And then Mom cut Rin's head off her shoulders in a single stroke.

I watched the head topple in slow motion. I. I just.

WHAT.

Obito shrieked, "WHAT THE FU—"

The—the head it was—

Zetsu. No, how—

Kushina-san!

"AAAAAAUGH!"

I whipped my head around so quickly I almost got whiplash, and was just in time to catch Gai—who had been thrown off the roof by Enomoto. Maekawa hit the ground hard five meters way, and I got to see the Tsunade-Zetsu tear a chunk out of Chiharu's throat with her—its—teeth. "Her" long blonde hair fell away, revealing the putty-like creature underneath with a vengeance while our teammate choked to death on his own blood.

Shit shit shit.

Obito lashed out, impaling the Tsunade-Zetsu on a massive Wood Release projection that branched off and stabbed through the ones pretending to be Yamaguchi-sensei and Shizune. Enomoto was down—and headless—by the time Mom, Gai and I managed to catch up and put down the remaining Zetsu clones with extreme prejudice.

Six seconds of combat without someone pulling IFF duty and half our team was dead.

Jesus fuck.

Maekawa planted the spiked end of her hammer in the Rin-Zetsu's gut, swearing under her breath.

I had my hand on Gai's shoulder, who was panting not from exertion but from shock. Aside from the thing I heard about his dad, I wasn't sure he'd ever been in a fight that was so much like Sensei's—wham, bam, corpses everywhere in a flash.

Isobu, what the fuck happened to Kurama?

I don't know. And I can't exactly tell anyone to track him down!

Point. Okay. Deeep breath.

"Gai"—and apparently I was still using enough of Isobu's chakra that my voice sounded like Jennifer Hale's or something—"hang in there. I need to get someone to make a call."

"Already did, Kei." Obito said. "I think."

After a second or two, Gai straightened up and seemed to shake the fear off entirely. His chakra was still jumpy, but he'd pushed most of the fear behind a curtain of bravado that would probably serve him better than my Isobu-influenced rage.

Speaking of. The last thing I needed was to have my brain marinating in the emotional equivalent of anabolic steroids.

You'll get rid of that armor when I say you can.

…Oookay then.

"Mom, what are we going to do?" I asked her, since she'd identified the Zetsu clone off-hand and dealt with the Rin-Zetsu immediately.

Mom looks in the direction of the Hokage tower. "Why did you stop?"

Earlier? "Isobu says that something happened to Kushina-san. She was helping us."

From Mom's expression, I could guess that she could guess the rest of that statement. Being able to spot Zetsu clones while they were disguised was not a common skill. Not in a village as big as ours. But Mom had done it anyway.

Was there some way to apply that to finding Hayate?

Obito was holding the Katsuyu clone in both hands, as though she was a cat or a small dog instead of a slug summon (and component of a creature that made kaijū look tiny). "Katsuyu-chan, how about we talk to the real Tsunade? Or Sensei. Sensei would be better."

"Uzumaki-san must have been compromised." Mom mused aloud, but quietly. "The question is: how?"

"—and half our team just died—" Obito went on in the background.

"Why Uzumaki-san?" Gai asked blankly. "And who is Isobu? Has someone been following us?"

"Why would the Hokage's wife be in danger?" Maekawa asked.

"—so we could really use some help even if it's just to move everyone—"

Did I look like I cared? "Gai, Maekawa-san, not right now. I'll explain later if we're not all dead." I turned my attention back to Mom. "How did you know Rin was a fake?"

"—and the enemy stopped what Kushina-san was doing somehow—"
"Her chakra didn't flow correctly." Mom told me. "But we need to find your brother, now."

I nodded, though I didn't really understand how the hell her sensing ability worked so differently from mine. I couldn't tell the Zetsu clones apart from the real people they disguised themselves as. But there were other, pressing problems. "Obito, can I speak to Katsuyu-san?"

"Huh? Yeah, sure. I'm not totally sure if this is getting through to anyone, since the other teams might be under attack, but...well it's not like you need anyone else. Do you know what's going on?" Obito asked, but he was looking at the armor. That wasn't important. Getting information to Sensei was.

"Distract Gai and Maekawa-san, please." I said to both him and to Mom, rather than answering. Mom's eyebrows went up, but Obito just nodded. I had to have a reason, right?

Whatever. I sat down on the nearest available surface—the bench in the garden—with Katsuyu on my left thigh. Where the hell was I even gonna start?

"Katsuyu-san, does every one of you hear everything each clone hears?" I asked her.

Katsuyu lifted her head and shook it from side to side, which just looked weird considering that her head wasn't really accompanied by a neck, per se. "No. The largest mass will hear the most information. It's very difficult to keep things organized otherwise."

I kind of hoped that the largest mass in Konoha was hanging out with either Sensei or Tsunade. "Where is that one?"

"With Hokage-sama. Tsunade-sama will be informed as well." I assumed that part was because Tsunade was the slugs' contractor, and therefore too important to leave out of the loop. That would work for me.

So I went and blitzed right through in the lowest voice I could. "Sensei, the Zetsu clones must have somehow figured out that someone was making their jobs harder. Kushina-san is the only one who makes sense as a target because while it's not common knowledge that she's Kurama's host, she's related to the late Mito-sama and Kurama's ability to detect evil wasn't exactly a secret." I took a breath. Needed to force the anger back before I did something everyone would regret. "And...I don't know if this part is true. It's speculation at this point. But something tore through the wards at my house. My brother's missing. And I know that Madara and the Zetsu collective have to know that I'm Isobu's host. The two facts might not be connected, but everyone else who's been killed by the Zetsu clones was killed on the spot." And eaten.

And there was more. There was always more, and I hated Madara and his plans so much. "You already know that Madara—or Tobi—was planning on releasing Kurama on Konoha to flatten it. There's some kind of sealing array someplace outside of Konoha that makes it easier, but I don't know how much difference an hour makes when it comes to stabilizing Kushina-san's seal. Alternatively, Madara might be banking on using my brother's life to lure me into the same damned trap because my seal is weaker than Kushina-san's, and thus would take less effort to break." What else, what else? Realizing that Sensei was probably about to get up and go storm the enemy stronghold personally, I went on rapidly, "There's a special Zetsu there with unknown powers, Sensei. The original White Zetsu should be with—with the hostages, if anywhere, but I don't know what the Black Zetsu attached to it can do." More Wood Release? "Advanced Wood Release at a minimum, plus whatever ground-melding abilities it might have used to get into the village."

I paused again, and this time I actually looked around at the rest of the street. Strangely unoccupied, but maybe we just hadn't been spotted? Fuck if knew how anyone could miss us. I was still throwing off Isobu's chakra thanks to the armor he'd given me.
"Did he get all of that, Katsuyu-san?" I asked.

"I think so, Keisuke-san." Katsuyu said. "He's not in the office anymore, and he took the Katsuyu split with him."

"Good." Hm… "Is there a Katsuyu with Kushina-san?"

Kurama didn't mention it.

Would he bother?

"There was," Ominous much? "Kushina-san seems to be gone, and the Katsuyu is trying to heal everyone else. Tsunade-sama is providing chakra."

Wait. Who would Sensei trust to look after…?

Did Kurama bitch about someone with a Sharingan? Singular?

…Yes. Why? A pause from Isobu, followed by, That boy again?

ARGH. "Obito, I think Kakashi's in trouble."

And as though on cue, an earthquake shook the village in a way that wasn't entirely natural, throwing up massive quantities of dust and flinging housing bits up into the air from across the village wall what the fuck.

…Was Nagato on the security detail?

The Rinnegan boy? Yes.

So, my to-do list was as follows, in order of importance to self. Sort of. Past the first three, it got a bit blurry.

Rescuing Hayate.

Checking up on Kakashi.

Helping Sensei rescue Kushina.

Defeat various Zetsu clones until the original pops up, and then smite him.

Secure the village from external threat.

Maybe talk Nagato out of pancaking Konoha by accident? Didn't quite count as an external threat…

I pinched the bridge of my nose. With a list like that, we'd better get started.

No offense intended to, um, everyone else in existence. But when my brother was in trouble, I remained aware of everything else that was supposed to cross my mind, thanks to Isobu's constant reminders. I just didn't especially care. Nagato could have been violently gravity-smashing enemy summon creatures to death right next to me and I probably still would have ignored him. Mostly.

I needed to find Hayate.

Which would require flaking out on Sensei's orders. On the Hokage's orders, when Konoha was already in crisis mode and, per the slug communication system, the Hokage in question had already skived off the job in pursuit of something else.

"Kei, you're doing that thing where you look like you really want to say something but think you're gonna get in trouble," Obito commented from the street. Somehow, I wasn't surprised that he could read my expressions that well.

I felt Mom's hand on my head. So much for having them run interference with Gai and Maekawa.

After a second or two, Mom knelt in front of me and cupped my face in her hands. "How long have you been holding all of that back?" I couldn't tell if it was amazement or shock in her voice, so I didn't guess. "Tell me. How long have you known all of these things?"

I tried not to make eye contact. "I… I didn't know you were listening." Which wasn't an answer, but I had a predisposition toward evading rather than being direct anyway.

"It was harder not to," Mom told me. "Look at me, please?"

It didn't have the snap of command, but I obeyed anyway. Mom smiled somewhat uncertainly, then wrapped me in a hug that had me crushed against her chest for the most part. I managed to hook my chin over her shoulder, to use my shaking arms to squeeze around her ribs.

"I don't know where you learned everything I heard," Mom said in a whisper, "but you sound like you're doing as much good as you can with it." A soft huff of a laugh. "Is there anything in that steel-trap of a mind to help us find your brother, Kei-chan?"

Yes. Yes, there was.

"I…I think so." Okay, I needed to think it through carefully. Theoretically… "Mom, the thing you do with sensing, can you find Hayate?"

Mom pulled back and shook her head. "No, Kei-chan. My range is only five meters at best." Her eyes were very dark, but I didn't know what was behind them. "Yours is better, isn't it?"
"Yeah. But I… I don't know where the ritual site is." The manga had been unhelpfully vague on that point, and no one ever established what Tobi's maximum teleportation range was. I knew that Sensei had a maximum range, but I'd never figured out what it was (other than being measured in kilometers).

Mom seemed to sag a bit.

"I think I can find out," I hastened to reassure her. "But… I'm not sure if you're gonna be happy with how I do it. Sensei will probably want to kill me, but…"

"We'll deal with the consequences together," Mom said. The corner of her mouth quirked up. "And I've already seen you in the grips of a Tailed Beast's rage. There's nothing you can do that will scare me off now. I'm your mother, after all."

_Oh, Mom. I'm far from the worst thing this night can possibly throw at us._ I tried to laugh, but it turned into a choked-off sob halfway through. No tears, thankfully, but my throat constricted like someone was trying to choke me and I couldn't say anything.

Mom pressed her forehead to mine. "Shhhh, shhhh. We'll get through this, just you wait. We'll get your brother back safe and sound. Just take a few deep breaths. Then we'll hear your plan."

Okay.

Mom let go of me and let me stand up on my own. Isobu's chakra receded somewhat, pulling the armor he'd created back into my coils to conserve my strength. There was a limit to how much of his energy I could use per day, or week or whatever. And since I wasn't getting jumped by anything like a Zetsu, Isobu felt secure enough to back off a bit. Possibly.

"Keisuke-chan, what is our next move?" Gai asked, pushing past Obito to speak to me directly.

"Well, we can't spot the enemy ahead of time like we have been." I made a show of crossing my arms and thinking about it. Doing so just about hid my trembling. "So we need to go straight to the source."

"The source?" Maekawa asked blankly. "Every one of those things is coming from a single point? That seems highly unlikely…"

"But it's true," Obito told her. "But… Kei, I don't know if you're going to be able to find it. I had to give Sensei directions, and it still got away."

"We're not searching for it," I corrected Obito after thinking about it. If Sensei couldn't track it… No. "But we can probably track Hayate."

"How?" Obito asked.

I gave Gai and Maekawa a quick glance, then decided that I didn't care about revealing extra details about the whole Tailed Beast thing. They'd seen the partial transformation, and maybe whatever other crazy things I'd done recently that didn't matter anymore. They'd be fine if they hadn't run for the hills already.

"I can use Isobu's chakra to expand my sensing range. Good enough?" I'd done it before, back when my spiritual energy had been going gleefully insane and destroying my precision chakra control. I could do it again. "The downside is that everything is also going to know where we are."

If they didn't already. Isobu's chakra was many things, but "subtle" wasn't one of them. But if Mom hadn't whipped out her katana and gone on a limb-chopping spree, we were probably fine.

"Isobu? You mean the Tailed Beast." Maekawa frowned. "You shouldn't...how do you know you can trust it?"

"I believe that if Keisuke-chan believes that she can do it, she can trust whomever she wishes!" Gai interrupted. "We have been fighting alongside Keisuke-chan and her invisible companion all night, and have suffered no strange disasters. I believe in her!"

Taken aback, it was all I could do to choke out, "...T-Thanks, Gai." I swallowed. "I'll do my best."

"Find us a path, Keisuke-chan! Then we..." Here, Gai paused, just for a second. There was a hesitation in him, which I hadn't seen before. "Then we may lay ghosts to rest!"

I nodded. He was probably talking about everyone who had died here, but it was also an apt description of Madara at this point in the timeline. A shell of a man, holding on through bitterness and a burning desire to see the world ground down under his heel.

He deserved every inch of payback anyone could muster.

Mom gestured for me to get on with it. Maekawa still looked a bit nervous, but eh.

And Obito? Obito gave me a thumbs-up, as Katsuyu crawled back up onto his shoulder.

Right, then.

Isobu?

Whenever you're ready.

I closed my eyes.

Gentler than I'd been interacting with that corrosive energy all night, I teased scraps of it free of the seal. Filaments of Isobu's chakra seeped into my chakra coils very slowly, weaving through my lighter, human chakra like a needle through cloth. I teased our energies apart and then together in my mind's eye, maintaining the Snake seal with my actual hands.

What was once blue—my water-aligned chakra—started becoming ever-so-slightly purple in my synesthesia-affected brain. I could feel Isobu reinforcing what I had rather than just flooding my coils like he did if there was a crisis, and I could "see" him lounging around on the glacier shelf in my head.

And now breathe out.

I did.

Where are you, little brother?

A constellation in my mind's eye—deceptively simple, with the brightest points of light standing out in the dark. I could sense most of the chakra signatures in the village, but only as vague blurs. More powerful chakra—the Zetsu monsters when massing together, Jiraiya, Tsunade, some village jōnin—was brighter. Little stars were lit up across the planetarium inside my head, which might have given Isobu an interesting view when he looked up. When it came to Hayate, though, I could tell where he was without any further prompting.
Fifteen kilometers that way.

And there, midway between here and Hayate, were rapidly moving lights that seemed to be heading in that direction. Isobu roused in my mindscape, looking at the one that gleamed red in the dark—Kurama?—and the gaggle of other shooting stars in pursuit.

The big, clunky one with a throbbing bass-line felt like Nagato. Other lights were snuffed out next to him, a lot.

And the little bright light, white in the dark… Kakashi.

…A rescue mission would be more practical with him and the others on board…

I opened my eyes. "I found everyone."

"Well, then what are we waiting for?" Obito asked with a grin. "Lead the way, Kei."

"Leading the way" meant that my team didn’t so much join Kakashi’s fight as hit it like a freight train. This was not, however, to say that someone wasn’t already doing just that by the time we got there. Nagato could probably throw actual freight trains around once he got going, but a jinchūriki tearing into the enemy’s flank did some good in terms of spreading the destruction around.

It was followed shortly by Kakashi’s lightning-streaked kunai cutting through the Zetsu directly in front of Obito, Obito bouncing off its corpse to get at the one trying to sneak up on Gai (who was pinwheeling through the air and kicking Zetsu clones halfway across the battlefield and to their deaths). Mom used another shot of the Mountain Cutter jutsu (though I wasn’t sure if you could call it one, since it wasn’t a ninja technique) to carve through four Zetsu clones at once, while Maekawa brought her hammer down on a clone’s face hard enough to leave a three-meter crater underneath the point of impact.

And me?

I pounced on the Zetsu that was trying to blindside Nagato and tore it to shreds with my bare hands. Well, my Isobu-enhanced hands. It wasn’t like Isobu had claws or, say, legs to help me with any fiddly stuff.

All of our effort was promptly made trivial when Nagato got his breath back, opened his eyes, and threw one hand out to his right like he was trying to direct a symphony.

A thirty-meter-long cone of…of space suddenly opened up in that direction—Nagato’s technique had smashed everything else aside. Where there had once been trees, earth, and possibly hidden Zetsu clones, there was suddenly nothing but a massive furrow in the ground that Isobu probably could have sat in if he wasn’t picky about space.

But beyond that massive trench, in the trees and in the dark, I could see the white blobs in the distance that indicated the enemy was close and didn’t much care who it was spotted by.

How to contain an entire mob of Zetsu clones, simply and easily?

…Ooooh, idea.

I raised my voice a bit to say, "Someone find me a live Zetsu!"

A groaning Zetsu clone was promptly flung in my direction, but by Kakashi instead of Maekawa.
I put both of my hands on its head and concentrated. Seal lines spread from my fingers and wove down its face and neck and shoulders, coalescing into a series of explosive seals. Together, they were some of the strongest instant seals I was capable of creating on this scale. I'd incorporated as much Lightning and Fire as I could manage, though Water's power to dissolve chemical bonds and the like would also make the results more fun.

They were also on a timer.

I shoved the Zetsu away, toward Nagato. "Nagato, aim at the horde."

Nagato looked at the Zetsu, peered at the seals, and automatically winced. Being on a team with Konan had probably giving him a thoroughly practical education in things that went boom, so I wasn't surprised that he didn't try to touch it. Exhaling loudly, he grabbed the Zetsu clone with his gravity-manipulating power and did... something to it. I didn't know what, but there was a lot of chakra involved.

Then that same Zetsu clone was shooting toward the enemy massing in the distance. It was probably like seeing an RPG heading straight for some distant target—the projectile was visible half because it was huge and half because it was moving just slowly enough to be visible but not slow enough to react to. The Zetsu, upon clipping the ground at the end of its shallow arc, knocked a cloud of dust into the air in a huge plume and skidded to a stop somewhere in the middle of everything.

Kakashi brought his hands together and, with Obito working alongside him for the first time in what felt like a month, brought the Earth Release: Earth Wall jutsu to bear.

Hiding behind a wall of compacted earth and stone, none of us saw the explosion go off. I didn't even want to think about looking. We felt the air pressure change, with wild winds whipping up whirlwinds of dust and debris in the wake of the ear-ringing explosion.

And I felt it when a decent chunk of the clone army—all the little lights in my mind's eye—were violently snuffed out.

I felt like Kimblee for about four seconds, then tried not to think about it once the urge to make a nihilistic quip didn't manifest.

As the dust settled, I got a chance to take stock of things.

Nagato stood up, peeking over the edge of the Earth Wall. His hair was about three centimeters shorter on the left side of his head compared to the right; the bright red abruptly terminated in burned fragments right around his earlobe, indicating a near-miss. His Akatsuki cloak collar was similarly scorched, but he didn't look injured. Mostly, he looked pissed off. Even as I watched, he made a hissing noise between his teeth and climbed over the wall, stomping off to finish off whatever stragglers might remain in Konoha's newest artificial clearing.

Kakashi, while he'd decided to stand up at the same time, was somewhat worse for the wear compared to our resident god-ninja. In addition to a generous speckling of blood across the gray vest of his uniform, one of his forearm guards was cracked down the middle and the same arm was sluggishly dripping blood from a cut I couldn't see. His Sharingan was closed when he looked at me, and it wasn't just because I could see sweat dripping down his face. He felt tired.

Gai saved me from having to say anything, because he could break the ice as easily as he broke other people's bones. "My eternal rival, how joyous it is to see you again!"

And, despite what I'd been expecting, I watched as the tension slowly bled out of Kakashi's stance.
When Gai hit him with one of those complimentary friendly shoulder-slaps that could knock the wind out of the unsuspecting, Kakashi just rolled with it.

He even relaxed further when Gai decided that he needed a friendly arm around his shoulders.

Either Gai and Kakashi had a Thing, or he was seriously not on top of his game. Or maybe there was another possibility. Gai is to Kakashi as Obito is to Kei? Shitty analogy, but...

I reached over and pushed Obito's drooping jaw up with one finger. While I could appreciate a good and comedic jaw drop on principle, now was not the time to gawk.

"What happened to you?" I asked, giving the blood spatter a pointed look.

"Most of it isn't mine," Kakashi replied, easing himself out of Gai's grip. "The Zetsu clones hit the Barrier Team building. Genma and Raidō went down fighting, but the enemy escaped with Kushina-sama. Nagato-san and I pursued."

Which I'd kind of figured, but it was a blow to hear it said aloud. And I had to wonder how much Kakashi was hiding behind that careful, level tone. It sounded like an official report to a superior officer, not an account of what would have been a horrifying attack when everyone involved would have felt safe.

Or maybe I was projecting.

Probably the second thing. Kakashi could handle things better than I could.

"Tell us they're alive," Obito nearly begged. I agreed, though for some reason my tongue wouldn't form the words.

Kakashi sighed. "I don't know. I left Katsuyu back there to tend to them. Nagato and I didn't really need her."

Obito held our Katsuyu under Kakashi's nose. "Actually, yeah, you do. You're burning chakra like crazy and that arm can't be comfortable."

I thought I saw Kakashi's masked jaw twitch, but he accepted the slug and she crawled onto his shoulder.

As Katsuyu got to healing (and possibly transferring some of Tsunade's mammoth chakra reserves), I tried to think about what we needed to know. What I needed to do.

So, after powering down a bit from I-Am-Turtle-Hear-Me-Roar mode, I started talking. "Kakashi, you've met Mom." Mom had carefully avoided saying anything while we were sorting out our teenage drama, but she nodded in acknowledgement of the introduction anyway and Kakashi nodded warily back. "And this is Maekawa-san, one of Gai's neighbors. You might know her, too."

"We've met very briefly," Maekawa said, then returned to examining the battlefield. After a second or so, she took off after Nagato with her hammer slung across her back.

"Right." Kakashi shrugged with his uninjured shoulder, since apparently they'd never made any significant impression on each other. He turned his attention back to Mom. "Are you leading this team, Gekkō-san?"

"Nominally." She pushed me forward so I was taking center stage, such that it was. "But I believe that Kei has been supplying much of our information, so I'd like everyone to share what they have while we have the chance. I only know a little of the enemy we face now."

It turned out that, among the four of us kids and plus Mom, we had something like a handle on what was going on.

The Zetsu clones had hit the Barrier Team building, killing half a dozen shinobi and taking both Genma and Raidō out of the fight with leg injuries of some kind. Kakashi wasn't a medic and didn't actually know the exact nature of their injuries, but given that he and Nagato had been the only ones capable of pursuing, I could fill in the blanks. Everyone else was dead, and we weren't getting any backup aside from those Katsuyu could easily divert to our position. And she wouldn't if Tsunade didn't order it.

"The oddest thing was the split Zetsu." Kakashi crossed his arms, and Katsuyu stretched herself across his shoulders like a fur stole made of squishy stuff. The gash on his arm was already closed.
"All the other creatures are pure white, but this one was split down the middle into black and white halves."

Meaning that, if the original White Zetsu wasn't running amok, the Black Zetsu half was. Could Zetsu clones rip themselves in half and join up with other Zetsu clones? Because it was seeming like the answer was going to be "yes, with extreme variants."

"That's the thing that was originally called 'Zetsu' from my visions," I said. "It has a ton of different jutsu to keep itself from getting killed, but apparently that doesn't keep it from being tracked. How have you been following it?"

Turned out that Kushina had never entirely lost the habit of using her hair like Hansel and Gretel used breadcrumbs. Not often, and very carefully, but Kakashi was able to catch the scent himself with Kushina's occasional reinforcement. It helped mitigate the issue caused by one of Zetsu's particularly bullshit powers, which Obito explicitly identified:

"That's the thing the Zetsu copies do to hide from people!" Obito said, once Kakashi described it. "They melt into the ground and travel that way, using tunnels and other buried Zetsu to navigate. So Kushina-san must have been pulling her hair to give you a trail every time they came up for air."

Because, of course, Kushina had to breathe. As opposed to the adaptive Zetsu clones.

"How is she still conscious?" Mom wanted to know. She had the same body language as Kakashi at the moment, but with more restraint.

"I don't know. But we're still finding hair." Kakashi chuffed, like a tiger. "Or we were. Trap or not, we were still finding hair up until just now." He jabbed a thumb over his shoulder, indicating the battlefield past the Earth Wall.

Until Nagato had to hit everything with the Fist of God. Twice. We'd be lucky to find anything to lead us to her that way—and since my method involved expending Isobu's chakra, there went our stealth rating. We'd still find her, but we'd have to stomp every Zetsu between her and us into the ground first.

"And your dogs?" I asked.

"I left Akino with Biwako-sama." And thus Naruto. Good call. "The rest haven't been summoned. I don't want to put them at risk yet, and I can track just fine on my own." He drummed his fingers against his left bicep. "And I have thumbs, which means jutsu."

Sounded like the reasons I'd dismissed Tsuruya, so I didn't bother questioning him on any of those
"I think that we should be able to defeat the enemy without jutsu!" Gai insisted, to my mild surprise. "We need to conserve chakra, and we will not always have Katsuyu-san to help us regain chakra!"

"Gai, not everyone can kill these guys with a single kick," Obito pointed out.

"This should not dissuade you from trying!" Gai said brightly. "It is important to think positive in desperate situations."

"Gai," Kakashi cut in as Obito's expression went flat with annoyance. "Leave it for now."

Gai gave Kakashi a long look before shrugging. "As you wish, my eternal rival."

Obito looked at Kakashi like he expected our team's mini-jōnin to grow an extra head any moment.

"It would be best to regroup with Nagato-san and inform him of the new information we've acquired." Mom gave me a particularly pointed look. "Kei-chan, I know your sensing technique isn't subtle, but we need to find Uzumaki-san to end this, don't we?"

Well, where Kushina ended up was probably where Sensei would be. Since I didn't really see any plan for confronting Madara that ended well without those two, it made sense. And besides, it wasn't going to be hard to drum up support for the idea of rescuing Kushina or helping Sensei do so. Assassinating the original White Zetsu sans any other details would probably be a harder sell.

I nodded.

"Then we've decided. Kakashi-kun, if you—"

I heard Maekawa scream, and then suddenly all of us were leaping over the Earth Wall after the noise.

The scream was over by the time we got there. It had been replaced by a faint, painful gurgle as blood dripped down from Maekawa's lips. It dripped onto her hands, the haft of her hammer, and the body of the Zetsu whose blade-shaped arm was still thrust through her sternum. Its head had been violently relocated to the depths of its torso via hammer, but not quickly enough.

Gai charged forward with a shout of rage, smashing the half-transformed and half-crushed Zetsu aside with one vicious kick. The blow wrenched the Zetsu's arm out of Maekawa's chest and she sank to the ground into a pool of her own blood.

Gai caught her before she landed face-first on the ground.

I stabbed the Zetsu coming up behind him through the face, then jerked my katana sideways with a nasty flourish that spit its head vertically and horizontally.

Obito leapt onto another Zetsu, impaling it twice with a hastily-assembled Wood Release spear.

Kakashi flung two Lightning kunai down the length of the field and killed two more, bringing a third kunai down on an emerging Zetsu's hand with a quick spin in place.

Mom used the Mountain Cutter again and suddenly there were a lot more half-Zetsus not running around because they didn't have legs.

Then Nagato stormed back into the melee, grabbed a Zetsu, and...did something. I saw a ball of black energy being forced down its throat, and then it was sent skidding across the entire battlefield.
like a runaway train. It might have hit a tree at the other end, but by then I was already running over to Maekawa and Gai with my hands flaring green.

The ground trembled and, with a tremendous roar of earth and stone, Zetsu clones emerged from the ground as though being plucked from it like errant potatoes. They flew through the air toward the original Zetsu that was used as a shot-put, massing into a single white…yes. That was a sphere of compacted Zetsu clones, getting bigger all the time as more and more Zetsu clones were pulled into what seemed to be quickly becoming a giant sphere of mashed-together bodies.

And apparently we'd been sitting on a nest of the damn things.

My chakra completely failed to take hold in Maekawa's system—already dying on the spot—and at the same time, Nagato brought the full force of his massive chakra reserves to bear and crushed the mass of Zetsu clones into a space the size of a truck tire.

There may have been fairly horrible sounds. I don't remember.

Gai and I got Maekawa rolled over, so we could see her face.

She reached up with one blood-slicked hand and grasped Gai's trembling fingers hard enough to turn his fingertips white. "Gai…"

"Maekawa-san…" Gai whispered.

Maekawa's eyes, glazing over with shock and pain, still focused squarely on Gai's face. Her lips parted to form a rictus of a grin, fierce and proud despite the blood. "…G-Go on, Gai-kun…" Don't let this stop you, I half-translated.

Her chakra slipped away.

Her hand, though, didn't droop. Gai was holding on too tightly to let that happen, his head bowed over his neighbor's half-lidded dead stare.

Kakashi seemed to appear from nowhere, crouching next to Gai's other side and whispering something in a low, serious tone into Gai's ear.

Gai's head stayed bowed.

Kakashi bumped Gai's shoulder with his. I caught him saying something including the phrase, "would have wanted." For my part, I sat there like an indecisive deer in headlights for what felt like forever.

Then, after Kakashi convinced Gai to close Maekawa's eyes and stand up, I got to my feet as well and headed straight for Nagato. Given half a moment to wallow in anger, shock or grief, and our team's attempts to fix everything would grind to a halt.

I didn't really want to push. Gai needed time to sort out his feelings, but sooner or later there would be more Zetsu clones and more death until we could find the mastermind and punch his teeth in. We needed to keep going.

It was the same kind of single-minded stubbornness that had let me push my worry about Hayate into Isobu's domain in the back of my mind. It wasn't the same as suppressing my emotions, but I was just giving Isobu more fuel to use to channel his chakra through my body. Avoidance was doubly unhealthy in my case, but I didn't have any other options.
"Nagato-san, I can locate Kushina-san," I told him in a voice gone flat and dead. I felt Mom walk up behind me, while Obito went over to try helping Kakashi with Gai. Hopefully we would still have a team by the end of this.

Nagato blinked, shaking himself out of whatever battle-rage mode he'd been in. "You can?"

I crossed my arms over my chest. "Host of the Three-Tails, and a sensor. Turns out you can combine the two."

"Then we're going after her," Nagato said firmly.

Yes and no. I channeled Isobu's chakra again, in the specialized way I had before. Kushina and Sensei had moved, with their chakra signals stilling somewhere in the forests to the southwest of the village. Rather than the original fifteen kilometers, we were a mere eleven kilometers away from what I presumed was the ritual site. Hayate's chakra was still there, too, but dimmer compared to the other two.

I doubt you're going to just leave it like that. Isobu's tails lashed the icy air in my mindscape. Especially when your brother is right there.

"Nagato-san, your cousin isn't the only one there," I said, my eyes still closed. "Sensei and Kushina-san are both there, and…fighting?" I tilted my head up and met his eyes with calm I didn't actually possess. "Maybe. But something took my kid brother from my house, and I'm gonna get him back. So you don't get to just indiscriminately smash the entire area with your shiny new gravity jutsu, even if it'd work on most stuff. You need to be specific."

Nagato looked a bit taken aback that I would give him orders about anything. My role was supposed to revolve around information. Not command.

"You or I could remove your brother from the line of fire, Kei-chan," Mom said from my left. "In theory."

Nagato looked from me to my mother and back again. His expression was an indecisive mix of surprise, anxiousness, and perhaps a trace of hope. Not for my brother, who he didn't know, but it was always nice to have comrades when trying to plan and then enact a complex rescue mission with unknown enemies around every corner.

And when you got down to it, Nagato was the biggest blunt instrument we could use against Madara at this point in history.

"This is a rescue mission first," I said, though reluctantly. I wanted my brother back safe and sound more than I wanted every Zetsu on the planet dead and gone. And yet the idea of killing Madara or one of his major catspaws… "But we should stay aware of any targets of opportunity. I don't know when we're gonna get another chance to decapitate the Zetsu army."

Likely never, if Madara was as intelligent as Kishimoto had been insisting.

"And I shall accompany you on your quest!" Gai announced, stomping over to us. The corners of his eyes were damp and his nose was still running, but his body language screamed determination. "We will work together to bring peace back to Konoha and secure our village's future! This is the promise of a lifetime!" He gave the rest of us a thumbs-up and a slightly wobbly grin.

I shot a look at Kakashi, who nodded. Obito gave a helpless shrug from next to him. Apparently, the mysteries of one Maito Gai were for the universe and Kakashi to comprehend.
"Thank you, Gai-kun," Mom said, bowing slightly. "We will do the best we can to help you fulfill it."

And to do that, we needed...okay. So maybe we didn't really need a plan, as such. None of our plans had survived thirty seconds of contact with friendlies, never mind the actual goddamn enemy.

So we ran, and schemed on the way.

The sealing array in the foothills was a work of art.

Four stone pillars were arranged into a half-circle around a raised dais, with all five structures linked by seals. Not seals on the ground, oh no. Someone had decided to use seals across thin air, weaving amongst themselves like fine black chains. If I had time to stop and properly examine them, I probably would have practically frothed at the mouth for a chance to study them for the applications alone.

But there were four things getting in the way.

One: Kushina was bound up in those seals, which were crawling down her arms toward the blacked-out seal on her stomach. We could only hear one thing over the sound of her screaming as Kurama's red chakra was painfully dragged out of her.

Two: Kurama had already half-emerged from Kushina's chakra coils and was screaming too, making a high animal noise that was nothing less than pain and anger given voice. I could almost see his chakra clinging to the seal, refusing to be removed and enslaved to another master's will.

Three: Sensei was teleport-spamming the hell out of the emergent Zetsu army, keeping Zetsu (black-and-white edition) from getting anywhere near close enough to pour more power into the extraction seal array. Every time the monster tried to get close to Kushina and Kurama, Sensei was stabbing the extra clones he spawned or slamming a Rasengan into any interlopers with extreme prejudice.

Four: I still couldn't see my brother.

But you know what? I prioritized. "Everybody, SMASH!"

Nagato swept through the ranks of the generic Zetsu clones and literally rolled them up into a massive white Katamari, just like the group from before. He missed the hybrid Zetsu only because Sensei was too close to avoid if he moved that way, but Nagato still violently squashed the Zetsu clones he caught.

Whitish water flew everywhere as their liquid mass was compressed right out of them.

Obito charged into the remainders of the fray next, with his Sharingan almost glowing in the full moon's silvery light. He snarled even as he skidded in front of Kushina, trying to hold back the half-formed Kurama before he could emerge and possibly fall into Zetsu's sway.

Kakashi appeared alongside him, their paired Sharingan synchronizing their chakra and doubling their effective influence on Kurama—or, rather, against whatever compulsions Zetsu had put into the extraction array.

"Think you can hold on for a minute, Kakashi?" Obito asked, reaching out toward Kurama with his replacement right arm.

Kakashi copied the movement, but with his left. "I think I can."
Mom's chakra flared as she activated the First, Second, and Third Gates all in a row, and used the Mountain Cutter to tear the sealing pillars apart between one blink and the next. Her sword glowed like a blue lightsaber, cleaving through more rock than it could have physically touched and leaving the seal in tatters with its job half-finished.

Gai stuck by me, uncharacteristically silent as we used my chakra sense to locate Hayate all over again. With so much powerful chakra flowing through the area—of which Kurama was simply the most ludicrous example—picking out smaller chakra signatures was quickly proving to be an exercise in futility. I was getting too much feedback from everything else to even know where to start.

Clear your head and let me handle this.

Or it was.

Hayate was to my left, but where?

It was then that Black Zetsu detached from White Zetsu, suddenly turning Sensei's fight into a two-on-one match instead. Mom moved to assist, still using three Gates at once to keep up with the fight, while everyone else stuck to their assigned roles.

Obito tossed the first of two sealing scrolls over his shoulder, seals broken, and doused Black and White Zetsu in two hundred and fifty thousand liters of water all at once.

Nagato picked most of that water up, formed it into the rough shape of a cylinder, and brought it down with an immense bang that shook the ground where Black Zetsu had been standing a fraction of a second before.

With Mom and Nagato both engaging the Zetsu pair, Sensei broke off and popped out of existence once—getting the kunai launcher scroll from Obito—and twice to reach Kushina.

I figured that was taken care of, snatched the now-empty storage scroll out of the middle of the melee with a chakra tail, and immediately started rewriting the seal's physical parameters on the spot. My compression seal, added around the storage seal's properties, would capture and indefinitely contain whatever I managed to snatch with it.

I rolled the scroll, quick as a whip, and handed it off to Gai. All he needed to do was hit the right target, and with a sticky adhesive to make it stick to the nunchaku he preferred, it would be easy enough to succeed.

Then I drew Isobu's chakra up, tapped into the water-hammer thing that Nagato was throwing around, and dropped a Water Dragon Bullet on White Zetsu's face.

What a time to get it right.

And then there was a shriek of sudden pain from Kakashi, making my head whip around so fast I almost got whiplash. Automatically, I said, "Kakashi?" before I even knew what was going on.

Obito was doubled over on the ground, clawing at his chest in soundless agony. And down on one knee next to him, clutching his hands over his left eye socket, was Kakashi. I didn't even have the slightest idea what had happened—they should have been able to suppress Kurama with Kurama's consent even if they didn't have the Mangekyō!

Distantly, I noticed that Hayate's chakra had moved, but I was already charging for my teammates despite the danger.
An invisible hand picked me up by the scruff of my flak jacket and flung me aside like a rag doll, sending me skidding away from my teammates. I rolled instantly to my feet once I got them under me again, and saw grayish-white spines sticking up through the grass where I'd just been.

Giving Nagato a quick thumbs-up, I put my right hand on the handle of my katana and maneuvered around the spikes so I was once again running toward my teammates.

Kurama's half-formed specter loomed over them both until, with a horrific tearing noise, the beast split in half down the center of its body. The now-darker half of it dissolved into red energy and streamed back into Kushina in a flood that would have struck a lesser person dead on the spot. As it was, Kushina collapsed on the dais like a puppet with cut strings, dazed but alive, and landed in Sensei's arms.

The light Kurama, with his/its exposed innards slowly rearranging into a working second half, planted its working forepaw a scant meter away from where my teammates were insensate on the ground. As its jaw regrew a left side and its chakra started to form a second pair of limbs, it screamed raw rage to the heavens.

And then I saw why Obito had collapsed—black energy like chakra but not was streaming from the hidden seal in his chest and sending tendrils out. It spread like ink, with lines projecting out into thin air before whipping around and sinking hooklike projections into Obito's arms and locking him in place from sheer pain.

I tripped on nothing, face-planting on the grass with a gasp of pain as my chest seized. I coughed on reflex and rolled onto my side as I choked on air.

Through glazed eyes, I could see the inky black hooks crawling out from under my clothes and sending waves of pain up toward my brain.

In my mind's eye, Isobu was already screaming, his tails lashing in frustrated fury as Madara's seal once again emerged in my mindscape and tore into him like some kind of beaked, tentacle-laden monster. A tendril lashed around his leftmost tail and his crown of cranial spikes, as another hooked into my throat and choked me instantly.

And then I got a read on the chakra of the creature that emerged from the ground, walking slowly toward me with its eye socket seeming to glow with an alien black light.

It was definitely a Zetsu, and definitely similar to that Guruguru creature Obito had once been semi-friendly with. It was still a monster and still needed to be killed. There was no doubt about that.

But wrapped in the core of it, nearly smothered, was my brother's chakra.

I gasped, forcing my right elbow underneath me to lever myself up. Another pulse from the Puppet Master seal and I was on the grass again, digging my fingers into the damp earth to keep from screaming.

"Looking for someone, Kei-chan?" the nameless Zetsu clone asked.

I managed to growl, "Y-You—"

The Zetsu sat on its heels in front of me, idly resting its arms over the tops of its thighs. "So much for the runaway act, huh?"

As I watched, its head unfurled like Guruguru's had, back when we first reunited with Obito. In between the claylike spikes, my brother's head lolled limply with the whims of gravity.
I snarled in wordless, primal rage, lunging for the creature before another pulse from the seal brought me down again. The Zetsu still danced backward, making a chittering sound that might have been laughter. Its head and shoulders twisted back together, hiding Hayate from view.

"Nice try, Kei-chan! But you're going to have to sit and behave like a good girl! And isn't that the saying?" Its voice dropped, lower and lower until it was a bass growl, "Children shouldn't be seen or heard, right?"

I'LL FUCKING KILL YOU!

And then the Zetsu, to its and my surprise, was thrown forward abruptly with stunning force. Nagato, standing halfway across the battlefield and otherwise helping Kakashi to his feet again, had one hand held out toward the spiky Zetsu and was forcing it to float in midair by its hands.

"Get away from her, you bastard." And then Mom was there, cleaving both of the Zetsu's arms from its body.

While the white-gray flesh landed on the ground with an anticlimactic flop, Mom reversed the grip on her katana and placed her thumb, middle, and index fingers of both hands on opposite sides of the stunned Zetsu's head.

There was a nails-on-a-chalkboard sensation, and the Zetsu unraveled into what looked like ten meters of coiled white rope on the spot.

And in the middle, where it had been, Hayate stood on his entangled legs for maybe half a second before toppling backwards into Mom's arms.

"Stop that!" White Zetsu snarled, white teeth snapping at the air with every word. "You're ruining everything even after we got the Fox? You're cheating!"

The aforementioned fox, with the other half of his body regrown from nothing but chakra, ignored Sensei and Kushina and smashed his new left paw down where White Zetsu suddenly wasn't. Black Zetsu flattened where he was, sliding across the ground like a shadow, and made a beeline for—

"Obi—!" And then I was choking on air again.

Mom reached for me, still holding Hayate in her arms.

Kakashi got to his feet and dove for Obito. Gai did, too, while Nagato spun the column of water out into thin tendrils of concentrated water that aimed for the White Zetsu.

"OBITO!" I heard Sensei shout, maybe in warning, but Kurama’s right paw smashed into the ground directly between Sensei and Obito and cut off line of sight. I heard Sensei swear at the fox, but Kushina’s half of Kurama also started flaring up at that moment and Sensei didn’t have time for anything else. Nagato’s chakra shoved Kurama aside with one massive burst of kinetic energy, trying to keep the fox from crushing us all.

Black Zetsu reached Obito and engulfed him in inky darkness.

Obito—no, Obito's body staggered upright even though he was almost entirely covered in Black Zetsu's shapeless body. Even as Kakashi pulled up short, horror writ large across his face, Black Zetsu steered them both toward me and Hayate and Mom.

Kakashi's hand started sparking.
And Mom, realizing what was happening, stood up with her sword in hand and Hayate held to her left side, growling, "Let him go, you son of a bitch!"

The supposedly-disabled Zetsu at Mom's feet twitched. I tried to scream a warning and almost blacked out when the seal tore into my stomach and felt like it tried to pry my ribs open. Anything I wanted to say died in my throat.

Black Zetsu pried Obito's Sharingan open. "Take a good look, brat. See what happens when you don't toe the line?"

No, no, no no no no this isn't happening no this can't be happening don't let—

The white spikes struck, catching Mom just under her shoulder blades and through her right leg at the knee.

MOM!

Mom crumpled to the ground, one arm still outstretched across Hayate's shoulders.

Obito screamed.

Kakashi's hand stopped sparking as he stumbled, clutching his left eye all over again as Gai held him upright. Gai's eyes were wide with shocked horror, nunchaku clutched tightly in his free hand.

Sensei's Flying Thunder God kunai rained down around us, punching holes through parts of the environment and through White Zetsu. One impaled Obito's kunai holster. Another stuck through Mom's sleeve. Gai caught one out of the air. I narrowly avoided taking one through my head, but only because of luck. It cut into the tie holding my headband in place and got stuck there. Another kunai went high and clung in Kurama's orange fur.

Fwish.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter's song title is brought to you by Puella Magi Madoka Magica.
I wasn't on the ground but I was choking on my screams again, thrashing against whatever was holding me. Fishhooks sank into every scrap of skin I still had, twisting in the wound and dragging me through what had to be a living hell. I felt my head bounce off of something as I flailed in agony and none of it made any difference.

Something big wrapped around me, forcing me facedown onto grassy earth. I couldn't move but it almost hurt less than the cocoon of pain Madara's seal had me trapped in. I could have broken both my arms and legs and it wouldn't hurt this bad.

"String-Cutter Seal!"

And it stopped.

My chest heaved from the effort of keeping myself from just bursting into tears from the sheer relief of not hurting, and it took entirely too much effort for me to prop myself up on my elbows. Getting to my feet seemed, for a moment, like a pipe dream.

"Better, Kei-kun?" Jiraiya's hand was splayed out across my back.

I managed to nod, and he looped his arm around my torso like I was an errant pup and hauled me to my feet again. I listed badly to one side, and someone else caught me.

"Kei-senpai, you're going to be all right now," Rin said, kneeling on the ground next to me. She wrapped one arm around me and started pumping healing chakra into my battered ribcage. On one hand, I appreciated her dedication to bedside manner, for all that it approached the definition of the term "tunnel vision." On the other…um. Hello. World falling apart, here?

What happened?

Sensei's Flying Thunder God jutsu had never been used on a group that I remembered, but I could vaguely recall that he'd used it defensively on a Tailed Beast Bomb before. This was an inversion of that process; deliberately moving everyone to a kill-zone.

Because I couldn't think of any other reason to find both Jiraiya and Tsunade in the same spot despite the way all our teams had split up, along with Honoka and a squad of ANBU, the Third Hokage and two of the Elders. Everyone was in battle mode from what I could feel, so we hadn't caught them by surprise. Sensei had set this up somehow, even beyond what our team had planned using Katsuyu relays.

They were doing a lot better than our group was.
Mom was on the ground, Hayate was unconscious, Kushina was dazed, Kakashi was dealing with major sympathetic feedback, Gai straight-up wasn't good enough to be here, Sensei was juggling eight different crises along with a bunch of knives, Nagato didn't know where to aim, and I was trembling from the aftereffects of a local-flavor Cruciatus Curse.

Kurama loomed overhead, standing up on all four legs with nine tails lashing like mad.

And in the middle of it all, Obito was up to his remaining eyeball in what seemed like a full-body sheath made of Black Zetsu’s malleable form. He couldn't open his mouth or scream, but I could see the black lines connecting the evil mass to his eye and could see his Sharingan glow.

And it formed the triple-bladed Mangekyō that I could still remember from some of my worst nightmares.

In the distance, something huge gave a guttural roar and I saw white something, about the size of Kurama, charge toward him with all the grace of a pie falling down stairs (and several million times the mass). Kurama roared back, ears flat against his massive neck and his tails raised high in a threat display.

What the shit?

"Aburame clan, now!" Tsunade's voice roared over the general panic, and then the clearing exploded into thousands upon thousands of silvery wings.

One bug landed on my shoulder, turning around to face me properly. Its little compound eyes couldn't blink, but I nonetheless got the impression that it was giving me a funny look.

I blinked, brushing the little monster off before it could start eating my human chakra. "Seal butterflies?" I asked as it flapped off to join the horde.

"They can easily tell the difference between the enemy and living shinobi," murmured a shinobi next to me. I looked over and recognized, after a brief moment of shock, Shimika Aburame in her long olive-toned overcoat. "Their chakra tastes different."

"Is this you?" I asked. I sort of meant to ask if she had summoned them, or if she was actually a bug clone, but ended up not really asking either.

"No," Shimika said, and evaporated into a cloud of kikai insects that promptly joined the swarm.

The swarm blurred through the clearing, making it impossible to see anything. And because everything flying in the immediate area also happened to be of a chakra-devouring persuasion, my chakra sense told me precisely fuck-all. I couldn't even feel Kurama and the Zetsu abomination squaring off, and I knew they were there.

What the absolute shit?

I managed to steady myself after another second or two, trying to figure out what the hell was going on. Rin’s arm around me helped a bit—her energy was just barely there, compared to the way everything else had gone fuzzy—but still.

It was a trial.

Obito was nearly bent double, with his normal arm clutching at his Zetsu-borne and Zetsu-infested arm in attempt to keep himself from doing anything. Black Zetsu, clinging to Obito like a second skin, had shifted so that his yellow dot of an eye settled over Obito's empty eye socket and his rictus of a mouth was overlapping Obito's in a way that made him look like someone had stitched it over his face.

Kakashi and Gai were in front of him, and I caught the words "don't give up" before the swarm of hell-butterflies thickened into a storm of wingbeats. The tide of bugs was nearly thick enough to force me back, but I just ended up using my free arm to defend my face. Even if they couldn't get at my chakra past Isobu, I didn't need a bug in my eye.

"Rin, can you…?" I trailed off, finally seeing the look on her face. The angle was wrong, but I could also feel her chakra next to mine.

"I…that was Obito." Rin's face was white. "Kei, what happened to him?"

I guessed she must have missed the big freak-out I had a second ago over that exact thing. I sort of felt like I should have apologized for distracting her. My unsteadiness was a minor issue, compared to the whole "Obito is possessed by an abomination from the dawn of time aaaaaaaagh" situation, which took up most of my headspace.

"Madara's messing with him," I informed Rin in a very quiet voice. What I was saying was probably mostly true, but I didn't know the details beyond what I'd experienced. I was still willing to pin everything on Madara, though. I heard her squeak in surprise, and went on with, "There's a seal in his chest that keeps him from moving, so Black Zetsu got him while we were trying to fight other people." I squeezed Rin's arm. "But we're gonna get him back."

"How?"

I didn't know. But I did have a guess. "I think we're gonna have to beat it off him." Beating the madness out of a person seemed like a very Final Fantasy-esque solution, but it seemed to work on everything from Tailed Beast hosts to runaway sealing accidents. And on some forms of mental instability, at least on people Naruto fought.

"I don't want to be the one to hurt Obito," Rin said in a small voice.

I gave the battlefield a speculative look. "Well, I don't think you'll have to." I could probably muster up the motivation for a well-intentioned beating, assuming that Black Zetsu didn't just jump to me and steer me into the path of a random Rasengan, or maybe toward the giant pudding monster. At which point I'd probably get eaten, Isobu would be captured, and we'd be even further behind on the whole Ten-Tails bullshit than if Yahiko had just died.

And I was ignoring the big fight between abominations again. I didn't have the ability to fight on the same scale as Kurama did, obviously, but maybe I knew someone who did. And who had enough strength that even Kurama would have some trouble killing us all.

"Nagato-san, can you hear me?" I called out, hoping that he'd be able to respond despite the hail of chakra-eating butterflies.

My answer came in the form of an abrupt hole in the swarm, where Nagato had used that gravity jutsu to push the bugs out of the way. Either that or he was using a Wind jutsu to do the same thing. With the Rinnegan, you could never really tell.

Nagato, carrying Kushina, arrived with no real fanfare. Jiraiya patted his shoulder, sure, but everyone else was too busy to really acknowledge him. Mostly, the Aburame clan members seemed to be focusing on maintaining a defense against the butterfly assault formation, which seemed to be a barrier seal that was also made of seal butterflies.
Honoka wasn't a defensive fighter or an Aburame. So she was busy giving me a funny look while I went to Nagato and Kushina.

"Dammit, why can't I be out there fighting like everyone else?" Kushina demanded as Nagato set her down in front of Tsunade. "I'm not dead enough to be an invalid!"

"Where the hell are my brother and my mom?" I asked, sidetracked.

"The medics have them," Nagato answered, "And what did you need me for, Kei-san?"

"If anyone can roll that Zetsu fusion into a ball and squash it, it's you," I said in a flat tone. "Madara isn't here, so that means the only thing you have to kill is the result of a zillion morons pooling their resources. No one else can launch attacks on that scale aside from Kurama, and he's going to be using the Tailed Beast Bomb if he uses anything. So you're it."

"And the Nine-Tails?" Nagato asked, with his mouth pressed into a grim line.

I bit my lip. "Badger-san over there has the Mangekyō Sharingan. If Kurama looks like he's gonna turn around and stomp on us, get her on board. Black Zetsu may have Obito, but Badger's got two eyes and she's had them for longer. Should be enough."

"You don't sound very sure, Kei-san. I...I've never even seen that thing before." Nagato looked up, to where the giant Zetsu abomination was squaring off against Kurama. As we watched it, it grew about fifty extra limbs in the shape of tree branches and lowered the brand-new crown of its canopy (of arms).

"Well, you have the tools to deal with it. And Kurama, if something goes wrong." Well, technically no one currently alive had the ability to deal with it at the moment, aside from the people trying to kill us. And Nagato. Who was not holding up his end of the whole deal. "Nagato-san, please."

"You really think I can fight all of that?" Nagato asked again.

"Yes."

Nagato nodded. He went over to talk to Honoka, who was standing nearby with skepticism in practically every line of her body language. So what if she didn't trust Nagato or me or my plan? So fucking what?

I didn't care. Nagato would deal with it or he wouldn't. It was out of my control.

I squeezed Rin's shoulder again, then eased myself out of her grip. She still look shell-shocked. At best. "Rin-chan, let's go save Obito."

Rin shook herself. "Right."

Fwish.

"Need a lift?" Sensei asked, popping back into the world right by my left shoulder.

"Only after you get Kushina-san out," I said sharply. "If Black Zetsu gets to her—"

By way of response, Sensei grabbed Kushina's hand, teleported out, and was back in exactly six seconds. Fwish-fwish.

"...Okay, I take it back. Take us to Obito," I backtracked.

Sensei winced. To Jiraiya, he said, "Handle things here for another minute. I'll be right back."

Oh, goodie. He was going to let us handle Black Zetsu on our own. I'd been wondering if Sensei had gotten concussed at some point. He was too young for senility. There were other concerns, like the whole thing where Black Zetsu and White Zetsu together made one S-class missing-nin—ergo, too much for a bunch of teenagers to handle—but I just had to wonder what was going through Sensei's head. There was a plan, right?

In case there wasn't… Isobu, please make sure Kurama's all right. That bullshit with the seal can't have been healthy. My chakra wouldn't extend past the edge of the swarm without getting eaten midway through, so I couldn't tell where anyone was unless I tried using hearing or smell. And the latter was a bust.

I'll try to get him to listen.

Can you tell if the Spiral and White Zetsu variants are dead?

…They're not. The White Zetsu just cloned itself about fifteen million times over, and the clones don't seem to dissipate when hit. I think this is that bio-clone stuff? The big one over there seems to be made of the same thing.

Fuck. That meant that White Zetsu, powered by whatever bullshitium that Madara had stuffed into him, could basically act as a one-man army against what force we could muster. With Nagato unable to pull his Katamari routine without abandoning the fight with the really big one…

They're not retreating underground, or trying for subtle tactics. They're trying to mob our side.

And how's that working out?

We have practically unlimited chakra-eating bugs. Thus, bigger mob.

Sensei grabbed my arm and Rin's and fwish.

The next glimpse I had of the possessed Obito was when Sensei landed square on his back with Rin and I tucked under each arm.

Sensei front-flipped off Obito with a grunt, and another fwish that put all three of us next to Kakashi and Gai. He let go of us then, letting us stand up on our own. I wasn't even wobbly! Go me.

Kakashi looked bone-tired in a way that didn't have anything to do with physical exhaustion. His eyes had flicked to me, briefly, but he'd already refocused on Obito by the time I thought of anything to say. A Katsuyu had, at some point, found him and climbed up on his shoulder like the one we'd found earlier, and was probably pumping extra chakra into him so he could still function. I didn't know if he had enough chakra for another Chidori shot, but I hoped mostly that he didn't do it again.

Gai was equally heartsick, with the tear-tracks from his earlier, interrupted grief still on his face. While his breathing was relatively steady, he looked like he'd used the First Gate while I'd been unable to sense or even see much of anything past the swarm of butterflies. Given that parts of Training Ground Three—which I had somewhat recognized earlier and only then really realized—were still intact and Obito was still possessed, I didn't think it'd been successful. But that wasn't what the First Gate was for anyway.

Rin, white with horror, still managed to clamp down on her trembling in record time. She swallowed hard, eyes locked on Obito and the thing trying to eat his chakra. Despite the revulsion and her fear for Obito, I couldn’t feel any fear for herself. Under all of that roiling emotion was Rin’s ever-dependable core of steel. There was no way she was leaving the clearing without Obito safe and sound. Either we'd leave together or not at all.

Couldn’t say I disagreed with that notion.

And surrounding all of us in a nigh-impenetrable swarm? More fucking butterflies.

"Well, well, well." Black Zetsu grinned using Obito's mouth, while Obito clenched his teeth against the movement. "The jinchūriki, the damsel, the rival, and the clown. These are all your little friends, boy?"

Obito made a strangled noise, half fear and half fury.

"You have one last chance to let him go," Sensei told the parasite. His voice was completely level despite the tension in the air, and he was idly cleaning under his fingernails with a Flying Thunder God kunai. This, despite the fact that killing intent was flooding the area and I was ninety-nine percent sure that it didn't have anything to do with the Tailed Beast battle going on across town. "Three."

"You think you can destroy me, you arrogant bastard?" Black Zetsu snapped. He raised Obito's arm to point an accusing finger at Sensei, before opening his hand and making a sweeping gesture. "Your future is set in stone. You die here, little Hokage."

"No, I don't think he will," I said in a voice like ice. Set in stone, set in sto—wait. I had half a memory of something… I closed my eyes, both to help myself think and to make sure Black Zetsu couldn't use Obito's Sharingan on me.

"Two," said Sensei.

Isobu, close your eye.

Why?

This is going to get messy, and Black Zetsu's gonna want to spam the Sharingan techniques he can wrestle out of Obito. I don't want to risk him getting you even if we transform.

…Fine. He covered his uninjured eye with one strangely humanlike appendage. Both Kuramas are all right. Yin Kurama is still with his host, while Yang Kurama is allied with the Rinnegan boy and that Sharingan woman. He huffed. So, now we can concentrate on our fight?

Yep. Get ready.

I was born ready. Isobu let out a growl. Let's destroy this parasite.

Parasite, parasite…

"Our future is what we make it, Monster-san!" Gai announced, practically radiating determination.
He was reaching for the Gates, though I didn't really know what he'd be able to do against Black Zetsu that Mom hadn't. He was still so far from his full potential…

"You aren't going anywhere with him." Kakashi's chakra jumped, from spark to blazing bolt of lightning in an instant. If I didn't have Isobu's chakra wrapped around me like a blanket, I would've been cringing from the noise he generated. But I had more important things to worry about.

Sensei—for lack of a better term—uncoiled. Every twitch of his chakra suggested impending horrific violence, to be visited upon exactly one target. "One." All humor was gone from his voice.

"Pointless bravado. You'll die like the rest." Black Zetsu barked a laugh. "Watch closely, boy. This is why you shouldn't run." I felt Obito's body—his chakra being leeched away and into Black Zetsu—slip into a fighting stance. How long would he be able to keep that thing from using Kamui?

Waitafuckingminute—

Fwish. And Sensei was already moving.

Black Zetsu was a chakra leech. How far did that ability extend? How far did any Zetsu variant's integration abilities extend? How far did the corresponding control ability work? If Black Zetsu was an extension of Madara's will…

What in the world are you thinking about? There's a fight going on!

Rin and I threw ourselves in opposite directions, simultaneously dodging a burst of Fire jutsu from Obito. My eyes might have been shut, but I could still see reddish-orange practically through my eyelids and I could certainly feel the scorching heat.

"Rin-chan, Keisuke-chan, are you both all right?" Gai called out from somewhere past the fireball.

"We're good!" I shouted back, getting a feel for Black Zetsu's modifications to Obito's fighting style.

"Jerky" was one way to put it. Though Black Zetsu could force Obito to make hand signs, he couldn't seem to make him aim worth a damn. I knew Obito could hit most targets through sheer AOE bullshit if he wanted, but he wasn't. He had Wood, Fire, and Water release, and he wasn't really using any of it properly.

As if to illustrate the point, Gai launched himself over a Wood Release spike and ended up ricocheting off one of the training posts. Black Zetsu failed to follow through with that jutsu, deciding to chase after Kakashi instead.

Kakashi, for his part, was actually moving a good quarter faster than Black Zetsu was. As a fraction of their total speed, anyway. Maybe it was the constant buzz of Lightning Release saturating Kakashi's whole body, but it honestly seemed like the parasite couldn't keep up even though Obito's Sharingan had to be open.

There were times when Black Zetsu almost seemed capable of landing a finger on one of the boys.

And then Minato would pop in, shove him to the ground, and pop out before the parasite could grab him.

And Rin? Was being totally ignored.

I, on the other hand, felt Obito's dominated hand brush slightly against my elbow.
I reeled, Isobu roared, and Black Zetsu cackled aloud. In my mental world, Isobu's rightmost tail was suddenly missing a cubic half-meter of flesh. I might have screamed, but my brain went all fuzzy for a second there and I couldn't be sure.

"Not so fast, are we?" came out of Black Zetsu's mouth at the same time Obito's voice let out a panicked "KEI!"

"Scuse me, Chucklefuck, but I didn't win the bullshit power lottery!" I snarled back, my eyes still closed. "Obito, I'm fine! Worry about yourself right now!"

Obito's body gave an all-encompassing shudder that evolved into a drunken stagger as Black Zetsu yanked at his chakra. He got his left wrist up and clamped it around his right before Black Zetsu could aim another swipe at me.

I got the hell out of the way.

I've never seen a chakra thief like this one. Isobu curled his injured tail among the other two, as though to defend it. Assuming I didn't get hit again, he'd probably be fine. Killer B had managed to get Gyūki to sacrifice a tentacle as a distraction, so I assumed that some things could grow back.

Then there's no way he's a bog-standard Zetsu. Not that he ever was. I crossed Rin's path briefly as I ran, feeling her duck behind a patch of undergrowth. So, a Zetsu-parasite that uses people's chakra against them and their friends. And yet still human enough to get boxed in by seal butterflies. Something's weird here.

I channeled my chakra sense through Isobu's chakra, getting a detailed map of the area that I oughtn't to have needed—I'd spent enough of my life on this training field to know it like the back of my hand. Possibly better—aside from a few sword-scars, my hand didn't particularly stand out from anyone else's. This training ground had never lacked for landmarks.

I skittered into the tree-line, circling around the fight as Kakashi and Gai tore after the retreating enemy. The butterflies parted like a curtain wherever I went, probably out of fear.

Kakashi wasn't aiming to kill. That jutsu in his hand was more like the Chidori Stream than the Chidori proper—an overpowered taser. But the question was how to get close enough to use it when the other guy wasn't running on effectively half his chakra capacity.

Gai? Gai went straight for the Leaf Whirlwind which, while not necessarily lethal, would still catch most opponents napping. Black Zetsu steered Obito away from the face-cruncher of a kick, spitting curses at the "clown" he'd dismissed.

Rin ducked back, and I could feel her go for chakra scalpels—her old standby. I had no idea if she planned to carve Black Zetsu from Obito's chakra system, but if there was anyone who could do it…

Sensei blinked in and out of existence, always just behind or just to the left of Black Zetsu and Obito. He had more instant-use seals than just the Flying Thunder God, and I didn't know what he was going to use to fight Black Zetsu. It just couldn't be the Rasengan—Obito was durable, sure, but I was also sure that Sensei had no intention of risking anything.

It seemed like Obito's control was strongest on left side. Which was pointedly not the side with both Wood Release and the Mangekyō Sharingan. Hell, Obito was right-handed. So, how were we going to dislodge Black Zetsu enough that he didn't just take Obito's arm and his eye with him when it left?
There was something relevant in my memories, somewhere. I knew there had to be. Black Zetsu hadn't been a complete unknown. I clawed around in my memory for some kind of hint; anything could be the slip that would give us an edge.

It had to come down to willpower, somehow.

Black Zetsu is a manifestation of Madara's will.

That was the key.

But how to use it?

What are you going to do? Isobu asked. In my mind's eye, he was still moving around with his eyes shut and bobbing gently with the icy current. His tails lashed the air. You can't even use my power if you're too afraid to hit the boy.

I know. But... Hm. You know what? I think that just might work in reverse, too.

A memory-construct flitted by, side-swiping Isobu's leftmost horn. In its fractal wings, I could see an adult Obito—Tobi—on the ground, with a hole the size of a man's fist in his torso. I knew exactly whose fist, too, once I recalled the context of the image. I could see familiar inky darkness clinging to his arms and pouncing on his shaking body, with the expectation of being obeyed.

He should have been using that jutsu that revived the dead. Something like... Samsara of Life? Something kinda gibberish-y. It made corpses into people again, without the infinite chakra and regeneration thing. Nagato had used it to revive Konoha's citizens after pancaking the place.

But no. Tobi wanted to be the Ten-Tails jinchūriki more than Madara must have wanted to be revived, because the former happened. He must have overwhelmed Black Zetsu.

Idea! Hopefully I'd survive it.

Wait, what—?

I dashed back into the training field.

Sensei had an active seal on the hand that didn't have a Flying Thunder God kunai, but I couldn't easily tell what it was. Hopefully a Chakra Suppression Seal like we'd used on Guruguru. That would be very helpful, since Sensei was the guy who could be relied upon to actually tag the fucking bastard properly.

But...

I aimed two kunai directly at where my chakra sense told me Obito's entrapped legs were, which Black Zetsu caught out of the air with negligent ease. Obito didn't really want to be crippled any more than Black Zetsu did, but with both sides treating the other half of the fight with kid gloves, we weren't getting anywhere.

(Which would only stay at the status quo for as long as Obito could concentrate.)

But I only wanted his attention anyway, and I had it.

"Obito, you don't have to do a single fucking thing he's trying to make you do," I said clearly, my voice deepening again as I called on Isobu's chakra. I didn't need power, but I did need staying power. If he punched me, normal-me was going to feel it regardless of any Sharingan bullshit. If I was channeling Isobu's chakra, I could take what Obito—with without using his enhancements—could dish out, with impunity.

Still kept my eyes shut, though.

"You've been pushing back against him already." I ducked a theatrically slow punch from the Zetsu-dominated and derived arm. I could feel his chakra running almost directly counter to Black Zetsu's movements, pulling frantically. Still, I didn't dare let it touch me again. "No one's been hurt because of you, do you hear me? It's all on Black Zetsu. Anything he tries to get you to do, it's not you. It's a parasite trying to hurt people."

"Kick him out of your system already." Kakashi's voice was strangely scathing. It sounded like the kind of shit you said to teammates under mind control. In superhero comics. "Start taking this seriously!"

"You can defeat this monster, Obito-kun!" Gai called out, and easily dodged a half-assed manifestation of Wood Release that went his way. He even kicked one of the branches apart. "Believe in your will!"

How did that…? Okay, never mind. Clearly this was some kind of shōnen thing I didn't understand. I'd even started the trend, so it wasn't like I could complain about spontaneous rousing speeches.

Sensei felt like he'd probably have something to say, but...

Black Zetsu rewarded our consideration by trying to kill us with another burst of ninjutsu. Status quo ante bellum and all that.

I ducked under a fireball, swatted a flying ball of mud aside with one of Isobu's chakra tails, and spat a burst of water (Water Trumpet, specifically) to douse a fireball. If the rest of us were on the ball, Black Zetsu had been run over by it. His reactions were still slower than when Obito had been a genin, and the spasmodic movements were obvious signs that Obito was throwing himself against the thing that was laboring under the delusion that it owned him.

In passing, Sensei murmured, "Kei, I think we're getting through. But it's not enough, yet."

I jerked my head, preparing a response, but Sensei had already teleported away. He popped up again next to Rin, whispered something, and then was gone again.

Rin charged straight at Black Zetsu and Obito.

I scrambled to intercept her, same as Kakashi, as Black Zetsu crooned, "Little Rin-chan should learn her place. Watch closely, boy."

Gai closed in on him from behind. "Obito-kun—!"

"Obi—!" Kakashi's voice.

Black Zetsu urged Obito into a lurching run. I still felt Obito digging his heels in, trying to stall. Black Zetsu overrode that. "Die, worthless little wretch!"

Then Rin, in defiance of common sense, threw her arms out to her sides like she was planning on receiving a hug and not a potentially fatal tackle.

I got there first, tried to block the attack with my body, and was promptly swatted aside by a Wood Release mallet that was more surprising than painful. I even hit a tree and went straight through the
I sat up in the ruins of falling branches and instantaneous wood chips, automatically trying to figure out what I'd missed.

It was a tableau.

"HOW COULD YOU—YOU HID YOUR POWER FROM ME? TO USE IT TO SAVE A LITTLE GIRL?" Black Zetsu raged. "You have all the power in the world, and you won't use it to save yourself?"

Obito was kneeling behind Rin, who was already turning to reach for him. Gai had the business end of his nunchaku against Obito's Black Zetsu-encased shoulder, while Kakashi's sparking hand was causing the chakra parasite to spasm against the corresponding arm. Sensei had his right hand around the back of Obito's neck, with a steady pulse of chakra building to a crescendo under his hand.

Apparently while I'd been putting the pieces together outside of the butterfly ambush, everyone else had been working on a plan.

"Zero," Sensei hissed.

The seal under his hand ripped through Black Zetsu's chakra system with all the ferocity of a winter storm. The shadowy mass gave a terrible cry of rage and tore itself loose from Obito with a sound like tearing flesh. Obito collapsed, his chakra flickering like a dying lightbulb, and Rin and Kakashi both grabbed him before he hit the ground.

Then Gai's seal—the storage seal from before—was pressed into the parasite's mass and activated.

For a moment, the air in the clearing sounded like a rumbling waterfall and tore just as hard at exposed clothes, hair, and whatever else it could grab. I couldn't hear Black Zetsu's defiant and disbelieving screaming, but I could feel it when the bandanna was sucked off my head and into the frenzied air.

There was a pop and then blessed silence.

I opened my eyes and took a second to appreciate the fact that I couldn't sense Black Zetsu anymore. Then I shook the excess green from my vision and got up.

I managed to get to the seal—detached from Gai's nunchaku but still on its paper—before anyone else and examine it. My special containment additions had activated, meaning that the subject wasn't going to find it possible to leave the seal unless deliberately released. And even then, storage seals had never been designed with living beings in mind.

Black Zetsu wasn't alive, or at least I didn't really think he was. If he was, he was insanely durable and I wanted this scroll disintegrated by Amaterasu fire as soon as we could manage it.

Sensei's hand descended into my line of sight and picked up the scroll.

I looked up as he re-rolled it and bound it with black string from out of apparently nowhere. His expression—hell, the slump of his shoulders—said he was tired as hell without him actually needing to say anything at all.

"Get to Obito, Kei. This isn't over yet," Sensei said. "You have two minutes, unless something comes up."

"Sensei?"
"I am not letting a Tailed Beast fight at random in the Konoha's territory." Sensei sighed. "You already know. Do what you can, where you can."

And…and he was going to send me to reinforce Nagato? Not that I could argue—I was the only other person who could turn into a giant monster besides Kushina (in theory)—but…well. There were weight classes I really wasn't in.

We can do it.

I still filed that away into a mental folder I'd labeled "Things to Deal with Later" and went to join the others.

This turned out to be the right decision.

Even if, once I realized what was happening, I almost immediately felt like I was going to have a heart attack.

Obito was still on the ground, but Kakashi had taken off his ANBU-issue vest and formed a crude pillow underneath Obito's head. Rin had her right hand on Obito's forehead and her left over his heart, channeling chakra into him like there was no tomorrow. Gai had his hands over hers, while sitting on the opposite side of Obito's unresponsive body, and I could almost see the chakra he was pouring into Rin so she could use it to help Obito.

I kneeled next to Gai and added my chakra to hers, shoring up the healing done on those fishing-hook wounds in his legs. Mine had already healed, according to Isobu, but Obito didn't have a Tailed Beast helping him out. I wasn't doing much, given my lack of medical expertise compared to Rin, but it was something.

"Is he going to recover?" Kakashi asked. I wasn't sure who he was talking to, but Rin wasn't going to answer. She was busy.

Obito was alive, but only just. Black Zetsu hadn't come quietly. I didn't have the training to know what his removal could have done.

But what I said was, "Probably."

If Obito wasn't dead yet, then I couldn't see Rin letting him go. I sure as hell wouldn't either—not such a short time after Kakashi and I got him back—but I didn't have enough experience with advanced healing techniques to make good on my promises. Rin did.

Katsuyu, having crawled from Kakashi's shoulder to Obito's stomach, gave one last burst of healing chakra before popping out of reality in a burst of smoke. Guess we'd used up our allotment of free heals.

Then Rin said, in a voice like a sigh, "I…I think we're in the clear now."

No sooner had she finished that sentence, making me almost crack up in sheer relief, than Obito's leg twitched under my hands.

I paused, wondering if I'd just imagined that, but it was quickly confirmed when Gai shouted, "Obito-kun, welcome back!"

Everyone was looking at Obito's face, then, and we got to see him staring up at us with an identical sense of wonder.
It didn’t last.

While Kakashi helped him sit up, and Rin hugged him hard enough that I could practically hear his spine pop, I could also feel Obito’s chakra start to shrink in on itself. It was faint—he hardly had enough chakra to read—but I could feel the shakes almost before they started. This was not going to be a perfect, happy moment.

Gai pulled back, probably feeling awkward and wanting to leave us to our team moment.

I scooted into the vacant spot Gai left behind, resting my hand against Obito’s shoulder. Between Kakashi behind him, Rin currently hugging him from his left side (in a way that meant she was supporting most of his weight), and me on his right, he was pretty much surrounded by friends.

Obito blinked once. Twice.

He was silently trembling before I finished formulating a sufficiently vehement thought at Black Zetsu’s nonexistent corpse. Sledgehammers were involved. So were wood-chippers and battery acid.

Rin pulled him close against her and tucked his head under her chin. Obito was already mostly in her lap, with his tremors taking hold as if had winter rolled in early. It was a short step from there to Rin being the one to physically hold him together.

I could hear him murmur something against Rin's collarbone. It was near-silent and nearly a mantra. Soft like a prayer and twice as desperate. "...I'm sorry, I'm sorry, I'm sorry..."

Like he needed our forgiveness.

"You didn't do anything wrong," Rin whispered back.

He shook his head, violently. "No, no! I-I almost—"

Obito was afraid. Not of us, not of the Tailed Beasts rampaging in the distance, but of himself. Of what he’d almost done.

"Not your fault," Kakashi said shortly, and I wondered how long it would take him to give himself that kind of absolution. "And you weren't even close to going over the edge."

Obito stared at him, wild-eyed. "But—!"

"'Close' only counts with exploding tags." My voice came out a lot harsher than intended, and Rin winced.

Obito was looking at Kakashi and me like we were aliens. As if the concept of "not guilty by reason of being turned into a meat puppet (or narrowly avoiding such a fate)" didn't exist here.

"You didn't use your Mangekyō Sharingan while you fought me," I tried, going for a softer tone. "If Black Zetsu had used it, we'd pretty much all be dead."

Sans Sensei. And that was cutting it majorly close.

"But I h-hit you!" Obito was still giving me trapped-animal vibes. So not good.

"It was a hit I meant to take, and I wasn't hurt." I managed to smile, despite the situation. Maybe my smile was a little cracked at the edges, whether from nerves or something else, but I still needed him to understand. I was okay. "I was the only one who could've taken it. I asked for it, because I didn't know what else to do."
Speaking of. "What actually happened after that?"

"The Black Zetsu creature tried to make Obito attack Rin," Kakashi said. I could practically feel him trying to inject some reassurance into his tone. "And then Obito phased right through her. Not a scratch."

Obito looked up at Rin.

She squeezed him tighter. "I'm one hundred percent okay, Obito."

He relaxed slightly. Better than nothing.

"Obito..." I began, trying to think. "Obito, if you hadn't been fighting back, Black Zetsu would have killed us all in ten seconds." He opened his mouth to protest, but I cut him off. "No, I'm dead serious. With you fighting him every step of the way, a drunk civilian could have outrun him. No one got hurt, though not because he wasn't trying." Though Rin had been the only one to actually stand still and nearly die.

I was really going to have to tear a strip out of her and Sensei for just standing there in the middle of a fucking fight.

"I knew he wouldn't hurt me," Rin said plainly. As though that was obvious. As though that was the honest, unshakeable truth.

…Okay, yeah, I could believe that.

"Black Zetsu could have torn Isobu right out of me if he got me again during the fight. The Wood Release shots were slow enough for Gai to dodge. You let Kakashi get close with his handheld lightning bolt about twenty times." I took a deep breath. "Face it. You're not the bad guy here. You never were."

I would have loved to be able to just... spend time making sure they'd all be okay.

But no.

"Kei, it's time," Sensei said from behind me.

I winced inwardly, twisting around to face him. "Already?"

"Yes. Sorry." Sensei brushed past me, dropping to one knee so Obito could easily see him and not have to strain his neck. Sensei carefully extracted Obito from Rin's arms so he could squish his student in a bear hug. To Obito, he said, "If I don't come back, just know I don't blame you. Nothing you've done here tonight needs to be forgiven. Remember that, Obito."

"Sensei...?" Even Kakashi was giving him a weird look.

Sensei smiled. I felt the pull of his chakra just for a second—

Fwish.

All of us were... was this the Shikkotsu Forest? White trees, something moving in the darkness, Kushina-san—huh?

Sensei let go of Obito, stepped back, and grabbed my shoulder.

Fwish.
It took me a second to realize where the hell we ended up after the second teleport. After a moment longer, I realized we were looking down on the village from the top of a stone precipice…so the Hokage Mountain was at least intact. Good.

"Kei." Sensei's voice had the clear crack of command, and I turned around to see what he was looking at.

Konoha's village walls extended in a massive circle, kilometers across and partially composed of the long line of the Hokage Monument's mountain. If someone climbed up the rock face and peered over the opposite edge, there'd be thick forest almost as far as the eye could see. There were buildings and small settlements in the distance, but Konohagakure was the epicenter of all trade and commerce in the region. This was a bit of a no-man's land.

Kurama, big and orange and still brimming over with barely-suppressed murderous intent, sat squarely in the middle of the forest. When he sat like that, he didn't put all four limbs on the ground like a canid—instead, he gave the impression of an old guru, with his animalistic hindquarters sitting the way I expected while his humanlike forelegs rested across the tops of his knees. All nine of his tails were up and waving in midair, but I didn't get the impression he was going to rip a bunch of trees out of the ground, fling them at the nearest soft target, and run. He was surrounded by three massive figures, two of which I recognized offhand.

Katsuyu, as big as the entire Konoha administration building and almost luminescent in the moonlight, was to Kurama's left. Her head was raised somewhat, unlike when she was generally preparing to charge into the fray, and I could see her eye-stalks curving inward to observe something on her forehead. If slugs had foreheads.

Gamabunta, somewhat smaller than Katsuyu but also wielding a knife the size of the Forest of Death's central tower, had one webbed hand on the ground as though bracing for an attack while the other was on the hilt of that blade. His legs weren't compressed neatly underneath him—instead, the boss toad gave the impression of waiting for the opportunity, or excuse, to go to town. On his head, barely visible, was a patch of white that was probably Jiraiya's hair.

And the last one, its huge wings flat against the ground and probably upsetting the trees, was a gigantic moth. Or butterfly—much like the abundance of frogs in the Toad summon realm, I imagined that they weren't actually too picky. It had a fuzzy white body with six fuzzy, claw-tipped legs, and huge, iridescent eyes that leaned toward a sort of electric blue tone. Its antenna were vaguely reminiscent of a luna moth, and I could make out large yellow eyespots on the outsides of its primary-colored wings.

"Before we get started, what is that?" I asked Sensei, looking at the Mexican standoff that had Kurama stuck in the middle.

"Mosura, apparently." Sensei prodded the side of my head. "You mean you didn't even read that summon scroll you brought back?"

"...No," I said. "Mothra? Really? And as the boss of all those butterfly summons? "So I'm gonna assume that she's not hostile, and that the Zetsu fusion was smashed by a pissed-off Kurama. What do you want me to do here?"

"Whatever you can. Talk to him? Fight him? Anything to get him on our side."

I felt my thought processes crash to a halt, to be replaced with…What.
"You might be the only person who can convince the Nine-Tails to come quietly back to Konoha," Sensei went on, apparently oblivious to my flabbergasted expression.

"No, wait, let's go back and talk about this all the way through." I started rubbing circles on my temples with my fingertips. "Point one: Somehow the Aburame clan summoned a gigantic butterfly monster and it's our new friend. I can deal with that. It's cool. Point two: Kurama is somehow not trying to murder us all at this exact second. Point three: How am I supposed to talk a hundred-meter fox into doing anything other than 'whatever the hell he wants'? Because Isobu and I certainly can't fight him, no matter what backup we have."

Sensei put his hand on my shoulder. "I believe you can do it, Kei-kun."

I opened my mouth to say something else—probably another protest—but was cut off by the next fwish of Sensei's Flying Thunder God jutsu.

"So we finally meet, little bug."

Shit.

Sensei had teleported us both off the mountain. He also just so happened to put us on Gamabunta's head with Jiraiya, right in front of Kurama's huge red eyes. Which was not where anyone sane should have wanted to be.

"Yeah, I guess we do." Proud but also surprised that my voice came out that steady, I immediately snapped into a thirty-degree bow on reflex. Mom had trained Hayate and me in the art of respect to the point that it was nearly reflex sometimes.

While Isobu laughed at me from my mindscape, at least Kurama only offered a derisive snort. I would definitely take a blatant dismissal over becoming dinner.

"I know you asked me to call you Kurama-sama, but that's...not gonna happen. Sorry," I went on, probably about to drift over into full ramble mode. "What happened to the Zetsu fusion?"

"Zetsu? You mean that thing." And if a Tailed Beast called something an abomination, then I guess there really was no salvaging it. Zetsu was a semi-mindless humanlike monster with more powers than a Justice League meeting, so of course it would seem like a thing that should not be, even to Kurama. Who was a monster according to just about everyone else. "It died. These three"—and here, he waved one disturbingly humanlike hand to indicate the three boss summons —"are just keeping me from leaving. What a waste of my time."

"Kurama-san," I said, even as he glared at me for not using his preferred form of address, "if you'd tried to track down where it came from, Madara would have tried to grab you again."

"You think that just because I'm not listening to his infernal whining," Kurama's voice lowered in anger, "that I actually think you're the better option? That I wouldn't crush you all where you stand, given half a chance? You're just as selfish and pathetic as he ever was, like all humans. I only decided not to kill you all because I hate him more."

Yeah, this wasn't going well.

Want me to try?

It can't hurt, I guess? Give me a second. I had to manifest enough of Isobu's physical form to give him a mouth, since otherwise we'd all be stuck communing on the mental plane alone. I guessed that Sensei and Jiraiya probably would have objected to having me, and therefore Isobu, flop over and stop responding while we hashed out a deal in the Tailed Beast pocket dimension.

I felt Sensei and Jiraiya both step away from me and Gamabunta shift uncomfortably underfoot as I pushed through to the V1 chakra cloak. After a second more, I had a mostly-complete but still miniature manifestation of Isobu projected outward in a cloudlike structure of reddish chakra. All three tails were visible, along with his humanoid arms and spiky shell and head, but I was also still quite obviously in the middle of the projection.

"Kurama, you're being an idiot."

Inside of Isobu's chakra aura, I immediately facepalmed with both hands. Goddammit.

"Do you honestly think that these humans are just going to let you run off into whatever corner of the world you think you can hide in?" Isobu's voice boomed. "Isn't that exactly what you did until Madara caught you in the first place?"

Kurama's head pulls back and his ears flatten against his head. "How many jailors have you had, you weakling? You may have had your spine ripped out by these insects, but I don't plan on following your example!"

"So what are you going to do?" Isobu asked challengingly. "There's nowhere to hide, Kurama!"

"I hate your plan," I stage-whispered at Sensei. "It sucks."

Sensei gave me a thumbs-up anyway.

"It would be simpler just to kill you all," Kurama snapped. "Especially you, Three-Tails! I will never be trapped by a human again, even if I have to exterminate every living thing on this continent to make it work!"

"And I'm pretty sure you've tried that!" I shouted at him, separate from Isobu. "And guess what?
Madara happened, you were sealed, and you ended up worse than where you started." I made a frustrated noise. "Look, I'm supposed to be talking you into not stomping all over creation and killing squishy humans you find."

"And you're doing so well at that."

Oh, shut up. "Madara is still out there, Kurama-san!" I snapped. It was already hard enough trying to channel Naruto, but if I had to explain this shit… "Look, as far as I'm concerned, you've got a totally legitimate beef with humanity. But I am trying really, really hard to make sure that when push comes to shove we can kill that motherfucker. To that end I am willing to force everyone else to negotiate what terms you and they have to abide by, if you'll come back to Konoha without killing everything."

Kurama was giving me what, on a human face, would have been a funny look. "Three-Tails—"

"It's Isobu," My turtle friend growled.

"—whatever. Is this bug telling the truth?"

"I'm still talking, aren't I?" Isobu couldn't shrug, exactly, since his shoulders were pretty much fused with his shell. I still got that impression, and I shrugged along, too. "It could be worse. She tried talking your jailor into giving you more freedom. Or don't you remember that?"

"I was busy." Yeah, right. He'd been busy fighting Isobu and then getting clubbed over the head by one of Kushina's seal's many fail-safes. None of which she'd designed, from what I remembered.

"That's still more effort than any human's put into interacting with you in more than eighty years," Isobu said dryly. "So put some effort into not being used as a superweapon. Half of you is still stuck in the same host. Do you feel like reassembling yourself or being in two places at once? Because that's what I can see happening."

"I have no interest whatsoever in being stuck in that woman's stomach again," Kurama growled.

Which was convenient because, at this point, I was pretty sure Kushina's seal wouldn't survive having Kurama reassembled in her chakra coils. The strain of a partial extraction coupled with the damage it took during Naruto's birth would probably make putting Yang Kurama back in there a really bad idea.

"Well, what about someone else?" I asked.

"There's no one worth that," Kurama said bluntly.

There were three reasons he hadn't murderized his way out of here yet, and all of them felt a little apprehensive to my chakra sense. The butterfly queen couldn't absorb Tailed Beast chakra if she was anything like her underlings, while Katsuyu and Gamabunta probably didn't have the raw power. Theoretically, Nagato would be able to, but beating Kurama into submission wasn't exactly a sign of progress.

I really, really hoped we weren't going to go the "Pokémon battle" route. "Let's beat this guy up to show him we should be friends!" Fuck that.

You're going to show him?

Nothing else is really working.

Not everyone can be persuaded by bombarding them with genjutsu images of the nonexistent future, either.

...Point. What would you do? He can't leave, since no one from here to the fucking border would let him just waltz off. And we do have the resources to seal him even if he fights. Seriously. Jiraiya, Sensei, and Nagato were all within about two hundred meters. The boss summons were at a disadvantage, but Sensei could call Kushina back in an instant and, to my knowledge, her chakra chains were a lot stronger when she wasn't dying of Tailed Beast extraction syndrome.

"Kurama. Give them a chance," Isobu said, his voice sounding tired. "Humans as a group are useless, panicky ants. But a person can be kind. A person can understand. A person can change," Isobu sighed. "I found a human I could tolerate. I think you can, too."

Kurama blinked. Then he burst out laughing.

"I am serious, you idiot!" Isobu snapped. "They're offering to seal you into someone who isn't a selfish, power hungry human, and maybe you'll finally have a chance to learn something for once!"
"More specifically," I cut in before Isobu could lose his temper, "we're talking about someone who may grow up to change everything."

"Change? Why should I care, little bug?" Kurama snapped his teeth, perilously close to Gamabunta's face. The toad boss, to his credit, didn't flinch.

I, however, found my breaking point.

This goddamned night had been one hit after another. First the Zetsu clones, then Hayate, then Gai's neighbors, then more Zetsu clones, then Black Zetsu and him hurting Obito, and then Mom, and then this thing with Kurama was the straw that broke the camel's back.

"Okay, fuck your superiority complex," I snarled back in his face. "We can do this the easy way or the hard way, and you already know what the hard way is." I threw my arms out to my sides, trying to encompass the whole of Konoha. "I don't know if you've noticed, but we have enough resources to put even you on your back foot, but I got told that we're trying to play nice. For once, the humans are not trying to instantaneously stuff you back into your goddamn genie lamp. We are trying to talk. We aren't any good at it because, guess what, we have your lifespan of history telling us there's only one way to deal with anything big enough to stomp on us. That's to stomp it back.

"You are one of the only beings in the world who's going to live to see the changes we enact. Maybe you've noticed that in all our history, humans live really short lives. Tailed Beasts are effectively immortal, and I'm sure there's a lot we could've learned from you and vice versa if our ancestors hadn't been 'shoot first, question never' types. But we are trying, dammit, so give us a chance to actually follow through!" I panted. "SO ARE WE GOING TO FINALLY CHANGE SHIT OR NOT?"

"There's no way of knowing if working with humans now will change the future," Isobu said while I tried to get my breath back. "But trying anyway is important."

Kurama said nothing for a long moment. Then, "...and if it doesn't work?"

"Then we fight until it does," Sensei said, staring down the creature that had pretty much killed him and his wife the last time around. "I think everyone here heard that. Right?"

Over on Katsuyu, Tsunade signaled that she had. Next to her, finally clambering onto Katsuyu's head after a long disappearance, Nagato gave us all a thumbs-up.

Jiraiya said, "Between all of us—Tailed Beast and human alike—we can make it work."

"Here, we have a Tailed Beast, his host, at least one Hokage, two Sages, three boss summons, two of the Sannin and a young man with the Rinnegan." Sensei met Kurama's eyes squarely. Calmly. "We'll hold up our end of the deal."

"...Hmph. So. I lose, then?" Kurama still didn't feel happy about it. "I have to be sealed away into some random human child."

"I...wouldn't say 'random'," Sensei said carefully.

"You have a plan, then." Isobu twisted to watch Sensei with a cautious air. "Someone who's going to be protected?"

"Yes." Sensei looked at me. "By you and your host, actually."
Thank god.

"Be right back." Sensei _fwished_ away.

I sat down on Gamabunta's head, though Isobu's spectral chakra avatar didn't shift positions at all. "Fucking _finally._"

"Long night, kid?" Jiraiya asked.

"Jiraiya-sama? I...you have _no idea._" I pinched the bridge of my nose. Between the Zetsu alert, Hayate being kidnapped, the Black Zetsu horseshit with Obito, and then all this crap with Kurama? After all of it, I mostly wanted to collapse into a bed and not wake up for a month.

Sensei reappeared, carrying Kushina who was carrying Naruto. "See you in ten, all right?"

"Wait—!" _Fwish._ This one took Kurama with it. From the feel of it, they all ended up somewhere further away from Konoha. After a second, Jiraiya sighed. "That boy..."

"He's gonna keep doing that, isn't he?" Bit of a rhetorical question there, but...

"Yes. He is."

"He's gonna collapse from chakra exhaustion sooner or later," I said.

"Probably."

Maybe I'd dredge up a few more dams to give once I'd had a decent rest myself. I pulled my knees up to my chest and ran my hands over my face. The second Isobu's chakra cut out, I was probably going to faint.

Across the way, Mosura finally poofed into a gigantic burst of smoke that was followed by a series of de-summoning smoke clouds all over the outskirts of the village. The butterflies had _finally_ decided to go home, apparently. I was kind of curious about what their Aburame handlers thought about their performance tonight, but couldn't really think of how to ask the question. Wasn't Jiraiya's part of the operation, either.

"You're pretty calm about Sensei going off to seal Kurama," I said, resting my head against my folded arms. "You know something I don't?"

"I know a _lot_ of things you don't, Kei-kun," Jiraiya said. "But between the speeches you and the Three-Tails gave him, the fact that Kushina's got the other half of the fox, and the seal-work we did in the last three months...nah. Minato can handle this."

"Good," I managed.

"This _is_ fascinating, though," Jiraiya said, looking Isobu's chakra projection over with a keenly interested eye. "This is probably the first time in history that someone's been able to sit down and just talk with a Tailed Beast."

"Aside from our hosts? Yes. But most of them weren't interested in talking much, either," Isobu said. "This one is the _first_ one who didn't just try to steal my chakra first thing."

...Thanks? I think. It's sad that the bar's so low, though.

I know.
A thought occurred to me. "Sensei and Kushina acted like me talking to Isobu was a sign of the end times. Why are you so calm?"

"You and Isobu-san just spent ten minutes arguing with the Nine-Tails about why we should all work together for world peace." Jiraiya smiled.

There…was a thing. That he was thinking of. Probably a prophecy, but I was too tired to try to puzzle out how an old warrior was working his way through that whole thing.

I don't think your body will take any more of my chakra right now. Isobu said, seeming to settle down inside of my mindscape. Even his projected body was just twisting his injured tail around to inspect the damage. I'm cutting you off.

Not gonna argue. I thought back.

I felt myself slip sideways, saw the red energy dissipate.

The ground came up to meet me.

I woke up in a room with yellow walls, underneath two comforters and somebody's legs. Sunlight streamed through the open window, with the slightest chill of a mid-autumn morning. Between the warmth of the blankets and a reluctance to immediately start talking to people, I didn't move for a while.

The legs shifted sometime in the middle of my attempt at sleeping in—apparently my bedmate had been asleep, too, but had rectified that.

Someone opened the door.

"Rin-chan, Kei-chan. I know you're both awake." Kushina?

I sat bolt upright in bed, making Rin jolt awake properly. It also meant that I got to confront a migraine immediately afterward.

"Owww." Rin must have fallen off the bed. Then her head poked up from the side of the bed like a

"…Yep," I said, channeling just a bit of Isobu's chakra to try and combat the headache. But no dice.

It's a dehydration headache, stupid. Isobu said flatly.

*Okay, okay, I got that."

"We need to talk," Kushina said firmly.

Huh? "Uh, okay," I said, blinking sleep out of my eyes. "Just give me a second…"

"Now, Kei-chan."

In short order, I was hauled out of bed—noticing somewhat belatedly that I was still in my combat uniform, minus the flak jacket—dumped at the dining room table. Along the way, I tried to assemble the facts in my head.

Fact: Given who else was at the table, everyone on my team had survived. Sure, Obito was practically asleep in his (empty) bowl, Kakashi was looking at me with unnerving, silent focus, Gai was looking for an escape route from Kushina's domestic wrath (probably), and Rin was just getting into her seat, but...well, that was a relief. Sensei was there, too, but zonked out on the couch with Naruto lying on his chest.

Fact: I was in Kushina and Sensei's house rather than my own. This could have meant that my house had been demolished at some point after we killed at the Zetsu clones in the area. It could also have meant that entire districts were cordoned off for another reason. Or maybe whoever had been conscious at that point had decided that I didn't need to be there.

Fact: I was still suffering from that dehydration headache and there was tea in front of me (that I promptly drank). I was also hungry, shaky, and not entirely sure what was going on.

Fact: I still didn't know where my mom and my brother were.

This last conundrum ate the majority of my conscious thought processes.

"Has anyone seen my mom? Or my brother?" I asked.

Dead silence.

Obito sat up with a jerk, still looking terrible and also rather out of it. Kakashi's laser-focused gaze was pointed at me for just a moment, then over toward the kitchen at Kushina. Gai, on the other hand, practically oozed a sense of dread that I didn't understand at first. Rin looked like someone had told her that her dog had died. What did I say?

"You guys are scaring me right now," I said, but the joke fell flat on its face. Crap, crap, crap...

Kushina set a huge basket of fruit in the middle of the table. As she sat down across from me, I felt the tension in the room ratchet up a notch.

"Kushina-san..." I began, but didn't know where to even start.

"I have good news and bad news," Kushina said with forced calm, her fingers laced together in front of her face. I could still feel her agitated chakra moving.

"...Hayate?" I managed.

"He's got a broken leg, but he's going to be okay. He's in the boys' room." She nodded at Kakashi, who had put away his scroll at some point. Not awake, though. Shit. "But your mother... I'm sorry, Kei-chan."

No.

No, no, no—

Shit. I already...I'd seen her fall in the fight against Black Zetsu, but I hadn't...

Fuck.

"That's..." Shit. Okay, no, she's already gone—what has to happen next? What do I need to do? How can I keep my brother safe and healthy now? There had to be a way... And there I went, not dealing with the problem.

My whole body slumped back, as I looked at Kushina with something between denial and raw grief in every line of my frame. Fuck.
No, no. I couldn't let it control me, not now.

But—

I got up from the table, slamming the chair back hard enough to make it tip over with an almighty bang.

Rin tried to follow. "Kei—!"

But I batted her reaching hand aside and stumbled down the hall, feeling tears stream down my face. I found the door I was looking for, wrenched it open, and closed it behind me before bracing my back against it and sliding down until my butt reached the floor. I tried to wipe my face on my sleeves, only to get tears and snot all over them.

No one came knocking.

But there was already someone in here.

A faint voice came from the rough vicinity of the bed. "S-Sis?"

"H-here. Over here," I croaked, getting to my feet and heading over to the bed. I sat down on the edge of it, leaning over so I could see my brother properly.

Hayate looked pale and wan, still dressed in his pajamas and looking up at me with dull eyes. His left leg was in a cast from the knee down, with his pajama leg pushed up so the medics could get at it. He'd thrown the blankets off at some point, leaving a mess of a bedspread and a scattered pillow or two across the room. There was a thick ring of dark purplish-blue bruises around his throat.

"You heard." Hayate's voice was like a sigh. I brushed my fingers against his cheek and felt dried tearstains before I saw them.

He lifted his hand slowly to grip mine, and I saw his lip start to tremble.

I helped him sit up in time for him to smother his tears against my shirt. He was shaking and sobbing and sooner or later we'd both come back to swearing at the world. At that moment, though, I squeezed him just as hard as he was hugging me.

"Wh-What are we going to do?" Hayate demanded, his voice wobbling and hitching halfway through.

I tucked his head under my chin. I couldn't give him a useful answer at that moment. Maybe not for a while. "We'll…figure it out."

It would take time, but we'd be okay.

I wouldn't allow things to be any other way.

Chapter End Notes

AN: Okay, I figured that was long enough on the cliffhanger I left last time. Arc's over, everybody out.

1. Rin has officially progressed from "-chan/-senpai" for Kei to yobisute, or "null honorific." This will be pointed out later. There is no lingering Zetsu problem. (The Rin-Zetsu didn't get any lines anyway.)

2. Yes, Naruto and Kushina are both Kurama's hosts. Kushina keeps Yin and Naruto gets Yang. As in the manga, the Yin half of Kurama is the generally more congenial side. Yang is…not.

3. The Ten-Tails and therefore the Statue used to be in this chapter, but since it was criminally underutilized even in the role of "big smashy monster," I've elected to keep it off the field for a while longer. Not actually sure why it would be on the battlefield at this stage anyway, given that Madara is still hooked up to it and can't fight in his old age at the moment. So instead, you get the Zetsu equivalent of the S'muz.

4. The boss summon of the butterflies is indeed Mothra. Speaking of summons, I shudder to think of the result when you combine Fourth Shinobi War-strength Naruto with the Slug summon contract.

5. Kei still doesn't know what all happened in this arc. See next chapter for details. You can also ask me on my tumblr (Langwrites), or via review, if something needs to be answered post-haste.

6. This chapter's title is brought to you by the first Pokemon movie's soundtrack.
A while after I finally settled Hayate down, there was a knock at the door.

"Kei?" Kakashi's voice.

Hayate and I were still on the bed. He'd fallen asleep—or at least gone quiet—with his head on my thigh, and I was braced against the headboard with my eyes seemingly glued to the opposite wall. My right hand was still slowly running though his hair, while the rest of me sort of...checked out for a while. The knock brought me back to reality, and I wiped my aching eyes with my left sleeve.

"Yeah?" I croaked, and paused. I sounded horrible. "I...I can be out in a minute." What in hell could they need me for?

The door opened, just a crack, and a familiar brown ball of fur slipped through the gap. He briefly disappeared in the blind spot between the edge of the bed and the floor, but hopped up onto the bedspread. Another dog, this one with a distinct droopy-eyed look and kanji on his forehead, nosed the door open and followed in Pakkun's wake.

Pakkun walked across the mattress until he was able to put a paw on my raised knee. "Kei-chan, things will be okay."

I sighed and scratched behind his ears. He leaned into it, scooted closer, and eventually crawled into my lap. It took a few seconds to rearrange his legs properly, but by the end he was resting with his nose against the back of my brother's head.

Bisuke, on the other hand, cut out the middleman and just walked over to my brother's side of the bed and curled into a ball next to him.

...So I guessed that meant I didn't actually have to do anything, yet.

I cleared my throat and said, "If you're still there, you can come in."

It took a few seconds, but Kakashi finished his mental tug-of-war and gently nudged the door open with one shoulder. On a tray, he was carrying two empty teacups and a black teapot that was leaking steam. He put the tray on the nightstand and kind of just stood there in the middle of the room, practically radiating awkwardness.

"Hey," I said. I patted the empty side of the bed. "There's a spot."

Kakashi gave a wordless grunt of acknowledgement before sitting down next to me. The mattress dipped, but not enough to wake Hayate.
"Small mercies, I guess."

"How is he?" Kakashi asked quietly, not quite meeting my eyes.

I shrugged. I brought my left hand up and rubbed my temples, forcing down whatever half-formed sarcastic remarks I was tempted to say. Something about how our entire team was finally composed of orphans, probably. Shit.

"Rin-san is with Obito," Kakashi said, answering a question I hadn't asked. But it was good to know that Obito wasn't being forgotten in the wake of everything. "Gai is, too."

"Good." I started petting Pakkun again. It made it easier to think of what to say and keep from getting distracted by unhelpful impulses. I didn't need to make everyone else feel like shit. "Obito's going to need them. And us."

Kakashi nodded.

I continued staring at the blank spot on the opposite wall that had occupied my attention for so long.

It…It wasn't that I didn't understand that Mom was dead. While a highly paranoid part of me insisted that nobody was dead unless I saw the body, I wasn't really in denial. Being a shinobi for six years meant that there wasn't really any time for that kind of wishful thinking—we tended to skip past "denial" and jump straight to the other stages of grief, only to double back to "anger" as many times as necessary. Denial just wasn't productive in our line of work.

I just…I had things to do. People who depended on me. I'd let myself wallow when Dad died. And when we'd thought that Obito had died (or gone to the dark side). This time, though, I didn't have Mom backing me up.

Now I was the one that Hayate depended on to be strong. He didn't really know Sensei or Kushina, and while Rin and Obito were his friends as well as mine…well, they weren't Mom. Neither was I, but I was family. I'd been there the whole time.

I blinked the tears away this time, and none of them fell.

Sooner or later, I'd get up again.

Kakashi handed me one of the napkins on the tray. Instead of wiping my eyes, I blew my nose, folded it up again, and crumpled it in my fist. I wiped my eyes on my sleeve again.

"Sorry," I mumbled.

Kakashi sighed. "Don't apologize. It's fine."

I looked at him, at the visible discomfort in his body language and the hesitance in his voice. And I said, rather than addressing it, "When do they need me out there?"

Kakashi shook his head. "Not yet. Just—" He made a very quiet, frustrated noise. "Kei, you're allowed to just not do things."

Like hell I was. "I'm head of household now. There's…there's paperwork and we can't stay here forever…"

"No one's going to ask about that," Kakashi replied, and I could feel this strange combination of frustration, worry, and alarm working through his chakra. "Kei…"
Irrational anger built in my chest like a spark took to tinder. Fucking hypocrite. As if I didn't know that the way Kakashi dealt with grief was by pushing himself to exhaustion, whether in this iteration of reality or in the other one, where he'd lost everything over and over again. As if I didn't know that work was one of the best—or worst—ways to take my mind off any impending downward spiral. As if I didn't have other responsibilities that wouldn't stay on hold while I got my head sorted out.

Kakashi handed me a teacup.

…Right. I probably wasn't imagining the way that his eye had widened a bit when my temper started flaring unpredictably. Maybe he'd even felt a scrap of Isobu's chakra at this range.

I took a deep breath to steady myself. It took longer than it should have to be able to choke out, "…Thanks."

So we sat, and drank tea, and I tried to think my way through it all.

Sensei and Kushina were alive. Naruto wasn't going to be an orphan if any of us had anything to say about it.

Obito and Rin were alive, too, and if they weren't whole then I guess that was something we were all going to have to struggle through together.

The village was intact. Ish.

Mom was dead, and so were a bunch of other people. What fighting I'd done last night had probably saved others. Other families would be okay.

Knowing that, I had to hold onto the idea that I did everything I could to help. I might've been able to save Mom, if I hadn't had Madara's seal in my chest. Sensei might have if he hadn't had to make sure Kushina made it out alive. Maybe Nagato, too, if they hadn't been dogpiled by Zetsu clones at that exact moment. But if anything else had changed, maybe someone else would have died instead.

If I hadn't had the Puppet Master Seal in me, I probably wouldn't have had Isobu, either. And that could have killed us all six months ago.

I transferred my teacup to my other hand. I reached out, blindly, and grabbed Kakashi's free hand with my left. I squeezed his hand, my fingers shaking.

He squeezed back, hesitant.

"…Thank you." I sighed again. With anger draining out of me, I mostly just felt…empty. Small. Alone.

Kakashi bumped my shoulder with his.

I could get up again.

Cynical as it was, losing Dad and Obito (briefly) had made the patterns of grief somewhat predictable. If my mind was a forest, my mourning mindset was following old game trails through it. I'd done this before.

I just hoped it wouldn't become a habit.

The week after October tenth was…messy.
Not just literally. The village was more than a little worse for wear, thanks to the Zetsu monsters that had been stomping around. Storefronts had been smashed, houses had been punctured or worse, and the hospital had caught fire. Between the number of bodies needing to be removed, the number of injured, and the damage to most structures, central Konoha had become something of an improvised tent city within eight hours of the attack's conclusion.

Somewhere in the forest of tents, the Third Hokage had authorized a missing persons bulletin board. Anyone who stopped by, possibly looking for relatives or friends spirited away by Zetsu clones or among the injured somewhere, would have a chance to add a name to the board. Next to it, labeled by white ink on a black header, was a corresponding list of confirmed dead.

It was just the first day after the attack, so the administrative personnel only had a list of about four hundred names by noon, on both lists. Here and there, a representative of each major clan had apparently trooped up to the board and scribbled down every deceased or missing clan member. You could get halfway down and, after watching the slow procession of people reporting more and more dead names, almost pinpoint the exact time that the Uchiha clan had gotten around to adding names.

Yoshi Uchiha, Matsumaru Uchiha, Chiharu Uchiha…

Inosuke Yamanaka, Chōku Akimichi…

ANBU had their own lists, somewhere in Sensei's office. I didn't know when he'd get around to checking it and reassigning team captains, and I didn't want to ask. Since Sensei's office received updates on the casualty lists once per fifteen minutes, there was a steady stream of people making their way in and out of the building on a regular basis.

I wasn't stationed in the administration building on the eleventh. I was, however, on the job.

At least, I checked the security seals. Sensei had remoted-linked just about everything he could get his hands on, in a way that reminded me more of Harry Dresden than Nicolas Fury. I could track the movements of people in the office using a game board set up like a model of the office, and the progress of the casualty list via a messaging document on the Hokage's desk. The latter was linked to a scroll slightly to the left of the game board.

The blue piece indicating the Third Hokage hadn't moved out of the room in about four hours.

I checked if Mom's name was on the "Confirmed Dead" list (it was, near the top), then settled in for my shift as a Hokage's bodyguard.

Unless you were walking wounded, nobody had days off in the wake of a major disaster.

The Hokage Guard Platoon's roster had been cut down to half strength in less than twelve hours, so there wasn't enough manpower to go around at the moment. At the same time, I was also one of the two members of Team Minato who could actually walk for more than twenty meters in a straight line. With Kakashi elsewhere regrouping with the rest of ANBU and Obito unable to walk under his own power, and most of the veterans in the Hokage Guard Platoon either injured or dead, I was kinda…it.

It would have been psychologically sound to take a goddamn personal day—or week would have been able to sort out all the paperwork that somebody had retrieved from my house, try to learn how to cook something that my brother would eat, and maybe get some extra sleep. But I'd decided that my coping strategy was to work my demons to death during daylight hours.

I know, I know. Kakashi's coping method wasn't any better when I was the one doing it.
At least we weren't in the office.

For one thing, Sensei wasn't any more mobile than Obito was. Sensei did have an office in the house, with a desk and an in-tray that seemed to be linked somehow to the one in the Hokage's circular office. It was very clearly designed to work in the event that the office was destroyed, the water pipes busted, or some other administrative nightmare.

But with Sensei down for the count due to chakra exhaustion, it meant mostly that paperwork piled up on top of the in-tray's space-time seal. To be honest, I wasn't really sure how he managed to make it home. But according to Gai, he'd made it through the front door before collapsing into a dead faint.

My job, which I managed between trying to get Hayate to eat and staring at a spot on the wall, was to make sure that no one in the house managed to die before he woke up. Rin was managing the actual care part, medically speaking, while the rest of us did whatever.

But Hayate had cried himself to sleep earlier and hadn't woken up. Obito had been moved to the bedroom to keep him company, and he had fallen asleep again almost immediately after breakfast. Kushina was awake and running on fumes to keep herself that way, in case there was some kind of crisis that only she was capable of dealing with. Rin was probably running on entirely too many stimulants and only enough sleep to tide her over.

I was at loose ends.

Gai was gone by about ten in the morning. Genma stopped by, limping and slightly fuzzy-brained but alive, and dragged Gai home with him with the justification that his apartment was still intact, and they were teammates anyway. I didn't ask about what had happened to Raidō—I probably wouldn't have gotten a straight answer, even if Genma did know. Gai still looked miserable at the reminder that he was effectively homeless, but it was mitigated by the knowledge that at least one of his genin teammates was still alive.

"Most buildings in the district got pretty badly hit, but mine's fine," Genma had explained, once Gai was helping him stand up straight. Personally, I would have been leery of letting a guy suffering from post-concussion syndrome walk out of the medical center, but there were probably enough casualties that anyone with all extremities attached was of minimal concern. "Come on, Gai. The power still works at my place, so there's food there."

"Will there be missions in the afternoon?" Gai had asked, as they were leaving.

"You're gonna have to do that bit yourself," Genma had said, wincing as the autumn sunlight hit his eyes.

They'd left, with a stern order from Rin to get Genma to sleep the concussion off. He wasn't dying by any stretch of the imagination, but there was no point in trying to put a wobbly shinobi to work.

As the morning turned to afternoon, the sound of work in the neighborhood around the house got louder and louder. Eventually, the noise woke Naruto—just in time for lunch.

I could tell based on the sudden screaming coming from the master bedroom, which was not accompanied by a corresponding jump in Sensei's chakra. So much for getting him off the couch—it'd taken me two minutes to wrestle his unresponsive ass off to his actual bed, and he hadn't woken up then, either.

Now, Naruto was a very cute baby. For a baby human.

In the spirit of fairness, I will say that newborns are generally not the cutest things on the planet. The vast majority of newborns are small, red, vaguely hominid creatures that scream a lot and don't generally display any spark of interest in the broader world. Newborns hardly had the eyesight necessary to recognize their parents' faces, but little Naruto definitely had preferences for which brightly colored blobs he wanted to see.

I was not one of them (nor was I brightly colored). Not when he was hungry, and his dad wasn't responding to his loudly articulated argument that he should be fed immediately.

Cute and pushy, at the tender age of about twelve hours. Who would've thought?

"Kei-chan, take over for me," Kushina said as soon as we heard the newborn screaming, handing me a wooden spoon before rushing off toward the bedroom.

I…wasn't exactly sure what in hell she expected me to do with it. I was the kind of cook that, rather than being bad enough to warp the very laws of physics and accidentally create sapient pudding, was merely mediocre. Most the cookery fail came from my lack of attention span, more than anything. I'd forget stuff on the stove while working on creating seals barely two meters away, or wander away while someone tried to show me how to keep myself from starving.

There was an "oof" as Rin dropped into one of the kitchen chairs behind me. I stood at the stove, trapped in the existential terror of trying to figure out what to do.

"Kei, I can help with that," Rin said.

"Really?" I asked.

Rin got up, plucked the spoon out of my hand, set it down on a kitchen towel, and patted my shoulder. With her other hand, she turned the heat on the stove down, probably so the soup wouldn't burn.

Oh. "Thanks, Rin-chan." I paused, looking at her. "When did you start just using my name, anyway?"

She started doing that thing. The thing that Hinata did, when she was nervous? Rin pushed her index fingers together, radiating a quiet anxiousness. "It's…it's not rude, is it?"

"No. You never really had to call me 'Kei-senpai' in the first place, either." I shrugged. "I mean, it felt nice that someone looked up to me like that, but you surpassed me ages ago." I winked. "Eh, Rin-senpai?"

"Please don't, Kei-chan." Ah, crap. She didn't need to slip backwards a step just because she was concerned about my feelings.

"You don't need to worry about me," I told her, affecting unconcern. "My whole genin team is a bunch of rude jerks anyway, compared to you. We don't use '-kun' or '-chan' in any direction, and we pretty much never have."

Mostly because we actually were rude to each other. It was just that none of us had ever cared. For fuck's sake, Obito straight up called Kakashi a bastard the first time they met, and I'd been privately referring to Kakashi as a jackass in my head for about that long. Kakashi had had us both pegged as sentimental idiots.

I just wasn't sure when all those flying insults became endearments.

"Ah." Belatedly, I realized that maybe my description of my team had been more of an indictment "Still, Rin-chan? You can totally just use 'Kei' for me." Just about everyone else my age did already.

"Only if I can be just 'Rin','" she countered.

Perhaps it was my cultural gap showing again, but it almost felt like a bizarre sort of downgrade to lose the '-chan.' But if that was what she wanted… "Okay, Rin."

"Did you two let my soup burn?" Kushina demanded, reappearing in the kitchen. For a second, I wondered why she didn't seem to have the same bounce in her step as usual. Then I remembered that, duh, she'd given birth about fourteen hours beforehand and… wait.

Yep, she had her shirt pushed up and was still breastfeeding Naruto.

Was my competence in the kitchen so horrifically lacking that she couldn't delay at all? It seemed like Naruto was going to get used to being lugged around like an animate loaf of bread for the foreseeable future—his mother would hardly stay still for anything. We'd have to rig them a sling post-haste, just so Kushina didn't get the urge to just put her baby down someplace in order to use her hands.

"You were gone for like two minutes," I said incredulously. "Even I can't destroy a kitchen that fast."

…Well, I couldn't destroy a kitchen through failing at cooking by accident. I could definitely pull some ridiculous crap on purpose.

Kushina gave Rin and me a thoroughly skeptical look. Then, without another word, she dragged another chair out from its hiding place behind the kitchen table, collapsing into it with a sigh.

"Is Naruto-chan all right?" Rin asked, sitting back down at the table so she could more easily peer at Naruto.

"I don't think anything that eats this much could be unhealthy," Kushina said dryly. Looking at her, I realized belatedly that she didn't really look like she'd slept all that well. Her long red hair was still stiff from sweat or dirt or whatever, and with Sensei still unconscious, me sleeping off chakra exhaustion, and Obito immobile, there hadn't been all that many hands to help keep little Naruto occupied through the night.

"Weren't the Third and Biwako-sama helping you at all?" I asked, crossing my arms.

"Yes, but the village…" Kushina trailed off. She sighed again. "Needs of the many, right?"

"…That's one way to look at it," I said carefully. "But it doesn't really change the fact that you don't look like you've slept since Naruto-chan was born."

Rin and I exchanged glances. Rin said, "Kushina-san, maybe you could take a nap once Naruto-chan is fed? Kei and I can handle most things just fine."

Especially since, thanks to Jiraiya, I didn't have to deal with the local equivalent of the Agony Matrix in my chest.

But as for Rin…

"Rin, you should probably take a nap unless you've got a soldier pill bottle around here somewhere,"
I added, giving the resident medic a concerned look.

"What about you?" Kushina asked, as Naruto made a small sighing noise against her chest.

"I recover a lot faster from chakra exhaustion than most people, I wasn't awake all night, and I wasn't in labor yesterday." I shrugged. "I'll be fine."

"Don't go abusing the Thr—Isobu-sensei's power just because the rest of us are tired," Kushina said, catching herself.

"I'm staying up," Rin said, setting her jaw stubbornly. "There are stimulants in the bathroom cabinet, and I don't feel comfortable going to sleep when Obito and Hokage-sama are still reeling from chakra exhaustion. And besides, I got to nap earlier."

"Explains why you were asleep next to me." But still… "There's nothing we can really do to help with chakra exhaustion of all things. Rin…"

Which was kind of the reason that chakra exhaustion was such a problem, for a condition that was bleeding obvious to any shinobi who wasn't riding an adrenaline high. It was very, very unusual for the condition to strike without warning. I had no doubt whatsoever that Sensei had known that using whatever seal they went with, for Naruto, would have knocked him flat. He just hadn't cared.

Rin shook her head. "You can't make me follow that suggestion, Kei."

…Okay, point. I ranked her in terms of the whole promotion thing, but as a field medic she could basically do whatever she had to in order to ensure her patients' survival. Anything.

Who exactly do you expect to help if the Uchiha boy crashes on your watch?

Double point. Dammit.

I gave up. "All right, all right. You're head medic. I'm just head face-breaker. Get the pills you want and we'll get set up."

"You two don't actually have to—" But Kushina's protest was cut off by a jaw-cracking yawn, which neatly punctured her argument. "Oh, fine."

"We'll do a walk-through a couple of times," I said. "Seriously, Kushina-sensei, you need to rest." And at the moment, aside from advanced sealing techniques I hadn't gotten around to, there wasn't much she could do that I couldn't. Pushing her to do so would be…well, stupid. Especially if it was something we could just as easily get Jiraiya to do.

"After Naruto's finished," Kushina acquiesced. Then all of her attention was back on the newborn in her arms.

"Kei, can you send Tsuruya-sensei out?" Rin asked, as we retreated from the kitchen. Rin was probably going to check on Sensei again—I hadn't asked—but I was going to start checking the security seals around the house. We wouldn't be talking much.

"Yeah, I have the chakra for it. Just a second." I headed out the front door, closing it behind me. Then I hopped up onto the roof so I could summon Tsuruya well off the ground. She was large enough to require a leaping start from ground level, which she often didn't appreciate having to do.

I pricked my thumb with a shuriken and, one poof of smoke later, had Tsuruya's huge black-tipped wings shading me from overhead.
She bonked me on the side of my head anyway, with her beak. "Tell me, Keisuke-sama, did everything go well? There were no injuries, no… Oh, dear."

I hugged Tsuruya as she gently wrapped her right wing around me. I wasn't crying but it was a very close thing.

"It's going to be all right, Keisuke-sama," Tsuruya murmured, lowering her head to rest against the top of mine. "When I come back, I'll listen."

"R-Right." I swallowed. "Tsuruya, go find Jiraiya-sama or the Third Hokage. I need to make sure they know how Sensei's doing."

"How is the Fourth Hokage?" Tsuruya asked, her voice still low. With her wing in the way, it was going to be pretty hard for anyone to hear me or read my lips.

"He'll be fine. Rin thinks he could wake up any minute now," I hedged anyway. Okay, so it wasn't a lie… It was more like I was fudging the truth a little. The idea that Sensei wouldn't wake up from a nonfatal bout of chakra exhaustion was frankly terrifying. And unlikely. "I'm going to stay here, all right? I'll take any orders they have, but only if I have someone to hand off guard duty to. And I don't think there's anyone who qualifies right now."

Tsuruya nodded. "I understand, Keisuke-sama. I'll deliver the messages. Do you need me to do anything else?"

"Well, if someone needs help…"

"I will volunteer my services." Tsuruya's flight feathers rattled as she folded her wings back into their resting position. "Goodbye for now, Keisuke-sama."

As Tsuruya threw herself off the roof, I hopped back down to the welcome mat and let myself back into the house.

I could tell when Sensei woke up when he walked into the master bedroom's doorframe with an echoing thud, about an hour after Kushina had finally gone to bed, with Naruto asleep on her chest. It probably said something about the situation—about my life—that I could recognize that sound off-hand. I just wasn't sure what.

I didn't get up from the couch to go help or anything—instead, I was creating more explosive seals to replace some of the ones that I kept handing off to other people. It didn't take much concentration compared to the other stuff, so I could guard and practice my explosive calligraphy at the same time. Sensei didn't really need my help to figure out how to operate a door anyway.

"…get that moved…" he muttered as he disappeared into the bathroom, rubbing his forehead. There was the sound of the showerhead's spray hissing and hitting the other wall.

"What happened?" asked Rin, sticking her head out of the guest bedroom. Obito was awake, though he hadn't moved yet and Rin hadn't apparently noticed. Hayate was in the other bathroom, washing his face from what I could hear.

"Sensei misses the door when he's chakra-exhausted," I replied without looking up. "He's two for two on that."

Rin disappeared back into the guest bedroom with a shrug, after a moment's thought. I went back to my sealing work.
Sensei emerged from the depths of the bathroom after a while, and after another thud and "ow!" combination. I didn't ask what he'd been having difficulty with. There are some things that just aren't worth asking.

He sat down on the couch next to me, peering curiously at my designs. It took him longer than it should have to make an "ah" of realization.

Sensei scratched his head. "Kei-kun?"

"Yes, Sensei?"

"What day is it?"

I looked up, realizing that he had his head leaning pretty heavily on his upraised palm, which was supported by his elbow and leg. His eyes were also heavy-lidded and somewhat unfocused. I said, "The eleventh. You were either asleep or unconscious for about…fourteen hours? Something like that. I'm on watch."

Sensei had gone as still as a statue.

"Sensei?" I asked.

He jumped off the couch like something had shocked him and ran to the bedroom.

Rin stuck her head out into the hall again. "What was that?"

Whatever I was going to say was cut off by Sensei saying, quite loudly, "I'M A DAD!"

As an aside, I had no idea how he had failed to notice little Naruto in the bed with him and Kushina. I was probably never going to know.

"I KNOW," Kushina snarled back at him," SO BE QUIET!"

That was about when Naruto started crying again.

I facepalmed with both hands.

And this was probably why Sensei didn't work himself to chakra exhaustion all the time. His brain clearly went on walkabout whenever it happened.

Long story short: We eventually managed to get everything sorted out again. Kushina stayed in the bedroom with the newborn, grumbling about her husband's airheaded-ness. Hayate came out of the other bathroom at some point, his hair still wet and eyes still red, and curled into my side as I put the finishing touches on my explosive seals. Sensei eventually ate something, though he struggled to pull his jōnin uniform shirt on without getting stuck—which didn't really say much for his ability to defend himself. Along the way, he made sure to ask what he'd missed by sleeping the morning away.

"Other than reconstruction work, not much," I said, capping my calligraphy brush and eyeballing the drying ink carefully. Once satisfied with my work, I rolled it all up into another premade explosive scroll. I'd probably end up giving it to Genma or someone else again, given my touch explosive talent, but it was always good to have these things on hand. "I can follow you to the office, if you want."

Sensei sighed. "Yeah. That."

"You don't need to sound so excited," I said dryly.
Sensei waved my remark off with a flap of his left hand. His right was occupied by his second melonpan of the day, which he was devouring with gusto.

"You probably don't even need to go in, really," I said, since his mouth was full. "That in-tray in the office is transporting all the paperwork over here, and the Third Hokage is still in the actual office and coordinating things."

Though Tsuruya hadn't gotten back with news from around the village, I really didn't think that it indicated any kind of trouble.

"No, I need to get out of the house and show people I'm not dead," Sensei replied, after downing a cup of hot tea in one swallow. I kind of wanted to know how he did that without scalding himself, but it wasn't super important. "I…I think I'll take you, and Obito, and I'll have to pull someone from the Hokage Guard Platoon to cover the house while we're gone…" Sensei paused, looking at me. And at Hayate.

I was wearing a tear-stained gray tank-top with my uniform bottoms, which were covered in mud and blood spatter. My hitai-ate was in some kind of pocket dimension along with Black Zetsu, and I didn't care enough to try and get it back from him. I had explosives, and my equipment belts, and my flak jacket was still around the house somewhere.

Hayate, who was now wearing shorts and a stained T-shirt that probably belonged to Kakashi (given the bizarrely extended turtleneck look), looked dully back at him.

"Your brother should come, too. I'm going to meet Tsunade there one way or another."

"Is that why you want to bring Obito?" I asked.

"Yes. The sooner everyone's back on their feet, the sooner we can get the village put back together." I saw something shift in his expression, and his eyes darkened. "Then we can start arranging funerals."

Oh.

"Go ahead and get dressed. I'm leaving in two minutes."

"Getting dressed," given that I didn't have any spare clothes stashed in the house, basically consisted of tracking down my uniform shirt and flak jacket. And my sandals, but that part was less of a concern, given that destroying them was harder. As it was, I salvaged a dirty but otherwise serviceable ensemble. I doubted anyone would really care how rumpled I was or wasn't, after last night.

"…And make sure to ask Jiraiya-sama to make completely sure that no one can do that again," Rin was saying to Sensei, as I emerged from the bathroom with a toothbrush in my mouth.

Sensei was carrying Obito on his back, with Obito's arms looped loosely around his neck. He was nodding along seriously with what Rin was saying, his eyes slightly wider than usual. I guessed that while he hadn't actually doubted that she had a spine, given that Rin's actions last night had half been his idea, he'd never really thought that she'd use that same iron core on him.

Obito was stifling a quiet snicker against the side of Sensei's neck.

I dodged the lecture and let Hayate climb onto my back as well. I tried to be careful of his injured leg, but I couldn't really help if it bumped against my hip before I got him settled.
"We're going to get your leg fixed, Haa-chan," I whispered to him, twisting my neck so I could almost see his face.

He nodded, bumping his forehead against the side of my head. "Okay."

"And Kei," and I jumped a little at the sight of Rin's index finger waggling in my face, "make sure you remind Tsunade-sama to check his chakra coils. And keep Hayate-chan off that leg even after Tsunade-sama heals it!"

I nodded automatically. "Right, got it."

Rin stepped back, crossing her arms over her chest. "Well…that's all I had to say. I'll look after Kushina-san and Naruto-chan until someone gets sent here, then."

The living room vanished in a blur of whirling color and a fwish before I was able to respond.

When reality reasserted itself, we were all in the Hokage's office in front of the desk, where the Third Hokage had accidentally let some ash from his pipe fall on the desk as he jolted from surprise. The secretary next to him—a chūnin I didn't recognize—dropped a clipboard and hastened to retrieve it.

The Third Hokage recovered first. "Minato-kun, you're already ready to resume work?"

"Close enough," Sensei replied. He had left his signature Fourth Hokage-emblazoned coat in the house, along with his flak jacket, but he set Obito down on the office's couch and immediately grabbed the spare formal robes from a nearby…was that a broom closet? Or a cabinet I'd just somehow never noticed before.

Apparently it was more like a robe closet. Regardless, the cabinet vanished from sight as soon as Sensei closed the door and started to tug the robes on over his head.

"Define 'close enough.'" I suggested, setting Hayate down on the couch next to Obito, who still hadn't said anything.

"Don't expect me to give you a lift back to the house."

Dammit.

"Sarutobi-sama, I'm going to need…Jiraiya-sensei, Tsunade-hime, and maybe a few more people."

Sensei made a helpless gesture. "I don't actually know what's been happening since I blacked out."

"Well, how about I get you started, then." The Third Hokage addressed his secretary then, saying, "Please leave us. Ask Tsunade-chan and Jiraiya-kun to come to the tower as soon as possible."

"Yes, Hokage-sama."

The rest of us watched her go.

"I think I need to clarify a few things before anyone else arrives," the Third Hokage said, giving Hayate a significant look. "And this doesn't need to be heard by young ears."

"As soon as Tsunade fixes his leg and Obito's chakra, I'll send them back," Sensei replied, leaning on the edge of the desk. "We'll need Falcon's team at my house as soon as possible."

Sarutobi checked a document at the desk. "…Falcon's team is down three members, but we should be able to get the rest on duty."
I have to admit, I tuned out most of what they said, logistics-wise, after that. Not that it wasn't interesting from a macro-level standpoint about village inter-departmental politics and logistics…but I really didn't care.

My focus was on Obito and Hayate. I figured the two Hokage in the room would be able to handle whatever came their way, at least for a bit.

"Hey. You two are going to be back to walking in just a bit," I said to them, standing in front of them. I wasn't willing to sit down just yet, not after spending the morning getting a crick in my back from leaning over the coffee table for too long.

"I guess," Obito muttered.

Hayate mumbled something I couldn't understand at all.

Oh, dammit again.

Under my breath, I grumbled, "Tsunade-sama had better get here soon…"

"What in the world were you doing?" Tsunade asked Obito, after putting him through a fairly thorough medical examination. Obito and I opened our mouths to respond, but she cut us off, "That was a rhetorical question. I damn well know what you were doing. Just don't make a habit of it. I'm not going to be around to fix your screw-ups whenever you shred your chakra coils."

"I…wasn't really planning on doing it again?" Obito tried, baffled by the woman's backhanded approach to concern.

"Good." Tsunade looked at me, even while still smoothing the… "scabs"…in Obito's chakra coils, which Rin had put in to keep him from dying on the spot last night. She could almost repair the very walls of capillaries with that kind of skill, no matter how shredded they were. To me, she said, "And you."

I squeaked. "Yes, Tsunade-sama?"

"I remember your brother from last night. Why didn't you bring him to one of the medical stations?" Hayate shifted uncomfortably under her gaze as she turned her attention to him. Her expression softened, but only slightly.

"I was unconscious," I offered lamely.

Tsunade paused, as though considering whether that actually was a valid excuse for delayed medical attention. "…Fine. At least you got him to me."

She managed to get Hayate's leg sorted out within ten minutes. Something about a clean break. She did tell me to keep him off it, but since I wasn't heading back to the house until Sensei decided he was done working for the day…

"Obito, can you look after Hayate?" I asked.

Obito flinched nearly imperceptibly. I still caught it, though—all those months of fighting in sync with him had taught me a thing or two about tells. "Uh, yeah. Sure."

"Obito, I meant what I said last night," I said, just as Jiraiya walked into the office.

"What are you talking about?" Jiraiya asked, with a strange lilt to his voice that made me give him a narrow-eyed glare. I was not in the mood to deal with Jiraiya in goofball mode, regardless of the power difference between us. And yes, I realized that the words I used could have been taken the wrong way.

"Jiraiya-sensei, not now," Sensei snapped from the desk. He was looking at something written in really tiny characters. Apparently, the designer of that particular form had been big on saving paper but not ink.

"All right, all right. Hey, kid. You've still got that weird seal, right?" Jiraiya had turned his attention to Obito instead of saying whatever "that's what she said"-esque remark he'd probably been planning. He could read the mood of a room, but apparently his brain was on a short delay.

…Which, given that most of us hadn't slept in a while, made sense. I sighed and tried not to think about it too much.

"Yeah, I think so?" Obito replied.

Jiraiya nodded to himself. "Right. Let me see your back. Tsunade-hime, if you could…"

The two Sannin and my teammate shifted positions so that Tsunade could continue healing uninterrupted, while Jiraiya applied that strange counter-seal from the night before.

"Kei-kun, take a look at this," Sensei said, still sitting on the desk. He held a thick sheaf of papers out to me, bound with metal rings.

"This is…" Well, it was ten pages long, but it was also an anonymized and abridged medical file from the looks of it, using the Konoha hospital's slightly singed letterhead. I flipped through the stack until I found the coroner's report, which was quite thoroughly abridged. Via someone going over it with a gigantic censorship pen. "This is probably the kind of medical file I'm not supposed to be seeing."

Sensei nodded. "True. Still, what do you notice?"

Well…

"In between all the 'redacted' and 'insufficient clearance' notices, I'm also seeing a distinct lack of mission details. So, ANBU or jōnin mission results. Any details pulled from the file are probably based on that." I flipped to the first page again. "Which means either that the unnamed deceased was involved in something extremely sketchy before his or her death, or that the details of the death are distinctive enough that they would point fingers at someone who doesn't need the advanced notice."

"And?" the Third Hokage asked.

"And I'm going to guess, based on the patient's listed height and weight, that the deceased individual was either a woman or a lightly-built man." I flipped to the coroner's report again. "...And someone who abruptly lost about five kilos of weight upon death. Long-term illness leading to weight loss to that degree would have been noted in the file, or at least pulled the deceased from the active roster. Five kilos indicates a major extremity or major organ being badly damaged or lost, plus associated body mass. Possibly up to or including parts of the head." I looked up. "How am I doing?"

Sensei just gestured for me to go on.

"Well, I'm going to assume that the deceased lost their head somehow, given the abrupt associated change in height that likely explains the sudden weight loss," I said, checking details across the file. "You wouldn't be giving me this file unless it was important or a test, which may or may not be related to the events last night. I'm leaning toward 'yes' for the latter question, because the hospital was on fire last night, and given the other problems the village has had lately, you wouldn't have had time or inclination to go fishing though the salvaged paperwork for something irrelevant." Flip. Close the file. Sigh. "This is probably someone I know, isn't it?"

Sensei cast a significant look at Hayate, again.

Speaking of, Tsunade had just finished healing them both, and Jiraiya had applied that…String-Cutter Seal…to Obito. I couldn't sense the Puppet-Master Seal, in him or in me, so I took that to mean that the danger was over.

"Obito, you and Hayate are going back to the house," I said, my voice astoundingly level.

"I was planning on it," Obito said, and though I could still hear the hesitation in his voice I decided not to comment on it. It wasn't as pronounced, at least.

Hayate still seemed somewhat listless, but the only way I'd be able to deal with that was by dealing with everything else and then making sure the village was calm enough for everyone. Then I'd be able to help him properly.

…And thinking like that was probably why Asuma had, in the other timeline, run the fuck away to become one of the Twelve Guardian Ninja rather than staying in Konoha to deal with his dad.

Tsunade said briskly, "Your chakra levels should be back to normal by tomorrow. Make sure to go to bed early, and don't even think about stretching the definition of 'light duty' for at least a day after that. Leave the reconstruction to people who can keep their arms raised above their heads." She helped Obito to his feet, and helped him lift Hayate off the couch into a bridal carry. "Now go rest."

They left through Sensei's window. From the feel of things, they made it past the first jump, so I stopped worrying about them for a bit.

"So, Sensei, why did you want us here?" Jiraiya asked, leaning against the office wall.

"Actually, Minato-kun did." The Third Hokage beckoned for his successor to take the floor. "If you would."

Sensei nodded. Then he turned to me. "Kei, that file is about someone you happen to know."

I braced for bad news.

"Honoka Uchiha was discovered dead early this morning, before dawn."

…What? "She was…Sensei, I distinctly remember seeing Honoka-san with Nagato-san during the initial confrontation with the giant Zetsu," I said, surprised. "She was alive, and with Nagato-san providing fire support there was no way anything should have gotten close enough to kill her. And…" Wait a fucking minute. "Sensei, where is her Mangekyō Sharingan?"

"That's what we're trying to find out, Kei-kun." Sensei took the coroner's report back from me before dropping it to the desk. "Now, I know you're not involved in her death, and neither is Nagato-san. I saw enough of his fighting style to know that if he'd attacked her, we probably wouldn't have found a body."

Mainly because he pulped his opponents rather than going for any kind of striking attack. Like oranges.
"I'm not going to assume that her eyes were destroyed. Or that her death was natural." Inasmuch as a death on a battlefield with a Tailed Beast on it could possibly be. And anyway, even biting Honoka's head off didn't seem like Kurama's style. He would have mentioned it, right?

Isobu?

Kurama doesn't seem to know anything about an Uchiha during the fight. She didn't use her eyes on him. He would have noticed.

"Wolf's report"—and here, Sensei produced another sheaf of paperwork, which was filled out with Kakashi's handwriting and not nearly as censored—"shows that there was evidence other humans had been in the area, and a blood trail that disappeared a short distance away."

"They could have waited for Honoka-san's blood to coagulate, though…that wouldn't account for the movement or the additional possible suspects." I bit the inside of my cheek, thinking. "Sensei, Isobu says that Kurama didn't even notice Honoka-san—if he had, he might've killed her. But the destruction seemed too precise for someone that big. There would have been crushed flesh, not a slice. There's no note about tool marks, either, but a single katana strike could have produced a mostly-clean separation."

Only if the killer had known exactly what they were doing, and if the target wasn't moving. I liked to think I knew a thing or two about shinobi combat, and what I knew made the idea that this could be an accident laughable.

"This is a murder investigation." Sensei sat back on the desk, steepling his fingers in front of his face. In the midafternoon light streaming in through the window, it made him look rather ominous.

"Why involve me?" I asked, more curious than anything. Yes, I'd known Honoka, but…well, I hadn't necessarily liked her. I respected her skill and her attitude, but I didn't necessarily feel any grief at her death. I reserved all of that for…basically for Mom, at this point.

"We have reason to believe that this may not be the first incident of its kind," Sensei responded. His gaze swept across the room, until eventually coming to a stop on the Third Hokage. "We've talked about this, somewhat."

So, Sensei thought it was ROOT, too? Well, that made things simpler. At the same time, the fact that Sarutobi was going to be included in this discussion made things somewhat less so.

"That doesn't answer the question, though…" I said in a somewhat quieter voice, hesitant.

"Kid, the people in this room are those who are absolutely trustworthy in the eyes of the Hokage," Jiraiya said, clapping his hand down on my shoulder. "And who can act on that loyalty."

Aaaaand?

"Keisuke-chan, isn't it?" Tsunade huffed. "Fourteen hours ago, you stood in the way of the strongest of the Tailed Beasts and shouted him into submission. Before that, you fought tooth and nail against a possessed teammate and successfully talked him down to the point that others were able to act and free him from Madara Uchiha's compulsions."

"Face it, kid," Jiraiya said to my dumbstruck expression. "You're in deep now."

Meep.

I tried very hard to push the gravity of that realization aside, because *holy f*ucking *sh*t*. I was mostly successful, after struggling internally for a few seconds. But my voice still came out strangled when I said, "T-Thank you, Se—Hokage-sama."

"From what I've heard from Minato-kun and Jiraiya-kun," Sarutobi said, into the awkward silence, "there has been a conspiracy brewing within Konoha for some time. It's a serious allegation, and one I'd like to hear justified."

I exchanged a look with Sensei. Most of what I could "prove" depended on future knowledge, because I really had no idea what I could bring to the table without showing too many of our cards. Shisui's death wasn't going to happen for ages, if it did at all, and while I could probably argue that someone should get Danzō to take the bandages off that right arm of his, there was no guarantee that the arm was even there yet.

It would be too much like luck to just randomly stumble onto, say, a refrigerated basement full of stolen Sharingan. Even if I was pretty sure it existed somewhere.

Sensei said, "At this point, we don't have evidence. Just…suspicions." Sensei shrugged. "But to be honest, Sarutobi-sama, we don't actually have to prove anything to you. I just thought it'd be best to make you aware that events in this village have not always been as they seem. At this point, it's my business whether the conspirators get rooted out."

…That had to be deliberate word choice, there.

Sarutobi's eyes narrowed, just a little.

"The ANBU team conspiring with Hanzō the Salamander was a bit of a hint, though," Jiraiya remarked. "I never did report exactly where we got Nagato from, did I?"

"Not to Sarutobi-sensei, anyway," Tsunade put in, equally dry.

"The short version is that, at last count, ROOT is still active despite mandates against just that," Sensei summed up. "And while it's possible that the cell in Amegakure had gone rogue, at least for black ops, a coordinated assault on the Akatsuki stronghold by Konoha and Amegakure forces looks more suspicious than not. We do not, as I recall, have any diplomatic ties to Ame. Further, the government collapsed a month ago and Akatsuki confirmed Hanzō's death, so I doubt we were going to be served well by pursuing an alliance anyway."

Inaudibly, I sighed. This was mostly rehashing things we already knew.

"ROOT may be under new management for all we know," Jiraiya said, probably to mollify Sarutobi. I doubted he believed it. "Shimura-dono may well have ceded control of all ROOT assets to the village, only for a cell or ten to go rogue for one reason or another. There's currently no way to be sure. But I don't like this trend of Konoha not being aware of the moves we make against other villages."

Sarutobi sighed. "Clearly, you've put a lot of thought into this."

"Not enough to convince you, though." Jiraiya shrugged. "Which is fine, if disappointing. Minato is the only one whose opinion really matters. I just thought it'd be polite to inform you what could be going on behind all our backs."

The question was what we were going to do with this information, though. I hadn't been trained to make those decisions, and when I had, my future-knowledge hadn't always been a help.

"Kei-kun?" Sensei said quietly, while the other adults were sizing each other up for a fight. Or maybe an argument. It was so hard to tell with high-level ninjas.

"Se—Hokage-sama?" I responded, with minor hesitance. I was supposed to be treating him like the Hokage but... well. It was a hard habit to break.

Sensei paced carefully around the Sannin and their teacher and dropped a file—which he had apparently pulled out of nowhere—in my hands. "Here."

"Sensei, what is...?" I trailed off, looking at the name at on the lip of the folder. Miyako Gekkō. "Oh."

"Take this home. We're going to be here for a while." Sensei smiled, but sadly, like he didn't really want to leave me with just this but he had to.

"Well," I said with false cheer, around the knot in my throat, "I can see where I'm not wanted." I didn't want to be around the Sannin or this hell-conspiracy atmosphere when I read this. And I didn't really have anything to contribute that Jiraiya couldn't..."

"I'll tell you everything when I get home." He tapped the file. "We can discuss this then. Actually, we just need to have a family meeting in general..."

Funny, how I'd almost started thinking of "home" the same way I'd heard people talk about. Home is where you can love and be loved in return. "Where the heart is," if I could excuse the cliché.

Sensei gave the rest of the adults a long, dry look. Then he caught the look on my face, or maybe the way my chakra went haywire for a single, alarming moment as my composure started to crack.

Then he gave me a quick hug, which squashed the file to my chest. "I'll be home as soon as I can."

I left the office, my mind whirling.

Bizarrely, being sent home early from work didn't bother me so much. I may have been a special jōnin, but everyone in that room was also anywhere from ten to thirty or more years older than I was. They had the experience to know what to do to uproot a conspiracy. The smart thing to do was to use my information until it stopped being reliable, and then extrapolate to take the problem into their own hands.

They had enough to go on. They didn't need me to convince Sarutobi that Danzō was a fucking creep. Hell, having me there probably didn't help.

I was better off at home.

I got as far as the udon restaurant on Kame Street, with the file still under my arm, before realizing I was going the wrong way.

I was heading toward the house where I'd grown up, not toward Kushina and Sensei's house. Muscle memory had, in a single absentminded moment, ruined everything.

I sat down on the roof, hard, and put my face in my hands.

So much for keeping it together. It wasn't even dinnertime and I was already feeling myself crack again.

"Gekkō-san, please move to the ground. It's not safe to stay up here," said a voice by my ear.

I blinked, hurriedly rubbing the tears away on my sleeve before I turned into a leaky faucet. I stood up sharply, locating the speaker after just a moment.

An ANBU with a distinctly bird-shaped mask stood in front of me, further up on the roof. If I looked closely, I could see the artistic profile of a peregrine falcon, with blue markings implying a dark mask around a lightly-colored beak. He wasn't wearing a black cloak, but had a rather familiar sword strapped to his back as opposed to the ANBU standard-issue blades.

Almost against my will, I felt my lips curve into a watery smile. "I'll be out of your way in a moment, ANBU-san. Momentary lapse."

The ANBU nodded back, and I saw just the edge of Raidō Namiashi's face-warping scar when he turned his head. Combine that with the black sword and the sandy hair and…well. No one else had all of those. Especially when combined with that chakra signature.

Thank the merciful heavens that he was still okay.

"I think you and I are going to the same place." I said after a moment. "Falcon-san, right?"

The ANBU nodded.

When he turned to leave, I followed.

This time I didn't get lost.

Mom's file was…odd.

Granted, I'd never actually seen someone's unabridged personal file before, but I got the impression that they were supposed to be longer than a couple dozen pages even so. People just accumulated paperwork as they got older, in any society with a working bureaucracy. Ours, as per Sensei's lesser-known title of Paperwork Ninja Par Excellence, did not lack for paperwork.

I decided that subtlety had been expended for the day and, as soon as I got back to Sensei and Kushina's house, dropped it on the kitchen table. I felt Raidō take up his position on the roof, feeling rather bored, and the other chakra signatures in the house were…subdued. Not that I blamed them.

Kushina was asleep and, from the feel of things, Rin had stepped out for a while. That left me in the house with a sleeping mom and baby, and Obito and Hayate.

Hayate limped into the kitchen and sat down at the table with me once I had the file split into loose piles, by topic.

"What's this stuff?" Hayate asked, picking up a detailed schematic of some kind of sword design I didn't recognize. The exact proportions of the blade were off, and it had a reverse-bent edge. There was a word for it, but I didn't really care what it was.

"These are parts of Mom's file," I told him, wondering briefly if I should hide this information from him. It, in theory, wasn't necessarily appropriate for an Academy student to be reading about how his mother used to be…someone else. Thing was, as the current head of the family…"I didn't really think there was much point. "She used to be Tomoe Uesugi, but she changed her name when she married Dad."

And I was starting to get the feeling that "Tomoe Uesugi" had been someone that Mom might have wanted to forget.
"Tomoe…" Hayate leaned over, looking at how Mom's old name had been written. A single kanji.

"Uesugi…Uesugi…" I blew out a sigh of frustration. "I know I've heard that name before, but I can't remember where."

"This says Mom was from the Land of Iron," Hayate said, looking at a page that had the word "immigration" somewhere on it.

Well, theory confirmed.

"I guess she might have been from a clan?" I shrugged.

I didn't know anything about the Land of Iron, really. I knew there were samurai there, and that they turned normal swords into chakra lightsabers or something, but that was about when it all ended. In the snow. Possibly perma-snow. They shared a border with the Land of Frost, didn't they?

Hayate said, "Well, we know she came here…seventeen years ago. Wow."

Sensei would have just been a kid back then. The Second Shinobi World War would have still been raging. Hell, I wasn't quite sure if the Sannin had had their reputation back when Mom was just arriving in Konoha.

It also meant that Mom would have been an active shinobi on our side for only three years. How in the world had she become a special jōnin in that time?

…oh, who was I kidding? I'd gotten that far in five (even if I was sure the last promotion was a formality). It was possible.

"I wonder if she met Dad back when the war was still on." Hayate picked up another sheet. Absently, he rubbed at his eyes with his sleeve, but I could feel a sort of determination in him that I hadn't all day.

At least all this stuff was helping him.

Mostly, it was worrying me. There had to be some reason for Mom to come to Konoha of all places. The Land of Iron wasn't all that close to Konoha, from what I remembered. She could have stopped in any of the countries between the two and just…settled down, I guess? Trained samurai were, in their own ways, nearly as valuable as mercenaries as shinobi were. There just weren't nearly as many of them.

"Kei, Hayate-chan, what are you two looking at?" Obito's voice asked from the hall, and I looked up to find him peeking around the corner like he'd been waiting for a moment that wouldn't feel like intruding.

"Mom's stuff," said Hayate, still distracted by whatever he was reading. "Sis, what's Three Wolves?"

I shrugged. "It's a mountain in the Land of Iron, I think. And Obito, you can sit down here. I doubt any of this is Eyes-Only." If it had been, Sensei wouldn't have let me take it back to the house.

Obito still hesitated, but just for a moment. He sat down across from Hayate and picked up another sheaf of paper.

God damn we did not need another guilt complex on the team. Kakashi was enough for three teams.

"Obito, the thing I said before? Still true," I told him.
"What thing?" Hayate asked.

Dammit.

"It's a team thing, Hayate. I'll tell you later." Or never.

Hayate gave me a critical look. "You're lying."

Double dammit.

Obito was doing that cringing thing, and Hayate focused on him. Softer target. Mom and I had taught him almost too well. Hayate just said, "Obito?"

Obito flinched like Hayate had tried to punch him.

Hayate waited. So did I, but for a different reason.

If I hadn't gotten through to him—if Rin hadn't gotten through to him—then maybe this was necessary.

Obito's voice was no louder than a breath as he spoke. Fear and guilt and shame had torn through him again and again all day, stripping the strength from him. "I…your mom wouldn't be dead if it wasn't for me."

Hayate froze.

…I'd actually forgotten that Hayate had spent most of last night unconscious.

I looked between Hayate (still shocked) and Obito (still cringing) and found myself incapable of making a move. What in hell did you say in situations like this? This had not been a part of my limited psych training, in either lifetime.

"Y-you said it's 'your fault'." Hayate swallowed hard, clearly thinking his way through it. "B-but that's not the s-same as…as killing Mom. It's not."

"But…" Obito trailed off at the look on Hayate's face.

"You're almost like my b-big brother," Hayate's voice hitched. "S-so you're lying. There's no way —"

"I am not—!" Obito reeled back, his Sharingan activating apparently without him noticing. He choked on the knot in his throat, recovered, and tried again, "I'm not—!"

"You are!" Hayate got to his feet, sending the chair skidding back. He looked at me, eyes wide, "Sis, tell him!"

Tell him what?

The truth.

"Obito Uchiha," I said, in an impossibly level voice. I was probably going to break at least one major security regulation, but…well. For a good cause.

Obito’s eye snapped to mine. I was very deliberately not allowing any of Isobu's chakra into my coils. In my mind's eye, I could see Isobu covering his eye again.
"Mom…was like the mother you never had." My voice went terribly gentle. Obito winced again.
"And you loved her, like we did. Hayate and I both know you'd never hurt her."

"But…"

"You didn't, Obito." I felt Hayate's hand grab mine and squeeze. "That man did, because he knew he wouldn't be able to use your power if you still had her. Had us." Deep breath. "The Sharingan is a terrible power, that cuts its user as much as its enemies. It gets stronger with pain, and he knew it. So he killed her, while she was trying to keep us all safe."

Because Madara would never get Obito unless he broke him first.

To Hayate, I explained quietly, "Last night, a cruel man tried to destroy everyone and everything in Konoha. If he'd succeeded, well, none of us would be here. Obito and I, and others, all went out to stop him." Stripped of all major detail, I could maybe slip this story past a few security regulations…"There was a chakra parasite who used Obito like a puppet to try and get him to work for the enemy. It didn't work, but it was a close fight.

"And…the same man killed Mom." While she was trying to get Hayate to safety, and deliberately challenging Black Zetsu to get Obito out of danger, but fuck mentioning that part. "We got him back—took out the chakra parasite and killed his entire army—but…"

"But he's still out there. He might be able to hurt us." Hayate looked around at us, pale. Then he focused on Obito again, and I felt his chakra act up again in that strange way that meant—"That's…that's why you're afraid. You don't trust yourself anymore."

And just like that, Hayate hit the nail on the head.

Obito mumbled something I didn't quite catch.

Hayate walked around the edge of the table, to Obito's side, and hugged him. I heard Hayate's voice hitch, but he still managed to say, "I do. I still trust you."

And then everyone was crying. But it was the good kind, I think.

It took us a couple of minutes to calm down after that. I got tea started somewhere in the middle of the recovery period, while Hayate and Obito checked the documents on the table for tearstains. Or maybe information. It was hard to tell.

"Kei…what was that jutsu y-your mom used?" Minimal hesitance, there, but at least we were making progress. Obito clarified, "Last night?"

"Which one?" I asked, because Mom had used a lot of jutsu that he wouldn't necessarily have been familiar with. Hell, I'd never seen her bust out the Gates before then.

"The, uh, the thing she did with her chakra," Obito said. "It turned her skin red, and she seemed tired after using it?"

"The Eight Gates." I replied, glancing over my shoulder at them. Obito's Sharingan had finally calmed the fuck down, and Hayate was kneeling on his chair to get a better look at the documents at the far side of the table.

Obito blinked. "That's…Gai does that, doesn't he?"

"Yeah." I turned the heat on the stove's burners down and turned around. "Can I see where the "What?" Obito asked.

"Well, it says here"—between all the Scrabble words—"that Mom came to the village with chakra coil damage from overuse of the Eight Gates." It would explain a few things… "Mom did serious damage to her own body before Dad met her. He was on the team that managed to bring her in."

"Like a criminal?" Hayate asked, his eyes wide.

"I…don't know. Obito, find the intake form."

A quick search with the Sharingan later…

"Okay, let me see what we have here." I had taken the kettle off the stove and passed it off to Hayate so he could pour us all a cup each. I scanned the documents again. "This says that Mom arrived in Konoha suffering from severe chakra exhaustion and some long-term injuries that hadn't been treated properly." Mainly of the blade-inflicted kind. I flipped a page forward. "And the medic-nin in charge of her care at the time"—Yamaguchi-sensei?—"said that she'd have to quit fighting to keep herself from getting worse."

"I thought only the Fifth Gate on up were fatal," Obito said.

"Well, all of them are going to hurt if you're not careful. They shut down the body's limiters, which means muscles can start breaking bones and things like that." I explained. Flip. Flip. "Mom's old samurai style had a…a jutsu, I guess, that needed the user to open the first four Gates. "Dragon Flight of Heaven…? Where had I heard that before?"

"That still doesn't really explain why she came here instead of staying in the Land of Iron," Hayate pointed out.

"Is there an interview transcript anywhere?" Obito blinked and then his Sharingan was active again. And then, "This is the second time this 'Ghoul of Three Wolves' has come up."

If Mom already had a secret long-lost double life as a samurai from the Land of Iron, who had left her homeland under mysterious circumstances and ended up in Konoha with severe injuries, then…

"Somehow," I said aloud, in a very dry voice that did not prevent me from hearing the fwhish of Sensei arriving, "I think Mom was the Ghoul."

"You'd be right," Sensei said, sweeping over to us while still clad in his heavy Hokage robe.

This confirmation did not, all told, engender any particular feelings of shame, regret, or really anything other than a vaguely hollow sense of being cheated out of getting to ask the question while Mom was still alive.

With a name like that, Mom could hardly have been a notorious murderer. At the same time, I was staying in the house of a man who had a list of confirmed kills that had ticked upward through triple digits sometime last year, with a boy whose alternate universe counterpart had an even higher body-count, and I trusted them both implicitly.

Both with my life and my brother's.

It was amazing how far standards shifted in a different culture.

"So, you're here to answer questions," I said, though my tone was pretty flat. "We've got a few."

Sensei sat down at the table next to us. "Hit me."

None of us took that literally.

"What do we know about the Ghoul?" Hayate piped up, still holding the paper that listed Mom's country of origin.

Sensei explained. It took a while, and was almost disturbingly clinical.

The Ghoul of Three Wolves first appeared nineteen years ago in the Land of Iron, in the wake of the destruction of one of the most prominent samurai clans in the country. Sensei admitted that he didn't actually know the details, but Konoha informants nonetheless reported the near-total fatalities among the members of the Uesugi clan in the waning days of the Second Shinobi World War. There was no way to say whether the conflicts had been related.

Nonetheless, there were a few recorded survivors. A couple from the clan had been in the Land of Rice Fields at the time and escaped the slaughter, and eventually received another survivor—a three-year-old boy—on their front doorstep weeks after the disaster. Witnesses had also reported seeing an adult escape the burning manor, but no one could confirm if the last survivor was a man or a woman.

Several months later, the murders began.

The Ghoul of Three Wolves hunted down dozens of samurai clan affiliates and rogue shinobi who were later discovered to be involved, whether financially or otherwise, in the destruction of the Uesugi clan. Upon the death of the second son of the Azai clan head, samurai units were mobilized to hunt down the perpetrator. The country was in a state of emergency, having never dealt with a chakra-trained murderer with a clear grudge and the means of acting on it.

The Ghoul murders stopped six months to the day after the first death. The Ghoul had, in those scant months, killed upwards of fifty people directly and tangentially related to the Uesugi clan massacre. Not all bodies were found, and for a year afterward people were contributing most katana-inflicted deaths as the Ghoul's handiwork.

"But what Konoha knows about the Ghoul really started about a year after that," Sensei said, lacing his fingers together in front of him on the table. "It's not in the file, but Wataru Gekkō—your father—was on a sabotage mission in the Land of Rivers during the last few months of the Second Shinobi World War, during our last campaign against Sunagakure."

Wataru and his team—who were down one member by the time they even got there—met the Ghoul in a roadside inn and struck up a conversation about swords of all things. By all accounts, neither party had recognized the other as a threat at the time. While Wataru Gekkō hadn't been listed as a sensor in any known file, it was difficult for grown shinobi to not notice when another chakra-trained individual was around. None of the other surviving team members had viewed Dad's actions as unusual, even given the wartime atmosphere, given that the Ghoul had not been carrying any Village-aligned identification.
Then the inn had come under attack by Suna-nin, including a member of the infamous Puppet Corps. Theoretically, it would have been possible for the Ghoul to walk away unscathed by pretending to be a civilian. It wasn't guaranteed—most shinobi villages were a hairsbreadth away from declaring open season on noncombatants who dared harbor enemy troops—but it could have worked for as long as the two teams were embroiled in open combat. Per the Ghoul's record, she had the speed and the skill to avoid death and escape relatively unharmed.

The Ghoul instead chose to ally with the Konoha team and beat back the Suna-nin, using unheard-of samurai techniques in coordination with explosives and jutsu provided by the shinobi half of the alliance. When the Suna-nin were driven into a retreat (and later hunted down and eliminated for information security purposes), the Ghoul chose to maintain the informal alliance.

"She introduced herself as Miyako, at the time," Sensei told us. "We figured out her birth name and family once she followed the team home."

On its face, the situation sounded ridiculous. A fairly well-known murderer, when confronted in an inn by hostile shinobi, would spontaneously forge a battle alliance that she would then use to follow a saboteur team all the way home. It was more characteristic of lost dogs than of humans.

…Though maybe an avenger was psychologically unstable enough…

"Did she ever say why she stopped?" I asked.

"According to her interview? She ran out of targets," Sensei replied, shaking his head.

That was…probably better than anyone really had any right to expect, from someone who probably saw her family murdered in front of her.

I tried, briefly, to imagine what it would feel like to be that…empty. To complete her life's mission, and then have to keep living afterward with so much blood on her hands. And then another fight would show up, giving her something to do for just a little while longer, to avoid facing the emptiness and find new enemies to occupy her time.

There was a reason that Sasuke had been so easily manipulated by Tobi.

The Ghoul became Miyako, over time. She joined Konoha's forces after a thorough vetting by Yamanaka clan elders, the Third Hokage, and almost everyone else who had half a stake in what a half-mad samurai exile would do with free time on her hands. And oddly enough, Wataru Gekkō stayed with her the entire time. Maybe he'd fallen in love at first sight? No one could really say.

Miyako's combat strength deteriorated slowly as time passed, exactly as the medics had warned her. She was removed from active duty after two years of running high-risk saboteur missions, citing health concerns, and slowly acclimated to living in a much slower civilian world.

Miyako became Miyako Gekkō eight months before I was born.

"That's the story as far as Konoha knows it," Sensei concluded.

Hayate recovered first. "Does that mean we have family in the Land of Iron?"

"I don't know," Sensei replied. "Any surviving Uesugi clan members could be anywhere by now."

"Well, even if we do," Hayate paused, looking up at me, then at Obito and then finally Sensei. "I don't want to leave."
"No one can make us," I said flatly. "Not even family." Whom we'd never met anyway.

"Legally, anyone who wanted to reclaim you two would have to go through Kei. As the oldest shinobi you're directly related to, what she says goes." Sensei told Hayate, "And if they tried to claim her as a minor, master-student ties trump civilian legality in most cases." He produced a tri-pronged kunai out of nowhere and started toying with it. "And as her teacher and Hokage, what I say definitely goes."

There went my major worries about ROOT.

Yeah. We'd be okay.

Total casualties: 2,097
Total fatalities: 544

Damage: A lot. (With the caveat that I was neither a paperwork ninja nor an economist, and therefore the number that changed eight times an hour meant nothing to me. Bring on the manual labor any day.)

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title from a NateWantsToBattle song. Kingdom Hearts and metal!
Kei

The funeral came.

It went.

Sensei only arranged about four funerals personally, including the ceremony for ANBU agents who died in the line of duty (that only the Hokage and then ANBU were allowed to attend). There was a village-wide memorial service, and we had a minute of silence the day before, but Sensei and Kushina attended everything with Naruto in tow. Everything that the Hokage showed up for, I had to shadow him.

I think it was a way for them to emphasize that while the dead would be remembered, the future was still wide open. The number of babies—particularly the ones born since January, because these were our equivalent of baby boomers—across the village seemed to reinforce that, despite the loss.

Regardless, I left Hayate at home for most of it.

The only service I really attended as a mourner was the private one for Mom, and pretty much everyone in my immediate social circle attended that one. It took place in the late afternoon, in the reddish-orange light of the setting sun. There wasn’t really any other time-slot for a private service, not with over five hundred deaths across the village and someone to mourn every one of them.

Her name had already found its way onto the Memorial Stone, to my mild surprise, and I guess there was something to be said about continuity.

Mom’s name was seven lines over, and five rows down, from Dad’s. I ran my fingers across the names, picking up granite dust from the recent entries. I could see my reflection in the stone, down to the whitened scar across my face and blotchy nose and dark circles under my reddened eyes.

And yes, I cried like a baby.

Nagato

“Thanks for helping us with this, Nagato-san,” Keisuke says, as we step onto the street he’d once lived on. His brother, Hayate, goes on ahead of us, occasionally getting help limping down the street by Obito. Residual rubble is still strewn haphazardly across the village, and the old neighborhood had definitely seen better days. For my part, I’ve been helping out across the village whenever Kushina doesn’t need me, but I haven’t been back here.
From the looks of it, no one has. The street is uncannily silent.

“It’s no problem, Kei-san,” I say, deftly avoiding any upraised nails or similar rubble without much difficulty. I follow along in his wake and we both trail slowly after Obito and Hayate.

He hadn’t asked why I would accompany someone I hardly knew through the village. Honestly, I don’t mind Kushina or her newborn son, or even my supposed brother-in-law. I don’t mind Jiraiya-sensei either, or the Slug Princess I’m somehow related to. The problem is all of them together in small spaces, especially when the Konoha Council of Elders tries to make its opinions known. That’s a lot of suspicion and suspicious retirees in an office I didn’t want to be in anyway.

I don’t think I’ve been that unsettled since Jiraiya-sensei handed those rogue ANBU agents over to Konan, and I saw the look on her face.

“Well, here we are,” Keisuke says, as we catch up with the other two boys.

We’re in front of a modest-looking house with a small garden underneath the front window. It’s off-white with one of those curved, sloped blue roofs common in this village. It’s mashed together between two other homes on either side, leaving little space for much maneuvering. Unless it’s my imagination, the house seems to be slightly slanted on its foundation.

And then there’s the business of the front door being in the middle of the street, broken hinges and all.

No one says anything for a long moment. Keisuke’s younger brother reaches over and clamps onto the nearest person—Obito, in this case—and he’s gone very pale. Keisuke himself takes a very deep, careful breath before heading for the open doorway.

“Kei-san, your brother…” I trail off, as the Konoha shinobi goes very still in a way that suggests something between anger and fear.

Keisuke gestures vaguely, and Obito takes his brother over to the still-intact garden bench and sits down with him. After a brief whispered conversation with the MP, the younger boy curls into a ball and hides his head between his knees. He lets Obito pull him into a one-armed hug, but doesn’t reciprocate.

I stand around, shifting my weight between my feet and feeling completely useless.

So I head inside, with only a last glance at the two boys.

“What happened here?” I ask, once the sounds of objects being moved become audible.

“Sorry, what was that?” Keisuke’s head appears around the corner, from what I assume is the kitchen.

“I asked what…” I let the sentence hang, because I can see what must have been the living area.

The couch is overturned, the rug on the floor is ruined, the kotatsu is on its side…and there’s a trail of dirt and pebbles across the floor, leading back to a hole that seems to have been ripped up from the foundation and through the floorboards.

“Zetsu happened,” Keisuke says in a hateful tone. I look at his scarred face, and the special jōnin looks right past me as though he doesn’t see me at all. He’s too busy trying to glare a hole in the floor to match the one faintly dotted with whitish orange stains.
Whatever I can think of to say in this situation feels inadequate.

Keisuke kicks a bent kettle out of his way, swearing furiously under his breath as he stalks down the hall where the bedrooms must be. I almost expect to see a trace of the Three-Tails’ chakra leak into the air, but nothing happens.

I follow.

“Oh, come on! Those fuckers couldn’t have left the fucking windows in one piece?” Keisuke snarls, even as he’s unloading the dressers in the room and dumping the clothes in them onto the floor. In a moment, the assorted shirts, pants, and other articles disappear into a supply storage scroll on the floor. “Going to be picking glass out of these for ages…”

“Kei-san, can I help somehow?” I offer, “I have some experience with seals.”

Keisuke pauses, brow furrowing as he considers me carefully. For a moment, he almost looks like an adult and not a child trying his best to keep himself together and coherent long enough to get the job done. “Sure, Nagato-san. Here.”

I catch the thrown scroll, noting that the first seal on it contains sealing supplies. “Thank you. I can start on the other room…?”

Keisuke visibly struggles with himself before nodding. “Just...okay.”

I find what looks like a boy’s bedroom, with a faint sprinkling of ash on everything in it. There’s toy kunai and shuriken alongside the real deal, with a poster on the wall proclaiming the heroism of the Third Hokage. The bed is unmade, with the katana-patterned sheets in a pile on the floor. The dresser in this room is open, and I quickly scribble out a storage seal for its contents.

I…I guess I didn’t expect Konoha-nin to be so normal.

After my parents, after Jiraiya-sensei…I suppose I never really stopped to think if ordinary Konoha-nin could just be like any other people. I’d never wondered if it wasn’t that Jiraiya-sensei was special—or that Minato-san was, or Kushina-san—but rather that people were just people. Wherever they came from.

Even in the face of something so horrible.

“Nagato-san, I’m done in this room. I’m gonna get started on Mom’s,” Keisuke calls out, crossing the hall and heading to a different bedroom.

“I understand,” I reply, upending the contents of all three drawers into the floor. One application of chakra later, and they all disappear into the first of the storage seals. Just for good measure, I also bring along the toys and training weapons.

Hayate isn’t in any state to enjoy them, but the idea of just leaving them here…

“I’m finished, Kei-san,” I say as I emerge from the bedroom. I sealed everything easily moveable, including the bedspread. Hopefully, Hayate will get something out of all this pain.

“Same,” Keisuke says, drifting out of the last bedroom with two bound scrolls in hand. He sighs, rubbing his forehead. After a second, Keisuke’s hand drifts down to just covering his face and his shoulders start to shake.

“Maybe you should take care of your brother,” I suggest quietly.
“Y-yeah, I…” Keisuke swallows, then takes a deep breath. He tucks the scrolls away into two empty hip holsters and shoves past me.

Maybe… I snatch an embroidered handkerchief from the kitchen and follow, feeling useless.

I find all three of the younger boys outside in the garden.

Hayate is almost engulfed in his older brother’s embrace, clutching Keisuke’s uniform shirt in a white-knuckled grip. His head is a barely-visible patch of dark hair, and his face is hidden against his brother’s shirt.

Obito has a pained expression, and is rubbing circles on Hayate’s back to minimal effect.

Keisuke tucks his brother’s head under his chin and starts to hum. It’s barely audible, but the thing about being that close to another person is that it doesn’t have to be.

It…almost sounds like a lullaby.

It’s not one I recognize, but Keisuke takes what advantage he can of his higher voice. He can hold a note without his voice cracking noticeably, and while he’s not especially good it seems to be enough. His brother’s breathing starts to slow and even out.

“Obito, fix the floor in there,” Keisuke says, after a long moment looking up through his bangs.

“Kei…” Obito says, surprised that he’s being sent away.

Keisuke’s expression twists into something almost inhuman. “Obito.”

Obito jerks back. “I—okay, I can do that.” Obito quickly disappears into the house, almost as though Keisuke had punched him or hit him with a Lightning jutsu.

I wordlessly offer Keisuke the handkerchief I found.

He takes it, nodding his thanks. He starts trying to coax his brother out from the protection of his hold, but it’s hard going.

I hesitate to make the situation worse somehow, but… “Kei-san, has…has this happened before?”

Keisuke nods, not taking his eyes off his brother’s still-huddled form. “Shhh, Haa-chan. You’re okay.”

Hayate hiccups.

“When?” I ask.

“…Mostly when we’ve talked about coming back here for our stuff,” Keisuke mumbles. He glances up. “Hayate was kidnapped three days ago, from here. We got him back, but…”

“Say no more,” I reply softly. “I’m sorry.”

Keisuke sighs, and then his brother finally unfolds into a child again. Hayate snatches the handkerchief out of Keisuke’s hand and wipes his face with it. He takes deep, desperate breaths, and Keisuke just waits.

He calms down after another few minutes, still not talking to anyone. Keisuke and I…just try to be there, I guess? I’ve never seen a panic attack from the outside before.
“Kei…” says Obito’s voice, from the house.

“Yeah, Obito?” Keisuke asks.

“I’m finished. Do you have everything already?”

Hayate nods shakily, getting to his feet and passing the handkerchief back to his brother. “I’m s-sorry I couldn’t…”

“Hey, shhhhh, none of that now,” Keisuke murmurs back, looping his arm around his brother’s shoulders. “You did nothing wrong.”

“I don’t feel like I did anything right,” Hayate mutters, steadier.

Obito finally comes out and, to my surprise, produces a roll of MP caution tape from some hidden pocket. After a moment, he bars the doorway with two long strips and says, “Well, at least civilians are gonna know not to come in.”

“Yeah. Thanks, Obito,” Keisuke says.

We head back out onto the street without any further delays, dodging rubble as usual and heading back toward the Konoha administration center. The sun is bright and high overhead, and everywhere I look there’s one Konoha civilian or another trying to fix their village up. Shinobi feature heavily in reconstruction work, too, but apparently Keisuke and Hayate lived (or used to live) in a mostly-civilian area.

We reach the administrative center in only a few minutes, though it feels like much longer than that. The big red building is attached to the Hokage’s Tower—somewhat hard to miss—and what Keisuke referred to as the Academy. There are some people outside of the building, ushering their children off to class.

One of the little girls, with long purple hair and a bright yellow blouse, waves enthusiastically at our group. I blink, watching as Keisuke and Hayate break into a jog to go and greet her.

“Hayate-kun!” says the girl, and immediately grabs Keisuke’s brother in a mutual hug.

One of the other children, a boy with a brown ponytail and off-white outfit, slams into the pair and knocks them over into a giggling dogpile.

“They made it,” Obito says, grinning with undisguised relief. He rushes forward, waving. “Hey, Umino-san!”

…I’m not sure if I should follow and intrude on their moment or not…

“Nagato-san, what are you still doing over there?” Obito calls, “Come on!”

In short order, I’m introduced to the Umino family—Kohari, Ikkaku, and their son Iruka. I have to wonder how such a family finds itself in the Land of Fire. The name sounds like something more reminiscent of Uzushio, Tani, Kiri or Yuigakure.

And then I am suddenly surrounded by children.

The little girl with purple hair, Yūgao, looks up at me with wide, dark eyes. Iruka joins her, and I get the impression that they’re mainly curious about my eyes. Like nearly everyone else in the village.
“What’s that symbol for?” Yūgao asks, and I belatedly realize that he’s actually referring to my slashed headband.

“Ah, it’s…it’s the symbol we use in Akatsuki,” I reply, “It’s to symbolize that we’re not part of Hanzō’s old Amegakure.”

“Ame! That was it!” Iruka says. “So does that mean you’re a part of new Amegakure?”

“Uh, yes.” I nod, sending a nervous glance at Keisuke and Hayate.

Keisuke sticks his tongue out at me.

“So, what’s your name again? I missed it,” Iruka asks.

“Nagato…” I correct myself after a moment, “Nagato Uzumaki, actually.”

“Like Kushina-sama!” Yūgao looks star-struck. “That’s so amazing.”

“Hopefully, we’ll get a real announcement about that,” Keisuke says, interrupting the impending interrogation. “But we have places to be right now. Little brother, did you want to go to school today or not?”

Hayate shakes his head.

Yūgao looks disappointed, briefly, but doesn’t say anything. Iruka looks at his parents for an explanation—they were talking to Keisuke a moment ago—but doesn’t get an answer.

“See you around, Hayate,” Iruka says.

“And you too, Big Sis!” Yūgao adds…wait.

What?

“See you around, Iruka-kun, Yūgao-chan.” Keisuke turns to Hayate and says, “To the office, kiddo. Chop-chop.”

“All right, Sis,” Hayate replies.

What?

“Bye, everyone!” Obito says, cheerfully. “See you later!”

We make it to the front door before I fully manage to formulate my thoughts. Or get them in order. Or anything.

“Ah, Kei-san?” Looking at…at her, I guess, I can see the hints of a female build? Most kunoichi wear bright colors or have accessories of some sort. Keisuke wears the unisex Konoha village uniform, complete with high-collared shirt, and doesn’t really seem to care for her appearance. Or what tone she uses on anyone, given that I’ve heard half the number of honorifics I would from, say, Konan.

Keisuke turns, curious. “Yeah?”

“I apologize if I’m being offensive, but…are you a kunoichi?” I ask. I can actually feel myself turning red. Sooner or later I’ll be able to camouflage with my hair. Oh, this is a mess.
Keisuke blinks. “…Yep.” A brief pause, as she thinks and I realize that I’ve been an idiot for over a week. “Oh! Don’t worry about it, Nagato-san. Pretty much everyone makes that mistake at first.”

“I’m so sorry!” I burst out. Konan would kill me for making this mistake in front of her.

“It’s okay!” Keisuke’s hands flutter, frantically trying to stave off…my worries? What a strange girl.

“No, it’s not!”

“I swear it’s fine!”

Obito turns back, grabs my hand, and drags me into the building. I hear him say something about idiots, but it doesn’t really seem to be directed at me…

Hayate backtracks and makes sure to push Keisuke along, muttering all the way.

Minato

“I think her S-class secret status is officially too little, too late,” I say dryly, rereading the Aburame clan’s mission reports from the tenth of October with an air of faint despair.

Fifteen miniature reports of the confrontation with the Nine-Tails, the deployment results of their new summon contract’s boss, and a note asking where the village had gotten a second Tailed Beast along with congratulations for doing so.

Another two reports from eyewitnesses citing an incident in the Gekkō family’s old neighborhood, where Kei partially transformed.

And then, the incident in front of the hospital with over two dozen witnesses of various ages, ranks, and statuses.

And any of them could have spoken to anyone else before the debriefing teams caught up with them.

I’m not nearly naïve enough to believe that the rumors aren’t spreading.

“No, really?” Jiraiya-sensei says, every bit as sarcastic as I imagine Kei would be in the same circumstances. Fortunately, she’s out and about somewhere in the village, leading Nagato around. I’m not quite sure where they went, but…

“I’m worried that if I just confirm it then…” I sigh, glancing at the ceiling and the “Your answers aren’t up here” note.

“She was never going to have a normal life,” he replies, shrugging. Jiraiya-sensei always did have the bluntest possible way to put things… “So you might as well face the situation. Kei-kun needs to have the choice whether or not to re-class her jinchūriki status as an A-ranked secret or to just go public. And if she does, that makes her a target outside of the village.” Jiraiya-sensei looks around the office. “But I don’t imagine she’s going to be taking too many outside missions anyway, so the question then becomes whether she can face the scorn inside Konoha. How are you going to spin it?”

“The exact details of the Zetsu army’s attack are classified, but…well, the Aburame clan saw the confrontation with the Nine-Tails.” I give the reports a speculative look. “Maybe if we announced that she defeated the Nine-Tails...”

“Wouldn’t work,” Jiraiya says, shaking his head. “Too many people saw you make that thing vanish.”

I make a noise of frustration. “I’m going to be fending off poaching attempts until I punch him in the face.”

Practically the first thing he did was to ask about the Gekko siblings and how very sad it was that they were suddenly orphans and wow, didn’t he just know a place…

I want to kill him.

It’s amazing how thoroughly one village elder with a bone to pick can slow things down. If I had any solid evidence to link Shimura directly to anything, I’d have ordered the seizure of all of his assets within the village and put him under seal-enforced house arrest until we could have a trial. Preferably one where his arm stays in a sling and his eyes remain covered.

I don’t care how demeaning it is. I do not want to deal with the possibility of Shimura copying Kakashi and getting multiple Sharingan to enforce his will.

“There isn’t any way to know if Danzō has Badger’s eyes, is there?” I ask, contemplating the ceiling. “She never recorded any unique Mangekyō abilities. Not even with ANBU.”

“Unique?” Jiraiya asked.

“Like, I don’t know, that jutsu Kei talked about. Kamui,” I mutter. “We probably could trace her blood if there was any to track, but the Sharingan could be anywhere by now.”

If Shimura is anything like Orochimaru, he could have hidden bases all over the village. Half of ANBU might be seeded with infiltrators for all I know, which cut down on the number of people I could trust to carry out anti-ROOT operations.

I need to ask if there’s any way to tell ROOT from ordinary members of ANBU.

At that moment, there’s a knock at the door. “Keisuke Gekkō has returned, Hokage-sama.”

“Send her in,” I say, while Jiraiya seems to be grinning about something. What? Her sense of timing?

Kei walks through the door sans her brother or Nagato, looking rough but at least alive. She doesn’t seem to be in a good mood, necessarily, and her uniform is somewhat rumpled-looking, but she straightens when she enters the office.

“Kei-kun, go ahead and close the door. The seals will be back up in a moment.”

She nods and does so. “I sent my brother back to the house, with Nagato-san. Was there anything you needed me to do, Sensei?”

She’s never going to break that habit. I shrug it off, saying, “Just a few points for your consideration.”

The seals slam closed, dampening sound outside of the office and neatly frying most forms of surveillance. Keisuke settles into place in front of my desk, both hands in her pockets as usual. Somehow, her body language is more relaxed than this morning.

“So what was it?” she asks.

“First, do you know any way that ROOT forces are different from normal ANBU?” Jiraiya-sensei asks.
Kei blinks. “Yeah, actually. You remember those seals Madara put on Obito and me?”

“Danzō has those?” I say, horrified.

“No, he’s got a…” Kei opens her mouth and sticks her tongue out. She points at the back of her tongue, indicating where someone could, theoretically, place a seal. She straightens and ceases making funny faces a moment later. “Danzō puts silencing seals on most ROOT agents. They can’t talk about him, or even mention his name. Check their tongues.”

“How do you remove it?” I ask. Granted, I’ll have to think about getting my hands on a ROOT agent to rest any theories…

“Kill Danzō,” she says blithely. She pauses, as Jiraiya-sensei and I exchange looks. Not the way we wanted to approach this investigation. “I’ve never seen the seals, personally, but I do know that in the other world, they all automatically faded when Danzō was killed. Or you could try removing the seal from each ROOT agent manually.”

I grimace at the thought of combining the implied number of ROOT agents with seal removal duties, which I could hardly unload on some random ANBU fūinjutsu specialist. Shimura hadn’t necessarily been known for his fūinjutsu but, if what had been implied about Orochimaru had been correct, I would have to worry a lot more about booby traps he stuck in those seals. Too much so to risk agents screwing up.

“But I think we might be able to find ROOT agents to volunteer…” Kei trails off, thinking. “I’m not sure, though. There’s at least one person I want to look up before we can go that route, and I’m half-convinced that he actually isn’t in ROOT yet.” Kei shrugs helplessly. “You were dead in the other timeline, and that could mean anything for what Danzō decides to do next. I get the feeling that he knew he could sneak more things past Sarutobi-sama thanks to their old friendship.” Another pause. “Which was totally one-sided, by the way. Danzō went bitter a long, long time ago.”

“Somehow, that doesn’t surprise me,” Jiraiya-sensei says. “So. You’re giving us a lot of speculation at this point. I’m guessing that you think we’ll uncover information to back up all those suppositions in time.”

“If you’re going to investigate Danzō, I’m telling you that you can’t half-ass it,” Kei says darkly. “I can point you in the right direction, but I’m neither old enough nor well-connected enough to do any digging of my own without getting into deep trouble.”

“You might be, now,” I say, flicking a thick manila folder toward Kei. She catches it out of the air.

“Sensei?” Kei says blankly.

“Tell me about this possible informant, then read it,” I say.

“Well, his name’s… I never actually figured that out…” She tucks the folder under her arm so she can gesture with both hands, saying, “The point, though, is that he’s a survivor of Orochimaru’s old experiments into the Wood Release bloodline.”

“I’ve heard of him,” Jiraiya-sensei muses aloud, rubbing his chin. “There have been rumors circulating the village for years about Wood Release, but until Obito-kun came back there wasn’t really anything to go off of. And I do remember the labs.”

Fifty-nine failed experiments. Fifty-nine little trees.

It still makes me sick, years later.
“Well, the kid’s around,” Kei hedges. “I don’t know where, though, or what name he’s operating under. But he might be useful when it comes to puzzling out where ROOT gets its recruits. And… and I think maybe Tsunade-sama could bring him into the Senju clan.”

I practically feel Jiraiya-sensei’s thoughts grind to a halt.

“Tsunade-sama hasn’t left the village yet.” Kei is staring at the floor, still thinking aloud. “I don’t know if that’s because you’re here, because Jiraiya-sama is, or maybe because Kushina-san is still getting her involved in Naruto-chan’s life. But… shinobi need anchors. And that kid? He doesn’t have any. Which is why ROOT would look like a good idea, I think.”

Jiraiya-sensei suddenly breaks into a short laugh. As Kei and I look at him curiously, he explains, “The first thing Academy kids learn is going to have to be the importance of bonds, now. You’re pushing us toward reuniting strong shinobi with their roots, aren’t you?”

Kei looks blank. “Uh, yeah? Most S-class shinobi are members of villages who are, while strong, kinda crazy.”

Well, yes.

“Do you have a name, Kei-kun? Even a bit of one?” I ask, to get the conversation back on track.

“Tenzō, I think? He might pick ‘Yamato’ later, but those are both codenames.” Kei shrugs. “I can’t help you find him. I just know that there’s someone to find.” She holds up the file. “So, what’s this?”

“Files I think you should look over, Operative Crane,” I say casually.

I don’t miss the way that Kei pauses, carefully, and looks up. “Hokage-sama?”

“I suggest you be objective when you look it over.” I rest my chin on my balled-up fist. “Sure, just about everything we talk about in this office is classified, but this is personal to one Keisuke Gekkō.”

“Well.” She flips the folder open and starts reading.

As she does so, I go back to the files on my desk. Jiraiya-sensei can read over her shoulder if he wants to—really, she’d stop him if she cared to.

It’s strange to think that we have three full generations of teacher-student bonds in this room. Jiraiya-sensei taught me when I was younger, then I grew up to teach Kei and her teammates. And with Hiruzen out of the picture for being unhelpful and also for being retired, Kakashi in ANBU, Obito with the Konoha MPs, and Tsunade at the hospital, that left just the three of us to represent a long tradition of shinobi teachings.

Honestly, just knowing that those traditions are being passed down—bell test included—is kind of reassuring. I have no doubt that if Kei gets her own team, she’ll find a way to mess with those kids as well or better than I could.

Kei finishes reading her file and takes a very deep breath. “So, go public or deny everything?”

“Essentially,” I say, nodding. “We could go for a few executions to bring everyone back into line, but there’s no real way to suppress the information entirely anymore.”

“We could scare the village into not actually saying anything, but you outed yourself pretty thoroughly,” Jiraiya-sensei adds.
“I’m still debating which option is best,” Kei says, handing the folder to Jiraiya-sensei and pinching the bridge of her nose. “Because, well, I’ve seen both sides before.”

“Oh?” Jiraiya-sensei asks.

Kei nods. She holds up a hand and counts down with her fingers. “Gaara, over in Sunagakure. Raised with his jinchūriki status out in the open, and then harassed until he pretty much abandoned his humanity. Shukaku didn’t help.” Another finger goes down. “Utakata, in Kirigakure. His sensei tried to remove Saiken, to give Utakata a better life. Only I guess he didn’t realize that he might’ve talked to him about it. Utakata takes it as a threat, everyone dies, and he goes missing-nin.” Middle finger folds. “Killer B, of Kumogakure. Had to strive for most of his adult life to eventually win the respect of the village, since Gyūki rampaged all over Kumo sometime in the past.” Ring finger. “Kushina-san, here. No one knowing has kept her safe so far, but that’s probably going to be over sooner or later.” Pinkie. “And finally, Naruto in the other reality. For being an S-class secret, everyone over the age of about eighteen already knew. Ostracized until his mid-teens, when he beat Evil Nagato into the ground after Nagato squashed Konoha entirely.”

“You’ve thought about this quite a bit, I see,” Jiraiya-sensei comments.

“Yeah, I guess.” Kei sighs. “Here’s the thing, though. I’m also an established kunoichi with a dependent. And I’ve managed to keep my brother from knowing all this for a while now.”

“I thought you said your brother was a sensor. Your mother”—Kei winces as I say it, but I keep going determinedly—“was able to tell the Zetsu clones apart from ordinary shinobi. Your brother…”

“He managed to identify one, too,” Kei says, wincing. “Thing is, I’ve mostly figured out his range. It’s about a meter, and he’s only been able to do it properly for a few days. I’ve been a jinchūriki for months.”

“I wouldn’t assume that any member of your family didn’t know something,” Jiraiya-sensei says dryly. “Maybe he’s just being polite enough to wait for an explanation.”

“Suspecting something is different from having it confirmed, Jiraiya-sama,” Kei replies. She pinches the bridge of her nose. “Look, even if he just rolls with it, being confirmed as the Three-Tails jinchūriki basically makes me a target for Kirigakure. Which means he’s a target as soon as they confirm that I actually have surviving family.”

“…How is that different from what every single jōnin faces?” I ask. As Kei tries to think that over, I add, “Kei-kun, you’ve been at risk since I became the Yellow Flash four years ago. You’re going to have to face the reality that being a powerful shinobi is not safe. For anyone involved in it.” I lean back in my chair. “We do the best we can, but I’m sure you’ve thought that before during the war. Your brother is due to graduate from the Academy within a year, at which point he’ll be assigned a jōnin-sensei and start taking missions like we all did when we were younger.” There’s a reason I’m the only surviving member of my genin team.

Jiraiya-sensei nods, a silent acknowledgment of that old pain.

Before Kei can protest, I go on, “By becoming Isobu-san’s host, you’ve officially become one of the most dangerous people in this village. Jinchūriki are, for more than ninety-five percent of all shinobi, entirely too hazardous to face in combat. You happen to live and interact with some of the only people in this village who can actually do anything about a rampaging jinchūriki. And that’s a close call on bad days.

“So I need you to think very carefully about what recognition will do, in the context that you’ve already been selected as one of my family’s bodyguards. You’re going to be deployed outside of the village less than a fraction of the time most special jōnin will, because you have responsibilities here and the Hokage Guard Platoon suffered fifty percent casualties last week.” I lace my fingers together in front of my face. “And regardless, your brother is unlikely to be allowed to stay unguarded for more than ten minutes at a time until he’s deployed. We do know how to take care of our own.”

No one says anything for a while.

Kei has always been my most unpredictable student. I’m finding depths of paranoia in her thought processes that I never expected to see. Perhaps she just refused to air them in the past. Now that the team’s position in the village hierarchy is secure, she feels comfortable airing some of it.

Maybe she wants, more than anything, to be reassured.

Then, “Hokage-sama, it’s my recommendation that I be openly acknowledged as a jinchūriki.” Kei crosses her arms. “I’m already your student and dependent, ish, and it might take some of the heat off of Kushina-san and Naruto-chan.”

I’m going to have to make sure that Kei doesn’t view this as some kind of sacrificial play. I half-suspect that she’d throw herself to the wolves to defend those she cares about—or else start a very localized war.

But not now.

Well, with that out of the way, I expect the meeting’s going to go easier from this point on.

“So what else did you need out of me?” Kei asks, relaxing now that the hard part’s over.

“Ah, just one last thing. You saw Maito Gai in the field the other night, correct?” I ask, being deliberately obtuse for once.

It’s still funny to see Kei’s face screw up into that skeptical look. “Yeah.”

“Do you think he’s ready for greater responsibilities?”

“I think he’s got the chops for jōnin, easy.” Kei makes a “tch” noise. “Just be careful how you break it to him. He’s got the skills, but we’re all reeling from last week. And Gai lost people.”

Point taken.

Kei looks puzzled for a moment. “Speaking of that night… Sensei, I’m not actually sure how you survived using the Dead Demon Consuming Seal. I’m, uh, pretty sure that’s one of those insta-kill jutsu.”

Ah. That.

“I don’t remember telling you which seal I prepared,” I say, sort of surprised by the question. On one hand, I haven’t gotten around to teaching Kei the forbidden sealing arts derived from Uzumaki clan techniques. On the other, well, she’s Kei.

Kei gives me a flat look. “Uh-huh.”

“Well, do you remember the scrolls the Chinatsugumi gave you all those years ago?”

Kei’s eyes widen. “You’re kidding.”
“The Red Strength Blood Seal was the basis for…let’s call it a targeting apparatus. Uzumaki seals, like the Dead Demon Consuming Seal and the Eight Trigrams Seal, are mutually compatible when used with Uzumaki chakra, and you can essentially mix-and-match to get the results you want as long as the basics stay the same,” I explain. “I could have chosen just to seal Kurama-san into Naruto and gotten it over with. The seal would have worked, though Kurama’s chakra would have been dangerously unfiltered if Naruto-chan ever used too many tails. The formerly-mandatory sacrifice was, at the time of design, optional.

“But thanks to that creature that tried to use Obito to attack the village…well, I had a spare soul sitting around. So I used it.” I smile, but it’s a razor-edged thing that, once upon a time, made a Konoha-born defector piss himself in fear. “So, there you have it. The sworn enemy of Konoha, used to fuel its original superweapon.”

“Holy shit.” And yet, somehow, Kei’s grin is nearly as evil as mine.

“Dismissed.”

Kei salutes on her way out of the office, but manages to shoot a comment over her shoulder. “And look up Wind Release: Rasengan sometime, Sensei!”

Oh damn it. There goes one more secret I hadn’t thought she knew. I had a breakthrough just yesterday!

“She got you again, huh?” Jiraiya-sensei snickers.

“I swear she does that on purpose.”

“Probably.”

Kei

So, a month passed.

Sensei and Kushina had announced Naruto’s birth and the thing with the jinchūriki status, and the thing about…

Look, it was a bit of a busy month.

Like, Sensei and Kushina actually got married.

It was a bit of a stumper for everyone else, who kind of assumed that they already were. And legally, the “everyone else” would be completely right. Sensei and Kushina were legally married about three months ago or something, but told exactly nobody out of justified paranoia. Kushina’s clan name had changed on precisely one form in all of Konoha’s mountains of paperwork, and that was just the one that asked who she was married to in case of medical emergency. They’d hidden the whole thing pretty well, actually.

You know, from the five people in the entire village who hadn’t known that Sensei and Kushina were a thing. There wasn’t even anything like a debate about who Naruto’s dad was, even back when Kushina had just been showing.

So basically, they’d been holding off on this shit forever.

And then they finally got to have the friggin’ party.
I got some sidelong glances, I guess, but those who attended the party seemed to be convinced that if anyone could handle the Three-Tails jinchūriki even in such a tight space, it’d be the man who’d beaten the Nine-Tails. Sensei seemed to wince just a bit whenever that little detail came up, but I doubted anyone cared.

Yeah, we’d let that part get out. Let the village think that everything was okay and contained. My part in fighting the Nine-Tails was acknowledged, but as far as anyone not in the know was concerned, it was still Sensei’s achievement. My role as a heroine for the month had been confined to the eyewitness accounts of me—and my team—killing the various Zetsu monsters across the village.

The Aburame clan had been too far away to hear what I was saying anyway.

Anyway, I attended the party in a lavender, flower-patterned furisode Mom had gotten me and had repeatedly altered to fit me as I grew. I didn’t ask how—for all I knew Tsuruya and Mom had conspired together—but since it was a wedding at least I wasn’t the only person who was dressed up and felt a bit awkward. Hayate had to get a rental, but honestly I think he was half-surprised he’d even been invited along.

All in all, the party included…

Fugaku and Mikoto Uchiha in clan regalia, plus their sons and a large Uchiha escort.

The head of the Hyuga clan and his twin brother, with a toddler Neji in tow and his mother carrying him. Himawari was at least seven or eight months pregnant, but had nonetheless shown up with a trail of Hyuga medics just in case something happened.

The Ino-Shika-Cho trio and their wives and their kids, even if they were all babies and I swear Konoha was acquiring a pile of them.

Jiraiya, along with Tsunade and half of the alcohol in the entire village. The Third Hokage, along with his wife and two sons (Ichigo and Asuma). Nagato also turned up, and had to be correspondingly shoved into a formal outfit before being allowed to participate as the brother of the bride.

And our team—meaning not just me, but also Obito plus Rin plus Kakashi plus Gai plus Genma plus Raidō. (And Yamaguchi-sensei.)

Speaking of, half of the entire village. It was a security nightmare.

But I guess as long as everyone was happy with the result, there wasn’t really anything to say against it.

I didn’t want to dance, or anything half as interesting. I was a perpetual wallflower, really, and was perfectly fine with nursing my drink for ages on end if necessary. And despite being a legal adult in terms of shinobi standing, I was still biologically fourteen and thus banned from sampling the alcohol on take.

So really, I sat around and looked dramatic while sitting on a chair in the designated Kids Corner.

I took another long sip of my drink. Some sort of weak punch, probably. Basically, it was there to keep my hands occupied.

“Are you going to just sit here in the corner all day?” Raidō’s voice asked, and I looked up. He had actually combed his hair for once, but I did note that he wasn’t wearing one of the uber-fancy outfits that, say, had been inflicted on Nagato. He even still had his katana.

Man, and I’d been hard-pressed to fit a tantō in my outfit’s obi.

“Maybe,” I said, still not really feeling the celebratory mood.

Hayate could shake off bits of what I was feeling, mostly when he was with his friends. I could do the same if I kept busy, but I kept getting blindsided by the empty ache of grief whenever I stopped to think for too long.

…Which was probably not the smart thing to be doing at this party.

I frowned.

I was being dumb.

I put my drink down and got to my feet.

“I’m pretty sure I can find a dance for you,” Raidō offered. His expression took on an amused, almost sardonic edge. “I’d do it myself, but I’m pretty sure there’s a couple guys around here who’d kick my ass.”

“I’m pretty sure I can barely walk in this thing anyway,” I muttered. Honestly, who in the world had designated geta as the go-to footwear for this shit? “Dancing’s out of the question.”

“Well, I can drop you off by Obito and Nohara-san. Maybe she’d be able to give you some pointers?” Raidō still helped me to my feet, despite my obvious anger issues with formal kimono. He probably realized that I wasn’t about to take it out on him.

“Good enough,” I replied. Then I muttered something impolite about swinging sleeves, under my breath. Between the trouble with hair clips, makeup, and other formal-wear shenanigans, I was in no mood for tripping over my own clothes. I had not been designed for this dress-up stuff.

Sure, any kunoichi worth the name could fight in any state of dress, but I could still gripe about the inconvenience of it all.

Raidō led me to one of the significantly louder corners of the party, where Rin was talking to Kurenai and Asuma while Obito had his mouth slightly glued shut by daifuku overindulgence.

“Keisuke-chan, hi!” Kurenai said once she spotted me. (And I wondered if she was Asuma’s plus-one.) She smiled. “You look very nice today.”

“It’s a good color on you,” Asuma said with an approving nod, but I didn’t have to be clairvoyant to know that his eyes were pretty much just for Kurenai.

Rin, I noted, was not wearing a furisode. She had an actual, formal blouse and skirt combination that gave her room to move with that slit up the back. She was wearing heeled sandals, but that was still different than the get I was using. She lit up when she saw me, but damned if I knew why.

Obito, it seemed, had managed to get the MP formal uniform, and was not letting any awkwardness keep him from enjoying himself. He waved, standing up when I stumbled on the godawful sandals so he could make sure I didn’t faceplant.

I could already feel myself start to flush red in sheer awkwardness, and that was before anything especially stupid happened.

“Thanks for the assist, Raidō-san,” I said, and he waved it off before disappearing into the crowd. I turned back to my former classmates and said, “So, everything going okay over here?”

“I was about to ask you that,” Obito said, still letting me use his arm to balance.

I was going to have to run some combat drills to get my balance skills to translate into this weird new form. Preferably in a dress—if I could run a mission in kimono while not shredding the material, then maybe I could consider myself good at bodyguarding in a formal setting…

The only reason I was sucking so much at walking was because I didn’t want to destroy the furisode, as far as I was concerned. I could tear it to shreds and fight naked if I absolutely had to (and wouldn’t that cause a stir…), but I probably would blow my cover if I tried that while Sensei was in a meeting with the daimyo or some shit. And besides, it wasn’t necessary here.

“I hate formal clothes,” I told Obito flatly. “Give me pants any day.”

Obito snickered. “I would never have guessed.”

“Well, at least you can’t be mistaken for a boy this way?” Kurenai tried looking for the silver lining.

Between the flower hairclips and the furisode and the makeup, probably not. My scar couldn’t quite be hidden under whatever visual enhancements the wedding planners had used on me, but it was less obvious. I looked less like a shinobi of any sort than a really awkward teenage girl. But still, I said to Kurenai, “I never minded when I was.”

“I still do, sometimes,” I said. I wasn’t a very nice person.

“Are you going to dance, Kei-san?” Asuma asked, waving a hand to indicate the dance floor where the crowd was concentrated. “I think the Hokage and his wife have finally left the floor.”

“I hope you aren’t going to ask me that,” Rin said, shuddering. “I can dodge every attack coming my way, but I never learned to dance properly. The motions are easy, but to music?”

“I don’t know…yet!” Obito said, and cheerfully activated his Sharingan to copy the dancers that remained on the floor.

Cheating bastard.

“Well, great. Then you can teach the rest of them, Obito-kun. Asuma-kun, do you know?” Kurenai asked.

“Yeah, I kinda had…wait, are you asking me to dance with you?” Asuma asked, blinking. He was also starting to turn a bit red.

“I thought this was a part of the kunoichi curriculum,” I said blankly. “Which, by the way, I completely failed. Rin?”

“Well, I can try to remind you,” Obito offered. He deactivated his Sharingan and added, “You too, Kei.”
I thought about it. I said to Asuma, “Have fun, then.”

Then I shoved Asuma out onto the dance floor with Kurenai.

As they disappeared into the crowd, that left me with Obito and Rin. I said, “I warn you, I’m not gonna be able to move much in this thing.” I felt like I was wrapped in a burrito, and could walk just about that well. Half-steps at best, without tearing silk.

“You’ll be fine. Rin and I’ll both keep track of you,” Obito said with ruthless cheer.

And then we were dancing.

For my part, it was pretty limited. I mean, I couldn’t move. Not that I’d known much more than how to shuffle my feet to start with, but Rin got back into the swing of things uncannily quickly and Obito could dance like he’d always known how just by copying other people’s muscle memory.

Before long, the two of them were killing it out there.

And since I couldn’t keep up, I very much felt like a third wheel despite being assisted by both parties.

“No, no, you need to make those sleeves swing,” Rin was saying patiently in the face of my increasingly flustered attempts to hold a beat.

“I’m gonna hit someone,” I warned her.

Sure enough, I did.

“Keisuke-chan, hello!” Fortunately, Gai was unfazed by taking a furisode sleeve to the face. I had not, in fact, brought anything heavy to stick in said sleeves and hurt people with, so he got off lucky.

“Enjoying the party, Gai?” I asked, feeling a smile creep onto my face.

“Yes, I am!” Gai took my hand, to my surprise, and added, “Would you dance with me, Keisuke-chan?”

“As long as you don’t mind getting tripped over,” I replied, though I was sure he’d be able to stand whatever punishment I could dish out. It wasn’t like we were going to be fighting.

Fun fact: Turns out Gai knows something very similar to the tango. He could spin like a top and I didn’t actually have to do much other than remember which way was up and let him lead. It was fun, kind of hilarious, and giggle-inducing to be able to even think about keeping up. But in the end I did not, so accidentally tripping in the middle was pretty much what I expected to happen.

Landing practically on top of Kakashi while Gai continued his one man dance party…was less so.

It was also a lot less pleasant because, despite a pretty good catch on Kakashi’s part, we still ended up head-butting one another by accident.

And anyway, that’s the story about how my first time attending a wedding (and wearing kimono) included me holding an ice pack to my forehead while laughing my ass off.

And I hadn’t been wrong, exactly—the cheerful chaos of the wedding/baby shower did take everyone’s mind off of things. Mine included.

Not a bad way to end autumn that year.
Chapter End Notes

Song title from Owl City.
One of the nice things about being in a shinobi village, particularly Konoha, is that you can basically justify almost anything in terms of military secrecy if you really want to. People live in Konoha not just because we kinda got the pick of lowland locations, but also because we have a pretty thoroughly integrated village all told. Civilians are family are the village, really. They don't have enough clearance to see everything, and the price for protection is control by the military in some ways, but our people are treated well as a whole. It just doesn't change the fact that the Hokage's in charge.

The downside of living in a shinobi village, sometimes, is that the Hokage's in charge.

Sensei leaned back in his chair—which probably will be upgraded to swivel at some point—and stretched. On his desk, forms were neatly piled in one corner and the inbox was empty for once. Legitimately so, and not just because Sensei left a space-time seal active and accidentally teleported all of his work home.

And since it was lunchtime, there wasn't going to be any more paperwork for at least a little bit.

"I think it's time we try something different," Sensei said, idly popping the knuckles in his right hand one at a time. "Did you pack lunch?"

"A bento, nothing special." Kushina had done the actual cooking, after all. And had thankfully avoided cooking too much shrimp. "Why?"

"We're going to the Academy this time."

Since the Academy was all of fifteen meters off the north side of the Tower if roof-hopping was taken into account, I didn't exactly consider this the trip of a lifetime.

"The kids are still in class, Sensei," I said.

I'd gone to visit Hayate during his lunch before, once or twice, but I'd had to be careful about not scaring the civilian-born kids. Or the Academy teachers. Or just people in general. They tended to be leery of random shinobi showing up in the school yard, special jōnin or not.

"Not for much longer. We can visit your brother while we're there," Sensei pressed, still cheerful. Or cheerfully sadistic.

"...You have some kind of appointment down there?" I asked, still skeptical.

Sensei whistled innocently, getting up from his desk and grabbing his bento from that genjutsu-guarded robe closet. Since he was basically vacating the premises of the office regardless of what I thought, I decided it'd be practical to follow along and watch the chaos anyway. My bento being in a storage scroll, I brought the whole thing along.

I have long since learned not to trust when Sensei breaks routine.

It didn't generally pay to question him, because straight answers weren't his thing, but I'd learned through long experience that Sensei had weird ideas sometimes.

Sensei led me down the stairs instead of just hopping off the side of the Tower. I supposed we were pretending to be civilized people who didn't use chakra literally all the time. Even though hopping around on rooftops was half the point of being shinobi in a populated area, as far as I was concerned.

"Don't make that face, Kei," Sensei said from the bottom of the stairwell. "It'll stick that way."

I scowled on purpose and said, "I haven't believed that since I was five, Hokage-sama." In my last lifetime. If that.

"You don't want to scare them, do you?" he asked, but there was a sliver of what sounded like an order in his tone.

"I don't," I said, giving up. "And besides, I'm sure my brother ruined whatever mystique I'd have as a monster anyway."

"You're not a monster, Kei," Sensei said, and I could see the start of a frown on his brow.

"I know that, and you know that, but not everyone does." I shrugged. "Seriously, though, I can deal with it."

"Like you did the other day?" Sensei stepped aside as I reached the bottom of the stairs, glancing at the Academy's gates.

"He wasn't a threat, Sensei, and you know it." I headed for the gates. "I handled it."

"I'd still prefer if you didn't have to. But that was the price we paid for the tenth." Sensei sighed. "But I never did thank you, did I?"

In exchange for making my status public, Sensei had been able to hide the exact nature of the events on October Tenth—specifically, who the Nine-Tails jinchūriki was. Naruto and Kushina got off essentially scot-free as long as there was a public figure to associate all one's demon-mongering needs with, and I could work with that.

Like fuck I was making Naruto go through all that shit again. I didn't care if he supposedly had his parents' backing this time around. He shouldn't have needed it.

And anyway, as a teenager with an established performance record and all that crap, I had a better chance of keeping civilians too cautious around me to do anything. The shinobi, in general, didn't really give a fuck about whether I was a Host or not. If I was reliable in combat—which seemed to be the case, if Sensei had me as his most visible bodyguard—then they generally didn't have a problem.

I was still somewhat hesitant about visiting the Academy, though. My brother and his friends were one thing. The entire Academy set was quite another.

"You don't need to say anything," I said with a shrug. I reached the gate and pushed it open without any real effort, holding the way for Sensei. "After you."
Sensei grinned. "So polite."

I rolled my eyes as he passed and let the gate shut behind me.

We could have gone through the inside staircase, I suppose, but at least this way we saw the sun and the kids could see us coming if they were in the yard. Yay.

There were, in fact, no kids in the yard. Called it.

Sensei swept across the Academy yard with his Fourth Hokage cloak flaring out behind him, with me plodding along in his wake like a duckling. We met the Academy's office supervisor in the front office not too much later, and Sensei disarmed her prickly exterior with the power of his smile and the fact that he outranked literally everyone in the village.

I didn't pay too much attention to what he actually said. I was busy looking around at the building, particularly the walls, and feeling myself drift a bit amidst the nostalgia.

It didn't last very long. After all, anyone who knew me as an Academy student would have been able to recognize me as the ambiguous-looking kid who slept through all the classes, but passed all of them in turn. I'd only been around for a year, but what a year.

"Kei-kun, they're ready for us now," Sensei said, leaving the front office behind to follow me down the halls.

"You never did tell me what we're here for, Hokage-sama," I replied. There was still an audience, after all.

"Oh, I thought the Academy would like having the Hokage visit during his lunch hour. I believe the students are going to recess in a moment," Sensei replied, innocent as a lamb.

I gave him a very careful sidelong look before saying, "So, we're hosting question and answer hour?"

Fireside chats with the President had been a thing in my old life, right? Not while I was alive, but the principle was the same…

Sensei grinned. "Yes."

Oh, goddamn it. I had thought…

"This has got to be the worst possible way to force ignoramuses to accept me," I told him flatly, "Hokage-sama."

"I'd suggest looking further underneath the underneath than that, Kei-kun," Sensei said cheerfully. "Eat quickly. We've got a working lunch ahead of us."

I was pretty sure that, in my old life, I'd have had to get twenty permission forms per kid from their parents before I'd be able to do what Sensei was planning. I wasn't any more of a danger to the kids than the Hokage was, because both of us were capable of holding back our enemy-killing potential when surrounded by little tykes. Despite all the reassurances in the world, though, I was sure people would still look at me like I was a rabid bear. Even though I had a kid brother and had helped save the village not too long ago, I was still a ticking time bomb in the eyes of some people.

Most of them were hurting or afraid, but that didn't change the pretty fundamental dislike that some villagers would still have toward me.
Sensei had a flair for the dramatic when he wanted to use it. He clapped one hand down on my shoulder and, while I was puzzling over whether or not I was allowed to eat in front of the kids while Sensei talked, teleported us into the presumably-correct classroom.

There were many small faces staring back at us, while Sensei nudged me toward sitting on the chūnin sensei's desk.

With an apologetic grimace to said Academy teacher, I set my bento on the desk and leaned against it. I was gonna have to eat while the kids were distracted. Or sneak out with the Academy teacher while Sensei was putting on his performing hat.

Behind his back, I spotted my brother and his friends hanging out in the back row of desks, toward the right-hand wall from my perspective. I waved at them.

Hayate's chakra pinged back at me.

Well, then.

Sensei said something about everyone going outside—whee, my teacher was a whackjob—and all of us trooped into the yard. Sensei was in the lead, while I hung back with the chūnin Academy teacher and, by not-so-coincidental arrangements, my brother's little gaggle of friends.

I could recognize maybe about four faces aside from theirs, once we had a crowd growing in the Academy yard. I could pick out at least two sets of Byakugan among the students, though I couldn't remember which Hyūga clan kids were the right age to be in this Academy class. There was also at least one Aburame, going by the glasses, and there were two or three kids who looked like they might have been civilian-born going by the awe they showed Sensei.

That wasn't much of an indicator, though. Minato Namikaze was the village's golden boy as far as public opinion went. When you were a war hero, had apparently fought the Nine-Tails and lived, and were the current Hokage, a little star-struck admiration from the crowd just made sense.

Anyway, eventually we got upwards of fifty kids of various ages turned into an audience, with their chūnin sensei at the back to observe everything and Sensei and I at the front to hold their attention.

"—and allow me to introduce my student, Keisuke Gekkō." I felt my train of thought derail and blinked back to the present.

The kids were all looking between me—the obvious outsider—and my brother.

"Yeah, that's my sister," Hayate said loudly from the back of the crowd.

And there Hayate went, ruining my fun.

I held up my right hand in a vague sort of wave. "Call me Kei, everyone. I'm answering questions and stuff too, though I'm pretty sure I'm less interesting than, you know, the Hokage."

Hayate's chakra pinged at me again, and I gave him a pointedly raised eyebrow. He subsided. Still, what a time for a kid to develop his chakra control like this…

Half of the crowd raised their hands.

"In the back there, what's your name?" Sensei asked, indicating a tiny child with dark hair, in the middle of a dense pack of children.
I peered closer. Wait, wasn't that…

"Itachi Uchiha, Hokage-sama."

Yep. He had to be around, what, five or six? If he killed his clan when Sasuke was eight and when he was thirteen, then…yeah. Huh.

Ignoring my back-asswards math, I refocused on what he and Sensei were saying.

"Keisuke-san, when did you graduate the Academy?" Itachi asked, in his rather articulate five-ish-year-old voice.

I glanced a Sensei for a moment—was that public record?—then shrugged. My early life hadn't been classified, just weird. "I graduated at nine, made chūnin at eleven, and got promoted to special jōnin a few months ago. I'm fourteen now."

"She graduated earlier than I did, in a way. I was ten and made chūnin at fourteen myself," Sensei put in, cheerful.

"But you're a—" a white-haired kid, whom I could vaguely recognize, burst out. Two of his classmates clapped their hands over his mouth at the same time, looking wary of my reaction.

"Kei earned her promotion before encountering a Tailed Beast," Sensei said mildly. "Though I suppose that kind of assumption makes sense if you're not well-informed. Wartime graduation ages were lower than they are now, and I had to do a lot of work to get Kei and her teammates ready for the trouble we were facing out there."

White-haired kid, white-haired…wait. That couldn't be Kabuto because he'd still have glasses. Who else…

Oh.

Mizuki.

…He was shorter than I recalled. And a lot less beady-eyed and suspicious-looking. But I was still seeing the green eyes, the bandanna, and the chin-length white hair.

I was honestly not sure if I was supposed to keep an eye on him for signs of megalomania or not.

"Any other questions?" Sensei asked the crowd, once the topic had been taken care of.

"Do you have a favorite jutsu?" asked a kid with a black cloth covering his hair. "The question's for both of you."

Sensei and I glanced at one another before chorusing, "The Rasengan."

"What's that?" asked Iruka.

"Combat ninjutsu," I said. "A lot of fun and very strong, but really hard to learn."

"Can we see it?" That was one of the other kids—a little girl with her hair pulled into two fat pigtails.

Sensei smiled. He held out his right hand and, with a gentle whoosh of chakra, formed a swirling Rasengan in his palm.

I heard practically all of the kids go "oooh" at once.
I did, however, notice that little Itachi's eyes had gone red and Shisui was looking at his cousin with something between curiosity, anticipation, and admiration. Then Itachi's eyes went dark again and he shook his head.

Well, well, well. A bit difficult to copy a jutsu performed without hand seals, wasn't it?

"Most ninjutsu use hand seals, like the Academy basic three," I said, as Sensei let the Rasengan spin itself away into nothingness. "The Hokage invented the Rasengan, which doesn't use hand seals, because he thought all that stuff wasn't fast enough."

"And if you train a lot with your chakra nature, you can reduce the number of hand seals you have to use to make a jutsu work," Sensei added. "Any other questions?"

"What if I want to be the next Hokage?" asked a girl with blue braids.

"Train hard, make good decisions and good friends, and maybe you'll get there," was Sensei's response.

It also generally required becoming the student of the Hokage, or of a future Hokage, or of a Hokage's student. Most of these categories overlapped.

Nepotism was definitely a thing in the ninja world.

And anyway, Sensei wasn't even twenty-five yet. If Hiruzen Sarutobi could keep his title into his mid-fifties, I didn't really see Sensei retiring. Definitely not before Naruto was an established shinobi, at the least. And after Kushina and Sensei raised any more hypothetical Uzumaki-Namikaze kids.

The honest answer would probably have been "finagle your way into having Tsunade, Jiraiya, or Sensei into being your jōnin-sensei."

...And now that I'd thought of Sensei and Kushina having more kids, my train of thought had well and truly derailed.

"Is there anything you don't like about shinobi life, Hokage-sama?" asked Iruka, his eyes wide. His new cheekbone-to-cheekbone scar was still livid against his tanned skin, and didn't quite stretch with his expression just yet.

Well. I didn't like the fact that I had to kill people so often, but I really hadn't been killing "people" in the strictest sense recently. Most of my missions had been fairly straightforward and didn't include much in the way of direct enemy action. In terms of body-count, the things I'd killed the most of were seal butterflies.

"Sometimes spending too much time away from the village is difficult," Sensei replied, looking a little solemn. "But now that I'm Hokage and the war is over, I spend a lot more time here with my friends and family."

"How is your son, Hokage-sama?" asked the chūnin-sensei, apparently unable to stop herself from asking.

"He's doing very well," Sensei said, grinning. "Keeping me up at night, of course. Hopefully, he'll be able to visit sometime soon."

Itachi was nodding along as Sensei talked—apparently Sasuke was a fussy baby, too. Shisui was snickering.
Hayate was nodding, too. Naruto, even at the tender age of less than a month, had certainly figured out what lungs were for. We’d experienced that bit the hard way, and discovered why Kushina owned a breast milk pump. Naruto wasn’t so much a child at the moment as he was a loaf of bread that had intermittent screaming fits (and needed diaper changes).

Hayate had still learned very quickly that he was not to hold Naruto like he was a loaf of bread.

"What was the first jutsu you learned, Hokage-sama?" Yūgao asked, her eyes bright.

"The Clone Jutsu, like most of you." Obviously, clan kids didn't exactly count. "I also learned the Replacement and Transformation Jutsu around the same time. In fact," Sensei waved a hand to indicate me, "Kei here was able to do the Replacement Jutsu without hand seals by the time she was ten."

It was a chakra control trick, Sensei. Still, I shifted uncomfortably with all of those little eyes on me.

"The Replacement Jutsu was really important to me at the time," I explained. "Because otherwise a punch to the face is really a punch to the face. And I don't know about any of you, but being punched hurts."

There was a round of nods.

"So the Academy teaches you how to do the Replacement Jutsu before you graduate, so you can avoid that stuff," I said. "It's just a good idea."

"Have you ever been hurt really bad?" asked one of the boys. I wasn't really keeping track of them aside from the ones I could recognized.

"I broke my shoulder the first time I took the Chūnin Exams," I said, as Sensei winced slightly. "I went up against Himawari Hyūga and didn't run away fast enough."

"Himawari-sama?" said one of the Hyūga students in shock.

Hayate's chakra pinged off mine again—he felt like he was both kind of amused and kind of annoyed.

"But—but the scar?" asked the other Hyūga kid.

Oh, right. The obvious thing. "I was on a mission about a year ago and ducked left when I should've ducked right. I figure I'm lucky I didn't lose an eye."

Which was, while all true, also fudging the truth to a vast extent. Hell, on that mission alone, I'd broken a katana, messed up my face, and gotten a minor concussion, Kakashi had been tortured and lost an eye, Obito had gotten half his body crushed and lost an eye to my rudimentary surgery. And then Kakashi and I had been busy in a weeks-long depressive funk, while Obito was going through horribly painful physical therapy to adapt to his new body parts and being continually mind-fucked by Madara Uchiha.

Kannabi had been the complete opposite of fun.

Just by looking at the crowd, I could tell that there were certain children who would have called bullshit on the Kid-Friendly Edition if they'd known enough details to do so. Among them were my brother, Itachi, and this kid with a Nara-like ponytail.
Question and Answer Time with the Hokage went on a while longer after that, since none of the kids really wanted to let us go and I was getting attached to them too. Eventually, the chūnin-sensei had to herd the kids back toward their classrooms so they could finally get their lunches and eat, and Sensei and I had to scramble to make it back to the Tower in time for finishing our food. Talking to so many kids for over an hour is tiring work.

"Feeling better, Kei?" Sensei asked, halfway through a pile of noodles Kushina had stir-fried sometime in the last few days. Before I could answer, he was already chomping through the rest of it really quickly.

I blinked, holding a slice of fried fish above my bento. I had been about to just eat it, but… "About what?"

Sensei paused to swallow before saying, "About going public as Isobu's host."

I thought about it. Remarkably, I actually was. There was something gratifying about the way little kids didn't run away screaming at the sight of me. I was pretty sure that they had mostly thought of me as a funny-looking fixture around the building until today. The whole Tailed Beast thing had been handled with surprising grace, since kids their age generally didn't have any.

"Kei?"

"Actually, Sensei, I do feel better. Thanks."

There were three birthdays to celebrate in November, which meant a lot of planning and a lot of running around.

First, Hayate's was on the second. Hayate was turning twelve, which meant he was due for a new kodachi and some more shinobi equipment in anticipation of his upcoming graduation. He probably needed a new set of clothes, too, but thankfully I was only expected to get him one gift. Sensei had said something about footing the bill for most of it, too.

Yūgao was the day after, and Hayate was going to be the one attending her celebration as she attended his. My job in that scenario was to get Hayate to and from the party unharmed, and to make sure he could get the gift he wanted to give to her. It'd be easier if he'd just tell me what that was, but no dice thus far.

And last of all, Rin. Her birthday was on the fifteenth and she was finally turning fourteen to match the rest of her age group. I had almost two weeks to come up with something for her, which was better than nothing.

Looooong story short: Hayate got a thick pair of kenjutsu bracers from me, a new kodachi from Sensei and Kushina, a haori-style green shirt from Rin, and Obito ended up getting him a heavily modified weapons' belt like the one I'd made for Kakashi almost a year ago. Only with more emphasis on the katana it was supposed to be holding.

(I never did figure out where the hell Kakashi's jōnin present—from me—went. Must have lost it at Kannabi.)

I got Yūgao a set of shinobi nail enamel, but Hayate wasn't willing to claim it was from him like he used to. He insisted on getting her a sword maintenance kit, which went great with the sword she didn't actually have. Maybe he thought it counted as dropping a hint. I wasn't sure if she had a bokken yet, but I hadn't been involved in her training.

I also got Rin a shell-embossed box I spotted in the market, though I wasn't sure what she'd store in it. Obito got her a hematite bracelet, which was cute and also tended to randomly magnetize itself to things like doorknobs. I think Kakashi might have gotten her a set of hair ribbons, but only because Rin mentioned it. Hayate made her a card that contained one storage seal, with my help, which spat out a cupcake when the seal was activated.

And Sensei and Kushina made her an actual birthday cake, while Yamaguchi-sensei finally announced that he'd made Rin heir to all his earthly holdings, and every medical technique he could get his hands on. The implication, there, was that all of the adults would make damn sure they were around to make sure she got everything she needed.

All in all, November looked a lot better than October had.

Genjutsu, on its own, wasn't exactly the most difficult of all possible disciplines. It required creativity, ruthlessness, good planning, and a willingness to eventually get right up in someone's face and cut their throat if all other options failed.

There were two major schools of genjutsu.

One was distraction. Making people see things that weren't there and fail to see things that were there, for whatever purpose the user could think of. Camouflage, for non-combat operations, meant that there was a much better chance for the practitioner to get out alive. Or perhaps a skilled genjutsu user could make an opponent think that there were a lot more enemies than there actually were. Either way, the point was to screw with the enemy's perceptions and hopefully reduce the chances your own side would get hurt.

The other one was based on the ability to break an enemy's mind before you ever laid a finger on them.

The Tsukuyomi, for somewhat obvious reasons, was in the latter category. It was an offensive, not defensive, genjutsu. And most targets were apparently reduced to vegetables if they couldn't fight it off. And most of them couldn't.

Isobu, as the Three-Tailed Beast, had access to both types of genjutsu in addition to the kind of watery firepower most people would associate with forces of nature. Which he kinda was.

You could have asked about learning more about my powers a long time ago. Isobu said, when I asked him about it.

We weren't really talking for a lot of that. I gently reminded him.

I still don't understand how you can know how to dispel so many kinds of genjutsu, but can't cast more than the basics.

Call it a lack of motivation. Between learning the Demonic Illusion series and the present, there had been more than enough crap going on to fill my schedule.

…Had that seriously only been six months ago?

"You done meditating now, Keisuke-chan?" Kurenai's voice startled me out of my reverie.

"Yeah, I think so," I said, opening my eyes.
I hadn't really planned on making my genjutsu training into a group event, but hey. What happened, happened.

Which is how I ended up at Training Ground Four, sitting in a circle with Kurenai, Kushina (and Naruto), Rin, and Mikoto Uchiha (and Sasuke).

Kushina was there because she was a Tailed Beast Host and was kind of curious to see how another Tailed Beast operated. Kurama could give her insane strength and stamina, but I hadn't heard anything about his talent for genjutsu. And I was also pretty sure I'd heard Kushina describe herself as complete garbage at ninjutsu.

Naruto was there because Kushina might have wanted to introduce him to the Tailed Beast people could talk to. You know, without him wishing for the instantaneous death of everyone. (I'd heard Kurama was getting better, but Isobu was still the mildest-tempered of the three in Konoha.)

Mikoto Uchiha was there because Kushina was her best friend and her Sharingan would serve as a way to instantly shut me down if I needed any help, though honestly I hoped she was there because Kushina might need her support.

Sasuke was there because Mikoto couldn't find a babysitter, and Itachi wasn't because it was during school hours.

Kurenai wanted to help me with genjutsu, mostly out of curiosity. But she also wanted to know how the hell I'd managed to get promoted twice without learning more than two genjutsu total. If I could dismiss them easily enough, it counted toward a higher ranking in my file, but I wasn't much for casting them on my own.

And Rin? Moral support. Hayate couldn't attend due to school, either.

"You have a funny look on your face," Kushina said, leaning forward. "Did that turtle say something?"

Naruto napped by her side, with Sasuke very slowly wiggling toward the other baby on his belly. They were rather cuter when not screaming incessantly. It was also surprising to learn how bloody big Naruto was for his age—Sasuke was around five months or something, and wasn't really all that much bigger despite the extra time.

"Isobu just called me an idiot for not learning more genjutsu," I muttered, rubbing the back of my neck awkwardly.

I did not.

"Well, I agree with him," Kurenai said. She crossed her arms, looking disapproving. "The Demonic Illusion series is the simplest there is! I know you scored better than that when we were at the Academy, Keisuke-chan."

"Have you met my teacher?" I asked dryly. Sensei came up with great ideas, but the only genjutsu he'd taught us was nonexistent. He didn't use genjutsu in combat—what he did was teleport everywhere he'd planted those Flying Thunder God seals, and Rasengan anyone who was resistant to face-stabbing. I'd never really been a genjutsu-type anyway, but in hindsight the lack was glaring. Even Jiraiya had thought as much.

"Hey, I…actually have nothing to say to that," Kushina said, losing steam.

"Kushina-chan…" Mikoto began, reproving, before pausing. Then she sighed. "Well, what do you three want to learn? Keep in mind that I can't teach you any Uchiha clan jutsu, and probably wouldn't if I could."

"Is it because they're dependent on the Sharingan, Mikoto-sama?" Rin asked.

Mikoto nodded. "I have more than a few of my own, though. I think they should be enough to get you started—though I imagine that Kurenai-chan will have a lot less trouble."

Kurenai beamed.

I rolled my eyes. Kurenai was already genjutsu-specialized, and I'd experienced—and defeated—that specialty on more than one occasion. Specifically, Kurenai's version. It was a lot harder to shake off the Sharingan, even with Isobu and me working together.

Rin reached over and slapped the back of my head.

"Ow!"

"Don't be rude, Kei," Rin said.

"You don't take genjutsu seriously?" Kurenai asked.

"Being a jinchūriki makes it harder for genjutsu to work," I explained, "But I have been caught in one that the Sharingan didn't break. And Isobu got me out, but that's a side note."

"A genjutsu the Sharingan couldn't pierce?" Mikoto asked, surprised.

Yeah, I wasn't gonna forget the butterflies of doom anytime soon. "Turns out that when you combine genjutsu with fūinjutsu, the result is pretty horrible. Genjutsu mines."

"And you couldn't escape on your own?" Kurenai sounded surprised. "I would have thought you could have disrupted them with your chakra."

Kushina, unnoticed by everyone else except possibly Mikoto, winced. Had Kakashi told her about that mission? It would have made sense…

"I kinda fell headfirst into the basement," I said, wincing. Nope, that had not been my finest moment. "The seal was put down after I landed and knocked myself out. Combine that with the chakra drain…well, it wasn't a fun mission."

Rin blinked, like she'd just understood what I was talking about. "Kei, was that…?"

"It was the mission right before I was promoted," I confirmed. I shrugged. "I mean, aside from getting caught for a few minutes, it wasn't the worst I've gone through."

"But this business about the Sharingan…" Mikoto pressed.

"Kakashi didn't have his Sharingan active." Horseshit, since it was always active. What it had been was covered. "I had to run around breaking the seals manually before we got the region fully disarmed. Honoka-san did better, but I didn't see what was going on with her."

Mikoto frowned. "While I understand that Hatake-kun has a transplant, I still would have expected the Sharingan to perceive the trap."

"Ah! This has to do with the Aburame clan's new summon contract, doesn't it?" Kurenai said, hitting the nail on the head. "I saw some very strange things that night, but the Aburame clan doesn't really use genjutsu much on their own. I asked Shibi-san, but he said they weren't really kikai insects either."

I glanced at Kushina. Could I confirm this?

Kushina nodded. Not like it was an especially big secret. The rest of the village would have it confirmed sooner or later.

I explained, "That was when we retrieved the contract. Honoka-san suggested that they'd do better with the Aburame clan than with a dead summoner, so…"

That was kinda that.

I shrugged. "Is there any reason I can't just use genjutsu via fūinjutsu and save myself having to learn more hand seals? Rin and Kurenai-chan would get more use out of that."

"While I'm sure using seals is very appealing, Kei-chan, there's a problem with that," Kushina said. "That's a lot of prep work for something you should be able to use on your own."

"Just because I can make things blow up at a touch doesn't mean I don't carry craptons of exploding seals anyway," I pointed out. Before anyone could protest, I picked up a pebble near my knee, coated it in an explosive seal from my fingertips, and flung it across the training field.

It exploded with a noise like a firecracker, making Naruto blink awake in time to find Sasuke pulling on his orange onesie's sleeve. He stuck his little fat baby fingers up Sasuke's nose.

Sasuke stuffed Naruto's whole hand in his mouth.

"You've mostly been giving them to other people, right?" Kurenai asked, ignoring the impending baby fight.

"Only if necessary. The seals I create by hand tend to be timed, so if I want to create a working trap I usually have to rig them up ahead of time." It wasn't a tremendous amount of work, but then, I'd been studying fūinjutsu for years and could easily get away with creating explosives out of otherwise-innocent paper and ink. Genjutsu wouldn't be too much harder, right?

My instant-use seals, on the other hand, were often chakra-intensive. Which, with Isobu, had stopped being quite as much of a danger. Sure, I could only do explosives that way, but it was a technique that had served me well over the last year.

How much bang did I want, versus how much preparation would I otherwise have to use? It didn't really matter. I was capable of killing anything regardless.

…but when you got down to it, it kind of felt like I was just trying to avoid getting into the habit of relying on hand seals again.

Between my katana and use of explosive seals, I didn't generally have or need my hands free to be a monster in close combat. After I'd rediscovered the ability to project a Rasengan without needing to use an open palm, I was even less keen on wasting time in the middle of a fight.

It was a clash of ninja and samurai sensibilities, in short.

"Well, how about you try to create some genjutsu seals with me, first. Then I'll be able to say whether or not you can get out of learning them the normal way," Kushina suggested.
"I would be willing to help test these seals," Mikoto said, smiling as she pried Sasuke away from Naruto, to the babies' obvious frustration. "It will be interesting to see if you can help Itachi learn to recognize genjutsu, girls."

"I can definitely do that," Kurenai said. Then she frowned. "But I still don't think these genjutsu seals will be as good as real genjutsu."

Rin shrugged. "I may have to work next time, so I don't know when I'll be able to meet up. Kei?"

"Ask me about my schedule tomorrow. This is my only day off for a while," I admitted. "I'll work on the seals with Kushina-san and see where we get. Mikoto-sama, will it be all right if my brother comes along, if Itachi can make it? It'd be a valuable experience for him, too. Especially since he's going to be a genin soon."

"I don't see why not."

Up until New Year's, little changes continued to pile up.

Sensei was still Hokage, in blatant defiance of the Plot, and had settled into his work with gusto and Shadow Clone assistance. Sure, he went home with a hell of a headache every day, but he got work done and eventually got to the point where Hiruzen Sarutobi figured it was past time to actually enjoy his retirement. He even finally got around to appointing a new Jōnin Commander—Shikaku Nara.

Kushina continued to be a social butterfly as though making up for lost time. There were so many new mothers among the clans that she had as many choices as she wanted. It was her job, in a way, to maintain connections between the clans and the Hokage by being so friendly that people felt bad turning her away. This was especially true for the wife of the Uchiha clan's head, and I saw almost more of the clan than I had in years in barely a few months.

Naruto grew like a weed, filling Kushina's arms by the time he was two months old. He had figured smiling out uncannily early, but hadn't quite figured out the secret to peekaboo. He had gotten used to seeing more people—mostly Hayate and me, since we were around the most—and lifting his arms to grab fistfuls of hair or whatever was in range. He was a happy baby, loved by his parents and just about everyone else. Naruto even had a new best friend in the form of Sasuke, though I wasn't sure he could recognize him yet.

Obito continued with his probation, helping sort out domestic disputes and other minor grievances that cropped up once the crisis point of village recovery was finally over. He was also tapped to help repair the hospital, but the village's architects took one look at his Wood Release and declined—not enough stability in the wood. I don't think he minded much. He was probably happier helping people directly. Also, Obito was finally able to move back into the Uchiha district around the twentieth of December, since people had finally gotten around to repairing his block.

Kakashi spent a lot of his time on missions outside of the village, but he didn't skip out on visiting just because he had a bunk in the ANBU barracks. He managed to make it to dinner about five times out of ten, if he wasn't on a mission. While I wasn't always sure what to think of his resolution to head into ANBU despite most of his social circle being alive and kicking, I figured that if he'd stop by and remind himself he was human, he'd be okay.

Rin continued working at the hospital for the most part, despite her field medic certification. Without war missions and postings, she really didn't need to be deployed much. And since she spent so much time at the hospital with Yamaguchi-sensei and the legion of medical experts, she continued to just get better and better. She even got to study with Tsunade and Shizune, since they were sticking around for the foreseeable future.

"You are?" I asked, surprised.

"Yes," Shizune confirmed. Her expression became somewhat dry. "Tsunade-sama says that there's nothing really outside of Konoha anyway."

"...Huh." I wondered if she had come to that conclusion because of Kushina and Naruto, or if something else I couldn't see had changed the Slug Princess's mind. "I'm surprised she decided to stay, still. Everyone said she was gone for good."

"I think Tsunade-sama has finally found a reason to stay in the village," Shizune said, smiling fondly. Her expression went a little wistful, a little sad. "I'm just sorry it took so long."

"Hey, I don't think anyone blames her," I said, but it was probably a lie. There was probably someone who did, considering that she'd ditched when the Third Shinobi World War was still in progress. Like Orochimaru had.

"Shizune-san, please get back to work." Yamaguchi-sensei's voice rang out, making Shizune jump. My old teacher stood off to the side, already lighting up what was probably his fifth cigarette of the day with a spark of lightning. He jerked his head significantly, and Shizune bustled off—from what I could feel, she was probably being asked to reinforce Tsunade on something or other.

And that left the two of us on the hospital roof, among the drying linens.

"Kei-kun."

"Yamaguchi-sensei." I greeted him with a nod, "Still smoking yourself to death, I see."

"And you're as cheerfully belligerent as ever," Yamaguchi-sensei replied, patently unimpressed. "So. You show up to Rin's birthday and hardly say a word to me. And here I thought we were student and teacher."

I shrugged. "We both upgraded."

Yamaguchi-sensei's mouth twisted into half a smirk around the end of his cigarette, but he mirrored my shrug. "I suppose we did. Rin is a talented medic. You...could have been."

"I fell out of practice. Which kinda seems impossible, given Obito and Kakashi. But hey, I can now kill a man in a dozen interesting ways." I made a "what can you do" gesture and just sighed. "Did you need me for something? Otherwise, I can get lost."

"No, you can go and frolic in the woods or whatever you do for a day job now," Yamaguchi-sensei said dismissively. "You've grown beyond me, and you know it."

"What, in stabbing capability? I was always better," I scoffed, grinning. God, it was nice to have someone to make caustic remarks at.

"I don't know. I've seen worse on on Saturday nights." Yamaguchi-sensei snarked right back.

I flapped a hand at him. "Self-inflicted doesn't count."

"And you'd know, wouldn't you?" Yamaguchi-sensei said, taking his cigarette out of his mouth so he wouldn't choke on it if he laughed.
"I have tons of people to make sure all stabbings are directed at the enemy now." Sans one. But I wasn't here to reminisce about ghosts laid to rest.

"I'm sure they run themselves ragged just trying to keep up, now." He was really smiling. "You must be trying to give them gray hairs early, Kei-kun. I hope you appreciate them."

"I do. And you have family now, too," was my rejoinder. As I hurled myself over the roof fencing, I shot over my shoulder, "I think it worked out for the best that I'm not your student anymore!"

"Get off of my building, brat!" Yamaguchi-sensei yelled down after me, but what did I care? Things were going just fine.

I bounced off a building or two before I hit the ground, feeling quite a bit better for having been able to visit much of anyone. Sure, Rin hadn't wanted to talk too much while there was stuff going on, and Yamaguchi-sensei had been on his smoke break, but still. It was nice to catch up with anyone.

…Actually.

As I headed back up the road that led to the Tower—and thus its broad selection of takeout options for the mid-level paperwork ninja—I spotted a somewhat familiar face in the crowd.

A woman with long, dark purple hair, white eyes, and quite a rotund stomach. Flanked by two white-eyed guards as she made her way toward the hospital.

I didn't stop and chat with Himawari-san, but I did pick up the pace toward Sensei's office. I'd just remembered the Kumogakure-caused Hyūga incident, and he needed to know about it as quickly as possible.

Somewhat later, I was eating a late lunch in Sensei's office while Kakashi was in the ceiling somewhere and Sensei was supposedly just filling out paperwork like it was any old winter afternoon. No siree, no ninjas in the air vent…

I could tell Kakashi was up there for two reasons: One, his signature lightning-elemental chakra that always seemed so distinct to me. Two, the fact that there was a pug sleeping in the in-tray on Sensei's desk. And anyway, I was pretty sure he liked miso soup with eggplant, because the contents of the bowl mysteriously vanished by half-centimeter increments whenever I set it down to talk.

Whatever. He was welcome to it.

"So what you're saying is that the clans should be on guard," Sensei concluded, stamping his seal of approval on something or other. One of his Shadow Clones dumped another load of paperwork on his desk—avoiding Pakkun by scant centimeters—before poofing out of existence again.

"Sort of. While it's true that the clan heiress was targeted, there wasn't…technically anything stopping them from targeting any other clan kids." I paused. "Well, other than Kumo's hard-on for the Byakugan in general."

In the ceiling, I heard Kakashi make a "tch" noise.

Boys.

"Actually, there was a guy in Kirigakure who had a Byakugan at the time of the Fourth Shinobi World War," I said, "Though I don't have the slightest clue how he got it."
Sensei frowned. "It sounds like the Hyūga clan's method of avoiding bloodline theft wasn't as secure as they thought."

"...You could say that." The Caged Bird Seal was, in my opinion as a student of Uzumaki-styled fūinjutsu, barely adequate for its intended purpose and all too effective at being used to punish uppity Branch House members.

"Go on."

I tapped my chin with the fat end of my chopsticks. "I'd say the Uchiha clan might want to be careful, given Kakashi's example, but the onus of keeping the Kumo ambassadors out of trouble falls on both the village and the clan. The clans defend their children, and we watch the Kumo-nin?" Sounded kind of fair.

"We have five clan heirs in the theoretically at-risk group," Sensei remarked. "Shikaku's son, Chōza's son, Fugaku's eldest and youngest sons, the yet-unborn Hyūga heiress, and my son." He sighed. "At least Kumo doesn't look like they're going to stand down from their 'resentful ceasefire' tack anytime in the immediate future. I've honestly been half-waiting for someone to try and assassinate me. Keeps a person on their toes."

"Iwa or Kumo?" I asked, half-jokingly.

"Why not both? Both is good. At least that way we know who's done playing at friendship." Sensei shrugged. "Kumo's had a price on my head since I was fourteen or something, and Iwa's got their own problem with me."

"...Huh. Okay."

"Thanks for telling me anyway. Oh! And this came in recently." Sensei dug something out from under Pakkun's belly, leaving the pug undisturbed, and flung it Frisbee-style across the desk at me.

I caught the little black book and blinked. "Kumogakure's bingo book?"

"One of the ANBU teams brought it back earlier today. I thought you'd like to see that a certain someone made it in. Flip to the part about minor villages."

I did so.

And there, staring up at me from the page, was a rather pathetically low-detail sketch of someone who could only be Nagato. It might as well have been a stick figure colored red and black for all the visual information it held.

And underneath the sketch, there was half a page of tiny script detailing how much nobody friggin' knew about the guy. Something, something, violently murderizing people and things that pissed him off. At the moment, the list was sparse, but the more people poked at the hornet's nest that was Amegakure, the more violently they'd be introduced to Nagato's thus-undiscovered capacity for violence.

"Hah!"

"I thought you'd appreciate that. Kushina laughed for a good five minutes. Jiraiya-sensei looked like he was about to cry," Sensei said, dryly amused. "It looks like we're making progress, doesn't it?"

"Kinda does. Isn't Nagato-san kind of your brother-in-law—ah, there it is. Confirmed Uzumaki." I smiled. "Well, isn't that just going to give everyone else fits."
"I think it will." Sensei leaned back in his chair, sighing contentedly. "I think this is going pretty well, don't you?"

"Yep," I said, then glanced at the ceiling. "Kakashi?"

"His mask's name, Kei. He's on the job," Sensei stage-whispered to me.

"Right. ANBU Wolf, do you think we're doing all right?"

"I think the more time we spend on self-congratulating, the less is going to get done," Kakashi's voice said from the vent in the ceiling. "And since I have afternoon shift today, I think you should get enough work done to head home for dinner, Hokage-sama."

"Don't feel like getting takeout?" Sensei teased.

Kakashi snorted. "Would you?" After tasting Kushina Uzumaki's cooking, takeout looked unappealing most of the time. (Though I reserved the right to tease friends and family.)

"Says the guy who ate half my lunch," I said, because I could.

"You asked for it," Kakashi replied, sniffing.

"Kids, please," Sensei chuckled, "Kei, go ahead and waste the afternoon however you choose. We'll be home for dinner."

Mission accomplished! Another resounding success.

One thing that people learned and learned quickly around Konoha, at least if they wanted to live, was that Uzumaki clan members had volcanic tempers.

There were only two Uzumaki clan members in town on most days, granted, and one of them was all of three months old. It still didn't pay to treat them dismissively. Of the traveling Uzumaki clan members, Akira wasn't dangerous when he stopped by on trade runs, but he was married to a woman who used explosive seals in her personal armament, and Nagato was a walking artillery piece no matter which way you looked at it.

But Kushina? If she got pissed off at you, the only real option was to run and hope that the Hokage caught up with her before she caught up with you. And if he failed, to pray for a quick death.

Sensei, on the other hand, made a point of seeming unflappable and polite in public. He had terrifying killing intent, and had a more threatening reputation, but he seemed nice.

It didn't change the fact that Sensei burned cold.

Most higher-caliber shinobi had a coldblooded side that let them order enemy troops or villages to be violently scattered to the four winds, or to take a man apart in front of his comrades to make them talk, or to do any number of other horrible things for the sake of the village. Sensei was no different. He just hid it better, and could go home without worrying about the blood on his hands if he had to. He'd mostly left that work behind, as Hokage, but as a commander he had the capacity to utilize the cold calculus of war.

When Sensei lost his temper, people learned their lessons in a very terminal way. Just ask Black Zetsu. Oh wait, Sensei fed the guy's soul to the Shinigami because Black Zetsu pissed him off.

...Maybe half of that was hyperbole. But which half?

On January seventh, when the week-long New Year's celebrations for Konoha were finally coming to an end, someone finally tried attacking the Hokage's family.

By which I mean they got violently mangled.

What? I said they tried.

There were a total of five infiltrators.

Apparently one of them tried doing something at the village gates, only to be arrested by an Uchiha MP squad. From what I heard, they were tipped off by Fuse Inuzuka, who happened to be coming back from cross-country training with all eight of her dogs, and they had to pry the big one's jaws open with a crowbar to get him off.

The second ran into an ANBU patrol inside the village and got a senbon in the eye when he failed to stop and submit to questioning for being a suspicious-looking guy. I imagine the purple-gray arm- and leg-warmers and flat mask had something to do with it.

The third through the fifth got a bit closer to their destination.

The third, unlucky bastard that he was, tripped over Kakashi in a shitty mood and got a Lighting Release kunai to the face.

Contestant number four met Obito, and we found the halves of him on two different rooftops. In related news, we found out that Obito had discovered how Kamui worked.

Number five met me.

By the time Sensei got back to the house, I had a full-grown Kiri-nin in a triangle choke on the front doorstep, using both arms and a smattering of Isobu's chakra.

Kushina and Naruto had been out and about, but my brother had been in the house and I was on my goddamned day off. I had wanted to sleep in, but noooooo, we had foreign assholes running around in our village and there went my morning. I even got beaned in the face by a freaking New Year’s orange earlier, courtesy of Hayate. All in all, I had a bit of frustration to work off, so I didn't just insta-kill him like anyone else would have.

Sensei had to pull me off him before I popped his head off.

As far as assassination attempts went, in hindsight I wasn't all that impressed.

And also in hindsight, the Kiri-nin probably would have gone with death-by-me rather than being handed over to Torture and Interrogation by Sensei's entirely nonexistent sense of mercy whenever his family was being threatened.

I'd like to say that was the story of the first assassination attempt, all told. It would've been nice to just be able to shrug it off and say it was the cost of doing business, really.

But, as with many things to do with shinobi, there was more to it than that.

I was told of the essentials of the case in Sensei's office.

I seemed to be spending a lot more time in there, with the security seals up, than I did nearly anywhere else. If people didn't start to suspect that there was some kind of clandestine something-or-other going on by this point, I'd be shocked. Luckily, Kakashi was in the office and thus I could worry about something else or other as background noise to my thoughts.

Anyway, I summed up my opinion of the attack and its reasoning—per some guy being tortured in a basement somewhere, to my surprising lack of fucks to give—with a very succinct statement.

"Well, shit."

It was appropriate, okay?

I went on to say, "All of that over Isobu? And they didn't even send a guy who could handle a jinchūriki."
"Partially." Sensei glanced up from his files to pin Kakashi to the wall with a look. Not sure what for, but maybe that meant he was going to give Kakashi something to do in a minute. The Hokage was the only one who can really hand ANBU missions over just like that, but I didn't know if Sensei had used that privilege much. "I'm informed that it seems like a provoked attack, though we don't quite have all the pieces yet. The prisoner was very openly hostile toward Konoha, in a way that suggested a personal grudge."

"He could be related to the Kiri-nin we killed on the mission where Obito came back," I suggested. I felt like I was throwing darts at a board the size of the entire wall, composed of conspiracy theories on little post-its. There were too many options to pin down a specific motive. "Though that would imply that Kiri's ANBU system is less secure than ours."

"Or someone is deliberately setting Kirigakure against us," Kakashi put in, ever the cynic. But then, I didn't know enough about the sinister world of ANBU ops to know what was realistic.

Still, for the sake of arguing, "Or they might just want to get Isobu back." Tch. Like they'd be able to. Isobu hadn't sounded too fond of them the last time we talked. "Good luck."

Kakashi didn't look like he wanted to argue the preferences of a Tailed Beast. "By making the Three-Tails—Isobu-san—public knowledge here, you've turned yourself into a target. So someone took you up on it." He shook his head, like he couldn't believe the amount of stupid I exuded. "ANBU is still investigating, but this isn't surprising."

"Thank you, Wolf," Sensei said in a dry voice. "It's nice to know my family was just a target of opportunity." He sighed.

"Sensei, I was still expecting Iwa to send you congrats on having a kid, first," I remarked to Sensei, who sighed again. Yeah, not necessarily the best time for jokes.

"I do think they would have if they'd had the chance," Sensei replied. "But if they didn't get one, I don't have any complaints." He turned his attention back to Kakashi, who hadn't moved. "Wolf, keep me updated on the investigation. I'm sure it'll cross my desk eventually, but I'd appreciate the warning."

"Of course, Hokage-sama." Kakashi said, and for once in his life decided to leave the office through the door as opposed to an air vent or whatever ANBU used to get around. Hell, I'd hid in the ceiling before, but I'd cheated and I probably wouldn't fit in the vents within a few months.

Damned puberty.

Still, I did have something important to tell Kakashi about. "Be right back, Sensei."

Sensei offered a dismissive wave with his left hand, already nose-deep in the paperwork again.

I caught up with Kakashi in the hallway just outside, so at least he hadn't poured on the Body Flicker speed. "Kakashi, wait up for a second."

"What?" His voice was a little harsher than I expected, but whatever. He could judge after I asked.

It was weird to feel his chakra go all agitated even though we were alone out here. I mean, I couldn't corner him or anything and I didn't think he was still afraid of Isobu, but hey. His heart rate was probably up, and I could see suspicion in what little I could see of his face.

I forced myself to relax a bit. Body language stuff like this worked with dogs, so maybe… "Are you going to be at the graduation ceremony?"
Kakashi's chakra stilled. By god that was a weird feeling. Did I catch him off guard? Still, he said, "Probably not. Tell Hayate I'm sorry."

Well, rats. He was looking forward to having everyone there.

"All right. Well, if you do get back early or something, there's going to be a party thing at the Umino family's place. Team announcements are the day after, but I'm not worried about that."

Not like I actually expected him to attend. I was pretty sure Kakashi likes parties like that about as much as I did. I was probably going to spend the afternoon avoiding talking to parents.

Kakashi turned to leave almost before I completed the thought, then paused. He looked back over his shoulder with a piercing stare. "Kei."

I paused, halfway back into the office. "Yeah?" I needed to fill Sensei in on some other futureverse shit while I had it in mind.

"Go check on Obito."

…What.

I could practically feel my face settle into business mode, where my mouth flattens into a whitening line and my eyes narrow.

What's wrong with Obito?

But if Kakashi didn't want to talk, and he did spot something wrong with our team's third member… "I will. Take care out there."

Kakashi vanished in a burst of Body Flicker speed.

Dammit. Like I needed another bombshell in my lap before New Year's was even over.

Speaking of, New Year's celebrations in Konoha lasted about a week. I had almost forgotten, since tradition dictated that a death in the family generally cancelled out most celebrations. I'd have had to send letters to all my relatives and close friends to not send New Year's cards…only Hayate and I were the only members of the family that we knew, and anyway everyone else we cared about already knew about Mom's death.

Being fourteen and twelve, we'd struggled for about two days before just giving up and making sure the Namikaze-Uzumaki joint celebrations were as happy as they could be.

And then the assassination attempt happened.

"Sensei?" I asked, as I wandered back over to the desk.

"Yes, Kei?" Sensei replied distractedly.

"Have you heard much from Obito for the last week?"

"Aside from this morning, no. Is something wrong?" Sensei looked up, concerned.

"I don't know yet. Kakashi seems to think so." Which was fucking weird. Either there was something genuinely up with my only Uchiha friend, or Kakashi just wanted to get me to leave him alone. But there were better ways to distract me that didn't get my anxious thought processes going.
In hindsight, it had been strange to find Obito using Kamui on the offensive in such a brutal way. The Kiri-nin had looked like someone had chopped him in half with a chakra scalpel, as silly as it sounded. No tool marks on the body or anything as obvious as Wood Release. It had looked like Obito had sucked half of the guy into the Kamui dimension and...well, forgotten to get the rest of him. And then thrown the other half right out again.

According to Sensei, the guy had still been twitching when ANBU got to him.

Sensei frowned. "I haven't heard anything. And nothing's crossed my desk yet, either. Kei, would you mind checking on him?"

I wasn't technically on shift—I'd just been called in to talk—so I was technically also free to go do just that. "Yeah, I will."

I left the office after that, heading to the house first. The Academy wasn't in session during New Year's, so I could bring Hayate along to help me figure out what was what with Obito.

Hayate's initial concerns were somewhat less than relevant, but they made sense to him.

"I'm sorry I hit you with an orange this morning," he said quite seriously, when I got back.

"Eh, it's fine." I checked the shoes by the front door—Kushina wasn't back yet—and headed inside to find a decent jacket before I would walk to Obito's. If I was going to walk to the Uchiha district, I'd need something a little thicker than a glorified training tank top.

And I wasn't gonna go over the rooftops if I was taking Hayate along. He was just about good enough to travel like that consistently if he wanted to, but I was worried that he'd injure himself before his graduation ceremony. And that would suck.

"So where are you going now?" Hayate asked, as I put on a dark blue coat and a scarf I hadn't used much in the last few days.

Aside from the incident with the Kiri-nin, I hadn't been doing much this New Year's.

"Gonna see Obito. Coming with?" Did I even have long sandals...? Nope. Once again, Konoha's depressingly consistent footwear came back to bite me. We didn't generally need socks, so the selection in town was appalling.

"Sure!" And he whooshed away to go and get dressed.

It was probably only around 55 degrees Fahrenheit, but Konoha didn't really have consistent thermometers anywhere. It wasn't cold, but it was cool enough to trigger two urges—one, I needed sleeves, and two, Hayate needed to have more than one layer of clothing.

The rest was just complaining.

Hayate whooshed back into view, wearing his new haori-style shirt. I wanted to side-eye it—it wasn't exactly a jacket or similar—but there were sleeves and I hadn't actually said that he had to wear anything in particular.

I shrugged. "All right. Let's go."

I found out that Hayate could, in fact, keep up with me to some degree if I went over the rooftops. Given that Obito and I had managed a respectable pace when we were younger than him, it was somewhat gratifying to learn.

Sure, he hadn't learned which rooftops let me catch the most air, but hey. He could learn that over time.

Still, when we landed just inside the outer boundaries of the Uchiha district, he had to take a moment to get his breathing under control. Whether due to Isobu or due to years of running the same route to get Obito anywhere on time, I didn't. Hayate would probably be getting a lot of opportunities for physical conditioning once he got a jōnin-sensei. I had. Granted, it felt like most of what I had put myself through had been because of my teammates and not my sensei, but that amounted to semantics.

"Obito's...hah...house? It's there, right?" Hayate panted, looking up at me through his bangs.

Obito's apartment was, yes. In hindsight, I was pretty sure Hayate had never been inside.

Somehow, the building was actually in better shape than it had been the last time I visited. Sure, it was a clan-owned apartment complex, but I'd been expecting the place to still be slightly scorched—at least a bit. I hadn't expected that the place would be a priority.

...Also, for some reason I could sense Obito's chakra only in fits and starts.

What the hell?

I tapped the side of my head as we approached his apartment building, still getting intermittent signals. Obito didn't deliberately flare his chakra to communicate with me or anything, since he didn't really understand how my chakra sense worked, but I still almost always knew where he was once he was in my range. Either my chakra sense was going batty again, or something else was going on.

"Is something wrong, Sis?" Hayate asked, having noticed my behavior.

I had no idea. "Maybe."

We headed up the stairs—Konoha apartments weren't gated, and it wouldn't have mattered if they were—since Obito lived on the third floor and two apartments down the hall. At least, he probably did. He actually could have changed exact addresses when his building was repaired and I'd never know.

I still made sure Obito's chakra popped back into his apartment before I knocked on the door.

There was a loud crash.

Startled, I leaned toward the door and called, "Obito?"

"Kei?" His voice sounded strained. At least he could talk. "What are you doing here?"

"And Hayate's here, too!" my brother added, refusing to be left out.

There was the sound of something plastic and hollow being set down, and a rummaging noise. Then Obito finally reached the door and—

His face appeared first, randomly in the formerly-blank apartment door.

Hayate shrieked in surprise and jerked backward, pulling me with him.

Meanwhile, Obito stepped right through his apartment door like it wasn't actually there. If I hadn't been looking right at him, and therefore at his Mangekyō Sharingan, I probably would have wondered if he'd gone and died while I hadn't been paying attention. The last thing I needed to deal with was literal ghosts of the past. Knowing my luck, Madara would be next.

My outward reaction was to remain calm. I quirked an eyebrow while I studied him for any injuries, mostly to buy me time.

He was dressed in old gray clothes, with his pant legs and sleeves rolled up, his black spiky hair wrapped up in a handkerchief, and his mouth behind a medical mask. Combined with the eyepatch over his left eye socket, he kind of looked like Kakashi in (theoretical) cleaning mode. He had rubber gloves on both hands and was covered in a fine layer of dust where he wasn't wet from kneeling in something that apparently stained rusty brown. He was holding a scrub brush and, to be perfectly honest, looked a little surprised that Hayate and I had showed up. And perhaps a little embarrassed that we had.

"Spring cleaning?" I asked, with just a trace of teasing in the tone.

"Uh, kinda," Obito said, pulling the mask down so it was hanging off his ears. "…I just walked through the door, didn't I?"

"HOW DID YOU DO THAT?" Hayate shouted, recovering admirably quickly. "You—that's…"

I clapped a hand down on my brother's shoulder. "Let's finish this conversation inside, all right?"

"We haven't even started yet!" my brother protested.

"Yeah, just hang on a sec." Obito flicked his right wrist and a woody vine curled out from under his sleeve and sought out the keyhole. There was a click and he pushed the door open ahead of us, saying, "Um, sorry about the mess."

Honestly, Obito's apartment wasn't as bad as I'd have thought, given how he was acting. Sure, there was That Chair, which had clearly become a repository for everything Obito didn't feel like putting away. There was a suspicious-looking stain on the wall that looked like it was older than Jiraiya, and the sink was full of unwashed dishes. And the futon was unmade. But other than those random points, it was astonishingly well-maintained. Obito had a bookshelf shoved next to a writing desk backed by cork-board, and a lamp on the desk as well as a chair that looked like it could swivel. On the desk was a neat line of framed photographs, and the bulletin board had his daily schedule pinned to it. The main window was half-hidden behind the board, sure, but there was still plenty of light. I could see six or seven posters tacked to the walls, standing out in bright colors against the striped wallpaper. Sure, the place was small, but it was his.

Honestly, I'd done worse when it came to maintaining my room back in the house. Even if Mom had helped.

The only real problem I had was the lingering smell of bleach.

Hayate's nose wrinkled, too. "Obito?"

"Yeah, Hayate?" Obito blinked, like he couldn't see why we were here anyway. Though he let us into his apartment.

"Why's the room smell weird?" Hayate asked.
"Ah, that's…" Obito looked at me, seeming a little frantic.

"Wait, no, never mind that. How did you walk through your door?!" Hayate changed mental train tracks entirely and remembered what he'd been talking about before.

"It's, um." Another stall.

"It's a special Sharingan ability," I told Hayate, since Obito was floundering. "Only Obito can do it."

"Oh." Hayate seemed to realize that he wasn't getting any more of an explanation than that, and let it drop.

"So, what were you doing when we got here, Obito?" I asked, curious.

He got that hunted look on his face again. "How much can I…?"

"The tenth's classified, but otherwise you can tell him whatever you feel like," I said seriously.

Obito spun his desk chair around and sat down in it. Maybe it was just me, but it seemed like Obito was tired. Had he been cleaning since he was interviewed about the would-be assassin he bisected?

Hayate and I sat on the floor. Hayate seemed to be expecting story time.

I wanted more of an explanation.

"I've been cleaning up blood all morning, actually," Obito said warily.

"Blood? Where?" Hayate asked, whipping his head around to stare at the visible parts of the apartment.

I crossed my arms and waited.

"Not here, Hayate," Obito said. "My Sharingan has a special power, called Kamui. It lets me shove stuff into another dimension."

"Like…" Hayate visibly struggled for an example, before saying, "Like the inside of a storage scroll?"

"I guess. I've never thought about it." Obito's handwriting was bad enough that he hadn't wanted to put in the hours to study fūinjutsu. Most of that time would involve just getting his calligraphy up to snuff. "But anyway, I used that special power to stop one of the assassins this morning."

"There were a total of five," I told my brother, "and you saw the last one."

Hayate went quiet. Yes, he had.

Obito looked between us, surprised by the sudden silence. "Um…?"

"The guy got as far as the front step. Then I happened."

"Ah."

"So what does that have to do with having to clean up blood someplace?" I asked, into the awkward moment.

"Not 'someplace,' Kei," Obito corrected me. "I hit the guy with Kamui, remember?"
Oh, ick. He'd sawed the guy in half with the entrance to a pocket dimension, and the blood was still there? While I'd have to remember to check storage scrolls for that capability now that I was aware of it, damn. It'd been a nastier way to die than I'd thought.

"So you can get in and out of that place easily?" I asked, tilting my head to one side. "No eye strain or anything?"

"Rin asked me to keep track. Nothing's changed so far." Obito shrugged. "But I kinda tripped in the blood when I tried to use Kamui after I got the guy to ANBU, so I figured I could clean it up." He picked at the knees of his pants, which reminded me that the rusty stains were still there. "I'm probably gonna have to burn this, but at least it was old."

…Okay. Not exactly the suicide watch caliber thing I'd been expecting since Kakashi had brought Obito up.

Maybe he really had just been trying to get me off his case.

Then Hayate's stomach grumbled.

"Do you have any food, Obito?" I asked, belatedly realizing that I hadn't had breakfast either. I remembered a second after that that the question was kinda rude. We were uninvited guests, after all.

"Not really," Obito mumbled, rubbing the back of his neck awkwardly. "I eat a lot of takeout…"

With Hayate flushing red with embarrassment, I seized my chance to get to the bottom of the mystery.

"Hayate, if I give you some pocket money, can you get snacks from the bakery?" I asked. Most of the time Mom or I had gone with him to the store, but there had to have been some times that Mom had let him go places unsupervised…

"No problem," Hayate said, relieved. "Gimme."

I made sure to hit him in the shoulder with my least favorite wallet. It held maybe a hundred ryō or so—enough for a few snack buns if he was choosy.

Hayate dashed out the door, and I felt his cheerful little chakra signature pound down the building's staircase and out into the street.

With half my attention on Hayate as he trotted toward the Uchiha clan's bakery, I turned the rest to Obito. He still felt nervous to me, in a way that wasn't necessarily justified by circumstances.

I glanced around the room again. Getting up, I decided to examine the picture frames arranged on his desk. If that put me within grabbing distance…well, whatever. I knew a couple different ways to put pressure on him, gently.

"Kakashi got me the frames," Obito said, apropos of nothing. He spun the chair around so he was facing the little line of photographs, too. "He said it looked stupid to just have them pinned up."

"Well, I agree. It was nice of him to give you the frames, though." I paused. It had been a rather sweet gesture, but that didn't say much for the state of most of Obito's belongings in past months. "But you can never tell him I said that."

Obito snickered. "All right, I promise I won't tell."
Yeah, right.

The first picture was of our team, actually. Sensei stood in the back, with his hands on Obito and Kakashi’s heads while I—as then-tallest of the genin—was in the middle with my arms around both of their shoulders. I may or may not have been trying not to strangle one or both of them at the time. I couldn't really remember.

"Hard to believe it's been four years," Obito said, "We were so tiny back then."

"Says the guy who's finally taller than me," I replied, smiling. I set that frame gently aside and looked at the next.

A photo of Rin, of course. She was tiny, and still wearing that shuriken-patterned dress, but held up a sealed pack that I knew contained a medic-nin uniform. In careful pen, she'd written, "First day on the job!" in the bottom right corner of the picture. Her other hand formed a V for victory sign, and she was grinning widely.

"I feel like I missed the memo on this one," I said, curious.

"She said Yamaguchi-sensei took it," Obito said. "She gave it to me after we got back from that first C-rank."

Christ, that'd been a long time ago.

"And this one?" The next photograph was of a field, with barely distinguishable blobs running around in the frame.

"Ah, that was the time Kakashi's dogs were learning how to track." He pointed to a dark bluish blur in the background. "That's me. I was laying the trail but, uh…"

"But Kakashi let them loose early." I hadn't known Sensei had a camera out for that moment. "At least they weren't full-grown yet."

"It was almost worth it, seeing Sensei yell at him," Obito said fondly.

He picked up the last picture frame in line, skipping two half-sized frames that depicted events I almost recognized. The photograph he held was old, gone slightly yellowish with age, and it looked a little wrinkled. Like someone had crumpled it at least once.

There were three people in the photo. A man with a brown crew cut and low-necked Uchiha shirt, alongside a woman in a yellow kimono with a side-swept part to her brown hair. In the woman's arms, barely visible, was a tiny fuzzy-headed baby.

"Your parents?" I asked, gently taking the frame from him.

"Yeah." Obito didn't look like he was going to cry. He looked solemn, sure, but this was an old pain. "I never knew them, you know? Mom and Dad died in the Second War, so…so I kind of didn't know enough to miss them."

Held long enough, against the sharp points, sometimes old pain could be gently worn down. The edges smoothed, until eventually there was a simple leaden weight there, in your chest like an old friend. Neither pain nor comfort. Just a reminder, on cold days.

Sometimes, I felt that way about my old life. Whether it was gone or I was the one who had fallen down the rabbit hole unwittingly, I didn't know.
And yet this one was the one I had.

I'd picked up a lovely little collection of losses to weigh me down in this life, all the same. Dad, Mom, even Obito for a while there. And yet, I could accept those. I had to. There was no going back.

"I think I'd miss them more if I did know them," Obito said, sighing. He smiled, though, and I blinked. "But I have Sensei, and Rin-chan and you and Kakashi and Hayate and Kushina-san…and it's not that lonely, you know?"

I did. Oh, did I ever. "More than you know." I abruptly remembered why I'd shown up here unannounced in the first place. "Obito, Kakashi is actually the one who sent me here. He sounded worried about you."

Obito's face fell. "Oh."

"Obito, is something bothering you?" I asked anyway. So there was something. It must have been bad if Kakashi had called me out here, right?

"Just…" Obito fidgeted, twisting the hem of his shirt between his fingers.

"Obito?"

Obito gave me one last, searching look before reaching down to open one of his desk's side drawers. He pulled out a manila folder, with his name on it. "Here."

"What is this?" I didn't open the folder just yet. I was a little busy watching Obito's body language—it was the equivalent of a whole-body flinch.

"Just open it," Obito said quietly, not looking at me. Instead, he was tracing the edge of the team photo with the fingers of his transplanted arm.

I opened the file, sitting back against the desk by Obito's other elbow.

The first thing I noticed was that the first page belonged to a personnel file—specifically, Obito's Military Police performance review. The page had been highlighted, twice, to emphasize one segment of the profile.

_Potential security hazard._

"The hell is this?"

"It's part of an MP file. I, uh, probably shouldn't have taken it, but…" Obito mumbled something inaudible. "I wanted to know why the patrols were getting weird…"

"How so?" I asked, turning my attention to the next page.

Unusual Mangekyō Sharingan technique…

"Turn to page seven," Obito said softly, instead of answering.

Page seven, as it turned out, was a genealogical chart.

Aside from his parents—Megumi and Naoya Uchiha—there was a name that stood out in his family tree.
Tracing the ink lines with my finger, I followed the lines of descent from Madara on down—and diagonally, past the names of people I half-recognized from either old KIA reports or the Memorial Stone monument. My finger swerved to the left and kept on going, it was just on Obito's immediate family again.

Obito Uchiha was Madara's only remaining great-grandson.

Looking at the next few pages, I could see more of the picture behind that revelation. Madara hadn't married while in Konoha's good graces, but apparently there had been an illegitimate daughter who claimed relation upon reaching the village. While the Uchiha clan weren't quite certain if this was the case, there was enough of a physical resemblance to make the survivors of Madara's attempted purge very cautious. But she'd been clan-less and lost, and the clan head at the time had let her in.

That woman—Kaede Uchiha née Takagi—had married into the clan to make the name official, and in time there were several children. One, Megumi Uchiha, married Naoya Uchiha and their marriage eventually produced Obito. All of her siblings died childless.

It wasn't a guaranteed blood connection, but it didn't really matter. As long as the clan—as long as Obito—believed he was Madara's last remaining direct relative, then the downward spiral was in place.

"Have you talked to anyone about this?" I asked quietly, closing the file.

Almost absently, his left hand reached out and wrapped around mine. His right swept over his face, covering his eye. He was shaking. "N-No."

I dropped the file on the desk and slid off it, pulling Obito to the floor with me.

He'd gotten taller than me a while ago, but I let him nearly burrow into my side like Hayate used to—still did—with my arm over his shoulders. He had to hunch up more to do it, but he managed.

"Were you worried I was going to hate you for being related to that guy?" I wanted to know, at once in awe of terror-fueled thought processes and frustrated by them.

Obito nodded, though he still wasn't looking up at me.

"I'm not going to deny hating Madara Uchiha with every fiber of my being." Mainly because it'd be a lie and he'd spot that in a second. "But I don't hate you. I honestly don't think I could."

I'd thoroughly compartmentalized Tobi and Obito in my head for more or less that exact reason. I could pity Tobi as much as I thought he was a rampaging asshole, but Obito? Nope. Not capable of it. I wasn't even capable of killing him.

"I think that this is something that needs to be talked about, though." I squeezed Obito's shoulder. "Can you do that for me? Can you help me understand what's going on in here?" I swept my thumb across his face, slowly, and caught a teardrop on its way down. "Tell me what's going on, please."

"I…" He cleared his throat, "I didn't know…about this. Before."

When Madara had been keeping him in the basement? "Huh?"

"I mean," Obito shifted so he didn't have his arms around my waist anymore. His head ended up on my lap, facing away from me, and I instinctively pulled the kerchief off his head and ran my fingers through his hair. I'd apologize if it was unwelcome, but... "I mean when—when we were growing up."

"Does this have something to do with"—the fact that you were an orphan within a major clan and somehow left to grow up alone?—"being an orphan?"

"Kinda?" Obito gave a one-shouldered shrug. "I mean, I guess...if they knew I was related to Madara, no one would want to take me in."

Wow, I could practically feel my opinion of the Uchiha clan plummet. It was Naruto all over again.

Still, it was my job to see the bright side here, wasn't it? I didn't know if Obito would appreciate me playing devil's advocate here, but...well, I had to try. I'd gotten pretty far by forcing myself to assume that people were basically good and could be reasoned with. Even the ones that were the size of buildings and could spit city-destroying energy bombs.

(And yet Danzō, Orochimaru, and Madara had earned full "worthless dickbag" ratings from me despite that. Hey, I wasn't perfect. Or Naruto.)

"Well, that was stupid of them." Natural 1 on my diplomacy roll. Big whoop. "If they thought you were going to follow in his footsteps, then they should have done their best to make you really a part of the family. Not just provide money on odd weeks."

Obito sighed. "Yeah."

"What else?" I asked, as he rolled over so he could look up at the ceiling. I could finally see his face, too. "I thought you went back to the clan because things were better."

"They weren't. I mean, I hoped..." Obito shook his head. When he stopped, he was looking up at the ceiling. I could see his face twisting up along his whorl scars, and his chakra flickered in agitation. "I really felt like I could go back to the old me. But I wasn't the same and...and it felt like they hadn't changed. So I had to change again, to fit them."

I tried to imagine it.

Obito, upon returning from that hole in the ground, had been a skinny kid with half his face scarred and half his body replaced by a Zetsu's, only one eye, and a truckload of issues. He'd been stuck underground with only a hateful old man and his retinue of Zetsu servants for company, hearing a constant stream of nihilistic bullshit from the master himself. The master who was, in all likelihood, his maternal great-grandfather and had absolutely no qualms about trying to pull Obito apart and mold his mind into something else entirely. And if he could pull it off without Obito realizing that what he was doing was manipulation of the highest order, so much the better.

I didn't know if Obito had ever trusted Madara, but the revelation about the seals, Zetsu, Isobu, and Rin would have destroyed it. And while he trusted us—people who, several months before, had left him to die—he couldn't trust the only human being he'd interacted with for half a year. In fact, the creepy old man had turned out to be an even bigger creep than previously imagined.

And then, once he'd come back to Konoha, he almost immediately tried to reintegrate with a clan that had, for reasons unknown to him, never really accepted him in the first place. They'd likely never believed the official line of bullshit Sensei fed them—not when Fugaku knew most of the story.

So Obito, still reeling from social isolation and psychological conditioning, had gone back to a clan that wasn't prepared to offer any kind of help. He'd thrown himself into it, trying to become a model Uchiha by joining the MPs. He had the combat skill required—oh, did he ever—but not the mindset.
Little things marked him as "outsider," long before he'd known they'd been there.

I continued to card my fingers through his hair.

"I tried. But...but I couldn't understand why nothing seemed to be getting better," Obito murmured. "After you let everyone know you were Isobu's host, they started doubling up my patrols. It used to be just me and one officer, but then there were three of them. And I always felt like I was being watched..."

Which, in a clan that had so many kekkei genkai active, was probably very close to hellish.

"I didn't know what I was doing wrong," he said, his voice twisted in despair. "So...so I used Kamui to break into the office, this morning. I shouldn't have, I know, but..." He'd needed to know, but hadn't even known what questions to ask. "I didn't know what to do."

Well, if he'd trusted Fugaku worth a damn, he could have asked.

But that was the trouble, wasn't it? Trust was a two-way street, and it was one we'd both walked many times. Obito didn't trust his clan because they didn't trust him. Rin had. I had. Sensei and Kakashi had, too, and as a result he'd thrown everything about himself into our bonds. The clan had been an afterthought at best.

"I think I need help," Obito mumbled, finally looking at me. "Please?"

"Of course I'll help," I said, and put my hand on his forehead. "All you ever had to do was ask."

Obito put his hand on top of mine. "Thanks, Kei."

And that was when Hayate came back in through the apartment's door. He'd actually been sitting outside of it for at least five minutes, but took the sudden calm silence as a cue. He took one look at the two of us sitting on the floor—well, I was sitting—and said, "Should I come back later?"

I rolled my eyes. "No, Hayate. Did you get food?"

"I got some melonpan," Hayate said, holding up a bag, before inverting it. Only crumbs fell out, at which point he added, "But you were taking so long talking that I ate them."

Well, I suppose that was par for the course. I should have made sure he had breakfast before we left the house.

Hayate walked over to us and, without so much as a how-you-do, flopped down on the floor on my other side, also resting his head on my lap. Just on the opposite side Obito was.

He was asking for a noogie.

"Are you two dating now?" he asked.

Obito sputtered.

"Pretty sure I'm just more comfortable than furniture. But hey, maybe it's a family trait." I leaned forward and put my elbow on my brother's forehead, putting my weight on it and making him thrash. He got out from the "hold" in a scant second, but he scrambled across the room to get out of my range anyway.

Obito sat up and started laughing.
Hayate glared reproachfully at me. "That hurt."

"And you asked for it." I looked at Obito again, who'd finally calmed down. "So, feeling better?"

"Me? Yeah, I think?" Obito scratched his head. "Though I still don't really know what we should do. Or what I should do, I guess."

"I'd say talk to Sensei first." At Obito's surprised look, I said, "Hey, if Kakashi thought someone needed to check on you, it means you weren't talking to Sensei. Which he confirmed, by the way. But seriously, he's like your legal guardian, too."

"I'm still not calling him 'Dad,' though," Hayate said. He wrinkled his nose. "That'd be weird. The Hokage's not my dad."

"Especially since the clan doesn't seem to be doing its job," I concluded, as though Hayate hadn't said anything.

"…Okay. I can do that." Obito winced. "I think."

"Do you have a patrol shift today?" I asked.

"No, I…" He sighed. "Fugaku-sama put me on leave after the thing this morning. I've just been cleaning up after it, since."

"Well, then we can get you lunch and we can talk to Sensei and Fugaku-sama? Maybe getting all of this out in the air will help," I suggested.

Obito still didn't look too happy with the idea, but I was a little mollified at the thought that Fugaku had pulled him off the roster for however long. I would have liked to hear his reasoning for it, or at least heard that Obito had heard the reason behind it. Sure, Obito probably needed help and Fugaku may or may not have known that ahead of time, but what Obito needed was to be assured that his treatment wasn't entirely arbitrary. You couldn't trust that.

We needed to sort everything out as quickly as possible to keep bad blood from settling in.

"I'll meet you over at the Hokage's office in fifteen minutes, all right?" Obito got to his feet, looking a little embarrassed. "I need to get dressed."

"If you're not there by then, I'm going to drag you there," I warned him as I got up, crossing my arms and setting my jaw into a stubborn jut.

"I know. Thanks."

Hayate looked between us like we were speaking a foreign language. "I have no idea why you need to go see the Hokage, but…can we get lunch first?"

"You ate our lunches, Hayate," I said.

"You were busy and I was hungry! And I still am!"

I sighed and gave up. "All right, all right. See, this is why I didn't give you my real wallet."

"What?!"

Obito ended up having to throw us out. Otherwise, we'd have argued on the threshold of his apartment all day and never gotten anywhere.
Obito's talk with Sensei ended up taking the better part of an hour, even with my attempts to help the explanations. Eventually, I had to leave with Hayate—some stuff was too heavy and too personal for us to be involved—but I was later told that it had worked out. I wasn't actually sure what that meant at the time, but Obito was later able to clarify it for me.

We were on the roof of the Academy, looking down over the edge of the building and waiting for the fun to start. Obito wasn't wearing his MP uniform variant, and I pretended that my Konoha uniform included a katana strapped to my back even though we weren't heading out on a mission.

Still waiting on that explanation. I gave Obito a long look.

"It…It turns out that Fugaku-sama didn't realize what was happening," Obito said, sheepish. "I mean, he knew I wasn't doing my best, but he didn't realize how bad I was doing"— he tapped the side of his head—"up here. The extra guys on patrol were for a psych evaluation, but nobody told me."

That would defeat the point of an evaluation. People didn't behave the same way when they knew they were being observed, or so the stories went. I didn't say as much, but Obito got the vibe from me anyway.

"So I…kind of panicked," Obito went on, quieter. "Fugaku-sama was pissed that I grabbed the records, but he was also kinda surprised I could pull it off. Once he realized it was a Mangekyō Sharingan power, though, he was pissed off all over again."

"Why?" I asked.

"He was worried it meant I was…what was the word he used…uh, reeling? From October. And I was, because I was avoiding everything and just playing around with my new power once it stopped…well, once it felt less awful." Obito shrugged self-consciously, "And he didn't notice, so he was mad at himself for not noticing and at everyone else for just letting me go back onto the roster without double-checking his orders."

"I think a lot of people are finding out about that kind of stuff now," I said, wincing. New Year's had not really been the best time this year. "I mean, I didn't…"

"I was trying really hard to make sure you didn't find out," Obito replied, looking at the ground. "I mean, you had a lot to worry about and so did Sensei and everyone…"

"But not Kakashi, apparently." Even as I said it, I knew it was a self-reprimand more than anything.
How had I not noticed? That was easy. I was too wrapped up in my own problems to give anyone else the time of day if they weren't bleeding on the carpet in front of me.

Kakashi was in ANBU, for fuck's sake. If he could make time to pick up on things like that…

"So what happens now?" I asked him, shaking myself out of my funk.

Obito sighed. "Well, I'm not on the patrol roster anymore. Psychiatric leave, like yesterday. And I guess Fugaku-sama wanted me to see a Yamanaka. But I don't know if I'm going to be able to continue as an MP."

"I didn't realize it was that bad."

"It's…Fugaku-sama said that the clan hadn't deserved my trust." Obito shook his head. "So they didn't deserve my strength. Fugaku-sama says I can come back to the MP thing if I want, but that he
"That's…that's pretty big of him." Which was likely not the right term. Fugaku shouldn't have been turning the clan over for Obito's sake, at least from what I knew about both Obito and the head of the Uchiha clan, but maybe I was reading into things the wrong way. "So what are you going to do now?"

Obito's stomach rumbled. "Right now I'm thinking about lunch, and how I can't get it until Hayate officially graduates."

I kicked him in the ankle. Sure, we might have been fifteen meters above the courtyard where every other extended family member of every other student was gathering, but still. It was the principle of the thing.

"Ow!"

I paused. "That actually hurt?"

"Fugaku-sama made me promise not to use my Mangekyō so much," Obito muttered, rubbing his ankle. "He said I might lose my eyesight. And I've only got one eye, so…"

"Point." I looked down at the crowd again. Luckily, the crowd was focused on the Academy doors and not the two special jōnin goofing off on the roof.

I felt a flash of lightning chakra almost before the—"Yo," said Kakashi's voice from behind us.

Obito jumped. I didn't.

"Thanks for showing up," I said, turning to greet him.

He wasn't in his ANBU uniform. Instead, he was wearing jōnin blues like Obito and I were, though he'd opted for bandages to cover his calves where I used mesh. He was also wearing the metal-backed ANBU gloves. If I could forget the fact that he wasn't quite at his full adult height and that the visible parts of his face had no stress lines, I could have mistaken him for his older counterpart.

He shrugged. "I have a few minutes to spare."

"Do you know if Rin-chan is going to make it here?" Obito asked him.

Kakashi shrugged again.

I was looking over the edge of the building, to where I could feel Sensei standing just inside the Academy doors. "She's got fifteen seconds."

Rin ended up missing the parade of kids that streamed out of the Academy as soon as Sensei threw the doors open. She'd make it up to Hayate somehow, so I didn't worry.

For my part, I hopped off the edge of the roof, pinging my brother's chakra signature.

He pinged back, his chakra riding high with joy that only increased as I wove through the crowd and snatched him up into a bear hug. Obito zoomed along in my wake, followed by Kakashi (at a more sedate pace).

"I did it, Sis!" he cheered, even as I lifted him into the air.
"I knew you could!" I told him, finally setting him down again and bringing my hand down on his head to ruffle his hair—only to find a bandanna-style headband in my way. "Copycat!"

"You lost like three of these, so it doesn't count!" Hayate replied, still grinning. He twisted around in my grip so he could see Obito. "Hey, I did it!"

"You did!" Obito said with a matching grin. "I said you were gonna be a great ninja!"

"I am going to be the greatest ninja!" Hayate bickered cheerfully with him.

I still felt a pang. If only Mom had lived to see this moment…

While my brother and my best friend embarking on their epic scuffle, Kakashi sidled through the crowd until he was next to me and said, "Kanjutsu, too?"

"Yep." Damned if I was going to be able to train him on it, though. Hayate may have figured out a weird sensing technique and he did have potential as a possible kenjutsu master, but I didn't know if his jōnin-sensei would be able to make sure he kept making progress.

"Any idea who's going to be on his team?" Kakashi asked.

Yūgao and Iruka, possibly? "I have half an idea, but I didn't get a look at Sensei's notes or anything."

Despite my best efforts. "As long as it's not as bad as when Rin was a genin, it should be fine."

"Rin?" Kakashi blinked.

"Rin's genin team failed and got sent to the Genin Corps," I told him. "Yamaguchi-sensei pulled her out again and made her his apprentice."

"Ah," was what Kakashi said, as though trying to put that information into context with what he knew about the only real medic-nin we knew. Then, "You're going to train him."

That did not sound like a question. "When he's home? Yes. But there are these things called missions that kinda get in the way."

"Then if you can't handle it, I can," Kakashi said flatly.

…Eh?

I pointed at him, then poked him in the shoulder. "You. Kakashi Hatake. You are offering to help train my brother."

Kakashi rolled his visible eye. "As if that's such a difficult concept to grasp."

"I'll let you train with him right after I throttle you," I said in a tone that matched his.

"I hope my students aren't about to murder each other in public," Sensei's voice said from apparently nowhere, neatly puncturing our argument. His tone was cheerful, but the hand that landed on my head said, "Behave" entirely nonverbally.

"No, Hokage-sama," Kakashi said.

"Good. Kei?" Sensei prodded.

"I wasn't going to do anything," I said. I didn't know if I was lying, so he wouldn't be able to tell.
"Good." And then Sensei drifted away, his cloak flapping out behind him. I guess he was still on kid-congratulating duty?

Kakashi sighed.

"Look, I'll ask if he can take up that offer once he has a team, all right?" I suggested.

"Fine," Kakashi said, and took off.

I stared at where he'd been for a little longer before shaking my head and going back to my brother and Obito. They'd headed in the direction of Iruka's parents as my conversation with Kakashi had gone on, so I raced to catch up.

Team assignments in the morning, huh?

Well, then I'd panic then.

By noon two days later, I had good news: My brother was on a team with Iruka Umino and Yūgao Uzuki. Their sensei was Inoichi Yamanaka, which struck me as suspiciously apropos given that Hayate probably needed a therapist. Regardless, he was a solid shinobi, and I didn't have any doubts that he'd get them through hell or high water just fine.

By the tenth, Hayate and his team were on their first of what would turn out to be a seemingly endless parade of D-ranks.

By the fourteenth, Hayate was thoroughly sick of D-ranks and Obito was finally talking to a Yamanaka mediator to help him reconcile with his clan.

By the twentieth, one more assassination attempt had been stopped dead, this time solely by Raidō. At least that one had been Iwa, since we'd honestly been waiting for their salutations for a while.

By the twenty-eighth, Konoha was officially back to what amounted to full strength. Missions were being run, I was getting more time off as the old members of the Hokage Guard entered the rotation properly, and Tsunade was officially named secondary godmother to Naruto (after Mikoto). Jiraiya got to be the godfather regardless.

By early February, I also had bad news: Sensei had absolutely no fucking idea where Kakashi had gone for about three full days. He hadn't reported in to ANBU, or even stopped by Sensei's house to crash. His account in the village coffers was untapped, and no one could apparently remember seeing him anywhere.

It was like he was just gone.

"Kei?" Sensei had asked, cautious in the face of my uncharacteristic silence at the news.

I was pretty sure he could feel the steady tendrils of Isobu's chakra leaking into my coils. A muscle in my jaw started to twitch. To keep my teeth from grinding, I spat a word. A name. Someone who could pluck my teammate out of the villages without somebody noticing. Someone who had been harassing us all for months. "Danzō."

Sensei's eyes narrowed. He'd probably suspected as much. "I can have that investigation on my desk in two minutes."

I needed to find Kakashi. But I forced Isobu's chakra back. I needed to find him without letting... everyone know I was looking. That meant going through Sensei's political ties and through ANBU and hoping that someone knew an answer somewhere. Kakashi hadn't disappeared without a trace. That wasn't something he did.

But where in hell was he?

Other than the terrifying possibility that the answer was exactly that.

Kakashi

8:46 am, February 5th

“Wolf…I’m sorry.”

The thing about attempting murder is this: It’s going to stay an attempt if you’re stupid enough to give your target any warning whatsoever.

Between Kinoe’s voice, the faint smell of his Wood Release growing from the walls, and the strange play of shadows on the cavern walls, everything gives him away.

I whirl on the spot and duck under the blockiest Wood Release jutsu I’ve seen from him yet.

Wood is Water and Earth combined, so that means as long as we’re underground he has the advantage if he tries to box me in. If I use any lightning, he has the combined form of his kekkei genkai to play with, and I won’t be able to leverage all my advantages fast enough.

I spare him a glare with both eyes—Obito’s Sharingan is pretty effective that way—before planting my spiked sandals in the dirt and using Body Flicker to get the hell out of there.

From observing Kinoe, I know enough to read the differences between Obito’s and his styles of using Wood Release.

Kinoe’s use of the kekkei genkai is thoughtful, steady, and square. His primary attacking forms try to catch and constrict rather than to just rip holes straight through the nearest target like Obito’s version. The wood itself is tougher, but correspondingly that much harder to use in a fight. It’s slow and cautious in a way that combat jutsu don’t need to be, and I’m almost irritated by the contrast.

Well, if you want to catch me, Kinoe, you’re going to have to be better than that.

A mud ball shoots out of the tunnel in my wake, splatting on the ground. It’s followed by a blur of greenery as Kinoe catches up to the impact site and uses his bloodline to draw fully-formed planks of wood from the mud he just used against me.

One lightning kunai rips through them like pruning shears.

My eyes narrow. That was a little too easy.

Well, if he keeps this up, maybe Kinoe will find out what it’s like to be backstabbed first.

A tree branch shoots through the air as though shot from a bow, impaling a rock that had been behind me. I’m just a little faster than that, though, and I don’t plan to share its fate.

“Hold still, Wolf!” Kinoe says, his voice rising. “Please! I don’t want to hurt you.”

I can almost believe that. He may not want to, but that doesn’t mean he won’t. Whether of his own free will, or on orders I can believe the Councilman might have given, Kinoe doesn’t like causing unnecessary pain.

He’s still ANBU. Still ROOT.

We know a thing or two about necessary evils.

Another twang and a narrow strip of wood shoots past my face like an arrow, again.

Well, great. Now he’s discovered something he thinks might work.

I duck and dodge through the rock-strewn landscape, heading away from the forest that borders one side of this bare expanse. I hate it when my enemies have too many weapons available. Reaching a forest—or worse, a river—is going to give him far too many ways to fulfill his mission objectives.

“Kinoe, your mission is a failure,” I tell him flatly, as another twisting column of wood tries to engulf my left leg. A quick blast of lightning shuts that attempt down cold.

“I still have my orders,” Kinoe responds, apparently unaware that no matter how much genjutsu he knows, I can still see him shuffling around in it.

For a massive chakra sink, Obito’s Sharingan is paying dividends now.

I sidestep another burst of the oddly slow Wood Release whatever-this-is, to Kinoe’s almost tangible surprise. Yes, I can see you. No, I don’t care one bit about whether you’ve realized that or not.

“Kinoe, I don’t actually want to hurt you either,” I say quietly, as though it’s an apology and not just a statement of intent. Kinoe has potential, assuming I can pry him out of his current mindset. He might be a decent ANBU agent someday. Perhaps a great one.

But he can still do it without killing me.

“Then please stop fighting!” Kinoe shouts, as though stealth goes out the window just because the fight is getting loud anyway.

…I maybe he really doesn’t want kill me.

Well, then this is getting exactly nowhere. The only reason we’re doing this pointless song and dance is because Kinoe is eleven, is an escaped Orochimaru test subject, and he doesn’t know any better. This is a job for Sensei or someone who actually knows how to rehabilitate kids pushed into situations like this. Maybe a Yamanaka. I’m pretty sure Obito’s finally seeing one.

As Kinoe launches yet another Wood Release arm at me, I deliberately fail to dodge it in time and let it wrap around me like a wooden cage growing out of thin air.

I put my hand on the hilt of my ANBU regulation katana and draw it. Kinoe’s is still sheathed.

Too bad for him. Now, how did Kei do this…ah! There we go.

Lightning races up the blade as I channel chakra into it in a way that I’ve only copied once, and even that had been a partial match. Kei’s habit of not using hand seals is irritating that way. Hopefully, she’ll be willing to put herself through more experiments so I can figure out how to do this without preparation. In the meantime, this will do.

Kinoe’s eyes widen. The Wood Release projection splits, trying to weave around my arm and cut off the chakra to the blade. What does he think I’m going to do with this, cut my way loose?

…I could, but it would be a waste of a good setup.

“Sorry about this, Kinoe.” I slam my chakra into the blade. Lightning flashes, crackles, and burns too brightly to stare at even with the Sharingan filtering out some of the chakra to read the “jutsu” I’d barely practiced.

Kinoe realizes what I am about to do several seconds after the lightning jumps from my katana, races down the Wood Release cage in pursuit of something special, and arcs into the blade on his back. By that time he’s already on the ground and too stunned to move.

Thousands of volts to the spine tend to do that. It might have been kinder to just knock him out cold instead, but since he’s not unconscious I’m just going to have to correct that.

“Lightning Release: Stunning Flash,” I say, stepping out of the would-be cage of thorns and splinters. I sheathe my sparking katana, drawing the lightning off and grounding it back in myself. “Or Arcing Bolt. Haven’t thought of a name for this version yet.”

Kinoe is still shaking. “T-Th—”

“Don’t let future victims handle your equipment, Kinoe.” I roll him over and remove his ANBU mask. I don’t want him to close his eyes before I can push the command through. I look down at him and concentrate with Obito’s eye. “Night.”

Kinoe falls asleep between one blink and the next. I pick him up and sling him over my left shoulder. Even if he did try to kill me on orders, I’d still prefer to drag him home. Maybe the Hokage would be able to figure out what to do to deprogram the village’s only non-transplant Wood Release user.

And maybe he could learn not to hate me.

I almost hope he learns his lesson from this. Though I’m not quite sure what that lesson will be.

The wind shifts.

The funny thing about being in a canyon is that visibility is fairly close to “abysmal” if there’s no Hyūga on the team, and that other senses can be baffled by the wind if it’s not feeling cooperative. Rocks further reduce the amount of viable space, and it’s all too easy to be cornered. That was half the point—Kinoe led us here because he wanted it to be difficult for me to get out alive.

There are twenty men heading in my direction.

…Fuck my life.

Run, or fight? Probably both, given the rate the wind’s moving and calculating out how strong their scents are. They don’t smell like they’re from Konoha. North? The diet’s different…

“You,” I tell the unconscious Kinoe, “are a jinx.”

I draw my katana.
Kei

12:37 pm, February 5th

I did a pretty good impression of an improperly beheaded chicken for about a minute after the news came in.

I mean, I wasn’t running around in obvious disarray, gushing blood everywhere from my neck stump. That’d be too literal.

But my thoughts definitely went in circles.

Kakashi wasn’t supposed to be on a mission, ANBU or otherwise, as far as Sensei knew. ANBU operatives could get assigned missions in their “civilian” guises, but Kakashi hadn’t gotten one of those or any special assignments from Sensei.

And I didn’t know the first thing about how to help.

Sensei let me pace around in agitated silence while he fussed around the office, trying to figure out what he’d missed for some bureaucracy-related reason or another. He put a lot of effort into seeming omniscient, but the fact remained that it was impossible for him to know everything that was happening in Konoha at all times.

An ANBU agent appeared halfway through one of my circuits of the office, appearing from the ceiling somehow. I didn’t really know how they did it—this guy was too big to fit in the vents—but hey, what did I know? I wasn’t black ops.

“Hokage-sama, your report,” said the owl-masked agent, dropping the manila folder on his desk.

“Thank you, Owl. Send Falcon in,” Sensei replied, and I blinked when I heard Raidō’s ANBU name.

“That will not be possible, Hokage-sama,” Owl reported. “Falcon left the village earlier this week.”

Sensei muttered something under his breath. “I’ll assume the details are in this file?”

“Yes,” Owl said.

“Very well. Dismissed,” Sensei barked, and Owl vanished out the window.

I felt the electric hum as Sensei activated the security seals again. If I looked closely enough, I could almost see the faint glow of active anti-eavesdropping measures in the walls. And ceiling and floor.

Sensei flipped the file open and started reading.

I didn’t volunteer to help. It was an ANBU file. If Sensei wanted or needed my input, he’d ask.

After a while, Sensei glanced up and said, “You don’t have to wear a hole in the floor, Kei. You can go home. Nothing’s going to change in the next hour.”

That was the part that was driving me crazy.

I made a muffled noise inside my throat and sat down on the office’s couch, trying not to lose patience.

Or hope.
What are you worrying over now? Isobu’s voice asked from the depths of my mindscape.

He’d gotten more comfortable in time, over the past few months. We’d knocked the glacier and the psychiatrist’s office over and put in a white-sand beach, since why the hell not. He could lounge in or around it without any fear of unexpected callers, except maybe the two Kuramas.

It mostly meant that he caught up on his beauty sleep or something. Apparently, having me for a host was not the most relaxing gig.

I could kinda see his point, now. Distantly, because I was in the middle of a quiet freak-out.

The boy is fine. Isobu said in a flat tone. And if he isn’t, then there isn’t anything you can do about it.

We could— I was about to suggest something stupid, then stopped. I sighed. Never mind.

If we could find him, then locate him without being stopped by the man in front of us or someone else, it still wouldn’t mean he has to be alive for us to find. Isobu told me.

And he was right. Ugh.

I sat with my legs crisscrossed on the couch and tried to meditate instead.

I’d never been too good at traditional meditation. Even with the worry beads I’d gotten for my last birthday. I just tended to play with them. I liked running through katas for the same reason I paced like a woman on a mission—I needed to keep my body occupied or my mind would go off on epic tangents.

If I could just relax—if I had something productive to do—I could just go do that instead. But one thing required another, and I needed a distraction I didn’t have.

Sensei threw something at my head.

I caught it without looking, then glanced up at him with a disbelieving expression once I realized what it was.

“Edit that,” Sensei said, not looking up from the file. “It’ll keep your mind occupied, if nothing else.”

Sure, it didn’t have an orange cover, but I definitely recognized the signature on the roughly-bound book. It looked like a first printing—or a hand-bound manuscript—but there was no mistaking Jiraiya’s handiwork. Or the little “18+” on the corner of the cover.

Briefly, I wondered if Kushina had told him that I’d been an adult in my other life.

If not…well, I was pretty sure Kakashi had gotten his hands on these things somehow before he was of age. It probably couldn’t be that bad.

“Where did you even get this?” I wondered aloud, as I read the first page.

“Jiraiya-sensei wanted me to help him polish it for editors, but I don’t have the time,” Sensei replied distractedly.

The book was already dog-eared thanks to what I assumed was Sensei’s first read, with the makeshift spine cracked in a dozen places. He’d also taken to writing very compact notes in the margins, telling Jiraiya what things he’d liked or disliked. If this was just a manuscript, then I supposed he had every right. That was why Jiraiya had given it to him, right?

Though after page four it turned into Kushina’s handwriting.

Kushina had even gone as far as to cross one character’s introduction out entirely, saying that if Jiraiya could waste five lines talking about breasts then he could damn well describe the whole person for just as long.

I didn’t think I’d be able to finish the text if it was that creative…

Well, regardless of my impressions of the text, its writer, or its editors, it kept my mind occupied. As long as I was trying to figure out exactly what euphemism Jiraiya had accidentally botched on page forty, I didn’t worry about Kakashi.

Funny as it was, the existence of this book, here and now, made me think that of course Kakashi would come back. He hadn’t read it yet, after all.

I’d made a couple of minor additions myself—just in the corners, mentioning that the dialogue felt stilted in one place or another—by the time I realized that my heartbeat had slowed to normal and that I was actually calm again.

I was still worried, but it wasn’t an all-encompassing anxious state. Not the kind that annoyed Isobu and made me hell to be around. I was just…I don’t know, waiting.

I felt the flash of a familiar chakra signature—actually, two, accompanied by a third—before there was a knock on the door.

“Yes?” Sensei asked automatically, still not looking up from the file. The line between his eyebrows was becoming more annoyed the longer I watched him. Cautiously, mind, but…

“Open up, Minato. You’ve got a visitor,” said Jiraiya’s voice.

Sensei snapped his fingers and the security seals deactivated.

The door opened.

Jiraiya came in first, giving me a long look once he spotted me on the couch. Then he looked at Minato, who had finally decided to give his back a rest and sit up straight. Then Jiraiya did a double-take when he saw what I had in my hands, before shaking his head.

Behind Jiraiya, to my mild surprise, was Shikaku Nara. I hadn’t expected to see the new Jōnin Commander this morning, but I supposed that it made sense. Even if I didn’t remember Sensei specifically asking for him, it was a good idea to get him involved in any investigation with ROOT.

And the third person was a small woman with a white headress and glasses with angular frames, dressed in a modest black kimono. She had blonde hair, of a significantly more subtle shade than Sensei’s violently electric yellow, and gray-green eyes without visible pupils. I probably wouldn’t have recognized her if not for headdress—which I recognized belatedly as something like a nun’s. Or because of the barely-detectable seal in her mouth.

Nonō Yakushi, the only known ROOT retiree, had just walked into Sensei’s office.

I could immediately feel my figurative hackles come up.

“Here to take me up on that offer, Yakushi-san?” Sensei asked in a mild tone.
Nonō bowed deeply. “Yes, Hokage-sama. I would like”—she dug the fingers of her right hands under her jaw, shaking—“this removed. As soon as possible.”

“Did something change?” Sensei asked, his eyes narrowing.

She nodded.

Sensei stood up, crossing the room to meet her. “Very well then. Jiraiya-sensei?”

“The room’s ready.”

Sensei turned back to Shikaku, saying, “You’re in charge, Shikaku. At least until I get back.”

When I got up to leave—whether to follow or not, I wasn’t sure—Sensei ordered, “Keisuke, stay here.”

I blinked, freezing in place at his tone. “Hokage-sama?”

“I take back what I said about dismissing you for the day. Stay with Shikaku and come up with groundwork. Use the file on my desk.” Sensei didn’t smile. His focus was a million miles away, or perhaps with his wayward student.

I knew mine was.

I inclined my head. “…And Obito?” His and Kakashi’s halves of the Sharingan pair had some strange properties, didn’t they? There was something about sensory feedback, both ways…

Sensei paused. “If he comes here, tell him what’s going on. I’ll be back shortly.”

“By your command, Hokage-sama,” I said, bowing.

Sensei may or may not have given me a funny look before leaving. I didn't check.

I sat back down on the couch as the door closed, focusing on the book again. Hopefully, we’d get news one way or another on a lot of issues. In the meantime, I could slowly, carefully suppress the urge I’d had since I got the news, which was to go out and mangle whoever was keeping my teammate from coming home.

It’d be a pity to unleash screaming hell without knowing where to aim it. (1)

Kakashi

9:56 am, February 5th

Well, I think, as Falcon hits the ground behind me before rolling back up again, this is not what I thought I’d be doing this morning.

“Wolf, are you all right?” Falcon asks, drawing his black katana as he looks around at the bodies littering canyon.

It’s a bit of a mess.

The team at his back—Crow, Horse, and Rat—spreads out to secure the area, while I turn to face him properly and take a careful look at the damage.
Earth Release spikes have spread everywhere, barely missing the various former combatants. The walls themselves are probably only being held up by the Wood Release misfires, scorched as they are, and I eye them dubiously. There’s blood all over the place, but none of it is mine even if I do have a disturbing splatter on me from multiple close-combat opponents who underestimated either my endurance, or skill, or both.

I think the scene of the fight, such that it is, looks a little more time-compressed than it should. There were at least two fights, after all.

“I’m fine,” I tell Falcon, pulling a cracked porcelain shard from my belt. “But my mask didn’t make it.” It’s in about fifteen pieces, actually, but it kept me from getting my head cracked open. I want to keep a bit of it to commemorate the only sacrifice it could make.

“Was that”—Falcon indicates the mask—“because of him?”

The tiniest ANBU on record—at least according to the mission file I got—in the entire organization is hog-tied on the ground, out cold. I suppose I’m not being subtle.

“No, that was the mission,” I say, heading over to where the ANBU agent Kinoe is still sawing logs. I sit back on my heels next to him, check to make sure he’s still unconscious, and then pry his mouth open. While Falcon seems confused, he doesn’t stop me as I figure out whether Kinoe’s got a…yep. That’s a ROOT tattoo.

“Falcon, look at this,” says Horse, from across the cavern.

Falcon goes to see what Horse found out, while I pick Kinoe up and follow.

“…Okay, that’s a new one on me,” says Crow, scratching the base of his long black ponytail.

“Musical notes. Really?”

“Keep the commentary to a minimum, Crow.” Rat pulls the foreign hitai-ate loose from its mount and pockets it. “Wolf?”

“They claimed be representatives of Otogakure,” I tell them, shaking my head. Reflexively, I close the Sharingan and cover it with my free hand. “They were after the lab, but decided to come after us. Got it out of that one.” I wave a hand vaguely, indicating an Oto-nin corpse that was covered in bite marks.

Akino didn’t like how he smelled. Neither did I, which is why the guy’s throat is halfway across the cavern.

“…I want to ask if you’re kidding, but of course you’re not,” Falcon says, shaking his head. “Why?”

“Kinoe can use Wood Release. And my eye is a bit obvious,” I tell Falcon, who winces. Rat, Horse, and Crow go very still. “It makes sense.”

I don’t actually know for sure if Kinoe is involved in any of Otogakure’s bloodline theft ambitions. It really doesn’t matter if he does—I’ve heard the rumors surrounding Kinoe’s Wood Release, which are the reason that there are any expectations about Obito’s use of the bloodline. Obito’s is obviously a transplant, and he couldn’t keep a secret to save his life, so the Hokage had let his powers go unremarked-upon, officially.

Unofficially, the councilman is probably very concerned that the Uchiha clan has a powerful bloodline out of nowhere, and may be reaching beyond his borders to see if he can’t get a similar upgrade.
But this is all speculation.

All I know for certain is that Kinoe tried to kill me and (probably) take my Sharingan an hour ago. After that, I spent fifty-five minutes dodging, ducking, and killing Oto-nin while lugging an unconscious, possibly-traitorous teammate around.

And then Falcon’s team showed up.

“And this is why they pay him more, and why I don’t want a raise,” Crow says to Horse, as an aside. “Too many bizarre secrets.”

I sigh internally. Without witnesses, ANBU can be shockingly unprofessional.

“Crow, rig up a corpse scroll while you’re talking,” Falcon snaps, finally losing patience. He turns his attention back to me. “Any injuries?”

“No,” I reply. “Just mild chakra exhaustion.”

Honestly, fighting Kinoe took the bulk of my energy. Not because I was using particularly powerful jutsu, for once. Obito’s Sharingan did most of the damage. After that, the Oto-nin were relatively easy to cut down to size. Even if I was carrying Kinoe at the time and fighting with just one hand and a barrage of kicks.

I guess there was something to Kei’s sword-dependent style after all. Now I just have to figure out how to use the full Chidori with only one hand…

Falcon nods. “Then we’ll be heading back immediately.” Falcon tilts his head to one side, thinks about something else but declines to share, and shrugs. “Horse, carry the kid. He’s going straight to the holding cells.”

I hand Kinoe over to the only female agent of this team, who slings him over her shoulders. He’s going to have one hell of a bruise on his stomach by the time he wakes up. I almost feel guilty about that, but then I remember that he tried to kill me an hour ago and the conflicted feeling comes back.

Kinoe is tiny. He’s a wide-eyed brat, with confidence in his abilities but not the conviction to use them to their fullest extent against someone who showed him one iota of kindness. There’s a bit about him that reminds me of Obito from last month—fragile and desperate underneath the armor of “I can kill a man with my pinky” levels of skill.

I’m sure Kei would have something caustic to say right now, but I’m too tired to bother.

It’s a generic, unpainted thing—probably some kind of rodent, given that it’s Rat, but I accept and put it over my face.

Crow stuffs three Oto-nin corpses into his storage scroll before wrapping the whole thing up. He slips it into his kunai holster. “Ready.”

“One of my dogs should be halfway to the village by now,” I tell Falcon, as Rat starts planting explosive seals all over the canyon to trigger a rockslide.

“How many did you send?” Falcon asks. Falcon, of all people on this team, should know exactly how many dogs I have and which ones I’d use for a message, so I give him a look that says volumes about the stupidity of his statement. I’d only run missions with him fifteen times. In and outside of the village.

Falcon says nothing.

“One to your post, one to the village,” I say, after a while. Chakra exhaustion hasn’t caught up with me yet, but I can feel myself getting there and reflexively close Obito’s eye.

Falcon nods. “…Well, good enough. Team?”

“Ready,” Horse and Rat report.

Crow shrugs.

And we’re off.

Kei

2:22 pm, February 5th

The silence in the office was stifling.

I finished reading the rough draft of what would be Jiraiya’s bestselling series, then read it again with a narrower mind and more severe editing pen. Maybe he’d appreciate it, maybe he wouldn’t. It was all right, I guess, but first drafts always sucked by definition. He was already ahead of the curve. He’d improve and then I assumed he’d put the books out with some regularity.

The thing was that once I was done reading, there wasn’t anything else to do other than talk to Shikaku. And I didn’t want to.

Shikaku was trustworthy almost by definition. Two different Hokage hat-owners had declared him the Jōnin Commander in two different realities. If both the Third and Sensei agreed that Shikaku deserved the post, I sure wasn’t going to argue.

Shikaku didn’t say or do anything too unusual, actually. He poked around the file on Sensei’s desk, like he was asked to, but he didn’t really do much in the way of asking me questions.

Simple stuff, really. Name, rank, hobbies, etc.

I wasn’t stupid enough to think that Shikaku wasn’t gathering intel on me as easily as I breathed, but…well, I think anyone would have been able to see my agitation and comment on it if they wanted to. Shikaku didn’t.

I almost picked up Jiraiya’s book for a third reading, wondering if I’d missed anything important, when Sensei teleported back into the room with yet another fwish.

I stood up immediately, and so did Shikaku.

“Hokage-sama,” Shikaku said, his expression cautious. In hindsight, I was a little surprised at how stark those twisted scars on his face were, even when he wasn’t really trying to pull a face. I generally didn’t make faces in the bathroom mirror, but I probably looked a bit like that, didn’t I?

“Shikaku, Kei,” Sensei nodded at both of us. He crossed the room, heading back for his desk as soon as Shikaku vacated it. He sat down in his chair, stretching his arms carefully over his desk, and then said, “Our ROOT retiree was remarkably helpful.”
“I’m surprised you didn’t have to leave her in Interrogation, Hokage-sama,” Shikaku said, glancing at the clock on the wall. “That was almost too easy.”

“I wouldn’t say that,” Sensei replied. “We had to remove her tongue.”

“…I’m gonna assume the angle was too awkward?” I guessed.

“Right. We had medics reattach it after Jiraiya-sensei and I removed the seal. She may have a slight lisp after this, but she could still write the answers to our questions. Yakushi-san should recover fully in a week.” Sensei’s eyes narrowed somewhat. “Though we have to keep her in a secure recovery ward in case ROOT tries to silence her.”

Shikaku frowned. “Any names?”

“We’ve confirmed that Danzō Shimura is still the head of ROOT,” Sensei replied, interlacing his fingers in front of his face. “He stopped by the orphanage Yakushi-san runs, escorted by two bodyguards. He was…disappointed that she’d accepted alternative funding.” Sensei glanced at me. “Thank you for that tip, by the way.”

“Of course, Hokage-sama,” I said, and I saw Shikaku raise his eyebrows at me.

“As I was saying,” Sensei went on before Shikaku could ask anything, “the councilman implied he would out Yakushi-san as former ROOT if she did not continue to bow to his demands—new recruits this time.”

My mouth twisted in disgust. “Bastard.”

Sensei nodded. “Yakushi-san decided she would give herself up first, unaware that you’d previously informed us about her. She was pleasantly surprised at the lack of judgment, I think. And my refusal to pull her funding. Even if she somehow died under the knife, her work will continue. Just without the councilman poking his nose into things.”

“You had your students investigate the councilman?” Shikaku looked like he wasn’t quite sure if he wanted to be appalled at Sensei’s lack of sense or just surprised that he’d been that underhanded.

“I don’t know if that’s the right term for what we were doing,” I said, “And anyway, I didn’t know Kakashi was tapped for that. I thought he was supposed to be looking into the Kiri-nin thing from January.”

“So did I,” Sensei muttered, frowning more severely than I’d seen in months.

…Crap. “Sensei, I did not want to hear that.” I managed to keep my voice level through sheer luck.

“Define ‘investigation’ for me,” Shikaku suggested. “Was he asked to infiltrate at any point?”

“That’s the problem. I can’t find any record that says as much, and I know I didn’t order him to go dark.”

The absence of evidence is not proof of absence. Just because Sensei couldn’t find a paper trail didn’t mean that Kakashi hadn’t gotten in over his head with Danzō. It just made it a hell of a lot harder to prove if Kakashi didn’t come back.

I was about to say something, though in hindsight I didn’t know what. Regardless, I was interrupted by familiar barking from outside the window. I jerked back to attention, wondering why I could hear anything from outside when the window was shut and the office was packed with security seals, and was almost immediately faced with the answer to that question.

Liver-toned Ūhei, the skinniest of Kakashi’s eight dogs, was balancing carefully on the window and pawing at the glass.

Sensei was up and out of his chair and letting that dog come inside the office so quickly that he might have used his signature jutsu.

Ūhei hopped inside the office and trotted over to my side, where he sat as though nothing at all had gone wrong. “Afternoon, Kei-chan!”

I’m not going to yell at the dog. I’m not gonna yell at the dog. I’m not— “Ūhei, where’s Kakashi?”

Ūhei lifted a leg and started scratching behind his ears. “The boss says… Kakashi says… ‘I’m sorry I’m late. I had some gardening to do.’ He said you’d understand what he meant, Kei-chan.”

…No fucking way.

Immediately, my brain launched into an association game.

Kakashi didn’t own any houseplants that I knew of, but I could immediately connect ‘gardening’ with ROOT because Konoha was also a plant metaphor if you squinted at it hard enough. ROOT got its name because they were the ones that ran in the dark to support the leaf-sigil-wearing remainder of the population.

But it had a double meaning, because of the Great Toad Sage prediction Kakashi had received months before. I didn’t remember the exact wording in my panic, but I remembered thinking that Yamato was the answer to Kakashi’s unconventional prophecy. He wasn’t the only person in Konoha who could use Wood Release, since Obito was still running around, but Kakashi had already been friends with Obito. It wouldn’t make much of a prophecy if he could make it work by breathing.

“Youma-to,” I said, blinking. “Sensei, either Kakashi fought someone from ROOT, or he fought Yamato. Or both—I was never clear on when Yamato left the organization.”

“You mean Kinoe?” Ūhei yawned. “He was unconscious by the time we got there. Didn’t look like much of a fight.”

Oh thank god.

“Kakashi’s on his way back now,” Ūhei added, one ear flicking. “I can hear Akino already.”

Sensei looked carefully at Ūhei, who butted his head against my thigh. Then Sensei spread his fingers out flat against the top of his desk and closed his eyes.

Shikaku didn’t move. I scratched behind Ūhei’s ears, but otherwise I stayed still.

I didn’t want to see what happened when a Sage forgot what he was supposed to be doing and got distracted. There were entirely too many statues on Mount Myōboku for me to forget.

After about thirty seconds, Sensei opened his eyes again and said, “Kakashi split from his team. He’s heading this way alone. I’m going to assume that ‘Kinoe’ is on his way to ANBU’s holding cells.”

Shikaku sighed, saying, “If he did what the dog implied, then that’s the least of his worries. Failing a ROOT mission…” Shikaku shook his head. “Protective custody’s the least we can do.” Then he looked at me. “But your student… Keisuke-san, how did you know about this ‘Kinoe’ character, or whatever his name is?”

I looked at Sensei for permission.

Sensei looked directly at Shikaku, before the man could add anything, and said, “Meet Operative Crane.”

Shikaku blinked first. “…You’re serious. The one who looked at the data and predicted the October tenth disaster. Your student.”

“Yes.” Sensei was half a step short of preening.

“I didn’t predict the invasion,” I corrected. “I expected the Nine-Tails to run around loose. I wasn’t sure how, but going by records about Mito-sama, the vulnerabilities in the seal were already known factors.”

Ūhei licked my hand. “Kakashi is almost home. What now?”

It turned out to be another two minutes before my teammate snaked in through the ventilation system, apparently because he was contractually obliged to do so. I didn’t really care how he got inside—all that mattered to me was that he was back in the village after three days missing.

Kakashi dropped from the vent in the ceiling, landing in a crouch before straightening up again with a brief bow to Sensei.

He looked pretty rough after whatever mission he’d been on. There was a hitch to his movements that spoke of fatigue, but not nearly as much as I would have otherwise expected from him. ANBU gear was beat to hell and covered in blood, but he didn’t move like any of it was his. The mask he wore wasn’t one I was used to, being a rodent rather than a vaguely-canine shape and dangling from his neck by a string. Obito’s eye was shut, so he was returning my once-over with a mild, one-eyed glare of reproach.

“Kakashi,” Sensei said, getting up from his desk and crossing the room, “let me see your tongue.”

Kakashi tilted his head to the side as he paused to consider the strange question, but that was probably fatigue talking. His gloved fingers hooked in either side of the black material and tugged down.

…It was probably weird that I’d never seen Kakashi’s face before. Neither had Obito, but we’d sort of given up on that curiosity after a certain point in Team Minato’s history. Neither of us could remember when we stopped caring, but it was a while ago.

Kakashi’s face was…well, I’d have to go with “cute.” He had a narrow jawline and straight noise, which I’d expected, and a mole to the left of his mouth that really suited the term “beauty mark.” It was kind of strange—even though I’d expected him to be attractive, it was a little surprising to have that suspicion confirmed. With his face framed by his fluffy white hair, I’d have to admit that he was… I supposed the technical term would be “aesthetically pleasing,” but that made it sound like I was talking about a chair.

And yet it was just weird to see him without the mask. I’d gotten used to not actually wondering what was under the mask and just focusing on what came out of it. Which was mostly smartassery.

While I pondered this, Kakashi opened his mouth all the way and stuck his tongue out so Sensei could check him for the usual ROOT tattoo. And I noticed the teeth. It wasn’t anywhere as near as obvious as it was with the Inuzuka clan, but Kakashi’s canine teeth were all slightly more pointed than the human norm.

He could probably open cans with those.

“Clean.” Sensei gave a sigh of relief, both of his hands on Kakashi’s shoulders. “Thank goodness.”

“Kinoe had one,” Kakashi told Sensei, pulling the mask back up over his face. “It’ll be in the mission report.”

Sensei stepped back and nodded. “Good. But would you first get to explaining where you’ve been for the last few days?”

“A ROOT agent approached me on the first,” Kakashi said, after giving Shikaku and I careful looks. “Kinoe, actually. He said he’d been sent to ask for assistance on an off-the-books mission that was vital to village security. After seeing information about a potential lead on an abandoned laboratory, likely used by Orochimaru, I agreed. I was already checking into potential security leaks due to ROOT or other sources, but I decided to see if the assignment was offered in good faith.

“We did find the base after scouring the region for three days. It turned out to be inside Arashi Keikoku.” Who the hell put their base in a location named “storm canyon”? “The entrance had been smashed by a recent flood, but the experiment containment tubes were intact.”

I had the image of the lab in my head—gigantic upright glass tubes, as large as support columns, containing glowing fluid and little dark shapes inside. Shapes that may have been human, once, before being twisted into something else.

“Intact?” I echoed faintly.

“But empty,” Kakashi said, “I think it triggered Kinoe. He didn’t speak to me for at least fifteen minutes after we found the first ones, even while I tried to help him out of it.”

I winced. Yamato—Kinoe—had one of the more traumatic childhoods I could recall offhand. But I wasn’t sure of the exact timeline, or when he’d entered ROOT service. I just knew he’d attended the Academy, and then both graduated and got promoted to chūnin in the same year. At age six.

Every time I thought I was okay with the ninja system, it reminded me why I wasn’t.

“Is the site marked?” Sensei asked.

“Yes. I also had pre-packed preservation seals, but they aren’t going to last forever. We probably have a month or two before they degrade.” Kakashi looked off into what I’d call the “middle distance,” thinking. “Kinoe attacked as we were leaving the facility, after I expressed disinterest in joining ROOT. I subdued him and was preparing to return to Konoha, but… Kei, have you heard of Otogakure?”

Had I ever. “Otogakure—a new shinobi village located in the soon-to-be-former Land of Rice Fields,” I recited, feeling a growl trying to build in my chest. “Sometime in the next ten years, it becomes the Land of Sound. I don’t know when. But I do know who rules it.”

Sensei was frowning.

“Orochimaru,” I confirmed.

“What?” That was Shikaku.
“Kei knows things,” Sensei reminded him.

“I’m going to need an explanation for that at some point,” Shikaku said sourly.

“Of course.”

“An enemy team, numbering approximately twenty shinobi of roughly genin to chūnin skill level, attempted to prevent me from leaving,” Kakashi went on, as soon as it became apparent that neither man was going to say anything further. Neither was I, but he could ignore me more easily. “The team leader admitted to being sent to destroy the laboratory, but also expressed interest in my Sharingan and in Kinoe’s Wood Release abilities. There was some evidence of our fight, but I got the impression that the Oto-nin were more opportunistic than planned.”

“And was Kinoe after your eye?” I asked, just to confirm my suspicions. This was Yamato, and yet…

“Target of opportunity,” Kakashi said, “The offer to work with a ROOT liaison was probably in good faith at the time, but circumstances changed. I didn’t take his commander’s offer to join. But I knew too much, so the obvious answer was to kill me.” He opened his left eye. “The Sharingan would have been a consolation prize.”

I scratched Ūhei’s ears again, frowning. “So Kinoe’s in interrogation now.”

I wasn’t sure whether to be disappointed or not. Yamato would grow to be the most successful ANBU captain in the organization’s history, and a pretty decent guy. The Plot would put him through a lot of shit to get there, though. One of those things being me—he’d tried to kill my teammate, after all. Even if he’d been hilariously unsuccessful, I was waiting on Kakashi’s judgment. If he forgave Kinoe, then I could probably accept that even over my territoriality when it came to teammates. Not that I’d ever actually met the kid…

“Until the situation changes, yes,” Sensei replied to my unasked question. Which had been, “What now?” “ROOT may send a disposal agent for him, or mount a rescue effort. He could submit to having his seal removed, or any number of other possibilities.”

“I can try talking to him,” Kakashi offered, to my surprise. As I stared, he went on, “I’ve met Kinoe before, though he wasn’t representing ROOT openly at the time. He didn’t want to kill me, but he’s conditioned to obey orders above all else. If I can get through to him…”

“I’ll help where I can, then,” Sensei nodded his assent. “Maybe Tsunade-sama as well…”

I sighed. “So, all in all, we have a lot of dirt on ROOT and at least one fairly open attempted murder. What do we do now that we know for certain Shimura’s the active head of the organization, knowing that he pushes for off-the-books missions with low chances of survival or success? Because I don’t know how public any takedown could possibly be.”

Especially when the man still had access to a private army.

Danzō Shimura was a respected elder, even if he was a social recluse. That happened. He’d never had a family, instead devoting his entire life to the village and therefore was allowed to retire with most of his limbs still working. He didn’t seem dangerous. He looked like a wounded old warrior made bitter by endless conflict, but not evil.

“Answering that requires deciding between a hard takedown and a long imprisonment,” Shikaku put in, breaking his silence. Apparently he’d decided that we were serious, despite our group-wide idiosyncrasies. “Public execution isn’t a workable solution—we’d have to air too many village secrets to drag this into the open. Life imprisonment could work if he’s a proven traitor, but the investigations won’t reveal everything he was involved in. He’d be useful for drawing out any rescue attempts by his subordinates. On the other hand, it may be too much of a security risk to have him alive in any capacity, Hokage-sama.”

“…We’ll keep it under wraps for just a little longer,” Sensei said in a cool voice, his eyes narrowed almost to slits.

Let’s see how deep the rabbit hole goes.

“Kei, tell the front desk to cancel all of my appointments for the rest of the day, then head to the house for the remainder of your shift. I’m going to be busy.” Sensei ordered. “Kakashi, with me. Shikaku, you have the run of the office. Shiranui-kun should be here in five minutes.”

“By your command,” Shikaku and I said together.

Sensei led the way out of the office, though I wasn’t sure where he was going. Kakashi and I lagged behind somewhat, though never by more than a few paces. Uhei poofed away to wherever the rest of the pack was, leaving me sadly devoid of canine ears to scratch.

Still, I caught Kakashi in a sidelong hug before he could get away. As his chakra jumped in surprise and I could start to feel my hair try to stand on end, I told him fiercely, “I’m glad you’re okay.”

Kakashi relaxed. “I wasn’t going to miss training on Saturday.” Saturdays were the days my brother usually had free for “family” training. Which was basically me, plus whoever I could finagle into helping.

“Well, thanks for that, then.” I let go of him, leaving him rubbing his arm to get feeling back into it, and added, “Oh, and by the way, we match.”

I tapped my left cheekbone, indicating the mole just under the corner of my eye.

“Heh. Maybe,” was his reply.

Then Kakashi and Sensei went left and out of the building, while I went to see the front desk. Things were finally moving.

Kakashi

3:55 pm, February 5th

“I failed,” Kinoe says in a quiet voice.

Given the body of evidence—mine—I have to agree. “You failed.”

“Then why am I still alive?” Kinoe asks, looking up.

The kid has catlike eyes—Kei would probably call them almond-shaped—and looks at me with nothing short of despair in his expression, his body language, and his voice. He’s small, smaller than Hayate is, and his long brown hair used to be a sort of a flag—really, it’s more of a shroud now. Ball ed up in the corner of the interrogation cell, unbound but still not struggling, he paints a pathetic picture.
Kinoe has been alone for a very long time.

With the Hokage and Jiraiya and Tsunade in the wings, it’s not really surprising that he thinks I’m a threat. I even personally kicked the fight out of him maybe six hours ago.

“I didn’t want to kill you,” I tell him, carefully. “And the Hokage’s going with my decision for now.” I sit down outside the cell and its powerful chakra-baffling seals, but keep my hands in sight so Kinoe can still see what I am doing.

“Why?” Kinoe asks, even as his chin drops into the bowl of his folded arms. “I was trying to kill you.”

“You weren’t trying very hard if I’m still here,” I say. “Kinoe, did you want to kill me or was it just your orders?”

Kinoe doesn’t respond for a while. He seems to shrink in on himself, further, before mumbling, “I’m sorry. I didn’t…”

“—is dying,” Kinoe echoes. He blinks. “But when there are two of you…”

“…All you think about is surviving,” I conclude quietly. “Kinoe, I don’t want to kill you. I don’t want to see you hurt. I’d prefer if you could come out of the cell and I could trust you not to attack me anyway. Or ever.”

I take a deep breath. “Don’t you ever want to come out of the shadows?”

Kinoe’s shaking.

“I’ll be waiting for you,” I try. “There’s a whole world out here that could be, Kinoe.” He just needs the ROOT seal to come off.

I don’t know how to help him past this, but I can at least try. I have enough people in my life determined to do the same for me that it feels strange and selfish not to.

The Hokage—Sensei—was the first person to make sure I was still functional after Dad. Kushina did her best to keep me alive and fed and tried mothering me, I think, but maybe I wasn’t in the best headspace to take that. Then Obito and Kei wouldn’t get lost, until it stopped feeling like a burden when they were around. I almost can’t imagine what life would be like without everyone now.

I nod. It’s the least I can do.

The funny thing about having friends—or at least people that try very hard to make sure I don’t die in a ditch somewhere—is that you get better at it over time. What I know about ROOT, from what the Hokage and Kei have said, is that it’s a lonely existence where your bonds are all either broken or become that way by the time you’re finished training.

Kinoe doesn’t know the first thing about being a friend. Or having one.

“For now, we’ll need to make sure that you’re not too badly hurt,” the Hokage’s voice says from behind me.

Kinoe blinks at him, surprised and thoroughly intimidated. “Ah…”
“Will you allow our medic to take a look at you?” the Hokage asks.

Kinoe hesitates a very long time before he nods, carefully.

I don’t think I’ve ever seen a person’s eyes go quite as wide as when Kinoe first lays eyes on the Senju Princess, Tsunade. It might be admiration, or complete disbelief. Kinoe is, in a way, the heir to the First Hokage’s Wood Release legacy, unlike all of his blood descendants, so maybe Kinoe’s been wondering if there’s a kinship there. He might admire Tsunade for being what he isn’t—accepted, respected, widely loved, and afraid of nothing. And a proud Senju.

Or maybe the reaction’s because of her huge rack. I’ve been informed by a highly credible source (otherwise known as Jiraiya) that its powers are not to be underestimated.

I stay outside of the cell, ready to spring, in case something happens as Tsunade draws Kinoe out. She can’t work in that cell any better than Kinoe can, and it’s once he’s out that there might be trouble.

Kinoe probably knows better than to make hand seals around the Hokage, though.

Tsunade grumbles, turning Kinoe’s head this way and that. She checks his pupils, does something with her left hand that elicits another grumble from her and a green glow, and then pushes Kinoe’s chest experimentally. “Kakashi, what’d you hit him with?”

“B-ranked Lightning jutsu,” I say, calculating the power I put into it. Less than a Chidori, but more than the lightning kunai… “Though not one I’ve used before.”

“I’m feeling lightning burns down his spine,” Tsunade mutters distractedly. “Kinoe-kun, demonstrate a jutsu for me. I don’t care which. Just don’t attack me or there’ll be hell to pay.”

Kinoe nods. But even after making the Snake hand seal, nothing happens. His eyes widen.

“Thought so. Lightning damage,” Tsunade says, for the benefit of her audience. “Means no jutsu for a week, because the chakra coils need to recover. I could cut that down, but I won’t.”

“Oh,” Kinoe says, sitting back down again.

“I don’t trust you, kid. You may be carrying my grandfather’s kekkei genkai, but so far you’ve used it against my family,” Tsunade says, tilting Kinoe’s chin back up so he meets her eyes. “You didn’t turn your back on ROOT at all. You just got caught. Neither I nor the Hokage can trust that.”

Kinoe nods.

“So you’re doing back in that cell for a while. You won’t be tortured, or starved, or taunted or anything like that. But until we’ve determined what to do with you, you aren’t going anywhere.” Tsunade tells him.

“I understand,” Kinoe says quietly.

He goes back into his cell without any further fuss, still looking like he feels about as big as a speck of dust. I wince internally, but…well. Nothing for it now.

“Go ahead and head back to the house.” The Hokage looks like he has a lot to think about, and it’s the kind of topic that people without foreknowledge or the ability to bench-press small towns don’t need to know. At least, that’s my impression.
“Understood, Hokage-sama.”

3:55 pm, February 5th

Sensei’s house was kind of crowded by the time I got there. Aside from Kushina and Naruto, per usual, Obito was helping with dinner while Hayate was apparently taking a shower after his team’s afternoon training session. Rin was also in attendance, and learning to knit from Kushina as Naruto stuck a wooden mushroom in his mouth.

“I was wondering where Kakashi was,” Obito said, when I told him about what had happened in the office. “But I didn’t know he was missing. Or that someone was trying to kill him. Who the hell does that?”

I wasn’t quite sure if he was talking about the people trying to kill Kakashi or talking about how Kakashi had vanished. “Well…”

“And that he let you see his face,” Obito continued, as though I hadn’t said anything. And to be fair, I had hesitated for slightly too long. “So…”?

“He’s a cute kid,” Kushina piped up from the couch.

“That’s implied.” Well, I was officially getting nowhere in this conversation.

Rin put her knitting aside and looked up. “Kei, you saw his face?”

“Yeah. He had to open his mouth so Sensei could check if he had a ROOT seal. Though now that I think of it, they’re probably going to change where they put those seals once they realize we’re onto them…” I frowned. “Crap.”

“Kei, you’re getting off-topic,” Obito reminded me. “Kakashi has a face?”

I facepalmed. “Yes. Yes, he does. He doesn’t have any huge deformities or anything that would normally require a mask to hide. What do you want me to say here?”

“Details?” Rin suggested.

I gave up. “He has a mole right here…”

Chapter Notes

I needed to write a happy chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

After about a month spent cycling around R&D, wherein a team of actual researchers and I (and whoever else was available) tested them for safety and reliability, I was finally ready to bring out my brand-new set-and-forget genjutsu seals.

Based heavily on the designs for the genjutsu traps I’d seen some six months ago, I’d drawn and redrawn what seemed like dozens of designs that were more compatible with human chakra. While the butterflies had been devastating, their dependence on actually being the seal in question meant that I wouldn’t be able to make a mass-produced seal design based on how they did it. I’d had to confirm that with the Aburame clan, who were happy with their new chakra-eating insects but were understandably not interested in sharing secrets. Shimika had at least told me that much.

My basic design wasn’t exactly a comprehensive genjutsu mind-fuck like the butterfly ones tended to be. It was a basic visual genjutsu, which screwed with the visual cortex in the brain to make the target believe that everything they saw was about fifty centimeters further to the right.

I was pretty sure that Mikoto Uchiha would think they were children’s playthings, and they really were more suited for pranks at this stage than they were for combat.

Field-testing them was still fun.

Inoichi Yamanaka, as expected from his clan, was a shrewd and intelligent man with the kind of perceptiveness ordinarily expected from psychics, conmen, and prosecuting attorneys. That made him a good jōnin-sensei, because between his daughter and the clan kids that were running around, he had a lot of experience dealing with children. Even if they occasionally made him want to pull his ponytail out by the roots.

The last bit was probably why, when I’d posted a D-rank for genin to help with the final stage of my tags’ testing, Team Inoichi showed up to claim it.

Which was why Hayate and Yūgao were running into trees all morning at Training Ground Four.

The kids weren’t allowed to take the tags off, per orders from Inoichi. They had to figure out a way around the restrictions placed on them. It was a bit like blindfold training, but sillier. My brother and Yūgao had a bit of trouble with that concept.
Iruka, on the other hand, had figured out the trick to the genjutsu—that it was solely visual—and was making a clicking noise with his tongue and easily navigating the forest. He was quite a bit further through the “obstacle course” than the other kids were, even if the obstacles themselves were just a little further to one side than they normally would be.

“Your brother can’t detect non-human obstacles,” Inoichi said, as the two of us sat under a tree and watched the kids try and navigate toward their lunches.

We had bento lunches for everyone, assuming they didn’t knock themselves unconscious first. They could also take the seal tags off their jackets and just stop the exercise there, but that would have been too much like giving up.

And the kids were nothing if not competitive.

I took a long sip of green tea and nodded.

“I’m seeing very little of the Academy tajutsu style from him,” Inoichi commented, as another crash of a kid going through a bush sounded from the woods.

“Mom and I taught him kenjutsu at home,” I told him, balancing the thermos of tea on my upraised knee because I could. “I tried some stuff with the tajutsu my teammates use—we kind of blended our styles after a while—but Hayate’s not quite strong enough for it.”

Mom had never been a tajutsu user the way that people expected. She was kenjutsu all the way, while my fighting methodology had incorporated both. Her tajutsu had not been exceptional without the sword. It probably had a lot to do with her background, but I’d never gotten a chance to ask.

But going to Kakashi and Obito for help with Hayate had resulted in a wealth of resources for my brother, who still hadn’t decide who to emulate the most. He’d been trying some of Kakashi’s loose-limbed method of using the environment to every possible advantage, but wasn’t fast or strong enough to make full use of it.

Maybe when he hit puberty.

At about that point, Iruka stumbled out of the woods with his eyes still shut, falling over onto a sunny patch of grass next to the picnic blanket. “Ow…”

“I’m guessing that the echolocation trick didn’t work on the bushes?” I teased, as he got to his feet again.

“It worked, it just…worked less,” Iruka corrected me. He picked himself up carefully, and I realized that, yes, he’d probably fallen straight through a barberry patch. Ouch. “Can I take the tag off now?”

“Yeah, you can,” I said, and he removed the sticky paper from his arm with a sigh of relief. “So, how do you feel?”

Iruka groaned. “Hungry?”

“No nausea, dizziness, or urge to throw up?” I pressed.

“Nooo. Inoichi-sensei, can I please eat?” Iruka wheedled.

Inoichi sniggered, but he still passed Iruka a bento box to devour.

It commenced a disappearing act in his mouth.
“Well, at least there weren’t any unintended side effects,” I muttered, putting my thermos down and checking my notebook of seal designs. It was about the same size as a Bingo Book, but with blank pages so I could write as much as I wanted. “It’s good for a proof-of-concept, but if I want to be able to use these in a fight, I’m going to have to tweak the Yang chakra anchor…”

“Why did you want to work on a fūinjutsu workaround to genjutsu in the first place?” Inoichi asked. “I didn’t realize you had any problems with it.”

“I actually don’t,” I said. “What I’m really trying to do is to make a point. Kushina-sama wants me to study genjutsu to shore up my full education, but I would rather work on this. It’s still genjutsu, and I’m still learning about them…but I don’t screw up my combat style by having to make hand seals.”

“You could just learn to make hand seals faster, Keisuke-san,” Inoichi said dryly. “Most people do.”

“Most people don’t specialize in fūinjutsu and kenjutsu at the same time. I do.” I scribbled a few more notes before snapping the book closed. “The only reason I drop my sword is if I’m handing it to someone else. And Kakashi comes with his own.”

“Can Obito use kenjutsu?” Iruka asked, with a mouth still full of rice.

“…You know, I think he can, but he pretty much never does.” I tapped the end of my pencil against my lower lip. Obito had used his Sharingan alongside me in combat before, but I’d never seen him pick up a sword and go to town. “I’ll see if I can’t test that.”

Wham went another pair of kids—this time, my brother and Yūgao had managed to make it almost to the edge of the forest before smacking into one last tree. The tree itself gave a shudder and some leaves drifted down from the branches.

Hayate staggered out of the woods at last, closely followed by Yūgao, and both of them looked like they’d be developing bruises from the high-speed impacts with bits of the landscape. Hayate had as many scratches as Iruka, if not more, and Yūgao had picked up a collection of twigs in her hair that reminded me of some of my own training accidents. Long past, mostly.

“All right, all right, you kids can have lunch now,” Inoichi said to his other two students.

My brother immediately stripped off the genjutsu seal and, once he realized where he was and who he was lying next to, yanked Yūgao’s seal as well.

“That was awful,” Hayate complained, even as he wriggled over to the picnic blanket and snatched a bento from the pile.

“That wasn’t the most devastating genjutsu in the world,” I told Hayate seriously. “I mean, I can cast worse ones normally.” Well. I could cast one.

Yūgao grabbed another bento and opened it, grumbling unhappily.

Over the course of lunch, I managed to get more data from the kids about my…whatever-it-was-called seal. I hadn’t thought of a name yet, so I was just calling it the Experiment. It made it sound cooler than it really was.

“I think we’re going to need to work on our genjutsu dispelling, too,” Inoichi murmured thoughtfully. “Even if these were tags, I was surprised by how unprepared you were to deal with them…”

training on something else?"

“I could, but I wonder how much that would help.” Inoichi caught my interrogative look and added, “At this stage, I have to monitor my students’ training more than I would need to later. I’d rather get them started on elemental ninjutsu first…”

“Well, as long as you didn’t do what Sensei did, that’ll work,” I said.

“What did the Hokage do?” Yūgao asked, surprised that I could complain about such a famous teacher.

“I was his student for four years before I learned how to cast my own genjutsu,” I said flatly. “And I didn’t even learn that from him.”

Inoichi choked on his tea.

Hayate gave his sensei a careful look, then furrowed his brows and said, “You’re never gonna forget this, are you?”

“Nope,” I replied, while Inoichi was still trying not to laugh.

“So, when can we expect Kakashi-san to show up?” Iruka asked, having finally finished his lunch.

Kakashi had made a habit of showing up around Training Grounds Three and Four over the past months, though mostly because Hayate and I trained out here. He helped Hayate with kenjutsu—or at least his version thereof—while I helped him help my brother. It’d worked out like that for a while, actually, until Yūgao had gotten wind of the not-so-secret training sessions. Somehow, this led to Team Inoichi occasionally getting joint lessons between me, Inoichi, and the youngest jōnin in Konoha. They weren’t even pure kenjutsu anymore.

“I think he said he might be coming here around…an hour ago, actually.” I frowned.

“He’s late,” Yūgao said, then stuffed a last slice of salmon into her mouth.

A little flash of lightning, and—

“I always show up exactly when I want to,” Kakashi said flatly, showing up in the branches of that last tree. The one that probably had Hayate’s and Yūgao’s faces imprinted on it, specifically. He huffed. “Inoichi-san?”

Inoichi glanced at me, smiling. “Make sure to mark the mission as successful, will you?”

“Sure. Your pay’s going to be from R&D, and maybe once I have a battle-ready seal I’ll credit you four.” I shrugged, grinning back. “Lemme just have everyone pack up…"

While Inoichi’s team cleared the training field, I beckoned Kakashi down from the tree.

“Shimura?” I asked in a whisper as he landed next to me.

“Not yet. But something tripped my apartment’s traps.” Kakashi replied, similarly quiet. “He’s testing us.”

Every once in a while, people with workable stealth ratings would tell me how the secret campaign against ROOT was going. I couldn’t investigate much of anything myself—mostly because Isobu’s chakra made it impossible for me to fully suppress my chakra even if I wanted to—but I could still stay informed. Then Sensei would be able to bounce ideas off of me without having to also get me up to speed on things.

And besides, if everyone knew I was the Three-Tails jinchūriki, then they knew where I was at all times. It was a basic precaution for the village’s sake, so I’d gotten used to always having eyes on me in one form or another. They weren’t always hostile, of course, but being observed was pretty much my lot in life. I wasn’t going to be able to ditch all of the watching eyes to go digging around in abandoned laboratories or anything like that, so I just…well, I played it normal.

I went on grocery runs, I talked to everyone I knew, I attended weekly sessions with the Kunoichi Quartet (and associated children) to learn about what they’d been doing, and I occasionally pulled in a couple of C-ranked message-running missions. I’d picked up the fūinjutsu research on a whim, but was kind of getting into it. Between that, training my brother, and the million other distractions I had, I ought to have been too busy to be a nuisance for anyone.

Rin would say that it still wasn’t enough.

And still, Sensei hadn’t officially made a move on Danzō. That I knew of, anyway. Was he waiting for the old man to have a stress-induced heart attack? Who knew?

“What are you going to show us today, Kakashi-sensei?” Yūgao asked, bouncing to her feet.

Aside from thinking that the jutsu sounded like the name to a theme park, I didn’t have any objections. It was a C-ranked jutsu with many applications, and we were next to a riverbank anyway. The kids would have fun with it. “I learned that one last year. Inoichi-san?”

“One would hope that a jōnin would know how to use his own chakra nature,” Inoichi said in a dry voice.

“Then let’s get started,” Kakashi said, and headed to the riverbank with three genin trailing him.

The riverbank was really just a resource. The various Water Bullet-styled techniques were supposed to rely on environmental water, which was then displaced to the mouth and shot out like a fire hose. I didn’t really understand the technical explanation, but I did know that Water was one of the more annoying chakra natures like that. Water Release attacks generally required a water reservoir of some sort, while Earth was everywhere anyway, and so was Wind. On the other hand, Fire and Lightning had higher personal costs—I could use Water Release all day while Kakashi would burn out after maybe two Chidori shots per day.

Sure, my control was relative garbage at higher levels, but I had a lot more to chakra play with. Even without tapping Isobu.

Come to think of it, maybe I ought to have gotten reassessed on that count…

“The hand seals are Dragon, Tiger, and Hare,” I said, demonstrating. I didn’t push any chakra into them, though.

The genin watched all three of us raptly.

“Can anyone just…use that?” Hayate asked, mimicking my movements.

“It helps to have a Water nature, but almost anyone can learn it,” Inoichi replied, “So, Keisuke-san…”
Well, if Kakashi would otherwise have to mess with his mask and Inoichi wanted to keep talking, sure. I made the required hand seals, and Water Release: Wild Water Wave!

I had to turn my head so I didn’t douse the kids with the sudden burst of water coming out of my mouth. As it was, the tree ten meters to the left got a thorough soaking.

“As soon as it’s not March anymore, I think it might be a good idea to organize a water fight or something,” Inoichi mused, as the kids got started.

Within a minute, Hayate was standing out on the surface of the water, making faces at his teammates as they tried to hit him with their jutsu. If I had to guess, I’d bet that Iruka would succeed first. At least Mom and I had made sure Hayate knew how to swim…

“Try concentrating on the Water chakra first,” Kakashi was saying to Yūgao. “Then go for shaping.”

“Okay, Kakashi-sensei,” Yūgao replied, and tried the hand signs again.

This time, Hayate had to do a cartwheel to get out of the way.

“Follow-up, Iruka,” Inoichi encouraged him.

“Dodge like the wind, Hayate!” I, of course, had to root for the home team.

Both attacks missed, because Hayate wasn’t stupid and had learned to dodge as well. He ended up running to the other side of the river, encouraging his teammates to hit him with everything they had. Most of the time, everyone missed—even when Hayate failed to fire back, due possibly to a chakra nature mismatch—but all three of the kids were a little damp by the time we finished that part of the training session.

“Can we please have a water fight?” Iruka asked. And he was employing the puppy eyes. “Please, Inoichi-sensei?”

“Let’s have teams!” Hayate called out from across the river. “Me and Sis versus, uh, Yugao-chan and Kakashi-sensei. And then Iruka can have Inoichi-sensei!”

“Is that really fair?” Yūgao asked. “Kakashi-sensei doesn’t have a Water nature…or do you?”

“I can fake it,” Kakashi said, shrugging. And yet, he was giving me a sidelong, challenging look.

“Oh, you’re on.”

“What did I just say about it being…oh, never mind. We’ll just all have colds together.” Inoichi was grinning, though. “The ground rules are simple—no ninjutsu other than Water Release. No genjutsu, but taijutsu and weapons are free.”

Hayate bounced back across the water toward me.

I added, while reading out and giving my brother a one-armed noogie, “And I’m not gonna be using the Three-Tails, so don’t even go there.”

You ruin all my fun.

Shut up.

To make a very long story short, a D-ranked mission showed up in the office the next day. It asked for one genin team to please, please drain Training Ground Three and Four and get them back up to snuff for the next team.

And Hayate had sniffles for three days afterward.

“You can do it, Naruto! Say ‘Mama’!” Kushina enthused, lying on her stomach and cooing to her baby.

“Ba-ba-ba-baaaaa,” said Naruto.

Next to him, Sasuke looked at his mother with a toy kunai’s ring end in his mouth. He pulled it out with a pop and said, “Ma-ma!”

Kushina pouted.

“He’s eight months old, Kushina-san,” I reminded her, even as I balanced a box of sewing equipment between my shoulder and head. “Give him time.”

“You sound like a baby development book,” Kushina groaned, dropping her head to the tops of her hands. Her legs kept kicking, though. “Narutooooo, play along with Mama…”

“Ba!” said Naruto, and wiggled on his stomach across the rug. His tiny hands fistedit in Kushina’s loose red hair.

Sasuke shuffled over toward him on his butt, babbling happily, while his mother tucked her hands back into her lap and smiled contentedly at the sight.

Maybe having them over to help with the move had been a bad idea. They certainly weren’t helping things along…

After Sensei re-re-updated the fūjinjutsu wards around my family’s house (and showed me how to make more), and after Hayate was going on multiple D-ranked missions per day, I wondered if maybe it was time to move back into the old house. It…didn’t quite work out like that.

Sensei had gone back after Nagato and I had cleared out my family’s belongings, then put preservation seals on the house itself to compliment the Uchiha MP tape Obito had left. Hayate had been back twice, but he hadn’t broken the seal on the house. I had been back four times, including this one, trying to figure out what to do with it.

On one hand, this house was where we’d grown up. It held a lot of memories for us. I could walk into it and remember childhood moments just by smelling old scents left in the halls. If I closed my eyes, I could almost image that nothing had happened at all. It also seemed kind of a waste to just leave it sitting there abandoned, since we’d moved into Sensei and Kushina’s house and colonized their spare spaces with reckless abandon.

On the other hand, this house was also where bad memories waited if we weren’t careful. Hayate had had a breakdown in the front garden just from seeing it while reeling from October Tenth, and I’d been pissed off just walking inside to gather our stuff. The living room floor hadn’t been replaced perfectly, since the original wood had been bamboo or something and Obito’s repair work didn’t match. Putting a rug over it didn’t change the fact that this place was marked.

Basically, the practical side of me said to sell it. What good memories I had couldn’t overpower Hayate’s bad ones. So I had to get it ready to sell. Once I stripped off all the security seals and cleaned the house up, it was likely going to go to a civilian family, given what district we’d lived in. I just needed to get it to that point sometime before I died of old age.
Somehow, the people I’d recruited for this purpose seemed less than interested.

Aside from Kushina and Mikoto and their respective sons, I also had Inoichi’s genin team (including my brother) running errands for things like paint, and Obito had volunteered to help me get replacement slats for the roof. Kakashi had been by, up until lunch and Gai’s challenge to some kind of game involving rocking horses.

(I didn’t ask.)

So while Obito had gone to get more pitch to seal things up, and Inoichi’s team was off at the store, I moved things around to sealing scrolls and poofed them away into pocket dimensions. And Mikoto and Kushina and their kids filled the house with noise so I didn’t have to think in silence for too long.

I’d figure out what to do with all this stuff later. Maybe an estate sale? Well, if Hayate and I were alive it was probably too gauche, right?

“How’s Itachi doing?” I asked, once the sewing stuff had disappeared into a seal.

“He is now the top of his class, Keisuke-chan,” Mikoto replied, picking Sasuke up before he could try to stuff Naruto’s foot into his mouth. The littlest Uchiha squirmed on her lap, pouting, before leaning back into his mother’s arms. “He was very fond of the daifuku you sent him.”

“I hoped he would be,” I said, “Obito loves that stuff, so I was banking on it being an Uchiha thing.”

“You don’t like to glue your teeth together?” Kushina teased.

“Apples, strawberries and other fruit are better,” I agreed. “Kushina-san, Mikoto-sama…do you know anything about selling houses? Or getting an apartment…?”

“I know more than Minato does,” Kushina said.

Mikoto shook her head. “I just moved into Fugaku’s house. Sorry I can’t be of more help.”

“Okay. I’m probably going to ask you for advice, then…” I sighed, “Lemme finish packing this place up.” Then I’d be able to start really cleaning.

“Ha-wa-mah-na,” said Naruto.

“Uh-da-wa-la?” asked Sasuke.

“Ubah,” Naruto said.

“Oh my gosh, they have their own language,” Kushina squeaked.

Mikoto almost busted a gut laughing.

I sighed and, between the genin and Obito, managed to get the house set up.

By the end of the month, everything was finally in order.

We sold our house to a young family of metalworkers, who had a shop elsewhere in the district. I’d only known who Temujin was—he was the one who’d made my first katana and sold it to Mom—but I could almost recognize their silly little toddler. Tenten was a cute kid at the ripe old age of a year and spare change, but I didn’t stick around to bother them.

No, instead Hayate and I moved into a two-bedroom apartment in a totally different part of town. We actually moved closer to the Hokage office and Academy, but were on the other side of the village relative to where we’d started. The new place was in a shinobi-dominated part of the village, where apartment managers were a little more understanding of the security seals I was obligated to slap all over the place. It was also the kind of place with neighbors I could trust.

Moving into that apartment was really just a matter of applying all those seals, then unpacking all the stuff that’d been preserved in sealing scrolls to make it more like home.

The apartment was actually a lot bigger than Konoha standard—two adjacent bedrooms with one bathroom across the hall, and then a kitchen that opened into the living/dining room. Though it was probably around…what, ten by ten meters all told? It still made most apartments in town seem like bolt holes.

I was pretty sure Kakashi’s consisted of just one actual room. I knew Obito’s had two—the main room, and the bathroom. He didn’t actually own the hallway.

“I have my own room again.” Hayate marveled at that thought alone, once we’d gotten all of his stuff squared away properly.

His room didn’t look much like it had before—it wasn’t green anymore, for starters—but he’d managed to get all of his things inside. We’d even come up with a wall mount for his various weapons—shinai, bokken, a hanger for his kunai holster, a mount for his kodachi, and then a final pair of wooden hooks for his future katana. He’d re-tacked all of his posters to the wall, and added in one that was an advertisement for Temujin’s weapons’ shop. His old dresser had also survived the transition, so we’d put it in his new room, too. On top of it, there was a framed photo of my brother’s genin team.

I ruffled his hair and went to my room.

My room at the family house had been a bit of a pit, to be honest. I left sealing scrolls and supplies everywhere, and I’d stained my bedroom pretty thoroughly with various inks whenever I was occupied with new designs. I’d had to paint over all of that so it’d seem like a kid could actually live in there. Aside from the mattress on the floor—not a futon, because I was a degree of cultural bias there—my new room was pretty bare. Everything of value (and my clothes) ended up in the closet. I had a low craft table with a cushion to one side so I could create seals without marking up the rest of the apartment, and there were books and scrolls strewn haphazardly across my workspace. I had a few photos here and there—one of Team Minato, one of Hayate and me goofing off in the summer years ago, one of Mom sitting underneath the trees during the Hanami festival…

As for the rest of the stuff, well, Mom’s katana and wakizashi set was gonna stay on the living room wall until Hayate was old enough to handle them.

We’d salvaged some of the pots and pans from the house, and I’d set the kitchen up for two kids who were still learning this whole “cooking” thing. And I’d bought rice, noodles, spices, and a bunch of other stuff I knew could hold us until either of us figured out the arcane secrets behind cuisine. And we could always visit Sensei’s house if we exploded the kitchen and had to beg for scraps.

I dug some weapon cases out of the closet—one containing senbon, while the other had kunai—and set them on my desk for later. I’d finally figured out when Genma’s birthday was (in about three days) and, given how much he tended to make things explode, I decided to create a few nonstandard senbon for him to puzzle out.

Maybe he’d have fun if I could incorporate my genjutsu seals into these things…
Which was around when someone rang the doorbell. I heard a thud from the other room, followed by a loud pattering of feet. I felt Hayate rush for the front door and, given what chakra signature I could feel past it, I let him. I’d catch up in a second.

“Hey, kid,” Genma’s voice said, once Hayate opened the door. “Can you give this to your sister? I… kinda forgot her birthday.”

Fun fact: Genma’s birthday was on the seventeenth of July. Mine was the tenth.

I’d spent my fifteenth birthday fixing this apartment up to livable conditions, but hey. There was eventually some cake involved. Kushina was good like that.

“Not having a party for her?” Hayate asked him, while I emerged from my bedroom and headed over to say hi.

“Eh, not so much.” Genma’s senbon made another circuit of his mouth. He spotted me and added, “Sorry I’m late. Got stuck on the capital rotation for two weeks. You know how it is.”

I didn’t, actually, since I’d never been called on to make sure the daimyo’s manor was secure. Sure, Konoha lent ninja out to the daimyo so we could maintain political ties, but I’d never been available for that. I wasn’t sure if it was because I had a dependent listed right there in my file, or if it was because Sensei was making a special exception for me. As a political tool and a big stick with which to threaten other nations, I was probably too potentially useful to be sent out to the capital. If Sensei needed me to smash heads on the home front, he wanted to have me at hand.

Not that he would, without some serious incentive to do so, but the thought was there.

“It’s fine,” I said, instead of mentioning all that. I glanced at the present that Hayate still had in hand. “What’s that?”

Well, I was already fifteen, so…yeah. Sure. Why not? I carefully unwrapped the bright package and was rewarded with a small lacquered box. Sliding my fingernail along the seam, I opened it.

Inside was a small, bright red omamori. I’d seen them before, in passing—the little silk bags tended to end up everywhere after New Year’s—but I’d never actually had one myself. The one in my hand proclaimed that it would help protect the owner’s family from harm.

“Figured you could use the luck,” Genma explained, though there was a solemn cast to his teasing. “You can keep the cloth and the box, too.”

“Thanks, Genma-san.” I handed it to my brother, who turned it over in his hands. “Was this a souvenir?”

“Yeah, there’s a big temple at the capital. It seemed like everyone was getting ready for an early Tanabata at the time, but I didn’t think I’d make it back here in time to keep it relevant if I bought something from that.” Genma shrugged. “And anyway, I like the touristy part of traveling around. I’d do it more if I wasn’t stuck in one spot for half the month.”

“And if you were deployed to nice places,” I prodded.

“That too,” Genma quirked an eyebrow at Hayate, “So, kid, you gonna be in the Chūnin Exams?”

“Maybe the next one,” Hayate said. “Inoichi-sensei says we’re not ready yet.”
“Been there.” Genma glanced at me, pointedly. "Or your sister has."

“Shut up.” I said.

“So what are you doing for your birthday, Genma-san?” Hayate asked, before I could start a verbal sparring match.

“Well, Gai promised me we’d head out someplace, but I think he got Ebisu to pay.” Genma shrugged. “So we’re gonna have a team dinner at an Akimichi place with Chōza-sensei, since Ebisu’s cheap like that.” He looked toward the ceiling. “I’d say we could hang out, but only like two of us can legally drink…”

“Genma-san,” I said dryly, “you’re turning eighteen, not twenty.”

“I’m dragging Raidō along to see if he tries to drink Chōza-sensei under the table,” he replied blithely. He rolled his eyes. “Honestly, Kei-san, it’s like you don’t even know me.”

“Seriously, get the hell out before you corrupt my brother or something. Thanks for the gift, and I’ll get yours to you sometime”—here, I paused for a quick calculation—“this week. You’re still going to take my shift on Saturday?”

“Don’t I know it,” was my response. But I did need to figure out if I’d done the responsible sibling thing and introduced Hayate to Gai in full Youth Mode. It was something like inoculating him, but with less responsibility and no needles.

Hm… Maybe I’d have to wear the omamori like a bracelet to get the full benefits… I mean, if it kept me from getting mauled in my next sparring match with Gai, it would have paid for itself twice over.

Tanabata, in Konoha anyway, still ran on the local lunar calendar and not the one that said January was New Year’s. It was about the only thing that did. I’m not exactly sure where we even got it, since there were random smatterings of other cultures in Konoha and I was eventually forced to just write them off as quirks.

This did not mean that I disliked festivals. Actually, I really liked them.

Hayate and I dressed up in yukata (navy stripes for him and purple-backed shuriken for me, plus shuriken-shaped hairclip), but only on the last day of Tanabata. I wasn’t actually around for the first two days, so he got to do whatever while hanging out at Iruka’s house for a multi-day sleepover.

What I did hate were last-minute missions. Even if they were as simple as “Go here, blow the entire secret laboratory to kingdom come as soon as the salvage team’s done.” It still took me out of Konoha for a while, and Orochimaru’s secret labs had a way of turning my stomach even years after everything and everyone in the place had long since either left or died trying.

Between the genjutsu seal senbon I’d given to Genma, the base-clearing explosions I was capable of, and various other stupid little things, I was getting something like a reputation among Konoha’s shinobi forces. “Danger” was a double-edged assessment in some ways. I was dangerous, sure, but so was every person I hung out with.
But anyway, I tried to enjoy myself even after that kind of mission. I’d missed the first night’s fireworks show, to my brother’s great disappointment, but the festival itself was still there.

So that was how I got where I was on the eighth of August.

Konoha may not have been the richest village, but we could damn well throw a party. There were tons of paper decorations, in every imaginable color, with the smell of fried food and sticky sweets permeating the air. Orange paper lanterns were strung on cable over our heads, instead of string, in case someone needed to make a quick exit from being trapped on a date or something.

I was in one of the larger non-clan groups, actually. While Iruka, Yūgao, and Hayate forged ahead of our group and occasionally disappeared into the crowd, I maintained a steady walking pace for Gai, Genma, and Raidō to follow. Sure, Ebisu had vanished earlier in the direction of Asuma, Kurenai, and Shizune, but the rest of us kept together. Obito and Rin had been with us, but they’d said they’d come back once Obito managed to win Rin a stuffed panda without being caught cheating.

“Genma, we must try this prize booth next!” Gai enthused from behind me, and I turned around to see him pointing at a goldfish-catching booth with the words “NO JUTSU” in large characters to one side. Not that Gai ever…

Shopkeepers got worked up over the silliest things.

Like shinobi being excellent cheaters when it came to these games. Which were rigged anyway.

Even when we didn’t cheat, shinobi had faster reflexes and surer movements than any civilian. Some booths had put up signs banning anyone over the age of twelve, as though that would save their profits once the clan kids got going.

Speaking of, Raidō was stuck carrying all the things Gai had won over the course of the night. At last count, this included one live turtle, a Gamabunta toy, three Uchiha-style paper fans, and a poster for something I didn’t recognize. Probably a movie.

“Seriously, Gai? We’ve already got a turtle,” Genma complained.

Theoretically, the turtle game was harder to win. Practically speaking, we had Gai.

Raidō muttered something from behind the pile of prizes.

“I can take the turtle, Raidō-san!” Yūgao said, holding up her hand.

Raidō immediately handed its travel container over. “Here.”

Yūgao made a squealing noise of pure joy and ran off with it. “Iruka-kun, Hayate-kun, I have a turtle now!”

I tilted my head to one side. Was it really right of Raidō to give it away? “Uh…”

“Ningame is the best shelled friend a shinobi can have!” Gai assured me. “Kame-chan will find a good home with Yūgao-chan!”

Oh, so he did have his summon contract. I’d wondered.

“Is it too late to join?” drawled Kakashi’s voice, and Gai immediately whirled on the spot to greet him. Kakashi’s yukata was blue with black paw-prints, because he was predictable like that.

I froze for a second once I recognized the kid standing next to him in a bamboo-patterned green yukata. Smaller than Hayate, but with spiky brown hair and dark, catlike eyes. Without the gladiator-styled hitai-ate, I probably wouldn’t have recognized him if not for his chakra.

It felt like the stuff that made up Obito’s right arm.

Yamato?

“No, my rival!” Gai put both of his hands on Kakashi’s shoulders. “You have arrived at the perfect time to participate in a challenge of great importance!”

“Which is…?” Kakashi prompted.

“This game!” Gai said, sweeping his arm toward the goldfish-catching booth. The proprietor was looking a little nervous.

“Hm.” Kakashi looked at me with his one visible eye and said, “Kei, this is Tenzō. Keep track of him.” Then Kakashi rolled up his sleeves and stepped toward the booth in perfect sync with Gai.

The owner of the goldfish booth winced preemptively.

Genma looped one arm around Raidō’s shoulders and leaned on him, in possibly the best position to watch the show. Raidō sighed.

I gestured for Tenzō to stand closer. He hesitated, but did as I asked.

“You’re the Three-Tails jinchūriki,” Tenzō said quietly from my side, staring up at me with wide eyes.

“And you apparently need some help with social skills,” was my muttered response. In a more conversational tone, I added, “Seriously, though, don’t kill the mood around here. Everyone already knows, but it freaks people out sometimes.”

“But…” Tenzō shook himself. “I barely know what I’m supposed to do here.”

“You could do what they’re doing,” I suggested, waving a hand in Gai and Kakashi’s direction. Between the two of them, they’d clear out the stall in minutes without using any jutsu at all. Even if the paper nets were flimsy, the two of them took competitive cheating to a whole new level.

I was pretty sure I could hear the proprietor crying. Maybe next year he’d make it a “no chakra” rule instead.

“Or what they’re doing over there.” I meant my brother and his friends, who were off in the crowd and probably pooling their mission money to buy something fried. I could just barely see Iruka’s wave-patterned yukata through the throng.

“…I don’t like fried things,” Tenzō said. “Nothing greasy.”

“Then you and Kakashi have something in common,” I said. I held out my hand. “So, Tenzō-kun, what do you like to eat?”

“Simpler stuff. Walnuts?” It sounded like a guess, but he let me pat his shoulder anyway. Maybe he’d gain confidence as the evening went on.

And maybe I’d figure out what the fuck he was doing here, as opposed to wherever Kakashi and Sensei had been keeping him.
(Could Tenzō grow walnut trees?)

“You can call me Kei-san, by the way. Everyone calls me that.” Except people who were overly formal, like Gai.

“Ah-HAH!” Gai crowed in triumph. “I have defeated you, my rival. I now have seven wins to your eight!”

Kakashi was eyeing the paper net he’d been using, which was nearly snapped in two. “So you did. Congratulations, Gai.”

I peered at the booth.

Between the two of them, they’d managed to capture and bag every goldfish in the tank. Sure, Gai’s pile of water-filled plastic bags was higher than Kakashi’s was, but man did these two go overboard on these stupid challenges.

“So, are you two gonna take those home or give ‘em back?” Raidō asked.

“I don’t have the space,” Kakashi said, “Gai?”

“No, I believe we have done what we came here to do!” Gai gave us all a thousand-watt smile.

“Thank you for spectating this event, but we must return the fish to their rightful owner, so they may be won by deserving children across the village!”

The stall’s owner sobbed in relief.

Raidō muttered something that might’ve been a prayer thanking the local spirits for mercy. He’d been the group pack mule since the start and that wasn’t going to change.

Genma patted his back sympathetically.

“So, where have you been?” I asked Kakashi, as we all settled back into our “roving band of bored adolescents” mode. It mostly meant wandering around until Gai got excited or someone got hungry.

“Busy,” was his reply, and Tenzō walked closer to his side than mine even as we finally reached my brother’s mini-gang of genin.

“Sis, take one!” Hayate offered me three choices—sugared strawberry, Mikan orange, or apple. The last choice, or what I supposed had been the last one, was a taiyaki fish that Yūgao and Iruka had already split between them.

“What, are the other two for you?” I asked, snatching the strawberry.

“Yeah, but… Huh?” Hayate blinked. “Kakashi-san, who’s this?”

“What, you think I wouldn’t just show up late on my own?”

Hayate gave him a flat look.

Kakashi gave in. “This is Tenzō. He’s about your age, so for all I know you’ll get along.”

“Who are you?” Tenzō asked Hayate, who was giving him a curious look that edged into suspicion by millimeters.

“Hayate Gekkō! I’m Kei’s brother,” Hayate said. His eyes narrowed somewhat. “Your chakra feels weird. Like…like Obito? Just a bit.”

“Tenzō-kun has Wood Release, Hayate,” I told him. It probably wasn’t classified—it was really more like Tenzō himself was kind of a state secret. Only if he was out and about, something had changed.

“Oh! Okay, then.” Hayate looked down at his remaining two festival snacks contemplatively, then held them up in front of Tenzō’s face. “Want one?”

Tenzō grabbed the candied apple apparently on pure reflex. Idly, I focused my chakra sense on him and, to my mild surprise, I couldn’t sense a ROOT seal on him.

Weird, I thought. And then I ate the strawberry with a loud crunch.

“Were you in any of our classes?” Yūgao asked, even as she wiped chocolate off her cheeks. So much for the taiyaki. “You were in the Academy, right?”

Kakashi tapped my shoulder, while the kids whisked Tenzō away. I turned to frown at him.

“Don’t look at me like that. This was Sensei’s idea,” Kakashi said in a low voice.

“I’m not angry, Kakashi,” I replied, equally quiet. “I’m just…confused. He tried to kill you, didn’t he?”

“We’re rehabilitating him,” Kakashi said.

“That…okay. Does that mean we should expect to see random assholes offering him candy?”

Kakashi looked blank.

Well, apparently that metaphor didn’t work across cultures. Even if I knew that kid-snatching was definitely still a thing, maybe it didn’t take the exact same form as the stereotypical white van route…

“Are they re-recruiting this kid or not?”

“Sensei doesn’t think so,” Kakashi said, as Gai dragged Genma on ahead with the kids. Raidō followed with a grumble. “He’s been out of their hands for too long, either in therapy or with me. The conditioning breaks down over time.”

Why did I get the feeling that that last bit was something that they’d tried and tested? How many other ROOT kids were being carefully deprogrammed even now? I’d given Sensei a start, but I didn’t know what he’d done with that lead. Maybe Shimura had mysteriously broken a hip while at home alone? Fuck if I knew. He could have dismantled ROOT entirely and I would only be informed after the fact if he didn’t need to bounce an idea or two off me.

I felt like I’d set the figurative barn on fire by setting Sensei on Danzō. I not only couldn’t close the barn doors after all the horses had fled, but I also didn’t want to. Sticking around would only mean getting burned.

I sighed. “Okay. Not totally on board with this plan, but I’ll work with that. He deserves better, anyway.”

Kakashi nodded seriously. “I thought you’d say that.”

Well, there was something to be said for being predictable in a non-insulting way. “By the way, did you see Rin or Obito anywhere?”
“Back by the okonomiyaki, I think. Obito was playing a game.”

“Still?” It could not possibly take that long for Obito to either cheat successfully or get banned from a stall.

Kakashi shrugged. “I have to keep an eye on Tenzō. You can go find them if you want.”

I debated it for about ten seconds.

“I’ll make sure the others don’t stray,” Kakashi offered, reluctantly.

“Thanks, Kakashi!” And I was off, using my chakra sense to pinpoint my other friends.

But as soon as I approached, Obito’s chakra headed off into the crowd someplace, leaving Rin alone and hunched over on a bench in her butterfly-patterned summer yukata. I slowed down, practically feeling the grade-A awkward in the air. If I’d had a knife sharp enough, I probably could have carved it out of the air and sold it as cheap building material.

“Rin?” I called, heading closer.

Rin looked up, sighed, and patted the bench next to her.

I sat down. “You all right?”

“No really,” Rin mumbled, and leaned on my shoulder. “Sorry, everything’s just…complicated.”

I patted Rin’s hand. “Talk it out with me? It might help.”

Rin sighed again, deeper this time. “It’s hard to…”

“…Then, uh, can I kinda poke at things?” How did well-adjusted human beings do this kind of thing? Because I was also thinking of getting a carton of ice cream or something and having an old-fashioned bitching session, but wasn’t sure what about. “You can tell me to shut up.”

Rin made a noncommittal noise. “Remember how, um, you told me about Obito. After Kannabi?”

…So that hadn’t been the best way to handle it. I fucking admit it already. “Yeah. I’m sorry, that was a lot of stuff—”

“Obito and I talked,” Rin interrupted, “and he told me his feelings, and we talked more, but…”

“No spark?” I’d been there before. But not in this life.

“No! It’s…it’s just…” Rin sighed. “Complicated.”

“…Okay?” Yeah, I was out of my depth.

“You don’t understand, Kei.” Rin paused, trying to decide what to say next. “I…I do like Obito a lot. I’m okay with knowing that, with that part of me. I might not like him as much as he does me, but…”

I let her squeeze my hand as she took a deep breath. She said, “But I also like Kakashi. And that…that hurts him, and it hurts me sometimes, too. I’ve been in love—or something like it—with Kakashi for a long time, and it doesn’t feel like it’s going anywhere.” Another sigh. “He even told me that.”

“Wait, Kakashi told you he didn’t care about your feelings?” I felt a surge of defensive anger. I knew he didn’t like Rin that way, but there were ways to put things gently! “Fucking hell, I knew I was gonna have to…” To what? Yell at him over something he couldn’t change anyway?

“Kei! Don’t.”

I grumbled.

“I wasn’t finished.” Rin blew out an angry breath. “Do I have to spell it out for you? Kakashi can’t love me, because he just doesn’t. That’s okay. I’ve… I’ve thought for a long time that he’s been in love with someone else. But my feelings don’t change and that drives me crazy.”

Oh. Damn, this was a mess. “…Did he let you down gently?”

“He tried.” Rin’s voice turned wry. “But I don’t think there’s any way to really do that. He respects me as a medic-nin and a woman, but he doesn’t look at me that way.”

“I’m sorry, Rin.”

Rin waved a hand dismissively, as if warding off the apology. “Don’t worry about it. You didn’t know.”

“No, I was being an insensitive bitch.” I sighed, pulling on the hairclips I’d put in just because they fit my yukata. Now they were something to do with my idle hands. “I’m sorry. You’re still working things out up here,” I tapped the side of her head, gently. “And I shouldn’t have pushed.”

“Yeah.” Rin sighed. Sighs were apparently quite contagious. “I’m…it hurts, to be told you’re not that special. He probably didn’t mean it that way, but… Well. I’m just going to have to take my broken heart somewhere else, right?”

“I’m hoping Obito isn’t the rebound guy in this scenario.”

“He’s not.” Rin pinched my wrist, and once she got an “ow!” out of me, she went on, “I’m taking things way slower this time. I need to know I can love him the way he does me before I say anything.” She looked down at the tops of her sandals. “There’s a chance. But I didn’t want to say anything tonight, and I don’t know how he took it…”

“…I’m sorry you got hurt, Rin,” I said, after a long pause. “I’m sorry everything’s such a mess.”

“It’s not anyone’s fault but mine,” Rin said. “I’ll fall out of love sooner or later. Then maybe I’ll be able to give Obito a fair shot.”

“Are you going to be okay?” I asked.

“I know I will be,” Rin said, determined. “Don’t worry about me, Kei.”

Fat chance of that. I worried regardless of whether I wanted to. Everyone else didn’t really come into it.

I said, “Well, are you feeling okay enough to go join our group? I…I probably need to find Obito.”

Rin gave me a clueless look. “Look for him? Obito went to get—”

And then Obito’s chakra was back again, bounding back from the food stalls and over to us. Once he was actually in view, I could see that he had won one of those stuffed pandas, and was carrying two taiyaki in paper packets along with a selection of foods on sticks.
“Kei?” Obito dropped the panda on the bench next to Rin, then juggled the various food items for a moment before catching them again. I spotted two skewers of yakitori to start with. There were six more of various things. “When did you get here?”

“Just a minute ago,” I said, deciding to pretend nothing had been said or happened over the last few minutes. “Gai won a turtle.”

“That jerk! I told him I was gonna be there in a minute!” Obito pouted. “Rin-chan, here.”

Rin took the offered taiyaki and bit into it immediately, probably so she wouldn’t have to talk. Well, if that was the tactic she wanted to use, I could help.

“He gave the turtle to Yūgao-chan, though.” What else could I distract him with? “Also, is that a chocolate banana? Gimme!”

Obito dutifully surrendered his remaining sweets to Rin and me. “Rin-chan, Kei, do you mind if I, um, go catch up to everyone else?” He paused awkwardly, as though carefully assessing our body language for any kind of indication that we wanted to get up and move. He didn’t find it.

“Go ahead, Obito,” I said, since Rin was still eating the taiyaki.

“I can be back in a minute?” Obito hesitated.

Rin swallowed and said, “I’m just going to rest here for a little while. We’ll catch up.”

He still looked torn.

“Seriously, I’m not gonna let her get lost,” I said. I straightened my legs and flexed my toes. “I just need a breather.”

“Get going, Obito,” Rin said, chuckling. “You’re not missing anything here.”

Obito nodded, then dashed off through the stalls. I wasn’t quite sure how he was going to locate the rest of the group, but maybe he could sense his connection to Kakashi’s Sharingan? Hell if I knew. Maybe he’d get lost and the rest would find him.

“Have you ever tried to talk about this stuff before?” I asked Rin, once Obito was well out of earshot.

Rin made a muffled negative noise, having started on the second taiyaki.

“I admit to being…not really the best person to talk to about this…” Mainly due to having zero romantic experience. “But I’m willing to listen if you want or need me to. I’ll try not to push as much.”

Rin wiped her mouth with her sleeve and mumbled, “Thanks, Kei.”

I hugged her. “No problem, Rin.”

“Kei.”

“Yeah?”

“Have you ever been in love?” Rin asked.

Counting both lifetimes? “Nope.”
Rin blinked. “Really?”

“Really. Crushes, yes, but love? I love people, sure, but I’ve never been ‘in love’ before.” Or at the very least, I was very good at squashing those urges before they did anything. "Like, right now, I could say that I love Hayate, Obito, and Kakashi, and you, and like half a dozen other people. That means I’ll kill or be killed trying to make sure you can all be safe and happy, but…” I shrugged. "It’s not what you’re talking about."

“Crushing on someone doesn’t make you stupid, Rin.” I said. “And neither does falling in love, but I guess…take it slow? I’ve never been burned because I never let things get anywhere anyway, but…”

“But…” Rin sighed. “But what if I keep just…I’m being pulled in too many directions.”

I waited for her to say something else.

“I…I love Kakashi, I think,” Rin mumbled, resting her head in her hands. “But sometimes it feels like I love Obito, more like he does me, and…”

What exactly was I supposed to say here?

“And sometimes I love you, but it can’t all be true, right?” Rin mumbled something else, then dropped her head against my shoulder in what would have been a head-to-desk moment of sheer frustration if I’d been a desk.

“I don’t know, Rin.” I rested my cheek against the top of her head. “But I’m sorry I can’t really help you there. My brain doesn’t think that way, not really.” Oh, I jealously guarded what social bonds I had and could be terrifyingly protective, but that wasn’t the same as what Rin was talking about. Not even close.

And even if it was, I couldn’t give her anything like what she was asking. That kind of hollowness wasn’t my thing—I had to really believe in what I was doing, or it’d fall apart on the spot.

“I’ll be fine, Kei,” Rin said, shaking me off. She hopped off the bench and to her feet. “I think we can go back to the festival now. I need to do something fun.”

“Like?” I asked, even as I got up to follow her.

“I don’t know. Just…something silly and fun so we can get back to business tomorrow and not worry too much?” Rin smiled, though it was wobbly.

“Tanabata wishes, maybe?” I suggested, heading in the general direction of where our group had run off. From the feel of things, everyone was having fun.

“Maybe. Maybe I’ll get a mask and scare Obito. Or get a strawberry daifuku.” She brightened at that last prospect.

“Rin?”

“Hm?” She turned to look at me.

“I’m sorry, again.” If Rin had a flaw, it was her heart. She loved too much, and it sounded like a horrible thing to think about anyone, much less her. “That I can’t…I can’t love anyone like that. Not yet.”
Not on demand. Not when confessed to. My heart was a slow thing, and clueless as all get out. It didn’t change in the face of new information. It, and I, were strangely stubborn like that. Inflexible.

Rin took my hand. “It’s okay, Kei. Let’s get back to the others.”

We did.

And by the time we got there, my teammates and Gai were embroiled in another challenge—competitive ring tossing, this time.

It lasted until Rin snuck up behind Obito, wearing a cartoonish cat mask, and shrieked loud enough to startle him and accidentally send him into the booth itself in a brief panic. She made it up to him (and the rest of us) later by getting strawberry daifuku for everyone, grinning all the while.

“How do you feel, Tenzō-kun?” I asked some time later, when our group had finally retired to a nearby park for the night. Not to sleep, unless we wore ourselves out entirely, but there was a huge picnic blanket and my brother was using my leg as a pillow anyway.

Raidō was drinking something, though he was disinclined to share in a catlike sort of way. Genma sat next to him and was examining some of the prizes from the evening’s games, including the turtle that Yūgao had claimed. Obito and Gai were playing hanafuda to my left with Rin and Kakashi spectating, while Yūgao was puzzling out one of those weird get-the-ball-into-the-wooden-cup things. Iruka hummed, admiring a silk fan he’d won someplace in the orange lantern light. All of us had made Tanabata wishes, though Tenzo and Kakashi had needed a bit of persuading.

I had a good wish, but I sure wasn’t gonna tell anyone.

Tenzō sat placidly next to me, slowly eating a chocolate-covered banana. We were all going to have to work our asses off in training to burn these junk calories, but hey, festivals were for fun’s sake. I could live with that. “I’m…I’m happy. This was fun, Kei-san.”

I patted his shoulder. It was.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter is dedicated in loving memory of Zeus, who had to be put down earlier this week. Gonna miss you, buddy.

Song-derived chapter title is courtesy of the Goo Goo Dolls.
“The Chūnin Exams?” I blinked, setting my bowl of ramen down on the countertop again. I stared at my brother, who sat next to me and was pointedly, almost shamefully averting his eyes from mine and concentrating on his shrimp ramen.

I looked at his teammates, who occupied the third and fourth seats at Ichiraku’s front counter, and who were looking between Hayate and me with expectant expressions.

“We can only enter with a full team,” Iruka said, leaning over to try to get a look at Hayate’s expression.

I said, puzzled, “I know. I’m just not sure why you’re asking me about it.”

True, the Exams weren’t going to happen for almost two months, and were in Suna this time around. And they were also a bit mystifying for the uninitiated. But while all of these facts were, in fact, facts and not just speculation, I didn’t really see why they were taking it this soon.

“Inoichi-sensei thinks you’re ready?” I looked at all three of the genin, propping my head up on my curled fingers.

“He gave us the option of taking it, anyway,” Yūgao mumbled.

I sighed. Time to explain my thinking. “Okay, I don’t deny being worried about this kinda thing, since you’re going to be spending a month in a foreign village and that freaks me out. Yūgao, Iruka, you’ve both had this conversation with your parents?”

Two nods.

Okay, then. So the problem was my brother.

“Hayate, you’re probably more ready to take on the Exams than I was the first time.” I paused. Then I told him, “But I’d still been a genin for two full years before I passed. Do you think you’re ready?”

Hayate finally met my eyes, looking more determined (or perhaps stubborn) than he’d seemed since the day he’d come back from his team’s first C-ranked mission. “I do.”

“Then, while I’ll probably want to wring Inoichi-san’s neck if you get hurt, I’m not going to ban you from going.” I stirred my ramen idly. “But I’m gonna make sure all three of you get some more training, as quick as we can pull it off.”

“You are?” Iruka looked surprised.
“If you think the goal is just to go there and pass, you’re wrong.” Maybe my blunt tone and slightly evil grin were a bit too much? Regardless, all three kids flinched. “The Chūnin Exams are where the best and the brightest of each village show off their skills to clients and show just what we can do. By the time Sensei heads there—and he’d better, because Kage get-togethers only happen if the villages have got competitors in the finals—all three of you should be impressive.”

“…We’re dead,” Iruka said faintly. “So, so dead.”

“Can you maybe not kill us?” Yūgao asked. “Pretty please?”

“Who said anything about killing you? No, you’re just going to be training.” At their looks of relief, I added with a level of cheerful sadism, “Gai-kun needs a few sparring partners before his next mission. Maybe he’ll help you train. I’ll be joining, of course…”

Three groans.

“Now, technically I can’t force you to attend,” I said. “But I’d really recommend it, even if you feel like you have to beg permission from Inoichi-san.”

I was going to be hanging with Gai as a congratulations for being field-promoted to full jōnin, but the kids didn’t have to be there. But it didn’t change the fact that Gai was one of the best people in the village to power-level with. He was always up for it, for one, and that made him pretty damn awesome.

Being one of the few people in the village with a healing factor strong enough to keep up with him, I could say that without any degree of irony.

“What are we going to be facing in the Suna Chūnin Exams that’s so scary?” Hayate asked. “It’s…it’s just like ours, right?”

“Not so much.” At their surprised looks, I said, “I’ve never been to a foreign exam. I can tell you a bit about what you could run into, just because you’ll facing Suna genin, but the main scare factor is that it’s basically going to be your team plus whoever else the village can put together. In a foreign country. Backup’s a week away at best, and I’m not gonna be there until the Third Exam. Foreign Kage aren’t allowed in other villages before then.” I paused, thinking. “I’ll ask Sensei for more info, but you should also ask Inoichi-san.”

Yūgao frowned. “Doesn’t Suna have…puppets?”

“Right. The Puppet Brigade is one of Sunagakure’s oldest organizations, and a lot of their shinobi have at least the basics of puppet-based combat in mind when fighting.” Hm. What else? “You’re also going to see a lot of Wind chakra natures, to say the least. Maybe you should ask Inoichi-san to give you the paper test so you know what you’re getting into on that front.”

Hayate looked at Iruka.

“What?”

“Did you get the paper test thing?” Hayate asked.

“Yeah. I got a Fire-Water split thing, I think. Mom and Dad made sure I knew before I graduated,” Iruka explained. Well, I supposed there were some benefits to having two jōnin for parents. They were quite sensible people.

“Yūgao-chan?” I prompted.
“I…don’t know.” She frowned. “I should talk to Inoichi-sensei, too, then?”

I nodded. “It’d help.”

“I don’t think I’m Water.” Hayate stuck out his lower lip and pouted. “That would’ve been cool.”

“We don’t actually know what Mom’s chakra nature was, either,” I remarked. “For all I know, she might not have known either. It’s not like samurai train for ninjutsu.”

“Then I’ll get it tested and come back and tell you.” Hayate paused, contemplating life, the universe, or possibly just his bowl of ramen. “Sis, what about Tenzō-san?”

“What about him?”

“Is he going to be in the Exams, too?” Iruka asked, leaning over so he could see me. “Tenzō-san was strong that one time he showed up for training, and he has Wood Release.”

“Tenzō-kun is already a chūnin,” I informed Team Inoichi. “I think he made chūnin…uh, seven years ago? Before I did, anyway.”

“No way,” breathed Hayate. “But he’s our age!”

I shrugged helplessly. “Sorry, I just heard from Kakashi. If it hadn’t been him, I wouldn’t have believed it either.”

“Well, then I’m gonna make chūnin this time.” Hayate said.

“So will I.” Yūgao said. “Then maybe we’ll all become jōnin together!”

Iruka looked a little dubious, but shrugged and smiled along with his team anyway. Then he got around to finishing his ramen.

I supposed I could follow his example. In short order, Ichiraku’s was silent except for the sounds of slurping soup.

Honestly, it would be interesting to find out what, exactly, I could do to help these kids grow stronger. I just hoped that I would be able to see him grow.

About a week and another C-ranked mission for Team Inoichi later, Hayate got back to me on the whole chakra nature question. Not that I’d been waiting for him to tell me or anything.

Over the previous week, I’d also found out that Sensei had been the one pushing for a foreign exam—something about how showing Suna up on their home turf would confirm our military superiority. Or at least that was how he’d framed his argument to the Elders (still sans Danzō) when they questioned him about it. It would also put him in range of another Kage for the first time since his inauguration, and I thought he kinda wanted to see how he stacked up.

Personally, I wanted to see what the Fourth Kazekage had done to fuck up his kids this early in the timeline. I didn’t know if Sensei’s tentative alliance thing with Suna would amount to anything as far as Gaara was concerned, but…maybe taking the economic pressures off would help, somewhat? I didn’t know. I didn’t even know enough about Sunagakure and its harebrained tendencies to make a guess.
Anyway, back to the day my brother came home. It was late afternoon and I had just gotten back from the training fields, feeling a little like I’d been hit with a meat tenderizer a couple hundred times. Gai’s celebratory spar had lasted almost fifteen minutes, but only as a warmup for the three-hour training session. Gai was fun and funny like that.

“Lightning!” Hayate reported, bouncing into the apartment and getting road dust on everything. “Yūgao-chan got Wind, but Inoichi-sensei says we can learn other types if we train really hard.” He made a face. “But that’s not gonna help me in the next Exam. Didn’t you have to train for months to do all that stuff?”

“Yes.” I shoved a plate of onigiri toward him without looking, since I was still trying to figure out how to make okonomiyaki on a skillet. My journey toward mastering cookery was slow going, but there was some progress. “Dinner, Hayate.”

When Hayate fell on the plate with all the hunger of a growing teenage boy. Rice flew.

But while he ate, I thought.

I thought of a clear evening in the Konoha summer, when an Oto genin was crushed into paste for the crime of pissing Gaara off. When Suna and Oto forces met to conspire toward Konoha’s destruction. I thought of my brother being ripped apart by a Wind jutsu at the hands of someone barely older than I was. About Yūgao, fully grown, finding his corpse on a rooftop and never being able to find her fiancé’s killer.

I very carefully thought about something else until my hands stopped shaking.

“Adamantine Chakra CHAINS!”

“…So I guess she’s reentering active service?” I asked Sensei, as Kushina tore Training Ground Thirty-Eight apart.

Sensei, who was lying on his stomach with Naruto sitting in the bowl of his arms (and pulling on his hair), grinned and said, “Maybe!”

We were well out of danger, hanging out near a slightly-misplaced Hashirama tree and otherwise not really participating. Sure, Sensei would later—but only once Kushina wore out her current opponent. Or trapped him in her chakra chains, which was a distinct possibility. If she could hold Kurama of all people…

“Grand Fireball Jutsu!” was Obito’s retort, audible from across the field and accompanied by a gigantic fireball of death.

For almost anyone else. But Kushina? Hah. She didn’t even need Kurama’s chakra to shred it.

“You’re not worried that Kushina is going to hurt Obito, are you?” Sensei asked, while Naruto progressed from merely pulling on his father’s hair to trying to eat it.

I reassessed my body language. While I was leaning forward a bit, I was still sitting crisscrossed on the ground and had a sealing scroll out in front of me, complete with all of my sealing supplies. Theoretically, I could have been a little anxious, but, “Obito’s slippery, and Kushina-san doesn’t really want to hurt him. I think they’ll have fun.”
There was another explosion, deep in the midst of the training fields. Given the lack of immediate follow-up, I had to assume that someone had been momentarily scared off.

“I think that one’s Kushina’s.” Sensei tapped the corner of my testing paper. “Her point.”

I dutifully gave Kushina’s side of the paper another tally. The score was, at that moment, four to Obito and seven to Kushina, but I held out hope for a turnaround.

Task completed, I asked, “So how’s Naruto doing? No trouble sleeping, or any of that other stuff?”

“Well,” Sensei began, before carefully extracting his long side-locks from his son’s mouth, “I think he’s doing well. He doesn’t sleep through the night, but he’s stopped screaming when he needs a diaper change or if he’s hungry. At night, anyway.”

“That might be the best you can hope for,” I replied.

“Paaaaah,” was Naruto’s articulate contribution to the conversation. “Papa!”

Sensei’s attention was immediately back on his son. “What is it, Naruto? Hungry?”

He pointed at me and wiggled into a sitting position in his frog-green onesie, still entrapped in Sensei’s arms. As he laboriously climbed up Sensei’s bicep, he whined, “Kiii…”

“Kei, Naruto-chan.” I wiggled my ink-stained fingers at him. “No touchie.”

Naruto pouted, climbing up onto Sensei’s back and then grasping fistfuls of his hair. “Papapa!”

“I’m not really sure what he wants me to do, here. He’s not really pulling.” Sensei gave me a helpless look. “Kei?”

“Naruto-chan might want a ride.” I shrugged. “But hey, it’s around noon. I guess he might want lunch if Kushina didn’t feed him before getting us. Or maybe he just wants Kushina-san.”

“Naruto-chan, is your daddy not enough for you?” Sensei asked, craning his neck so he could peer at his son over his shoulder.

“Mama!” was Naruto’s response.

“That kid is going to be spoiled if you’re not careful,” I told him, as another distant explosion rocked the training field.

“I like to think we’re better parents than that.” Sensei’s head jerked as Naruto tugged experimentally on his hair. “Ow!”

“…Uh-huh.” I finished my latest genjutsu seal with a flourish, then capped the sealing brush and pushed the scroll into the sun to dry. While I loved fūinjutsu, sometimes the actual work of creating seals was tedious. “Anyway, I made a bet with Rin that I lost, so…are you two going to have any more kids?”

Sensei choked.

“Seriously?” I said, while Naruto burst into likely-unrelated giggles. “I’m fifteen. I’ve heard this whole thing before. But I do want to know if you’ve come up with any precautions that are better than what happened when this little guy was born. Seeing as I’d probably be tapped for guard duty again.”
“I…uh, yes?” Sensei coughed. “Kushina and I haven’t…um. Well, it’ll be her choice.”

“…Okay.” I shrugged. Ultimately, it wasn’t really my business.

“Kei, is there a reason you’re worried Naruto will grow up spoiled?” Sensei asked, as Naruto industriously turned himself around on his father’s back and pushed himself up. Naruto’s own personal Hokage Mountain gave him a better vantage point to see things than he would have been able to manage on his own.

“Kinda, yeah,” I said, as another explosion sounded from the wooded part of the training area. At the rate Kushina and Obito were going, I wondered if they were going to have to replant the area themselves.

Almost as an afterthought, I picked up a security seal I’d made during my musings and activated it. Its radius was about five meters and included a genjutsu component, which was enough to baffle eavesdroppers. “In the…other world, Naruto grew up pretty much alone. Sort of like Obito, but,” I wobbled a hand, “worse.”

Sensei nodded, looking a little confused.

“I mean, Kakashi wasn’t fit to be a parent at all, as a traumatized fourteen-year-old ANBU operative, and Jiraiya was off doing stuff for the sake of the village, so the only consistent adult presence he had in his life was the Third Hokage. Who was, as you might imagine, really busy.” At Sensei’s second nod, I went on, “Which effectively meant Naruto had no consistent adult support until age twelve.”

Sensei’s eyes narrowed. Naruto made a noise that sounded like “Mama!” again, but didn’t move. He sat contentedly on his father’s back, watching clouds overhead.

“Looking at his history in that world, and how he used it to empathize with others—up to and including Kurama—well.” I sighed. “But it doesn’t really make up for the fact that his early life was frankly terrible. I can understand the argument that the upbringing of a child has a massive influence on who they’ll be as adults, but…there were a lot of chances for Naruto to fail. And I don’t feel like the core of what Naruto was—will be—is only tied up in his crappy childhood.”

Naruto made a happy burbling sound and twisted around again, deciding that his father’s hair was still the most interesting thing within reach.

“I’m not sure I follow your reasoning, Kei.” Sensei paused, reached up, and gently deposited his son on the ground.

Naruto immediately put one hand on Sensei’s back and wobbled to his feet, using Sensei like a guiderail.

“I don’t know. Maybe Naruto won’t be vital to the mental health and morale of the entire world,” I mumbled, half to myself. “But I guess…I guess I just want him to grow up into a good person. A happy kid, but one who can also see the other side of people’s stories and listen, since that’s what a lot of people seem to need.”

“Who says we have to wait until he grows up?” Sensei mused aloud. “I don’t know about you, but I think there’s a chance that, if all of us work together, maybe we can build that kinder world you’re dreaming of. Maybe then, Naruto won’t have to carry that burden—that dream-alone.”

My answering smile was a little sardonic. Maybe a little sad. “We’ve already gotten started, in some ways.”
“I think you have, yes.” At my surprised look, Sensei added, “I do notice things, Kei. You make a point to look out for your teammates and whoever else crosses your path. It doesn’t really matter if you’re doing it out of pragmatism or because you genuinely care about everyone—the results seem to be the same. After all, that genjutsu of yours showed us that Kushina and I are only alive because of the changes you made with Obito. That’s just one example.”

“I tried,” I mumbled. “But right before we went to Mount Myōboku—I’d hit my limit.” I drummed my fingers on my knee. “That’s why, um, it’s why I decided to tell you everything that time. In hindsight, anyway. Once we’d gotten Obito back, there wasn’t much else I could do to secure the future without the Hokage’s explicit or implicit blessing. And everyone knew you were going to be Hokage, so…”

“And with Kurama?” Sensei prompted.

“I really didn’t think that was going to work,” I admitted. “I’d been working with Isobu for months, but he’s a lot less angry than Kurama is. Or was.” Pausing to reorganize my thoughts, I went on, “But one thing about the resurrected Madara—or even Tobi, during the late parts of the Fourth Shinobi World War—was that to them, the Tailed Beasts were just weapons. And they hated that. I mean, the old guard like to pretend that a shinobi is just a weapon, but we’re more than that and we know it. But no one ever gave the Tailed Beasts a second thought on that count.”

“True.” Sensei gently steered Naruto back toward me, since he’d been carefully making his way toward Sensei’s feet. “I admit…I didn’t either. But that’s in the past. Kurama’s been calmer, at least according to Kushina, and he isn’t as restricted as he was. I guess he’s so old that his subjective view of time is different than ours, since Kushina said he doesn’t seem to mind waiting until Naruto can talk back to him.”

“He might regret that.” Naruto chose that moment to crawl into my lap like a puppy, flopped across my legs. “Hey, Naruto-chan. Can you say ‘why’?”

Sensei winced. “Please, don’t teach him that one on purpose.”

“Woo?” said Naruto.

I smiled. “Close enough.”

There was one last explosion, and then Kushina shouted in triumph.

“Guess it’s over, then.” Sensei pushed himself back into a sitting position. Then he leaned over to brush his knuckles across Naruto’s marked cheek. “Your mother’s done very well today. I’m sure she’ll be able to run mission if she wants.”

The air next to my elbow wavered, twisting like a midair drain, and Obito appeared out of the portal. And then he hit the ground in what looked like a fairly painful belly-flop, groaning, “Kushina-san is evil…”

“It’s not her fault your chakra capacity’s lower than hers, Obito.” I poked him in the shoulder. “Are you hurt?”

“My pride, mostly.” Obito struggled for a moment, then rolled over onto his back. “Ow.”

“Oboo?” said Naruto. He wriggled off my lap and toward Obito, grabbing Obito’s shirt sleeve between his tiny fingers. “Itoo.”

Sensei grinned. “He almost got it that time.”
Naruto got bored with Obito’s dusty sleeve after a moment and then climbed up onto his chest. It gave him a better angle to touch his face, which was what our resident toddler immediately did. “Itoo?”

While Naruto ran his tiny hands over the whorls over the right side of Obito’s face, I looked up when I felt Kushina approach.

She was honestly hard to miss. In her special jōnin uniform—tight pants, short sleeves, and her long red hair done up in a ponytail—Kushina looked more professional and ready for a fight than I could easily remember. She also had her fair share of dirt and splinters everywhere, but she was still grinning madly as she jogged up to us.

She immediately tackled Sensei back to the ground, riding a victory high for all it was worth. “That was awesome!”

“Mama!” Naruto said, and bounced off Obito’s chest—drawing an “oof!” from him—to stumble toward his parents.

I would have said “his mother,” but since Sensei was still flat on his back thanks to Kushina’s exuberance and Kushina was still on top of him, he was really heading for both of them.

Kushina rolled off Sensei and held out her arms to her little blond bundle of joy. “Come to mommy, Naruto!”

“Mama!” Naruto giggled, and was swept up into a hug.

Sensei sat up again, smiling in a wry sort of way. Of course Naruto was going to favor his mother—both in terms of the strength of their bond, and in terms of taking after her in personality—at this age. Sensei was at the office most of the time that Naruto was awake, making these moments relatively rare and doubly precious.

(Though maybe he should have put a small playpen in his office anyway.)

Sensei got to his feet and brushed the dirt and grass from his pants. “I think it’s about time I head back to work. Obito, Kushina, are you heading back to the house?”

“I am, but only to change.” Kushina plucked a piece of grass from Naruto’s hair and shifted him so he was lying against her flak jacket’s shoulder pad. “Naruto and I are going to visit Mikoto-chan later. Obito?”

“I think I’m going home.” Obito sat up, though with difficulty. “I’m beat.”

“Kei?” Sensei prompted.

“I promised Genma I’d give him some more genjutsu senbon in exchange for a barrier seal design,” I said. “I can be at the office in a few minutes, if I’m needed.”

Sensei shook his head. “No, Shimika will be with me. It’s fine.”

Not that I had anything against the Aburame woman, but… Okay, so maybe I was a little paranoid. I needed to stop being quite that bad.

I picked up my security seal and deactivated it, then tucked it into a pocket. Unlike explosives, I could get these things to work more than once. Also unlike explosives, they didn’t take people’s fingers off if I got mad. Truly, a terrible price to pay.
“Sensei, for the Chūnin Exams, are you going to bring all of us, or just a few?” By “us,” I meant the Hokage Guard Platoon. I mean, there weren’t that many of us—though Obito could actually show up for the job now that he wasn’t splitting his time—but I imagined that at least a couple of us would be a part of the Konoha entourage when it headed to Suna.

Assuming that any of our genin made the finals, anyway.

Sensei shrugged. “I’ll decide once I’ve talked it over with the veterans. It’ll be my first foreign Exam as Hokage, and a first for you two, period. So I’d like to make sure I know what I’ll be doing. I’ll let you know once I’ve figured it out.”

“Ohay. In that case, see you tomorrow.”

And I took off to Genma’s place a little after that, leaving everyone else to sort themselves out.

Maybe it wasn’t fair of me in hindsight, but in the month leading up to the final confirmation of competitors for Suna’s Chūnin Exam, I pretty much drilled my brother into the ground.

Hayate wasn’t weak, but he wasn’t a powerhouse like the members of my team. None of the members of his team were capable of just powering through threats. So they needed skill and guile. Aside from the benefits of being relatively small and therefore easily overlooked, I really couldn’t do much for them. I could teach them how to make better traps, or even give them some of my seals, but it didn’t affect their thinking.

Most of my ability to deceive people hadn’t been learned for combat purposes. Since Isobu, I didn’t hide my advantages in combat so much as…I just didn’t use them as much as I could. While I had his chakra, I preferred to use my own and my skill in kenjutsu rather than just going for the nuclear option.

I taught Hayate kenjutsu and maybe a bit of fūinjutsu—the kind that exploded on purpose—and tried to see what I could do for Yūgao and Iruka. More kenjutsu, traps—whatever they needed in order to round out the education Inoichi had already given them. I went with the assumption that having Inoichi for a sensei had made them clever in a way that being genin alone could not. That was half the point of having jōnin-led teams in the first place.

In late January, a little after Sensei turned twenty-six, I finally got more information about the Exams.

In addition to Team Inoichi (whose official designation was apparently “Konoha Team Four”), there was another team made of competitors I recognized immediately.

Konoha’s Team Makoto was composed of Anko Mitarashi, Kotetsu Hagane, and Izumo Kamizuki. They were being led by a red-haired woman named Makoto Kiyotaka, who I vaguely recognized as a one-time member of one of Sensei’s various combat teams. I was pretty sure she was in Intelligence somewhere, like Inoichi.

I had no doubt that the team had been reshuffled. Anko’s old sensei, who was very nearly Voldemort, had turned out to be a traitor years ago, meaning that there wasn’t much chance of her being able to take the Exam with her team’s old roster. There was even a possibility that he’d left earlier than he would have otherwise, since I couldn’t remember the time he’d been outed as a monster in the other timeline anyway. That would have shot her promotion chances straight to hell.

There were four other teams, but I didn’t recognize any of them and therefore didn’t really make note of them.

After the meeting where the jōnin nominated their teams, we retired to the Hokage’s office and its legion of security seals.

“And I’m taking you along for the Finals, if our teams get that far.” Sensei leaned back in his chair and looked contemplatively up at the ceiling. “Along with…hm. Obito, Kakashi, and Rin.”

“Why Rin?” I asked, looking up from examining one of the barrier seal kunai I’d made with Genma’s design. It was fascinating to see what an independent seal-user could make, though I personally wasn’t as interested in straight-up barriers as he was. Then again, I also wasn’t interested in genjutsu seals as much more than a proof of concept, so maybe I wasn’t the best judge.

“I think we need a medic, just in case.” Sensei sighed. “I would like to have Tsunade along, because she’s already proven against Sunagakure’s poisons, but I need her here to act as interim Hokage.”

“…I bet she was happy about that,” I said in a dry voice.

“She may have threatened…things.” Sensei still managed to smile, though. “I’m sure she wasn’t serious. And anyway, I can’t really trust Sarutobi-sama to keep the councilman under wraps, as it were. Tsunade doesn’t like that snake any more than I do.”

“And Jiraiya-sama?” I asked, turning the barrier kunai over in my fingers. I needed to test it…

“Not even in the village anymore.” Sensei shrugged. “I could order him back, but I’m fairly certain I know where he is. He’s not subtle if he doesn’t want to be.”

“Doesn’t that defeat the point of having a roaming spymaster?” I asked.

“Just because our enemies know where he goes doesn’t mean they know what he finds out. And Jiraiya-sensei can basically do what he needs to, where he is now.” Sensei sat up properly. “So, back to Rin. She’s been learning under some of the best medic-nin on the continent for years, Tsunade included. While I doubt that she’s learned how to kick a mountain in half, I think she was last certified in advanced poison treatment.”

Rin was definitely progressing faster than I’d thought. “She didn’t mention that the last time I saw her,” I remarked, but I was smiling despite my word choice. I was happy for Rin. Anything else was secondary.

“I think she took her prophecy very seriously,” Sensei said.

“…Hm.”

Kakashi had already met Tenzō and befriended him faster than I would have thought possible. We might have already killed the man in black—or rather, the thing that had been a shadowy chakra parasite, which had been controlling Obito. I wasn't sure if that counted. I didn’t know anything about dead gods for certain, though the Ten-Tails certainly seemed like one candidate…

I was still stumped for definite “dragonling” candidates. And it wasn’t like I planned on getting a genin team for at least a few years, regardless of this destiny stuff.

Because on one hand, Team Seven (or Team Kakashi) would eventually grow to be as destructive as any dragon. But I didn’t want to be their primary teacher, now or ever. Sure, I was a jinchūriki already—and some would argue that there wasn’t much worse out there—but I was fairly certain that I’d die of a stress-induced heart attack based solely on their shenanigans. I already had enough to worry about with Hayate, and he didn’t practically have “Main Characters” stamped on him.

As for other candidates…Uchiha clan kids? I wasn’t sure. Breathing fire would be good, I supposed, but I wasn’t sure what I’d be able to teach them without knowing for certain that the Uchiha massacre wasn’t going to happen. I’d cut some of the events leading up to it short—like Sensei’s death—but I didn’t know for sure. And if it turned out that Shimura was somehow responsible for my (hypothetical future) students’ deaths…

That would be bad. For everyone.

And then, finally…the Chinatsugumi would be another resource. Much as I hated to think about them in that context.

The Chinatsugumi, though they hadn’t apparently realized it, were all either reincarnations or at least creepily similar to some figures I’d thought I’d made up in my last life. I didn’t have proof of it either way, much like how there was no physical evidence of my reincarnation except for the scars in my head. But the old me had loved dragons. Probably about as much as Daenerys Targaryen.

Who knew? Maybe the dragon motif had carried over. I didn’t think the Great Toad Sage would pick up this kind of absurd detail, but maybe I was underestimating his abilities.

Or maybe all of this was just speculation. I didn’t know. I’d never really been clairvoyant, after all.

“Kei, can I see that kunai?” Sensei asked, startling me out of my reverie.

“Sure.” I tossed it at him without activating the seal, so he easily caught it between two fingers.

“Hm. This isn’t a standard design.” Sensei whipped a Flying Thunder God kunai out of nowhere and examined the seals closely. “Then again, neither is mine. Did Shiranui-kun happen to name this?”

“Nope. Why?”

“I feel like it needs one.” Sensei was eyeing the seal on the metal speculatively. “Do you think he’d —?”

“Let Genma do it, Sensei.” Like I’d forgotten his tendency toward naming things in a really weird way. “It’s still his even if he gave me the design to mess with.”

Sensei pouted.

My eyes narrowed. “And I’m gonna tell him not to use the words ‘flash,’ ‘howl,’ ‘dance,’ or ‘storm’ at all.”

“You’re no fun,” Sensei said.

“I don’t even know if that seal does what Genma said it would,” I told him. “My calligraphy isn’t the same as his no matter how neat it is. And you’re the one who taught me about errant brushstrokes.”

“I’m joking, Kei.” Sensei sighed. “How about you head down to the market for a break? I think some of the Chinatsugumi are finally in town again. I imagine they’d want to see you.”

The Chinatsugumi had, fairly early in the war, declined to send full caravans to Konoha because the roads between our village and Sorayama were so thoroughly watched. There were enough deserters and foreigners among their ranks to make Chinatsu wary of pushing their luck, so they’d been cautious and gone no further than Tanzaku-Gai for most of the war.

Not the best business strategy, perhaps, but it was one I could sort of understand why she’d done it.

“All right. Do you want me to buy you anything?” I asked, only half-joking. The Chinatsugumi themselves couldn’t range wherever they pleased, but their associates could. I’d never seen reindeer meat (transported via seal-embossed containers) before I met them, in either lifetime.

“If you can find one of those little Daruma dolls, sure.” Sensei had already gone back to his paperwork by then, and gave me a dismissive wave. “Bye, Kei.”

I left through the actual office door, unlike some people I could name.

When I reached the Chinatsugumi—and their rented chunk of the market district, where all of their merchandise was laid out to be sold—I was somewhat surprised to only see a few faces I recognized. There were more guards than I remembered, and I could see a team of what looked like genin being led away from the caravan, but of the Chinatsugumi…not so much.

Chinatsu was there, though. She was sitting down on the back of one of the caravan carts, sharpening a long knife, when I finally worked my way through the crowd.

She looked up and said, “Keisuke-san. You’ve grown since we last met.”

“It’s only been a year and spare change.” I sat down next to her, looking out across the marketplace and the wares slowly being unloaded. “So, no Rikuto this time?”

“Rikuto decided that it would be best if he remained in the compound,” was Chinatsu’s measured response. “Given his heritage, and the village’s recent history.”

I made a vaguely agreeable noise. “So, how’s everyone been?”

Chinatsu’s golden eyes went distant. “…Worried. Preparing. Misaki insisted that we give my niece the seals as soon as she could handle them.”

I wasn’t sure exactly what said seals looked like, but I could guess which ones she was talking about. Rather than the strength-enhancing fūinjutsu that Chinatsu and her sister used, she was talking about the anti-eruption seals on Mount Soragami. I didn’t understand the mechanism by which they worked, but I could imagine that giving a… “How old is Aiko-chan, anyway?”

“Six, now,” Chinatsu said.

Giving a six-year-old access to continent-destroying seals didn’t seem wise, all told.

“She won’t be able to use them, Keisuke-san. It’s just a bloodline seal.” In other words, something more akin to magic than true fūinjutsu. Keeping a curse alive by keeping the blood alive, or—in this case—keeping the protective seals on a volcano tied to a single family.

I kind of wondered why the Uzumaki clan didn’t seem to have had any.

“Did you come here to buy something?” Chinatsu asked, putting her knife away. “I don’t imagine you just wanted to stop and chat.”

“Sensei wants a Daruma doll, if you have one.” I kicked my legs idly, watching them swing in midair. I was physically a teenager, so I was allowed to occasionally act the part.

“I’m surprised the Hokage would want one.” Chinatsu scooted off the edge of the wagon and flagged down one of the caravan workers. “A Daruma doll, please.”

“Right away, Chinatsu-sama,” said the woman, scuttling off.

“Why is it surprising that the Hokage would want one?” I asked her.

“I’ve always thought of the various Hokage as…well, those who make their own luck, rather than wishing.” Chinatsu shrugged.

Well, given the omamori pendant around the hilt of my katana, I could honestly say that the shinobi contingent of the population wasn’t really any less superstitious than any other group of people. And besides, Daruma dolls didn’t need to be made special for every possible blessing they were supposed to confer. Omamori…well, it was polite if they were. And I’d need to remember to return this one to the Fire capital, whether personally or through making Genma run that errand for me.

“A little late to get one,” Chinatsu commented, once she’d gotten the Daruma. The little red caricature was actually kind of cute, if in a bizarre way. As expected, its eyes were blank, waiting to be filled with a dot and a corresponding wish. “But it’s still early enough that the blessing should work for the next year.”

I made a neutral noise. “So, how much is it?”

“This one? The Hokage can have it for free,” Chinatsu said. “I trust that his ambitions are good for the Land of Fire as a whole.”

Sensei’s ambitions…

Trapping Danzō in a web of his own lies. Offing Orochimaru. Making sure his son would grow up safe and happy (without dying). Rehabilitating ROOT members. Strengthening ties between Konoha and Suna. There was probably other stuff I was forgetting, but that list seemed like a representative sample.

“They are,” I said firmly.

“Good.” Chinatsu signaled for another worker, and told the man, “Please wrap this neatly. It’s a gift for the Fourth Hokage.”

“Of course, Chinatsu-sama.” And he bustled away.

“Was there anything else you wanted to talk about?” Chinatsu asked.

“How are the kids?” was my response.

Chinatsu blinked. “…Fine?”

“Weak answer. And you call yourself a mother?” I teased. Or I gave it my best shot, anyway.

And yet I could see Chinatsu’s expression shift as she caught the subtle undercurrent of pain in my voice. Her eyes seemed to soften.

“Roku is starting to show some sort of strange powers we think, but we don’t know what it is.” Chinatsu mimed a circle around each of her eyes. “He has dark marks around his eyes when he draws on his chakra, but none of us have seen that before. I’m very proud of him.”
“Sounds like Magnet Release,” I said quietly.

Her eyebrows rose. “Well, perhaps. Tayuya, meanwhile, has picked up playing the biwa from Rikuto. She’s more talented than he is, though I don’t think the instrument is small enough for her.”

“...I think she’d be good with the flute,” I muttered.

Chinatsu gave me a long stare. “...I see.”

It was somewhat difficult to carry on a conversation with Chinatsu. Rikuto was friendlier, less stiff, and often...more honest, in a way. Or at least better at pretending that he was just another random cheerful civilian. In hindsight, it was actually weird to think that Chinatsu’s outward personality seemed so close to the “shinobi shall never show his tears” mantra in its entirety. Rikuto had been a jonin for Iwa, and seemed to have picked up precisely none of it. Chinatsu’s records, meanwhile, pegged her as a former Konoha genin. The contrast was just incongruous enough to be weird.

“There are those of us who wish to join a shinobi village, rather than stay at Sorayama.” Chinatsu’s eyes unfocused somewhat as she stared into the middle distance, somewhere across the marketplace. “Misaki and I cannot, and Rikuto will not...”

“It’s not a bad idea.” If they wanted to avoid the potential hazard called one of the goddamn Sannin, anyway.

But I could also see why Rikuto, Iwa missing-nin extraordinaire despite the fact that Konoha’s upper echelons knew about him, would not really want to move into a village he’d probably fought in the past. He hadn’t seemed overly enamored of the ninja system in general, either.

“True. But without the Kasai clan, Soragami will...not remain as it is.” Chinatsu sighed. “And as for relocation, the core members of my group refused to consider it. Nanami was never a kunoichi, but she was from a Kiri clan. Shirozora? Chūnin, formerly of Kirigakure. And Zakuro will not leave the father of her children behind.”

“Of course not.” Shit.

“I don’t expect you to understand, not at your age.” Chinatsu sighed again. “But adults can sometimes be quite stupid.”

And again we returned to the whole issue of the snake-summoning member of the Sannin.

“...I could...try to talk to Sensei?” I suggested, hesitant.

Chinatsu paused. “...Would you?”

“It might help a bit if you started a dialogue about this stuff first, but, uh, immigration laws aren’t...” Well, they’d let Mom in, hadn’t they? The Ghoul of Three Wolves had apparently been considered the scariest bogeyman in the Land of Iron because she was real. And yet, our Intelligence department had still let her in. “It’s an idea? I mean, the Hokage is going to probably devote his energies toward the upcoming Chūnin Exam, but the idea has some merit. And if not here...maybe Ame?”

Chinatsu made a neutral noise of acknowledgement, nodding. Whatever she was going to say after that, though, was cut off by a different caravan worker coming up to us with a neatly wrapped package.

“Your Daruma doll.” Chinatsu handed it to me a moment later. “Goodbye, Keisuke-san.”
Well, that was a dismissal if I’d ever heard one. I skedaddled.

“No, no, no.” Obito blinked as Tenzō shook his head at him. Tenzō went on, “I don’t even know how you’re doing that, but you—I have to use the Snake seal just to get that much wood to move!”

“Transplant.” Obito shrugged.

“Why do I get the feeling there’s something he’s not telling us?” Raidō stage-whispered to Kakashi.

“Because he isn’t.” Kakashi’s voice was, as usual, rather snappish.

I continued snacking on dango and let the boys argue.

Somehow, the “everyone in the new Hokage Guard Platoon except for Genma who was on shift at Sensei’s house” meeting had gone a little sideways. Kakashi had showed up late with Tenzō, meaning that it wasn’t really an exclusive gathering anymore, and we didn’t get to discuss who would be doing what once three of us were in Suna. No, instead our meeting was derailed by Obito demonstrating his Zetsu-derived version of Wood Release and confusing the crap out of Tenzō, who had the non-Zetsu version with a correspondingly higher chakra cost. It was still being derailed.

I presumed that we would figure out the details of our work once we got to Suna, in the best traditions of procrastinators everywhere. The only reason I was even there was because Hayate’s team had left three weeks previous, which gave me my first real taste of empty nest syndrome. I didn’t like it much.

“This isn’t…this isn’t even the same kind of wood.” Tenzō looked confused and frustrated.

Confrustrated? Confuzzled? Thwarted?

Obito was dangling by his feet from the tree above us, while Tenzō sat next to Kakashi, so the argument was inescapable. As was a moderate degree of food thievery.

Swiping another dango stick from my stockpile, using a scrap of a branch, Obito went on, “I don’t even know how this works, okay? So don’t ask me why it doesn’t make sense, because I don’t know.”

“There’s not exactly anyone to ask about how Wood Release works for multiple users,” I said, around a dango stick clamped between my teeth. “Hashirama-sama was the only one of his kind and…well, he’s a bit dead to ask about it.” If you discounted the uberzombie form.

“But I…but the invaders…” Tenzō trailed off.

Raidō said, “I’m not sure they count if they’re not human.”

“Anyway, I’m pretty good at this stuff now.” Obito grinned. “Right, Sapling?” And of course Obito remembered that prophecy.

Kakashi rolled his visible eye.

Tenzō frowned up at Obito. “I’ve had this power longer than you have.”

“So?”

“So I know what to do with it.” Tenzō pointed up at Obito, saying, “Do you even know how to “Make a shield?”

“… kinda?”

Tenzō huffed. “So you’re not better than me.”

“I’m stronger,” Obito corrected. “I can make more than five tiny trees before I get tired.”

“Prove it!” was the response.

As the two of them charged off toward the training field proper, Kakashi sighed. “Well, at least he’s adjusting to normalcy.”

“This is normal?” Raidō asked.

I responded, “Yes, it is.” Then I handed him a stick of dango.

“Sometimes I forget that you’re still kids,” Raidō said, around one of the dumplings. “And then that stuff happens.”

“Watch who you’re calling a kid, old man,” I teased.

“Obito isn’t the best example of maturity,” Kakashi muttered.

“Well, no, but that’s why Hayate likes him so much. He’s fun to hang out with,” I said, and handed Kakashi the last dango stick.

Kakashi made a mumbled noise that sounded like thanks, even if he didn’t like sweets that much.

Out on the training field, there was a sudden shout and then a new tree sprang into being more abruptly than Athena from the head of Zeus. Just wham, bam, tree.

And then it just kept going. The training field rocked, smaller trees swaying as though in the wind, while Obito and Tenzō’s chakra drove the roots of this new monster of a tree deep and wide across the area. Dirt flew everywhere and there was a series of gigantic cracks as those roots broke their smaller cousins into splinters. And meanwhile, the new Hashirama-styled tree kept shooting up toward the sky.

All three of us—Raidō, Kakashi, and I—sprang up and got the hell out of the way while we still could.

In the middle of that chakra maelstrom, though? Obito and Tenzō.

“I would love to know what the hell they’re doing!” Raidō shouted, as all three of us ran—a severed tree trunk smashed into the ground where we’d been a moment afterward.

As it happened, Raidō landed next to me as Kakashi swung his ANBU katana overhead and slashed a falling limb apart before it could hit us. As such, he was able to hear my explanation.

I could see the main body of the tree pretty well, and that said a lot.

Actually, there were two trees, tightly intertwined. Tenzō’s interpretation of the First’s bloodline resulted in darker wood that quickly grew a bark layer to protect itself from attack, while Obito’s version was lighter, grew faster, and was twisting around in a rough spiral.

“Thumb war with trees?” I suggested, only half-joking.
Kakashi made a noise in the back of his throat that sounded like it’d come out of Bull instead.

“I’d say you didn’t have to worry about the kid killing himself like this, but you kinda do.” Raidō smacked another dislodged branch aside as the too-thin-to-be-practical Hashirama tree thing finally reached what looked like its final height.

The tree swayed as the Obito-derived Wood Release constricted suddenly, sending another barrage of fallen leaves and branches down on us.

“Kakashi, Raidō-kun, you get Tenzō-kun. I’m shutting Obito down.” And I reached for Isobu’s power and spun it around and around my coils like a thread. I also felt my eyes itch, so at least something was happening.

Kakashi took off at a run, flanked by Raidō. Both of them headed for where Tenzō’s chakra was the strongest.

I did the same, but around the other side of the tree and toward Obito instead. The tree—or trees—was shaped like one of those fuzzy-topped pens if there was a lot of clay wound around in. The resulting weird structure would probably collapse in the next windstorm, but I still needed both boys to stop dicking around before one of them fell over from chakra exhaustion.

I found Obito not long afterward, his hands clasped together in the Snake seal like Tenzō would have done, and yelled, “Obito, stop doing that!”

Obito jolted like I’d hit him, and I belatedly realized that Isobu was also losing patience with him.

I forced Isobu’s chakra back down a bit. “Obito, I know you’re into competition. That’s admirable. But Tenzō-kun gets caught up in things and if you aren’t careful, he’ll be the one in the hospital and you’ll have to explain to Tsunade-sama how he got there!”

Obito immediately stopped channeling chakra into the tree. “Sorry?”

“Apologize to Tenzō-kun, if—Kakashi, how is he?” I had to reorient on Kakashi and Raidō when they emerged from the wrecked underbrush, carrying Tenzō between them. It was actually surprising how quickly they had gotten Tenzō out of trouble.

“Tired, but not dead.” Kakashi let me put my hand to Tenzō’s forehead to check his chakra levels.

Tenzō giggled, sounding almost drunk.

“Maybe a little loopy,” Kakashi amended.

Obito sheepishly, “Sorry, Tenzō-kun. Kakashi, I can take him to the hospital if…”

“Tenzō-kun needs bedrest, not the hospital,” I corrected, having made a couple quick calculations about his chakra levels compared to his maximum capacity. “So you get to take him to the Hokage Residence, where Tsunade-sama is”—I checked my chakra sense, “—right now, actually.”

Obito paled. “But—!”

Whatever Obito was about to say was bitten off and forgotten under the weight of three glares. Tenzō couldn’t participate, but I like to think I made up for that.

“All right, all right. But if I die because I got punched through a wall, I’m going to haunt all of you,” Obito declared, though he did scoop Tenzō into a bridal carry. “C’mon, kid, let’s get you fixed Obito, rather than using Kamui, decided just to go with the normal shinobi rooftop-run.

“…I feel like I should have told him that Tenzō gets motion-sick when being carried,” Kakashi said, his tone mild.

I pulled my dango skewer out of my hair, where I’d made the probably-poor decision to stow it, and threw it at his head.

He ducked in time.

“Kids, kids, maybe we should try to figure out what we’re going to do to explain this?” Raidō gestured at the tree.

“…Training accident,” was Kakashi and my mutual response. Kakashi continued with, “I’m going to go make sure they make it there. Kei, Raidō, see you two later.”

A burst of Body Flicker speed later, and that left just Raidō and me looking up at the monstrosity of a tree in the middle of the training grounds.

Way at the top, a crow was looking down at us and cawing.

“…Okay, so, do you want to cut this thing down?” I asked. “I know a jutsu.”

“Show me what you’re thinking of, and then I’ll give an answer,” said Raidō.

We ended up not cutting the tree down, since it was really a job that genin could have fun with, but I did teach Raidō how to use the (workaround) Samurai Sword jutsu. So, all in all, the afternoon worked out all right.

A week later, Sensei finally got the list of finalists from the Kazekage’s office. He showed it to me and to Rin while we happened to be in the office for a schedule briefing (with regards to why we didn’t have one).

I read over Rin’s shoulder and, beneath the flowery diplomatic words, I focused on the important parts.

There were a total of eight finalists.

From Konoha: Hayate Gekkō, Yūgao Uzuki, and Anko Mitarashi.

From Suna: Maki, Takumi, Osamu, and Katsuo.

And, surprisingly, from Ame: Ren.

“I don’t know half these names, so they kinda mean nothing to me.” I grinned despite that. “But Hayate made it! Hell yeah!”

Rin cheered, too.

And not long after that, it was time to pack our bags—or scrolls, in my case—for a trip to Sunagakure.

While it was true that Kakashi, Obito, and I were the only members of the actual Hokage Guard to be traveling with Sensei to Sunagakure, we were nowhere near the only shinobi to make up his entourage for the event. We had a couple of other people to fill out the ranks. Rin was coming along, of course, and so was one of Sensei's squad-mates from the Third Shinobi World War. And Kohari Umino, who had volunteered because her son was in Suna and she didn't have any other standing assignments.

Given who our Hokage was, I couldn't say that we were all there for his protection. I couldn't even say that most of us were there for his protection.

We were basically there to look impressive.

…Sort of.

Actually, among our team, we had multiple forms of long-range detection that otherwise made a mockery of people who dared think they could take us by surprise. Because of Gaku Inuzuka and Aomaru, we effectively had three forms of scent-based detection if you counted Kakashi, too. Kohari Umino didn't have her son's bizarre hearing, but she did have something that mimicked tremor-sense common in animals. Then we had Obito, who could see chakra being molded from almost two hundred yards off and lacked Kakashi's stamina weakness (as the tree war had proved). I had a multi-kilometer sensing range when working alongside Isobu, and then Sensei had his own version—using Sage chakra instead.

I would not have wanted to be on the team that was tasked with sneaking past us.

I ended up sticking all of my stuff into a pair of scrolls on a back-mounted holder, as usual. I had two smaller scrolls on my right hip for the various set-and-forget seals I'd made up over the years. It was the only thing, really, that made me stand out from the other people in Konoha uniforms. Even Kohari had a katana and a bandanna-style headband, so that didn't make me unique.

My presence changes the game, Isobu said as we stood at the main gates, waiting for all the ceremony to be over with.

Yes, but I have to wonder how much. I looked across the assembled shinobi, frowning slightly in thought. You're not exactly adapted for desert combat…

Because of course I was thinking about possible Tailed Beast fights. I'd been required to call on Isobu's chakra a lot more than I'd expected back when he'd first been sealed in me, so I was conditioned to expect bad things.

And probably dehydration, depending on the weather out in the desert.
Sensei was still talking to Tsunade, who still looked unhappy with being handed the Hokage's office (literally and figuratively) for a week. Hey, if she already lived in her grandfather's old house, she could take a bit of the responsibility.

Next to Tsunade, Kushina stood in her jōnin uniform and grinned at Sensei's predicament. Naruto sat in her arms, peering at his dad in a vaguely interested way. I wasn't sure he understood what was going on.

"How hot is it going to be over there, Umino-san?" Obito asked Kohari, who was one of the oldest members of the team.

"It should actually be colder than it is here, at least at night," Kohari told him, "There's very little water in Sunagakure, which means the land controls the temperature. So sometimes, they wake up and there's frost on the ground."

Obito stared, trying to process the concept. "Frost? In a desert?"

"Technically, the only thing that makes the Land of Wind a desert is the lack of rain," I remarked. Finally, that geographical trivia I'd learned was becoming useful. Even for a five-minute conversation. "They get most of their harvests from a strip of land on the border with Rivers, I think."

"So then there can be really cold deserts if there's no rain." Obito's brow furrowed. "Or snow, I guess."

Like Antarctica.

"Right," Kohari confirmed. "Parts of the Land of Snow seem to be like that, from what I've heard."

Even more like Antarctica.

"Actually, the First gave them that land." That was Gaku, who sounded less than happy with that little bit of trivia. He added dryly, "For some reason."

It had to do with Shukaku, actually. The First Hokage had been using the Tailed Beasts as bribes for peace, because he was naïve in some ways, only to find that the First Kazekage had already swiped the One-Tailed Beast beforehand. So the First Kazekage had demanded arable land instead, and we'd been kind of fighting over it ever since.

At least until the Land of Rivers had popped up.

"...Should I have packed a sweater?" Obito wondered aloud.

"I don't think we're going to be wandering around after dark very much," Rin put in.

"Chūnin Exam finals generally take only a day," Kohari said. More cheerfully, she added, "But I'm looking forward to seeing Iruka there."

"Same for me and Hayate," I said.

Sure, Hayate was a finalist while Iruka wasn't, but watching the Chūnin Exams with family was a pretty good way to learn new things. Competitors always had fun tricks.

Sensei walked back over to us at that point, smiling broadly. I supposed the lipstick mark faintly visible on his cheek had something to do with that. "All right, everyone! Sunagakure awaits!"
And then we started to run. It'd take a week to get to Sunagakure on foot, but that was no reason to slack off.

Other than waking up on the third day with Obito, Rin and I in a defensive ring made of Kakashi's dogs, nothing of interest really happened on the trip.

We caught lunch on three of the days we spent on the road, rather than eating rations, because Kohari Umino turned out to be the best fisherwoman I'd ever seen. And not the sort with nets—or at least, not only with nets. She had a strange chakra trick involving senbon, fishing hooks, and theme-thin shinobi wire. The result of her skill was a very tasty lunch wherever we found a river, because Rin had packed some spices to go with my apparently-endless supply of camping equipment.

If all else failed, we could use it to hurt people. There was a second frying pan in there somewhere.

Anyway, after that point Gaku Inuzuka talked something over with Sensei and the next thing we knew, we were all being offered soldier pills because Sensei was impatient with the whole "stopping to sleep" thing.

I had to decline, for medical reasons. Namely because if I did take one, I had absolutely no idea what would happen. Inuzuka soldier pills had never been rated for jinchūriki consumption, so for all I knew I'd probably explode. Instead, leaning on Isobu a bit seemed to lead to roughly the same results, so I went without medicinal stamina boosters.

Anyway, we got there a little after sundown on day five. We were, of course, immediately stopped by Sunagakure guards and Sensei had to talk to them for a while.

Aomaru, Gaku's immense fawn-colored partner, carefully leaned back into a long doggy stretch, flexing all of his toes and yawning. Honestly, Aomaru was more of a giant bear-hybrid with ratty ears than a dog, but he'd kept up with the rest of us without any complaints.

Gaku reached down and scratched behind his ears. Aomaru obligingly did not eat his hand.

Seriously, I'd seen the typical Inuzuka dogs while in the village, and Aomaru's ancestors had apparently been hybridized with a lion somewhere. But he got along with Bull—the only bigger dog I'd ever met—and thus I wasn't complaining about his presence.

Shiba obligingly poked his nose against my leg to get my attention span back on track. I snapped off a quick, joking salute to Kakashi in thanks. He just shrugged.

Obito was talking to Kohari again, with Rin dropping in some comment or another, but I decided to hurry up a bit and flank Sensei.

By the time I really refocused, Sensei had talked his way through the guards, and we were being led to what I assumed was the foreigner's district. While Konoha didn't exactly have a designated neighborhood where we could set foreign shinobi up for the night, we did have a number of publicly-accessible inns that were intensely monitored for security's sake. They just weren't all in one place, for some reason.

Sunagakure, however, had apparently planned ahead several decades ahead of time and did have a special location within its walls for visitors.

The inn had a name that I didn't catch before getting distracted again.

This time, it was because Kohari had shot past both Sensei and me and scooped up the figure back-lit in the doorway, hugging him fiercely.
"Mom! Mom, I'm okay, really!" Iruka's voice was muffled by both his mother's flak jacket and his own laughter.

"I was worried about you, young man!" Kohari tried and failed to pull off a stern parent mode, collapsing into relieved giggling. "Come on, come on, show us around!"

"Okay—Hokage-sama, you have a special room and everything." Iruka waved the rest of us over.

I sent out a subtle, entirely-human chakra ping, and got an answer from Hayate. He was on the second floor, with Yūgao and Inoichi.

"I think some people are going to have to share, but that's okay because my team just has two rooms anyway," Iruka was explaining as we entered and walked into the yellow-orange indoor lights.

"I don't think that will be a problem, Iruka-kun," Sensei replied with a laugh. He turned to the rest of us and added, "Kakashi, Gaku, could you please come with me to meet the Kazekage? I'm sure everyone else can set up our rooms properly."

"By your command, Hokage-sama," the two dog-ninjas said together, and followed Sensei back out.

That left Obito to turn to the inn's front desk receptionist and say, "So, how many rooms do we have?"

"Six," said the receptionist, looking bored. "We only have futons here, so you should have plenty of space."

I had to wonder how much traffic this place saw at any other time of year. And anyway, I'd brought my futon from home.

Obito grinned. "Thank you, then."

And with that, Iruka led the way up the stairs and let the lot of us set about claiming our spaces.

I poked around some of the rooms before going to visit my brother's. As advertised, the inn was small and slightly sandy thanks to foot traffic, and only had actual beds in about half the room. And those were bunks that weren't quite long enough for Gaku and his dog.

I think most of the team gave up and just asked for futons within five minutes of bustling around sorting out who wanted what room. The beds were just not worth it.

Then I finally poked my head into the room where Hayate, Inoichi and Yūgao turned out to have been eating dinner.

"Hi, Sis," said Hayate, waving with his chopsticks in hand.

I shot across the room, snatched him off the ground, and squished him in a hug.

"Sis"—swing—"I'm"—my brother was officially tackled and pinned—"fine"—and then I started tickling him. "Ahahaha no, no, stop, hahaha!"

"You think you're gonna be a chūnin when you can't even get out of a tickle-fest?" I cackled.

Hayate nearly kicked me in the face trying to get away, but I ducked left and he missed entirely. "I can—hahaha—I can do this!"

"Prove it!" I challenged, grinning widely.
"I will!" Hayate was grinning back.

"While I'm glad you're both excited," Inoichi's voice broke in, cutting across the brewing friendly brawl like a whip-crack, "I don't think the inn can take much shinobi tussling."

Both of us paused.

Yūgao was (unsuccessfully) stifling her giggles, while Iruka and his mother peered into the room cautiously, as though expecting a fight to have happened anyway. Obito stood next to them with a hand over his mouth and his shoulders shaking from suppressed laughter.

"Fine." I let go of Hayate's ankle before he could kick loose. Then I let myself flop to the floor, yawning. That whole "not taking a soldier pill" thing seemed to have finally caught up with me.

"Tired?" Obito asked, crouching next to me as Hayate grabbed his dinner from the table.

"Unlike everyone else, I didn't go for chemical enhancers," I grumped. I pulled out my sleeve scroll, which had carefully perforated paper for the seals I'd written. I tossed it up to Obito's waiting hand. "So here, take my security seals and do something with them. Should take care of most stuff."

"Oh! Right." Obito snatched the seal scroll out of the air. Then he opened it to check that I hadn't made a mistake in my fatigue-addled state.

As if. I could write seals even if I'd spent thirty-six hours awake, and the results would only explode prematurely some of the time!

"Gotcha. Umino-san, please take care of her? I'm gonna go spread these around." And then Obito was off, bothering everyone else.

Kohari was kind enough to help me back up.

My energy crash ended up making it so I went to bed in the women's rooms with my road clothes still on, but at least I'd remembered to get my futon out before just passing out on the floor. I was one of six kunoichi on the trip—in addition to the Hokage's posse, Makoto, Anko, and Yūgao also had to be accounted for. All the men got to fight over sleeping arrangements in the rest of the rooms.

Except Sensei. Being Hokage, he got his own. And probably loaded it down with more security seals than I'd ever written, but hey. His prerogative.

All in all, that five-day stretch—from morning in Konoha to night in Suna—passed pretty peacefully.

The next morning was a bit of a scramble in the improvised barracks. It turned out that soldier pills had one major side effect that no one had bothered mentioning.

Namely, they made everyone who imbibed them massively hungry once they wore off. Soldier pills didn't really just generate three extra days' worth of chakra out of nowhere—they burned stored carbs, fats and sugars and also made the user crave them like crazy afterward. They weren't nearly as extreme as the infamous Akimichi Food Pills, which burned through even more insane amounts of body fat for more extreme results, but only one member of our team was an Inuzuka. Nobody else had ever gotten used to the strain.

I sat back with Teams Inoichi and Makoto and watched the carnage in the dining hall unfold from a safe distance.
And that was only about half our team. I had never seen Rin eat that much, ever.

"Can I just say that that's kinda terrifying?" Kotetsu asked, openly staring at the behavior of his fellow Konoha-nin.

At the ripe old age of thirteen, Kotetsu somehow still managed to have the spikiest hair I'd ever seen outside of Jiraiya himself. He had the signature strip of cloth across his nose, even at this age, and a navy blue mark on his chin that could easily be mistaken for a goatee if he was older. He was taller than his interim sensei when standing up, but hunched defensively over his breakfast as though he expected his superiors to try and snatch it.

Given that Sensei, Kakashi, and Kohari Umino had taken off early to go talk to the Kazekage again, I didn't really think his food was in danger.

"If you're not saying it, we're still all thinking it," said Izumo, to his right.

Izumo's dark brown hair covered his right eye, per usual, and he had a dark green sweater that went up and over his chin. His hair wasn't as untamable as Kotetsu's, or maybe he'd crammed most of it under his bandanna headband and just called it quits.

"Oo to 'er 'iners." I was pretty sure Anko meant to say "You two are whiners," but it was difficult to be eloquent with a mouthful of rice to talk around. Anko swallowed and went on, "This is why you're not in the finals! You're too busy worrying about things."

"What are the tournament brackets, anyway?" I asked, spotting an opening to change the topic. "I didn't get to ask last night, so…"

"Yūgao-chan is going up against a Suna-nin, but I'm fighting that Ame girl." Anko poked the side of her face with the thick end of her chopsticks as she thought. "Uh, I think her name was Rin or Ren or something like that."

"I'm going to be fighting Maki-san," Hayate said. "She uses some kind of cloth jutsu, and Inoichi-sensei said her sensei's famous."

"Maki-san's sensei is Pakura." Inoichi retrieved a Bingo Book out of nowhere and tossed it to me. "Also known as the only jōnin-level user of Scorch Release in Sunagakure."

I flipped to Pakura's page, which was about in the middle of the black book. There was a low-resolution photograph of a Suna kunoichi with green hair and orange bangs, wearing a dark purple outfit with arm-warmers. She had apparently been throwing a glowing fireball at the photographer. "Scorch Release? Shit."

"I'm not fighting her, Sis." Hayate downed his cup of tea before continuing with, "And anyway, Maki-san doesn't have the bloodline. I checked."

"You should still be careful, though," Iruka piped up. At my raised eyebrow, he added innocently, "Maki-san was the one who defeated Kotetsu."

"And I told you, if I'd had a chance to use my summons I would have had her!" Kotetsu protested.

"So, Izumo-kun…?" I prompted.

"Anko."

That answered that, then.
"Iruka scratched the base of his ponytail. "I think the qualifiers might've been a bit rigged."

"It honestly wouldn't surprise me if they were." I shrugged. "But hey, at least we're going to see something cool tomorrow, right?"

"You will," was Makoto's contribution. The red-haired kunoichi had rolled up her Intelligence coat's sleeves and was looking contemplatively across the room. I'd never actually talked to her before, and her chakra was telling me it probably wasn't a good time to start. She felt like a grouch, and not just because I was pretty sure she was mildly hungover.

…Actually, her family name was "Kiyotaka," wasn't it? I vaguely remembered hearing that name during the night Naruto was born, but nothing had really come of it. Chiharu had been too dead to complete the mission. I didn't know what should have happened there, and wasn't sure how to ask.

"Have all of you prepared for poisons?" I asked.

"Yep!" Anko said. "But I bet they haven't planned for snakes, Kei-san!"

Oh, ouch.

Anyway, breakfast broke up altogether sometime before nine in the morning, when the rest of the gang finally cleaned the kitchen out. The Finals were tomorrow, so we had a bit of time to wander Sunagakure if we didn't mind being stalked by Suna-nin and Suna civilians. The exceptions were Kakashi and Kohari, who had been chosen as Sensei's guards for a bit. We'd probably swap whenever Sensei wanted, though.

"We could probably go out and buy a souvenir or something," Obito told the genin.

"We've never been to Suna's arena," I pointed out, crossing my arms over my chest. "We have to case that area at some point, too."

Obito opened his mouth to argue, but Gaku hooked his arm around my Uchiha teammate's neck and dragged him out of the inn before we could get caught up in debating the merits of strategic thinking.

Kohari caught me a little off the main street, pulling me aside for a quick chat.

It amounted to, "You're on shift now, Keisuke-chan."

So that was that.

I was pointed in the direction of the Kazekage's office, which was in a building shaped like an egg or a gourd. There were dozens of other sandstone-brown, roughly cylindrical buildings, linked by power lines. The kanji for wind was plastered across the side of the building in reddish brown.

Despite the lack of bright red paint and trees, I actually rather liked the Kazekage's idea of architecture. Wind could rip right through the streets and whip sand everywhere, but the buildings would retain their strength despite not really retaining their polish.

I entered the building without any fanfare, tracking Sensei and Kakashi and the other chakra signatures in the building with half my attention. They were in the office and not moving all that much, but they didn't feel particularly stressed or agitated. Neither did the Kazekage, which alleviated some of my worries. The rest of my thought processes, however, was devoted to observation.
This led me to notice the faint glitter of gold across all the surfaces in the building.

Rasa, despite his later actions as Fourth Kazekage, apparently wasn't an idiot. At the moment.

I actually had to use the stairs in this building. While some of the probably-Suna-ANBU front office workers gave me sidelong looks, I proceeded up through the building until reaching the Kazekage's office. I didn't know my way around, but I didn't feel like asking for directions from people who probably would have killed me without a second thought (and wouldn't have given me directions anyway).

So hooray for my chakra sense, which made all of that moot.

Outside of the door to the Kazekage's office, there was only one guard. He was probably about four years older than I was (as well as significantly taller) and wore Sunagakure's official uniform. Going by the color of his eyebrows, I assumed he had dark hair—given that the rest of his head was wrapped in a Suna sun-repelling turban, it was my best guess. He had a slightly darker skin-tone than I did, with a broad nose and prominent lips twisted into a mild grimace as soon as he realized I was heading his way.

He looked vaguely familiar in a way that put my figurative hackles up, but he let me past him and into the office unobstructed.

The office was meticulously neat in a way that Sensei's tried and frequently failed to be. There were no loose papers, whether in piles or not, but the Kazekage had left a number of thick binders on the corner of his desk, as though he had just been interrupted in the middle of studying something. Such as trade law, going by what I could read upside-down on the covers of said binders. Small, circular windows let filtered sunlight enter the office, but I imagined that they were hardly any larger than portholes on ships for security purposes.

The Kazekage himself, in his formal blue-trimmed robe but not wearing his official hat, sat behind his desk and leveled a cool, dark stare at me as I entered. I got the impression that he viewed me as a particularly uppity bug.

He wasn't a particularly tall or well-built man, but I could sense his chakra easily enough and I had no doubt that he could pump out as much killing intent as Sensei on a bad day. His hair was a sort of reddish brown that was squarely between what I remembered of Kakurō's and Gaara's tones, and I could see him in both of his sons. Or maybe the reverse. I could also feel his chakra all across the building, scattered among the particles of gold dust he controlled.

All that glitters was definitely gold in this case. But that didn't mean it wasn't potentially lethal.

And yet, while I remembered the Fourth Kazekage's combat abilities and their potential, I found myself distracted by my foreknowledge of what this man would do, if he thought it was for the good of his village. I'd used Gaara's story as a cautionary tale for a very good reason.

I still turned my attention to Sensei, who stood in front of the desk, and to Kakashi, who stood off toward the wall.

"You called, Hokage-sama?" I asked him in a completely level tone.

"I did." Sensei smiled, and I could feel his chakra exerting a sort of opposing pressure to the Kazekage's strength. It wasn't killing intent, or even undirected hostility. It was just a gentle push back—a refusal to be intimidated.

Kakashi's chakra was also maintaining strength, but with the crackling energy of lightning instead of Sensei’s wind. I drew Isobu's chakra up, just a little, and ignored the pressure as best I could.

_Isobu, can you sense Shukaku around here?_

Yes. But he's not listening at the moment. Isobu gave me the impression that he tilted his head to one side. I know he's ranting like a lunatic, but I can't quite hear what he's saying.

Rats.

The Kazekage's door guard entered the room after me, crossing it to stand opposite Kakashi at the other wall. "Wall" was a bit of a misnomer, since the office was circular, but whatever. I headed over to stand next to Kakashi instead of just staying stock-still in the office like a dork.

Kakashi rolled his eye at me, and I shot him an annoyed look in return.

Sensei's chakra snapped out as clearly as if he had slapped both of us upside our heads. So we stopped after that.

…Why the hell were we even here?

"Kazekage-dono, allow me to formally introduce my student, Keisuke Gekkō." Sensei's diplomatic smile was honestly kind of creepy at this angle.

Well, that explained the bad feeling. I sighed inwardly as the Kazekage and his guard immediately stared at me.

I managed a crooked smile, though I found myself channeling Sensei and winking as well. "It's an honor to meet you, Kazekage-sama."

The Kazekage leaned forward, lacing his dingers together contemplatively in front of his face. "So, you've brought an Uchiha, a Hatake, an Inuzuka, and several extra shinobi, Hokage-dono. You must be very interested in personal security."

"Only as much as I'm interested in the results of the Exam," Sensei replied mildly. "Several members of my entourage wished to see the genin compete."

I had no doubt whatsoever that Sensei had fifteen reasons for nearly everything he did. It was not _nearly_ that simple. This discussion had several goals I didn't quite see yet. He'd get around to explaining things eventually.

Thinking that didn't stop me from being vaguely irritated by it.

"But not everyone has arrived for this meeting just yet." The Kazekage glanced at his bodyguard. "Baki-kun, see that the Ame delegation hasn't gotten lost."

_Baki?_

My mind went momentarily blank. And then there was a surging cacophony of questions.

Baki? The man who killed Hayate? The one who would go _entirely unpunished_, despite Yūgao seeking revenge? The man who would stay on as one of Gaara's advisors in his term as Kazekage?

Why wasn't I already _killing him stone dead?_

I was reaching for Isobu's chakra almost before I'd completed any of those thoughts.
Isobu stirred, baffled. Who is—oh, no. This human? Here?

Trust the monster in my head to know what was going on in it.

Isobu's chakra didn't surge. Instead, it sank into mine like fishhooks and yanked on the chakra in my brain hard enough to cause momentary disorientation—and to make his genjutsu powers known. His power tore through my rapidly mounting anger as fiercely as a crop thresher in a field of wheat, cutting it off.

NOT. NOW.

Vaguely, I was aware that my eyes had narrowed to slits and that the memory swarm in my mindscape had gone eerily silent. And yet, Isobu had snapped me away from unthinking, reflex-level anger and instead I just felt…cold.

Not fear-cold, but the kind of cold anger that didn't rouse Isobu unnecessarily. It probably wasn't because of something I'd done—instead, I later realized that Isobu had pulled the hot anger back and buried it in his own chakra like a flood dousing a flame.

It was the exact opposite of what should have happened.

Still, I didn't get more than a curious glance from the young Baki, who snapped to his Kazekage's orders and trooped dutifully out of the room without another look at me. I supposed that the burst of killing intent hadn't actually made it any further than the inside of my chakra coils, as bizarre as that sounded. Isobu had been on top of his game, apparently.

Kakashi, who was behind me, gently prodded my back. A static charge leapt from his hand to me, but no one else seemed to have noticed.

I nodded almost imperceptibly. I'm okay. I'll explain later. And I really wasn't looking forward to that, to say the least.

Sensei and the Kazekage made veiled remarks for another ten minutes or so while I tried to sort through what had been a "vision" and what had been the scars of my reincarnation trauma from years ago. I still went cold all over when I thought of Hayate's death in that other world, and it wasn't just because of the memories I'd sequestered away in the depths of my mindscape. No amount of meditation really seemed to make a dent in the fact that I'd spent six solid years with recurring nightmares.

Not all of those nightmares had been kind enough to just be memories. No, my brain had come up with original content with depressing frequency.

Kakashi zapped me out of my reverie just before I felt Baki reenter the building.

Bracing myself, I took a deep breath and focused on the chakra signature accompanying him. I felt a Water nature, like my own but without a Tailed Beast component. The second signature, oddly, came from something tiny located on our new guest's shoulder.

The hell?

A minute later, the mystery was solved.

Baki entered the room first, followed by a young man in a red-rimmed black cloak.

I blinked.
Orange hair in spikes as sharp as Sensei's, over brown eyes and a moderate tan from outdoor living. He wore an Ame headband with four vertical lines bisected by a single slash. And as though it was a lapel pin, a white paper flower sat innocently on his chest.

If the flower didn't practically bleed another person's chakra, maybe I'd have let it go unremarked. But I was pretty sure that it meant Konan had her eye on the proceedings.

He saw Sensei and grinned. And that grin was incredibly similar to what I remembered of Naruto's. Yahiko was Naruto's doppelgänger. Or brother from another mother. Or something like that. "Ah, Minato-senpai!" I could practically feel Sensei blink. "Yahiko of Akatsuki and Amegakure, honored to finally meet you."

"Ah, I remember Jiraiya-sensei speaking about you at some point." Sensei smiled suddenly. "So does that mean Jiraiya-sensei is around?"

Why was Jiraiya acting as a bodyguard for Yahiko? His allegiance to Konoha wasn't remotely a secret, so it'd look like we were trying to sneak extra people into the Exam. Sure, he had a double allegiance of sorts to Mount Myōboku, and he'd taught all three leaders of Akatsuki, but…

"Yeah, he's off checking in with your team. It's fine." Yahiko shrugged. "But anyway, let's get this meeting over with!"

On second thought, maybe Yahiko just hadn't thought about the implications. I'd gotten the impression from the manga that he was not exactly the brains of the operation, though he was its heart. Akatsuki would function as intended as long as he was alive.

The Kazekage looked between his two guests and looked like he wanted to facepalm. Still, he rallied his dignity and said, "So, let's discuss arrangements for tomorrow, now that we're all present."

In the end, the three village leaders managed to sort things out to their satisfaction. From what I actually understood, Yahiko wanted to have his shinobi—mainly a few Amegakure shinobi who had been Akatsuki members at some point—as close to him in the stands as possible. Sensei didn't mind that, because he had pretty much the same sentiment, but justified it with the Kazekage's box supposedly having the best vantage point in the stadium. The Kazekage, of course, had a home field advantage in that his shinobi outnumbered us about a hundred to one, and ended up acquiescing with a condescending sort of grace that belied his frustration.

I didn't blame him, exactly. It wasn't every day that you found out that the foreigners in one's village were actually all allied with each other and not necessarily with you.

Amegakure—or at least Akatsuki's founders—was bonded to Konoha via marriage (what with Nagato becoming Kushina's brother legally and then her marrying Sensei) and the fact that Jiraiya had taught and partially raised all four of the two villages' leaders. Sunagakure had no such bonds to either other village, and that was a bit…worrying. Especially when Ame was apparently a bit of a rising star.

At least nobody came to blows. (Though I did eye the gold dust stuck to our clothes with extreme suspicion.)

But even as we left the building a little over two hours later, I knew I wasn't getting out of things that easy.

"Yahiko-dono," Sensei began, once we'd reached the street again.

"Oh, no, you don't call me that." Yahiko waved it off. "Seriously, just Yahiko. You're my senpai as far as being taught by Jiraiya-sensei goes, so that's the way it'll stay."

"...Yahiko, then." Sensei nodded. "Well, what I was going to say is that I'm sorry, but I'm not going to be available for a while. If you want to talk, please leave a message at the Desert Rose, and I'll see what I can do to arrange another meeting."

"What, really?" Yahiko frowned. "Why?"

"I...need to speak to Keisuke-kun, here." Sensei eyed me pointedly, and I winced. He continued, "But I really would like to talk to you. I'd like to share stories, too."

"Well, if you insist." Yahiko stopped. "Wait. Keisuke?"

I raised my hand meekly.

"Jiraiya-sensei mentioned you!" Yahiko went on with, "He said you were the kind of student he'd wished Minato-senpai would get. When he was mad at him. Like, 'May you have a student just like you.'"

"...Thanks?" I said blankly.

"Not really," Yahiko said, and shrugged. "Well, see you later."

As Yahiko left, Sensei muttered, "That is a very interesting young man."

"That's one word for him." Kakashi poked me again, though this time without any lightning. "So what was that?"

"What was what?" I asked, playing dumb.

Kakashi was having none of it. "Don't play dumb."

I had a vague impression of déjà vu and knew immediately that I wasn't going to get away from explaining my issues.

"Okay, okay, you win." I held up my hands in surrender before Kakashi could harmlessly zap me again to prove his point. Between him and Isobu's quick thinking, I'd avoided causing a scene, but it had been a close call that couldn't go unpunished.

Sensei said, "Good. Then let's get back to the inn right now. I think we need to have a full team meeting."

"Plus Rin?" I asked, kind of hoping for a mercy kill. Rin could guilt trip people.

"Yes."

Dammit.

"I can go find Obito," Kakashi volunteered.

Sensei nodded. "Please do."

Crap.

I sighed deeply, and Sensei flicked the back of my head.
"Ow!"

"Don't relax yet, Kei. We need to talk."

We need to talk. In social terms, I was in for a whuppin'.

Sensei took a bit of mercy on me and didn't immediately go in for the kill when everyone was assembled in his hotel room. No, instead he had tea brought to the room (and tested for poisons), and we assembled around the folding table in his room on some of the spare futons. Obito sat next to me while Kakashi was at Rin's left elbow, looking across the table at me between sips of tea. Sensei presided over our meeting without remarking on the tension in the room, apparently content to wait us out.

Well, to wait me out.

For about five minutes. Sensei eventually broke the awkward silence with, "So...what was that about? I thought you'd be happy to spend time outside of the village for once."

I couldn't tell if he was deliberately playing dumb or not. I'd thought it had been pretty obvious that I'd been triggered by hearing Baki's name, and realizing he was within striking distance. Or at least I, knowing the source and reasoning behind my anger, could call it obvious. Maybe Sensei suspected that I had lost control of Isobu?

Silly Sensei. I didn't control Isobu. It was a relationship. It was based on mutual respect. Or possibly on driving Isobu out of his mind with worry. Otherwise he would never have saved me from my long-stoked hatred.

After taking one last sip of tea, I turned to Obito and said, "So, Obito. Remember the nightmares I had as a kid?"

Obito blinked, looking rather confused. "...Um." His face screwed up in thought. I probably hadn't said anything directly to him about my worries over my brother for years, though the worry had grown and abated over that timeframe. "About Hayate? I remember you didn't sleep much when we were in the Academy, and you...I think you said, once, that you had nightmares about your brother. In the hospital?"

Probably after a freak-out of some sort. It'd been...what, back when we'd first met the Chinatsugumi? That had been a long time ago.

Kakashi nodded, and I vaguely remembered that he'd been there at the time. He'd listened, hadn't he?

Sensei and Rin just looked confused. Sensei did remember when my brother had been kidnapped and had seen the trauma recovery process, but probably didn't make the connection between Hayate and Baki. Meanwhile, Rin had probably seen Hayate's medical records at some point, but she hadn't gotten the low-down about my myriad issues.

In response to Obito's guess, I murmured, "Yeah, I did. Only I kinda lied. Just a bit."

Or I'd been lying like a rug. There were white lies and then there were the epic lies of omission I'd been practicing practically since the day I was born.

Then Sensei snapped his fingers, as though an idea had just popped up. "You mentioned once that that young ROOT agent, Kabuto, could be involved in your brother's death. It was when we were discussing Yakushi-san." Sensei frowned thoughtfully, taking another sip of his tea. Then, "Now that Yakushi-san is on our side, I can't dispute the results, but still…"

I winced. "Yeah. So…I may have lied a bit when I talked about…um. The future world thing. By omission." I made a vague gesture with my right hand that could have been interpreted as either a wobble indicating "so-so" or maybe just an attempt to ward off criticism. "The whole story was a little longer than I made it out to be."

Rin reached across the table and grasped my left hand in a supportive, firm grip. She said earnestly, "We're listening."

"Yeah, I can tell," I grumbled. "Anyway, skip forward ten years from now. Hayate makes chūnin and then special jōnin at some point, though I don't know when, and gets engaged to Yūgao along the way. Keep in mind that I'm a complete nobody in that world. Ergo, non-factor."

Kakashi frowned. "…So you're not related to Hayate in that world."

All too accurate for my tastes.

I made a face at him before continuing with, "Probably not. Assume I don't exist there. It's easier that way." I took a deep breath. "So for some reason or other, a whole bunch of stuff happens and Sunagakure ends up allied with Otogakure during a Chūnin Exam in Konoha. Kabuto—that ROOT kid Yakushi-san raised and the kid we still haven't found—is on Oto's side. Baki—the future jōnin we just met—is on Suna's side. And both of them are not on Konoha's side."

Obito mumbled, "I'm following so far, but…"

I talked right over him, saying in a strained voice, "So my brother, who is much older than he is now, stumbles into this midnight conspiracy while investigating something else." Like Gaara murdering that Oto genin for being too stupid to live. Who the hell willingly challenged Gaara because they thought he was in the way? "And he finds out that they're planning on staging a joint Suna-Oto invasion of Konoha, with the intention of wiping us off the map."

Sensei and Kakashi both went very quiet and dangerously serious.

"Suna and Oto? They're a super-small village, though, aren't they?" Rin said, confused.

"Orochimaru's their leader. Enough said," I almost snapped. I shook my head and proceeded with the air of someone trying to get everything over as quickly as possible. Because I was. "So anyway, Hayate finds out and thinks maybe it's a good idea to go warn people. But he's not as sneaky as a trained ROOT agent and a Suna jōnin, or else Baki figured out Wind-based sensing somehow. Hell if I know."

And here, my voice went almost hollow, "Short version: Hayate gets spotted, fights, and gets killed inside of five minutes."

"But Kei," Rin begins, "Baki-san hasn't—"

"I know." I glared into the depths of my teacup. "I know about a million things have changed between the then and the now and I'm half-convinced I'm going to die of stress before Hayate dies fighting the same guy. Too many things have changed already."

"But it doesn't change the fact that, until I was eight, I was beaten over the head with trauma nightmares for years." I ran a hand over my face. "My rational mind says nothing's going to happen. The remainders of those visions say 'Who cares? Have more nightmares!' Isobu had to tell me I was being stupid. Isobu. Because whenever my brother's in trouble or if I think he is, any Tailed Beast freakouts are most definitely my fault."
"You can't kill someone over something they haven't done yet." Rin was sweet, really, but that wasn't how our world worked.

"Actually, we kinda already do." That was Obito. His chakra said he was looking around the table with a guileless air. "I mean, that's why ANBU takes Hokage-sanctioned assassination missions."

I looked up to see Rin giving Obito a "you're not helping" look.

"Are you going to be able to handle seeing Baki-san again?" Sensei asked, watching my reactions carefully.

"I…might? The initial shock's over." It was like ripping a bandage off, in theory. I could probably desensitize myself to triggers like Baki, but it wouldn't be comfortable at all. I'd be edgy as hell.

I was almost seeing why people had decided to seal the Tailed Beasts into children. That way, at least you had a chance of noticing preexisting issues before your human weapon developed a hair trigger. Adult or teenaged shinobi had already learned to hide those kinds of things from prying eyes.

Then again, in my case, beggars couldn't be choosers.

"I don't actually know for certain how I'll react if someone doesn't distract me when I see him again." I propped my elbow on the table and leaned my chin on the heel of my upraised hand. "But I think I need to meditate to get my brain back in order. Maybe talk to Isobu. Maybe nap through the afternoon. I don't know."

"It sounds like you're going to need an intervention team if it comes down to that." Sensei poured himself another cup of tea. "I could act, since I know the seal on you is still active, but leaving the box myself would cause the Kazekage to react however he feels is necessary."

"Kakashi and I could do it," Obito suggested. "Couldn't we?"

"Not if one of you is supposed to be 'guarding' me." Sensei gave me a level look. "I wasn't expecting your visions to be a liability, Kei. Or your emotions."

"I'd argue that in this case, me not having a level head is worse than Isobu—at least he doesn't really care about people enough to get angry over them." I sighed. "And from what I know, Baki isn't a bad person. In that scenario he was following orders, and Hayate was on the wrong end of them. So…"

I could probably rationalize my way past that semi-irrational fear if I had enough time to turn it over in my head. I had a little less trouble viewing the Kazekage as a practical man who made bad decisions, but then, he hadn't actually given any orders here against Konoha, and he probably hadn't ordered Gaara's uncle to kill him yet. Maybe the dissonance was because I knew the Kazekage would recant his attitude post-mortem, and Gaara would be a greater Kazekage than his father had ever been once he got his head back in order. Baki, though, had just killed my brother and moved on. Nothing personal.

"Are you going to meditate?" Kakashi asked pointedly.

I nodded. "Yeah. Otherwise I'm a menace to society, I guess."
"Right. Summoning Jutsu." Kakashi slammed his hand down on the table, which was promptly engulfed in smoke.

When the chakra smoke cleared, Pakkun was sitting in front of Kakashi and inspecting the tea cake next to his master's cup. Offhandedly, Pakkun asked, "What'd you need me for?"

Kakashi gave his dog a pointed look, and Pakkun blithely ate the tea cake anyway. "Stay here with Kei."

Pakkun nodded. "Right." Then the pug hopped off the table and walked around until he could lie down next to me and lean against my leg.

I started petting him immediately.

"While you're meditating," Sensei mused aloud, "can you see if Isobu-san can pass a message to Kurama-san?"

I said, "Probably. Why?"

Why in the world is he asking me?

"I think I might've forgotten to take care of something back home. I know I left Kushina to deal with it, but I'm a little anxious to hear the results." Sensei smiled innocently, but his phrasing sent up a few alarm klaxons in my head anyway.

"...I'll see what I can do." I couldn't promise more than that, with Sensei being deliberately, ominously vague.

"Please do," Sensei said mildly. "And by this time tomorrow, have yourself under control."

I inclined my head, formally. I could hear the Hokage-ness in his voice and whether uncomfortable or not, I didn't want to disappoint him. Or miss the Finals. While I was sure watching my brother fight would get my blood pressure up, I was sure it would bug Hayate if I didn't show.

I could almost imagine his thirteen-year-old voice, cracking a bit in despair, "Where were you, Sis? Why weren't you there?"

Yeah, I didn't want to have to live with that. So I had to get myself under control.

In time, my team rotated out of the inn. Rin was going to check out the Sunagakure hospital, accompanied by Kakashi, while Obito was just going to go exploring. I didn't ask what else they wanted to do, since I was effectively under self-imposed seclusion to sort myself out. Hopefully they'd remember to get cute souvenirs or something.

I went back to the room I'd been sleeping in beforehand, rolled my futon back out, and decided to lie down. On my stomach, with my arms stretched out under my pillow.

Pakkun ate the other tea cakes before following me, so I made sure to pay attention to him. I didn't know how a summoned dog's metabolism differed from that of a normal dog, but I didn't imagine that so much extra sugar would be good for his stomach.

Pakkun didn't actually show any signs of distress, though. So, eventually, I had to meditate for real.

With my fingers running through Pakkun's fur, I took the metaphorical plunge.
I more or less bypassed my mindscape this time, heading down to the Tailed Beast collective subconscious whatever the heck. For the most part, I was actually comforted by its familiarity. The space itself was seemingly infinite, covered in water that was barely two centimeters deep and barely enough to create perfect mirrored reflections. Down here, I didn't have any particular powers like I did in my mindscape, but I was able to sit and chat with Isobu without any worry of being scoped out by a mind-reader. Even of the Sharingan sort.

But the yellow-skied salt flats were occupied. Mainly because there was a big blood-red fox lying in the middle of it like a sunbather, with his nine colossal tails idly waving behind him like a long cloak.

"What are you doing here, human?" Yin Kurama asked, rolling over so his feet were back under him. I was sitting on Isobu's head by then, with my legs dangling down between two of his forehead spikes. Underneath me, Isobu lifted himself up on his forelimbs and stomped toward Kurama. It made for a rocky ride, but probably not as much as, say, riding a horse. Isobu was big enough compared to me that I could have easily wondered if I was caught in an earthquake.

"We're here to get some answers." Isobu dropped back onto his belly, sending waves across the flats. He folded his arms in front of him like a person, and rested his head on top of them. Yin Kurama's tails lashed. "Is it about the fight? That's old news."

"Fight?" I asked. Panic seized me again. "Wait, did something happen in Konoha after we left?"

"A minor matter that angered the humans, I suppose." Yin Kurama shrugged. "It wasn't important enough for my host to require my help, so it's not enough for me to bother with at all."

"Do you have any idea who was involved? Or what happened? Is Kushina-san safe, Kurama-san?" "Fight?" I asked. Panic seized me again. "Wait, did something happen in Konoha after we left?"

"A minor matter that angered the humans, I suppose." Yin Kurama shrugged. "It wasn't important enough for my host to require my help, so it's not enough for me to bother with at all."

"Do you have any idea who was involved? Or what happened? Is Kushina-san safe, Kurama-san?" "Do you have any idea who was involved? Or what happened? Is Kushina-san safe, Kurama-san?"

"I don't know. I'm not her secretary, so don't expect me to write down all your questions for her." Yin Kurama turned away.

Isobu grumbled, "That's just because your handwriting's terrible."

Yin Kurama growled, "You take that back!"

…What.

Just…what?

"The Seven-, Six-, Five-, and Two-Tails are worse than I am," Yin Kurama snarled, all of his tails seeming to puff up.

And when nine tails on a fox that size all decided to go for the "I wanna be bigger than I am" animal reflex, it was a little like Yin Kurama had suddenly doubled in mass. Despite its usual tendency to lie flat, he had more hair, proportionately speaking, than Cousin It.
"That's because they don't even have hands!" Isobu snapped back.

Wait a minute.

I leaned over and thumped Isobu's horns a few times to get his attention before saying, "That's still half of the Tailed Beasts. And besides, there's nothing really stopping Kurama-san from learning calligraphy."

"There isn't?" Yin Kurama's tails stilled, his ears lifted, and his head tilted to his left. His body language was a weird mishmash of humanlike and canid, and the result was generally mixed messages.

"Kushina-san was one of my three teachers when it comes to fūinjutsu. If you asked nicely, I'm sure she could help you. You have hands that are built pretty close to hers, so it's not like she'd have to learn new techniques to help you." I swung my legs as I thought, then added, "I mean, it might keep you from getting as bored if you had something to work on, right? It's productive that way."

"...It's an idea." Yin Kurama settled down again. Maybe it was just me, but he seemed more relaxed when Isobu wasn't hammering on one of his few insecurities. "What were you asking about?"

"What did that fight involve?" I asked, leaning forward intently.

"My host lost her temper with some other human. Her prey tried to escape without her permission." Yin Kurama's fangs were bared in a vicious grin. "You know, sometimes you humans aren't so bad."

That did not bode well for whoever had tried to cross Kushina. "Kushina isn't violent without a reason. What did her prey look like?"

"All you humans look alike to me. You're small." Yin Kurama appeared to think about it, and one of his long ears flicked. "Bandages? Black hair, maybe."

"That could describe half of the humans in the village." Isobu shifted uncomfortably. Maybe he was wondering where this conversation could end up.

"I could just get her here to talk to you." Yin Kurama's tails stretched skyward, or at least upward into what ought to have been just the sky. Instead, they vanished about halfway along their length, into apparently thin air.

And then there was the sound of barely-audible screaming.

A tiny red-streaked blur streaked out of the sky like a comet, plummeting toward Yin Kurama's back as his tails reappeared and curled around his body. Then the blur hit the top of his tails, ending up engulfed in his long red fur.

Kushina's voice rang out from the mass of the giant fox monster's tails, "What the hell was that for, Kurama?"

Yin Kurama's middle tail lashed, caught something, and pulled loose from the mass. "You have visitors, host."

Kushina was clinging to the fur of that tail, looking disgruntled. She was also wearing her jōnin uniform, and I wondered if that meant she was also wearing it in real life.
"Visit—oh!" She flung herself loose from Yin Kurama's fur and landed squarely on his head, waving. "Kei-chan, Isobu-san! I didn't know we could talk from so far away!"

"Why does he rate a '-san'?" Yin Kurama demanded, his ears coming up again.

"Because," Kushina said, then paused. "Well, I don't know. He just looks like one. So, what's going on over there in Sunagakure?"

"I met the man who killed my brother in the other world." As soon as I said it, I saw Kushina blink. I went on, "He seems nice, but it was…not fun."

"Is this another thing like with Obito?" Kushina asked.

Tobi had been another source of nightmares over the years, but Obito being around, alive, and cheery had mitigated most of that trauma in the same way that vaccines inoculated against disease. Obito hadn't genuinely scared me in quite a while, with Tobi as a factor or not.

"Kind of. But Baki-san was following orders." I shoved that topic aside as hard as I could, and said, "But Sensei wanted me to check in with you, since this communication method is faster than birds and it's undetectable. So what happened in the village? Kurama-san said there was a fight."

"Oh? Well, there was. Sort of." Kushina shrugged. "Minato asked me to help Tsunade-sama keep the village safe from ROOT, because they've been lying low since he organized the ANBU manhunts for the various members."

So that was why I hadn't been hearing much on that front. I wasn't involved in the investigation, of course, but I'd still been a little antsy about how quiet ROOT had been. Kakashi hadn't had any news to tell me, so I'd wondered if the trail had gone cold.

And the last anyone had said, Danzō had been confined to bedrest after breaking his hip or something,

"…I take it that Sensei deciding to leave the village for a while was well-timed." I frowned.

"And ROOT made their move," Kushina agreed. "Right into the trap I set up for them."

"Which was…?"

Tsunade was the genius medical ninja who had quite literally changed the face of Konoha's war machine by making us invest in medics. Having her and Kushina in the village would have made the village too dangerous for any foreign foe to confront directly. Not that most of them knew that, but I imagined than an insider like Danzō would have known better than to underestimate the two women. Kushina's jinchūriki status was well-known to Konoha's elders, and Tsunade had been a "speaks for herself" kind of threat. Politically and otherwise.

Looked like both of us had been wrong.

I'd assumed that Danzō's forces weren't idiots.

He'd assumed he could recover from that mistake.

"Around their leader, of course. It was a rescue mission." Kushina sat down on Yin Kurama's head and smiled unpleasantly as her eyes went red and her pupils turned into vertical slits. "Shimura's dead."
"...And we're sure about that." Holy crap. If it was true, then maybe the Uchiha massacre wasn't going to happen! "We're absolutely sure that he's dead. We have a body?"

"We do, sort of." Kushina wobbled a hand in midair. "He had some kind of space-time seal that was supposed to kill everything within a twenty-meter radius around him the second he died, and then cram it into a storage seal. Sort of like what Minato used on that black blob thing from the Tenth."

"No one got caught in it?" I demanded, sitting up. "Please tell me no one got caught in it."

And hadn't he had some kind of...right! He'd been able to use Izanami in the other timeline. Between the ten stolen Sharingan and the Sharingarm he'd mounted them into, he'd been spamming the shit out of the reality-modifying technique. But here, he must not have had time to complete whatever research had gotten that arm for him. Nor had he been able to take Shisui's eye, which was the most dangerous of the lot.

Hard to steal someone's Mangekyō Sharingan when the person in question didn't actually have one yet. And, with luck, Shisui would never be in a position to get it again.

"It didn't even go off." Kushina grinned. "Come on, Kei-chan. What do you take me for? I've forgotten more about seals than Shimura ever knew. And I checked the captive ROOT agents for seals after his death, too. He's gone."

"How'd you stop that seal, though?" Hadn't Tobi needed to intervene to save Sasuke, when the kid finally offed Shimura? Kamui was like a half-step of bullshit down from Izanami, and Tobi had had that at his disposal too.

"My chakra chains aren't just for binding things." Kushina smiled. "They can shut down all the chakra moving in anyone who gets caught by them. Just leaves brute strength. And while Shimura was a tough old man, no one can hit harder than Tsunade-sama."

So, like Nagato's chakra receivers, but using the chakra chains as anchors instead...

I guess that solved one mystery about the Uzumaki clan. They'd been blessed with more than ridiculous vitality. Impossible-for-anyone-else fūinjutsu seemed right up their alley.

"So I'm going to assume that Shimura got his ribs caved in," I said thoughtfully. "And that, what, his troops just rolled over and gave up?"

"No." Kushina went solemn for a moment. "But the fight was underground, so it was at least contained. The ROOT extraction team couldn't get out of the fortified bunker thanks to Shiranui-kun's portable barrier kunai. I didn't even have to reinforce that. Then Falcon's team was forced to take the ROOT agents down hard. Only one survivor, and he barely lasted long enough to cough up the location of their training facility."

Which I was going to assume had not been possible before Danzō's death. Even for a Yamanaka. Otherwise ROOT would have been found out the instant that ANBU did infiltration checks.

But hadn't one of Danzō's bodyguards been a Yamanaka? That was like putting the mole in charge of mole-hunting if that guy had anything to do with the investigations.

"We're going to hit them next." Kushina looked contemplatively up at the sky. "Or at least, ANBU are. Hopefully."

"And you're saying that the Hokage planned all of this?" Isobu asked. "He isn't clairvoyant."
Kushina said, "No, but he was forewarned, and had more options than just sitting on the issue. That part was driving him crazy. Drove me crazy, too. Remind me to give you the first draft of the speech Minato wanted to make when he finally got Danzō by the short hairs. We weren't charitable."

I stared. "...I'm going to guess that it's not appropriate for all audiences."

"No. But I think you'd appreciate it." Kushina shook her head. "Tell Minato that his plan worked out. No one got hurt on our side, not even Falcon's team. We're just cleaning up."

"I will." And maybe I'd try my very best to never get on either of their bad sides ever again. And then I remembered what Yin Kurama had said earlier in the conversation. "Uh...by the way, is Tenzō-kun all right?"

Kushina tilted her head to one side.

"Kurama-san mentioned him," I added.

Kushina rapped her knuckles on the top of Yin Kurama's head, muttering something, before saying, "He's fine, Kei-chan. He got a little roughed up, but Tsunade-sama has him now."

That just raised more questions. I could guess and say that her tone implied that Tenzō was home free from all things ROOT, but the words she used suggested a darker meaning. The phrasing was just ambiguous enough to be worrying in my agitated mental state.

"Did he defect back to ROOT?" I asked sharply.

A little taken aback by my tone, Kushina said carefully, "No. Tenzō-kun was hurt when he joined in the initial brawl against the ROOT extraction team. Broke his wrist." Kushina frowned. "Where did that come from?"

"I had a run-in with someone who accidentally gave me nightmares for six years," I said tersely. "I may not be thinking rationally."

Or be officially paranoid.

Isobu added, "She isn't. While in this village, we've already had a near-miss."

"What kind of near-miss?" Kushina hopped off Yin Kurama's head and easily floated over to Isobu's. She sat down next to me and took my right hand in hers. "Kei-chan?"

I told her, this time without leaving anything out. So did Isobu.

"Oh, Kei-chan," Kushina murmured, giving me a hug. "Your brother will be all right. You have Rin-chan and Obito and Minato to help make sure he does, you know. Not just the power of a single person and her inner demon."

"I would argue that the inner demon factor changes things." Isobu said flatly.

"Reluctantly, I'm forced to agree with you." Yin Kurama yawned, then. "Smash them all like the pests they are and there won't be a threat."

Oh, what a time for these two to start getting along.

"Thank you both for thinking positive," Kushina sniped at them both.
"I'm sorry," I mumbled, when both Tailed Beasts settled back down. "I didn't mean to make it sound like Tenzō-kun was on Shimura's side. Or even to get that close to losing my temper over something that's just in my head. I'm supposed to be trying to meditate, but then I decided I should talk to you first and…well."

"There's nothing really wrong with having the occasional doubt or bad thought, as long as you don't act on it." Kushina patted my hand. "Or, if you do, you think on it before its make or break time. That way at least you can say that you were trying to come up with a better solution."

"Yeah." I pinched the bridge of my nose. "I'll give Sensei the all-clear from Konoha after I actually meditate. Is that all right?"

Kushina nodded. "The situation isn't urgent here anymore. We're fine. And I'll give Tenzō-kun an extra melonpan and say it was from you, okay?"

"Good idea." Even if he'd probably wonder why I was apologizing through a proxy. I hadn't done anything to him recently other than besmirch his name while emotionally compromised.

With a final wave from Kushina and a nod from Yin Kurama, both of them vanished.

"…Isobu, they're scary when they're working together," I admitted, once they were gone. Sure, I felt better, but Kushina and Tsunade had apparently dismantled ROOT without Yin Kurama's help. Uzumaki women might have just been born more terrifying than average. "I'm not sure which one's scarier."

Isobu nodded sagely. "I'm not sure if she's a bad influence on Kurama or if Kurama's a bad influence on her."

We couldn't exactly do anything about it now. "Either way, it probably averages out a little south of 'friendly.' Let's head back and see if any time's passed since we got here."

And a little after that, I "woke up" exactly where I remembered lying down. Isobu and I both checked for genjutsu, intruders, or any other interesting surprises, but found none. Pakkun was the only person in the Konoha section of the inn besides me, which suited me just fine.

Pakkun had migrated onto my back, but he just gave an audible doggy sigh and said, "Are you planning on getting up already? I just got comfortable."

I reached awkwardly back to scratch under his chin. "How long was I out?"

"About five minutes." Pakkun leaned into my hand, closing his eyes. "Now can you hold still so I can take a nap?"

"…Sure." I could meditate lying down. And he'd asked. I got comfortable again and Pakkun got up, turned in a circle, and settled back down again.

We had an actual quiet hour in there, total.
"You need to learn how to use my powers more than you have already."

That was the first thing Isobu told me, upon being asked for suggestions during my meditation period. I had asked for "ways to control myself more effectively," so I wasn't exactly sure why he suggested that.

We were back in the mindscape, and he was bobbing in the shallows of the bay like a giant greenish iceberg, while I was lying on the sand. Sure, we weren't actually on a beach, but I liked to think that the sensation of sun on my face was a pretty good substitute for sunburn. And while we were in here, we could easily be heard from any place in it, without having to shout, unless Isobu and I were mumbling to ourselves.

"Why's that?" I asked, though it was a stupid question. In order to be an effective shinobi, I needed to know all of the tools in my arsenal. While I had no problem with using Isobu's chakra as a way to enhance my strength, speed, and sensing ability, those things didn't modify my fighting style much. I had to put less time into retraining myself as long as I didn't change how I fought.

"It's fine to use my chakra alone," Isobu said, "but you're not going to reach your full potential that way."

Yeah, I wasn't.

But at the same time, what powers did Isobu have? Powerful genjutsu? Great, but not what I specialized in. I had devised workarounds that let me use them with the speed I was used to, but I didn't have much interest in things other than just blowing the enemy to into bone chunks. What else could he do?

"What do you know about coral?" Isobu asked me, sounding like he was trying not to growl.

"Microscopic living creatures that live together in superstructures generally called reefs by humans," I rattled off, digging my toes into the sand on Isobu's beach.

"…Yes. But pretend you don't have to think about all that." Isobu grumbled a bit, then said, "A host using my chakra can use our combined control over water to cause coral to grow anywhere you touch. It's called the Coral Palm jutsu."

"And?" I asked. I remembered a few scraps from my old ecology lessons, and coral was always described as "fragile" whenever the topic came up. But that might've had something to do with water temperature…
"It's organic rock that fights chakra directly. I've only ever seen one person escape, and he did it by hacking his arm off," Isobu told me flatly.

"Did he die?" Morbid curiosity. I swear it was going to get me in trouble one day.

"Yes." Isobu seemed to purr with satisfaction, which…honestly? It just sounded weird coming from a non-feline form. And from a rib cage that big.

Then again, he could talk. What did I know about what sounds Tailed Beasts could make?

"Isobu…I don't know how to say this," I admitted, scratching the back of my neck, "but I've kind of always thought of using that much of your chakra as a weapon of last resort. I mean, I can deal with the little enhancements and the other little bonuses, but my fighting style would have to be completely useless before I'd be willing to go full Version Two Chakra Cloak. Or to try a full transformation."

"Are you afraid that your seal won't survive it?" Isobu asked, as his middle tail slammed down into the water and something fishlike in it proceeded to die of hydrostatic shock.

(Either the fish-creature's death had just been that obvious, or else Isobu was feeding my brain bizarre phantom sensations.)

"A little, but not as much as I would have before Sensei and Kushina modified it." I sighed. "Not to mention that there are only about three people in the whole village I can practice against if we do go all the way. And Jiraiya would do the sensible thing and just drop Gamabunta on us."

"What about this?" Isobu flicked another of his tails, and a memory fragment went careening straight for my hand. I managed to snatch my hand out of the way in time, but Isobu just continued with, "Look at that one."

I picked up the memory fragment with my nearly-impaled hand and…Oh. This one had a looping clip of Naruto in full Sage Mode, as he was going to confront Pain with four summoned toads at his back.

"Okay, you have a point there. Though I don't know if Sensei is as comfortable with this as I'd need him to be." I frowned thoughtfully as the image-Naruto proceeded to pick up a summoned rhinoceros as big as a tanker truck and hurl it the approximate length of a football stadium. "But if he is, yeah, I'd be okay trying to find our limits."

Mainly because Sage Mode could let people tank attacks they otherwise wouldn't survive.

"Then it's a plan. We simply have to make it through tomorrow." Isobu settled back down in the bay, apparently content for now. "It will be interesting to go all-out on the man who sealed Kurama."

…Okay, I was just gonna have to ignore that. Or else I wasn't going to get any sleep later.

I caught up to Sensei a while after that, since I still needed to finish my actual meditation and people kept interrupting. Checking my chakra sense once I was done, I pinpointed him as he was coming back to our inn from the Ame delegation's place. There were probably about seven Ame-nin in town, even with Konan's flower throwing a false positive, and he hadn't needed anyone to chaperone him there.

Especially since Jiraiya was accompanying him back.
I managed to get their attention inside the inn. Not a major feat, given how small the lobby was, but...well, whatever. Mission accomplished.

"Sensei, Kushina-san is all right," I told Sensei, with Pakkun still on my shoulder. I imagined that my padded flak jacket was more comfortable than the sandy ground, so I didn't mind the extra weight either. I'd trained with weirder handicaps. "Everything’s been taken care of.

Sensei blinked, momentarily nonplussed, before a light lit up behind his eyes. "Oh! That was actually faster than I expected."

"For what?" I asked him.

"For you to get back to me, actually." Sensei grinned, the picture of innocence. "I knew I left the village in good hands."

This Hokage of yours is a little too confident.

It might be partly an act, but he's masking his chakra too well for me to tell for sure.

Sensei patted my shoulder. "If you hurry, you should still be able to catch your teammates wandering around town. This is our rest day, so you should enjoy it."

"Sensei…during the exams, am I allowed to cheer even though I might be in the box with you?" I asked. The idea had been bothering me off-and-on, ever since I heard my brother was in the finals. If I was supposed to be a guard, wouldn't that mean I needed to maintain a dignified front for my Kage's sake? "Since Hayate's a finalist and all."

Sensei brought his hand to his chin and made a show of thinking about it. "Well…"

"Oh, like you're going to be quiet, Minato." Jiraiya slapped Sensei's shoulder, nearly sending him careening into me. "Let Kei-kun have some fun with this."

"It's an important event, Jiraiya-sensei." My blond teacher, despite his words, seemed to be fighting the urge to smile. He cleared his throat and told me, "Kei, for the duration of the Chūnin Exams, consider yourself relieved of duty. I can get Kakashi to take care of it."

"Thanks, Sensei." Oh, and one more thing… "By the way, have you mastered Sage Mode? Either of you?"

Sensei groaned, exasperated. "I know we've talked about this, but Kei, can you please not bring up everything I'm working on? I like to pretend I have some secrets."

Jiraiya gave me a shrewd look. "No. But why do you need to know?"

"I need to get more training in. So, I'm willing to spar with someone who can take me on at full tilt." I crossed my arms and shifted my weight, so I had my hips cocked to one side.

"Um… Well, I'm only up to three minutes, so we'll have to see how this goes." Sensei shook his head. "Kushina's been telling me I need to train seriously anyway."

"It could be interesting." Jiraiya rubbed his chin, contemplating.

And maybe it'd help him prepare for possibly facing down his godson in fifteen years.

"Well, Kei, you're free to do whatever you want at this point." Sensei waved a hand dismissively. "Go on now."
I explored Sunagakure after that.

Maybe it was just my jinchūriki status talking, but I didn't feel any particular need to immediately find someone to hang out with. Instead, I walked around town and tried to take in the sights out of a much-belated sense of wonder.

Between a late arrival to the village last night, and an early meeting with the Kazekage, I hadn't gotten a chance to check out the village itself. It wasn't my first time in another shinobi village—I'd been to Tanigakure and to Jōmae too—but it was my first time exploring another of the Big Five. And it was amazing how different things were once you got into another village's territory.

The Land of Wind wasn't all desert, but Sunagakure had been one since the village's founding. Someone or something, back in the day, had smashed a gigantic hole into the sandstone and left a valley behind. The valley, because it had exactly one inlet, had become a fortified town and, eventually, a shinobi village. Looking at the walls, I wondered if a meteorite impact had something to do with it. If I tried to edit the buildings out with my mind, it did kind of look like a huge crater…

But anyway, that was a mere idle thought.

The buildings themselves weren't made of wood, but rather a sort of clay composite that could shed daytime heat. It reminded me of the way that native Arizonans had once made entire cities out of the same material, though obviously the folks who lived there hadn't decided to include power cables running from building to building. The awnings, too, were something undeniably Suna instead of having easy equivalents in other cultures.

As a foreign shinobi, I obviously wasn't allowed to head into certain areas. The village walls, for example, were not open to tourists. I wasn't supposed to be anywhere near the administrative center, either, so I didn't go there. The Academy was also out, for obvious reasons.

Instead, I visited the marketplace.

Which was underground.

Actually, that's not quite accurate. Suna's market for nonperishable items, like cloth and dried spices, was on the ground level. So were their hot food stands, since steam and smoke were more of a hazard where airflow was a problem. On the other hand, anything that could rot or end up getting mummified by the hot desert air tended to be stored below ground.

It still smelled a lot like old fish.

I was in search of something a little different than fish, though. I wanted to see if Suna had some very particular things.

"Is there anything to eat down here?" Pakkun asked, from around ankle height. He got tired of pretending to be my parrot at some point.

"Kakashi-kun, this will be perfect!"

And by "particular things," I did not mean my teammates. I was actually craving pomegranates. I hadn't seen the darn things for over fifteen years and was rather looking forward to being able to juice a few. Sure, I'd probably ruin a shirt or two, but it'd be worth it.

But hey, you take what you can get. I waved in their direction, though I was probably not too visible in the crappy underground lightning. It turned everything red. So, I waved again and shouted, "Rin!"
"Kei!" was Rin's quick reply. She shoved something into Kakashi's arms before pushing her way through the crowd toward me.

Some Suna civilians gave her dirty looks. That stopped once Pakkun bit one of them in the ankle, then disappeared into the throng.

"Kei, what are you doing here? I thought you'd be meditating all afternoon." Rin was wearing one of those Suna headdress things, which blocked out excess sunlight to help prevent heatstroke and sunburn. I wasn't sure why—it certainly wasn't that hot out.

When in Rome, I guess.

"I got finished early. So, what have you two been doing?" I asked, as Rin grabbed my arm and dragged me back to where Kakashi was paying for…whatever they'd bought.

"I wanted to try some of these things. Look, candied dates!" Rin enthused. "They also have special breads you never see anywhere in Konoha."

Well, if rice needed tons of water to grow—and it did—then obviously different regions would have to explore different culinary options. Konoha tended to prefer a combination of rice and various grains, including buckwheat, while I was pretty sure that Sunagakure couldn't get away with that without importing a majority of their food. So if they had a bit of a Middle Eastern flair, more power to them.

"Not exactly surprising." Kakashi was holding a pinkish fruit that looked rather familiar. Pakkun had already clambered up onto his shoulder and was sitting there patiently. "I've never eaten one of these before."

"I think that was what I was looking for." I sidled over to the stall with Kakashi in front of it, looking at the wares as the shopkeeper looked askance at all three of us. "How much for these?"

The merchant named his price—kind of expensive for a fruit so difficult to eat—and I walked out of the market with two of them a few minutes later. Granted, they were in Rin's grocery bag, but it was the thought that counted, right? And I'd be able to test my new knife skills on an unnecessarily complex fruit.

"What did you get?" I asked Rin, as we headed out into the sunlight again.

"This flatbread, more candied dates…" Rin dug around in her bag for a moment before pulling out a clear glass jar of something salmon-colored. I had to look closer to be sure of what it was, and remained nonplussed even after I realized what it was.

"…Pickled ginger? I thought we had that stuff at home." Granted, I didn't use it much, even when eating out, but I was still certain the Land of Fire had ginger farms somewhere.

"But the Land of Wind has a different kind," Rin insisted, placing the jar back in her bag. "And it's not any more expensive here, so why not? We can just seal up all of our stuff in one of those sealing scrolls for the trip home."

"Point taken." I shrugged. "Kakashi, did you get anything?"

Kakashi nodded, but said, "Earlier, I did. A cactus."

"…For you, or for Tenzō-kun?" I asked, genuinely curious. Kakashi wasn't around the village as much as he probably would be once he left ANBU, so he probably wouldn't be able to take care of a plant like the one Naruto had given him.

Pakkun made an aggravated noise from Kakashi's shoulder, because clearly getting a plant with thorns was going to screw with his doggy mojo.

…Wow, brain.

"Both. I'll let him pick which one he wants." Kakashi glanced around at the outdoor market. "Actually, I think Gai said something about curry…"

"How hot?" I asked, because I got the feeling that Suna had a very different type than Konoha preferred. Hot regions tended to produce hot food, for a variety of reasons.

"Gai's would take the roof off your mouth if Genma let him cook for the group," Kakashi replied, heading off toward the spices. "Granted, Gai isn't much of a cook anyway."

"You eat takeout or Kushina-san's cooking all the time, though." Rin had to pick up the pace to catch up to the two of us.

"Gai's worse. Tip: Never let him watch the stove." Which, upon consideration, sounded pretty much the same as Kushina's concerns about me a year ago. Only I was pretty sure I wasn't the kind of person to add extra stuff to a dish, like that guy from Ratatouille.

Rin piped up with, "I think we're not going to find instant curry here…"

Sometime after that, we finished shopping and had picked up a carrot pastry of some sort (which both of my teammates automatically hated) in addition to real curry, noodles, and a bunch of other stuff that Rin wanted to experiment with. I only knew how to make like four dishes, with Kakashi not much better and Rin lacking resources to cook, so I imagined that we'd probably need to plan some kind of group cookout to pool our ignorance once we got back to Konoha.

I did not have high hopes for it. But that was just my cynicism talking.

Oh, and Pakkun had left. Guess he wanted to fill the rest of the dogs in on his successful babysitting mission.

"Oh, Kei, did you see Obito anywhere? He took off this morning, and we haven't seen him since," Rin commented, frowning suddenly. "I hope he hasn't gotten lost…"

Actually, I was thinking "I hope he hasn't gotten caught snooping someplace that'll get the rest of us in trouble." Obito had a more liberal idea of exploration than I did, and Kamui allowed him to get in and out of places that otherwise had the most stringent anti-intruder security measures on the planet. It was what had made Tobi such a pain in the ass.

Kakashi gave me a significant look, which I took to mean that he was thinking roughly the same way I was.

So I reached out with my chakra sense and— "He's by the…stadium, I think. Like, a kilometer that way. Otherwise, there's nothing out there to hold his attention out in the middle of the desert."

"Are you sure about that?" Kakashi asked.

"…Well, unless he's discovered scorpions." I checked with my chakra sense again. Obito didn't feel jumpy. "Though I don't think so."
"What is your range, now?" Rin asked, curious.

"...You know, I'm not sure." I'd never exactly tested that, and when I needed extreme long range scanning, most relevant persons could traverse it in seconds, whether through teleportation or other means. Still, I had a lot more chakra than I had once had as a child, and Isobu's chakra integrating with mine and expanding even my normal chakra capacity had changed a few more variables.

"Probably five hundred to a thousand meters if I'm concentrating really hard, though I know Obito's chakra really well. More under special circumstances." Meaning basically when partnering up with Isobu for the explicit purpose of finding things. "Well, that's another thing for when we get back home."

Kakashi said, "Are you testing something?"

"Yeah. I'm gonna see what 'going all-out' looks like. Sensei might invite you and Obito to it."

Rin looked alarmed. "Really?"

"...I want to look forward to that, but I feel like it's mostly going to result in property damage," Kakashi said dryly.

I was about to say something, likely sarcastic, when Obito's chakra vanished from the spot a kilometer away and reappeared about two meters away.

I had to give him mental points for the entrance, too. Obito managed to disguise the Kamui reemergence, which was quite unique, by dropping a smoke pellet through the portal first. By the time the smoke—which was the same color and smell as chakra smoke from both the Body Flicker jutsu and Summoning jutsu—vanished, Obito was standing in front of us with only minor fanfare.

"Hi! Where've you guys been?" He was holding a scorpion. It had a light gray body and yellowish limbs, with narrow pincers and a very long tail with a red-tipped stinger. If Kakashi had made a bet with me, I would have owed him money.

"Um, the market? Obito, why do you have a scorpion?" Rin asked, recovering first.

"I kinda wondered what kinds of venomous animals they had around here." The scorpion crawled up his right arm, which had enough weirdness going on that Obito was probably safe. "Rin-chan, do we have any stuff about scorpion venom? I know most shinobi use mixed poisons, but I don't know if we've ever gotten samples from these guys before."

Quick as a whip, Kakashi pulled a book—and not porn or manga—out of his shuriken pouch. From the cover, it was a field guide to local wildlife. And it was not the sort of book that got published just because the writer wanted to satisfy his curiosity.

If he had, he wouldn't have titled it Hostile Flora and Fauna of the Land of Wind.

Kakashi flipped through the pages rapidly, while Obito's scorpion friend turned around on his sleeve and marched back down toward Obito's gloved hand.

"Hey, Obito? Might not want to let that sting you," I said, pulling a kunai out of a hip holster I'd put on for today. Kakashi's reaction had set me a bit on edge.

"I wasn't planning on it." Obito picked the scorpion up with a quick burst of Wood Release, trapping the creature in a tiny wooden cage.

"Sunagakure red scorpion," Kakashi announced. He snapped the book shut. "Congratulations, Obito. Your new friend can kill you in five minutes."

Rin, peering at the scorpion, said, "I think the hospital will want to see this one. If he hasn't stung anything yet, he probably could be useful for making antivenom."

"Or making poisons. Can I see that?" I asked Kakashi, who obligingly tossed me his field guide.

Obito twisted the Wood Release projection until it formed a wicker-like cage with a long vine as a string to hold it. He held it out. "Do you want it, Rin-chan? I could take it to the Suna hospital if you think that'd be the best choice instead."

"Um, maybe?" Rin handed her bags to Kakashi, taking the little wicker cage. Inside, the scorpion snapped its pincers at her.

"This thing says there's no antivenom," I said, perusing the five pages of warnings on the Sunagakure red scorpion. Jesus. Hundreds of years of chakra bullshit and nobody had figured out how to counter it? "But I guess that's no reason we can't try."

"Well, that settles it. We're taking this back to the inn." Rin smiled broadly, to my surprise.

"So, you like him?" Obito still seemed hesitant.

"Yep! If Kei can make a containment seal for him," Rin paused, and I nodded. She continued with a renewed smile, "Then we can keep him and take him home for medical research. Thank you, Obito!"

"No problem." Obito peered into the bag Kakashi was carrying. "So, is this dinner?"

"We're having dinner back at the inn. These are mostly gifts," Kakashi corrected him.

"Did you want to get anything from the market before we head back?" I asked Obito.

"Eh, right now I can't think of anything. Maybe tomorrow, before we leave." Obito shrugged. "Well, let's go!"

Much later that day, after dinner, I was lying on my futon with Shiba across my feet. It'd been a long day, and I needed to calm my brain down a bit, so I was inking yet more explosive seals in a strange sort of meditation. I was pretty sure that the methods that sane people used would not have resulted in accumulating a pile of explosive notes, but I was going with what worked for me.

Kakashi was reading what looked like a romance novel, over by the room's only window. He had picked up the book from the inn's lobby, but he looked like he was about to fall asleep from boredom halfway through the first chapter. Maybe I could get him to trade once I was done.

Then the door opened, and my brother poked his head into the room.

"Sis, can I use your explosive tags tomorrow?" Hayate asked.

I looked up, drawing a line through the last seal to cancel it out. "Um, why? I thought genin were supposed to just use their own talents."

"It's not my fault you haven't taught me how to make them." Hayate crossed the room to my futon, then flopped over on top of me like a felled tree. Oof! "Come ooooon, Sis. I swear I know how to use them!"
"Ask your sensei," I said. "If he says you can use them, sure."

"I already did," Hayate told me smugly, still lying across my back. He shifted his weight and, though his elbows were digging into me, I didn't toss him off. "He says I can do whatever to win."

"I'm more worried about you blowing yourself up, Hayate." I held up one of my seals, dropping it to my left so he could reach it. "Because these? These are not standard seals. I haven't made those in ages."

"I don't think standard seals will work on Maki-san anyway." Hayate picked up the seal and rolled over on my back, so he was lying with the back of his head between my shoulder blades. "Iruka said he heard her training and he thinks she might know fūinjutsu, too. Just, uh, with the cloth stuff instead of paper."

"Just let him," was Kakashi's unasked-for contribution to the conversation.

The Chūnin Exams were supposed to test foresight, command ability, and also the ability to know when you were outgunned. To make a good showing, entrants had to do all of the above, and maybe have the nearest Kage smile down on them.

Having a sister who specialized in kenjutsu and fūinjutsu (specifically of the things that went boom) and just asking for help probably counted as resourcefulness.

Hayate's chakra pinged mine again. "Please, Sis. I can do this!"

"Well, all right." I reached out, grabbed my explosives scroll, and handed it to him over my shoulder. "So, kenjutsu?"

"I think so." Hayate stuffed my entire scroll into one of his jacket pockets. "I think I've almost figured out that thing you and Mom could do. The Mountain Cutter."

"Almost?" I asked.

I felt Kakashi's chakra show a spark of interest.

"Well, I don't have enough chakra for more than a couple shots," Hayate admitted. "And Inoichi-sensei won't let me train with the Gates. So, I guess it's more of a last resort thing."

"The audience loves a show," Kakashi put in.

"Yeah, we're not competing just for the promotions. I know that." Hayate shrugged. "But I want to win! So, I'm willing to do whatever to give myself a better shot. Without sabotaging my opponents."

"Hm." I contemplated my ink-stained calligraphy brushes.

"So can I take your flight goggles, too?" Hayate asked, poking my shoulder.

"Is this because of the sand?" I asked.

"Yeah. I mean, I know I can sense, but a lot of Suna-nin use Wind and I can't sense as well if there's some kind of fake sandstorm." I guessed that being here for a month, just training, would tell him that much. "And it would help with contact poisons and blinding powders."

"Point." I didn't have my flight gear on me, but I could get Tsuruya's flight bags easily enough. "You can use them."
"I kinda wish I'd trained more with a full katana." Hayate finally got off of my back and sat up. He scooted over until I could see him without straining my neck, then crouched down next to me.

…I was not going to fall for puppy-dog eyes.

"No." And I wasn't going to budge on that. Hayate could not learn to use a full katana in twelve hours. It just wasn't going to happen.

Hayate grinned. Cheeky brat. "Hey, it was worth a try."

I reached out and poked him in the forehead.

"Hey!"

"Go and bug your sensei, Hayate."

Hayate left, and from the sounds of his laughter bouncing off the walls after that, I had to imagine that he'd gotten exactly what he wanted.

"He'll be fine," Kakashi said, not looking up from his book.

I put my brushes on the pile of explosives I'd made, thought about it, and then dropped my face onto my pillow. With my voice muffled by cotton, I said, "I know that, and you know that, but my heart rate doesn't want to believe it."

"Try being more convincing." He sighed, snapping his book shut. "I give up. Do you want to read this?"

I looked up. "Is it horrible?"

"The pacing's bland, I hate the main character, and I've gotten through the first chapter and I'm pretty sure the main couple hasn't met. Your call." Kakashi held the book out to me, then tossed it so it landed next to my hand.

"What a glowing endorsement." I picked up the book and flipped it open to the first page.

Kakashi sat down across from me, picking through my pile of drying seals and sorting them by power.

"The branch Roku had added to the fire burst asunder with a muted pop as the coals underneath heated the gnarled length of wood to the point where a small cache of water or sap that had somehow evaded the rays of the sun for untold decades exploded into steam…" I recited, then paused. "How did this make it past the editing stage? Because this is…" The first sentence of what promised to be a horrible experience?

"Yeah." Kakashi had sorted my seals into piles that translated to "small," "big" and "run," at a glance. "And that's just a campfire."

"It's an abomination," I said, and flipped to another page to start scanning for more problems. Depressingly, I found them. "…Did the author just use five synonyms for 'green'? He's talking about a tree. Oh, and this one has something about 'brown silk,' but I think human hair doesn't quite work that way. Unless you're showering them with compliments. But, um, this character's describing herself."

"It's one of those books that makes a great projectile," Kakashi commented absently. "Because I know I want to throw it."

"I'd rather scribble on it." Even if I didn't like Jiraiya's work at its current stage, he had a bunch of editors—including me—to stop this sort of crap before it happened. "And not as an autograph. But it's not my book. So I guess we can give it back to the innkeepers."

"...Later," Kakashi said, picking the book back up. "I almost wonder how bad it can get."

Should I have mentioned the fact that Jiraiya was working on his romance series already? Would that be conforming to the Plot too hard, or would that mean I was being a bad influence somehow?

Or maybe Kakashi had an overdeveloped tendency toward morbid curiosity, and he'd find his way to Icha-Icha eventually.

"Well, have fun with that." I went back to my seals, and he went back to reading a book he didn't seem to like.

About fifteen minutes later, he ended up hurling it across the room and out the room's door just as it opened. It sailed over Kohari's head and into the hallway, much to her surprise, and I never did figure out exactly which part of the book pissed him off.

Traditionally, regional Chūnin Exams feature some sort of celebratory procession—a parade, of sorts. Something to make the guests feel like they've walked into something amazing, and to pay damn close attention to the skills of the village's finest up-and-comers. In Konoha, we sometimes had a parade, but I'd avoided most of the Exams since I got promoted to chūnin, and hadn't attended any since being promoted to special jōnin either. The war had made such displays...tacky, I supposed.

In Suna, which had never been the richest village to start with, the display was actually handled mainly by the Kazekage himself. Sure, he had attendants, but who the hell cared? It wasn't like anyone else in the village could use Magnet Release on the scale that he did.

We were dealing with a guy who could control gold dust on a scale normally only seen with Tailed Beasts. Specifically, Shukaku.

And by my reckoning, Gaara was already around, complete with a furious Shukaku sealed into him. So Suna's economy had already taken a nosedive, and the Kazekage needed to pull something spectacular to make up for it. Sensei had mentioned something about reports of the guy selling off gold dust for raw cash, but we'd never authenticated those reports and I still wasn't sure where they'd come from. But the idea that he'd do so—to reduce his combat effectiveness to keep his village afloat for a little while longer, in addition to sealing Shukaku—contributed to my mental image of the man's character.

I was thinking Lawful Neutral.

And anyway, a giant hand made of gold dust made an impression. So did creating the Chūnin Exam ring in front of us.

The Sunagakure stadium wasn't like the Konoha one, which was kind of a theater shape. Suna's was open-air, like a track field, with stands only on one side of a huge dirt field. The Kazekage had changed that as soon as Sensei had arrived in the Kage box with Yahiko. The newly-created ring was raised about a meter off the rocky desert ground, and had been carved into a fifty-meter-by-forty-meter stone square by the Kazekage himself, right in front of us.

Then the gold dust hand lifted up again, while the Kazekage stood in the center of the ring with his arms crossed over his chest, and delicately swept the remaining detritus off the field. The dust cloud didn't get anywhere, thanks to his attendants' Wind jutsu, and the crowd was strangely silent. Respect, I supposed.

All it really did was force those of us in the Konoha section to whisper to each other.

"...So not what I was expecting." Obito happened to be next to me, so I heard his whisper without any trouble. "Can Sensei do that?"

"Don't think so," I whispered back. "But he's great if you want someone's throat cut or if you wanna bury them in paperwork."

"Shh!" Rin hissed from Obito's other side.

Rin, Obito and I made up the front ranks. Then Kohari, Iruka, Inoichi, Gaku and Aomaru one row up from us. Past them, Makoto, Kotetsu, and Izumo made up the rest of the group. Kakashi was off being a bodyguard to one of the very few people in the village who probably didn't need one.

Though now that I thought of it, Sensei was probably the lowest-powered Hokage of the current batch. Which was not the same as being weaker, exactly, but I was pretty sure he had relatively little in the way of chakra reserves compared to, say, Jiraiya. Or me. Or Kushina. Or, hell, even the Kazekage? Sensei's thing wasn't stamina, it was speed. Well, speed and rigging the battlefield in his favor within a nanosecond. Maybe that was why he said he wasn't all that great at maintaining Sage Mode? Naruto could just make a bunch of Shadow Clones and have them gather natural energy for him whenever he planned in advance, but Sensei didn't. It wasn't his specialty, and he barely ever needed the extra punch.

Maybe I needed to suggest that to him. Even if Sensei could teleport and thus make most people look like total chumps before they got their necks sliced open, it couldn't hurt to ask. He already had the skill to take down opponents roughly as dangerous as he was (ex. Black Zetsu, circa a little over a year ago), so maybe a power boost of some kind would let him hop over that threshold and become really deadly.

"Kei-san, you're missing the best part!" said Gaku, from behind me. His dog, Aomaru, had never been particularly chatty, but the big beasty nonetheless leaned forward and put his head on my shoulder.

I looked out onto the field again, while reaching up and scratching behind Aomaru's long ears. He squished his nose against the side of my neck, making a contented "whuff" noise.

Out on the field, all of the genin had finally trooped out at the behest of the Kazekage. While the man himself promptly exploded into a Gold Dust clone and left things to the attendant on the field—presumably the referee—that still let me get a good look at the kids.

If I had to guess, the oldest of them was the Ame genin, Ren. She was wearing one of those Akatsuki all-encompassing black robes, so I figured she had to be a core member of the original recruits, and seemed to have the same modified Ame headband as Yahiko and Nagato did. She carried what looked like a scuba tank strapped across her back, with bands extending over her chest, and I guessed that it stored water for jutsu purposes instead of air. Her hair was long, black, and had a pair of pink streaks near her temples, and I was almost certain that her eyes were pink, too.

"First one's Ren." Thanks, Obito, but I kinda noticed.

Going down the line from there was one of the Suna genin. Taller than Ren, but with dusty blond hair and a mostly-brown outfit, loose enough that I couldn't really tell if he was overweight, skinny as a rake, or neither. He carried a pair of huge storage scrolls, stacked atop one another on a back-mounted carry rack, and wore a cloth mask over the lower half of his face as well as a pair of fingerless gloves. His Sunagakure headband wasn't on his forehead, but instead wrapped around his neck like a choker.

"Second one's Osamu. No clan name listed, but Suna doesn't really do clans anyway," Obito said, holding up his program. Ah.

Past Osamu, there was a girl with light brown hair and purple facial tattoos, like Rin's. But instead of plain rectangles, they reminded me of scorpion mandibles. She wore a black choker, a boat-necked yellow shirt, and gray shorts with long mesh leggings and only one kunai holster along her right leg. However, she had a back-mounted rack that carried what seemed to be a bolt of cloth about as tall and wide as her entire torso. If I had to guess, that was Maki.

Obito obligingly confirmed the guess, saying, "Third one's Maki, Hayate's first opponent."

"And the next two?"

I saw one boy holding what looked like a wooden war fan—sort of like the kind that Madara and Tobi had both used in the other world. It was painted blue, to match the Kazekage's robes or something. He wore a pale blue long-sleeved shirt, cargo shorts, and had covered all the rest of his exposed skin with shinobi mesh armor. It was actually interesting to look at, if kind of baffling.

The other boy, who was probably around ten years old, was wearing a black-lined white turban. He wore a cut-down version of the Sunagakure flak jacket, which had had both huge shoulder-guards removed at some point. He had a pair of seals tattooed to each forearm, which looked like storage seals to me. Obviously, I wasn't about to get much of a look.

"A fan specialist, Takumi, and the other one's Katsuo. Second puppeteer in the group, and he does poisons." Obito handed the program to me. "Though I think this thing's for betting purposes. You always get rich jerks living it up during events like this."

And then, all in a row, were Yūgao, Anko, and my brother.

Yūgao was wearing a lot of shinobi mesh along with her high-necked pink top and dark blue pants, but not as much as Anko was. She carried a small steel-ribbed war fan, which was dark pink if I remembered correctly, and a collapsible metal staff rather than a sword. It was going to be interesting watching how she did with those weapons, since I'd never seen her train with either.

Anko wore a mesh top, along with mesh guarding her arms and a tantō strapped to her back. She was wearing shorts, along with yet more mesh and a pair of long boots to cover her legs. She'd doubled up on shuriken pouches and kunai holsters, and probably had a scroll on her person somewhere. Though I had no respect for Orochimaru as a person, I was still fairly certain that Anko had been a skilled student. She wasn't bad at seals for a genin.

Hayate had taken off his bandanna, and was wearing it around his neck like a scarf. He also had my flight goggles on his head, sort of the way that Obito tended to wear his. Then he had the long, dull red overcoat he favored for missions, complete with hood, modified sword belt, and more. Very desert chic, I thought.

Now, if only we could get this show on the road.

I peered over my shoulder at the Kage Box, where the Kazekage, Yahiko, Sensei, and their respective guards had all managed to crowd into some kind of order. It looked very official, with a bid banner and a garland of desert flowers across the front guardrails. I wasn't sure what the guardrails were for, other than to look pretty.

Unlike the Konoha observation area, there was no sheer drop. In Suna, they had apparently decided to build their Kage Box directly into the stands, which meant the hosting Kage had legions of reinforcements. Sure, assassins could theoretically get close, but the various Kazekage had always been kings of murdering people via overwhelming home field advantage.

Sensei could just teleport out, so the risk to him was negligible. Kakashi couldn't, but he and Kohari were probably much less interesting targets.

As for Yahiko…well, even with only one Ame-native guard who looked old enough to be his father (and Jiraiya, who was actually leaning back on the wall between Yahiko and Sensei and looking kinda bored), he still had Konan's paper flower. I didn't even want to know what traps she'd stuck in that.

As I watched, the Kazekage stood up.

"How well do you think our side's going to do?" Obito asked, leaning over to pry the program open. "We only have three entrants, but they're not facing each other in the first round."

"I don't know, but I'm hoping Hayate beats Maki." Going by the program, Anko and Ren were up first. Then Hayate and Maki. The winner of the first match would face the winner of the second, unless there was a tie. In that case, the only actual winner would get a bye.

"Oh, and here's Yūgao-chan stuck in a bracket with all the Suna-nin." Obito frowned. "She'll have to beat Katsuo and either Osamu or Takumi just to get back to fighting Konoha-nin. And that's if they win."

"How old is everyone?" Rin asked, prodding Obito's shoulder.

Obito's Sharingan activated for a second—seriously?—before he said, "Well, we already know Hayate's thirteen and his teammates are twelve. Ren's sixteen, though her mission history doesn't really match, and then Maki's fourteen. Osamu and Takumi are each fifteen. And Katsuo's nine."

"…That wasn't in the pamphlet, was it?" Rin snatched it from my hands, drawing a dry look from me.

"Nope," I said, watching Obito carefully.

"Don't ask me anything and I won't have to lie," Obito whispered back, shrugging.

So he had broken in someplace.

…I'd yell at him later if I had to. Not now.

"How's the scorpion, Rin-chan?" Obito asked, changing the topic.

Rin smiles. "I think Sasa-chan is doing well."

"I didn't realize you already named…her?" I hedged.

"Female Sunagakure red scorpions have smaller pincers. I had to find another one to check, but Sasa-chan seems to be female. Or an adolescent male." Rin shrugged. "Whichever it is, I'm sure Tsunade-sama will want to see what we can learn from her. I fed her last night, so she's probably not going to need to eat until we get back to Konoha."

"Just make sure to keep her in the box." I thought about what the Aburame clan would say about a Suna scorpion randomly getting loose in Konoha territory. They were avid adherents of combatting invasive species of all sorts, mainly because their kikai insects would be called on to deal with infestations of anything that got to be a pest species.

There was such a thing as putting the bugs through too much work.

Scorponok could darn well stay in that box.

"Oh, wait, I think the Kazekage's done." Obito tilted his head and his Sharingan went active again as he looked down at the arena. Obviously, it was no Byakugan, but Obito could see detail from what would be impractical for normal human vision.

As we watched, all of the kids but two trooped back off the field.

Anko and Ren squared off in the middle of the empty ring, adopting ready stances. Anko seemed to be planning to go for a kunai first, while Ren reached up for the valve on her water tank.

Let the games begin.

Chapter End Notes

---

Sorry, no song title is intended here. There are a couple of indie songs titled "Complacency," but I'm not really referring to them.

Oh, let's see.

* Ren's physical description is based partially on Lie Ren from RWBY, who was voiced by the late and much-mourned Monty Oum.
* The Sunagakure red scorpion is based on the Indian red scorpion. The venom of the species very dangerous to humans.
* The quoted passage up there is from Brisingr by Christopher Paolini. Kiiinda hated that book.
As soon as the referee's hand sliced down through the air, Anko and Ren both dove toward each other.

Anko's whipped a kunai out of nowhere and ripped through Ren, who exploded into a shower of water. Then Anko was darting back and across the field, looking for her opponent while something white drifted in the puddle—aha!

The puddle promptly exploded as an exploding tag, left unattended in the clone, went off like a firecracker.

"What just happened?" Rin asked, leaning forward as the crowd oohed.

"Unless you use your chakra or set them on fire, exploding tags don't have to go off." I wasn't familiar with whatever sealing style Ame ninjas used, but I imagined that Konan's explosive notes were even more stable and predictable than mine were. She only had her entire life and all the paper jutsu in the world to practice with it.

Down on the battlefield, Ren emerged from the ground like a Diglett from hell, grasping at but failing to catch Anko's ankles. As the smaller kunoichi leapt back and flung her kunai at her opponent, Ren snatched the weapon out of the air and tossed it aside with one hand.

Her other hand rested on the valve of her water tank.

"I wonder how much water's in that thing." Obito craned his neck to see what was happening, though his Sharingan wasn't active. "It's not like a storage seal."

"Sometimes, Ame has very different versions of what other villages use." I was certain that Amegakure was the only village with honest-to-god skyscrapers, though I didn't know if they had them yet. Maybe it had been a side effect of having Nagato there? One of the Paths of Pain was kind of a cyborg, wasn't it? "I guess going the non-chakra route for water storage makes sense, but I'm still sure seals could be more effective in this case.

"What about releasing only a little of the water?" Rin suggested.

"…We did kinda get doused the last time we used one of Sensei's water storage seals, didn't we?"

No, I'm pretty sure Nagato took care of that. Obito shook his head and said, "Well, let's see what this Ame-nin can do."

I added, "And here's to hoping that Anko-chan pulls through!" Because why not rhyme?

Down on the battlefield, Anko and Ren clashed again, but this time Ren used the water tank like a bludgeon. Even on a miss, the metal clanked dangerously and knocked a divot into the sandstone arena floor.

I kind of wonder if that's going to explode into a hail of metal shards if she keeps abusing it. I'd never been a physicist, but I had watched Mythbusters and Jaws once upon a time. Stuff under high pressure did not react well to being punctured.

…Ike a deep-water fish at the surface?

Maybe? Like I knew.

And finally the Ame-nin unscrewed the valve on her water storage tank and started making hand signs. Water rushed out along the sandstone and Anko darted away again, watching her opponent warily.

Of course, Obito's Sharingan was already active before the Ame kunoichi made her move. Friggin' Uchihas.

And yet, I wasn't worried about Anko. She'd only showed off her kunai skills thus far, which was barely a taste of what she was capable of. She had to have a few more tricks up her sleeve to stomp on Izumo, even if she had trained with him before.

Thinking of that, actually… "Hey, Kotetsu-kun, you said something about a summon contract?"

"Anko has snakes." Kotetsu said over Aomaru's head. As he scratched the dog's head, he added, "But I can summon weapons, so it should have worked on Maki-san."

"…Weapons?" Obito turned his head, looking at Kotetsu incredulously. "Seriously? I thought summon contracts only worked on animals."

"And people," I added, thinking of the Chūnin Exams back home.

"Yeah, but it's kinda more like just a…I don't know," Kotetsu mumbled. He said, after a pause, "I have this weapon—a mace—and it's just too big to carry and it's chakra-active, so it doesn't really work with storage scrolls. So I left it at home and I can summon it here, as long as no one pulled it out of the circle in the meantime."

…Okay, so maybe people who couldn't create custom storage scrolls had to make bizarre workarounds, but that honestly just sounded kind of dumb. Massively impractical? And then if Kotetsu had managed to summon his weapon, he'd have to lug the thing back to Konoha unless he found someone willing to help him store it the right way.

"Makoto-sensei helped me set it up," Kotetsu admitted, shooting a glance at his red-haired interim sensei.

She shrugged.

"I think it'd be easier to just, uh, get a custom storage scroll made for you. Because that sounds too complicated." Obito glanced at Makoto, who had turned her attention back to the arena. "Kei could do it."

Did I just get volunteered?

"Anko-chan, get her back!" Rin shouted, either ignoring our conversation or too caught up in the fight to pay attention.
Down below, Anko bounced off Ren's shoulders and ducked under another Water jutsu. The water formed a dragon's head and chased after her, only to be blown apart by an explosive tag attached to a rock.

The explosion was only standard size, so I didn't worry about Hayate sharing too much with his comrades just yet. It was one thing to supply explosives to my younger brother, but I imagined that Makoto and Inoichi would side-eye me for being the elicit supplier of powerful ordnance to an entire cadre of genin.

That was their job.

I mean, sure, by the time I'd been Hayate's age I'd pretty much already taken over that position for my team, but there was something to be said for not following in one's older sibling's footsteps. Especially in this universe.

"Summoning Jutsu!" came Anko's voice from the arena floor.

I watched as there was a colossal plume of smoke and then—oh, cool!

Anko had her hand on one of the puddles Ren had made, while trying to make her dragon-headed jutsu go after Anko, and she'd made the seal lines of a heavy-duty summon.

"Nurehebi, get her!" Anko shouted, as a red-lined white snake surged out of the water as though the puddle was a lot deeper than it first appeared. The snake was probably about three meters long and covered in pearlescent white scales, curling its body around Anko's legs before rearing up to look at their enemy.

Ren backed up.

The snake itself, shrouded in water, bared its tiny fangs and spat a globe of high-pressure water after the Ame-nin's running retreat.

"I think that's the cutest snake I've ever seen." It had little feathery things—a headdress?—around the corners of its jaws and it had little red outlines around its eyes and oh goodness it was cute for a giant constrictor. And was that another brush-thingy on its tail? Gosh, that snake was dressed to impress.

"That's a new one," said Izumo, with a frown audible in his voice. "See, Kotetsu, this is why you set up with an animal summon contract. Your mace doesn't give you any more maces."

"Shut up," was Kotetsu's reply.

Anko, down on the battlefield, spun away from another of Ren's attacks as the Ame-nin flung a kunai at her. The kunai was stopped by Nurehebi, who shot it out of the air with a thin stream of water that nonetheless must have hit with the force of a bullet. The kunai went spinning off toward the desert floor some ten meters away.

"Kick her ass, Anko-chan!" Iruka cheered, over Obito's shoulder.

"Iruka!" Kohari said sharply.

"Sorry, Mom," was his chastised response.

Kotetsu and Izumo sniggered.

"Iruka, you're supposed to put your heart into a cheer," Kohari went on, "so it should have been Okay, so apparently Iruka's penchant for shouting in the classroom—and thus his maximum volume—had been inherited from someone. Good to know. Or it would be once my ears stopped ringing.

"Oh, okay!" Iruka took a deep breath, and I reflexively covered my ears. "YOU CAN DO IT, ANKO-CHAN!"

Obito mouthed something like "My poor ears!"

Rin, well into the spirit of things, stood up in her seat as Anko landed a kick on Ren's water tank with Nurehebi constricting the older kunoichi's ankles to slow her down. Rin's hands were formed into fists in front of her mouth. "Come on, Anko-chan…"

It was at about that point, with all of us looking down on the grappling match, that Ren the Ame-nin finally managed to say something that all of us could hear.

"WATER RELEASE: GREAT CLONE EXPLOSION!"

And the water—the water around Nurehebi, the water in the tank, and the water in the puddles across the arena floor—all exploded like someone had dropped a grenade in it. A big ol’ plume of water, out of nowhere, that obscured all of the combatants and threw the crowd into a strange silence.

The silence gave way to panicky speculation, probably because of gambling.

I ignored that and probed cautiously at the mist obscuring the field with my chakra sense.

Beside me, I could feel Obito feeding more chakra into his Sharingan, as though it would spontaneously gain a few Byakugan-like aspects. Such as the ability to see beyond what would normally be considered human range.

It was all kind of pointless, since the mist cleared a moment later.

Anko was shielded by Nurehebi, but it became very apparent that the Ame-nin's water storage tank had exploded in the chaos. Metal shards dotted the sandstone arena, and one of them had managed to draw a thin line of blood across the pearlescent scales along Nurehebi's neck. The snake's water supply was gone, and it was lying on the sandstone, twitching feebly.

Hydrostatic shock?

Ren, for her part, was lying some six meters away and clutching her leg. Her chakra was going haywire with pain and with…something else? I couldn't tell precisely what had gone wrong from so far away.

"What the hell just happened?" Kotetsu asked Obito.

"From what I can tell, The snake bit Ren-san before the jutsu went off," Obito said, peering closer at the damage. "Are all of the snake summons poisonous?"

"Venomous, and I'm pretty sure they must be," said Rin, having calmed down somewhat now that the match seemed to be one for the judges. Ren, for her part, still hadn't gotten to her feet. "I thought Nurehebi had to be a constrictor, but guess I was wrong."

"Snake summons must pull double duty." I paused, thinking. "Somehow, I don't think Suna has "Probably not." Rin glanced up toward the Kage box, where Sensei was leaning forward to observe the proceedings. "If the Hokage wants, I could try to come up with something."

"He hasn't said anything yet," Obito pointed out. "Oh, look—Anko's up!"

Anko had, indeed, gotten to her feet. She put her hand down on Nurehebi's head, and the huge snake poofed away into a cloud of smoke. Then Anko straightened up and drew yet another kunai from a pocket, heading toward her opponent.

Our section of the crowd, which wasn't that large, began a slow chant of sorts. "An-ko, An-ko, An-ko!"

Thus, we were promptly disappointed when Anko sank to her knees, and Ren fainted.

The judge declared a double KO at that point.

"Damn, she's going to be disappointed," Kotetsu muttered.

"It's an anticlimax to have both competitors out of the running, but she did fairly well. I've never seen her summon that snake before, and I don't think she could have predicted her opponent blowing herself up," Makoto said, speaking up for the first time in quite a while.

Aomaru barked his agreement.

"Maybe she needs a bit more polish on her Replacement jutsu?" I suggested.

Makoto shrugged. "Probably. But I did like her teamwork with her summon."

"Is that enough to get her a promotion, though?" Rin asked.

"It might. It might not. It's the Hokage's decision," said Gaku. He looked down at the arena floor, to where medics were carting both Anko and Ren off to the infirmary. "But I'll go check on Anko-chan and see what happened. We didn't get the best view from here."

"Okay. Tell us if something happens?" Obito had turned off his Sharingan, so it was only a request.

…Maybe there was something wrong with me, given how I kept jumping to so many conclusions. Or assuming possible ill-intent where there wasn't any.

"Sure. Root for Hayate-kun for me, will ya?"

We all nodded, and Gaku took off. Aomaru stayed, though.

"So, what's the difference between poisonous and venomous again?" Obito asked Rin.

"Sasa-chan is venomous," Rin said, "because of her stinger. But…I think maybe the Hokage has some poisonous toads. There are no stingers or fangs. But snakes that try to eat them are going to be very upset."

"I think that the Land of Rainforests has a bunch of poison rainbow frogs. Pretty, but local hunters use their poison to kill huge animals." I scratched the back of my neck. "But I don't think our medics run into poisonings like that all that often."

"Because they're too far away?" Obito guessed.
Um, no. "More like because the victims die inside of a minute."

Kohari turned to her son and said, "You have some very strange friends." So yes, maybe we were kind of strange. I was certain that Anko would get by just fine, and she had—even if she'd probably gotten slightly exploded. Gaku hadn't sent up the Medic-Signal or anything, so I assumed that she was going to be all right until confirmed otherwise.

Or maybe I was egging on a pointless conversation because I was nervous. Hayate was going to fight next.

Hayate was going to fight next. Oh man.

Why are you only panicking now?

Because I am very good at avoiding anxious thoughts until they hit me in the face?

That has nothing to do with anything.

What did he know?

"Kei, do you need to take a moment to breathe?" Rin asked.

"No, no, I'm going to be fine." I took a very deep breath. In, out. Okay. Hayate was going to be fine. "He'll be fine. Hayate isn't some pushover."

"You don't sound too sure," Obito teased.

I shot him a glare, and he winced.

He obligingly backtracked. "All right, shutting up now."

"Will the competitors in the second match please come down to the battlefield?" the judge shouted, loud enough to cut through the babble of the crowd. Some of us quieted in response. Some did not.

For my part, I watched my brother and Maki troop out of the competitor's waiting area.

Hayate had loosened his hitai-ate around his neck, and was in the process of retying it as he walked out beside Maki. Maki, for her part, seemed to give my brother a skeptical look for his apparent lack of preparation. Thus, my brother ignored her.

I extended my chakra sense outward, testing.

I felt Hayate's chakra, bouncing excitedly inside his body as he assessed his opponent. He also pinged back at me, just for a moment, to acknowledge that he knew I was there and watching. He didn't feel like he had any problem with fighting his opponent, confidence or otherwise—he knew what he was going to do. His chakra faintly buzzed with playful lightning, and I felt better for feeling it.

Maki, as I poked at her cautiously, felt like a breeze through drying laundry lines. Probably insensitive or judgmental of me, in a way, since I knew she used large bolts of cloth to fight and she was from the Land of Wind. But she didn't feel unstable or needlessly aggressive, and I was fairly certain that it would be a friendly match.

Inasmuch as fights against foreigners ever were.

"Begin!" barked the judge, and I leaned forward in my seat to watch the opening shots.
Maki dashed backwards, unfurling her weapon as seal-lines spread across the linen like black lightning. The cloth interposed itself between her and Hayate, who aborted his charge with a sharp turn of his heel and instead drew one of my explosive scrolls from his long jacket sleeves.

The cloth swirled through the air after him, with designs I didn't quite recognize, and were promptly met by four exploding kunai going the other way.

When the smoke cleared, I didn't see any scorch marks on the cloth, but that was because it had formed a giant swirling white mass around where I could feel Maki's chakra, presumably to protect her.

Hayate stood on the opposite end of the arena floor than expected, peering at the shield with interest. He said something, then started unrolling the tear-away explosive scroll.

I didn't like the look of that. "Ah, hell. He'd better not be trying to do what I think he is."

"Which is…?" Obito prompted.

"He's going to try brute-forcing that shield if it doesn't come down." And I didn't remember which seals Hayate had taken with him. I didn't think I'd created anything recently that would pulverize rock, but…

Hayate shouted something to Maki's shield. A taunt? A warning?

"I hope Maki has a backup plan, then." Obito glanced at the Kage box, presumably searching for a reaction from the elites up there. I didn't think he got one.

I felt Maki's chakra shift then, as she Replaced herself with something else. Her cloth shield wall was empty, guarding nothing, and I had to wonder how she planned to take advantage of my brother's apparent tunnel-vision.

Hayate tossed the scroll down at his feet. Then he started charging a lightning kunai—not as strong or as well-formed as Kakashi's favorite mid-combat distraction—before unceremoniously dropping it, and he burst into a run toward the unoccupied corner of the arena.

The lightning kunai turned over once, twice in midair, before hitting the unrolled scroll dead center. By that point, Hayate was well away from the impending fireball.

I felt Maki's panic as the area above her underground hiding place was promptly immolated.

When that fireball cleared, the sandstone had been violently pulverized—which meant I'd somewhat underestimated the ordnance my brother had access to—and Maki's chakra had fled again, back to the cloth shield.

Which Hayate was currently standing next to, with yet another technique prepared.

"Now, I think I recognize that stance…" Obito began, his Sharingan active again. "Yeah, Kei, that's your kenjutsu!"

"Our family's kenjutsu," I corrected absently. Come on, Hayate! Show us what you can really do!

Actually, why wasn't I up and shouting?

I rectified my mistake by getting to my feet as the two competitors were about to clash directly. "COME ON, HAYATE, KNOCK HER FLAT!"
"Whoa, okay." Rin seemed surprised by my sudden enthusiasm, given my lackluster showing during Anko's fight, but recovered quickly. She joined in with, "YOU CAN DO IT, HAYATE-KUN!"

Down on the arena floor, Maki's cloth unfurled from its cocoon shape around her and slashed out like a whip for Hayate's face. My cheering, however briefly, faltered in the face of sudden action.

As the cloth moved, I could hear Obito give a quiet running commentary along the lines of, "Gonna have to see what that seal means when I get home…" and I could feel Iruka stand up behind me, trying to see. Our section of the stands was perhaps a bit rowdy.

Hayate shot left, then right, but the chakra-infused linen followed him wherever he went. He rolled in midair on another evasive leap, and I saw his hands come together briefly in a few seals. I couldn't tell what because the angle wasn't great, but I could feel his chakra swell—and then…

The cloth trapped his ankle. But not Hayate's, not exactly.

"Rapid-fire Clone-stuff and then something with the Replacement jutsu," was Obito's muttered comment. "But I can't tell if it's a—oh!"

The clone popped, disappearing, and the cloth knotted closed on empty air as Hayate landed safely out of reach.

He might have given Maki, with her full bolt of cloth unrolled and her chakra somewhat flagging, a cheeky grin. We were too far away to tell.

I still whooped in triumph anyway. Then I settled back down in my seat so Iruka and Izumo wouldn't have to crane their necks so much.

"Was that the Clone Jutsu?" I asked Obito, who had probably been able to see the flow of Hayate's chakra even from this far off.

"Yep. You know, I never even tried to use that in a fight." Obito grinned. "But good on Hayate for making it work."

Hayate drew his kodachi for the first time in the entire fight—and that wasn't just a simple draw. Iaijutsu was our family's not-so-secret signature, straight out of the Land of Iron, and Hayate's chakra-infused kodachi cut right through the cloth and the seal on it.

"I'm also seeing a lot of lightning manipulation from him. Has he been training with Kakashi?" Obito asked.

"Yeah, actually. He's not that strong yet, but I'm surprised by how fast he seems to be picking up on that part." I thought about it, then shrugged. "I'm not sure if that means Kakashi's a good teacher, or Hayate's a genius."

Obito made a show of gagging. "Ugh, no. How about just no? Like, you're a genius and so is Kakashi and then Sensei and so is Rin! Where does that leave me?"

"…Says the guy who still holds the course records for the Military Police," I retorted.

"Can they not argue so we can all focus on the match?" Kotetsu stage-whispered to Aomaru.

Aomaru gave a doggy huff, so I reached back and scratched his ears. When he laid his head down on my shoulder and smooshed the side of his muzzle against my neck, I knew I'd been forgiven.
Down below, Hayate was industriously hacking Maki's cloth jutsu to pieces with a lightning-charged kodachi and making it look easier than it probably was. If I concentrated, I could feel both lightning and carefully manipulated cutting chakra moving in sync.

He'd fused my technique and Kakashi's and come up with something…different. Something good.

He needed to name it.

"It almost feels like a workaround to the Mountain Cutter," I said, watching Hayate dart to and fro across the arena floor, fending off more cloth attacks and retaliating with vicious slashes. "Less chakra overall, but he's not really using the kodachi for its edge down there. He's using it for its shape."

"Huh?" Obito looked blank.

"When creating chakra projections," Rin said, "the size of the blade or weapon depends partly on chakra control and partly on the amount of chakra you can push into it. Maintaining chakra scalpels more than a centimeter or two beyond your skin is really difficult, at least for surgical purposes, but using a weapon…"

"If I use my katana as a focus, I can extend my reach proportionately." And if I was using Isobu's chakra or deliberately cramming as much chakra as I could into the shape, I could double the effective length of the blade or create an improvised lightsaber. Or a sword the size and breadth of the Kubikiribōchō without the weight issues. Or both. "And a katana isn't as sharp as a scalpel, but it's plenty sharp for this."

Granted, people who actually knew the Samurai Sword-and-or-Saber thing would be better at it than I was, having never actually been taught properly. Mom had never really expected me to rearrange my concept of chakra to fully master her version of the technique. But I could make do with what I did know, and did.

Down in the arena, Hayate finally sliced apart the last major section of the cloth jutsu, leaving Maki's weapon in so many shreds of linen.

…Which was not to say that she was helpless. Far from it.

The separate scraps of cloth, to my chakra sense, hadn't really been destroyed or even neutralized. They'd simply been split, like normal cloth. My brother could cut it, but he hadn't managed to obliterate it.

That wasn't how the katana worked.

To neutralize Maki's jutsu, he'd have to irreparably ruin her weaponry, and it was going to take more lightning than he could make.

"You can't stop me now, Hayate-kun!" Maki shouted, as the linen rose up and loomed over my brother.

Luckily, my brother had thought of that. And had thought of a way around it.

In the words of someone probably in the throes of TNT-induced euphoria, "As the size of the explosion increases, the number of situations it cannot solve approaches zero."

All around Maki's feet, desert sand blew around and revealed a carpet of explosive tags across the arena floor, stretching from the edge of the arena behind her to within four feet of Hayate.
"…He took a few more than I thought," I said, staring. Wait…

"You can try your luck, Maki-san, but I don't think you're going to like what happens if you do!" Hayate replied in a cheerful shout.

Wait a fucking minute here. I checked my scroll pocket, flipping the most dangerous of them into my hand. Sure, Kakashi had sorted my seals the other night, but…

Maki hesitated. "I…"

"You can't make chūnin if you're dead, and I have way more where these came from!" Hayate shouted.

Almost to myself, I murmured, "He didn't…"

"Kei?" Obito asked.

The judge then said, loud enough for the rest of us to hear. "Maki of Sunagakure has surrendered. The winner is Hayate Gekkō of Konohagakure. Please clear the arena!"

Maki ended up walking out first, gathering her shredded cloth back into something resembling the long bolt it had come from. She stomped off the sandstone, clearly upset with her loss.

Hayate hopped off the edge of the sandstone platform a moment later, turned, and threw a lightning kunai at the mass of seals.

I put my face in my hands as the seals screamed, popped, and made noise as they whizzed through the air and dust like overactive fireworks. Which was, in the end, exactly all they'd been.

Maki's voice became a shriek of rage. "You little jerk!"

"If it works, it works!" Hayate yelled back.

"Kindly get off the field!" the judge yelled over both of their voices, and over the continual whizz-pop-bang of the firework seals.

"…What just happened?" Rin said.

"Got me. Where'd he get all those tags?" Kotetsu asked.

Aomaru barked.

I raised my hand. "But, uh, with the qualifier that I didn't know he was taking all of the first two tiers of the things."

"Two tiers?" Rin looked shocked at my carelessness. "Kei, how many explosive seals did you make?"

I had to shrug. "…I dunno. It's a hobby of mine to make enough that I'm kinda swimming in 'em all the time." I managed a cheeky grin, though. "But at least he didn't take the really big ones."

Rin and Obito both groaned.

"Seriously?" Izumo demanded. "He just asked you for explosives?"

"I don't remember anyone saying it was against the rules. I've been making these things since I was nine," I said.

"I remember that time." Obito's voice was a little muffled, since he had his face in his hands. "And how they didn't use to work."

"So he can just use all of those without a problem? Like, he doesn't have to pay for them or anything?" Kotetsu asked.

"No, I pay for my supplies and I don't ask for money, I'll charge him once he actually earns more than pocket money." I shrugged again, then got up. "I'm going to go for a short walk, okay? Hayate won, so the crowd's gonna be changing money around and that's a perfect time to get snacks. You want anything?"

"...Well, Yūgao's match is the one after next, so...can you find me a bag of chips?" Izumo asked. "I can pay you back later."

Kohari glanced from her son—still watching the arena as the Kazekage flattened it back out—to me. "A water bottle would be nice. If you can get a cold one, even better!"

In short order, I was given a good half-dozen requests.

Well, it...it felt nice to be useful.

I came back with all the requested items in a storage scroll. Because of course I could.

I could also pack hot lunches that way, so excuse me for showing off a bit.

Anyway, I passed out all the food, unsealing items one at a time, before making my way back to my seat. Though of course I'd missed the Suna-only match before, Yūgao's was still there. I'd never seen her fight all out, so it'd be interesting to see what she could do.

Or at least that was the plan.

Isobu interrupted with, A little help here?

Are you serious right now? The match just started! Sure, time tended to move faster when everything went at the speed of thought, but I wanted to watch these matches! I'd barely seen Yūgao fight in the entire time I'd known her, and I wanted to know how strong she was. And besides, five or ten minutes of being stuck down there could mean I'd also miss parts of Hayate's next match, depending on how fast things moved.

But since when did Isobu ask me for help with anything? I stopped short at that thought, my eyes going unfocused as I reached for Isobu's consciousness again. What happened?

Shukaku—oof!—is in the Tailed Beast subconscious dimension with his host. And he refuses to let the boy go. Isobu sent me an impression, of creeping sand and a child's high-pitched shrieks of terror. I don't even understand how he got down here without his host's consent. The red woman didn't have to accept Kurama's demands—

Gaara's a toddler, Isobu! Fuck, fuck, fuck—

"Obito?" I nudged him. I needed his attention. What I didn't need was the possibility of Shukaku overpowering Gaara's mind and kicking off a rampage that had never happened in the old timeline.
Below, Yūgao ricocheted off her opponent and sent a barrage of senbon needles in Osamu's direction. Osamu replied with a burst of Wind jutsu that blew the senbon out of the arena but missed Yūgao herself.

"Yeah, Kei?" Obito was distracted, but he wouldn't be for long.

"I'm gonna be unresponsive for a few minutes." That sent Obito's thoughts screeching to a halt, for some reason. Probably phrasing. I was already turning to Rin, saying, "So, Rin, I'm gonna be out. Please don't send me to the medical wing."

"Why are you going to be out?" Rin asked cautiously.

"Tailed Beast fight. See you in a few." And then I let my mind dive after Isobu.

I still hadn't decided on a name for the shared subconscious of the various jinchūriki on the planet. There wasn't one to start with, that Isobu knew of, so I clearly needed to come up with something snappy. Since my mindscape was already named, in use, and modified to fit my turtle friend, there had to be something else to call it.

The particular naming ceremony would just have to wait until there weren't two giant monsters duking it out right in front of me.

Finally, my legs fully formed inside the strange sub-dimension and I could drop to the ground and see what was happening. I landed on top of ankle-deep water and could see the distorted reflections of the Tailed Beasts wrestling as I straightened up.

The two of them had foregone the tendency shinobi had to square off dramatically, waiting for a convenient wind to mark the start of the fight. The two massive monsters had jumped straight into the mutual mauling, with Isobu's three tails wrapping around Shukaku's one and trying to pull his nonexistent spine out of him.

So, fun fact: Neither Isobu nor Shukaku had teeth.

Not real teeth, anyway, since that seemed to be the purview of the upper-level Tailed Beasts, and both of them really just had huge spikes soldered onto their respective jaws. Isobu complimented that array with the spines on his head, his shell, and his tails. Shukaku made up for his lack of true teeth by being made of actual sand, which made it a huge hassle to try and hurt him meaningfully without just hitting him with Tailed Beast Bombs until he stopped trying to get up.

Isobu didn't need me to tell him about that, though.

He'd forgotten more about Shukaku than I would ever know.

No, if he needed me down here, it was because there was something he couldn't handle on his own.

I had not met the Tailed Beast who could easily remove a toddler from Shukaku's hold. Mainly because they didn't have the manual dexterity necessary. I didn't think I'd met a person who could easily do it, at least not down here. So I was simply going to have to rescue Gaara the hard away, with Isobu acting as a big, crabby distraction.

Theoretically, I could just cut Gaara out of the overgrown sand-squirrel's head as soon as Isobu could hold him down for more than a few seconds. It was just one of those things that was easier said than done.

"STAY DOWN, YOU MISERABLE REPTILE!" Shukaku howled, flowing back and away from Isobu's grip like a waterfall of sand. His body twisted, curving into a serpentine form for just a moment, and his head turn all the way around to launch a compressed ball of air directly at Isobu's face.

Isobu met the blast squarely with a similar-sized blast of compressed water. When the two attacks met, a cascade of cold water poured down across the battlefield like a sudden winter rainstorm.

I darted up onto Isobu's lower shell and sprinted for his head, ducking around spikes and sand hiding in the cracks of it. As he bucked, spitting more water bullets at Shukaku, I had to cling to him with chakra channeled into my hands and feet to avoid being thrown off.

"I can hold him here," Isobu told me with a grunt, as I skidded to a stop on his left shoulder and gripped one of his spikes.

"Forever?" I asked distractedly, peering at Shukaku's head. Where was the flash of red? I knew that Gaara had been protruding from Shukaku's head when he transformed in the old timeline, but I had to admit that I didn't really understand his unique forms.

Isobu grunted, "Long enough. Where is the human now?"

"I don't," I began.

Then Shukaku laughed. "YOU WANT TO CALL ON THE SQUALLING BRAT? HE CAN'T HELP YOU!"

I ignored the big tanuki's rant for the most part after that. Instead, I focused on tracking the non-Shukaku chakra in his mass. "...Well, I can sense Gaara in there. But he's a kid, and Shukaku's pretty damned big. I can only tell that he's in his head somewhere."

"Then we'll have to pound Shukaku into sand until he coughs him up." Isobu's forelimbs squared and he seemed to settle down in place. "Get ready to move."

Why was it that every confrontation between Tailed Beasts seemed to devolve into all of us beating the stuffing out of each other? Sans the bit with Kurama yesterday, but there had been the thing with the seal-cage before that...

...If we called Kurama down here, somehow, I imagined that Isobu would be absolutely mortified. And then Shukaku would be so much dust in the wind. And then there would be other problems relating to Shukaku and Kurama's epic sibling rivalry, and I'd have to explain all of that to a two-year-old.

So we were on our own.

I glanced down at myself. Despite the weapons and supplies I'd been carrying in reality, I was down to just whatever I could use on the fly down here. I'd carried my mental avatar body down here instead of my real one, meaning I was wearing an oversized T-shirt with sweatpants and a pair of glasses. So, no weapons or scrolls.

No seals but those I could make spontaneously.

"Well, this'll be fun." I made sure to cram as much sarcasm into the words as possible.

"Unhelpful sarcasm is the last thing I need from you." With that, Isobu shifted his massive bulk forward and launched another ball of water directly for Shukaku's face.
Once again, it was countered with an air blast.

Isobu’s outermost tails dug into the ground—or what passed for it—and heaved him to the left as Shukaku’s long sandy tail lashed down where we’d just been. Despite the fact that both Tailed Beasts were somewhat lacking in the mobility department, since Isobu didn’t have back legs and Shukaku’s barely counted, they both managed a decent turn of speed.

Even if their movements were limited, it didn’t change the fact that they were a hundred meters tall and even stubby limbs at that size moved a hundred paces to my one.

I clambered down Isobu’s shoulder to reach his ear and, quietly enough that Shukaku couldn’t hear, I said, "Can’t you glue him to the ground with coral?"

"Not if he rips his legs off and starts over elsewhere." Isobu’s outward tails flattened against the water below us all, and I felt his chakra reaching out. There wasn’t airborne water vapor down here, not really, and the water pooling below us was also just a product of a collective imagination.

We could still use it to attack. Shukaku only had as much sand as he was made of, since Kurama had been the one to create this particular variant of the dimension. Isobu wasn’t interested in overturning that ruling, and Shukaku wasn’t strong enough.

"If you can coat him in enough that he has to deform to squeeze free, I might be able to get Gaara out of there." I glared across the field at the giant tanuki. "Do you have any idea how to calm him down?"

"Half an idea, but not that one. Too slow." Isobu’s central tail touched the water. "Hang on."

I did so.

Isobu’s huge shell seemed to deform as his head and the front of his shell tipped forward over his hands. When I looked back, I saw the rearmost parts of his shell—where the huge plates overlapped—start to curve over toward his tails—

And then Isobu and I were upside-down. Isobu’s three tails curled under his belly to form something like tractor treads, and his arms folded up with the spikes facing outward and oh god of course he had a rolling attack.

I probably screamed. After the fact, I distinctly remembered trying not to curse, for the sake of toddlers that might or might not have been listening.

And anyway, the screaming was somewhat muffled once Isobu finally hit Shukaku with the full weight of his greenish-gray spinning body and smashed his weaker sibling into…well, basically into a beach. We were already surrounded by water, after all. I was, for my part, thrown clean off my turtle friend and into the pile of sand that had once been a Tailed Beast, and immediately set about looking for any sign of red.

Shukaku’s head was already reforming, so I had to work fast. Already, I could hear the dulcet tones of Shukaku saying, "I’LL KILL YOU FOR THAT, THREE-TAILS!" with enough volume to make the sand quake.

I’d better hurry up. Okay, so, where would a tiny toddler be in all of this? I could easily skim across the top of the sand—it was sort of the opposite of the water-walking trick—without getting snagged by any of the sand as long as Shukaku was distracted. And with Isobu in his face and blasting him over and over with compressed water, I imagined he couldn’t be anything else.
"Gaara-chan? Gaara-chan?" I slipped among the dunes of somewhat-damp sand, ducking away from surges of Shukaku's sand under my feet and also from the sand-laden torrents of water raining down from above. "Come on, kiddo, you have to be in here somewhere…"

My patience, such as it was, was rewarded just as Shukaku figured out how to put enough sand together to reform his arms and lunge at Isobu. Somewhere in the midst of the sound of rushing sand and crashing waves, I heard a tiny voice cry out, "Mama!"

Where—there he was! Just behind another mound of sand, I saw a pale arm wiggling. Crossing the shifting surface of Shukaku's body at a dead run, I quickly found a tiny red-headed toddler squirming in the sand. He was encased in sand up to about the middle of his thighs, and stared up at me upon my sudden appearance like I was some kind of bogeyman.

"Can I help you get outta there, kid?" I asked, hesitating to approach for just a moment.

"Want Mama!" Gaara shrieked, falling backwards onto his butt and flailing his arms. "Mama help!"

Fuck.

"Whatever you're doing is—auh!" Isobu was roughly shoved away from Shukaku's flattened mass, bringing his armored hand up to cover his only eye. Must have gotten sand in it.

I was focusing more on Shukaku, whose head had reassembled itself. I stared down into his gaping maw as he snarled, "GET AWAY FROM THE HUMAN, PEST! HE'S MINE!"

"No." I glared up at those golden eyes and snapped, "What do you want with Gaara?"

"He is my jailor, human." Shukaku's voice was like gravel when he spoke instead of shouting. It'd be funny in retrospect, given that he was made of sand, but at the time I was surprised by the fact that he could just talk. Not shout. "I will have my freedom back."

"And what, get sealed again?" Isobu argued, having recovered. Shukaku failed to rise to meet him, so Isobu glowered down at his weakest sibling. "Aside from me and my host, the humans brought four more humans who can take you and yours to pieces on top of the one that was already here. You will lose, Shukaku. You could even die."

Shukaku growled again, his sand shifting.

I took that opportunity to haul the silently crying Gaara out of the sand and reposition him against my hip. While I had certainly missed out on certain aspects of puberty, I'd gotten enough in the way of hips that I could manage one toddler. Even if I had to sneak out of a demon's range while my inner demon argued with him.

"Death would be better than permanent imprisonment!" Shukaku roared in Isobu's face. "What do you know about prison, Three-Tails?"

"The two hosts I had before this one seemed to be a hint." Isobu shook his head. "You are not the only one who's been through it."

I had, at this point, gotten out of Shukaku's giant sand-trap and snuck back toward the gaps in Isobu's huge gray-green shell. Gaara remained silent the entire time. His face was buried against my T-shirt.

"YOU KNOW NOTHING!" Shukaku snarled, with all of his sand surging upward in a wave. But even as I watched from the curve of Isobu's crab shell front, Shukaku's sand was sluggish in a way that even inevitable doom never was.

The water was weighing him down.

I clamped my hands over Gaara's ears as Isobu reared back, his tails flaring out.

"YOU ARE AN IGNORANT CHILD!" Isobu roared back, "KNOW YOUR PLACE!"

The argument was...circular. At best.

"You're all the same age!" I shouted up at Isobu.

But there was this thing, with twins and other multiple-count siblings. The younger one will say that age doesn't matter when asked which is oldest. The elder, though?

"No, we're not!" snapped Isobu.

Exemplars of proper conduct. Really.

Somehow, despite how Isobu had smashed Shukaku into being a chunk of scenery not five minutes beforehand, the tanuki still had fight in him. Quite a lot, in fact.

"I'LL KILL YOU ALL!" Shukaku had managed to reincorporate all of his sand, but with a considerable liquid component. His face looked like a candle shaped like a carved pumpkin, which had started to melt. "I'LL GRIND YOUR SHELL INTO FERTILIZER AND SMASH THE REST OF YOU INTO PASTE, THREE-TAILS!"

"Isobu, if you have any kinda trump card for dealing with him..." I whispered, as the sand tanuki loomed. Despite being weaker, his upright stance did mean he was taller than Isobu. Then again, pretty much all of the Tailed Beasts were.

"In a way, I do. But I don't want to resort to that." Isobu's bulk shuddered, and then he launched another compressed blast of water for Shukaku's head.

"Mama?" Gaara asked belatedly, looking around when the water from Isobu's attack blew back on us. "Where Mama?"

Did Gaara even know what his mother looked like at this age? Did he already think that Shukaku embodied his mother's will? Hell if I knew. I was starting to get used to the idea of having no fucking idea what was going on, and that was annoying just on its own.

Questions for later.

"Hey, kiddo, what's your name?" I asked, as though I hadn't been shouting at Shukaku earlier. I tried my best to inject some cheer into my tone, but I wasn't feeling it and Gaara wasn't dumb.

His lip wobbled. "G...Gaara?"

"You sure, Gaara-chan?" I asked, somewhat briskly, as Isobu blasted Shukaku's arm off and it blew apart into a miniature cyclone.

"Um," was as far as he got, before he hid his face against my shirt again.

I raised my arm to block some of the water and sand from hitting him in the face, but we were both getting doused anyway. "Well, Gaara-chan," I continued with false cheer, "I'm Kei. Just hang on "tight, okay? We'll get you back to your family soon!"

"We?" Gaara mumbled.

"Isobu, mainly. That's him up there, with the water blasts. I just help," I corrected myself. "Again, hang on!"

Right on cue, Isobu's shell bucked, and I was glad that the tree-walking skill had easily adapted to other surfaces. Gaara ended up squished against my chest and shoulder, but I managed to keep his head from jerking dangerously.

"You okay, Gaara-chan?" I asked, once Isobu shot one of Shukaku's feet and blasted it back into the shape of mere damp sand.

"Mm-hm!" Gaara replied, still clinging.

"Good, now..." How the hell were we going to get out of this, really? Shukaku and Isobu were both immortal and ultimately indestructible. They ran out of energy eventually, like anyone, but down here they could essentially blast away at one another until the sun burned out. There wasn't much purpose to it, but since when had that stopped angry siblings from fighting?

"I'll blast you as many times as it takes for you to learn," Isobu growled under his breath as Shukaku worked on reassembling his head out of the driest sand that remained.

"Can we do anything else?" I asked him. One of my hands was flat against his shell. "Because this is getting us nowhere. We rescued Gaara-chan, but now what do we do?"

"The host must call their spirit back to their body." Isobu blasted Shukaku again, making his half-formed head explode again in a burst of sandy water.

"I pretty much never do that with you!" I argued, almost instinctively.

"Then figure out what will work!" Isobu snapped, turning his attention back to his fight.

The next vicious twist of his shell flung both Gaara and I more than fifty meters across the empty salt flats. We flew, however briefly, and I had to tuck and roll around Gaara to protect him from the inevitable skidding impact, however dampened by the strange physics of this place.

Still ended up on my back in ten centimeters of water with the wind knocked out of me, but hey, Gaara was fine.

I rolled upright into a cross-legged meditation pose, and then I set Gaara down on my right leg.

"Okay. Gaara-chan, can you talk to me for a little bit?"

"Why?" Ah, Naruto's soon-to-be-favorite word made its appearance. I hoped that Gaara actually wanted to know the answer, since I was going to give it to him.

"Because...you see that big brown monster?" I pointed, but Gaara was already nodding fearfully.

"Well, he's really mad right now. Me and my big green monster are trying to get him to stop, but we can't. He's too big and angry."

Gaara nodded, his green eyes darting to where our respective Tailed Beasts were still wailing on each other with reckless abandon.

"So..." How did I put this? "...you're gonna have to tell him to go to his room."
"Room?" Gaara didn't appear capable of comprehending just how big of a room Shukaku would need. That was okay. He didn't need to.

"Well, it's that or we call the biggest monster and have to make him do it." Kushina would be pissed at being pulled away from mopping up the rest of ROOT and Danzō's machinations if this ended up requiring her attention in the end, but this was important. If she ended up being mad, I could take that.

And anyway, in all likelihood it'd just take Kurama in a hissy fit to make everyone else simmer down out of sheer self-preservation.

"So, Gaara-chan, you wanna try being the boss?" I asked him.

"…Daddy?" Gaara seemed to think about it. "Daddy boss."

Yeah, but the Kazekage wasn't exactly around. "Try it anyway, please? For me?"

Gaara nodded. He turned to the Tailed Beasts—at which point I realized Shukaku had been smashed into something resembling pancake batter again—and said in his best bossy voice, "Room."

Shukaku stirred. "WHAT?"

"Bad!" Gaara shouted. "Go room now!"

"You heard the human. Go to your room." Isobu was snickering, or as near as he could manage.

"SILENCE! I WILL NOT BE ORDERED AROUND BY A LITTLE PINK RAT!" Shukaku roared, but it was somewhat less intimidating than he might have hoped. It was difficult to be intimidating from underneath the massive bulk of his stronger sibling when said sibling had literally flattened him more than once.

"Shukaku-san, you're not getting out of this." I picked the little conquering hero up from my knee and lifted him so he could sit on my shoulders. That way, Gaara could have the best podium in the whole place. "This isn't even the worst we can do."

Shukaku growled.

"I mean, Kurama hasn't even joined the party." With Gaara's fist in my hair so he could keep his balance, I strode forward as Isobu's left tail smashed down and bashed Shukaku's single one back into inanimate sand.

"Go room!" Gaara shouted again.

"You think this is over, human?" Shukaku bit out.

Isobu brought one of his armored hands down on Shukaku's barely-formed head to keep him from getting too nasty. "It never is, with you. You'd think being trapped in that old human would have taught you some patience."

"Being trapped only teaches rage." Shukaku tried and failed to get back up again. Which, again, was probably pointless with Isobu sitting on him. "It hasn't been long since I was sealed here! I can still break it!"

"…Um, Shukaku-san, Gaara's two." I looked up, and Gaara nodded down at me. "Yeah. So it's been, uh, two years. If you haven't cracked it yet, I'm not sure you're going to. Even if it is a bad Shukaku visibly and literally deflated, shocked. "…But I haven't even finished cursing his family to the twentieth generation."

"I told you your sense of time was off," I called up to Isobu. "You and all your siblings!"

Isobu rolled his visible eye.

"WHATEVER! I'M STILL NOT GOING BACK IN THERE!"

Isobu snorted. "Yes, you are. Whether I have to smash you flat again or not."

"Third time's the charm, Gaara-chan. Give him all you've got!" Unseen by Gaara, I gave Isobu a thumbs-up.

Gaara took a deep breath. Then he did it again. He was gonna huff and puff and knock Shukaku's metaphorical socks off.

"GO," Gaara shouted, "TO YOUR ROOM!"

And at the exact same time that Gaara's chakra called Shukaku back, Isobu blasted straight down with a Tailed Beast Bomb. Gaara's call was a bit like going to meet someone when they rang the doorbell, while Isobu's post-script was perhaps more of a boot to the ass.

All's well that ends well, anyway. The funny thing about physics in the mindscape, on top of the various other silly little quirks, was that the Tailed Beast Bomb had been thoroughly concentrated just on Shukaku. No blowback to deal with, and no waves either.

I looked up at Gaara, who was leaning over and peering down at my face. "Good job, Gaara-chan!"

"Did it!" He tugged on my hair, steering me back toward looking at Isobu. "What that?"

"My monster. You can call him Isobu-san," I replied, resting my hands on his tiny ankles to keep him from falling. "Wanna say hello?"

"It's Isobu-sama, humans." Isobu seemed to puff himself up.

"Iso-tama!" Gaara said.

"…Close enough, I guess." Isobu dropped back down onto his lined belly and eyed Gaara and me with some curiosity. His mouth seemed to twist, though he didn't have lips. "…Thank you."

"Why?" Gaara asked.

"Not you." Isobu blinked slowly, like a contented cat. "Kei. For…helping."

I grinned. "No problem, Isobu." I turned my attention back to the toddler. "So, Gaara-chan, do you like piggyback rides?"

"What that?" Gaara asked. Was he chewing on my hair? Yes, he was.

Oh well.

"See, it goes like this…"
I opened my eyes to a sideways view of the back of someone's head sticking up over the row of seats in front of ours, and the feeling of slender hands shaking my shoulder. Upon further thought, I was lying with my head in Rin's lap, and she was the one doing the shaking.

"Kei, wake up! Hayate's match is about to start!" Rin said, as I looked up.

"I'm up, I'm up!" I hauled myself back into a sitting position, then rubbed at my eyes. "How long was I out?"

"Long enough to miss the rest of the first and the whole second round!" Kotetsu complained from behind me. "You're lucky Hayate had a bye, I guess, but you missed Yūgao's match, too!"

Aomaru chuffed and pushed his face against the side of my flak jacket's neck guard.

"How in the world do you sleep through a Chūnin Exam? Are you part Nara, kid?" Gaku asked, leaning on his dog.

What a joker.

"Ha. Ha. Ha." Ignoring Gaku's further contributions to the conversation, I looked around, but saw neither hide nor hair of Obito or…wait, Kakashi was gone, too. Where'd they go? I could see Makoto over in the Kage Box with Sensei and the other elites, but my teammates were nowhere to be found. Kohari Umino was also missing.

I shook my head and dismissed the question before I could ask it. There were some questions I couldn't ask in front of genin, not when I suspected that Shukaku had to do with some of the answers. "Okay, summarize what I missed. Anyone?"

"Well, the two Suna guys fought." Izumo shrugged. "Then Yūgao did. The Katsuo guy won, and he beat Yūgao in the only match of the second round. He used a really freaky puppet."

"That totally fails to capture how awesome the match was!" Iruka protested, looking insulted on Yūgao's behalf. "She was kicking his butt!"

"Until she got poisoned unconscious," said Izumo.

"You're not even in the finals, and you're saying she's weak?" Iruka demanded.

"No, I'm saying she lost and she's in the infirmary now or something. Which is where Umino-san went, in case you were wondering." The last sentence was apparently for my benefit, since I rather expected that Iruka would know where his mother was. Izumo just shrugged again.

"So, Kei, how was your nap?" Rin asked, prodding at me with a diagnostic technique. "No drowsiness? No aches?"

"I'm fine, Rin." And I did note that she was deliberately not asking me about the whole "Tailed Beast fight" business. Did the others just assume it was a non-sequitur of some kind? Did people say really silly things before slumping over in a narcoleptic mini-coma?

"If you say so," Rin said doubtfully.

I set my jaw.

"The final match of the Sunagakure Chūnin Exams is about to begin!" the judge called from the center of the arena. "The competitors are Hayate Gekkō of Konohagakure and Katsuo of Sunagakure! Will the chūnin hopefuls please come to the center of the arena?"

Right on cue, the two genin trooped out onto the sandstone.

Just from a casual observation of the two, I noticed that Hayate had pulled his hitai-ate's cloth up from his neck and over his nose and mouth, and had pulled my flight goggles down over his eyes again. Katsuo, on the other hand, had already crossed his arms so that his hands were touching his forearm seals.

"So, Katsuo's a puppeteer?" I heard myself ask aloud. I'd heard it from Obito, but I needed to confirm that my memory wasn't faulty. "And a poison user."

"Right," Rin confirmed.

"That explains why Hayate wanted my stuff," I muttered. "Rin, did Hayate get anything from you last night?"

"What do you mean?" she asked.

I didn't really know for certain. "Like, I don't know, did he ask for some kind of antitoxin? Antivenom? Antihistamine?"

"No," Rin replied.

Shit.

"You don't go into a fight with a known poisoner without taking every precaution in the book," I muttered under my breath. "Hayate, play it safe…"

"BEGIN!" the judge shouted, before Body Flickering away from ground zero.

Katsuo immediately deployed a pair of puppets from the storage seals on his tattooed arms. Once the smoke cleared, I got a good look at a large wooden puppet shaped like a spider the size of a large dog, and a smaller one shaped more-or-less like a monkey. The big one was deployed in front, as a guard and a moving shield, while the smaller one had more seals on it that, I would assume, involved launching things.

Hayate's chakra had already flickered away from his starting point—currently occupied by a plain old Clone Jutsu—and was circling unseen around to Katsuo's blind side. I could feel something like a genjutsu keeping him out of immediate view—maybe Yūgao had taught him something—but there was so much dust in the air that it hardly mattered much.

Hayate hit Katsuo like a speeding car, kicking the smaller genin with both feet at once and launching him across the field.

A poof of smoke revealed that Hayate had kicked one of the puppets instead, which disassembled in flight and hit the ground with a clatter.

Hayate planted the point of his kodachi in the sandstone, as though pole-vaulting, and launched himself out of the way of the retaliatory strike. Said strike came in the form of the monkey puppet coming back together, screeching, and diving through the space where my brother had last been.

Katsuo himself reappeared, slightly disoriented, from the belly of his huge spider puppet.

Hayate landed, located Katsuo immediately, and charged after him.
"He's playing this a lot more aggressively than last time," I said, as Hayate bounced off Katsuo's spider puppet in a failed attempt to force Katsuo to flinch.

"Ah, right, you didn't hear." At my curious look, Rin explained, "Your brother gave his spare tags to Yūgao-chan, and she used them in her match. He's only using his own chakra and his own skills now."

Okay, that was chivalry and team spirit writ large, but it didn't help Hayate now.

I pinched the bridge of my nose. "Dammit, Hayate."

"Don't worry too much about him. Hayate's strong," said Iruka. "He's really strong!"

A muffled groan was all the noise I made in reply.

Katsuo's huge spider puppet reared up and spat a hail of senbon needles after my brother.

Hayate was gone in another burst of his lightning-aligned chakra.

"I need to ask Kakashi what he's teaching Hayate when I'm not there," I muttered. Another thought struck me, just as Katsuo's puppet sent a senbon needle through the sleeve of Hayate's coat on a near-miss. "Rin, where'd Obito go, exactly? I didn't think he was supposed to be working now."

"I don't know," Rin said, "but I do know that there was a spike of weird chakra a little while ago. Maybe it had something to do with your nap?"

Oh, not good. Shukaku had been acting up in the underbelly of the universe or whatever, yes, but to have his influence reach into the real world? Very worrying.

I was about to get up, but Rin caught my sleeve. "Kei, the Hokage called Obito over. He didn't ask for you, not yet."

"I probably slept through it," I protested.

"You didn't. Kei, the Hokage doesn't need your help right now," Rin said, pulling me back down into my seat. "Hayate needs to see you here, watching him succeed."

She had a point. If Sensei had needed me, he would have just had someone haul me over there and wait until I got up. Until something happened, I didn't need to be anywhere but here.

Hopefully.

Hayate shattered the monkey puppet again, but this time his sword was blazing blue in my mind's eye. I could almost see the instant when the chakra strings snapped and the puppet went dead in the air. I couldn't hear the sound of wood clattering to the ground over the noise of the crowd, but I imagined it anyway.

Hayate kicked the puppet out of the arena to deny his opponent any additional sneak-attack options.

That left Katsuo with his spider and not a lot of options if he didn't want to get smashed.

Hayate slid his kodachi back into its sheath, changing his stance.

"Is he building chakra for an attack?" Rin asked.

"Yeah. Feels like…" I paused, watching his chakra move in my mind's eye. "Something like the Mountain Cutter. Smaller. Sharper?" Hayate and I had trained in the same tradition, but experience had forced my style to diverge from his over my career. I'd picked up more taijutsu from Obito and Kakashi than I often admitted, and Hayate had been incorporating jutsu instead.

If his version of the technique didn't feel the same, that wasn't unexpected. In hindsight anyway.

"He's going to use up a lot of his chakra this way," I concluded. I rested my chin in the palm of my hand. "Come on, Hayate…"

Down on the battlefield, Hayate was forced to juke left and then right, ducking repeated bursts of senbon. The Mountain Cutter, as my mother and I had conceived of it, didn't need any actual windup time.

Yet, Hayate didn't seem to be capable of using all that energy immediately. Or at range.

Hm. Something to work on.

"Does your brother ever use two swords?" Kotetsu asked. "Because right now, he looks like he could use another one."

"Mn, no, that's something he's going to have to learn." I hadn't really learned how to dual-wield blades until I spent some time watching Sensei, and even then the skills hadn't been easy to transfer. In the end, I had never really carried two blades. The first was my katana, and was necessary. The second would be made mostly of chakra and mostly when I needed it.

Unbidden, the feeling of using my old kodachi's sheath like a blade came back to mind. Driving the improvised blade through Kakkō's back and into the ground. Not something I was eager to remember. Particularly since that particular fight had accomplished exactly fuck-all.

"What's this Mountain Cutter thing anyway? Isn't that hyperbole?" Gaku asked.

"It's just the name Mom made up for our style's ultimate attack." I shrugged. It might've had another name, but Mom had never used a different one. "It's a little overblown, but, you know, if you do it right then it'll cut through just about anything."

"But you need to use half your chakra per attack," Rin added. "So it's not really efficient."

At Gaku's blank expression and Aomaru's nonplussed face, I explained, "Mom used the Eight Gates to do it. I never learned that, and neither has Hayate. So I don't really know exactly what changes he's made."

"I guess we'll find out," said Izumo.

"Hayate can do this! He will succeed!" Iruka insisted.

While my brother's teammate's faith in him was comforting, I didn't think it'd affect the match one way or another at this point.

Katsuo crouched behind his puppet, then sent it careening after Hayate like a runaway freight train on chakra strings.

I watched as the puppet deployed axes and sickles from the joints of its limbs, spitting senbon needles everywhere and generally behaving like a wooden hell-creature. It was a little like a crop thresher in terms of function, and I knew it would be unpleasant to be caught by any of those blades.
Poisoned weapons were a puppeteer's best friends.

Hayate didn't hesitate. His chakra flowed down his arm and into his sword, shifting fast enough that I almost couldn't track it.

The next thing anyone saw was Katsuo's puppet splitting down the middle of its chassis as though sliced apart by thin air, sending wooden shards and other fun things careening past my brother and toward the other side of the arena.

Some kind of canister, hidden inside the puppet until that moment, exploded in his face.

Across the battlefield, Katsuo was finally hit by the vacuum wave component of the technique, and he was hurled out of the arena and into a cactus.

That wasn't something I'd emphasized in my own training, though it was looking like I should have. Mom must have known, and trained Hayate in some of the advanced chakra usages I didn't get a chance to learn before being deployed. I was almost sure of that.

And then Hayate's distress hit me in a cold flood. I turned my attention back to him—why had it ever left?—and spotted him doubled up on the ground. I couldn't see what was going on, but I could feel pain and panic from him even these far away, even if I couldn't figure out where. His chakra flared erratically, reaching for anything—anyone—to help.

"What's going on?" Iruka asked, leaning forward over Aomaru's head. "I didn't see what happened!"

That was the last thing I remember hearing from the stands.

Rin was already on her feet and had hopped back over to the aisle before I got my legs working properly. I was too stunned, frozen by an old fear I thought I'd forgotten. I could remember a dark room, and feeling my brother's tiny chakra signature shriek in terrified, silent distress.

I ran after Rin without checking to see where we were going, or hearing anything but a roaring in my ears that drowned out everything else. It had nothing to do with Isobu.

Rin caught up with the medics carting the two competitors to the infirmary.

Katsuo was probably going to have to stay off that leg of his for a while, and looked furious with himself for the ring-out and the destruction of his puppets. He went on ahead.

Rin bustled up to the Suna medics and might have argued credentials with them. I wasn't sure. I didn't care.

My brother's chest was rising and falling only in errant bursts. Someone had taken the goggles and the headband off. I could see his face, which had gone slack and was covered in both a fine sheen of sweat and raised, reddened, blistered patches.

Dark and too hot, the sound of harsh breathing from across the room...

I took his hand and felt for his pulse along his wrist. I also channeled chakra for something like a diagnostic jutsu, but I wasn't concentrating well enough to read much detail from it.

My brother's lungs were failing. His heart was pounding, erratic and using far too much oxygen.

Not again. Not again, not again, not again, not again—I couldn't—wouldn't—

I can't do this again! I can't lose him!
My vision went red, then black, for just a moment.

Blood.

Screaming darkness.

Dawn, and crows.

I was never fast enough. And I never would be.

Then I blinked. And...everyone had backed away. Except Rin, and the stretcher-bearers.

My hand was on my brother's limp wrist, still, and Rin's hand came down on mine with almost absurd gentleness. "Kei. Please. I can handle it from here."

My eyes itched.

Isobu was being curiously quiet.

I swallowed hard. I didn't know enough to help, did I? If I tried advanced healing with Rin, I wasn't going to be able to help on her level. No, I was better as a glorified battery. And she didn't need that yet.

But...but Hayate...

Her other hand cupped my cheek. "Trust me."

I nodded.

She turned to the medics, the medical assistants, and even the Suna-nin who'd started to form a crowd to see what the fuss was about. "Get him to the infirmary right now, and let's see what was in that mix that hit him. Move, people!"

I didn't go with them.

I stood in the hall for a moment, looking down at my hand and the faintest shimmer of reddish chakra swirling around my fingertips. Exhaling, I let go of my grip on Isobu's chakra and focused mainly on calming myself down.

I'd never been good at self-soothing techniques.

"Keisuke-san?"

I turned at the sound of my name, and found myself face-to-face with Baki.

His face didn't trigger a secondary surge of helpless anger, but only because Isobu had his tails wrapped around the core of his chakra and refused to let me have any. The sensation was distracting enough to throw me off.

But there was an undercurrent there, out of Isobu's control, which was cold and harsh and somehow still me. That part of me took a vicious joy in seeing the blood drain from Baki's face as he met my eyes.

I probably looked and felt like a serial killer. I didn't have a convenient mirror to see if there was something extra going on with my face, but it probably didn't matter.
"Baki-san. Did you have something to say?" I asked, surprised at the level tone in my voice. Sure, the question came out a little chilly, but it was clearly non-hostile.

"Ah, yes." Baki coughed. "The Kazekage...he asked me if Konoha would be willing to accept assistance from Sunagakure in this matter."

"I don't know about Konoha, but I would be personally interested." On second thought, didn't I have a reflective edge on my katana? A thought for later, perhaps. "Depends on what you mean, though. Are you offering to help with medical matters?"

"I can't help personally," Baki clarified, "but the Kazekage is offering to provide Sunagakure's expertise in poisons and medicine."

I hadn't asked anyone what, exactly, had happened while I was out. I had some idea, but if Obito and Kakashi were gone because they were dealing with a Shukaku flare-up...well, this sudden amiability from Suna forces would make sense. The Kazekage didn't do anything without a greater goal in mind, but perhaps gratitude for two Sharingan assistants would tip the scale. Or not gratitude. Perhaps resentment of owing anyone anything.

My brother was a bargaining chip, then, to get the Kazekage out of an immediate debt to Sensei. Assuming I was correct, anyway.

"Baki-san, I would be grateful for any help Sunagakure can offer," I said carefully. I couldn't speak for Sensei or for the village. But I could speak for myself. "Hayate is my younger brother, and he's all the family I have left."

Another calculated risk. If people wanted to hurt me, Hayate was the obvious target. But anyone who looked at our respective surnames would know that. I still hated Baki, in the depths of my soul, but not this Baki. Not yet. Not this young jōnin who hadn't done a damn thing to me or mine and might never do it.

Acceptable risk.

"I understand, Keisuke-san. Or Gekkō-san," he corrected himself. Then he vanished in a burst of Body Flicker speed and left me to my thoughts.

I eyed the space where he'd been, then drew my katana and looked into my reflection's face. I'd expected a scowl. I expected something like the physical manifestation of my killing intent. I didn't expect what I did see.

My irises were bright gold.

"Kei! Kei, what happened?" Obito's voice startled me out of my dazed sulk, making me look up from the magazine I'd been staring at for about half an hour. Staring at, rather than reading. I could barely string three words together when I could feel my brother's chakra wink in and out in the depths of the hospital.

Waiting rooms were probably a feature of at least one layer of Hell.

"Hi, Obito—" And that was as far as I got.

When Obito swept me up in a crushing hug, I didn't protest. I just rested my chin on his shoulder and sighed.
"We missed the match, Kei." Kakashi stood off to the side of the waiting room as though he'd always been there. "How's Hayate?"

I made a noncommittal noise as Obito set me down and dusted me off. "He's alive. No one's been out to give a progress report or anything."

"Seriously?" Obito frowned. "That's…that's not normal, is it? I'm not normally the one out here waiting…"

"It's only been half an hour," I said dully. I took a deep breath and added, "But Rin's in there. I trust her."

Obito nodded seriously. "Rin can take care of him. But, uh…Kei, why are your eyes that color?"

Kakashi's headband was sitting straight on his head, though his Sharingan was closed. He clearly expected something out of me.

"I'm agitated, but not murderous," I muttered. "Apparently, this is what happens when I'm broadcasting my mood, now."

"Did something change while we were gone?" Obito asked.

"Several things changed," I informed him. "My brother's in respiratory arrest, I talked to a Tailed Beast, and I think I've discovered new levels of impulse control."

Obito looked blank.

"The Tailed Beast situation has been dealt with," Kakashi said, while Obito struggled to find something to say. "The One-Tail is contained. When did you fight him?"

I tapped the side of my head.

"Ah." Kakashi's Sharingan opened. "So. Any trouble?"

I waved off his concern. "Nothing I couldn't handle. I'm sorry it ended up causing trouble for you."

"I'm not sure you could call a weird ball of sand 'trouble,'" Obito said. "I mean, even with the face on it. It didn't…attack, exactly. Not much."

"What he means is that he tried to start a staring contest with it, and got sand in his sandals as revenge," Kakashi added, giving Obito a sidelong look.

"You can't prove that was deliberate." Obito crossed his arms.

Maybe it was the tension in the air, but I…I just started giggling. Nothing they'd said was really funny, as such, but I was so wound up that it didn't really matter what set me off. It could have been a misplaced picture frame or something, and I probably would have still cracked like an egg.

In short order, I was giggling so hard that I needed to sit down, unable to breathe from laughing. But the sound that came out of my mouth didn't sound like laughter at all.

"Uh, Kei?" Obito had his hands up, as though preparing to catch me or fend off a punch to the face. He didn't look sure which one he really expected.

My vision went wobbly, distorted by tears.
I felt a hand on my shoulder and looked up, trying to force a grin automatically.

Kakashi stared placidly back, his Sharingan closed, and offered me water in a paper cup.

I stopped smiling. I took the paper cup, looked down at it, and felt my breathing hitch. "I-I can't do this again."

"Do what?" Kakashi asked, kneeling in front of me.

I had to take a sip of water before I could continue. Then I rubbed at my eyes with my other hand, embarrassed. "I just… I-I remember what happened on the Tenth. With Hayate. This—this helplessness drives me insane."

There was only one "Tenth" for Konoha. Especially for those who had fought in it.

"Hayate will be fine," Kakashi insisted. "The Hokage was able to call in a favor."

"A favor we got for him, and on his orders," Obito added. I gave him a blank look. "So do us a favor and believe in us."

"In you?"

"In the power of people's selfishness, and the Kazekage's hatred of debts," Kakashi corrected.

Pfft. "I think I can do that."

"Good enough," Kakashi stood up, looking around at the waiting room with the air of someone with nothing better to do.

"So, did Baki-san tell you about the extra medical staff?" Obito asked, sitting down next to me.

"Yeah. But he didn't say who he was bringing in. Maybe another puppeteer?" I shrugged, not really feeling up to guessing.

That was about as far as the conversation got.

The doors to the waiting room were kicked in from the outside, startling all of us.

Cue a seventy-year-old woman barreling in, pausing, reorienting, and lunging right at Kakashi with chakra strings trailing from her arms. "WHITE FANG, PREPARE TO DIE!"

Several things happened at once.

Obito's eye went red and he whirled to face the incoming jōnin with his right arm building chakra for a Wood Release barrage.

Kakashi's chakra exploded outward with a sensation like a lightning strike, scorching the hospital linoleum.

I dragged on Isobu's chakra hard enough that I felt it surround me in a Tailed Beast chakra cloak almost before I knew it.

Two seconds later, the haze of battle was put on hold by a massive flare of chakra that made all of us pause, just to look in the direction it had come from.

( Didn't hold a candle to Isobu in a tizzy, but then, it wasn't Isobu who was acting. I was.)
The Kazekage, flanked by Baki, strode into the waiting room with an expression that bordered on murderous.

Behind him, with his eyes gleaming gold and his eyelids marked in dark orange, was Sensei. His chakra felt strange. Detached, maybe? Either way, I knew Sage Mode when I saw it, and didn't want to get in his way.

I didn't really want to think about the picture we presented.

Kakashi had left a scorched trail across the floor, and was somehow across the room and behind Sensei without using the Body Flicker jutsu or the Replacement.

All three of my chakra tails had curled defensively around Kakashi's previous position, cutting the old woman off from reaching it by dissolving her chakra strings as soon as they got too close. The tails were almost solid, bubbling with chakra, and I had to make a concerted effort to pull them back.

Obito had stopped short of actually attacking, and had needed to direct his Wood Release attack straight up to avoid accidentally firing in the direction of the two Kage, since the old woman had ducked. That left a wooden spike protruding from one of the fluorescent light fixtures, raining sparks down on us.

I straightened up from my battle-ready stance. No need for this to get violent.

Er. More violent.

"Elder Chiyo," Sensei said in a deliberately even tone. "Meet my students."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Of the six people in that waiting room who were ready to rumble, not one of us moved. We were at an impasse, standing still like statues, for long enough that the moment made the transition from ominous to uncomfortable and then to downright awkward. The Kazekage's gold sand drifted around the room, and so did quite a lot of agitated chakra from all of us, but no one looked like they wanted to turn the level of violence from "imminent" to "immediate." Killing intent, used like a cracking whip and then held up as a threat, kept all of us from acting on our impulses for just long enough to remember what we were doing.

Funny, how that put Sensei and the Kazekage on the spot as lion-tamers.

Sensei exhaled first, closing his eyes, and the Sage markings faded out before he decided to say anything. I had to wonder how he could still find words to say, since I'd run out of them.

In the end, the Kazekage spoke first. He said in a tone that said "death before dishonor" and other fun things, "Elder Chiyo. Your patient is through those doors."

Chiyo hesitated for just a fraction too long. Her hooded gaze remained on Kakashi, who stared levelly back with his Sharingan closed. I couldn't imagine what was going through her head, at that moment.

Then her body language shifted entirely, as she changed her demeanor from "deadly shinobi" to "doddering old woman who occasionally played dead to fake out her brother." "Whoops! I think I got the wrong ninja. Sorry about the mistake!"

And then she flounced off through the swinging doors like a shinobi a third her age.

Obito was definitely making a face—he felt like he was making a face—but I didn't look at him. Not even when he reached up and removed the Wood Release javelin from the ceiling and it turned to dust in his hand.

I kept my eyes locked on the two village leaders in the room, who in turn had not let their guard down regarding each other. I did put Isobu's chakra back where I'd found it, though. It felt politer that way.

Similarly, I felt Kakashi cautiously power down once Chiyo had gone off to do her job. I'd have to ask him exactly what new Chidori variant he'd come up with this time. It hadn't felt like the usual nails on a chalkboard across my chakra sense, so maybe he'd been training like a maniac to come up with a new technique. If so, I had somehow missed that.

"...I trust this incident hasn't affected our agreement, Hokage-dono," said the Kazekage.
Sensei shook his head. "No harm was done, Kazekage-dono."

"Then I will take my leave and confer with my advisors for promotion prospects." The Kazekage swept an assessing gaze across the room, his eyes searching for points of weakness, before walking off and out of the hospital.

Sensei stared after him for a moment, then focused on Baki. Baki bowed, but he didn't leave.

"You might wanna, um, call a maintenance guy," Obito said, looking up at the still-sparking light fixture. Then at the floor, where Kakashi had somehow reduced the surface of eight linoleum tiles to so much char. "Please?"

Baki nodded and slipped out of the waiting room, but it didn't feel like his chakra was moving that far away.

"…Could someone explain what the hell just happened?" Obito asked as soon as Baki had left.

"From context, my father killed Chiyo's son and daughter-in-law in the Second Shinobi World War." Kakashi's expression, from what I could see of it, was somber. He shook his head.

"Ah." Obito's face fell. "But he died years ago…"

Kakashi didn't bristle at the thought, but it seemed like a close thing.

"Elder Chiyo probably realized that," Sensei said. His chakra was very tightly controlled, allowing nothing about his thoughts or emotions to slip through one way or another. "Discuss it later with her if you want, but we don't have time for that now. It's not an issue unless she attacks again.

"But before you stay here…" Sensei sighed, "could someone please get Kei up to date on what's been happening? This Shadow Clone isn't going to last much longer."

"I didn't look at a clock," Obito admitted, sheepish. "So I don't really remember what happened when. But…oh! Kei, you passed out around an hour ago, right? So we can start there."

I made a face. "Sure."

"If you two have things handled…?" Sensei prompted. When the two boys gave him simultaneous nods, he—

Okay, I'd never seen Sensei stab himself in the hand with a kunai, but that was certainly one way to dismiss a Shadow Clone. Points for style. Combining Shadow Clone hax with the Flying Thunder God, all while probably investigating further on all counts by himself? It wasn't surprising that Sensei had wrangled an S-class rating.

"So, do you have any idea where the real Sensei is?" I asked, watching my teammates' reactions.

"He's working on the One-Tail's seal. Something came up," Obito said with a shrug. "I don't get it, personally, but…"

Kakashi interrupted with, "Back on topic. Let's sit down for a moment."

All three of us sat down around the waiting room's sole magazine-laden table, and I slapped an anti-eavesdropping tag down on it. The hospital staff didn't need to hear anything we were talking about. Honestly, I should have done it sooner. Maybe even when I'd first walked in.

"What's the last thing you remember?" Kakashi asked.
"Isobu asked me to help him with Shukaku," I explained, while Obito had his Sharingan trained on me. "After that, I guess… I facilitated a kind of wrestling match thing between the two of them. Isobu smashed Shukaku into sand dunes twice, and I got Gaara a bit of control…" I trailed off upon seeing Kakashi's body language. "What?"

"The One-Tail's seal was constructed from an advanced storage seal," Kakashi explained. "I think you already know what that means."

"Yeah. No mind-filtering components." Mine didn't have much in the way of a cognitive filter between Beast and host, but mine was also a complete slapdash job that had been designed to fail inside of four hours. It was something of a miracle that Sensei had managed to stabilize me. "But it's modular, inside of its own context, and the design as a concept is actually more flexible than more abstract seals. I still wouldn't have gone with it."

"Sensei said that, uh, the seal was at least workable." Obito scratched the side of his face, along the whorled scars. "But…"

"The One-Tailed Beast's seal shouldn't be deteriorating…" I muttered. Not this soon.

"It wasn't," Kakashi said flatly. "It had been modified."

There was something foreboding about the way he said it. "How?"

"From the inside."

What? "What?"

WHAT?

How could the seals be modified from the inside? How could anyone even tell? The modification of a jinchūriki seal usually required multiple specialists—or one sealing equivalent of Tony Stark—and was chakra-intensive enough that anyone with decent sensing ability should have been able to feel it happening long before it was successful. Furthermore, Tailed Beast chakra was often completely incompatible with the process primarily because their energy was far too reactive.

The knowledge necessary to modify a jinchūriki seal was even harder to come by than the raw ability to do so. There was a minimum chakra requirement for the task, as well as control threshold, and then there was training involved to refine both points until nothing about the modifications would be constructed incorrectly.

Otherwise, like many faulty seals, it would explode.

What the hell had happened?

When I finally spoke, my voice had turned rough and harsh. Not because of Isobu, but because I was realizing that there was a good chance we were in deep shit. Implications were there, but I hadn't managed to even put them to thought, yet. "Obito, I think we need to take this to the Kamui dimension."

And I needed space to think, even if I was wrestling with all too many ideas. They threatened to crush me.

Somehow, somewhere, I had fucked up big time.

Obito was looking between Kakashi and me, having apparently missed the subtext. "Kei?"
"A privacy seal isn't gonna cut it," I bit out. "We need to discuss this in private."

"Well, okay. I just, uh," Obito gave the swinging doors a second glance, probably about to say something about my brother, but… "Okay. Since you asked."

Obito took my hand, then held the other out for Kakashi's.

Obito's jutsu, in a way, was the strangest sensations I'd experienced in my second run at life. It didn't hurt, and it wasn't unpleasant except in a "this should not be working this way" sense. I couldn't feel myself being pulled into a miniature wormhole, being stretched out until I could fit into a hole in space-time the size of a quarter, but I knew I was. I could see it happening.

I decided right then and there to keep my eyes shut if I ever had to do it again.

I landed in a handstand once my body figured out what proper proportions were again, so my first glimpse of Obito's version of Hueco Mundo was upside-down. I righted myself and stood up, looking around.

Hm. Black background or a featureless void of some kind, while the ground was made of something that was probably stone. It was arranged into perfect, grayish blocks the approximate size of skyscrapers. I couldn't see far enough to say whether the field of gray extended past an outer ring of raised pillars, and I wasn't really interested.

I also had no idea where the light was coming from. Above, certainly, but there was no sun and there weren't any stars.

Eerie.

Kakashi landed next to me a moment later, in the wake of a gentle swish of displaced air. He looked at me and said, "First time?"

"…Yeah." I shrugged, staring upward into the infinite dark. "I mean, I knew it looked like this, but seeing it in person…"

Kakashi made a neutral-sounding noise, and then Obito finally twisted out of the air in front of us. In hindsight, it was like watching water flow down a drain, but backwards.

Obito looked at both of us and said, "So, what's the big secret here?" Defensively, he added, "I'm not an idiot! I just… don't get seal thingies."

"If the seal is modified from the inside, then the only one who can change things is Shukaku," I said, crossing my arms over my chest. "And if he can modify his seal freely, then the Kazekage has a lot more to worry about than just his kid's sanity. Thing is, I don't actually know how his seal was changed. Kakashi?"

"Where would he even learn to do that? And how is it possible?" Kakashi asked, audibly frowning.

"I think…" Ah, hell. I swallowed, and my fingers tightened involuntarily in the fabric of my uniform. "I think it has something to do with me. Somehow. I know that sounds arrogant, but…"

"I take it Shukaku never got that far in the other world?" Kakashi asked.

"No, not even close." Which may have had something to do with how differently the Beasts I had met were behaving differently. I'd butterflyed something, but no one had been able to point out exactly what. And I didn't have proof just yet. "One of you, can you draw the seal modification?"
"Sensei probably would have had to write the thing out longhand to tell it'd been changed."

"It looked like this, Kei." Quickly, Obito activated his Sharingan again and carved the sequence of kanji into the stone with a kunai.

All three of us crouched over the seal Obito copied between our feet, which made for a bit of a crowd. But we were used to that.

I barely had to look at it to realize what had happened, tracing the lines with my finger. "That's… that's not something Shukaku could have just learned. It's an Uzumaki sealing variant."

"So that's not just Sensei's lousy handwriting?" Obito asked. "I mean, there was a bunch of other stuff but this was where he turned pale—"

"Sensei's handwriting and his seal-work are totally different," I reminded Obito. "Because bad seals explode when you don't want them to. This seal's definitely doing what it was intended for."

"Then where he'd pick this one up?" Obito still looked blank.

I shook my head. "No, Obito, Shukaku has never been recorded anywhere near Uzumaki clan holdings. Before being sealed in the Kazekage's son, he spent more than eighty years sealed inside an old priest, and Sunagakure has records that go back even further than that. He couldn't have just picked up those seal patterns anywhere, and they have to be deliberately taught."

Kakashi caught on first. "Kei, what did you do?"

I gulped, watching Obito's gaze swing to me and his expression shift to something crestfallen. "Kei…?"

"Shukaku's seal doesn't have a cognitive filter between him and Gaara. And…neither does mine." I rushed on with, "Though theoretically he could have learned some of those sealing patterns from Kurama, who might be learning calligraphy from Kushina…I don't think he did. But he hates Kurama." Oh god, what did I do? "It's a lot more likely that he learned from Isobu—and copied what I know about seals."

Oh god.

Ohhhhh god.

Oh fuck.

I finally had to sit down when the weight of my mistakes finally hit me.

I had only had a cognitive filter—or something approximating one, anyway—during the earliest days after Isobu had been sealed in me. The Five Elements Seal had ruined my chakra control and my ability to fight, but it had kept Isobu from talking to me at all. And after that, when trapped in the butterfly genjutsu, I…

I let him see the memory cloud. And I'd never thought about what he might be picking up while riding shotgun in my head. I'd been using some of his chakra in my seals for months—almost years—and never once thought about what feedback he'd get out of it.

Did you think I was going to wait forever? Isobu asked, in a voice that reverberated enough that I almost wondered why Obito and Kakashi didn't look like they'd heard him.
Obito looked at Kakashi, though, and both of them then looked at me with their Sharingan active. I had to imagine that the expression on my face wasn't reassuring.

What did you do? I demanded of Isobu, barely remembering to keep it in my head at the last second.

I did what you would not, Isobu replied, and made sure my brother will be safe.

"What I wouldn't?" I repeated, jarred out of silence. "What are you—?"

I am talking about your repeatedly-stated desire to assist the Tailed Beasts. Isobu growled, But what have I seen from you? Platitudes, and threats. Meanwhile, I can hear my brother's screams from across the continent, while his seal keeps him in total isolation from any of our brothers and sisters!

I was sealed in a warded jar for three months. Compared to what I've seen of Kurama's seal, mine was a nightmare. Isobu's tails lashed. Months, of not being able to move, or see, or hear, or make any noise even for the echo. I could not feel anything. I could only wait for it to be over. Shukaku, unlike me, was sealed for years. And now that he has a human, why would he not tear them to ribbons at the first chance? It would make him real!

I remembered a quote, just out of nowhere. "Love breeds sacrifice... which in turn breeds hatred. Then you can know pain." Pain—Nagato—said that once.

Isobu loved his siblings, despite their stormy relationships and the long distances between them.

If you can—and are encouraged to—protect your brother, then I do not see why I should be any different. Isobu glared down at my mental avatar, his eye glowing ominously.

Your brother can flatten the entirety of Sunagakure in a tantrum. Does he need to be protected? And yet, I knew it was an ignorant question as soon as I asked it.

If your brother could reshape the world at his whim, would you stop worrying? Isobu scoffed. Hardly.

...He had a point.

"Kei?" Obito asked. "Are you talking to Isobu?"

I nodded, though I didn’t say anything. My eyes were a little unfocused, looking off into the middle distance, as I tried to think through Isobu’s reasoning and hold an internal conversation.

You are...tolerable, for a human, Isobu said after a while. Why do you think I never cut you off from my chakra? I could. I could abandon you in the middle of a fight. I would come back.

I was curious. You asked for my name, when no other human had. Not since him. Isobu seemed to sigh. So I was disappointed when you avoided taking a stance to help my siblings in a concrete way. Oh, you talk a big game, and to some of the right people, but only I can hear them. He paused. Not all of them, and not all the time. But enough.

"Why did Shukaku act up as soon as we got to Sunagakure, Isobu?" I asked aloud, for my teammates' benefit. "You said you couldn't tell what he was saying."

I was the only one of us to reach out to Shukaku on purpose. He was...excited.
"Excited? I…okay, I can see that." I paused, while Kakashi and Obito's respective Sharingan started spinning slowly. They weren't trying to get my attention, though, so I imagined that they were all right with passively observing my chakra and Isobu's as we spoke. "Isobu…what exactly did you teach him to do?"

Isobu growled. I taught him how to disrupt any seal that dares put him inside something without chakra of its own.

I'd probably have to tell Sunagakure that the teapot strategy was literally never going to work again. Not that it was a good idea in the first place. And it had clearly never been the humane solution. Now that I thought about it, there had to have been a reason Gaara had thought that he was Shukaku, and perhaps memory bleed-over had been the answer. And with what Isobu was saying about Shukaku's experiences…

It was, in a word, horrifying.

Shukaku can talk to me now. He may not be happy, but he can see and act and be heard. Even if his pride is hurt by the idea of needing any help at all. Isobu's eye seemed to glow. It is a start.

"So, you're working for Tailed Beast rights, in a way. No, not rights. Powers? Welfare? There's a term I'm missing here, but you know what I mean." I watched my teammate's movements, but only vaguely. They hadn't decided to act or not, yet. "So all this…"

I am acting in my brother's best interest. Isobu said shortly. As I expect of you.

Heh. The past ten minutes had been nothing but that, hadn't they? I freaked over Hayate's safety, while Chiyo tried to maul Kakashi out of revenge because she'd lost her family to his father, while Isobu did something a human would call ill-advised to ensure his brother's sanity.

It seemed like we were all doomed to working at cross-purposes, no matter how well-intentioned we all were.

"Is Shukaku all right?" I asked aloud, although I was certain that I was confusing the hell out of Obito and Kakashi by now.

He is angry. As usual. But he can rant at me now, instead of just hearing his own screams into the void.

…Well, then. What's done was done.

I couldn't exactly go back in time and tell Shukaku to get back in his cozy little box, and didn't want to. Not now that I understood, somewhat, where he and Isobu were coming from. Hell, the fight from before might have been an act, and I was still going to be looking back on some of the things I'd said and cringing months later, if this was anything to go by.

"Um, maybe next time tell me what you're doing ahead of time, so I have an actual explanation for when people start asking questions?" And maybe let me know before you do it if you're going to act out a fight like that? While, yes, I understood why he'd do it, I would prefer to have at least some kind of explanation on hand for when people inevitably started asking me difficult questions. I hadn't even been able to come up with a reasonable lie to cover my ignorance this time.

I make no promises.
I sighed aloud. Clearly, this discussion wasn't over.

"Kei, we're only getting like half a conversation and a chakra read," Obito reminded me. He tapped his eyebrow over his empty eye socket. "And I get two, only the second's fuzzy. What did the Three-Tails—Isobu—say?"

I thought about it. "Isobu is taking a stand as the first Tailed Beast Tailed Beast Rights activist."

"...Huh?" While Obito had been the one to actually verbalize his confusion, Kakashi was looking pretty bemused, too. Obito guessed, "Like...exercise?"

Maybe I should have known that the ideas didn't quite transfer. Stupid language differences. I spoke like a native, but every once in a while I'd say something that didn't quite work and then I'd get funny looks. And then people would generally ignore my oddities once they remembered what Dad had been like. Or what I was like.

Isobu, who had more understanding of my thought processes as a result of the lack of a mental filter between us, caught on faster. He said,  That is not what I said.

Vive la révolution! Which was about the only French I remembered, other than  moi and  merci.

"No, I mean that Isobu did a thing that makes Shukaku's life easier, and Shukaku acted up because he was just so darn excited about being able to avoid ever being sealed into a teapot again." I shrugged. "Though...hm. Pretty sure Isobu can't actually make seals himself..."

Shukaku lacks a solid shape, like Matatabi. He can form whatever seals he wants out of his body by stretching carefully. Isobu paused, then added,  Though I suppose it helps that he is covered in Curse Seals. Something of a legacy from the Sage.

And there was another thing I'd simply have to chalk up to "things I never got to learn before reincarnating," then. If Shukaku's weird little spots were Curse Seals, there was a pretty good chance that they'd  always been Curse Seals. What a weird world.

"Isobu showed Shukaku some of my seal designs," I concluded. "Which allowed him to modify his seal and make it less like a sensory deprivation cell. He can talk to Isobu now. At range."

Obito did not look like my further comments had illuminated much of anything. "Okay, but...uh. That doesn't really explain the freak-out."

Kakashi was being very quiet.

"...I don't really know how to break this to you, but Tailed Beasts are sapient beings with agendas of their own. And Isobu worked on his agenda, which caused a lot of panic but, uh, otherwise seems handled." I tilted my head to one side. "So, how  was it handled?"

Kakashi said, with his fingers drumming under his left eye and his Sharingan locked on me, "How do you  think? We came, we saw, we had to shut him down."

"Kakashi, that was—" Obito began, but I felt Isobu's chakra shift the same way as an impending landslide.

Kakashi, intentionally or not, had found one of Isobu's personal hot-buttons and  hammered it.

"You expect me to believe that the Three-Tails teaches  other Tailed Beasts how to modify their seals, and to just be okay with that?" Kakashi snapped. "Obito's apparently letting the entire thought process fly right over his head, but I distinctly remember you telling me how to shut them down, Kei. You can't take risks with monsters that can flatten villages, no matter how friendly they act."

Isobu's chakra exploded out of my coils and coalesced around me in a red shroud, while I remained seated and tried very hard to get a grip on the surge of alien anger. I could rationalize my way past nearly anything that happened in this stupid lifetime if I tried, apparently, but not everyone had developed the ability to just ignore things that they couldn't change. Or knew how to drop an argument when both sides were stubborn as fuck.

Hoo, boy.

The red mist twisted, forming a segmented shell and multiple long tails. Isobu's shell flared out in front, like a crab's, and I could see his head form last a little above mine. I hadn't really used the Isobu avatar mode for years, but apparently he'd figured out the trick without my help.

I stood up, probing cautiously at the edges of the projection. I didn't feel anything out of the ordinary—such as my flesh boiling off—but the idea alone helped me tamp down on Isobu's anger somewhat. Isobu wasn't angry enough that he was forgetting himself. Or forgetting the squishy human he was attached to.

Obito and Kakashi had both gotten to their feet and retreated a few steps, though Obito seemed more hesitant. Kakashi's body language, meanwhile, was raring for a fight.

For fuck's sake.

"So I should just let humans do whatever they wish to my brothers and sisters? Not while I still live," Isobu snarled, making the ground shake with the power in his voice. "And I am not going to let you, of all worthless humans, dictate what I can or cannot do to ensure the safety of my family!"

"It's our concern when you start threatening innocent lives while you do it," Kakashi growled back. "The One-Tail acting up may not have hurt me, or hurt Obito, but there were people around who can't defend against mobile sand. Not to mention that if he had kept it up, Kei would have probably been called in and ordered to neutralize a toddler over something you did!"

"I'm pretty sure the Kazekage or Sensei could have—" was as far as Obito got.

"Shukaku's sand dome is harmless until you humans start to attack it! If you had just let him be until he calmed down, his host would have been able to walk free without your interference," Isobu snapped, seeming to rear up on his tails a bit.

"Then what about the sand eye, or when it tried to crush Obito anyway?" Kakashi demanded.

"Uh, that didn't really—" Obito tried again. He reached out to Kakashi, who shook him off.

"Obviously, it failed." Yikes. No remorse from Isobu there.

"Isobu, did you actually ask me to help you out with Shukaku because you cared what he did to Gaara, or was it just a smokescreen?" I asked, and since I was inside what ought to have been his ribcage, I had a somewhat easier time cutting through the argument than Obito did.

"I do not care about the poor judgments humans make. But I did know that you would likely be eager to help another human," Isobu said, and I winced. "I do not hate the hosts we are sealed into. But asking me to care is futile." To me, he added, I do not want to die—again—and so our fates are temporarily intertwined. Reassembling myself would be troublesome.

Bit harsh, aren't you?

It is the truth.

"So, you did it because...it'd make Kei happy?" Obito guessed.

Isobu growled. Your human happiness is irrelevant. I protected my brother. That is all.

"So can I ask...?" Obito started again, only for Kakashi to override him.

"The Hokage is still going to have to clean up after you for this stunt." Okay, reasonable objection there. Ish. "And we have no idea what this has done to our relations with Sunagakure, between the Tailed Beast activity and whatever other things have been happening. I doubt you told us everything."

"If I told you everything I knew and did, we would be here for longer than your natural lifespan. I am not interested in inflicting your company on myself for that long," Isobu replied nastily. Especially yours.

"Excuse me," Kakashi responded, and it didn't even change inflection enough to form a proper question. "What."

Shit.

"Did you think I forgave you," Isobu began in a low snarl, for using that eye on me?

"I apologized for that a long time ago," was Kakashi's sharp reply.

"And I had to spend several hours having my seal inspected, as soon as you could find a stronger human to run to," Isobu growled.

I remembered this. Back when I'd first come back from the hell butterfly mission, I'd been called up in case of mental deterioration. I'd understood Kakashi's reasons despite the inconvenience, but as far as I was concerned there'd been no harm done.

Isobu clearly did not agree.

"But Kei said it was—" Obito tried again.

"But Kakashi went back on his apology, by not letting Isobu and I handle things ourselves," I interrupted. I glanced at Obito, "Sorry, Obito, but this is really between him and Isobu."

Kakashi didn't say anything.

"Perhaps, even when you made it, you planned on seeing how you could irritate me most effectively." Isobu's tails lashed. If so, it worked.

"I was trying to make sure Kei was going to be safe," Kakashi replied, his eyes narrowed.

"And you couldn't trust either of us to do it?" I asked, confused. While it made sense from his viewpoint, Isobu had helped during October Tenth, even after that. It'd been months since any kind of untoward activity, even on a mission when I lost my temper.
How long had this conflict been festering?

Finally, Obito had his chance, and seized it. "I know you have the best intentions, man, but"—and here, Obito grabbed Kakashi's raised hand to keep from being interrupting again, "but seriously, you're scaring me here."

"I'm scaring you," Kakashi said flatly. "And the Tailed Beast right in front of us?"

Obito nodded. He looked at the chakra projection and said, "See, I know Kei and Isobu-san don't always get along, since that'd be unrealistic. But, uh, I don't let it drive me nuts. Kei knows those seals, and sure maybe Isobu-san knows them too, but I figure I can trust Kei to know what to do. I mean, she knew back then, didn't she?"

What?

"I hadn't had any concrete experience of being a host back then, Obito," I reminded him. The entire Three-Tails possession event had not been a fun scenario to prep for. I hadn't known then if I could keep Rin safe long enough to get Obito's attention and then pry him out of Madara's influence. It had just so happened that he'd done a lot of the work himself.

He said, " Didn't stop you from having backup plans. And I know you said you knew it was coming, but it was still important that you prepared for the whole thing with Isobu-san and Guruguru and Madara instead of just, y'know, not."

While I didn't share Obito's confidence, I didn't say anything. He had way too much faith in my ability to act on my foreknowledge.

Obito managed to sling an arm over Kakashi's shoulder. "Are you sure you're all right, Kakashi? Because I'm getting mixed signals. Like you're mainly afraid for Kei, but, uh, I don't think you're really as cool as you act."

"What," was Kakashi's response.

"Okay, so here's the thing. You're angry because you're worried," Obito held up his other hand and started counting down on his fingers. "Which means you don't really trust that Kei can take care of herself." One finger folded into his palm. "Which means you try to do it for her." Another. "Only you know she doesn't really want you—or anyone else—to do stuff 'for her own good,' so then you go behind her back." Another. "Which pisses off Isobu-san, and maybe Kei, and here we are." Just his thumb remained free.

"I think we're a little off the topic of sealing accidents and Tailed Beast stuff, Obito," I said.

"I'm getting there." Having apparently decided that fingers were useless for mnemonic purposes, Obito went on without using them and said, "All that stuff wrecked Isobu-san's trust in you, and you didn't trust him anyway, so when we get to the point where everyone's doing stuff for the people they care about and it blows up, everyone fights. Instead of, you know, sitting down and just talking about stuff until we have some kind of agreement to not scare each other again."

…Uh. Obito had apparently been taking communication classes from somewhere between missions.

If Isobu and Kakashi were both listening to him—and a quick check confirmed that they were—then he'd clearly rolled a natural twenty on his diplomacy check.

"You expect me to trust him?"
"Not really. It's just, uh, maybe we can all try to give each other a bit more slack? Like, Isobu-san, you do stuff so you can protect your siblings. And Kei." Obito looked sheepish. "Kakashi does stuff to protect the people he cares about, too. And I'm sure you know about Kei trying to keep her brother safe all the time.

"Like, uh, I heard about the speech Isobu-san kinda gave to Kurama-san, though no one remembered the whole thing." Obito paused, "And I don't really know if there was stuff I missed, but…well, I think you're a good person, Isobu-san. We're just all working against each other because we're not talking, you know?"

"I don't think I know the whole thing, Obito, and I was there." I said. Isobu…you didn't actually say everything you told Kurama aloud back then, did you? Were there parts that even I missed?

Yes. I am an effective multitasker. Then Isobu said aloud, "I still intend to work for the best interests of my siblings, human."

"I think all of us get that," Obito said, with a significant glance at Kakashi, who had turned away. "Even if we don't think we do yet. I just want to know first. I mean, I…guess I could stop you? But really, I just want to know what's going on."

"Kakashi, what about you?" I asked him. It felt like we were somehow coming to an agreement. What the agreement was, I couldn't quite say.

"I'd prefer if the Thr—if Isobu would just stop doing things that send you into an hour-long coma or scare the village into nearly declaring a state of emergency," Kakashi said, with Obito's transplanted arm still over his shoulders. His eyes narrowed as he looked up at Isobu, but his Sharingan didn't shift to Mangekyō mode. "Are you going to stop?"

"…I suppose I could stop needlessly antagonizing you humans." Isobu shifted his weight and settled back onto his belly. "But I make no promises if I need to act in defense of my siblings. Which is what I expect of all of you."

"That we'd defend our precious people," I asked, "or that we'd try to look after the Tailed Beasts too?"

Isobu grumbled. "The former. I doubt you can stretch your selfishness far enough for the latter."

While Isobu was probably talking about "you" in the plural form, meaning all of us, my train of thought took a detour. Once again, I recalled what I'd said about my heart. Not just to Rin all those months ago, but also the self-berating tendencies I'd had since being reborn. I was too selfish to care about everyone.

I wasn't Naruto. I couldn't expect anyone else to take up his role, though, given how much the timeline had changed. This Naruto could grow up very differently compared to the Naruto who grew up alone and hated.

But…

Maybe, as a team, we could cobble something together.

"I will wait until another sibling can contact me. For now, Shukaku and Kurama will occupy my time," Isobu rumbled. "But when they call, I will answer. Your reaction is up to you."
"What if they can't?" Obito asked.

"Then I will do what I have to do."

Oi.

Obito let go of Kakashi, instead deciding to gesture grandly as he said, "But seriously, talk to us about this!" He waved at Kakashi, "I mean, Kakashi's got more lightning than anybody I've ever met, and I can do some pretty cool things, too. Even if we can't really understand everything you want to do, in here"—and here, Obito touched his chest over his heart—"we can at least get you both out of trouble most of the time. All right?"

"...Your concern is unnecessary," Isobu muttered.

"Then let us worry about Kei, at least." Obito shot me a grin. "You all right with that?"

"I probably don't have much of a choice," I said, crossing my arms. But I was smiling a bit, too. "Right?"

"Right." Kakashi agreed, shaking himself out of his funk. He looked at Isobu. "Can we agree on that, Isobu-san? You tell us a few things, and maybe we can combine forces?"

Isobu snorted. "There will have to be a terrible threat, but... provisionally, I will trust you again, human. Despite how you have betrayed that trust in the past." He lowered his head. "Do not expect a third chance."

"I won't need one," Kakashi said. He looked at Obito and me, and added. "At that point, I doubt these two would let me get away with it."

Obito made a huffing noise and said, "Damn straight."

Isobu gave one last deep-throated affirmative rumble before his chakra lost its shape with a pffsh noise. The red mist then dispersed back into my chakra coils, fleeing back behind the seals. Maybe it was too embarrassing to stay out here and deal with the beacon of idealism and hope that Obito seemed to carry with him everywhere. It made things awkward.

Idly, I rubbed my arms and looked up at my teammates.

I had the absurd urge to start laughing, and squashed it. "Thanks, both of you. I, uh, I don't think I need that debrief anymore. We covered it."

"I'll say," Obito agreed. He thumped Kakashi's shoulder. "What did I tell you about all those bad feelings, Kakashi? You have to get rid of them somehow!"

Kakashi muttered something unintelligible. Then, "So, what are we going to tell the Kazekage when we head back?"

"The situation's been dealt with." I glanced around the empty void again, now that it wasn't filtered through a reddish haze. "And I still need to make sure my brother's all right."

"Are you okay dealing with that on your own?" Obito asked.

"Well, no, but we took so long that I think you two are needed elsewhere." I shrugged. "I didn't really expect everyone to take so long to see eye-to-eye on things."
Obito snorted with barely-suppressed laughter.

"What?" I asked him, while Kakashi gave him a sidelong look.

"You said 'eye-to-eye,' like, you know how all of us—uh, never mind." Obito's eye went from normal Sharingan to Mangekyō. "Wanna head back?"

"Yeah." I paused. Then I took one big step forward, snatching both of my teammates in the biggest hug I could manage. I held on just long enough for it to get awkward, then let go.

Obito was grinning.

Kakashi was face-palming, right over the unmasked part of his face.

"Now we can go!" I said.

And we did.

The rest of the afternoon passed in a daze. The adrenaline high from working through things with Isobu and Kakashi and Obito hadn't lasted that long, so I was left tired and shaky by the time I finally shooed them off to report in. Technically, only one of them needed to report in. Between their shared Sharingan, either of them would be able to recall enough to be useful to Sensei.

I just wanted to be alone for a while.

So, between waking up this morning and flopping out of Obito's Kamui dimension, a lot had happened. My brother had been hurt in a fight, Isobu had turned out to be conspiring with his fellow Tailed Beasts for the greater good, Kakashi had revealed some serious issues with Isobu at the same time Isobu had made his clear, and we'd hashed out something like a vague agreement not to pull each other's hair anymore.

It felt like the kind of day when it didn't really pay to get out of bed.

After a while, something pinged off a thought in Isobu's brain and prompted him to say, You were going to ask me something before we left that world.

I was?

Yes.

I hemmed and hawed for a moment, then asked him, What did you tell Kurama back then?

I said I would do what I could to help him find happiness again. No matter how long it took. And while none of you were listening, he did. Isobu gave me the impression of a shrug. I didn't expect it to work. But maybe I'm also selfish. I didn't want to lose a chance at the future your memories were pointing toward.

If we'd died there... If Isobu hadn't roused himself to help...

If staying here—in you—prevents the Ten-Tails from being born again, I can stand it. We'll work together to keep that thing from ever coming back. Isobu paused. You're not horrible for a human. I thought you would understand why I would still work to protect my family. From that thing, and from humans.
And you were right about that. Oh, was he ever.

Isobu went silent for a long time.

But this wasn't over. So I told him, But you're not going to get access to my memories anymore, Isobu.

...Fair enough.

In my mind's eye, I swept up the entire cloud of memories and stuffed every last scrap of them—and of my thoughts, too—into my mental avatar. No open-access crap for Isobu. Not anymore. He'd done some good with it, but he'd done that without my permission and I wasn't going to let him off for that.

...Oh. And I thought of something interesting.

As I crammed the last memory away from Isobu's glowing eye, I said distractedly, Oh?

You said you called this place the mindscape. Isobu swept his tails outward to indicate the mentally constructed beach and other amenities. And I think you were frustrated with the lack of a name for the second layer, where Tailed Beasts congregate.

Yeah.

So, what about calling it... the mind-skype.

I let out a noise that sounded like "pfft" as I bit down on a laugh. Oh, what the hell? Why didn't I think of that?

Now and forever, that place is the mind-skype, Isobu announced imperiously. Then, At least, for the two of us. I doubt the others would appreciate the joke.

Probably not. Thanks, anyway.

I looked around the empty waiting room. I could still feel Hayate's chakra, so I settled back down for yet more waiting.

They had named this place quite aptly.

I stared at the clock on the wall for a full minute at one point, watching the seconds tick by. Three-fifty already, huh? Time flew when I was in the middle of arguing with my team and my literal inner demon, but apparently it couldn't spare the effort when I was actually looking at a timepiece.

Typical, really.

At about that point, several bright chakra signatures made their way down the hallway toward me. Recognizing them offhand, I just put down the magazine I hadn't been reading and waited for them to arrive.

Iruka made it through the door first, barreling into the waiting room. He skidded to a stop, sighted on me, and ran over. He landed on the waiting room chair next to mine with a thump, saying, "Is Hayate all right?"

"Not sure, yet," I answered, as Yūgao and Inoichi finally arrived in the room.
Yūgao was limping a bit and using her sensei's arm as support, but she was moving under her own power. She had a big scrape along one cheek that had been covered in a strong-smelling salve, reminiscent of road burn, but I expected that she would be fine.

"Hello, Yūgao-chan, Inoichi-sensei. Like I told Iruka-kun, I haven't heard anything from the medics in there," I told them, as the pair of them found other seats in the waiting room. "I don't even really know what he got hit with, to be honest."

My voice was surprisingly steady, even to me. Maybe the situation with Isobu had taken the figurative wind out of my sails.

Inoichi frowned. "It's been longer than I'd expected from Suna medics. Rin-chan is in there too, isn't she?"

"Along with Elder Chiyo of Suna, yeah," I said. To the kids, I added, "Chiyo is one of the oldest medic-nin on the continent, besides being an expert puppeteer and poisoner. If anyone knows how to deal with poison, it's those two."

That said, Chiyo had never been able to make a poison that Tsunade couldn't counter. I was banking on Rin having studied with Tsunade and Shizune, and thus learning from them, to save the day.

Then the doors for the surgery—or whatever they called the section for operating rooms around here—swung open.

A Suna medic-nin, dressed head to toe in the local equivalent of medical scrubs, poked his head out and looked around the waiting room until he laid eyes on me. I saw his pupils widen and felt his chakra jump, but didn't make any untoward moves. The kids were also looking at him, waiting for news.

"Uh, K-Keisuke Gekkō, yes?" When I nodded, the medic-nin continued with, "Nohara-san is asking for you."

…I was not a good sign. Still, I got up and, as I walked over to the door with my hands in my pockets, asked, "Did she say why?"

"Uh, no. Sorry." He ducked through the doors and damn near ran away.

The medic skittered on ahead through the halls as I strolled after him, keeping my chakra under tight control. I'd probably spooked this guy earlier, during the whole confrontation with Chiyo, but I couldn't muster up the goodwill to apologize just yet.

If Rin was calling on me now, it was because she needed some kind of backup.

I ended up hearing angry voices before I even got close. The medic who'd been guiding me through the hospital's depths took one look at me at that point and took off running somewhere. Presumably, he figured that I could follow the sound of Rin actually shouting, and he'd be free to escape my presence in the meantime. Fair enough.

I tracked Rin's chakra to a ward with a placard to one side of the doors, which said Respiratory Distress, and nudged the swing doors open with one foot. I sidled inside and was greeted by, in a word, a fight.

Under a thickly woven net of wires, tubes, and various other devices, I could just about see my brother lying in the bed that ought to have been the center of all this attention. His chakra was still there, and certainly stable enough for all that he had a tube down his throat, he wasn't awake. Here and there, medics bustled and adjusted one thing or another, but no one's focus was really on him like it should have been.

Instead, Chiyo and Rin had their respective chakra signatures flaring up like a fire plus gasoline, which ratcheted the tension in the room up to unworkable levels. The two kunoichi were glaring at each other, arguing in medical terms I couldn't quite parse as they stood across Hayate's bed from each other. They were both angry enough that none of the other medics around seemed to want to distract them from their fight and incur their wrath, but the net result was that medical things were not happening.

"Rin, what's going on?"

I got a long string of medic-babble in reply.

I coughed. "Ah, no, hang on." Rather than snapping my fingers or something, I gathered chakra into my hand and summoned a spinning Rasengan the size of a baseball. The noise from the jutsu, while certainly a distraction, did not quite make a dent. But the way that a Rasengan ripped at the air around it, like a miniature tornado, did.

That stopped everyone cold.

"Short version?" Rin looked frazzled, even with her hand hovering over my brother's chest. "A capsaicin spray mixed with a paralytic."

"Define 'paralytic,'" I suggested, eyeing Chiyo.

"Kumogashira poison is more than a mere paralytic," Chiyo informed me haughtily. "Which is why we are still here."

Okay, rather unhelpful. "Rin?"

"We have no idea what dosage was inhaled, but it could last anywhere from half an hour to eight hours," Rin said, pushing her hair out of her eyes. Sweat stuck to her tattooed cheeks, and I realized belatedly that Chiyo hardly looked much better.

"...And you just let me sit out there in the waiting room, totally unaware of a toxin metabolizing in my brother's blood?" I asked incredulously.

Rin narrowed her eyes at me.

I dropped the overacting, which didn't hide stress worth a damn anyway. Not from Rin. "All right. What do you need me to do, Rin?"

"I need you to transfer chakra to both of us. Chiyo-sama and I are not strong enough to force the poison to process any faster, but with your chakra we should be able to help Hayate's body break it down faster," Rin said, and waved me over. "Otherwise, we wouldn't be able to keep him breathing that long."

"And the respirator?" I asked, watching the machines warily. Did Tailed Beast chakra disrupt electricity?

"It's doing its job, but I need to work on his diaphragm specifically and Chiyo-sama needs to take a break," Rin said. She may or may not have shot a dirty look at the old medic-nin, who stuck her tongue out in reply.

"I can last long enough to tweak his and clear the reaction to the pepper solution." To me, Chiyo added, "Once the poison is purged, expect him to be tired and hungry, but alive. And don't expect me to use your chakra, jinchūriki."

"I expect you to!" Rin snapped. "For the sake of the patient!"

Chiyo glared.

"Is this why you two didn't call me earlier?" I put my hand against Rin's shoulder and started shifting my chakra into her, slowly enough that she could grasp it. I felt her sag with relief at the boost, but I kept my eyes on Chiyo. "This isn't the first time we've done this, Elder Chiyo."

Chiyo sniffed. "And you kept your inhuman chakra away?"

Given that I'd been half terrified that Obito would die under my hands—or more specifically Rin's hands—at the time, it had been a lot easier than expected. I could, in fact, shove chakra toward someone else so they could use it. I hadn't known what else to do.

And after that, Rin had called on me once or twice for an endurance boost while working. So that was something, too.

What I actually said to Chiyo was, "Without a problem."

It took a little longer to convince her—time Hayate only just had, thanks to Rin—but eventually she came around.

And we brought my brother back from what would have been the brink, anywhere else.

It took about an hour for my brother to get back on his feet after he woke up.

And it turned out that "woke" was in fact a fairly useless and inaccurate word.

Kumogashira poison didn't let its victims lose consciousness. No, instead, it acted simply as a full-body paralytic. In cases where the concoction had been used to hunt game, the prey died of asphyxiation as their diaphragm failed, and got to be conscious for every minute of it.

Hayate, fortunately, had avoided that part of the program. But he still clearly remembered the intubation process and all the medics arguing over his supposedly comatose body, which had not been pleasant.

"It was really annoying. Everyone kept using medical words I didn't understand, and I couldn't ask them to explain," Hayate croaked. His throat was still sore.

I squeezed his shoulder reassuringly. "Sorry about that. Maybe next time you can try not to catch poison grenades with your face?"

"I'll remember that," he muttered, and finally accepted the ice chips I'd been trying to get him to eat for twenty minutes.

"Speaking of freaky things, I didn't scare you too badly, did I?" I raised my fist and tapped it over my heart. It was, unfortunately, also the location of Isobu's seal.

Hayate shook his head. "No. You wouldn't hurt anyone unless they deserved it."
What a glowing commendation.

I sighed. "Well, okay. Do you want me to ask the medics to let you loose early so you can head back to the inn?"

Hayate shook his head. "I've only got a bit longer in here. Just, um, please stay?"

I squeezed his hand. "Okay."

And an hour later, just before Hayate was going to be released into my care, Obito bounced into the Suna hospital to give my brother a congratulatory tackle—probably for the finals match that he'd missed—and that led to its own problems and a lot of yelling. Hayate and I both appreciated the thought, though perhaps my brother didn't need the wind knocked out of him twice in one day.

So, there was yelling. Most of it was Rin, at Obito.

Hayate and I fled in the confusion.

Kakashi

The next morning, Sensei decides to let everyone but me run off to find breakfast. We're only going to be in town until the promotion ceremony at noon, after which point we are finally heading home.

I've been on missions where I've missed Kushina's cooking less than this.

So, while the others spend the early morning eating, goofing off, and packing, I have breakfast with the Hokage and we debrief the last few days.

There's a lot to go over. Breakfast doesn't last nearly that long.

Eventually, there's only thirty minutes left until we can finally leave. I've already picked out who will be promoted, but haven't told anyone. It'd ruin the betting pool since I trained two of the competitors.

"All in all, we gained more than we lost," the Hokage says, idly twirling a Flying Thunder God kunai around his index finger. For some reason, I'm pretty sure that the gesture would have been far more fitting if he was sitting behind his desk and staring me down from behind a pile of paperwork.
As it is, he looks more like he's amused than actively scheming.

There's really only so much anyone can do with gravitas when lounging on the floor next to a coffee table.

"Suna may know that Kei is a jinchūriki, but they've overlooked Operative Crane's full scope," the Hokage goes on. "It'll be months before they realize that there was ever a break-in. Obito did well."

I nod.

"And while I didn't expect the Tailed Beast problem, it seems to be handled." The Hokage shrugs as he sits up. He puts down his kunai, picks up his teacup, and takes a long sip. Then, "So for now, I'll commit some additional time to researching cognitive filters in case Kei or the Kazekage ask. I doubt they will, but it's best to be prepared."

"The Kazekage seemed to believe he got the better end of the deal," I comment mildly, glancing at my tea. On second thought, not yet. Too hot. "An Uchiha with Wood Release? Me? Kei was the obvious one, but we're all exceptional."
"It's only a loss if he can capitalize on the information," the Hokage reminds me. "Which, given how your abilities function, is unlikely. But I'll see for myself how Kei fights when we get home. As far as I'm concerned, though, Rasa believing he has something over our heads is no problem for us."

"Rin expressed some concerns that Chiyo was holding back." I reach out and idly set a spark running across the surface of my tea. The porcelain doesn't crack. Good. "Deliberately. Not just because I set her off."

"Not terribly surprising," the Hokage mutters. "We already knew she wasn't going to be a friend to Konoha even if the Kazekage ordered her to pretend. Still, combining that report with Obito's information and the report Kei gave on the future Akatsuki..."

"Sasori will be a difficult fight if he challenges us, but it's not an impossible one." I pick up my teacup and take a long sip, glancing at the clock on the wall.

"The promotions are in five minutes," the Hokage says. He raises an eyebrow challengingly. "Can you get there in time?"

I drain my cup and set it down. I nod at him.

The Hokage—Sensei—grins widely and disappears in a fwhish of displaced air.

I'm out of the inn by the time the dust settles.

Kei

Long story short: Hayate got promoted! So did Anko, and Yūgao, and Ren and I guess all four Suna-nin. Not quite sure why, since I missed a bunch of fights, but I supposed that everyone wanted to look strong for the next year.

I...had mixed feelings about seeing the last of Suna for a while. About not being able to see Gaara in person, but unable to finagle a reason the Kazekage would swallow. About Hayate nearly dying again. But I didn't have mixed feelings about going home at all.

The road goes ever on and on...

Chapter Notes

Aside from the Konoha genin teams—some of which didn't actually have just genin anymore—Jiraiya had also decided to follow us back. Yahiko and his Ame delegation had left Suna on the back of a gigantic paper crane, so his bodyguard services hadn't been required anymore. So, he joined the center of our traveling circus group and stuck close to Sensei while the rest of us fanned out into what would have been lazy formation design for any other sort of group.

Actually, with Sensei and Jiraiya in the middle and Kakashi, Obito and me on point and each flank, all we did was increase the range that we could defend. The genin were in the middle, too, but they were protected by both their chūnin teammates and their respective sensei at rear guard, while Gaku, Aomaru, and Kohari fanned out behind our group.

Basically, everyone would be protected for the whole trip if they needed it. It was probably unnecessary, but it made everyone feel all warm and fuzzy to get used to their new roles.

It took a week to get to our destination, and we made it there with maybe two hours of sunlight to spare.

Konoha.

The first Hidden Village among the Elemental Nations, where shinobi from many clans and hundreds of thousands of civilians could congregate in relative peace, banded together for the common defense in a way that had never happened before. The childhood dream of Hashirama Senju (and, at one point, Madara Uchiha) that had grown and prospered.

Honestly, though? All of that fancy, poetic crap was true, but for the twenty-odd shinobi coming back from Suna…

Well. "Home" was good enough.

Those gates were definitely a sight for sore eyes.

Sensei let us all run off in different directions, after reminding me to stop by the office sometime for a pile of paperwork. He didn't have enough consideration to tell me what I was supposed to be doing with said files, other than something about analysis and troubleshooting (which I took as a likely candidate for "not hyperbole" if there ever was one).

"Tell me what you think about it, once you get it!" Sensei said, as he waved my questions off. "No questions until then!"

Well, if that was how things were going to be.
Somewhat later and still feeling a little like I'd been banished to the little kids' table, I found myself in the produce marketplace with a debate on my hands.

What, exactly, was I supposed to make for dinner?

While admittedly I was a novice cook, I had figured out how to make some of the foods that Hayate and I preferred. This was facilitated by the amount of time I spent in the village, relative to pretty much everyone I knew. I didn't take normal missions, mainly because I had a full-time position exactly where I wanted to be, and that meant I could keep track of everything in the refrigerator with more leeway than anyone I knew except for the housewives. I also had the help of the recipe cards my parents had left behind, as vague as they sometimes were.

…Except for this month.

Since Hayate and I had both been gone for nearly two weeks, I was going to have to throw just about everything out and start over from scratch. Aside from the probably-spoiled food, I'd also have to clean the house just on general principles, because two weeks' worth of dust was probably waiting for me once I got home.

But for at least a little while, I could forget about old noodles and just concentrate on what I wanted to make.

"What do you think would be good, Granny Umeko?" I asked the elderly woman who stood next to me among the seemingly endless tiers of squash.

"I think one of these should do, for you and your brother," was my old neighbor's response. She picked up a green, striped squash from somewhere and handed it to me. "Turn it over, Keisuke-chan."

Granny Umeko wasn't really a grandmother, but she insisted on the title and had since I could remember. For a tiny old woman who managed a vegetable stand, she was a living example of how big things could come in small packages. She'd never been a shinobi, from what I could tell, but I'd seen full-grown shinobi of all ranks treat her with absolute respect and more than a little affection for as long as I'd known her.

Guess it didn't pay to piss off the lady who knew what you ate. Or maybe there was power in being a fixture in the neighborhood for so long that it was slowly becoming a literal description.

I turned the vegetable—or was it technically a fruit?—upside-down and took a look at the big patch that indicated what side it had been growing on. Marring the neat dark-green skin was a bright patch of orange rimmed with yellowish white. If it was anything like a watermelon, this thing was probably ripe. "Why this one?"

"You look like you could do with something warm." Granny Umeko reached over and thumped the pumpkin fondly. "It's also difficult to fail at cooking one. Cut it in half, take the seeds out, roast the rest." She smiled. "And there you have it."

Any vegetable would have to be resilient to survive my fumbling attempts at cooking. Eyeing the pumpkin dubiously, I was still deciding to buy it or not when someone else sidled up next to me.

Granny Umeko turned to the new customer with a smile and said, "Oh, hello, Raidō-kun."

I turned to my right and saw Raidō rubbing the scar across his nose, looking flustered. "Uh, hi." He glanced at me, then looked at the vegetables like a man trying to find any point of familiarity in a foreign land.
I let him focus on his apparent existential crisis for a bit longer, then put the pumpkin down. "Raidō?"

Granny Umeko sat back among her wares with one last conspiratorial look at the two of us, then bustled off. I didn't ask why and never planned on doing so.

Raidō shook his head. "Sorry, what?"

"...I was just gonna ask what you were looking for." I gave him a long, assessing look. While Raidō didn't look like he'd taken a hit to the head recently, I did know that he was the falcon-masked ANBU agent. If he'd been involved in the mission to wipe out ROOT's leadership, he was probably exhausted.

"Oh," Raidō said, and fumbled for a moment for something to say. Then, "I, uh, I'm looking for a way to make pumpkin into something."

"Do you cook?" I asked.

"No," Raidō admitted, and I watched his face heat up with something akin to morbid fascination. He added, by way of explanation, "I'm a takeout guy. I, uh, I'm just trying to make something for once. As an experiment."

If the awkward atmosphere got any thicker, I'd probably be able to cut it with a knife.

"Been there," I told him. Only in my case, Mom's death had been the main reason for me to learn. And it was still very much a work in progress. "So, here."

Raidō jolted a bit when I picked up the pumpkin I had been looking at and shoved it into his hands. "I, uh..."

"I'll admit I don't know anything about pumpkins other than what Granny Umeko told me, but this is the one she was trying to get me to buy," I said. Hm, there wasn't a clock nearby... "Maybe I could help? Though maybe it's not so much 'helping' as 'pooling our collective ignorance'..."

"Do you know what goes well with this?" Raidō asked, while hefting the pumpkin.

"...If I had to guess? Soy sauce and something sweet."

"That's more than I knew." Raidō shrugged, scratching at his scar with his free hand. "Okay. You're hired."

"Hired?" I repeated.

"Or whatever. I'm maybe a bit desperate here." Which did not jive with his earlier airs of nonchalance, but I'd let it slide. Raidō said, "So, uh... get what you need? I'm still deciding, I guess..."

I'd call it taking pity on Raidō, if I wasn't every bit as aware of the tension in the air and almost as affected by it. I gathered up all the vegetables I needed for the next week, and a second pumpkin for experimentation purposes, and paid for everything I was going to work with. I even managed to swing by the spice merchant on our way out of the marketplace, picking up a few items I was sure had spoiled in the last two weeks. Woo, replacements.

Then I sealed everything into what I called my "grocery scroll," because I had absolutely no reason not to use my fūinjutsu skills for everything ever.
Raidō bought his pumpkin separately, still looking lost.

"Do you have a kitchen?" I asked him, once we were ready to go.

"...Not really." Raidō wobbled his free hand in the air. "I have a mobile stove thing."

Hm. "Well, if you want, we can go to my apartment and blow up an actual kitchen. I'm supposed to be making dinner tonight anyway."

Raidō blinked. "That's...okay. Thank you."

I strode on ahead a bit, then paused. "You know, thanking me might be a bit premature."

"Why?" he asked.

I said, "I don't actually know what my brother's been doing since we got back. For all I know, he's got all his friends at our place and we're gonna have to feed a bunch of ravenous teenagers."

Raidō gave me a long look, his expression slightly pinched, before he sighed and said, "I'm pretty sure you are a teenager, Kei-san."

I made a grumbling noise and led the way home.

And when we got there, hopping rooftops because of course we would, it turned out that a certain bandana-wearing someone was already there.

I closed the security seals as soon as we were in, and was in the middle of kicking my sandals off at the threshold when my brother's voice called out, "Sis, are you home?"

"Who else do you think it could be?" I responded, ducking out of the entryway so Raidō could avoid having to stand on one foot or chakra-stick himself to the wall and get his shoes off. I chucked my grocery scroll onto the kitchen counter as I went, and pinged Hayate's chakra with mine just to reassure him.

It had been a rather insensitive question.

Hayate poked his head out of his bedroom and spotted Raidō immediately, so he said, "What's Namiashi-san doing here?"

"Just Raidō, kid," was Raidō's reply. He put the pumpkin he'd been carrying in the kitchen sink, then turned on the water to rinse the dirt off its skin.

"I offered to help him cook something, since I have to cook anyway and we have an actual kitchen." I unrolled my grocery scroll until I found the seal I'd used for my pumpkin, and activated it. One poof of chakra smoke later, and a nearly-identical squash was on the counter.

Hayate padded out on bare feet to join us in the kitchen, tilting his head to one side like a dog hearing a new sound. As soon as he saw the pumpkin, his eyes lit up. "Oh, can I cut it? Can I?"

"You can cut this one." I thumped the side of the one I'd bought. "But we aren't going to be using these things for target practice, little brother. We actually want to eat it."

Hayate still gave an evil laugh. "Yes! Be right back!" And Hayate ran to his room.

Raidō's mouth twisted a bit. "Should I be worried, or...?"
"Only if you're afraid of a kid with a kodachi." I turned my back to the impending chaos and took out a dishrag to scrub some of the clingier dirt off of Raidō's pumpkin. Hm, this thing was heavier than it looked.

I put it on the counter and then rapidly scrubbed the second pumpkin free of dirt. And then I swapped them, just as fast. I felt Raidō's eyes on me, but he had to turn his attention back to my brother's rapid approach after a split second.

A second later, there was a war cry and, immediately, Hayate's kodachi was embedded well into the rind of the pumpkin I'd bought.

"I let him get away with more than Mom ever did," I muttered. Then I reached over and flicked my brother's ear.

"Ow!"

"Four out of ten. You need to get through the whole squash," I reminded him.

"I didn't want to mark the counter," Hayate protested.

"Then don't. Cut exactly enough to get through the squash, and we're good. But since you didn't, you need more training." I levered his kodachi out of the pumpkin and, gathering chakra into my fingertip, carved through the rest of it with a chakra scalpel. Much saner. "And we're going to have to bake this one, now."

Raidō, who had carefully stayed out of the way, was biting down on his lip. I didn't have to look closely to know he was suppressing laughter. He coughed instead. "So, uh, is this normal around here?"

Hayate grinned back, waving his sword in the direction of the two new halves of pumpkin. "Only with squash. Hey, Sis, do you need me to find the recipe cards?"

"Go clean that," I ordered him. "Then get the cards."

"Okay, okay." And Hayate bounced off back toward his room to get his sword-cleaning kit, too.

Raidō shook his head, still holding back laughter. Once he got himself under control, he said, "It's reminding me of the time I watched Team Chōza try to cook. Keyword being 'try,' because I don't think the result still qualified as food."

"Why?" I asked, as I dragged a baking sheet out of some nether-region of the kitchen and washed it off.

"Curry. Gai-kun is a...a fan." Raidō turned his attention back to the pumpkins. "So, what are you doing now?"

"Getting ready to bake this thing." I picked up my grocery scroll and looked through it, then popped a different storage seal open. Once the smoke dispersed, I had a small bottle of cooking oil sitting on the paper. I ended up talking half to myself as I puzzled out what to do with the mélange of ingredients around the house.

Hayate popped back in, dropped off the recipe cards—which had been a box in my room, like a lot of our parents' things, and disappeared again.

I picked up the first one. Simmered pumpkin, and roasted pumpkin. Those would work. "Okay, uh, I think you put oil on the cut halves…and I think we'll need dashi… Raidō? I think we're gonna cut yours up, then…stew it, maybe? What do you think?"

"Hey, I don't have any more idea what I'm doing than you do. I don't have a problem with it." Raidō shrugged, rolled up his sleeves, and got to work.

So with him briefly occupied, I ran around and cleared the rest of the cooking area. Trash went into trash bins, the fridge was cleared out, and basically I did the chores I probably should have before we started cooking. Luckily, we were actually cooking things, so food poisoning probably wasn't on the menu.

And if it was a concern, well, as shinobi we'd all eaten worse things.

Hayate wandered back in at that point, and I said, "Hayate, help me put these things away."

Thanks to the grocery run, we were stocked up on vegetables again, at least. I hadn't gone anywhere for meat, so we were going to have to deal with eating pseudo-vegetarian for one meal.

"Okay, Sis." And somehow, having three people in the kitchen wasn't crowded despite how much we were all moving.

As Hayate finally closed the fridge after finally reorganizing its contents, he piped up with, "So, can I have friends over?"

"I don't ever remember telling you that you couldn't," I said distractedly as I put the split pumpkin in the oven, with a little pile of its seeds and guts to one side of the pan. "How many?"

"…Well, since you have one of your friends over, I was thinking Yūgao and Iruka, mostly."

"Aren't they eating dinner right now?"

Hayate raised a finger to protest, then said, "Point."

"Go ahead and sit down, Hayate." I waved him over toward the table in the living room. "We're almost done."

Though Raidō and I were not experienced cooks, we were both good with knives and blades of all kinds. Compared to actually figuring out what ingredients combined into something tasty, chopping vegetables was easy mode. Sure, chopping the onion darn near made my eyes feel like they were bleeding, but we got it done.

Eventually, the pumpkin chunks ended up stewing on the stove and the pumpkin halves were put in the oven to bake.

While Raidō joined my brother at the table, I started making tea to go with our dinner. Then I got some rice going, since no meal was complete without some kind of grain component.

"So, you were gone for a couple of weeks there," Raidō said, "which was new. How were the Exams?"

"I think there was more excitement outside of the arena than in it," I said. I paused, then dragged the teapot over to the low table and set it down on a mat. Teacups.

"I made it to the final match, but I got poisoned and I guess you can't be declared the winner when they have to drag you off the field." Hayate wrinkled his nose. "Don't get poisoned. It's not worth it."
"There was a bit of drama with the whole Kage meeting," I put in. "The Kazekage didn't know that Sensei and Yahiko-san knew each other."

"Who?" Hayate just looked confused.

"Yahiko-san is one of the three leaders of the new Amegakure government," I explained. "Alongside Nagato-san."

"Ah," said Raidō. "I remember him. Absolutely terrifying in a fight, if I remember right. He volunteered to help clean up the village a few years ago. I didn't realize that he was part of a triumvirate thing."

"Right. And Jiraiya-sama came with him from Ame, as a bodyguard. The Kazekage basically walked into the meeting and then realized he was outnumbered in his own village by S-ranked shinobi." I took a sip of my tea, and said, "So he wasn't happy."

"I bet." Raidō gave the stove a suspicious look, then turned back to his tea. "Sounds like we had the boring end of things."

Bullshit. Raidō's team had been involved in wrecking Danzō's entire organization. The only reason Kakashi, Obito, and I had gone with Sensei to Suna, aside from personal interest, was to get us out of the way. ROOT wouldn't make a move with the entirety of Team Minato in town, or so it seemed.

"Can you tell us anything? We missed a few weeks there," Hayate said. "Konoha isn't that boring."

Raidō scratched his scar, averted his eyes for a second, and then said, "Well, um, I hadn't worked with Shimika-san in a while. So without Kei-san, we had to reshuffle the Hokage Guard for the first time in a while."

Hayate made a face that said, quiet distinctly, that he did not consider this a worthwhile conversation topic.

Raidō was not impressed by that look. "Kid, I can't exactly share mission details with a genin." Particularly since Raidō was, according to his friggin' ANBU file, a designated assassin with a list of kills nearly as long as Kakashi's.

"I got promoted!" my brother replied, finally running the oil cloth down the length of his kodachi. With that, he placed the sword back in its sheath and added, "So I'm a chūnin now. I have a vest to prove it!"

"Huh. And you're what, ten?" Raidō asked.

"I'm thirteen," Hayate replied. He put his kodachi down on the floor next to his leg and asked, "How old were you when you were promoted?"

"I was your age, I think." Raidō nodded toward me. To my brother, he said, "Thing is, I'm twenty-one. I was already a chūnin by the time your sister graduated."

"Pff, old man." I rolled my eyes. I changed the subject with, "So, Raidō, why'd you focus on pumpkins?"

Was it just me, or did Raidō start to blush? "Uh..." He rubbed the back of his neck. "That's..."

He could have just said he liked them, but it was quickly becoming apparent that Raidō was perhaps not the best liar. It didn't really make sense—special jōnin ANBU assassin and all—but there was something about this innocent winter squash that threw him off his game hard enough to bounce. And not bounce back.

After a long pause, Raidō said, "I want to learn how to do this."

Hayate and I exchanged looks.

"What?" was the defensive rejoinder.

Yeah, that'd been a bit overwrought for a "just because" reason. If that was really the answer, he probably wouldn't have been nearly as evasive about it, unless he was somehow afraid of admitting that he had some cooking ability. And that bordered on stupid.

"Are you dating someone?" Hayate asked.

And then we got to watch as Raidō's froze in place and, after a brief delay, his ears and cheekbones turned red. Given the scar, which didn't seem to have the best circulation, the effect would have been interesting even if Hayate's question hadn't revealed something rather important. I didn't hang out with Raidō much, and this universe lacked Facebook and social media, so the idea that he was actually in a relationship—and not an obvious one—was novel.

Raidō covered his face with both hands and mumbled something unintelligible. Still, he nodded.

Hayate looked as though no one had actually said "yes" when he asked that question before, and was at a loss for words.

I just felt the awkwardness in the room dial itself back up to eleven.

"Well, you don't have to talk to us about it," I said, apropos of nothing, once the atmosphere in the room had finally evolved from "awkward" to "secondhand mortification." I took a long sip of my tea and, with my brother, kinda tried to look anywhere but at Raidō until he recovered.

It took a moment, but eventually Raidō mumbled, "I just want to make up for all the dinners I keep missing."

I made a noise of understanding, but didn't press. Hayate was looking up at the ceiling like he was supposed to be inspecting it, but I could guess at what he was thinking. I'd missed a lot of Hayate's childhood thanks to missions, or so it seemed to me.

"Civilian or shinobi?" my brother asked, rather than what I'd expected.

So maybe I was the only one of us who thought of the past so much.

"Shinobi. There's some schedule overlap, but..." Raidō sighed. "Not much."

"Well, maybe—" And whatever I was about to say was cut off by a knock at the door.

Hayate immediately dashed over to answer it.

"Hayate," I growled, "that had better not be who I think it is." But of course, I already knew. Hooray for my chakra sense.

"Sorry, Sis!" Hayate tossed over his shoulder. Then he opened the door. "Come in, guys!"

I heard a rising cacophony of voices—Team Inoichi and Team Makoto—and winced preemptively. Okay, so tonight was definitely an order-in sort of night. Crap.
By the time I looked back to Raidō, preparing to apologize for the ruckus, he'd disappeared. And the kitchen window was open.

I had not thought it was wide enough to let an adult through, but it clearly was. I'd have to re-seal the windows later, then.

I walked over to the window and shut it, then checked on the pumpkins.

Seemed like I was going to have to make a delivery later. I...didn't know where Raidō lived, but I would probably be able to ask around.

Something for tomorrow, then.

I turned back to my brother's gaggle of friends and decided to just concentrate on being a good host, for now.

The next morning, I packed up the entire pot of simmered pumpkin and sealed it into my grocery scroll. While I'd successfully finished the recipe according to Dad's handwritten notes, I couldn't have said if the result had been what Raidō wanted. The kids had liked what little they got to eat—since I was guarding the pumpkin bits for their unknown recipient—and had also said the roasted version was all right.

Still. Going AWOL kind of screwed with the cooking lesson.

So, since I didn't know where Raidō was and didn't feel like waking up the village with my chakra to check for a specific location, I went to Genma's apartment first. I figured that, even if Genma didn't actually know where Raidō was, he'd be able to get the delivery where it needed to go.

And my next shot after that was Gai, who generally knew where Genma was (and would run around until he found him), and so on. Last possible resort was Kakashi, because of the ANBU connection.

But first, Genma's.

Genma lived in an apartment building that bordered the Aburame district. It wasn't upscale, exactly, but the area was well-maintained and had an air of settled-ness that some parts of the village were severely lacking. This neighborhood had never taken the kind of devastating damage that had hit parts of the Uchiha district, or the area around the hospital. In spite of my aversion to kikai insects, it was clear that having Aburame neighbors and their butterfly summon contract here had saved the immediate area from quite a lot of pain.

His actual building had four stories, with spacious studio-type apartments—at least by Konoha standards. While I couldn't see inside the apartment from street level, I could still make out the faintest buzz of security seals.

Like any fūinjutsu specialist, Genma had not skimped on the anti-burglary measures.

I unsealed the pot of pumpkin and carried it up the stairs the old-fashioned way. As I went, I dragged my left index fingertip along the wall, poking at the chakra signatures in the building out of curiosity. At nine in the morning on a Saturday, plenty of the residents were still around. I couldn't sense anything in Genma's apartment past the door, which meant that his seals were about as good as mine.

I'd been kind of waiting for him to take up my suggestions for that particular seal, so it was nice to get some indirect validation.
Okay, apartment three-oh-three. It even had his name on the little mail-slot, which was probably sharpened or otherwise messed with. I'd never been particularly interested in testing his home's defenses on the occasions that I'd been here before.

So, rather than poke too hard at anything, I knocked on the door.

The funny thing about sound-muffling seals, which I could feel in the walls of the apartment, was that they couldn't quite muffle vibrations that traveled through solid objects. So, if someone had punched a wall, I'd still be able to feel it through the frame of the building. There were plenty of places where a sufficiently prepared seal-user would be able to compensate for that and seal off the nearest sections of the building, but an apartment was not one of them.

As it was, I felt a series of thumps that suggested either two people, or one very fast person, rushing around inside the apartment. Since I knew for a fact that Sensei was at home this morning, I kind of doubted that the apartment only had one occupant today.

Too bad Genma's door didn't have a peephole. Deadbolts? Yes. But no peephole. I'd bet that Genma used his hearing to compensate for that.

I knocked again, and this time I said, "Hey, Genma? It's Kei! I'm just dropping something off!"

Another muffled thud. Maybe he needed to invest in carpeting the place? I didn't think my apartment manager would let me get away with that, but maybe the Aburame were more lax about that kind of thing.

There was a resounding thud as something hit the door at speed. I backed off instinctively, startled, and clutched the pot of stew/soup/whatever the heck a little tighter.

And then, finally, Genma opened the door maybe ten centimeters or so. The chain-lock on his door kept it from going any further.

"Didn't expect to see you today," Genma said, looking like he'd not only gotten up on the wrong side of the bed, but that the damn thing had attacked him. His hair was messy and stuck to his head in places thanks to sweat, he was wearing a tank top that looked like it had been through a firefight, and his chakra seemed to be moving sluggishly somehow. It was also the first time I'd ever seen him without a senbon in his mouth.

There was something about his forehead…

"Sorry, was it your day off?" I asked, rather than dwelling on it.

"More like I just got back from a mission," Genma replied. He yawned, rubbing at his eyes. "Was there a reason for this…visit?"

"Yeah, actually." I lifted the pot of pumpkin so he could see its contents through the glass lid. "I was gonna drop this off, so can I come in?"

Genma's eyes lit up. "Simmered pumpkin? You bet!" Before he went to unlock the chain-lock, though, he winced and said, "Just, uh, mind the mess. Sorry."

Using my place as a reference, Genma's really wasn't that bad. Sure, there was a large futon recklessly stuffed into a corner of the room, with the comforter hanging off what I assumed was a coat rack. There was also a noticeable layer of dust coating a bunch of surfaces, but it was consistent with being gone for a while. Combining the wreck the gaggle of genin and chūnin had made of my living room last night with the fact that I hadn't really been able to clean up after my long absence, and Genma's apartment almost seemed homey.

"So, how was Suna?" Genma asked, leaning back against his kitchen unit's counter.

I put the pot on the stove, then shrugged. "Not a lot that I can actually say without getting a warning from the Hokage."

Genma raised an eyebrow. "Seriously?"

I winked.

Genma rolled his eyes. "Quit joking around. I actually do wanna hear what happened. Did that pipsqueak brother of yours pass or not?"

Haha, made him ask. "Well, my brother and a couple of his friends are now chūnin, so you're gonna be seeing more of them. And there was some stuff with the One-Tailed Beast, but that's my problem."

Genma shook his head. "Honestly? I have no idea how you and your team survive some of the crap you get into." Then his eyes slid over to the pumpkin again. "So, what's the occasion?"

"Huh?"

"It's not my birthday, I don't know of anything you did to piss me off recently, and yet it's still pretty close to my favorite food," Genma rattled off, indicating the pumpkin. He crossed his arms and said expectantly, "So, what gives?"

Click went my brain.

Raidō's weird stammer whenever the topic of why he was so interested in pumpkin recipes.

Raidō's admission that he was in a relationship. My brother hadn't asked who the other person was, since we'd been busy being cowed by his spectacular embarrassment over the topic.

The thing about missing dinners, and the issue of overlapping mission schedules.

And I'd finally realized that Genma was wearing a plain headband, instead of the reversed bandanna he generally preferred. Which Raidō did wear. They didn't even look alike!

And, now that I was actually paying attention, I could feel one extra chakra signature even through the generalized dampening effect of the privacy seals.

Oh, for fuck's sake.

With my face heating up—I was so dumb—I mumbled, "Your boyfriend forgot this at my place."

"...What was he..." Genma trailed off for a moment. Then I saw the realization hit him like a hammer. Sighing, he turned toward the bathroom, which held the chakra signature and had remained studiously closed, and said, "Raidō, she knows. You can stop hiding now."

There was a quiet, muffled curse.

"Yeah, I know, but there's pumpkin involved," Genma told him. He rubbed the back of his neck. "My bad."

Another brief curse, and I was pretty sure I heard the word "pants."
"…Yeah, sorry." Genma turned his attention back to me and said, "Sorry, but he's not coming out of there. Wardrobe malfunction."

My brain was connecting another set of dots at that point. I hadn't seen any loose clothing around here, but that didn't mean that there wasn't any. And I was cutting that thought off there. Stars and stones, I didn't need to think about my friends' private lives.

"You know what?" I was still red to the tips of my ears, but at least I hadn't lost control of my voice. While Raidō continued to hide behind the bathroom door, I said, "I'm sorry I made this morning so awkward for you two."

Genma blinked. "…What, that's it?"

"Yep, enjoy your breakfast." But before I had fully exited the premises, I turned on my heel and rattled off, "I'm happy for you both, drop the cookware off whenever, and I'll see you later!"

And then I was out of their hair for a while.

I was at least ten blocks away before I could stop, take a deep breath, and officially mark this morning as the most intensely uncomfortable situation I had ever been in, socially speaking. It was like walking in on Sensei and Kushina, but worse, because I had never suspected the possibility. It was one thing with a couple whose relationship kinda had to happen for Naruto to exist. It was quite another to walk in on two people without even having an inkling that they were a thing.

I facepalmed. What a start to the day.

I headed home after that to clean up.

While my brother had gone someplace in the intervening time—probably the Mission Office—I still had to maintain a pretense of being a responsible human being. That meant actually having organized spaces in the apartment, or at least spaces that did not have significant dust and food layers mixed in on top of what ought to have been clean surfaces.

I emptied trash bins. I dusted everything I could get my hands on. I walked on the ceiling to wipe down the lights. I opened all the windows and cleaned the bathroom with bleach, though it stank horribly. I scrubbed every pot and pan in the house and set them on racks to dry. I went on a cleaning spree fueled as much by hatred of icky sensations as it was by embarrassment-derived adrenaline.

Regardless of my motivations, the apartment was spotless by the end.

Which was why, at the end of it all, I was surprised to find a thick manila folder on the kotatsu in the center of the living room.

The Paperwork Fairy—otherwise known as the Hokage—had clearly stopped by. I didn't sense any seal-work other than the usual, so it kinda had to be him.

On top of the file, in scratchy handwriting, was a little note on pink paper. It read, Eyes only, Kei! Burn the entire thing after reading it. Or perform a controlled explosion. I don't care which.

Sensei had such a way with words.

I crumpled the note and tossed it into the kitchen wastebasket, then sat down on the floor. I stuck my legs under the kotatsu's blanket and opened the file, slowly.
The apparent title for the entire file was, ROOT FACTION: DESTRUCTION COMPLETE.

And right below that, in Kushina's handwriting, was another note. It said, Now what?

Given the seventy pages of reading I was going to have to do, based on the file's thickness, I imagined the answer was something along the lines of "Let me get back to you on this."

Well, no time like the present. I activated the apartment's security seals—sans the one that Hayate could bypass via the front door—and started reading.

Chapter End Notes

Song title courtesy of Elvis Presley.

This chapter takes place in February, in-universe. Happy Turkey Day, for those who care out-of-universe.
It turned out that Sensei had not been merciful. Whether because of the screw-up with Baki, or just by mistake, the file on the table contained multiple storage seals. The first seal, which just said “box” in the middle, coughed up a cardboard box full of manila folders that dated as far back as the Second Shinobi World War. After seeing the first one, I didn’t even want to look at the rest of the files.

What the fuck, Sensei.

The horrifying part, once I got started reading headings instead of just sitting there and screaming internally, was that there were hundreds of individual files. Each one was thin—barely four pages in some cases—but I’d see code names and clan jutsu and all sorts of little details that set off enough red flags to decorate Tiananmen Square.

I was seeing names. I was seeing codenames like “Sai” and “Shin” used for half a dozen different kids each. I saw a record of Tenzō’s recovery from a busted lab someplace, talking about his height and weight at age five—below average, below average, insufficient—and a file talking about how Nonō Yakushi’s orphanage could be useful to the cause.

And the more I read, the sicker I felt.

Nonō, in her active role as Nanigashi, must have dissected dozens of people. Former ROOT operatives, lost ANBU units, enemy corpses—there was no way to be sure, between all the medic-babble, who any of these people had been. Once they went under the knife, they weren’t people. They weren’t even corpses. They were assets.

She’d been allowed to retire, as a special exception for her years of work. Danzō had planned on rescinding on that deal, through Kabuto. Kabuto, the agent named out of hand by some random orphan kid, trained to kill on command and to infiltrate every village on the continent. Whatever had been there before, it had been hollowed out until Kabuto’s identity was just a mask he could slip on or off, making it easy for him to end up anywhere.

And then Sensei had derailed that. Shimura’s assets had been frozen, his agents detained or killed, and eventually it had all led to his death to complete the picture.

It was…a pretty depressing way to spend the rest of the morning, actually. I felt my mood drop steadily the longer I read, wondering how to help anyone affected by the old spider’s web.

At around noon, someone knocked at my front door.

Without opening the door, I could already tell that it was Genma. My apartment didn’t have the same kind of chakra-sense dampening effect that his did.
Getting up, I stretched and glanced at the nearest clock before going anywhere.

_Noon already?_ Well, the morning was officially done.

I packed up all the paperwork and crammed things back into their seals before I went to go get the door. Senior shinobi or not, Genma hadn’t been the one asked to look over those files for Sensei. I stuck the remaining monster of a manila folder under the kotatsu for good measure.

Then I answered the door.

Apparently, three hours had given Genma time to get dressed, figure out which headband was actually his, and get the formerly-filled pot back to me.

“Can I talk to you, Kei-san?” Genma asked, even as he offered the giant soup-pot-thing back to me.

“You already are, but sure.” Stepping back from the door, I waved him inside. “Come in. The seals won’t fry you if I opened the door from the inside.”

“That’s reassuring,” Genma muttered, but he followed me in. Without any further prompt from me, he sat down at the kotatsu and slid his legs underneath the blanket, then folded his arms on the tabletop.

I got the tea kettle going, then started sorting through tea varieties. We had matcha, but it seemed pompous anywhere but in a tea ceremony (which I couldn’t remember how to perform), and then there were a couple of varieties of black tea…

“So…” Genma began.

“What kind of tea do you want?” I asked over my shoulder.

Genma groaned, letting his head fall into his folded arms. “Please forget about the tea. This conversation can happen without you having to act like a hostess.”

I nudged the kettle off the burner, then joined him at the table. I propped my head up on the heel of my hand, with my elbow on the table, and said, “I already apologized for this morning, Genma.”

“You did.” He lifted his head. “But here we are, having this conversation.”

I raised one eyebrow. “…Okay.”

“That reaction, right there, is what’s throwing me off.” Genma sat up and said, “I honestly can’t tell what you’re thinking right now.”

“The main thing I’m thinking is ‘why are we talking right now?’” I told him. “I apologized about ruining your morning. Was the pumpkin horrible or something?”

Genma was developing a tic under his left eye.

I stopped, reading his chakra and his expression carefully. Well, that hadn’t been the right thing to say. “Genma, is this about the fact that you’re with Raidō?”

“Yes.” And that was about the most frustrated I’d ever heard him.

“Are you happy?” I asked him. “Like, are both of you happy with things and talking about important stuff, and no one’s getting hurt?”
Genma blinked. “…Yes?”

“Then it’s okay.”

“That’s it?” Genma’s senbon twitched. “After what happened this morning?”

“Walking in on you two was probably the most embarrassing thing I’ve ever done, but… yeah.” I tilted my head to one side. Given how worked up Genma was—for him, anyway—I could guess where this was going. “I guess you were expecting something more extreme.”

“I might have talked Raidō down from the idea that you’d shout the whole thing from the rooftops and make his neighbors hate him,” Genma said dryly. “I kind of expected more, given the running away thing.”

“Why would his neighbors hate him?” And as soon as I said it, I realized it was a stupid question. I immediately smacked myself in the forehead and said, “No, no, just hang on. I clearly forgot to turn my brain on this morning.”

“That makes two of us,” Genma remarked. Apparently for lack of anything better to say, he went with, “The pumpkin thing was good, though.”

“Thanks. It was Dad’s recipe.” I stared at the tabletop for a moment, then said, “Genma, what did you need to talk to me about, really?” I looked up. “If it’s really about Raidō and you, I don’t really have anything important to say. If you’re happy, then what I say doesn’t matter at all.”

To my surprise, Genma gave a short, low laugh. “Honestly? Just that.”

“…Then wasn’t this whole thing pretty overblown?” I asked him.

“Maybe a little.” Genma slumped over again. His chakra was still agitated, but he was slowly calming down. “You have no idea what a relief this is.”

No, I didn’t. I wasn’t sure I could. But since this was messing with Raidō and Genma, I sympathized anyway. “Are you gonna be all right?”

“Yeah,” Genma mumbled. He drew his arms up, so his head was resting on his forearms. I could see his expression shift into a half-smile after a moment, and he said, “Did this morning strike you as actually pretty funny, in hindsight? If you ignored the terror part.”

“It was like something out of a romance novel,” I agreed. “The silly ones.”

“…Wait, you read romance novels with…” and here, he made a hand gesture that left very little to the imagination.

“Jiraiya is my sensei’s sensei,” I said, feeling myself start to blush again. “It’s an… uh, it’s an occupational hazard.”

“I’ll bet.” But he was smiling! Yay, the awkwardness of the morning was officially over!

“So…” I began, “Can I ask you how long you two have been together?”

“You just did. But I’ll let you,” Genma said. He looked up at the ceiling as he thought, then said, “Eight months, now. We got together after my birthday.”

“So you were already together during Tanabata?” Damn, I’d certainly missed a hell of a lot of cues. Granted, I didn’t generally hang out with Genma at the same time as Raidō, and… actually, I almost never spent time with Raidō outside of work hours. Whoops.

At least I knew both of them. It was somehow less weird than, oh, meeting a new cousin’s significant other? And then discovering that I hated them. Not that I knew any of my cousins in this lifetime.

“Yeah,” Genma said.

“I can’t believe you managed to keep things secret for that long.” Not like they lacked for motivation to hide things, I supposed, but wow. Didn’t people generally figure this kind of thing out quickly? Not including me, at any rate.

“I think that a couple people already know,” Genma corrected me. “But no one’s said anything, so Raidō can keep his illusions.”

“Who would already know?” I asked.

“Your teammate Kakashi, for starters,” Genma told me.

Kakashi? Well, now that I thought of it, he had a sense of smell better than an Inuzuka’s and he was one of Raidō’s ANBU teammates. Add in his functional brain and the opportunity to actually interact with Raidō… Yeah, I could see that. Points to him for not letting anything slip, though I didn’t know what he actually thought about all this. And it almost seemed too personal to ask him.

As for Genma, well, he had showed up at my house. This conversation wasn’t going to reach anyone else’s ears before I got an affirmative from Genma and Raidō. But as long as he was here… Curiosity burned, so of course I gave in. “Can…can I ask how you two got together?”

“That is…kind of a funny story.” Genma glanced at the clock on the wall. “Which is too long. Short version: I asked him out.”

“…Yes, that’s how many relationships start,” I said dryly.

“Marginally longer version, then: He complimented my ass by accident, and then I complimented his on purpose.” Genma waved his hands as though to say, “Ta-dah.”

I wasn’t sure why I was still asking him anything. Curiosity met sarcasm and smashed itself to pieces like a car against a tree.

Genma happened to turn his head, then, and I caught a glimpse of something I hadn’t noticed before. Right behind his ear…

“Is that a hickey?” I asked, before I could think better of it.

“Huh?” Almost instinctively, he raised his hand to the side of his neck and covered it. “Oh, yep.” A fond smile crept onto his face. “Raidō was covered in ‘em, too. That’s why he didn’t…” And then he trailed off.

I was blushing to the tips of my ears.

“…Fuck. Please don’t tell anyone I told you that.” Genma finally actually blushed. Just a little. “I keep forgetting you’re fifteen. You don’t ever act like it.”

Maybe that’s because I’m not a kid at all? “I’m not even sure what it’d mean to act my age in this context.”
“…I don’t really know, either. I guess I expected more screaming.” Genma shrugged.

I wasn’t sure if he meant a poor reaction derived from a conservative society, or something closer to Sakura’s nosebleed-spree reaction to the guy-on-guy edition of the Sexy Jutsu. I was pretty sure that it’d been intended as a gag showing that Sakura had a functional sex drive, same as the guys who fell for the Sexy Jutsu, but the entire idea was just designed for cheap laughs or something.

And wow, I was never going to ask about who was on top. Or think about asking. Ever again.

If the thought had had a physical form, I needed to drag it out behind the figurative shed and shoot it.

“I think you may be making a bigger deal out of this than it actually is. At least, with me. I can’t speak for other people in this town.” I sat back and tried to see Genma’s point of view on this, since I’d been all too blind recently.

Different groups in Konoha tended to react differently to things outside the norm. While shinobi often preferred the most practical approach to issues like love, because we never really knew which mission was gonna kill us, it wasn’t always so clear-cut to civilians. And while shinobi were revered as the honorable protectors of Konoha as a whole, it didn’t really change the fact that we were actually just a really prominent minority. Unlike in some villages, Konoha’s civilian population dwarfed its fighting population.

I tended to use the village’s treatment of the old timeline’s Naruto as a baseline for how they reacted to things they couldn’t understand. More often than not, I was proven right. There were parts of the village where a sort of mob collective ruled, and those were the kinds of places where people wouldn’t meet my eye after I went public as a jinchūriki. I tended to look at it as a matter of fear, but hate was a significant component for some specific individuals.

Shinobi wouldn’t say anything, because a lot of us had pretty miserable times in our lives where having someone to love was our lifeline. Most of us knew better than to lash out at someone else for who they happened to find happiness with. There were exceptions—exceptions to everything—but that was the general attitude.

Civilians didn’t know better. They didn’t know a lot of things related to a lifestyle that demanded life-risking and life-losing in equal measure, sometimes. And some of them chose to express that ignorance in a way that was blatantly, incredibly unhelpful. There would be unfriendly eyes everywhere.

“What do you want me to do?” I asked Genma. Frankly, none of my musings meant anything in the face of reality. If he wanted me to do anything with regards to avoiding trouble, I’d help.

“For Raidō’s sake, please don’t say anything.” Genma was frowning again, and crossed his arms over his chest. “It was a bit of an assumption on my part, about the whole freak-out thing. Guess I thought…well, I don’t know what I thought. But all of my friends are shinobi and I pay rent to the Aburame clan. I don’t have to give a shit about other people’s opinions if I don’t want to.” Genma’s senbon twitched as he set his jaw. “But Raidō is…well, you know. He lives in a civilian building. And given what he does for a living, he can’t really afford anyone to pay too much attention to him.”

Meaning, basically, that if any infiltrators ever had suspicions about Raidō randomly disappearing in order to fulfill his ANBU duties, they’d get a bunch of free witnesses thanks to the power of gossipy neighbors. The whole point of ANBU was that its members were anonymous enough that no one would ever be able to pin their actions on a single member. ANBU was, for Konoha, the ultimate knife in the dark. If you saw an agent, it was one we wanted you to see.
Insert even more self-congratulatory hype as needed, basically.

So I said, “I won’t tell anyone, Genma.”

“Thank you.” Genma shifted in his seat, looking away from me. “You know. For being understanding, and for helping Raidō yesterday.”

“No problem.” With that, I got up and headed to the kitchen again.

At the same time, Genma got to his feet and started for the door.

“Genma, hang on a second.” After a bit of scrambling around, I found what I was looking for and sent it spinning across the apartment at Genma’s head. “Here, take the card.”

He caught it out of the air, then peered at it. “Uh—the simmered pumpkin recipe?”

“Yeah. I think you’re gonna get more use out of it than I will.” I grinned. “Right?”

“Heh. I think I will.” Genma left with one last wave and a, “Thanks again, Kei-san.”

For a couple of minutes after he left, I basked in the warm glow of having actually done a good deed for the day. Or week. Hopefully, once Genma got back to Raidō about things, the guy would have a chance to calm down from his near-heart attack. Then they could go back to being happy.

I made myself some tea, then…well.

Then it was back to reading ROOT reports.

There went the good feeling.

I sighed and got back to work.

By two in the afternoon, I had something like an idea for a possible suggestion. Kushina’s note had asked for a potential course of action.

I didn’t really have that.

What I had were suppositions, based on both personal experience and what I knew about ROOT in both realities through manga and through hearsay. I hadn’t been involved in the investigation proper, except as a catalyst, and thus I couldn’t accurately gauge how many dominos were going to be toppled. I could draw from knowledge of old political scandals that had never touched me, and I could do my best to advise Sensei on what he should do next.

The decision wasn’t going to be in my hands.

Nonetheless, I boxed up all of the files and the seals, got dressed in my special jōnin blues, and then headed to the Hokage’s office anyway.

I caught Sensei in his office with two of his shadow clones, while he was busy making a dent into the mountains of paperwork that Tsunade had left behind for him.

“Did anything get finished while we were out of town?” I asked as I walked in, carrying the file I’d been given earlier. I hadn’t sealed it into a more convenient shape—ergo, flat as a tattoo—because stacking storage seals tended to lead to spontaneously-generated wormholes.

I closed the door behind me to prevent any loose paper from escaping. None of the Hokage Guard seemed to be on duty today, which was odd, but it was just as likely that Sensei had shooed away whoever was on the clock. He didn’t often need protection, so we were more likely to allow it than the Third Hokage’s guards were.

“I don’t think so!” said one of Sensei’s clones. At least, I assumed the one on the left was a clone. Technically, the real Sensei didn’t have to be the one behind the desk. It was just what generally happened.

I had learned, sort of through happenstance, how Sensei managed to keep insane hours in the Hokage office while also being a dad and whatever else he got up to in the time he had left.

I didn’t know what exact thing had prompted the incident, but about a month and a half ago, Tsunade had stormed into Sensei’s office a little past midnight and thrown a file folder at him. I’d caught the bulk of it, what with ninja reflexes being a thing, but two sheets of paper had smacked Sensei in the face. Lightly—it was still paper, even when thrown by Tsunade of the friggin’ Sannin—but there was definite contact.

And then he’d exploded into smoke.

There had a brief moment of confusion before Sensei had teleported into the office, still wearing his pajamas. Explanations had ensued, and Tsunade had left the office with a new appreciation for the Shadow Clone technique.

Effectively, Sensei had a thirty-six hour workday. Any time he had to take care of duties outside of his Hokage capacity, he left a clone in the office and went to do whatever he had to. Often, that meant there was a clone doing paperwork while Sensei went home and caught up on sleep. Given that he could teleport to any of his Flying Thunder God seals, it was easier than one would think to maintain this kind of bizarre double life.

Chakra-intensive as hell, and not great in terms of mental strain, but it was doable. I supposed it was a bit like being a firefighter or something—always on-call, but not always on-site.

Sensei apparently had some very weird dreams when the clone ended up dispersing before he woke up.

But in the middle of the day, Sensei wasn’t shy about employing his Shadow Clones out in the open. Particularly when there was so much work to do.

“I skimmed the files you gave me, Sensei,” I said, hefting the file for emphasis. “And I’m here to give a preliminary…opinion, I think? Unless that isn’t what you wanted.”

“No, no,” said the Sensei at the desk. “I want to hear your report. Just give me a second to…” Sensei brought his hand down next to the stamp pad and the whole room glowed orange with active security seals.

The Shadow Clones both dismissed themselves.

“All right, so…” I had rehearsed a spiel of sorts, and yet when confronted by the idea of actually saying it, any polish wore right off. I found myself going back to basics, going over what Sensei already knew, and felt like a high schooler giving a verbal book report. “I wasn’t able to read everything, but it’s clear enough that Shimura had a tendency of grabbing kids from across the Land of Fire. Few were ever reported missing, so I guess they were orphans like Tenzō.” Say what you would about the data-rich world I’d come from—at least there’d be a record of most people’s existence, somewhere. “I don’t know if he picked up the habit from Orochimaru, or if…if Orochimaru’s experiments always featured kids given to him by ROOT. There’s no way to tell anymore. But we know that Danzō was working with that reptilian bastard, which would be enough to condemn him if he was alive to stand trial.”

Sensei made a “go on” gesture.

“Right. So, about what we should actually do with the data and the ROOT agents… I guess Homura and Koharu are telling you to bury it?” I paused, then hedged, “If they know about the bust.”

“Mitosado and Utatane are no longer a part of the equation,” Sensei said flatly. Meaning that they had been, but got punted out of the ROOT business after Sensei lost patience with them.

“In the future universe,” I began carefully, “Danzō’s manipulations eventually came out. I’d rather explain the details in writing, later, but the backlash from ROOT’s outing seemed to be effectively ignored, given what happened after that. Between the attack on the Five Kage summit, and the stuff with Akatsuki…Well. Uh, Tobi declared war on the entire world under the name ‘Madara Uchiha,’ so I get why people didn’t seem to care much after that.”

“But thanks to you, we don’t have a Tobi to worry about,” Sensei reminded me, with a nod. “However, the issue of ROOT and Danzō Shimura remain, even after neutralizing both.”

“Yeah. I…” I found myself twisting a lock of hair between my fingers, then stopped. “I think you need to meet with the heads of the clans.”

“Oh?” Sensei’s tone was mild.

“Shimura and the other two members of the Council seem to want to crush the clans into line with the village. No matter what it does to them,” I said, thinking of the Uchiha clan. I was ninety percent sure that their planned coup had been inspired by more than random dickery and arrogance. “I…I guess that’s a good reason to bring the clans in closer. The right way.”

“The right way?” Sensei prompted.

“Every clan in Konoha’s lost a kid or two to ROOT. I can’t say if they were forced to give them up, on pain of some kind of political sanction…” I frowned. I thought back to what I’d read—barely—and said, “Everyone except the Uchiha clan. Which might explain their shrinking influence somewhat… Sensei, I think we need to get these grievances out in the open, otherwise it’s like we’ve all been poisoned and we’re just…waiting for it to get better. That’s stupid. It lets a dead man set the terms the village has to live by.”

It explained why there was only a record of one pair of Sharingan, total, among ROOT’s files. They had to have been Honoka’s. The clan wouldn’t have given up any of their kids, but that didn’t mean that Shimura hadn’t had ways around that. Given that Honoka’s death, while in full ANBU uniform, would never be fully explained to the clan due to village policy…

It felt like I tripped over more bullshit from that old bastard every time I turned around. I wasn’t even the one directly involved in the investigation, though I knew I had eyes on me as much as any other member of my team. If not more, given the whole jinchūriki thing.

I said, “It’s important to control the flow of information, now. Covering things up works, but when it comes out there’s going to be an explosion and we can’t know what form it’ll take or how devastating it will be. If we get the testimony of clan heads, if we can get them on-side…maybe there won’t be a reason for a cover-up, at least on our end. We can push the angle that Danzō was solely responsible for everything, and that our faction—whatever we’re calling ourselves—were the ones to nail him to the wall for it.” I shrugged one shoulder. “I can’t tell you if it’d be harder or easier if he was alive to scream at, but we’ve got a corpse to work with. And a corpse can’t defend itself.”

Sensei made a vague noise of acknowledgement. He had his hands clasped in front of his face and was staring off into the middle distance as he thought.

I didn’t know who else he’d talked to before I wandered into his office. I didn’t know what variables he was considering.

All he said was, “Thank you for your report, Kei.”

Just this once, I crossed my arms and waited.

Sensei’s eyes refocused on me after another moment or two, and he straightened in his chair. “Yes?”

“Do I get any hints about what you’re actually going to do with that information?” I asked. I’d gotten used to being kept out of the loop whenever Sensei put his figurative politician hat on, but it was still annoying sometimes.

“Not until I actually decide, Kei,” Sensei replied, smiling innocently.

I gave up. “Did you need me for anything else, Sensei?”

“Hm… Actually, yes.” Sensei’s smile expanded into a grin that wouldn’t have looked out of place on his son in the alternate future. Oh, crap. “Please go home and prepare for our spar at noon tomorrow. I’ll be disappointed if you hold anything back.”

Double crap. I’d actually forgotten about that for a while, given the stuff that had happened this morning.

“Understood, Sensei,” I said, bowing.

Sensei was still grinning. “It’ll be interesting to see how strong you’ve become, won’t it?”

It would be. It would also probably be a painful experience.

Isobu? I think we’re gonna have to strategize.

Yes, I think we will.

Sensei’s voice stopped me, right before I was going to turn to leave. “Oh, and Kei?”

“Yeah, Sensei?” I asked, surprised. What did he want now?

“Why do you always refer to the contents of your visions in past tense?” he asked.

He’d actually noticed that? “Mainly? As far as I’m concerned, that story’s over and done with. We’re making a better one, here and now.” Careful, careful. Still shading the truth, there.

I dumped the file I’d been holding on the corner of Sensei’s desk. Then I headed out of the office and went for the external stairs.

I left the Administration Center and started heading to the market. I needed to buy sealing supplies, meat, and probably get something for a late lunch. It was becoming very rapidly clear that I was not necessarily going to be able to do any of that, though.

“Kei, you’re late!” Rin ran up to me, looking like I’d done something stupid recently. “Where have you been?”

“…At home, then in there.” I said, jerking my thumb back over my shoulder to point to the Hokage’s office window. Rin really didn’t need to know precisely what I’d done today. “Did I miss something important?”

Rin huffed. “Honestly, Kei! I can’t believe you right now. We were supposed to meet up today with Kurenai and the other kunoichi.”

Ohhh, right. The support group thing that Kushina was running. The one with the Uchiha matriarch. That one.

“Is it already over?” I asked weakly. Dammit, I’d entirely forgotten. Between the pumpkin incident and Sensei dumping a load of top secret files on my table, I hadn’t had any time to think about it. I had forgotten to ask when the next meeting was supposed to be, but I knew it was supposed to be a Saturday so Itachi could attend. I just hadn’t realized that it was this Saturday.

“No, but Kushina-san sent me to find you.” Rin put her hands on her hips. “So are you coming along or not?”

On one hand, I was pretty much guaranteed to get the ever-living shit kicked out of me tomorrow if I didn’t prepare to fight Sensei with everything I had.

On the other…well, I was probably gonna get wailed on regardless of what I did.

When Rin turned to leave, I jogged to catch up. I asked, “Is everyone already there?”

“Pretty much. Except you and me.” Rin held out her hand. “Come on, Kei! Kurenai-chan said she had something for you.”

“Well, okay.” I was just gonna have to leave early. But that didn’t mean I couldn’t show up at all. “Lead the way, Rin.”

Rin led me to the Hokage residence, which was ordinarily Tsunade’s place. Hiruzen Sarutobi had never lived here, preferring the Sarutobi clan holdings, but Tsunade had knocked down a wall and built a room and made her grandfather and granduncle’s former place into her own. When she wasn’t in the hospital or out drinking, she lived here.

Tenzō had moved in at some point during the ROOT investigation, but I hadn’t asked for further details than that. Just like that, though, there were more people living in the Hokage residence than there had been since the Second Hokage.

On this particular Saturday, there were a lot of kids. They were mostly concentrated in the yard and the room that opened into it, along with all the food, but I was still immediately concerned about tripping over any of them.

Mikoto Uchiha had brought both of her sons, and Tsume Inuzuka had brought both Hana and the toddler Kiba. Then there was Himawari Hyūga, with her little daughter Hinata. Then Kushina and Naruto. And then all three of the Ino-Shika-Chō kids, plus Rin and Kurenai. Almost everyone was snacking on something, though Mikoto and Kushina were also manning an open-air grill.

“Well,” I said, since I couldn’t come up with anything better. “I guess I’m late?”
Rin smacked my shoulder. “Yes, you are!”

“Hey, hey, I was busy!” I protested, even as Rin herded me over toward Kurenai. I ended up sitting down next to the resident non-clan genjutsu expert, had a plate full of grilled meat shoved into my hands by the Akimichi mother, and got to be rather nonplussed about the whole thing.

“What have you been, Keisuke-chan?” Kurenai asked, even as she handed me a spare set of chopsticks.

“I was at the Administration building. Sen—the Hokage wanted me to review a bunch of stuff.” I glanced over toward Kushina, who hadn’t looked up when I arrived. Then something on the grill caught fire and I understood why.

“Huh. Did you finish?” Kurenai asked, as Sasuke wandered over.

The toddler then proceeded to steal a bit of sliced pork from her plate and stuff it in his mouth.

“Hey, Mikoto-sama, are you feeding him enough?” I asked loudly, as Sasuke gnawed industriously on his prize.

Kurenai was too busy giggling to offer any resistance to little Sasuke’s next great heist. Another slice of meat disappeared.

“Itachi, your brother…” Mikoto said, offhandedly.

Itachi appeared from somewhere in the throng of younger kids and picked up his younger brother, chiding him in a high-pitched voice. “Sasuke, no!”

Sasuke ignored him, inasmuch as he could, and started chewing on Itachi’s arm.

The result was loud enough that it took me a moment to realize that Naruto had stolen my food.

I let him.

“So, what are you doing tomorrow?” Kurenai asked, as Itachi struggled to control two toddlers.

I opted for honesty. “I’m going to get the crap beaten out of me.”

“…Why?” Rin asked, since Kurenai reacted to my dramatic revelation with nonplussed silence. She hadn’t hung out with me enough to know that the best response was sarcasm, or to keep asking to cut through the inevitable layer of bullshit.

“Sen—the Hokage and I talked about going all-out in a spar while we were still in Suna,” I explained, setting my plate down and picking up Naruto with my now-free hands. Once I had him settled him on my lap, I went on, “So, he brings everything he has, and I try to do the same. And I’m pretty sure I’m gonna lose.”

Sensei’s standby might’ve been the old teleport-stab combo, but that was far from the only tactic he could use, or the only jutsu. Aside from variations on the Rasengan, Sensei knew how to manipulate Shadow Clones and related techniques like a master. Which he was. And aside from that, Sensei had Lightning and Fire Release jutsu—a survival skill, with Obito and Kakashi on the team—and Sage training with enough experience and power to compete with Jiraiya despite the age difference. He wasn’t Hashirama Senju, sure—no true macro-scale jutsu were just gonna pop out of nowhere—but he was a better thinker and had more tactical flexibility at (insane) speed.
By contrast, I had Isobu. And while I got strength, speed, and stamina from our partnership, I still didn’t know how Isobu’s unique Tailed Beast abilities worked or how to use them. I preferred the Rasengan to the Tailed Beast Bomb, since I didn’t know how to transform that far without killing myself, and I had a plan for option one. I could pull water right out of the air to use as ammunition for Water jutsu if I needed to, while Sensei specialized in non-physical jutsu that had higher chakra costs than mine if there were any water sources to draw from.

But there was very little, in terms of mere speed boosts, which would compare to outright teleportation. I knew that Sensei wasn’t outright immune to genjutsu or, say, getting stabbed, but nothing I could do would matter if I couldn’t hit him.

If I was going to win—or lose with some dignity intact—then I needed to find a way to make him take a hit like the tank Sage Mode made him rather than just dodging. And I wasn’t sure how to do that, yet.

Kurenai squeezed my shoulder sympathetically. “I’m sorry. Um, well, I can put ten ryō down on you, if it makes you feel better?”

“Wait, wait, what?” Tsume Inuzuka interrupted, carrying Kiba under her arm like an errant pup, with Kuromaru trailing behind her. “Who’s betting? Who’s fighting?”

“Kurenai-chan is betting that Kei will win her fight with Hokage-sama,” Rin responded dutifully, but she winked at me.

Oh, damn.

“The Hokage won’t lose to his student, no matter how strong she is,” Tsume scoffed. “Fifty ryō on Minato.”

“Are we betting on my husband?” Kushina called out loudly. “If so, for what?”

Double damn.

“We’re not betting on anything,” I responded, but by then Tsunade had poked her head into the room. She must have been drinking in the other room or something, because I hadn’t seen her when I’d come in.

The thing with Tsunade and gambling was kinda self-explanatory at this point. She had a reputation for taking every sucker’s bet on the face of the continent and blowing through her inheritance money the same way. Given that she was the only living Senju, or at least she had been, this had mainly been a problem for Shizune to sort out. The Senju clan had been rolling in cash by the end of the Clan Wars, thanks to the god-shinobi they had leading from the front.

Between coming back to Konoha (and having her outstanding debts paid off) and kinda-adopting Tenzō, Tsunade had been cutting back. Shizune hadn’t had to go retrieve her sorta-aunt from a real dive in ages.

Just from looking at her face, I was somehow getting the impression that when Tsunade fell off of that wagon, the results would be of the kind best viewed through a telescope.

“You’re betting…without me.” Tsunade’s voice promised bad things.

I didn’t say anything. It didn’t pay to say something dumb to someone with super strength and an apparent hangover. At least she did her drinking at home nowadays.
Himawari Hyūga chose that moment to drift into the conversation, every bit as serene as the Uchiha matriarch. The two of them flanked Tsunade, who glared blearily at them.

“I think we need to get a proper pool started, don’t you, Himawari-san?” Mikoto Uchiha said in a mild voice.

Himawari nodded, smiling placidly. “Hm, yes. Kurenai-chan, could you please fetch some paper and a brush? This needs to be recorded.”

It was a fucking conspiracy and I was pretty sure that Tsunade and I were the only ones not in on it somehow. The astounding thing was that the conspiracy in question was barely a minute old and suddenly had ten participants.

In short order, a scroll was produced and I had a calligraphy brush in my hand somehow. Before I knew it, I was recording bets for basically every clan mother in Konoha, watching in a sort of detached horror as the numbers crept steadily upward. While hundreds of ryō ended up in Kushina’s hands—it was her husband and her husband’s student—I felt like I’d been shoved into the passenger seat in my own life for a few moments.

Maybe…I shouldn’t have mentioned this? Like, at all?

“Aaaaaand…done!” Kushina grinned as she looked over the list of names. “Oh, I bet we can get more people in on this, but I’m not sure we should! This is more fun than the Chūnin Exams.”

Himawari patted my shoulder while I sat frozen in the wake of it all. “I’m rooting for you, Keisuke-chan. Do your best!”

I could feel my face heating up as I read the list of names and bet amounts. It…it was about even, weirdly. These women had more faith in me than I did.

(Itachi had refrained from betting. He liked his allowance where it was.)

Rin’s name was on Sensei’s side of things, though, so I mustered what theatrical offense I could and said, “Really, Rin?”

“Sorry, Kei, but it is the Hokage.” Rin shrugged, unabashed.

“Well, I’m on your side,” said Kurenai. “You can do this!”

“…I’m not sure whether to be honored by your faith in me or run away to live in the hills or something,” I admitted, looking at the floor.

“Hah! With an attitude like that, there’s no way she’s gonna win,” Tsume said, sitting back and exchanging high-fives with Yoshino Nara. “Minato’s got this in the bag.”

“I wouldn’t be too sure of that, Tsume-san,” Mikoto said sweetly. “It doesn’t pay to underestimate someone with her power, you know.”

Oh, boy. I read the names again.

Tsunade had refrained from betting openly, citing privacy concerns—meaning that nobody would bet on the same side as her—but that still left a lot of money on the board.

“At least get her teammates on board with this,” Himawari said to Kushina. “I’m sure they would be interested in seeing who would win.”
I got to my feet, nudging Naruto toward his Auntie Mikoto. “I’m sorry, everyone, but I need to go home and prepare for the match if I’m gonna win. I… I guess I can’t control who you decide to share this with, but you’ll have to ask Sensei if this is gonna be a public spectacle.”

And then I ran away. To prepare, of course.

Not because I’d been embarrassed all too many times today.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title is from the Undertale OST.

Also, who do you think will win?
Kei

It rained overnight.

As I walked out onto the flat, brownish plateau of Training Ground Four, I curled my fingers around the katana at my left hip. Rain was a good sign—it meant that I’d have something to work with for my Water jutsu—but I could still feel my body shake thanks to nervousness.

Training Ground Four was about as far out of Konoha as was possible, while still counting as our territory. Nobody lived in the area, because the landscape was dull and barren, which meant it was one of the few places where S-class shinobi could train safely. A long time ago, Hashirama Senju had deliberately left this place bare when constructing Konoha, claiming that there had to be someplace to use all of the really destructive clan techniques.

It probably spoke more about the shinobi in his generation than anything. If I’d been in Konoha at the same time as Tobirama Senju and Madara Uchiha, I probably would have felt safer if I knew there was someplace where they could murderize each other without involving bystanders, too.

But today, Training Ground Four was going to be occupied.

There was already a bit of a crowd—mostly various clan representatives, some jōnin and special jōnin from across the village. Hayate, Anko, and Yūgao were with their teams, but stood out because of their flak jackets. I could also see both of Iruka’s parents, Kushina, Rin, Yamaguchi-sensei, and both Raidō and Genma hanging out in different parts of the crowd. Even as I watched, the crowd just kept getting bigger.

I spotted my main headaches right in the middle of the only rock-free zone in immediate view. Sensei and Jiraiya, waiting.

"Kei-kun, nice of you to join us!" Jiraiya called out, waving.

I headed over to them at a trot, despite how silly I felt. Out of the corner of my eye, I could see Genma scribbling something on the ground, with Gai standing over his shoulder to offer encouragement.

"I'm pretty sure I'm early, even if the rest of you were here earlier," I said, waving an arm to indicate the crowd. "Also, when did we get an audience?"

"A little bird told someone about the match, and then people wanted to make money off of it," Sensei said, shrugging. "Now, who could have done that?"
"I get your point already," I grumbled. I squared my stance and pressed my lips together in a thin line. "How long until noon?"

Jiraiya produced an alarm clock out of a sleeve, then shook it. "Five minutes. Any last words, kid?"

"Are there any rules to this…?" I waved my left hand vaguely. "Thing."

Sensei said "Oh!" and pulled something out of his flak jacket pocket. It was a strip of paper—a seal—that he handed to Jiraiya. To me, he said, "Kei, I won't be using the Chakra Suppressing Seal in this match. Instead, I'll be leaving its use to Jiraiya-sensei, who is going to be our referee."

He was about the only person around who could survive that job, so I approved.

"It'd be too easy to win that way," Sensei added, with a sort of innocence that I didn't trust.

My eyes narrowed. "I'd have thought you were above trash-talking."

"Is it still just banter if it's true?" Sensei teased, as though he wasn't standing two meters away.

…I was officially out of reservations about punching him. Previously, this attitude was due to my belief that nothing I could do would hurt Sensei, so it didn't matter how extreme I got. Now, I didn't care.

My eyes itched.

"Ah, there we go." Sensei smiled and added, with some anticipation, "Mind if I show off my eye color trick, too?"

"You're gonna have to, Sensei." And there went the Tailed Beast voice. Awesome.

The traditional pre-fight posturing was interrupted by a distinct twist of air, and Obito warped into existence next to my left elbow. There was a second bizarre spiraling effect in midair, and Kakashi was suddenly right next to him. On a rock.

"Yo," said Kakashi, once he found his footing again.

"Are we late?" asked Obito.

"No, no, you're fine." Still, Sensei jerked out a hand and pointed at the crowd. "But you should still be over there, boys. We're about to start."

The crowd had somehow gotten bigger still in the previous three minutes.

Hell.

Kakashi squeezed my shoulder—a vote of confidence?—and Obito followed that up with a hug that engulfed me quite effectively. Kakashi was already some distance away by the time Obito get around to letting go.

Obito said, "Good luck, Kei!" before running off after Kakashi toward the "sideline," inasmuch as there really was such a thing when Sensei and I were gonna be throwing overkill jutsu around. Having two Sharingan users around probably helped the situation, actually.

"Well, time's up," Jiraiya-sensei said. He put the alarm clock away and then folded his arms over his chest. "Ready?"
Sensei and I both tensed.

Jiraiya Body Flickered his way out of the battle, over to where Genma had finally set up his shimmery bluish barrier to shield the crowd from any backlash from our more powerful jutsu. Without taking my eyes off Sensei, I could feel the moment when Jiraiya's hand dropped.

Sensei disappeared between one heartbeat and the next with the faintest fwish.

I didn't even have to think about what to do next, as the air snapped like someone twanged a gigantic rubber band, and then Sensei reappeared next to Obito—standing on the outside of the barrier because of course he was—with his chakra radiating confusion.

The very first thing I needed to do in the fight involved neutralizing Sensei's two instant-win options.

I'd drawn a complex seal on my left arm to control the Flying Thunder God Seal permanently emblazoned across my left collarbone, which would render it inert for twenty-four hours. It would reduce the amount of lead-time Sensei had on detecting me if I ever needed to disengage (not bloody likely), at least until Sage Mode got involved. It would also prevent him from instantly teleporting to me and stabbing me in the face until he could establish a different seal and a new anchor point.

And it'd worked, much to Sensei's bafflement.

I waved at him with my left hand.

Then, before Sensei could launch into the Body Flicker to reestablish contact, I pulled on Isobu's chakra with a vengeance. Red energy flowed out of my body, surrounding me like a bubbling red flame, twisting itself into a shape reminiscent but not identical to Isobu's three-tailed form.

For one thing, I was only going for the first tail, and for another I was only in V1 Cloak mode rather than V2. While V2 would have the effect of making it impossible to touch me without Sage Mode, it would also alter my movements into something more bestial. I couldn't use my sword like that, and V1 was still good enough that Sensei wouldn't be able to reach my real body unless I let him.

Speaking of, I rose from my hunched-over position and put my hand on the handle of my katana. The chakra aura resolved itself into a shelled shape, flaring out along my shoulders and down my back to establish that I had no intention of being attacked from the rear.

And anyone who tried was gonna get burned.

Sensei didn't use hand seals. One second he was next to Obito, and then the next—Christ, how did he move that fast even with—

I caught his tri-pronged kunai on a chakra-assisted swing of my katana and broke it, sending Sensei spinning from his abruptly excessive momentum. His left hand hit the ground, palm flat and planting a seal there—

I dropped a seal, too, and made sure to smother his in it. Channeling chakra through my legs was easy once I got the hang of it. Explosive footprints, go!

Then I brought the chakra tail down, anchoring in the bare rock and sent myself on a catapult trajectory away from the explosive I'd just armed. I felt Sensei use the Flying Thunder God jutsu to dodge, reverting to the anchor point some fifty meters past his starting position, just as a thirty-meter fireball engulfed the space where we'd just been.

I landed on my left foot first and spun, bringing my sword to bear on Sensei's new position right in front of me. My sword bit into his side and met no resistance whatsoever, particularly when he exploded into smoke a fraction of a second after contact. Another flicker of speed and I knew I'd not only missed, but ended up somehow furthering his plans, because his chakra tore across the battlefield in the other direction.

Sensei fought best up close. Why was he running?

I drew on Isobu's chakra differently as I took off in pursuit, Body Flicker speed giving me a boost even past the usual jinchūriki shenanigans. Drawing the water from the surrounding environment—\textit{thank} you, weather—I sent two Water Dragons after Sensei's distant chakra.

As though summoned from hell or something, the two chakra constructs appeared out of what seemed like thin air and swam through the air after him, roaring a challenge. I followed in their wake, waiting for any sign I was on the right track.

Sensei reappeared just briefly, skirting between the nearly intertwined dragons and toward me as easily as if it had been some kind of synchronized dance. He was still ten met—\textit{Fwish} and then I was on the back foot again, with a Rasengan in my face. I brought my katana up to block, Mountain Cutter turning my blade into something more akin to the friggin' Buster Sword, and the two techniques made contact.

Blinding light, followed up with a detonation that ripped my katana out of my hands and sent me rolling back toward the flat plain we'd started on. Isobu's forearms ripped themselves out of the chakra cloak and dug into the earth, slowing me, and the chakra tail behind me slammed into the ground to stop me altogether. Maybe it was something about the chakra, but I wasn't dizzy when I got back to my feet.

No, I wasn't dizzy at all. Blood pounded in my ears, but all I felt was the need to punch Sensei's lights out.

\textit{Fuck it. You drive your limbs, and I'll handle mine.}

\textbf{I can do that.}

Sensei Body Flickered up to us again, Rasengan at the ready, and Isobu's tail whipped down between us. I caught the briefest look of surprise on his face before the tail split apart and slammed back together onto Sensei's wrist.

I gave him a cheeky wave as Isobu's tail hauled him up and over my head again, only to slam him into the ground behind me.

\textit{Puny god.}

\textit{Oh my god, you don't get to make that reference. You basically \textbf{are} the god here, Isobu!}

\textbf{I will be once I beat him.}

Isobu reeled him back in, probably for a second crushing, but I felt it when Sensei Replaced himself with a log and nudged Isobu's consciousness. Better leave it than waste energy.

The tail dissolved briefly into unshaped chakra, dropping the log, then reassembled itself into two separate tails. \textit{Okay} then.

I had no idea where my sword had gone. Sensei had already forced Isobu and me to use part of our hidden hand in an attempt to keep up. While two tails in the V1 Cloak wasn't a game breaker just yet, neutralizing Sensei's ungodly speed advantage was going to have to remain our priority.

Ready?

Always.

Isobu's shell solidified on my back, the chakra darkening and becoming denser, less human in my mind's eye. His tails grew translucent spikes, curling out into the air like they would have if he truly walked in the real world. His armored forearms and upper arms seemed to form over mine, leaving me with armor that weighed nothing while providing enough resilience to...well. We'd have to find out what we could take.

The second way Sensei could shut me down would have involved using the Chakra Suppressing Seal. I could find a way around that—I had made the damn seal myself, and could keep Sensei from getting close enough to touch me. Only Sensei had removed that particular option from his arsenal, so perhaps my techniques were less necessary.

I still wasn't gonna cut him any slack, because he sure as hell didn't need it.

Fwish.

"You know you're not going to win this way." Sensei's voice came from about...yes, twenty meters off. I didn't have the reach to immediately attack that space, but I just about had the speed to do it.

Isobu's tails shifted, as though he was preparing another attack.

"I don't know about that, Sensei!" I called out, though I was still wary of any new attacks from him. Sensei didn't often stop and chat during a fight. If he did, it was because you were already where he wanted you and he wanted you to stay there just a bit—

I drove forward, just as Sensei teleported to the spot I'd just been standing on and slammed a Rasengan down into the dirt.

What would it be like to take a direct hit from one of those?

Best not to find out.

Sensei grinned, then teleported out of range.

Let me try something. Isobu's head shifted above mine, forming a black globe of chakra in his spectral jaws.

Are we talking mini-Tailed Beast Bomb here? I asked him.

No. You're too small for this, and we have not practiced a full transformation. Isobu's jaws widened further as he drew yet more chakra into the impending blast. As I watched, thin tendrils of water streamed up from the damp ground and wove themselves around the Tailed Beast chakra core. Isobu's armor faded around me, leaving the V1 cloak. This is something he won't expect.

Minato

Kei's doing better than I would have expected before this! I've only managed to take her sword out of her hands, but none of the attacks I've used have been working the way I'd have expected. If Kei had been a stranger—and one who wasn't a student of mine—then maybe I would have been able to end the fight in a fraction of a second despite her Tailed Beast powers.

But no, my bright little pupil managed to work her way around that, too!

Despite the situation—and how I was bounced to Obito's instead of Kei's Flying Thunder God seal—I have to fight down a grin. Even as one of the big chakra tails lashes out and tries to take my legs out from under me, and I use the Flying Thunder God to warp to a different part of the training ground to avoid it.

She's come such a long way. How far can she still go?

Can you keep up, though? I wonder, feeling Kei and the Three-Tails' chakra crash through the section of the training grounds closest to the stands. She almost certainly knows where I am, though she can't quite seem to move fast enough to capitalize on it. It's one thing to neutralize air resistance through the Body Flicker or outright teleportation. But perhaps Kei has enough power to simply force it? Hm.

There's a noise like an explosion, and I can see a fat globe of water shoot up into the air from Kei's position. It's not a water dragon, but…

The water orb explodes a hundred meters in the air, then Kei disappears in a blur of speed as the spray falls like rain.

The first drop hits my extended arm like a rock. What—?

Kei lands in a crouch to my left, briefly, before surging after me. Her eyes focus on me, inhuman in their intensity. She glows like a red star, with the Three-Tails' aura forming something like his real shape around her, and their tails slap down onto the damp ground. Rain rises, freezes in the air, and then—

Mist?

"Hidden Mist Jutsu!" And then there's a lot of mist, blotting out anything more than two meters from me and dampening sound.

Immediately, I know it's a lie. I've been under a real Hidden Mist effect before—and fought blind through it until finding the user—but this doesn't feel anything like that. It's thicker, heavier, and I can actually feel myself slow down. It is mist, but it's not the kind I've seen before.

Why can't I sense anything in here? Not even my seals! Normally there would be some kind of…of natural energy…

A translucent red tail whirls out of the mist at waist height and forces me to fling myself backward as though snaking my way under a horizontal bar. My feet stick to the ground, giving me leverage to stand a second later.

And then I leap over a second tail, then hit the ground and duck on all fours under the third. That third tail clips the edge of my cloak and shears a flame-patterned corner right off as the second tail comes back for another pass.

Kei snarls in wordless frustration at the repeated misses, down on one knee in the middle of this whirling storm of Tailed Beast chakra as her tails do the attacking for her. She's fast enough with that reddish energy that the mist can't fill in a tail's wake fast enough, but seeing her twenty meters away isn't enough to guarantee success.
Even if I felt confident enough to attack her head-on—a losing prospect when I can't tell where the seals I need are—the blazing chakra cloak screams "danger" to the part of me that clings to common sense. My favorite jutsu are all close-range, but melee combat with a jinchūriki without an easy escape? Not where I want to be. Not when she can attack with all three tails independent of her actual movements.

I can tell she and the Beast are tracking me easily through the haze of energy and the mist, even though I feel like I've fallen into a fog.

Still on my hands and the balls of my feet, I hurl myself out of Kei's melee range (which seems to have grown to some twenty-odd meters of tail-enforced perimeter) and reach again for any sense of where my seals might be.

Nothing.

And the range of her mist seems to be expanding.

Well. Well, well, well.

My student is craftier than I expected, and now I'm paying for it.

As Kei braces her hands against the ground, as the Three-Tails's spectral jaws open wide to launch another attack directly at me—call it a hunch—I start laying new seals experimentally. Just a quick seal, hardly a half-meter from my current position, but this new seal blazes in my mind's eye.

How Kei managed to cut me off from all of my seals that are older than this mist, I don't know. But I've clearly underestimated the power she and the Three-Tails wield together, and I need to stop playing around.

I reach through my connection to natural energy instead, pulling on the clones I placed in the Hokage Tower—

The ground for fifty meters in all directions lights up with a purplish glow harsh enough to illuminate the mist, exactly like a net of explosive seals primed to blow. Or, I think as the purple seems to get even more expansive, maybe she's created a minefield. And I was stupid enough to step right into it.

Clever girl.

Kei

While Isobu charged a miniature Tailed Beast Bomb—really more water than "bomb," but who's complaining?—I sent my chakra through the ground to prime the biggest explosive seal I've ever used in combat. With the Three-Tails Mist cutting off Sensei's ability to use his Flying Thunder God seals, thanks to a triple-layered genjutsu concealed in Isobu's oppressive chakra, he couldn't move more than the range of a Body Flicker with any confidence.

Granted, he was fast enough for his namesake even without literally cheating the laws of physics and didn't actually have to stay inside the mist if he didn't want to, but I had enough power to flood Sensei's effective maximum range with things that went boom. And Isobu's chakra covered the whole training field anyway, so it wasn't like there was anywhere he'd be able to go without breaking at least one rule of the spar.

Isobu's jaws snapped shut on the energy he'd been building, sending it swirling around me into a kind of preliminary V2 cloak instead, and I set off the first set of chakra mines.
In movies, people caught in the middle of an airstrike would see nothing but huge plumes of dirt, all thrown high into the air by the power of high explosives. The sound system would mimic the sensation of ringing eardrums rather than going for bass and trying to deafen the audience. There might be a streak of gray as death rained down from the sky, marking the passage of an air-to-ground explosive of some kind, but ultimately the poor characters would generally be helpless in the face of death from above. The only way to avoid dying was to get lucky, because bombs didn't respond to pleas of mercy.

Being caught in a minefield, laid by yours truly, was somewhat similar. Obviously, there weren't any problems with an overhead plane screaming into view with worrying dramatic timing, but the plumes of dirt went just as high, and the noise was every bit as deafening.

Isobu and I, cradled in his chakra, bounced out of the kill-zone as though shot out of a cannon. We hit the ground some hundred meters later, rolling to a stop with all three of Isobu's chakra tails flared out behind us in an S-shape each, waiting for any sign that Sensei was going on the offensive. We'd left the mist behind, but it'd be easy to create a second one after the first inevitably dispersed.

I had felt a very suspicious flare of chakra from him right before the blast, though, and felt the hairs on the back of my neck stand on end.

It couldn't possibly be that easy. A few Tailed Beast tricks and the biggest explosion I'd ever made were certainly awesome, but Sensei was the Yellow Flash.

It was a matter of waiting for the other shoe to drop.

_Fwish_. Oh sh— "Sage Art: Rasengan!"

Oh, no you don't. Isobu's tails whirled on the spot and lashed out, two of them catching Sensei's cloak before I had time to turn.

As they yanked backward on his cloak, tearing it due to the combination of Isobu's strength and Sensei's momentum, the third tail met the Sage-boosted Rasengan head-on while trying to swat Sensei like an errant fly.

The tail and the Rasengan both detonated at close range—throwing me forward and into a brief, helpless somersault along the bare dirt. The tail was a loss for the moment, so I got my feet under me as quickly as I could and juked left before ducking right into a dive, and barely avoided another Rasengan to the back.

My right hand hit the ground first, so I stuck to it with chakra and pivoted on the single point of contact and swung both of Isobu's remaining tails back toward Sensei's chakra signature.

There was a bone-jarring _thud_ as both tails made contact, hitting Sensei spiked side first in the upper arm and forearm as he _blocked_.

I got another good look at him then, and had to pause for a heartbeat as I realized what was going on.

His grin was a little strained, a little worn. His outfit was a mess, too—scorched and a little shredded, going by the cloak. I could that his chakra had shifted—he was supposed to be playing a bit more conservatively, to be thinking carefully about his next move. He _wasn't_ supposed to be trying to fight me in hand to hand when I had organized a way to literally blow his socks off—if he wore socks, anyway. His shoes were pretty shredded.

But he'd tanked the best explosives I had, and now he was holding off an Isobu-powered hit without moving from the force of it. There weren't even any noticeable skid-marks along the ground.
Sensei's eyelids were a reddish orange like they had been in Suna, and his eyes had gone gold with rectangular pupils.

Oh, hell.

Sensei had gone right for Sage Mode.

"Let's see how your taijutsu has progressed, Kei!" Sensei said brightly, and immediately shoved the tails away and went for my throat.

Iso — And by that point, I had already taken a kick square to the face.

Then Isobu's chakra flared, fashionably late, and my vision went red.

---

Minato

Kei doesn't quite recover from the strike as gracefully as I half-hope she can. I guess I must have taken her by surprise, because she goes skidding backwards and into a tumble, eventually skidding to a stop near the barrier shielding the crowd from debris.

When she gets back to her feet, yet more Tailed Beast chakra surges from her seal, and Kei vanishes underneath a bubbling mass of dark red chakra. Her eyes become ominous, glowing holes in her face, her mouth becomes nothing more than a jagged outline that mirrors the spikes on her head, and three solid-looking tails extend outward, spikes curved and deadly. There are even beginnings of a shell, there across her shoulders, but it's half-formed and I'm not sure how she's going to use it.

She's found out how to access the second stage. And it's not a partial transformation, not like before. No half-solid shell. No armor. It's well and truly the second stage of Tailed Beast chakra usage. If I didn't know it was her under there, there would be no way to tell.

Kei's blank white eyes lock on me, and she roars, sending a wave of pressurized air whirling in my direction. It's every bit as strong as one of my Wind jutsu, but undirected. Not focused enough.

I lift my hand and crook my fingers, offering nothing but a challenge. "Let's go."

Kei raises her tails, dropping onto all fours to accommodate her new center of balance. Then she blurs into motion.

I teleport fifteen meters back, closer to the edge of the mist, as soon as I feel Kei's chakra shift in my direction. The spot where I was standing a minute ago, and some five meters around that, is shattered like porcelain and the ground collapses inward toward the point of impact.

It's like seeing Tsunade giving the ground a light tap.

Not bad at all.

The next strike she makes, after blurring again from sheer speed on her approach, is a textbook perfect leg sweep. It's launched with full Tailed Beast-derived speed and strength, and I don't dare try to block. Not yet.

I don't have a full picture of what she can do. On the other hand…

Gently as I can, I brush my hand against Kei's left tail as it passes at inhuman speed, using natural energy to take the glancing hit without flinching.
On one hand, well, I have a seal on her, now. Even after the third tail grew out again.

On the other, I have to teleport away to figure out what the hell is happening to my hand. Where I touched Kei's chakra tail, pinkish, rocky growth is clinging to my skin and, if I'm not mistaken, it's growing. Already, my index and middle fingers on my right hand are too covered in the stuff to move.

"Like the Coral Palm, Sensei?" Kei asks, in a horribly distorted voice.

From the look of her face, I'm actually surprised that she can even form words. Those craggy jaws aren't suited for the job.

Well, a fistfight is clearly out of the question.

With my other hand, I form a spinning Rasengan with every intent of throwing down a new gauntlet. Fwish.

Kei

Okay, that's Sensei's hand seals taken care of. Sure, he never depended much on seals in the first place, but the coral would engulf his arm if given enough time. That would make his mobility—or at least some of it—less of an immediate problem.

…Or, looking across the battlefield at him, maybe it'd give me a chance if I could outlast him long enough.

Sensei had a Rasengan, yes, but it was about the size of an exercise ball and I could feel the powerful twisting winds that indicated that it was another Sage technique. I hadn't seen Sensei use the Rasengan left-handed before, but he clearly had the concept down pat. He had Wind Release already—or if he didn't, he would soon—and I knew what had come after Sage Mode for Naruto in the original timeline.

Ergo, the complete Rasenshuriken.

Not something I wanted to deal with. If Kakuzu, who was just about as old as dirt, had gotten completely wrecked by that jutsu, I was going to avoid having anything to do with it at all costs.

And then Sensei teleports again and I know—

He's behind me!

That won't save him.

-that if Isobu wasn't watching my back, I'd be halfway across the training field already. Instead, Sensei's Rasengan smashed into a second Rasengan, formed between two of Isobu's tails and tinged faintly purple from his chakra.

The two attacks struggled against each other for a painfully long moment with a noise like a complex machine straining against an obstruction, during which I got a good look at the expression of shocked disbelief on Sensei's face…and then the two Rasengan detonated.

With Isobu's strength, we managed to stay in place even with the bone-shattering explosion at our collective back. However, I had to reach out to find Sensei's chakra again since he'd friggin' teleported out of range again.

Mist, again.

Right.

There was still enough residual water to create more of the chakra-sense-baffling mist, but we weren't going to be able to just press the attack. Not when Sensei had seen us do that already. We needed to come up with something else.

The mist shrouded the battlefield, blotting out the sunlight as it linked up with the already-existing fog. If I had to guess, Isobu and I had limited the effective range of Sensei's teleportation bullshit to only a third of the total area of the training field. There wasn't enough water to do more than that, not without screwing something up for the audience. Air with a humidity of zero wasn't something I wanted to force them to experience.

I could feel Sensei flitting to and fro in the mist, placing new seals.

Dammit. And he still had Sage Mode for at least another minute.

What about a clone? I asked Isobu, as we approached Sensei's general area, relying on the mist's chakra-baffling effects rather than suppressing our energy. And on my ability to move silently in the field, which Sensei had trained me to do through many long practice sessions over the years.

...Hm.

It wasn't a "no," at least.

How was this supposed to go, again? Snake, Ram, Horse—

---

Minato

Again with the anti-me Tailed Beast mist. I'll have to ask Kei how she gets Isobu to play along and grant her access to all of his powers, because this is far more than I expected this morning. Even with Sage Mode, there's enough interference that I don't feel comfortable jumping to any of my older seals. And I don't have visual or auditory confirmation of Kei's exact location, but my seals are all closer to where I remember she was last standing. That's an unacceptable risk.

Rats.

Of course, I think as I feel my internal timer for Sage Mode start to tick down, there's no real guarantee she's even in that direction anymore. Damn this mist!

There! "Hello, Sen—!" One quick backhanded punch later, and the clone explodes into a fine spray of water.

And again. Popping the second clone is as easy as the first. Why is all of this water—?

The water leaps up at me, cutting off my senses with the same Tailed Beast inhuman haze as before—and then it closes overhead.

Kei materializes out of the mist, with her eyes still glowing like emergency lights, and her extended, upward-turned hand gathers the mist with a deafening bang. The air pressure doesn't make sense—
My ears pop, and I hear her guttural voice say clearly, "Water Prison Jutsu," before the orb closes around me. Instead of her hand, Kei has two tail-tips in the body of the bubble, maintaining the flow of chakra without needing her actual input. So, the Three-Tails can do this on his own?

…I am never getting stuck in this mist ever again. I'd rather teleport blindly and risk ending up all the way across Konoha than have to repeat this experience.

Kushina is never going to let me live this down. Kakashi is never going to let me live this down. They will tell Naruto stories for our entire lives.

Still, I can't move while in this bubble, and the coral is still creeping up my arm. Even as I acknowledge that growing problem, Sage Mode cuts out entirely, and I realize that this is not the Water Prison variant that lets its victim breathe freely.

Well done, Kei.

Kei doesn't shift back to the thinner, wispier of the two Tailed Beast chakra modes I've seen. Instead, she remains in the more volatile form, clearly expecting me to try something. Which I am, because I can hardly do any less, but I still half-expect her to tell a joke or something.

Come to think of it, Kei was caught in a Water Prison during our first C-rank mission as a team. Maybe she used that experience as inspiration?

"You're going to get out of this, Sensei," Kei says in a conversational tone, completely at odds with her current vocal range. Those glowing eyes narrow suspiciously. "The question is, how?"

Well…

Disregarding the coral growth and the lack of air, this isn't the worst possible position to be in. Kei's somehow managed not to actually hurt me, despite the higher-ranked jutsu we've been throwing around. Even with Sage Mode fading out of my chakra coils, I still have an ace or two up my sleeve.

Speaking of which, I choose that moment to send in my clones. She used up the mist to create the Water Prison, which means they can find me easily enough—and I can find my way out of her range with no issues once I get out of here.

"Time's up." Kei opens her caricature of a mouth wide and begins charging a black orb of energy. The Tailed Beast Bomb? At this range?

My eyes narrow. The Sage Mode boost is gone, and I can't hold my breath forever, but I have a way out of this.

The first clone warps in, slamming a Rasengan into what turns out not to be just Kei's back. Instead, the clone is met by two purplish Rasengan going the other way, as one of Kei's tails detaches from the Water Prison and decides to go on the offensive. It spawns two Rasengan along its length and curls around the clone, dispersing it easily by overpowering the attack.

Kei's eyes never leave my face.

So she sees it when the rush of natural energy brings the orange and gold back to my eyes. I smile as she recoils just a bit, though I'm still not getting out just yet. I need more of a distraction.

Two more clones warp in, each bristling with Sage Mode power and a Rasengan each. Kei is thoroughly distracted, even if she hasn't moved far enough to break the Water Prison, and I can make my move.
Using the Flying Thunder God Jutsu would be too easy, with my clones running around and planting new seals as they go. Kei hasn't overridden them with explosives yet, so I could get out if I wanted to without much trouble.

But with Kei's back to me, it's too good of a position to give up.

Gathering chakra slowly, I press my will outward into the body of the Water Prison. While Kei might be able to feel it if she pays attention, she's too busy dealing with Sage Mode clones to actually act on whatever sensation is coming from the bubble. The Water Prison is moving clockwise, so if I just—

I feel the Three-Tails's eyes on me and its chakra lashes out across my senses, snapping my chakra back into my body before I can subvert Kei's Water Prison.

Never mind, then.

Fworp. One Flying Thunder God Jutsu later, and I'm out of there.

I take a deep, almost gasping breath, wringing the water from my hair. After a second's thought, I discard my shredded cloak. Despite being forced to give up something like an advantage, I'm fine. Granted, I'm soaked to the skin and out of position, but Kei hasn't dealt with my clones yet.

Bomph.

Never mind that, then. This clone sends its last memory—of getting a Tailed Beast-powered kick directly to the gut that would have killed any normal human—along with an extension to my Sage Mode internal timer. Well, its sacrifice wasn't in vain.

The next clone is stabbed to death—a coral sword?—and by that point I have to get moving. Kei knows exactly where I am, but not where I'm going to be.

Fwish.

Kei

Fighting Sensei was like fighting air. Not like fighting Tobi would be, granted, but he still wasn't there when I was trying to hit him. Quite aside from Sensei's literal Wind affinity, he never stuck around long enough to take a hit if he could see a way out of it.

Of course, if I had the speed advantage that he did, I'd probably do the same. Didn't make it any less annoying.

Given the brief lull in the battle, I look down at my new weapon. Clenched in a hand covered entirely by Isobu's chakra, the coral sword is a thing of...well, I didn't want to call it beautiful. As katana went, it was an ugly, malformed thing that happened to also be bright pink and settled in my hand like a porous volcanic rock. But it had killed Sensei's second clone just fine.

Will this spread the effects of the Coral Palm? I asked Isobu.

It is the Coral Palm, he corrected me. It can do no less.

Well, that was reassuring in a weird way. Sensei had already effectively lost the use of his right hand, given that it was encased in coral, and that distinction made it easy to tell him from the clones. He'd still gotten away, but I hadn't really expected to be able to do more than slow him down in a Water Prison. But catching him at all was a triumph.

Hopefully, he'd take me more seriously now.

Here we go.

I felt the burst of chakra almost before Sensei was on me, aiming a Sage-powered kick directly at my head. I caught the strike on the back of my right forearm, engulfing the offending limb in coral as soon as I felt contact and killed his momentum dead.

Hadn't he learned?

That Sensei exploded into smoke.

That sure answered my question.

But what was Sensei actually doing, if he'd sacrifice clones to try and mess with me?

Fwish. Fwish. Fwish. Three Sensei-clones all at once, then—

"Summoning: Toad Mouth Bind!"

For a moment, I had no actual idea what the hell that meant. It was probably a side effect of Sensei's rather random naming scheme for jutsu, which tended toward being non-indicative at best. I didn't immediately understand the problem.

And then the pinkish flesh started growing around me, burning out two clones in turn. My chakra-coated feet barely avoided sticking to the brand-new "ground," even as I watched the mass grow up and around me like I was...I don't know, maybe trapped in the throat of some massive creature.

An experimental Rasengan at the "wall" confirmed a niggling thought I had, unfortunately. The pink, moist walls absorbed the hit with minimal stretching, and tried to eat my hand even as I pulled back.

This was that thing that had required Itachi's Amaterasu to get out of. The bit where Jiraiya, a universe over and some ten years into the future, had tried and failed to trap two of the more bullshit-prone Akatsuki members.

God damnit.

"I wouldn't waste too much time being frustrated, Kei." The last clone had yet to implode, so I glared at it even as it went on in Sensei's mild voice, "After all, everyone eventually hits their limit. It's nothing to be ashamed of."

It is when this isn't my limit, I hissed at him silently, all three tails lashing as Isobu reacted to my frustration.

Now? Isobu asked me, as I looked up at the flesh of the giant toad's esophagus overhead. I did not want to stay in here for any longer than necessary.

...Just a second. Channeling Isobu's chakra down my arm and into my coral sword, I looked at the wall with my expression firmly controlled underneath the blood-red aura of the V2 cloak. If I could just—

I unleashed the Hunting Tiger Strike against the side of the fleshy wall, using both Isobu's chakra and my control and the parasitic nature of the coral, ripping it wide open. Without a second thought, I dove through the sudden opening and left that trap behind to eventually be dismissed.

And anyway, the trap in front of me was a lot more concerning.

The trap in question was a toad. Specifically, a rust-red toad with red markings around his mouth, eyes, and along his forearms, who wore a blue haori with the sleeves tucked short. He'd wrapped bandages around his middle like a true yakuza member, and I didn't have to look behind him to know that he still had a big ol' tantō stuck in that makeshift belt. There was a pipe sticking out of his mouth as his big yellow eyes glared down at me, rectangular pupils seeming to constrict.

Somehow, Gamabunta had seemed smaller the last time I had seen him—but then, I'd been on his head at the time.

Sensei waved down at me from the tip of Gamabunta's nose.

For fuck's sake, Sensei. Internally, I groaned before bowing to the inevitable. Isobu, we're gonna have to do the thing.

Excellent.

BA-BMP.

There was a sound like cracking glass, breaking slowly in stages as its strength gave out. Or maybe it was the snap of bone, grinding painfully into place. Maybe it was something stranger, like the tide rushing in. But what I could really hear, what I could really feel…?

Dizziness. Loss of any awareness of the outer world, as Isobu's chakra wrapped all around me, layering itself like rings in a tree with me at the core.

I didn't know where I was. My sense of up and down was distorted, though I was sure Isobu was moving both of us away from Gamabunta. To do otherwise didn't make sense.

I didn't know what I was going to do once the transformation finished. I'd lost any sense of time—what was Sensei doing? What could happen, before I remembered myself?

It felt like…something. Some amount of time had passed. I couldn't have said how much.

But when Isobu said, Look, I did.

One vast red eye snapped open.

Minato

"...Wasn't expecting her to do that," I admit, as the bulk of the Three-Tails rises from where Kei was standing just a minute ago. Gamabunta had to leap back to get clear as the overwhelming chakra resolved itself into a solid shape.

For a creature generally referred to as a "turtle," I'm seeing many different types of shelled creature crammed into the Three-Tails's form. There's the sweep of a spiky crab's shell, then the segmented back common to shrimp or lobsters, and then the long, spiky tails that borrow from entirely too many animals. Its hands and arms are human-like, with four sturdy fingers and a thumb each, but every scrap of those limbs is covered in gray-green armor. Its head isn't so much a head as it is a mobile durian that happens to have teeth and eyes.
Perhaps that's unfair of me.

I can feel Kei's chakra in that monster, calm as can be, so at least I know that the two of them aren't planning on going berserk. But still, I think as I glance down at the barrier-shielded audience not too far away, I need to keep this fight far away from everyone else.

"Minato, this is what your student can do?" Gamabunta rumbles underneath me. "It's the Nine-Tails all over again."

The Three-Tails's voice, resonant despite its relatively higher pitch, says clearly from across the battlefield, "I take offense to that."

"Tch," Gamabunta grumbles.

"What now, Kei?" I shout over Gamabunta's complaints. "Stalemate?"

"No. That would be cliché," the Three-Tails says, and I can almost hear Kei's tone in that voice. "We're going to fight you and your summoned partners like this. Together." The three scaled tails lashed and the Tailed Beast lowers its head. "Come and get us."

"I think you stole my line," I muse, but I'm smiling anyway. "Gamabunta, what do you say to a little company?"

"Bring whoever you want." Gamabunta's weight shifts underneath my feet as he leans forward, preparing to draw his weapon and leap into the fray. Riding a boss summon as it moves into battle is a bit like trying to ride a mountain. At a hundred meters tall, Gamabunta dwarfs most of the other toads at Mount Myōboku and has the strength to back up his mulish attitude.

Most. He's not bigger than this toad.

I pour chakra into a pronged kunai, enough to call the one I'm looking for. Then I hurl the kunai over the Three-Tails's back in the distance, with Sage-derived strength, and let the chakra do what I need it to go.

Kei might even get a kick out of seeing him fight.

In a massive burst of smoke, behind the three spiked tails, a giant aquamarine toad lands squarely on the ground with enough force to make it shake. With dark markings under his eyes, a brighter back, and two massive swords strapped across his back, Gamahiro cuts an imposing figure for most people.

The Three-Tails and Kei just give the toad dismissive swat with their tails, forcing him to block with both unsheathed blades. The force of the blow knocks Gamahiro to one knee, much to the toad's shock, and the Three-Tails and Kei move together—their chakra is synchronized—to heave the Beast's bulk onto its forearms. With a monumental effort, they manage to begin...a somersault? The movement puts the Three-Tails's head in line with Gamahiro, who immediately takes a massive blast of water squarely in the face.

Water from literally nowhere, apparently. I'm never going to understand how people with Water affinities manage without these kinds of huge chakra reserves.

As Gamahiro staggers, the Three-Tails is up and moving toward Gamabunta and me, launching itself into a forward roll that ought to look silly, but really puts all those spikes on its back to good use for traction. The tails curl around it, forming a complete tread, and then Gamabunta has to leap out of the way to avoid being ground into meat hash under the Three-Tails's bulk.

Watching the Three-Tails and Kei pass below us from Gamabunta's bulk, I'm the first to see the spiky hell-monster launch itself off the ground in a jump I usually see from Akimichi clan members. Extending one tail as it spins, the Three-Tails brings that tail down on Gamabunta's trailing left leg, eliciting a grunt of pain from the massive toad.

Gamabunta and I crash to the ground a moment later, shattering it.

"How is she doing that?" Gamabunta demands, as the Three-Tails bounces back to earth and uncurls from its spinning form.

It's immediately set upon by Gamahiro, who finds himself trying to block a pair of gargantuan coral swords formed instantly from the Tailed Beast's hands. Definitely Kei's influence there, for all that the Three-Tails can barely move through Kei's usual katas without actual legs.

"Gamabunta, can you still fight?" I ask, placing my hand against his brow. While Gamabunta has never been a pushover, and I'm no medic, I can still feel his chakra curling defensively around the leg that the Three-Tails struck.

"Pft. You're a hundred years too early to be asking me that, Minato," the toad says disgustedly. "I don't need your pity."

"My mistake, Gamabunta." And yet I'm smiling.

Though this battle is a real clash of titanic forces, it's...it's almost fun, to have someone to fight who knows how to pull her punches so well. Even with such tremendous power at her fingertips. I'm under no illusions about the Three-Tails's feelings toward us, so what mercy we've seen thus far must be Kei. Maybe this won't help her in a real all-out battle, but I'm honestly feeling just fine about how she can do in a spar, even one as far past that definition as this one is.

She's grown so much.

I rap my knuckles against Gamabunta's head, sending a gentle pulse of my chakra into him. We can do this. "Let's go join Gamahiro and show her a real fight, huh?"

Gamabunta leaps into the fray without a word.

Kei

Choking the big sword-wielding toad was easier than it probably had any right to be. With my two-handed kenjutsu adjusted for Isobu's strength and leverage, and two of his tails squashing the toad in their coils, it seemed like this fight was going to be over before it really even started.

This toad might have used swords, but he wasn't me. And I was damn good at what I did, even by proxy through Isobu's arms.

The third tail, left to stabilize us so we didn't roll over somehow, was the only saving grace that let Isobu and I heave ourselves out of the way of Gamabunta's attack, aimed at our "unprotected" back.

We let the turquoise toad go and, as he disappeared into smoke, brought both coral swords up against Gamabunta's.

Only a few more seconds, Isobu reminded me, and I grimaced internally.
As powerful as a Tailed Beast transformation was, and as much power as I could feel throbbing in my coils, it had a cost. And that cost was, bluntly, expressed in time. Like, oh, picking up a star in one of those Mario games?

Tailed Beast hosts burned bright. But as inexperienced as I was—as inexperienced as my body was—I'd burn fast. I had barely half a minute at full power. Sensei had ten minutes of Sage Mode, thanks to all the clones. I couldn't push the energy burden off on anyone or anything else like that.

If I did too much too soon, I'd die.

Just a little longer. I took a deep breath I couldn't really feel, as it was more habit than anything. Mountain Cutter!

And Gamabunta, for all that he was the size of a mountain all his own, hurled himself far enough away to dodge.

Welp. That was it, then.

I'm cutting you off, now, Isobu said, and the power—except for the barest scrap required to keep me conscious—vanished. So did the Tailed Beast body I'd been safely sequestered inside. Which put me quite a ways in the air, with no parachute.

I fell.

I had enough presence of mind to summon Tsuruya, so at least I didn't face-plant on the ground a hundred meters straight down.

She swooped under me and let me droop across her shoulders as she adjusted to our sudden predicament. She and I coasted to the ground in a gentle glide. She didn't even ask what kind of stupid situation I'd gotten myself into.

Then I face-planted in the broken dirt, since getting off Tsuruya's back properly seemed suddenly like it was too much effort.

"Keisuke-sama, what happened?" Tsuruya asked, leaning over me with the point of her beak prodding the back of my head.

Ow.

"I'm fine," I mumbled, still unwilling (or maybe unable) to get to my feet.

"Well, I see no reason for you to spend the afternoon on the ground," Tsuruya said, and hauled me to my feet again with some difficulty.

I listed badly to one side, mainly because my legs were trembling so badly that it was difficult to figure what a straight line was, but Tsuruya nonetheless steered me onward.

I wasn't quite sure when she'd stopped, but it had to have been a minute or two. The next thing I knew, I flopped forward into what should have been a dizziness-inspired faint, but strong arms caught me before I could topple.

"You did very well, Kei," said Sensei's voice.

"Oh, cool," was as much as I managed. Then I passed out.

Somewhat later, I woke to the sensation of someone poking me in the cheek. Irritably, I swatted their hand away, mumbling, "Five more minutes, dammit."

"She's awake!" said a strikingly familiar voice.

Wait a minute. Hadn't I just been fighting Sensei…?

With some effort, I managed to open my eyes and try to figure out what the hell I'd missed. Rin was sitting by my right side, with her hand hovering over my chest and gently applying some kind of healing jutsu. Hayate was to my left, and managed to wear a look of affront when I focused on him.

"You didn't have to smack me, Sis," Hayate said reproachfully. He was rubbing his fingertips with his left hand, pouting.

"Don't go poking jōnin when they're unconscious, Hayate-kun," Rin admonished without looking at him.

I sat up, though Rin put her hand on my shoulder to make sure I was steady. After a second, I brushed her hand off and rubbed my eyes. "So, how long was I out?"

"About a minute," Rin said. She took her other hand off my chest and sat back, tilting her head at me as though not quite sure what she'd expected. "That…was a much faster recovery time than I thought you'd have."

"Isobu was going easy on me," I replied, shrugging. I focused on my brother then, saying. "So, I lost?"

"Yeah, you did." Hayate huffed, crossing his arms. "But it was so close. You almost had him!"

"Close only counts with exploding tags." I looked around, realizing that Hayate and Rin were the only humans within about five meters. The rest of the group that had come to observe was keeping their distance thanks to a set of barrier seals that had Genma carefully pacing the perimeter like a caged tiger.

Genma was actually inside the barrier, running his hand over its glittery blue surface in a way that reminded me of, well, me whenever I was refreshing the seals in my house. Raidō, Kakashi, and Obito were also sitting around the inside of the seal, evenly spaced out like points on a compass, but they were still keeping back. Maybe they wanted to avoid distracting Rin?

Huh. Guess I scared everyone pretty badly.

"We're good, everyone," Rin told them.

The tension drained out of the bubble, and Genma snapped his fingers. Then the shield bubble collapsed as easily as if it were made of soap.

"Except for the bit where I don't think I can really walk right now," I admitted, while the boys stretched and got to their feet. "My legs feel like jelly." And ached like hell, but that was fading. Oh, the wonders of medical ninjutsu and a Tailed Beast-inspired regeneration rate. I'd be fine.

"Let me help!" And without any further input from me, my brother hauled one of my arms over his shoulders and levered me to my feet again. Hayate made a pretty good makeshift crutch, but the experience was still a little embarrassing.

At about that point, the rest of the crowd swooped in.
Or they might have, but Kushina appeared as though by magic and said brightly, "Payouts right here, everyone!"

It was a little like watching someone throw food into a koi pond. Though my head pounded from the noise—and probably from the chakra strain—I still felt my spirits lift just a little. No one seemed terribly angry at me for losing. In fact, the crowd was mostly jostling and laughing with one another, recounting one part or another of the fight to people who might have missed a bit. Fragments of conversation bubbled to the surface, seemingly at random.

"Did you see the toads?"

"—the Water Prison was textbook!"

"I've never seen a Tailed Beast strain like that!"

"Did you see the Hokage's arm? Tsunade-sama had it cleared up like that!"

"Everyone seems happy," I commented, as Hayate led me away from the crush.

"That match did confirm what I already thought," Genma said with a shrug, sidling through the crowd as though they weren't there. "You're definitely the scariest fifteen-year-old girl I know."

"How many do you know, Genma-san?" Rin asked from behind me.

Tiniest pool of candidates ever, but I could live with that.

"It does help that we won about five thousand ryō apiece by betting on the Hokage," Raidō added, equally nonchalant.

"Well, I don't feel bad about losing a bet like that!" Obito piped up. He patted my shoulder, grinning. "You did great, Kei! Losing to Sensei is nothing to feel bad about!"

I gave him a wry half-smile. "Thanks, Obito. I kinda figured he'd win, but as long as I gave it my all…" I trailed off, shaking my head. "Good enough, right?"

"Yep! Oh, Kakashi, who'd you bet on?" Obito spun around and continued walking, though backwards.

From behind me, Kakashi said, "Sensei, of course." He made a noise that might have been a laugh, and I craned my neck to see if he actually was laughing, only to find that he'd stopped already. "Though I'm going to remember that Water Prison trick."

I sure hope so. Kakashi falling for that one a universe over had been…well, disappointing.

"How much did you win, Kakashi?" Raidō asked.

"About fifty thousand ryō."

Raidō made a choking noise. Fifty thousand ryō was more than any of the bets I'd heard before leaving the big kunoichi meeting yesterday, but it was only equivalent to a C-ranked mission. Granted, it was a lot for just one person when those missions usually went to teams, and I didn't think Kakashi was going to lose anything in taxes. Maybe everyone else had only been betting pocket money?
"Confident, huh?" Genma said, unfazed.

"It's Sensei," Kakashi replied in the same tone.

Okay, he had a point. Didn't mean I wouldn't rib him for it. "Ouch, Kakashi. Gets me right here," I said with a bark of a laugh, tapping my chest over my heart. "But I guess it was for a good cause, right?"

But Kakashi was magnanimous in victory. "If you want an apology, I can buy you lunch."

"How can anyone eat fifty thousand ryō in food for lunch?" Obito demanded, when Genma made his very own special choking noise. It had a senbon in it.

"Have you ever seen Tsunade-sama eat after she uses a lot of chakra?" Rin asked, though it was clearly a rhetorical question. "I bet jinchūriki have to do the same thing."

On cue, my stomach rumbled. What the hell, metabolism? "Honestly," I admitted, as I put my hand against my stomach in mild embarrassment, "I was kind of hoping Kushina-san would cook this time. I'm too tired to do much other than sit and eat…"

"Offer's open," Kakashi said, with the verbal equivalent to a thoughtless shrug, though I felt his chakra shift strangely. Eh?

"Maybe another time," I mumbled, and yawned. "Okay, okay, I really need to rest. Give me a second to sort out this stupid body…"

Eventually, my group found a place to put my effectively-immobile ass down for a bit. We did some crowd-watching, and I might've fallen asleep on Rin or something, but that wasn't important. I'd fought well, no one was really hurt, and I'd pushed my limits harder than ever.

It was a good day, when all was said and done.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title is courtesy of Matchbox Twenty.
"I believe we could make an apartment building around this, Keisuke-chan!" Gai shouted down at me. Honestly, given how high up he was, Gai was pretty much the only person who could effectively communicate from up there.

"Up there" was the top of one of the big coral swords Isobu and I had made in our fight against Sensei. If I had to guess, the blade was actually longer than Gamabunta's favored weapon, and it looked like a rather bizarre, pink piece of modern art from where I was standing. Huge, yes, and also rather impressive for what it was made of, but also just kind of "what the fuck was the artist thinking?" at the same time.

"While that's great, I don't think anyone wants to live in an active training ground, Gai!" I yelled back up at him.

After I'd fainted for the second time in about ten minutes, my friends had decided that maybe it wasn't a good idea to keep dragging me around. So, with Rin's specific orders in mind, my brother had dragged me to the Namikaze-Uzumaki household to sleep off the effects of pushing myself to my limits. While this did mean that I was exempt from cooking duties, and that I woke up in the late afternoon to Kushina's homemade ramen, it also meant that I did so with spiral squiggles on my face courtesy of Naruto.

I'd been too hungry to do much more than just eat and bear the giggling.

It also meant that no one had made certain to pick up my sword from the training fields. So, after much deliberation, I had made the decision not to retrieve it until morning. Five hours hadn't given Isobu's chakra enough time to fix me up, but Rin thought that a good night's sleep might.

Cue the next day, bright and early. While most of my friends had prior engagements—mainly of the mission kind—Gai had been running around during his morning training. He'd seemed amenable to a distraction, so I'd asked if he could help.

"It sounds like an excellent opportunity to train my tracking skills!" Gai had said, beaming even while sweat ran down his face.

I was not going to find my sword if I scoured Training Ground Four on my own, so it was a win-win.

Which was how we had discovered what everyone else in the village already knew—namely, that the coral swords had not disappeared when Isobu had let the transformation go. One of them had snapped in half at some point, leaving two pieces the size of airplane wings lying some ten meters apart on the ground. The other had not, staying upright where it had been imbedded in the ground.
The broken one had chips taken out of it, with little hand-sized gouges cut free with shinobi tools. Gai had said something about souvenirs, but I wouldn't have believed it if I wasn't seeing the evidence firsthand.

People were weird.

"Gai, where were you yesterday?" I asked him, while still kicking over random chunks of wood. Isobu had flattened a lot of trees in thirty seconds. "I could have sworn you were there at the beginning of the match."

"Oh! Well, Keisuke-chan"—and here, Gai leapt off the top of the coral tower so he could speak to me directly—"I was asked by Kushina-sama to convey the results of all the bets to all those who did bet. I am, after all, a very fast and hard-working ninja."

Also completely guileless, or at least people assumed that. They trusted Gai's word because they often assumed he wasn't capable of lying. But Gai was a jōnin, so people who knew him knew better in short order. He could tell someone that the sky was green with absolute conviction and, for just a second, they'd believe it. That was really all it took.

So he'd been put to work as a sort of Green Beast Express: Faster and more reliable than the Pony Express over short distances.

"I remember that the line for payouts went around the block…" I said distractedly, though in truth I could only remember a barrage of knocks on Sensei's door.

"Quite so, Keisuke-chan! Everyone was very excited, especially if they decided to bet on the Hokage!" Gai grinned. "It was quite fun!"

I made a face. "It was a lot less fun when I was fighting."

Gai paused. "You… You didn't find fighting Hokage-sama fun?"

"I kinda did, but I kinda didn't at the same time," I admitted, crossing my arms over my chest and looking away. "The Three-Tails loved the challenge, and I guess I really did want to push myself to see how strong I was, but I don't like fighting friends and family."

"You really don't have any ambition, do you?" Sensei had asked last night. I'd been too tired to really formulate an answer, but I knew what it was.

I didn't. I really didn't.

Gai looked like he didn't have a concept for people who didn't like the idea of throwing themselves toward greater and greater heights. He was practically the patron saint of hard work—despite not being dead—and there wasn't much that fell harder into the category of "not Gai" than being entirely uninterested in power and effort.

I'd fallen backwards into superweapon status and was still playing catch-up in some significant ways.

"Well, Keisuke-chan, I think you should train with your comrades rather than just worrying!" Gai suggested brightly. "It is true that great power can be disconcerting at first, but you cannot become comfortable with your new strength if you never use it!" Gai bounced in place on the balls of his feet, thoughtful. "Really, while I was impressed by your fight with the Hokage, you do not have much staying power."

"Yeah, the end there was a bit of a make-it-or-break-it moment. Either I'd lose once my strength ran
"You want to train with me?" Gai looked like he was about to explode from joy.

"Okay, Gai. What time works for you?"

I managed to keep my expression blank, though I had a sudden urge to start running. "We've trained together befo—?"

At that point, I was already being hugged to death and there was nothing for it. I made a noise like a squeaky toy being stepped on as Gai spun me around in joy.

Gai, meanwhile, continued with his gleeful rant. "WE WILL RUN TWO HUNDRED LAPS AROUND THE VILLAGE TOMORROW MORNING, THEN SPAR UNTIL WE CANNOT FIGHT ANY MORE!"

"I'm—glad—you're—happy—" I managed, in fits and starts, "but—can—you—please—!"

Gai set me down with a flourish, brushing a tear from beneath his eye as he struggled with his emotions, "Keisuke-chan, I would be honored to be your sparring partner until you can set a worthy goal for yourself!"

"Who"—here, I croaked and had to clear my throat—"said anything about setting goals? I'm okay where I am!"

"No, Keisuke-chan, you already know you are not happy where you are. You are afraid of your own strength." Gai adopted a pose reminiscent of a superhero, maybe Superman, giving a lecture of great importance. "Which is not to say that caution isn't important! But it is making you unhappy."

"...Can't argue with that." I looked down, sighing again. "And I'm not really keeping up with training with Obito or Kakashi, either..."

Gai patted my shoulder. "Then catch up with your teammates first? Even Ebisu makes an effort to meet Genma and me in combat, though our specialties are very different." He gave me a thumbs-up. "After you spar with them, we can train to our hearts' content! And Ningame would love to meet the Three-Tails and discuss turtle life with him!"

I nodded. Still, this wasn't exactly what we'd been talking about before. Shifting my weight from foot to foot in the face of his enthusiasm, I finally said, "So, uh, can we keep looking for my sword now?"

"Of course, Keisuke-chan! We will retrieve it from the rubble of your battle, or I will climb the Hokage Mountain fifty times on my hands alone!" Gai flashed me one last brilliant grin and takes off.

Riiight back up the coral...spire. I was going to call it a spire in my head and no one could stop me. Anyway, Gai stood up there, peering around the rather flattened battlefield, while I did the literal groundwork. Hopefully, he'd spot something to point me in the right direction as long as we both kept looking.

I had just kicked a shattered log aside, searching underneath it, when I heard a sudden storm of barking coming from the approximate direction of the village.

Granted, it turned out to just be one dog. If any dog deserved to be able to make a storm all by himself, though, Kuromaru was definitely worthy. He bounded onto the scene with his partner Tsune at his side, looking admirably fierce today.
"You!" Tsume said sharply, pointing one clawed index finger at me.

I mouthed "me?" as Gai landed beside me, via an epic leap from the top of the coral spire that I sadly missed.

"Yes, you. Keisuke Gekkō, host of the Three-Tailed seafood buffet." Tsume stood up straight and nodded to herself as Isobu sputtered inside my head. Then, "Good fight yesterday, kid."

"...Thanks?" I never knew exactly how to interact with Kiba's mother, though I'd known her first as an examiner way back when. She was every bit as overbearing as Gai when she wanted to be, but more fierce about it. Gai was just...overenthusiastic.

Tsume was a Kushina-like bulldozer.

"But right now the Hokage wants to see you, so finish up whatever you're doing here." Tsume made a shooing motion. "Go on."

"But we are searching for Keisuke-chan's sword!" Gai protested. "We cannot leave without recovering it. It is very important to her!"

While Gai was correct, I still put my head in my hands. Mom had given me that katana personally, which made it special, but it wasn't a uniquely valuable weapon otherwise. I was sure Tsume didn't care.

One of Tsume's eyebrows rose. "A sword?"

"Yeah." My voice came out much quieter and more hesitant than expected. So maybe it really was a special sword. Or maybe my spine turned to jelly around domineering women? It was hard to tell sometimes.

"Don't worry about it, kid." Tsume looked at her partner and dropped her hand onto his head. "Kuromaru, go ahead."

And that was the story of how two special jōnin couldn't find what a dog found in about four seconds. We probably should have just dragged Kakashi into our search in the first place. Luckily, Tsume had been the one to respond.

With my katana strapped across my back once again, I made my way to Sensei's office under Inuzuka escort and wondered why it was necessary.

Of course, once I got there I realized the problem.

"A promotion to full jōnin? B-but Sensei..." With Tsume and Kuromaru at my back, her arms crossed and her back against the closed office door, there was nowhere to run. And I didn't want to have this conversation at all.

Not when I didn't really deserve it.

"Yes, Kei?" Sensei sat serenely behind his desk, his chin resting on one hand as he waited for me to respond to his suggestion.

There were no extra copies of Sensei running around, so I was at least mostly certain it was the real him, for now. The office was clear of paperwork, thanks to the hard work of said clones, but that mostly just made me feel like I'd well and truly been put on the spot. There wasn't any place to hide.
"Speak up, please," Sensei said, and it was an order in the form of a request at best.

I steeled myself. "Hokage-sama, I respectfully ask that you keep the promotion slot for someone who deserves it more than I do. There are—there are other candidates." Though in the pressure of the moment, I couldn't think of any. Maybe Tsume, since she was standing right there? Obito?

Sensei's eyebrows rose. He glanced over my shoulder and said to Tsume, "I believe I need to talk to my student alone, Tsume-san."

Tsume's chakra suggested she had to bite down on a comment or two, but she and Kuromaru turned and left the office in silence. That left me alone in the office with Sensei, which was more uncomfortable than it had been since getting back from the hell butterfly mission. Funnily enough, I'd been offered a chance at promotion then, too.

"Opportunities for promotion don't come around that often, Kei," Sensei commented. "What's on your mind?"

I found myself staring at the floor, trying to think. If not for the fact that I had my hands in my pockets, they'd be shaking. I hadn't felt like this before fighting Sensei. What the hell was wrong with me?

"Kei?"

"…A jōnin is supposed to be the elite of the elite," I said after a long moment, my voice still quieter than I would have liked. "I…I guess I have the power for it. I fought you, and most jōnin can't do that. But I'm still not really ready for it."

Sensei made a neutral noise.

I took that as a cue to continue. "Being a jōnin would require me to reach not just competence, but, uh, something pretty close to excellence in several different disciplines. I…I can only use one type of elemental ninjutsu. Kakashi could use three by the time he was thirteen." I could feel Sensei's gaze drilling into the top of my bowed head, but that was my fault. I didn't want to meet his eyes. "But I can use what I have really well, so that counts for something. I have fūinjutsu expertise beyond most people my age, even if it's not perfect."

I could feel Sensei's chakra suffuse the room, gently supporting me and mine. It was like he was trying to smooth down the agitated energy I was giving off, though he didn't know why it was necessary. "Go on, please."

"I, uh—I'm good enough in taijutsu. I think. You and Obito made sure of that, and I fought without my katana for most of the match yesterday." It was something I wouldn't have been able to say just a few years ago. "And I can do kenjutsu, though I'm still working on Isobu's part in that. We'd never done the coral swords before…"

"You'd never used the coral swords?" Sensei interrupted, and I looked up on reflex.

He'd stepped out from behind his desk at some point, and stood in front of it and a lot closer to me, an expression like shock on his features. Then he pinched the bridge of his nose and said, "Oh, Kei. I knew it would be difficult for you to practice with Tailed Beast powers with any subtlety, but I didn't think you wouldn't practice at all."

I said nothing.

"I'm glad the Three-Tails trusted you with his powers, but that was…ill-advised," Sensei sighed, shaking his head. "Remind me later to set up a specifically warded training room or something. The seals on your home…?"

"I checked those; they'd break down during the second stage of the transformation. It's too much," I said, "So it'll, uh, take a whole lot more practice for me to be able to really do it…and I wasn't gonna try with my brother around."

"And I did spring that match on you, didn't I?" Sensei mused.

"I had a week to think about it," I replied. "I could have trained on the road. I knew it was going to happen, but I didn't ask when."

Sensei patted my shoulder. "Still, enough about that for now. Kei, can you continue?"

"Right," I said, and Sensei retreated a bit so he could lean back against his desk. After a second or two, I said thoughtfully, "Anyway, the coral swords mean I can keep using kenjutsu even as my strength and speed increase, so that's useful. Then I…don't have the best grasp of genjutsu, not really. But Isobu does, and his genjutsu worked on you, so that's a pretty good assessment right there."

"The mist was a genjutsu?" Sensei asked, eyebrows raised.

"Well, the mist was real, but it carried a contact genjutsu." I shrugged. "You'd have to ask Isobu how it works. He tried explaining, but he had to dumb down explaining the explanation and gave up after a while." Advanced genjutsu theory was not my thing. And Isobu didn't even use the same notation system as Kurenai did, so the kunoichi meetups hadn't helped.

"Still, interesting. I haven't been taken in by a genjutsu for years." Sensei smiled then, saying, "But I'm interrupting again."

I nodded. "And, uh, I guess as soon as I start really putting my back into things…I can keep up with you. If you're not using anything to boost your speed. And I hit pretty hard when I want to." Not that we had electronic punching machines or anything here to actually quantify strength. If we did, I'd still say with confidence that I wasn't in Tsunade's tier or anything. No one was, except maybe Kushina if she ever really decided to tap into Kurama's chakra. But no one had seen that happen yet.
"And as for chakra reserves, I knew I started around the middle of the pack for a kunoichi. Not great, and big chakra reserves didn't run in my family. But since getting Isobu stuck in me, the only times I passed out from chakra overexertion were when I was overusing his. I don't actually remember my last totally mundane run at chakra exhaustion."

"You may be moving past that kind of concern, Kei." Sensei's smile became a little wry. "Though I haven't."

I paused. "Did you run into the doorframe again this morning?"

"I did, actually." Sensei rolled his eyes. "Anyway, back to the assessment. Kei, is there anything you really think you can't do as a jōnin?"

"Yeah." I bit the inside of my cheek, then decided it'd be better to just bite the bullet. "I can't lead."

Sensei made a "go on" gesture as his eyes narrowed a bit.

"The only time I was even a little in charge of things was during my Chūnin Exams." I shrugged, uncomfortable. "I mean, that's squad leadership and that's great, but I'm, uh, a born follower otherwise. I don't like leading. Even at Kannabi—and I know you put Kakashi in charge—I only did a little. And we lost Obito when…” Well, no one had really been in charge by then. And I'd lost my head. I had Obito to thank for the fact that it hadn't been literal, and that sacrifice had nearly been fatal.

I was really better off being an easily-deployed superweapon.

My eyes were focused on the office's rug again. I swallowed hard. "I'm okay where I am."

"I disagree," Sensei replied, and I looked up again. He had his arms crossed pointedly over his chest and was looking down at me with faint disappointment in his expression and his chakra. It wasn't…it felt somehow muted, like there was something holding him back from just delivering a lecture about self-confidence and pride.

I couldn't meet his eyes for very long.

"When we consider a shinobi for promotion to jōnin, a senior jōnin of appropriate strength or specialization is selected for assessing the new prospect," Sensei informed me, his voice completely level. When my gaze snapped up toward his face again, his expression was serious as well. "That spar yesterday was your assessment."

"It…what?"

"In terms of sheer combat capability, you are more than qualified for jōnin rank." Sensei reached behind his back and pulled something out of his hip pocket. After a second, it was flying through the air at me.

I caught it. An Iwagakure Bingo Book.

"And as of yesterday, they'll have to update your rank in that." Sensei gestured for me to open it.

"I didn't realize I had a…oh." Right there, in the Konoha-nin section, a page after Sensei's. There wasn't a photograph or anything, but there was a basic description of me. My eyes skipped around as I read, resulting in disjointed sentences like this: One hundred and sixty-seven centimeters, unknown weight, black hair, unknown sex... And right there, in big blockish characters, Kill on sight. After that, there was a lot of speculation about my power and my skills, but there was an element of fear of the unknown—Iwa had no idea why Konoha had kept me in reserve for so long when it was public knowledge that I was a jinchūriki.

So they speculated. And yesterday, as far as fears about a full Tailed Beast transformation went, I had gone and proved their worst fears correct.

Well, then.

"And sooner or later, they'll probably update that to 'flee on sight' once you get in the field again." Sensei crooked his fingers, and I tossed the book into his waiting hand. "I'm also facing some pressure from the Council, since our two other jinchūriki aren't going to be stomping all over enemy villages anytime soon."

"But I thought Kushina-san…” And then I trailed off, as Sensei shook his head.

"Kushina hasn't said anything to me about restoring her field status for two months," Sensei replied with a sigh. "If she wants to, the offer's open. But that's not what we're here to talk about."

"But I still don't have any real experience leading a team," I protested. "I just…do things. I haven't even really been on a mission in more than a year."
Sensei raised one eyebrow. "I seem to recall you taking charge of a team including your mother, Nagato-san, Gai-kun, Kakashi, Obito, and assorted other shinobi during the October Tenth crisis."

I…I had, hadn't I? "That was still more than a year ago."

"From Obito's report after the fact, you had information and wrangled everyone involved under your command without hesitation. What was so different about that mission?"

It was self-appointed, for one. And Mom and Maekawa-san had still gotten killed on that rescuing rampage of a mission, and Obito had been badly hurt. It'd been a miracle that we hadn't all died once Black Zetsu turned the whole thing around on us.

But what I said was, "Hayate was in trouble. So I…I argued for the village's benefit—we were gonna go try and rescue Kushina-san, too, and I made sure we all knew how important she was to our defenses—but I really had a selfish motive. It just…worked out." And it only cost me my mother and Gai's friends.

If Hayate hadn't been held in the same location as Kushina had, would I have still tried to rescue her? Christ, what was wrong with me? Every time Sensei tried to make a point with something positive I had done or could do, I kept tearing it up in front of him. I knew I was selfish and short-sighted, but all Sensei could see was the results of my actions. A net good. There was just so much fear behind every "success."

So much doubt. "I don't deserve to be a jōnin when I don't know how to be a leader."

Sensei didn't say anything for a while. Then, "If you hadn't taken the initiative to tell us about what was going to happen then, I wouldn't be here to argue this with you."

"That's…that's just intel, Sensei. And anyway, I couldn't—the village needed you." Saving Sensei had been good. It had been such a correct choice that it almost felt like I was riding on the waves created by that choice even now. I loved him, sure, but… If there had been a choice not to tell him—not to save him and Kushina—then I didn't know of any version of me that would have gone with that. I didn't want to.

Not after Kannabi.

Sensei and Kushina—the future they promised just by being alive was more important than my fucking mental issues.

"Intel needs to be acted on to be worth a damn," Sensei said sharply, and I flinched. Then he sighed and said, "While the information was invaluable, what I'm worried about now is the fact that one of the most promising young shinobi in her generation is consistently tearing herself down in front of me."

Sensei stepped forward and pulled me into a hug without hesitation. I pulled my hands out of my pockets and hugged back on pure reflex, but I could already feel my face burning. If Sensei was just a little taller, I might've been able to hide my face in his flak jacket without a problem. As it was, though, I just made a muffled noise against his shoulder pad and let him squeeze.

"This has been going on for such a long time, I almost forget you're so hard on yourself, Kei." Sensei let me pull back, but he kept his hands on my shoulders and gave me an assessing look. "What is this really about, Kei? You don't have to take the promotion…"

"N-no, I…" Fucking hell, I am not going to cry like a baby right now! I'm a special jōnin! And yet, it took me a moment to get my voice under control. "I can't take the promotion now. I don't have enough experience."

"That can be fixed." Sensei poked me in the forehead. "But are you okay up here?"

No. But then, I'd always known I had issues. They just…flared whenever I was asked to reach outside my comfort zone.

Or asked to take on such a dangerous responsibility.

Jōnin were generals. They commanded every rank of shinobi below them in wartime, with allowances made for special jōnin skills that outstripped those of the commanding officer. Sensei had been commanding battalions since he was seventeen, and Kakashi would eventually be named a general in the Fourth Shinobi World War in one universe, where two other division commanders were Kage. Then there were jōnin-sensei, entrusted with the care and instruction of genin until promotion, retirement, or death. Or all three.

I wasn't a commander. I was a wrecking ball. And thanks to my homemaker tendencies for the past year, I was barely even that.

"Doesn't feel like it," Sensei commented, and I belatedly realized he was reading my chakra even as I read his. "Kei, what do you say to a bit of field work?"

"Like what?" I asked, as he let go of my shoulder and stood back.

"Something to get you back into the swing of things," was his vague response. My expression must not have been very accommodating, because he added, "Take outside missions again, Kei. Not A-ranked on up or anything. C-ranks. Ease yourself back into the procedures, the pressure. You've been at home so long that I'm not sure even you remember how you used to behave out there."

I probably didn't. Still, a boring old escort mission or something…honestly sounded kind of relaxing. I'd have to have a team, probably, but I'd always been told in my old life that I needed to get out and meet new people. Mom might have mentioned something along those lines back before my first Chūnin Exam, but I wasn't sure if she actually had or if it was just something motherly to say and I was misremembering.

Sensei patted my head this time, smiling sadly. "Heh. It feels like only yesterday you were scaring yourself silly about your personnel file. And now you're an S-class threat to Iwa." He pretended to brush away a tear with his free hand. "Kids grow up so fast."

"Really, Sensei? You're going with that cliché?" I complained.

"Hey, I have to have fun with this parent thing somehow. And Naruto isn't old enough to appreciate the classic lines Jiraiya-sensei used on me." Sensei winked. "Even if you're really old enough to be my little sister."

"Heh, true." I'd never really viewed Sensei as a surrogate dad. Obito could have been thinking along those lines, and I was pretty sure Kakashi did, but me? Nope. I'd had Dad, and a dad before that. And the Dad-shaped hole in my life was not Sensei-shaped and never had been.

"So, will you try this out?" Sensei asked me.

"Yeah. I mean, it's a bunch of C-ranks. It shouldn't be any problem." Somewhat later, I would realize that handing the universe a line like that was just asking for trouble.
But Sensei distracted me by saying, "By the way, can you go and check on Kakashi for me? He seemed put-out yesterday, but I didn't have a chance to talk to him." Sensei looked over at the clock and sighed, "And I have a meeting with Shibi Aburame in ten minutes. I can't leave to go look."

"No Shadow Clones?" I asked him.

"I…don't have the chakra to spare, after yesterday," Sensei said with a wince. "But don't tell anyone."

I mimed zipping my mouth shut.

"Good girl. Now, go see what's going on with Kakashi."

I was gone in moments.

Finding Kakashi in Konoha, with my range as large as it was, turned out to be pretty simple. I could track his lightning signature for kilometers in any direction if I concentrated my expanded chakra on the task, and he wasn't nearly that far away. It was a bit weird, in hindsight—he certainly wasn't the only person with a Lightning affinity in the village. He wasn't even the only person with sparky chakra that I knew. But I could always find him easier than the rest.

In fact, I found Obito and Kakashi's chakra signatures together, around the middle of the business district. So I headed that way, hopping idly from rooftop to rooftop because I could.

I hadn't been taking particular notice how people reacted toward me after my spar with Sensei. I generally didn't try to—while only one person in about a thousand had ever been willing to give me shit over being a jinchūriki, there were a lot of people in Konoha. And a lot more than just one in a thousand had been wary of me. Unable to do much about their feelings, from my perspective, I just let the whole thing sit until the situation changed. I got used to it.

There was an undercurrent of respect in the chakra of the people who saw me, now.

Fear, too, but the fact that the respect was there at all was novel. The business district contained relatively few shinobi households, so civilian presences were thick on the ground. And I still didn't feel excessive fear from them.

Given what Naruto had needed to go through to get that much consideration out of his fellow Konoha citizens, I took that lack of collective fear and scorn as a victory.

I dropped to street level, landing next to a calligraphy supply shop, and focused on my teammates. They were…standing in front of a bookstore about four shops down, so I sauntered over to go and say hi. Though I didn't have high hopes that I'd find out what was up with Kakashi while we were in public, at least I could find out what he and Obito did when they hung out together.

I'd never actually been to this bookstore before. It had a big painting of a smiling green turtle, with a legend proclaiming that the Kame Bookstore had deals anyone would come out of their shell for. I wasn't sure it was true, but I could give them points for the pun and the mob of sales flyers taking up the rest of the window.

I could feel my fingers itch a bit as I thought about how long it had been since I'd gotten my hands on a decent novel. But this wasn't shopping day, so I focused on my friends instead.

Obito stood to one side of the shop's other window, facing my direction while still focused on Kakashi. Kakashi had his back to me, but apparently wasn't paying attention to his surroundings or trusted Obito to watch his back for him. Either-or.

And funnily enough, Obito's expression was becoming more and more irritated the longer I watched. And his chakra matched.

So I sidled up to Kakashi's left shoulder and said, "Hi."

Kakashi glanced at me, seeming slightly interested that I'd showed up, but it was Obito's reaction that surprised me.

"Make him stop!" Obito wailed, throwing himself at me and hugging me around the waist in a death-grip. The impact knocked me back a few steps, since Obito outweighed me by a fair bit, and Obito kept clinging even as he was dragged along the street.

"Stop what?" I asked, bewildered. Why in the world was Obito acting like this?

By that point, Kakashi had turned around as well. He carried a shopping bag with what looked like a few books, and he had one open in his right hand, held so I couldn't read the cover. He gave Obito a nonplussed look, but reserved the completely blank expression for me.

Obito craned his neck so he could glare back at Kakashi. "Don't you start."

Was that a mischievous glint in Kakashi's eye, or was I just imagining it?

"Kei, why did the skeleton want friends?" Kakashi asked.

…What?

Obito glared with his Sharingan active. "Do not—!"

Kakashi talked right over him, saying, "Because he was feeling bonely."

"Pfft." I tried and failed to successfully bite down on the startled laugh. Kakashi didn't joke. It wasn't something he did. It was like seeing Batman trying to read off a bunch of knock-knock jokes, which was probably why I was laughing.

Well, that…and I genuinely liked stupid puns. I mainly liked making them, but had no talent for it. It was why I preferred making references instead, but the people around here wouldn't have understood most of them.

"Kei," Obito whined from around waist height. "Not you, too!"

"He made me get this book instead of one about fūinjutsu," Kakashi said, and held the book up so I could see the cover. One Thousand and One Jokes and Puns. "But by now I'm sure he's drawing a blank on why."

"Oh my god," I managed, though still trying not to giggle.

"You both suck!" Obito snapped.

Yep, there was definitely just a bit of teasing in Kakashi's tone. He held the book up in front of his face and said, "There was another one on lock-picking, but I couldn't get into it."

Nope, couldn't stop the next giggle. Though I couldn't see his face when it was hidden behind the book, his chakra seemed cheery enough.
"That's it!" Obito let go of me and whirled around to face Kakashi, shouting, "You, me, Training Ground Fifteen tomorrow!"

Kakashi shrugged.

Obito grabbed his bags—which had been on the ground behind Kakashi—hopped up to roof height, and then disappeared into thin air via Kamui.

I looked up at where the wormhole thing had been and said, "Okay, I didn't know he hated puns that much."

"It's probably more that I've read the first six pages out loud at this point." Kakashi dropped the book back into his bag and tied the bag shut. He said, "But it got him off my case."

"Does that mean you're out of puns?" I asked, closing the distance between us to see what else he'd bought. Unfortunately, the bag was neither transparent nor translucent, so I couldn't tell what other kinds of books Kakashi was interested in. Rats.

"No, there are about a hundred pages left." Kakashi gave me a curious look. "You really like those kinds of jokes?"

"There's a bit of timing involved, but yeah." Kakashi was actually more upbeat than I expected, if he could annoy the shit out of Obito with something so innocuous. Maybe I didn't need to check on him at all? "Need any help with the books?"

I was curious. So sue me.

Kakashi raised his visible eyebrow and started walking in the general direction of his apartment. Welp.

"I'll take that as a no," I said, following him.

"You'd be right."

And yet I still followed. Sort of like a lost puppy or something.

Kakashi slowed down a bit so I could catch up without picking up my pace, so he said, in response to the expression on my face. "Why are you smiling?"

"Thought of another pun," I said, and smothered the smile.

"Is it bad?" he asked.

I paused. "…Kinda lame, maybe."

Kakashi made a circling motion with his free hand, fingers extended. Well, if he insisted.

"I was just thinking, I was following you around like a lost puppy." I held up my hands, saying, "First thing that came to mind."

"There was an entire section on dog puns in that book," Kakashi mused aloud. He nodded to himself, then said, "That was terrible, Kei. It would have made more sense if you said I was following you like a puppy."

"But you're not." I shook my head, sticking my hands back in my pockets. Great, defensive again. "Hey, I never said I was any good."
"Apparently." Kakashi took a right turn at the end of the street and I followed him, curious still but for a different reason.

I knew Kakashi's apartment was friggin' tiny, and that he didn't really spend much time in it since Sensei and Kushina would always clear a space for him. I knew that Kakashi nonetheless stopped in his apartment first, after any mission that didn't go to hell. While it wasn't much, it was still his space, and people didn't visit it enough for him to feel pressured when he was there.

And there I was, following him anyway. After a while, Kakashi sighed. Then, "Kei, are you going to follow me all the way home?"

Point of order: I was still almost certain that Kakashi considered the Namikaze-Uzumaki household his real home. But I wasn't going to argue about that, and we had better things to talk about.

"Actually, yeah," I said, with a level of casualness that surprised me as much as it did Kakashi. "I was going to talk to you about something, but I guess we could take out two birds in one stone and stuff."

"What birds?" Kakashi asked.

"Well, I want to see what you got from the bookstore, Sensei wanted me to check in on you"—and there was a minute scowl there, under his mask—"and I think you can squeeze me into your schedule for lunch, right?"

Kakashi stopped walking. I could see the whites of his visible eye quite clearly as I turned to see what the problem was, only for him to abruptly jerk his head away so I was looking at the half of his face that was covered by the headband. "You…probably shouldn't visit my apartment right now. It's a mess."

"It can't be worse than my room," I said, skeptical. "And anyway, we don't have to hang out at your house. But I'm hungry and I want to hang out with you, so lunch seems like the best option here."

"…True." Kakashi hefted the shopping back over his shoulder and took to the rooftops without a word, but his chakra seemed to say follow me.

So I did.

At some point in the previous ten years, it might have made sense for traveling via parkour on steroids to lose a bit of its luster. Shinobi traversed the village like that all the time, even if they didn't have to. It should have seemed mundane or boring after long enough.

Nope. I still got a little thrill every time I did it. It was, after all, about the closest thing to flight that most of us could manage.

We reached Kakashi's apartment in about a minute, and he held up a hand to stop me before I could follow him into his building.

"It can't possibly be that bad," I said, still disbelieving.

"Just wait here, Kei," Kakashi said with a sigh, and slipped in through his apartment's sole window. His place was on the second floor, but apparently lacked all but the ground-level entrance for some stupid reason.

I sat on the roof and waited with badly-disguised impatience, kicking my feet idly out over the edge of the roof. There was some shuffling going on in the apartment itself, but I pretended I was deaf for about two minutes to be polite.

During that time, I observed.

Kakashi lived in a shinobi-majority district, sort of like the one I lived in with Hayate. However, while I knew Genna's place was owned and maintained by the Aburame clan, and that my house was sort of in this neutral zone where the Hokage actually had more influence than any one clan, I couldn't have said which clan controlled rent around Kakashi's place. The Inuzuka clan was that way, and the Akimichi, Yamanaka, and Nara clans owned property around here…

Then someone called up to me, "Keisuke-kun? What are you doing up there?"

I looked down and spotted Fuse Inuzuka, along with her husband Yatsu and the biggest dog they had.

It had been about a year since I'd interacted with Fuse outside of Hokage Guard duties, since she was one of the few retirees who had survived the Tenth and we'd been pretty short-handed. Her hair was still done up like a pair of upright canine ears, and she was wearing a casual kimono instead of her shinobi gear.

Yatsu had his hair pulled into this strange, loose ponytail that allowed two long sections to fall over his ears like, well, floppy dog ears. He didn't look at me—still blind—but managed to wave in my direction anyway. Was it echolocation, or was he taking cues from the big hound this time? Or was he also a sensor?

"I'm waiting on a friend," I replied, waving back to them though Yatsu couldn't see it. "It's nice to see you."

"Are you referring to Kakashi-kun?" Fuse asked.

"Yep," I said. Hm. "Say, who owns this district? Or at least this building?"

"The Inuzuka clan does," Fuse replied. "But specifically, my brother is the manager here."

"I didn't know shinobi could do that," I said, surprised. "Doesn't he have to run missions, too?"

Yatsu shrugged. "No. Not every clan throws all of its members into combat roles." There was the slightest bit of an edge in his voice, which made me wonder just which clan he was talking about. Sure, the Inuzuka were a bit infamous for their combat mission record, but…

…Did he really hate the Hyūga clan that much?

Kakashi drew back the blinds on his window and opened it, peering out. Since I was basically sitting where a window box might have gone if he had one, he didn't have to ask where I'd run off to. "Kei, who are you talking to?"

"Down here, Kakashi-kun!" Fuse said, with her hands cupped around her mouth. "How are you today?"

"Fine," Kakashi replied, and slipped out the window with the speed and grace of someone who had done it a million times before. He tapped my shoulder with two fingers as he passed and dropped to ground level.

"See you later, Fuse-san, Yatsu-san!" And once again, I followed.
"Do you have any idea what their deal is?" I asked Kakashi a while later, over a couple of bowls of egg-topped udon.

We'd decided not to go to Ichiraku's, just because we had memorized the place's menu and anyway Kakashi wanted to splurge a tiny bit. So somehow, that got us a place in an udon restaurant instead.

The restaurant wasn't particularly upscale, but it had booths. That meant I could slap a privacy seal down on the table while we ate, so we could talk about whatever. I'd take the seal off when it was time to pay for our food.

"Whose deal?" Kakashi asked. Secure in the knowledge that I had seen his unmasked face before and not cared, and that the security seals were pretty near impossible to pierce, he stirred his noodles once and then scooped some into his mouth. Unlike, say, Obito, he could listen and eat at the same time.

"Yatsu-san and Fuse-san," I said, picking up one of the slices of egg with my chopsticks. "I've never really talked to them outside of work, so…"

Kakashi nodded mostly to himself, then swallowed. Then he said, "I know that Yatsu-san left his clan before I was born. My neighbors say he's been blind for at least as long, and Fuse-san acts like one fact has a lot to do with the other."

"Really?" I couldn't quite imagine what it would have been like. A Hyūga, completely blind—and then chucked out of his clan like last week's trash. Christ. "That's…that's pretty horrible."

"There's a lot of bad blood there," was all Kakashi said after that. "You'd have to ask them for more detail."

I frowned, shaking my head. "No, it was rude of me to pry at all."

Kakashi continued eating, making slurping sounds as he went. I didn't have a solid grasp on how much he could eat, but it looked like one bowl of udon wasn't going to be enough.

I ate the egg slice and chewed slowly as I thought. Well, that was one avenue of conversation exhausted.

"Kei, what did you need to talk to me about?" Kakashi asked, once every noodle in his udon was gone, leaving a small amount of broth at the bottom.

"I…hm. Sensei just told me to." Which was not, perhaps, the most flattering way to put it. Being ordered to hang out with someone sounded pretty harsh. "Or maybe he just wanted to make sure I wasn't in the office. I don't know. But are you okay?"

While I slurped down my noodles in turn, Kakashi drained his broth and thought. After a while, he said, "Obito was being annoying, but I'm fine. You?"

I set my bowl down once it was empty, exhaling with a satisfied air. That hit the spot. Thinking about Kakashi's question, though, I didn't really want to just brush him off the way he'd just done to me. Or the way he had responded to Fuse's casual concern earlier. "…Sort of."

Kakashi's visible eyebrow rose, and his mouth quirked to one side. While I'd gotten used to reading his expressions when only one-quarter of his face was showing, it was a new and baffling development to be able to read his jaw and mouth without the mask in the way. "What does that mean?"
"Sensei asked me if I wanted to be promoted to full jōnin, but I'm not sure if I'm ready." I poked around at the side dishes available—grilled saury was there for both of us, though I'd pushed my portion over to Kakashi without a word. Hm, that left rice, miso, pickled daikon…

Kakashi gave me a flat look. "So you're turning it down."

"No, I…" I trailed off, meeting his eye briefly. Then my gaze was down at the tabletop again. "I don't know."

"You've never led a formal mission above C-rank before, but October Tenth and Kannabi were both at least A-ranked missions. And then there was the incident in the Land of Rivers," Kakashi said, a frown in his voice. He only stumbled a little, though. "So I don't see why it's a 'don't know' and not 'not yet'."

"I don't think I can do it," I admitted to my bowl of rice, rather than looking at Kakashi. "But I don't want to disappoint anyone."

"The only person you're really worried about disappointing is yourself," Kakashi replied, planting his elbow on the table and resting his chin in his upraised palm. "The fact that Sensei even offered you the chance for a promotion shows that he thinks you can do it. Everyone who saw you fight would agree, which is why Sensei decided to make it public."

"So it wasn't just because I blabbed about it at the wrong venue?" I tried for a joking tone, but it fell a bit flat.

"No. Or at least not totally." Kakashi took his bowl of rice and looked speculatively between the two saury on offer, as though deciding which one to eat first. "Obito's probably going to be due for his jōnin spar soon enough, so it's not just you. The three of us are some of the most dangerous jōnin—or special jōnin—Konoha can deploy, so there was always going to be some kind of…push."

Well, at least it wasn't personal.

"So you think I should go for it?" I asked, as Kakashi bit the fish's head off.

He nodded. After swallowing, he added, "Or at least think long and hard before giving a flat 'no' to Sensei."

Hm. It had been less than an hour…

Kakashi finished the saury in a moment, then said, "Well, we can talk about something else."

I reached for the security seal very slowly, giving time for Kakashi to pull his mask back up if he wanted. "Round two?"

Kakashi nodded.

Round two—kitsune udon for me and tsumiki udon for him—arrived shortly. I was a little leery of the raw egg in Kakashi's bowl, which was being poached from the heat of the soup, but had no such problems with the fried tofu topping my order. Om nom nom.

Still put the privacy seal down again, to deter prying eyes or eavesdropping ears.

"What books did you get?" I asked, after chomping one of the aburaage pieces in half for easier manipulation.
"The joke book, as you saw," Kakashi said, "And then one I just wanted to get. But the last one is a surprise."

"It is?" Given that he hadn't even told me what the second one was, what was the third supposed to be? I smiled uncertainly. What had I walked into?

"If you are promoted, it will be your present," Kakashi said, meeting my eyes just for a moment before his gaze skittered off to the side somewhere. Right as his cheekbones started to color a bit, he dove into his bowl. Not literally, but I couldn't really expect to get anything more out of him for a bit.

It was just weird to be able to see Kakashi's whole face. Was the soup too hot for him? It certainly cooked that egg…

I scratched my scar before shrugging to myself and copying the one-time Copy Ninja. Well, even if the book was a bribe of sorts for making jōnin, I was still curious enough to want to ask about it later.

For a few minutes, the only sound involved was either slurping or chewing, and the clicking of chopsticks and spoons.

Then I broke the silence, once I had eaten all of the tofu and was just toying with the noodles. I said, "So… That second book. It isn't anything like that book we read in Suna, is it?"

Kakashi paused, with his bowl still held up to his mouth. He slurped down the rest of the soup and set the bowl on the table again, then dabbed at his mouth with a napkin. Stalling.

I drummed my fingers on the table, staring at Kakashi.

He stared back.

For a moment, it was like something passed between us. If we'd been dogs, I would have been something like a dominance display. Who'd give up first?

Kakashi looked away and mumbled, "It's the, um. It's the first of Jiraiya-sama's new series."

"I didn't know he'd managed to get a publisher," I said, though I should have. It'd been a year since I'd put my two cents in on his first draft, along with Kushina and Sensei and whoever else Jiraiya had conned into reading it. "What's the title? Is it any good?"

"It's from the Icha-Icha series, though there's only one book so far." Kakashi still wasn't looking at me, and was steadily getting redder. "It's called Icha-Icha Paradise."

"Make-Out Paradise. I wondered if it still had its infamous orange cover and the R-18 warning, but that wouldn't have explained how Kakashi could get his hands on it if that was the case. Had something changed significantly in the editing process?"

"Any decent reviews?"

Kakashi shrugged, still avoiding my gaze. "I don't think it was really the critic-first kind of book."

I made a neutral noise. "Well, whenever you're done, can I borrow it?"

"You're already getting one book from me," Kakashi said defensively, with a sidelong glare in my direction. "Wait until you get that one before you ask."

"Which I'm only going to get if I get promoted." At this, Kakashi nodded. So I said, with my face heating up a bit, "So I'm being bribed with books, one porn and one not."
"It's a romantic comedy," Kakashi corrected me, huffy to the last. In a mutter, he added, "Jiraiyasama had to cut some scenes for the first printing."

I thought of some of the stuff that Kushina had commented on and nodded to myself. That made sense, though I imagined that Jiraiya wouldn't have been happy about it. Then again, he'd get to release an ultra-special collector's edition later with all the sex scenes put back in for more money on the same manuscript. Probably.

Was that even how book publishing worked?

It worked for video games, anyway. In a "hey, look at all the stuff we would have added in if we had more time and/or any reservations about talking all your money."

Still, I let the topic drop after nothing else seemed to come to mind. And I couldn't exactly complain to Kakashi about DLC dependency in an industry from a dead universe. Or a universe I was dead to. Whatever.

"Are you training with anyone now?" Kakashi asked, "I saw a lot of Water Release jutsu from you, in each stage of the transformation, but it seemed like you were relying heavily on the Three-Tails's power instead of yours."

"I know. Sensei's just too tricky to take on otherwise," I replied, toying with my remaining udon. "But as for more elemental ninjutsu, I'm all ears. It's just that I didn't have any time to train in, say, Fire." Which, as a nature transformation that was close to Water on the wheel, was an absolute pain to learn. Or it probably would have been, if I put any effort into it…

"You should probably think about learning the Shadow Clone jutsu," Kakashi suggested, to my surprise. "What? You have more chakra than Sensei and Obito combined. As long as Sensei signs off on it, you can learn it."

"Is that how you learned it?" I asked, having never really thought about the idea before. Clearly, Kakashi had needed to learn that technique somewhere, and the nature of the technique help him polish any number of other skills solely because they were a physical and mental force multiplier. Having one person who could use the Shadow Clone jutsu in a team meant that they could effectively be in two places at once.

Sensei preferred to stack the deck even more by adding the Flying Thunder God teleportation into the mix, but there was potential there. Even for the non-teleporters on our team.

"Yes," Kakashi said shortly.

Well, well, well. No wonder no one had ever called Naruto out for learning the technique, even though it was forbidden. As soon as someone with enough clearance signed off on it, he was in the clear. Given that the kid had beaten up a traitor with it and had an in with the Third Hokage, there wasn't any real question.

Speaking of traitors, I probably needed to keep an eye on some of the kids running around with their genin teams now.

It turned out that I zoned out a bit, wondering about off-topic things like that. It must have been at least a minute of silence from me, which probably turned the atmosphere rather awkward.

So Kakashi tried to break it. He cleared his throat and said, "Kei, I—" And that was as far as Kakashi got, because both he and I jerked to attention as a new chakra signature made itself known right next to us.
Kakashi pulled his mask up, and I ripped the seal off the tabletop.

"Sensei wants us in the office right now," Obito said, with no preamble. The expression on his face was a match for any of Kakashi's game faces, with his normally-cheery face still and his eye narrowed.

Kakashi stood up first, counting out ryō notes by feel even as I slid out of the booth and snatched my sword off the floor. "What's the situation?" Kakashi asked sharply.

Obito shook his head. "Can't tell you here."

Fair enough. Once Kakashi finished paying for both of our meals (which I would need to remember to pay back), I gave the restaurant at large an assessing look. While Obito was a nervous mass of chakra, no one else seemed to have taken any particular notice.

"Done," Kakashi said. "Let's go."

And all three of us zipped out of there, at Body Flicker speed.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title comes from that one song featuring Ed Sheeran.

On to news:
1. There are two new side-stories up on the cyb-by-lang tumblr account, under the tag "fan works," for more reading material. (I didn't write either, so they're not on The B-Plot.) And there is also new art for the story, on the same blog's "art" tag!
2. Check the "word of god" or "this shit is canon" tags for out-of-story information, confirmation, and other fun things!
3. I'm starting a new job sometime this week (or next week), so writing time is gonna be at a premium for a while. Sorry, folks!

The only experience I'd had with the big clan council chambers was not a pleasant one. Two years ago, Kakashi and I had been hauled up in front of Fugaku Uchiha and whoever else felt like reaming us up one side and down the other about the clusterfuck that had been Kannabi. And both of us had been in the perfect psychological pitfall that it felt like we'd deserved every bit of side-eyeing, lecturing, ranting, and suspicion that people could drag out. Those memories, for me, seemed burned into the wood and plaster in the building like old ghosts, and I gave an instinctive shudder as the three of us strode through the empty halls.

There was a mass of agitated chakra up ahead—while the component signatures weren't the same, this situation felt unpleasantly familiar.

Obito hadn't been there, so he didn't hesitate for the half-step that Kakashi and I did when we entered the building. And he didn't lead us toward the crowded chamber—instead, we were heading onward and upward to Sensei's office.

"Why does Sensei need us?" I asked in a whisper as we went, finally losing patience.

"He needs Operative Crane," was Obito's reply, and I could feel his chakra humming underneath his skin in a way that reminded me of Kakashi. It felt like a banked flame, contained for the moment but certainly capable of breaking its chains.

Speaking of, Kakashi's earlier awkwardness had melted away. His jaw tensed underneath his mask, and he flexed his hands methodically as though expecting that he'd have to use them to kill someone. His chakra buzzed like a live wire.

I frowned and didn't ask anything else.

Operative Crane, from the start, had been a cover for whatever Sensei needed. For the most part, I'd been the one who supplied the information that Sensei couldn't find anywhere else solely because we didn't live in the universe that my information was from. I'd also been the one to stitch new facts and figures together, but my role had never been that of a field agent.

I was...overt. Quite aside from the issues with fielding a jinchūriki without every sensor sitting up and taking notice, I'd never been trained to be much other than either the support or backbone of a team. I had basic shinobi stealth figured out, but I'd lost the ability to totally suppress my chakra since Isobu had come along. People would know someone was there. And if they knew that, they could act on it.

But Obito was a different story.

I hadn't asked what Obito was doing to enforce the power of the Operative Crane mantle, but it was fairly obvious now that he'd had more to do with the operations side of things than I had. While I sat at home and read through file cabinets, Obito was doing things.

Like using Kamui. While Sensei was no slouch, having a second person in Konoha's forces with access to exclusive space-time ninjutsu was invaluable for strategic purposes. His power gave us an edge that literally no other shinobi could replicate.

Except Kakashi. But he wasn't really there yet. Older-him had gone thirteen years without even knowing the Mangekyō Sharingan existed. Even when he was nearly thirty, two uses would put him in the hospital for a month. Kakashi was playing it very safe to avoid killing himself through chakra exhaustion.

"Pre-meeting briefing?" Kakashi asked, barely louder than a breath, jarring me out of my thoughts.

"Yeah," said Obito, not much louder.

It was the quietest and most awkward walk to Sensei's office since the time…since… Hm. Since sometime before this, probably. I just couldn't think of anything that stood out. Maybe that time when Obito and Kakashi had both passed out from chakra exhaustion and Genma and Raidō came with me to the office instead?

Before I knew it, we had arrived.

Obito held the door open for Kakashi and me, and we slipped inside without a sound.

Good thing, too, given that there were already some people there, and there was already a meeting of sorts in progress as a result.

Sensei stood up from his desk when we entered, but with the faintest of winces. He didn't hesitate for more than a half-second, but I felt his chakra emphasize the moment of sudden weakness. Still, he said, "Good, you're here."

To Sensei's left, arrayed among the filing cabinets that might have been pulled out of storage, were the Third Hokage, Jiraiya, and Tsunade. To his right, Kushina and Shikaku Nara stood waiting patiently for the three of us to file on in.

I hate not knowing what I'm walking into, and this situation was no exception.

Obito closed the door behind us and the office's seals flared to life in my mind's eye, locking our secrets in with us.

Sensei sat back down again, perhaps with the faintest hint of relief. "I suppose you're wondering why I called you here."

"I'm not," Jiraiya muttered.

"Thank you, Jiraiya-sensei, for that input," Sensei said dryly.

Tsunade elbowed Jiraiya, who yelped.
"Thank you, Tsunade-chan," the Third Hokage said without apparently giving a shit if anyone heard him. The perks of being retired, I supposed.

Obito sighed from next to me, shaking his head. He said, "Okay, Sensei, we're all here. But why?"

"Two floors below us, we're going to be dragging all of Danzō Shimura's dark deeds into the light," Sensei went on, as though the various S-class shinobi in the room weren't acting like Academy Students while the teacher was being boring. "We have thirty minutes before we have to be down there, but the clans have assembled before the deadline." Sensei briefly drummed his fingers against his desk. "And we're going to get our secrets out of the way right now, so there are no surprises down there."

I blinked. Wait, he couldn't mean my "visions," could he?

"Sarutobi-sama, Kushina. Operative Crane is two individuals. You're looking at them." Sensei nodded toward Obito and me. "Keisuke supplies information analysis. Obito's Kamui ability makes him impossible to keep out of secure facilities."

"Not impossible…" Obito said, at the same time that I said, "Well, a little."

Shikaku nodded slowly, though I had no doubt he'd worked out some of this on his own. I could see him slot us into new categories in his head, accept the shape his thoughts formed, and move on to the next stage of his strategy without missing a beat.

"Don't downplay your contributions," Sensei rebuked us mildly, but he didn't dwell on it. Instead he prompted, "Sarutobi-sama…?"

I might have imagined the room's temperature falling, but I shivered anyway. This was getting into really heavy territory, and with people I didn't honestly know all that well. What was Sensei going to expect us to do in the meeting?

"Danzō," the Third Hokage said heavily. "was my friend. But it has become clear to me that while I considered him a trusted advisor, he did not believe the same of me. Not for some time."

Jiraiya sighed. "He made a point of acting like a harmless old war hawk whenever you were around. But he wasn't as careful around me, or around Minato. Guess he thought we were too young to read him."

"I'm not sure that 'harmless' and 'war hawk' go together," Kakashi frowned. "Are we just airing grievances?"

"Yes, and no. In truth, this meeting is so we can all establish a…baseline. What Danzō did to us, or around us, that puts us on the clans' side," Sensei said. "The clans are going to be furious when I explain what happened with ROOT. But I'd rather they rant and rave at a time I choose rather than watching helplessly as the information explodes in ten or twenty years."

Kakashi's visible eye narrowed. "You want me to bring up that Danzō tried to recruit me? Twice?"

"Forcibly," Minato added.

"But don't bring up Tenzō's name," Tsunade interrupted, crossing her arms over her chest.

"I wasn't going to. I can barely bring up what I was doing at the time," Kakashi replied. Ah, right. He'd been on an ANBU mission of sorts. Not really official, but he'd been out of the village without anyone knowing…
Obito tilted his head to one side. He frowned thoughtfully and, after a while, said, "I don't know if he ever tried to do anything to me. I mean, I was legally dead and stuff for a while there. I had another creepy old guy to worry about."

"Then you need to catch up on your reading, kid," Jiraiya said, shaking his head. He turned to the nearest file cabinet and dug through it, then pulled out a pair of files. Just at a glance, one of them had my name and the other had Obito's written on it.

"What—that's my name." Obito caught the file as Jiraiya tossed it at him, then snatched the second out of the air and absently handed it off to me. "Sensei?"

I was already flipping through a…what the shit? "This is a transfer request. Off of Team Minato." I swallowed. "O-Obito, what…?"

"Mine's a medical exam order," Obito said, his voice carefully controlled. "Full physical for me, which I distinctly remember not getting. Emphasis on the—why the hell would anyone need to focus on the eye that didn't get removed?"

The adults in the room didn't seem surprised at all. Sensei must have spoken to them before we arrived. But Kakashi was staring at us both, his visible eye wide in surprise.

I flipped to the next page. And I saw red. "This—he thought—"

I felt Shikaku and Sensei nod.

"That fucking bastard thought he could take my brother!" I demanded, feeling my eyes itch in a way that meant Isobu's chakra was leaking into mine again. "To take us both into ROOT and, what, celebrate his new pets? And he tried to do it officially!"

"He was also interested in Kakashi's transplanted eye," Obito says, flipping through his file. "What was he going to do with all of this?"

While I seethed, I thought quickly. Danzō's involvement in these files meant nothing good. If I somehow got hold of a chart outlining the essential features of a "good person" in moral and ethical meanings of the word, then compared a chart of Danzō's essential personality features in a Venn diagram, I would have only been able to put one item in the overlapping middle. And that phrase was "well-intentioned." With question marks.

"Currently unknown," Sensei said, and I jerked my head toward him in surprise. He didn't want to talk about my "visions," even though they were a good chunk of the reasons we'd gone after the old man at all? Only Tsunade and Shikaku hadn't been personally informed. I knew why Danzō had been after Obito's eye and arm, and most of it involved self-improvement through surgery.

It wasn't like I'd ever seen a ROOT agent benefit from Danzō's bullshit. Including Tenzō.

"I wanted to give you all a chance to avoid being surprised by what information pertains to you personally." Sensei glanced at Jiraiya, who frowned. "The clans are going to accuse us of being complicit in the councilman's actions. It's not an unreasonable conclusion to make. But we all know perfectly well that we were the ones who finally stopped him."

"Konan-chan never did say if she was going to ship those ROOT agents back to us," Jiraiya said, seemingly out of nowhere. "We got everyone who reported in when the old man had a chance to start screaming. That does leave any number of them in the wild, but they may rot on the vine. They may not. We need the clans' weapons pointed at our enemies, not at each other."
"Given," Shikaku said. The scarred Jōnin Commander's eyes narrowed. "You're expecting something beyond the usual screaming matches."

Entering the council room still felt like walking to a hanging. I wasn't on trial, and neither were Obito and Kakashi. But if the clans came to blows in that room, blood was going to coat the ceiling. And knowing how worked up I was about Hayate and what Danzō had tried to do, I'd probably be a contributing factor.

"Your eyes are still gold, Kei," Obito whispered to me just before we entered.

I gave a helpless shrug and just walked in after Kakashi, who was holding the doors open for our group. There were enough stupid eye techniques around that I didn't care how much I stood out. I was just going to sit in Sensei's corner like a good weapon and avoid starting anything with anybody else. Couldn't be that hard, right?

Sensei made his way to what was about the middle of a massive ring of stands. As the Hokage, he got his own section instead of having to take the floor or anything like that. The room was shaped in such a way that his section could hear the faintest whispers in the room if the seals were active, and any sound produced in his immediate vicinity was not transferred at all. Just in case secrets needed to avoid being spilled.

It was something to do with architecture that I didn't get, and seal work, which I did. Something like ovals? Elliptical…? Whatever.

But none of that was terribly important.

No, instead the important factors in this...what, open forum? Not really open—I could only spot one member of each clan representing their interests. No council of clan elders. No children or nominally unbiased individuals. At least there were some familiar faces, despite my mixed feelings about some of the people said faces belonged to.

In the Hyūga corner, Hiashi was glaring around the chamber at basically everyone. As a small mercy, his Byakugan wasn't active. No one needed anyone else getting a look at their insides at a meeting like this. There was also probably a rule against it, even if the Byakugan wasn't terribly subtle.

The current head of the Akimichi clan, Chōza, sat between Shikaku and Inoichi. While not oblivious, the man didn't seem nearly as keyed up as Hiashi was. Actually, he was talking to the Yamanaka representative without sparing any particular concern for the rest of the room. It was as though he didn't believe the outcome of the meeting would have much impact on his clan.

Off to his right and forming a third corner, Fugaku Uchiha examined the battlefield. While he didn't have the same degree of frostiness as Hiashi, I noticed that only became the case once he spotted Obito sitting off to Sensei's right. He gave my teammate a minute nod once he caught his eye, and Obito blinked rapidly before cautiously nodding back.

Oookay, apparently there had been more than just one kind of therapy going on.

And then, sitting in the last corner of the room like a fourth pillar, Shibi Aburame sat with his hands hidden and his collar pulled up to his nose. He had carried a large, buzzing satchel into the meeting, which I assumed meant that there were other kikai-related concerns that he couldn't just drop. I didn't blame him for prioritizing other things.

Everyone else was, after all.
And between each noble clan, there were others.

As the only living, adult Senju, Tsunade was sitting with her head propped up on her closed fist and her expression as bored as she could make it. Speaking as someone who was familiar with Kakashi, and as someone who owned a mirror, Tsunade had the best resting bitchface I'd ever seen. As I watched, she held up her other hand and started examining her painted nails as though the meeting was a complete and utter waste of her time.

(Which it was.)

Tsume Inuzuka sat near Tsunade with her arms crossed over her flak jacket with Kuromaru by her side. She eyed the assembled clan representatives with interest, but didn't really comment. She looked amused when she spotted my team and me, but also faintly disappointed when all three of us ended up in Sensei's corner.

The Third Hokage, representing the Sarutobi clan, had already started smoking. He hadn't gotten around to blowing smoke rings, but Tsunade was providing a perfect example of exactly how much impact this meeting had for most of the S-class ninjas here. So I wouldn't have been surprised if he started. In someone's face. For being an uncooperative jerk.

I had a few candidates in mind. It was a pity that only one of them was in this room.

Speaking of people holding the title of Hokage, Sensei's corner was a bit crowded. Kushina was sitting directly to Sensei's right and Jiraiya was on his left side. Then Sensei's three most adorable students (meaning us) were spread out from there.

I hunkered down in my seat and looked at Sensei out of the corner of my eye. When was he going to…?

"I see that everyone has arrived promptly," Sensei said, as though we hadn't been the last ones to get there. By like an hour. "You may be wondering why I called for a representative from each major clan to meet here today."

Tsunade rolled her eyes. "Get on with it, brat."

Sensei went on, apparently oblivious, "Some of you may already have noticed that the number of mission-kills has fallen in the last year."

Tsume said, "The war's been over for three." Which was not the same as pointing out the obvious, exactly. Tsume's eyes were narrowed to slits. "So what makes the last year so special?"

...A lot. The thing with Sunagakure and the adjustments made to Gaara's seal, the attacks led by Kirigakure that went literally nowhere thanks to our strength and the Mizukage apparently going bonkers, and so on and so forth. And then there was that big fight yesterday, which I imagined made a lot of people a lot of different amounts of money. We'd had a pretty busy year, actually.

"Aside from our burgeoning alliance with Sunagakure?" Sensei smiled unpleasantly. "The ANBU faction known as ROOT has been disassembled over the course of the last year, with the process reaching completion just last week with its leader."

There was a long, long pause.

"What the fuck is ROOT?" Tsume asked.

Not the first time someone was going to be thinking that today, in my opinion. Tsume was just the only one to say that out loud. If Tsunade and Kushina hadn't already known, though I imagined that they would have had something to say, too. The way Sensei described ROOT, it could have easily been some kind of weapon or factory of some kind, and not an army of human beings raised from childhood to be perfect weapons.

There was something screwy about how much time and effort the people on this continent seemed to devote to that ideal.

"A faction within ANBU," Sensei repeated, still smiling away. "Until recently, it functioned as Danzō Shimura's private army."

Fugaku abruptly went paler than normal, with his eyes giving off a brief red glow before flickering out. I didn't turn my head fast enough to see if Obito had done the same in response.

Shibi Aburame adjusted his glasses, seeming to frown behind his collar.

Huh? Had these two in particular had a bad history with Danzō? No one else had a reaction really worth noting.

"Shimura was a respected member of the community," Hiashi said, but I could feel the gears turning in his head thanks to my chakra sense. Sensei probably could, too. His frown became more severe. "Though it does not preclude his involvement, I believe I recall meeting him on more than one occasion. He did not have the physical ability to command unwilling shinobi."

There were a couple of nods.

Like that matters, I thought.

"Like it takes that much," Tsunade muttered, but her expression was slowly working its way up to something murderous. "You didn't see the medical records I dug up. Or the corpses."

"Bodies, Tsunade-sama?" Chōza asked, appalled. "Elder Torifu would have said something!"

I was pretty sure I saw the Third Hokage blow a smoke ring as he waited for the brief protest to die down, but I wasn't sure if he was aiming it at anyone. While he wasn't exactly in his peak fighting condition, he was hardly any older than Jiraiya had been during the second half of Naruto's story. And that guy had never been a pushover.

Did Danzō train? Ever? I was fairly certain I remembered how he had walked with a cane at some point, but I wasn't certain whether he'd started investing in surgical upgrades for compensating for an arm injury or if he'd actually cut off his original, functional arm for a Zetsu one loaded up with Sharingan. And since Tsunade had gotten him, it was probably one of those questions I would never be able to answer.

"Hence the comment about this issue being within ANBU, I believe. Why? Because no covert operation within a covert organization would dare reveal itself," Shibi put in, turning his head to face Sensei. "Because then the village could claim to have no knowledge if the ruse were discovered. Therefore, Shimura acted in the best interests of the village. Theoretically."

Devil's advocates were everywhere.

Still, Sensei didn't tell Shibi to be quiet. Instead, he waited for additional input.

He knew something I didn't. While a perfectly accurate statement for the other three hundred and sixty-four days in a year, too, it pertained very particularly to this situation and this person. Maybe Mainly because a bunch of them died. I remembered something about the Second Shinobi World War, and about the death of the Second Hokage, but further detail was a bit spotty.

"And in turn, I ordered ROOT disbanded at the end of the Third Shinobi World War," the Third Hokage said heavily. "ANBU used to depend on ROOT for training purposes. Obviously, this was an old and disregarded practice more than ten years ago, but Danzō wished to maintain his troop numbers even after ANBU became more adept at fielding entirely non-ROOT agents. His forces lost relevance entirely, but I might have let him maintain an honor guard of his own if not for information uncovered just before young Minato-kun took office."

This was news to me. I had always figured that ANBU had been created first, with ROOT as a kind of insidious infection spreading throughout it like a cancer. If ROOT had been ANBU's training program gone bad, the Third Hokage's tolerance for its existence made more sense. He had probably assumed that there was no way his old friend could have been such a bastard.

Funny. He'd made the same assumption about Orochimaru.

I wasn't really inclined to be charitable, to say the least. Even if he had been the Hokage I'd technically grown up with. As far as I was concerned, Sensei was the only Hokage I'd ever really be able to think of as absolutely trustworthy. It wasn't really that he was on my side. I was on his.

We just had to get everyone else over here, too.

"Speaking of that," Sensei said, "Jiraiya-sensei?"

Jiraiya shrugged and got to his feet so he could make use of his height and lung capacity to carry the crowd. "About a year ago, ROOT agents were deployed to Amegakure to secure an alliance with Hanzō the Salamander. Supposedly, he would owe ROOT a debt if they could corner and wipe out a rebel force called Akatsuki and secure his hold on Ame."

Muttering broke out. Akatsuki might not have been quite a household name, but it was hard not to notice the only group on the continent with a known Rinnegan user. Nagato had a bingo book bounty with eight zeros in it, mostly because of his eyes. The remaining millions came from adding the bounties of people he or his friends recruited into Akatsuki...or the hostile forces that the three of them killed. Horribly.

"Tsunade and I intervened, thanks to a timely tip," Jiraiya said with a shrug. "And one of the ROOT agents coughed up their mission. I backtracked the rest of the information and the sealing work I saw. Shimura was more ambitious than smart that time." Jiraiya looked around the room. "You might remember one of those rebels as Nagato Uzumaki, who single-handedly held off the invasion force on the northern side of the village by squashing it into slurry. Or who later assisted in reconstruction efforts here in the wake of the October Tenth attack."

More muttering. Tsume turned to Tsunade and commented at a volume too low to hear, but Tsunade just rolled her eyes.

"One of my other students, Yahiko, helped secure our alliance with Sunagakure," Jiraiya said, "which Minato set in stone. Amegakure and Konohagakure are the most tightly aligned villages in the Elemental Countries, and in adding Sunagakure to the group we have secured some of the most powerful shinobi on the continent." Jiraiya added, as though to rub salt in the wound, "None of which would have happened if Shimura had gotten his way. Instead of getting three S-class shinobi, their village, and their organization in our corner, Danzō would have gotten backing for whatever he, and he alone, wanted to accomplish in that region. We already know from experience that he wasn't sharing his toys with anyone else."

And Hanzō, while unlikely to have gotten a backdoor into Konoha out of the deal, would have probably continued to oppress Amegakure or keep it in the Second Shinobi World War or whatever. I hadn't studied the guy much, ever, but it had seemed especially pointless once Akatsuki and two Sannin had killed him and all of his diehard troops.

"That's just one example of Shimura running operations behind the village's collective back." Sensei nodded at Jiraiya, who sat down and looked thoughtfully up at the ceiling. Sensei cleared his throat and said, "However the next example is more serious, which is why I asked for a clan registry from each of you."

"All right," Inoichi said, "I'll bite. Why do you need clan registries? Is it the names?"

"Yes and no," Sensei said. "What I really need is the list of birth dates."

"...ROOT was the training division," Fugaku said, and this time his Sharingan was up and spinning in agitation. "Are you telling me that he was recruiting from our clans?"

"Occasionally," Sensei replied, his gaze drifting across the room to alight on a particular face. "And that would be your cue, Shibi-san."

The Aburame man stood, adjusting his glasses again to more fully cover his eyes. And then he began to speak. "This story may not be familiar to some of you in this room. Why? Because you are the heads of your respective clans, and Shimura did not often deal with those who could challenge him in a court of public influence." Shibi's voice was deceptively even, given what I thought he was building up to. "I am not so well-connected."

I was willing to bet that he would be, after this.

"Torune is the name of a child of one of my clansmen, who died in the field years ago. Shikuro, as I would later discover, was a ROOT agent of some renown within his organization." Shibi's hidden eyes seemed to drill into Hiashi, of all people. "Torune's kikai are too dangerous to be controlled until he is older. Why do I know this? Because Shikuro was known for his intensely destructive, unique hive composition. While I cannot allow him to attend the Academy until he has more experience, I chose to raise Torune as a son. As Shino's brother."

"When did you become aware that Shikuro Aburame was a ROOT agent?" Sensei asked.

"When Danzō Shimura approached me, one year ago, with the intent of taking my son away," was Shibi's reply.

My fists clenched in sudden, shocked anger. What?!

Obito's Zetsu arm clapped down onto my shoulder to keep me from getting to my feet.

There was more muttering among the clan representatives. In particular, Tsume and Chōza looked (and sounded, via growling and Kuromaru) furious. With both clans being highly group-oriented, it was no surprise. Shikaku's eyes had narrowed dangerously, and Inoichi looked appalled.
Hiashi was stoic, but had fallen suspiciously silent over the course of the meeting. Did...did he know something we didn't, or was he even more suspicious of the village because of these revelations? Was he feeling more or less willing to come to Sensei about problems like this? His chakra control was good enough to be annoying.

And Fugaku's Sharingan drilled figurative holes into the opposite wall as he fumed. I wasn't sure he even noticed it was active. "He just walked up to you and demanded that you give up a child?"

"Yes. Does this sound familiar, Uchiha-dono?" Shibi asked, raising one dark eyebrow.

Took the words right out of my mouth, Shibi. I did know that Danzō had a kind of hate-boner for the Uchiha clan that went further back than the Uchiha Massacre, but it sounded like we were about to find out some of the details.

"What did Shimura threaten if you didn't turn Torune-kun over to him?" Fugaku asked instead.

"Shimura wished to take either of my children," Shibi corrected, his tone calm in the face of Fugaku's anger. "Shikuro's death left him without an Aburame agent. I concluded that while Shikuro was an adult and could make his decisions, I would not allow Shimura to make mine for me. I would not give up Torune or Shino. And in reply, he asked if I wished my clan's lands...repossessed." Shibi met Fugaku's Sharingan from behind his shades and said firmly, "It was not a compelling offer. He then insinuated that my clan could suffer further consequences for my refusal. I reaffirmed my decision, and he left without incident."

Oh. That...that explained a lot. In a bad way. Why the Uchiha clan had felt pressured by the village. Why it seemed like the majority of the clan lived solely in the District, as though there was no place for them outside of it. Why their petitions to the Council had been rejected over and over again.

Fugaku said, in a flat tone, "That does sound familiar, Aburame-dono. My apologies for interrupting your narrative."

"I believe the difference between our similar circumstances," Shibi said without any particular heat, "is that I reported my grievances to both my clan council and the Hokage. Who, surprisingly, took my concerns as perfect truth." Shibi looked at Sensei. "I now see why. You were building a case against Shimura's influence in Konoha politics before the incident occurred."

I tried not to draw any attention to myself, looking down toward the floor. I'd been the one to first pit Sensei against Danzō. And before that, I'd warned the Chinatsugumi against any of his overtures with the same degree of seriousness as the warning about Orochimaru. And then Jiraiya and Tsunade had saved the fledgling Akatsuki, and added more weight to our suspicions.

Without all that, I didn't know if Sensei would have taken such a strong stance against him.

"Actually," Kushina said brightly, "we were building a case for his house arrest. Much more straightforward!"

Well, we hadn't needed a trial that way. Just the mountain of evidence and Sensei's decision to bait Danzō to his death.

"I see," said Shibi. With a last nod at Sensei, Shibi sat back down.

"We're still sorting through a mountain of paperwork about former ROOT agents," Sensei said apologetically, "but I'll tell you what I've discovered.

"First, there are no Uchiha in ROOT. There was one agent, or at least we think so, but we discovered their corpse on October Tenth with their eyes removed," Sensei explained. That'd be Nonō, then. But I guess Sensei decided she didn't need to make her big public debut here. "We found the eyes in question in ROOT storage, so there is some speculation that the Uchiha was a ROOT agent who was betrayed by their employer. We don't know for certain."

"Why haven't they been returned to the clan?" Fugaku asked.

"Frankly? Until we had enough evidence to drag ROOT into the light, it would look more like the village was collecting kekkei genkai," Sensei said, grimacing. "They've been preserved, Fugakudono. After this meeting, Tsunade can take you to retrieve them. Given the lack of close family in the agent's file, you would be the best person to take them."

Fugaku nodded and sat back. His Sharingan finally deactivated, leaving his eyes plain black again. "The clan will have to live with that. Given...what happened."

Sensei glanced at the floor for a moment in thought. "I deliberately acted to counteract Danzō, playing on the resentment of the only ROOT agent we could find who was peacefully retired. Once I intervened in Danzō's attempt to influence them as they had done to you, Aburame-dono, ROOT made an apparent point to anger me personally. Why Shimura thought he could possibly get away with it is beyond me, but they do say an old dog never learns new tricks."

With that, Sensei prodded me.

With a brief glare for his smiling face, I got to my feet.

And I was not going to even pretend to be calm.

"I'm sure you already know me," I said, my voice flat. "Keisuke Gekkō. Orphaned on the Tenth of October, like a lot of other people were. Like my brother." My eyes were already gold, so I was sure that everyone in that room knew I was angry. "And our favorite Konoha Council member decided that my brother and I would be better off in his care than as sad little orphans."

I was sure I didn't imagine Obito wincing. I'd have to apologize for that later.

"He put in a formal transfer request for me, during the period before Sensei reestablished his presence in the office on the eleventh," I explained, having done my homework and hated things as a result. "Sensei stopped it. And he stopped it again when Shimura brought up the topic later on, when my brother and I were still living in Sensei's house."

I clasped my hands behind my back. "So I'm not at all sorry that Shimura's dead."

That got a bunch of raised eyebrows across the room.

Hiashi said, "I didn't realize that Shimura had died. Under house arrest, I assume?"

"In one sense!" Kushina said, cheerful still. "But it was really more like we had him under house arrest for a year—which accounts for the dip in mission deaths, since ROOT would kill ANBU agents that discovered them and then they suddenly didn't have any missions at all. Or at least they'd try." Kushina smiled exactly as unpleasantly as Sensei had before and added, "But that ended a little less than two weeks ago. Shimura attacked me when I went to go feed him. So Tsunade-sama killed him."

Which was not what Kurama had said. I didn't have actual details about the situation leading up to Danzō's death, I did know that Kurama had praised her performance. Which implied Adamantine Chakra Chains, premeditated murder, and Tsunade squashing someone quite thoroughly. I didn't even want to think about the results of Tsunade's punches hitting something without Orochimaru's durability.

Sensei prodded Obito next.

Obito, I hope you nail this. I didn't even really know what he was going to say, but I sat down anyway.

"Oh!" Obito jolted to his feet, looking out at the ten other faces and looking abruptly nervous. "Uh. I...I got back to the village about a year and a half ago or something, but I was listed as KIA for a while too. And, um, I got this arm along the way. Most people know about it now."

I winced internally. I hadn't noticed any underlying tension between Obito and the rest of the village aside from his clan, but I had to wonder how many people in this room—or in their clans—had spent the time since Obito's return wondering when he was going to snap and murder everyone. Which was, of course, the best possible thing for someone recovering from trauma.

Fucking ninjas.

"I didn't get a physical when I got back," Obito went on, his gaze sort of just sliding off of people instead of finding a single point to focus on. "Which I didn't realize was weird—I mean, there was a medic where I was, so maybe I didn't need to go to the hospital? And I wasn't going to since Sensei said I shouldn't just go wherever."

Obito took a deep breath. "But I, I found out that the order went in before I was really even considered alive by the village. Like, someone wanted me to get this"—and here, Obito reached up and touched the top of his cheekbone, under his right eye—"looked at before anyone was supposed to know I wasn't a corpse. How does that even work?"

Never leave a debate opponent with a rhetorical question. They might just answer it.

So Kakashi grabbed it with both hands. "It doesn't," he said, for the benefit of any particularly slow members of the audience. "Which, in addition to the details of Shimura's recruitment attempt for me—which I am not allowed to disclose—indicates only that we were all targets."

"Kei is a jinchūriki. I have Obito's eye in my left socket. Obito...Obito has one of the strangest, most unique powers anyone's ever seen," Kakashi said plainly. "Team Minato has...uncanny luck. Some would call us cursed. But Shimura threw all of this—this effort into taking what he could from the clans. From us."

Then Kakashi and Obito both sat down, allowing Sensei to take the stage one more time.

"For all that he talked about putting Konoha first, he spent a suspicious amount of time ruining the lives of people in it," Sensei commented, with the faintest sardonic tinge to his tone. "It was almost like he didn't comprehend a world where his goals and Konoha's didn't align perfectly. Like he thought the clans and the rest of the people here were just pawns on a shogi board."

Sensei leaned forward in his seat. He took a deep breath, then said in a voice that resonated across the room, "As Hokage, I chose to make the results of this investigation known so the clans can take grievances to Konoha as a whole and not be censured for it. No more back-dealing and underhanded threats. We cannot change the past, but we can make certain that Shimura's machinations don't destroy what our predecessors worked to create." His gaze swept across the room. "Currently, we are in a time of relative peace and security, in defiance of the world Shimura was going to make for our children and grandchildren to live in. We have moved beyond reflexive, thoughtless hostility toward each other."

For a long moment, no one in the room said anything. We all just looked at each other, thinking.

Sensei wasn't...well, he was pragmatic. If a single speech could change the shinobi world for the better, Hashirama Senju would have gotten his way in about fifteen minutes. So Sensei had started here, with an explicit outlining of past wrongs done by the village against the clans, and asked forgiveness and for everyone to look toward the future. It would be a struggle to make a brighter future after what so many people had done to wreck it out of selfishness or shortsightedness or genre blindness, but as long as work happened, we were going to make progress.

All of us knew this wasn't going to be the end of the fight. There was always more shit heading downstream toward us. But no one could change the future without the strength to pick up a figurative hammer and get to work.

"Thank you for coming to this meeting today. Uchiha-dono, Aburame-dono, I'll be happy to meet in my office with you both in about half an hour. There is someone there I want you two to meet. As for everyone else, I will be providing each of you with a list of known losses to ROOT forces for each of your clans. If you wish to discuss solutions or preventative measures for these kinds of abuses of power, please bring your ideas to my attention as soon as possible." With that, Sensei turned and walked right out of the meeting room. Half a step behind, Kushina followed.

Obito, Kakashi, and I waited until everyone was gone before we finally decided to leave. It wasn't something we planned, but it just seemed like the right decision for all of us.

"Ten ryō says this isn't over," Obito said, leaning back in his chair and resting his feet on the back of the low wall separating the stands from the low center of the room.

"Sucker's bet," Kakashi muttered, glancing at me. "He'll probably call us back within an hour. What should we do now?"

I shrugged. We'd already had lunch, so that was out of the question. "Well, I owe you for lunch."

"Oh, right! "Hey, what did you want say before? Obito kinda cut you off there."

"I did?" Obito asked. He jerked upright. "Was it interesting?"

"It wasn't important," Kakashi said dismissively. "And you don't have to pay me back."

"Maybe if it was a date I wouldn't," I said, though I had a niggling thought that it was much fairer to just split the bill all the time. And did Kakashi just wince there? "But seriously, I can pay for my own food."

Kakashi's chakra crackled.

To my surprise, Obito flashed us both a quick grin. "If you two are gonna just argue about this, I'm gonna go see if I can't get my lunch. See you in a while, probably!"

And then he did something that I remembered Tobi doing, once. He raised his arm and moved it in a slow circle, and his body progressively disappeared around it until his arm vanished into a hole in space-time bit by bit, too.

"...That was weird," I said after a moment, to the space where Obito had been. "I hope he's seeing Rin about eye strain nowadays."

"He is. That may even be where he's heading now," Kakashi murmured, with his chakra already back to normal. "Did you get the same feeling from the clans as I did?" he asked, changing the topic.

"Depends. I think there are going to be some trouble spots," I admitted, while wondering what Kakashi meant by Obito going to visit Rin. Had I heard a bit of wistfulness there? Were Obito and Rin...a thing? I wasn't going to ask about that yet, though. "And I already know that Kumogakure's going to be gunning for us again, but that's not news. I don't know if they're going to try and target Kushina or Naruto, though, or if they're going to try for one of the dōjutsu clans. We already know that they can be transplanted."

"Depressingly enough, yes," Kakashi agreed, frowning under his mask. "You've already discussed your suspicions with Sensei, haven't you?"

"A while ago, yeah. I just hope Hiashi's support doesn't come from that potential shitstorm. Fugaku and Shibi are on board, though, and I think the rest are pretty much on our side," I said, picking dirt under my nails as I thought. "Well, I think we're done for now. Can we like...I don't know. Let's go someplace and talk about jutsu or something."

After a brief moment of consideration, Kakashi nodded. "We have some catching up to do. Let's go."

By the time Sensei did call us back, Kakashi and I had gone to the Academy roof and gotten to talk about most of the obvious changes in our respective repertoires.

Kakashi's new mobility-enhancing Lightning jutsu was called Lightning Release: Arc Jump, which actually worked in a straight line. But as long as he could mark his place with a faint tinge of Lightning chakra, he could fire himself like a bolt of lightning at that point. Sure, he couldn't attack while moving that fast, and he couldn't phase through solid objects, and he needed line of sight to use it successfully, but he was working on those parts. Already, he had practiced it enough to use it as a reflexive dodging technique. Maybe, in time, he'd manage a reverse-engineered version of what the various Raikage kept playing with. He'd also progressed with his Lightning manipulation to the point that he could send a bog-standard human—and most shinobi—into cardiac arrest with a touch. That technique didn't have a name just yet.

And I described some of the things I'd been working on with Isobu, which the various jinchūriki transformations played into. The coral projections were most definitely a work in progress, given that I could barely get the blades to hold a consistent edge, but creating solid objects out of pure chakra was something too energy-intensive for me to accomplish on my own. That meant I'd always have to use the V2 cloak to pull it off, which curtailed my training opportunities rather severely. As for the full transformation...well, even with properly formed coral swords, I'd need to adjust my kenjutsu to compensate for a lack of sheaths for iaijutsu, using two blades, and for not having any actual legs. Again, a work in progress.

And then Sensei's secretary came to come get us off the roof and into the office. Obito showed up a minute later, having clearly run from the Hospital to the office instead of just ripping a hole in space-time for the same purpose. I had to wonder if Rin had told him to lay off the use of a technique that might screw with his eyesight. He kind of only had one eye left to use for it.

"Ordinarily, I wouldn't call all three of you to the office at once over a mission, and not so soon," Sensei said, once the three of us were safely ensconced inside of the Hokage's office. Security seals up, possibility of eavesdroppers down, and so on and so forth. "But a message arrived right after Fugaku and Shibi left, and I think all three of you need to hear it."

Kakashi straightened from his usual sulky slouch, watching Sensei carefully. Obito's earlier agitation had thrown him off—or maybe on, if that meant his mission-ready state. He wasn't in uniform, but I could definitely sense the ANBU training in him. And he'd gone totally quiet, which was a sharp change from just twenty minutes ago.

Obito crossed his arms over his chest and waited.

I stuck my hands in my pockets and waited with less poise. It was an accomplishment. Instead of devoting any particular effort to that, I concentrated on my chakra sense and noticed an extra signature in the room. It wasn't much—more like the chakra levels in a small animal of some kind—but it was still unusual.

Sensei nodded to himself, mostly. Then he waved his hand at something on his desk and said, "Well, go on."

From behind the inkwell on his desk, something made a rustling noise. Then, with the sound of crinkling paper, a little white shape bounced into view.

I'd never really been a fan of origami or paper art in general, but someone must have thought that Sensei was. They'd left a little white paper crane on Sensei's desk.

And the little crane was moving like a real one would have, though with an awkward lack of feet. Now, who did we know with a tendency to use origami to create minions?

The crane hopped off the desk and landed on the floor between us. As we watched, it unfolded itself into an unmarred paper square, then re-folded into a little origami person. It looked like a child wearing a white paper dress, actually.

I could practically feel everyone in the room biting down on the urge to say anything.

The origami creature stepped forward until it stood equidistant from each of us. Then, without any further sound, raised its little arms and all three of us jumped back as a full-sized, flickering image of a woman in Akatsuki uniform dominated the room.

…Okay, so she was only about my height, but Konan's hologram-like projection stood an additional five centimeters off the floor and could look Kakashi square in the eye. She had light blue hair with a distinct lavender undertone, and wore a white origami rose in her hair. Her eyes were cool gray with eyeshadow the same color as her hair, and there was a silver piercing under her lower lip. While she wore the usual Akatsuki robe and had the new Ame headband style, it would be a mistake to think this woman was any common foot-soldier.

She was, after all, the last original Akatsuki member left standing. In one timeline, at least.

Here and now, though, she wasn't nearly as worn by time and pain. Instead, her image smiled faintly as she saw the three of us, and she said, "Hello, everyone. I am Konan, the third of Jiraiya's Amegakure students. Am I looking at Minato-senpai's students?"

"That's us," Obito said. "I'm Obito Uchiha!"

"Kakashi Hatake," said Kakashi, still eyeing Konan's image carefully.

And as Konan turned to me, I managed, "I'm Keisuke Gekkō, Konan-san. Er, Konan-sama?"

"Konan-senpai at most, Keisuke-san," Konan corrected me gently. "That goes for all of you, except for Minato-senpai."

"Okay, Konan-senpai!" Obito said, "So, you have a mission request?"
"Yes." Konan lifted her arm and her image briefly dissolved. However, her voice still came through loud and clear as we were treated to the somewhat garbled transmission of a cave's mouth. "To be brief, this is a cavern within Amegakure territory, recently uncovered due to limestone erosion in the area," she explained, and the cave's mouth seemed to grow jagged fangs of limestone for a moment. "We came across it during the last severe winter storm, and Yahiko sent a Water Clone in to investigate it for weak points."

The image shifted again, showing the inside of the cave's depths. The faint sound of water constantly dripping down formed a sort of background white noise as Konan continued, "And inside the caves, we found…this."

The cave effectively disappeared. While Konan's image did appear again, carrying a sheaf of burning paper, it was dwarfed by the massive thing lit by the firelight.

"Holy shit," Obito breathed.

Sitting primly in a meditative position, the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path seemed to loom over everyone and everything, despite the projection only reaching the office's sealing. It was exactly as ugly as I remembered it being—all emaciated limbs, ten closed eyes set in a mummified face, one mouth with a full set of completely flat teeth. It looked like someone had forced a tree to grow into a horrific depiction of an elder god, complete with ten little stumps to represent the Ten-Tails it had once been.

Yahiko's image climbed up its side, illuminating its limbs—chained, though damned if I knew where the links were.

"That's…I remember that thing!" Obito burst out, his eye wide with shock. "That's the statue thing that was keeping Madara alive the last I saw him!"

Konan's image flickered back into view, her gray eyes narrowed. "Madara Uchiha?"

"So that's what that thing looks like," Sensei murmured. "I was wondering about that…"

"Yeah, he—look, there's a whole ton of history behind that," Obito said, cutting himself off. "But I met the guy a while back and that was definitely working with him."

"That's not all it is," I said, stepping forward. "You're looking at the empty shell that used to be the Ten-Tailed Beast."

That's not all it is, Isobu said, in a sort of mocking echo. He was staring up at the statue's grim heights even from the inside of my mindscape. Not even close.

What?

I need to talk this over with the others, Isobu said. Give me a moment.

Wait, which others? How many of your siblings are you even talking to?

Not now, was all he said in response.

"The Ten-Tails?" Konan asked, openly staring. "I thought that was a fairy tale."

"It's really, really not," I told her, eyes still on the Statue's motionless form. "The Tailed Beasts don't remember being the Ten-Tails, but the Three-Tails confirmed that the story was true. I don't know as much about it as he seems to, but that thing is really bad news."
Konan frowned. "I see. Well, I was going to request your team to investigate this statue's origins, but I see that you already know. I would like more detail, however."

"So, we don't actually have a mission?" Obito asked, disappointed despite the earlier spike of fear.

"No, I would still like to hire Team Minato," Konan said. "There are a number of aspects of this situation that I believe we, as students in the tradition of Jiraiya-sensei, need to work together to resolve."

None of us said anything for a moment.

And then, when I was just starting to wonder if Sensei had deliberately let us wander into this minefield of a conversation because he could, we were saved from endless silence.

"When do you need us there?" Kakashi asked, as though nothing out of the ordinary had happened.

"As soon as you can travel here," Konan said. She bowed. "I look forward to meeting all of you in person."

Then the little paper person on the floor folded itself into a crane again and flapped its way back onto Sensei's desk.

I sighed internally. And to think I'd been wondering if this chunk of the timeline was going to be boring. Mondays were officially the worst days. What was the phrase, again? When it rains, it pours?

Well, since we were apparently suiting up for Amegakure, all of those bits seemed accurate. We'd just have to head over there and find out for sure.
"…And that's why your daddy's always running into walls," I concluded, bouncing Naruto on my knee as I waited for my teammates to show up at Sensei's house.

"Daddy fall down!" Naruto concluded, still pulling on his stuffed toad toy's long pink tongue.

"Yep! You're one smart cookie, Naruto-chan." While the toddler continued to babble happily to himself, I propped my chin up on his head and took a moment to reflect.

While obviously putting a jinchūriki right in range of the withered Ten-Tails was a bad idea, I didn't exactly plan on being the one to poke around its insides. Konan's paper messenger had confirmed, on further interrogation, that the cavern for the statue was some ways outside of Amegakure proper. I'd be around in case someone needed to bounce theories off me, but my job was mainly to see if we couldn't establish firmer ties between Ame and Konoha.

That left Kakashi and Obito, who both had quick ways out of trouble, to investigate along with any of the Ame trio who wanted to go with them. If I had to pick one of them, though, I would have chosen Nagato. While Nagato was one of the strongest people on the continent, his main value there would be the link between his Rinnegan and the statue. I didn't know if he'd actually tried that already, and it would take us almost a week to get there. If he had, we'd probably find out how that experiment went around the time the continent flipped over on us.

"Are you slandering me?" Sensei asked, once he'd appeared at the front door with the usual _fwish_ noise. I didn't doubt that he'd been listening beforehand, though.

"It's not slander if it's true," I told him. "It's more like telling stories to your son so he can make fun of you when I'm not around."

"Is this revenge for not giving you the C-rank I talked about earlier?" he asked, amused.

"No, I figured this was a crisis and that's fine," I said, as Naruto made his little frog toy lick my face. "But I claim the next C-rank that fits my abilities and temperament."

"Temperament?" Sensei gave a sudden back of a laugh. "Like what? Because I _did_ see what happened yesterday. Your temper isn't great, Kei."

I shrugged. "Well, then you shouldn't have told me that Hayate could have been hurt." If my brain was the control panel of a doomsday device, I could honestly say that there was a switch with the label "Hayate's in trouble" that could get blistering anger out of me no matter what day it was.

Probably not a good weakness to have. But it was there anyway.

I sighed aloud. Hayate could stay at our apartment, but I'd also talked with Sensei about possibly letting him stay over in the Namikaze household's guest room. And I was pretty sure the Umino family would let him sleep there, if he wanted. But really, I expected that he'd be running missions for most of the time that I was gone in any case.

"Are you worried about your first S-ranked mission?" Sensei asked in a whisper, leaning in so only Naruto and I could hear.

I glared at him over the top of his son's head. "First planned one, maybe."

"Well?" Sensei insisted.

"I don't know. There are a ton of ways that this could go wrong, as usual," I said.

I bounced Naruto on my knee again, but it seemed like the toddler was tired of the game. As he turned around and reached up with both hands for his father with an imperious cry of "Up!"

Sensei obliged, scooping Naruto off my lap and into his arms. "There we go, Naruto." With Naruto having established a grip in his father's hair, Sensei turned his attention back to me and said, "I still expect you to keep your team informed of any updated information you get as the mission progresses. I didn't get the impression you knew as much about this assignment."

"That's because we're veering off into speculation, and it'll change depending on the situation on the ground." Like information always did. I stared down at my hands for a moment, thinking. "We'll see once we get there."

"True," Sensei said, and patted my shoulder. "Also, maybe you should take your gear and head to the West Gate. I'm pretty sure Obito and Kakashi are getting into it over there."

"What?" I grabbed my pack and immediately stood up, staring at Sensei even as I got my stuff secured. "How can you tell?"

"I have a seal on each of them, remember? Might be something you want to consider," Sensei suggested, and headed into his house.

Well, now that I concentrated, I could definitely feel the two of them over in that part of the village. Kakashi's chakra in particular got easier to locate the angrier he got. What the hell?

"I told them to meet here," I grumbled as I took off.

After a bit of verbal sparring—in which puns featured prominently—the three of us set off from the West Gate. Given our average endurance, which was admittedly half chakra and half physical conditioning, I was pretty sure we managed to go farther than most teams in the same timeframe.

So, on the eve of the first day away from Konoha, we could afford to slow a bit and chat. A little.

"So, Obito," I began, as we dashed through the forests outside of Konoha. A lot fewer trees out here, but they were sufficient for traveling quickly above ground. "How's Rin?"

Kakashi dashed ahead of us, shooting me a quick, skeptical look.

I winked back.

"So, when were you gonna tell us that you two are a thing?" I asked.

Obito tripped on a branch and fell out of the canopy.

Maybe I should have saved that for when we made camp.

Obito caught up to us a minute later, red in the face and shouting, "We're not like that, Kei! Rin-chan's just been making sure my eyesight's okay even with how much work I've been doing!"

"How much work?" I repeated. "Obito, you're overusing that jutsu after everything that happened, aren't you?"

"Not as much," Obito insisted, though petulant. "But it's what I've got, Kei."

"You say that like you don't have four or five other techniques no one can imitate," Kakashi called over his shoulder, irritated. "But you only have one eye."

"But it's mine," Obito said to Kakashi's back. "Rin-chan already looked at it yesterday and the fixed problems that came up. I'm fine."

"I'm not gonna turn a blind eye to your situation, Obito," Kakashi replied.

"Shut up."

"Rin will actually kill you if you go blind after all the work she put in," I said. "Like, she'll watch as you bounce off walls eighty times in a row and won't lift a finger to help, because it'll be your fault for overusing a jutsu like that."

"Ugh, that's almost exactly what she said." Obito concentrated on his landings for a moment, then said, "Only she threatened to strap me to a hospital bed for incurable stupidity, too."

"Sounds more extreme than usual," I remarked, dodging the trunk of a tree as we went. "Aside from the eye thing, did you do anything to make her mad?"

"Not that I know of." Obito rubbed the back of his neck. "I'll talk to her as soon as we…well, actually, when you guys set camp I'll just go see her. It's not that hard to find places I've already visited."

Which was why we weren't just teleporting to Amegakure, by the by. None of us had ever visited, so a Flying Thunder God Formation wouldn't have helped at all. Even Sensei hadn't been there, and Jiraiya didn't generally leave Sensei's kunai just lying around. Obito needed some idea of where he was going to end up in order to go someplace—or at least, Kakashi needed to be in the area. I was pretty sure that Obito could always locate the other eye in the pair.

"Don't let it fester," I agreed. "Sounds all right to me."

Obito nodded to himself. Then, "I hope she doesn't get mad again because I'm using Kamui to get back…"

Spoiler: It turned out later that yes, Rin did get mad. But it was a bit more than that.

While Kakashi set up the camp perimeter with his dogs and my security seals, Obito and I got our actual campsite ready for bedtime. Despite the existence of soldier pills, no one really wanted to suffer an energy crash at the end of the trip. Assuming that nothing horrible happened while we were working our way toward Amegakure, we'd be okay.

"Rin yelled at me pretty much immediately," Obito admitted when I asked. "But I asked her to tell me what I did—if I did anything—to make her madder than what usually happens."

"And what did she say?" I asked.

"She said, um…” Obito looked down at the bedroll he was trying to unwrap and sighed. "She said I wasn't allowed to do anything that dumb and preventable. Because chakra exhaustion isn't something that just hits out of the blue, and I'm supposed to be limiting how much I use Kamui anyway."

I kicked my bedroll out flat, then gestured for him to continue. "Well?"

"She said I'm not allowed to do stuff that has such a high chance of making sure I never come home," Obito said quietly. "That she'd cried enough for me the first time, and so did everyone else."

Wordlessly, I reached out and grasped his left shoulder.

He sighed. "Yeah, I know." He paused awkwardly, then cheered up a bit and said, "Though something good did come out of it!"

"Like what?" I asked.

"Well, uh," Obito mumbled, slowly turning red. But in a pleased sort of way.

"Spit it out," Kakashi said.

"Rin and I, um, we…” Sooner or later, Obito was going to turn redder than Raidō…had… Wait. "I have a date with Rin when we get back!"

"Congrats!" I said reflexively, pleasantly surprised.

"Yeah, it's really…” Obito trailed off. "It's kind of embarrassing, actually. I said, 'Can I be your boyfriend?' at the same time Rin said, 'I want to be your girlfriend.' It took us a bit to, uh, actually hear what we were saying. But we're going to take it slow. I don't think either of us really know what we're doing, so… So we're going to try."

Even compared to the story I got from Genma about how he and Raidō hooked up, it was actually pretty cute.

"Then we'd better make sure this S-ranked mission goes better than our last A-rank together," Kakashi said, drifting out of the dark with his dogs at his heels. He stopped at Obito's side and thumped the back of his right shoulder blade with his fist. "Won't we?"

Obito brushed him off, but said, "Yeah, we will." He sat down with his back to the fire. "And we're all a lot stronger now than we were back then. So I think we're going to be okay as long as we do this together."

Speaking of that… "Actually, it might be best for me to stay as far away from the Statue as possible," I said, while Kakashi dug through our packs for our dinner. I'd sealed a hot bowl of miso soup with eggplant into one of the scrolls in his pack, but I didn't remember quite where. It would take him a while to find it.
"Is it because of Isobu-san?" Obito asked.

"Yes." I sat down on my bedroll and started picking through one of my storage scrolls, looking for whichever seal held my pillow. Absently, I said, "In the other world, that thing was used as a…a storage container."

"For what?" Obito wanted to know, startled. "It didn't look hollow or anything…?"

"…This might take a while to explain," I said, even as my pillow poofed back into existence in my hands. I set it aside and said, "But the short version? Over there, Akatsuki was a band of missing-nin with the explicit purpose of capturing all the Tailed Beasts and sealing them into that statue to create a superweapon. I'm not sure if they knew that meant reviving the Ten-Tails."

"And Akatsuki here is…not going to do that, I hope." Obito looked a little green around the gills.

"No, I don't think so." I picked up another scroll and worked on getting my dinner—leftover baked pumpkin and assorted other stuff—out of whatever scroll I'd sealed it into. "From what I know about Konan-san, Nagato-san, and Yahiko-san, they're really just idealistic revolutionaries here. Danzō didn't ruin their lives because Tsunade-sama and Jiraiya-sama rescued them, so they're not dead or insane." What in the world had that timeline looked like? "And without Tobi to give them that last push, they'll make better choices on their own, too."

"What happens, exactly, if the Ten-Tails comes back?" Kakashi asked. He had found his dinner and snapped the chopsticks apart as I watched. As he stirred the steaming bowl of noodles, he said, "If Akatsuki sealed all of the Tailed Beasts into the statue, all of the jinchūriki died when they were taken. That would leave the villages without any jinchūriki to use on offense or defense, and they'd be facing off against something that sounds like it'd give the Nine-Tailed Fox nightmares. Why would anyone even try to bring that thing back?"

Stupidity? Isobu suggested. The Sage sometimes talked about what the world was like before the Ten-Tails was sealed away. Imagine the Clan Wars era your people view with so much fear, and then drop in a massive monster that devours other beings whole—body and spirit alike. Isobu's eye closed. None of us remember what that was like. But we know enough that we don't want to go back.

Would any of your siblings know more about it? I asked him.

Gyūki might. Kurama, too. But neither of them really want to talk about the old days.

"Isobu says anyone who tries is an idiot," I said, staring down into the fire for a moment. "The Infinite or Eternal Tsukuyomi—I forget which— involves using the Ten-Tails's power to create a massive, world-spanning genjutsu, but there was never any mention of what's supposed to happen while everyone's stuck like that. I guess the Ten-Tails eats them?" For fuel, maybe. Like in The Matrix? "But I do remember that the Rinnegan can control the statue—up to a point."

"Here's to hoping that Nagato-san can hold it off if something does happen, then," Obito said.

"I don't understand how Tobi expected to control it, since, well…" Kakashi gestured at his left eye. Which was the one with the Sharingan, true, but Obito's was just an empty socket.

"Tobi went grave-robbing after Nagato-san died," I said flatly. "And he killed Konan-san in the process."

(Fūinjutsu was the best thing ever.)
"It sounds like there's seriously nothing this guy wouldn't do to make things worse, Kei," Obito said bleakly.

"Yeah," I muttered. I sighed, running a hand through my hair and sliding my headband off in the process. As it dropped onto my bedroll, I said, "Seriously, Obito, I don't think I thank you for existing nearly enough."

"Existing like I am with friends like you two isn't really that hard," Obito pointed out with a faint smile on his face. He added somewhat sadly, after a moment of thought, "I guess that's one reason I kinda feel sorry for Tobi. Everything came tumbling down on him before he knew how good things could be. It's easy to go bad when there's no one left to tell you any better."

Ehhh, I wouldn't go that far. But then, I wasn't exactly a bubbling wellspring of empathy. Obito was. Pakkun trotted over to me and sniffed at my dinner, which was in a bowl in front of me. "Vegetables?" he said, frowning.

"Yep," I replied, picking up a cold cube of pumpkin in my chopsticks. "Sorry, Pakkun."

"Not a problem. Hey, Kakashi, when are you going to feed us?" Pakkun demanded, wandering over to him instead. He was quickly joined by Kakashi's other seven dogs, who all sat around him in a ring of fur for more effective begging.

"You can feed yourselves too, you know," Kakashi told them.

"You're a bunch of mooches," Obito said to the dogs, though I noted that he had unsealed and commenced devouring his dinner much faster once Pakkun had approached me. So he didn't really have anything left to steal.

I smiled anyway at their antics. "They're cute mooches, though."

"Cute or not, I don't have enough food with me to last this trip if there are eight more mouths to feed," Kakashi said. "And I didn't pack dog food anyway."

"You're such a lazy master!" Shiba barked unhappily.

Kakashi rolled his visible eye. "I'll feed you what you like once we aren't on the road."

All eight dogs whined in unison.

"This place freaks me out a little," Obito said, apropos of nothing, as we gazed across the lake to Amegakure proper. "It just looks...weird."

Amegakure wasn't a Hidden Village the way that Konoha was. Perched on the edge of a massive lake and amidst near-constant curtains of rain, Amegakure loomed over the landscape like a city skyline straight out of my world. I couldn't judge building heights from where I was, but it looked like there were many more spires than would have been practical in a world with helicopters. It didn't gleam, though—the rain was in the process of turning the city gray.

Kakashi shook himself under his thick rain-cloak, peering out from under his flattened and soaked bangs. "Konan-san said she was going to send someone out here to meet us."

I pulled my hood back a bit and looked up. As rain dripped down my face, saturated with chakra I was pretty sure I recognized, I said, "I think she already knows we're here. We just have to wait."
"Really?" Obito asked. He flipped his hood back and stuck his tongue out to catch a raindrop on it.

"How can she tell?" Kakashi asked. "I can smell anything in this rain."

"I think Nagato laces his chakra into the storm," I said. "It's actually centered on Amegakure from what I can tell."

"...That's kind of scary," Obito said after a moment. "Oh man, does that mean I just swallowed some of his chakra?"

"Probably," Kakashi said.

Off in the distance, I could see a tiny black shape in the sky above the city. It turned and seemed to get closer to us, flapping gigantic white wings as it went. "Uh, Kakashi, Obito, is that who I think it might be?"

Obito's eye turned Sharingan red while Kakashi lifted his headband, too. After a second or so of peering at the flying figure, Obito said, "Oh, it's Konan-san!"

"She can fly?" Kakashi stared out across the lake as Konan flew steadily closer. "Her wings...that's paper. I'm amazed she can keep going in the rain."

"If she couldn't use her paper ninjutsu in the rain, I don't think she would have lasted that long," I pointed out. "I bet Jiraiya-sama could have told us specifics, but we didn't ask." Though I already knew that toad oil could weigh her down to the point of uselessness. We just didn't have any, and neither would anyone with hostile intent toward Amegakure in this universe.

After a couple more minutes of careful flapping, Konan landed on our little spur of rock as lightly as a bird, blowing all of our hoods back as she settled into place. Her paper wings flew apart as she secured her footing, almost like confetti framing her arrival, before they reformed into a gigantic paper umbrella over all of our heads.

I clapped.

Konan gave a playful little bow and said, "Hello again, Team Minato. Welcome to Amegakure."

Damn, she was beautiful. And there went my train of thought for a good three seconds.

Obito raised his hand while I was in the process of rationalizing the thought to death. He said, "So does that mean we can actually go into the village now? Kei said we should probably wait outside of it."

Konan raised one blue eyebrow at me. I could only shrug helplessly in response.

"While there are some security concerns in any new village," Konan said, "you are invited guests. You didn't have to wait two kilometers outside of the village."

Obito reached over and punched me in the shoulder. "Told you!"

"Yeah, yeah," I grouched. So I'd been thinking a little too much of the circumstances leading to Jiraiya's death. It wasn't like the old story had focused on Amegakure for any other reason! "I'm sorry already!"

"I still found you. It's fine," Konan said.

"Konan-san, when would it be best to take care of our clothing concerns?" Kakashi asked, while Obito and I shoved each other for a couple of seconds. He'd already lowered his hitai-ate, knowing that we weren't going to cause any real trouble.

All three of us had decided to wear our jōnin blues on the trip to Ame solely because they were the outfits we cared the least about. People got their uniforms wrecked all the time and sent them in for repairs, and I didn't even want to think about the number of shredded flak jackets Konoha went through. I had at least two spare sets at home in case one got shredded beyond all repair.

But since Amegakure was home to an awful of people who had grievances with the Five Elemental Nations—primarily because border powers like Ame got steamrolled whenever we fought each other—Konan had suggested that each of us take some less-distinctive clothes for the times when we wanted to walk around in the streets. There were diplomatic passes of a sort, like the metal tags Konan and the other two rebel leaders sometimes handed out, but it was better to avoid unnecessary hostility.

"Fortunately, I can take all three of you directly to where you will be staying while you are here," Konan said. Which didn't necessarily mean we were going to be at an inn. "From there, you may either rest or begin work immediately."

Obito's stomach growled right on cue. He gave Konan a sheepish look and said, "Maybe we can decide once we eat?"

Konan's smile was something I had never really expected to see on her face in person. A fond smile, sort of like how Rin looked whenever Obito and I did something silly in front of her. Fond exasperation, perhaps? "Of course, Obito-san."

With a nod to us and a quick gesture indicating that we should probably back up a bit, Konan raised both of her arms over her head.

While we got out of the way, all of the pieces of paper that had formed our little umbrella flew together until they nearly formed a single, coherent sheet. As we watched, that sheet—easily the size of a sail—folded itself rapidly into…yep. That was what I'd thought.

A gigantic paper crane flapped its wings and blew our cloaks aside from the sheer down-draft it produced. It was easily twice Tsuruya's size, and if Konan was planning on providing transport just like that, I didn't need to call on my flesh-and-blood crane to check.

Konan leapt up onto one of the crane's huge wings, then hopped into position in the crook between its neck and back. "Step up here, please."

Obito bounded up and onto the paper crane's back without any hesitation whatsoever. Kakashi, on the other hand, put a cautious foot on the joint where the nearest wing met the body and put his weight on it experimentally before apparently just getting on with things.

Then I bounced on up. I landed in the divot on the left side of the crane's central hump, while Obito was on the right one and Kakashi was in the back. Once I was onboard, Konan clapped her hands and the crane flapped its huge wings once, twice.

And then we were in the air and surging toward Amegakure's spiky skyline. In a paper bird.

I needed to learn to stop questioning some things and just go with the flow, like Obito. Who, on our flight, raised his arms within the first ten seconds in the air and was shouting "Wheeeeee!" most of the way to Amegakure's most complicated-looking tower.

We alighted on a small landing pad next to a demonic-looking caricature of a face built into the side of the tower. More specifically, the crane dissolved into three smaller cranes to fit through the opening into the side of the tower, with one crane carrying each member of Team Minato. Konan just danced across the leftover paper sheets as though she didn't weigh anything, landing as perfectly as a trained gymnast on the far edge of the landing pad.

The rest of us had to hang on for dear life, since our crane steeds seemed to prefer skidding stops rather than perfect landings. And once we were on our feet again, they split apart into their component sheets of paper and flew back into Konan's sleeves.

"Are you sixteen or six?" Kakashi asked Obito once we were all settled again. "What was with all the cheering?"

"Flying is the coolest thing ever." Obito crossed his arms stubbornly and huffed, "You just don't have a sense of fun."

"Konan-san," I suggested, before the boys could start squabbling like they had before we left Konoha, "where are we going to be staying?"

"This way," Konan said, hiding a smile behind her long black sleeves. "You're probably not used to the weather here, are you?"

I shivered a little. "No." I used to live in a region that rained buckets, but Konoha was fairly temperate. Summers made me wish for Amegakure's rainfall, but maybe not the version in early March.

"Well, come along then," Konan said, and all of us fell into line with her as she walked backwards toward what turned out to be a staircase. "Yahiko and Nagato want to see all of you, and it would be better if you don't have to shiver all through dinner."

"How have they been?" Obito asked. "I mean, we saw Yahiko-san like a month ago, but still…"

"We've been doing well. All of the damage from our takeover has finally been repaired, so we can sleep soundly for once," Konan said as we descended. Little sheets of paper floated on after her as we went, with pieces in the shape of people or small origami animals hopping at her heels.

I was going to take a wild guess and say that Konan was probably the information hub of Amegakure, just because she had a downright ridiculous number of ways to get information. Every village needed a spymaster. What made Konan special was that she was also every agent in the field.

"So, do we call you Konan-senpai in public, or is Konan-san okay?" Obito asked, curious. "I mean, to the people here, we're just Konoha-nin. We probably shouldn't be too informal, right?"

"I think 'Konan-senpai' will do for any public appearances you might make," Konan replied, sending another paper construct shooting off in a different direction with a flick of her wrist. "But we need to get started on the reason we called you three here in the first place."

After passing another few floors, Konan ushered us into a hallway that was decorated in a more traditional manner. The doors were actual rice-paper shoji, which made me wonder if they'd been stockpiling since Hanzō's death. The rainy climate ought to have eaten right through them otherwise, right? Or mold would have.

"You each have a room here, if you want," Konan said, "or you can take two of them apart and just sleep in one room. I do recommend that you trap them, though—even now, things aren't necessarily what I would call stable."
And coming from someone who'd grown up smack in the middle of a warzone, Konan's words had weight.

"One room is easier to trap," Obito said, eyeing the walls and doors speculatively. He nodded to himself. "Kakashi, pick one."

"That one," Kakashi said, pointing at a seemingly random sliding door and heading toward it immediately.

"Ah, Keisuke-san," Konan said, before I could go and join my teammates. When I stopped, looking back, she continued, "Do you have any concerns about how the rooms are arranged? I just remembered that Konoha is a little stricter than we are here in Amegakure, and I don't want you to feel awkward."

"Honestly, Konan-san, the only thing awkward about this is that you're asking that," I replied, watching a sheepish expression spread across the older kunoichi's face. "I'm fine. Thanks for your concern, and thanks for being one of the few people who doesn't need to be told I'm female. You're pretty observant."

"It has nothing to do with observation," Konan admitted. "Nagato came back from Konoha once and told us all about the 'terrible mistake' he'd made. Yahiko and I didn't stop laughing at him for a week."

"Harsh," I said, but smiled anyway. "Well, Konan-san, we're gonna unpack now. Do you need us anywhere immediately?"

"No. Just join us downstairs when you're hungry," she said, handing me a paper star, spun practically out of thin air by a strip of paper and a wisp of her chakra in an instant. "Here, this token will get you through to our quarters on the fifth floor. Don't try getting in without it. Imoriko isn't very friendly."

"Imoriko?" I repeated.

"You'll meet her in a little while," was all Konan said, and then she vanished down the stairs in a flurry of paper.

Huh. That sounded like a summon animal security measure. I tucked the paper star carefully into my hip holster and went to see what my boys had done with the room.

Aside from the security tags on the walls and the requisite flinging of personal belongings across the room, they hadn't done all that much. Obito was actually in the next room over, dragging a futon back, and Kakashi was sitting cross-legged on one of the lily pad-patterned ones on the floor.

After a moment, he held up his hands and a dangerous-looking length of ninja wire seemed to glow in the faint light, coiled between his fingers. "Eighth trap's ready to go."

"Cool, gimme," was Obito's reply. He caught it in his gloved right hand when Kakashi tossed it his way, and commenced trapping the window.

"Do either of you want to get changed?" I asked, distractedly sorting through the arsenal of seals in my head to decide what I wanted to add. By the time we were done here, an enemy would need to take out the building to get in here. And with the people who lived here, I rather doubted they'd survive in any case. "We have a bit of time."

Kakashi got to his feet and picked up his mission pack. Slipping into the room that Obito had stripped for more supplies, he slid the shoji shut behind him and said, "Mine."
"You know, you're supposed to say 'dibs' instead of just running in," Obito said. Anything else he wanted to say was muffled by the kunai between his teeth a moment later.

"You're busy," Kakashi replied through the shoji. Then apparently he decided to concentrate on not looking like a Konoha-nin for a bit, which was really the point.

After a couple more minutes, Obito and I had trapped the room to a point that even Kakashi probably would have had trouble getting into the room unscathed. We didn't need him to test it, though, because that would have ruined his clothes and he was already inside anyway.

Kakashi pushed the shoji open a moment after Obito flopped onto his futon to dig through his pack.

He wasn't wearing his mask or his headband, leaving his fluffy white hair untamed by gravity or accessories. Aside from that bizarre detail, though, Kakashi had simply found a short-sleeved version of his Konoha uniform. But without the flak jacket or headband, it just looked like he was showing allegiance to the Uzumaki clan, given the ubiquitous shoulder patches that all of our uniforms had.

Obito stared at the lower half of Kakashi's face for long enough that Kakashi actually started to fidget.

"You don't look like you," Obito said finally.

"And?" Kakashi prompted, sounding irritable already.

"Go put the mask back on," Obito said. "This is one too many freaky things in a single day."

Kakashi rolled his normal eye, though the Sharingan remained shut. "Fine, fine." He drifted back into the other room and grumbled to himself for a bit.

Obito shook himself and said, "Kei, you didn't do that weirdness justice."

"It's just his face," I said, my eyebrows knitting together in confusion.

"You didn't say he was pretty," Obito argued. "That should have come up!"

In fact, I had deliberately talked my way around that little point. So, oops?

"What, does that make it awkward somehow?" I asked.

Obito grouched, "No, I'm just jealous." He sighed. "There are guys in my clan who aren't that pretty. There are people in the Hyūga clan who aren't that attractive."

"You know, if this bugs you, you could always do what Mom said I should do when I find someone attractive enough to get a little envious," I suggested, since I didn't know what else to do.

"What's that?"

"Mom said that you should always remember that you can't be hot the same way someone else is," I explained. "So the best thing is to be hot in a you way." Granted, I didn't specify which of my mothers had said it, but I didn't really remember. I'd been a lot more self-conscious about my appearance before the whole reincarnation thing.

Obito thought about it. "Sounds kind of cheap."

"Says the guy with a date," I reminded him.
Kakashi piped up, "You two do realize I can still hear you, right?"

"Don't you have dogs to feed?" Obito shot back.

"Actually, yes, but it's your turn to get changed now," Kakashi said, turning back to us with his mask firmly in place. But he'd picked up a strip of cloth to remind himself not to open his Sharingan, so we were back to seeing about a quarter of his face.

After some hemming and hawing, Obito left his vest in the room, but that was all he did. He kept all of his weaponry with him, like Kakashi and I did.

In the end, I swapped out my Konoha flak jacket and uniform top for a sleeveless, cowl-necked black shirt with mesh arm covers. I kept my hip and thigh scroll/weapon holsters, but I left my katana in the room when it was time to head down. I could get access to some kind of blade if I needed one, and not just because I had a dedicated weapon scroll, too.

Then it was time to meet our, um, our seniors? If Jiraiya taught them and taught Sensei, then did that make us kinda like step-students or something? And how was that affected if Jiraiya had taught me, even if it was just about genjutsu?

"Kei, stop goofing off and come on!" Obito yelled back up the stairs, since I was dawdling as I thought. Kakashi had already gone on ahead.

"All right, all right!" I hurried to catch up.

"Dinner," as it turned out, meant all of us ate yakitori on a balcony on the fifth floor of the Akatsuki triumvirate's steel tower.

"We don't cook as much as we should," Yahiko had admitted, once he spotted how nonplussed we all were by what was essentially takeout. "So since we didn't really know when you were going to arrive, I just bought stuff."

And aside from meeting Yahiko's salamander summon ("She's just cranky, I swear!") and finding places to sit, that was that.

"How did you get all these towers built?" Kakashi asked, leaning back against the chunk of wall closest to the sheer five-story drop. He looked out into the rain pensively, his Sharingan open and drinking in the scenery.

I wasn't sure why. Cities weren't exactly pretty, and most of Amegakure's architecture had a "mad artist" vibe, with an optional note of "junkyard living."

Then again, art was subjective.

"They were already there. But we blew up at least a few, and Nagato...did something to fix those," Yahiko said, looking over at the third member of their team.

Nagato was sitting on the floor with Akino in his lap, and was scratching behind the dog's ears with an expression of intense concentration on his face. He didn't seem to have heard his name.

All of Kakashi's dogs were out and about, and they were the reason that Yahiko ended up needing to make a second trip to that yakitori stand. Now happy with their lot in life, they lounged around the balcony while the rest of us talked. Akino was simply the only one who decided to sit on someone.
Though Pakkun was on my foot, I could still move and had decided that it didn't count.

"I don't really know what kind of jutsu it was," Yahiko went on, "but since it's pretty hard to get large amounts of metal here without paying through the nose, it worked out for the best."

While he wasn't actually using any descriptive terms, I was willing to guess that it had something to do with Nagato's Paths of Pain (or whatever he was calling it now), and particularly the one that had been a missile-launching cyborg. Really, sometimes it seemed like this continent didn't have any level of internal technological consistency…

"So, about that statue," I said, since no one else seemed ready to say anything about what we were supposedly being hired to do.

"Are you sure it's the Ten-Tails?" Yahiko asked. "Because I don't see why something like that is in our country."

"It used to be the Ten-Tails," I corrected. "But the Sage did…something. And now there are nine Tailed Beasts and one husk that should probably be launched into the sun."

Yahiko blinked. "Isn't that a little extreme? I mean, it's not doing anything."

"We actually don't know all of what it can do," Obito broke in, "I mean, when I last saw it, there were these big tube things and I guess it was keeping Madara on life support or something." Obito glanced at me for a moment and then added, "But he seemed like he was reaching the end of that lifeline last time, so…"

"Could you try starting over from the beginning?" Yahiko asked. "Where did all this stuff about meeting Madara even come from?"

Obito, Kakashi and I exchanged glances.

Yeah, that was what could be called "a long story."

"The whole story would be best," Nagato piped up. On his lap, Akino had rolled over and was grasping Nagato's pale hand in his mouth.

"…Then I suggest you get comfortable," Kakashi said, sliding down the wall until he was sitting against the floor.

"It really is a long story," Obito agreed. "Kei, can we get some seals?"

I nodded, but Konan held up her hand. "Please, allow me."

When I sat down in place, Konan drew paper seals from her sleeves and sent them skittering off to the walls and floor. I could feel the security protocols snap into place like steel bands to my senses, which really just told me that I needed to copy Konan's designs. Maybe she'd be willing to swap ideas once this was over?

Our story had more detail than just "Obito was held captive for six months in a megalomaniac's basement," but far less detail than what we'd reported to Sensei. The majority of the dramatic bits in the story were still under the blanket of S-ranked secrecy, but we could bend things a bit to accommodate our new mission. And if we went in to explore that statue's secrets blind, there was every chance that we'd all get killed somehow, so there was a certain level of pragmatism at work.

But explaining all that meant explaining other things, like the original story of the Tailed Beasts and the monster they used to be. And why it'd be a bad idea for me to get near the thing.

My argument mainly rested upon the preexisting connection between Isobu and the Ten-Tails, and how Yahiko had said that the creature was like a gaping chakra void with a great big mass of weird shit in the middle. Kind of like a big, demonic coconut. None of us wanted to see what would happen if I got sucked in.

"...So I'm not getting anywhere near that thing," I said, toward the end of the info dump about Tailed Beasts. "Because I want to live."

"That's fine, Keisuke-san," Konan said. "Because neither Yahiko nor I are going to be interacting with it again."

"I mean, I could," Yahiko said, before anyone could open their mouth to ask why he was holding off. "But it seems like it's more of a Nagato thing. And you did say that the Statue is linked to the Rinnegan, didn't you?"

"Yes. Oh, and Nagato-san? If it tries to impale you with chakra receiving rods, do us all a favor and don't get stabbed." I couldn't remember if that had been a result of the way Nagato had summoned the Statue in the previous timeline or if it had just been a function of the Statue's interaction with its handlers. Nagato had not been in a good place to make sound decisions when his best friend was dead on the ground, his legs were useless, and Konan had still been in trouble.

I probably would have done something stupid in those circumstances, too. And...I kind of had, though Kannabi was not quite on the same scale.

"I'll...try?" Nagato said blankly. Er, whoops? Maybe I needed to explain about the future-past Nagato?

"Don't worry, she says stuff like that a lot," Obito said sympathetically. "But it's usually best to follow her advice anyway."

"The idea is that Nagato-san will be able to keep the creature contained if it decides to wake up," Kakashi said. "And if he can, we may be able to seal it underground or in Obito's Kamui dimension. Someplace no one will be able to access."

I still wanted it to be launched into the sun. But given some of the stories about the Ten-Tails and the Sage of Six Paths, and what Pain had just failed to do with a berserking Naruto, maybe the moon would be far enough.

It won't be, Isobu said, interrupting my thoughts. The Sage did seal that creature into the moon, but the fact that it is here now means that it is a part of a summon contract of some kind. His tails lashed in the water, stirring up the bay and sending waves crashing toward the shore. It was on this world before this Rinnegan boy ever discovered it, but you already know that only he and others with the Rinnegan make it do anything. So, Madara must have brought it here.

"The only question is why?" I murmured aloud, looking up at the dripping ceiling.

"Why what?" Obito asked.

"Why would Madara bring the Ten-Tails's husk here?" I repeated, for the benefit of the audience I had briefly forgotten about. I stood up and started to pace. "Madara managed to escape us at the Mountain's Graveyard because he could make it move before Sensei could get there and kill him. But why would he move it here? Nagato's the only person on the continent with a working Rinnegan, so he'd be able to take it away from him. Why would Madara risk something like that?"

"It could be a trap," Yahiko reminded me, as though we hadn't been treating the situation like one since we first heard of it. "But I don't like the idea of something that big and that dangerous in Amegakure territory. We can try examining it again with Konan's paper jutsu, but it still seems like Nagato's going to be the only one to get anything out of it."

"I know I'm going with him," Obito put in, "because I'm the one with the best escape strategy. If something goes wrong, I can get us both out of there quickly." He rubbed the back of his neck. "I mean, I don't have the Puppet-Master Seal anymore. Jiraiya-sama made sure of that much, so it means I'm probably safe."

"There might be a way to destroy it," Konan remarked, holding up an explosive tag between her fingers. "Has anyone ever tried?"

"We can anyway," Yahiko said, shrugging. "Okay, here's a plan for now. Obito-san and Nagato will check it out tomorrow morning with a couple of Konan's spy birds so the rest of us can see what they're seeing. Kakashi-san, did you want to join them?"

"I'm the only one trained in forensic investigation," Kakashi pointed out. "Since when? It would make sense, as long as I knew Nagato-san could control it."

"So then Nagato and Obito go first, and you go in once we feel like it's safe so we can try to figure out how it got here," Yahiko concluded. "That might work."

"Did you discover anything unusual about the Statue, other than the fact that it's there?" Kakashi asked.

"When we tapped it," Konan said, "it sounded...strange. It may not be made of the same material all the way through."

Well, that was ominous. What could be hiding in there?

Madara was still at large as far as we knew, but what about his followers? I knew for a fact that couldn't have killed every Zetsu available to him, because the body count in Konoha didn't even come close to matching up. Sure, we'd killed more than ten thousand Zetsu clones, but Tobi had somehow gotten his hands on ninety thousand more of the putty soldiers when they'd come up in the future-past timeline. There could easily have been more of them, but I also didn't think Nagato would have just left them lying around once he realized that they hid underground.

"Nagato-san, did you get rid of all the Zetsu clones in Amegakure?" I asked him.

"You mean the strange soldiers?" Nagato asked, but it seemed to be a rhetorical question because he nodded and said, "Last year, we exterminated as many as we could locate within ten kilometers of Amegakure."

"But what if the Statue has more around it?" Obito asked. "I know it might not have seemed like it, but I only saw two active Zetsu clones the whole time I was with Madara. And somehow, when Sensei and Jiraiya-sama went after him, they got about a hundred to deal with. Something weird happened there, and it might be happening here."

"This just keeps getting better and better," Yahiko muttered.

On that upbeat note, we tabled our plans for tomorrow. Because, of course, we needed to get dessert.
Konan and Kakashi ended up heading back to the Akatsuki tower early, while Obito, Yahiko and I headed down to the market near the docks of Amegakure. Nagato hadn't left at all, preferring to stay with Kakashi's eight dogs and simply pet everything that wanted to be petted. That left those of us with actual sweet teeth to sort out who was going to get what.

Somehow, I ended up walking around the market and observing the merchants at work. I had the idle thought of buying a novelty umbrella, or something else that wouldn't generally be found outside Ame. I didn't travel much compared to most shinobi, but the idea of a souvenir appealed somewhat.

As I poked through the stock of a merchant selling oiled paper umbrellas with some rather beautiful flower designs, the merchant gave my Konoha symbol a sidelong look. I ignored the hostility with the ease of long practice, since it wasn't like I hadn't dealt with worse from people who actually knew how unstable "my kind" could be.

"Buy something or get out!" And there was the moment when the hostility became overt. Yay.

"I want to see that one," I said, as though the merchant hadn't said anything about window-shoppers like me. I was pointing at an umbrella that had—surprise!—a raindrop pattern. Maybe Naruto would find that funny.

"Oh, and that was the one I wanted to see," said a voice behind me.

I turned, and found myself looking at a woman who I definitely didn't recall sensing. She was a little taller than I was, and while I couldn't see her eyes past a pair of dark sunglasses, I did note the almost white-gold tone to her thick, feathered hair. She had unmarked skin, but her chakra said "kunoichi," which implied some talent. And the extreme plunging neckline said "boobs." In one sense, she was beautiful.

But in another, the hair on the back of my neck was trying to stand up more the longer I looked at her.

"A fellow tourist?" I asked reflexively, masking my doubts behind a smile.

"Oh, yes," she said, and the creeping feeling got stronger. She looked back toward the umbrellas and sighed, "The children just love these."

The merchant bustled between us, then jabbed the umbrella at me. "This one?" he demanded.

I took it from him and examined the pattern, but I kept one eye on the woman.

A genjutsu. Isobu seemed to rumble inside of the mindscape. An infiltrator?

...I don't know. If I knew what village she was from...

"Yahiko-senpai," I called out, though I still tracked the woman's chakra without looking. "Do you think Naruto-chan would like this?"

"He might?" Yahiko said, drifting over. "It's kind of a tragedy that I've never actually met the kid, you know."

"Remind me to tell Sensei about that, then."

And then Yahiko turned to the woman, who had been retreating from the shop, and said, "Passport, please."
She dug through her purse for a moment before producing an official-looking slip of paper. As I watched, Yahiko took the paper between his fingers and his chakra flared.

A musical note appeared on it, next to Konan's seal.

Sweet galloping Gertrude.

"Another new village, huh?" Yahiko said, as though he had—oh no. He genuinely had no idea what that meant? "Take it back to your lodgings and register properly, will you? There's no photograph on it."

"Of course, Yahiko-sama," the woman said, bobbing into a brief curtsey. Then she bustled away as though nothing had happened.

"You feel kinda tense to me, Keisuke-san," Yahiko commented, when the woman had finally vanished. "What was that about?"

"…Might want Konan-senpai to add a new village to her personal watch-list," I said after a while. "Because the person who runs it should not have agents here."

"Hm," was all Yahiko said in response. Then, "Well, did you want to get this umbrella or not?"

I looked contemplatively at it for a little longer. Then I said to the merchant, "Do you have one with toads?"

The merchant in question looked at Yahiko, then looked at me. And then, with an impressive grasp of his changing circumstances, said in a much friendlier voice, "Of course!"

Obito showed up a little after that, carrying a whole bag of slightly overripe kinkan but no candy. I knew that March was a little out of season for most fruits, but hey, he'd tried. We ended up heading back to the tower with a security update and dessert in hand.

And in the morning, we'd confront the Statue.

(Konan never did find that mysterious kunoichi. And I never let my guard down.)

Chapter Notes

Chapter title's from that one song by Runaground.

That night, Isobu and I talked a few things over.

“What the hell aren’t you telling me about the Ten-Tails?!”

Well, he talked. I suffered a sudden failure of volume regulation skills.

Isobu, who sat placidly in the middle of the Tailed Beast mindscape dimension, was remarkably tolerant of the screaming monkey in front of his face. Ergo, me.

Actually, besides Isobu, there were three Tailed Beasts in residence. Shukaku sat on his haunches across from Isobu, with Gaara sitting on top of his giant sandy paws. And, turning the Tailed Beast meeting into a square, both halves of Kurama sat opposite each other, though without either of their human hosts. Yin Kurama was lounging on the ground, his head propped up on the knuckles of his right hand, and his nine tails flared out behind him like a skirt. Yang Kurama sat back on his haunches and had his elbows across his knees.

The two Kuramas mostly seemed interested in watching the show.

“You let your human talk to you like that?” Shukaku cackled, while Gaara played with a tiny amount of sand that was lying dormant at his feet. He was making a sand castle.

“Yours can’t make complete sentences, so I don’t understand why you think you can talk,” Isobu told him. His three tails lashed, briefly, as he turned his eye back to me. “The truth is, we don’t remember anything before being separated into nine Tailed Beasts. But the old man—the man you know as the Sage of Six Paths—did tell us some. We were with him for months.”

Given that most jinchūriki lasted a grand total of two seconds after their Tailed Beast was extracted, I was duly impressed. Being the first jinchuriki ever—and of the Ten-Tails—had apparently given the Sage a bit of a break on the usual instantaneous death thing.

“The Ten-Tails wasn’t a normal creature.” Shukaku glanced down at Gaara, and his sand danced between the toddler’s fingers. “Not even by our standards.”

“What made it so different than everyone else?” I asked, already dreading the answer.

“The Sage didn’t talk about it much,” Isobu cautioned. “But you already know that the Sage was the jinchūriki of the Ten-Tails, don’t you?”

“Yes.” Because Ten-Tailed Tobi hadn’t exactly been one of the things I could just ignore. “There was something about…Truth-Seeking Orbs? I do know that being the Ten-Tails’s host results in basically unlimited power and indestructibility. I mean, all of you are immortal anyway, but your hosts do die.”

“And so did the Sage.” As one, the Tailed Beasts closed their eyes as Isobu spoke. Just for a moment. “But there is a secret about the Ten-Tails that not even you could know.”

“What’s that?”

“The Ten-Tails’s rampage was not just a punishment for human sins,” Yin Kurama said. “It was fueled directly by them. Very personally.”

“The Sage’s name was Hagoromo Ōtsutsuki.” Yang Kurama dropped lower to the ground, so he could meet my eyes with his—which were about the size of my entire body. “And the Ten-Tails was the result of his mother, Kaguya, gaining all the power of the Shinju by devouring its chakra fruit. And she went mad with power. All of it.”

“The what?” I asked.

“The giant god-tree you might have forgotten about,” Isobu put in. “Remember?”

The name “Kaguya” was familiar, but not in that context. There was the story of Princess Kaguya, the bamboo-cutter’s daughter, who was originally a space alien who dropped into pre-industrial Japan or something. That story had little to no bearing on this world’s version of the story, where the mythical Kaguya had been just the mother to the Sage. There were fragmented stories about how she stole the fruit of the Divine Tree (against the will of the gods) and then triggered a multi-decade rampage by the Ten-Tails. In hindsight, I’d never closely examined how Kaguya had disappeared from the story right before the Sage showed up and put the Ten-Tails in its place. She was only ever mentioned as the Sage’s mother, who ate the chakra fruit and then gave birth to the Sage. Full stop. Who cared about the woman who gave birth to Heracles? Obviously, someone had, but parents were supposed to drop right out of the stories to let their divine children take hold of the narrative.

I brought my hand to my chin in thought. Then I asked, “How crazy?”

As the first chakra user on the planet, I imagined that when Yang Kurama said “all of it,” he meant it literally.

“Imagine a jinchūriki without a seal. Worse than this human and I were going to be.” Shukaku waved a paw vaguely, and Gaara clung to the other thumb-claw. “The Sage’s mother became the Ten-Tails by fusing with the Tree, though no one knows why. Before that, no one really knows what it was like. But we do know that once she had all that chakra, only the Sage and Uncle Hamura could stop her.”

But I could guess a few more things, based on what I saw. “The Ten-Tails didn’t show any intelligence in the Fourth Shinobi World War. Even when it came to the—to this”—I waved my hand to indicate the Tailed Beast mindscape—“the Ten-Tails didn’t show up. All of the Tailed Beasts it held did, though. From what I remember, Tobi and Madara’s Rinnegan could only keep it in line so far, but neither of them mentioned anything about a mental struggle in terms of pitting two thinking minds against each other. Just that it was too aggressive to contain.”
And then the bloody thing had just ended up sealed away regardless.

“Uncle Hamura?” I repeated, buying time to think.

“Hamama?” Gaara asked.

“It was Hamura, brat,” Shukaku said, but with subtle fondness.

Gaara ignored the correction and held his arms up at the gigantic tanuki. “Up!”

Shukaku sighed and created a floating platform of sand to carry Gaara up to eye his eye level.

“The Sage’s twin brother, who fought alongside him against Kaguya,” Yin Kurama clarified. “We never met him, but he led most of the Ōtsutsuki clan away after he had children. The Sage stayed with us on this world.”

“Define ‘away’” I suggested.

Yang Kurama shrugged his massive shoulders. “The moon? All we know is that we haven’t seen them since.”

Well, if the Sage’s brother had been as strong as the man himself, I imagined that surviving in a hard vacuum wasn’t impossible. This ninja-ridden reality had more ways to thumb one’s nose at physics than most comic books I’d ever read.

“The nine of us,” Isobu said, “were born from the Ten-Tails’s chakra alone. The Sage wasn’t able to contain all of his mother’s Tailed Beast form, so he had to seal the body separately. He created the moon to contain the husk that was left. And we’ve already discussed how the body might have come back here.” Isobu growled. “The idea that Madara of all people could call it back to this world…”

“However it got here, the empty husk is what you are going to be dealing with,” said Yin Kurama. “Along with anything it might contain.”

Okay. Oooooookay.

I needed to take a minute. I sat down abruptly, trying to figure out what to do with any of this information.

So if Princess Kaguya was really more like, uh, Hera from Greek myth, then where did that leave us? The Ten-Tails I’d seen had been more like Godzilla than a woman who sounded like the inspiration for the phrase “hell hath no fury,” but the Tailed Beasts were being clear. Or as clear as they could be. Kaguya had been the mother of all monsters, and the Ten-Tails might have a mind inside all of that rage. It…it kind of explained a bit about why the Ten-Tails was so human-shaped to start with. While on one hand, “humans are the real monsters” was a bit of a theme in this universe, I had to wonder if something that had started as a fucking tree would otherwise have any interest in opposable thumbs.

So, I was going to assume that the Tailed Beasts had the most accurate information available. They’d been born from the chakra of the Ten-Tails, and the Sage had been as honest with his nine new kids as he could have at the time. A tree wouldn’t have had the initiative necessary to blow a gasket over a fruit being stolen.

At least, I didn’t think so.
Abruptly, the Great Toad Sage’s words came back, hauntingly apt. “Beware the man in black. Dead gods still dream.”

If I assumed that the Ten-Tails—that Kaguya—counted as enough of a god for the prophecy, then her revival would be absolutely disastrous. Even aside from what the Tailed Beasts knew about her personality and the power she would be able to throw around once she got back on her feet, I remembered what I had thought immediately when I had first heard the second half of that prophecy.

Reaper.

Kaguya’s revival would be an extinction-level event. And if the “dream” part was accurate, then she could either influence people from beyond the grave somehow like a dead Reaper, or she wasn’t as dead as anyone assumed.

Then again, Tailed Beasts couldn’t be permanently killed. Why would anyone assume that a woman who became a Tailed Beast would be any different?

No pressure, right?

But who was the man in black? Assuming the prophecies were linked, it had to be someone who was working for Kaguya’s revival, or else the heir to her legacy. Someone who carried a dead goddess’s dream…

I bit my lip, unwilling to voice the thought. But I was already thinking of Tobi and Madara. They were the only two villains who had lasted long enough in the manga to be relevant by the time I’d dropped into this reality instead. If all of that stuff was foreshadowing for Kaguya’s return, then there wasn’t much time to bring anyone else in to be her cat’s paw. So wouldn’t it have to be one of them?

Maybe that had been the real purpose of the all of that bullshit about the worldwide genjutsu.

“There is one other factor,” Shukaku said, interrupting my thoughts. “The Sage had two sons.”

“And did one of them do something stupid?” I asked offhandedly, because it felt like there was a bit of a universal theme about siblings in this universe. Aside from the Inuzuka siblings, there was always some kind of tension in the manga. Knowing that the Sage was about as mythological as a real-life person could get, I had to assume that his family drama was every bit as epic.

“The older one—Indra—was very similar to the person you know as Madara Uchiha,” Shukaku said bluntly. “I never liked him much. Imagine him as the stupid one.”

While I imagined that when Madara was made, they broke the fucking mold, it was becoming clear that I was wrong. There were always epic rivals in every generation, weren’t there? Hashirama and Madara, Jiraiya and Orochimaru, Naruto and Sasuke...

“But the younger one was not nearly as aggravating.” Yin Kurama yawned, then went on with, “He gave the Sage the idea to make us.”

What.

Shukaku said, without acknowledging my confusion, “Asura was friendlier. Harder-working. He actually stopped and talked to us sometimes after we were born and off on our own. At least, before he and his brother killed each other.”

I covered my eyes with my hand, as though trying to ward off a headache. Of course they did. Yeah,
“...While this is probably the most gossip anyone’s heard about the Sage of Six Paths in over a thousand years,” I said, “I don’t know what this has to do with the Statue my friends are going to be facing off against tomorrow.”

“It doesn’t. Kaguya’s rampage was old news by then,” Shukaku said. “But we figured you might want to hear the entire story.”

Well, if I’d come this far already…

Sighing to myself, I ninja-hopped my way up to where Gaara was still building sandcastles out of Shukaku’s sand and sat down next to him on the Beast’s head. With a toddler crawling into my lap, I told Shukaku, “Go ahead.”

By the end of the explanation, I decided that I’d pitch it to Jiraiya as the plot of his next heavy novel once I got back to Konoha. While the story was no Make-Out Paradise, the subject matter was a lot more relevant to our sense of our world’s history. If HBO existed, they could make a Spartacus-level drama out of it.

With that cheery thought, I woke up. I had no way of knowing if I had spent only a few minutes in the Tailed Beast mindscape and just slept the rest of the night away, or if it had taken far longer than it felt like to hear the Tailed Beasts’ side of the story.

But I did know that when I woke up, I was bracketed by both of my teammates’ backs. Somehow, our three futons had merged into one. Obito was sleeping with my arm pinned under his pillow, while Kakashi had his mask off and had stolen about half of my blanket.

I chuckled very quietly to myself and decided to sleep in. The Ame trio could hear my story when it was actually light out.

Amegakure didn’t really have a particular office space the way that Konoha did. While Hanzō had lived in a spacious mansion that was loaded to the gills with traps, the Akatsuki triumvirate had apparently repurposed it into a homeless shelter after stripping out anything dangerous. Their Amegakure’s nerve center was actually made up of the first four floors of their favorite tower, while they used floors five through ten for their living quarters. I’d heard from Yahiko that it was a temporary arrangement until they could build a real administration center, but they were still fighting over the design.

So in the meantime, while Konan basically ran everything from one spot via her paper messengers, thirty or so Ame-nin made up the office’s actual staff. And, once Yahiko had finally been tracked down by the Ame-nin who made up his guard detail, all of those bodies meant that the triumvirate could get on with the business of running a village.

This included sorting out all of the foreigners that somehow showed up in Amegakure, too. The result was a series of queues to the front desk that reminded me of a DMV.

Since I didn’t have anything else to do other than wait for the three to report in, I found myself hanging around the Ame-nin for lack of any diversions.

“You could always go back to your rooms if you’re bored, Gekkō-san,” said the nearest Ame-nin. Ren, the pink-eyed young woman who had fought Anko at the Chūnin Exams, had been properly introduced to me this morning, so she was the person who had been assigned to keeping me out of trouble.

This basically meant making certain I never left Konan’s sight.

“I don’t think I’ll get anything out of staying up there,” I told Ren. “But thanks for the suggestion.”

Ren nodded and got back to work, signing off on something or other.

The three shinobi generally known as the leaders of Amegakure, the original three Akatsuki members, were simply the most prominent members of their organization. They were the most powerful, too, but in this timeline the other rebels against Hanzō’s rule had also survived, which meant that Amegakure had a core leadership made of dozens of former insurgents.

It also meant that Yahiko, Konan, and Nagato had needed to crush two other minor rebellions that were the result of their hostile takeover. Ame’s history recorded them as Hanzō’s relatives and former political allies, but I wasn’t sure about that. Regardless of how involved the other rebels were in Hanzō’s regime, they were still dead. And given that Nagato was involved in the suppression, I assumed the crushing had been literal as well as total.

As for the rest of Akatsuki, it turned out that they were made up mostly of war orphans and malcontents of various types. Yahiko was older than most of the core members of Akatsuki. Other people had flocked to his cause once it became obvious that the rebels were gonna win the civil war, but the new administration was still short of adults.

“Can you get us lunch, then?” asked Tohru, an Ame-nin with a topknot. I’d had to be introduced to him twice, since I’d forgotten his name about five seconds after learning it the first time.

I glanced at Yahiko for permission. He nodded back.

And that’s the story of how I became an office gofer.

Sometime later, I was delivering lunch in various forms. I even had a Water Clone helping me, which was easier than it would have been in Konoha thanks to the tremendous amounts of environmental water in Amegakure. Though my memory for names was still lousy, I was somewhat better with faces, and everyone got what they ordered eventually.

And then, during the last few moments of this self-appointed delivery mission, I heard a shout.

“You!”

At this exclamation, I automatically glanced around the room for anyone else the speaker could have addressed. Since neither Konan nor Yahiko turned to talk to the person yelling in my face, I assumed that meant I was, in fact, the “you” in question.

Aside from my team and me, the umbrella category of “foreigner” also included the greenish-gray-hAIed, magenta-eyed young man who was glaring at me like I’d killed his grandmother. He had a rough-stitched scar running from the lower lid of his left eye toward his jawline, and he was shorter than me by at least four centimeters. Aside from wearing a green robe-like top that was accented by a Kirigakure hitai-ate, I could also recognize the flower-topped crook-ended staff he had strapped across his back.

“Me,” I said, to the young man who might have been the Fourth Mizukage. Sensei would despair of my self-preservation skills in the face of important people yelling at me.

What was he even doing here? Obviously, he wasn’t a jinchūriki in this timeline—my status made that kind of obvious—but I also hadn’t heard much of anything about Kirigakure in…in quite some time. I’d killed a few of their ANBU on the mission where Obito came back, and when a squad had failed miserably to infiltrate Konoha, but I’d never been the one to throw the first kunai.

Yagura, looking around at the crowd of other foreigners and the way that both Konan and Yahiko were looking right at him, seemed to reconsider his tone. Briefly. In a low voice, he said, “Kirigakure has a few bones to pick with you, thief.”

Big talk, coming from this human, Isobu grumbled from inside my mind. After a second of thought, my favorite turtle added, So this is the human I could have been sealed into, if not for your interference. He’s smaller than expected.

Thank you for your completely useless commentary, I told him.

I try.

“Kirigakure has its own problems,” I reminded Yagura. “But you’re a Mizukage candidate, Yagurasan. Why would Kirigakure send you to this newly-established village?” Even without Isobu, my chakra sense told me that Yagura was no pushover. Isobu had given him a crapload of chakra to play around with, but Yagura felt skilled. His chakra was water-aligned like mine, but somehow more precise, and I didn’t dare assume that the staff was just for show.

And there was that Bingo Book entry for notorious Kirigakure shinobi, which removed some of the mystery about both of us. I was in there because I was Isobu’s jinchūriki, but Yagura was in our Bingo Book as a potential S-class shinobi, if we gave him long enough to get that strong. From the feeling of it, we had.

Ren’s eyes darted between Yagura, whose glare had kicked up a notch, and me, the known jinchūriki, and she signaled for help before anything else could happen. Which probably made her smarter than I was, to be perfectly blunt.

“If you start the Fourth Shinobi World War in Amegakure,” Yahiko’s voice cut in sharply, “it’s also going to end here.” As though the crowd was no obstacle, Yahiko was suddenly between Yagura and me like a referee, with tension in every line of his frame.

As a sensor, Yahiko probably knew better than most people exactly how much power was crammed into the building, even with my boys and Nagato off on their spelunking adventure.

“Go hang out with Konan for a day,” they said. “It’ll be calming,” they said. “Maybe investigate the creeper from yesterday!” And then no one accounts for the sheer number of possible problems that might require me to not stay calm.

Sure, I’d made the decision to stay away from the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path long before ever reaching Ame, but I was in the mood to gripe about self-inflicted misfortunes anyway.

“This is a Kirigakure internal matter, Yahiko-dono,” Yagura said, glaring at the taller shinobi. “It’s not your concern.”

“Actually,” Yahiko countered, “it’s my business when you threaten my employees. Keisuke-san was loaned to Amegakure by the Fourth Hokage as a personal favor. If Kirigakure wants to open diplomatic ties to Amegakure, it might be a good idea to avoid trampling all over what’s already
And just like that, I had Akatsuki’s protection for as long as Team Minato was working for them. Yahiko might not have thought of it that way, since he was also looking out for his teacher’s student’s students, but the message was clear.

Kirigakure wasn’t going to be able to do much about me.

But Yagura was here anyway. Why Ame, and why now?

Kirigakure was off the eastern coast of the Land of Fire, well into the Land of Water’s archipelago. Amegakure, on the other hand, was between the Land of Rivers, Fire, and Wind, and was hundreds of kilometers inland. Who would have the authority to send a Mizukage candidate so far away from home? And why the fuck would anyone important like that go to Ame unless they had a hell of a reason?

“So, as a favor I’ll let you skip the line,” Yahiko said in a much more casual tone, eyeing Yagura carefully. “What does Kirigakure want with Amegakure?”

I was going to stay and listen, but one of Konan’s paper cranes flitted across my field of vision and drew my attention to her. Granted, I was nearly certain that the Konan at the desk was actually a paper clone she’d made so she didn’t have to be there in person, but that was a minor quibble.

I left Yahiko to deal with Yagura, then followed the paper crane onto the next floor. The Konan at the desk must have been a paper clone, then.

Four floors up, where the Akatsuki triumvirate all had their own workspaces—though I didn’t know what was in all of them—the crane led me to a shoji with blue chrysanthemums on the paper. Figuring that it was Konan’s office—and sensing her inside—I rapped my knuckles against the wooden frame of the shoji.

“Come in,” Konan’s voice said, and I obeyed.

Konan was sitting at a writing table, which was covered in neat rows of seal tags. Konan’s hand was on the tabletop, practically merged with the seals slowly forming all at once on the surface, and I had to tear my eyes away from the sight.

I sat down across from her. “You needed me here, Konan-san?”

“Yes. Nagato and your friends have finally reached the Ten-Tails, and you need a quick way to relay information directly to them,” Konan said, and held up a carefully folded origami person. It looked a lot like the one that she had sent to Sensei’s office, which had projected the initial image of the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path.

(Also known, variously, as the Statue, the Ten-Tails, the One-Eyed Giant, “that creepy mummy,” and “trouble.”)

“A live connection, huh?” I muttered, and took the origami figure. Better than a live helmet feed.

A what?

It came alive in my hand, wrapping its little paper limbs around my hand and wrist like a particularly clingy monkey, and lifted its square-shaped head. Just like the see-through hologram thing that Konan had used last time, the image flickered and waivered in place before clearing up.
And then I was looking down at a…well, it looked like someone had strapped a camera to someone’s head, given how the image was swaying and jerking with somebody’s movements. Given that I could see Obito up ahead, climbing on what looked like the curve of a massive heel, I assumed that Nagato was the one carrying Konan’s paper camera-thingy.

“Konan, are you seeing this?” Nagato’s voice asked, and his pale hand waved in front of the paper scout’s field of view.

“We can see, Nagato,” Konan said. “Keisuke-san is here, too.”

“Oh, she is? Well, we haven’t found anything serious yet,” Obito called out, with his image turning to face Nagato. “And the statue hasn’t moved.”

“I haven’t tried to make it move,” Nagato clarified, “but…I can definitely feel something down here that’s not us, or the statue. But it’s not really human, either…”

“Don’t poke it unless you’re prepared to smash it,” I suggested, watching as the image wavered when Nagato nodded.

“We’ll continue exploring for a while. Once we’re sure we’re clear, Kakashi-san can come in,” Nagato said, and moved on.

For a while, the only sounds I could hear were of Nagato and Obito exploring a dripping limestone cave, poring over the various nooks and crannies created by someone plunking a hundred-meter mummy monster into it. I’d have thought that shoving something with that much mass into such a small space would result in tons of rubble, but apparently either the Akatsuki trio had taken care of it or the Statue had pulverized the rubble.

“Do you mind telling me what happened with the Kiri-nin, Keisuke-san?” Konan asked.

How was I supposed to put it? “Yagura is a potential candidate for Mizukage.” I tapped the spot on my chest where Isobu’s seal sat. “There’s a conflict of interest.”

“I see.” Konan turned her head and flicked her left wrist. A sheet of paper shot out of her sleeve and flew out of the office in the form of an origami butterfly. “Daibutsu and Kyūsuke should be able to keep an eye on him.”

“Who?” I asked.

“You’ll meet them soon enough,” Konan said, “but for reference, Daibutsu is the oldest Akatsuki member here. Kyūsuke is…hm, closer to my age than yours, I think. You’d notice his purple tattoos first.”

“Oh,” I said.

“Hey, Nagato? I think there’s something down there!” Obito’s voice called out from the projection, and I jolted back to attention.

“Like what?” I asked, and was ignored.

“I think you need to make this thing move its stupid elbow first,” Obito yelled. “It looks a bit like cloth, maybe?”

“Obito-san, please stand back!” Nagato suggested loudly.
I watched Obito’s image leap back from the Statue and land on one of the water-slick walls of the cavern, sticking to it with chakra.

And the husk of the Ten-Tails moved.

I bit down on a startled, reflexive shriek, jerking away from the image of that thing flexing its massive hands. Its withered arms shifted, dislodging layers of dust that shouldn’t have accumulated in this kind of environment. I would have expected mold or moss so thick even Nagato would be choking on it, not...not whatever this was.

Obito gave a sudden scream, and then Nagato’s head jerked and the image spasmed horribly. There was a noise like two massive objects colliding, and then something white flew across Nagato’s field of view and hit a wall hard enough to splat.

Then the little projection sorted itself out. Konan was on her feet by then, peering into the image alongside me, as Nagato adjusted his headband.

“I thought those were all dead,” Obito’s voice said as he rematerialized to Nagato’s left. “That was one of those Zetsu things!”

“I...I don’t think we ever established where they came from.” Nagato’s breath came a little faster than normal, probably out of sheer surprise. “I didn’t—Konan, did you see where it might have come from? It’s all limestone around here.”

“No, Nagato,” Konan replied. “We can only see what you do.”

“Oh, right. Obito-san?” Nagato prompted.

“It looked like it came from under the Statue somewhere,” Obito replied. Already, he was picking his way through the cave and back toward the mostly-dead monster.

Chills went down my back. Zetsu clones almost never appeared alone. “Obito, get away from there.”

“It missed, Kei!” Obito protested.

I couldn’t keep myself from snapping, “Then why the fuck are you giving it a second shot?”

Konan blinked at my language—not sure why, given that she’d been hanging out with teenagers since forever—while Nagato’s hand came into view and he did something. The result of that something was the Statue being lifted off the ground and starting to float toward the cavern’s ceiling through the use of Nagato’s gravity-manipulation powers.

“Oh, hell.” I wasn’t sure if Obito or I said that first, but it was definitely our shared reaction toward the things we saw next.

Even if I hadn’t just heard the story about a tree growing some kind of godhood-inducing fruit, I would have recoiled from what was poking out of a tunnel that had been hidden behind the Statue’s back. Or, more specifically, the thing that was growing out of the Statue’s back and curling down through the tunnel like a nightmarish extra tail.

Nagato pulled the Statue forward as he strode around it, but his paper scout-thingy was pointed down the tunnel. And we could see that the tree that grew into it was covered in thick branches and long white stems. Each stem had a fruit growing at the end, like a cherry tree or something.

And each “cherry” was a half-formed Zetsu clone.
“Fuck,” I heard Obito whisper, as Nagato continued to pull on the Statue and expose more and more of the dormant ranks of Zetsu clones.

Konan’s gray eyes seemed to flash. “Nagato, burn them all.”

“Nagato, can you see this?” Obito yelped. His arms flailed, and he shouted from the opposite end of the cavern, “There’s—there’s human faces in the bark!”

“Oh god.” I swallowed hard. “Obito, does it look kind of familiar?”

“It… They—they look like,” Obito began, and paused. “Like the faces on the Hokage monument. E- Especially the First.”

Well, that definitely explained why Obito could use Wood Release. I’d forgotten that Madara had a stock of Hashirama’s cells—which, by the way, was disgusting—that he used to give the Statue some more fuel for its troops. But holy fuck was that ever creepy in person. So many faces...

“I can feel it trying to absorb my chakra, even now,” Nagato reported, looking up at the statue itself. “Obito-san, please stand back. I’m going to break the tree down.”

“Y-You got it,” Obito said, and vanished in a swirl of air.

And then things got loud.

After carefully lowering the Statue to the ground, still in its half-rising position, Nagato turned his attention to the tree growing from its back and lifted both hands. He didn’t really have to, from what I remembered of the Deva Path’s powers, but perhaps it helped him concentrate.

Then a section of the tree, as thick around as one of the Statue’s arms, crunched in on itself as though it was no stronger than a pencil. A second groan of wood started immediately, and a colossal cracking noise heralded the collapse of the second section into so many splinters. After that, the cracks and crunches got closer together as Nagato hit his stride, punctuated occasionally by the squish of a Zetsu being caught between the various chunks of flying wood. As he went, Nagato dragged more and more of the tree out of the tunnel to be crushed methodically into firewood.

None of the spear-sized got anywhere near Nagato thanks to a bit more Deva Path magic. But I would not have wanted to put anyone else in there with him. It would be like standing in front a giant wood chipper.

It took a total of four minutes for the noises to stop. By that point, the cavern was littered in enough wood chips to cover the Statue’s ankles. Some of that debris was held together by glue made of squished Zetsu clones, and none of it had tried retaliating. All that was left of the tree was a large purple bud, about the size of a minivan, with the rest of the stem ending in the world’s biggest pile of potential splinters.

As first-person views of utter destruction went, I’d give it a ten out of ten.

“Is it safe to come back in?” Obito’s voice rang out, in the wake of that commotion.

“Possibly,” Nagato called over his shoulder. “But stand back. I think we’ve found the last part of the tree.”

“Gotta say,” Obito’s voice said, getting closer anyway, “that was the most straightforward way to fight that I’ve ever seen. Find target? Target goes squish.”
“I try,” Nagato replied. He looked down at Obito, who was grinning at him. “I thought I said it wasn’t quite safe.”

“Yeah, but I got out the last two times all right.” He shrugged. “So, what’s...oh! I know what that is.”

“You do?” I said, though Obito had made a point of ignoring whatever I tried to say through Konan’s messaging system over the last few minutes.

“It was the top of the tree,” Obito said, and grinned guilelessly.

“...That’s very helpful, thank you,” said Nagato, with the faintest trace of sarcasm.

“Seriously, though. I think if we crack that open, we might find what we’re looking for.” Obito turned his face toward the bud and said, “I can see a bit of chakra moving in there.” He had his Sharingan on, then.

“Famous last words, Obito,” I said dryly.

Obito shushed me, and Nagato held his hands out again.

The drastically overgrown bud tore open some fifteen meters away from them, splitting from tip to end as neatly as if a knife had done it.

Bones spilled out.

Everyone froze for a moment. I could hear Nagato’s breathing in the sudden silence. I could hear my breathing. I could have sworn that I could hear Kakashi gasping, except that I knew he wasn’t there.

“That...that isn’t what I thought it would be,” Obito said. And, because he was apparently incorrigible, he crept closer to the resulting pile.

Then Nagato did something with gravity and Obito was suddenly floating half a meter in the air and back toward him, with a startled squawk. He flailed in midair for a moment, trying to figure out why gravity wasn’t doing its job, before realizing what was going on and groaning aloud.

When he finally dragged Obito back to face him, Nagato said, “Please don’t do something that might make your friends upset, Obito-san.”

Thoroughly chastised, Obito didn’t go after the skeleton again.

“Keisuke-san,” Nagato began, “do you have any idea what might be happening here?”

...Maybe I did? “I don’t know for sure. But maybe you could float the bones over to you instead of going over there?” I suggested.

“Kakashi-san may be able to tell us more about them,” Konan said, eyeing the skeleton with distaste. “Obito-san, if you could?”

“Oh! Sure, I can get them to him.” And as soon as Nagato used more Deva Path power to do exactly what I had said, Obito followed Konan’s suggestion with a minimum of squeamishness. I didn’t want to imagine the entire idea of having a portal built into one’s head and then thinking about the stuff you’d have to let get close to your eye to use it.

Better Obito than me.
...Shit, he was the one who let me perform eye surgery on him without anesthetic. He could do whatever the fuck he wanted at this point.

Once Obito had vanished again, Nagato looked around the cavern again. “Konan, I don’t think the Statue will burn even if I give it my best shot. There must be a reason the Sage of Six Paths didn’t destroy it.”

“...Perhaps he was thinking in a different way,” Konan allowed. She propped her elbow up on her desk and rested her head against her upraised palm. After a moment’s thought. “I can be there in half an hour. Be ready to contain the blast.”

Holy shit.

Nagato nodded, making the projected image shake. “Of course.”

Konan sighed to herself and stood up. “Keisuke-san, I will be busy helping Nagato deal with the problem. I can’t know if I will be back soon, so please head downstairs to wait with Yahiko. I will send your teammates along when I can.”

“Okay, Konan-san,” I replied, bowing my head respectfully.

Konan smiled. “I’ll be back.”

And Konan left in a flurry of paper, leaving me to trudge downstairs again.

I wasn’t really allowed to help Yahiko with any administrative duties. While I was used to doing things like running for supplies, delivering papers, and forging signatures (if Sensei didn’t feel like signing something), no one wanted a Konoha-nin to be involved in Amegakure’s bureaucracy any more than I already had been. And that was as a gofer.

“Hey, Gekko-san, are you going to be around much longer?” asked another member of Akatsuki. Brown-haired and resembling a Neji (sans Byakugan) to some extent, Kie was one of the original Akatsuki members who’d fought against Hanzo and believed fervently in their cause.

I shrugged, leaning back against a desk. “Classified, Kie-san.”

He frowned severely. “Don’t think you can just do whatever you want because you’re Konoha-nin,” he warned.

Since I was barely allowed to fetch lunches for people, I didn’t really see his point. “I know, Kie-san.” I decided to relax a bit and said, “As soon as Yahiko-senpai is satisfied with our mission, we’ll be out of your hair.”

Kie still didn’t look particularly mollified. “Well, why do you call Yahiko ‘-senpai?’ It doesn’t seem like something most Konoha-nin would do.”

“Our teacher, the Fourth Hokage, was taught by Jiraiya-sama at around the same time as Yahiko-senpai,” I told him. “So he’s our senpai.”

“Oh,” Kie said. He huffed. “Well, don’t think everyone is going to be able to address them so familiarly! And there are gonna be more of you, aren’t there?”

“...Maybe?” I kind of doubted that Yahiko would want any help from Konoha when Amegakure still needed more income to stand on its own figurative feet. And if the Akatsuki trio needed money, I imagined that as soon as they got their house in order, they’d hit the continental economy with a bang. The only question I still had was if this Akatsuki would be in the business of recruiting missing-nin.

But it probably wasn’t the right time to ask that question.

Just then, I felt the signature pop of Kakashi’s chakra reentering the Akatsuki’s central tower, about two floors below me. Right after presumably kicking Kakashi out of the Kamui dimension, Obito’s chakra followed suit. I could feel their familiar bright flame and bolt of lightning chakra signatures and exhaled an immediate sigh of relief.

To Kie, I said, “I’m sorry, but I have to go right now. Can we talk later?”

Kie nodded and let me leave.

I chose to scramble down the stairs in the approved ninja fashion, which was to avoid the actual steps and just ricochet off walls to get to my destination faster. Gotta love breaking physics.

I spotted Kakashi staggering out from one of the basement doors, illuminated by a stark white light coming from the room. Cold seemed to drift out like a fog, trailing after Obito’s ankles.

“Obito!” I called out, catching his attention.

He snatched me up in an immediate hug, making me squeak in surprise. I patted his back until he set me down again, and I noted how shaken he seemed.

“Hey, what happened?” I asked him, trying to scoot past him and to the open door.

That wasn’t good. I pushed past him and toward the room I assumed had to be a morgue. Konan’s chakra was almost burned into the room, setting up a dozen or more interlaced refrigeration seals. Inside, there were six steel drainage tables. Kakashi stood by one of them, unloading a hundred bones onto its surface from a wicker basket.

“Kakashi, what’s your first thought?” I asked, but my eyes were completely trained on the partially assembled skeleton.

Obito ghosted in after me, still quieter than he should have been.

“Going by the lack of teeth, without any evidence of jaw trauma or disease,” Kakashi commented absently, “I’d say that this skeleton was gumming his food before he died.”

If he hadn’t been holding a fragile-looking femur, I would have smacked him. Instead, I looked down at the other bones that Kakashi had started to rearrange into a coherent whole. Ribs, ribs, ribs, various vertebra…

“Do we have any idea who this might be?” I asked, looking at the bone spurs on the cap of each femur. That must have hurt like hell.

“I won’t be able to say for certain unless we get a DNA test,” Kakashi pointed out. “And even then… Wait, you think this is someone specific, don’t you?”

“Madara was the only old man associated with the Statue, according to Obito and from what I remember. If this was the Sage, the bones would be way too deteriorated to be able to even guess. So I have a guess, yes.” I admitted. “And I’m hoping it is him, so we can lay this entire problem to rest.”

“I’m not going to say it can’t be him,” Kakashi said, putting the femur into its correct place. “But, again, I can only tell you so much before testing. And I don’t think either of our villages has a convenient stock of Madara’s DNA for this kind of thing.”

“You…” Obito began, hesitant. “You could test it against mine.”

“That doesn’t change the fact that we don’t have any of the right equipment here,” Kakashi said flatly. He held up the skeleton’s right forefinger, barely held together by scraps of what might have been cartilage? “We can assume, for now, that we have the bones of someone associated with the Ten-Tails. Willingly or not. We don’t know who. We do know that the subject was an arthritic old man who lost pretty much all of his teeth before he died. No bone trauma aside from fully-healed breaks, so I’ll go out on a limb”—and here, he held up the rest of the arm and made Obito swear quietly at him for the pun—“and say that he died of old age.”

“It wasn’t like he’d be getting into fights in his nineties,” I muttered.

“No, but the bones have enough old breaks for me to say that he lived like a combat shinobi for a long time,” Kakashi pointed out. He put the arm down and traced a slightly misaligned section of the skeleton’s fourth rib. “And this probably should have been fatal. This rib got nicked twice before the break.”

“That…must have hurt.” I shuddered for effect.

“It probably did. But then, most people would just bleed to death after this point. It wasn’t something they’d be in a position to worry about.” Kakashi braced his hands on the edge of the table and said to Obito, “Is there anything you want to ask before I have to really get to work?”

“Oh, n-no.” Obito looked away, hugging himself. “Just let me know if you find out who it is? Uh, was?”

Kakashi gave Obito a long, level stare—probably because he’d already said he couldn’t do that, twice—and sighed to himself. Then he said, “I’ll make sure you’re the first to know if I find anything.”

Obito nodded stiffly and walked out.

I watched him go. Turning back to Kakashi for a moment, I found him staring squarely into my eyes. Maybe it was some half-forgotten impulse from the days where we’d trained together after Kannabi, or maybe some other shared pain. But I felt like I knew his intentions even without thinking of forming a question.

I said, “I’ll look after him, Kakashi.”

“Thank you,” Kakashi said, and I left to follow Obito up the stairs.

I didn’t get that far. Obito was waiting on the first turn in the staircase, looking back down at me. His mouth twisted into a grimace, and he said, “Kei, I heard Kakashi. But please, I’m gonna need a bit of space. Just for a while.” His active Sharingan seemed to gaze off into the middle distance for a moment before focusing on my face for just a moment. “Please?”

I nodded. But I had another idea, which didn’t require me to leave Obito entirely alone.
Once Obito Kamui’d away—and I made a mental note to complain to Rin about how he kept forgetting her orders—I headed back down to Kakashi and his macabre puzzle.

He raised an eyebrow at me anyway, even as he finally found a loose patella.

“I’m gonna need you to send Bisuke up there,” I told Kakashi without letting him get a word in. “I don’t think Obito wants to deal with people for a bit.”

Kakashi nodded, and then immediately summoned Bisuke by tapping his foot against the chilly floor. I had to assume that was bleeding somewhere, but I didn’t ask how or why.

The newly-summoned Bisuke barked, “What do you need, Kakashi?”

“Go look after Obito for a while,” Kakashi told him. “We need to finish working on whoever this used to be.”

Bisuke sniffed at the bones and said, “But this guy’s been dead for a year or something, hasn’t he? He doesn’t really need any help!”

Kakashi’s eye widened just a bit, and I felt myself start to stare. Over a year? Was there any way to be more specific?

“What?” Bisuke said, blinking up at us. “I’m a dog. You think I don’t know bones, Kei-chan?”

“Maybe not in this specific sense?” I mumbled, unsure of what to say.

“I’ve smelled all kinds of things that even Kakashi hasn’t,” Bisuke pointed out. He shook himself, making his fawn coat fluff up. “But I can go see to Obito.” Bisuke’s tail wagged. “Is he upstairs?”

I glanced up, though I didn’t have the ability to see through solid objects. With my chakra sense and familiarity with Obito, though, I didn’t need to. “He’s on the seventh floor.”

“Right!” Bisuke barked, and dashed away.

“...So. I’m leaning more toward ‘Madara’ than not,” Kakashi said after a moment, looking down at the bones. “Bisuke just confirmed a couple of my suspicions.”

“Aside from that part, what else makes you think it’s him?” I asked.

“It has to do with the degree of decomposition, and a bit of evidence from the site,” Kakashi said. He leaned over the table and pointed out...something. “I’m not sure if you noticed over Konan’s live report, but the inside of the bud was badly stained by decomposition, which makes me think this man died there. Maybe after life support failed? But at the same time, some of the tendons and things are still here even if most of the flesh is gone.” Kakashi shrugged. “If the environment had been drier, he might’ve mummified, but as it is, the body more or less dissolved in place. And since the flesh is gone, it wouldn’t have taken all that much to just rip a limb off by jarring it.” And that didn’t even get into how the Statue or the tree growing out of it could have fucked with any of the natural processes involved after death. God dammit.

“Still, the lack of rotten material clinging to the bones makes me think that Bisuke was right. Whoever this guy was, he’s been dead for over a year,” Kakashi said, sighing. “Which is a bit short of the October Tenth attack. But it’s possible he’s been dead for longer than that—I don’t have enough information to be able to tell, and I don’t want to crack a bone open to check the marrow when we’re not back in Konoha.”
“So while we think this might be Madara—or possibly some other old man associated with the Statue—we don’t really know much else other than maybe that the guy died there, and that he was probably involved in the Zetsu thing?” I rubbed my forehead, trying to think. “I don’t remember the Zetsu clones aging, and I was never sure if they had bones…”

“They don’t,” Kakashi said.

“Thank you. So I guess...we have a dead megalomaniac in the basement.” I looked up at the ceiling and said, “So, now what?”

Kakashi nodded. “More or less. Can you seal these up? I want to take these back to Konoha to make sure.”

“Yeah,” I said. “I can do that.”

Between the two of us, we managed to pile the entire skeleton into a jumble of bones and seal it into a single empty slot on the scroll I had on hand. Kakashi made sure not to miss anything, including random carpals or tarsals, and then went to the sink to wash his gloves off.

Maybe it was me just being paranoid, but I did notice Kakashi wincing a bit as he stood there, and again I wondered how he’d so easily summoned Bisuke…

“Kakashi,” I said as I strode over to him and came to a stop behind his back, “did you get hurt during the investigation?”

“A splinter caught me in the leg,” Kakashi said, and I automatically glanced down at the bandages on his calves for any sign of blood. It wasn’t like his clothes were exactly designed to show bloodstains. Stupid black pants!

“And?” I asked. I didn’t have much of a nose for blood—didn’t have much of a scent tracking ability at all, actually—but I still had to stifle my first urge to pick Kakashi up and plunk him down on a table so I could more effectively demand to know where he was hurt.

“And I got grazed.” Kakashi turned to face me, even while wringing out his ANBU gloves, and said, “It’s already bandaged.”

“But did you clean it out?” I demanded.

The silence was admission enough for me. And why was he blushing?

“As soon as we’re done here, we’re going back to our rooms,” I informed him. “And you’re going to sit through the worst antiseptic I have.”

Kakashi rolled his visible eye, but he didn’t meet mine afterward. “Fine, fine. You’re the captain, apparently.”

...Right. I was supposed to be the team leader this time, wasn’t I?

I drew myself up and said, “And as your captain, I say we’re gonna take care of you and Obito first, and whatever else is going on here can wait. Got it?”

It took a bit more arguing than that, but we did leave the Akatsuki basement/morgue with maybe-Madara’s corpse and both of us walking under our own power. Kakashi limped, sure, but it wasn’t life-threatening if he’d field-dressed it himself. We’d be fine.
“What the hell, Kakashi?” I demanded, as Obito sat nearby with Bisuke in his lap, looking on in curiosity. I had ordered Kakashi to sit down on one of the spare futons and let me take a look at the injury, which had meant he needed to take his pants off. And I was thoroughly disappointed in his idea of what constituted a serious injury. “This isn’t a graze, you idiot.”

As it turned out, Kakashi had a ten-centimeter gash along the outside of his left thigh, right below the hem of his boxers. There were actually two matching holes on opposite sides, and apparently he’d almost lost the lower strap on his secondary kunai holster. It was still bleeding like a motherfucker, because of course it did, and it had dripped down to his knee without any problem, going by the bloodstains. The gauze pad over it had been getting close to saturated by the time I got a look at the “graze.”

“That’s still no reason to go standing around on it like you never got stabbed,” I griped, even as I put my hand against the gash and started applying the Mystic Palm Jutsu. Both of us had taken worse injuries before, so unfortunately the technique had become a standby for our team.

“I wasn’t stabbed,” Kakashi pointed out.

“You can take your stupid technicalities and...and...” And do something anatomically impossible. But I wasn’t actually going to tell him that. I settled for, “Shut up.”

“Uh,” said Obito, “am I in trouble? Because I kinda knew about it…”

“I’ll decide in a minute,” I snapped. “You need to feel better, and then I’ll yell at you for real about certain other things.”

“...Like what?” Obito asked cautiously.

“Like ignoring Rin’s orders to avoid using Kamui too much,” I told him flatly. “Or maybe I should just tell her and have her deal with you.”

Obito made a “meep” noise and stopped talking.

After another minute or two, I’d sealed the wound enough that I figured it would hold under stress. While I certainly didn’t want Kakashi to go and take on an entire complement of Kiri-nin, it at least wouldn’t be painful.

“Oh, go get a different pair of pants. I’ll stitch these up,” I said, as I packed up my medical supplies. The main downside to having a ton of supplies in storage seals was that they inevitably had to be put away again.

“...Kei, you do know I can do that myself,” Kakashi said, even as he skittered out of range of any other possible medical procedures. It meant he was closer to his pack, too.

I side-eyed him. “Fine. But if I get bored and start designing more explosives, I blame you.”

“Needlework is boring,” Obito mumbled.

Bisuke reached up and bumped Obito’s chin with his forehead. “But it’s how Kakashi made our clothes!”

“...Huh?” Obito said blankly.
Kakashi, who was in the other room and apparently had found pants, said loudly, “I had a few free weekends.”

...If I was being completely honest with myself, I would have done the same thing, given time and cute animals. “Was this while Obito and I were training for our second Chunin Exam?” Because that was about the only time I could remember without Kakashi in some kind of contact with Obito and me.

“Again. Free weekends.” Kakashi sighed and said, “And I haven’t had one since.”

“But now we have team uniforms! It’s great.” Bisuke’s tail was wagging faster than some small pistons. “Maybe you should make some for Obito and Kei-chan!”

“I don’t want to look like one of Kakashi’s dogs,” Obito said, scratching behind Bisuke’s ears. “How about you dogs come up with something a little more human-friendly? We already have vests...”

If I could see Kakashi’s face, I imagined that I’d see a level of eye-rolling previously achieved only by Mad-Eye Moody. Because we were goofballs and unrepentantly annoying sometimes.

“Armbands?” I suggested.

“Get me a pattern and maybe I’ll think about it,” Kakashi replied.

And on that bright note, the Akatsuki tower started shaking.
Instantly, all three of us were on our feet and moving again. Obito disappeared down the stairwell quick as a wink, while Kakashi and I left through the two rooms' windows and Bisuke disappeared into smoke. If the tower was going to collapse, a guy who could suck himself into a tiny wormhole was probably going to have more luck than people like Kakashi and me, who could get squished.

Outside, Kakashi skidded down the sloped Amegakure awning with just a scrap of chakra on each foot keeping him from slipping. It was like he'd somehow come up with an invisible snowboard and decided to grind down a rail.

Me? Just fell. It wasn't like I had to worry about sticking the landing.

I landed in a crouch on all fours, absorbing the impact with as much ease as a cat. The effect was somewhat ruined by the inevitable splash—Amegakure wasn't quite efficient enough that puddles weren't a problem—but chakra saved my pride once again. I didn't ruin my clothes thanks to landing on top of the puddle rather than in it.

"What the hell was that?" Yagura's voice demanded, and I glanced back to see him standing behind me with a small crowd of shinobi. Three of them were his—Kirigakure shinobi that I hadn't seen earlier and currently didn't care about—and the other two wore the black Akatsuki robes.

One of the Akatsuki members was tall enough to look down at Jiraiya, with a perfectly smooth head and a face that reminded me a lot of a Buddha statue. He had a bo staff strapped across his back, so I wondered for just a moment if Konan had gotten him from a temple somewhere.

The second Akatsuki member was a young man with long brown hair mostly tucked under a bandana-style Amegakure headband. He had Inuzuka-like narrow eyes with dark markings around them, and blue tattoos across each cheek that looked kind of like a circuit board.

Daibutsu and Kyūsuke, I assumed.

"If I had to guess," Kakashi said in a quiet voice that still managed to carry, "I'd say Amegakure's leadership is having fun."

There was a strange undertone to his voice that nonetheless made me think that, despite his innocent words, Kakashi was still invoking the once-and-possibly-future God of Amegakure to get Yagura to shut his trap. Which didn't even get into what the "Angel" was capable of, without calling on any gods at all.

Trusting Kakashi to keep Yagura from doing anything his Ame escorts would have disapproved of, I closed my eyes and reached out with my chakra sense.

Since attaining full Tailed Beast Mode—though only for a moment—I'd found that the range of my chakra sense had expanded by at least another five kilometers. While previously my limit had been around fifteen while using Isobu's chakra to bolster mine, I kept finding my range growing little by little, over the previous forty-eight hours. But a slow, steady increase in chakra, over two full days, added up to something significant.

At just a little more than twelve kilometers from Amegakure, Nagato and Konan glowed like beacons in the dark. While chakra residue didn't carry easily, I could still feel traces of it in the air as a distant dust cloud loomed. There was some Nagato in that, but the bulk of the energy that had been expended there was Konan's. There was no evidence that anyone else had joined the battle. Even Zetsus.

Relief flooded my veins. As long as those two were all right, Amegakure would be fine.

The Statue hadn't gone after either of them, going by its chakra. Actually, it probably hadn't moved. Despite the haze of Konan's explosives, the dead spot occupied by the Statue was still.

"It's not serious," I said, opening my eyes again.

Kakashi nodded. He eased back into a slouch instead of the posture that, for people who knew him, would have indicated an eagerness to spring on someone and snap their neck. Probably Yagura's, and wouldn't that have been a mess.

Not that I didn't think Kakashi could. Possibly even bloodlessly, given the rain. But it would have been politically tricky.

"Kei, everyone's all right in here," said Obito's voice, and I felt him jogging up behind me. Turning, I spotted Yahiko behind him.

"Good," I said to Obito, and glanced past him at Yahiko. "Yahiko-senpai, did Konan-senpai give you any kind of status update?"

Yahiko nodded, and a tiny paper person poked its head out from Yahiko's high collar. Sheltered from the rain by his chin, it waved at me.

Well, I could see that Konan still had a sense of humor about things. Or else she had designed an army of autonomous, sentient paper constructs and let them loose on Ame.

Yahiko turned to the gathering crowd and bellowed, "False alarm, everyone! Back to work!"

And in short order, nearly everyone dispersed.

"False alarm?" Yagura repeated. His bodyguards—a two-guy, one-girl team—seemed to brace for impact. "Everyone felt that, Yahiko-dono. That wasn't just some firework going off at the wrong time."

Speaking of the Kiri team, I saw a blonde woman with long dangly earrings and a heart-shaped face. She had a slight build, compared to her two teammates, and wore the standard Kiri uniform with jade bracelets around each bandage-covered wrist.
The biggest member of the team was a man with long, wavy brown hair tied off behind his back. He was frankly built like a Mack truck, complete with huge bare biceps and the same jade bangles as his tiny teammate.

And then there was the guy who didn't stand out much. Aside from his sharply slanted eyes, the last guy reminded me of a skinnier version of Asuma, without the indecisive stubble. He was also paler by a fair margin, like he didn't do things in daylight much.

...They were familiar somehow, but not in the same way that Yagura was. Had I seen their pictures somewhere before?

If they attack you now, Isobu commented, you may be able to remember their faces long enough to say something pithy to their corpses.

Can we never talk about CSI ever again? Especially after this morning.

But this is the best time for it. Isobu griped, then subsided.

"As far as I'm concerned," Yahiko said sharply, "I have enough to deal with without Kirigakure shinobi brandishing weapons in a neutral village." He crossed his arms over his chest and said, "Daibutsu, Kyūsuke, back to the Kiri zone. Take our guests with you."

Yagura glared up at Yahiko, who didn't appear to spare him a second thought—instead, he turned his attention back to Obito and said, "So, is something wrong?"

"...I guess not," Obito said, his eye darting between Kakashi and me as the atmosphere settled down somewhat. As Yagura's party left the area, taking their buzzing chakra with them, Obito said, "They sent him to be a diplomat?"

"Villages have to send powerhouses to get anything done nowadays, Obito," I said. "Like we did in Sunagakure, remember?"

Granted, Suna had been a bit of a fluke. Sensei had to go, as Hokage, but he'd brought nearly every S-class shinobi he could get his hands on. And then Yahiko and Jiraiya had shown up, with the rest of the Ame contingent and Konan's flower.

"Let's head back inside," Yahiko said. He jabbed a finger at the sky and said, "Nagato hasn't figured out how to make that stop yet, and it would suck if you all caught colds now."

Old wives' tale or not, Yahiko bustled all three of us back into the tower to dry off. He didn't have any apparent concerns about his friends, which I took to mean that he was certain they were all right. While I had no idea what Yahiko's range was, I assumed that Nagato was pretty hard to miss no matter what degree of skill was involved. At least, he was to me.

"So," Yahiko said as we weaved through the crowd of desks. Most of them were ill-matched, but all of them were occupied by at least one Ame-nin busy Getting Shit Done. "I haven't had as much time to hang out with you three as Nagato and Konan have. How about you tell me what's been going on, from your point of view? We all know Nagato's gonna roll up whatever thinks about threatening us and smash it into okonomiyaki, so there's no point in worrying too much."

"...Is that how he dealt with Hanzō?" I asked, rather than deal with the fact that Nagato wasn't going to be able to kill the Statue. Because it was literally impossible.

"No," Yahiko said, as we climbed the same freaking staircase after him again. He said distantly, "I handled him."
"How?" asked Obito.

"Kenjutsu," Yahiko said, tapping the grip of the katana at his waist. It looked like an ANBU-regulation katana, but that was probably an assumption based on the lack of a guard. While Yahiko could have gotten it off the ROOT unit that was sent to wipe out Akatsuki, he could easily lie, and I didn't really want to know the answer. "It was easier once Jiraiya-sensei and Tsunade-sama took out Ibuse. He’s still pissed that Hanzō's dead, so Imoriko has to negotiate with the salamanders on my behalf now."

"That's still nicer than most summon contracts would be," Kakashi remarked. "So, Yahiko-san, the quake from before…?"

"What about it?" Yahiko asked, as we finally reached the Akatsuki living quarters.

"Does Konan-san do that often?" Kakashi asked.

I kind of ignored the thread of the conversation for a moment, looking around first and foremost.

The Akatsuki triumvirate personal floor was...a mess, to be blunt. Konan's office was organized in a way that reflected her sealing specialty, and I hadn't seen Yahiko or Nagato's versions. But the floor they actually lived on had been kicked over by a renovation demon or something, going by all the sawdust and other fun residue of a home remodeling job.

Aside from having knocked out at least three walls, the aforementioned demon had gotten started on several projects that were abandoned in the middle. One of them included installing a kitchen sink. Aside from that, clothes carpeted two sections of the floor—where there had once been designated rooms—in a way that reminded me of a college dorm room when both roommates had an allergy to laundry baskets. Sensei probably would have said that a tornado had hit the place, but I would have argued that tornadoes were more discriminatory.

"Dammit, Nagato," Yahiko muttered, looking around at his living space with an air of despair. "This is why you don't use ninjutsu to clean."

I mostly ignored that, too, and continued poking around. While Kakashi and Yahiko talked about the logistical difficulties of having teammates who could rearrange maps and then occasionally forgot not to, Obito sort of drifted around and watched me explore.

The Ame trio had a few wall scrolls haphazardly lying across countertops here and there, and someone had left their door open. I wasn't going to snoop, exactly, but...

You're snooping.

Shut up.

Something screeched and I jumped back, toward Obito's chakra signature, and knocked both of us over.

"Did you know that the contract includes screaming salamanders?" Yahiko asked in a tone that made it obvious that the question was rhetorical.

"We do now," Obito said from under me.

"Why do salamanders even have the ability to scream?" I demanded, getting up and then helping Obito to his feet again.
The salamander in question was a big, brown, flat-headed creature that peered at us from the ceiling of the open room. It made another "paaaaarp" noise before waddling around on the ceiling for a moment. Then the door slid closed.

"Curiosity did kill the cat, Kei-san. Just be glad that was only my alarm." Yahiko turned away then and dug around in the cabinets above the sink for something. When he turned around, he had cans of various kinds of drinks in each hand. "I don't have the slightest idea how to make something traditional, so here you go."

Then he dragged all of us over to the low kotatsu table, because we were sheep and had already been embarrassed about six times today.

"Cold tea?" Kakashi said blankly, even as he accepted his can.

"Ame special." Yahiko cracked his can open without any hesitation and said, "Cheers." And downed the lot.

"This is the lowest-budget tea break I've ever had," Obito said, reading the label. "This isn't tea. This is some kind of health drink disguised as tea."

"Mine says honey on the label," I said, a little baffled. I hadn't seen honey with green tea in...years? Mom would have called this stuff sacrilege, or nearly so.

Obito watched Yahiko drain his can, shrugged to himself, and opened the can. He sipped cautiously.

I, on the other hand, suffered a sudden attack of bravery and decided to take a big swallow immediately. Go me.

Kakashi looked at all of us like we'd grown two heads.

"It's just sweet, Kakashi," I said. Kind of...boring, actually. More honey than tea, in my case, made the drink taste a bit syrupy.

Kakashi was making a face under his mask. I just knew it. "I...don't think so." And on top of not liking sweets, he probably didn't care for the idea of taking his mask off in front of Yahiko.

Yahiko looked around at us and kinda just shrugged it off. It took a second for me to realize that his brown eyes stayed focused on Kakashi's face, then drifted to each of us before darting back. In a pattern. Then Yahiko said, "So, kiddos, what's Konoha like?"

"Not rainy," Obito said.

"I figured as much, given that it's in the Land of Fire."

"Well, we have summer festivals and stuff," Obito said. "But those are kind of regional and it'd be hard to have Tanabata in this much rain."

Yahiko nodded, but looked disappointed. "Damn, I was hoping to come up with some kind of special occasion..."

"It'd be better to celebrate Amegakure than anything else," I said. "...Do you ever have some kind of anniversary thing? For defeating Hanzō?"

"Not really," Yahiko replied. "We've been reconstructing Ame for a year, but maybe in a few more. Once people get used to us."
Would it be like celebrating the French Revolution while the Terror was still going on?

"Where did you learn Water ninjutsu?" I asked Yahiko, apropos of nothing.

"Jiraiya-sensei taught me a bit," Yahiko replied. "Though I think the better ones are the ones I've learned from the salamanders since getting the contract. And in Akatsuki, most of us teach each other. You?"

"I learned most of mine from a chunin I met," I replied. "He lives with this merchant group in the Land of Fire, but I did see a few of their wagons out in the market." If Kirigakure was in too much of a mess to do much about Shirozora and Nanami, did that still make them missing-nin? "I actually almost expected to see someone I knew down there."

While at least half of the core Chinatsugumi were shinobi, they were also missing-nin—or at least Rikuto and Shirozora were. Even if they were mostly just merchants now, the caravans couldn't deal with Iwagakure and Kirigakure in case somebody got suspicious. Instead, they focused on villages and cities that their members hadn't pissed off and built relations there. They built little sanctums, becoming part of new communities.

Sure, those new outposts doubled as places to run if shit got serious, but their primary motivation always came down to money. New markets equaled new business partners. And for the villages that took in tons of trade cargo, it was a mutually beneficial setup.

Any further conversation was stalled by the sound of someone in private room opening a window. Aside from the screaming salamander alarm clock, which didn't go off, I hadn't expected anyone else to show up at all. And then there was a loud thump, as a very heavy someone—or two somebodies—hit a mattress.

(I used to jump on a bed with my brother. I know these things.)

"Konan, make sure Nagato doesn't soak through the mattress!" Yahiko yelled. He dashed into the other room, with all of the messy clothes. I had to assume they were Nagato's, then? God dammit these people were confusing.

"I am—oof—trying!" Konan replied. "Nagato, you went swimming."

"It wasn't on purpose." Nagato wandered out of the room a moment later, with Konan keeping him upright with some difficulty. When he made it to the table, he slumped over the surface with a sigh of relief, dripping water onto the wood.

"What's going on?" Obito asked, looking like he was fighting the urge to poke Nagato and see if he would jump. Then he gave into temptation anyway, after about four seconds.

"Ow…" groaned Nagato, not lifting his head from the tabletop. Not even as Konan undid his headband and tied it to a drying line above the sink.

"Nagato," Yahiko growled, "if you ruined my pillows, I'm going to roll your clothes into a ball and set them on fire."

"I was on my pillow," Nagato replied, still not looking up.

"And mine," said Konan, but much less annoyed about it.

Um… Was this gonna be another Raidō and Genma thing or…?
"Uh..." said Obito. "Do you all share a bed?"

"Yes," Konan replied without looking up, as Yahiko dropped a towel on Nagato's head and commenced drying him off with all the gentle loving care of an older sibling administering a noogie. While Nagato immediately tried to punch Yahiko, blindly, Konan said, "I think the particular use of his Rinnegan abilities has exhausted him."

Obito, Kakashi, and I all looked at each other. So, we weren't going to talk about...that. Saved me a headache for the moment, but I wasn't totally sure of what we were going to think in an hour. There was a bit too much going on to really have a discussion.

I sighed. "Judge not, lest you be judged in turn," right?

Exactly what are you talking about?

Ask me again in a minute.

Obito patted my shoulder, though I wasn't sure he knew why I was sighing in the first place.

Kakashi finally elected to crack open his canned drink, whatever it actually was, and sniff at the contents suspiciously. He had apparently decided that Konan and Yahiko could handle whatever was going on with Nagato. Any other concerns were not his problem.

"I'm fine!" Nagato insisted, but Yahiko had batted away his hand without any effort. "Ow!"

"You're an idiot," Yahiko said to Nagato, giving up on the toweling for a second. He dropped to one knee next to Nagato, grabbing the redhead and hugging him fiercely. "What did you do? Konan hasn't had to carry you since we were kids!"

"I did the same thing as usual," Nagato said, grumbling a little even as he relaxed into the hold. "Just...more of it."

"...How much more?" Yahiko wanted to know, and everyone heard the warning tone in his voice.

"I, um." Nagato ducked his head. "I might've launched the Statue as far as I could."

Which was probably somewhere around low-earth orbit. If the Tailed Beasts were right and the Sage had created the moon, Nagato probably could have managed escape velocity on an object with far less mass. I asked, "As in, so far it might not come back down? Or far enough that it's not our problem anymore?"

"Everything that goes up has to come down, Kei-san," said Konan, distracted. Yahiko was hauling Nagato to his feet—or nearly so—and starting to move him, and it took most of her attention.

I wobbled a hand in the air and said "Kinda," but mostly to myself.

Kakashi stared at me. So did Obito, but he was a little less skeptical about it. But the Akatsuki trio was too busy wrangling Nagato out of the room and toward a bathroom (and hot water) to bother with what I was saying.

"I'm not getting into a discussion about how I know that," I told them, and went back to my can of green tea. The second sip was as syrupy as the first.

Obito exchanged looks with Kakashi and said, "I know we say that Kei just kinda 'knows things' a lot, but this is weird."
Kakashi nodded, giving me a long look even as he pulled his mask down and knocked back his completely nonalcoholic drink. And then, since the drink was apparently inoffensive enough for him to stand, he drank the rest of it.

The comment about gravity was probably another tick mark in Kakashi's "Kei is a weird kid and this is really weird" tally. I was mentally counting down to the moment that he called me out, and probably had been for years.

While I certainly was a strange child, I'd just lived in a world where people had been to the moon. Without magic powers, and with significant technological advancements. I was not looking forward to the day that shinobi figured out how to really utilize what technology we had. Given our society's patterns, it was just a matter of time before we started using all of that tech to kill each other even more thoroughly than usual.

I sighed again. It was a problem for another day. "So, if Nagato took care of the Statue and we have the skeleton, I guess that means the mission's over."

Elsewhere in the apartment, the hot water finally turned on, and we could hear Yahiko, Konan, and Nagato speaking quietly to each other through the thin walls.

"Yeah, I guess so," said Obito. He was staring down at the table, looking distant, with his head resting on the knuckles of his left hand.

"Obito, were you feeling okay earlier?" I asked, now that we had a quiet moment to talk.

"Mn...no," Obito mumbled. "Just... I don't know how to describe it."

"Try," Kakashi suggested. "We can help."

And Kakashi could bring Bisuke back to facilitate that. Given Bisuke's absence, I reached for Obito's right hand and placed my hand on top of his. Just for a moment.

"...I can do that." Obito blinked slowly, like a cat, and took his hand back. He stretched out against the surface of the table, then folded his arms to pillow his head. "It's...kinda weird. I mean. If the body is Madara's."

Kakashi frowned, visibly. Seeing him without his mask added a level of sincerity to his expressions that I hadn't noticed was missing before. "We haven't established that yet."

"Yeah, but I think we will," Obito said, closing his eye. "And that...that's the hard part."

"...I don't understand," said Kakashi, but he said it as though he wasn't even certain that that was the right response.

"How so?" I asked Obito, and my voice came out softer than I had thought it would.

Obito blew out a frustrated breath. "I don't know how to say it!" After a moment, he went on, in a harsh tone that seemed to twist around on him. "I just—when I saw the bones, I was upset that he was gone. It was like—I'd lost someone I cared about, but I know he was a monster and he was just using me. And it was his fault I couldn't come home sooner, and then there was the kidnapping!" By that point, he was glaring down at the table as though he expected to be able to spontaneously develop heat vision.

Oh, Obito. And here was Stockholm Syndrome, rearing its ugly head.
"He wasn't a good person. He was probably the gold standard for evil," Obito said, though his voice was getting wobbly. "He hurt you both, through me and through all those Zetsu copies. He's why Miyako-san died." Obito buried his face in his arms. "But…"

My voice was hidden and buried behind the lump in my throat. I didn't know if it had formed from anger or empathy for Obito's pain, but it was there nonetheless. I dug my nails of my right hand into my palm, but I reached out again for Obito with my left.

"B-But he still…he looked after me. Whenever I felt like giving up, like it was too hard…” Obito made a choked noise and trailed off for a moment, letting me hold onto his left hand. Then, "I didn't have anyone besides Z-Zetsu, and Guruguru, and h-him. No one to talk to. And you were both—you didn't know. You couldn't have—there was no way there was any kind of rescue coming."

Neither Kakashi nor I said anything.

Obito sighed. "It was like…like the more time went on, the more I liked them. I didn't—I knew they were standing b-between me and getting out. But you didn't see what it was like, when I woke up." Obito held up his right arm, turning his wrist slowly. He watched it move, almost hypnotized. "I was—it—I couldn't walk. My arm was g-gone, my eye was gone. I really—I should have died down there. They didn't—they could have l-left." His fist closed on empty air. "They didn't have to save me."

And they had, and we hadn't.

Fuck.

"Th-they didn't have to h-help me at all," Obito continued, in a voice that hitched but didn't have any real inflection. "B-but they gave me this arm. Th-they helped me learn to use it. To get stronger." He let his arm drop to the table again. "I could almost… There were t-times I thought they cared. They c-could have. Maybe they just…decided I wasn't worth it, after you brought me home."

Then, when Kakashi eyes met mine, we both decided to abandon subtlety and just scooted over, so we bracketed Obito on each side. I still had Obito's hand in mine, and Kakashi placed his arm over Obito's shaking shoulders to reassure him.

"Y-you must think I'm pretty m-messed up," Obito managed past the hitch in his voice. "I—it's stupid."

Actually, it was the long-delayed exploration of a problem I suspected had been festering in Obito for well over a year. Just because I didn't experience any regrets about Madara's lonely demise—or what I hoped was his demise—didn't mean I could say what Obito could or couldn't feel. And given that Madara had kept him for over six months, while none of us had ever mounted so much as a half-assed a rescue attempt…well.

I could at least offer hugs.

"I thought I was o-over this," Obito mumbled, still hiding his face. "It never—with Inoichi…"

Just talking about a problem didn't always bring up all of the emotions associated with it. But to be confronted with the reality, even a year after the fact…

Or was it the jumble of emotions that was the worst part? Madara had been a bogeyman for most of modern shinobi history, and even after the Tenth we hadn't been sure he was dead. And now, with evidence that pointed toward "yes" after over a year, maybe the finality of it all was what was throwing Obito off. Madara actually being dead changed things.
"This is—it's just really confusing," Obito said, though his voice was muffled by his sleeves.

"Let's go back to our floor," Kakashi suggested, gripping Obito's shoulder. "Come on."

After that, Obito let us guide him back up the staircase. We spent a while just sitting around the low table in our room, not really talking. I made tea and everyone had a bit, but we all decided that this was a time to just...be. Though Kakashi did put his mask back on at some point.

Eventually, the shower two floors down stopped running.

I didn't really care. Instead, I spent my time lying on my side, listening to my teammates' breathing. Kakashi sat near me, reading his copy of Icha-Icha and listening to the rain. Obito was lying next to me, his back against mine. I waited until I could feel Obito fall asleep to really let my thoughts loose.

The Statue was gone. Madara was...probably gone. We'd survived this mission with only minimal harm, even if Obito would need to talk to Inoichi again when we went home. We'd get through all of it just fine.

But if that was true, why did I still have a bad feeling about the future?

On the day we were going to leave, there was a Zetsu invasion a little before lunch.

It ended the moment Nagato got his hands on one of them and ripped its soul out of its body and absorbed it. Sure, the Zetsus trying to attack people might have scared some people into minor heart attacks, and every shinobi ended up killing more than their fair share of the drone army, but the overall effectiveness of the attack was frankly laughable.

Because, once Nagato shook off his chakra exhaustion symptoms—similar to a hangover—he demonstrated why the Rinnegan was known as the most powerful bloodline limit on the planet.

Even now, several hours after the fact, there was a crowd oohing and aahing over the tremendous mounds of Zetsu-based mulch that were left of every Zetsu within twenty-six kilometers of Amegakure.

"Are you all going to make Zetsu extermination a thing now?" I asked Nagato, while Ame shinobi started burying all the shredded corpses.

"We can't know when they'll activate otherwise," Nagato said distantly. He was looking down at his hands. "I've never torn someone's soul out before."

"I wouldn't have guessed that Zetsu clones had souls," I mumbled, right on the lower edge of what would be audible.

"They do," Nagato murmured. "He couldn't remember his name, or who he'd been. Only that he'd been human once. But he could remember the others, so... I chose to deal with the problem in front of me." Nagato shook himself. "Ultimately, the Zetsu creatures are still hostile. They will always be hostile. But it's...sad, how far they've fallen."

Nagato and I stood there, looking across the lake toward Amegakure, where the last few Zetsu stragglers were being put down. We were quiet for a while.

"Are you certain you don't want any kind of bonus for your mission?" Nagato asked. "I understand this was something arranged between Konan and Minato-senpai, but it did deal with the kind of trouble that is more normal for S-ranked missions. Tailed Beasts and everything."
"All we really did was make it easier for you to hurl it into space," I said. I punched him in the shoulder, in a friendly way. And at the same time, I slipped him a Flying Thunder God kunai for Konan's future reference. And so we'd have a waypoint if we ever wanted to make this trip again.

"I don't know about this...'space' thing," Nagato said cautiously. He was still a little skeptical about my more unproven ramblings, even once I'd explained the idea. (And then I found out that he had taken my hypothetical plan to "launch it into the sun" as literally as he could.) "I just know that it won't come back down for a while. No one can reach it except me."

Unless they had a rocket. I didn't know enough math to be sure when the thing would come down, or if it would. But Nagato was the only one who could really change its trajectory once it was caught in the planet's orbit, at least for quite some time.

I nodded. "Thanks for putting us up for a bit. We can find our own way home from here."

At that, Nagato looked back over his shoulder, to where Obito was carrying a crate full of some kind of grain and loading it into a wagon. Kakashi was elsewhere, avoiding the smell of Amegakure fish being put into crates lined with refrigeration seals.

Spotting me, a merchant waved back.

There were some perks to the Chinatsugumi's expansion efforts after all. The most important of them were the outposts of Konoha-friendly faces everywhere.

"Don't be a stranger, Nagato-san," I said, as I headed down the crest of the tiny hill and toward my team. "Talk to Kushina-san often, all right?"

"Of course," Nagato said.

And then Kakashi came back from wherever he'd been, Obito grabbed both of our hands, and we used the Flying Thunder God Formation. It was one thing to be worried about conserving chakra. It was quite another to spend too much time in an area we knew had potentially-hostile Kiri-nin.

The next thing we all knew, we were at the gates.

"Hey," said Genma's voice. He waved at us from the checkpoint, looking bored. There wasn't anyone in line in front of us, so it must have been a slow day. Wasn't mid-afternoon usually busier? "You kids are late."

"We're a week ahead of schedule," I argued. And it had only taken a chunk of Isobu's chakra to cut out a trip that would have taken even Sensei two days' worth of chakra to pull off.

"You're welcome.

And you're the only reason we're not all dead of chakra exhaustion, so thank you.

"Is Raidō around?" Kakashi asked, as we headed in through the gates. Genma didn't make any move to stop any of us, so I assumed it was okay that he wasn't really checking IDs.

Kakashi nodded and said, "Kei, we need to report in."

I sighed. "Duty calls. Say hi to Raidō for me if you see him first!"

Genma waved us on and said, "Sure, sure. Hey, Obito, can you beat your teammates to the Hokage's Obito set his jaw and said, "No problem."

"Prove it," Genma sing-songed, and then suddenly Team Minato was racing across the village with basically no further prompting.

We were terrible.

But we were home. And why not celebrate that?

For the record, Obito lost. But only because Rin was in the Academy and grabbed him first. And I was pretty sure Kakashi let me win, given the existence of his speed-enhancing jutsu. Which would have been cheating.

"What do you mean you have another mission?" Hayate demanded, his voice cracking as he spoke. Sometimes, I was reminded that he was a teenager now. Like me.

What a horrifying thought.

The debriefing with Sensei had been...boring. I hadn't been involved in the bulk of the mission, but I could report everything the Tailed Beasts had told me and what I had deduced from listening to everything that happened. Obito and Kakashi had the fun parts, and got dragged to the hospital by Rin for a checkup after that point.

Me? I stayed long enough to confirm that Obito was getting eye treatments from Rin and that Kakashi's leg gash was going to scar despite my best efforts. I got a clean bill of health from her, and then I headed home.

Hayate got home while I was trying to figure out where the hell all of the takeout had come from. I certainly hadn't left a bunch of empty paper containers in the fridge, and I hadn't thought that Hayate liked them…

"I mean exactly that," I told him, pulling one of the containers out and checking it over. Seriously, had no one ever told my brother not to keep these things in the fridge once they were empty? "Sorry, Hayate, but Sensei wants me to build up as much leadership experience as I can, and the last mission was a bit too easy."

It was easier than explaining the fact that we'd been trying to figure out how to get the Ten-Tails out of the area without it waking up and killing everything that moved. And since Nagato was who he was, and Obito had Kamui, the rest of us had more or less been window dressing until it came time to crunch the numbers and figure out what had happened before we got there.

And then there had been the short-lived Zetsu incursion.

"But you were gone for two weeks!" Hayate complained. He flopped over on the floor and clung to my leg, making pathetic noises.

I reached down to pat him on the head and somehow ended up on the floor anyway. As my brother put his head on my knees and made sad puppy eyes at me, I said, "So, how are the infiltration missions going?"

"Is it that obvious?" Hayate asked, in a much more normal tone. "Dammit! I'm supposed to be a body double for a merchant's daughter in a week and Inoichi-sensei says I have to act the part to “Make the Transformation jutsu count!”

“It’s more that you’re not in costume,” I said. “And anyway, wasn’t Inoichi-san going to take that role?”

“He’s gonna be the merchant,” said Hayate. “But the guy’s got like a million Academy-aged kids, and I still can’t get this right. How is acting like a kid this hard?”

I couldn’t exactly give him any real advice on that. My childishness had been a paper-thin ruse for longer than Hayate had been alive. If I hadn’t been reincarnated—if my mother hadn’t carried me for nine months—literally no one would have bought it. “I don’t know. Would it help to go visit the Academy students?”

“Probably not,” Hayate said. “I don’t really think any of the Academy kids are that spoiled.”

“Maybe go visit with some of your clan friends?” I suggested. “Obito may know someone who needs a babysitter for a bit…”

Hayate’s eyes widened in horror. “No.”

...What kinds of missions had my brother been on with his genin team? “Then I don’t know what to tell you. Stick it out. Ask Yūgao and Iruka what they’re doing. Pretend to be asleep the whole time?”

Hayate thunked his head against the sink cabinet out of pure frustration. “Ugh.”

I ruffled his hair. “Cheer up. I’ll get dinner ready for us and tell you a story about Ame.” And hopefully by the time I was done cooking, I’d have figured out which parts of said story I could tell him. With Madara Uchiha’s bones in ANBU’s basement somewhere, and the Ten-Tails in orbit, and the Zetsu attack, there were gonna be some serious holes.

But I did think about it. And over a dinner of instant ramen—because I wasn’t feeling that interested in cooking—I told my brother about some of the funnier things I’d seen and thought while in a foreign land. Like how Kakashi made clothes for all eight of his dogs all by himself, how Obito had made fun of me for thinking we were supposed to stand way out in the rain for a couple of hours, and more.

“Oh, and Obito and Rin have a date tomorrow,” I said, once I’d exhausted the other Hayate-safe conversation options.

Hayate looked blank, then disappointed, and said, “I thought he had a crush on you, though. You do a bunch of stuff that only couples do, right?”

I stared at my brother from across the table and said, “Uh, no. I remember the first time you called Obito ‘brother,’ and I can tell you right now that my feelings are pretty much exactly the same.”

Hayate blinked. “Oh. Really?”

“Yes, really,” I said.

“Huh.” Hayate scratched his head. “Well, that’s boring.”

“If there’s anything my life could use for the next six months,” I said, “it’s ‘boring.’”

Sensei had looked at the mission report Konan had sent with us—in the form of an origami cow hiding behind Obito’s goggles—and decided that I could run missions of comparatively less danger.
As long as I didn't run into any Kiri-nin, he'd thought, I could handle solo or team assignments with relatively little trouble.

I was scheduled for a two-shinobi mission with Gai, starting in two days and running until whenever it was finished. I was supposedly going to be in the lead, though Gai outranked me and had for at least a year or two. Something, something, go knock over a bandit castle for some villagers near the border with the Land of Grass. It was a setup for an easy C-rank, though the threat level could have been bumped to B-rank depending on how much resistance we ran into once we got there.

After the Ten-Tails and Amegakure's drama, I was really hoping it would be a cakewalk of a mission.

"You're gonna be on missions forever, aren't you?" Hayate complained, placing his chopsticks over the mouth of his ramen container. "That sucks."

"It's money," I said. "And well, with the Three-Tailed Beast…"

"Right," Hayate said, and sighed. "Are jonin always gone a lot? I've only had two-day missions so far."

"You've been a chunin for about two weeks, Hayate." I looked speculatively down into my cup of ramen and decided on the spot that I would never buy this brand again. Distantly, I added, "You're gonna get the long ones soon enough. Actually, your next mission sounds pretty long."

"Yeah. But you've been on longer ones," Hayate said. He rested his head against his hand and added, "Thanks for getting all that stuff set up."

"What stuff?"

"I mean, Aunt Kushina came by here and made sure I had food on Tuesday," Hayate said. "Even though Naruto's really hyper and she's already pregnant. And Rin—"

"Kushina's pregnant?" I interrupted, staring at my brother in shock. "Yeah. She said she's going to have the baby in, uh...November?" he said. "You didn't know?"

"No, I didn't." I got up and took both of our ramen cups to the kitchen trash can. "I'll stop in and see if they need anything done before I leave."

That certainly explains why she isn't interested in being on active duty at the moment, I thought.

Allowing for a moderate margin of error, I could guess that Kushina must have gotten pregnant in January sometime. Hayate hadn't mentioned a specific due date, but I had a sneaking suspicion about that. Specifically, about how Sensei's birthday was in January, and that Kushina and Sensei had not decided to throw a party.

Well, then. After the experience with Kushina and Sensei's first kid, I imagined that Sensei was going to go insane on security measures.

And I would probably...not be there for it, depending on my mission rotation. I frowned at the thought and started rinsing chopsticks. Naruto would have a baby sibling. Naruto. I was sure he'd be the best big brother he could, though perhaps not immediately.

"What kind of mission are you going to have?"
"Gai and I are gonna see if we can kick a bandit dude off his throne. Preferably hard enough to bounce." I shrugged. "And probably infuse the world with Youth."

Hayate peered suspiciously at me. "You're not...gonna copy him, are you?"

"Gai and I already train together," I pointed out. "I'm just missing out on the green."

"Gai could fix that."

"Yeah, but it's the wrong kind of green for the mission," I said, and tilted my head to one side as I considered the option. "Well, it's not like I'm exactly spoiled for outfits…"

"That is going to look weird," Hayate said, instantly reversing his position on jumpsuits of any kind. I could see it in his expression. "Don't do it."

Well, now I had to. I wouldn't take one of Gai's spares, but hadn't I gotten one of those things for a birthday present last year?

I winked at Hayate, and he groaned aloud.

Gai burst into tears the second he saw me on Wednesday morning.

I had cheated just a bit, since orange legwarmers hadn't come with the outfit I found in my closet. And the green outfit itself had been just a bit short around the ankles and wrists, since I'd grown over the previous six months. As a result, I had bandages around my wrists and up to my elbows, and another set for each of my calves to keep any components from shifting too much. And since my bandana wouldn't tie all the way around my waist like Gai's more traditional hitai-ate, I had to improvise a bit with my sword straps and three scroll holsters.

If I had to sum up the effect, I'd say that I looked a little like a much stabbier version of Gai. Almost as though the Green Spandex brigade had enough members to specialize. Add in my backpack, and I probably looked like a particularly heavily-armed turtle all dressed in form-fitting green.

Leonardo would be fucking proud.

"Sorry I couldn't find enough to make it genuine," I told him, while patting his back sympathetically.

"No, Keisuke-chan, this is wonderful!" Gai said, grabbing me up in a hug that would have probably broken the back of a lesser woman. Even with my pack keeping some of the pressure off, I still made a squeaky noise like a toy being stepped on. "You look beautiful today! So strong! So sure of yourself!"

That was a bit of an exaggeration…

Gai set me down and gave me a thumbs-up. "We must get a picture."

I glanced at the gate guard—a chunin I didn't know—and shrugged just out of sheer fellow-feeling. We didn't exactly have a glut of cameras in Konoha, but I had no problem with immortalizing this outfit in the annals of People Who Actually Willingly Wore It. "I don't think we can right now, Gai. Unless you have a camera?"

Gai would be overjoyed when Lee finally graduated. I could just see it now.

"In fact, I do!" Gai said brightly.
I waved the guard over, and he took a picture for us with Gai's goofy little Polaroid-thing. Low-tech and kind of ancient-looking, but since the flash still worked I'd have to assume that the camera did too. Both Gai and I had gigantic grins—his was bigger—and our arms slung over each other's shoulders just because we could. The only problem was that the film would probably take a week to get back to us, but hey, we'd be busy. It'd be fine.

"Make sure to send someone to deliver it to my apartment, please!" Gai called after the guard, who was apparently going on break and whose replacement immediately gave us a funny look. Gai ignored that and said to me, "Keisuke-chan, are you in charge of this mission?"

"Yes," I said. I scratched the underside of my wrist. Had the bandages been a bad idea?

"Then I will follow your lead, Keisuke-chan!" Gai said brightly. "Please, lead the way!"

Which I did.

When we got to the village a few days later, we immediately got into a fight with bandits on the road. And then with the ones in the village. And then the ones on the hill behind the village. And then, once they had raised the alarm, the rapid-fire fistfight went up the hill and into the fortress on said hill. And then through the fortress.

By the time we got to the bandit king, we'd been fighting his men for about an hour without stopping, moving slowly uphill like a two-shinobi reversed avalanche of death or something. We didn't even really stop in the village itself. We just kept finding more faces to kick in.

Actually, the fights themselves took longer than they might have otherwise, since Gai had asked me to honor the uniform I'd adopted for the mission. So I did.

Then we found the guy in question, sitting on a tatami mat in the middle of his fortress and eating his breakfast—stolen from the village just that morning, of course—he had barely gotten halfway to his feet before two simultaneous chakra-charged kicks to the chest launched him backward and out of the room.

With sweat dripping down our faces and a sort of fierce joy from a good workout, Gai and I fist-bumped. Then we started the real work, which was dragging all of the downed bandits to the nearest lockup. On my own, I might have killed them all just because I wouldn't have been focusing solely on taijutsu and instead just done what worked fastest, but it would have ruined Gai's experience.

We got home inside of a week, having been paid and fed well by the thankful villagers.

And then, when Gai caught up with Genma and Ebisu and picked up a mission with them, I got another one too. Since Hayate had departed on his mission while we were gone, I didn't even feel guilty about it.

Missions kind of blurred together after that.

The highlights pretty much went like this: I went on one pair-mission with Kakashi, where he managed to distract the missing-nin target with a well-timed pun ("We're going to cut you some slack...or not.") right before I decapitated her. I went on a border rotation with Ebisu, which put us down on the coastline and let us explore the wonderful world of half-rotted seafood when a boat from Kiri washed up on the shore. Obito's mission involved chasing down an Iwa patrol that had thought they could get away with stealing samples of Sensei's fuinjutsu. I reinforced Konoha's barrier with Genma.
There was even a mission where Obito and Kakashi were with me again, and we unraveled a conspiracy to rig the casinos in Tanzaku-Gai, which was about the weirdest mystery we’d encountered. If the head of the scheme had said something about meddling kids, it would have seemed a perfect fit. We'd even brought Kakashi's dogs out to help sniff out the culprit, and uncovered a completely unrelated drug smuggling ring that ended with a bunch of dead thugs.

And just like that, months slipped by.

The newest Namikaze-Uzumaki kid was born on the twentieth of November that year, in the middle of what felt like an early winter gale.

At least, Konoha was like that. Like for Naruto, Tsunade had made Katsuyu's realm available to the Namikaze family, and had decided to be midwife personally. Rin went with them, and so did Sensei (for obvious reasons).

But some of us demurred. I'd been on back-to-back missions for two solid months, so I stayed in Sensei's house to recover and watch both the toddler Naruto and Tenzō, who was pacing nervously around the living room. Kakashi was on a mission—again—and Obito had left to go and support Rin.

Naruto was fussier than normal, very aware that neither of his parents were around, and I had thus far failed to distract him in any meaningful way. He wouldn't even hug his favorite stuffed frog, though he did drag it around the house twice.

"Mommy!" Naruto called out, his little face scrunching up in a definite warning about impending tears. "Daddy?"

"Naruto-chan, come here." I patted the couch next to where I was sitting, and Naruto climbed up onto it with only a little grumble. After he tucked himself firmly into my side, he put Gama-chan on my lap and held it up, pointing its orange face toward me.

"Gama-tan is scared," Naruto told me, pushing the top of his head into...basically into what bosom I had. Which wasn't much. "Mommy and Daddy gone."

I squished him against my side, rubbing circles on his back. "They'll be back soon, Naruto-chan. Don't worry."

After a second, I noticed Tenzō standing awkwardly behind the couch, so I waved him over. Climbing over the back and sliding down the cushions, he slotted himself into place on Naruto's other side, sandwiching the toddler between us.

"Worried?" I asked Tenzō, as he looped both of his arms around Naruto. I ran my fingers through the no-longer-so-tiny chunin's hair, mostly because Hayate was on a mission and I needed to reassure someone. As the surrogate brother figure Kakashi had picked up, it sort of made him family to me too.

Tenzō nodded into Naruto's blond spikes, his expression distant. As Naruto nuzzled his way into Tenzō's flak jacket, which he hadn't taken off since arriving, he said, "I'm a bit worried. Naruto was born on the Tenth, but there's no way this can possibly be that bad of an emergency..."

"That was a unique problem." Not technically irreproducible, but I wasn't worried about it despite that.

Black Zetsu was dead. Madara was dead. The Ten-Tailed Beast was in space. Anything else that came after us now was going to die.

Yin Kurama's seal is loosening, Isobu reported. But he's not putting any effort into it.

Yet another reason I was glad that my seal was over my chest instead. It was less secure for it, but I probably wouldn't have to worry about Isobu falling out of me in childbirth at the same time the kid did.

I think he's trying to fall asleep. He's complaining about the noise, Isobu said. And I can't get him to stop.

What about Yang Kurama? I wondered, and stroked Naruto's hair.

He's laughing at his better half. Literally.

But is Kushina all right? I asked.

She seems to be. Screaming, of course, because human births are disgusting, but the slug woman is not panicking from what Yin Kurama can hear. Isobu seemed to roll his only eye. I refuse to be more excited about this. It's not as though the child is going to be one of us.

True. But the baby will be the child of a jinchūriki, the brother of another, and my...baby sister or niece. Not sure. I ran the pad of my thumb over Naruto's marked cheeks. There's plenty for you to be excited about as the baby grows.

...I reserve judgment for later. I do remember what this one used to be like. And how Shukaku's host behaves.

"Kei-san," Tenzō said, "are you all right?"

Whoops. "Yeah. I was just thinking." I rubbed my eyes with my left hand, yawning. "Just tired. I can't remember if Naruto-chan here is getting a new baby brother or sister yet. Did Sensei or Kushina-san happen to tell you?"

"A girl," Tenzō said. "They're gonna name her 'Tatsumaki.'"

Tornado, huh? Given the family she was being born into, that was a very fitting name.

"Hear that, Naruto-chan?" I murmured, feeling my eyes start to slide shut over and over. It was a sure sign that I was tired. And that I'd fall asleep at the slightest provocation. I wanted to fight that urge on instinct, but then I thought about where I was.

If I couldn't afford to catch a nap in Sensei's house, with Naruto and Tenzō right there, where could I sleep? It was about the safest place in the village.

With that thought in mind, I leaned back on the couch and pushed the top half with my back to force it to recline. Tenzō did the same, with Naruto and his frog still in his arms, and ended up leaning his head against my chest once I rolled onto my side. Naruto fell into the gap between us, chewing on his frog, but seemed happier than before.

The three of us fell asleep on the couch like that, and slept until I felt Kushina's chakra reenter the village and jolted awake with enough force to end up on the floor. That, of course, woke Naruto up, and Tenzō had to calm him down again.
"You're getting pretty good at that," I told him, once he'd gotten the toddler settled again.

"I've had a lot of practice, Kei-san." Tenzō handed Naruto to me, though. He needed two hands to get his flak jacket's zipper on, and then he went into the hallway closet to get a coat.

With a brief consideration of how I was just wearing my uniform pants and a T-shirt, which had been drooled on, I went to follow suit. Flak jacket, coat, random other shit…

I tucked Naruto into a toddler sling and, once that was all sorted out, went with Tenzō toward Kushina's chakra.

That ended up putting us at the hospital, but since Rin and Obito met us in the lobby, I assumed everything had gone well.

"How's everyone?" Tenzō asked, once he got out of the mandatory Team Minato hugs that seemed to be handed out like candy at times like this.

"No complications," said Rin, leaning back into Obito's chest. She still had a fine sheen of sweat on her face, from either stress or from pouring her chakra into Kushina earlier. "Everything went as expected."

Obito looped his arms around Rin's neck and leaned over, with his chin ending up on top of her head. "Aside from the part where Kushina was screaming the whole time," Obito said with a wince. "I mean, I know childbirth is like eighteen kinds of suck, but is it supposed to be that bad?"

"How long was she in labor?" I asked Rin.

"Two hours or so," Rin said with a shrug. "We left when Kushina's water broke, but the contractions didn't start until ten hours later. Most of the time we were gone was spent preparing the area for the Nine-Tails's chakra, and waiting. No one wanted to be out of place when it started, but the delivery itself was short."

"See, that's nothing compared to Naruto-chan and his fourteen hours." I hefted the dozing toddler up in his sling a bit, and he made a face at the world without opening his eyes. "I did hear that the second kid was supposed to be easier, but that's even better than I was expecting."

Tenzō's round eyes were even rounder than normal. "That's…that's kind of terrifying."

"Welcome to the life of an obstetrician, Tenzō-kun," Rin said, but not unkindly. Above her head, Obito was looking slightly ill. "Be glad you never have to go through any of that."

Tenzō nodded rapidly.

"So, Obito," I said, "when do we get to see the baby?"

"As soon as we do?" Obito guessed. "Though we already did. Tatsumaki's bald right now, but she's kinda cute."

"Are you saying my daughter isn't the cutest girl in the whole world?" Kushina yelled down the hall, making all of us jump. "Come in here so you can see for yourself!"

"No, don't—there are already six people in here!" Jiraiya yelled right after.

"Then get out!" Kushina argued. "Where's Naruto? Where's my other baby?"

"Here, Kushina-san," I said as I strode toward her chakra, since Naruto was already waking up in response to the dulcet tones of his mother's voice. I did not want to be the one left holding the screaming toddler, because I had no doubt that Kushina's little blond angel would undergo exactly that transformation if I kept him from his mother.

Obito, Tenzō, and Rin followed in my wake, since I had a reason to be going somewhat faster than they were.

Naruto, once awake, immediately struggled out of my grip and ran toward his parents' voices. I followed, right on his tiny heels, as he peeled around a sharp turn and barged into a room full of adults.

And it was full—between Jiraiya in the corner, Kushina in the bed with the little bundle of joy, Sensei getting his hand healed by Tsunade, three nurses, and the various machines, there wasn't much room for four extra teenagers. But right between Kushina and Sensei, there was just enough space for a tiny blond toddler wielding a plush frog like a flail.

Sensei caught him and let the world's most determined child use him as a high chair.

"Naruto, this is your baby sister," Kushina said, lifting the tiny bundle so the two-year-old could see it properly. After a second, a tiny reddish hand poked out from the blankets.

Naruto, enthralled, crawled up from Sensei's lap and stuck out a finger, letting the baby wrap her tiny fingers around his.

"Her name's Tatsumaki." Kushina leaned over and kissed the top of Naruto's head. "What do you think?"

At that moment, little Tatsumaki apparently decided that all of this was entirely too much excitement for the few hours of life, because she immediately started screaming.

I watched a jolt run through all of the shinobi present—or at least the ones who didn't have kids of their own. Which was...all of us except Sensei and Kushina. While we'd been around Naruto throughout his first two years, to varying degrees, there was a special pitch in an infant's voice that hit our brains like nails on a chalkboard. Parents built up an immunity over time, based on their love for their children. Which, again, most of us were not.

Somehow, the room was deserted inside of four seconds. Tenzō and Tsunade made the most graceful retreat, given that she had work and he'd spent the most time around Naruto during the kid's tantrums.

Obito and Rin? Gone.

Jiraiya and me? Headed down the hall and away from the noise.

But we did manage to hear Naruto's second reaction to having a new sibling: "Make it stop!"

"Thoughts on your new godchild?" I asked Jiraiya, once we were away from the worst of it.

"Tsunade's, actually." Jiraiya looked up at the ceiling tiles, where I was sure nothing of interest could be found, and said quietly, "I never really expected to be a grandfather, kid. Much less twice over."

I nodded to show I was listening, but he wasn't looking at me. He turned away and covered his eyes with his hand, but I could still see a tiny tear that escaped and ran down his face.

Then his other hand came down on my shoulder, knocking me off-balance, and I saw that he'd mastered his expression. He grinned down at me. "Kei, you do your best to protect what you can see, alright? I'm going to be out of the village more and more often as you kids get closer to growing all the way up, so I won't always be there to pull Minato out of the fire. Look after each other."

I put my hand on top of his and said, "You got it, Jiraiya-sama."

Chapter Summary

Every light burns out.

Hey Sis!

I just had to write to tell you that Tenzō and I are rivals now! Like, agh, I know he's been a chūnin longer than I've been a ninja at all, but he's my age! The only thing he has going for him is his bloodline, and he hasn't been out of the village in months!

I refuse to lose to him!

...Though I don't know if he's noticed yet. I need to challenge him to a sparring match like Gai-san does with Kakashi!

Sincerely,

Hayate

Sis,

I lost.

This sucks.

Gonna get stronger for next time by training with Gai-san!

Hayate

Sis,

That was a bad idea. It's been a week and my bones still hurt.

Hayate

Sis,

I think he let me win. That sucks worse! Probably not as much as it sucks to be away from home, though. Are you okay?

Hayate

Sis,

Since you asked in your last letter, I've been staying with Iruka sometimes, and Aunt Kushina and the Hokage more often. I think they like having a live-in babysitter, but when I can't stand it I just leave Tenzō there with them. And I think he said something about changing his name? "Yamato" sounds weird but I guess he needs a new one for some reason.

Since you've been gone, Tatsumaki-chan's finally grown hair! She's a redhead, like Aunt Kushina said she would be. I know you said her "whisker-marks" were cute, but they just look like normal birthmarks to me. I guess she looks like her brother? I don't know.

Obito and Rin are still dating. Iruka said they went on a mission together in Tanzaku-Gai, but I think they just visited the casino and the hot springs there. They came back with souvenirs for Naruto and Tatsumaki, but not for me! Jerks.

Oh, and Iruka took the Exams (again). He didn't pass. I think he's gonna spend some time thinking things over before he tries again. Inoichi-sensei says he doesn't really seem like wants to hurt people much. Which is alright, since Yūgao and I already kinda do it for him.

Things have been alright, but what I said before... The apartment is a bit too lonely to stay in alone. I've been keeping up on the rent and stuff, though.

But seriously, how are you doing out there?

Hayate

Sis,

Genma just gave me a pumpkin cake. And I guess I have some kind of standing sparring offer? I don't even know him that well.

What did you tell him?

Hayate

Sis,

Do you have any idea when you're coming home? The last time you were here, all you did was sleep a lot. I know the higher ranks are getting deployed a lot more as bigger missions come up, but do you think you can be home soon? I hope we can at least spend New Years' together. We already missed both of our birthdays.

I don't need everyone else checking in on me all the time. I need you to come home.

I miss you.

Hayate

I kept that letter tucked into the front pocket of my flak jacket for what felt like ages. It sat beside its fellows, each one more crumpled and messy than the last, but I refused to throw any of them out.

After all, it was all I heard from my brother for months at a time.

Writing back, for a fūinjutsu specialist, would have been trivial. I always had paper and ink. It wasn't like I lacked opportunity or the time to do it.
But when I sat down to write, the words wouldn't come.

What was I supposed to say? I had back-to-back-to-back missions all the time because it was impossible for anyone to deny that I was an S-class shinobi of some kind. Half of the contents of those missions were classified.

Over the course of a year, I went on a slew of missions that became more challenging the longer I went. Whether that meant escorting a caravan through the Land of Stone with the Anko and Team Chōza, or kicking over another bandit group with delusions of grandeur, or hunting down a band of missing-nin and turning in bounties, I was slowly escalating from C-rank to B-rank and then to A-ranked missions.

Twelve months of living outdoors to varying degrees. Twelve months of barely being in Konoha for more than a month total, counting the few times I had to come home to report anything to Sensei. I worked with dozens of shinobi over those months, all over the Land of Fire and sometimes even the Lands of Rain, Stone, Grass, and Hot Water. I formed the backbones of several teams, fighting longer and with fewer lasting injuries than would have been possible for most people. I provided healing where needed, or a figurative lance to those who tried to cause Konoha forces any kind of trouble.

I made a name for myself out there. By the time it was over, my Bingo Book entry had been updated twice—once to recognize that I was truly an S-class jinchūriki threat, and once to attribute a string of kills, broken enemy bunkers, and overturned plots to me.

It was enough to make a girl blush. But really, I just felt tired.

Afterward, I couldn't remember how many people died because of me. Most of them would have been elated to kill me, because it would have removed an obstacle for their villages. Instead, I'd gotten them first, and got to live to feel conflicted about my impact on the world.

In the following November, I was posted at a station somewhere near the weird little strip of land that separated the Land of Fire, Hot Water, and Frost. While my performance in battle hadn't suffered during my time in the field, I still found myself waking up in the middle of the night with homesickness dragging me down like an anchor around my neck.

Even if I could still fight and plan, and had gotten better at both over the time I spent outside of the village, I was emotionally…not all there. When there was nothing to do, I felt muted, vague, and weary in a way that had nothing to do with physical weakness.

A week before December, I was sitting on my bunk and reading the now dog-eared copy of Icha-Icha Paradise that I'd bought on my last trip back home. The book had gotten to the top of national bestseller lists in the year since Jiraiya had gotten enough copies sold for a second printing, and at some point the more imaginative X-rated scenes had been added back in. Given the chronic shortage of decent reading material at tiny border outposts like this one, I'd take what I could get.

To be honest, some of the situations in the novel were a bit too close to what I remembered of Jiraiya's misadventures around the Konoha hot springs. I skipped those.

"Hey, Gekkō-san," said Makoto Kiyotaka, the outpost's Intelligence officer and an off-again, on-again jōnin-sensei. She had a messenger hawk on her right forearm, and held out a green-marked message to me. "This one's for you."

"Thanks," I said, and caught the tiny slip of paper when it was inevitably thrown right at my head. While I unrolled it and started mentally replacing numbers for words, Makoto left to feed the hawk.
On the occasions when we hunted out here, we rarely wasted anything. Since Subaru had caught a rabbit, I figured that most of its entrails would make a nice snack for a loyal raptor.

The strip of paper was only about as wide as my thumb, and maybe twice as long. And yet, the writer of the message had managed to include something very important.

Orders for Keisuke Gekkō: Return to Konohagakure. Effective immediately. And instead of a signature, which wouldn't have fit, Sensei signed the slip with his shinobi ID number. It was one of those things that, as a member of Team Minato, I'd had to memorize just in case. Most people wouldn't have bothered.

I packed up all of my stuff—sealing supplies, clothes, and so on—inside of two hours after presenting the slip to the commander in charge of the outpost. Commander Akiko Emigahara barely looked at it, because it was one of four she had seen, but she did say, "Watch for Kumogakure's diplomatic team as you go."

"What?" I asked, blankly.

"You've been hiding in your bunk," Commander Emigahara pointed out with some disapproval, pinching the message between her fingers for a moment. "But Kumogakure has finally opened negotiations with us."

…Well, if that wasn't a reason to get home as soon as possible, nothing was. "Understood, Commander. I will be careful."

"See that you are."

And as soon as everyone else in my rotation was packed—and the next group of Konoha-nin had arrived and been updated on the situation they were heading into—I headed home.

It took a week and a half, even at shinobi speed, because there were certain parts of the Land of Fire that had weird terrain and I was posted in one of them. But the return trip always seemed to go a little faster than the journey away from home.

Konoha's main gates were a bit crowded when I arrived, to my surprise. While I was just as dusty and road-weary as most of the people, there were a number of merchant caravans undergoing inspection by a team of Konoha-nin. Some of them had decorations that were a bit more in line with Kumogakure than with Konoha—lightning bolts, clouds, and so on.

I surveyed the cheery crowd with a somewhat unimpressed stare. If this attempt at diplomacy went off anything like what had happened with Kushina, or in the future-past with Hinata, then I anticipated a speedy exit for most of these people. Or at least a rapid rebranding.

The Chinatsugumi caravans weren't among them, but then, they did have a sort of outpost thing in town. They didn't really need to bring everything with them when they wanted Konoha to buy their stuff.

"Oh, hey!" said a voice, and I craned my neck to spot Kotetsu waving at me from off to my left. Close behind him, Izumo followed.

"Kotetsu-kun, Izumo-kun," I acknowledged them both, smiling somewhat self-consciously. I felt like I hadn't had a proper shower in forever, my hair was even worse than it had been before I left (thanks to months without mirror-assisted trims), and my gear was scuffed to hell and back. I'd done enough to keep myself recognizable, but not much more than that. "Sup?"
"Not a whole lot since the last time you stopped in," Izumo said.

"Except that it was months ago," said Kotetsu, with perfect timing. "Your brother's been bugging us every time he hits the gates, asking if we've seen you yet."

"Keep it a secret for a bit longer," I suggested. "I'm hoping to surprise him."

"All right, we can do that," Izumo said, and then elbowed his partner. "Can't we?"

"Fiiiine," Kotetsu said. "Let's get you checked back in."

The check-in process was painless, despite how long I'd been gone, and I was soon on my way to the Hokage's office, as usual.

Heh. It was almost like I'd never left, in some ways. While I did notice a few new buildings in Konoha's skyline as I went, I didn't view them as important. The sooner I reported back to Sensei, the sooner I could go home and sleep for a week. Hayate's letter made it plain that he wouldn't be impressed by that kind of plan, but there was really nothing like coming home to my own friggin' bed and not a cot in some backwater I didn't care to name.

I headed straight into the office from the rooftop stairwell, not even pausing to drop my mission pack anywhere until I was inside Sensei's office.

Sensei's chair was facing the window, but I felt his chakra and also felt the moment the security seals slammed down on anyone else's access to the room.

"You needed me back home, Sensei?" I asked, unable to keep the fatigue entirely out of my voice.

"Yes," Sensei said. He stood up and absentmindedly spun his chair back into place, but walked around the desk to stand directly in front of me. "But I think you needed to come home first."

Eh? "So there's isn't a mission?" I blinked. "That's..." What word was I looking for? "Thank you?"

Probably for the best, Isobu said quietly in my mindscape, and I had the strangest feeling that he was looking over my shoulder. But not in a bad way—he just wanted to make sure that I didn't faceplant. ...He's talking to you.

Right.

Sensei was careful about it, but I did see what he wanted about a second before he hugged me. "Welcome home, Kei."

I let my head roll to the side, resting against the neck padding of his flak jacket. My eyes started to water a little as I hugged him back, but I didn't cry. "Thank you, Sensei."

"Now, go home. We'll have plenty of time to catch up as soon as you've had some sleep." Sensei let go of me and stood back a bit, tilting his head to one side. He looked from my head to my toes and winced, saying, "You look like you could use some time at home. Your brother didn't stop talking about you the entire time you were gone."

"I know. I got his letters." In what time I had left, during the usual "hurry up and wait" of any military force. And boy did I ever feel that. Blargh. Still, he was right. I missed my brother. "See you later then, Sensei."

I was most of the way out of the office before Sensei called, "And Kei?"
"What, Sensei?" I tossed over my shoulder.

"I'm sorry." Sensei looked grim once I finally managed to convince myself to turn and face him, however briefly. "You were out in the field for too long."

Who cared? I wondered, through a mental fog. But what I said was, "You're forgiven. Later."

The trip home was a blur after that point. But I did end up getting home in one piece, without falling off a roof or tripping on a power line.

I disarmed the seals, dropped my mission pack on the floor inside the front hall, and just about managed to clamber into an old t-shirt and sweatpants after taking a short shower. I didn't get as far as my bed, but I turned the kotatsu on and fell asleep under the coverlet there instead. It wasn't like anyone would use the apartment's central heating if they weren't there, and December was cold.

I slept like the dead, with my head pillowed on my folded arms.

I did wake up for a minute, but I just felt a familiar chakra signature settle down next to me. Half-asleep and probably not really up to thinking, I reached out blindly and drew whoever it was into a one-armed hug. Marginally thinner arms clutched at mine, drawing it over whoever it was, and a weight settled against my side, softly and without fanfare.

I moved my free arm so my forehead rested in the crook of that elbow, mumbled something vague, and went back to sleep.

A couple of hours later, I woke up with the usual sensation of pins-and-needles that came with sleeping on the floor like an idiot, but I was in a different position than normal. I had the usual sensation of some kind of rug imprint on my face, plus some dried drool, but when I tried to move my right arm, there was resistance.

I looked at the source of my predicament and spotted a familiar tousled mop of brown hair.

While I'd been in too much of a daze to notice, Hayate had found me lying on the floor like a drunk and had apparently decided to join in on my nap. He had my right arm wrapped in both of his, with my wrist by his face.

He snored.

I bit back a laugh and lowered my head to the floor again, resting my chin on the back of my hand. Goofy little brother. I'd missed two of his birthdays by my count, and he was nearly as big as I was, but I supposed that some things never changed. I was still a beloved older sister.

I blew on his ear, throwing hair over his face.

Blindly, he hit me in the face with his left hand.

"Ow!" Rubbing my nose ruefully—guess I deserved that—I braced my bare foot against his hip and pushed, sending my brother rolling out from under the kotatsu cover. "I'm home," I told him, and then I stuck my tongue out at him.

He woke up and flailed, ending up on his butt with his back against the wall. And then he saw me, awake and moving. That knowledge quickly overcame any annoyance about being kicked across the room, and the resulting grin was blinding. "I didn't get to say this before, but welcome back."
"It's good to be back," I told him. I sat back down on the floor and eyed him, and he did the same.

I...hadn't expected to miss out on seeing him grow. While I'd been back in the village intermittently over the last year, I was struck again by how different my brother was from that little boy who used to follow me everywhere, repeating what snips of my name he could pronounce. At age fifteen, he was easily my height and probably around my weight, with deep-set eyes and prominent cheekbones that reminded me of Dad. He'd let his hair get a bit out of control, and was anxiously twisting it between his fingers as I looked at him. He'd even started growing a bit of facial hair, though it was more like the barest hint of whiskers instead of Dad's five o'clock shadow. He was still all gangly limbs and hadn't filled out yet.

"Is something wrong, Sis?" Hayate asked, and his voice didn't crack at all.

I was tearing up again. "Nothing," I told him, rubbing at my eyes. "I just...I wish I'd been able to be around more."

The next thing I knew, Hayate was hugging me. He said, "Same here, Sis. But you're here now, right?"

I choked on a sudden sob, my fingers digging into the fabric of his shirt. "Y-yeah."

I'd been homesick for so long that I hardly knew what to do with myself anymore.

"Are you gonna be around for longer this time?" Hayate asked, once I finally let go of him and was busy rubbing my aching eyes.

"I don't know," I admitted, sighing to myself. Sensei had said that I spent too long out in the world, and I agreed with him, but there was still the possibility that I'd be sent someplace. Konoha didn't exactly lack for jōnin, but I was a bit more useful than usual.

Hayate muttered something impolite, but I didn't call him on it. He shook himself and said, "Well, you can still catch up with everyone while you're here. Iruka and Yūgao want to see you, and there's a whole lot to talk about. I couldn't send all of it through the mail."

"Oh?" I asked, rolling my shoulder to get the ache out of it. "Are you gonna keep me in suspense?"

"For a bit. I mean, it's a big thing," Hayate said, and looked away. Huh?

"Well, we can go get ramen with everyone we can find," I suggested.

"Ichiraku's doesn't have that much bench space," Hayate pointed out, having recovered from his brief bout of embarrassment. "And anyway, Aunt Kushina said she wanted to have a big dinner. Before I got here, they said they could start any time after you woke up."

"That's nice of them," I said, glancing out the window. It was already dark, but... "What time is it now?"

"Around five," Hayate guessed. "So, what do you say?"

I scratched my head, wincing as my fingernails caught in a knot in my hair. "...Okay. Give me a chance to get dressed for real and get ready. You should, too."

"It's not really a formal event, Sis."

"Still," I insisted. "I'll be out in five."
Hayate raised an eyebrow at me, but let me get on with it.

I poked around in my closet for a bit. While I hadn't had much time to organize anything before having to leave again, Rin had made certain that my wardrobe was less hilariously drab (or horrifically green) during the only free Saturday I'd had in August. It meant that I did have a small assortment of clothes that actually complimented my build rather than smothering it. Given that my shoulders were wide enough compared to my hips that I almost had a swimmer's build, that meant fewer sleeveless tops than I'd once gotten used to.

I'd put my foot down regarding crop tops, though. The rest of the knowledge Rin had painstakingly instilled into me was still there, but...

Looking at what I had, I felt the urge to put effort into things leave me with my next breath. Screw it, December was cold and we'd bought most of my stuff in the summertime.

I grabbed a cream-colored sweater, a spare pair of shinobi pants, and a non-weapon belt from my closet. My mission sandals were beat to shit, but they'd work for just a bit. Once dressed, I pulled my overlong bangs back with a butterfly hairclip Rin had given me, then looked in the mirror in the hallway.

...Eh, good enough. I still needed a haircut.

Hayate, who had apparently decided that a haori-styled shirt was good enough for anyone, was already waiting by the door.

"You don't really look quite up to the party," Hayate commented, eyeing me carefully. He could feel the way my chakra wavered when I was tired, perhaps more clearly than ever.

I shrugged. "It's just a few hours. And I want to see everyone as soon as I can."

Hayate nodded. "Your call, Sis. You still remember where the Hokage Residence is?"

I playfully punched him in the arm. "I was just gone for a while, stupid. My brain didn't fall out of my head while I was out of the village."

"You sure about that?" Hayate teased, though he rubbed his arm for effect. Whiner. If he'd been training with Gai like he said he had, that barely counted as a love tap.

Taking shots at each other the entire way, Hayate and I headed for the Hokage residence—and the great glowing beacon of chakra there. Kushina wasn't subtle.

"Welcome back!" Everyone seemed to shout at once, creating a wall of sound that hit Hayate and me like a hammer.

I did a quick head-count, right before Kushina hit me in the middle of my ribcage and started compressing me like a beloved stuffed animal. Over her head, I spotted Yūgao and Iruka at a long table laden with ten different kinds of food, just getting up from their chairs. Tenzō and Tsunade were in the kitchen, with the former eyeing the latter's drinking with entirely reasonable caution. Sensei was on the couch, being climbed on by both of his kids, and Obito and Rin were just behind Kushina and helped her squash me. Genma was sneaking food from the table, since everyone's attention was occupied.

No Kakashi or Raidō, though. Huh.
And then I remembered that I was supposed to be breathing, and squirmed in the grasp of three different shinobi.

"Give her a bit of space, Kushina," Sensei suggested, as Tatsumaki climbed up onto his shoulder.

Kushina let me go a moment later, then yanked my head down to her height and kissed my forehead. "Thank goodness you're back safe and sound, Kei-chan!"

Sensei winced.

"Did Hayate tell you some of what happened?" Obito asked, as Kushina pulled away. I had to look up to meet his eye—not a novel experience, but if I had to guess I'd have said that he had finally finished growing. He was taller than Sensei, and his voice was a bit deeper than it had been. He'd also swapped out his medical eyepatch for a more pirate-y look, which I approved of on general principles. "Seriously, it's hilarious."

"Hey!" protested Hayate, shoving at Obito's shoulder.

"What? It is," Obito said, unphased.

Rin took my hands in hers and said, "Come on, there's plenty of food and we're dying to know what you've been up to!" Rin, who had apparently decided on finally growing her hair out, seemed to have topped out about ten centimeters shorter than I was, looked less like a cute little girl than she had the last time we'd done much together. At seventeen, she was mostly filled out thanks to training and looked about the happiest that I'd ever seen her.

I smiled crookedly and said, "It wasn't really that interesting…"

Sensei's chakra did something weird as Rin and I spoke, and I resisted the urge to ask what was wrong.

Rin dragged me to my place at the table, which was between her and Obito and across from Genma, but I still found myself craning my neck to look at everyone as they crowded toward the table.

Sensei, with Naruto clinging to his leg and Tatsumaki on his shoulders (with her hands in his hair like he was some kind of horse), made his way to the table somewhat more cautiously than normal.

Tatsumaki was a tiny thing even at a year old, with three whisker marks per cheek like Naruto, and dark purple eyes that more closely resembled Sensei's in terms of shape. Her short red hair was tied into a pair of pigtails, and she was dressed in a pale yellow onesie.

Naruto was three, so he had mostly-complete control of his limbs and was staring over at me with a clear spark of curiosity in his eyes. In a white T-shirt that was already stained by some kind of mysterious sauce, from the look of it, he looked up at me like he might demand to be picked up at any second.

"Welcome back," Genma said once I sat down, as casual as if I had never left.

I blinked at everyone, still either a bit sleepy or a bit slow. Probably both. "I'm glad to be back," I said, since it seemed like a safe option.

"If you're wondering," Genma said, "Kakashi, Gai, and Raidō are sorry they couldn't make it, but they're out. Jiraiya-sama, too."

"On the same mission?" I asked.
"Hopefully not," said Tsunade.

For a while after that, all any of us had time or attention span to talk about. While Sensei tried to get Tatsumaki to eat her considerably-less-appetizing mush, Kushina pointed out what foods she'd made and cheerfully recommended everything to everyone. Everyone loaded up their plates in short order, and for a while the only sound anyone heard was the sound of people eating. Breathlessly, in some cases, because Kushina's cooking was just that good.

"Hayate, you need to tell Kei about the thing," Obito said, pointing his chopsticks at my brother. The fact that he had tempura shrimp clutched in said chopsticks didn't seem to bother him.

Hayate exchanged looks with Yūgao.

This soon? I wondered.

What? Isobu asked, but his voice sounded as though he'd been woken up from a nap. Oops.

I shushed him.

Grumbling, Isobu closed his eye again and went back to sleep.

Tenzō was also looking at Hayate with interest, his catlike eyes wide and his expression eager.

"Come on, tell her!"

"Shut up," Hayate told him.

"Kid, either speak up or one of these two," Tsunade said, indicating Obito and Tenzō, "are gonna do it for you."

Hayate groaned. "Fine! Sis, Yūgao and I are dating now!"

Silence reigned, aside from the sound of Tatsumaki trying to eat her father's hair.

"Congratulations, then," I said. "Obito, can you pass the...no, I'll take literally anything over there except the tempura shrimp."

"...That's it?" Hayate asked blankly. "But you've been gone for a year. I didn't even know I liked Yūgao until a few months ago."

I turned my attention back to him, with a huge serving bowl of steamed pumpkin now at my elbow, and said in a perfectly serious voice, "Your older sister can see the future."

Hayate grumbled, though my teammates had to choke back laughs.

"Seriously, though. I saw that one coming." To Yūgao, I said, "If you are both kind to each other, we won't have any problems."

"I don't think you have anything to worry about, Sister," Yūgao said brightly.

Iruka rolled his eyes and said, "You two are going to be *insufferable."

"Of course they are," Rin said. "More mackerel?"

"Yes, please," Iruka said, and took the bowl.

"We aren't that bad, are we?" Obito asked. I assumed he was referring to himself and Rin.
Minato, Tsunade, Kushina, Tenzō, Yūgao, Hayate, and Iruka all said, "Yes," at the same time. Well then.

"Traitors," said Obito.

"I missed the lovey-dovey stuff, then," I said.

"You did," Kushina agreed. "But it was cute while it lasted."

"It looked like a comedy to me," said Genma. "Given how much Rin-san was yelling at the beginning." To me, Genma added, "Pass the pumpkin, please."

I did so.

"In my defense," Rin said, "Obito kept using his eye jutsu without apparently listening to anything I had to say. Ever."

"I needed to at the time, though," Obito pointed out.

"Which is why I forgave you."

"What have you been doing, Kei-san?" Tenzō asked.

"Missions, mainly," I said. I shrugged. "It wouldn't have been all that bad if I had enough time between them, but there was always some kind of scheduling problem. Next thing I know, I've been out for almost a full year."

Kushina reached over and whacked Sensei's shoulder. "Minato, tell her!"

"Tell me what?" I asked, when Sensei gave Kushina a look that suggested he'd be facepalming if he had free hands. Naruto and Tatsumaki had somehow both ended up in his arms, and I wasn't sure how it had happened.

"How do I put this?" Sensei wondered aloud. "Actually, Kei, there was...um. There were repercussions, to the incident with the clans."

I stared at him. "Sensei?" This was not heading in a pleasant direction. When Sensei opened his mouth to explain, I shook my head and said, "Wait, no, don't tell me now. Maybe you assumed I knew something I didn't, but I seriously don't want to ruin the mood right now. This—it's supposed to be a party, right?"

Too late, mood ruined. Everyone had gone very quiet.

Suddenly claustrophobic, I got up from the table, appetite gone, and headed outside. I tried not to slam the door as I left, but might've failed at that.

Blowing out a deep breath, I scaled the side of the building and sat on the roof. The panels were cold, but I'd felt suffocated in there.

If I'd read the situation correctly, spending a year outside of the village had been a punishment detail. And Sensei hadn't even told me before sending me away. After the first mission happened to stack with the one afterward, I'd just assumed that it was bad luck. I'd had enough time to come back for a little while after the third, but the fourth, fifth, and sixth extended missions had all run right into each other.

I pulled my barrette out and let my bangs fall forward over my face.
I must have… I didn't know. So maybe addressing the clans had been a bad move during the meeting. Obito and I should have just stayed quiet and not gotten uppity. Was the reason I'd been sent away because I'd spoken out of turn? Or was it because I’d been too happy that Danzō was dead? Maybe it came down to just forcing Sensei to show more of his hand than he wanted to?

I sighed aloud, with my breath coming out in a translucent cloud.

There was shouting from below my feet. It sounded like Hayate was yelling, but Tsunade's voice was also raised. Obito and Rin also sounded upset, but I didn't hear Sensei’s voice in any of it.

So much for a plain, happy homecoming. It felt more like I was out on parole all of a sudden, with someone looking over my shoulder to keep me out of trouble. I was home, but not home free.

This isn't going how I planned, I said to Isobu, drawing my knees up to my chest and resting my chin on top of them. I thought it was just about getting more leadership experience. Not...being kicked out.

Given the amount of screaming Kurama's host is doing, Isobu said, I doubt it's that simple.

Which one?

Both.

And right on cue, I heard Naruto start to cry.

Dammit.

I got to my feet, hopping down and landing on top of a brick-and-mortar fence that separated the Hokage Residence from the rest of the neighborhood. From there, I bounced up and off the next roof. I didn't really care where I was going, as long as it was away from everyone.

I don't see how running away will help. Isobu blinked slowly, as though he needed a moment to contemplate my stupidity. Didn't you just spend months complaining about how you missed all of these humans?

It's complicated.

It was, in fact, a result of two different problems coming to a head: a massive sleep debt, and the realization that Sensei had kept the reason for my long deployment a mystery to me. So instead of having months to come to terms with the latter point and let my hurt feelings (justified or not) boil off, all of it was hitting me at once instead. If I could just wait, an explanation would probably come up sooner or later. Maybe it would be sufficient.

But I didn't want to hear it.

Eventually, I came to a stop in Training Ground Three, near the three training posts and the Memorial Stone. I looked at it as I passed, seeing my reflection just for a moment in the black granite as the glare of the lamps caught me, but didn't stay.

I wasn't planning on running my feelings off, not like Gai would have probably encouraged me to do. But I didn't want to be around anyone else.

I just wanted… I didn't know what I wanted.

Running away always felt like a better idea before I actually did it.
Kicking my scuffed sandals against the cold earth, I turned on my heel and went back to look at the Stone.

About halfway up one side, Obito's name had been painstakingly removed from the monument three years ago. The stoneworkers had been so careful that it was difficult to tell that the name had ever been there, but I knew exactly where it used to be. I didn't recognize the name over his spot, now.

I traced my parents' names in silence.

Though I had the memories of an adult, it didn't seem as though I was as resilient as I would have liked to be.

Sensei had screwed up before. He was human. Making mistakes was just something we did. My first Chūnin Exam, Kannabi, the mission where we got Obito back…

Then why did this feel so personal? Just because he hadn't told me? Just because, if he had, I might've known what I had to do better?

My fingers curled into a fist next to Dad's name.

It didn't matter. I was a shinobi. It shouldn't matter. All I needed to do...was learn to accept—_fwish._ "Somehow, I didn't think you would come here."

"I usually don't," I agreed, surprising myself by how controlled I sounded.

"Kei, I'm sorry I didn't explain before," Sensei said, and I felt his chakra approach me slowly. Cautiously.

"What was there to explain?" I asked, and my voice took a turn for the sullen. With a soundless laugh that barely amounted to a puff of air, I muttered, "I screw up, I get to spend months chasing missing-nin in the middle of nowhere. That's how it's supposed to work."

I turned around to face him.

"No," Sensei said quietly. "That isn't the way this works."

"It isn't?" There was a laugh in my voice, but what came out was more of a choked hiccupping noise. "I-I didn't—I was trying to think of reasons why I"—no, no, that's not what I wanted to say! "How did I mess up, Sensei? What did I do wrong?"

"You didn't—"

"Don't tell me that!" I snapped, cutting right across him. "I must have—there must be some reason…"

Years ago, when I'd been new to this world and still reeling from being reborn, I'd been too busy to deal with the consequences of being torn from everything I ever knew and being reborn into a place where all the variables were different. Relearning all of my basic skills had been all I had time to think about. The only part of me that had still mattered was what I could recall of this storybook world. Everything else was Keisuke. Mom and Dad's baby girl. Hayate's sister. Oh, I still had the helm, but what I had been before was irrelevant detail.

The only person who cared who I had been before this—before this ninja bullshit—was me. The knowledge I had was useful, but no one examined the source of it. No one asked how I knew anything—not in a way that I couldn't wriggle out of.

And my usefulness had run out. I had maybe a few months—Kumogakure's treaty was coming up—and then the rest of it was pointless.

"I'm not... I'm sorry I don't matter anymore," I whispered, just noticing the tears dripping down my nose. I hooked my thumb on the inside of my sweater and started to wipe them away. "After Kumo comes, n-nothing I predict will be true anymore. I'll just be me again."

Just Keisuke. Isobu would know who I used to be, but the rest of it I could take to the grave for all it mattered. I'd just be...me. Out of step with the rest of the world, for no reason anyone could see. Forever.

"Did you think I sent you out of the village because...we didn't need you anymore?" Sensei asked, and his voice was a lot closer than I remembered. I dashed my tears away on my sleeves and nodded, even as he hugged me and I just ended up bonking my head against my shoulder. "Kei..."

"W-What did I do, Sensei?" What had changed everything? What made sending me so far away from home, long enough that Sensei wanted to apologize, a good idea?

Sensei's chakra yanked on us both, and I blinked as I felt the ambient temperature shift abruptly. Lifting my head, I blinked and recognized the inside of Sensei and Kushina's apartment. Specifically, on the couch.

Sensei let go of me and reached back over the couch, pulling a blanket out and tucked it around my shoulders. "I'll be back in just a second, all right?"

I nodded, pulling my knees back up to my chest and wrapping my arms around them. After a second, I rested my cheek against the top of them and decided to just...stop. Stop doing things that made people upset.

Maybe stop everything.

Sensei sat down next to me a while later, putting two cups of tea down in front of us on the coffee table. He paused for a moment, as though trying to decide if it would be okay to touch me.

I solved his dilemma by just leaning into his side. I made no move to touch the tea.

"Kei, you didn't do anything wrong," Sensei said to the top of my head.

I made a doubtful noise.

"If anyone should be apologizing," Sensei murmured, "it's me. I never told you why you had to be out of the village for so long."

Whatever. It didn't matter.

"After the meeting with the clan representatives," Sensei explained in a slow, even tone, "there were...heightened feelings. Some people didn't like the fact that I asked you and Obito to speak up where and when you did. I felt Sensei shift beside me. "It took a while for them to build up momentum. Months. But when they did...I didn't—I should have told you about it."

I stayed quiet.

"The Shimura clan felt that you were disregarding their contributions to the village," Sensei went on, and he started rubbing my arm as though to make sure I stayed awake. "And the Hyūga clan, well, they reacted badly, in private, to the revelation that Danzō was dead on my orders. They still move cautiously around me."

The Hyūga thing would sort itself out. As long as someone caught the Kumo team in the act, we'd get away with whatever we had to. They'd come to our side.

I blinked slowly, my eyes half-lidded and feeling annoyingly puffy. I wasn't crying anymore, but still felt soppy and miserable. I curled tighter around myself, as though protecting some invisible core that had already been hurt once.

Not just once.

"I sent you out of the village because I was afraid," Sensei told me. "For your sake."

"I can take care of myself," I said in a hollow voice, but I didn't have to look up to know that Sensei didn't really believe me. I wouldn't have believed me. There was a reason I was on this goddamned couch instead of enjoying my homecoming.

"Kei, you didn't hear them," Sensei said. "You didn't hear what I—what my ANBU—heard them say about you. Obito is an Uchiha, and his clan name gives him some protection, but…"

So I was a clanless jinchūriki. Sensei still should have… I didn't know. Done something.

"I'm sorry. I thought it would only be a month, but there was still too much happening. I just...let your leadership learning go on longer, because it was easier for me than explaining the truth. That there were some people who don't appreciate you." Sensei leaned over and rested the side of his head against the top of mine. "I'm sorry. I should have called you home sooner."

"Mnuh," I mumbled, peering out from underneath my bangs. I wasn't truly focusing on anything, but maybe that was because I was exhausted. A two-hour nap in the middle of the day hadn't done much for me.

Sensei was about to say something else, but a thud sounded from somewhere down the hall.

"Kakashi's home," Sensei said, for my benefit. As though he'd forgotten that I could sense as well as he could.

I made another noncommittal noise, and Sensei didn't get up. Instead, he twisted in place and said loudly, "Kakashi, Kei's here. Can you—?"

Kakashi appeared before Sensei was finished speaking.

Wearing his ANBU armor, Kakashi looked older than I remembered. While on my year-long unofficial exile, I had only ever sensed him from an extreme distance. We hadn't talked or seen each other in the field, and our breaks in Konoha never seemed to overlap.

I could see that he'd more or less reached adulthood intact. While tired, going by the lines around his eyes and the way his chakra buzzed only a little, he still reached out to me with his black-gloved fingers and put his hand on top of my knee.

"Kei?" he asked. "What's wrong?"

I didn't know how to answer the question.
But I knew how to answer a different one. One that, over time, Kakashi and Obito and Sensei might have eventually known to ask.

"I th-think I need to say something," I mumbled. I shrugged off Kakashi’s touch and slowly unfolded from my bunched-up position, letting my feet touch the floor. I braced my hands on the couch, elbows locked straight, and felt my gaze slip to the floor almost before I actually understood what I was seeing.

Kakashi’s hand reappeared, his right hand going to my left. "Kei?" Then, "Sensei, what happened to her?"

"I—" And that was as far as Sensei got.

"I lied to you," I interrupted, as my hands gripped the couch cushions and my nails started to dig into the fabric.

"About what?" Sensei asked, sounding more puzzled than worried.

That would change.

You're going to tell them?

And you. Properly.

"S-Seventeen years ago," I began softly, "I started lying to everyone around me. And it just...it was easier to keep going. Like you said, Sensei. Why stop?"

"What are you talking about?" Kakashi asked, twining his fingers with mine. But he couldn't get me to relax.

I refused to look at him. I just pressed on, with the quiet inevitability of a tide or maybe impending winter. "The truth… The truth is, I haven't always been Keisuke Gekkō."

Silence.

Then, "What do you mean?" Sensei asked. His voice was quiet and sleek, like a knife, and I swayed in place, a prisoner to my own momentum.

Kakashi tried to tilt my head up, so I’d look him in the eye, but I shook him off.

"I used to be someone else," I murmured, as though drifting. "There was...a story. A world. A world like this one, I guess. I lived there. I died there. And I was reborn here." I looked down at my left hand, and realized distantly that my nails that had started bleeding. "In that world, I was an adult. I could do whatever I wanted. I just...wanted to see worlds that weren't mine. And one of those worlds, and the story in it, was this one."

"I don’t—Kei, are you saying that you saw the world as some kind of storybook?" Kakashi asked. Then, with a small noise of realization, "That's why your 'visions' never accounted for you. You weren't supposed to be here."

"I passed off what I knew from that story as a prophetic gift," I mumbled, my head bowed still. "It was the only way I could think of to change the plot."

"So that's why you said you'd seen it before," Minato said quietly. "And why you were so dead certain that certain events were going to happen."
I nodded, closing my eyes. "It was...easier. I'd seen it all play out once. I could be detached enough to see the causes." I sighed. "And then I got attached."

"Attached?"

"Hayate first." And oh, how that hurt now. What would he think of me once this got out? "I didn't—before he was just a minor character. His death didn't matter." Sensei and Kakashi both flinched. "And then he was born. And he—and I couldn't not love him.

"I met Obito and Rin later. And I couldn't—knowing that the story would waste them, I couldn't stay out of it." Kakashi's hands were cold behind the gloves. I couldn't feel his chakra strongly, there. "I thought, oh, I've seen this before. But I'm older. I'm stronger. I can do something."

"We know about this part, Kei," Sensei reminded me, and I remembered that.

"I kept just...everyone started out as paper, and then I got to know you, and I had to stand up. I had to do something." I managed a soft laugh, bitter and harsh. "And as long as I knew the game, I could still protect someone. But now I can't see anything. And I've changed too much, and nothing I do will—"

"Kei, stop," Kakashi said. "Please, you're hurting yourself."

"And you," I murmured, stopping him cold. "Kakashi. You were...you were different, in the story. It just kept hurting you over and over because it made things 'dramatic.' Pah." I almost smiled; a twisted thing, laughing more at myself than anything. "If Obito and Rin made it, I thought, you'd be okay. What did it matter if some twenty-year-old phony died in their place, as long as it filled the quota?"

I didn't belong here. I loved them all, but I wasn't really one of them. All that mattered were the changes I'd made. And each one pushed me further and further away from mattering at all.

Just a little bit left, until I couldn't predict anything anymore.

Then I could just...stop.

"I'm sorry I didn't say this before," I said tonelessly, though my eyes were still focused on the rug. "Or if I've hurt you by saying it. Maybe I just didn't want to believe I c-could lie so much."

I'm sorry I'm not real.

As though thinking those words had opened a wound inside me, I started crying again. And it was ugly crying, with shaking and sobbing and—and a hollowed-out feeling like someone had scraped out my insides and done it slowly.

I just cried my fucking eyes out, like I was the one hurt. Like it was important.

I didn't blame Kakashi for leaving once I started, or Sensei for not knowing what to say.

Distantly, I heard a pop.

Then there was a little furry body trying to work its way into my lap, and I wiped some of the tears and snot away on my sleeve.

Pakkun bumped his nose against my chin, lapping at the tears and pushing his way up my chest so he could stick his wrinkly face into my collarbone. And then, all at once, seven more dogs surrounded me. Bull at my back, Shiba over my knees, and Urushi and Guruko trying to reach my face even if Pakkun was taking up all the space. Úhei and Akino hung back, but not far, and nosed their way in.

I hiccupped.

Sensei pulled my head against his side and said, in a very quiet voice, "I'll sort this out for you, Kei. Give me some time to do it, but by the time I'm done, no clan will stand between you and your home again. Can you hear me?"

I nodded, too choked up to talk, and kept my head bowed.

Sensei got up after that, off to take care of a few things, and for a moment I just rocked in place, with Pakkun clutched tight to my chest.

I must have been there for a while, because I felt completely numb by the time I felt Kakashi's chakra next to me again. I didn't lift my head to acknowledge him, but Pakkun did.

Kakashi gently bumped his forehead against the top of my head. Almost too quiet to hear, he whispered, "No matter what you think, I'm glad you exist. Not your prophecies. Not your power. Just you."

He left after that, to go do mysterious ANBU things. But he left me with all eight of his dogs, which was enough.

The next day, there was some kind of big to-do about Kumogakure's treaty. I stayed inside that day, hiding out in Sensei and Kushina's guest bedroom, and ignored all of it. I turned away any visitors except Hayate, who would have broken in, and mostly just slept the day away.

And then the Kumo head ninja tried to kidnap the Hyūga heiress.

Almost like he'd been tipped off, Kakashi caught the Kumo head ninja two steps outside of the compound with the unconscious Hinata, and didn't kill him. Though from what I heard later, he made the guy wish he was dead.

Good.

"Can you handle one more mission?" Sensei asked me, a few days after the Hyūga incident.

I nodded, though I was staring off into the middle distance somewhere past Sensei's ear and out the office's window. Given the rampant feelings of betrayal in the village, even if they were aimed at Kumogakure instead of me, it made sense for me to get out while I could.

"Not as a team leader," Sensei added, once he had my assent. "Ebisu has been asking—politely—if he can take on a few missions for his promotion to special jōnin. He'd like to be a tutor, but he needs to be a half-step higher for the promotion."

"Okay," I said quietly. "That sounds nice."

"Hey," Sensei interrupted my thoughts, drawing my eyes back to him. "I'm sending all of Team Chōza this time. Shiranui and Gai should be able to follow his lead, and I have faith in you. Just...give him a chance to prove himself, okay?"

"Where are we going?" I asked, which was about as much initiative as I'd shown for three days.

"Mount Soragami. The Chinatsugumi would like an escort to Konoha again," Sensei told me, trying to smile. It stopped around his mouth.

"By your command, Hokage-sama," I said with a nod. "I'll go get ready."

As the door closes behind Kei—or what's left of her—I drop my head into my hands.

What have I done?
Isobu’s large eye narrows as he watches his human’s listless mental avatar. It hasn’t moved or tried to talk to him in long enough that he is actually impatient. The truth is, while he does care about the mind behind his gilded cage, he doesn’t know what to do about it.

This wreck of a human isn’t a mere shell of the Kei who has actually worked with him over the last three years. That would be an insult to shells everywhere. An empty shell can still be an opportunity and be useful to new creatures on the bottom of the ocean.

This is a burnt husk. Ashes and dust, from human fires. The explosion has already happened, and what is left is the mere outline of what had once been there.

But while he is cut off from his host’s mind, he is not out of options.

He dives. Down, into the dark and deep places where only Tailed Beasts can communicate. The mind-skype, as he calls it, is still open.

“Kurama, I need to speak with you and your host.”

Isobu waits, curling his three tails back on themselves as he tries to put his thoughts in order. Kurama will arrive when he wanted, and never a second before. That gives Isobu some time to decide what he will and will not say to his strongest sibling.

That thought still rankles.

Yin Kurama appears in utter silence out of the dark, his blood-red fur standing up along his spine and all nine tails raised high like the struts of a fan.

“So, just you, today?” Isobu asks, folding his armored arms in front of his chest.

Yin Kurama shrugs one disturbingly human shoulder. “I was the one most interested in hearing from you. My other half seems amused by juvenile humans. As for my host? Later.”

Isobu gives the massive, lanky fox a long stare, then decides to let that comment go. “My human has not recovered from her reaction earlier. Have the other humans found more information? I don’t understand what led to the situation in the first place.”
“Human gossip,” Yin Kurama says with a dismissive huff. “When humans can’t harm each other with rocks and sticks, they use words as weapons.”

“Sounds familiar,” Isobu replies, recalling Kei’s memories. Yang Kurama’s host had borne the brunt of maliciously-intended apathy in the strange story. And now he does not, due to blatant interference from Isobu’s host. “What kind of gossip? And where did it come from?”

“My host is driving herself and those near her into madness in her attempts to determine just that,” Yin Kurama replies, bringing one humanlike paw to the back of his head and scratching behind his long ears. “I wasn’t interested in listening to the details.”

Maybe Isobu needs to speak to Yang Kurama instead. “That’s not a useful attitude.”

“Hah. Even without detail, I can deduce more than some short-lived specks,” Yin Kurama’s nine tails lash and he brings his feet back to the ground. “Someone among the human clans has been spreading interesting stories, but our humans are failing miserably to investigate them. There are those who believe that we control the government of this wretched little village, through some unknown power.” Yin Kurama’s grin is full of fangs. “Humans look at us and see us as the ultimate evil, and yet can barely see that their misery is all self-inflicted. As though one of us would care. Pathetic.”

“...I don’t understand.”

Yin Kurama snorts. “You are the strongest genjutsu-user out of us. Not long ago, you and your host fooled even the Hokage with your powers when you fought him, no matter how briefly.” Yin Kurama’s grin shifts into a snarl. “And the humans are afraid of that power.”

“Connect that with the fact that you and your host killed that bandaged human...” Isobu goes on, carefully slotting pieces of the puzzle together to complete the thought. “Does the village believe that, somehow, my host and I manipulated the Hokage into twisting events in her favor?”

Yin Kurama rolls his eyes. “Of course they do. Humans are so easily ruled by fear, they clamored for her exile to remove our influence. And yet they never realized that my other half and I remained! They view you as tamed, but quake in fear anyway!” Yin Kurama’s long tails lash in irritation and human stupidity.

“And no one knows where the stories came from?” Isobu asks, for clarity’s sake.

“They believe the rumors originated with the bandage man’s clan, but I am simply seeing the same pattern in earlier forms,” Yin Kurama says in a dry tone. “The further out you go, the wilder they become.”

So Yin Kurama doesn’t have an answer. Wonderful.

“I don’t think my host even heard what the rumors were,” Isobu complains. “She couldn’t last long enough to hear them.”

“Does it matter?” Yin Kurama asks. “Weaknesses are capitalized on, no matter how fair or unfair the world might be. It is kill or be killed.”

It’s Isobu’s turn to snort at Kurama’s idiocy. “If you believe that, why is your host still teaching you how to write?”

Yin Kurama falls silent.

“Keep listening, and keep me informed.” Isobu heaves himself off the ground and makes to leave. “I want a name by the end of this.”

“There may not be a name. And your host may not care to pursue this,” Yin Kurama warns.

“I would still know.”

Yin Kurama makes a noise that sounds like a sigh, perhaps at Isobu’s stubbornness. “As a favor to you, then. From one sibling to another.”

Isobu nods, then leaves. He has a few things to mull over before he speaks to either Kurama again.

Kei

When training to be a soldier of any kind, the first thing that a decent drill sergeant will do is break down the green recruits. A good drill sergeant then builds them back up again into a useful shape. A bad one just breaks people into jagged shards and hopes to point them at the enemy.

I came pre-broken. I just refused to admit it for so long that I almost fooled myself. But those cracks were there to stay.

I was well-trained. Even while otherwise listless, I had packed my usual mission supplies on automatic. I even remembered to bring two extra sets of weapons in storage seals. I hadn’t remembered to cut my hair, but that wasn’t important.

As soon as the rest of the team arrived, we could leave.

I’d been told to meet the team at the village gates. Sensei had taken Team Chōza aside into his office, so I just moved on ahead. They needed time to get ready that I didn’t.

Fifteen minutes after I arrived, I felt the other members of the team fade in.

Which put us in the present.

“Genma,” Ebisu was saying to his teammate. “I’ll be in charge of this mission as soon as we’re out of the gates.”

“You got it.” I heard Genma sigh to himself and say, “Kei-san, you alright with that?”

I nodded. Then I went back to staring off into the middle distance for a while.

“And I, too, will follow your lead for the sake of completing our mission, Ebisu!” Gai enthused as he tuned in to the conversation. He bounced up beside me and put an arm around my shoulders, shaking me a bit to make sure I was awake.

“I’m fine, Gai,” I said in a dull voice.

“You are not being very convincing!” Gai insisted.

I shrugged with my free shoulder and said, “I know.”
“Ahem,” said Ebisu.

Gai let go of me.

I looked up at Ebisu through my bangs.

“We can move on from here.” Ebisu adjusted his shades. Whatever he saw in my face made him grimace. “We should be in Sorayama in half a week at most.”

Genma shouldered his pack. Then, without asking, he picked up my pack and took it along as well.

“I can carry my own bag, Genma,” I muttered.

“But burdens are lighter when they are shared, Keisuke-san!” Gai argued.

I looked between Genma and Gai. Between two friends who only meant the best. Between someone who would carry my pack and someone who would probably carry me.

I gave up. “Fine.”

It wasn’t worth arguing about. If I could still carry my sword and my personal gear, my teammates could do whatever they wanted. I wouldn’t be a burden.

Later that night, I stared out into the dark woods because I couldn’t sleep. While the stars dragged themselves across the sky, I listened to my teammates as they talked in hushed voices.

“...about the rumors?” Ebisu was asking.

“Absolutely not true!” Gai blurted, and was shushed by Genma and Ebisu at once.

They went quiet. Then Genma’s voice, saying, “...where they started…”

“...but I heard…” Ebisu, again.

“...know her…” Genma.

I rolled onto my stomach. Then I picked up my pillow and put it over my head to block my ears. I didn’t want to hear anything they said.

You hardly resemble the human I met four years ago, said the one voice I couldn’t block out with a pillow.

Sorry.

Isobu rumbled like a distant volcano. Do you even know what happens to jinchūriki who fall into despair?

Gaara came to mind immediately. So did Dark Naruto.

So did Dark Kei. I’d fought that bizarre mental construct off before, when facing down Isobu for the first time, but there was always a possibility of sinking into something worse than that. Something hopeless.

I squeezed the edges of my pillow harder against my ears. I’m sorry. But I can’t do this right now.
“Right now?” I may be your friend, Isobu told me, but if you use my chakra while this unfocused, I can’t say if you will be safe.

It won’t be necessary. I just needed to get home intact. Maybe I could finally get everyone to leave me alone.

I was so tired.

And if it is?

I trust you, I said. I trusted Isobu more than I trusted my stability at the moment. If something happened, he had enough kindness or self-preservation to stick to fighting the enemy instead of hurting my teammates.

I don’t want to hear that from you right now, Isobu told me. In your state, it doesn’t mean anything. Where is the human that cursed right in my face and refused to let me kill anyone besides Madara’s pawns? Where is the human who told me she would befriend me? Where is the human who asked for my name?

Where is my partner?

I reached for my chakra and tore at the additions to my jinchūriki seal.

Isobu fell silent as the mental barriers snapped into place.

What is a “honey trap?” Isobu asked a day later, while we were climbing the slopes of one of Soragami’s daughter peaks.

I’d loosened the mental barriers once the silence in my head started bothering me. Of course, Isobu had to take advantage of that.

Mostly it’s a role in a seduction mission, I replied without thinking. ANBU agent seduces a target, and either kills them or pumps them for information. Or stays in place to maintain control.

Humans, Isobu groaned in frustration. _Every time I learn something new, my opinion falls._

I shrugged one shoulder. Sorry.

Don’t apologize.

I stayed silent. I almost wanted know why Isobu needed to know, but the urge to ask didn’t fully materialize. He’d tell me if he had to.

He didn’t bother me again for the rest of the journey.

“Ah, Sorayama is as beautiful as ever!” Gai announced, once we could see the Chinatsugumi’s stronghold.

“Hey, Ebisu, are we staying overnight?” Genma asked, eyeing the setting sun. Our travel time toward Sorayama was good, but we wouldn’t be able to do it again. Watching over wagons would slow us down.

“Yes, I think we should,” Ebisu said. I felt him turn, and he said to me, “Kei-san, do you agree?”

I shrugged again. “It sounds nice.”
Gai and Genma’s chakra twisted, but I didn’t read into it.

Ebisu frowned. “Well, I hope you feel better once we have a chance to rest in the inn.”

By that point, I was looking off into the distance again. Sorayama was getting bigger as we walked.

It took a few more hours to get to the gates of Sorayama. We ducked through the security checkpoint, with Ebisu leading onward.

In the big hall, Misaki greeted our team. She looked older than I remembered. Around the eyes, she had picked up crow’s feet and her hair was coming out of its bun, but she didn’t talk like she cared.

She mostly talked numbers.

I waited for it to be over.

It must have taken less time than I thought, because the next thing I knew, I was being steered away from the desk. Genma and Gai had each walked up beside me and, without touching me, guided me away.

I was in a room at the inn after that.

I ate with them, though I didn’t remember what anything tasted like afterwards. I just knew I was supposed to eat something to make my stomach stop growling.

And then I sat up for a while, unable to sleep but too tired to do anything else.

Gai sat with me until he wasn’t anymore, and then Genma gave me a chance to play shogi with him. When I didn’t do anything, Ebisu took the spot and they played for a while.

I fell asleep sitting up at the table.

I dreamed.

I dreamed of running in the dark, calling out for someone to help me. For someone to find me. To tell me I could stop running and come home.

But nobody came.

Rikuto

“Do you remember what Shirozora was like when we met him for the first time?” Misaki asks me, as she continues slowly chewing her way through a pile of paperwork taller than her head.

“What, back when he had the social skills of a concussed sloth?” I ask, but I do know what she means. Misaki isn’t my favorite person in the entire world, but she always has a point to make if she talks. I just need to wait around until she finally goes in for the kill.

“Witty,” Misaki says, in a tone that disagrees with her words. “But did you happen to see young Keisuke-kun as she came in today?”

“No, I was triple-checking all of the account books.” Which had given me a headache I haven’t gotten over yet. I rub my goatee, thinking, “I’m going to assume that isn’t an idle comment. Did something happen to our little half-pint?”
“Adulthood seems to be part of it,” Misaki allows. So Keisuke’s not hilariously short for her vocabulary anymore? Drat. “But it doesn’t take a social expert to realize that she is not as she should be.”

Now, I feel like I should point out that I do like the weird little Konoha kid, despite the whole Hidden Village thing and my aptitude for nicknames. But if Misaki of all people can tell that something’s gone to hell, when her ability to tell when her own kid is upset is somewhat...shitty, then I should probably be worried.

“Well, what do you want me to do about it?” I ask, throwing an arm out to indicate the empty hall and lack of Konoha-nin. “I’m sure they’ve already decided it’s too late for visitors by now, and I’m still in their Bingo Book somewhere. And I like my face where it is.”

If I’m going to approach Konoha’s only (open) jinchūriki, when she’s in a snit, and expect to get away with it, I need actual assurance that the other three won’t get in my face. Sure I recognized the senbon guy when I spotted him in the inn’s lobby, but I don’t know the other two. I don’t plan on walking to my death before I’m old enough to have forgotten how to use toilets.

“I doubt it will be nearly that terrifying,” Misaki replies, unamused or unimpressed by my turns of phrase. “Keisuke-kun seems to have lost all motivation other than what’s necessary for life. Were I on her team, I would be willing to accept any help offered.”

Except for the part where Misaki has never been on a shinobi team that she hadn’t immediately alienated, I can almost see how that statement looks rational. It’s perfectly possible for the worst possible person available to have a valid point, if I stare at it long enough for my eyes to cross. If the little prophet is in that kind of condition, things must be pretty bad.

I can’t remember if our (limited, by shinobi standards) intelligence reports have coughed up anything about that. “Give me a second to go through what info we have from Konoha?”

Misaki waves me off and I leave, darting through the darkened halls.

Technically, I’m in charge of what information network we have. Not because I particularly want to be, but because I’m the only one who’s gotten far enough in a Hidden Village’s hierarchy to have the experience for the job. Sure, my information is sparse and filtered through merchant eyes across the continent, but it exists. And the outpost in Konoha is one of the oldest we have, if you don’t care about permanent fixtures.

My office is off to one side of the compound, behind five partitions and one case where roof access is the only way in. I get most of my deliveries of information from pigeons rather than the hawks that shinobi villages use, because hawks are expensive and I get pigeons for free.

My desk is a mess when I finally get to it, and I wince preemptively at the thought of having to go through it all to find what I want. Scraps of paper and pigeon crap are everywhere. There is a box with “Konoha” on it, somewhere, but I have to find it first.

It takes me a few minutes of digging, but I find a mess of little paper slips under a pile of old cup ramen containers. They’re pretty greasy as a result of being shoved off the desk and into the trash bin, but about half of them are still readable.

Some of these things are over a year old. No wonder I threw them out.

I turn my desk light on and start reading.
Most of them are irrelevant on top of being old and a little disgusting to touch, dealing with things like the price of shrimp in some port city I can just barely remember visiting. Maybe that was relevant to our interests once, but the price of seafood is hardly riveting reading now.

It takes me a while to find what I’m looking for, which ends up not being in the trash pile at all. After another twenty minutes of poking through the sheer amount of dead tree material in my office, I find a little subsection where my agents—pigeon summons are the best and I will hear no slights against them—have stored information pertaining to Tailed Beasts.

And their hosts, of course. No one’s let them run loose for ages.

As soon as I start understanding what I’m reading, I wonder why I didn’t consign this pile to the trash immediately.

While it’s true that rumors are unreliable sources of information, someone good at information analysis can usually parse out what’s bullshit and what’s truth running around behind a mask. I happen to be good at that, because it’s a survival skill in Iwagakure during wartime, and those who were bad at it didn’t tend to last long. At nearly forty (...or thirty-seven), I’m probably old enough to be able to say what’s what.

And what’s coming out of Konoha’s rumor mill is finely-honed shit.

Take a spark of fear or hate. It doesn’t take much—everyone in a Hidden Village lives in a fucking tinderbox anyway. It’s child’s play to turn a shinobi village into an undirected mob if someone can figure out what the correct spark will be. It’s the main reason why villages tend to control the flow of information as tightly as they do. They know they’re vulnerable.

The Fourth Hokage might not see that.

I rest my knuckles against the edge of my goatee and think as I read the scraps and assemble a picture in my head.

The timeline starts when Keisuke goes public as a jinchūriki.

Never a good move, given that most of them start with their identities in the open and don’t do well. I’ve seen Rōshi and Han get all sorts of shit for existing in Iwa. While no one ever fought the two of them, because it’s a fucking stupid idea to fight people who can flash-boil enemies in their own juices, I don’t remember either of them being happy with their lot in life. Sure, Han’s a kid and Rōshi is Ōnoki’s own blood, but that’s nothing in the face of fear.

But she did it anyway. There must be some angle I can’t see. I know that Madara Uchiha’s big meltdown involved the Nine-Tailed Fox, but so does anyone with half a brain and a history book. The Fox does appear a couple more times over the historical record, and I know that it showed up again in Konoha a few years back without flattening the place. So there must be another jinchūriki?

Hm. I’ll ask her and see if it’s not an S-rank secret.

After that, Keisuke stays in the village for a year. Tracking her movements is easy. My pigeons don’t even have to work for their lunches in Konoha, and they get good information from that period.

And then, a little after a Chūnin Exam in Sunagakure—no real info there, since the bastards can recognize my birds out there—Keisuke comes back to Konoha and...fights the Fourth Hokage.

Holy shit, why would anyone do that?
I can respect a guy who can kill two hundred of my countrymen in a single day, but holy fuck do I never want to piss him off. My Lava Release isn’t unique—there are plenty of guys with that bloodline in Iwagakure, and the Yellow Flash didn’t slow down when chopping them into bite-sized pieces.

I shudder. Keisuke is more reckless than I thought.

Um. Okay. After that…

A mission to Amegakure, of all places. We do have an outpost over there, but it’s barely a year old and any information from it would have to be filtered through too many months of human memory. I do know that the Amegakure government is run by three S-class shinobi of some kind, but I’m not sure I can believe what I hear about them. The fucking Rinnegan? In Ame, of all the tiny backwater villages? But the people who report to me were clear on that.

I shake my head. Back to the tiny prophet.

After the Ame mission…oh? The timeline gets weird. Six months of more missions outside of the village. The Fourth Hokage has a second kid. The world spins on.

And then Keisuke spends a solid—or nearly solid—year outside of Konohagakure.

But in her absence, things get interesting. And disturbing.

The pigeons don’t have date and times on any of their reports because they’re idiots about human concerns like precise timestamps. But there’s a clear lapse in information regarding Keisuke from the village itself.

Except for a series of whispers.

Pigeons and merchants have good ears when they want to use them, and I am looking down at a series of reports that track gossip as it changes in the market. For over six months.

It starts with an idea.

Tailed Beasts have special power that humans can’t match. The specifics vary, but the Three-Tails is the only one with genjutsu specialization from what I can remember. The others don’t bother.

But here, someone listed only as Person 1 insists to Person 2 and 3 that the Three-Tails jinchūriki is controlling the Fourth Hokage. I know I’m missing part of the story—hell, the pigeons probably didn’t even notice the conversation’s beginning or end if there were too many people around—but I can extrapolate.

Someone started a street-level smear campaign against, and based on fear of, a jinchūriki.

More pigeon (and merchant) reports reveal more of the progression. From fear of control by a Tailed Beast, the story changes to focus on fear of Keisuke, and then a sort of glittering-edged malice that happens whenever gossips have too much spare time.

By the end of it, the story is that Keisuke seduced the Fourth Hokage into purging her enemies from the village. Literally so, and complete with steamy detail that makes me just scratch my head. Gossips are so much more imaginative than ordinary people, who have better things to do. Jiraiya would make a killing off the content if he could manage to scrub his brain out and remove all memory of the context.
Well, at least I know when the civilian rumor mill started working. Mind control was a security concern. Seduction was just another trick in the shinobi toolkit.

I lean back in my chair and think.

Is all of this supposed to just be another case of a village of ungrateful bastards with memory issues? ‘Cause I know that tune well enough. Sure, the jinchūriki angle’s not one I’ve thought too hard about before, but it’s more of a continuation of a general theme. Hidden Villages are, after all, pretty fucked up. The idea of a student sleeping with their teacher for perks isn’t exactly a novel idea. It’s kind of what the weirder samurai stories amount to. As for the mind control...okay, yes, that was an actual concern. But not one I expected to see in Konoha of all places.

It just doesn’t seem like enough to trigger the problems Keisuke seems to be having.

What the hell happened? Is that kind of rumor enough to build momentum for a mob? Not on its own, but combined with the general lack of information about jinchūriki, and the death of some politically important fuckstick...maybe.

...Wait a minute.

I poke through the little pigeon reports again, searching for a name. Who had set this off?

“Danzō Shimura...?” Where had I heard that name before? The name conjures a quiet sense of dread, weaker than any of my bouts of deja vu, but I can’t place it for a moment.

Then it hits me like a brick to the face.

Back when Keisuke really was a half-pint prophet in name and form, I'd bothered her for a bit of a read on the future before her first Chūnin Exam. Zakuro wanted to come with me, and together we’d gotten a few names out of her.

One of them was Orochimaru’s, and the guy still brings a chill to my withered Iwa-born heart even if no one’s seen hide or hair of him for ages.

The other? Danzō Shimura. A Konoha Council member. An elder. And a guy who “collected” tragic little orphans like summer stag beetles.

_Fuck_. If Keisuke had done something to get the guy killed—like the rumors implied—then I owe her a drink.

_Or maybe a gift certificate? How old is she now, anyway?_

I’ll decide when I go over and bother her tomorrow.

First, I’m gonna pop in and tell the kids that their favorite babysitter is back in town. It’s baffling, but for some reason they seem to ask about the goofy little special jōnin a lot for kids who go without seeing her for year-long stretches. Especially Kazuki, and I know for a fact that my kid is the type who can’t fixate on most _thoughts_ for more than five seconds.

I’m not sure if it’s like the link that binds Misaki and the others to me. We _know_ each other, like old friends or old rivals who’ve finally put down their swords. We’ve all been like that since we first met.

But the kids... Is Keisuke supposed to be one of us? I’ve never answered that question to my satisfaction, and I’m sure I’ll end up just turning it over and over forever.
Ain’t like it’s gonna happen. She won’t join us if we ask, though it’s a nice thought anyway.

Kei

The next day, I wouldn’t necessarily say that I was “better” in a way that would have made much of a difference to an outside observer. But I was a little less dead inside.

Ebisu left me alone for the morning. We weren’t leaving until tomorrow, but he wanted Gai and Genma to try and help unload the caravan that had just come in. The three of them did their best to avoid waking me up on their way out, but I still wasn’t sleeping well enough for that to work.

I got up an hour later, when several pairs of children’s footsteps came pounding down the hall.

A slightly raspy child’s voice said, “Is she here?”

“I think she’s here,” another child replied.

“Roku, didn’t Auntie say?” A little girl’s voice, high and excited.

“Yes.” Definitely Roku.

A fifth child said, “Then she has to be here.”

“Then we should make sure she’s awake!” said a sixth.

“We’re being loud,” said the second voice, sounding like the youngest of the group.

Apparently, the entire kindergarten crew had arrived.

I kicked my covers off and got to my feet. As I stumbled around, looked down at myself. Being dressed in pajama pants and an overlarge white t-shirt didn’t quite make me presentable to adults, but kids would probably be fine with “depressed couch potato” chic.

I ran my hands through my hair twice, to get some of the knots out.

I decide to answer the door. I looked down into six expectant faces.

“BIG SIS KEI!” screamed all of the Chinatsugumi kids at once.

Answering the door may have been a mistake.

The two smallest girls did their level best to knock me over at waist height, but were unable to overcome my ability to stick my feet to the floor or my grip on the doorframe. As a result, dusty pink-haired Tayuya and blonde Aiko were acting like misplaced training weights.

Aiko and Tayuya’s gray and jet-black eyes looked up at me like they wanted to be picked up. I wasn’t going to until they let me go, for starters.

“You look sad!” shouted Kazuki, who was the owner of the scratchy voice. His big blue eyes almost seemed to glow in the crappy hallway light, and I automatically mussed his brown spikes before he could pursue the line of inquiry. Nope. Didn’t want to talk about it. And yet, I still heard him say, “Is something wrong?”

I didn’t feel like I was sad.
I didn’t feel much of anything.

“She’s not sad unless she says she is,” Kaito argued immediately. I looked down at him and thought, when I saw his almost catlike green eyes focusing on me from down around waist height with the rest of them. If I remembered right, this green-haired kid was actually a little older than Aiko, but was still smaller.

Miyu and Roku hung back. While Kazuki’s twin sister didn’t really like touching people and assumed that other people didn’t like it either, Roku looked like he was about to fall asleep on his feet.

“How old are all of you now?” I asked, putting on a more kid-friendly expression. The smile at least tried to reach my eyes.

“Eight,” said Kazuki and Miyu together.

“Maybe nine,” Roku said quietly. “We just celebrate my birthday at New Year’s.”

“Six and eight months,” said Kaito.

“Six and a half!” Aiko said.

“Five,” Tayuya said at the end.

“Can we go back to hide and seek now?” Miyu asked, her blue eyes narrowed in annoyance.

“Nooooo, Big Sis Kei needs to teach us how to play real ninja!” Kazuki barked, shouting his twin down.

“Shut up!” Miyu snapped back.

Roku started dragging both of the twins away by the backs of their yukata collars. Over their protests, the tallest of the six children pulled them out of view.

“Sorry, loud,” Tayuya said.

“They’re dumb,” said Kaito.

“They’re not dumb!” argued Aiko.

“Kids,” I said, “what do you actually want to do here?”

“Play!” the three remaining kids replied.

I wasn’t really feeling it. But the kids were.

Dilemma.

But as three kindergartners dragged me out of the inn, I caught Gai’s eye just before I was tugged into the Chnatsugumi compound. I’d probably get Genma and Ebisu just from sheer team magnetism once they realized their loudest friend wasn’t there anymore.

Even if I wasn’t up to playing, Gai always was. And if he could shout louder than both of Rikuto’s kids, then more power to him.
I woke up in the middle of the night.

Genma and Ebisu and Gai were all asleep. Gai was almost sleeping against my back, while Genma was on his other side, and Ebisu was dozing near the door. They must have decided that he would be the guard. Or maybe he had decided himself.

I kicked off my futon’s coverlet and got up, cracking all of my joints in my arms because they were stiff. A quick look at the clock confirmed that it was about four in the morning, and the thought was irritating. I didn’t want to be awake, but I was anyway. If I went back to sleep, I could have had more nightmares.

Then I shrugged to myself and went to find a bathroom. I knew there was one outside in the hallway, so I headed in that direction.

When I left after finishing my business and washing my hands, I immediately tripped over a sleeping body that did not belong to Ebisu and had not been there before. Shinobi reflexes saved the little roadblock from being crushed under me, because I grabbed the door handle in time.

And then I stopped to figure out who I had almost just kicked.

The light was bad, but my chakra sense worked.

The sleeping form shifted and revealed Roku, one of Chinatsu’s children. His long black hair stuck to his face from drool. I reached down and shook his shoulder.

Nothing happened.

I patted his cheek.

Nothing, except for his narrow brown hands grabbing hold of my pant leg.

It seemed that Roku was a sleepwalker.

I was...probably supposed to do something.

Without really thinking of what I was doing, I scooped the nine-year-old into my arms and carried him down the hall. At the next left, I walked down the stairs and into the inn’s lobby, which was empty and dim. And then I walked outside.

The Chinatsugumi compound was big, but I knew my way around. Shirozora had trained me here. My memory still worked.

The front hall was empty and dark, but I just moved on.

Roku made a noise and buried his face against my neck. I adjusted my grip on him and continued carrying him toward his actual home.

“Hello?” someone called, and I stopped.

In the light of an open doorway, a robe-wearing Chinatsu was looking out into the hall right at me. She looked exactly like her twin, Misaki, but would do such undignified things as actually rubbing her eyes in front of people. Or yawning.

Like she was doing now.

“Chinatsu-san,” I said, and walked over to her. I shifted Roku so most of his weight was on my hip.
“Roku-kun was in the inn.”

Chinatsu frowned. “That’s further than he usually goes.” She met my eyes for a moment, but I looked down and away. Still, I offered Roku to her. “Thank you for your help, Keisuke-san.”

“It was nothing,” I said. It didn’t matter. “I should get back to the inn.”

“Wait,” Chinatsu said, and something tugged on my shirt. When I looked, Roku’s hand was still clinging to my sleeve.

I moved my hand to pry his fingers off, but Chinatsu stopped me.

“Can I speak to you?” she asked.

I looked at her hand, then at Roku’s. Then I shrugged. “Okay.”

Chinatsu led me to a sitting room of some kind. There was a couch near the door, so we sat down on it. Roku didn’t let go of me, so Chinatsu let him sleep with his head on my lap.

I rested my hand on his head.

“When we first met,” Chinatsu said, “do you remember what I told you?”

I blinked, unable to quite remember. It had been eight years. How did she still know?

“All of us are connected.” Chinatsu lifted one arm and swept it outward. “All of this. And you.”

Oh.

Right.

“I still don’t know how this is the case,” Chinatsu admitted. She pushed my bangs back from my face. “But you are one of us, Keisuke-san. We want to help you.”

I looked at her out of the corner of my eye.

“Please, let us do that,” Chinatsu said, and her knuckles brushed the side of my face.

I looked down at Roku. His fingers were still caught in my shirt.

“Why do you care?” I asked my knees, instead of looking up. My voice shook.

“It’s something people do when they see someone in pain,” Chinatsu replied. “It’s easy to forget when you need others more than ever, and they don’t come.”

All too easy.

I wanted to go home.

“Our children miss you,” she said in a soft voice as she watched me. “They see someone who will care for them as much as we do.”

“I’m never here,” I said. Home was somewhere else. Why did I need to stay away? But instead of saying that, I asked, “Why should they?”

“Children,” Chinatsu said, “love easily and fully. And you are kind to them when you are here.” She held up her hand and crossed her first two fingers. “And I did mention the connection, didn’t I? Just because you don’t see someone every day doesn’t mean you don’t care about each other.”

“Oh.” I brushed Roku’s long bangs away from his face. To Chinatsu, in a whisper, I said, “It doesn’t feel like this—like I’m—”

_I try and I try and I just want to know if—if maybe I’m just playing at this. If I really matter._

I was hollow. There was a yawning chasm inside my chest where my heart should have been.

And they were almost finished. It was almost over.

Why did I need to try anymore?

“I—I’ve been fighting for everyone for so long, I d-don’t know what to do when I’m _not._” Hayate didn’t need me to look after him. I just...I could trust others to do that. To make sure he survived. Maybe? “I’m almost—m-my friends don’t _need_ me. My brother d-doesn’t need me. A-anything I do now is j-just…”

Just an insurance policy, really.

“I don’t recall meeting your brother recently,” Chinatsu said, reaching out and tucking some of my hair behind my ear. “I imagine he is kind, and brave, if he’s anything like you.”

I nodded, unable to trust my voice.

“And I’m sure he loves you very much.” Chinatsu leaned closer to me, and said, “I can tell you a secret, as a sister.”

I wiped my nose on my sleeve and looked at her through eyes swimming with tears.

“While I don’t always need her, Misaki is _always_ going to be my sister,” Chinatsu told me. “And even if I don’t always agree with her, I can tell you that I love her, and that I worry about her when she’s hurting. She always looks after me, though I don’t always need it. And I return the favor.”

I mumbled something.

She drew back and said, “That is how being a good sibling works. Even knowing you briefly, over years, I think I can say that you are a good older sister.”

I was good with kids, or at least kids I was related to or connected to through some kind of reincarnation-induced bullshit.

I made a loud sniffling noise.

Chinatsu eyed me carefully and said, “You might want to get some more sleep before the sun comes up, Keisuke-san. Also, I believe someone has been waiting for you to come back.”

Oh. I wiped my eyes and used my chakra to try and force myself under control, before I felt Genma’s chakra approach the doorway and heard him knock on the frame. “Kei-san?”

“In h-here.” So much for getting my voice back to normal.

Genma stepped into the room and spent a moment just looking at all three of us. Then he crossed the room and held his hand out to me. “I heard you get up, earlier. I hope I’m not interrupting anything.”

With his hearing, I didn’t doubt that he knew exactly what he was interrupting. I couldn’t quite muster the anger to glare at him.

“You’re fine, Shiranui-kun,” Chinatsu said. “Keisuke-san probably needs to catch up on sleep.”

Genma nodded. “Sounds about right.”

I sighed and took Genma’s offered hand. I moved Roku to Chinatsu’s lap with my free hand. “I get it. I’ll go back.”

“Good. I think I’m the only one who noticed you left, but we’ll all know the second Gai does. And no one wants to hear that,” Genma said, and escorted me out of the compound.

We arrived at the inn in just a minute or two, even when walking like normal people. But when we got there, Genma took a detour and ushered me into the empty dining hall instead.

“Do you mind telling me what happened?” he asked.

...I could.

It was a strange thought. Most of the wake of—of my homecoming had been focused on just hiding away from everyone. Building poison inside me like some kind of tropical frog, waiting for someone to step wrong and give me a moment to explode and hurt them back. Or hollowing myself out, because I was too tired to deal with concern or love when I had been gone so long that I barely remembered what they felt like.

Being sent away again had done the opposite of helping. At least, at first.

I looked up at Genma, who had forgotten his senbon somewhere and was looking at me with furrowed brows, and said, “Okay.”

“Okay?” Genma repeated.

I shrugged. The conversation had helped remind me that I was alive and that I still hurt, but I still didn’t feel that strongly at the moment. I was back to neutral.

It was easier not to feel.

But maybe it wasn’t the best plan anymore.

I sat down at one of the tables, crossing my arms and drooping over the placemat like I was planning on falling asleep again. But I didn’t. “I didn’t mean to wake you up.”

“I’m a light sleeper,” Genma pointed out. “Kind of a requirement for the job.”

“Yeah,” I agreed.

“So about the discussion with Chinatsu-san...”

I shrugged again. “What do you want to know?”

“...I mostly wanted to know if you’re all right,” Genma said, though the hesitance there told me that it wasn’t what he’d first planned on saying. “But I guess that’s a stupid question. You haven’t been okay since coming back to Konoha.”
I made a noise of agreement.

“Guess the year out took a lot out of you,” Genma said. He drummed his fingertips against the tabletop. “It’d make anyone into a strung-out mess.”

I nodded. Maybe I’d been uniquely vulnerable, but he was right.

“I can’t say much about what we’re gonna do about that, but we do have an extra day since Ebisu pushed us to go faster than normal,” Genma said. “Maybe take a day to just...decompress? Gai and I will be around, but if you would rather just stay out of our mission crap, I’ll talk Ebisu into just bossing the two of us around. He needs the practice anyway.”

“Thanks, Genma,” I mumbled into my folded arms.

“And once we are back in Konoha, Raidō and I have your back.” Genma ruffled my hair. “I’m not sure if you know this, but you were the second person in the village to say ‘congrats’ about us. We won’t forget that.”

I hadn’t known that, but I supposed it made sense.

“It’s okay to slow down and take a break sometimes,” Genma said. I heard him get to his feet. “So, do you want to try sleeping again? Because the table can’t be comfortable.”

“Okay.”

The next day, the kids found us again. And Ebisu gave his permission for another play day.

“That was fun,” Genma said, sitting on the side of the roof with Tayuya hanging off of his neck. He wouldn’t let the kid fall, even if she was probably going to steal his senbon sooner or later.

The rest of us were below the two of them, on the porch that led out to the compound’s garden.

Roku and Kaito were lying on my lap, and not sharing especially well. Roku was the largest child, and his dark hair kept getting into Kaito’s face when the latter tried to claim more space for himself. If Roku wasn’t closer to my hip, Kaito might have tried to push him off.

Gai was sitting next to where Aiko, Miyu, and Kazuki were all sprawled out on the porch, each one drenched in sweat from playing ninja with the most hilariously enthusiastic ninja out there. He could keep all three kids occupied with no effort at all, and their attempts to wear him down had only made him run around faster.

Ebisu had gotten something out of our play session, too. While he wasn’t really interested in being climbed on, he had a lot of useful things to say with regard to strategies for overcoming Gai’s tremendous advantages. And the kids had listened.

Which was why Gai had broken a sweat at all.

“Are you feeling any better, Keisuke-san?” Gai asked.

I thought about it.

While I wasn’t home, there weren’t really any expectations out here. Ebisu and Genma were concentrating on Ebisu’s qualification for special jōnin. Gai was just having fun. I was only there to round out the numbers, but my presence didn’t really come with any expectations.
It was nice to be able to veg out.

“I’m okay,” I said, though the word felt suddenly inadequate. I just couldn’t quite put what I was feeling into words. But it didn’t feel like I had to try, either.

“Good,” said Ebisu.

Genma jerked his head abruptly, and the next thing we knew there was another shinobi next to him.

Rikuto leaned over the edge of the roof and waved down at us, sticking his feet to the roof slats with chakra. “Hey. Are my kids being good?”

“They have been angels!” Gai said brightly, as Genma scooted away from the new arrival.

Miyu said, “We’re always good.”

“Uh-huh,” Rikuto said. He glanced at Genma, asking, “And the others?”

“They’ve been fine,” Genma replied.

“Good. Then I guess they’ve all earned an extra snack.”

“Snack?” Tayuya repeated, climbing up onto Genma’s shoulder. “Anmitsu!”

As though it was some kind of signal, Kaito and Aiko immediately snapped to attention. “Anmitsu?” they asked.

“Yep.” And as soon as he said that, Rikuto’s kids, along with Aiko, Kaito, and Tayuya immediately scrambled for the dining hall. Gai and Genma went with them—though in Genma’s case it was partly because Tayuya was trying to jump off the roof with him as her springboard.

Roku stayed exactly where he was, still dozing. So did Ebisu.

“Ebisu-san, can you take Roku-kun to dinner so he doesn’t miss out?” Rikuto asked.

Ebisu hesitated, looking back at us curiously.

With a terse nod at me, he picked Roku up and carried him in the wake of the other children. The kid didn’t even shift in his sleep.

Rikuto hopped down from the roof and landed near me. “What, you don’t like anmitsu?”

I wasn’t really hungry. But sweets sounded nice.

Rikuto, who could read my face, said, “Come on, there’s going to be tons left over.”

I followed him to the dining hall, maybe a little more cheerful than before.

After lunch, the children scattered to find their tutors among the various townspeople. I didn’t ask where they were studying, or what.

I decided to take a bath.
Sorayama had a bathhouse, and there was no one there so soon after lunchtime. If there had been, I would have found a shower at the inn.

Instead, I took my bath things there and decided to soak for a while.

There wasn’t a bath attendant, so I tried remembering the rules from Konoha. There were no posted rules, either, so I guessed.

Step one: Take off shoes.

Step two: Strip naked and dump clothes in a complimentary basket. No one would steal my stuff.

Step three: Take a shower and rinse thoroughly.

Step four: Actually go in the hot spring, which was outdoors. And it was December.

After washing off and pulling a water bottle out of a storage seal I brought with me, I got into the hot spring to just...well, to sit there.

The bench built below water level was just high enough that I could lean by head back against the rocks, with my shoulders exposed. From chest-down, I was submerged. The sharp cold was a good contrast to the hot water. I probably wouldn’t overheat.

I dozed.

I felt someone approach, but the chakra faded and I didn’t worry about it.

I just needed time to be left alone and stop thinking.

“Ah, Keisuke-chan,” said a voice.

I opened my eyes. So much for being alone for a while.

“You don’t look as bad as I expected,” Nanami said. Her green eyes narrowed as she stared at me.

I stared at her for better reasons.

Right beneath her collarbones, her entire body melted away into the water. Even the ends of her white hair went invisible in the hot spring and the cloud of steam flowing up from it.

“...Okay,” I said. Then I went back to trying to nap in the water.

Two fingers poked me in the forehead. “Rude. Wake up.”

“Why?” I asked.

“Because I’m talking to you,” Nanami replied. Her voice was suddenly much closer.

I didn’t want to move, but... “If you’re touching me right now, stop.”

“I’m fused with the spring,” Nanami said, brows scrunching up. “I am touching you right now.”

I gave her a long, blank stare. She had moved closer, but her head and shoulders were still the only parts that looked human.

I climbed out of the bath. Nope.
“I still want to talk to you,” I heard Nanami say.

“Not now,” I said. I would be happier if we did not have conversations while naked. I could just about tolerate most of the people I knew in Konoha, but Nanami was pushier. And melded with the water.

I was not going to take a bath in someone. Just no.

After a bit of searching, I found the bathhouse’s stock of towels and yukata. I dried off and put one of the yukata on, then decided to go and get my clothes.

Nanami kept trying to get me to talk to her.

“You don’t want to talk to me?”

“What’s wrong?”

“Are you still learning Water ninjutsu from Shiro this time?”

“Are you leaving tomorrow?”

I ignored all of it and finally found all of my things. Shampoo, check. Soap, check. Water bottle… Not check.

I must have left it somewhere. I turned back to Nanami to ask.

And I saw her playing with my slightly deformed water bottle.

It was deformed because it was frozen.

Great. Shirozora was probably on the other side of the bath partition.

“You know, I didn’t thank you for playing with Kaito today,” Nanami said, out of nowhere.

“No problem,” I said, deciding that the water bottle wasn’t worth it.

Kaito, at least, was cute. He was a kid. Nanami was at least thirty, and her quirks were a lot less charming.

Speaking of, Nanami decided that it was time to try something different. She was smiling, which made me pause. Did she think I just...needed to lighten up?

The next thing I knew, she tried splashing at me, with her arm still in water form.

Hot water flew out of the spring like a whip, with the half-melted water bottle coming with it.

Nope.

I still had enough reflexes to skitter out of the way, sticking to my landing point three meters away as the water rained down. Chakra stuck me firmly to the floor until I didn’t want to be.

I did catch my water bottle, though.

Then I turned on my heel and with all of my stuff, walked out of the women’s section of the baths.

I didn’t want anything to do with Nanami’s misplaced sense of “fun.”
And then I dodged the patch of ice that had formed outside the door, and sidestepped the bucket of snow that nearly fell on my head.

What was hilarious in training was simply annoying now.

They meant well. I knew they meant well. It was why I wasn’t angry.

Why I wasn’t letting myself get angry.

I swallowed hard and just left. I didn’t need to deal with this.

Sometime around dinnertime, I decided I wasn’t hungry.

I sat in the hotel room for a while in my pajamas, picking through the copy of Icha-Icha Paradise again.

It wasn’t funny.

I was too busy being upset with myself for being too angry to concentrate.

Sounded odd. Was still true.

I shouldn’t have been upset, or angry, or annoyed. I shouldn’t have even been numb.

But I just stared at the same page for too long and seethed.

It was so stupid. Shirozora and Nanami were weird and inconsiderate, but in any other mood I would have at least played along. Or fought back.

As it was, I just kept going back to beating myself up for feeling things that weren’t sunshine and unicorns.

Until I didn’t feel anything.

At that point, someone knocked on the door.

Because I never learned, I answered the door.

It was Rikuto.

Looking at him, I had to note the differences since the last time we’d met. Rikuto was actually shorter than I was, by four centimeters. His goatee was shot through with little specks of gray, though I was almost certain that he wasn’t forty yet. And for once, he wasn’t smiling, teasing, or otherwise playing around.

Rikuto in serious mode had only happened once before that I remembered. It wasn’t a happy memory.

I let him in.

I sat down at the table at with my elbows propped up on the surface.

“So, we haven’t talked for a while, Keisuke-san.” Rikuto settled down on one of the cushions at the room’s low table, but a careful distance away. It was like he wanted to avoid being in mangling range.
I tilted my head to one side and let him talk.

Rikuto didn’t speak immediately. His eyes were trained on my face, where I was certain the emotions had fallen right off.

“You’re feeling...upset?” Rikuto prompted.

I muttered, “You think?”

“What was that?” So much for being a former Iwa jōnin.

I sighed.

“Kid, I see you once in a blue moon. If you need to get something off your chest, I’m not exactly gonna be around to yell at you for it.”

I sighed again. Well, if he really wanted to know… “I spent a goddamned year away from home, with minimal contact, because Sensei wanted to ’protect’ me.”

Where did that come from?

...I don’t know?

Isobu made a noise, but didn’t say anything else.

“From what?” Rikuto asked, leaning forward.

“Some clan bullshit.” I shrugged one shoulder, drawing one knee up toward my chest. I hugged it closer and put my chin on top of it. “Someone whining that Shimura got killed and I wasn’t appropriately quiet when we were breaking the news to the clans, maybe.”

If I focused on it for too long I could feel a nasty rush of anger bubbling up inside me, so I made an annoyed noise and tried to put it out of my mind.

“Just that? And a year and a half deployed? Sheesh, who’d you piss off?” Rikuto asked.

“Everyone, I guess.” I glanced at him. “I didn’t tell anyone about that.”

“Kid, this may be news to you, but merchants chatter,” Rikuto said bluntly. “And my summon contract? Carrier pigeons. I know damn near everything I can get access to.”

“People were talking about me this far away from Konoha?” I asked, blinking.

“Eh, no. I just get news out here thanks to loose lips in the village,” Rikuto replied with a shrug of his own. “So, I take it you don’t know the whole story.”

“Between coming home and getting my ass kicked out again, no,” I growled. So what if I’d been too much of a wreck to string thoughts together? I knew enough to know that Sensei had lied to me, kept me away from people I cared about for so long I almost forgot what they were like, and couldn’t even justify it.

And then he kicked me out again to sort through the wreckage.

Screw his reasons. I didn’t care anymore.

“It’s like—look, everyone in the village thinks he’s a hero. And yet every time something bad happens, it’s on me, or on Obito, and it just keeps happening,” I said in a growl. “Even this fucking promotion is his idea, and he just—I thought he wanted me to get experience. And it was just a lie to keep me out longer.” I raked my hands through my hair in sheer frustration. “And I never even wanted to be a jōnin! Special jōnin’s good enough!”

Rikuto sat back and let me rant, but I noticed his hesitation after that last complaint. “What did you want to say?” I asked.

“Oh, I was just wondering if you heard the rumor mill’s quarterly reports.” Rikuto shrugged. “I mean, you’d know if you were mind-controlling the Fourth Hokage into killing off political rivals, right?”

The fuck?

This sounds familiar, Isobu added after a moment. Kurama and I discussed this not long ago.

“What the actual fuck?” I demanded. I wasn’t sure if I was talking to Isobu or Rikuto more, in that moment.

Rikuto grinned in the face of my anger, because he was an asshole. “Oh, it’s not even the best part. The latest version—or maybe the newest addition?—is that you’re actually sleeping your way to the top!”

“H—How does that even—?” I sputtered. “That’s disgusting!”

Rikuto laughed outright. “And apparently the Fourth Hokage is a bit of an idiot. Why didn’t he just tell you and point you at the rumor mill? It’d be hilarious.”

Probably because I wouldn’t have done anything. I’d heard other attempts to ruin what reputation I had, but most of those had cut short after my fight with Sensei, hadn’t they?

And besides, we were shinobi. Seduction missions might have been ANBU’s purview under normal circumstances, but we would do damn near anything to ensure mission success. Sex was just another tool if we wanted it to be.

But with Sensei? Uuuuuuuuugh.

“Or maybe that’s not the whole story, either,” Rikuto mused. “But it’s certainly the part that my eyes and ears in the world bothered to remember. What else could be going on behind closed doors?” And he waggled his eyebrows.

If I’d had a kunai, I would have probably thrown it at him. “If you’re trying to piss me off, it’s working.”

“Good!” Rikuto replied, getting right in my face and smirking in a way that made me want to punch it off his face. “Be honest with yourself! Go back home and tell the Yellow Flash to either be straight with you or go fuck himself.” Rikuto backed off slightly. “Fight for what you have, and keep it at all costs. Or die.”

That viewpoint probably explained why Rikuto was a missing-nin, actually. Pissing off one’s superiors was not a way to avoid suicide missions.

“Go away,” I said in a tone that was barely civil.

“Fine, fine,” Rikuto said. He got to his feet and stuck his hands in his pockets, like he didn’t expect any retaliation from me.

Well, he was right. I didn’t make a habit of shooting the messenger, even if the message was delivered with entirely too much sass and the messenger was an asshole.

It was still a better idea than moping.

Once Rikuto was gone, I hauled myself to my feet and muttered a few choice words to myself.

I take it that you’re alive again? Isobu asked with the slightest touch of sarcasm.

Yeah, I told him. You could say that.

Good. I prefer when you have your backbone, Isobu said. Denying your anger and hurt got us nowhere.

I guess. I stared down at my hands. I wasn’t better, not really. Rikuto had just made me angry enough to crack the seal of apathy. And maybe that anger would carry me home like a fucking hot air balloon.

Or maybe I’d wake up feeling just as gutted when it faded.

I was going to elaborate more on that thought. I might have even countered what Isobu wanted to pull out of this weird-as-shit situation. Shituation.

Hah.

I needed to go on a walk to clear my head.

So I did.

I was somewhere near a vegetable stand when I started hearing a song in my head.

The secret side of me

I never let you see

I keep it caged

But I can’t control it

So stay away from me

The beast is ugly

I feel the rage

And I just can’t hold it

What is that garbage supposed to be? Isobu demanded, as the world started to go a bit fuzzy around the edges.

English music, I told him, surprised that I was still thinking clearly. Okay, this was probably one of the worst genjutsu I’d been caught in—by which I meant that it sucked. The butterflies had been several times more deadly.
I could perceive all of the chakra in it, which wasn’t supposed to happen. That chakra was Zakuro’s, but the woman wasn’t anywhere nearby. In fact, I hadn’t seen her once on this entire mission. What the hell?

I’m getting rid of it. It’s just noise, Isobu said, and his chakra twanged across my senses like a rubber band.

And when the genjutsu came down, it was loud.

Not the genjutsu, but there were dozens—hundreds—of chakra signatures all crowding into my mental map of Mount Soragami’s slopes and lighting it up like a fucking pinball machine.

We’re under attack. I brought my hands together in an automatic seal. Isobu—

On it, he said, and our chakra flared together to rip the genjutsu loose from everyone in Sorayama.

Screaming started.

Chapter End Notes

A million miles away
Your signal in the distance
To whom it may concern
I think I lost my way
Getting good at starting over
Every time that I return

I'm learning to walk again
I believe I've waited long enough
Where do I begin?
I'm learning to talk again
Can't you see I've waited long enough?
Where do I begin?
Memory: Cascade

Chapter Summary

Plot: Cascade failure.

Chapter Notes

This chapter's song is "Cascade," from Homestuck.

We were under attack and I was unarmed.

Cursing myself and my blithering idiocy, I automatically leapt back to dodge a series of thrown kunai, and each impact traile me like the thrower was counting my steps. Or range-marking.

I caught a flash of gray cloth, and blocked a kunai stab attempt by slapping the point aside with one chakra-coated hand. Then I snatched at the sleeve of the arm holding it, got a grip, and severed every nerve I could get my chakra scalpels to touch.

The hand went limp.

And then I kicked the owner of that hand in the face, hard enough to cave his balaclava-wearing skull in.

Gray fabric uniform, ski-masked look, black bodysuit… I’d ruined the guy’s shinobi headband, but I could recognize an Oto uniform damn near anywhere. This wasn’t just some random band of enemy shinobi—they were trained killers all pointed right at Sorayama, and every last one of them was going to be trying to kill everyone they could get their hands on. Or worse: capture us, in the name of Lord Voldemort.

Augh!

I ducked under an Oto-nin who threw himself at me, but I made sure to drag my fingers along his leg as he passed overhead.

When he landed, his left leg exploded into red mist.

I didn’t have time to think about it. I was dodging incoming attacks by a hair in every direction—catching and returning kunai, batting shuriken aside with whatever I could find, and just staying ahead of the game.

Then, an opening—and with Isobu’s chakra reinforcing me, I launched into the hand seals for the Water Release: Great Waterfall technique.

It wouldn’t have been possible in any other circumstances—but Sorayama had rivers nearby, there were multiple hot springs, and Isobu’s chakra hauled on those water sources as well as the water in the air, and the result was nothing less than a localized waterspout going horizontally and up—and catching almost forty Oto-nin where they were trying to cross the village's defensive walls.

The vortex ripped the roofs off of half a dozen buildings, mixing rubble into the deadly cascade of force, and added other sources of water to its mad crusade.

The results were fairly similar to putting that part of the village through a gigantic washing machine.

For a moment, the area was clear.

"Keisuke-san, I would appreciate a minimum of property damage," said Misaki's voice, set over a cacophony of falling wood and bricks.

I turned.

Both of the Kasai sisters were coming up behind me.

Misaki was dressed in her usual formal kimono, but carried a naginata that had a man's severed arm impaled on the blade. Her exposed hand was covered in glowing red seal-lines, and the spiraling patterns ran up from the hemline of her kimono to cover the entire right half of her face in thorn-like designs. Her gold eyes glowed like candles.

Chinatsu, carrying a straight-edged tsurugi rather than a katana, had matching markings along the right side of her body.

And their chakra, together, felt like the sun itself had dropped in for a visit.

"Your mission was to defend the merchant caravan," Misaki went on, though her eyes were looking past me. "Gather your equipment, and do your job."

"But you're—"

"Aiko has the seals," Chinatsu interrupted firmly. "Get her out of danger, and some of us might live long enough to put this place back together."

Misaki nodded, her expression grim. "Neither of us matter any longer."

The volcano-controlling seals were passed on? Irrevocably? With no safeties? Neither of them still have control of the mountain?

God dammit! I'd known that Chinatsu and Misaki had passed seals to Aiko, but those specific seals?

I gave the Kasai sisters one quick nod, then ran.

The inn wasn't far away, but I heard a high-pitched whistling noise coming from behind me just as I reached the front door. I immediately juked right, then I skidded into the entryway, just a hair ahead of—

Oh my fucking god.

REALLY?!!

The thing that cut into the pavement, a bit behind me, was a fucking camellia-topped staff. A second later, its owner landed on the ground next to it.

Yagura?
He turned his head—but in the wrong direction? Wait, what's going—

And Yagura leapt back out of view, his chakra screaming panic, as a torrent of lava flooded the street after him.

Rikuto.

Though I couldn't see him, I could hear his war cry. "Where is my wife, you bastards?!"

He could handle it for a bit. I ran up the stairs and kicked the door to my team's suite hard enough that it flew into the opposite wall.

Inside the room, I cursed my team's lack of organization. I cursed myself, mainly, because I'd been the one spending the most time in there, but that wasn't productive. I located my mission gear after a second, and put my flak jacket on as soon as I got my hands on it. Then I clipped my scroll belts and sword belt over my pajama bottoms, as fast as I could manage.

I was wearing a T-shirt, the knee-length remnants of what used to be uniform bottoms, and whatever gear I could pile onto myself.

Good enough.

I slid the suite's window open and threw myself out of it, landing on a conveniently passing Oto-nin and driving him into the top of a fence. The boards and our combined weight resulted in a satisfying crunch of bone under my feet, and I left him hanging across it like a used towel.

Then I was in the air, leaping from roof to roof as I tracked my team's chakra signatures across Sorayama and through a cloud of interference.

I could feel everyone.

Chinatsu and Misaki occupied the square as a tightly-controlled storm of destruction, making the little lights representing the enemy wink out one after the other. Rikuto joined them, harassing four Kiri-nin—of which Yagura was one—and driving them toward the Kasai twins. Across the village, Nanami had merged with the hot springs and was boiling the enemy in their own clothes, while Shirozora occupied and held the Chinatsugumi gardens using just the water in the fish-ponds. The chakra signatures of all six children were clustered tightly behind the two former Kiri-nin, and the enemy struck at them again and again.

And midway between the outer wall and the Chinatsugumi compound, Team Chōza was effectively pinned by around fifty fighters. The Oto-nin were dying en masse, mainly because of Gai, but the sheer number of corpses-to-be were slowing Team Chōza down.

V1 cloak? I asked Isobu.

Of course. Isobu seemed to sit up a bit in the water, lifting his horned head. It was impossible for a creature without lips to smile, but he somehow managed anyway. It's good to have you back.

We'll see. This is going to get a lot worse before it gets better.

As long as our enemies die, I won't complain. His eye narrowed. In fact, I think I'll enjoy this.

As Isobu's chakra swept through my system like a storm surge, I could see the moment that my vision was covered in a red haze of his chakra.
And I was tearing across the rooftops to relieve my beleaguered teammates.

I arrived in time to see Genma stick a senbon needle in someone's eye. As the victim—yet another faceless Oto-nin—reeled back and remembered to start screaming, his head exploded. It sounded like the time I'd put an explosive seal on a watermelon.

Interesting.

I landed, luckily, on an Oto-nin who was trying to escape the battlefield, and the chakra-boosted impact crushed him to the ground hard enough that I felt his lungs give out.

Good.

Ebisu twisted and threw from his hip, sending another Oto-nin careening right for me, and I leapt over the flying man's trajectory with the timing borne of long practice. As I spun, I slashed outward by drawing my katana in midair and launching into the Curve of the Moon iaijutsu technique—and the Oto-nin hit the ground in pieces.

I touched the ground again in a three-point landing for just a moment, and then Isobu's chakra yanked me to one side like a yo-yo. A translucent tail was wrapped around a street lamp and he pulled me neatly out of the way of what turned out to be a—

Oh, more dead people.

Not literally so. But between Team Chōza and me, we made short work of the remaining Oto-nin brigade. It took maybe a minute. Two, tops.

"Keisuke-chan, I am glad you seem to be back to your normal self!" Gai greeted me, but he notably hesitated to hug me.

Yeah, the burning aura of death probably put a damper on that. And I really wasn't back to normal. I was just...doing my job.

Violently.

Wait. With a bit of help from Isobu, I dialed down the V1 cloak back to nothing, and all four of us darted into a nearby intact building. It was probably a shop, but given how many things had been smashed it would have been difficult to tell what was sold. Still, we needed a bit of space to talk and it was going to have to do.

"Did you see the Chinatsugumi?" Ebisu asked, and he froze in the act of adjusting his glasses when he realized that his fingertips were covered in blood. He wiped his hands on his pants first.

"I did," I told him. "Misaki-san says that our job is to help with the evacuation and to defend everyone. She and Chinatsu-san are taking the bulk of the enemy off us, but they won't last forever."

Already, I could feel their chakra starting to die down.

"Is there any kind of escape tunnel?" Genma asked, pulling another senbon out of his thigh holster to replace the one he'd just used to make a man's head explode. Had he been carrying the explosive version in his mouth the entire time?

...I wouldn't have noticed, would I? I'd missed a lot.

"I..." Was there one? The Chinatsugumi had never mentioned anything like that to me, but this place... wasn't exactly Helm's Deep. There had to be another way out that didn't go entirely overland, right? That would just make sense.

If anyone knew about where a tunnel or other escape route would be, then clearly someone would be either guarding it or hiding in it, in a situation like this one. Konoha's version of an escape plan was really more of a counterattack strategy, but we nonetheless had shelters build around the village. The biggest of them was in the Hokage Monument.

Sorayama wasn't a Hidden Village, but it did host people with powerful abilities—some of whom were missing-nin who would be expecting pursuers sooner or later. It would just be smart thinking.

Reaching out with my chakra sense, I tried to clear out some of the interference. Like with the Tenth, there were a lot of chakra signatures out there that I was unfamiliar with.

"There's..." How was I supposed to explain this? "I can sense civilian chakra signatures leaving the area, but I don't know how they're doing it." My chakra sense didn't account for obstacles, such as thousands of metric tons of dirt. I just knew where people were. It didn't tell me how to get there without having to find someone to excavate.

"I'll be able to figure that out," Genma said. He gave me a long, assessing look, and said, "Kei-san, the three of us should be able to help coordinate the retreat—or at least defend the people who are. But I think you're going to be more useful somewhere else."

Hadn't I been calling myself a weapon of mass destruction for years? Well, it was finally time to earn those stripes.

Except for one thing.

"The priority is Misaki's daughter Aiko," I told them. "I'll break off once you have her secured, because otherwise we're all going to die anyway."

Ebisu's eyebrows rose, and I could almost see his eyes around the edges of his shades. "The fabled Kasai clan bloodline?"

I nodded. "And that's where the enemy's attention is focused." Mostly. If you didn't count Yagura. Hopefully, Rikuto would be able to keep him occupied.

"I see... Genma, Gai, protect the civilians. I'll be making sure we can achieve all of our objectives by following Kei-san. She will hold the enemy's attention while I bring the child to safety." Ebisu straightened and added, somewhat uncertainly, "Is that right?"

"You're doing fine, Ebisu." Genma punched his shoulder playfully. "We'll be back together before you know it."

Which was all very well and good, but we still needed to make sure it happened before we could go celebrating.

"Genma and I will let no enemy past us!" Gai gave us a thumbs-up. "That's a promise!"

"You got it," I said, and offered a fist bump.

I got three responses, forming a circle of fists for just a moment.

"All right, kids. Let's get to work," Genma said, and we split our team up. The Oto-nin were mostly fodder to shinobi of our skill levels, and I trusted my teammates to know when to cut and run.
Like when their boss showed up.

Ebisu and I left first, with our chakra somewhat suppressed so I could continue getting a decent read of the situation in the village.

So I felt it when Chinatsu and Misaki's chakra disappeared.

I stumbled for a moment, almost falling off a roof in shock, and checked my chakra sense again. I found myself looking back toward where I'd left them, without really realizing I was doing it until I saw the column of smoke.

Rikuto's chakra had long since disappeared.

For a moment, with Ebisu hovering over my left shoulder and probably wondering what was slowing us down, I felt a stab of pain in my chest. Chinatsu and Misaki could hide their chakra better than any shinobi I'd met, so they could be fine—right?

But Rikuto…

I shook myself. That wasn't—it wasn't going to be what we were dealing with. Misaki had made it clear that they were not a part of our mission. Aiko was.

I couldn't afford to slow down. To be distracted. If we failed to get Aiko out of danger, there was no point to any of this because Soragami would be overjoyed to just bury us all in pumice and ash. We'd all die regardless of anything else we tried to accomplish or how hard we fought.

Rikuto's chakra disappearing meant Yagura was free to harass all of us for whatever boneheaded reason he wanted. I could still feel him running around, and had no doubt that he'd be back to attack me. It'd make our mission harder to accomplish, but Rikuto's death didn't mean all of the rest of us would die. Losing Aiko would.

Fuck it. I crammed my feelings into a mental box and resolved to deal with them later, if Soragami didn't kill us all first. "Ebisu, let's go."

Ebisu didn't hesitate.

The two of us ran for the Chinatsugumi compound.

I'd have said we did it stealthily, but there were so many running and screaming people that the only thing that would have cut through the crowd would have been a new disaster of some kind. As it was, the low, deep rumbling of a fucking earthquake was enough of a distraction for everyone, even if Ebisu and I could get past most of the shaking by leaping from place to place.

Low to the ground, though. While we were fish swimming against a current of people, it'd have been suicide to deliberately travel too far above the crowd.

Do you sense that? Isobu asked as we went.

Sense what? I asked him, as Ebisu and I skittered over the roof of the Chinatsugumi's compound. The kids were in here, somewhere, but there was also a second storm of chakra that felt like…

Zakuro's chakra? Not just Zakuro's—Rikuto's and Akira's were there, too, melded together into some horrible mess that hit Shirozora's icy chakra like a hammer.

And then his chakra, whirling into the amalgamation of Akira, Rikuto, and Zakuro, vanished as a separate signature.
All that was left was the hybrid.

Nanami’s chakra flared, then guttered and died, just as Ebisu and I reached the inner garden.

The garden looked like a massive jutsu had sanded the entire place down to the volcanic bedrock. All of the red-leafed maples were torn apart and strewn everywhere, with gigantic iceberg-like frozen monuments replacing each one of the fish ponds. The ornamental stone and bridges had been shattered by ice or melted by magma, and the ground continued to shake what was left of the place down around our ears.

Nanami’s body was half-in, half out of one of the icebergs. Her human torso, arms, neck, and head were entirely covered in hoarfrost, and her lower half vanished into the remnants of the nearest koi pond. The lower half of her left arm had been snapped off, leaving frozen bone and flesh exposed to open air. Half of her face had been broken off.

What remained of her expression was frozen in something that looked like horrified betrayal.

"Kei," Ebisu said, and I turned to see what he was looking at.

Shirozora was lying on the edge of the steps into the compound, surrounded by a shell of glittering ice, but that wasn't all. His lower half was engulfed in lava that radiated raw heat and had ripped through his icy shield like nothing. He was still twitching, but his jaw worked futilely just above the gaping, bloody ruin of his throat.

He was dying. His chakra was already gone. What was still breathing was just meat.

My hands twitched—an aborted attempt to reach for him, cut short by Ebisu's blocking hand and a significant look at the pool of still-glowing lava that had effectively cut Shirozora in half. Not even into two pieces—that would have implied that there was more than one left.

"W-whoever did this is still here," Ebisu said, but it was like I was hearing his voice from underwater.

My eyes itched from Isobu's chakra crawling further into mine and from burning, angry tears. To Ebisu, I managed a strangled, "I know."

"Kei-san," Ebisu prompted, though his chakra retreated from mine and into his coils from fear. "Focus."

I stepped around Shirozora's corpse and headed into the building at a run, making a beeline toward the horrific hybrid of chakra that had come for the children. It almost drowned them out, but I could still feel at least three of them in the same area as that all-consuming mass, which threatened to swallow them whole.

Ebisu, perhaps realizing that I was going to kill whoever I ran into first, stayed behind me the whole way. The halls were silent and filled with lava-borne flame and smoke, left in little trails like blood down the wooden floors.

We reached the nursery—the shielded sanctum—in about four seconds.

All three of Misaki’s assistants were dead on the floor, throats or bellies cut and blood all over the room. And standing in their blood, trying to muffle the children’s screaming, were four Oto-nin. Roku's skinny arm was bent behind his back at an impossible angle and he was screaming, while Aiko clawed and bit at her attacker's hands. A third Oto-nin kicked Roku hard enough to silence him, then seemed to notice that Ebisu and I were standing there and alerted the last.
While three of the Oto-nin were nondescript, including the two whose uniforms glittered with frost and who were pinning Roku and Aiko to the floor, the fourth was not.

Holding a motionless Kaito off the ground by his throat, the fourth Oto-nin turned to face us.

Her hip-length ash-blond hair was familiar even when tied back by the Oto-nin headband, as were the curves and muscle I recognized behind the Otogakure uniform and distinct snake-print collar. Her smile was familiar, too, as was the patient gleam of blood-reddened teeth. She was pretty, but it was the kind of beauty that belonged to anglerfish in the dark. And under her skin, writhing like serpents trapped in a sack, were four stolen chakra signatures that clashed horribly to my senses.

She wasn't wearing shades this time. I had a full view of her silver eyes, which gleamed like steel.

I knew those eyes.

"Hello again," she said in a silky voice, her eyes flashing. Zakuro's chakra bore down on Ebisu and me, and I smashed the incoming genjutsu away from both of us before it could twist its way into our skulls. "How long has it been since Amegakure, sweetie? You know, I never forget a cute face."

Ebisu gasped, but he was alive and still had his senses.

"What's with that ugly face you're making?" the Oto-nin asked, her dark eyebrows knitting together in perfectly sculpted confusion. "Aren't you glad to see me again?"

"You." My voice was a hideous Tailed Beast growl, lower than Isobu had ever given me.

I knew that face. Those eyes.

Every story needs a villain.

Isobu connected the dots almost instantaneously, putting together what I'd told him once about the Chinatsugumi and my reaction to this—this scum of the earth inside of a second. You wrote this woman?

I didn't answer him. I focused on her, letting the burst of guilt carry me over a threshold and into a brand new frontier of defensive, protective anger. "Let him go."

"Oh, no, I couldn't." She smiled in a slow, self-satisfied way. "I think I'll keep him. He'll make a decent light snack, don't you think? Like his parents did."

I threw myself at her, Isobu's chakra cloak—three tails and all—springing to life all around me and surging, simultaneously, for the other three Oto-nin.

All three tails struck home, severing limbs and tearing chunks out of enemy flesh and spraying their blood across the walls. But the female Oto-nin slung Kaito over her shoulder and spat lava in my face. It caught on the V1 cloak and hardened instantly as Isobu's watery chakra nullified it through sheer force.

But she got away.

Ebisu managed to skid under my attack, snatching both Roku and Aiko out of the carnage.

I whirled on the spot, all three tails coiled up and behind me in the midst of the now-neutralized enemy, barely avoiding burning Ebisu and the other two kids.
"Kei-san," Ebisu shouted, and I paused.

"What?" I demanded, feeling Isobu's chakra wrap more snugly around me.

"I'll take Aiko and Roku from here. Get Kaito back," Ebisu ordered.

I looked briefly at him, both through normal sight and with my chakra sense. He was terrified and out of his depth, but he knew what the mission was and could stick to it. He knew he couldn't accomplish any rescue on his own—but he didn't have to.

Between one breath and the next, I summoned Tsuruya.

My huge crane summon took one look at the situation, and at me, and didn't even need to ask what I wanted of her. She curled her long wings over Ebisu's shoulders, in an instant shield.

There was a reason I had come with Ebisu for this part of the program. Now, he could get out.

I nodded one last time to him as Ebisu carried the kids out under Tsuruya's protection, then decided that the door would be too slow. I could feel the Oto kunoichi heading for the main gates, so why bother with turns? I was already going to be taking on S-class ninja, and if she was heading in that direction, then so be it. Maybe I'd be able to retrieve the other three children along the way.

I blasted the roof out of my way with a high-pressure burst of Isobu's chakra, mingled with water, and tore after them.

It took a few minutes for me to lock onto the disgusting swirl of the Oto kunoichi's chakra with any accuracy, but it wasn't for lack of trying or for lack of opportunity. Even after combining so many people's chakra into a single body, she was slow by my standards, and her chakra was so outrageously bloated that the task should have been like shooting a white whale on a black background.

No, the problem was all of the other ninja.

With a V1 cloak active, I was quite literally the brightest target on the entire battlefield, both to people with sensing specialties and to those who couldn't sense worth a shit but had functional eyes.

And since I was the only shinobi still openly active on my side of the conflict, in between all the Oto-nin and screaming merchants, I was suddenly the most popular target in town.

It might have slowed me down more than it did, giving the Oto kunoichi more of a lead, if not for how flexible Isobu and I had gotten about chakra usage. Whenever it felt like I was being swarmed, Isobu's chakra tails spun around me like three deadly orbiting bludgeons, independent of minor concerns like anatomical consistency, and smashed my opponents aside like nothing. He didn't do it constantly—it made him a bit dizzy—but it was enough to clear the chaff.

The Oto kunoichi hit a rooftop and slid down the opposite side.

I hit the roof with another pressurized burst of water, from the near side of the building, and punched the top third of it off. I was aiming a bit above where I expected the Oto kunoichi to be and hoping to hit her with wooden shrapnel, and followed in a straight line.

Immediately upon reaching the other side of the former storehouse, two different dragon-shaped blasts of water smashed me to the ground.

I wasn't hurt, but my momentum was stalled out until I could get my feet back under me. And then the dragons swirled around for another pass, so I needed to figure that out \textit{immediately}.

And yet, I could still perceive my enemies perfectly well. Inside Isobu's chakra cloak, I prepared to take the hit from the Water Dragon Bullets—but also to take all of that water and murder everything I could get my hands on.

"I see your mission was a success, Akuro-san?" asked the first of my attackers, who was a pretty blonde woman that I recognized. It was that Kiri-nin from Amegakure.

And seriously, Akuro? \textit{Evil wolf}. Who the hell named their kid \textit{that}? What was this, Ame's greatest hits and misses? Because wow, if any of the Kiri-nin wanted to survive this, they had lost the chance by assisting this pedophilic hell-bitch.

"Oh, it was less of a success than I might have wanted," said the Oto kunoichi, who looked toward me and smirked. "But I suppose not every experience can be delicious."

The Kiri-nin had the decency to be slightly creeped out. The dark-haired teammate of hers stayed silent, but I had my eyes on the group's two kunoichi.

"Keep her pinned, Suiren-san," Akuro said sweetly, adjusting her grip on Kaito. "Orochimaru-sama will want to deal with this one personally."

"Yagura-sama has the right to the first attack," said the other Kiri-nin whose jutsu was trying to encircle me. It was the bodybuilder-looking ninja from Ame. Nice to know they were all on the same team, still.

There would be no loose ends.

"Do I look like I \textit{care}, Junsai-san?" Akuro mocked him. "Just keep her here."

Then she left, shooting along the roofs without being hindered by any Oto-nin. Unobstructed, \textit{defended} by these idiot Kiri-nin—

Yeah, no. Fuck that.

\textit{Isobu? I want to kill them all.}

\textit{Let's.}

We would have. I swear to the stars we would have just started killing and not stopped until the sky rained limbs and blood. Until Kaito was safe.

But I didn't get to act on that impulse, because a green blur shot out of nowhere and smashed into the dark-haired lead Kiri-nin with all the force of a raging bull. Given the war cry of "\textit{DYNAMIC ENTRY!}" there was no questioning who it was.

A second later, two of Genma's exploding senbon nicked Suiren's arms and a third impaled her shoulder, making her yelp as her arm went limp and numb.

The last Kiri-nin standing looked like he was going to turn his Water Dragon Bullet on Genma, so Gai whirled in and smashed \textit{him} into a building for good measure.

"Where is Ebisu?" I demanded of Genma, even as I used one of Isobu's tails to hit the remaining Water Dragon Bullet so hard that the attack imploded.
"He reached us with the kids and told us to back you up. Ningame's helping him hold things together. Same thing with your crane," Genma replied, nailing Suiren twice more with senbon and taking out her legs. "Kaito?"

"Not safe," I said, immediately turning my attention back to pursuing Akuro.

"We'll deal with these idiots. Catch up to them," Genma suggested, never taking his eyes off the Kiri-nin. "Now, Kei!"

I didn't need telling twice.

As soon as I got a clear shot at Akuro, which took another fifty meters of running so I could catch up to her, I turned up the dial on Isobu's power.

Each of his tails became ten-meter banners streaming out behind me—except for the fact that they only obeyed the laws of physics insomuch as I wanted them to, and that I didn't.

The tails wrapped together, compressing into a single tail with triple the length, and I slammed Isobu's chakra and mine into my legs for a quick burst of speed that gave me just enough reach.

Akuro turned around in time to see the triple-length tail whipping down toward her, as thick around as a pencil and with all the force Isobu and I could muster.

The massive chakra blade whipped straight through her as though she was made of paper, swinging onward to embed itself in the street with enough force to rock the ground as hard as any earthquake.

By the time it hit the rock, it was back to being a nasty bludgeon.

Akuro hit the ground, rolling with Kaito still over her shoulder.

Her left arm hit the ground several meters away.

I landed near it, scattering Isobu's chakra back into three defensive tails, and brought my foot down hard enough on Akuro's arm to make it squelch under my sandal.

Akuro stared at me, her silver eyes suddenly wide and not nearly so confident. Not without lackeys to slow me down. Her arm had already stopped bleeding, and I felt a bit of Akira's chakra boil off as she burned it to close the injury. Kaito rolled off her shoulder and to the ground, still out cold, but she made no move to pick him up again.

I wanted to kill her. And not in a kind way, like Genma and those head-splodey senbon of his. Not like Kakashi and his instantaneous heart attacks.

I wanted to rip her in two and leave her to bleed to death like she had done to Shiro. I wanted to smash her face off like she'd done to Nanami.

I wanted her to suffer.

"S-So, this is the power of a jinchūriki?" she asked, and her voice only shook a little. Point to her—though it wasn't going to matter.

I bared my teeth.

And then she smirked.

What?
"Well, well, well. Isn't that your cue?" Akuro said, and a torrent of water surged apparently out of nowhere to flood the—central square? We'd already come that far?

I had a sudden bad feeling about this.

Ambush! Isobu roared, just as a watery wheel seemed to spring into existence in front of us. After a fraction of a second, it resolved itself into a mirror, showing me—glowing, chakra-cloak-wearing me.

Oh fuck.

"Eat this," Yagura's voice barked, and suddenly my reflection was lunging out of the mirror right at me.

The reflection—an instant Water Clone—hit me with all the force I probably would have otherwise used on Yagura, bowling me over and sending me rolling into a storefront hard enough to bring it down around me.

My Water Clone tried to capitalize on knocking me over, but there was something to be said for adaptability under pressure. Instead of drawing my sword—which I had seen on the clone's belt, too—I decided to cut out the middleman.

As I leapt to my feet, I brought concentrated Tailed Beast chakra into my hands just as the clone lunged for me.

"Rasengan!" I snarled, and drove the swirling drill-ball of death right into my doppelganger's gut.

The clone exploded into a shower of cold water droplets. Once she was gone, I could see my opponents clearly again.

Yagura stood across the square, holding his camellia staff in both hands, with water pooling at his feet and a second water mirror already formed in front of him. His eyes told me he planned to stop me here, despite his harsh breathing. His stance and chakra spoke of grim determination to get what he thought his village deserved. What Konoha had "stolen" from them.

The fact that he was standing beside Akuro told me that I was going to rip him to shreds regardless of any tricks he thought he had.

"I'll be taking the Three-Tails back now," Yagura said in a low, fierce tone.

"No, you won't," I said, and Isobu's voice had never resonated quite so much with mine.

But I wasn't really watching Yagura, though I was sure Isobu was. My attention whipped to Kaito as soon as I felt his chakra shift.

Behind Yagura's water mirror, Akuro had reached Kaito again, pinning his unconscious body under her weight. She'd pulled the collar of his shirt away, and her head was bent over his neck. It took me a second to realize what was happening—until the moment Kaito's chakra started flowing into Akuro's body.

Yagura had to flip his mirror over and launch the Water Clone at me immediately, because otherwise I would have gotten past him and ripped Akuro's head off with my teeth.

As it was, the V1 clone of me was smashed apart under my hands inside of a second, because I had hit V2 and its blood-red, burning aura in between the clone being released and me crossing the distance between us.

And then I bore down on Yagura, screaming with rage and hate and wanting nothing more than to kill everything I could get my hands on.

Yagura exploded into water under my weight, and I leapt at Akuro just in time to get a last burst of lava to the face before Rikuto’s chakra faded entirely from the horrible hybrid chakra she was using.

I shook it off, breaking obsidian apart in my hands and crushing it into so many glass shards.

Yagura shouted in alarm and encased me in a Water Prison before I could smash Akuro’s head off her shoulders. Snarling at the sudden stop, I began charging a miniature Tailed Beast Bomb to aim directly for Akuro’s smug face.

She smiled, and the water around me suddenly froze solid as Akuro yanked on Shirozora and Kaito’s combined chakra.

I drew Isobu’s chakra back into my body, tearing the tails free of their supposed icy prison, and reassembled them in an instant. The tails smashed part of my prison apart, and I brought the Tailed Beast Bomb right in front of me to take care of the rest.

I missed both enemies with the resulting barrage of ice chunks, but I was the only one who wasn’t blown back by the shockwave I created. Landing instead in a perfect animalistic crouch, I surveyed the battlefield for a split second.

The central square was in a hundred million pieces, with the force of the powerful techniques ripping mere buildings apart as though they were made of nothing but matchsticks. Yagura had been thrown to one side, with blood dripping down his face and blinding him. Akuro still had her remaining arm wrapped around Kaito’s neck, preventing a clean shot even at her head.

Then Yagura got up, wincing. "Not bad, kid."

I growled with Isobu’s help, sounding like an engine twice our size.

Yagura spun his staff in his hands, and I was momentarily torn. He couldn’t possibly threaten me more than he had—I was the one with Isobu. I had enough power to kill him four times over, even if he did his best not to take a decisive hit.

But at the same time, turning my back on a Mizukage candidate, even to kill Akuro, seemed like a deadly mistake if I’d ever heard one.

The indecision lasted only a moment. It was just long enough for Akuro to launch a barrage of ice needles at my back, which I idly batted aside with one of Isobu’s chakra tails.

Guess she wanted to be the first on the chopping block.

Akuro was on her knees, her hand still raised to form a single half-seal, and I saw Kaito still lying helpless behind her.

I Body Flickered into motion and reappeared right between her and Kaito.

And then Isobu made a noise I’d never heard from him before. It sounded a bit like whale song, and it hit my ears and rang across my nerves with enough force to momentarily stun me.

Akuro took the opportunity and blew me across the square with a burst of wind—half of the Ice Release bloodline—and Yagura followed it up with a clone of me in V2 mode, wielding a Rasengan in her clawed hands.

I could see my hands as I drew my katana and whipped out the Mountain Cutter and carved my clone in two. The fact that I could see my hands at all—and not Isobu's chakra—was something that was not supposed to happen.

I'd dropped into V1 cloak again.

Isobu?

It's—he's in my head.

He's what?

Isobu just roared incoherently after that, and I managed to focus past the screeching to see Yagura across the square, holding his staff behind his back and holding his empty palm out toward me as though trying to stop traffic. His eyes were closed, and I could feel his chakra in the air like mist, touching Isobu's.

Akuro was hiding behind him, still dragging Kaito along behind her. Blood was running down onto his shirt.

Shit.

And yet there wasn't anything to do but keep fighting. I was not going to let Kaito die because of this—this monster, any more than I would let my kid brother take on Madara fucking Uchiha. It wasn't going to happen.

I gathered what remained of Isobu's chakra to restructure and reinforce the V1 cloak, since he was occupied, and threw myself into the fight.

Two Water Clones headed toward me at once, courtesy of Yagura, and another two uses of the Mountain Cutter got me past even their V1 cloaks inside of a second. A third clone blasted me back once I decided to block instead, but heaving her over my head meant that I didn't lose any more ground than I would have by just stopping to use iaijutsu.

But when I got close enough to finally hit Yagura directly, he hooked the end of his staff around my foot and yanked my feet out from under me before I could focus hard enough for a Water Dragon Bullet right to his face. And when he did it, my katana flew out of my hand.

And Akuro froze my legs to the ground.

It only lasted for a moment. It only needed to.

Akuro threw herself at me, teeth first, and I caught her on a forearm that suddenly didn't have Isobu's chakra protecting it anymore.

The pain from the bite wasn't something I'd faced before, but I could handle it. And the blood, and the knowledge that another human being had just bit me.

But Akuro's bite ripped right into my chakra coils and started sucking the life out of me.

This is how Rikuto died. This is how Zakuro, and Akira—this is how they all died! And with Isobu still screaming in my head, I only had a few seconds to get out of this situation or die just like them.
Yagura stood over us, even as I gathered what chakra I could and formed a half-Rasengan in my free hand. It wobbled in a way that the jutsu hadn't done since the day I learned it, because between the pain and the way my chakra was being drained away, I could barely concentrate.

Yagura raised his staff, preparing to bring it down on my skull.

NO.

YOU.

DON'T.

Isobu's chakra flooded my body and threw Yagura and Akuro away from me from the sheer force of the surge, bolstering my chakra back to something that almost, in bad lighting, looked like homeostasis. Sure, my chakra was gutted, but Isobu's was there and apparently cutting through mine had given him an opening to drown me in his power to regain control of himself, too.

Or something. I was too relieved to care.

I got to my feet.

"This is becoming annoying," Akuro said to Yagura, with her eyes narrowed. Like losing her left arm had just been an inconvenience.

I suddenly didn't want to know anything about Orochimaru's transplant research. At all.

Akuro picked Kaito up again, without wiping our blood from her mouth. Maybe because of the blisters forming there. "Yagura-san, you've wasted enough of my time. I have a job to do."

And she made to leave, while Yagura took up a blocking position.

No!

And then, out of the glorious (not) blue, "DYNAMIC ENTRY!" split the air for the second time in ten minutes.

And Yagura was smashed squarely into the remaining pavement.

Which left me free to do what I'd been waiting to do for entirely too long.

I made a single Dragon seal, and the Water Dragon Bullet shot out ahead of me to encircle Akuro just as the Kiri-nin had done to me not long before.

She tried to freeze it, but Isobu's chakra and mine countered what remained of Shirozora and Kaito's stolen chakra with contemptuous ease. The dragon kept going, its jaws wide in a terrible shrieking roar and its yellow eyes glowing in the late afternoon light.

Water, drawn by the jutsu, yanked on Akuro's ankles and hurled her into the air. Kaito tumbled out of her grip, only to be caught by Isobu's waiting tails and gently eased to the ground behind me.

But Akuro? Oh, no.

No. She wasn't getting off with mere motion sickness.

She was smashed face-first into the ground in front of me by the Water Dragon Bullet, and I walked up to her fallen form with Isobu's chakra buoying me and my anger forward. If I was just on my own, I would have collapsed long ago.

But I wasn't.

So I was free to bring one chakra-enhanced foot down on Akuro's elbow hard enough to shatter the joint into bone shards.

Akuro screamed in helpless rage and pain, twisting in an effort to get a grip on me. At the same time, she burned with Akira's chakra, trying to heal herself rapidly enough to matter. Or maybe to recover enough to spit in my face.

But she couldn't. Even with all the healing power she'd stolen, it didn't make a difference. Her neck wouldn't turn far enough. Her arm was shattered. She couldn't get the leverage to even look up at me and face down death.

She didn't deserve that much.

Without waiting for her to recover, I brought Isobu's outer two tails down as hard as I could, and I didn't stop bashing away at her until she was a red stain on the ground.

With my grisly task finished, I turned back to Gai, who had started to painstakingly bandage Kaito's bite wound.

Yagura was still where Gai had left him, so I imagined that he was either unconscious or dead. Given the blood and the crater he was still lying in, I leaned more toward "dead," and didn't feel the slightest bit of guilt at the thought.

He'd brought the fight here. He couldn't blame us for finishing it.

"The Kiri-nin?" I asked Gai, as Isobu started pulling back on his chakra. I dropped out of V2, then out of V1 and back to the stage where only my eyes showed signs of jinchūriki power.

Fucking hell, I was exhausted. I could practically see the incoming adrenaline crash, and I would have welcomed it on almost any other day. But not today.

That was a theme for this entire fight, wasn't it?

On any other day, I wouldn't have brutally murdered someone who made me angry.

...On any other day, I wouldn't have done a lot of things.

"We killed them," Gai said, as he wound a bandage around Kaito's neck and shoulder, tying a gauze pad in place. "Genma and Ebisu have spread out a bit to look for survivors, but the fighting is mostly dying down. Did you find any of the other children?"

"...Not yet," I replied. My shoulders slumped. I'd been so focused on Kaito's immediate safety that I hadn't even thought about Kazuki, Miyu, or Tayuya. "Get Kaito to safety, and I'll be able to."

"Are you certain you don't need help, Keisuke-chan?" Gai asked.

It was a fair question. I was covered in blood, soaked to the skin otherwise, and was damn near shaking as I came down from both Isobu's chakra and an adrenaline rush.

Instead of actually answering, I asked, "Do you have any soldier pills?"

"I do not," Gai replied. He finally finished bandaging Kaito up, and put his hand against the side of the boy's face. "His chakra levels are very low, Keisuke-chan."

I can fix that.

I knelt next to them and put my right hand over Kaito's clammy forehead and my left over his heart. Dragging up what remained of my chakra—or at least what was still entirely human and not blended with Isobu's—I sent just a trickle of it into Kaito's chakra coils. While I was doing that, I used the Mystic Palm to try and fix up a few of his injuries. Reduce the swelling on the sprained ankle, on the concussion, on his bite wound...

It wouldn't be enough to get him conscious again. But I'd feel somewhat better letting him go with Gai.

I was going to stay and, with everything I had left, I was going to clear out the Oto-nin if it was the last thing I did.

With all the civilians gone, it wouldn't be like I would have any reason to hold back.

I pulled my hands back before I could give Kaito too much of my chakra. "It should be safe to carry him now, Gai. Get him out of here."

Gai gave me a long, cautious look. "I will bring Kaito-kun to Tsuruya-san and Ningame, but I will be back for you, Keisuke-chan. That's a promise!"

I nodded wearily, as my eyelids started to droop. As long as he got Kaito out.

Gai picked Kaito up properly and gave me one last, reassuring look. Then he ran, taking Kaito away from the battlefield.

I looked around what remained of Sorayama. In the shadow of Soragami, the former merchant stronghold burned as bright as a bonfire. The merchants were all either gone or dead, Chinatsugumi included. Half the buildings were gone. The streets were torn up from multiple massive jutsu, and I was hardly the only one left who could cause immense destruction.

I glanced at Yagura's mangled body, still unmoving on the pavement. Gai had broken his back, to say the least of his injuries. Human spines weren't supposed to bend that way.

Isobu, do you think we can handle the rest of them?

We can, Isobu said, surveying the world through my chakra sense. Together, we could sense about a hundred or so remaining chakra signatures.

I looked out and across the village. There were still pockets of Oto-nin signatures here and there, looting or scavenging. Given Gai's speed, he and Kaito were already well out of danger.

Let's kill them all.

And we would have. There were only so many ways a weaker, unprepared opponent could fight a jinchūriki—even an exhausted one. And if it meant that no Oto-nin would ever threaten my friends again, I was more than willing to kill everyone I could get my hands on, no matter what it would cost me.

Or so I thought.

At that exact moment, I heard soft laughter.
There was something inherently, viscerally disturbing about hearing human voices where there shouldn't have been any. Knowing that there was no one around, and yet the sound continued, sent a chill down my spine that Isobu couldn't do anything to help me with.

There were no chakra signatures in the immediate area—not even an AOE genjutsu—and nothing nearby could have just coincidentally produced that noise.

"I'm beginning to like this village," murmured a sibilant voice. There was a quiet overemphasis on the "s" consonant, barely detectable. Like an accent the speaker had mostly been trained out of, or maybe made out of habit.

I still couldn't determine which direction it was coming from. I couldn't feel the chakra signature that should have told me where he was.

With the hairs on the back of my neck standing up straight, I backed up a step.

Shit.

"As soon as its pest problem is taken care of," the voice went on, "I think I'll make it mine."

Why did I get the impression that I had hundreds of eyes on me at once? It didn't seem possible...

"Oh, Yagura," the voice went on in an amused tone. "All of that effort, wasted by your weakness."

I Body Flickered away from Yagura's downed body, dashing across the ruined town square and sliding to a stop in front of what used to be a sweets shop.

Where I had just been, looking down at Yagura's broken body, stood a tall, dark-haired person.

The hairs on my arms started to stand up, too.

I'd last seen this person in person six years ago. Long, dark hair so straight it was almost limp, over a chalk-white face. He had deep-set serpentine eyes, and prominent purple markings around them as though to emphasize his alien, unknowable nature, and his deep detachment from humanity.

Cheekbones sharp enough to cut.

And a chakra that seeped out into the air with the steady, icy pervasiveness of his chakra—no, his use of killing intent.

I backed off another step, and another.

Orochimaru was someone I had hoped never to run into. Part of my brain had realized that of course he would be backing up his men if he was devoting this many of them to a single offensive, but the rest of me had refused to think about it.

I could face Yagura. I had. I'd fought Akuro, too, and I hadn't started shaking like this except from anger.

But Orochimaru?

No.

I'd decided years ago that I would run.

Being a jinchuriki barely mattered in the face of someone who had been in Akatsuki. Otherwise known as the organization that hunted Tailed Beasts. And when he'd backstabbed a few idiots, he hadn't been immediately splattered across the vicinity—he'd gotten away.

It wasn't a question of power. Orochimaru was plainly outclassed by half-a-dozen other powerful shinobi, some of whom I had even befriended. But aside from Nagato, who hadn't figured out how many different powers he could use, Orochimaru was the single least predictable opponent on the planet. Sensei preferred variations on the same five tricks, and although all of them were lethal, it didn't touch how many different ways Orochimaru could ruin someone's life.

I could fight him and lose.

And worse yet, there was a chance he wouldn't kill me.

"Going somewhere, Keisuke-kun?" Orochimaru asked. "I must say, I'm disappointed."

And he knew my name.

Shit.

Orochimaru smiled, his earrings swaying as he stepped forward and over the wreck that used to be Yagura. "After all, Konoha-nin put so much importance on teamwork, don't they?"

My confusion must have shown on my face, past my rattled nerves. My team had already cleared out. They were safe.

"Oh, I suppose you can't sense him at all." Orochimaru raised two fingers in a signal. "Let's try this again."

The ground rumbled again. Over the remaining roofs of the nearby buildings, I could see something—shit.

Those were scales. Six massive brown coils became visible over the roofs, and the scales I could see were as big as my head. And their chakra, no longer hidden by the serpents' suppression skills, was massive. At the same time, the shape didn't make sense for me for a long moment.

What kind of snake had a forked spine?

I quickly got an answer.

The brown serpent's heads—plural—rose over the buildings, and as it slithered over to Orochimaru's side, its bulk flattened a strip four shops wide along the way.

One of its necks was bent in the middle, curling around something…

I stopped breathing as the second head dropped its burden to the ground.

Genma's body was entirely still on the ground, with blood pooling underneath him. His left arm had an extra two bends in it, and I could hear his faint, wheezing breath even from fifteen meters away. His chakra flickered weakly, unresponsive even to what would have been overwhelming pain.

"Dear Keisuke-kun." Orochimaru tilted his head to one side, smiling faintly. "Are you still going to run?"

No.

I encouraged Isobu's chakra as it flooded my body, reinforcing my tired muscles and filling me with energy that burned. It surged through me, making my injuries hiss with something like steam as they filled in—patchily, and unevenly, but regrew tissue nonetheless. My skin started to itch as the red chakra seeped outward from my coils and across me, engulfing me in the second stage of a Tailed Beast transformation.

No, I wouldn't leave Genma.

I lifted my head, opened my glowing, jagged mouth, and bellowed out a roar of challenge. If Orochimaru and his snake focused on me, they wouldn't have time to hit Genma—I'd shred them both if they did.

I would never leave anyone behind again.

"Excellent," Orochimaru said, nearly inaudible in the windstorm Isobu's energy and mine had combined to make. Orochimaru slid into a combat stance, but it was loose and unconcerned. He was grinning. "Let's see what you can do, Keisuke-kun."

"Do not forget about us, Keisuke-chan!" Gai's voice cut across the battlefield almost as clearly as my roar.

I stopped short, looking to either side of me.

Ebisu and Gai landed from their long run, just off to my left and right. I felt both of them tense up upon seeing their teammate lying prone on the ground, but neither of them balked.

"We're with you," Ebisu said, his voice trembling just slightly. His eyes were trained on his teammate, but it would be idiocy to take his eyes entirely off of Orochimaru for too long. "We'll get Genma out of here."

"All of us will come home, Keisuke-chan," Gai said, and he got into the starting stance of the Strong Fist style. He was close enough to touch me if he wanted to, but showed good judgment and didn't so much as offer me a fist-bump.

I would remember this. And I would protect them, too. "Thank you."

Orochimaru gave the three of us a long look, then reached up for his snake. It lowered its second head, baring its long curved fangs.

"Tsuchihebi, split," Orochimaru commanded.

Above Yagura and Genma's prone bodies, the snake's two heads heaved themselves in different directions. With a hideous tearing noise, the snake split into two snakes in a way that would have just been impossible for any ordinary serpent, and both resulting snakes bore down on us as though they hadn't just ripped themselves in half lengthwise.

We're going to need more help. In my mindscape, Isobu lifted his spiked head and tails, his single eye glowing like a beacon. If you want to get out of here without anyone else dying.

I didn't have time to ask him what he meant.

I drew Isobu's chakra up and solidified three blades along his tails in addition to my katana.

And I threw myself into the fray.
Memory: Battle of Orochi

Chapter Summary

Plot: Split-screen mode!

Chapter Notes

This chapter is literally named after the battle theme for Orochi in the game Okami.

There were few people more terrifying than Orochimaru.

Sensei might have had the “flee-on-sight” order from Iwagakure, but that was due to sheer kill-count. In terms of the actual number of ways he could destroy you, Orochimaru had Sensei beat.

And we—Ebisu, Gai, Isobu, and I—were going to fight him anyway, because it wasn’t in our nature to turn and run when our friend was dying at his feet. Sure, all of us could feel Orochimaru’s killing intent pressing down on us, and we were all quaking in our figurative boots.

...But it would be a cold day in hell the day that we ran from this fight.

We just need to hold on until help arrives, Isobu said. Kurama heard me.

I didn’t breathe a sigh of relief. A lot of horrible things could happen before any backup arrived.

But it took a bit of pressure off, and I could focus on the attack.

I reached Orochimaru first, pivoting on my lead foot as soon as it touched the ground and launching three near-simultaneous slashes at him with Isobu’s blade-tipped chakra tails.

And the first snake’s head got in my way, taking the brunt of the blows with its thick scales. It tried to knock me backward, away from Orochimaru to give him a bit of space for a jutsu, but I dug my heels and my blades in and hung on. The sudden halt to its momentum made the entire serpent jerk to a stop, sending ripples along its body and flattening everything underneath it for the second time.

The second snake tried to get around me, to Ebisu and Gai.

No!

Let me try.

Isobu’s chakra surged out of my back, just like we’d practiced. As the second snake tried to bear down on Ebisu and Gai, the chakra hit the air so hard that there was a thunderclap, and my knees almost buckled under the sudden, unaccustomed weight of this technique.

But I kept standing, even as Isobu’s full-sized, gray-green shell took the entire weight of the brown snake summon and impaled it four times in return. It floated in midair over my entire team, slightly translucent and dome-like in structure, and all of us could see snake blood dripping down the side.

Just like that, I had both summons occupied. One, because its ribs would be exposed to the open air if it made any stupid decisions, and the other because I had three forty-centimeter blades embedded in its face and the edge of the shell prevented it from lifting its head.

Gai and Ebisu took the opportunity to maneuver out of danger.

Good plan, because I wasn’t going to be able to manage the projection for long.

With the few seconds I had left, I crumpled the edges of Isobu’s shell for their chakra and shoved the resulting excess into the top surface.

The spikes on top of the shell quadrupled in size, and coincidentally quadrupled the size of the wounds in the impaled snake.

The snake exploded into smoke at the exact moment that Isobu’s shell dissolved away in midair.

“I see you’ve learned a few new tricks since your fight with Minato-kun,” Orochimaru said, while his second snake summon continued to try and pull its head away from me to strike. As it was, it couldn’t even open its mouth.

“Where are the children?” I asked him, Isobu’s voice overlaying mine.

“Oh, the children…” Orochimaru smiled. “I could ask you the same thing, Keisuke-kun. You ran off with my prizes.”

“Humans aren’t toys,” I snapped. Behind the featureless, glowing pits that the V2 cloak gave me instead of eyes, my gaze flickered to Genma for just a moment. I needed to get him away from there.

“Ironic, coming from you,” Orochimaru countered. He held his hands out mockingly. “A jinchūriki defending the rights of humans to exist, after what they did to make you? Amusing. But that soft heart will be the end of you today.”

I bared my chakra-formed fangs. “Come at me and put that theory to the test.”

Orochimaru did so.

With all three of Isobu’s tails, I threw the snake summon back over the row of buildings to meet Orochimaru’s charge cleanly. Hopefully, I would buy Gai and Ebisu enough time to get Genma out.

Orochimaru actually stopped short, whipping one arm out and across his body as though he was making a knife strike of some kind—and then it was raining snakes, because of course he summoned the fucking things from up his sleeves.

Each snake opened its little jaws and coughed up a partial replica of the Sword of Kusanagi, amounting to a storm of dragon-slaying blades I didn’t have any time for.

Water Release: Water Trumpet.

A sudden blast of water, badly overclocked by the strength of the chakra behind it, ripped free from my mouth and blasted all of the snakes aside or back toward their master. A second dose of Tailed Beast chakra, as a follow-up that looked more like a downsized Hyper Beam than anything, atomized the stunned serpents immediately.
Orochimaru looked at the results of my attack and, grabbing Genma off the ground by his flak jacket, immediately fled the village.

I bellowed in rage and followed.

Outside of the village walls, I could see Oto forces arrayed in loose formations, but all but two shinobi scattered for the hills as soon as I touched the ground again.

Those two, in full Oto uniform, caught Genma when Orochimaru threw him at them. I heard the faintest rasp of pain from Genma when he was dropped unceremoniously to the ground, and all thoughts flew out of my head.

I didn’t need hand seals for the Body Flicker, and what speed was granted by the V2 form should have given me the edge over Orochimaru, no matter how many jutsu he could use. I dug my claw-tipped feet into the ground, about to start removing faces.

And then the ground exploded underneath my feet.

I wasn’t thrown back, because the explosion was mostly just heat and flash, but the dust that was dislodged by the explosion blocked my sight for just a moment.

I felt Orochimaru’s chakra split in two.

One half went for me, and the air burned as an Uchiha-caliber fireball bore down on me with all of the force of a natural disaster.

I was a walking natural disaster. And I wasn’t afraid of fire.

Pulled out of the ground and the river and the now far-off hot springs, water swirled up around me like the jaws of a mythical monster. The vortex swirled, reached up—and then whipped into a waterspout that engulfed the fireball with a vengeance that also contained the cloud of steam.

The resulting explosion of steam knocked nearly everyone flat to the ground.

And in that cover, two snakes sprang from the ground and coiled around my legs. I lashed out, instantly, but a third snake—easily twice the size of either of the snakes that had done a reverse-hydra in the village—surged up from the ground underneath me and its sheer momentum shunted me through the air and into a nearby hillside.

I hit the ground under the snake’s weight, swearing under my breath because even jinchūriki bullshit couldn’t entirely ignore physics.

But once I had leverage, I cheated outright and brought a Tailed Beast Rasengan into existence right in front of my glowing mouth, and popped it like a water balloon.

The resulting explosion smashed everything within ten meters straight up. While the snake reeled like it had been sucker-punched by a giant, I shot out from under it and into open ground.

It let me see where the snake had come from, so I could target it.

Orochimaru was on the ground with his hands still on a summoning seal, while a second Orochimaru…

Somehow, one of the Oto-nin had dragged Yagura’s broken body over to the Otogakure line. One of the Oto-nin from before had apparently stomped on Yagura’s neck, killing him instantly, but the other one was holding onto a massive, complex-looking scroll. I caught the moment when the first one smeared Yagura’s blood across the scroll.

Orochimaru stood next to them, next to Genma, and my heart almost stopped when I realized what was about to happen. When he looked directly at me and smiled.

No.

I hadn’t seen Konoha’s forbidden jutsu scroll in a very long time, mostly because I wasn’t supposed to have access to it in the first place. But Sensei had let me see it anyway, because there were some things than the Hokage’s unofficial sounding board needed to know. Even if I hadn’t seen that scroll, I could still recognize this technique.

There was no mistaking the Impure World Reincarnation technique for anything else.

Orochimaru was going to burn Genma’s life for Yagura’s. And I was too far out of position to stop him.

I immediately spat a hastily-assembled Water Dragon Bullet at the Orochimaru closer to me, trying to get him away and to get enough space to avoid the snake, which had recovered from the shockwave and slithered between me and Genma.

Mountain Cutter!

Isobu’s three blades didn’t do the job as well as my katana would have, but the tails made for easy reach and I needed to cut my way past a lot of snake.

And Orochimaru met me going the other way with Wind Release: Overpressure.

It took me too long to get out of it. Too long to get back to the ground—ducking flying snake pieces all the way down—and mount a real charge.

I tried anyway.

Smashing everything aside with the sheer force of the Isobu-given chakra, I hit the ground more than ten seconds later. I dug into the dirt, sliding onto all fours, and even with the Body Flicker I would have been too late.

“LEAF WHIRLWIND!” And Gai—wonderful, green Gai—popped out of abso-fucking-lutely nowhere and kicked three men in the head at once. One of them was Orochimaru, and he immediately puffed away into a bit of smoke and a lot of snakes. The other two were his men, who went down with compound skull fractures.

On occasion, people forgot that Gai had become a jōnin at fourteen entirely on his own merits. I’d forgotten.

I’d forgotten that when the occasion called for it, Gai could effectively turn invisible. It wasn’t something he did often, and a casual observer would never know that the Green Beast of Konoha had a solid three in genjutsu skills. In a crowded and over-loud battlefield like this one, that was more than enough to get where he was going and wreck people’s faces.

Gai, glowing with a greenish aura that was probably half sweat and his skin nearly beet-red, grabbed Genma and almost immediately vanished through sheer speed.

As soon as Gai got Genma clear, I obliterated the entire burgeoning ritual—and scoured a twohundred-meter wide strip of land of anything resembling topsoil—with the Great Waterfall technique.

Maybe I killed a few Oto-nin in the deal, too. Wasn’t sure.

Distantly, I could feel Gai rejoin Ebisu with Genma along for the ride, and I had to assume that he could get taken care of as long as he was out of the fight.

As for me…well.

Orochimaru didn’t look happy.

I bared my monstrous, Isobu-derived teeth. Sure, he couldn’t tell where my teeth even were behind the V2 cloak, but it was the thought that counted.

“This is no longer entertaining,” Orochimaru said, and his voice was perfectly audible despite the distance between us. He rolled up his sleeve, displaying the massive bar tattoos that held his edition of a summon contract.

Shit.

“Let’s see how you deal with Manda.”

There was a noise like a volcanic rumble, low and deep, and the cloud of smoke was something I would have expected from a wildfire. The ground buckled when the creature behind the smoke finally touched down, and I was bounced hard enough to fly some fifteen meters backward—and I leapt another fifty once I saw the smoke start to shift.

Manda’s massive, purple, horned head hit the ground like a giant’s fist, where I’d just been.

“You dare summon me now, Orochimaru?” Manda hissed as his head pulled back like a cobra’s. He didn’t have the hood, but I could easily see it as a threat display. “After you didn’t give me my human sacrifices last time?”

While Manda and Orochimaru argued—and Orochimaru seemed to be losing—I weighed my options with Isobu.

My best idea here is just to get eaten and then explode him from inside with a full transformation, I admitted.

Not a bad plan, Isobu commented, seeming to frown. After all of this, you’re back down to thirty seconds at full strength. And I wouldn’t bet on that right now.

I grimaced under the Tailed Beast cloak. Do we have any idea it will take for help to finally show up?

…We just have to hold out for as long as he can.

I started charging a variant on the Tailed Beast Bomb. Because, bluntly, they were giving me an opening.

Now, I fully expected to have to take on Manda alone. He had the approximate mass of a skyscraper, which put him well out of the literal and figurative weight class of any ordinary opponent. I was exhausted, but I was still the S-class shinobi. I’d faced Gamabunta—and lost—but this wasn’t a sparring match.
It was me or the snakes, and I just wanted to buy time.

That was when Gai reappeared.

And Gai, using what felt like the First through Sixth Gates, smashed into Manda with exactly as much force as his future self would have someday done against a Kisame clone. A furious flurry of punches, each powered by the Gates, hit Manda square on the nose hard enough to make the massive snake’s head jerk straight downward from the momentum alone.

I’d never seen the Morning Peacock in person before.

_The problem_, I thought as I surged into motion, _is that Manda’s so damned big that Gai isn’t ever going to get to do that again_. I automatically “swallowed” the Tailed Beast Bomb’s densest form, feeling fire build in my throat and belly as the urge to let loose got stronger and stronger. But I didn’t have time to charge it anymore.

_Must go faster._

Manda had flinched, but only because an Eight Gates user could hit with tremendous force. But Manda wasn’t down, and the Gates’ drawbacks didn’t leave much room for the user to get away from opponents who survived mostly intact.

I thought of Gaara’s fight against Lee and went even faster.

I hit Manda square in the nose, where Gai had just fallen away, and it took me a moment to realize that Orochimaru wasn’t up there anymore. While Manda’s head whipped backward and the snake screamed in fury, I clung to his scales for a second with my V2-given claws and looked down.

Gai was on the ground, shaking a bit from fatigue, and Orochimaru was right behind him.

The air felt like a storm.

There was lightning in the air.

“Gai!” I shouted, trying to get his attention. Manda was coming back to life underneath my feet, and he bucked hard enough to send me flying straight up.

The last thing I saw, before Manda swallowed me whole, was a massive thunderbolt flash on the ground.

Kakashi

If there’s anything that proves that the Hokage isn’t really listening to me, it’s the fact that I was sent across the country to assassinate one merchant on another merchant’s payroll, while a third merchant sat back and waited for his rivals to be implicated in the death. _I hate_ being told to set someone up to take a fall, no matter where it is, because it inevitably means that the mission involves sending someone a “message.”

Heart attacks are easier to manage. The horse’s head and three-day terror campaign was just excessive.

But the mission is over, and I’m finally on my way home.

Things were a mess when I left. The timing for this assassination request couldn’t have been worse, and yet the timeframe had been narrow enough that only my team could have possibly handled it. If the original messenger had been any faster, I might have been able to dump the assignment on a different assassination team.

But it hadn’t, and that puts me way out in the middle of the countryside when I know I’m needed most at home.

Kei isn’t at her best. At all.

I don’t have the slightest clue how to fix it. I don’t even think it can be fixed. But whatever state she’s in, she needs as many people around her as possible. A year out of the village did nothing but wear her down to the bone, and I don’t think she was even slightly better by the time I left. I don’t think she noticed me leaving.

But now my team and I are on our way home, and hopefully Kei’s road to recovery is in front of us, too.

I stop short just as we crest a tree-lined hilltop, landing on a branch and holding up my hand for the rest of the team to slow to a stop if possible.

Crow doesn’t crash into Rat this time, at least.

Falcon, a little ahead of me, hears the rest of us slow down and stops on a branch about five meters above and to the left, looking back at me. His black captain’s cloak and pack stand out against the sunset, telling me that he’s dropped his low-level camouflage genjutsu as well.

Horse lands on the ground, a little below me, and I lift my head to try and pick up the same scent as before.

The wind is carrying the smell of thick, acrid smoke toward us.

“What is it?” Horse asks, looking up at me.

I inhale again, deeper.

Smoke, yes, but there’s also blood and the smell of cooking meat. If I concentrate, I can pick up a few foreign scents, but it’s hard to be certain of anything else from so far off. The scent still smells like it’s dissipated a fair bit.

I shake my head rapidly, trying to clear it.

“Someone attacked one of our villages,” I tell Falcon, and pause for a moment. “The only place around here is Sorayama.”

All of us take a moment to contemplate that. Falcon’s probably thinking of some kind of adaptive attack strategy we can use once we get close enough to see any of the combatants. Horse is already deciding on triage, though we won’t be able to get everything sorted out until we get there. I don’t have any idea what Crow and Rat are thinking.

Mostly, I want to know why I can almost smell something familiar in all that smoke. I can’t put my finger on it yet, though.

“Move out,” Falcon says, automatically taking point.

At full speed, kilometers disappear under our feet easily. Our mission wasn’t difficult, just tedious, so we all have most of our chakra. We should be ready for anything.

We’re within ten kilometers when we feel it.

Horse jerks to a stop, catching herself on a branch when the wave of Tailed Beast chakra hits us. Rat actually does crash, because Crow smacked into him and threw him off the branch, and Falcon notably hesitates to cross the distance between his tree and the next.

Falcon signals for me to join him on point, and I do. My mind’s already whirling.

“What’s she doing out here?” Falcon asks me.

I have no idea. “I don’t know. It doesn’t make sense.” Why would Sensei put Kei on a mission to Sorayama? She was barely moving the last time I saw her. There’s no way she could be mission-ready now.

I’ve seen other breakdowns at other times, sometimes even in the field. Kei’s had less than a week to recover. ANBU agents don’t come back into the fold for a month at a minimum after an incident like Kei’s, if not longer. And even then, a lot of us didn’t come back after psychological leave.

And now she’s using the Three-Tails’s chakra out in the field again.

I have a very bad feeling about this.

“Wolf, don’t do anything stupid,” Falcon warns me.

I turn my head so I can glare at him with Obito’s eye. I am this close to snapping at him, to saying that I don’t point out obvious things like that whenever Genma goes off on risky missions. And besides that, I’m within a month of getting my own captain’s cloak. I don’t need to be reminded to maintain objectivity.

But I don’t put any of it into words.

Falcon looks away first.

“Permission to scout ahead?” I ask him instead. My Arc Jump is a lot more reliable than it used to be, and I can use it almost fifteen times in a row without feeling too much strain—or using Obito’s eye for anything except sighting my destination.

Falcon struggles for a moment.

I’m not really a part of his team. I’ve been on solo and mixed team assignments, but ultimately this is an internship of sorts. And effectively, I’m his equal. He doesn’t need to look after me the same way he does the rest of his team—particularly Crow.

“Permission granted,” Falcon says finally. He gestures to the rest of his team, who form up closer to him. “We’ll arrive in a few minutes.”

“I’ll be a few minutes ahead of you, then,” I respond, and open Obito’s eye again.

That tree looks promising, even if it is a kilometer away. Target sighted.

I complete the hand seals for the Arc Jump and fly.

Boom.
I’m in the tree. Next one…

Boom.

I can see Sorayama on top of the hill. It’s…it’s definitely on fire. I swallow hard and then direct my attention toward the shattered roof of the Chinatsugumi compound. I need to aim somewhere intact…

Boom.

And I can see the damage that’s been done to this place.

Looking down from the roof, I can see eight corpses immediately. Three of them are in Otogakure uniforms, which explains who was attacking. Three more are the Chinatsugumi’s near-interchangeable aides, and the last two…died horribly.

Shirozora’s been burned to death by lava, and Nanami’s in a hundred shattered pieces on the ground. In the second case, the only reason I can even tell who she is…it’s just the scent of her blood that’s left as she thaws.

And Kei’s definitely been here. Her scent is thick on the ground—I must have missed her by less than ten minutes.

Sniffing around a bit more, I also identify a fourth Oto-nin and Gai’s other genin teammate, Ebisu. What’s he doing here? I can’t think of any reason a team would require both Ebisu and Kei—their specializations are too different. Not to mention that he’s a bit too old for escort missions around here.

…but then, if he wasn’t here, there might have been a chance that Kei wouldn’t have walked out of here.

The Tailed Beast chakra reeks of a last stand. I can’t say for sure what Kei’s mindset is like now, but I’m also not looking forward to finding out.

I need to get to her.

I don’t use the Arc Jump again while in the village, not when I need to devote so much time to just investigating my surroundings as fast as I can.

This entire place looks like a battlefield. I can smell snake, thick on the ground and absolutely putrid. I also find the corpses of some Kirigakure shinobi, their scents nearly masked by the snakes—and while there, I pick up Gai and Genma’s scents, too. Not their blood, granted, but I can definitely smell them and their scents aren’t old.

Shit.

Falcon is going to have a heart attack.

And that’s when I start to hear the real problem, making massive amounts of noise outside the village. I head to a roof to get a better vantage point, and see Manda’s big purple head rising over the edges of the village walls.

I’ve never seen that thing in person before, but it’s enough for me to confirm that not only was Orochimaru in the area, he still is. I recognize the Snake boss summon from Jiraiya-sama’s descriptions of him, and he’s every bit as big and ugly as I remember.
And Kei’s chakra is right. There.

I watch the battle for a moment, as Manda gets into some kind of argument with a cream-colored speck I can hardly see, and I see a green speck hit him in the nose. Gai?

Then a red one. Kei.

I Arc Jump straight to the village walls, suppressing my chakra for this approach until I can determine where would be best to jump in.

Only I can’t, because I can see Orochimaru charging a Lightning jutsu and aiming at Gai’s back and Kei’s in the air and—and fuck everything.

I push myself through the Arc Jump again, and immediately take the excess energy from the jutsu and channel it into the Chidori—right as the Lightning jutsu closes the distance toward Gai, and Kei vanishes into Manda’s gullet.

Orochimaru’s Lightning jutsu, whatever it is, hits me squarely in my left arm and arcs into me like a real bolt of lightning.

For a second, it’s like I’m on fire. Every nerve in my left arm burns—it’s not the one that’s supposed to be channeling the force of the Chidori, but now it is. I have two of them, and I’m not—it’s not supposed to be nearly this—

Screw this.

I drag Orochimaru’s chakra up my left shoulder, coaxing it because Lightning calls to Lightning entirely differently than Water or Wind do. The bolt surges up my arm, is diverted down through my stomach instead of over my heart, and up and out toward my right hand.

Where the Chidori, already charged, is abruptly overcharged and I need to do something with it before my hand is burned off.

I aim at Orochimaru’s face. “Raikiri”

The resulting bolt looks almost like a wolf’s head, ripping its way out of my grip like it’s alive, and it strikes Orochimaru dead-center as he’s staring at me in abrupt shock. He’s blown off his feet and possibly mangled by the strike, which carries the Chidori’s charge as well as whatever he put into his attempt to kill Gai.

For a frozen second or two, no one says or does anything.

Then, from behind me, I hear Gai say, “Kakashi?” in a tone of total shock.

I lower my smoking hand, which is already showing signs that it’s going to scar, and turn my head to nod at him. We have that much time.

And just then, Manda starts making choking noises. I knew it.

The side of the titanic snake’s neck starts looking like he swallowed a power pole. And then, as though by some miracle, a pair of blades—curved and jagged, looking like stone—rip their way out of the side of his throat at two different angles. After a moment more, the blades work like scissors to pry his flesh apart.

Manda looks like he’d scream if he could make his voice work.
Then, with a loud snip, the blades close together and retract.

And a V2 cloak jinchūriki Kei pries herself out of the opening like some kind of oversized maggot. Her horned head and spiky shoulders appear first, followed by the tails and her legs, and then she’s out and dropping to the ground next to the fifteen-meter scorch mark Orochimaru left on his way out.

“Kakashi?” Kei’s voice is horribly distorted, but I can still hear her surprise and exhaustion through the filter of the Three-Tails’s chakra. “How did you get here?”

“I was in the area,” I tell her. I can’t read her mood under the chakra cloak. “What do you need me to do?”

Kei blinks. Or at least the flashlight-like eyes visible in the V2 cloak narrow and widen again. “Is Sensei here?”

What? “No. Your chakra though—I wouldn’t have known you were here if not for that,” I try to explain, and start looking around.

“Shit.” Kei shakes her spiky head and doesn’t elaborate. Instead, she says, “Genma’s been badly hurt. Ebisu’s looking after him now, but he needs a hospital. And so does Gai.”

Falcon is really going to have a heart attack. Two heart attacks. At once.

“I am fine, Keisuke-chan!” Gai protests.

“Can you even use any jutsu?” Kei asks him harshly, and he falls silent. “Thought so. Gai, none of Team Chōza has to die here. Including you. We just need to be patient.”

“Patient for what?” I ask, as Kei turns to regard Orochimaru and Manda.

As we watch, Orochimaru’s husk opens its jaws and spits out a brand new copy of him. At the same time, Manda starts to shed his massive purple skin.

“Isobu sent a warning to Kurama. Hopefully, we should have backup incoming.” Kei sighs and drops into a kenjutsu ready stance. As I watch, her hands start to extrude more of the pink coral that has accumulated on her tails, and what I’ve seen stuck on the Hokage’s arms before. “But in the meantime, we keep fighting.”

“Gai,” I say, “please get to your teammates.”

“Kakashi…”

“Don’t waste your life after I just saved it!” I snap, without turning to face him. I can’t concentrate on this battle if Gai is still in danger. And unlike Kei and me, he’d last four seconds.

I’d give us, together, about ten minutes.

But with Manda already back to fighting strength and Orochimaru flicking bits of his old body off of his fingernails, I can’t help but think that holding out is all we’re going to be able to do.

“Kakashi,” Kei says, in a much quieter voice than before. Her breathing is heavier, louder than I expect. “If this goes bad, do your best to get them out of here.”

I pause. “Kei?”
“Gai’s your friend. Genma has someone waiting for him. Ebisu has ambition,” Kei says with a soft sigh that sounds strange with the Tailed Beast overtones. “I can do this alone.”

Idiot, I think with a mix of fondness and absolute exasperation. This is not remotely the time for that. I’d never leave you behind. “What’s that phrase again…two heads are better than one? I think we have that covered.”

“In more than one sense,” Kei mutters.

And then Orochimaru and Manda are ready to go, and there’s no more time to talk.

Raidō

Clearing out hostiles around Sorayama’s northern edge takes time that I’m not sure anyone still has, but it has to be done.

After killing every Oto-nin around the refugee column and dropping Crow off to help support the efforts of two summon animals, the only option we have is to strike at the source of the attack on Sorayama and cut its head off.

The problem, when Manda’s giant head rises over the village, is that I know my team is horribly outmatched.

But we’re ANBU. And Orochimaru is a missing-nin attacking the citizens of the Land of Fire. And from the looks of things, he’s also attacking Konoha-nin in the process. I can’t see Kei being sent on a solo mission at this point, so her team is in danger.

There’s never going to be any question of what our duty is.

The three of us—Horse, Rat, and I—dash around the outside of Sorayama’s walls to reach the battlefield that the main causeway has become.

We don’t make it that far.

Horse immediately splits off from our formation as soon as she spots a Konoha shinobi—Ebisu?—trying to bind someone’s injuries. This new, temporary medic-station only has one medic and one patient, but it’s cut off from the fight by a section of Sorayama’s wall.

I can see Gai limping his way up the hill, while behind him, Kakashi and Kei—in her second jinchūriki form—are trying to fend off Manda and Orochimaru together. They’re not being beaten back, but Kei’s chakra is nowhere near as overwhelming as it was initially.

They’re losing chakra too fast to be able to keep this up.

Rat rushes down the hill to help Gai make it to Horse and Ebisu faster, and I have a sudden sinking feeling as I remember that these two…well. They’re Genma’s baby chicks.

I know Gai is in all likelihood going to be capable of killing me in a single punch someday, but Ebisu doesn’t normally take that many missions outside of the village. Genma complained to me about that once, saying that Ebisu was never gonna get the promotion he wanted if he didn’t get out and do things like Kei. Just…little things I suddenly remember, and it becomes something like a warning in my head.

Who is Ebisu looking after?
Horse gives a little gasp, just as Rat finally drags Gai over to his teammate.

Both of his teammates.

My hands are suddenly shaking, worse than they have in years. My mouth is dry behind my mask, and I kneel down next to Horse and Ebisu’s patient.

It’s Genma.

I reach out with one trembling, gloved hand, and press my fingers to the uninjured side of Genma’s neck to feel for a pulse.

It’s there. But just barely.

I kneel down next to him and try to think past the litany of no no no no that is tearing through my head.

Distantly, I hear Horse muttering under her breath about fractures and contusions, with Ebisu replying just as quietly. None of that matters.

The only person who matters is lying on the ground and slowly slipping away from me.

His entire left side struggles to get any air. Only half his chest manages to expand when he draws in a shallow breath, making a faint rattling noise that sends chills right through me.

There’s blood trickling from his nose and bubbling at his lips before it drips down his broken jaw. The rest of the side of his face is swollen and purple, and barely recognizable—even if the pain is something I can make out clearly.

His left arm has been broken at least twice, with the compound fracture snapping both of his lower arm bones, and I don’t even want to know what the shoulder looks like.

The flak jacket didn’t help. Nothing helped. Nothing protected him from this.

Horse gently nudges me to one side, and I look back to see her using a medical ninjutsu on a gash Ebisu might have stitched before we got here. Going by the amount of blood on the grass around them, Genma’s femoral artery could easily have been punctured.

It doesn’t even matter how much chakra Horse pours into him. There’s no amount of her field healing that will replace surgery, at a hospital that none of us can reach in time to matter.

He’s going to die.

I don’t know what to do. I clasp Genma’s intact right hand between both of mine, biting back on the urge to scream, or swear, or cry.

“What happened?” I ask Ebisu, unable to keep the pain out of my voice.

Ebisu obviously struggles to find the words, then manages, “Our team—we split up to secure all of the civilians. And Orochimaru found Genma first.”

I’m kneeling in a pool of his blood. I have a very good idea of what that means.

“Kei-san helped us get him back,” Ebisu goes on, “but we can’t keep fighting Orochimaru forever. We can’t… None of us are strong enough for this.”
If I stay right here, I’ll be with him until the end. Part of me wants that—to stay behind and just buckle under the terrifying weight of the knowledge that Genma is going to die.

There’s no rescue coming.

There’s no chance of reinforcements.

We’re out on our own with an S-class missing-nin breathing down our necks, and our heavy hitters are almost worn down to nothing.

But if I fight alongside Kei and Kakashi, I might give them half a chance more. Kei’s an S-class shinobi on her own, and Kakashi’s not far off. If I fight, maybe I can give them just enough of an edge.

Just enough that not all of us will die today.

And I don’t really have the strength to watch Genma’s life slip through my fingers.

“ANBU-san?” Ebisu asks.

I draw a deep, shuddering breath. I know what I have to do.

Genma… It’ll probably be easier on him if he doesn’t wake up from this. It’ll be easier if he just…slips away. Waking up in pain is something I can’t ask of him, not now.

My mask seems to be suffocating, now.

I’m going to die facing Orochimaru anyway. What’s one stupid regulation at this point?

I reach up with my right hand and, with my hood still pulled low over my face, I remove my ANBU mask and set it aside on the grass next to me.

Horse makes a shocked noise, but it quickly fades. She knows what I’m going to do, for better or for worse. She gently pulls Ebisu back, just for a moment.

I lean down over Genma’s face and press my lips to his forehead. If I concentrate, I can just barely feel his breath, weak though it is, brush against my right ear. He’s alive, still. But that’s all. I just wish my thoughts could get through to him like this, but they can’t. I’m sorry, Genma. Even if you wake up I…don’t see how this will work out.

Goodbye.

“Ra—” Gai is about to say my name, but my mask is back on before he can finish it. He bites down on the rest of it. “ANBU-san, are you going to fight?”

I glance at Rat, who is by Gai’s other side. The smaller ANBU agent seems just to be…waiting.

I turn my attention back to Gai. “Horse is in charge here now.” I’m not answering Gai’s question. Of course I’m going to fight.

If Kokutō can taste the blood of the man who did this to Genma, I can die happy.

“Rat, move out.”

Rat inclines his head and starts off down the hill. I follow, drawing Kokutō from its sheath as we go.
We reach Kei and Kakashi in just a moment.

Kakashi’s cracked his mask in half again, somehow, and is fighting openly now. His ANBU katana is snapped in the middle, but he’s continuing to hang onto the sparking bottom half of the blade. I’m not sure if he’s using it as a focus for his techniques, but if he wants to keep it, I can’t exactly tell him not to.

Kei is on her knees, still clinging to the jinchūriki cloak. Her sides are heaving like she’s run all day and night, and reddish foam drips from the chakra construct’s caricature of a mouth. All three of the Beast’s tails are tipped with pinkish blades, but the tails themselves are drooping toward the ground.

I don’t see how we’re going to get out of this.

The best we can hope for is to go down fighting, buying the civilians some time to escape.

“More Konoha-nin?” Orochimaru sneers. His gold eye flit to each of us in turn. “You have a remarkable cockroach-like tendency to keep appearing out of the woodwork after I’ve exterminated your compatriots, don’t you?”

I bite down on the urge to attack him. He’s baiting us, and the first one who charges in without a plan is going to get eaten—either by him, or by the giant purple worm he calls a summon.

“Big words...coming from someone who’s had to cheat death...four times today,” Kei manages, though she’s clearly not in any shape to be making smart remarks. There’s a slowly-forming pool of blood underneath her feet, and her arms are nearly limp at her sides.

“Oh, I intend to cheat death far more times than that,” Orochimaru replies. “After all, Keisuke-kun, you only have one life to throw away. And I can see you burning it moment by moment.”

“As long as it screws you over,” Kei growls, “I don’t care.”

“You? You’re nothing more than an attempted roadblock.” Orochimaru looks at each of us, arrayed out in front of him like we actually have a chance. “Nothing you four can do will matter.”

It probably won’t. Not from where I’m standing. Kakashi and Kei are on their last legs, and Rat and I just aren’t capable of fighting on this level.

It’s hopeless.

Kushina

I’m trying to get Tatsumaki to eat her okayu without fussing when the call comes in.

My little red-haired baby isn’t the worst eater I’ve ever met—that honor belongs firmly to Kakashi when he’s in a snit—but there’s something about rice that seems to offend her today. She narrows her purple eyes at the spoon in clear dislike, and I take a moment to wonder what I have to do to get her to eat.

“Mommy, I want some!” Naruto says, and he’s already climbing up the back of Tatsumaki’s chair as he says it. As soon as his hands appear behind his sister’s shoulders, he tries to haul himself up far enough to reach the spoon.

Tatsumaki seems to take offense to this, too, and bites the spoon out of my hand, porridge and all, before her brother can get it. She starts to suck on it, denying her brother any food at all.
Typical siblings, from what Biwako-sama tells me.

“I’ll get you a bowl right now, Naruto,” I tell him, since there’s always enough food in this house. Just, um, not necessarily in Tatsumaki’s tiny bowl.

Naruto makes a face, but he climbs down from his sister’s high chair anyway.

Human, Yin Kurama interrupts. My thoughts screech to a halt, and I freeze in the middle of getting Naruto’s serving for him.

Names, please, I remind him, even as I resume getting Naruto’s dinner ready for him.

Kushina, then, Yin Kurama corrects himself. But then, more urgently, he says, My sibling just called me for help.

If Naruto notices that I’m suddenly quiet, he doesn’t let it distract him from eating.

The Three-Tails—I mean, Isobu-san? What happened?

Kei isn’t in the village, and part of the reason Minato isn’t at home at the moment is because he knows I’m still upset about that. How could he send Kei away from everyone who loves her when she’s in that state? Whatever he likes to think, Kei is still a child in some ways. She needs people she trusts looking out for her as she recovers. Or to be on hand in case she tries something desperate.

She doesn’t need to be halfway across the country with a bunch of crazy merchants, even if my cousin Akira is out there. They’re still not us. They’re not her family, and Sorayama isn’t her home.

The human village is under attack, Kurama reports, and I freeze again in shock. No. That’s not—

And Isobu says that one of the attackers is the missing-nin Orochimaru. Does that mean anything to you?

It does. I immediately head into Minato’s study, peering at the seals on the wall. No alerts were set off… Hm.

“Mommy?” Naruto asks, at the same time that Tatsumaki says, “Mama?”

“Just wait a moment, kids,” I tell them. They can sense the tension in the air now.

I pick up a spare sheet of paper. Scribbling “COME HOME NOW,” across the top, complete with a minor flashbang seal underneath, I drop the paper onto the in-tray Minato keyed to his office—and vice-versa.

The paper disappears as soon as it touches the inscribed metal tray.

Fifteen seconds later, I hear the fwish of displaced air from the kitchen that signals Minato’s arrival.

“Kushina? What’s wrong?”

I head back out into the living room in time to see Tatsumaki climbing up the front of Minato’s shirt, and squash the urge to smile at the sight. If Isobu thinks that the situation is so dangerous that he needs to call on Kurama, then Kei’s in serious trouble. Any other month, I would have said that Kei could handle Orochimaru, or nearly so.

Not this time. “Orochimaru attacked Sorayama,” I tell Minato, “and Kei’s still fighting him, right now.”
The blood drains out of Minato’s face. “Is she all right?”

“What kind of question is that?” I demand. “She’s not all right, or else Isobu wouldn’t have told Kurama he needed help!”

I never actually said that.

I’ve gotten better at reading between the lines, Kurama, I tell him. You learn a lot about someone by teaching them, and you hide things for the sake of pride when you shouldn’t.

Yin Kurama huffs, but doesn’t comment further.

“Tatsumaki, Naruto, you’re going to be staying with your big brother Tenzō, okay?” I say, turning to speak to the children as Minato vanishes again.

“What’s a ‘Chimaru?’” Naruto asks.

“Mama?” Tatsumaki repeats. “Mama go ‘way?”

“Orochimaru is a really bad man,” I tell Naruto. “So Daddy and I have to go out and scare him away.” At the least. If he’s hurt a single hair on Kei’s head, I’ll kill him. “While we’re gone, be good for Tenzō-kun, okay?”

And then Minato pops back in, dragging Tenzō and Hayate.

“Tatsumaki, Naruto, you’re going to be training together,” Minato says, as he drops both boys on the couch. “Tenzō-kun, Hayate-kun, we need you to look after Tatsumaki and Naruto.”

“No problem, Hokage-sama,” Tenzō says immediately.

Hayate looks sullen and asks, “Why?”

Minato and I exchange glances for just a moment. If I’m upset with Minato, Hayate is a dangerous mixture of confused and furious at his sister’s treatment over the last year. He doesn’t even know the entire story, but he does know that it’s definitely Minato’s fault that she’s outside of the village right now.

Minato takes a deep breath. Then, “Because your sister is in danger, and we need to go get her.”

Hayate blinks, startled out of his resentment. “But Kei is—she’s one of the strongest people in the village!”

“And she’s facing someone worse,” Minato says, his tone leaving no room for argument. “And no, you can’t come with us. We’re going to gather everyone we can spare and hit him like a thunderbolt, but I need to know Tatsumaki and Naruto can be safe here with you before we can leave. Do you understand, Hayate-kun?”

Hayate still looks alarmed, but he nods anyway.

“Thank you,” I tell Hayate sincerely, since Minato is already off in his own world and making big plans for smacking Orochimaru around. “We’ll bring her back safe, Hayate-kun.”

Hayate replies, “Thanks, Auntie Kushina.”

And then Minato takes my hand, and we’re off to get Obito.
The next thing I see is the hospital roof. Obito and Rin are both there, sitting together and out of view of the rooftop door, but they startle apart as soon as they realize that Minato and I are both there and watching them.

I doubt they got to anything especially worth being embarrassed about, but I don’t have any time for that. None of us do.

“Obito, I need you to head to Sorayama immediately,” Minato says, with no preamble whatsoever.

“Sensei?” Obito says, blankly.

“Just go, Obito,” Minato commands, “I don’t have the range, and Kei’s life depends on how fast we can all get there. I’m giving you a minute to figure out the situation on the ground and point us at Orochimaru.”

Obito’s eye widens, and his Sharingan immediately shifts into the triple-bladed Mangekyō mode. And then he’s gone.

“Hokage-sama—?” Rin begins, but I interrupt her.

“Rin, please alert the hospital to the possibility of incoming casualties,” I tell her. “We don’t know how many are going to be injured, but tell Tsunade-sama that it’s an Orochimaru-related incident. She’ll know what antivenoms to use.”

Rin’s spine is ramrod straight as she settles into crisis mode. “On it, Kushina-sama!” And Rin runs down the stairs.

I start to hear the hospital coming to life underneath our feet as Rin triggers some kind of code. Code black, possibly, but I don’t remember the procedure for a massive influx of casualties.

And then Obito reappears, scything out of the air as though he’s made of ribbons.

“How bad is it?” Minato asks him as soon as he’s solid again.

“Everything’s on fire, Sensei,” Obito replies. He looks shaken. “But Kei’s not the only one there, Sensei. Kakashi’s there too.”

Minato’s hand tightens on mine, and I feel my heart try to leap into my throat to match. “What?” I demand.

“I wouldn’t have been able to find the place so fast otherwise.” Obito looks like he wants to panic, but can’t. There’s too much at stake. “We have to help them!”

“I’ll go first,” I say, before Minato can give any orders. To Minato, I say, “You need to get the Third to take over for the day. We can’t afford to have too many of us outside of the village, and you know I can take the first hit if I have to. Even from Orochimaru.”

Minato still doesn’t look convinced. “But Kushina…”

“I am a kunoichi of Konohagakure,” I remind him. “And I go where I’m needed most.”

“…If you’re sure…” Minato noticeably hesitates.

“I’m sure.” I turn back to Obito and hold out my hand. “Kurama and I will be the first ones out. Make sure to come back for Minato as soon as I’m clear.”
Obito looks at Minato for confirmation.

“She’s the one going,” Minato reminds him. He looks and sounds fond, but also resigned. “I’ll be back in a flash.”

Obito hesitates, for just a second. Then he grabs my hand, and we vanish through a hole in the world.

The place we arrive in is...weird. I’ve never been inside Obito’s Kamui dimension, but I didn’t expect to see plain, slightly creepy columns of stone that reached off into an ever-expanding black void. It’s almost cold here, with no wind or sun, and I shiver for just a moment.

“I can open up the second portal now,” Obito says as I stop acting like a tourist. He still looks pained at the idea of just dropping me off in the middle of a warzone. He’s the only one who’s seen in, so he might be right to worry.

He’s also the one who’s sparred with me most often since I had Naruto, so I think his worry might be a bit much.

Kurama and I are much more in sync than we were the last time we tried this. Ready?

You say that like there’s a chance I’m not. Yin Kurama yawns widely, then starts channeling a torrent of his chakra out from the seal. He doesn’t need to reinforce me right now, but if he does...well, I’m hardly going to complain. The second stage of a chakra cloak is a lot easier to take hits with than it is with the first.

My eyes itch a little bit as Kurama’s eyes overlay mine, turning them red and fox-pupiled rather than a plain dark purple.

Obito starts to back up.

And then the red aura surrounds me like a bubble, letting me see this monochrome world through a hazy red filter. After a few seconds’ pause, the red aura intensifies until my normal body disappears from view under a Tailed Beast cloak exoskeleton.

“Looking good, Kushina,” Obito says. “You’re up to five tails now. And your hair is acting up a bit, but...”

“I’m going for six, minimum,” I tell him, through a voice half-garbled by Kurama’s chakra. The world isn’t red now—it’s just more intense, like I can see everything.

If you want six, I can give you six, Yin Kurama comments. He folds his arms over his chest. But give it a moment. Let’s see what you can do with this and your human strength.

“Okay, Kushina...I’m going out first, and then you pop out,” Obito says. He’s bouncing anxiously on the balls of his feet. “They won’t be ready for you.”

“Sounds good to me.” I drop into an animalistic crouch.

Obito disappears into midair as he uses Kamui again, and I wait for the moment to strike.
I wouldn’t admit it to him, but seeing Raidō in his Falcon uniform felt like getting a sword to the gut and feeling it twist. After what had happened to Genma while we were supposed to be teammates—when I was the only S-class ninja out here—seeing Raidō at all brought a wave of guilt that I couldn’t afford to feel.

Not when I could practically feel the V2 cloak falling apart around me.

Isobu was being as helpful as possible, but Orochimaru wasn’t a pushover even if I was channeling a fragment of a god. And killing him four times in a single fight had been something I didn’t think we were going to get a chance to try again.

I coughed up another mouthful of bloody foam. Every breath was a knife sliding through my ribs. Even if the fucking Sword of Kusanagi couldn’t actually pierce a Tailed Beast chakra cloak, blunt force alone was enough to break a rib. Isobu was doing what he could to stave off the pain, but the actual bone refused to just be healed.

Beside me, Kakashi’s chakra was down to practically nothing. Though he’d stopped using the Chidori or any variations on it, Obito’s eye ate through his chakra like a particularly vicious piranha, and he was probably about five minutes from dropping into a coma.

And the last ANBU agent, Rat, wasn’t even worth mentioning. What chakra signature I could sense pointed more toward genjutsu than surviving a gigantic punching match between kaiju.

To make a long story short: We were completely screwed.

Then things started going to hell.

Isobu actually had to stop me and say, Your body can’t handle the strain anymore.

You’ve gotta be fucking kidding me!

If I let you use any more of my chakra, Isobu growled, all you’ll do is die in horrific agony faster.

I was going to tell him that I’d accept that kind of price, just to keep Orochimaru at bay a little while longer. But Isobu didn’t give me a choice, and I felt the V2 cloak dissolve around me.

In a way, I was lucky I was already on my knees. I wouldn’t have been able to keep my balance if I wasn’t. It also let me see that the bloody pinkish foam had changed, somehow, to a trickle of nothing but blood. Without Isobu’s chakra preventing me from seeing or feeling the worst of my injuries, I also abruptly realized that I had a gash in my side that had failed to close properly and was bleeding sluggishly down my hip and thigh on that side.

I couldn’t even remember how I’d gotten it.

I pressed my hands to my side in an attempt to stem the flow of blood either through chakra or just by sheer force, and the pain alone made me wobble on my knees.

“Kei?!” Kakashi was instantly there next to me, trying to keep me from just falling over sideways. It worked, but I couldn’t stop the bleeding and the edges of my vision were going black. “Stay with me, now.”
“Not...sure I...can,” I wheezed, trying not to dribble blood down onto his armor. What power I had, I tried to push toward the wound. Even a crappy patch job would keep me up at least a little longer, right?

My chakra fizzled halfway to the wound. Between the pain disrupting my concentration and the sheer lack of chakra, I couldn’t even stop the bleeding.

“Isn’t that interesting?” Orochimaru’s voice range out. I heard his signature, low laugh a moment later.

Rat and Raidō—whose chakra screamed anger and fear in nearly equal proportions—immediately tried to block Orochimaru’s line of sight, but it was pointless. Predators could sense weakness.

“Out of my way,” Orochimaru said, and then Raidō and Rat just weren’t there. I caught a glimpse of Raidō’s black cloak landing down the hill with a bone-jarring thud, and Kakashi’s arms were ripped away from me just a moment later.

I didn’t hit the ground. I didn’t have that much time.

One moment I was swaying on the spot, and the next Orochimaru’s neck was longer than it should have been. I was in the air, legs dangling down, and Orochimaru’s teeth were holding me up by the muscle of my left shoulder.

Compared to everything else, it didn’t hurt that much at first. I already had a hole in my side, a broken rib, and the bones in my arms felt cracked on top of everything else.

And then he dropped me.

Hitting the ground jarred every injury I had, making my mind blank out in pain for a few precious seconds.

And then the burning started.

I must have passed out, because the next thing I saw was Isobu’s four-story face.

“What the heck?” I asked, looking around in shock as I reassessed my control over the local gravity. I didn’t need to be upright to function, but still. What was I doing here? “Isobu?”

The bite—!

“Well, well, well. What have we here?” Orochimaru’s voice seemed to murmur from everywhere at once. It replaced the sound of the wind and waves that should have been dominant. “What an interesting little girl you are, Keisuke-kun.”

Shit.

I retreated to Isobu’s head-spikes, looking for the source of the sound. With Orochimaru’s laughter as background music, every move I made felt like it could be my last. While Isobu shifted underneath me and attempted to locate whatever was laughing so damn much, I took a moment to panic.

I’d known that Orochimaru’s bite could spread the Curse Seal. I’d known that the Curse Seal of Heaven had enough of Orochimaru’s soul in it to essentially function as a fucking Horcrux.

“I always did want to see what a jinchūriki’s power would feel like,” Orochimaru said with a faint
“I just never thought it would be so easy! Your soul is hardly even attached. There’s plenty of room for a new...tenant.”

Fuck fuck fuck.

This has to do with your reincarnation experience, doesn’t it? Isobu asked, even as his huge tails churned the water. Your soul has too much weighing it down from its past life.

Up until now, that wasn’t a problem! I hissed back at him. I wasn’t normal, no, but I’d made it work. With a few...speed bumps, like Id and the Dreamer. I’d at least managed to survive everything up until now.

I felt Isobu radiating skepticism.

Or at least it was a problem I could handle! I resisted the urge to beat my head against the nearest giant turtle spike. And now we have an extra roommate, and I—can you even get rid of him?

Not easily, Isobu said, shifting uncomfortably.

God dammit. What do I have to do to get him out of here?

I didn’t get to hear his answer. At that moment, something appeared out of thin air and landed on Isobu’s back next to me.

For a moment, I didn’t understand what I was seeing. It looked like a huge white carpet for a moment, draped across Isobu’s shell. And then I realized that it was moving.

It was a carpet of hundreds of thousands of white snakes.

As I reeled back in horror, the serpents seemed to flow together, surging up and into a strange, eerie shape that...oh hell.

Orochimaru’s “true,” post experimentation form. A snake nearly the size of a summoned creature, but made of a swarm of other snakes. As Isobu’s shell pitched and rolled beneath my feet, the monster fully assembled itself. It even had a patch of long, lank black hair that framed its face exactly like Orochimaru’s hair did his.

“Well, what do you think of it, Keisuke-kun? My true form?” The giant serpent tilted its head to one side and showed off all of its fangs.

Isobu, burn the seal off! I watched, paralyzed in terror, as Orochimaru drew his head back for a strike.

But you’ll die if you use any more of my chakra!

Do it anyway! I’d rather die than be a new Orochimaru clone!

Isobu considered my proposal for maybe half a second. This will hurt.

And then I burned.

Kakashi

I hit the ground and roll, avoiding the worst of the impact. But it takes me a moment to get air back into my lungs after being backhanded by Orochimaru’s right arm. I don’t think anything’s broken, but I still can’t get to my feet immediately. My vision goes black when I try.

But I can look up. And the bottom drops out of my stomach.

He has Kei.

His neck is too long, stretched out until it reaches Kei.

And Kei—

His head is—his jaws are holding her in the air. And she’s still not reacting.

I have to get over there, but I can’t—I don’t have any chakra left. I can’t even use Obito’s eye anymore. If I do, I won’t be—

Orochimaru lets go of her.

Kei drops to the ground, unmoving.

Orochimaru’s head retracts toward his body. He turns to me, grinning with all of his fangs.

My eye darts back to Kei. I keep Obito’s eye closed. I need to conserve my chakra for when he gets close enough for me to kill him.

“Are you...angry at me?” Orochimaru asks me. He wipes blood—Kei’s blood—from his mouth. “Do you hate me?”

I manage a growl, but I can’t—I can’t get up. My limbs feel like lead, weighing me down with exhaustion and pain. I only have enough chakra for a single, desperate attack, and I still can’t get to my feet. I have to wait for him to get closer…

“A Sharingan like yours is useless to me, Kakashi-kun,” Orochimaru said thoughtfully. “I wonder. Can I make it worth something...if I kill the one you love?”

Then Kei starts screaming.

“Or perhaps not.” Orochimaru glances back at Kei as soon as the swell of Tailed Beast chakra starts again. “What—?”

Kei’s thrashing on the ground and she’s still screaming, clutching at her left shoulder. At the bite. At what Orochimaru did to her.

“This shouldn’t be—” Orochimaru cuts himself off, frowning.

If I could just—

A burst of Tailed Beast chakra bowls us both over, as energy the same color as blood fountains out of Kei’s shoulder. But it’s not blood, because it forms the shape of one of the Three-Tails’s massive hands and wraps back around her, forming a new V2 cloak.

But all I can hear is the Three-Tails’s roar start to harmonize with Kei’s.

Orochimaru’s back is still turned away from me, looking at the actual threat, when the air distorts in front of me.
I jolt in surprise, but Obito’s hand reaches for mine. His eye is trained on Orochimaru, not Kei, and I want to ask him what the fuck took him so long—and then the air rips open again, in front of Obito’s face.

And another jinchūriki appears, swathed in a second V2 cloak with six tails and a series of bone structures overlapping her body.

Kushina explodes into motion, going after Orochimaru like an angry mother bear. If angry mother bears had godlike power and could fire waves of reddish-orange, concentrated devastation from their mouths.

I blink and half of the hillside—along with the entirety of Manda disappears in one blast.

“Kakashi, what’s happening to Kei?” Obito asks, shaking me to get my attention back. His entire body screams fear, in a way that almost doesn’t make sense to me for a moment. He wasn’t here.

“Orochimaru bit her and now she’s—” Wait, no. “Where the hell have you been?”

Obito shoves a bottle of pills into my hand. “Take one. Two would cause a chakra overdose.”

Soldier pills, then. I’m definitely going to feel this in the morning, but with luck I’ll actually live long enough for the crash.

“Seriously, don’t even think about it,” Obito says. “Rin changed the recipe for these ones.”

Fine. I take one pill and swallow it whole.

I don’t get an instant surge of energy, but I do gain the ability to stand on my own. It’s an improvement. Anything’s an improvement over lying helpless on the ground while Kei screams in agony ten meters away.

The instinct to go to her is nearly overwhelming, even in the face of the Three-Tails’s raging chakra. I don’t even know any medical ninjutsu, and I don’t have a way to calm her down without the Sharingan. Using it would probably convince the Three-Tails to kill me.

But she’s in pain. She’s in so much pain, and it’s killing me to see her like this.

My hands clench, nails trying to bite through the material of my gloves.

Kei’s surrounded by a whirling storm of Tailed Beast chakra that I don’t think we’re going to be able to get through. Maybe Kushina might, but going by the Adamantine Chakra Chain barrier she put up around us while she goes after Orochimaru, I can’t be certain that she’ll do anything to help.

She’s done enough to keep Orochimaru away from us. Obito and I need to do the rest.

“Kakashi, Sensei’s gonna be waiting on me to get back to Konoha and pick him up.” Obito is still unable to tear his eyes away from Kei, but can’t risk getting close and wasting chakra avoiding her attacks. His voice quavers. “I’m… I’ll have to leave you here, to get him.”

I consider that. Then, “Get the injured first.”

“Injured—who got hurt?” Obito blurts, looking around the battlefield as though he hasn’t seen it before.

I resist the urge to punch him. Kei’s still screaming, but Obito needs the facts as fast I can manage. With luck, we might be able to get everyone out right now. “ANBU agents Rat and Falcon are both down. Ebisu and Horse set up a medical station behind that bend in the hill, and their patients need immediate transfer to Konoha. Get everyone out.”

“What about you?” Obito asks.

“I’m fine.” I’m at least functioning, which is better than most people can say now. Genma’s probably dying, Gai needs to avoid permanent damage from the Gates, Falcon and Rat still haven’t gotten up after Orochimaru backhanded them… “Get the others out.”

“Can you handle…this?” Obito asks, his eye still trained on Kei.

She’s gone quiet, but in the V2 cloak she’s just bashing her shoulder against the ground again and again. She’s still making an animalistic panting noise, like a paw’s been caught in a trap but the initial shock is over. Her glowing eyes are shut tight, and there’s no way I’m going to be able to make contact with the Sharingan without getting mauled. Kei probably barely remembers who I am.

Still, I have to do something.

“I’ll have to. Go,” I tell him.

Obito casts one last look at me, hesitating for just a moment, and runs in the direction where I last saw Falcon and Rat.

And that leaves me alone with Kei.

She’s brought one of those chakra-coated paws up and is digging the claw-tips into her left shoulder. She’s doubled over on the ground, three tails writhing in the air and her forehead against the dirt of the new crater she’s dug into the earth.

There’s something precise about her actions now. Controlled. Through the pain, she still has a goal in mind.

I make it to the edge of the crater and slide down the side. If all of this has a purpose, I need to help her see it through.

Obito

I make it to the downed ANBU agents first, following the skid-marks in the torn-up grass and mud. It looks like someone sanded the entire hillside down, or maybe the aftermath of a flood, and for a second I can’t see the Rat or Falcon-masked agents—until I concentrate with my Sharingan and can see their chakra faintly moving in all the debris.

I touch Rat first, since he’s closer, and yank him into my Kamui dimension as soon as I’ve got a grip on his uniform. As he streams away into thin air, the second ANBU agent—the captain with the black cloak and the black sword—sits up against a shattered boulder.

“...Obito?” asks a familiar voice, and I stare at the bleary-eyed ANBU captain, who’s lost half his mask. What’s left of it is dangling down off one ear by the string, and it gives me a full view of Raidō Namiashi’s unfocused eyes.

“Just hang on a minute. I’ll get you out of here,” I tell him urgently. With Rat in my Kamui dimension, I can get Raidō out of trouble right now. “Take my hand, okay?”

Raidō blinks slowly, but then focus comes back into his expression. “What…about Genma?”
“I’ll go get him next. Just take my hand first.” I grasp Raidō’s bloodied right arm. “It’ll just be a second.”

“Nope. Getting both of you.” And I yank him out of this dimension entirely, watching as he vanishes into a hole in the air.

Okay, Genma now.

I’m pretty fast when I want to be. And I have all the motivation in the world right now.

I make it to the makeshift medical station with a quick Body Flicker, instead of using Kamui. I might step on someone if I do, and I really can’t afford to make mistakes here.

The ANBU agent with the Horse-patterned mask is using some kind of healing jutsu on Genma when I get there, with Ebisu and Gai sitting anxiously nearby. And Genma’s looking like a couple steps short of being dead—almost like someone picked him up and swung him at a tree or something?—so I need to get him out of here right now.

“Obito?” Ebisu asks, when I skid to a stop next to him. “I don’t understand. How are you here?”

“Cheating.” I don’t elaborate on it, instead turning to the ANBU agent on site. To her, I say, “I already got Falcon and Rat out. I’ll pull anyone else you need me to, but I only have a few seconds before I go back for the Hokage.”

Horse’s eyes flick to Gai and Ebisu in turn. Genma’s a given.

“And you?”

“I’ll stay.” Horse jerks her head in the direction of the battle, where Kushina is still chasing Orochimaru around like a particularly tricky mouse.

If I look closely, I can see the remnants of three huge structures almost as big as the Konoha main gates, and a good dozen craters dotting the landscape. I have no idea where they came from, but going by the impact craters and the way they just stop at the edge of Kushina’s Adamantine Chakra Chain barrier… Well. Any attack they were meant to block probably would have killed us all, too.

And between them and us, but still inside the barrier, are Kakashi and Kei.

They’ve somehow made their own crater now, expanding slowly from where the two of them are still...talking? Whatever is going on down there, it’s going to have another few seconds to keep happening before I get Sensei and stop everything.

“Okay, Gai first. Be careful where you step, okay?” I say sharply, and grab Gai’s shoulder. As he disappears into the Kamui world, I hold out my other hand to Ebisu and say, “Watch the landing. Genma’s probably going to end up where you do.”

“Only probably?” Ebisu asks, frowning.

“It’s not exactly as easy as marking a target,” I tell him. “Just be ready to catch him.” And I open Kamui again, and then Ebisu’s gone.

And finally, I put my hand on Genma’s uninjured shoulder and shift him over to the other side of the portal as gently as I can. He’s still breathing, but if I’m not careful it might not be for much longer.

“I’m out now,” I tell Horse. “Good luck.”

Horse nods and stands. The next thing I know, she vanishes—and reappears somewhere else, probably. This stage of the battle is over.

And then I use Kamui, and land on all fours as soon as I reappear in what amounts to my own private world.

My private world is crowded as all hell now.

Between Team Chōza and half of the ANBU team, it’s actually more crowded than I can ever remember it being. Even back when Kei, Kakashi, and I all talked with the Thr—with Isobu-san, it hadn’t been full of people. Even when I’d killed people with Kamui, it hadn’t had this many people.

And now everyone’s in pain.

Genma’s still unconscious, but Gai and Ebisu are both hovering as well as they can and making sure he doesn’t crash while nobody’s healing him. Rat’s out cold still, but Raidō—he’s lying next to Genma and holding onto his good hand, though he doesn’t look all that much better.

I open a new Kamui portal to the Konoha hospital’s roof. Time to get people moving.

I have to head out first, and I drop out of Kamui right in front of Sensei and Tsunade. And about fifteen medics, nurses, and doctors, all waiting for the first casualties.

Sensei’s arms are crossed and he feels keyed up in a way I haven’t felt in years, but otherwise he seems to be under control. “Ready?” he asks me.

Tsunade gives him a flat look from behind his back.

“Not...quite yet,” I tell him. “Transporting wounded now.”

Tsunade nods and I take a moment to steady myself before I try and pull Genma out. The last thing I want is to accidentally cut his foot off or something because I can’t gather enough chakra to manage the holes in reality.

I have to strain, though, when I realize that Raidō refuses to let go of Genma’s hand, and I’m sure not going to cut their fingers off. I feel a stinging sensation in my eye as something gives out, and Sensei yelps in sudden shock as I feel something warm start to run down my face.

By the time I get both Raidō and Genma through, spiraling out of the air like twisted bolts of cloth, my eye is definitely bleeding. I’m wobbling dangerously on my feet for a second, and then everything seems to happen really quickly.

Some of the medics grab Raidō and Genma away from where they’ve landed, transporting them away on stretchers. Tsunade puts her hand over my eye, while Sensei tries to steady my shoulders.

“Sorry, Sensei,” I manage when the two of them force me to sit down on the rooftop, though I can’t see anything and I feel a bit fuzzy around the edges. Chakra exhaustion cannot have worse timing, since it’s always bad, but this is probably not the best time for this shit. How many times did I use Kamui there?

“He’s too low on chakra to use this...jutsu for much longer.” Tsunade’s voice is harsh. “You—
Higurashi, get a protein supplement and at least one mixed meal. We’re going to be relying partly on soldier pills. And get Nohara here for dosages and for a second opinion on this eye.”

“I have a few of those,” I tell her, even as her healing chakra worms its way into my eye and starts fixing up the damage I’ve done to myself. “Rin-chan gave them to me.”

“Nohara will be able to do more with this eye than I can, though,” Tsunade mutters. “She’s been the one looking after you, hasn’t she?”

“Uh-huh.”

“Obito, how many more people do you have in the Kamui dimension?” Sensei asks.

“Just ANBU agent Rat and Ebisu and Gai, but Gai used the Gates, I think.” If I concentrate, I can sort of tell where they are. As soon as I have a bit more chakra, I’ll be able to get them all out.

“Ebisu’s…I don’t think he’s hurt. But Rat didn’t wake up when I pulled him in, so I need to get him out next.”

“You heard him,” Tsunade says, probably to her medics. “ANBU procedures for the agent. And if you forgot about it for Falcon, I will find you.”

A couple different voices say “Yes, Tsunade-sama!” before running off. The door to the roof opens and closes a few times.

Sensei’s still hovering. “Do you think you’ll be able to manage a few return trips?”

“Maybe,” I tell him. “But using Kamui like this eats up chakra really fast. It’s not gonna be easy.”

The door to the roof slams open, and I’m sure it takes a chunk out of the wall it’s attached to.

“Obito!”

But that’s definitely Rin’s voice, so who cares about the door? Tsunade’s hand pulls back, and I catch a quick glimpse of Rin before she makes me close my eye again.

“How much have you been using your eye?” Rin asks.

“A...lot. I kind of need it to see, so—ow!” I yelp, as Rin flicks my ear. “Okay, okay, uh...fourteen times?”

“If it was any time but now, I’d make you stop,” Rin says, and her voice is shaking. Oh no. “But I can still fix the damage—and you can go out again. Bring everyone home.”

“And the dosages, Nohara?” Tsunade asks.

“One pill should be sufficient,” Rin tells her. “But two is dangerous together. He’d need some kind of supplement…”

“Already taken care of,” Tsunade says, as the roof door opens again. Someone shoves a cold glass into my hand. “Drink the entire thing, then eat the pill. Then you can start using that jutsu again.”

The glass turns out to contain a thick, moderately disgusting nutrient shake. It tries to taste like strawberry, but the results are pretty much just vaguely sweet, cold mush. Either way, the cold means I can’t really taste the bitter aftertaste I know is supposed to be there, so I just slurp the whole thing down and hope for the best.

And then the soldier pill, which I don’t bite because biting it means I’d just overdose on it all at once instead of getting a steady supply of chakra on top of mine.

“How do you feel now?” Rin asks.

I pause, to assess my chakra levels. I nod to myself, and Rin pulls her hand back so I can open my eye. Which isn’t bleeding anymore. “I’m gonna be bringing Rat out next. Don’t let him drop, okay?”

“You won’t need to worry about that,” Tsunade says.

In short order, Rat is bundled up in a stretcher and carried off by medical ninja. Gai and Ebisu emerge from the Kamui dimension after that, shaken but mostly intact. Ebisu follows the medics that drag Gai off for a medical assessment, and I’m still feeling decent enough.

Not sure how much time I have left before the crash, but I can get Sensei out to Kushina, Kei, and Kakashi with no problem.

I hold out my hand to him. “We can go now.” Overall, I think all of that might’ve taken a few minutes. Not the best time, but it’s workable.

“Take this with you, then,” Tsunade says, and she bites down on her thumb. Even as the injury is already closing, the blood vanishes in a puff of smoke—which also drops a Katsuyu into Tsunade’s hands.

This chunk of Katsuyu is about the size of a cat, and Tsunade immediately drops it onto Sensei’s shoulder.

“Good idea,” Sensei replies, nodding. “So, Ino-Shika-Chō can be deployed in roughly ten minutes. I think once Kushina and I meet up, we might be able to handle some of the transportation problems, but just in case… Obito, do you know where Shimika and Shikane are at this time of day?”

“No, but I can find out,” I tell Sensei.

“Get them and be ready to use the Flying Thunder God Formation. I don’t want to tax you any more than I have to, and it’s just as reliable. As soon as I’m at Sorayama, come back here and find them. They should help you get Inoichi and his team out here.”

Maybe more reliable, actually. It uses three people’s chakra instead of just me, and it doesn’t need to open multiple portals to get anywhere. It’s just that the area has to be marked ahead of time…and I didn’t have any of the permanent seals on me at the time.

Dammit, I’m going to have to start carrying Sensei’s kunai around everywhere, aren’t I?

This is probably part of the reason why Sensei doesn’t want me to rely so much on Kamui. Using Kamui means I’m the gatekeeper whether I like it or not, and it’s not always the best option. Like right now.

I grab Sensei’s hand and activate Kamui again. As soon as he’s vanished in midair, I yank myself into the Kamui dimension as well.

Time to deploy the next S-class ninja.

Kakashi

As soon as Obito leaves, I slide down into the crater and head closer to Kei.
She’s not screaming anymore, not in the same sense. Instead, the Three-Tails’s voice has overridden hers, and all I can hear is roaring that sounds like a gigantic beast in agony. She’s still entirely enveloped in the V2 chakra cloak, and chakra bubbles off her form in a horrible boiling froth. Kei and the Three-Tails bash themselves into the dirt, tearing at their “skin” as though infested by fleas.

They are officially out of control. And I’m still getting closer to them.

This is probably a bad plan.

“Wolf!” calls a voice, once I’m at the bottom.

Kei’s on the ground and on her knees, and she is making horrible noises under her breath that sound like labored breathing. But in a creature a lot bigger than she actually is.

I’m not sure I can call back to Horse and not trigger something.

“Haaaaah…” Kei lifts her head, and her glowing eyes stare sightlessly up at the edge of the crater. Up, up, toward the sky.

Her jaw hinges open, jerking as the angle expands to something impossible for human mouths. I can almost hear bone cracking.

As I watch, the bubbles of chakra consolidate into one bite-sized purple-ball. Kei and the Three-Tails lunge upward and chomp down on it, pulling the dense ball into the body of the V2 cloak. And as soon as she does so, the area immediately around her is flattened as though by one of Nagato’s ninjutsu.

Oh no.

“Kei!” I shout, just as Horse reaches the edge of the crater. To my fellow ANBU agent, I order, “Horse, don’t you dare get any closer.”

“And you?” Horse asks, but I’m not sure if her attention is even on me. It’s very, very hard to ignore Kei at this point.

She’s turning in our direction. Her eyes are like searchlights in the dark red of her face.

I have to get her to stop. I don’t know if I can calm her down without using Obito’s eye, but I can’t just leave her here to suffer.

Something changes.

Kei jerks her horned head. Her right arm comes up and her claws hit her right shoulder hard enough to make the entire chakra cloak ripple, and something wriggles at the strike. Differently than the cloak. Separately.

And with a spurt of blood and chakra, a white snake rips itself free of Kei’s body. It’s at least half a meter long, and it’s covered in blood and chakra burns in nearly equal measure. And its chakra, to Obito’s eye, moves exactly like Orochimaru’s.

What the actual fuck.

The snake flips itself onto its belly, drawing its black-marked head up in a sudden hiss as Kei stares down at it.
Kei blasts it with the Tailed Beast Bomb.

The snake—and half of the crater, and a third of the hill we’re on—vanishes into a massive red, concussive blast of energy. The blowback sends me slamming backward into the exposed dirt walls of the crater, knocking air right out of me, and I slide down the side while coughing and gasping from the hit.

Horse is gone.

But Kei’s still there, and she turns back to me after obliterating the hillside.

“Kei,” I try, and she doesn’t respond.

Except to drop onto all fours and start growling.

Shit.

I have enough chakra for an Arc Jump. I aim for a point behind Kei. If I tag the area, I have someplace to run if this gets more dangerous than it is already.

But as soon as I turn Obito’s eye in Kei’s direction, I realize the main problem.

Though my view isn’t as accurate as that of a Byakugan, I can see chakra flowing outward from the seal on Kei’s chest in an unending flood. Some of it is directed toward the shoulder wound where Orochimaru bit her—and where the snake popped out—to repair the damage. But the vast majority is just covering Kei up and smothering her underneath its power, and I can’t actually see any way to stop it.

Kei’s never really lost control of the Three-Tails’s chakra before. What the hell is going on? The Tailed Beast chakra hasn’t stopped flowing for a moment, even though the Orochimaru problem is being dealt with. And even if Kei isn’t in any shape to deal with the seal, the Three-Tails should have cut her off to keep her safe from that overwhelming strength.

A theory creeps up on me, and for a moment I can’t even breathe from the sheer horror of the idea.

Kei’s seal is cracking. She can’t control it. The Three-Tails can’t control it.

They’re dying.

This is just their last gasp before the end, and they’re going to die screaming. Slavering and insane, and unable to even comprehend what’s happening.

Kei and the Three-Tails hack up another mouthful of bloodied foam. They aren’t growling anymore. They’re just on their knees, coughing and shaking in place.

I need to do something. And I’ve been so useless at that all day that anything starts to look like a good idea.

“Kei!” I shout, trying to get her attention. To gauge her reaction. Can she even still hear me?

Those lamp-like eyes turn toward me, but there’s no recognition or understanding there. The growl starts up again, but weaker and stuttering as the coughing continues.

I take a step closer. “Are you still in there?”

Her tails lash the air, and her eyes haven’t left my face. For an insane moment, I’m almost glad that my ANBU mask is destroyed. She can tell that it’s me if she tries, not just a faceless assassin. Not just an enemy needing to be cut down.

No matter what’s going on in that head of hers, she hasn’t attacked me. Maybe she won’t.

“You can hear me, can’t you?” I try, raising my voice to be heard over the constant buzz of chakra. She’s not emitting any kind of concentrated chakra wave, but the second she does and if the hit connects, I’m dead. “Easy, now…”

Kei lifts her arm, and the growl intensifies into a sharp snarl of anger—or maybe pain. Either way, I can see the Tailed Beast chakra concentrating, and reach for the Arc Jump to get out of the way before she reflexively murders me—

And then Obito pops out of the air in front of me, followed immediately by the Hokage. By Sensei. A Sensei with a slug on his shoulder, but it’s him.

Sensei takes one look at the situation and immediately Body Flickers to me—with Obito in hand and somehow Horse is right there—and uses the Flying Thunder God jutsu to get us out of Kei’s range.

From a distance, we hear Kei’s Tailed Beast voice rise from a snarl into a scream of pain, and I might kick Sensei in the shin to get him to let go of me. Even if, in the barrier, a shockwave throws a huge cloud of dirt into the air.

He winces and drops me. “What in the world are you thinking right now?” Sensei demands anyway.

“What even just happened?” Obito asks, staring back in the direction we came from.

Which is inside the barrier. Inside of the shining golden dome, a black blast of energy hits the apex of the structure and explodes harmlessly inside of it. Kushina’s barriers are something else, but the question after that is “where is Kushina?”

Kushina, as it turns out, is about a kilometer away—with the golden chains still trailing from her back—and still chasing Orochimaru.

“Kei’s seal is breaking,” I tell Sensei. I never use the “don’t argue with me” tone on him, but this seems like an appropriate time to start. “I need a way to either strengthen it or shut it down.”

“The Sharingan works, doesn’t it?” Sensei asks.

“But we told—we promised Isobu-san that we wouldn’t do that to him,” Obito says. His eye is wide, and it’s almost like he’s almost unable to understand why it might be necessary to save human life.

I wince. I do understand. Both sides of this. Dammit. I would do nearly anything to save Kei...but I won’t do that. Ripping out the Three-Tailed Beast’s mind and supplanting it with my will? Never again.

“I have this. But you’ll have to get close enough to use it,” Sensei tells me, even as he produces a Chakra Suppressing Seal for me out of his kunai holster. Katsuyu also slides across his arm and onto my shoulder. As I adjust to the slug’s presence on my shoulder blades and take the seal, Sensei says, “And I won’t be helping.”

“Orochimaru?” Obito asks.

Sensei nods. As I watch, his eyelids turn orange and his irises are replaced by square pupils on a
He won’t have a chance to hurt any of you again.”

Considering that Sensei doesn’t even really know what Orochimaru did, I still manage to feel oddly comforted by that thought. But it’s not time for chitchat.

“Obito, get me back in there,” I tell him, as Sensei turns away to chase Orochimaru with Kushina and the Nine-Tails.

Obito holds out his hand and away we go.

Obito drops me just inside the barrier, then teleports out. I don’t ask why, just like I didn’t ask why Sensei only gave me the one Chakra Suppressing Seal in the first place. Obito’s abilities are too useful somewhere else.

I guess I should have some pride in Sensei’s trusting that I can avoid getting killed long enough to use this seal on Kei, but I’m too worried to think about it much.

“Kakashi-san, should you really be attempting this on your own?” Katsuyu asks, from my back. She at least remembers me from last time, then.

“Probably not,” I admit, but I make my way back toward Kei anyway. Obito’s eye is open, but I only need it to mark my range for the Arc Jump. I don’t plan on using the Mangekyō Sharingan form on the Three-Tails.

Kei’s V2 cloak is rippling and heaving, and the Sharingan helpfully informs me that the seal has destabilized even more, over the course of a minute at most. What is left of Kei’s chakra only surfaces briefly in the roiling storm that belongs to the Three-Tails, and every second I waste just looking at them means that they get closer and closer to dying.

She looks up at me as I approach her, by sliding down the new crater wall. At the same time, Katsuyu snakes up from my shoulder blades so she’s wrapped around the back of my neck like some kind of bizarre, squishy scarf.

“As soon as the chakra dies down, please heal her,” I tell Katsuyu under my breath.

“Of course, Kakashi-san,” says the slug, and I can almost hear a bit of affront in her tone.

I turn my attention away from Katsuyu and back toward Kei. She’s making that low animalistic rumble, but there’s a new tone to it now. Somewhere in the back of the cacophony, there’s a few tones that sound like...notes? A bit like whale song. Something...sad like that.

They had better not be saying goodbye.

“Kei, do you remember what I told you a few days ago?” I ask, raising my voice a little.

Kei’s growling pauses for a moment, and she tilts her spiky head to listen in. The whale song noise doesn’t stop, and her V2 chakra cloak continues to writhe against her form...but it’s progress. She can hear me.

“The last time you were in the village,” I begin, concentrating on keeping my body language relaxed and nonthreatening, “You said you...kept a secret.”

Kei’s still listening. Good. I might be able to pull this off. As long as she’s not attacking, I might be able to get close enough to stick the Chakra Suppressing Seal on her before she kills me.
“Do you remember what I told you then?” I ask her. Moving with all the haste of a glacier, I edge closer to Kei.

Kei lowers her head. Though light is sucked in by the chakra cloak, I can almost picture those horns lowering in preparation for a nasty tackle.

“That no matter what you thought,” I go on, after a brief pause to make sure she’s not going to just charge and impale me, “I still care about you. Even after we haven’t talked for a year. Even after how much pain you’re in. Think back, please…”

Kei’s empty gaze focuses on me, and her maw hangs open—but she’s not snarling. Blood drips down from those jagged chakra-teeth, but aside from her breathing, she doesn’t move.

This close, the Three-Tails’s power is overwhelming. My throat is dry, and when I swallow hard, it’s almost painful. Gooseflesh ripples up and down my arms, and every instinct I have is demanding that I run. I shouldn’t be here. I should be with Sensei and trying to fight Orochimaru, because I know from experience that I can. Not well, but I can.

Here? Kei could rip my face off before she even realizes what she’s done.

Deep breaths. I still don’t dare move too quickly, or else she might react to the movement and the results will be...messy. “If you can just hold still a little longer, I’ll be able to stop s-some of the pain. Can you do that for me?”

“Haaaaaaaaaaah…” is what I hear, and the exhalation comes with a cloud of steam.

I’m almost close enough to touch her. Just another few meters...

The V2 cloak spasms, rocked by another wave of pain, and Kei lets out a sudden shriek before throwing herself at me.

Shit! I use the Arc Jump and hurt myself to the other side of the crater. Lightning touches down and I land halfway up the dirt-and-mud slant in the earth, clinging to the slippery material with chakra for just a moment—

And that’s apparently not far enough, because Kei’s on me by the time I manage to open Obito’s eye for a second jolt. The Chakra-Suppressing Seal is somewhere in all of the debris, but it’s out of reach.

The V2 cloak gives Kei bestial jaws large enough to eat my entire head. I can’t help thinking about it, given that I’m almost staring down her throat as she roars in my face. A mouthful of blood flies out of her mouth alongside the roar and splatters across the front of my uniform.

It’s not that I’m pinned under her weight. I’m not. She’s not even touching me. But if she does, she’s going to give me chakra burns to feel for the next lifetime.

She lowers her head so her eyes are even with mine. I freeze under her fathomless gaze, as blood-scented steam continues to hiss through the jagged V2 cloak mouth.

If I don’t move, I’m dead. If I do move, I’m still dead. I can’t get nearly far enough away when I can’t pick out a landing zone.

“Kei…” What do I do what do I do what do I—

Kei’s mouth opens again. “Graaaaah…”
Then I do something stupid.

I reach up and wrap my arms around her. My hands instantly start to ache when they come into contact with the bubbling Tailed Beast chakra, and the pain spreads into a kind of magnified stinging as it lances up my arms and toward my chest as soon as I touch her. Katsuyu’s influence dulls it a bit once she realizes what’s wrong, but it doesn’t stop me from pulling myself up so I can hug her fully.

Kei isn’t moving. Her head twists so her V2-cloaked face is nearly up against my neck, but that’s it. She doesn’t bite down, doesn’t try to kill me.

“I’m here. I’m here,” I tell Kei, though I have no idea if she can hear me. “Come on, listen to me. I know you’re in there.”

It hurts just to touch her. But just the idea that she hasn’t horribly mangled me yet—I can be here. I can hold on.

And then I burn.

The Tailed Beast chakra pours into me like I’ve somehow ended up inside the chakra cloak, feeling it sink into my chakra coils like some kind of venom. The sheer overload is going to kill me without Kei having to lift a finger, unless—

Unless—

I make fifteen hand signs behind Kei’s back, quick as I can, and both of my hands start to spark with a Lightning Release jutsu. I don’t have a lot of time, but I at least know how to translate chakra into a charge. And I know how to carry a charge, and how to get rid of it.

Avoiding Katsuyu and my heart, I channel as much chakra as I can handle out through my feet and legs, sending a thunderbolt straight down into the dirt beneath me. It’s all I can do to keep converting the Tailed Beast chakra as it accumulates in my coils, before it can settle and start to incinerate me from the inside out.

It takes me a while to realize I’m screaming.

And so is Kei.

And this time I can actually hear her, under the Tailed Beast cloak, and forcing my eyes open again lets me see that she’s downgraded—from V2 to V1, so I can actually see her under the reddish chakra.

I don’t know what is working here. Maybe everything. Maybe just one piece, and I don’t know what. Either way, I have no choice but to hang on.

And then Katsuyu—who isn’t on my neck anymore, and has been proactive while I’ve been pinned—slides up Kei’s back despite the remaining Tailed Beast chakra and places the Chakra Suppressing Seal in my hand. I snatch it up and activate the seal, and Kei’s overwhelming chakra finally, finally dies off.

Kei collapses on top of me.

I’m shaking even as I lever her off of me, rolling her off to my left while my chakra coils buzz like a beehive is inside me. I still can’t get rid of enough chakra—I’m still overloaded—but I don’t have time to focus on anything less than an immediate chance of death. Chakra overload isn’t going to kill me so fast that I can’t make sure Kei is okay first.

“Kakashi-san, Keisuke-san is in bad condition,” Katsuyu says from her place on Kei’s chest.

She can say that again.

Kei is bleeding from her mouth and nose, and even from her eyes. Her flak jacket’s zipper is a mess of metal teeth, exposing a T-shirt that is nearly brown-red with blood. Almost every patch of exposed skin has been scoured raw, and her breathing is abnormally shallow thanks to the same damned broken rib from earlier. And if I look with Obito’s eye, her seal for the Three-Tails’s containment is almost glowing, red-hot and weakened significantly by this struggle for survival.

I have no idea how much damage she’s suffered, but it’s horrific.

This never should have happened.

“Kakashi!” It’s Sensei, trailed by a non-V2 Kushina. Way to be late. “Kakashi, what were you thinking?”

I put my hand on the top of Kei’s head as Katsuyu pumps healing chakra into her. She doesn’t open her eyes, but she shifts a bit when I touch her hair. Just a little. Just her eyes.

I don’t want to talk to Sensei. I don’t even want to look at him.

“Kakashi?” Sensei asks. He lands next to me as Kushina goes to Kei.

Kushina leans over Kei, and her long red hair seems to fall across Kei like a shroud. I hope Kushina is looking over the seal. There’s no other way Kei’s going to live through this.

I manage to keep my temper in check until Sensei touches me. Just a gentle hand on my shoulder, but with the Three-Tails’s chakra in my blood and the string of recent events in my head, I can’t take it anymore. Sensei might think I’m in shock, and I might be.

But what I feel is raw, blistering anger.

“How could you send her out here, Sensei?” I demand, lifting my head and glaring at him with both eyes wide open. “When you knew there was a chance that something—anything—could go wrong after you hurt her?! If it wasn’t Orochimaru out of nowhere, would you have even come out here?”

Sensei reels back like I’ve punched him.

“And all this, over what? Rumors? Hearsay? For fuck’s sake, Sensei,” I snarl in his face, “Kei needed to be with us, in the village, more than she needed to be sent away because it was politically convenient.”

Kushina is ignoring us. Maybe she agrees with me.

Katsuyu is crawling up my leg.

“And now, she might die,” I tell Sensei in a low, vicious tone. “And after what she told us? After everything she’s been through, you just. Didn’t. Listen.”

And Sensei doesn’t argue. He draws a deep, shuddering breath, but he can’t meet my eyes and he doesn’t try after the first attempt. His gaze is over to the right, fixed on Kushina and Kei.
I wish he wouldn’t. It’s so much easier to be pissed off at him when I can’t see how much guilt is weighing him down.

“Kei-chan,” Kushina says quietly, as Kei shifts. “Come on, wake up. You’re okay now.”

Kei groans.

“Where’s Orochimaru?” I ask Sensei.

Sensei shakes his head, still looking at Kei. “We had to break off the chase.”

What? “Why?”

“Because we needed to come back for you both.” I stare at him when he says it. Kei and I were fine.

...Not fine. But that means if Orochimaru didn’t run, he’s still around here. He’s still a threat. I’m not ungrateful that Kushina is fixing Kei’s seal and I know I couldn’t have done it myself, but to leave Orochimaru to do whatever he wants? Now?

“Kurama heard Isobu scream,” Sensei tells me, almost desperately. “We all had a stake in coming back, Kakashi. I couldn’t just let both of you die, either.”

I want to argue with that. But I can’t. Not when Kurama’s just saved Kei’s life. Sensei wouldn’t have had a choice—there was no time for vengeance. If he has to choose between killing a man and saving his students, I like to think that there isn’t really a choice at all.

Maybe I’m just angry that I couldn’t make a single kill count against that bastard.

Kushina helps Kei sit up, and her head droops toward Kushina’s shoulder in total exhaustion.

“How are you feeling?” Sensei asks her.

I think that’s...yes, Kushina is glaring at him over the top of Kei’s head.

“...Tired,” Kei mumbles. “...hurts...” After a moment, she pushes Kushina back. “Wanna...try...”

Let’s see if she can stand. Or at least try to.

Kei does make it to her feet, shakily. Sensei stands to help her when she stumbles.

One moment, everything’s fine. Kei’s wobbly and sickly-looking, but she’s up. She’s using Sensei’s arm for support, and I can see the relief in everyone’s faces. It’s real. She’s okay.

And then Kei shoves Sensei to the ground.

Something silver streaks over his head, and then it’s in Kei’s chest.

It’s—that is a sword. There’s a sword in Kei’s chest, embedded up to the hilt.

No no no no this isn’t happening this is just a dream, it’s not real, please don’t let it be real—

Her eyes are wide, but not surprised. She coughs a spray of blood across Sensei and me and—

My head jerks around until I’m looking in the direction the blade came from, just as it jerks out of Kei’s chest and flies back—

It’s Orochimaru.
It’s Orochimaru, and he’s here, and I want to—I have to—

Obito’s eye starts to bleed, and I reach for the man in a way I don’t even really understand, but anger’s burning through me like a live wire, and this chakra—

DIE!

Almost a hundred meters off, the air twists and Orochimaru’s head vanishes right off his shoulders. And the Sword of Kusanagi drops soundlessly to the valley floor, splashing Kei’s blood over the grass.

Kei sinks to her knees, even as Kushina rushes forward to catch her and Sensei teleports out again. Katsuyu throws herself off my shoulder and toward Kei and—

It doesn’t matter if Orochimaru’s dead.

I’m too late.

People appear after that, Obito among them. I hear voices I should recognize, but I can’t work up the energy to care. My chakra is back down to within normal limits, and I’m alive after using Kamui…

Something thumps to the ground next to me, even as Obito pulls me to my feet.

Orochimaru’s head, with his tongue sticking out of his mouth and his eyes still wide in bewilderment, stares up at me. Mocking me. His last laugh worked.

I kick the head down the hill. Laugh at that, you bastard.

“...one of the most unusually wounded minds I’ve ever seen…”

“...And that’s just a surface scan?”

“...sorry, Hokage-sama, but that’s the way it is…”

“...any way to help her?”

“...probably done enough.”

Someone was holding my hand.

It was warm.

And I slept on.
December 10th

Raidō

I don’t remember what happened after confronting Orochimaru.

I remember waking up in a darkened hospital room, all my gear gone, and being treated by an animal-masked medic. Being told that I need to be ready to be woken up every few hours, until the experts feel safe letting me go home.

It takes me hours to recover meaningfully, drifting in and out of consciousness and post-concussion nausea. Lizard visits, and so does Horse and even Tsunade, and between all three of them I shake off the worst of the effects about fifteen hours after being dropped off by...someone?

I can’t remember how I got here.

I know I have to be in the hospital—in our hospital—because everything smells the same, and I hear familiar voices. I have a pounding headache, and I still can’t make it all the way down a hallway without having to stop and lean against a wall to wait out the intermittent waves of nausea and light sensitivity. But the most worrying thing is that there’s a chunk of my memory that’s just gone.

I hate concussions.

But I do remember Orochimaru rushing me. I remember fighting him before that, Kokutō out and unable to land a solid hit, and Kakashi and Kei making sure the man didn’t kill Rat or me. I remember realizing, instantly and with a quiet sort of horror, that there was no way to win. That I’d never get my revenge, not even as a petty last strike against the man who killed Genma. That the best I’d be able to do is spit in Orochimaru’s face before he killed me.
I can’t get Genma’s face out of my head. All I can think of is the strangled wheeze as he tries to breathe, about the sunken look to his ribs and the way his arm bent the wrong way with the bones exposed…

I don’t know if he’s even alive.

I can’t—I don’t know if I want to survive if I—

Fuck.

Around eight in the morning, I finally get enough thoughts in order to ask. They’ve been jumbled by panic and the throbbing in my head, but concern for Genma is at least consistent. It forces me to pull myself halfway together.

“Genma Shiranui?” The receptionist checks his patient intake records, going through a list of names that goes through the four pages in tiny script. “Oh. He’s in surgery right now. Who are you again?”

The sense of relief—he’s not dead he’s not dead—lasts long enough for the word “surgery” to sink in. I know Genma’s injuries were serious, but…

I don’t know. I can’t think.

“Raidō Namiashi. His, um, next of kin or something. I…can’t remember the term.” I hold up my hospital bracelet, which sort of disappears under my uniform sleeves. Pretty sure it means I’m concussed and not at my best, but I generally don’t pay attention to color-coded paper in this context.

“I know what you mean,” the receptionist says. “You can wait in that room over there. It has snacks and tea, though your stomach may not want to handle it.”

“Thanks,” I say reflexively, and wander over to a waiting room.

The waiting room in question is beige and features both a painting of a fruit bowl and a bowl of actual fruit on the low table. I sink into a chair and pick up a winter apple, turning it over and over in my hands. I’m not hungry—the entire idea of eating makes me feel sick—but I need something to keep my hands occupied.

I’m still not allowed to leave the hospital, so what else can I do? Sit here and wait.

“Hey, here,” says a voice, and I look up. It’s Ebisu.

He looks…better. He’s replaced his beat-to-shit uniform with another one, so I guess he’s gone home since arriving in Konoha and me wandering out of my daze. The glasses he’s wearing aren’t cracked, either, and he looks like he’s scrubbed himself raw to get his teammates’ blood off of his skin.

I take the offered cup of water, but mostly I just stare at it. The thought of eating or drinking anything, even though I know I have to, makes my stomach turn over.

“How’ve you been?” I ask him. My eyes are sort of squinted against the hospital fluorescent lights, so I can’t really look directly at him for long periods.

“…Not great,” Ebisu admits. “I’m the only one on Team Chōza who’s still standing.”

Yeah. I knew that feeling, though I hadn’t stopped in on Rat before stumbling my way out of the ANBU wing. A pitched battle with an S-class shinobi wasn’t good for anyone’s health.
“Gai is recovering well, from what I heard,” Ebisu goes on, staring down into the depths of the paper cup he’s holding. From the looks of it, it’s the strongest green tea he could find in this place. “Just overstretched himself. He should be back to his old self in a few days, as long as he doesn’t try training in the recovery ward.”

I give Ebisu a sidelong look.

“I know. I’m here to keep him occupied when the medics don’t,” Ebisu admits. “But Genma…”

“I don’t even want to hear how bad it is,” I tell him, but it’s a lie. I desperately want to know what’s wrong, but at the same time there’s no way to fix anything from where I’m sitting. I can’t use medical ninjutsu. I can barely keep track of what I’m doing in between the thud-thud-thud of my heartbeat in my head.

It’s agonizing.

Ebisu must read my expressions better than I think he can, because the next thing he says is, “He’ll be okay, Raidō.”

I place the cup of water down on the low table and, while pressing my fingers to my temples to try and deal with some of this impossible headache, I ask him, “How do you know?”

“Tsunade-sama is the best medic-nin on the continent,” Ebisu says, with perfect faith.

“Medical ninjutsu can’t save everyone,” I tell him flatly, but my spirits struggle to lift up anyway. Maybe…

Ebisu rests a hand on my forearm, and I stare at his scabbed knuckles rather than looking up at his face. He should get those seen to, shouldn’t he?

Why do I even care about Ebisu busting his knuckles open? It’s not something I’d do, it’s just…something that Genma…

“You missed part of what happened, Raidō,” Ebisu tells me, cutting off my thoughts. “You didn’t see Kei-san when she came in.”

I could…sort of remember Kei at the end of that fight. Out of chakra, out of Tailed Beast chakra, and on her last legs. And then I got hit hard enough that I don’t remember much about the fight after that. Or some of the pieces before it.

“How bad was it?” I ask him. There’s a bit more emotional distance between Kei and me. I can ask what happened to her. I can’t ask about Genma yet. The words just don’t form.

“As I understand it, she took what would have been a fatal attack, for the Hokage’s sake,” Ebisu tells me, adjusting his glasses. “Kushina-sama managed to save her life.”

Kushina-sama can heal? Since when?

“I don’t understand how it works,” Ebisu goes on, once he spots my puzzled expression. “But whatever she did, she did it for Genma, too. Otherwise…”

“They’d be dead already,” I say in a hollow voice, completing the thought. In a way, it brings home how close I am—and was—to losing a friend and…and Genma.

“But they’re not,” Ebisu says, and his hand tightens on my arm. “Don’t give up yet, Raidō. Genma will—he’ll make it home. All the way home.*

I drop my head into my hands. Muffled, I manage to say, “I hope so,” and Ebisu falls silent.

I go home that night. Not because I want to, but because my hospital bed is occupied by a new patient—a civilian with a crushed leg that might turn gangrenous—and the ANBU medics and hospital staff alike decide that I can do better than crowded rooms and crying people everywhere. No one can give me an update on Genma’s condition, and it seems like the best option.

I have to bite my thumb and smear blood on the door to get past Genma’s seal-locks on the place, and then I step into an apartment that’s been abandoned for what feels like ages. I only got a day of downtime before the merchant assassination mission, and it doesn’t look or smell like Genma got anything cleaned before the Sorayama mission, either.

I moved into Genma’s Aburame-owned apartment almost six months ago. Landlord issues, I told everyone, and didn’t really say where I was going once I left my old complex behind. But I didn’t talk about Genma there.

I didn’t say that I missed him so much that I could hardly imagine spending one more day in an apartment that I didn’t care about anyway. I just packed up my stuff and left instead of renewing my lease. It was an easy decision.

Six blissful months later, and I’m alone again.

Now, in the still and silent darkness, the walls seem to close in on me.

It’s not like I haven’t moved in properly and made this space mine, too. There’s a second toothbrush on the bathroom counter, I have my very own weapon rack on the wall, and there are some takeout containers on the countertop that we both forgot to throw out. I keep my own house plants—bamboo—and Genma has his sealing corner where everything goes from normal to explosive.

But without him, shivers run up and down my spine.

I try to ignore it. I unfold the futon that we normally share, whacking the dust out of it as I go. If I go to sleep, headache or not, I can kill eight hours in one shot. And by the time I wake up, maybe there will be news about Genma. Good news.

It doesn’t work out like that.

I don’t generally get nightmares, even about my work in ANBU. I don’t dream much in the first place, which Genma tells me means I don’t have much of an imagination. Given what I’ve seen from Kakashi and some of my other teammates over the course of my career, I’ll take it. It’s by far the better option when compared to the strings of recurring nightmares that other ANBU operatives seem to get.

When I try to sleep this time though, I wake up within two hours. Even before that, I tossed and turned constantly.

I stare up at the darkened ceiling, unable to quiet my thoughts. Ordinarily, I sleep on my back and Genma spends the night curled against my side. Every errant noise in the village keeps him awake on nights when I’m not home, he says. But when I am, he drowns all of it out by pushing his head close to my heart and losing himself in that white noise instead.

My hearing isn’t nearly as strong as his. But I miss his weight and warmth and the sound of his even breathing once he calms down at night.
I sling my arm over my face and resolve to stick this out as best I can. It’s going to just have to be a rough night. As long as Genma’s in surgery, I know people are still trying to save him. I don’t know when I’ll actually be told if he’s out, but hopefully making it through tonight will just get me that much closer to finding out.

And lo and behold, I sleep badly if at all. I own an alarm clock (that Genma hates and “forgets” to wind) and it’s unhelpfully dead for the entire night, never letting me move past 4:03.

Then the sun finally comes up.

I dig through the fridge for something approximating breakfast. We forgot to throw anything out before our last missions, so the first task ends up being just to clean the kitchen out. Dump the old takeout containers, the old vegetables…

In the end, I have four eggs, a package of instant ramen, and a bottle of chilled sake. Not exactly what I was hoping for. Still, I make a breakfast out of them that at least isn’t going to immediately put me back in the hospital, unlike everything else.

Then I shower, and shave, and get ready for the day. I get my flak jacket—well, maybe Genma’s, but who cares?—out of our only closet. With some preparation, I almost look like I didn’t face off against a Sannin and lose. Sure, I have a bandage around my head, but Tonbo Tobitake has his entire head wrapped up all the time and no one ever seems to care about that.

I walk to the hospital instead of trying to go by rooftop run. It’d be the worst timing in the world if I managed to hurt myself literally the day after being discharged from the hospital with nothing more than bandages and a bottle of painkillers.

And while on my way there, I happen to take a detour through one of the few neighborhoods in Konoha where not every house is occupied. Some kind of water pipe problem scared the people who used to live on this road out to other parts of the village, so the area is provisionally abandoned until the pipes are figured out. Days turned into weeks turned into at least a month, so the result is that a lot of feral cats move in.

Sure, the district most known for feral cats is really owned by the Uchiha clan, but I’ve always suspected that the clan has a soft spot for the homicidal felines who owe them rent. Literally. They’re probably uncontracted summon animals.

And then I hear mewling, coming from a house near my side of the road.

Curiosity piqued, I fight a brand new headache as I walk over to the overgrown garden near a particularly pathetic-looking house.

I find a box in the garden, turned on its side. I sit back on my heels and peer inside.

In the box are a pair of mud-balls that have tiny little mouths. Looking closely at them, I recognized four spindly little limbs each, straight tails, and little round heads that might have ears involved somewhere. One of them lifts its head and mews again.

I’m pretty sure they are supposed to be cats. Or baby cats.

...Well, I can drop them off at a veterinary clinic before I go to the hospital. I pick up the box and the kittens in it, then continue on my way.

Good deed for the day, I guess.
December 11th

Rin

Obito appears as though out of nowhere, just as I leave the recovery ward. He smiles, but I can’t see most of his face. With both eyes bandaged, he’s been waiting patiently in the hospital for me when he shouldn’t be. I tried to send him home, but he refused.

Obito doesn’t quite have the hang of walking around blind, but he seems cheerful enough despite the handicap. Using Kamui as many times as he had, he got everyone home safe—at the cost of straining his eye so badly that Akihito-shishō and I both had to step in to help him recover. He’s a hero, yes, but sometimes I wonder if he has any sense of self-preservation.

Then again, given where I’ve been working, I can’t say that about any of my friends.

“How are they doing now?” Obito asks, as I loop my arm around his, interlacing our fingers.

“They’re...stable,” I tell him, and lean into him as we walk. Obito eases his arm out of my grip and wraps it around my shoulders, probably as much to make sure that I can lead him around as it is just for my sake.

Kei’s being kept in a sealed room until Kushina and the Hokage have had a chance to compare her damaged seal with what Jiraiya might know. There are so many toads involved that I had to give up counting. That doesn’t even get into the fact that they had to call in Hyūga clan experts just to see the damage that’s been done to the tenketsu in her left shoulder, where Kakashi said she burned a powerful seal right out of her body with Tailed Beast chakra.

Genma still hasn’t woken up. His breathing is better than when they first brought him in, thanks to some secret jutsu Kushina used, but I hadn’t been able to do much for him around all of the other medics. Lungs and skeletal damage like that aren’t my specialties, but...I would have liked to have been able to at least help.

All I can do is check on my other friends.

Obito sighs suddenly, shaking his head. “I can barely believe it. Who would have thought that going to Sorayama would turn out like this?”

Kei nearly died. And even in surviving, she’s not out of the woods yet, with all of those injuries and the Three-Tails to deal with. Kakashi’s being treated for chakra burns of at least two entirely different kinds, while Genma barely avoided losing his arm at the shoulder. Gai is suffering from muscle tears and severe chakra overstrain, thanks to his overuse of the Gates. And Obito? He’s overused his eye so much lately that he’ll be blind by twenty if he can’t get to regular treatments whenever he starts feeling the strain.

I’ve helped where I can, but in the end I’m as scared as anyone that it won’t be enough. Katsuyu and Tsunade’s power is the only reason that what we’ve done has amounted to success. Kushina’s miracle cure is still with her, and won’t be available until she says so. The rest is down to time and luck.

I hope Team Minato’s insane luck works both ways.

“Let’s go say goodnight to Kakashi and Gai-san, okay?” I suggest to Obito as we walk.

“Visiting hours are over already?” Obito asks with some surprise. With his free hand, he rubbed the side of his neck. “How long was I out there?”
“In the hall? About two hours. Then my shift in there was over,” I admit to him. “I didn’t mean to make you wait that long, but your eye…” I didn’t want to send him home, where there’d be no one to wait for him. Pointing him toward the Hokage’s house would mean that he would be asked to babysit with Tenzō.

“Hey, it’s fine. I didn’t even notice.” That doesn’t make me feel any better about it.

“I’m sorry anyway, Obito.”

“Rin-chan, if you can give our friends that much more of a chance, it’s okay if you forget about me for a bit.” The way he says it makes me feel slightly guilty simply because it’s so genuine. Obito doesn’t mind being left out in a hall like a blind old dog for hours on end.

I shift my arm so it reaches back and around his waist. “Thank you, Obito.”

We come to the recovery room where Gai and Kakashi are staying, and are greeted with a cheerful, “Hello again, Rin-chan, Obito-san! We have just been told that it’s almost time to go to sleep and focus on our healing!”

“Otherwise,” Kakashi says in a long-suffering tone, “Gai wouldn’t ever go to sleep.”

Obito and I enter the room properly.

Obito detaches himself from my arm to wander in the direction of Gai’s bright voice, his hands outstretched. After a bit of blind groping at the air, Gai manages to catch Obito’s flailing arms and guide him to sit on the hospital bed next to Gai’s foot.

I tried helping him with that before, but Obito didn’t like being led around if I was too obvious about it. What independence he has, like this, he treasures more than most. I’m just glad Gai is there to catch him.

For my part, I sit down opposite Obito, on Kakashi’s bed.

Then I take stock.

Checking the clipboard hanging off the edge of his bed, I read what looks like a laundry list of potential problems and dangerous unknown factors. Aside from chakra burns along his arms and chest, because of overexposure to Kei’s Tailed Beast chakra, he has internal damage from what looks like being hit by a literal bolt of lightning. While the palms of his hands are badly burned enough that Tsunade had clicked her tongue when she saw them, it’s the way his capillaries have been damaged that sets the other medics to worrying. Worse, the damage continues through his chakra coils and makes ninjutsu usage an extremely bad idea.

Gai, from what I remember, has an overwhelming number of micro-tears in his muscle from what amounts to overdoing everything at once. While the Eight Gates are a powerful technique, they also release all of the body’s natural limitations—like the ones that keep muscles from snapping bones as they contract. Gai was lucky, all told, and escaped with only a few compression fractures in his knuckles. He’ll be up and about within a day, if tremendously sore.

Add in Obito, and it becomes clear that these three have done the most damage to themselves out of anyone in the hospital.

I can’t say the same for anyone else here.

“How are you two feeling?” I ask them, while Obito bounces experimentally on the bed.
“We will make full recoveries, Rin-chan!” Gai replies, though the cast means he can’t make a proper thumbs-up. “Unless Kakashi is unable to conquer his distaste for hospital antiseptic and food!”

“I swear they’re the same thing,” Kakashi mutters, then trails off into a sigh. “Obito, can you use your eye?”

“I think I would forgive you if you broke into my apartment now and brought a book back.” Kakashi sighs again. “But I guess you don’t have that covered.”

“Shut up,” Obito says reflexively. I think Obito would be smacking his own forehead if he wasn’t worried he’d miss. Instead, he slowly drops his face into both hands and moans, “Why am I even friends with you?”

“Because Kakashi is a beautiful flower of Konoha and the glow of friendship brings you back!” Gai replies, and nudes Obito with his foot.

“I’d say ‘stop being negative,’ but I’d be shocked if I could channel enough chakra to make it work,” Kakashi says, letting his head drop back into the pillow. “You all right, Obito?”

“Yeah, just wore myself out. Twice,” Obito admits with a wince. “But everyone’s home now, and we’re getting better.”

I’m not sure of that. At least, not for Kei and Genma. The Hokage and Kushina are still working on her, and Tsunade has Genma in intensive care. Not surgery—not anymore—but he hasn’t woken up and there’s always a nurse on call in there. He’s hooked up to so many machines that it almost looks like we’re running his entire body for him.

“You look worried, Rin-chan,” Gai says.

I look at his earnest, concerned face, and absently tuck a strand of hair back behind my ear. “I am. I mean, I’m sure that everyone will be fine, but… I don’t know. I wish I could do more for you.”

“More?” Obito repeats. He reaches out for me and I take his hand, sliding my fingers between his after a brief hesitation. “You already do so much for us, Rin-chan. You’re kind, and you listen, and you’ve healed all of us here.”

“I just wish I could stop you from being hurt in the first place,” I tell him, curling my other hand into a fist. I don’t train to hit people. I don’t train to fight people, really. My job as a field-certified medic is to keep my teammates alive long enough to come home, and I cannot afford to be anything other than the last shinobi on my team left standing.

But am I doing enough to…to stop all of this?

“You can’t stop us from getting hurt, Rin,” Kakashi tells me, though his voice is a bit distant from fatigue. “Combat shinobi take risks.”

“You are very good at what you do, Rin-chan!” Gai said encouragingly, but it fell a little flat to me.

I squeeze Obito’s hand and say, “I just wish I could do more. Tsunade-sama’s summon is more useful than I am.”

Katsuyu can at least go out into the field wherever and whenever she has to, spreading Tsunade’s power to unheard-of distances for medical ninjutsu. I also heard about what she did to save Kei, even though she was in so much danger and Kakashi had lost the seal by that point. In retrieving the seal when she did, Katsuyu saved both of their lives.

“Rin-chan, you can always get your own summon contract,” Gai says. “I have Ningame, and Kakashi has his dogs, and Keisuke-chan has Tsuruya-san.”

“I know Kei had a contract,” I admit, “but I don’t know much about them. I mean, it’s a physical scroll, isn’t it?”

Gai looked thoughtful for a moment. “You should ask around for more help finding a summon contract, but I met Ningame by using the Summoning Jutsu without a contract and ending up in the tortoises’ domain. I negotiated for a contract, and got the chance to sign it!”

I wait for objections, about the risk of running into hostile clans of summon creatures. About, maybe, the fact that I’m not really all that good at fighting.

The Summoning Jutsu is a B-ranked technique, with moderate-to-incredible chakra costs. But for its cost and complexity, it is the most versatile jutsu around. I’d thought about getting a contract somewhere before, but there are no suitable spare contracts in Konoha for a clanless medic-nin. And sometimes the animal clans involved are picky about their summoners, like the Toads are. They only need one summoner per generation, and are famous now for the power of the only two living signers of said contract.

But Obito and Kakashi consider the idea without laughing or protesting.

“The Summoning Jutsu,” Gai explains, “will put you into contact with the clan that suits you best. Knowing you, Rin-chan, I think that you will not have any difficulty in finding your destined partners!”

“Really?” I ask them.

“Yeah,” Obito nods. “I mean, I don’t know much about summon contracts, but I’m sure any clan you run into would be as nice as you are, Rin-chan.”

“Just be sure to be polite,” Kakashi suggests. “It never hurts.”

“...Can anyone go with me?” I ask, hesitant.

The boys all look at each other, as though trying to figure out if any of them have the answer.

“I don’t know,” Gai says. “I made the decision to obtain a summoning contract without informing my teammates or my sensei. But I think with a few precautions, you will succeed!”

Kakashi nods in agreement. But he’s already nodding off, so he doesn’t bother to say anything about it.

“Thank you,” I say quietly.

“Hey, if you need someone to go with,” Obito says, squeezing my hand, “I’ll be there.”

I need to speak to Akihito-shishō and tell him I need to have someone cover my shifts for the next few days, don’t I?

I’m about to get up and lead Obito out, so I can take him back to his apartment, but Kakashi makes an abrupt noise. All of us look at him as he forces himself to sit up, or at least get up on his elbows.
I let go of Obito’s hand and offer Kakashi mine to help him (while Obito leans back against Gai’s raised knee to keep his balance), but he waves me off.

“What’s wrong, Kakashi?” Gai asks.

“I just…” Kakashi trailed off, staring out the door with his normal eye. “Did anyone else notice someone walking past the door?”

I blink. Since when is Kakashi a pure chakra sensor?

“Well, I did hear a few footsteps. I’ve just been assuming anyone I hear is a medic,” Obito allows. “Rin-chan?”

“I’ll take a look,” I say, and then wince.

“Well, it’s not like any of us can really do that part,” Obito says cheerfully, ignoring my unintentional reminder of his current blindness. “But I’ll come with you, anyway. I can at least walk.”

And combat shinobi—even Uchiha—are always taught how to fight without using their eyes. It’s harder on him in particular, given the existence of the Kamui technique, but the idea of Obito coming with me makes me feel a bit better. I have no idea what’s going on.

“Good night, both of you,” Obito says as we leave. “Unless we get in a fight. Then Gai’s in charge if you get attacked.”

Kakashi gives Obito a dry look and says, “Just go figure out if we need to smash that fly on the wall.”

Obito and I head back into the hallway. With Obito’s hearing leading the way, and my shoulder to keep him away from walls, we make our way toward what turns out to be the hallway to the recovery ward.

Raidō Namiashi is sitting outside of the room, with a blanket bundle in his lap and his back against the wall near the door. He can’t get into the room to visit anyone inside, and I’m pretty sure he was discharged yesterday. He still has the bandage around his head, though it’s been cleaned and changed.

“Raidō-san?” I call out, but softly. Sound carries through the walls around this part of the building, and while most people in the recovery ward at this point are either drugged to the gills or unconscious otherwise, it’s still not polite.

Raidō’s head jerks up on reflex, and he immediately winces as his post-concussion headache makes itself known. “Ow…”

Obito immediately makes his way over to Raidō, sitting on the floor next to him. “So, what are you doing here past visiting hours?”

“Could ask you the same question,” Raidō says, and rubs his temples with his hand over his eyes to block out the light. His eyes are squeezed shut against the pain.

I lean down and say, “Do you want me to take a look at you for a moment? I can help.”

“Yeah, that’d be—ow—great.” Raidō takes his hand away from his face.

I apply a numbing ninjutsu to the sides of Raidō’s head, and then search for the cause of all of the pain in the first place. Reduce swelling, reinforce bone, seal the skin…

“Thanks, Rin-san,” Raidō says, when he can finally look up at me without pain.

“No problem.” I sit back on my heels and give him an assessing look. “Obito’s going to walk me home. But why are you here?”

Raidō leans his head back against the wall and sighs aloud. “I’m waiting.”

“For somebody?” Obito asks from Raidō’s other side.

“Yeah,” Raidō says, and bows his head. Actually, no, he’s looking down at something in the blanket on his lap. And it’s moving.

It mewls.

“Is that a cat?” Obito asks, cocking his head curiously.

“Mm-hm,” Raidō mumbles, and he unwraps the blankets. Squished up against each other like peas in a pod, their fur colors intermingling, are a pair of kittens.

One of them is awake and active, with orange tabby fur and big green eyes. The kitten stares up at Obito and me with its mouth open and mewls again, then yawns widely. Its fellow kitten is mostly white with large black patches on its ears and its tail, and snoozes on undisturbed.

“I picked these two up yesterday,” Raidō explains quietly, rolling his shoulder as though to get some stiffness out. “And I guess I, uh, didn’t really let them go. I figured Genma might like to see them. Or maybe hear them.”

I frown slightly. “Genma-san isn’t awake right now, Raidō-san.”

“I know, but I can’t sleep,” Raidō says with a one-shouldered shrug. He isn’t looking at Obito or me, just staring off into the middle distance. “Might as well wait here so I know when he wakes up.”

“Visiting hours are over, though,” I remind him gently.

Raidō shifts uncomfortably. “I know.”

“Wait, you can’t sleep?” Obito asks, confused. “I mean, all of us are nervous about Kei and Genma, but…”

Most of us have no choice but to force ourselves to relax. Kakashi barely has the energy necessary to stand, and any worrying about Kei has to happen between circulating chakra in his coils to test his limits. I’m a medic, but what I can do is limited by my medical expertise and my precision, as well as what my superiors want me to do.

But this feels different.

Very, very different.

Raidō explains, “I moved in with him a while back. I forgot how to sleep there on my own, I guess.” He glances back down at the kittens on his lap, and one of them is chewing on his sword-callused fingers. “Genma and I have been together for two years.”

I can almost feel the moment where Obito’s thoughts stutter to a stop. He shuts his mouth immediately with a click of his teeth, biting his lip to keep from talking.
After a second, I ask, “Do you love him?”

Raidō raises an eyebrow.

“There, stupid question. Well, um, don’t tell anyone I said this…but I can let family in,” I tell him in a conspiratorial whisper. “But you’re probably going to have to sneak out on your own.”

Raidō pauses for a second. “I already snuck in, though you caught up to me. And I snuck these little guys in, too. I guess I just want to know if they’re a risk to Genma. I can bring them back to the apartment and have the neighbors—or Ebisu—look after them, but…” Raidō shakes his head. “I just want to show him something more interesting than the room’s walls.”

“Well, his immune system is fine, and his file doesn’t say anything about allergies. And animals are good for healing,” I tell him. “I’ll let you in.”

And once Raidō has been squared away, I take Obito home. If he stays on the couch, I can keep track of his recovery more closely than anyone else.

What day is it?

Kei

Everything hurt.

I woke up as a sort of solid ache, running deep into my bones and centered on a sharp pain in my chest. It hurt to move. It hurt to think about moving enough to figure out if everything was still attached.

But someone was holding my hand.

So I opened my eyes with difficulty, feeling that sleepy crust built up in the corners.

Huh. I’d almost forgotten what a Konoha hospital room looked like. It’d been so long since I’d spent any time here, the teal-colored walls had stopped feeling familiar. The scratchy white bedsheets were still the same, but I didn’t really have to open my eyes to be able to tell that much. But I opened my eyes anyway, and tried to take stock of what was happening.

Hospital room, check. Medical ventilator and attachment? Check. Throbbing pain thanks to meds wearing off like the traitors they were? Also check. All sorts of crap stuck to me, in the forms of IVs and monitor wires? Definitely check.

A familiar brown mop of hair by my hand, pillowed by the crook of an elbow?

I moved my fingers experimentally. While they were stiff and bandaged besides that, I got them to obey me. With aggravating slowness, I wrapped my fingers more firmly around Hayate’s limp hand and gently squeezed.

Check.

Hayate mumbled in his sleep.

How long had I been asleep? I remembered snatches of conversation that I must have heard while other people thought I was out, but not enough to say that I’d been awake. And if Hayate had been here long enough to fall asleep and not wake up and hit me as soon as I poked him…
I tried to think back. What was the last thing I remembered?

I was on my feet and saw a gleam of silver, just visible off the sunset, and Orochimaru’s chakra was there—

Oh. Right.

I tried to move my left arm and, for a moment, my vision went black from pain. I didn’t make a sound, but my hands clenched reflexively. The next thing I knew, Hayate was up and standing over me, but froze in place as soon as I got my eyes to focus on him again.

He looked down at the wires trailing from me toward the machines, then at the tube down my throat and the mask attached to it. It was like he was a deer caught in headlights, unable to decide what to do next.

His face crumpled. “I-I…”

I gripped his right hand tighter, unable to smile or do much else with all of the medical equipment in the way, but trying anyway. I’d missed Hayate, though I hadn’t been in much of a state to show it the last time I’d seen him. But I was here now. Sort of.

Hayate sat back down in his borrowed hospital chair with a thud, still holding my hand in both of his. He pulled my hand over, resting his forehead against the back of it, and I could see his shoulders shake with the effort he put into keeping his voice steady as he said, “I didn’t know if you were going to w-wake up.”

Unable to talk, I flexed my fingers as best I could and ran my thumb over the back of his hand. It was like trying to say I love you, I love you without words, but there was a thought weighing me down.

During the fight against Orochimaru, I had told Kakashi to leave me behind. So I could get Team Chōza out alive, I was prepared to give up my life and stall Orochimaru to death. And I would have died. The rest of the fight had been enough to prove that.

Kakashi had said no. He’d said no, and stayed, and kept me alive long enough for this.

"I was worried you weren't going to come back when the Hokage left to go after you.” I felt Hayate shake. His hands tightened enough on mine to hurt, but I refused to react. “The last time he had to fight, with you, M-Mom died.”

For a moment, I felt a burst of hatred that almost immediately morphed into the emotional equivalent of a frag grenade.

I hated myself first and foremost. As noble as it sounded to give up my life for my comrades, all it amounted to was stupidity if it hurt Hayate like this. He’d been at ground zero of my descent into a depressed haze, and he’d tried his best to be there for me. And I went and spat on that—on him—by not acknowledging it, by throwing my life away.

And I raged silently at Sensei, for putting me in a position where that seemed like the greatest idea ever. It was small, compared to how much I wanted to go back in time and change my actions, to reach out and cling to my remaining family like some kind of limpet with separation anxiety—

But I couldn’t. I couldn’t take any of it back.

If I could just fucking move my left hand, I could at least sign an apology. But no. My idiocy hadn’t even left me with that much.

“Kakashi told me what you almost did,” Hayate said, though his voice was muffled by our hands. “And I’m proud of you, a little, but you scared the shit out of me.” He finally looked up, “I know it’s...it’s like a-a-an ideal thing, to die f-f for the Hokage. I know it’s y-your job. But I st-still...”

Shit. I want to be able I say that I love you, but I can’t—and I want to hug you but I can’t and I hate that. Please, don’t hate me.

I hadn’t even been thinking at the time. Like, I’d known that my duty was to protect Sensei on paper as well as just, like, in my heart somewhere. But the only thought in my head at the time had been that the sword was coming and that I was the only one who saw it in time to matter.

Telling Kakashi to take everyone and run had been a calculated decision. I’d still had enough chakra left to make that call. But to protect Sensei?

Just reflex.

I couldn’t move anything besides my right arm and I couldn’t talk, but I could move my chakra. So, with more difficulty than I remembered, I reached out with my chakra and pinged my brother’s.

He gave a loud sob, and pinged me back. He managed to avoid all of my wires and hugged me, and I brought my mobile arm up to rub ineffectual circles on his back. He didn’t cry into my hospital gown, but he held on like he never wanted to let me go.

“I’m just glad you’re home,” Hayate managed, into my shoulder.

Against his back, stiffly, I drew a character against his back. Just a quick I’m sorry, traced by hand.

“Stupid, stupid sister.” Hayate hiccuped. “D-Don’t scare me like that again.”

I’ll do my best, I thought.

It turned out that I’d woken up sometime around seven in the morning, because Hayate sat with me through the barrage of nurses after that. There were too many people around, and anyway the sun had finally come up.

I was still barely awake and in a fair approximation of agony, so no one asked me to stand up for tests. They did dial up the dosages on the painkillers once they checked my injuries for some level of healing, so I faded in and out through most of the morning after that.

Given the pain, I didn’t mind spending the morning pretty damned loopy. It just...trailed into the next day, and through at least one room transfer.

On what turned out to be the fourteenth of December, from the chart I noticed on a wall, I woke up again in the early hours of the morning. Probably around five.

And I finally realized that I was flat on my back.

Isobu hated that. I’d never been able to get a straight answer out of him about it, and had ended up chalking it up to his turtle components. Even now, after the shit we’d been through, I expected fragments of his thoughts and fears to be trickling down the line to me.

Where was Isobu? He couldn’t dead. Tailed Beasts were basically unkillable, with resurrection-based immortality because they dispersed into ambient chakra when killed until they pulled themselves together. But I couldn’t hear him, and I couldn’t reach for his presence in my mind at all. It was like someone had put in a wall, keeping me from contacting him at all.

There was a reason for it. There was always a reason for whatever the medics did.

But I heard my heartbeat monitor start to wail anyway.

_Dammit._

To my surprise, Yamaguchi-sensei walked in a moment later. His chakra seemed to buzz with tension, but he relaxed fractionally when he realized that I was staring at him.

“Kei-kun,” Yamaguchi-sensei said when he walked over to my bedside. “What’s the problem?”

And he offered me his hand. Clearly, my brother had told someone that I could still draw characters with my right hand, even if my left had graduated from being painful to move to merely godawful levels of sore.

I finger-spelled the characters I needed and felt like a complete invalid the entire time. And I very much _was_, so I didn’t really get to complain about it.

“The Three-Tails? No, Kushina-sama and Hokage-sama banned its chakra from entering your system until you recovered,” Yamaguchi-sensei answers. “The problem with burning yourself with chakra, Kei-kun, is that it also nullifies your otherwise-impressive recovery rate. So stop doing that.”

I drew something else on his hand.

“Rude,” Yamaguchi-sensei commented. He checked my health via a quick chakra read through my hand, and he blinked. Then he threw his hands in the air and said in an exasperated tone, “Did anyone ever _check_ to see if you even need a damned ventilator anymore?”

I stared at him. It wasn’t like I could do much else, and I certainly hadn’t been awake enough to argue the point. Zonked out of my mind on painkillers and all that.

Yamaguchi-sensei flapped a hand irritably and said, “Never mind, I’ll get the staff started on removing some of these things. This is ridiculous.”

In relatively short order, I was divested of all extraneous medical equipment and shuffled to _another_ room, and this one didn’t look like the inside of the ICU. Instead of the place where casualties went to die (after all due care), I was wheeled into one of many recovery wards in the building. This one had two beds, the other of which had its curtains drawn. The lights were still low there, so it hadn’t taken anyone that long to get me out of there.

“Now, stay here and stop scaring everyone for a few minutes. I’ll have the receptionist send your brother up here as soon as he comes back,” Yamaguchi-sensei says in a deadly whisper that nonetheless eased right over into pure ham.

My voice sounded like gravel in a blender when I talked, but at least I _could_ talk. “Go away.”

He made a dismissive noise and barged out the doors, probably off to go terrorize someone’s broken leg into making a miraculous recovery.

For a moment, I enjoyed the silence. Sure, Isobu was locked up in my seal like it was Fort Knox, and I was still bedridden, and I still felt enough pain to remind me that I wasn’t dead, but...well. It’d been a long few days.
And then I had to stop ignoring the pair of chakra signatures in the bed next to mine. I hadn’t noticed the hospital chair on the other side of the bed at first, but now that I could move my neck freely and do things other than just blink energetically, I decided to shift a little.

Leaning over toward the other bed, I whispered, “You awake?”

“I am now,” grumbled Gennma’s voice from the other side of the curtain. “And I’ll just say it sucks. They won’t let me have any senbon.”

I snorted with laughter, even if it pulled on a wound I didn’t know I had and sent pain shooting through me. After a gasp and a moment to recover, I managed, “Did Yamaguchi-sensei offer you a cigarette?”

“Ice chips.” Genma sighed. “So, you?”

“Not yet,” I told him. “Just got the tube taken out.”

“Well, you’re pretty lucid for it,” Genma said. He shifted and, after a moment, asked, “So, I heard you got stabbed in the chest.”

“Just a flesh wound,” I said immediately, and Genma made a noise that could have been a laugh. It turned into a wheeze after a second, and I felt his chakra struggle to suppress a cough.

“Oh, ow, don’t do that to me right now,” Genma replied, though a bit shakily. “No jokes.”

“I can do that,” I agreed. “So. Raidō’s there, huh?”

Genma gave a long sigh of contentment. “Sleeping like a rock. Didn’t exactly seem like he did much of that while I was here.”

“Probably not.”

“You know, we had quite a crowd in here yesterday.” If he wanted to go with such an abrupt change of topic, I could let it go. No more war injuries. “Had to tell Gai not to do flowers. So he gave me a card. It’s on the nightstand.”

I craned my neck to look, and managed to just make out the words “You’re a beautiful flower of Konoha, and I wish you a speedy recovery through the power of Youth,” complete with flower drawing, on an upright greeting card. From the look of it, Gai had made it himself. I had to wonder if he’d immediately gone to create it once his Plan A was shot down.

He probably had. Gai was just like that.

“Oh, he brought a cat bed. It has cartoon fish on it. Did I mention that before?” Genma wondered aloud.

“...Why a cat bed?” I asked, though I was pretty sure I knew the answer.

I was sure Genma was grinning. “For the cats.”

“And here I thought you didn’t have enough time for pets,” I said.

“Well, given that my arm got broken in three places and my shoulder joint damn near healed into a fused knot made of broken bones, I’m not gonna be going on many missions now,” he replied.

The only reason I didn’t wince out of guilt was because of his tone. It was Genma’s way to make light of anything he could find humor in, and as a result his jokes could sometimes be downright cutting. Usually at himself.

“Anyway,” he went on, “I had Gai take it to his place. He’s cat-sitting the two of them now.”

I couldn’t quite think of what to say.

“Kid, I’m going to make a full recovery sooner or later. But two surgeries makes a guy a bit antsy.”
Genma sighed again. “I’m just glad I’m not going in for my ribs.”

And here I was, after getting basically everything except the heartbeat monitor removed. I wouldn’t go into surgery again for mere pain, and being a jinchūriki—with or without direct access to Isobu’s chakra—would still give me an edge over a normal shinobi.

“So what are the cats’ names?” I asked him.

Genma gave another embarrassed little laugh, which thankfully didn’t turn into a cough. “Sushi and Kabocha.”

Pumpkin, huh? I’d never been the type to name my pets after my favorite food, but it sounded cute.
“Is Kabocha orange?”

Genma chuckled again. “And Sushi is black and white.”

And for some reason, the word “white” reminded me of something important. Genma would have said something if Kakashi hadn’t made it but—

A thought occurred to me, sending a feeling like icy fingers down my spine. “Genma. Did—do you know if the children are all right?”

Genma’s chakra stilled, losing all sense of humor. I felt Raidō shift, his sleep disturbed, and almost wanted to retract the statement. But I needed to know. How long had it taken me to remember?

The others…” He exhaled slowly, then went on, “No luck. Trackers did their best, but they’re just…gone. Hell, we couldn’t find half of adults who lived in that fortress, much less the kids.”

I hissed under my breath. Fuck.

“I think Rin-san said the three of them were in the hospital somewhere, but I haven’t seen them since I woke up.” Genma’s voice sort of rolled right over me, as I sank back into my hospital bed and started swearing in a steady stream, almost on automatic.

There was—there hadn’t been a way for me to ensure the others would be safe. I had to recognize that, acknowledge it, and move the fuck on. I just—I’d tried, but with Orochimaru and Yagura and Akuro, it’d been all I could do just to keep people I could see alive long enough to come home.

Genma had been a premier example of that.

“It’s not worth much to hear it from me, now, but Kei-san? You did the best you could with what you had,” Genma said.

It probably shouldn’t have helped. The thought of what Kazuki and Tayuya and Miyu could be going through at that exact moment was the kind of thought I didn’t want to have. But I really didn’t have any choice. If there was ever going to be some chance of rescue, or reconciliation, or a bunch of other R-words, I needed to be able to stand up to act on any of them.

And I couldn’t.

So I needed to cram those feelings of failure into a mental filing cabinet until I had the means to deal with them.

“I’m going to go back to sleep.” Genma said quietly, while I tried to corral my whirling thoughts and put them away for a while. “Please, don’t disturb Raidō. I mean, I know it’s hard, but neither of us can even move. It doesn’t do any good to focus on things we can’t change right now.”

He had a point.

I knew he had a point.

I still wasn’t going to be able to sleep with that thought in mind.

But, on Genma’s advice, I tried anyway.

I drifted in and out, waking every twenty or thirty minutes, until dawn finally broke.

If I’d been able to sleep, I might have just let my fatigued brain finally drop off to sleep, but anxiety and guilt kept me awake when ordinarily nothing should have been able to do it. I stared at the ceiling until the low lights started to turn on, slowly signaling that the day would begin soon.

“Raidō, wake up,” Genma’s voice said quietly, once his chakra finally signaled to me that he was awake and thinking. “If you want to hide, you’re gonna have to do it now.”

Raidō’s chakra signature roused after a moment, and I heard him yawn. Then the other hospital bed shifted, and Genma actually squeaked before starting to laugh helplessly under his breath. And while I wasn’t exactly known for having a dirty mind as much as one that went for doomsday scenarios, well, they were a couple. There were any number of things that could have been happening.

“I don’t actually want to know what you two are doing in there,” I told them as I tracked the chakra of people within the hospital. Visiting hours would be starting soon, and we had a non-Rin nurse heading our way. “But figure things out fast.”

Genma murmured something, and then Raidō’s chakra became muffled under a powerful genjutsu. It was probably the camouflage thing I’d seen from him before. And once Raidō was cloaked, the curtains around Genma’s bed rippled. Raidō slipped out of the room just as the floor’s head nurse walked in.

Guess he wasn’t an ANBU captain for nothing.

“Oh, you’re awake again, Gekkō-kun?” said the nurse, whom I didn’t recognize. She was of the same general mold as Yamaguchi-sensei, complete with the domineering personality and string bean build. The main difference was that her voice was higher, and I didn’t know her name.

“I’m awake,” I agreed.

The nurse glanced at my various monitors. “It looks like you should be able to stand having visitors, after breakfast.”

I made a face at the thought of hospital food.

“I know, I know,” said the nurse. “Nevertheless.” After a moment, she turned to the curtain around Genma’s bed and asked, “Shiranui-kun, are you awake?”

“Yep,” Genma replied.

I bit back at least two sarcastic comments.

“Same thing I said to her, then,” the nurse said. “Be ready for a barrage of visitors.”

“Make sure to remind Gai not to bring flowers,” Genma called out to her as she left.

“A barrage?” I asked Genma, when the room was quiet again.

Genma replied, “Mostly for your sake. Me? I’m gonna be anesthetized or asleep for the rest of the day. Whenever they wheel me out of here.” He muttered something under his breath.

“Well, good luck,” I told him.

Genma ended up getting taken out of the room around an hour later, but most of our conversation sort of just died off after that last comment. I ate a tasteless breakfast while Genma dozed through the medic-nin prepping the area to wheel him out.

And by eight, I’d caught a glimpse of the immobilization rig they’d trapped his entire upper left side in. And then he was off to have that mess dealt with.

Five minutes after eight, I felt three bright little chakra signatures trooping down the hall. I put my empty breakfast tray on the nearest table and futzed with the bed until I could finally lean back against the raised back half of it. I needed to seem awake, for—

“Big sis Kei!” shrieked Aiko, as she led two more kids around the corner and through the doorway. She pulled her hand free from the nurse who had been escorting them around, ran, and leapt up onto my hospital bed.

“Whoa, hey, hang on,” I said, holding out my right hand to catch her. My left was still fucked (in that trying to lift it hurt like the blazes), so I didn’t trust it worth a damn. I was still waiting on some kind of soft cast.

Once she calmed down, I let her clamber onto my legs and pin them to the bed. She was followed by both Roku and Kaito, though I noticed that the latter had a yellow “Fall Risk” medical bracelet. Roku had one arm in a cast, but otherwise seemed lucid.

Roku helped Aiko make sure I wasn’t going to be walking anywhere, while Kaito needed a bit of help to get past the bed’s railing. Once on the bed, I saw a bandage wound around his head, and he curled up into my side like an exhausted puppy, leaning his head against my chest.

The nurse took one look at the pack of puppies I was dealing with and left, apparently convinced that no one would die in the next few moments.

I wasn’t that optimistic.

Aiko was twisting her fingers in the ends of her hair, which was four inches shorter than I remembered and without its usual cheery braids. She had a stitched gash under her eye, which was a rainbow of old bruising. She was wearing a hospital gown, like all of us, and suddenly seemed shy and nervous in a way she’d never really been before.

Roku was wide awake, unlike usual, and stared at me like he didn’t quite believe I was real and he’d never see me again. He looked at me like he was trying to memorize every detail. And like Aiko, he’d clearly been punched in the face at some point during the Sorayama incident, but wasn’t letting that stop him from wandering around.

And Kaito? He’d never clung like this. His skinny limbs trembled against my hospital gown, and I wrapped my arm around his back. When I did, I could feel the heavy gauze pad that the medics had put over the remainder of the bite wound he’d gotten days ago, and the bandages they’d used to secure it.

I didn’t even have to ask whether I was their rock in a shifting sea. They’d already made it clear.

“What happened here?” I asked, as I lifted my hand to touch the bandages woven through his near-black green hair. “Kaito?”

“Kaito hurt his head,” Roku answered, when Kaito responded by burying his face in my chest. His tone was strange, almost like he was spitting out a reply on autopilot. But if Aiko and Kaito wouldn’t talk, Roku took initiative, “They said it might grow back white instead of normal.”

A little chill crept up my spine. When I had written the character who so resembled Kaito, his hair had been white. Entirely. There had been legitimate plot reasons for that, but now it felt like a middle finger straight from the Plot I’d been fighting for most of this lifetime.

“And the nurse said Kaito was a girl,” he went on, puzzled. Then he frowned. “Why would she say that?”

Kaito shifted, burrowing further into my right side.

“That, I don’t know,” I admitted. I’d have to ask. And maybe get someone yelled at. Instead of concentrating on that, I asked, “Have the other people here been kind to you?”

I got two nods. Kaito didn’t bother responding.

“Konoha is—generally—one of the nicer Hidden Villages,” I said, but without any particular conviction. I’d pulled the short straw more than once in my second life, and mostly thanks to the people who lived here. And recently enough that the new scars were still raw.

I still didn’t know what to do about that. What to say.

I hadn’t...been in the best state the last time I saw most of them. Ebisu had probably let the others know that I had gotten better—or at least less dead, before replacing my feelings with overwhelming hate for a while.

I didn’t really know what to call how I felt, now.

And I had never addressed the elephant in the room before leaving, freaking out, and then getting run through. Namely, the details of my reincarnation.

And like a lot of decisions made while emotionally compromised, telling Sensei and Kakashi was one of those things I was sure I was going to regret.

“Big sis?” Roku asked.

“Yeah?”
“Can you, um, can you tell us a story or something?” Roku suggested, as he settled in next to me.

If I could use every story I’d ever heard of...yes.

“Give me a moment to think about it,” I said. I frowned in thought, leaning back against the bed. I had an idea, as long as I skipped a bit to avoid the name “Orochi.” Or I could just leave that villain out.

Well. I had something, and at least it ended better than most of the shinobi parables we were taught in the Academy. Most of those were depressing.

“Once upon a time, in a land far away from here, there was a god in the form of a white wolf,” I began, as the children settled in. “But the gods in this land had lost strength because the faith of the people had wavered, and the god returned to a world overrun with monsters, and had very little strength to fight them with. And so the wolf embarked on a journey to cleanse the land and restore human belief in the gods…”

I was probably telling the story badly, by removing the eight-headed Orochi with a lot of spotty editing. But for now, the kids could stand to hear the Orochi-free version for as long as they stayed awake.

The lot of them fell asleep a little after the Spider Queen was defeated, where the wolf saved the little dog Ume from being eaten and his owner Kokari from being left horribly depressed. Kaito remained stuck to me as though with glue, while the other two treated me like a breathing pillow.

With the kids asleep, I decided to doze.
Kaito, Roku, and Aiko had to leave for more tests around nine in the morning. “Do we have to?” Roku asked me, as Kaito quietly refused to leave my side. In fact, he dug his fingers into my hospital gown and hung on for dear life.

Aiko was already standing, her tiny feet in those uncomfortable hospital slippers, and she looked between Roku and me with wide gray eyes. “That nurse was mean.”

“Then ask for Yamaguchi-sensei instead,” I suggested. At their blanks looks, I explained, “He was my teacher when I was learning medical ninjutsu years ago, and he’s nice to kids even if he looks scary.”

“Really?” Roku asked.

“Really,” I told them. “And if he looks too scary anyway, or if he’s yelling at someone, ask for Rin Nohara. She’s not scary, and she listens. Yamaguchi-sensei is good for scaring other people, though.”

Roku’s eyes unfocused for a moment. “Rin...san? I heard that name before…”

“She’s visited you once, but it was a long time ago,” I replied.

Roku nodded. “We’ll find Rin-san.”

And with that, Roku gently pried Kaito away from me and, with only a bit of hesitation, led them after the nurse that had come to escort them to their checkups.

That left me with nothing to do except sit and stew in my thoughts.

Did the kids even know what had happened? I hadn’t asked if they understood what had happened at Sorayama. I could certainly remember having a concept of death at the tender age of six, but I was a reincarnation and therefore a complete cheater. Kaito’s parents hadn’t quite been killed in front of him, but all three kids had seen Chinatsu’s aides all die defending them. They’d been in mortal peril. That left scars, even if the children didn’t understand the magnitude of what had occurred. How thorough the Oto-Kiri forces had been.
And I didn’t know if the Chinatsugumi—the pure merchants, the ones who hadn’t gone down fighting—had mostly made it out okay. At civilian speeds, it would take them days to arrive in Konoha, if they were even headed in our direction. Until then, these three kids were at the mercy of Konoha’s charity, without any familiar faces besides me and Team Chōza. And Rin, but the last time she’d visited Sorayama had been years ago. They were in a sea of strangers, and would be for days.

And among all of the other unknowns, there was no way to know what had happened to the other children. Gemma had heard rumors, but that didn’t mean much given that no one on the relief team could have possibly known about the kids. I’d been the last one standing, and I didn’t remember telling anyone that we should have been looking for kidnapped civilian children.

Hell, I didn’t know what had really happened there, because there was a missing bit in the middle and the ending basically came down to me getting perforated. And even that part—the mystery of how I’d come down from a Tailed Beast breakdown, or what I’d done in it—was a total blank.

I clung to the fact that Genma hadn’t mentioned my teammates. If he and I were the worst off...well, it sucked to be stuck in a hospital bed, but I could live with that. I knew what had happened there, and that I’d recover in time. If my friends had suffered, just because I was stupid enough to get bitten by Lord Voldemort...

This was not a productive line of thought.

Luckily, it was almost immediately interrupted by a blue Konoha sandal hitting the swing doors and knocking both of them wide open.

The sandal was attached to a foot, which was immediately followed by bright orange legwarmers. And then the whole ninja stumbled in, bearing a pair of wrapped packages in his arms and a tortoise’s huge red shell on his back. Tied to his arms, he had also helpfully brought along a selection of paper chains and good luck charms, at least two homemade cards, and a takeout container. Unable to get up and help him with any of it, I watched as Gai brought everything he apparently thought was necessary for a well-wishing and grinned at me.

It took me a bit longer than it should have to realize that the tortoise was alive, since it didn’t react to Gai’s exuberance.

“Hello, Keisuke-chan,” Gai said, grinning from ear to ear. “I’m so glad to see you awake and lively!”

And I was just glad to see him alive. Probably wouldn’t be a good idea to say as much, though.

“I’m glad to be awake,” I said, and eyed his burdens with mild worry. “Are, uh, are you supposed to be doing crazy stuff right now?”

“My hand is in a cast, Keisuke-chan, but I am still mobile!” Gai replied. He paused for a moment, thinking, and said, “Actually, all told, I do not feel much worse than if I overworked myself during training. I must credit this to Rin-chan’s wonderful hard work.”

“Just be sure you don’t re-injure yourself,” I suggested.

“He won’t,” said Ningame, from just below the edge of the mattress. He craned his neck so he could see me, and added, “I won’t let him.”

“Ningame, I am not so irresponsible that I will hurt myself again,” Gai protested.

Maybe I needed to get them off of that topic. “Gai, what is all this stuff?”
“Oh! I have brought gifts to ensure your quick recovery, Keisuke-chan!” Gai said, and presented me with two signed cards.

I blinked and had to put them down on my blankets, since I could only use one hand to read them. My left still wasn’t doing much for me. As soon as Rin or Yamaguchi-sensei came to see me, I’d have to complain about that little fact, and figure out what the fuck I’d done to myself.

“Thank you, I…” And I trailed off once I got the card open.

The card itself had been designed with Gai’s usual flair, complete with little sketched shuriken and katana for a border design along the inside. The card itself was a light spring green, and left plenty of room for people to write their well-wishes and put their signatures all over it.

And they had.

“Get well soon!” proclaimed the card, and a cluster of signatures had sprung up around the message. I read the names with a feeling of floaty, but not unpleasant, numbness that came with surprises like this one. And yet, my throat started to close up and my eyes started to burn as I read.

Kurenai Yūhi, Asuma Sarutobi, Aoba Yamashiro, Kotetsu Hagane, Izumo Kamizuki, Anko Mitarashi…

Then my eyesight blurred too much to read the rest. I put the card down and dragged the collar of my hospital gown up to dab at my eyes. I didn’t exactly have enough sleeve to do it with.

When I looked up, Gai was holding a box of tissues for me. “There is another card too, Keisuke-chan.”

After I wiped my eyes again, I checked that one out. The second card was robin’s-egg blue, and contained another twenty or thirty signatures. A few stood out, just because I was surprised the people involved had bothered.

Himawari Hyūga, Mikoto Uchiha, Fugaku Uchiha, Shibi Aburame, Biwako Sarutobi, Hiruzen Sarutobi…

I hadn’t even seen half of these people since the clan meeting over a year and a half ago.

“I only got signatures from those who would not be able to visit you in the hospital immediately,” Gai admitted. “I’m certain that Kakashi and Obito wish to see you directly, and they are not going to be available for missions that take them outside of the village.”

“Outs—oh. Sorayama cleanup?” I asked, as the warm fuzzy feeling started to wear off.

“Yes. The Hokage wanted us to do as much as we can for those who lived in the village,” Gai explained.

“Gai isn’t going, though,” Ningame said firmly. “The refugee columns were Tsuruya-san’s responsibility initially, and mine. But we will not deploy walking wounded to this task. I put my foot down.”

“You did?” Gai asked his summon.

“Well. Sort of,” Ningame turned his head toward Gai. “I can tell you right now that you’re not going anywhere until you are healed, Gai!”
Gai gives me a helpless look for just a moment, but then he waggles his eyebrows to show that he’s not being at all serious. “Keisuke-chan, we do not know what happened during the incident, not in the detail that others do. But rest assured that Konoha is doing its best for everyone who was hurt in the attack.”

I wasn’t quite sure if I could trust that if it had come from anyone else. But from Gai? I could believe that he believed it. And if he believed it, then it’d become reality sooner or later.

It was just the kind of person he was.

“Thank you, Gai,” I said, and put as much sincerity into it as I could manage. He didn’t have to do all of this for me. It must have taken him hours to go around and talk to all of these people...and quite a while to get any information about Sorayama, if enough high-level personnel were involved.

“You have not even seen my other gift.” With that Gai picks up the long-forgotten package and, after a moment where he apparently makes certain that it’s the one he means, he hands it to me. “Feel free to open it, Keisuke-chan. I did not get you anything for your birthday, but I think this gift will be suitable!”

“I, uh, may need your help,” I admitted. I gestured helplessly at my stupid left arm and added, “I can’t really, um, use that much chakra.”

“No need to worry!” Gai said. At my nod, which he accurately assessed as permission, he picked up the package and shredded the wrapping paper in about half a second. Scraps blew everywhere from the sudden shockwave of air, because of course Gai still did stuff at immense speed when he wasn’t supposed to.

Ningame bit the outside of Gai’s legwarmer to get him to stop.

While Gai argued with his summon, I picked up the tangle of cloth to get a better look at it.

The first component was a pale gray T-shirt which had an image of Isobu’s big, spiky head slapped right onto the front of it. It looked like a traditional ink painting, but I didn’t know of any artist in town who would have drawn it. Pulling on the fabric experimentally, I realized that it would stretch a bit—just not over the image. Weird, but artistically a good choice.

And the pajama pants were equally interesting. Instead of just using normal, worn-out shinobi pants that I either dismantled or modified into pajama bottoms, I could now be fashionable and thematically appropriate while lounging around and not going on missions. Mainly because the pants were dark blue, with dozens upon dozens of bubbles on the fabric.

As soon as I could tell Isobu about this, I was sure he would get a kick out of it.

“I am glad you like it,” Gai said. With his good hand, he grasped mine and said, “I cannot stay for long, Keisuke-chan, but I hope that you will be able to wear these instead of hospital gowns soon enough.”

I smiled back, and pumped his hand once. It was a lot less violent than his usual handshakes. “Baby steps toward progress, right? Thank you so much, Gai.”

“You’re welcome, Keisuke-chan!” Gai said, and he picked up Ningame and zoomed out of the room.

Off to make the world a better place.
Heh.

I needed to get back on my feet to do that.

I got really bored within twenty minutes of Gai taking off.

If I concentrated, I could feel Genma’s chakra again, outside of the isolation room that Konoha’s medic-nin preferred for surgeries, but they didn’t bring him back to my room to sleep off whatever they’d done to save his left shoulder. As a result, I had no roommate and no one to talk to.

I’d read Gai’s cards four times each, and folded and refolded the pajamas he’d given me with some difficulty. I buzzed for a nurse twice, to no avail, and thus my useless arm remained useless.

I had to assume that there were more casualties. Sure, my chakra sense couldn’t easily pick out civilians compared to shinobi, but there were a lot of people in the hospital.

“Obito, I already said Kei’s just through—”

That was Rin’s voice. And shortly thereafter—

Obito hit the door face-first and knocked the swing doors open wide enough that Rin could slip through in his wake. It took me a second to realize why, and then I spotted Obito’s headband pulled over both of his eyes like he was trying to make fun of Kakashi and had missed the mark.

Well, eye and eye socket.

“Kei, are you awake?” Obito asked, looking around even though he certainly didn’t have the Byakugan to play with.

“If you didn’t think I was awake, why’d you barge in?” I asked, sitting up thanks to the power of adjustable bed settings. I mean, I could probably do it on my own, but why push?

Obito paused. “Uh.” He rubbed the back of his neck. “Oops?”

“Gai told me you were awake,” Rin chastised me. “I told Obito we could come and visit. You shouldn’t tease him like that.”

I stuck my tongue out at them. I hadn’t had nearly enough time to joke with them both.

Funny how almost dying could change a person’s perspective.

“Obito, why do you have your headband that low?” I asked him, rather than pausing for too long and giving myself a chance to wallow.

Obito, after a bit of blind groping at the air, managed to find his way to the edge of my bed and sit down on it. He had to feel around to locate my knee, and then he turned pretty much in my direction.

“What’d you do?” I asked him. I didn’t...remember seeing him at Sorayama. But I couldn’t think of any other mission that could possibly make Obito overwork himself like that.

“I used Kamui...a lot,” Obito says sheepishly. He couldn’t see my reaction, but he hurriedly added, “I had a really good reason and we got a lot of people out of there all right, compared to what could have happened. I mean, uh...”
I sighed. “Obito, I’m not in any position to lecture you about reckless use of dangerous jutsu. At all.”

Rin sat down on my left side, mirroring Obito. After a second, she scooted so she faced me and crossed her legs to form a bowl with her lap. “I can’t really yell at anyone either...I mean, I did something dangerous yesterday, and I’m lucky it turned out well.”

Rin did something risky? “Like what?”

“It’d be easier to just show you.” With that, Rin bit the side of her thumb, gathered chakra, and then —oh, no way.

There was a puff of smoke, and a glossy black scorpion sat on Rin’s thigh. It had glowing green markings, huge pincers, and it was about the size of a cat. On its tail, someone had tied a cute, lacy ribbon just after the base of the stinger.

“This is Kyūri-chan,” Rin explained, even as the gigantic thing crawled over the hospital linens.

Cucumber? What was it with people I knew and naming their pets after food? Even as I thought that, it curled its stinger around itself and pressed its pincers closed and toward its head, then embarked on an epic journey across the bed.

It looked...kind of like a cucumber when it did that. With legs.

Actually, wait, this wasn’t a pet. “Congratulations on your summon contract, Rin,” I told her. “Is Kyūri-chan the only one?”

“No, she’s just the one who’s going to be observing me for a bit,” Rin corrected. “Once Kyūri-chan approves of me, I’ll be able to actually sign the scorpion contract.”

Eh?

“I got to speak to the mother of all the scorpion summons on the contract. She’s their boss, and she’s called Dokuyu-sama,” Rin explained. She held out her hand to pick up Kyūri, like some kind of favored pet, and cradled the big arachnid against her shoulder. “And all of the scorpion clan are her daughters and granddaughters.”

...How many babies did scorpions have at one time, again? I had a sudden vision of a picture I’d seen once, somewhere, of a mother scorpion carrying about thirty babies on her back, to protect them from predators. While originally the entire idea had given me chills, I liked to think that I’d grown a bit stronger over the course of this second lifetime.

Bugs just didn’t bug me as much. Eating them did, but I wasn’t called on to do that. Ever.

“Oh, and we brought you some gifts,” Obito said into the silence. “I have the scroll here—”

And Obito, after fumbling with the pockets in his jacket, managed to produce a storage scroll.

“Since when have you been able to use fūinjutsu?” I asked him, while he unraveled it.

“I can’t,” Obito replied. “Kushina-san helped me with this.”

“Oh, and speaking of help,” Rin said, like she’d just realized something important, “is your left arm all right?”

“In fact, no,” I told her, glaring down at the offending limb. “I can’t get it to move without hurting like hell. What happened to me?”
Rin paused for a moment, while Obito traced his fingertips across the inside of the scroll in an attempt to figure out which seal he was looking for.

“I don’t know how to say this…” Rin mumbled. Louder, she said, “But something destroyed three of your tenketsu points in that arm.”

“Oh,” I said.

“Is that all you have to say? ‘Oh?’” Rin repeated, and I knew I was in trouble. She sat up and almost snapped at me, saying, “Kei, the human body has three hundred and sixty-one tenketsu total, and I know you’ve done horrible damage to your chakra system before! Outright destroying your tenketsu could render you completely incapable of molding chakra, and you could have easily died if the Gates had been affected!”

I didn’t say anything. Instead, I sunk into my hospital bed and tried not to make any sudden movements.

Obito pretended to be busy.

“...But you’re not surprised at all,” Rin said, bringing her hand to her mouth as her eyes went wide. “Kei...did you know what would happen?”

I nodded.

Sounding hurt, Rin asked, “Then why did you do it?”

Hoo boy. Question of the hour, that one.

My fingers twisted in the bedsheets as I fidgeted. How was I supposed to...actually, Rin had told me the damage without too much hesitation. I could probably return the favor.

“When I was fighting Orochimaru,” I began carefully, “Isobu and I hit the limit. You know, of what chakra I can use from him before I burn up or something.”

Obito went still.

Rin gestured for me to go on.

“So Orochimaru jumped on that opening, and he bit me.” I gingerly touched my left shoulder, and the limb felt like particularly achey lead. I still couldn’t move it. “It’s probably somewhere in Anko’s file, or something, but Orochimaru can place a Curse Seal using his teeth. And the seal went right here.”

I didn’t remember what happened between that and the mental world, and then waking up to Kushina’s purple-eyed gaze boring into mine. But I could guess.

“I told Isobu I didn’t care what happened to the rest of me,” I went on, staring down at my lap. “So he flooded my system with his chakra until the...until the fragment of Orochimaru got burned out. But I can’t remember what happened in the middle, so I’ve just been assuming that the fuckup with my shoulder is on me.”

“Kakashi talked about a white snake…” Rin murmured, thinking rapidly.

“Sounds like a soul fragment to me,” I said with a half-shrug. “Orochimaru got a bit literal about his title.”
“Which one?” Obito asked. From what I could see of his face, he looked like he was trying to decide between being horrified at what had happened and concerned for my sake.

“He’s sometimes called the ‘White Snake,’” I told Obito. “And it’s something that sort of came up in the intelligence reports about him. His real form isn’t really human anymore. It’s more like a hundred thousand white snakes all crammed into one shape.” I shuddered. “That was what Isobu and I saw inside my head.”

“That must have—wait, you told Isobu to flood you with his chakra.” Obito reached over and grasped my left hand in both of his. “Kei, you were okay with dying? If Orochimaru hadn’t been defeated first—”

“I probably would have died,” I agreed. “Actually, I almost did. Kushina had to repair the seal before it just...broke, under all the stress.” Another one-shouldered shrug. “But if I let the Cursed Seal stay on me, I would have been…”

What in hell was this world’s term for a Horcrux?

“Each Curse Seal contains part of Orochimaru’s soul,” I improvised. Okay, okay, how to make this less alarming...? “But I guess that doesn’t really explain how important they are. Each seal essentially contains an, uh, a dormant form of Orochimaru. I think if you perform a specific unsealing ritual, the seals themselves can turn into another, whole Orochimaru.”

...Welp, so much for not making Rin look at me like I was about to explode. I only did that to other people, thank you so much.

It was a small mercy that I couldn’t see Obito’s full expression.

“And I wasn’t going to let myself become one of his spies, or an extra life, so I just...got rid of it.” I had officially made the entire business sound even more dire. Go me. “At the time, the most important thing to me was to keep him from getting any more footholds in this world. I...didn’t really think about what it would do to me to burn the seal off. It didn’t really seem to matter.”

And the next thing I knew, Obito and Rin were both hugging me. While the scorpion escaped onto Rin’s back in time, the scroll ended up crumpled between all of us, and my left arm continued sending out unhelpful pain signals. I bit the inside of my cheek to keep from swearing, to remind myself that this was okay, I wasn’t in any danger—

Obito eased off a bit, giving my left arm a chance to calm the fuck down, but his arms were still around my shoulder and around Rin, and his face was against my neck. Rin had both of her arms around my waist and was careful not to squeeze too hard, and her face was squished between my shoulder and Obito’s.

It was like being constricted by a very warm python. They probably didn’t mean it that way, but I didn’t exactly have the world’s most intact rib cage, and I wasn’t at my best.

I still held on as long as I could without breathing.

But after a while, with the deep ache in my chest reminding me that it existed, I had to pinch Obito’s side to get him to let me up.

“Never, ever, ever say you don’t matter,” Rin said firmly, even as she numbed my useless shoulder with one hand. “I don’t—I wouldn’t…” She swallowed hard. “You introduced me to Akihito-shishō. I—he wouldn’t be looking after me if it wasn’t for that. And I don’t know if I would have tried to be a medic-nin at all without him, and you, and…”
“And I would never have even gotten this far. Neither of us would have,” Obito said, nodding as he picked up the train of thought Rin had briefly dropped. While Rin sniffled for a moment, Obito managed a quick, wobbly grin and said, “You can feel good about saving both of us from what happened in that other world. So don’t be so hard on yourself!”

“You did the work yourselves, mostly,” I mumbled. While it was true that interfering at the right moment had given them both a chance to work out their futures, there had not technically been anything stopping either of them from caving under the pressure of ninja life in a different way.

“Kei, I don’t think you understand how...abstract some of the things you talk about really are,” Rin said. “I mean, you mentioned once that the story you remembered didn’t really have you in it, right?”

I nodded. “Right.”

“Neither of us really know what it was like,” Rin said, holding up a hand to stop me when I wanted to protest. Her eyes were still a little red. “As far as we’re concerned, this is the only timeline, or world, or story, and you’re in it for us. You’re real. It’s the world without you that’s vague and unreal and...impossible.”

I froze. That—it wasn’t—

It wasn’t supposed to work like that.

This was supposed to be just an offshoot, a branch timeline, a world where things went right enough and I could just...bow out once my role was finished. Where I could ensure something resembling a happy ending would happen.

I wasn’t supposed to be someone.

Obito hugged me again, while I reeled from Rin’s choice of words. “So don’t ever think we don’t care about you. The world you keep talking about—it sucks, and we need you here so ours doesn’t. Don’t...do that thing where you go away in your head.”

“We love you too much for that, okay?” Rin asked, and started sniffling again.

I could barely hear her over the noise from my breath hitching, and big, ugly sobs started to tear their way out of me. It was like seeing Hayate again, and knowing I’d almost hurt him so badly, but Rin and Obito knew. They knew something resembling the entire story.

Rin and Obito stayed long enough for all of us to calm down. It took...some time. Longer than it had with Hayate, because we all kept setting each other off.

“Poof.”

And in my hands was a rectangular glass vase, with pebbles piled into the bottom half. Out of the top, three little bamboo plants poked out, with their long leaves flaring across the top of the vase. When I shook it, very briefly, water sloshed around the top levels of the rocks.

“I know you didn’t spend a lot of time at home,” Obito said, “but this plant doesn’t require a lot of work, and I think, um, having something to focus on will be good. And there’s no pollen, so Kakashi can’t complain.”
“Isn’t bamboo a grass?” I asked, rubbing my eyes. Stupid tears. “It does do flowers, eventually.”

“Sort of, but this thing grows so slow that it shouldn’t be bad. You can just snip them off, too,” Obito said, letting me go. Then he turned to Rin. “Your turn, Rin-chan.”

Rin dug around in her medic-nin uniform pockets, and produced a silver-wired pendant on a matching chain. The pendant was made of mother of pearl that had been carved into a teardrop shape, and reflected a rainbow of colors as it turned in the light. When Rin handed it to me, I turned it over and over in my hands, letting the chain tangle in my fingers.

“Did you make this?” I asked Rin. I had given Rin a box for seashells before, but I couldn’t quite remember when.

“I did,” Rin said. “Do you like it?”

“I do.” I didn’t own any jewelry, and I kept Mom’s wedding band in a box somewhere. This was...this was really nice. I didn’t really know what to say, but perhaps I had an idea of what to do. Fumbling for a moment, I put it on with one hand and hoped that it made up for my inability to string words together.

After a while, I managed to say, “Thank you,” which felt inadequate.

Rin and Obito each gave me another hug before they left.

The world seemed a little duller once they were out of the room. There was color, in the form of the bamboo plant and the pendant, but my thoughts were melancholy at best.

I slept again, for lack of anything better to do.

Kakashi

The Konoha hospital clings to its patients, generally unwilling to let them wander off to parts unknown to recover in peace and quiet. Unless a patient can be released to someone, the staff’s general levels of possessiveness and paranoia regarding patient health mean that getting out is more difficult than it has to be. It’s generally more like trying to break out of prison than any other experience I can think of.

Luckily, I know Ten—Yamato. It’s still a pain trying to get used to his name change.

Anyway, Yamato isn’t a medic, but he is Tsunade’s ward. He has enough know-how to keep me out of trouble, or so the hospital thinks. One possible case of voluntary kidnapping later, and I was able to go home, get a new change of clothes, and feel a little more human.

Yamato does his best to keep track of me during that time, and is successful only because my injuries make it impossible for me to mold chakra worth a damn. And maybe because I’m feeling cooperative.

Now I’m back in the hospital, with T—Yamato at my side, feeling awkward at best.

“I can leave you here,” Yamato says, since we’ve been standing at the T-junction leading to Kei’s room for entirely too long. “You know the way there, right?”

Yamato focuses his cat-eyed stare on me, and for a moment I feel a lot older than seventeen. Bright-eyed and clean-shaven and not remotely scorched or bruised, he’s been well out of the epicenter of the literal and figurative explosions. I’m not even sure if he wants to join ANBU as a teenager. He’s grown his spiky hair out long enough that it’s settled down and can be tied off, in a style that almost mimics Tsunade’s. Without the Senju-styled headband, he looks less...focused. More relaxed.

I wish I could say the same for me.

I still feel like a live wire. Between my injuries and the realization that Kei is awake, I can’t stay still.

But I can’t just leave Yamato staring at me. I sigh and say, “Yeah, I can find my way there. Thanks, T—Yamato.”

“If you have that much trouble with it,” Yamato says, “you can keep calling me Tenzō.”

No, I need to get used to this. “It’s fine, Yamato.”

“Well, shout if you need me,” he says, and leaves in short order. He helps so much during the day in the hospital that I’m not sure if the staff know he has more violent skills than setting up IVs.

I head down the hall, hands in my pockets, and hope that Kei is going to want to talk to me.

The last time we really talked was probably before her year-long deployment. But between the disaster of her return to Konoha, and then the mission, and then fucking Orochimaru, I can’t say that we’ve really spoken outside of the minimum required to get vital information across. That’s all.

And then there was the problem of Kei’s biggest secret.

I’ve never really thought about what happens after I die, to be honest. About what would kill me, yes, but not that part. There are powerful, dangerous techniques based on manipulating souls, so the afterlife—the Pure World—probably exists. I know there are fūinjutsu that call on a literal reaper of souls, and Kei mentioned something called Impure World Reincarnation, which drags shinobi back from the afterlife to serve as the summoner’s shock troops. It was one of the Second Hokage’s most notorious techniques, according to the Forbidden Scroll.

But Kei didn’t follow the call of a jutsu that perverted the spirits of the dead. She reincarnated normally, but from some place that doesn’t make any sense to me. A totally different world, where our lives are mere stories and misery is just entertainment.

I wonder if that’s what it’s like to be a god.

There are stories of spirits falling from the sky, being trapped in this violent world and unable to go home to the heavens. But I can’t remember many details on them. I just know that the spirits were miserable in the mortal world.

I can practically feel myself dragging my feet, and shake myself to get it back under control. I killed an S-class missing-nin not three days ago, and now I get the shakes when even thinking about trying to talk to one of my teammates? Pull it together, Hatake...

As the numbered rooms pass by faster, I continue to turn the puzzle over in my head.

Kei doesn’t...no, before her string of missions, Kei hadn’t seemed like a spirit dragged out of its rightful afterlife, or a heavenly being that crashed into this world. She’d just been, well, Kei. A little silly, willing to play along with jokes, highly protective of her friends....

Well, that last part hasn’t changed. Hokage Guard or not, Kei always puts everyone else first.
And then there was the crash.

I don’t know if the situation is recoverable. I don’t know if Kei will go back to being hollowed-out and silent now that she’s back in Konoha.

But I have to see her. I’m at the door, so I just need to…

“Kakashi?”

Sweat breaks out on my forehead. Anything I want to say just flies right out of my head.

I push the door open anyway.

Kei is sitting up in her hospital bed with her left arm in a sling. She looks like she was crying relatively recently, and her hair looks like she’s been spending too much time asleep, but she’s aware and active and nearly normal. Her skin’s entirely grown back, and aside from her arm she doesn’t seem to be in any particular pain.

It’s better than I hoped for.

“Morning,” I greet her, as I cross the room to grab one of the visitor chairs.

“Just sit on the bed, Kakashi. Everyone else has,” Kei suggests.

A quick sniff confirms that. Under the pervasive, lingering odor of iodine-based disinfectants and whatever lemon-scented cleaner the hospital staff uses, I can smell seven other people. Obito and Rin are obvious, and recent, but I can also smell Genma and Raidō, even if they were over there and not on Kei’s bed. And then there are three strange, foreign scents, which remind me of Sorayama’s volcano.

So the children Obito brought back here did make it. I’d wondered about that.

I sit down on the edge of the bed, debating briefly if I should scoot closer before deciding against it. I need a bit of distance.

Kei doesn’t say anything for a long moment. She twists the blanket up between her fingers and doesn’t meet my eye. I don’t quite know what to say either, so I dig around in my pockets for the thing I meant to give her and hope it breaks the ice.

I look around the room. On top of the usual Gai-made cards that pepper the hospital, there is a bamboo plant in a vase, and a mother-of-pearl necklace around Kei’s neck. Obito and Rin are the only two people I can think of who would bring such specific gifts.

“Do you want to talk?” Kei asks, finally drawing my attention back to her. She bites the inside of her cheek as soon as the question’s out in the air.

“Yes, but I owe you this first.” I dig into my pockets and hand her the gift I’d intended to give to her almost a week ago.

Kei takes the gift, then unfolds it a bit with a surprised, “Oh!”

It took me a while to figure out what design to use for the armband. But once I decided, it was easy enough to sew the Konoha leaf symbol into the red fabric. This is the first in a series of five I’ve made so far. I just haven’t felt like giving them out until Kei gets hers.

“Hm, Kakashi, can you hand me that vase?” Kei asks, and I can see the spark of an idea in her eye.
It’s more than I’ve seen from her in entirely too long, so I snatch the vase up and hand it to her carefully.

Kei takes the bamboo plant and lowers it into her lap, preventing the water from spilling out with her knees. And with a flourish, she wraps the armband around the stalk of the bamboo, grinning and trying not to giggle. “I dub thee Mr. Ukki.”

Kei bursts out laughing.

I can almost feel the joke go flying over my head.

Kei stops giggling after a while, but she picks at the armband around the plant. She’s still smiling, though, so maybe I shouldn’t question it?

“I don’t understand what’s so funny,” I tell her.

Kei pauses, as though just remembering that I’m there. I see her hand spasm for just a moment, tightening on the armband. “It’s a bit hard to explain…”

I can’t stand to see Kei close herself off again, so I offer her my hand. Come on, stay with me…

Kei takes it. “It, uh, has to do with that story I told you about.”

“Do you want a privacy seal for this?” I ask. I have a few of those, just because I’m good at my job and I never know when I might need them.

Kei nods, so I take a privacy seal out of one of my pockets and place it on the bed between us. I have just enough control over my chakra to activate it, and Kei relaxes a bit once she sees that it’s one of her designs. Maybe this will help her feel a bit better?

“So I guess it’s not really a joke, exactly,” Kei says in a small voice, still toying with the armband. “Just…something I find apt, I guess.”

“I’m listening,” I tell her, squeezing her fingers between mine.

Kei takes a deep breath. Then, in a rush, she explains, “It was something from the story, you know? N—One of your future genin students gives you a plant, a little like this one. Maybe it was another weird kind of plant. Whatever it was, uh, the other you named it Mr. Ukki.”

“…So you can say you’ve gone back to your…roots?” I ask, raising one eyebrow. If I was wearing my headband, I’d probably look like an idiot.

Kei starts giggling again, and it’s far more honest than the last round. That session leaned toward hysteria.

Still, she settles back down eventually. “Thank you for that.”

“Well, it’s no apple, but there’s always a pun,” I say with a shrug.

Kei pauses, tilting her head to one side for a moment. “Well, I’ll forgive you for that, if you talk to me?”

“About what?” I sit back, tucking my hands back into my sweatshirt’s central pocket. She probably doesn’t need to hold onto me for the moment.

“If…could you tell me what happened?” Her right hand reaches up, clutching at her hospital gown over her heart. In my mind’s eye, I can almost see that moment again, with Kei’s slack face and the blood dripping down the Sword of Kusanagi. From the way her knuckles whiten, she can remember that moment, too. “After...this?”

Where do I even start?

“Please, Kakashi.” Kei lowers her head. Her hand tightens still further on her hospital gown. “I don’t —I don’t know how I’m still alive, when so many people aren’t. I mean, I should have...”

Kei trails off, because I put my hand on her knee and draw her attention away from her self-hatred for just a moment. We don’t need to face this particular inner demon again, not right now.

So I tell her.

I tell her about Kushina’s panic, about Sensei disappearing and about Obito’s arrival. I tell her about transporting the worst-wounded to Konoha, including those children Gai only told me about afterward, and I spend some time discussing Kushina’s unique healing ability.

I tell her about activating Kamui and killing Orochimaru. While I knew I had the ability more than three years ago, no amount of training could have made up for the chakra cost of Obito’s technique. I knew that much just by seeing it in action the first time.

And now, it seems, I’ve tackled that problem.

“...I didn’t realize you were—I mean, of course you’d be worried, but...” Kei shakes her head. “I’m sorry. I knew I was going to do something dumb and I didn’t warn you.”

“You were doing your job,” I tell her. Shit, I didn’t mean to cause her more pain. “Kei, you know all of us are—no, wait, you didn’t hear what I did.”

“What you did?” Kei asks. “But—”

“You were—you and the Three-Tails went insane, just from the pain,” I say quickly, trying to stave off the inevitable. I have a pretty good idea of what her reaction is going to be once I run out of ways to describe the events leading up to the dumbest moment of my life. Maybe putting it off will lessen the impact? “I lost the Chakra-Suppressing Seal Sensei gave me, but I still wanted to try talking.
It...didn’t work.”

“Kakashi, what did you do?” Kei asks, sharper than I expect.

Maybe I shouldn’t try to bluster my way through a lie in front of someone who’s known me since I was nine.

Might as well get it over with. It’s not as though I haven’t already said everything she could possibly say about that particular flash of brilliance. “After talking didn’t pan out, I ended up pinned. I was already low on chakra, and...emotionally compromised”—which is a great way of downplaying sheer desperation—“so I hugged you.”

Kei stares at me.

Yeah, that is about what I thought her reaction would be.

And yet I still wince inwardly as Kei says, “You idiot.”

“Way ahead of you there,” I tell her, masking my discomfort with a shrug. I realized my choice was a stupid one basically as soon as the idea popped into my head. “I called myself every name in the book when I did it.”

“But why did you think that hugging a berserk jinchūriki would—” Kei cuts herself off, shaking her head. “You could’ve died.”

Like that would have stopped me. I didn’t—there was no way I would have left Kei to suffer like that. I love her too much to walk away. Ever. “That was a risk I was willing to take.”

Kei falls silent.

When Kei doesn’t look like she has anything else to add, I go on, “I don’t—the Three-Tails did something, there, and used me like a lightning rod.” After a moment, I started picking at the bandages on my hands, and I can almost feel Kei’s eyes focusing on them. “The medics said that the burns here are from redirecting Orochimaru’s lightning, but my chakra coils… I guess the Three-Tails needed to get rid of all of the chakra before the seal broke down. I got overloaded, badly, and the medics say I won’t be able to take missions for a month.”

Kei shrinks in on herself the more I talk, and I reach out to her. She stares at the bandages on my hands for a long while, and then grasps it anyway. After a moment, I put my other hand over hers, and she doesn’t pull back.

“I don’t regret doing it,” I tell her, even as her head droops forward and her hair covers her face. I can’t see her expression. “It was stupid, and reckless, but I couldn’t think of anything else to do.”

“...Well, as long as we’re on the same page,” Kei mumbles, drawing her knees up toward her chest.

I don’t know how to help. I can probably change the subject to something lighter, but I can’t think of anything in the moment that won’t sound completely stupid. And there are things I do need to talk to Kei about, if only because they hurt her so badly the last time we spoke. People keep telling me that it feels better to talk about feelings, but I’m in unknown waters.

So I take a stab in the dark. “Kei, can...can we talk about your story again?”

“Y-Yeah,” Kei mumbles. “We can.”

Okay, now I’ve dug myself into a hole.

I don’t have any idea how to talk about reincarnation, Kei’s situation, or Kei’s reincarnation experiences. She never talked about it before, and that means I don’t have any way to approach this. How would I even start?

“Did you hear me before?” I ask, since I can’t think of anything else.

Kei shakes her head. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“A week ago,” I begin, and Kei freezes in place.

I feel the bottom drop out of my stomach. I don’t want to keep upsetting her, but this conversation just doesn’t want to improve.

“I told you that whatever you feel about being born into this world,” I whisper, “we’re all glad you’re here.”

Kei takes a deep, hiccupping breath.
I don’t know what to do other than keep going. She needs to hear this, fully, and not when she’s already been hurt or when she’s in too much pain to comprehend human speech. The third time has to be the charm, right?

I hope so.

“I know you feel like an outsider, or maybe...like someone playing god, but you’re human.” Okay, I know I’m grasping for a word that fits, and I missed. But Kei doesn’t pull away from me. “We’re all human. You were born here, and you belong here with all of us.”

Tears drip down onto the blanket, and Kei starts to shake.

I hope I’m doing the right thing. Please, please let me do the right thing here, for her. She’s been hurt too much, too often, and I can’t stand to see her like this.

“Even if you don’t realize it.” And then I fall silent because I can’t think of anything more to add that would be useful.

For a while, neither of us says anything. Kei sits and trembles in place, trying to keep a lid on her emotions, while I hold her hand and wait for them to pass.

But eventually, she calms down again. I don’t know for certain if my words have helped her, and perhaps I won’t until we talk about this again. But I can sense that this part of the conversation is closed, even before Kei lifts her head and her reddened eyes meet mine.

After a moment, Kei pulls her hand back and rubs at her eyes with her wrist. I settle back and wait for her to say something.

“Do you remember your prophecy, from the Great Toad Sage?”

I nod. Couldn’t exactly forget about it, simply because I noticed T—Yamato’s similarity to the figurative sapling. Small kid who makes trees. Sounds like a good candidate right there. The fact that Yamato’s connection to me meant ROOT’s downfall, over time, also seemed to point toward my prophecy being over and done with. I just had to keep moving forward.

Kei finally meets my eyes and says, “I think I found mine.”

The Great Toad Sage’s voice comes to mind immediately. “You will teach three dragon hatchlings to fly.”

Frowning slightly, I ask, “Are you talking about the three children who were in here earlier?”

They’re the only candidates I can think of at the moment. Though I’d wondered if Kei would teach Uchiha clan members, I suppose it makes sense that her baby dragons would appear in a group of three.

“Yeah, them. I-I never really put it together, until now,” Kei admits. She doesn’t even ask me how I knew that. “But the Chinatsugumi—they weren’t just merchants. You remember when we first met them, right?”

Uh. “I remember you being on the wrong end of Zakuro-san’s genjutsu bloodline.”

Kei shakes her head. “No, I mean about them being weird.”

“They are weird, yes,” I allow.
“They—they weren’t a part of your story, any more than I was,” Kei manages after a moment. She takes a breath and says, steadier, “None of them. But the important thing is that they’ve always been connected to dragons. It just seems to be less literal this time.”

“I don’t get it,” I admit. “Do you have some kind of...connection to them?”

“Yes.” Kei looks down at her lap again. “You remember how I said your world—it was a story to me? It wasn’t the only story out there. This one—it was mine. Not my life, but a story I made.”

How do I even respond to that? Kei—I love her, I know it as clearly as I know anything, but sometimes the things she says take time to even comprehend. Her mindset, in some ways, is truly alien.

But I know that the word “teach,” in conjunction with a skill, means that Kei is going to have students in the future. And I can grasp that easily enough. I may not know much about the children, or their purpose in Kei’s life beyond that. But if they’re Kei’s students, she’ll love them like her brother. They’ll be instant family.

If I don’t know these children now, I soon will.

As if to prove me right, three tiny sets of feet quickly become audible, past the buzz of the privacy seal. I pick the seal up off the bed and deactivate it.

“Big Sis Kei, are you here?” asks a child’s voice, and the door is quickly pushed open.

Three children in hospital gowns troop in. The tallest and oldest one immediately doubles back to lead the smallest child into the room. The little blonde girl ends up being the first one to reach the bed, but she stares up at me with wide, gray eyes as soon as she realizes I’m there.

“Who is he?” the child asks Kei, shrinking back.

The other two children skitter forward, huddling together with the blonde.

“This is my teammate, Kakashi Hatake,” Kei tells her. To me, she says, “Kakashi, in order: Aiko Kasai, Roku Chigami, and Kaito Yuki.”

Given Chinatsu’s clan name, I’m willing to assume that the blonde girl is the Kasai. The boys, though? My best guess is that the smaller one is Kaito, because the skin tone of the taller one doesn’t generally appear in Kiri clans.

Having been introduced, the smallest child apparently decides I’m not a threat. Kaito climbs up onto my lap, then crawls over to Kei. To my surprise, he buries himself into Kei’s right side, and Kei wraps her arm around him.

Then the other two follow suit, though neither one uses me as a ladder because I get off the bed to give them room first. One by one, each child slots into place around Kei.

Though they’re not dogs, I keep thinking of puppies rather than dragon children when I see them with Kei. I see the same desire for warmth and comfort. And I could smell the sharp tang of fear as soon as they walked into the room and met me, a stranger.

I stand a little out of the way, falling back to observe.

This group’s energy is all focused inward, and it doesn’t take a genius to see the pain reinforcing that bond. These children have lost everything, but they’ve latched onto Kei harder than I expected.
These kids need so much therapy.

But with Kei, they seem to be...all right. Cracked, like all of us are, and entirely too early, but they’re here. And Kei is going to be with them every step of the way, even through her recovery from this last year.

I glance out the recovery suite’s window, lost in thought.

I’m not going to do it. I can’t do it.

Kei has enough to think about without adding my feelings to this situation. If I tell her I love her, she’s going to devote her energy to my feelings as well. I’ve held onto my feelings for a long time already, and right now Kei needs to focus on herself and her new students.

Sure, nothing’s official, but I still don’t want to add to her burdens. She has enough to worry about. So, for now, I can bow out. I still love her, but what’s important here is Kei and the children. Anything else is secondary.

I reach out and take the armband I made off of Mr. Ukki. I adjust it so it sits more snugly around the three stalks. “I’ll leaf you four here to rest. Kei, take care of yourself.”

Kei nods and refocuses on the children. Her baby dragons.

Come to think of it, I need to check on my sapling again. Just to make sure he hasn’t fallen down a well or something.

With an excuse in hand, I leave.

Raidō catches me in the hallway before the bone and joint center, where I think Yamato has been growing splints for people.

“Did your visit go okay?” Raidō asks, as he scans me for any sign of...what, exactly? Something he doesn’t find. “Did you tell her?”

“Tell her what?” I ask, too quickly.

“You’re supposed to confess your love before the betting pool breaks down.” Raidō gives me a thoroughly unimpressed look.

How many people are in on this?! For fuck’s sake. Irritated, I hiss, “No, I didn’t tell her anything. And you shouldn’t either.”

Raidō gestures for me to elaborate.

“Kei has too much going on, and I’m not going to add to it,” I tell him sharply. “So stay out of this.”

Raidō looks completely blank for a few seconds. Then, as he slings his arm over my shoulder, “Shit, is it that bad?”

I nod, unwilling to say more.

“Do you want to talk about it?” It’s a bit late for sympathy, now.

“Not if you’re in on the betting pool.” I shake Raidō off and stalk away, off to find Yamato and make sure he’s all right.
It takes me a couple of minutes after that to start sneezing, and another ten seconds to realize that apparently, Raidō now has a cat.

Kei

The baby dragons went back to the children’s ward for lunch. They probably wouldn’t have left at all, if not for Yamaguchi-sensei showing up with candied ginger for good little piranhas, which they accepted as a bribe for good behavior.

Though he didn’t offer me any, because he was still a jerk at heart. And maybe dietary concerns.

Either way, it left me with nothing to do except get fusssed over by nurses. Between the sponge bath and the trip to the bathroom and the severe boredom, I didn’t end up with much to do.

I did find out that the Sword of Kusanagi had left a perfectly straight, reddened scar through my left breast, though. It even had a matching one that went right under my shoulder blade. So I guess the discovery there would at least keep me occupied for a bit from the sheer “how the fuck did I survive that” factor. There was enough important stuff inside my ribcage to have worried about that in the abstract, but the scar brought it home.

As it happened, the reason I survived my impromptu ventilation walked through the door during lunch, complete with her entire family.

Naruto made a beeline for me and held out his hands, demanding to be picked up immediately from the side of the bed. Unfortunately, I didn’t have enough arms or enough chakra to do as he asked without losing to physics somewhere, so I gave Kushina a helpless look.

Kushina smiled back, clearly hiding a giggle behind her daughter’s back.

Tatsumaki, with her red hair in a single ponytail today, struggled in Kushina’s arms in an attempt to kick off and toward the floor. With her message understood, however, Tatsumaki was conveyed over to my bed by Kushina.

“I made a card!” Naruto said in a bright voice, holding up a sheet of what used to be someone’s request for a...land ownership audit? Why would someone give that to Sensei in the first place?

Speaking of Sensei, he stayed near the door. His chakra was closed-off, cautious, and gave a strong impression that he didn’t want to be here.

My heart sank a little. Sensei didn’t even want to look at me?

But my spirits lifted a bit when Kushina picked up both Naruto and Tatsumaki and deposited them on my hospital bed, complete with the card made of ignored legal documents.

Naruto opened his mouth.

Inwardly, I braced for impact.

It came out as something like this: “Maki draws on the walls and eats cookies and doesn’t save any for me and hogs the ramen and always wants kisses and I love her so much!” And it went on for longer than I expected, fast enough that I wasn’t able to remember the bulk of it.

Tatsumaki started to giggle. “Ruto big noise!”

Well, she wasn’t wrong.
“Swimming is fun, and playing is fun and puppies are fun and I wanna puppy,” Naruto went on. “Mommy says no puppy. But ‘Maki and me wanna puppy.”

“Puppy!” said Tatsumaki. Then a thought seemed to occur to her. “No puppy?”

“You can always ask to play with Kakashi’s puppies,” I told him, since I did. When I was around.

“Tatsumaki, Naruto, I don’t think we’ve had lunch yet. This was just going to be a short visit, remember?” Kushina interrupted gently, but both of her kids turned to her with anguished looks on their faces.

I wasn’t sure why. I barely spent any time around them, as a rule. Hell, Tatsumaki hadn’t even had a personality the last time I was in town.

But I watched Kushina cast a significant look at Sensei, who was still being a wallflower. He winced when he met her eyes, at least as far as his chakra went. Someone was still in the figurative doghouse…

In short order, all of the Uzumaki-blooded members of the family were out the door and in search of something more appetizing than the crap left over from my lunch. I didn’t blame them, and in fact would have followed if I had any confidence that I would make it that far. As it was, the “Fall Risk” bracelet around my left wrist was an inconvenient reminder of reality.

Sensei leaned back against the wall and didn’t say anything. He didn’t look at me at all, with his gaze pointed firmly out the window instead.

I felt like I should apologize, more than anything. While Rikuto’s—the last conversation we really had was about encouraging me to be angry at injustice, and at people who hurt me. But I couldn’t find much of that anger, or at least none left over for other people.

It wasn’t exactly turning the other cheek. It was… I didn’t know what it was. But I was tired of being in pain, and of being exhausted, and of being unable to face my problems head-on. I just wanted to let it go and be done with it, but my stupid brain wouldn’t let me.

“I’m sorry, Kei.”

I jerked back to attention, tearing my eyes away from the middle distance and focusing on Sensei again. And, to my horror, a “For what?” slipped out, more aggressive than I expected.

Sensei’s eyes were on me, and his body language shifted. Where before, he was just leaning against the wall and trying to be invisible (and failing), there was a distinct slump to his shoulders that I couldn’t remember seeing before. His arms were crossed over his chest, and the second I tried to make eye contact, he averted his eyes.

I didn’t even have the capacity to joke at that point. While a small part of me was viciously satisfied that Sensei was finally, finally showing that he felt guilty about what had happened to me, the rest of me was more of a full-body flinch.

When the chips were down, I didn’t really want Sensei to be hurt. Whether physically—as proven by the incident that got me my first through-and-through wound—or not, I hated to see the people I loved in pain.

“I’m sorry, Sensei,” I heard myself say, as though in a daze. “I was out of line.”

“Don’t apologize,” Sensei said, but his tone was too soft to make it an order. “You had a point.”
I risked sneaking a peek at him.

He was still on the other side of the room, not moving. His chakra was still twisted in on itself, not flaring in anger.

Was I in the clear? Was everything okay?

“S—Sensei,” I said, around the lump in my throat. I tried again, and managed, “You can use the chair. You d—don’t need to stand over there.”

After a brief hesitation I almost never saw from him, Sensei nodded and crossed the room to sit down in the chair by my bedside. I sank further into the mattress, unsure of what to say. I should have been bowing, right?

Sensei sighed. “I haven’t been the best teacher, have I?”

What could I say to that? The fastest man alive was always a little bit too late. That was irony, or so I thought. Either way, it just hurt in a way that being near Sensei shouldn’t have. Sensei was supposed to mean I was safe, but the years had slowly chipped away at that sense of loyalty and dependence. The straw that broke the camel’s back—the sense of emotional abandonment that had gotten stronger and stronger over the course of my year out in the world—had been a long time coming.

It was probably a sign that I was irrevocably fucked up.

“I’ve made a lot of mistakes, Kei,” Sensei said, leaning forward a little so he could prop his elbows up on the bed. In the afternoon light streaming through the window, I could see the way the light hit his hair differently—and the occasional brighter spot where he’d picked up gray hairs.

He wasn’t even thirty.

“And how I’ve treated you has been one of the biggest ones.” Sensei looked away and said, “If I had just told you what I was trying to do, you probably would have understood. It wouldn’t have been a full year of field work, and you would have had the emotional strength to handle it.”

I looked away, too. Maybe I would have.

Or maybe I would have cracked in a new and interesting way instead.

“But I didn’t understand your situation at all, did I?” Sensei asked, and I looked at him again. There was a security seal by his elbow, preventing eavesdroppers, so I could assume that he was going to say something that didn’t need to be overheard at all.

So of course he did.

“Youreincarnation situation must have caused immense stress on its own, and I kept assuming that you got your information from some...conditionally helpful spirit,” Sensei shook his head again, and there was an undirected pulse of anger in his chakra, which promptly turned on him. He berated himself, “Someone or something that wanted to keep us alive for unknown reasons, and I couldn’t fully trust it.”

To be fair, I probably wouldn’t have trusted my information if I wasn’t me, either. Even if it kept being proved right, the source was dubious. Reincarnation-induced prophetic dreams sounded like complete horseshit, and they didn’t come with convenient automatic updates as the situation changed.
Just another reason that role was more and more useless with each passing day.

“No, it’s really not,” Sensei argued, but without raising his voice. “Kei, please look at me.”

Why, when we were making such a game out of avoiding eye contact? But still, my gaze finally snapped to Sensei’s face and stayed there.

“You are not expendable,” Sensei told me, reaching out and cupping my cheek. “You are my student, a baby sister, and someone who has a huge number of people who care about her.”

I immediately thought of the day’s barrage of hugs, and my throat started to close up.

Sensei continued quietly, “By letting politics get in the way—by letting small-mindedness and hatred dictate how I treated you—you were nearly killed by my cowardice.”

“I chose to protect you,” I protested. The decision had been about as thought-out as a spinal reflex, but it was still something I’d done. He couldn’t take that away from me.

“And I’m not sure I deserved that much,” Sensei replied heavily.

No.

No, he didn’t get to say that. Not after everything—

Sensei pushed his chair back, standing up.

“And I apologize for every time I’ve hurt you.”

What, was he going to run away from me because I got hurt? Getting hurt in his place was my literal job description, and, even if the year before the Orochimaru fight had done a lot to wreak havoc on my mental stability, I didn’t hate him.

Did he hate me now, for making him feel this guilty? He was supposed to be impartial, untouchable as Hokage—

Sensei knelt down in the middle of the floor, his feet tucked underneath him in a proper seiza, and slowly lowered himself into a full bow. His hands formed a triangle in front of him, and his forehead didn’t touch the ground, but it was the fucking Hokage, bowing to me.

“No, no, Sensei, no no no that’s not necessary,” I babbled, struggling to swing my legs over the edge of the bed. Sensei shouldn’t have been bowing to anyone, least of all me.

Sensei didn’t move. Maybe if he didn’t do the full ten seconds, it wouldn’t count—

“No, just get up! I’m not—!”

I fell off the right edge of the bed and hit the floor in a tangle of bedsheets. At least one monitor started screaming as a wire got detached, but I didn’t care. My limbs trembled with horrible weakness as I struggled to get some mobility back, but I had to get him to stop.

“Kei!”

By the time I sorted myself out, I was furious enough at my own weakness that time slipped away from me entirely.
Sensei’s arms encircled me, scooping me and my blankets off the floor and back onto the bed. In fact, he sat down first and let me lean into his side so I could sit there and steam silently against my stupid, disobedient limbs.

I picked at his white wrist-tie with my right hand.

Sensei still shouldn’t have bowed to me like that, but I could...appreciate the sentiment, and accept his guilt.

“I can’t ask you to forgive me without promising to do better,” Sensei said quietly to the top of my bowed head. “What do you want me to focus on first?”

What did I want? More than anything?

What had I wanted before all of this shit had started, more than anything? What had I kept coming back to, when I spent that year outside of the village?

“I want to be around my family,” I whispered, my hand clutching at his sleeve. “Hayate, and you, and Obito and Rin and Kushina and… I’m so tired of being alone.”

I felt Sensei nod. “If you want, I can keep you in the village for as long as necessary.” Then he drew me into a hug, which I could only partly return.

“And keep me filled in, please,” I mumbled into Sensei’s shoulder. “At least about stuff about me?”

“Done,” Sensei responds instantly. After a moment, he rested his cheek against the top of my head. “I’m sorry for everything, Kei.”

“I forgive you,” I said, and it was finally over.

I could finally start to heal.

Chapter End Notes

Beta: Sorry, but I’m stealing Lang’s attention for some other projects, so expect the next chapter to be delayed for a fair bit while she gets a well-deserved break from CYB.

Lang: And in the meantime, please visit the CYB-by-Lang Tumblr page (and the TV Tropes page, but this site seems to hate outside links) and check out the new artwork and writing that has popped up.
Camaraderie: Guiding Me Home

Chapter Summary

Kei: Begin recovering for real.

Chapter Notes

Beta: And now you can have your author back.

Lang: This chapter is very much a transitional chapter. We're running through a lot of groundwork for the next arc and dropping hints all over the place. And characters are gonna be dealing with the repercussions of their choices for a very long time. (Also possibly setting up for another timeskip, but we've got one in this chapter already.) The song for this chapter's title is "Guiding Me Home" by Kutless.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Compared to the speed I was used to on the occasions when I wasn’t barred from using Isobu’s chakra, I recovered slowly. I got to watch my injuries remain livid, day after day, and hear medics tutting about the damage I’d done to my poor tenketsu. I got more visits from just about everyone who’d signed my cards, and more besides, but it didn’t really change the fact that I was incredibly bored on the occasions when people didn’t take up my time.

On the fifteenth, Kakashi smuggled me a copy of Icha Icha, but it wasn’t a particularly thick book and there were only so many times I could stand to read anything. Later hospital misdemeanors on my behalf included at least one “borrowed” medical textbook, but there wasn’t much I could do with it if my chakra control had suffered as much as I suspected it had. The other major contraband item, an apple, was more useful.

But then, I still wasn’t supposed to be channeling or molding chakra at all, so I didn’t exactly get a lot of opportunities to test that idea. I knew enough about tenketsu as chakra regulators to tell that my left arm was going to be pretty useless in the near future, but as a jinchūriki I might have had some long-term options. No one had ever studied the effects of tenketsu destruction on someone like me.

On the sixteenth, Hayate brought me a basket of sweet rolls, courtesy of the Akimichi—apparently, a road-weary Chōza had recognized him on the street and dragged him to the Akimichi clan’s best bakery.

“I’m not sure if he wants to visit, given all the stuff going on, but he’s probably going to try,” Hayate said, after swallowing a mouthful of some of the finest bread in Konoha. “I mean, you did kinda save his kids.”

I frowned, failing to connect the dots. “Chōji didn’t leave the village, though.”

Hayate gave me a flat look. “Did you forget that Genma, Gai, and Ebisu are all on Team Chōza?”
…Yes, yes I had. “Please pretend I never said that,” I muttered, through the hand over my face. “I’m being stupid.”

Granted, Genma had gone home to recover yesterday, and Chōza hadn’t stopped in because he’d been outside of the village, but it was still a brain-fart.

“It’s not like I can forget,” Hayate said. Gesturing with the remainder of the roll, he added, “After you told Genma I needed some help training, he kept dragging me to the group spars even without Gai. I guess since I was already kind of training with Gai sometimes, he figured I needed to be looked after by the whole team.”

“You kind of already have a team,” I said, puzzled. “I only asked Genma to check in on you occasionally…”

“He’s a busybody,” said Hayate. “I was doing okay with Inoichi-sensei and…okay, so I was mad at the Hokage, but that’s different and it wasn’t all the time. Aunt Kushina was all right. Did he talk to you?”

And once again, I was reminded that my brother was old enough to have opinions. Occasionally, they were even informed opinions. Yay, incoming adulthood.

“Yes, Sensei and I talked,” I told Hayate. At my brother’s scowl, I sighed and said, “Hayate, he’s going to do better now.”

Hayate bit another hunk off the roll and started to chew on it, to avoid having to respond immediately.

Well, that topic seemed closed. I’d still have to get my brother to open up about the accumulated resentment he had for Sensei at this point, but it’d be easier to do that once I could put him in a headlock.

Or maybe not…

“Hayate, I’m not going to be heading out on missions much like this,” I said, waving my right hand over my still-stuck-in-a-sling left arm. “So I’m going to be here if you need to talk.”

Hayate progressed to glaring up at the ceiling.

Oh, for the love of swords. “What is this really about?”

“I just don’t understand how you can just forgive someone who hurt you like that!” Hayate blurted, throwing his hands in the air in frustration. “He kept you out of the village for almost a whole year!”

Oh, no.

“Hayate,” I said, as my brother turned away. “No, look at me right now. Get over here.”

Hayate slid off the window ledge and grabbed the nearest chair, then slid the screechy thing over to the right side of my bed. Then he threw himself into it, crossed his arms over his chest, and looked sulky.

I reached over and ran my right hand through his hair. “I was angry at Sensei, too.”

“But you’re not now,” Hayate mumbled, leaning into my touch.

“No, I…” How was I supposed to explain this? “What Sensei did was stupid and short-sighted. And he’s already been yelled at by Kushina, and by Kakashi”—which I had only heard about through Kushina—“and I think your anger came through loud and clear.”

“But what about you?” Hayate asked, giving me a narrow-eyed look.

“…I can’t stay angry at the people I care about,” I told Hayate, bowing my head. “I know it’s kind of…weak, maybe, given that there were plenty of reasons to hold a grudge. But I already had a lot of negative feelings and didn’t need another set over something that was just a series of stupid mistakes.”

Hayate made a skeptical noise.

“I know, I know,” I said, and carded my hand through his hair again. “It sounds like I’m making excuses for him. And it doesn’t cover how those decisions hurt you, either.”

“I’m fine,” Hayate insisted.

Yeah, right.

My little brother might have already been fifteen years old, but it didn’t change the fact that I was his only remaining family and Sensei had sent me off on a series of meat-grinder missions anyway. And since becoming primary breadwinner for the two of us three years ago, that year-long stretch was by far the longest I’d been away from home since…ever, actually.

Even my wartime deployments had been better about downtime in the village.

“When you get down to it, forgiveness is a choice that everyone has to make for themselves,” I admitted, somewhat unhappily. “I can’t ask you to put everything aside.”

Hayate stared at me for a long moment, then sighed. “I won’t try to avenge you or anything. The Hokage is still the Hokage, but…” He shrugged. “I just don’t know how to feel and it pisses me off.”

“Been there, Little Brother,” I said, sighing to match him. “Definitely been there.”

He scratched his nose. “I heard something on a mission a few months ago.”

“Oh?” I hadn’t heard much of anything about Hayate’s missions, other than what he elected to tell me. This was a rare treat.

“Yeah, from one of the monks in the Fire Temple.” Hayate lifted his head and said, “He was just reading precepts, but I guess it stuck in my head…”

“What one was it?” I asked.

“Oh, I think it went something like… ‘Holding grudges is like swallowing poison and waiting for the other person to drop dead,’” Hayate said, after a moment’s thought. “I can kind of see how it fits this, but I’m already doing that. I don’t know how to not be angry every time I see the Hokage’s face and remember what he did by throwing you out of the village.”

“I think he feels the same way when he looks in a mirror, Hayate,” I said.

Hayate made another disbelieving noise, but didn’t argue the point. “I’m just glad you’re home.”

“Well, I’m technically not home yet,” I said, and as Hayate grumbled again at the thought, I added in a cheerier tone, “But the medics said I could start some physical therapy tomorrow, so I should be able to get out of here.”
Hayate hugged me, which was a little like being caught in a mutual industrial press accident. We Gekkō siblings could never be accused of lacking familial affection, even if we sometimes didn’t see each other for weeks.

We let go of each other just as three bright chakra signatures trooped into the room.

“Big Sis Kei?” asked the lead child.

Roku, Kaito, and Aiko were in better shape than they had been the first time I saw them in the hospital. While Roku’s arm was still broken, he seemed more used to the cast at this point and the bruise on his face had faded to a sort of greenish yellow. His split lip was also healed up, and his visible eye was alert and clear instead of half-hidden under a black eye. Kaito, while he still had bandages around his neck and peeking out of his hospital gown, was looking around the room with interest instead of a fixation on the nearest supportive figure (me). Aiko was still clinging to the end of Roku’s hospital gown’s ties, but she peeked out from behind him this time.

My brother leaned over the back of his chair to look at all three kids upside-down, because of course he did.

Kaito made a beeline for me again, but froze up in indecision once he realized that there was a person who looked like me in the room. I mean, sure, Hayate and I weren’t that similar—

“Aiko-chan, this is my brother Hayate,” I said. Reaching down to beckon Kaito over, I added, “Hayate’s two years younger than I am, and he’s a chūnin.”

“What’s a chūnin?” Roku asked. Since I had tacitly given my approval of this mysterious doppelganger’s presence, he was apparently comfortable asking questions.

“Mid-ranked ninja,” Hayate explained, righting himself. “Journeyman, sort of. Hey, you need a hand up?”

Kaito, who stared up at my brother with a still-frozen expression, nodded slowly.

Hayate scooped the tiny kid off the ground and easily deposited him on my hospital bed. Immediately, Kaito crawled over to me and wedged himself into the space between my right arm and my torso, but he didn’t flinch away from Hayate.

This seemed to be the cue for Roku and Aiko to follow suit immediately, with only Aiko needing the assist.

“So, Hayate, these three are Kaito, Aiko, and Roku,” I said, and nudged Aiko with my knee to get her off my left shin. “Kids, again, this is my younger brother.”

Hayate looked more curious than anything, tilting his head to one side. “So why do they call you their sister? I figured I’d know if we had any more siblings, if you know what I mean.” And he raised one eyebrow, clearly teasing.

At some point, I would need to figure out how long it took for children to understand figurative language and sarcasm. Overexposure accounted for, say, Kakashi’s early adoption of both techniques, but some of what Hayate would say would probably fly right over their heads.

“We’re not really sisters,” Aiko explained to Hayate, sounding rather patient for being six years old.
“I’m not dumb.”

Roku added, “And besides, I was adopted. You don’t have to come from the same Momma to be family.” But, as though the thought had brought up another, less pleasant association, Roku bit his lip and said, “I haven’t seen Tayuya since we got here.”

Ah, hell.

“I didn’t see her in the kid room,” Aiko put in, scrunching her nose in sudden distress. “Sis, where is she? And Kazu, and Miyu?”

“I don’t know,” I admitted. “I haven’t seen them since before Sorayama was attacked. You remember when we played ninja, right?”

Aiko nodded, though her eyes were welling up with tears.

“No one’s told me anything,” I told them. Helplessly, I looked to my brother for a quick save. “Hayate?”

But my brother was slowly shaking his head, and he said, “There are a few refugee kids, but they’re either infants or teenagers. I only heard about three Academy-aged kids, and that’s these three.”

Roku pulled his knees up to his chest, dragging his fingers through his bangs so they fell over his face and covered both eyes. “No, no…”

“I want Mommy! I don’t wanna be stuck here!” Aiko started to cry. After just a moment, her voice rose to a heart-rending wail. “Mommy!”

Hayate acted decisively, getting up from his chair and onto the bed and scooping Aiko up and into his lap. She latched onto his neck and screamed in his ear, but Hayate hadn’t been Naruto’s go-to babysitter for nothing. He even added Roku after a moment, pulling the boy into a one-armed hug that he reciprocated by burying his face against Hayate’s ribs.

And Kaito, silent against my side until that moment, started to hiccup.

My brother and I hugged those kids until they cried themselves out, unsure of what else to do. Neither of us were child therapists, or therapists, or even really qualified for this kind of shit in the slightest.

But we were there, and solid, and that was what the kids needed.

Two weeks passed.

I was out of the hospital within twenty-four hours of when Sensei and Kushina visited a second time. It wasn’t that I was in great shape, but more because the hospital needed as many beds and free hands as they could manage. With my regeneration rate back up to snuff and Isobu’s chakra flowing again, I was better served by staying the hell home.

I didn’t see much of the refugee kids. After the three of them started crying loudly enough to wake up patients in the recovery ward, the hospital staff tracked down the non-shinobi Chinatsugumi refugee adults in order to provide some stability for them. Since none of them were seriously injured enough to overwhelm the outpatient facilities, they were shipped off to recover elsewhere.

Honestly, for a while there? I had to focus on myself.
The first week I spent outside of the hospital was...not what I expected.

Besides being dragged home by Hayate and setting both of Iruka’s parents on me for the sake of providing me with soup, Kushina and Tatsumaki made the kitchen their new experiment zone. The house was full of delicious smells and comforting food, both of which lasted for days. I participated where I could, but I mostly let the atmosphere and the joy of being alive wash over me as it wished.

And I went outside a few times, always accompanied by either my brother or one of our friends, but the most memorable occasion happened on the twentieth of December—mainly because I happened to go out to the market at the same time as three Akimichi shoppers.

Specifically, Chōza, his wife Momo, and their son Chōji.

My only warning was Hayate, walking backwards in front of me and grinning at someone over my shoulder. The lack of hostility—and the time spent in the hospital—meant that I was slower on the uptake than I would have been otherwise, and thus I failed to react to the incoming bear hug of joy before my feet were already dangling off the ground.

More confused than frightened, I craned my neck a bit and, to a peal of my brother’s laughter, realized that Chōza was hugging me about as well as Gai ever had. Better, actually, since Chōza was built like a bear with arms to match. Since there was no escape, I didn’t bother trying.

“Thank you, Keisuke-chan,” Chōza said as he finally set me down, clapping his hands down on both of my shoulders. “Thank you for bringing my genin home.”

Point of order: Genma was a special jōnin, Ebisu wanted to be one, and Gai had made it to full jōnin at fourteen. But it was clear that Chōza didn’t ever plan on stop thinking of them as his students.

“They’re my friends,” I told Chōza with a somewhat wobbly smile on my face. “I couldn’t do anything else.”

“Then I am glad that they have you for a friend,” Chōza replied. He patted my shoulder again, and then seemed to remember that other people were around. “Here, let me introduce you to my family...”

In relatively short order, I got additional hugs from Momo and Chōji, and a promise that if I stopped in on an Akimichi restaurant, I’d be treated like family. When the family bustled off, Chōji waved at me over his mother’s shoulder.

“...Okay, did you know that was going to happen?” I asked Hayate, since he was still chuckling just a bit.

“Only about two seconds before you did,” Hayate replied. He walked a little further along the rows upon rows of seafood stalls, leading me through the crowd. “People have been getting nicer.”

I gave him a blank look. “I...what? Are you talking about the rumors?”

“I mean...” Hayate paused, thinking. “What you did, with helping kill Orochimaru, it made the world safer and people are happier for it.” He flashed a quick, sardonic grin. “Though yeah, the assholes mostly shut up when we walk by, now.”

It probably said something about my state of mind that I honestly hadn’t noticed. I was so focused on simply being back in town that I was ignoring anything about it that could otherwise dampen my mood. Though staying in the house and focusing on recovery probably helped with that.
Also, I hadn’t killed Orochimaru. Forcing him to use his regeneration techniques over and over again still only counted as a TKO, and I had no way of knowing if he had any Curse Seal backups lying in wait.

Hayate waited for me to catch up, then slung his arm around my shoulders and said, “Come on, let’s go get udon. I’ll pay.”

Since the backlogged payouts for my string of B- and A-ranks hadn’t yet made all the way through Konoha’s bureaucracy, I let him.

There were other incidents—a random clap on the back from two different chūnin on two different days, a free winter cabbage, and Teuchi refusing to let me pay for ramen—but I was a bit too overwhelmed by finally being home to think about it much. Between the biweekly visits to the hospital to check my recovery rates, being stopped in the street, and what could best be called emotional exhaustion, well…

The entire two-week period was something of a blur. But a pleasant one.

And after it was over, and I could get my arm back to basic functionality, I went to the hospital to officially upgrade from having to use my left arm’s sling. I probably could have gone without it for some time here and there, but Rin had managed to instill a long-belated fear of medic-nin into me. I didn’t disobey doctors’ orders anymore.

But after I got the all-clear to change my physical therapy routine from “outpatient care” to “okay, maybe some light sparring if you’re really careful,” I found Sensei waiting for me outside the hospital’s front doors as I left.

Of course, this was cause for comment. Mine. “Sensei?”

“Kei, could I talk to you for a moment?”

It didn’t really sound like a request, but I still hesitated. “Can we talk” is never a good sign.

We could always make him go away, Isobu said, in a voice that still had a slight edge of threat woven into it.

My brother wasn’t the only person still pissed off at Sensei. The difference was that Isobu was the one with a direct line to my brain if need be.

It’s not necessary, Isobu, I reminded him, not now that we’re home.

You’re too quick to forgive.

…Look, I don’t need to have a breakdown about whether Sensei still cares about me, I said, feeling the thoughts try to rise up and choke me in broad daylight. I swallowed hard and said to Isobu, Please, it’s over. I don’t want to try to take everything back, after all it took for me to get this far.

I didn’t need any emotional setbacks. Not now.

“Hey, are you all right?” Sensei’s voice was closer, and I blinked. The commanding officer aspects had bled out of his frame, and he stood in front of me with one hand on my shoulder, as though trying to make me come back to myself. “Kei?”

I blinked rapidly, then nodded. With a voice that only came out a little strangled, I said, “Yes, I’m fine. What did you need to talk about?”

Sensei continued looking at me with a worried expression. But he withdrew his hand and said carefully, “I was just going to ask you how you’ve been.”

_No, you weren’t_. And I wasn’t sure I would have given him an honest answer even if he had asked that. _Something about my reaction made you decide against asking whatever you were going to say._ But what I said was, “I’m doing okay. You?”

“I’m not sure I believe you,” Sensei replied, and I felt my eyes being drawn back toward the ground. “Kei, is your brother at home?”

I checked my chakra sense. “Feels like it.”

Sensei nodded to himself, then said, “In that case, I can take you home and we can all talk.”

“Okay,” I said, though I still didn’t know what he wanted. I held out my hand.

Sensei took it, and one _fwish_ later put us on my apartment’s front doorstep.

We headed inside.

Hayate was cleaning all of the swords we owned, using the kotatsu and making the entire house smell like warm oil. It stung my nose for just a moment until I got used to it again, and Hayate looked up as we walked in. I definitely felt his chakra shift once he realized that Sensei was right behind me.

Maybe we shouldn’t have arrived while my kid brother was cleaning all of those sharp implements…

“May we sit?” Sensei asked Hayate.

Sensei got a carefully blank expression in return, but Hayate _did_ nod.

So the three of us were at the table, and Hayate put the swords away. Too bad, because the atmosphere was certainly thick enough to cut with one of them.

“What did you want to talk about, Sensei?” I asked, since it didn’t seem like anyone else was about to.

Sensei said nothing for a long moment, even as Hayate and I both stared at him and waited for _some_ kind of response. Then, finally, he said, “Have you ever thought about attending therapy, Kei?”

My mind blanked out for a second or two. On automatic, I heard myself say, “Dad brought me to Inoshi Yamanaka when I was a kid. I…only saw him once, though.”

And he was three years dead by this point, having been one of the many people who hadn’t survived Black Zetsu’s attack on the Sensing Barrier building. I hadn’t known that until later, but he’d been the only person who had had enough clues to put together my strange situation. If he’d tried.

I still didn’t know what he’d written down about me, and hadn’t really wanted to look.

“But no, I guess…my situation was a bit too unique. I didn’t think anyone would be able to understand, so I didn’t try.” I started picking at my nailbeds, not looking at Sensei or Hayate.

“Though I’ll admit that I probably need help.”

“Didn’t Inoichi-sensei ever try to help? Even a little?” Hayate asked. “He’s—well, he talked to me a lot while you were gone, trying to get me to talk to more people and worry a bit less. And it did help, even if I still missed you a lot.”

“Inoichi-sensei isn’t my teacher, though, so I don’t have to listen to him even if he does offer any help,” I told Hayate, looking up. “And I’ve always heard that you have to be able to be completely honest with a therapist, but I…well, my security clearance is all over the place, and I didn’t want to try to make something out of a situation that wasn’t going to let me be honest anyway.”

“And despite being your teacher,” Sensei said, “it’s become clear that even if I want to help you, I’m useless at it.”

Hayate snorted.

“Not helping, Hayate,” I scolded him, but my heart wasn’t in it.

“He has a right to his opinion, Kei.”

“I know that.” Hayate huffed, crossing his arms on the tabletop and dropping his chin down onto the tops of his folded forearms. He glared across the table at Sensei, from below his overgrown bangs.

...Well, Sensei tried. That counted for something.

But hugs didn’t fix everything, and there was still quite a ways to go before I could completely trust him again. Forgiveness and trust were intertwined, but not the same. I could forgive Sensei’s bad judgments and still flinch away from the next one, out of sheer self-preservation.

“If you do decide to pursue therapy,” Sensei said, “you do know that medic-patient confidentiality applies. Unless they think you’ll hurt yourself or others.”

“I don’t think that’s really a concern,” I said. I wasn’t suicidal, and I wasn’t really the type to self-destruct like a frag grenade. “But… Wouldn’t being in therapy mean I’d have to stay off the mission roster?”

“You know someone who does run missions at the same time, Kei,” Sensei reminded me.

Right. Obito.

I hadn’t asked him how that was going. I’d been so caught up in my catastrophic breakdown that it hadn’t even come up. But knowing that Obito was in therapy, and was still reaping the benefits of having a pressure release who wasn’t a friend or loved one, made my decision a little easier.

I just hoped I was doing the right thing. And that being a former psych major didn’t interfere at all—I didn’t have the slightest scrap of optimism regarding my reincarnation problem, when I hadn’t even told Hayate, Obito, or Rin about it yet.

Still never planned on it.

But all the same, I’d made my decision. Maybe it was inevitable. “Does…um, can Obito’s therapist take on another patient?”

“I wouldn’t have suggested this route if I didn’t have someone in mind,” Sensei replied, smiling just faintly.

It was kind of funny, actually. After so many years of disdaining Konoha’s mental health services—or how well people utilized them—I was finally going to see what it was like for myself. And hopefully, I’d come away with a better impression than what biased sources had given me beforehand.

Well. I still had to contact the expert first.

I rubbed my arms anxiously. That had…never been my strong suit. I was much better at rolling with introductions than trying to do things myself, especially about something this important. I wasn’t going to be strolling in as Keisuke Gekkō, host to Isobu and defeater of S-rank opponents.

I’d just be me. Vulnerable, and tired, and in need of help.

“So why am I here?” Hayate asked. He paused, then mumbled, “Aside from the fact that we’re in our apartment, anyway…”

“Kei needs you to be there for her.” Which was quite a lot of weight to put on a fifteen-year-old’s shoulders.

“Of course I’m gonna be here for my sister,” said Hayate, sounding affronted that Sensei had even seemed like he was going to question our bond.

I shrank in on myself, trying not to focus on the feeling of creeping shame that was making its way up my spine. I needed this, but it hurt to admit it. It hurt to admit that I couldn’t stand on my own, and all of it was because my brain turned against me at every opportunity.

And maybe it had latched onto Sensei’s statement as a way of telling the rest of me that Sensei wasn’t really family. Because of course it did.

“If not Obito’s therapist, who did you have in mind?” I asked Sensei, once I had shouted down the rest of my brain so I could think again.

Sensei paused. Then, with both Hayate and I staring him down once again, he asked, “How do you feel about scorpions?”

“I think the ones Rin has are cute,” I said, briefly puzzled. Why would…?

Oh.

“Rin’s summon contract is finally official. I...admit I was running out of options, so I asked her if her contract included any mental health specialists, and she said yes,” Sensei told me. “And Gama recommended Suika-sensei.”

Watermelon? Well, it was clear that the food naming scheme was officially a thing among the scorpion clan.

“She was about the size of an ox cart, but she seemed kind and understanding once I explained the situation.” Sensei smiled sheepishly. “Suika-sensei is willing to take on another patient, but she did say she isn’t willing to stay in Konoha. If the first meeting goes well, you’ll have to work out your schedules together.”

“Who are her other patients?” I asked. I was curious enough that it probably meant I was going to just jump in with both feet.

Sensei raised an eyebrow at me. Right, that whole doctor-patient confidentiality thing...

“Sorry, let me rephrase: Does she have human or animal patients?” I tried again.

“Probably mostly animals,” Hayate guessed, before Sensei could answer. “But you don’t have to see her if things don’t fit well, right?”

I nodded.

“Then you’ll try?” Sensei asked.

I had to. There was no getting better if I didn’t try.

Suika-sensei crouched in the center of a large, though security-sealed clearing, her watermelon-sized claws tucked in close against her body. All eight of her eyes were focused on me, with the exception of the two or three that kept wandering off to look at something in her peripheral vision.

Speaking of watermelons, she did sort of look like one—with pinkish-red markings along her legs and sides, and dark green striping along a bright green body, I could see where she had gotten her name.

Rin looked between her summon and me, cautiously hopeful.

“Uh, if it’s all right…” I trailed off, unsure of where to begin. “Could we get to know each other a bit?”

“Of course,” said Suika-sensei. She tucked her eight legs in and curled her tail, focusing on me again.

A bit eerie, but I could deal with that. I sat down on the grass and said, “I’m Keisuke Gekkō. I’m seventeen years old.”

Without a neck, Suika-sensei couldn’t nod, but her stinger bobbed in acknowledgement.

“I like my friends, and apples, and I have a real soft spot for dogs. My dislikes… I don’t like people who judge me before they get to know me,” I said, a little distantly. I made a ton of early snap judgments based on my foreknowledge, so it was a bit hypocritical of me to say that. “My hobbies are practicing kenjutsu and fūinjutsu.”

Suika-sensei’s tail bobbed again, and she turned toward Rin.

“Rin Nohara, also seventeen,” Rin said, smiling. “I like my friends, too, and my boyfriend, and strawberries. I don’t like it when people get hurt around me, and I don’t like natto either. I practice medical ninjutsu and signed a summon contract to help people, and I like collecting seashells.”

“I see,” said Suika-sensei. “Rin-chan, will you be attending our sessions? While the fact that you and Keisuke-san are friends can be helpful, I don’t wish to see my patient uncomfortable…”

“If Kei doesn’t want me here, I’ll just be here to summon you. I can leave,” Rin said, getting to her feet.

Rin patted my right shoulder and said, in a whisper, “I hope this goes well, Kei.”

And she walked out of the privacy-sealed zone without a backwards glance.

“Keisuke-san,” Suika-sensei began, “would you like me to introduce myself?”

“Please,” I replied.
“Very well. I am Suika, daughter of Dokuyu-sama.” Her pincers clicked, as though in a strange mimicry of human clapping. “I enjoy gardening in my spare time, and my favorite food is a type of noodle dish that you probably don’t eat in human lands, though I’m sure the Toad clan has some. Hm…I dislike seeing people suffer, almost as much as Dokuyu-sama does.”

“How big is Dokuyu-sama?” I asked her. Because if summon clans tended to be ruled by the biggest and strongest.

“Oh, I imagine she is the size of the largest of toads, though perhaps shorter,” Suika-sensei replied.

…Which meant she was probably in the same size category as Manda and Gamabunta. Not Katsuyu, though—from what I could tell, there was only one Katsuyu, and all of the others amounted to “what we could actually manage to summon.” She could have been the size of a mountain and no one would know unless they visited her at home.

“And now I am going to ask some difficult questions,” Suika-sensei said, settling down in place. “Is there anything I might do that would upset you in an unproductive way? Therapy is often difficult, emotionally, but I understand that there are simply some things people will not discuss. Particularly if it’s not important to your goals.”

I took a deep breath and tried to think.

What did I want out of this? What would make me rage-quit instead?

“I…I need you to believe me, when I say things that sound impossible,” I told her, even as I rubbed my left arm uncomfortably. “It’s not the same as believing me when I’m lying about how I feel, which I might do, but…”

Did Orochimaru count as an expert on the nature of souls? I had no interest in thinking of him as anything other than a monster in human shape, but he had been brilliant. He was probably the foremost expert on ninja-made Horcruxes the world over.

I shook my head and tried again. “I’m not normal, Suika-sensei. And I really mean that. The weirdness is tied directly into who I am, and I’ve…gotten it looked at. And if you don’t at least pretend to believe me, I can’t really trust you.”

“I understand, Keisuke-san,” replied Suika-sensei. “I will keep an open mind, though I hope you don’t mind if I ask a few clarifying questions sometimes.”

“That would be fine,” I told her. I sat back, looking up at the bright blue sky above us. “What about you? Do I need to do anything special so you’re okay?”

“Just show up on time, and be as honest as you can be,” Suika-sensei told me. “That should be enough.” She shifted her weight and curled her tail tighter over itself, trying to look smaller. “May I ask why you sought counseling?”

Oh, boy. Wasn’t that a laundry list to work through.

Well, I had a mental breakdown about two weeks ago, and there were enough warnings signs for it that it would have been like setting off a flashbang grenade if anyone had been around to see it. Instead, I spent a full year away from home, on top of never seeing any of my friends in the field, and only got to come back for long enough to crash and recover physically before being sent out again. I killed more people than I can even remember, and when I finally got back, I discovered that it was all a fucking stupid idea that Sensei came up with, and then I watched and felt my friends die while I was unable to protect them from fucking Orochimaru. And in the aftermath, I’m afraid of being hurt again by the Fourth friggin’ Hokage, and my left arm isn’t circulating chakra like it should, and for all I know I might have to retire before I’m twenty.

How’s that?

I paused. Probably a bit overboard and rant-laden for a question that worked better with a quick answer. And anyway, all of this would come out over the course of my appointments, which made the explanation a bit superfluous.

What I actually ended up saying, though a slightly blocked throat, was, “I had a meltdown almost a month ago, and my teacher suggested I get some kind of help.”

Suika-sensei paused. “And this teacher—we’re talking about the Fourth Hokage, yes?”

If she’d had a notebook, she’d probably have been taking notes. I assumed that she had a good memory and let it slide.

“Yeah, him,” I said flippantly. “In Konoha, your jōnin-sensei is supposed to be your second line of defense if you don’t have family, but he’s overworked and doesn’t have the time. So that wasn’t working out.”

“I see,” said Suika-sensei. Her pincers clicked again, almost absently, as she thought. “Keisuke-san, I cannot tell any other humans about what you tell me in these sessions. Unless you are a danger to yourself, or others, I will not violate that agreement. Do you trust me to keep your secrets?”

…If she had been human, I wasn’t sure.

But given that Suika-sensei was a scorpion larger than most civilian vehicles, I could.

Long story short: I had a scorpion therapist who could crush trash cans like cola cans, and I liked her. Our first session didn’t really end up doing much, because we had to make good first impressions before anything else, but I remained hopeful. The road to recovery was a long one, but I was pretty sure I’d taken the first step.

Some months later, I was back to “work.”

The payouts from all of those damned B- and A-ranked missions amounted to well over a million ryō, which meant I could afford to not do anything strenuous for months if I chose to.

According to Sensei, and Hayate, and just about everyone else I asked, I wasn’t supposed to be on the mission roster, and would continue not to be for as long as necessary. Because I still dealt with bouts of trembling weakness in my left arm and the resulting physical therapy sessions, on top of going to visit my therapist, no one really wanted to be the one to tell me it was time to get back in the field.

Even Gai had told me it would be better not to spar with him, so we—meaning Gai, Obito, Kakashi, Rin, and Ebisu—spent his birthday celebration at the best curry restaurant in town. Genma and Raidō didn’t attend, but they sent a card and a few taijutsu scrolls that might have been stolen from a foreign country once upon a time.

And then there was Sensei’s birthday, and Obito’s, and eventually March rolled in with nary an uptick in danger or drama.
Quite a change, really.

The twenty-second of March found me in Sensei’s office, for the first time since I was still sixteen. I sat with my back to a wall, with my portable writing desk across my knees, and wrote dozens upon dozens of steady, neatly-inked characters on specialized sealing paper. While I wasn’t using my blood-laced ink this time, it didn’t hurt to be careful.

While the Dead Demon Consuming Seal wasn’t the sort to spontaneously explode at the first errant brush-stroke, I still didn’t want to deal with the possibility that it could activate. Anything left to chance would be like dangling a steak in front of the Plot’s huge, serrated teeth.

In truth, I wasn’t really doing much in the way of guarding Sensei. He was really the one who was making sure I didn’t have some kind of crisis in the office, by half-supervising my sealing work and mostly filling out the piles upon piles of paperwork that seemed to appear out of thin air. But nevertheless, it gave us a chance to just sit and do what we had to. I’d missed the companionable silence in the year I’d been gone and, while it wasn’t the same, what was there was comforting to my rattled nerves.

Three stacks of paper poofed into Sensei’s inbox, and his chakra jumped for a moment until he saw who had sent them. I didn’t know what that was about, but was too busy concentrating on my calligraphy to ask.

Sensei picked up the papers and gave them a quick once-over, then said, “I think these were sent to the wrong place.”

“How so?” I asked absently, finishing the kanji for “person” on one arm of the seal. Almost there…

“These are requests for medical records, from the Academy, along with…things. Tsunade would have a better idea what a…” Sensei replied. Reading further, he let out a surprised “Oh.”

“What is it?” I asked, actually looking up.

“Kaito Yuki, Aiko Kasai, and Roku Chigami are all joining the Academy’s newest class,” Sensei replied, and held up one of the packets he’d received. Networking all of those teleportation seals for paperwork purposes had sped up intra-village communication, but errors like this one were still commonplace. The whole system was still in the testing phase.

“All three of them?” I blinked. “So, is Roku planning on testing out of the first two years, or what?”

Sensei gave a helpless shrug. “You’ll have to ask Shikane about that. But it seems like the answer is a provisional ‘no.’ He simply plans on joining the first-year students.”

“Then I guess you can just send it along to Tsunade-sama,” I suggested. As he scribbled a note on a separate sheet of paper and clipped it to the packets, I looked down at my replica of the Dead Demon Consuming Seal and asked, “Also, can you check my work here?”

Sensei slid the super-packet off the side of his desk and into a bin marked “hospital,” where it vanished into thin air. Then he stood up, stretched, and said, “Sure, Kei.”

Sensei, looking over my shoulder, started tracing the outside edge of my replica seal with the blunt end of his pen. “Structure looks good here, though this edge may be a bit too wide at the end…”

And on it went, as Sensei went over the replication challenge patiently and pointed out where I’d strayed from the design. It wasn’t generally a matter of handwriting—my calligraphy had to be good, or else I wouldn’t have survived as a fūinjutsu specialist. But sometimes I just forgot which kanji went where and guessed, which would have still resulted in a fatal explosion if the seal had been real.

“Given that this is a first try, I’m impressed,” Sensei told me, once he’d scanned the entire seal for errors. There were only three, though that was three too many for field work.

“Thank you, Sensei,” I said, as I set my work aside to dry completely. “What seal did you want me to try next?”

“Actually, I think you should try asking Kushina for her more unusual Uzumaki clan designs,” Sensei replied. Eyeing my work, he added, “And have you given any more thought to pursuing a fūinjutsu mastery?”

“...Not really,” I admitted. I started to pack up my sealing supplies as I talked, ashamed of my cowardice. “I’m just...not ready for it.”

It would be an interesting long-term goal, possibly, but my chakra control was still crap. I hadn’t been brave enough to try more than my mainstays, even after Suika-sensei tried encouraging me to pursue my old hobbies. I’d just been making these toothless replicas for weeks, practicing for something I hadn’t conjured up enough courage to try for real.

Maybe I could try it once I was sure I could relearn my other jutsu.

“One day at a time,” Sensei said reassuringly, which had sort of been Suika-sensei’s motto once she got more of my story out of me. She was encouraging, but told me to be patient with myself. And she also suggested that I should write in a journal, but I was putting that firmly on the backburner.

“Yep.” I wouldn’t be so bold as to say I was getting better, because I was still afraid of jinxing it, but I didn’t feel quite as tired as I remembered. Emotionally.

Sensei let me get back to my sealing practice, rather than telling me to get to Kushina post-haste.

Do you really think that talking to the scorpion is helping? Isobu asked, as I settled back down.

It’s more than I’ve managed so far, I told him. Then I thought about how that remark could sound and added, I mean, you help me a lot, too. But there’s some things that I don’t think I can really explain to you, and anyway I’m sure you don’t want to hear most of it.

And the scorpion is more invested in your well-being than I am? Isobu demanded.

...More like she’s far enough away to be unbiased. Mostly. I sighed. Seriously, Isobu, the fact that I’m seeing Suika-sensei doesn’t mean I don’t rely on you.

Hmph.

It didn’t take a genius to notice when someone like Isobu was getting jealous. Suika-sensei isn’t a combat summon. If you’re worried she’ll take your place, it’s not going to happen and you can relax.

Isobu just grumbled again.

“Oh, Kei, the ANBU teams brought this back a little while ago. Want to take a look?” Sensei asked, interrupting my thoughts. When I looked up, I spotted the little black Iwagakure bingo book dangling from his fingers.
“Sure,” I said, and caught the book when it was tossed to me.

Then, as I always did, I scanned for familiar faces.

I didn’t have to look for long.

Though the image was blurry, and heights and weights and even general description were all a bit vague, I could recognize Obito’s description. Mostly because the image showed someone emerging from a featureless concrete wall, and the black-cloaked figure clearly hadn’t bothered to smash said wall in the process.

“Konoha’s Phantom?” I said, with a brief laugh. “Obito called it.”

“Oh?” Sensei asked, curious.

“Way back, when he came home, he said...he said he wanted to be Phantom Obito, because Tobi wasn’t using the title.” In hindsight, it wasn’t even really funny in a way that provoked laughter. It was more of a bizarre coincidence. But nonetheless, Obito had guessed well.

“Ah. Well, that was certainly accurate,” Sensei remarked. To my surprise, he waved a hand and said, “Go on.”

I did so.

The entries weren’t alphabetical or anything, but more of a mélange of threat assessments and speculation. But if I flipped through the pages, looking for a familiar profile, I could eventually get where I was going.

Gai also had an entry, which called him the Green Beast of Konoha—cute, and what he was already calling himself to start with. There was also a note about possibly upgrading him to the Green Death, but apparently the nickname was still disputed.

And then there was Sensei’s still snug in its “flee on sight” categorization. But next to the vague description of his abilities, along with his official Hokage coronation photograph, was a brand-new entry.

Associates with the Lightning Fang, the Red Habanero, Konoha’s Phantom, and the Tidal Blade. DO NOT APPROACH.

That...hadn’t been what the entries during the war had said...

Quickly, I flipped through to find my entry, and found it right next to a sketch of Kushina, and her associated profile.

My entry was still about as full of holes as it had been the last time I’d read it, but Iwa had courteously updated the list of confirmed and speculated kills, as well as their assessment of my powers. The number of deaths and mission failures that were directly attributable to me had doubled in the last year. My profile insisted that I had completed two dozen B-ranked missions, and a baker’s dozen of A-ranks. They had even given me credit for violently ruining an S-rank mission for Iwa-nin.

And they’d given me a partial credit on Yagura’s death, along with full credit for killing Akuro. Not sure how that had gotten out. The ones who had really killed Yagura had been Orochimaru’s men, but I supposed that just landing the finishing blow didn’t really “count.” Gai had gotten a functional kill on him long before that.
Akuro, as I had learned through bits and pieces and old bingo book entries, had been a ghastly figure in local lore around the borders of the Land of Fire. And now she was dead, because she’d fucked with the wrong people.

Well, person. I would have given Gai the assist points for that one.

And then there was my nickname: Tidal Blade. Given that I used kenjutsu and had only really picked up a Water ninjutsu affinity, it made sense. It was even a bit of a pun if one bothered to substitute “wave” for “blade.”

Not bad, Iwagakure.

“I kinda like the nickname,” I told Sensei, as I turned pages until I found Kakashi’s entry. Ayup, Lightning Fang for when he was out of ANBU uniform. He at least pretended to be covert when he was on the clock.

“I always did think that Iwagakure had a good naming scheme going,” Sensei said cheerily. Then again, he was the one who could kill two or three hundred shinobi in a single routine battle.

…Actually, hadn’t I done that, too? I checked my entry again, and noted that all of the Sorayama kills aside from Akuro and Yagura had been left to sheer speculation. It wasn’t like Oto-gakure generally cared if they lost a fuckton of men.

But maybe losing Orochimaru was a bit more important.

“Do the records even say Orochimaru is dead?” I asked, now that I’d thought of it. “And if they do, who supposedly killed him?”

Sensei paused, then his eyes focused on the ceiling for a moment as his thoughts came together. “Officially, his death is being attributed to ANBU. Kakashi didn’t want it to get out that he’d done it…and anyway, knowing what we do about Orochimaru? We’re not actually certain he’s dead enough to call it.”

Well, at least someone had been able to read all of my info on the guy. Until the Curse Seals were all eliminated, all too much of Orochimaru was still in this world. I wouldn’t be up for the Horcrux hunt for ages, if I ever was, and the second he was revived at least once, we’d be back to square one.

And when it came down to it, I dreaded fighting the kids Orochimaru had recruited. I’d still do it, and kill every one of them if I had to, but the thought was already twisting my stomach into knots. The thought of a necessary evil, against people too dangerous to send normal shinobi or even ANBU to deal with…

I shuddered.

But since I was thinking of it… “There haven’t been any reports on more refugees, have there?”

In the months since Sorayama, stories trickled in with mission reports. Few of the Chinatsugumi had decided to permanently relocate to Konoha, particularly if they hadn’t experienced the brunt of the attack themselves. Many of them had gone back to their civilian lives, scattering among the dozens of towns in the Land of Fire, and moved on physically if not emotionally.

But while the three children I mentally referred to as “young dragons” were definitely staying in Konoha for the foreseeable future, my mind turned toward uncertainties.

And no one had ever reporting finding a single trace of the others.
Rikuto’s body had never been found, even if Kakashi’s dogs identified a probably-lethal amount of blood near the square. Misaki and Chinatsu had been, and riddled with kunai, but I didn’t know why the retreating Oto-nin would take Rikuto and not the other two. The Kasai clan fūinjutsu was at least theoretically replicable, but apparently Orochimaru’s men had been on the lookout for destructive kekkei genkai instead.

I would take every opportunity I had to call Orochimaru a tunnel-vision-afflicted idiot. Even if he was dead for the moment, and even if hatred was like a self-inflicted poison, I couldn’t stand thinking of him without feeling the rising tide of mingled fear and loathing threaten to pull me under.

“I’m sorry, Kei.” Sensei could still see my expression, and I didn’t have to ask why he was apologizing. “But at this point, all we can do is declare them all dead. We’ll continue searching for Orochimaru’s hideouts, but the chances that we find anyone alive…”

Were astronomical, yes.

I dropped my head into my hands and took a deep breath. So that was a door closed, a hope destroyed. I’d known that would be the answer, deep in my bones, but hearing it said aloud was still a blow.

And I still didn’t know if anyone had broken the news to the kids. Obviously, someone should have, but.

But.

Shit. I had to be sure. The kids didn’t need bad news right before they started in the Academy, but I —

I wasn’t a grief counselor, or a medic, or much of anything else at the moment. I…I’d stopped knowing what to do years ago.

And even then, I hadn’t been great at it.

“Did someone break the news to them?” Sure, the last thing we needed was another round of Murderous Orphan Syndrome in the population, but they needed to know. The last time I’d spoken with them, Aiko had still been convinced that there was a chance her mother could come and find her. She’d been broken up by the implication that her mother hadn’t, but the seed of hope had been there anyway.

“I believe that their guardians did, yes,” Sensei replied, frowning faintly. “But I can’t be certain.”

Dammit.

After that, the conversation just kind of…died.

I left once I remembered that I was supposed to be checking in with Rin during my lunch break, just to make certain that my shoulder continued healing properly.

So, about those health checkups I needed during my recovery. Turned out that there was some bad news to accompany the more positive developments—like mobility. More than a week after I first started “work” again, Rin finally gave me her verdict.

We were on the hospital’s roof, where Yamaguchi-sensei had helpfully left a pile of cigarette butts in the corner. Sitting against the rooftop fence, hidden from most people’s view by a forest of drying sheets, Rin and I spent our lunch break together. She’d decided to wear a lab coat rather than the usual standard medic-nin garb today, which probably meant she was only on clinic duty for the day.

“I’m sorry, Kei, but your chakra control is never going to be good enough for medical ninjutsu again,” Rin said, as she finished scanning my left shoulder. “Your shoulder tenketsu…think of them like, um, surge protectors. If your chakra flow increases for any reason, like if you’re using powerful ninjutsu, you could easily hurt yourself. If you aren’t careful, you could be facing that overload problem every time, and just make the damage worse.”

…Shit. There went my lunch break.

“You’re sure there’s no way to fix it?” I asked her. “Not even Isobu?”

But Rin was already shaking her head. “I don’t have a lot of experience with Isobu-san’s skill at manipulating your recovery rate, but I don’t think he can fix these kinds of things unless he uses your chakra network, right?”

“Right.” In fact, I’d been wondering exactly how extensive Isobu’s healing powers were. While it made a kind of sense that Kurama could repair Naruto’s arm from the Rasenshuriken’s hideous backlash, I didn’t remember Shukaku showing off the same expertise when Gaara had gotten stabbed (for realsies) in the Chūnin Exam invasion.

I can repair almost everything except death, Isobu insisted.

Then why is my shoulder still a mess? I countered.

Isobu subsided with an angry grumble.

“Kurama’s better than Isobu is,” I told Rin, thinking of another incident—specifically, when Sasuke had ventilated Naruto’s chest cavity with the Chidori. I…probably couldn’t expect to come out of a similar incident unscathed. “I don’t have any idea if this is just going to be something that heals with time, or what. Isobu’s still dependent on my chakra coils, mostly, so…”

“And I can’t help you with this anymore,” Rin said, her eyes downcast. She brought her hands to her face and let out a frustrated groan. “Why am I so useless at this?”

“Rin?” I squawked, taken aback. But no, Rin had really said that, and she looked like her white lab coat was weighing her down toward the floor.

“I just—every time you get hurt, all I can do is patch things.” Rin swore under her breath, then ran a hand through her hair as she sat up again. “I’m sorry, Kei. I’m sorry I can’t help.”

No. No, I wasn’t going to let her beat herself up over the results of the consequences of my decision. Not after she’d spent so much time on protecting all of us from just that. It wasn’t Rin’s fault that my mistakes had finally tipped over the edge of what Rin could fix.

I snatched up the collar of her coat and yanked her into a tight hug. “Don’t say things like that, Rin. You’re doing your best.”

Into my shoulder, Rin hissed, “But that isn’t good enough!”

“Then we work until it is.” I let Rin pull out of the hug and sit back, rubbing at her eyes with the heel of her hand. I said, “We’ll figure this out, Rin. You’re a medic, and I know fūinjutsu. We’ll get there.”
Rin sniffed loudly, then sighed. As I waited for her to reply, she took her headband off and rubbed at her forehead, thinking hard. Tucking the metal plate into her lab coat pocket, she looked up at me again.

This time, her expression had firmed, and her eyes were a touch narrower than I expected. She set her jaw. “Yes, we will.” She took a deep breath. “I’m sorry, Kei, I just—it was a moment of weakness.”

I smiled, relieved, and clapped my hand down on her shoulder. My left, which was painless whenever Rin could take a look at it. Sure, the fundamental problem hadn’t been addressed yet, but we’d get there.

“What we need is someone who knows a lot about tenketsu, and not just the Hyūga method of blowing them up,” I mused aloud. Sure, that one Hyūga medic had just about turned green once he saw my arm, but I assumed that wasn’t the usual reaction.

“Well, if you discount the part where she can’t see tenketsu,” Rin said, with her brow furrowing, “Tsunade-sama is the best medic-nin we have.”

Yes, that was obv—

Wait a tick.

I slapped myself in the forehead. With my hand sliding down to cover my eyes, I grumbled, “Tsunade-sama’s entire combat style is based on controlled release of chakra, starting with that mark on her forehead. I’m an idiot.”

“...Wait, are you referring to the Strength of a Hundred Seal?” Rin asked, and I nodded. “But neither of us have nearly that much chakra control—or just chakra, in my case…”

I settled back down, resting my hands against the tops of my thighs, and said to Rin, “But I think the same principle could work for me, if we could find out if fūinjutsu and medical ninjutsu could be combined into a form I can still use.”

“Then we need to get Kushina-san,” Rin said. “She knows more about fūinjutsu than anyone.”

And since Kushina was a jinchūriki, she would be able to work on that angle, since Rin and I had both hit a wall. “So, do we maybe have a plan?”

“We have a plan,” Rin said firmly. Abruptly, she let out a giggle.

Eh?

“I’m sorry, it’s just—I forget, sometimes, that we have all of these wonderful people to help us,” Rin explained, once she got the relieved laughter under control. “It’s not just us against the world, you know?”

...I did.

I did know. It’d just...taken a while to sink in.

Camaraderie: The Choice

Chapter Summary

Everyone: Make decisions, big and small.

Chapter Notes

This chapter's title is from the Undertale OST, specifically the track titled "The Choice." It's basically the main theme, slowed down five times over. Very dramatic.

Having gone to Kushina and Tsunade for help, Rin and I were left with a couple of different answers.

Kushina said that while she knew how to seal Tailed Beasts and other sources of volatile chakra, she wasn’t quite sure how to approach creating an artificial tenketsu. She didn’t have the medical expertise to know how to create a seal to mimic their function on someone like me, but there was always something she could learn.

Tsunade, on the other hand, frowned severely and informed us that our understanding of the Strength of a Hundred Seal was flawed. Yes, the seal needed a crapton of chakra in precise dosages and at certain times, in certain configurations, but it wasn’t truly a chakra regulator. Once established, the seal just...continued to work unless deliberately overclocked at some point. Kind of explained why she could just smash things when Sakura had to actually concentrate to turn into a human bulldozer.

But both women decided that the idea of creating some kind of seal to function as replacement tenketsu was a good one, and said that they’d help.

It was really all Rin and I could ask for, since any work we did could help someone else in the future—and as such, we needed to make sure it was a solid concept before moving on.

Rome wasn’t built in a day and all that rot. Regardless, I had plenty of things to occupy my time.

Like running around and bugging all of my friends.

Because Obito had the first shift of Sensei-sitting of the day, and Kakashi was on a mission to the Land of Snow—not that I was supposed to know that—I had the late morning free while my brother and his team had their group spars. Knowing that Rin also had a morning shift at the hospital and wasn’t due out until two, I had a lot of time on my hands and no one to spend it with.

I’d...gotten clingy over the previous year, so I immediately decided to go find someone.

This, somehow, resulted in a trip out to the training grounds with a full supply of training gear.

I was probably not in the best mindset for sparring with actual people, but I had an urge to wallop something and a bunch of wooden posts would probably suffice.
Still brought my actual katana, though. I needed to get used to using it again, properly, and I’d never relied too much on my left arm for kenjutsu anyway.

In short order, I found myself at Training Ground Seven, which had the usual stock of straw training dummies hanging from every tree in sight. Out of the sixteen of them that were in plain view and not strung up in other trees I couldn’t see, fifteen had at least five senbon in each of the targets on their torsos. Some of them completed the set with multiple senbon to the forehead-mounted bullseye.

And in the middle of the clearing, taking aim at the last trepanning victim with a senbon in his left hand, was Genma.

Raidō roamed off to one side, collecting senbon off the ground. From the looks of it, Genma had generally missed more than he hit at the beginning. Of course, I had no idea how long these two had been here, and it was only a guess.

“Hi, Kei-san,” Genma called over his shoulder as I arrived, but he didn’t take his eyes off his target.

Raidō turned around and waved at me, though.

I waved back. “So, is this just a target practice session, or can anyone join?”

Somewhat distracted, Genma replied, “Just gimme a chance to nail this last one.”

A moment later, Genma impaled the last straw target through a hole in its button eyeball. For a moment I wasn’t sure if he threw hard enough to make a brand new hole in the wood, or if he’d thrown accurately enough to thread a needle. With a needle.

For a target ten meters off and no weird eyeball shenanigans to assist, that kind of accuracy was just downright freaky. It also explained how the hell Genma could eschew any other weapon and somehow still not die.

But as soon as the throw was complete, Genma let out a loud sigh and let his arm drop. Wincing, he was still rubbing his shoulder when he turned back to me and said, “Field’s free, now.”

“I didn’t mean to make you feel like you had to finish early,” I backtracked, holding up my hands. “I’m sorry.”

“It’s fine, Kei. PT’s over for today,” Genma replied, and caught the water bottle Raidō tossed at him with his right hand. At least that side was in working order. “I’ve just been doing accuracy drills all morning.”

Yes, the hundred or so senbon probably indicated as much.

“‘Bout time I stopped, anyway. This arm’s still giving me trouble,” Genma said, and sat down on a fallen log.

Well, I could certainly empathize there. I joined him on the improvised bench a moment later, as Raidō continued cleaning up the training ground by cutting the various straw targets down.

“Come to think of it, how’s your arm doing?” Genma asked, and I noticed that he had already started chewing on the last stray senbon he had on hand.

“The tenketsu are still shot, so that’s not new,” I said with false cheer. I kicked my legs idly as I went on, “I’m probably not gonna be running any missions until we figure that out.”
Genma blinked. “I didn’t exactly think you’d be jumping at a chance to get back out there.”

“Not like you, you mean?” I teased him, then sighed. I dropped my head into my right hand and said, “I really don’t care about like, thrills or challenges like that. But not being able to use chakra with my left arm is kind of just a problem in general.”

“Huh.” Genma exhaled slowly, leaning back and looking up at the sky. “And Tsunade-sama can’t do anything about it?”

I told him, “It’s about as bad as a Hyūga could do, so it’s...not really something she’s practiced. Rin and I are looking into fūinjutsu options instead.”

“And there aren’t any Hyūga medics to take a look at it?”

I shook my head. “The whole point of the Gentle Fist is to break tenketsu and organs so bad that nothing can fix them. They’re not really in the repair business if they hit someone for real.”

Genma, with only a bit of a wince, patted my right shoulder with his left arm. “Well, just shout if you want my help with the fūinjutsu thing. I’m not a medic, but new eyes might be helpful once in a while.”

“And it has nothing to do with how bored you are, since you’re benched too?” I tried teasing him again.

“Absolutely not,” Genma informed me in a faux-serious tone. “I’m offering out of the goodness of my heart. ...Though yes, I’m bored and I need a new project or else I’m going to go insane.”

“I think your only project should be getting your arm healed,” Raidō called from the last dummy, which he was disassembling in order to retrieve all the senbon stuck in it.

Genma scowled, but the expression slid off his face in just a moment. He grumbled, “Like I need the reminder.”

I didn’t either. But then, I hadn’t really needed the same kind of treatment. Isobu could take care of most physical damage that time would otherwise give up on, with the glaring exception of the tenketsu problem. Anything else got sped up enough that Genma’s concerns were of a different tack than mine.

“So I guess that means you’re not up for a spar?” I had assumed that was the case, actually, but it wasn’t like Genma and I usually practiced together anyway. We were...not exactly in the same weight class, and our skills only had one area of overlap. Fūinjutsu like mine was great for fighting, but Genma’s wasn’t.

“Not remotely,” Genma admitted. “On the other hand, I’m pretty sure Raidō is.”

And as it so happened, Raidō was heading back over to us at the time, and heard every word. With pockets full of senbon and a pained expression, Raidō told Genma, “Stop volunteering me for things you don’t want to do.”

Genma stuck his tongue out at Raidō anyway. “What, you were gonna make her ask?”

Raidō gave me a long-suffering look. “Sorry about him.”

“No, I actually do want to train a bit, but...” I gestured helplessly at my left arm. “Well, you know.”
Raidō tilted his head to one side, giving Genma and me assessing looks. Then he said, “Jinchūriki or not, I wouldn’t really recommend it. Not until your arm’s healed.”

Bleh. “It’s not really a matter of healing at this point.”

“Still,” Genma said, as Raidō sat down to his right. But Genma paused for a second, closing for his eyes and holding still.

Raidō and I waited.

Then, Genma said, “Well, if neither of us end up sparring, I can hear Gai and his crew coming back right now. That’ll be enough for anyone.”

With barely any forewarning other than that (and the obligatory heads-up from my chakra sense), Gai Body Flickered onto the scene with a shout of triumph. In his wake, I could sense three somewhat less-enthused chakra signatures following along.

Running everyone else ragged was Gai’s specialty, and the members of Team Inoichi were no exception.

That was probably why Iruka stumbled over to the log like a drunk and collapsed across it, his face red and his hair everywhere thanks to Gai’s idea of light exercise. Between panting breaths, he managed, “The Academy was n-never this tough.”

Hayate staggered to a stop, but didn’t collapse. Instead, he sat down with his back to mine, trembling from exertion, and informed me in the most dramatic tone he could pull off, “I’m dead.”

I gingerly patted Iruka’s back. “You’ll live.” To my brother, I said, “And so will you.”

Yūgao, meanwhile, sat down next to Iruka and upended her water bottle over her head.

Gai grinned. “That was an invigorating run! Now, we spar!”

“I think the kids are exhausted.” Genma thumped Raidō’s shoulder and added with cheerful malice, “Tell you what, Raidō can—”

Raidō clapped a hand over Genma’s mouth—barely avoiding the senbon—and hissed, “Not a chance.”

“Not a chance what?” Gai asked, bouncing over to us.

Raidō’s expression froze up for a moment, in a sort of nervous grin. Then, “You know what, I have a shift change to take care of. Bye!”

As soon as Raidō disappeared into a cloud of smoke, Genma stage-whispered to me, “That’s his go-to excuse for everything now.”

I searched for something positive to say and came up with, “Well, he gets more work done that way.”

Genma snorted, but let the topic drop.

“Gai, if Raidō really is going to take over a shift, that means Obito is free now,” I said, blatantly throwing Obito under the bus. Well, if I couldn’t spar with Gai—which I would, under normal circumstances—then I could at least find someone in town who would be up for a challenge. “Just mention that you’d like to test his strength, and he’ll jump at the chance.”
“Do you think so?” Gai asked, buzzing with undirected energy.

After watching Sensei all morning, I had no doubt that Obito would want nothing more than a bit of excitement. “Yep. Go get him.”

Gai looked like he was about to bound off and do exactly that, but he paused thoughtfully. “Would you like to stay and watch our spar as we go, Keisuke-chan? Actually, all of you are invited to spectate!”

“Do we have to move?” Yūgao asked, as she tied her sopping-wet hair out of her face.

“No, I believe this location will be suitable! We will put on a Youthful display here for you all!” Gai gave us all a thumbs-up. “That is a promise.”

And then Gai was gone again.

Hayate groaned, bumping the back of my head with his. “I don’t know how you can keep up with him, Sis.”

“Is this a jinchūriki superpower?” Iruka asked, eyeing me skeptically.

“Practice makes perfect,” I told him, thinking back to the time I had first started training with Gai. It basically boiled down to “I’ve been doing this for six years, you lazy sods.”

“That doesn’t really work that way,” Genma countered. “I’ve been on his team for more than ten years, and I still can’t work on that level.”

“He was like that the entire time?” Yūgao asked, horrified.

“Nope,” said Genma. “And now he can kill jōnin with his little finger, and I’m on medical leave.” Genma shrugged, looking up at the sky again. “There’s a reason he talks about hard work so much.”

“...I don’t think I’ve ever seen you work hard at anything,” Hayate told Genma. The other teens were also giving the oldest shinobi in our midst skeptical looks.

“And now you know why Gai is stronger than Genma,” I summarized, as though reading the life lesson at the end of a fairy tale.

Genma rolled his eyes. “Thanks, Kei-san.” After a moment more, he took the senbon out of his mouth and asked, “So does anyone know what time it is?”

Everyone thought about it. Konoha did not have easily accessible clocks, and there was only so much timekeeping anyone could do while running in a Gai-inspired workout. Everything felt much slower while doing that.

“...Noon-ish?” Iruka guessed.

Genma got up, brushing splinters and dust from his pants. “I’ve got to get going.”

“Why?” Yūgao asked.

“I was supposed to take Sushi and Kabocha to the vet today, and I might be late.” He pointed up at the sky, where the sun had gone to hide behind the clouds like the unhelpful jerk it was. “Maybe.”

Oh. Oops. I said, “We can explain to Gai. I’m sure he’ll understand.”
“I hope so,” Genma said dryly. “It’s not like he’s not the best cat-sitter in the village or anything. Or the bit where he gave me a lecture on responsible pet ownership I really didn’t need.”

The rest of us waved Genma off, so he could do whatever he had to, and exchanged more silly stories for a while.

In the cool spring air, it seemed like our lives were carefree for at least a little while. It was all I could ask for.

Rin showed up on my front doorstep on a Tuesday, which would have been weird except for the bit where Rin’s schedule was weird anyway. Mine was pretty much “when I felt like working,” so it wasn’t exactly surprising that I wasn’t out and about.

Mornings, as far as I was concerned, were for sleeping in.

So I answered the door in a T-shirt and sweatpants, because of course I did. I had a comment on the tip of my tongue, about not waking me up for the end of the world, and had to swallow it when I looked down and realized that Rin was standing there.

She gave me an expectant look and said, “So, are you free today?”

I took stock.

Me: Pajamas, no breakfast, generally planning on snoozing the whole day away unless roused like a starving grizzly bear.

Her: Perfect hair, bright-eyed expression, cute outfit, and more energy than I’d had since I was sixteen.

“Sure,” I said. Except for the bit where I wasn’t exactly ready to go anywhere. I still needed to eat, shower, get dressed...hell. “Uh, you can wait in the kitchen? I need to...kind of get ready. In general.”

Luckily, there was fruit on the counter, so it wasn’t like I was being a bad host. It was just that Hayate had gotten up first, eaten all the takeout, and left in short order before I had even thought about swearing at the sun. There was something about being fifteen that turned people into ambulatory stomachs. Probably puberty.

Rin picked up one of the apples off the counter and bit into it, so I took that as my cue to retreat to the bathroom and get ready for the day.

After taking a shower and brushing my teeth—I’d eat while we were out—I got dressed.

Given that Rin was wearing something other than her hospital scrubs, I assumed she wanted to actually go out and do something. As opposed to training, or dragging me to the hospital to get my arm looked at again. That kind of thing demanded at least a modicum of “not looking like a hobo” out of me.

So I tried.

Black T-shirt under a...when the hell had I gotten a new hoodie? And one that for some reason was best described as eye-searing blue. Anyway, that plus the tighter style of shinobi pants that Rin favored, and then my less-ugly sandals.
I almost felt fashionable. Then I remembered that my hair was still wet, and just clipped it out of my face with whatever I had on hand. It would turn into a cowlick-ridden mess no matter what I did, so I just gave up on it preemptively.

“You look cute, Kei!” Rin said, once I stumbled my way back into the kitchen.

...Yeah, I wasn’t buying that. Instead of actually acknowledging the compliment, I asked, “What did you want to do today, anyway?”

“Oh, I thought we could hang out,” Rin said, smiling. “Aside from when things get serious, we haven’t done a lot of that lately.”

She had a point. If I was visiting Rin, for the most part it meant either I was going to have another appointment with Suika-sensei, or that I was noticing some kind of new and awful development in my left arm’s situation.

So no, we hadn’t had much time just to relax like actual non-dramatic friends.

“But still, what did you want to do?” I asked her again.

“Well, I was thinking we could do a little shopping”—and here, my expression became the slightest bit strained—“for some supplies”—phew—”and then maybe we could find some different clothes for special occasions, or maybe for everyday wear.”

Dammit.

You are a weakling. You can’t even stand something boring when one of your human friends is suffering alongside you?

...Okay, point of order? She thinks it’s fun, I argued silently.

“Kei?” Rin’s voice broke me out of my stupor, and I finally realized that she was giving me an expression similar to a pout. “You don’t really want to go, do you?”

I winced. “Sorry, Rin. I just—I’m really bad at this ‘shopping’ thing.” In fact, I was bad at most things that required me to wander around with no idea of what I was looking for, just to snap up any targets my partners could locate.

In other news, I was also bad at hunting.

Rin paused. “Well, how about we just focus on food, then? I need to get more for Sasa-chan, too.”

That, I could do. “Okay then.”

“Great!” Rin said, getting to her feet. “Let’s go.”

Our first stop was not, in fact, either a market or a pet supply store. It was a bank.

I stayed outside while Rin did whatever she had to. I didn’t have much interest in big financing things and the banking system had never made any sense to me, so I spent the time letting my mind wander a bit.

A few minutes later, Rin reappeared.

“So what was that about?” I asked.
“Akihito-shishō had a couple of errands for me to take care of,” Rin said, and didn’t elaborate.

After that, we were off.

Between Rin’s head for markets and mine for having absolutely nothing at all to do with the topic, we managed to buy all of the things we needed in record time. Bringing my grocery scroll along had been a good idea, since I had enough control over the chakra in my right arm to create more storage seals as we went. In the end, all of what we bought was tucked into various pocket dimensions.

And I learned way more about scorpion care than I had ever cared to know.

We spent at least a few minutes poking around the pet supply store. Rin knew what she was looking for, and while she went for the terrarium with feeder crickets, I explored a little.

I picked up a large packet of dog treats from a shelf near the back. While I didn’t always see Kakashi’s dogs, I could think of a few different people with canine companions who would tolerate someone spoiling their partners. Like Fuse Inuzuka.

And while I was at it, I picked up two different dog toys—one rope toy that looked like it could survive the loving attention of a chainsaw, and a rubber squeaky cat. Once I introduced the two toys to Bull, I fully expected them to be destroyed within a few minutes—especially the rope. Those also went in the shopping basket.

Then I joined Rin again at the terrarium, where the store’s employee was fishing the recalcitrant crickets out and sticking them into a disposable plastic bag.

While he did so, I noticed that he was channeling chakra, forcing the crickets to stick to whatever he touched—no escape for them. The rest of the process consisted of picking up the random junk in the tank and shaking them into their new, temporary home—which would be their last.

He was still a showoff.

“How’s little Sasa doing now, Rin-chan?” asked the employee, as he rang up our purchases.

“She’s fine, Satoshi-kun,” Rin responded, as she counted out her money.

The employee nodded. But as he was packing the crickets away (and I abruptly remembered that no, I couldn’t just stick them into the grocery scroll if I wanted them to live), he happened to say, “So, who’s your...friend?”

I gave him a flat look.

There weren’t exactly a ton of people around who would fail to recognize me. Sure, I wasn’t as distinctive as Kakashi and his floofy white hair and the hitai-ate eyepatch, but the scar wasn’t exactly subtle. And what was with that pause?

Sure, I was being over-defensive when faced with half an iota of possible judgment from a guy who felt like a genin, but my nerves had been keyed up for entirely too long.

Or maybe I was missing something.

Under the mess of spiky black hair and the one-step-down-from-Gai eyebrows, the guy had a pleasant smile and a friendly demeanor. He looked like the kind of person I could easily meet on the street and have a friendly chat, but my stupid brain insisted on overthinking everything.
“Oh, this is Kei,” Rin said cheerfully to the clerk’s question. “Kei, this is Satoshi-kun. You do remember him, right?”

“No, I’m sorry. I don’t remember you.” Not in the slightest.

Rin punched me playfully in the arm. “Come on, Kei, he was in our class!”

“I was in your class for maybe a year, and I slept through most of it,” I protested. But now that I thought of it, his face...kind of looked familiar... “Wait, Satoshi Inabi? You were placed on Rin’s genin team when we graduated!”

“And you’re Keisuke Gekkō.” Satoshi’s eyebrows rose, and he stepped back from the counter a bit for effect. “Damn, you got tall fast. If you were a guy…”

I sputtered, for just a moment.

“I know, I know, too fast.” Satoshi cackled, while Rin started giggling. Leaning forward, he put both elbows on the countertop and said cheerily, “But seriously, Keisuke-san, it’s nice to finally see you again.”

“Likewise,” I said, still reeling. “I, uh, I hope Rin’s been saying good things about me?” And my boys, come to think of it. We were sort of infamous.

“Mostly that she wished you’d get hurt less,” Satoshi replied, shrugging. “But hey, at least she’s got the skills to help. All I can do is listen.”

“But you listen really well, Satoshi-kun,” Rin assured him as she took the bag of crickets. To me, she added, “He helped me a lot when Obito and I got together, and we were still a little...uncertain, I think.”

“.‘Uncertain?’” I repeated. I’d been doing that enough that I probably could have been substituted with a parrot to no discernable effect.

“I didn’t—I mean…” Rin sighed, all of the wind coming out of her sails. “First relationships are a lot harder than books make it seem.”

I patted Rin’s shoulder sympathetically, though I had absolutely no idea. “Very true.”

“And everyone needs someone to talk to,” Satoshi added. “Or to get advice. And Rin’s made it pretty clear that her old man’s kinda...not great.”

Or he sucked at it.

No one said anything for a long moment. Welp, there went the conversation…

So, after saying our goodbyes to Satoshi, we left.

Rin and I, after dropping the crickets off at Rin and Yamaguchi-sensei’s apartment, went to a restaurant for lunch.

“Restaurant” was probably overstating it a bit, actually—it was a bit of a hole in the wall near the Konoha Administration Building, but there was soba. The place also had enough booths that I could slap down a privacy seal and feel completely sure that I wasn’t inconveniencing the wait-staff.

“Back then,” Rin began carefully, as she stirred her noodles around and around, “I wasn’t—I was afraid that Obito and I weren’t going to work out.”
I nodded to show I was listening, but couldn’t exactly reply with food in my mouth.

“I felt, at the time, it was a bit like I was forced to pick Obito over you,” Rin admitted, shaking her head. “But that’s stupid. It was a choice, and it mattered, and I would choose him again. But at the beginning it was hard to do.”

I swallowed hard. “Rin, I—”

“No, Kei, it’s all right. I’m over it.” Rin spoke over me, quietly but insisting on being heard. “Don’t beat yourself up over turning me down.”

...Er.

In some ways I’d kind of avoided thinking about it. Sure, I was aware of Rin’s feelings, and I loved her—but just not in the way she would have appreciated. That part hadn’t changed at all.

“So I went to Satoshi to figure out if I was doing the right thing,” Rin said. She smiled, distracted and fond. While twirling her noodles again, she went on, “And he said that as long as I spent more time happy than I did worrying about what might’ve been, then things would work out.”

“I’m surprised you went to him, but I guess that’s a bit silly to say,” I said.

“Satoshi and I didn’t know each other that well,” Rin told me. “I mean, we were only a team for one day, and Satoshi retired right after, but he’s a good friend now.”

And it wasn’t like she could talk to me of all people. I’d been out of the village so much that I wasn’t physically available, and the second she brought this up if I was, I’d probably have checked out mentally. But that wasn’t important now. “So, now that you’ve been dating Obito for almost two years, are you happy?”

“Oh, yes,” Rin said, brightening. She leaned forward and her expression became something I could best describe as “squee!”

Oh dear.

“Obito is so cute!” Rin chirped, with almost as much enthusiasm as Gai but in a much higher octave. “He helps me look after Sasa-chan, and feed her, and he never runs away from her even if she tries to sting him. I mean, Kei, he doesn’t live with us and he doesn’t have to, and he’s always so sweet about it. And he makes me laugh, even if things are hard, and he always remembers my birthday and —” Rin trailed off with a heartfelt sigh. “He’s almost too good, you know?”

I said nothing. I had no idea how to even approach this.

“Obito—he’s kind, and if he forgets things I can’t stay mad at him even if he thinks I should,” Rin murmured. “I even went out to find that cat he keep rescuing, and we got it out of that tree together. I don’t think I’d ever seen Shisui-kun laugh so hard.”

Pffft. I bit my lip and pressed the heel of my hand against my mouth, forcing the laugh back before it could burst free.

“Oh, laugh if you want,” Rin giggled. While both of us cackled together for a moment, Rin recovered first and dashed tears from her eyes as she wound down.

It took me a little longer, but I calmed myself back down after a while. A little breathless, I managed to say, “Sounds like you’re happy.”
“I am,” Rin said, and leaned in.

Blinking, I copied her and heard her whisper, “And it helps that he’s a good kisser.”

Given Rin’s excitement, I had to conclude that they’d figured that one out with plenty of practice.

I was about to ask about something. I couldn’t remember afterward, because a part of my brain started to scream at the rest of me. My head jerked as though someone had blasted the dulcet tones of microphone feedback into my ear.

“Kei?” Rin’s voice demanded in concern, as I came back to myself and shoved the pain aside.

I swore again under my breath, wondering why I was apparently the only person to hear that scream. And yet, my ears didn’t hurt… “Did you hear that?”

“Hear what?” Rin asked, and her hand was on my wrist and her chakra fed into mine. But there wasn’t really any pain to numb, was there?

“Chakra sense problems,” I said, distracted. Underneath the electronic scream, there had been an undercurrent of what I realized wasn’t my pain, but someone else’s. And it was still there, but fainter, in the distance.

Keito.

“Rin, I’m sorry, I have to go sort something out,” I rattled off, getting to my feet. “I’ll pay you back later, okay? For lunch and for the dog toys.”

“Of course, Kei,” Rin replied on reflex, but she was getting to her feet, too. “Kei, I may be able to help—”

But I was already out the door, and didn’t hear anything she said after that point.

What was that supposed to be? Isobu asked, stirring in the depths of my mind.

Someone in trouble, I told him, as I vaulted up to the rooftops and started calculating strength, direction, and distance to the intermittent chakra flares. It felt like—yes, that was definitely the Academy. And it was lunchtime for the kids, which could mean nothing good.

As I sped across the roofs toward the administration center, a dozen—no, two dozen other shinobi chakra signatures were already springing into action. If I hadn’t cared about smacking into a building, I could have closed my eyes to get a more accurate read on the situation, but I still needed to get there to be much use.

Fwish.

Sensei appeared just to my right, and I ducked left to avoid accidentally running into him. This, instead, forced me to drop down, having lost enough momentum that I would have missed the next rooftop jump.

Sensei caught the edge of my sleeve and yanked me back to solid ground. His chakra hummed against mine, showing worry and agitation and also a businesslike, brusque edge that would have had me cowering from him if Kaito hadn’t been in trouble.

His tone, as I skittered along ahead, was no less sharp. “Kei, you’ve already noticed the problem.”

Over my shoulder, I told Sensei, “I’ve noticed that there’s a problem.” The flippant tone was a flop
—there was enough stress in my voice that I almost immediately had to give it up. This just wasn’t the kind of situation that warranted it. I shook myself, then I asked, “Do you have a better idea what’s going on?”

“No,” Sensei replied.

Well, shit.

I was about to voice that thought, but Sensei didn’t give me any time to do it before grabbing my shoulder and just teleporting both of us to the site. I was fast, but there was simply nothing that compared to folding space-time like that.

And I hit the ground feet-first, eyes itching, as a crowd of children started to stream out of the Academy’s side gates past me. Sensei stuck to the walls, then dropped down to ground level ahead of me to clear the crowd.

“What happened?” Sensei barked at the Academy’s head teacher—Shikane Nara, actually. I hadn’t really thought about her being transferred from whatever she did other than being in the Hokage Guard, but it was nice to see a familiar face.

“One of the students is having difficulty,” Shikane said, perfectly serene despite the fact that her students were, uh, kind of evacuating to the schoolyard.

Well, it wasn’t like we were actually under attack as such…

Sensei and I drew her off to one side. It was mostly a formality, but the rest of the kids didn’t need to hear this.

“Is Kaito all right?” I asked her in a whisper. I already knew the answer.

“Kaito-kun recently froze every pipe in this part of the building,” Shikane informed us, as her voice took on more of a pleading tone. “Keisuke-kun, please try to talk him down.”

What the actual fuck is going on here? Why are you so calm? But what actually came out of my mouth was a startled, “But what’s happening?”

“Kaito-kun has encased one of our classrooms in ice,” Shikane replied, and Sensei closed his eyes briefly as though to force himself to slow down and think. Ignoring him, she went on, “From what the other students have said, he screamed while they were roughhousing, and used the ice to chase everyone else away.”

“No one’s been hurt, right?”

Shikane shook her head. “No, not even Kaito-kun. I think his power may be beyond him at this point, but the initial panic is over. It’s just that everyone who’s tried to reach him has been chased away from the room. But now you’re here, Keisuke-kun.”

I had no problem whatsoever with going in there—though I’d never been trained on something like this—but I did want to hear a bit of Shikane’s reasoning. “Shikane-san…”

“As a jinchūriki, you can shrug off any damage he might unintentionally cause,” Shikane said, reaching out and clasping my shoulder. “And I know you were one of the first responders to the Sorayama incident. I have no doubt you are suited for this.”

Yes, great, but what the hell does that have to do with me being able to feel Kaito screaming? What I needed to find him. That nasty little voice in my head, which screamed about doom and death whenever something went even slightly off a plan, was doing its best foghorn impression.

Sensei frowned, crossing his arms over his chest as he thought. “Are there any children trapped in there with him?”

Sure, he could probably tell that just by closing his eyes and concentrating, but it was still good to make sure things were verbally confirmed.

“No,” Shikane said, shaking her head firmly. She let go of me and sighed heavily. “We escorted all of the other children away from the building to give Kaito-kun some breathing space. At this point, Kaito is only a danger to himself, but that alone...” Shikane shook her head. “I’m sorry, Hokage-sama, Keisuke-kun. This is difficult for everyone here.”

Kaito’s chakra was a storm’s eyewall, tucked into the building and rampaging against its bonds. And there was a definite edge there, like a caged tiger, and the lightning sang when it oughtn’t.

It was too much. I had an image in my head, of a tiny house that had been blasted down to nothing by the force of a child’s terror and an untrained bloodline.

But Kaito wasn’t Haku. And the people around him weren’t homicidal villagers. No one was coming to hurt him, but I didn’t know if he knew that.

How are we going to help him? Because I knew perfectly well that we were going to do it. I stood there for a moment and quietly stamped down on the urge to panic from the pressure.

“Kei, can you do this?” Sensei asked me.

Kaito—he was one of my students. Not that Sensei could know that, unless Kakashi had told him. Kaito was mine. My responsibility, my little lost lamb with the ability to coat large areas in frost.

I needed to be there for him.

“Yes, Sensei,” I said, and headed toward Kaito’s bright sparks without further comment.

It wasn’t hard to locate Kaito. Even if I hadn’t been a chakra sensor, the air temperature steadily dropped as I walked through the silent halls. Out of curiosity, I dragged a hand along the nearest wall, and felt a chill from frozen pipes inside the walls.

Shit.

You’re going to need my help for this, Isobu said as we went, maintaining a steady silent stride along the wooden floors.

Probably. But can we not do the glowy eye thing first?

...If you insist.

Thanks.

The classroom was...perhaps a bit obvious. Icicles the size of spears drooped down from the top of the classroom’s doorframe, guarding the entryway like dragon’s teeth. An unearthly chill seeped from the room, spreading spidery lines of frost outward from the open door.
At least I knew there was going to only be one person inside. A scared someone, but someone I knew and someone I wanted to help. I was definitely going in.

I touched the first icicle and leaned closer, nudging the door open past it with one foot. The ice splashed back into harmless, if cold, water as soon as I sent a feather-light touch of Isobu’s chakra into it. Making my way carefully into the room, I called, “Kaito?”

I heard a sob, somewhere in the frigid air. His chakra shifted, and the classroom’s door sealed shut with ice behind me. The air seemed to get somehow colder, and my chakra sense narrowed to focus on the single point that mattered in here—the little, sparking presence that I knew nearly as well as the other Lightning-user in my life.

But Kakashi was stronger, and had been a shinobi since he was Kaito’s age. And Kaito was a scared little boy who needed someone to come looking for him.

I could be that person. I was that person. I couldn’t be anything less.

“Kaito, I’m here,” I said softly, as my breath made a white cloud in front of me.

The solid rows of desks extended upwards from where I stood, blocking any line of sight. But based on the cold and the chakra, I could tell that Kaito was in the second row’s furthest corner, under the desk and behind the four or five chairs that had been arranged normally, once.

On silent feet, I made my way up until I was even with him. On top of the desk, I could see the remnants of children’s lunches, school supplies, and other miscellaneous items, which gave me a few more clues to puzzle over as I dropped down into a crouching position.

Once down, I could see his tiny huddled form in the shadows—harder than normal, given that the ice had covered the overhead lights and probably destroyed them in short order. His knees were pulled up to his chest, and his arms and face disappeared behind them as he wedged himself into the corner.

...I was probably going to have to get all of those damned chairs out of the way before I could even get close to him. While, sure, I could approach him any of a dozen different ways thanks to ninja training, the chairs would also present an obstacle for him—if he wanted to leave, being unable to find a clear line of sight to escape would be incredibly unhelpful.

“Kaito?” I called again, taking care to pitch my voice so there was no chance it could be a shout.

It might have been my imagination, but I thought I saw his tremors stop for a second. Come on, please look at me. I’m not going to hurt you. I can’t imagine hurting you. And I’ll punch anyone who tries. Please, look up…

And as my internal mantra got steadily more pleading, I drew a few symbols under the nearest chair with my fingertip. One flare of chakra later, and there was a quiet bomph. First chair was sealed into the floorboards, but it was out of the way nonetheless.

Just four more to go to clear Kaito’s path.

“Kaito, it’s me,” I tried again, carefully slinking up to the next chair to remove it. “It’s Kei. Remember me?”

And to my relief, I saw his head bob once. The white streak in his hair shifted as he started to lift his head, but the only noise he made was a hiccupping sob. Then it was right back to the corner, with his breath fogging the air as his quiet panting sped up again.
Okay, nope, not approaching for a moment. New plan.

_Fuck._ I was so out of my depth.

“You’re safe here,” I told him in a soft tone, even as I carefully reached out and, with another _bomph_, sent the nearest chair into a pocket dimension. With that, I was able to tuck my legs under me and settle into place. “Please, look up. You’re in Konoha.”

Kaito whispered something.

I stopped what I was doing—plotting, mostly—and held myself perfectly still so I could listen.

“...K-Kei...?” As I stayed frozen in place, I watched him shift again—saw his eyes seem to gleam in the shadows. And for the first time since this thing started, I could see his hands shift upward and toward his mouth, where they were probably a bit warmer. But still, he shook.

I let out a silent breath. Then, “Yeah, Kaito. It’s me. It’s just me.”

“I c-can’t—it’s—” Kaito tried, but kept getting cut off by his traitorous lungs. I was _almost_ sure that this was mostly normal crying. Not panic-crying. “Sc—ared.”

For a brief, hysterical moment, I wished that Akuro was alive solely so I could kill her again. If I could have gone back in time and ripped her still-beating heart from her chest back when we first met in Amegakure, I would have.

“Can you come here?” I asked, sealing the third chair as I crept closer, still on my knees.

Kaito shook his head rapidly.

Nnnnnnope. Not going that route either. _Shit._

What could I say? While “anything” was a bad answer and liable to make the situation worse, I wasn’t exactly spoiled for choices. So I kept trying. “Kaito, can—I come over there? Is that okay?”

No answer.

For a while, all I could hear was his rapid breathing getting quieter and slower, despite the occasional sob that shook his whole body. Unsure of what to do, I got rid of the last two chairs standing between Kaito and me—and subsequently him and an escape route if he needed one.

“...K-Kei?” Kaito asked in a small, but somewhat steadier voice. He peeked out from behind his arms and his knees again, his face reddened and his eyes puffy from crying. But his shaking had petered out again, and I was _almost_ close enough to touch him if he let me.

“Hey, Kaito,” I said, and while I tried to smile it almost certainly came out flat and strained. “I know you’re scared. That’s okay. I’m here now.”

Though hesitant, Kaito gave me a long stare before nodding once. He still sniffled, but the worst seemed over.

I hadn’t seen the worst of the panic attack, just the aftermath. I could only try to piece together how bad it had been, or what had caused it. There could have been a flashback, triggered by details of the incident Shikane hadn’t really described. I didn’t know yet.

But first things first, here and now. “Is it okay if I sit next to you?”
Kaito blinked slowly, as though unable to process the question for a moment, before nodding. Okay, permission acquired, but I wasn’t quite sure where I was supposed to go. Obviously, being larger than Kaito, I couldn’t crowd him, but I also couldn’t comfortably fit under the desks like him...

I scooted down the chair-free aisle and put my back against the wall, so I was sitting close to—but not touching—him, and also giving him a straight shot toward the main aisle if he wanted to get away. That would probably work for now.

What now?

And it turned out that I didn’t have to find my own answer to that question, because Kaito crawled into my lap and wrapped his skinny arms around my neck. His face buried against the side of my neck, and his legs managed to get a grip on my waist like he was some kind of koala.

I hesitated to hug him back, wary of possibly triggering him again. But eventually, I did.

And as the world came back—the ice melted, his heartbeat slowed, and my nerves finally settled—Sensei entered the room alone. He listened for a long moment as I hummed a lullaby I hadn’t had to use in years, and didn’t try to get me to move until Kaito had long since fallen asleep.

As ever, the hard part was bound to come afterward. But for a while, there was peace.

In an act of benign neglect that bordered on stupidity, I had never bothered to interact with any of the Chinatsugumi merchants who were permanent Konoha residents. Sure, they owed their allegiance to a merchant group that no longer existed and thus were stuck where they were, but my primary contact with them had always been Chinatsu herself. The rest of them sort of blended into the background.

Except this guy.

Raiden Koizumi was about as tall as Sensei, with white-blond hair tucked into a samurai-esque topknot at the back of his head. He had the same placid expression as a cow in a field, complete with wider-set gray eyes that were the same shade as Aiko’s. While Shikane confirmed that Raiden is a successful merchant in his own right, despite working under Chinatsu’s banner, I just got a weird feeling when I look at him.

It was the same crawling déjà vu I’d felt every time I recognized another reincarnation, like the Chinatsugumi members, for who they were.

Raiden was...well, it shouldn’t have surprised me to learn that he’d fathered Aiko in this timeline, too. What was surprising was that he’d taken his illegitimate daughter under his wing immediately. His original self had been entirely too self-absorbed to even think about anything beyond the moment.

And I was somehow sitting across the table from a man who was not only happily married to a woman named Chihiro with twins on the way, but one who had adopted three other children without a second thought. He should have felt safe.

But Kaito hadn’t gone running to him when he showed up. For that reason alone, I kept my guard up.

Shikane’s office in the Academy was a study in contrasts: part administration hub, part workspace, part playpen for unruly children who somehow ended up banished here. And somehow, she still had enough room to fit all of the adults and children and supervise this...very awkward meeting.
Sensei, Shikane, and I formed the “shinobi” camp of the group. Kaito was sort of his own little neutral zone, while Raiden acted as the “parent.”

He probably didn’t deserve the air-quotes, but I wasn’t sure how to slot him into my mental map of this battlefield otherwise. And Chihiro only stopped in long enough to grab Aiko and Roku from the group in the courtyard and take them home, so she wasn’t really a part of this conversation.

“Can you tell us what happened, Kaito?” I asked him, as he shifted so his face was no longer buried in the side of my neck.

His grip tightened on my jacket. “No.”

“You don’t want to, or you don’t know?” Raiden asked, leaning forward across the table. He wasn’t shinobi-trained, but I felt his chakra pull back into his core and his body language had shifted so he appeared as nonthreatening as possible.

I rested my cheek against the top of Kaito’s head and murmured, “It’s okay. No one’s gonna hurt you. You’re not in trouble. We just need to know what happened so we can protect you.”

The more I spoke, the more I felt Kaito’s heart rate slow. He was still half-burrowed into me, but it was progress nonetheless.

Shikane and Sensei were being uncannily quiet. Just waiting, and listening. Maybe if they stayed that way for long enough, Kaito would forget they were there and open up to us. And to do so, their chakra was...dispersed, I suppose. I could still feel them both, but only because I knew exactly what I was looking for.

“I’m s-sorry,” Kaito mumbled miserably, letting me pick him up a little and shift his weight so it was more on my right leg. My left arm didn’t have enough strength to hold him there indefinitely.

Over the top of his head, I could see Sensei and Shikane making shinobi hand signals at each other. I caught the word “asset” and “protect” along with a smattering of other phrases, but they stopped once they realized I was watching.

Sensei signed, “Go,” to signal me to continue since I’d stopped. Field sign was limited, but few teams had enough Yamanaka members to make telepathy a thing.

“Sorry for what?” I asked the top of Kaito’s head.

“I didn’t want to hurt anyone,” Kaito managed, through a lump in his throat. “I was just sc-scared.”

“What were you scared of?” Raiden asked, a little closer than before. He was acting like someone trying to approach a frightened animal, keeping his voice soft and only moving closer in tiny increments.

Kaito twisted so his face was buried against my chest again. But one of his hands let go of my jacket and twitched its way up to the blotchy, uneven scar above his right collarbone. His fingernails dug into it. “I-I was…”

I took his hand in mine and eased his fingers away from the scar. “Easy, easy…”

“S-someone pulled my shirt,” Kaito mumbled. “I th-thought the sc-scary lady w-was back…”

Sensei’s chakra jumped, but subtly enough that no one but me could feel it.
Akuro’s death had been too good for her.

I pressed my lips together and kissed the top of Kaito’s head, as he shook in my arms.

Raiden had somehow managed to scoot all the way over to me, so he could reach out and touch Kaito if he wanted. “Kaito…”

Kaito made an inquisitive noise, lifting his head free of my collar so he could see Raiden’s face. Guileless, Raiden opened his mouth and asked, “Who is this ‘scary lady?’”

Kaito stared at him, his green eyes wide. He trembled, and the temperature of the room started to drop. “B—but we t-told you—”

Before Kaito could start to cry again, or shout, I shucked off my jacket and bundled him up into it as though it was a trauma blanket. To Raiden, I said in a less-than-accommodating tone, “That was a very insensitive question, Koizumi-san.”

Raiden looked as though I’d just slapped him, but his eyes were on Kaito, not me. His chakra was harder to read, but I could feel the man’s anger threading through him. His jaw worked, teeth grinding for just a moment. Then, Raiden said in a carefully level tone, “She—that woman exists?”

“We t-told you she did,” Kaito insisted, still staring at Raiden with wide, accusing eyes. “You d-didn’t believe us?”

“Kaito, look at me,” I interrupted, drawing his attention back to my face. “She will never hurt you again. She’s dead.”

Kaito sniffled.

“Koizumi-san,” Shikane spoke up for the first time in a while, “I believe we’ve isolated your child’s problem.”

“Yes, I—I see that.” Raiden shook himself, trying to regain his composure. “I, er, I think that perhaps the Academy isn’t the best place for him. Or for my daughter or nephew.”

Unintentionally, my grip tightened on Kaito, and he squeaked in surprise before his guardian’s words sank in.

“No, I’m staying!” Kaito argued, squirming so he could face Raiden. He took a moment to gather steam, shaking. “Please. I have to stay.”

“But Kaito, that woman—she hurt you, and the village doesn’t take ninja who might get hurt again,” Raiden said, shooting helpless looks at Sensei and Shikane.

Shikane sighed. “Koizumi-san, Kaito-kun has the Ice Release bloodline. He needs to be taught how to use it safely.” She tapped a pencil on her desk. “While this incident is concerning, it’s not insurmountable with time, careful training, and therapy.”

...Now that I thought about it, when had therapy become so prominent in Konoha? While my therapist was definitely new to treating humans, Obito’s had already been in business. And I still couldn’t recall the exact moment when there had been a paradigm shift away from “there are no therapists” to “we have them; use them.”

When had something changed? And why?

“But it’s not safe,” Raiden protested.

“If I get strong like Big Sis Kei,” Kaito argued back, his face reddening, “then no one will ever hurt me again.”

“But what if you’re not strong enough?” Raiden didn’t get to his feet, but it was a close thing. “I’m only trying to do what your parents would have wanted—to keep you safe.”

Which had served them so well.

I had a sudden urge to slap myself for the thought.

Kaito shook his head. “I still want to stay. You can’t—I need to protect me. I need to be strong!”

“Kaito, what if something like this happens again?” Raiden demanded.

Kaito’s mental state wasn’t a good sign for his prospects in the field. While we knew at least one of his triggers—or thought we did—I didn’t know how he’d react if he was in a real fight. If he did have PTSD, then I didn’t even know how the rest of the shinobi forces would react.

Sensei spoke up, “Would it help if we assigned someone specifically to Kaito-kun?”

“What?” Raiden asked, concentration broken.

“It seems to me that you’re worried about no one being able to calm him down and keep him safe.” Sensei stood back, steepling his fingers in front of him as he thought. It was probably better than playing with his kunai like he preferred, but I still thought it made him look pretentious.

“Yes, yes. Of course,” Raiden said, and Kaito settled back down into my arms.

Kaito reached up and touched the sides of my face, drawing my gaze down to him. “Can you do it? I promise I’ll be good. I won’t do bad things. Please?”

But Sensei was already shaking his head. “Keisuke isn’t a jōnin, Kaito-kun.”

“I could be.”

For a second, I almost didn’t recognize my own voice. But everyone was looking at me, so it had to be me, didn’t it?

I looked down into Kaito’s wide green eyes, feeling his weight in my lap. He trusted me, more than I could trust myself with anything.

But hadn’t I spent that hellish year outside of the village to grow stronger, smarter, and more capable for just that role?

I’d run away from responsibility for as long as I could, out of fear of letting someone down. I hadn’t thought I could do anything that wasn’t just protecting what I had. From stepping up to become a Hokage Guard member, to taking care of Hayate, to running missions that left me scrubbing blood out of my clothes—somehow, none of those had felt like choices. They were my decisions, yes, but I’d just fallen into those roles.
I would protect this child’s future. This was my choice.

“Sensei, I want to take you up on that promotion offer now,” I said, facing Sensei over the top of Kaito’s head.

“But what about Aiko and Roku?” Raiden asked, flabbergasted by the way the conversation had gotten away from him. “I mean, I don’t meant to question your methods, Hokage-sama, but isn’t this unusual? Kaito wants to stay, yes, but--”

“Shinobi teams start out as four-member cells, with three students and one teacher,” Sensei pointed out. He glanced at Shikane, who nodded back. “Granted, we generally don’t form the teams this early, but we can easily change that.”

“Their graduation is years away, Koizumi-san. What we are talking about now is how to make Kaito-kun’s Academy experience a successful one,” Shikane added, since Sensei had clearly forgotten.

Raiden sighed with relief. “Oh, thank goodness. I thought...well, I don’t know what I thought.”

Did no one hand out helpful pamphlets for this shit? I’d certainly be there for the kids, but it would be so much easier if civilians weren’t apparently misinformed about how the Academy operated. I’d need to talk to Raiden after this, to figure out what assumptions he had and get them out of the way properly. For the kids’ sake as well as his.

Most of the kids with shinobi parents got specialized training at home that put them ahead of the curve, particularly if they were born into major clans. Even though Raiden and his wife were the main people responsible for Kaito, Aiko, and Roku, it was clear that this family was out of its depth.

If I wanted to give these children the best chances possible, I needed to be involved long before the question of team assignments even came up.

Raiden turned to me again. After visibly struggling with himself, he burst out, “Promise me you’ll look after him. After all of them, if they’re yours.”

Kaito was the first, but they were all mine.

They were always mine. I just hadn’t been able to see it.

On the whole, starting my day sitting in the hospital’s basement was one of those situations that could have been worse.

While the particular chamber was kind of cold, there were climate-control seals in place that prevented the moisture buildup that made underground rooms feel like morgues. And while there were more seals on the walls that forcibly ejected natural energy and environmental chakra to provide a clean, stable space for dangerous procedures, it wasn’t a hostile sort of emptiness. Not feeling chakra against my skin just let me focus more on what was inside of me.

Actually, that was the entire reason I was sitting in my underwear in this magical clean room, with Tsunade, Rin, Kushina, and an assortment of medic-nin from various clans all arrayed around me. While each person in the room carried their own chakra signature, they had too much control to allow it to leak into the air and ruin anyone else’s readings.

“Channel chakra toward your left arm again,” Tsunade ordered, and the skin on my shoulder blade pricked as she channeled her chakra to monitor mine. “Hikaru, watch.”

The Hyūga medic activated his Byakugan with three quick hand signs, nodding as the veins around his eyes bulged.

“Monitoring,” murmured the Aburame medic, who had three kikai insects on the curve of my shoulder. “Tsunade-sama, the tenketsu are still inactive.”

“Same here. The chakra flow just stops after the joint,” the Hyūga observed, frowning.

“I can feel that,” I muttered.

It wasn’t that I had a block stuck in my chakra coils—which Hikaru had pointed out immediately after being called in—but more that whatever chakra I had simply couldn’t move past the wrecked tenketsu. What I used ended up being frittered away uselessly, like a broken fire hydrant or something. I just wasted chakra.

Tsunade, with her hand still on my back, said, “Rin, take over here. Hikaru, focus on the arm past the joint.”

As people shuffled around and I sat with one arm pulled out and being poked by medics, there wasn’t really much for me to do other than obey orders and talk to Isobu.

Should I have apologized for the damage? Isobu asked, since there was only so much else that came to mind.

No, I think the blame for that is on me, and on Orochimaru, and maybe partly on Yagura. Sure, we knew something bad was going to happen, but it wasn’t your fault that we got chased into a corner. I sighed internally.

Speaking of that human, Isobu murmured after a moment, what do you think happened to the forces behind him?

What, like political force or whichever shinobi supported Yagura? Or do you mean Orochimaru? I asked.

Both.

I guess we could ask Sensei for any reports on other villages, I offered, as Rin moved my arm back and forth so Hikaru could get a better view.

That may work. Then Isobu sighed. Though it was in a good cause, I am sorry for hurting you.

Given that it was my idea, it felt a bit overdone. But since we’d gone round and round on this exact topic several different times whenever it came up, I was probably better-served spending my energies elsewhere.

Like on seeing if the damage to my arm was completely hopeless.

Rin pinched the underside of my wrist. “Kei, pay attention.”

Ow. “Okay.” I blinked rapidly, trying to concentrate again. “What am I supposed to be paying attention to?”

“What does it feel like if I do this?” Hikaru asked, as his fingertips seemed to glow with chakra in my mind’s eye.

Under my suspicious gaze, he drew his fingers slowly down the length of my arm. While goosebumps sprang up wherever they hadn’t already, I couldn’t be sure what sort of effect he was going for.

“Well, I didn’t lose feeling in my arm, if that’s what you’re asking,” I said, shrugging with my right shoulder. When in doubt, sarcasm.

Rin flicked my ear. “That’s not being helpful, Kei.”

“But it’s true,” I protested. To Hikaru, I explained, “Really, though, I’m not feeling anything unusual. What should have happened?”

“I would have expected a tingling sensation,” Hikaru said, as his Byakugan went inactive again. “Tsunade-sama, direct stimulation of the chakra coils was unsuccessful. I’m not certain what other therapies are available.”

Tsunade muttered something under her breath. A crease appeared on her forehead, just below the Strength of a Hundred Seal, and she rubbed at it in annoyance. “Somehow, it’s not surprising that this case is full of complications. There must be some kind of curse on everyone associated with the Hokage’s hat…”

The Aburame called her kikai insects back, and they flew up toward her raised hand.

Tsunade went on, “So, do you want the good news or the bad news first?”

I studied her face carefully, keeping an eye out for any sign of a developing tic. Whatever happened, I was probably going to make it worse. “Good news?”

“Your arm is functional despite the lack of chakra, which honestly would have killed most people’s limbs dead,” Tsunade said, her eyes drilling into mine. When I didn’t react, she went on, “If you’re careful, you could continue to function as a field shinobi as long as you kept your left arm bound. It’s always going to be weaker than your right, and not just in the ‘I’m right-handed’ way.”

I nodded along, since that sounded more or less exactly like what I’d experienced. I could still, say, do a back handspring on my left arm, but I had neither the strike force nor the endurance I’d taken for granted before. Using both arms left me dangerously unbalanced in most of the demanding physical tasks of a shinobi lifestyle, which was a liability. If my right hand could use the Rasengan, Isobu’s chakra, and my explosive seals, my left was effectively dead weight in the kinds of fights I kept getting into. If I retired from being a ninja, I’d probably never experience any real problems, unlike someone with nerve damage.

Which would have been acceptable if I had any intention whatsoever of retiring. As far as I was concerned, it was not an option. Not being a shinobi meant not being a Hokage Guard, or being a jōnin-sensei, or being able to help my friends in the field. It also made me a pretty lousy superweapon.

“It’s not an optimal solution,” Tsunade admitted, “but I won’t order you to retire. If you play it safe, you could have a long and successful career ahead of you.”

But still, Tsunade didn’t smile. In fact, the crease between her brows got more pronounced. “At the same time, I think we both know you’re going to run into half-a-dozen disasters the first time you so much as sneeze outside of the village.”

...Well, she wasn’t wrong. At first, missions would be cakewalks. And then, just when I was feeling complacent, Orochimaru.

Or something. He was just the most recent example.

“And the bad news?” I prompted, once Tsunade’s words had percolated in my brain for a while.

The medics all looked at each other, but Tsunade just poked me in the forehead and said bluntly, “Your tenketsu are completely destroyed. Irrecoverable. Nonexistent. And because of that, all of the chakra coils centered in your left arm, and the tenketsu linked to them, are badly atrophied. Also irrecoverable. Furthermore, using Tailed Beast chakra to overcome this kind of injury is likely to destroy your arm entirely. It doesn’t have any chakra to channel and take the brunt of exposure.”

And lo, did the other shoe drop with a vengeance.

A lump of lead formed in my gut, but not as heavy as I would have expected. I’d already figured, between the weakness and the lack of chakra response from my left arm, that something had gone clunk and there wasn’t any coming back from it. I’d had a few months to get used to that fact, even if no one had put it into words.

It wasn’t so much as a revelation as a confirmation of what I already suspected.
“There’s still some hope for Kushina’s suggestion, but medically speaking, you’re beyond conventional means.” Tsunade shook her head. “So, no, there’s no special therapy we can use to ease tenketsu back into existence. I’m sorry.”

Well, if I was beyond conventional means… “What about a replacement or transplant?”

Tsunade’s eyes narrowed. By now, she’d had all too much experience with the weirdness that followed Team Minato around like a bad smell, and knew that I was the one who actually voiced the nonstandard ideas. “What…kind of replacement?”

I’d hate to disappoint her. “Oh, we could amputate my left arm and track down a Zetsu to replace it with. Obito has one, so it’s like we’d be twins! After surgery, anyway.”

For a long moment, no one said anything. Rin, with exaggerated slowness, covered her face with both hands and let out a long-suffering sigh, while the Aburame’s expression was indecipherable, and Hikaru just looked confused.

Then Tsunade rubbed her forehead, grumbling, “That is a stupid idea, and I’d hit you for it if you weren’t my patient. I don’t think I have to tell you all the reasons that shouldn’t have worked in the first place, or even answer that seriously.”

I shrugged, fighting down a nervous grin. “I have to laugh somehow.”

“Very funny,” said Tsunade, and got to her feet. “Well, all that’s left is to map the empty chakra coils.”

Wait. “What?”

Tsunade raised one slender eyebrow at me. “You didn’t think I’d work with Kushina on a tenketsu replacement system without gathering all the data I can, did you?”

“That will take hours, Tsunade-sama,” Hikaru said, but carefully kept the whine out of his voice.

“Then we’d better get started, shouldn’t we?”

Long story short: I was stuck in there for two hours while the medics traced out every dead tenketsu point they could find, and copied everything onto some kind of ultra-complex chart that made my eyes cross when I tried to understand it.

I had no doubt the process would be helpful for future reference, but aside from the tickling brushes they used, I spent the rest of mid-morning thoroughly bored.

After a morning wherein I got enough ink on my arm to look like I’d tripped into a tar pit, and had to painstakingly scrub all of it off afterward, I was also tasked with taking the medics’ report to Sensei when I reported in for my afternoon shift. There were ways to send things ahead, but apparently the fact that I was heading there anyway meant that I was automatically a courier.

The walk from the hospital to the administration center was pretty short to start with, and only got shorter once rooftop shinobi-only paths were taken into account. Since my left arm was the problematic limb, I didn’t have any trouble making it to Sensei’s office window within about two minutes.

I knocked on the glass, to be polite.
Sensei snapped his fingers, without looking up, and the glass stopped giving off the kind of chakra that indicated that trespassers would not just be shown the door, but arrive at said door in the form of ground hamburger.

When Sensei decided to stop playing around, his seal-work could be amazingly vindictive. It was really the little things that counted—and made my job pretty superfluous.

I slid the window open and hopped inside, still carrying the medical folder under my left arm. “Hi, Sensei.”

“Morning, Kei.” He paused. “Or is it afternoon?”

“You’re the one with a clock in the office,” I said automatically, shrugging. Walking around the desk to the front, I dropped the folder next to his inkpad. “Report from Tsunade.”

“What is it about?” Sensei asked, finally looking up after signing one last document of some sort.

I shrugged. “The usual. My arm’s a wreck, I can’t use Isobu’s chakra with it, and we’re working on a workaround that might not work.”

“...Did you use ‘work’ enough times in that sentence?” Sensei asked, quirking one eyebrow up as he looked at me over the top of the medical paperwork.

“Okay, so it doesn’t work, and work is going to be hell if I work in the field.”

Sensei gave me a flat stare.

I know someone else I can annoy with wordplay! I’d probably lay off of Obito, though.

Oh, this will be entertaining.

“And just after you’ve confirmed that you want to be a jōnin...” Sensei sighed as he read the rest of the report. “Rotten timing.”

“I still want the rank, but if I can’t be deployed... Well, maybe this won’t work.” At Sensei’s suspicious look, I said guilelessly, “It’ll be a problem.”

“Does Tsunade say anywhere that you can’t go on missions, or is this just your impression?” Sensei asked, dismissing whatever thought had come to mind. Probably about me being deliberately annoying. “Because her recommendation is that you just keep your arm out of the way.”

“Yeah, but how many A- or S-rank missions really allow that kind of handicap?”

Sensei closed the folder and met my eyes. “The short answer”—is that I couldn’t—“is that you won’t be taking any. I believe I owe you a string of C-ranks and D-ranks from before this incident, don’t I?”

Oh.

“Well, yeah, but—” A jōnin who couldn’t take jōnin missions was a bit of a waste of a promotion slot. I tried again, “Are you sure this is the right decision?”

Technically, I didn’t need to take missions for financial reasons. The main reason I took missions came down to defeating boredom, challenging myself, or maybe escorting a genin team with a sensei on medical leave. But I wanted my own genin team, too, and that did require a higher rank...
Oh, this waffling was all pointless. I was going to be a jōnin. Second-guessing myself over and over again was an exercise in frustration.

And while I wrestled my brain into some kind of order, Sensei continued watching me. Then, “I think you already know the answer to that question, Kei. You made the decision two days ago.”

I nodded. To be honest, as soon as I’d realized how badly Kaito needed me, I’d known there was no turning back. Not with Kaito, not with Aiko, and not with Roku.

“Speaking of big decisions,” Sensei said, while I stood there and stewed, “I had something to tell you.”

“Oh?”

“The new Fourth Mizukage is a woman named Mei Terumi,” Sensei told me, and shuffled a few papers on his overcrowded desk until a letter fell out.

Well, that name was sure familiar. I had to wonder how having a double-kekkei genkai user like that woman would change the course of Kirigakure’s history. Any persecution of people with special bloodlines would seem massively hypocritical if it came from the top, and she’d probably crack down on anything similar among her civilian population.

But wasn’t she my age? Hell, most of the S-class Kirigakure ninja were…

“She’s declared Yagura a missing-nin, retroactively, along with all of his co-conspirators.” Catching the look on my face, which could best be described as “skeptical” with a whole load of grudging approval on top, Sensei explained, “She also extends her personal thanks to you for putting down a madman who fell so far. While the new Mizukage and Yagura were allies in the Kiri Rebellion, it seems that they had a falling-out.”

I rolled my eyes. “And if Yagura’s plan had worked, I’d bet she’d be singing a different tune.”

“But as a politician, she takes the cards dealt to her,” Sensei said, eyeing me again for the ‘work’ I had worked into my response. “And she’s generously promised to give up claims to the Three-Tailed Beast, and stop operations aimed at recovering him from you.”

Which mostly meant that she’d stop openly attempting to murder me to get Isobu back, with shinobi she couldn’t afford to lose. I had no doubt whatsoever that Kirigakure’s ANBU were still going to be deadly foes from now on.

“I hope you don’t take offense but...I mostly trust politicians about as far as I can throw them,” I said. “With my left arm.”

“Then you’re ahead of the game,” Sensei admitted, tilting his head to one side.

“You, I could probably throw with my right arm.” Which still didn’t amount to that much—I’d never really been the type to go all Tsunade and punch people into the lower stratosphere.

...Or the lithosphere.

Sensei smiled ruefully. “That’s more charitable than I have any right to expect.”

“You’ve still got some work to do,” I said, looking away and toward a perfectly boring part of the office’s wall.
“...Did you just stick the word ‘work’ in that sentence just because?”

“Maybe! What I said is true, though,” I said, directing a quick smile back to Sensei so I could show him I was teasing him a bit.

By the time I did so, Sensei had already started on paperwork again. Because of course he would do that. While reading something or other, Sensei looked up for a moment and said, “By the way, Kushina wants to know what kind of cake you want.”

Eh? “Why?”

“She wants to make sure you have fun with your jōnin promotion party,” Sensei said with a bright grin, clapping his hands together. “As soon as Kakashi gets back to the village, we’re moving forward on that!”

_Oh, no._

Kakashi coming home would be a great thing, since he’d be safe at home with us, and I’d get to hear how the Land of Snow stuff had went. Team Minato would be back together, in full, for the first time in a long time.

But I really didn’t want people to blow this promotion business out of proportion. “Um, how many people are we inviting?”

Sensei grinned. “Everyone.”

_Meep._

“But in the meantime, I need to ask you to do something that’s a lot less fun.” Sensei’s expression was a bit solemn, so I snapped back to attention. “Downstairs, there’s still some lingering damage from the incident the other day. Can you help the Academy sort out its water damage problem?”

I knew less than nothing about how to deal with flood damage that wasn’t actually flood damage to a building like the Academy. But I could sort of tell when Sensei just wanted me to keep busy, or tackle a new problem simply because he thought I wasn’t pushing myself.

And he was right. A mundane challenge for a mundane day, but it was probably more productive than “guarding” someone who rigged his office windows to kill intruders. At least for today, when there was nothing to talk about.

“I...I guess I can get rid of the remaining water?” Environmental water concentrations had always been a part of my bigger jutsu, so I could probably rip the remaining liquid out of the walls. It wouldn’t undo the damage, but mold would be less of an issue.

“Thank you. Please assist the crew down there.” And then I was summarily waved off.

Once I was outside of Sensei’s office, through the door this time, I cracked my knuckles on both hands and headed downstairs to get to work.

True to Sensei’s word, Kakashi’s arrival heralded the coming of the Party.

It was more sedate than all that, though.

Unlike the welcome back party that had kinda, um, heralded a long-overdue emotional breakdown, this one took place in bright daylight, and included considerably higher numbers of ankle-biters.
“So you did adopt them,” Kakashi said, from his vantage point under a nearby tree.

Given that Kaito was running around in my jacket from the Academy incident around his skinny shoulders, I decided I didn’t have much of an argument against that point and preemptively dropped it. In general, I kind of wanted to argue with him about any topic that came to mind, but that was more a manifestation of my low-grade irritation at not being told what his mission to the Land of Snow had been about.

I could guess of course—there had only ever been one mention of the Land of Snow in the old universe—but I had to wonder what might have changed. Since Sorayama, I’d noticed that Kakashi’s chakra had gotten stronger—or maybe deeper? He seemed to have more energy for the Sharingan-based shenanigans that his counterpart had, to say the least, lacked. That could make a difference in any mission he took from now on, but I didn’t really have the clearance to go digging into ANBU mission records.

If I could justify it based on future visit crises, maybe I could weasel something out of Sensei, but the spirit of our agreement had only covered information related to me. And frankly, I could probably live without knowing If, when, or how Kakashi had rescued a princess.

For a while, anyway.

I leaned back against the same tree, and decided to do a bit of people-watching.

We’d actually taken over Training Ground Three, setting up several large picnic blankets with a wide selection of food. Some of them sat on powerful heating seals to keep everything warm, while a container of ice cream had chilling seals worked onto the carton to keep it from melting. There were enough empty spots for all of the guests as they trickled in.

It seemed like Kushina and Sensei were trying to make up for disaster four months ago.

Off on the nearest blanket, the children plotted. I wasn’t sure if any of them really thought about how suspicious it looked when seven kids put their heads together like that.

Well, Kaito, Roku, Aiko, Sasuke, and Naruto did. Tatsumaki seemed to be occupied with messily devouring a popsicle, getting a cherry-red face out of the deal, sitting in Itachi’s lap.

“Naruto-kun, go around the tree that way,” Roku was saying, making a circle in midair with his left hand. “Then jump on Gai-san.”

“And when you do that, we’ll get him,” Aiko said with a grin that was probably about as evil as she could manage. She was holding a red bean bun out to Naruto, who immediately ripped it in half and stuffed his part in his mouth.

The other one, Naruto handed to Sasuke. True to form, the other three-year-old ate it somewhat slower than his friend.

Bribery at its finest.

“Isn’t Gai-san a jōnin?” Itachi asked, bouncing Tatsumaki up and down patiently.

“We got him before,” Kaito said, flapping one sleeve-covered arm at Itachi to chase that concern away. “We can do it again!”

It was a lot more ambition than I’d heard out of Kaito in a long time.
And better yet, Gai was still talking to Genma and hadn’t seemed to notice the nefarious munchkins at all. Sitting with his back against Genma’s, Raidō made small talk to Ebisu, who was pausing every few seconds to watch the kids.

Well, at least someone knew the dangers of letting shinobi children go unsupervised.

“Ebisu-san helped us last time,” Roku admitted, catching the special jōnin’s eye for just a moment. He waved. “But I think we can do this.”

“Do you need me to help?” Itachi wanted to know.

Roku, Aiko, and Kaito looked at each other, then at Itachi. Then Roku asked, “Are you a genin?”

“Yes,” Itachi said blankly.

“Then we need your help to capture Gai-san,” Roku said, nodding to himself. “You can be the distraction.”

With that, all seven of the kids trooped off into the underbrush—though Tatsumaki needed a bit of help, and Itachi therefore carried her.

It was a little like seeing a pack of wolves plot to bring down a bison. The whole of the group was more dangerous than the mere sum of their parts.

As we watched them go, Kakashi said finally, “Those kids are going to be terrifying when they get older.”

“Probably,” I agreed.

For a moment, all either of us did was stretch out in total contentment as the sun shone down on the training fields. Sure, Kakashi and I were in the shade, but it was a lazy kind of day.

But before Kakashi could fall asleep, he cracked his normal eye open and said, “I never did give you your jōnin gift, did I?”

“The book? It’s fine, Kakashi. I liked the armband better, actually.” Seeing as I was wearing it and all. With a smile on my face, I swept my arm from left to right, to indicate the training ground and all of its occupants. “All we’re doing here is using the promotion thing to have an excuse to get together.”

Kakashi nodded. It was certainly why he was there—aside from free food.

On the blanket farthest away from our tree, Kushina and Sensei chatted with Fugaku and Mikoto, while Tsunade lounged nearby and was probably getting drunk.

Yamato, meanwhile, had grown a miniature maple over her head to shade her from the impact of her inevitable hangover, and prodded Hayate’s hand aside so he could get access to the walnut pastries someone had brought along. My brother didn’t snap, instead scooting to one side and continuing his conversation with Iruka.

Yūgao, with encouragement from Rin, had a river fish on a plate in front of her and sent little sparks of her chakra into it. While the fish test was one of those medic-nin tests that could technically be performed anywhere, I’d never seen Rin try to get Yūgao to try it out.

I trained my hearing in their direction, curious.
Yamato wandered over to their group with the walnut pastry in hand, peering at the fish as Yūgao poked it again. “Have you tried channeling Water-aligned chakra first?”

“No, I...wait, I thought you did Earth chakra most of the time, Yamato-kun,” Yūgao said, blinking. Under her hand, the fish flopped feebly.

“It...doesn’t work very well for fish,” Yamato said, scratching the base of his ponytail.

“You shouldn’t be helping Yūgao-chan cheat on the fish test, Yamato-kun,” Rin said. “Otherwise it’s not really a test.”

“...Okay,” I said to Kakashi, “I know I’ve been out of the loop for a while, but Yamato is a medic, right?”

Yep,” he said, from behind a small blue book titled One Hundred and One Even Worse Jokes. “He got certified eight months ago. I’m surprised you didn’t notice.”

Well, that hadn’t been a thing in the old timeline. Tsunade’s influence was definitely pervasive.

But had Yūgao been a medic? I couldn’t remember.

As we watched, Yamato and Yūgao continued talking about the relative merits of chakra elements in medical ninjutsu—not really my field—and Rin stealthily got out of their way. With a skip in her step, she headed our way.

Rin sat down on an upraised root, next to my vantage point. “Enjoying the party?” she asked us.

“Since there’s no dancing, yes,” Kakashi said, without looking up from his book.

“Have you seen Obito?” I asked, while Rin gave Kakashi a frown for being a party pooper.

“Obito, um, might still be trying to get something,” Rin said somewhat sheepishly.

I blinked. “...What in the world is he trying to get?”

“That’s kind of a secret, Kei,” Rin said, putting a finger to her lips. “And you didn’t hear anything from me.”

Well, drat. I reoriented on a slightly easier target. “Kakashi, do you know?”

“Nope,” he said, without looking up from his book.

Double drat.

And at that exact moment, two things happened at once: the Obito’s chakra signature finally poofed into the clearing to Rin’s immediate left, thanks to the Body Flicker jutsu, and five smaller chakra signatures geared up for a pounce.

The smoke cleared just in time for us to witness five children dogpile Gai, with Itachi and Tatsumaki trailing cheerfully behind as though they were hyenas. Strategy had clearly gone out the window.

“I feel like I missed something,” Obito said, tossing the little package to me. “Why are all the kids —?”

Gai surged to his feet, with at least one child clinging to each of his limbs. Kaito and Aiko hung from each of his biceps like he was some kind of bright green jungle gym, while Sasuke and Naruto had each grabbed one of his orange legwarmers—and Naruto used his teeth to get a better grip. Roku was slung over Gai’s back, and had the jōnin in a headlock that was probably about as effective as one of those U-shaped travel pillows.

Though he had managed to knock Itachi—with Tatsumaki attached to his face—into Genma, who was promptly squashed by them because Team Chōza was always good for comedic improv.

“I have been attacked by devious foes!” Gai shouted, hopping from foot to foot—careful not to harm either of the future members of Team Seven. “Go on without me, comrades! The power of Youth will prevail alone!”

From under his own pile of kids, Genma waved Gai off.

Gai charged off, with children still suspended from every limb, shouting cheerfully, and left surprised laughter in his wake.

It was...nostalgic?

Every now and again, even after things became normal again, I’d be struck by the sense that I was catching up on things I had missed. Like life had gone on without me.

And it had, but I was catching up anyway.

Obito and I both sat down under the tree with Rin and Kakashi, giving all of us a chance to just enjoy each other’s company. Well, the four of us plus one weird package.

“So, what’s that supposed to be?” I asked, while Obito and Rin knit their hands together. Obito’s left hand to Rin’s right.

“Go ahead and open it,” Obito said, and I ripped the paper wide open.

A thin sheaf of paper, composed of fifty or more white squares packed into a sort of notepad, all bound on one side. I didn’t want to rip a sheet off and “...Is this chakra testing paper?”

Obito grinned. “Since you said that you were taking on students, I figured you’d want to know what their chakra natures were!”

“As soon as they get back over here, yeah,” I said, though I had an inkling of what Kaito’s would be. He’d probably need a couple of sheets just to be sure. “Though it might be too early for them to even channel chakra into their hands, Obito.”

“Lucky that the paper doesn’t get old, then.” Obito shrugged and got to his feet. “I’m going to get something to eat. Want me to bring you anything?”

It turned out that answer was not only “yes,” but also “screw it, let’s all get something.” And in typical teenager fashion, we kinda gorged ourselves on whatever tasty things we got our hands on.

What? We were all still kids.

Sort of.

It turned out that even though I could feel Kaito’s Lightning nature, he didn’t have enough conscious control of his chakra to use the paper test that would have confirmed it. He also lacked true control over his Wind and Water natures, but since they made up his Ice Release bloodline, he could kinda manifest both of them without much practice.
A floating blob of water was a long way from the Water Dragon Bullet, but I certainly hadn’t shown half as much inclination toward elemental ninjutsu at his age. Especially not with a fish trapped in it, swimming in sad little circles because Kaito’s water globe was only about the size of a goldfish bowl. For a thirty-centimeter ornamental koi, it was the essence of suffering.

“Kaito-kun, you can put the fish back now,” I said, as the koi made the saddest fish face there ever was. “I think it misses its friends.”

Kaito nodded, then lowered the water bubble thingy back toward the surface of Raiden’s koi pond. To his credit, by the time he lost control, the fish was in safe dropping distance.

The frightened koi swam off, waggling its white tail at us in terror.

Aiko and Roku clapped like spectators at a golf tournament.

“Perhaps you should try for ducks next time?” Raiden asked, still looking a bit shell-shocked. Sure, he lived in a ninja village, but it was nearly his first time seeing shinobi training in action.

Technically, we hadn’t even really been doing that. Kaito’s affinity for water was something I couldn’t actually match without using ninjutsu, while he just seemed to know how to move small amounts of water by instinct.

“Can you imagine what that would look like?” Chihiro mused aloud, as the kids focused on her. “Imagine a poor little duck, trying to stay on top of a floating ball of water!”

“We could show the babies that!” Aiko said, tugging on Kaito’s sleeve. “Can’t we?”

“Maybe after some practice?” Roku suggested, while Kaito started to turn red.

Kaito ducked his head and mumbled, “M-maybe…”

Since the Academy incident two weeks ago, Kaito was still working on coming out of his shell. This was only my second time at the Koizumi household, and already I was seeing more interest from the Koizumi couple and more engagement from the kids than I had honestly expected to see.

That is your unjustified paranoia talking.

Maybe.

Making snap judgments based on outdated information had always been one of those insidious side effects to foreknowledge, and I couldn’t even say that I generally fought it. I just...never had a reason to, unless I knew someone really well.

And Raiden and his family, unfortunately, had never really been on that list.

“Keisuke-san, may I speak to you for a moment?” Chihiro asked, while the kids devolved into cheerful play-wrestling—as always, Roku versus the other two.

“Sure,” I said, getting up.

As the blonde woman struggled to her feet, Raiden and I each took hold of one of her hands—Raiden allowed her to use him as a kind of cane, while I was more of a hand railing. I hadn’t really thought about all the crap that pregnant women had to deal with since Kushina had been carrying Tatsumaki, but this was a sharp reminder.

I followed Chihiro to the kitchen, drifting along like I always had, I could feel her chakra start to buzz with tension. Crackle, maybe? She was a civilian, so her chakra certainly wasn’t strong, but I could feel just enough to tell that she was as much Fire as Obito was. Land of Fire, born and bred.

And also a bit agitated.

“Take a seat, please,” she said, and we both sat down at the kitchen table.

I did the mental equivalent of spinning my wheels until they screeched while I waited for Chihiro to say what was on her mind.

I was starting to see mental rubber burning by the time she did.

“Keisuke-san, are you—I know you’re a jōnin now,” Chihiro said carefully, and I blinked, confusion mounting as I continued to read her chakra. She was afraid of me? “When the children grow up, I need to know what kinds of—of situations you’ll expect them to be in.”

Civilian.

...Whoops.

“Like what kind?” Grasping at straws, I said, “All shinobi are combat-trained, but...well, most people don’t get into the kinds of fights I did. Ever. And if they do get in over their heads, well, that’s what a jōnin-sensei is for. And that won’t be at least for a few more years.”

And whenever I was nervous, or uncertain, there were two paths before me in a narrow wood.

I picked the one that let me talk the most.

“I—no, what I meant is…” Chihiro bit the inside of her cheek and said, “You’ll be training these children to kill, won’t you?”

...Oh.

You are a weapon, and aren’t. You’re a warrior who clings to peace. Isobu’s grumble seemed to rattle my mental landscape. The world is not simple. This is not simple, and never will be. Make her understand.

I wasn’t sure if I could. How did I approach this?

“No.” I hadn’t learned to kill from Sensei. I’d learned all the techniques I needed from Mom, and she’d talked it out with me afterward.

Chihiro blinked.

“What Konoha teaches is different from other villages,” I explained, folding my arms on the tabletop. “What we teach, first and foremost, is that our strength is there to protect others.”

I thought of Obito who, in a split second, had made the choice to make sure Kakashi and I would go home, with or without him. “We fight—and yes, sometimes kill—because we want to protect our friends, our families, and our villages, and to come home safe to them.”

It’s the part when that urge to protect is cut off that you need to worry about. I didn’t know the details of what had happened to the Uesugi clan, but Mom’s rampage had been complete. And yet, she’d still come to Konoha, and everyone must have found her values suited us just fine. Otherwise, they would never have made her a special jōnin, even for a short time.
Though, of course, there were serious downsides. “Sometimes that means someone ends up dead, but it’s not the goal.” Generally. And that was a little hit-or-miss.

And that didn’t get into ANBU’s existence. Konoha could be a big fat bunch of hypocrites when it came to the moral high ground, insofar as it even existed between shinobi villages.

I needed to get back to the point.

“Kaito told all of us not that long ago that he wants to protect himself by growing stronger,” I said, resting my chin against my upraised palm.

Chihiro nodded along. So she had heard about that part. “But it just seems so...cold.”

“He’s young now, but he’ll learn over time that strength isn’t the key,” I reassured her. “It’s love, and camaraderie, and the bonds that tie all of us together.” Actually… “It might not feel like it, sometimes, but I think these kids have a better idea of what that means than some adults do. And they seem to like you a lot already, even after everything they’ve been through.”

“I just…Keisuke-san, I worry about them and for them.” Chihiro shook her head. “You can’t convince me that everything is going to be safe. Or that being a shinobi means they’ll have peaceful lives, never having to kill.”

“Koizumi-san, I can’t even guarantee that for me, and I’m a lot older than any of them.” How should I put this? “But there is something else to consider—all of the children you see now are growing up in a peaceful era.”

To be perfectly honest, they’d said that after the Second Shinobi World War, too. And it’d only lasted nine years or so until the Third Shinobi World War started up where we’d left off. Dad’s death happened at the beginning of it, and Mom’s was at the very tail end, not long into the era of supposed peace.

Maybe we could pull off a full decade of peace this time.

“And, finally...well, there’s no guarantee they’ll even pass the Academy’s final exam.” Technically.

“What if they do, and decide not to become shinobi?” Chihiro asked.

“Then they can retire,” I said. Satoshi had, instead of being assigned to the Genin Corps. But then, Yamaguchi-sensei had failed his entire team, so it wasn’t like he was getting back into the apprentice system after that. “I just worry that they won’t learn to control their power otherwise.”

Chihiro gave me such a long stare that I felt almost like she was trying to invoke motherhood-derived guilt-tripping powers.

“Even if none of them decide to become shinobi, I can at least help them feel safe in their own skins,” I told Chihiro, meeting her eyes squarely. “That’s a promise.”

After another painfully long moment, Chihiro nodded to me and said, “I’m glad we had this talk, Keisuke-san.”

Given that I’d done nearly all of the talking, I couldn’t be sure I felt the same. But her chakra had evened out and the sense of pervasive fear I’d gotten from her wasn’t focused on me anymore. It settled into the background, into a somewhat healthier form.

But perhaps I needed to offer a better olive branch. I’d never given particular thought to civilians before, either, except in the context of if someone was going to run away screaming if I walked down their street. My social circle was almost entirely made of people who could kill with a toothpick. But starting to bridge the gap needed to happen somewhere, and it was as good a time as any to try.

So, I told Chihiro, “If you want, you can watch while I teach them. I know it’s only once a week, but it could give you more insight into what they learn at the Academy, too.”

“I’d like that,” Chihiro said, and smiled.

The next thing I was going to teach the kids involved reaching for their chakra, which wasn’t terribly interesting, but I could run them through some of the basic katas I’d learned from Mom as soon as they got bored with that. Again, not exciting, but Chihiro could probably at least guide them through those after I left.

Predictably, the kids got bored with the leaf exercise.

Kaito could use Water Release to a degree that would have been astonishing if I hadn’t known about Haku. The exercise was, to be blunt, just not advanced enough for him. So I had Raiden draw all of the koi off to one end of the pond with food, and asked Kaito try the very basics of water walking. Aside from my brother, I’d never seen another six-year-old set his jaw with such a determined expression, even after the initial, inevitable failure.

I let him get on with it, then focused on the other two.

I was pretty certain I’d felt a metallic warping noise (not unlike someone hitting steel cable under tension with a hammer) from Roku’s direction, but his eyelids were their normal light brown by the time I looked. Unlike Kaito, Roku hadn’t had access to anyone with his apparent bloodline limit, and there was no obvious elemental crossover with Magnet Release. I made a mental note to get him iron filings to practice with.

Aiko simply hadn’t had any luck with her chakra—which might have been related to the mirrored seals on her shoulder blades—but outpaced the other two when it came to physical exercises. She seemed to be the sort of student who learned physically, so I made a second mental note to ask Gai for tips on how to teach taijutsu to a newbie.

Pigs would fly on the day when Gai found someone he couldn’t help improve in that area.

“None of this is supposed to hurt,” I told the kids, when they lined up in front of me about fifteen minutes later. Aside from Kaito’s pants being soaked up to the knees (along with the over-long jacket sleeves), none of them were worse for wear. “If any of these exercises hurt, or wear you out, then you need to stop right away and contact me. At this point, you should still be working on your Academy assignments. This is like, um, extra credit.”

“But we’ll be here to help,” Chihiro spoke up, as I trailed off with that somewhat weak ending. “You three can come to us with anything.”

“Even after the babies are here?” Aiko asked, her gray eyes huge as they focused on the gentle bump of Chihiro’s stomach.

“Yes, Aiko-chan. You can trust us,” Chihiro said, and Raiden took her hand in his.

Roku frowned, bringing his curled fingers to rest over his mouth as he thought. Then, “Really?”

“Really,” Raiden affirmed. While he didn’t have a ton of chakra, I could almost feel him reaching out for the kids in a way that reminded me a bit of how Sensei had for me, once. There was a way of just making a small space feel like home, through force of will.

I felt abruptly like the elephant in the room. Maybe I should leave, if the kids are sorting out their family...problems? This touchy-feely business was kinda my thing, but not with the Koizumi family. I didn’t exactly know Raiden or Chihiro that well.

“Kei-sensei too?” Kaito asked, jolting me out of my thoughts.

One-track mind on that one.

Since everyone’s eyes were on me, I knelt down to eye level with the kids and said, “As long as you need me, I’ll be here.”

There were some hugs after that, mostly on the part of the children, but I nonetheless left the Koizumi household a little more optimistic. The kids would be all right.

Shortly after I turned eighteen in early July, I met my brother at Training Field Twenty-Two.

(Also known as the training ground that had been the stage of the tree-thumb war between then-Tenzō and Obito. The tree was still there.)

The previous three months, since picking up a gaggle of not-yet-genin apprentices and figuring out the secret to preventing mold buildup, had been busy to say the least, but not in a way that demanded a crisis response.

On Saturday afternoons, I caught up with my trio of dragonlings and helped them sort through the events of the previous week, updated their exercises, and offered assistance on Academy homework where appropriate. All three of them made strides over time, but Kaito in particular seemed calmer, more focused. Like not everything was a battle. Couple that with their recent announcement that they’d made actual friends, and I knew they were on the right path.

The genjutsu development group continued to meet whenever we had time, though Itachi had missions with his genin team more often than not. It was weird to think that within three years, Naruto and Sasuke would be Academy students and on their way to becoming shinobi in their own right, even with the changing curriculum and the slower route the Nara clan administrators had chosen.

I visited the hospital at least once per two weeks for checkups, with Tsunade tutting over my arm and its continued total lack of improvement, and sat through more tests as time went on. Determining the extent of the problem was easier than determining a solution. If there was one.

And I worked with Sensei, here and there and so forth, though I knew that it wasn’t really the point of the whole venture. I spent time with Naruto, and Tatsumaki, and with Kushina as she continued to puzzle over the persistent tenketsu problem I still had. There had to be workarounds, somehow, but they hadn’t been invented yet and we only had a starting point and scraps of time to devote to the problem.

So time slipped onward.

And before I knew it, I was eighteen and going stir-crazy again.

It wasn’t like I hadn’t sparred with people over the past three months, though perhaps against orders from Rin. I’d just been careful to avoid my left arm, and told people straight-up that jutsu were going to behave...unpredictably. I was still trying to relearn my entire arsenal based on one-handed seals, after all.

Even if I hadn’t truly used hand seals in years, most of my workarounds involved manipulating my chakra in the same way throughout my entire body. With my left arm removed from the equation, spiritually speaking, I had to build everything from the ground up again.

So, when I inevitably built up enough frustration at that weakness that I could feel it pounding behind my eyeballs, I went back to my roots.

Kenjutsu.

While I hadn’t been using my katana as my primary weapon for a while—thanks mostly to my dependence on Isobu’s chakra—there was something therapeutic about the familiar motions. While it was self-aggrandizing hyperbole to say that the blade and I were one, the katas I remembered flowed nearly as fluidly as I remembered.

Here, in this place and time, I knew exactly who I was. I knew where I was. I didn’t have to think about the future, only about the movements.

But sparring with the air was only going to get me so far. Since my kenjutsu relied on my dominant right arm so much more than the left, where my entire ninjutsu arsenal depended on a balance of both I hadn’t gotten back, I was able and willing to take on a sparring partner in this theater.

And my brother had volunteered as soon as I mentioned it.

“Are you sure you’re ready to do this?” Hayate asked, holding his katana loosely from one hand. “You’re still recovering and…”

I lifted mine into the guard position, eyes narrowed and feeling patience bleed out of me. I would not be coddled in this. Not when half of my justification for special jōnin rank had rested on kenjutsu skill. Maybe the glare I was giving him was what was making him trail off.

“Hayate, I’ve been practicing kenjutsu for almost as long as you’ve been alive,” I said in a tone that was not terribly patient, “and I know how to do this. Injury or not, don’t hold back.”

Famous last words, really. I’d be holding back one way or another, but I did want to see what Hayate was capable of. As long as I didn’t try to duel him with my right arm tied behind my back, though, I’d probably be fine.

Hayate nodded, grasping the handle of his katana with both hands. Oh, he was taking me seriously.

Good.

“First blood?” Hayate asked, even as he started to circle for a better position.

“And no nin- or genjutsu.” Plus the standard bag of ninja tricks—even without ninjutsu or genjutsu, the strength and speed bonuses we got for being alive and trained were sort of hard to ignore. Those particular peculiarities of shinobi biology fell under the purview of taijutsu, but hopefully neither of us were going to take that as an excuse to start throwing elbows.

Much. Or often. There were more than a few kenjutsu techniques designed for doomsday scenarios like “losing one’s sword.” And most of them did involve elbows, knees, and occasionally toes.

Head, shoulders, knees, and toes…
Stop singing.

Tough crowd.

“Whenever you’re ready,” I said, because while I was a kind older sister, I had my pride.

When Hayate reached the point in his circle where the sun was to his back and more importantly in my eyes, he kicked off and shot toward me.

I met his blade head-on. His katana’s edge and mine hit one another and made a horrible metallic shriek, but I refused to give an inch unless he made me back up by force. Which, besides being a way for me to test his striking force, was also an excellent way to destroy an otherwise-functional katana’s edge.

But Hayate only kept it up for a moment, using my strength to dart backward and out of range before I could slash at him. It wasn’t that I didn’t try, but rather that Kakashi’s kenjutsu influence meant that Hayate had a bizarre ability to keep all of his extremities out of stabbing range.

It was a good sign.

When Hayate got to his feet again, his mouth was set into a grim line and his brows furrowed.

Yeah, even with one arm I can stop you dead. The question is, what are you going to do about it?

Hayate’s katana started to hum with his chakra, glowing even to normal sight.

My eyes narrowed. Straight to the Lightning manipulation, huh? It’d cut through my sword if I was stupid about how I met that attack. Coating my blade in chakra would likely do the trick to save the weapon, but shifting to Water would just guide the charge down into my arm. Wham, bam, instant loss.

Dodging time.

Hayate’s blade passed neatly over my head and made my loose hair stand on end, but I slid out of the way without a moment’s flinch or hesitation.

I’d been out of the field for a long time, but the reflexes honed by deadly combat were as sharp as ever. Anything less would have gotten me killed in the kinds of fights I kept running into. One-hit-kill jutsu were devastating even to someone like me—but only if they hit.

Being too slow was a death sentence.

I had to wonder how much time Hayate had spent in similar situations. Going by his speed—as I stepped back out of the way of his next attack and felt sparks try to catch on my katana—probably not as much as I had.

But Hayate didn’t have the explosive speed of any of my more recent opponents. He didn’t hit nearly as hard, even if he had the cutting power to make up for some of that gap.

Using a sweeping kick to distract him for just a moment, I caught Hayate in midair before he could come back down and lashed out with the flat of my blade.

The dulled strike hit his right upper arm, sending a jolt of surprised pain down to his sword hand. While he didn’t drop it, the Lightning cutting edge fizzled out—which was more or less what happened with any jutsu that required intense chakra control. The ability to keep up in a ninjutsu fight, even through sudden, sharp pain, was something that had to be ingrained deep in one’s bones.

But unlike Itachi, I wasn’t trying to break my brother’s wrist.

I might not have pulled my strike enough, though, because Hayate dropped his sword point-first into the dirt. A second later, he landed on his butt in the dirt, wincing.

The hell?

Hayate rubbed his wrist as I killed my momentum dead, snatching up his sword and removing it from play. As a precaution, anyway.

“What the hell was that, Hayate?” I asked, as my brother sloooowly got his shit together. One solid hit and he was done? This wasn’t the fight I was expecting.

Hayate squinted up at me, since the sun was to my back. Not sure how that had happened. “Sis, you could have killed me easily.”

...Eh?

“Not with the hit,” Hayate said, interpreting my blank silence correctly. “But it only took two moves for me to know you’re too strong.”

“Hayate, I was pulling that strike. And the one before it.” I mean, who the hell really sparred full-pelt against a weaker opponent they didn’t plan on humiliating? Or killing.

“If that was a pulled hit, then why can’t I feel my wrist?” Hayate wanted to know, and held up his arm for inspection.

I grabbed his hand and turned his wrist over, inspecting the rising red welt with about half of my attention. It was a decent hit, but I wouldn’t have expected him to drop his sword unless I’d broken something, given the usual demands of shinobi combat.

And his chakra didn’t parse in a way that made sense with what he said. I knew what my brother felt like when he was in pain—mainly because he’d sure hit his knees enough on tables and chairs around me—and his chakra didn’t retreat back toward his core.

And Hayate made a grab for his sword, his hand sparking with Lightning chakra—not a lot, but enough that it would have hurt to hang onto his katana for long.

One of these damned days, I was going to badger Kakashi into explaining what techniques he’d shown Hayate how to perform. And then maybe figure out how to reverse-engineer them for my humble Water nature.

It was close—if he’d been a hair faster, or I was a bit slower, the action of yanking his sword back would have cut my left arm open because of the reversed grip I’d had. But nope, not quite.

My brother got far too much mileage out of the old “oh no, I’m doomed but not really” trick.

“Bruises don’t count as first blood, Sis,” Hayate said, which was totally unnecessary. He was just being a brat, but being ten meters away meant I’d have to actually run over there to pinch him for it.

“Well, shame on you for using my sisterly concern against me,” I shot back cheerfully, as Hayate went back to the thrift-shop lightsaber strategy again.

It didn’t work a second time.
Somewhat later, when my brother took a pair of minute nicks to the back of his right hand, he gave up. While he was better than the last time we’d sparred, I’d improved by just as much, if not more. The gap between our strengths remained.

While my brother dabbed at the little beads of blood with his sleeve—ugh, why couldn’t he use bandages?—he looked up to me and asked, “Did you even break a sweat?”

“Yes,” I said, even as I readjusted my hitai-ate on my head. Sheathing my sword at the same time my brother did, I waited for a couple of extra seconds before just deciding that maybe I didn’t need to say anything at all.

Hayate made a face at my answer, though. “Then can we work on something besides kenjutsu for a bit?”

“What do you want to do?” I asked him.

Hayate made a show of thinking about it. Then, “Everything!”

Short of blowing up the training field—which my brother couldn’t achieve on demand—we then practiced everything else in our respective arsenals. Lightning, high-pressure jets of water, a few more kenjutsu clashes, weapon-throwing—everything was on the table.

It was probably about two in the afternoon by the time we stopped, mostly because we were hungry. We walked back into town just in time to catch Iruka going the other way, toward one training site or another. Once outside of Konoha, the possibilities were pretty close to endless, so it wasn’t like I was going to be able to predict Iruka’s whims.

“Hayate, Kei-san,” Iruka said, acknowledging both of us with a nod. At some point Iruka had fallen out of the habit of calling me an honorary sister, which I kind of missed. But if he was growing up and had decided that he needed to be a bit more distant, I could understand that.

(It wasn’t like I didn’t have my brother, all three Chinatsugumi kids on occasion, both of Sensei’s kids, and Yūgao to fall back on, there.)

“Mostly. Actually,” Iruka corrected himself, “I was going to mention something to you.”

Hayate cocked his head to one side, hands in his pockets. “Like what?”

“I was at the Academy earlier, and I overheard someone saying their name was, uh, Kōsuke Gekkō?” Iruka shrugged, even as Hayate and I exchanged blank looks, “And I was just wondering if you knew anyone by that name.”

“I’m pretty sure we’re the only two Gekkō left,” Hayate said, puzzled. “I mean, I guess maybe we could have cousins somewhere, but...it’s not a common name…”

I nodded, frowning a bit. Sure, Dad had never talked about any of our extended family, as far as I knew, and no one else had ever mentioned more relatives coming out of the woodwork except for when Mom had died. Even so, Sensei had been focusing on possible Uesugi clan members, even if there had never been any indication that they’d possibly know we existed. Samurai were an unknown.

The Gekkō family—if we were actually related to any others, and Dad hadn’t just changed his name at some point—had never come up.

“Hey, do you have any idea why he was around the Academy?” I asked, trying to keep my confusion out of my voice. Sure, just like how not everyone named “Smith” was related, there was no real reason that Hayate and I would be related to any random person with the same family name.

“Mission request at the Administration building, I think. I just heard him talking outside,” Iruka said, shrugging. “I can’t really get into the mission office without an actual reason, so I guess you could ask the Hokage if anything interesting happened.” Since that’s a thing you do, and everyone knows it.

Or maybe I was reading too far into his tone.

Hayate and I waved Iruka onward and, by mutual, silent agreement, headed for the Hokage’s office to go and bug Sensei about exactly that.

Chapter End Notes

So this is the last chapter I'll be posting for a bit, since in about nine hours I'm going to be going on vacation for a while. To the Land of Rain and Heat. While I boil alive, there isn't going to be much opportunity to write except late at night. However, I do read every single message you, the readers, send to me, no matter what platform.

Please tell me your thoughts (and perhaps hopes, or speculations) as we move forward!
By the time Hayate and I got to the Administration center, I was harboring a few doubts about this mysterious new Gekkō—which, on reflection, sounded a bit like I was paranoid over the existence of a sticky-footed lizard. Yay, homophones.

Nevertheless, neither of us had ever met a single member of our extended family. It’d always been just us, Mom, and Dad. And then neither of our parents. If this stranger with our family name was here to, for example, try and get us to rejoin some clannish band who had nonetheless ignored us for our entire lives, I had no problem telling them where to stick it.

“Sis, are you nervous?” Hayate asked, once we landed on the roof and slipped toward the stairs that wound around the outside of the building.

There were some advantages to pretending to be like normal people, though most of them came down to “other people won’t look at you funny for spamming superpowers for everything.” Hence why, for the most part, I didn’t bother.

“Maybe a bit,” I admitted, while my brother’s chakra had more of an anticipatory thrill to it. I was better at imagining doomsday scenarios and heartbreaking confrontations than he was. Or perhaps all of that boiled down to a brain built for making mountains out of molehills.

Hayate proceeded to ignore my discomfort—or perhaps tried to distract me—by saying, “I wonder if he’ll look anything like us.”

“Depends on how distantly he’s related, if he is,” I reminded Hayate.

As a mixed-race kid in my last lifetime, I hadn’t really resembled any of my cousins. But here, the extended Hyūga and Uchiha clans looked creepily similar to other members of their respective clans. With the Aburame clan, it was hard to tell, and the other clans were all over the place.

I hoped for a middle ground, if anything at all.

Hayate led the way down the stairs toward the mission office, where I was pretty sure one of Sensei’s clones was working for the mid-afternoon. While his schedule had become harder to predict when I didn’t spend every day at work with him or Kushina, I was almost certain that this was one of those days when he stayed at home in the early afternoon to play with Naruto and Tatsumaki.

I cast my chakra sense outward, just to be sure. Sensei tended not to leave any real perceptible differences between the real him and the clones he used, but I could check anyway.

“There’s a pair of civilian chakra signatures down there,” I said to Hayate as we headed down the stairs, “but the other three are Sensei and two Chūnin Corps members. That might mean we’re in luck.”

Hayate sagged in disappointment. “I was hoping for another ninja in the family. Like maybe someone in ANBU!”

“If Kōsuke was a Konoha ninja, I’d have a really hard time not being pissed off at him, actually,” I grumbled. “Because that’d mean we had a relative running around for who even knows how long who totally ignored us for that whole time.”

Hayate grimaced. “Yeah. That would…” He shook his head, trying to stave off the negative thoughts. But I knew he was thinking of the time immediately after Mom’s death. “I don’t know if I could forgive someone who did that. Even for a really important reason.”

Which was also why he had such a problem with Sensei’s decision to put me in the field for so long. Where I had been a ninja and had finagled every possible way to stay in Hayate’s life for as much as I could, most shinobi couldn’t. I wasn’t sure if Hayate could see the difference yet, but that wasn’t the relevant issue anyway.

When we finally arrived just outside the Mission Office’s swing doors, both of us hesitated to enter. While there was nothing to fear out of a pair of pissed-off civilians—physically—the only ones with the agitated chakra—we hadn’t been called in for a mission and were really only there because of our burning curiosity.

Said burning curiosity was steadily turning my thoughts away from “what if we’re related to the mysterious new Gekkō we heard about?” to “why hasn’t Sensei made this scratchy-voiced punk shut up yet?” the longer Hayate and I eavesdropped.

Hayate mouthed, “This guy?” as he pointed at the door.

I shrugged helplessly. I didn’t know any more than he did.

A few minutes of muffled, raised voices later, and both of the civilian presences headed for the same door we had been shamelessly listening through. Exchanging looks, both of us vanished under basic camouflage genjutsu just as the door opened hard enough that, if there had been a doorknob of any sort, it probably would have gouged a hole in the relevant wall.

A teenaged boy, probably right around Hayate’s age, stomped out of the hall with his hands balled into fists. Dressed in well-made clothes, he looked either like a merchant or a tailor’s son, with his unruly black hair unsuccessfully pulled back into a high knot at the back of his head. Long eyelashes and a squareish jaw kind of reminded me of Dad, but probably only because I was looking for any sign of a resemblance.

If I was being honest, he looked like any teenaged jackass native to Konoha, given the relatively high proportion of normal human hair colors running loose in town. It wasn’t like we were in Kumogakure.

In the boy’s wake, a young woman who could have been his sister trailed in unobtrusive, serene silence. Like the boy, she had long, wild brown hair that was partly tamed, but by a jeweled headband. It matched her somewhat expensive kimono and geta, even as it made me wonder who the hell had let two teenagers travel to Konoha on their own. The two of them shared a somewhat stocky build, and both of them were shorter than Hayate or me, but that was really all I could say.

“I can’t believe the Hokage would assign this a B-rank,” the boy ranted as they went down the hall. “It’s a C-rank at most, isn’t it, Sister? We have to pay for it alone! Can’t he lower the price?!”

“Don’t worry, Kōsuke. I’m sure we can drum up funds in town somehow,” the girl said, placating. “I’ll sell my jewelry, and then we should be able to afford to pay these ninja.”

“Why should you have to sell anything? What we brought should have been enough!” grumbled the newly-identified Kōsuke. “Stupid, greedy ninja…"

I felt Hayate’s chakra spike in agitation, and jabbed at him with my chakra to remind him that we were supposed to be spying. Stealth was the name of the game.

Kōsuke rounded the corner, still complaining “under his breath” and drawing the eyes of everyone who crossed their path. His older sister offered more options, but he didn’t sound like he was willing to hear any of them.

Eventually, their voices faded entirely, and Hayate and I both dropped our genjutsu.

Hayate broke the silence first. “What the hell was that about?”

Gesturing at the door, I answered, “How about we ask?”

Hayate made a face. “That was a rhetorical question, Sis.”

“Come on, like you’re not dying to know,” I cajoled.

Hayate crossed his arms stubbornly. “I’m not sure I care anymore.”

Uh-oh. That had been a…less than stellar first impression, true, but I hadn’t realized it was quite that bad.

“Are you two just going to stand out there and argue, or are you going to get in here?” Sensei’s voice cut across both of us, jolting us back to the present and not our sibling squabble.

Somewhat chastised, we headed in.

“You needed to see us, Sensei?” I asked, like we hadn’t just been caught acting less-than-maturely for our ranks.

Sensei, who sat behind the main desk and had his head propped up on his knuckles, said, “I thought I’d see you two here sooner or later. Word travels fast, doesn’t it?”

There was a brand-new mission scroll on his desk, which was snatched up by one of the Chūnin Corps members and stuck into the wall slot that indicated it was a B-ranked mission. B-ranks were more expensive than C-ranks, but not prohibitively so. Unless the client was flat broke, anyway.

I’d have to ask for details on that one as soon as Hayate and I stopped pretending that our presence was anything but deliberate.

Speaking of.

“Who was that?” Hayate asked, jerking a thumb over his shoulder to indicate the long-disappeared other Gekkō siblings. Possibly. As in, they were possibly another set of Gekkō siblings, but Hayate definitely meant them one way or another.
I was starting to wonder if this was what it had felt like for the Elrics to meet the Tringham brothers. “No, the other ones” was probably going to be a phrase that popped up a lot.

“Tsukiko and Kōsuke Gekkō, from the Gekkō tailoring business in Kitano Town,” Sensei replied. “It’s somewhat close to the border with the Land of Grass.”

So they were from the Land of Fire. Kitano Town wasn’t the biggest one on our border with Kusa’s territory, but I was pretty sure I’d been there before on a mission with Ebisu to help with customs chicanery. I mostly remembered the smell of dead fish from the nearby river—certainly nothing like another possible family with our name. I liked to think I was more observant than that.

“Kitano Town’s been having trouble with bandit clans, some of which are led by former shinobi,” Sensei went on, glancing up at the scroll in its new resting place. “I can’t exactly give any mission with a high possibility of shinobi combat a rating lower than B.”

“And?” Hayate asked.

“He’s really asking if you think we might be related to them,” I said, when Sensei didn’t immediately answer.

The Chūnin Corps members were shuffling out of the room as we talked, so maybe they realized that this wasn’t a discussion that really needed to be aired. It was just that we were using their workspace anyway.

“It’s possible.” Well, what a ringing endorsement. Sensei went on, “I don’t have your father’s service records here, but I think he listed a hometown when he first enrolled in the Academy…”

Either that was a no, or Dad had been estranged from his family. Given what I had just seen from our possible-cousin’s behavior, I could see why.

Besides, it wasn’t like that was too uncommon. Sure, most Konoha shinobi had families in town, and that detail was something that separated us from most other shinobi villages. I was pretty sure that say, Raidō, had no family members in town, though I’d never asked why.

But perhaps I was being harsh.

Hayate and I had only seen our weird mirror duo for a few minutes, which was enough to form the negative first impression we had and pretty much nothing else. Maybe if we just asked them what was what, we’d get an answer.

“I wasn’t actually going to hand this mission to you two,” Sensei said, breaking me out of my reverie. “While the possible blood link is interesting, it’s not a C-rank. And I did promise.”

C-ranks always went to shit anyway, so I didn’t really know what to say to that.

“Can we...can we think about it?” Hayate asked, clearly struggling with himself. “I guess I want to know for sure if they’re family, but Kōsuke sounds like a complete brat…” He shook his head. “But if someone’s in trouble with Iwa, and they’re ours, we’re supposed to help them.”

“You’re not wrong,” Sensei replied, once my brother got his rambling out of the way, “but again, you two aren’t obligated to take this mission simply because your family name is the same as the clients’. I’d assign a complete team to handle a B-rank.”

I made a thoughtful noise. “Maybe...we could see if we could get more details out of those two. Or something. Or just think on it?”
Sensei hesitated. “Kei, didn’t curiosity kill the cat? I really don’t think you should push yourself into a situation you can’t handle over a burning need to know something so minor.”

“Well, it is kinda minor—I mean, at most, we might get pen pals out of this,” I admitted. But, looking at my brother’s determined expression, I didn’t think I was getting out of it either. “We aren’t going to stop being shinobi no matter what. Right, Hayate?”

“Right,” Hayate said with a sharp nod.

“So I don’t think there’s...too much harm in poking around. More than we already have,” I hedged, since Sensei had caught us eavesdropping not too long ago.

Also, I kind of wanted to know what the rest of the town was saying about the new Gekkō siblings, since they’d had so long to get used to us. Hopefully, we came off somewhat better by the comparison.

“I won’t stop you. Just try to be discreet,” Sensei said, and I supposed that meant we were dismissed.

Once we left, Hayate turned to me and said, “How do you want to do this?”

For a moment, I scratched the side of my head and thought about it. This self-appointed mission probably didn’t require both of us... Not to mention, I was supposed to be meeting Suika-sensei later. “I can’t follow them around today, Hayate. I’ll have to leave that to you.”

Hayate nodded, accepting my total lack of a spoken reason. He probably had a better idea of what my schedule was than I did, sometimes. “Something’s off about that guy’s reaction. I mean, Konoha makes exceptions for clients who can’t pay for big missions, don’t we?”

“I don’t remember. I know we have standing contracts for a lot of places, but their village might not be included,” I said. I could have asked Sensei, but I got the impression that he didn’t necessarily need the interruption about clerical minutiae. “What bothers me—aside from the part where they have the same family name—is that I guess I don’t see why they had to make a scene.”

“I can find out,” Hayate said, his eyes narrowing in suspicion.

“Don’t get caught.”

Now, this is a story all about how/My life got flipped-turned upside down...

My first attempt at talking about my old life lacked so much gravitas that it was practically floating.

Nonetheless, I did tell my reincarnation story to Suika-sensei at some point. Just with fewer references to 90s pop culture. And with fewer evasive statements than I’d ever managed before. It was a minor victory in the scheme of things, but a victory hard-won and at long last. Or something.

Being objective, it wasn’t a stretch to say that my life, perception thereof, and my goals had all changed once I died. But there was no California, so it wasn’t like I could take the rest of the song literally.

And after that story, Suika-sensei sent me away so we could both reflect. I got the thing off my chest, and she had to go make some kind of worm-salts tea for her impending headache.

I didn’t ask for details. I’d bounced a lot of them off her carapace, and we both needed a break.

While I could probably go and pester Hayate for a preliminary result on his scouting mission, he’d have more to report if I waited and let him (and all possible accomplices) go on without interference.

That left me at loose ends.

So, per usual, I decided to find someone I knew and bother them instead of just spending the afternoon reading or something. I was fresh out of books anyway.

First up, Rin. She’d left while I sat and talked and gave Suika-sensei a headache, because she only needed to be there for the initial summoning. My chakra sense put her—and Obito—somewhere toward the middle of town. Probably around the part of the Naka River that ran through the Uchiha district, though not near the waterfall end of things.

Still, I headed in that direction anyway, leaping from branch to branch among the Training Ground trees until I found the first rooftop, and continued from there.

Parkour!

_This is not remotely parkour. This is the stand-in for flight that...who is that human who wears underwear on the outside again?_

What a party pooper. Still, I accepted the correction with all due respect. Not-actually-parkour!

Show some respect.

*I never._

I eventually came to a stop in a tree with its lower branches beaten smooth by many passing feet. I draped one leg down over the curve of the wood, tucking the other underneath me, and gave myself a second to slow down and think.

Obito and Rin were just barely coming into view, visible only as a pair of silhouettes holding each other’s hands. As I half-watched, half-observed via my chakra sense, the two of them headed down toward the riverbank and disappeared from view. Their chakra was bright and clear, a warm flame meeting something that felt the way sun-dappled water looked.

I didn’t have enough of a grasp on how their chakra moved to be able to tell exactly what they were doing once they left my line of sight, but I didn’t need to have the Byakugan to know that they didn’t deserve to be interrupted.

...Maybe it’d be best if I stayed out of their way.

I slid off the tree branch and headed toward the rest of the village.

My next stop put me at the Academy—not so much because I was going to pester someone into interacting with me, but more because I wanted to see how my kids behaved in class.

“Class” turned out to be a slight misnomer. While all three of the former Chinatsugumi children were certainly enrolled, the Academy’s day was ending just as I arrived.

Perched in the tree in the Academy’s yard, I watched the students pour out of the doors. Given that I wasn’t looking down from Sensei’s office or the roof for once, the view struck me as somehow more...realistic, I supposed. It was sort of dehumanizing to look down on everyone from on high, and quite a different thing to just see how people went about their daily lives from around eye level.

Or two meters above it, as the case _actually_ was.
Roku was one of the last ones out, trailed by both Kaito and Aiko, but they didn’t lag behind for long. To my mild surprise, Shisui Uchiha—at least eleven years old and thus probably tall enough to reach my collar—waved them over toward the gates.

Slinging their little school-bags around like orbiting bodies, Aiko and Kaito almost managed to tackle the much taller child to the ground with the force of their hugs. And when their weight didn’t bring him down, their school-bags smacking together behind his head was just enough to make him overbalance and end up on the ground.

I tilted my head to one side, baffled. Since when had they…?

“Neither of them even stopped to ask about candy this time,” Itachi said, appearing next to Roku in a burst of smoke.

“They don’t have to ask,” said Roku, holding out his fist, which Itachi obligingly bumped. “Did you get my book back from your brother?”

Itachi shook his head, his chakra fizzling in embarrassment. “He wants me to finish reading to him. I know I promised, but…”

“It’s okay.” Roku patted Itachi’s shoulder. “If he likes the stories, you can keep it until he gets bored.”

“I don’t know if he will,” Itachi warned as they started to walk out of earshot, following the sudden three-child parade his cousin led—mostly by virtue of being the one with the longest legs.

...Nope, not interrupting that either.

With Kakashi (ANBU captainy things) and Gai (mission) out of the village, that pretty much exhausted my list of close friends who I felt comfortable bothering, since they’d all gone and gotten themselves into situations where I was not comfortable bothering them. Hayate’s friends were his friends, and Yamato fell into this weird purgatory where he was mostly associated with Kakashi or Hayate but not really with me, besides taking on some kind of assessment that Tsunade didn’t seem to approve of.

(It was probably related to ANBU, like a lot of people’s mysterious tests. There had to be better excuses.)

And I sure as shit wasn’t going to go and interrupt Genma and Raidō’s reunion dinner thingy—which, granted, Genma had been planning to last literally the entire day after Raidō got back from whatever ANBU mission he had. With their chakra signatures so close together, I had to assume said reunion thing had already started.

I had a real dilemma on my hands. On one, boredom. On the other, a mysterious void of infinite opportunity that I had yet to explore.

Maybe Kurenai would have an idea.

“...And that’s how I ended up here,” I said to Asuma, from across a shogi board.

Kurenai, who had been halfway out her front door for yet another mission, pointed me in Asuma’s direction like a real delegating champ.

“Given how bad you’re playing, I wouldn’t have guessed this was your first choice,” Asuma remarked dryly, and clicked one last piece into place to cement my defeat.

I blew my bangs out of my face, making a horselike noise. “Don’t rub it in. Another round?”

“Sure. I’m always up for winning.” Asuma cleared his victorious legions from the board with one sweep of his hand, then started setting up again.

I had a...theoretical grasp of shogi. While the Nara and Sarutobi clans seemed to make a communal hobby of the game, I only recognized pieces in passing and couldn’t remember how any of them moved. Genma knew, but I’d never shown any interest and he’d assumed I didn’t want to learn.

It was an accurate assumption, but one that was biting me in the ass anyway.

And once the pieces were all set up again—with no help from me—I stared at the black pieces for way too long for comfort. At a loss for anything else to say, I meekly asked Asuma, “Uh, remind me how the knights move?”

Shogi wasn’t chess, but the similar roles were making half-remembered rules smack into each other inside my head. It wasn’t helping my already terrible level of skill get anywhere fast, and the knights were always the dumbest pieces on the board.

“You aren’t supposed to telegraph your first play, you know,” Asuma pointed out.

“I can’t help it if I’m really awful at this,” I griped, drumming my fingers on my knee. Then I realized what I just said. “Crap.”

All you did was confirm his assessment of your skills, Isobu told me. Which just so happen to accurately indicate that you are terrible at this game.

“Asuma, did you want an actual challenge?” I asked him, while Isobu rattled off the movements of each of the pieces in turn with what I was pretty sure was pinpoint accuracy. Because of course he could.

Asuma scratched his day’s worth of stubble, then nodded with a bit of chagrin. “Even I have to admit this isn’t really fun anymore.”

Thanks, jerk. Though, of course, he was only telling the truth. There was a reason that good players didn’t generally play with beginners unless it was time to teach.

I got to my feet with a huff and bit down on a hangnail for the required drops of blood. While Isobu’s chakra patched the incredibly trivial injury, I called out, “Summoning jutsu!”

Technically, I didn’t have to say anything, but it felt more official when I did.

In a burst of smoke that nearly filled the Sarutobi clan’s porch, Tsuruya appeared at my back. With her huge wings folded against her sides and her neck and head held nearly level in the available space, she seemed somewhat smaller than normal.

“...You’re going to get your summon to play for you?” Asuma asked, looking torn between being insulted and actually rather eager to take on the challenge. “You really think you’re that bad?”

“I am that bad,” I retorted. “But Tsuruya actually knows the rules, and she’s never gotten a challenge out of me anyway.”

Tsuruya, who had peered down at the starting setup with interest, pulled her head back to bop me in the head with her beak. “Keisuke-sama, I am not going to play for your sake here. I offered to teach you once.”

“And I turned you down and I’m sorry about that,” I agreed, running my fingers along her glossy white feathers. “But no, you’re not playing for me. You’re playing Asuma so he has someone to play with, and I’ll cheer you on. Or move the pieces if you want.”

Tsuruya fixed me with a wry look. “I think I can manage, Keisuke-sama. Asuma-san, you wished to play white?”

Asuma nodded. “Since I’ve got the longest win record, it only seems fair. Your move, Tsuruya-san.”

Tsuruya huffed. “We’ll see about that, Asuma-san.”

I dozed to the sound of thoughtful clicking as the game unfolded. Aside from the possible utility of thumbs, it wasn’t like Tsuruya needed my input for anything there.

---

Once upon a time, someone on Earth had decided that conventional alarm clocks were for weaklings (or possibly too specialized in audio input), and had invented a cheerfully evil device that woke its users by zapping them awake in the morning.

We had them in ninja-land too, but the electrodes were replaced by timed seals in order to be let out into the field. When the other option was accidentally giving away one’s position in the field while badly outnumbered and acting as the quarry in a manhunt, shinobi could put aside their dislike of being zapped at regular intervals. To a point.

No one had hooked me up to one of those hideous devices.

And yet I was awake anyway.

From under Tsuruya’s wing, and to the general noise of another in-progress shogi match between her and Asuma, I felt a faint, rising tension in the air. It wasn’t really anything physical, and it wouldn’t have been important on its own.

But that flash in the figurative dark was one I knew well.

Kakashi’s chakra was a live wire, a sparking power line—but one that was just barely on the edge of my range. He picked his way toward the village and the detection system that the Barrier Team at least put up a pretense of maintaining, accompanied by several less-distinct signatures.

I nudged Tsuruya’s wing off me so I could sit up, making a sound akin to someone dropping a drawer full of cutlery as her feathers banged together. Tsuruya grumbled a bit, still intent on her game, but let me escape her mother hen instincts unscathed.

After yawning, I asked, “So who’s winning?”

“Tsuruya-san is,” Asuma replied, frowning over the board and not bothering to look up from his grand strategies. “ Barely.”

“It has been a close-run thing,” Tsuruya admitted. “But I do not plan to lose!” Her feathers rattled again, the tension building.

I slid my legs off the side of the porch and peered up at the sun. Judging by the angle of the shadows, and the deeper blue in the sky, I’d snoozed a few hours away. Likewise, Tsuruya and Asuma had pitted their respective brains against each other, continually, for that entire time.

Given how completely wretched I was at shogi, Asuma had to be having fun.

Kicking my legs idly, I closed my eyes and focused on Kakashi’s chakra. He felt a bit tired, buzzing perhaps a little less enthusiastically than normal, but it was nothing compared to what I remembered from his old ANBU missions. Before the Sorayama incident, Kakashi spent at least a few weeks out of every year on the bench due to chakra exhaustion, but nothing like that had happened since he rejoined the active ANBU roster.

Thank goodness for the small side benefits of horrible accidents that could have gone far more wrong, and for Team Minato’s luck finally swinging in a more useful direction.

Tsuruya briefly flicked her beak, then said, “Keisuke-sama, are you still interested in the outcome of this game?”

I made a face, unwilling to admit out loud that the answer was a resounding “no.” I didn’t want to hurt their feelings.

Thankfully, I was spared from having to answer any questions on that front by the sound of footsteps on the roof above us. A quick check with my chakra sense confirmed that the welcome new interloper was someone I knew, so I leaned forward and craned my neck so I could watch their arrival somewhat better.

Yūgao landed in the Sarutobi clan rock garden in front of me, accompanied by one rather peeved-seeming ANBU guard.

There were some perks to being a former Hokage, even if Hiruzen Sarutobi didn’t get out as often as he used to. Or as predictably.

“Hi, Yūgao-chan,” I said, as Tsuruya nearly clocked me with her beak again. I ducked in time, though. “What’s up?”

Yūgao paused, giving one last somewhat miffed look to her ANBU escort as he let go of her arm. Then, with a quick nod to Asuma, she said, “We found out some more stuff about those other Gekkō kids.”

Asuma placed a shogi tile seemingly at random and, while Tsuruya swore very quietly under her breath, asked distractedly, “‘Other Gekkō kids?’”

“...Did I forget to mention them before starting my losing streak?” I wondered aloud.

Asuma gave me an unamused look. “Yes.”

While Tsuruya squawked over suddenly realizing she’d lost—or so I assumed—Asuma scooted around on his butt until he was sitting next to me with his legs also dangling over the edge of the porch.

“So what did you learn?” I asked Yūgao, as Asuma dismissed the ANBU guard.

“Well, Hayate-kun wants you to talk to them, but I think we might be taking that mission.” Yūgao twisted her long purple hair around in her fingers, hesitating.

“So what is the mission?” I asked. I had a higher security clearance than she did, so it wasn’t like there was any reason to be hesitant, right?
To my surprise, that hesitance in Yūgao’s dark eyes didn’t go away. “I think it’d be easier if we go ask them directly.”

...Okay then? What the hell.

I got to my feet, to the sound of Tsuruya sweeping all the shogi pieces off the board in frustration. “Lead the way, Yūgao-chan.”

To my surprise, Asuma stood up too. Spotting my expression, he said, “Hey, I’m curious about this. It’s not something secret, right?”

“No really,” I said, though I did glance to Yūgao to confirm that. At her nod, I said, “Who knows, maybe we’ll get an actual interesting story out of them.”

With Tsuruya, Asuma, and me following along, Yūgao led us to the mysterious meeting place.

It turned out that Ichiraku Ramen was magic.

Kushina’s ramen was better in my opinion, but it was also the only way to get Kōsuke Gekkō to shut up.

Ichiraku’s only had six seats, which wasn’t nearly enough to include me, my brother, Yūgao, Iruka, Asuma, Kōsuke and Tsukiko Gekkō, and finally Tsuruya. So while the two foreign Gekkō got actually seats, and my brother and I apparently got two out of courtesy, Asuma ended up being the one who sat on Tsuruya’s back.

Sure, he wasn’t hungry, but I did offer to take his place since Tsuruya, per usual, started prodding his head with her beak to groom him like a chick. He seemed to take it well, though.

“They refused to tell me what was going on until I bought them lunch,” Hayate griped from around my right elbow.

Given the six bowls piled up in front of the other Gekkō siblings, I could see his point. Part of the reason he’d asked Yūgao to find me was to pay for this shit.

I didn’t ask him what he’d found out without having to spend my money, because that would have constituted admitting that we’d been spying on these strangers.

Tsukiko dabbed delicately at her lips with a napkin, then finally favored me with a polite and totally bland smile. I could see her social mask slide into place with a figurative click. It reminded me of the face Mom would put on when dealing with Sensei when she was already mad at him, and he persisted in giving her justification for it.

Eventually, curiosity got the better of me.

(It took about five minutes total.)

“So, why were you shouting in the Hokage’s office earlier?” I asked, and got to watch Kōsuke perform a perfect spit-take that nearly doused Teuchi’s daughter Ayame in hot soup and spittle.

He missed, and I didn’t have to throw a chopstick at his head.

While Kōsuke coughed to recover, Tsukiko turned to me while patting her brother’s back and said, “You heard that...Keisuke-san, wasn’t it? I wasn’t aware that anyone else was there at the time.”
There was a not-so-subtle hesitation over my name that I didn’t really understand, but we’d get to the bottom of that in short order.

“Shinobi have ways,” I said without batting an eye.

Tsukiko blinked slowly, glancing at Asuma and Tsuruya and their respective bowls of ramen. “I...see. Asuma-san has the same family name as your Third Hokage, doesn’t he?”

Asuma looked rather unimpressed, over the rim of his bowl. “He’s my dad, and you’re not subtle.”

“Hey, don’t talk to my sister that way!” Kōsuke snapped.

Asuma’s thick eyebrows rose by, at most, a couple of millimeters. I would have bet at least one...I probably would have bet a slightly bent kunai that Asuma was thinking something along the lines of Who taught this kid how to show common courtesy? Because they should be fired.

A kunai? Not money? Not even multiple kunai?

Hey, I’m not on his genin team. I don’t claim to know what he thinks.

Except right then.

...Except right then.

While Asuma didn’t exactly ooze political zeal—or skill—there was something to be said for basic survival instincts. It struck me as a kind of common sense to avoid insulting people who were theoretically capable of killing—though not willing to kill—other people with their bare hands.

Just saying.

“Can you answer my question? We might be able to help,” I said, interrupting a possible food fight before it could start.

Watching Kōsuke bite back the first three things he wanted to say was actually rather funny. He had the kind of face that showed every bit of the mental gymnastics he had to force himself through to get back on track. “It’s our town, okay?”

“Kitano Town is a prosperous, peaceful community located near the border of the Land of Fire,” Tsukiko said, as though reading from a tour pamphlet. “Unfortunately…”

“There are a bunch of bandit assholes in the hills,” Kōsuke said, picking up the thread. “And Grandma thinks they’re just going to get worse. They already robbed our cousins on the road, and Sano broke his stupid hand in the fight they had.”

“Why not go to Kusagakure, then?” Asuma suggested. “It’s closer, and we do have something of an agreement with them—they can work in our territory, and it sounds like you could have used the help sooner.”

Kōsuke scrunched his nose and said disdainfully, “We tried that. But the bandits watch those roads way too much. Sis and I only got this far because we hitched a ride with some people from the old Chinatsugumi. Otherwise, we wouldn’t have gotten past them.”

My mouth twisted a bit when I thought of Sorayama, and the incident that made all Chinatsugumi merchants technically “former” members.
“But since Konoha is the one that responded to the attack there, the guys said we’d have more luck with you than like...Takigakure or Amegakure.” Kōsuke flapped a hand, irritated. “I mean, you guys sent a freaking jinchūriki to kick the asses of the guys who did all that, so you’d probably take this shit seriously. Except when we got here, the Hokage wanted to charge us more money than we have.”

Tsukiko patted her brother’s back, while Hayate and I exchanged incredulous glances. Behind the other Gekkō siblings, Asuma choked on his soup and Tsuruya smacked him with her beak on reflex to help him out.

“There are ways around that price tag,” I said, pretending that I didn’t have any idea who this mysterious jinchūriki was. It was just a minor detail quibble—I’d already been at Sorayama, while Kushina had been the one actually deployed. “Payment plans, for example.”

“We’ve written similar agreements, Keisuke-san,” Tsukiko replied. “Should we expect shinobi to be any kinder?”

“...We’re soldiers, not loan sharks,” Iruka pointed out. “We do have a bureaucracy and everything, but you’re Land of Fire citizens and we do work for the whole nation at least some of the time. B-ranked missions are expensive, but we’ve made exceptions for poor villages before. I mean, it’s not like we’re broke.”

Since Sensei’s ascension as the Fourth Hokage and the subsequent peaceful new era—until some new war popped up—we’d actually been doing pretty well as a village. Except for the Sorayama thing, which was definitely still being sorted out. The Land of Fire’s economy had taken a hit from losing such a large merchant group nearly in its totality, and the nasty hit to nationwide confidence, but a quick response and the deaths of all the perpetrators had helped blunt the impact somewhat.

But I wasn’t an economic theorist, or a political one, and I had to admit that I was seriously sort of information past that level of detail.

“Neither of us have the authority to negotiate on Kitano Town’s behalf,” Tsukiko said softly. “The best we can do is ask for the mission to be completed and then pay afterward, but still...”

Having never had to hire shinobi for anything, I couldn’t say anything on that topic personally.

Tsukiko closed her eyes. “One would hope that the Gekkō family survives this trial.”

Asuma raised his eyebrows again. “Gekkō?”

“Yes. Our company is Gekkō Imported Goods.” Tsukiko titled her head. “Have you heard of us?”

“Nope,” Asuma said blithely. “But you might be sitting next to two of your cousins.”

Tsukiko blinked. Kōsuke froze.

Hayate waved. “Did I forget to mention that?”

“Keisuke Gekkō,” I said, since that barn door was wide open. “Konoha jōnin, host of the Three-Tailed Beast, and otherwise known as the Tidal Blade.”

“And I’m Hayate Gekkō, chūnin of Konoha,” Hayate said, perfectly in time. “Iruka and Yūgao-chan are my teammates.”
And both of us—and our friends—got to see both of the civilian Gekkō siblings reel back from me as though burned. Kōsuke actually tipped his stool over, making Tsuruya snap when it nearly clipped her face, and Yūgao and Iruka both tensed as though expecting to have to break up a fight.

“Y-you’re—” Kōsuke shook with rage. “What the _fuck_? What the _fuck_ was—you can’t just spring that on us!”

Ayame yelped and clapped her hands over her ears, and Teuchi ushered her toward the kitchen to get her away from the confrontation.

“Can. Did,” Hayate responded. More seriously, he added, “My team and I were thinking of taking your mission pretty much for free. But it’s just a joke. I’m not sure I want to be related to you anyway.”

“We’re always up for helping rescue villages,” Iruka added, before Kōsuke and Tsukiko could recover and start properly _reacting_ to the news.

“But just to be clear, the offer’s real,” Yūgao added. “We’ve had good missions lately so it doesn’t really matter if we get paid for a C or B-ranked mission.”

Oh, how time flew. I remembered days when I couldn’t have been nearly so blithe about money. Of course, Sensei had handled anything and everything akin to haggling back then, so it wasn’t really my concern as a genin.

Kōsuke looked like he was about to say something, but Tsukiko’s hand snapped out and caught his wrist. He visibly bit down on the inside of his cheek to keep from speaking.

Tsukiko bowed, still not relinquishing her grip on her brother’s arm. “We would be honored if you would be willing to help save our village, Hayate-san.”

“Hey, no, you don’t need to act like that around us,” Hayate backpedaled. When Tsukiko looked up, he went on, “We’ll take the mission. No more pranks.” Then he paused. “Sis, Inoichi-sensei isn’t on the mission roster this month ‘cause he took time off, so do you want to come with us as team leader?”

I hesitated. Satisfying my curiosity was one thing, but wasn’t this going a bit far to alleviate my wanderlust?

_Is this a joke? The only thing you have managed to avoid regarding your curiosity is death, and that by slim margins on occasion. How is this any different?_

... _Eh, point. But I can always count on you to bail me out._

_Untunately, yes._ Isobu sighed. _Try to avoid obvious idiocy this time._

“Yes, I’ll come with you. There’s just one thing,” I said, half thinking aloud. To my brother’s team, I said, “Hayate, we can’t just take a mission. It has to be assigned.”

“So?” Hayate had a mulish expression. “Can’t you just ask the Hokage? I mean, we’re probably the only team that’ll take this mission at the price our clients”—and here, he nodded at Kōsuke and Tsukiko, who were watching our banter as though it was a high-speed tennis match—“can pay. And he’s your sensei.”

Well, yes, but… “That’s favoritism.”
“Again, so?” At my raised eyebrow—and those of Asuma, Yūgao, and Iruka—Hayate elaborated with a rather cheeky, “I might forgive him if he listens to my big sister’s request and gives us this mission.”

I sighed, feeling my resolve start to crumble. Dammit, Hayate. “All right, you win. But you need to hold up your end of the bargain, you brat.”

After the impromptu business dinner broke up, I let Tsuruya go home with Asuma so they could continue their marathon best-out-of-infinity shogi series. And while Iruka and Yūgao headed back to their homes to pack, Hayate and I escorted the other Gekkō sibs to their inn. We’d get the mission officially in the morning, but I didn’t foresee any difficulty in getting Sensei to play ball.

It gave us a chance to get to know our soon-to-be clients, too, which went a ways toward satisfying my burning need to know everything.

Mainly because nothing killed my willingness to listen faster than the stupidity that ensued.

As we reached the inn’s front step, Kōsuke finally burst out, “What’s it like to be a monster?”

“I wouldn’t know,” Hayate said, rolling his eyes. Can you believe this guy? his face seemed to say.

“I wasn’t talking to you,” Kōsuke snapped, his eyes narrowing.

“Then you should’ve said,” Hayate retorted. “What the fuck kind of question is that?”

Oh, boy.

Tsukiko grabbed her brother’s collar and yanked on it, making him yelp. “Little Brother, they are helping us out of the goodness of their hearts—and despite the emptiness of their wallets. The least you can do is avoid antagonizing them.”

“The funny thing about monsters is that you don’t have to be a hundred meters tall and be able to flatten cities to be one,” I informed Kōsuke bluntly.

Kōsuke frowned, as much puzzled as upset. “But that’s what you are.”

“Kōsuke, that’s enough,” Tsukiko said in the same tone mothers used with misbehaving children. “Don’t insult a jinchūriki to their face.”

Actually, if he had insulted jinchūriki within Sensei, Kushina, Obito, or Kakashi’s hearing range, this mission would probably be in need of a new client. And Hayate was apparently inching his way into that category the longer Kōsuke kept talking.

This was going to be so fun.

Not.

“I sure hope we’re not really related,” Hayate muttered, when Tsukiko shoved Kōsuke through the front doors of the inn as soon as we arrived, aware that they were both pushing their luck. “I’m regretting agreeing to this already.”

“It was your idea,” I reminded him.

Hayate pinched the bridge of his nose. “Don’t remind me. I don’t get how you can let people talk to you like that.”
Hayate blinked. Right, I’d never told him about this, had I? I’d bet that he knew about Kushina one way or another, after the Sorayama thing, but Naruto was still a secret that I never planned to give up.

Assuming that Sensei and Kushina hadn’t just told him at some point while he was babysitting the kid. That was always a possibility.

“I talked about this with Sensei after the Tenth,” I explained quietly, as we turned to go. “And if it helps people adjust to jinchūriki, and makes it easier for us to be accepted in the future, then I don’t care.”

“Sis…” Hayate seemed to sag, as though the realization weighed on him. Then he shook himself, straightened up, and said, “Then I won’t pick a fight with him. But Sis, if he starts this again…”

“Hayate, it’s not important.” I shrugged. “If we’re lucky, Kōsuke will learn to keep his mouth shut and let us do our jobs. If not, we just need to ignore him.”

Hayate crossed his arms. He knew he was supposed to be a disciplined shinobi, and a good soldier. But it was so much easier to adhere to the ideal when someone wasn’t bad mouthing people close to him.

But I had to be certain he’d stay in line. “Promise me you won’t get into a fight with him again, no matter how he acts.”

Hayate met my eyes, then groaned. “I get it, I get it. It wouldn’t be a fair fight anyway.”

Not necessarily the attitude I wanted, but I’d take it.
 Shortly after “accepting” the Kitano Town mission from Sensei, my brand-new team of pubescent teenaged shinobi dispersed to finalize their preparations. As team leader, I stayed behind and requested a few more details.

For one thing, a topographical and geopolitical map—or at least the best we could muster. For another, an updated Bingo Book focused on Iwa and Kusa shinobi to help me remember who I could act surprised to see before I caved their heads in. And third, a…thingy.

That last one was Sensei’s idea.

“This seal will be your emergency beacon if the situation spirals out of control somehow,” Sensei told me, handing me a kunai that frankly looked like something he’d ripped off of Kiri-nin at some point.

Rather than three spiky tips, this kunai had a long, single-edged blade that had somehow sprouted another triangular point at a ninety-degree angle. On its vellum hilt, I read the character for “toad” in Sensei’s calligraphy before he folded my fingers over the weapon.

“Don’t lose it,” Sensei told me firmly. “I might not be able to be there for you this time”—which, given the last mission I’d taken, was a statement that I hoped did not prove to be something I regretted—“but you’re never going to go alone. It’ll summon two toads—one to report the situation to Konoha, and one to stay with you as combat support. I’d have tied it to Obito’s Kamui somehow, but we were planning on going over that technique next week. The toads will have to do.”

I slipped the kunai into my thigh holster and said, “Thank you, Sensei. I’ll take care of it.”

“I’d much rather it takes care of you,” Sensei grumbled good-naturedly. Then he ran a hand through his spiky blond hair, practically radiating worry, and said, “Really, you shouldn’t need to use it. But I feel better knowing that you have options.”

I hesitated to say that the mission would be a cakewalk. Given the C-ranked missions I’d taken, “cakewalk” was a hop-skip-and-a-jump from “clusterfuck.” After all, they all started with the same letter.

“Then I promise that I’ll call for help if I need it,” I told Sensei, shifting my weight from foot to foot. His anxiety was making me start to worry.

And Sensei understood that. Sticking two sensors in the same room meant that there was always an extra layer of conversation.

Sensei crossed the distance between us and gave me a firm hug. As I bumped my head against the shoulder pad of his jōnin vest, I heard him say quietly, “Take care of yourself out there, Kei.”

“I’m not leaving yet, Sensei,” I said once he—and I—let go, but the teasing tone fell flat thanks to the lump building in my throat. I coughed to clear it, then said, “I’m going to check in with Kakashi and Obito before I leave; maybe they’ll want souvenirs.”

Sensei smiled wryly. “And nothing for Tatsumaki or Naruto? For shame, Kei.”

“And upstage Yamato as their favorite babysitter?” I gasped in mock horror. “How could I?”

Sensei sighed. “Oh, just get out and do what you have to. The mission sets off at noon.”

“By your command, Hokage-sama!” I gave a quick bow, and was chased out of the office by Sensei’s long-suffering groan.

I counted it as a victory and ran off.

Once outside in the morning sunshine, I had about two hours to kill before I was due to meet my team. I’d packed everything I needed last night, thanks to the wonderful physics-breaking power of the humble storage scroll, and had a couple of accounts to settle before I could really embrace the tedium of waiting for merchant brats to get ready to go.

Last I’d checked, the other Gekkō siblings had been working on Kōsuke’s schedule, and he was a terrible morning person. I wasn’t one either, but there was “not a morning person” and then there was him.

But I had Tsuruya watching their inn in case the kid decided to roll the schedule onward without telling anyone, solely to have something to complain about.

So, with administrative and leader duties taken care of, I was free to take care of a few last-minute arrangements. The first thing involved stopping by my apartment and grabbing Mr. Ukki, and then heading out to check on Kakashi.

Ordinarily, I didn’t make much of a habit of making sure my spikiest teammate wasn’t dead. If his chakra was in the village, I relaxed. Sure, my imagination ran away with things if he wasn’t, but it did that for everything from birthday parties to inconclusive border reports. It was just that Kakashi spent a lot of time outside of the village, working on whatever ANBU missions required his expertise, so I worried over him more than, say, Rin.

But since I hadn’t seen him yesterday, after his most recent mission, I decided that he could use a bit of prodding.

Bypassing most of the central part of the village by running across the roofs toward the Inuzuka properties, I reached Kakashi’s apartment in no time at all.

Rather than trying to bug him from outside his bedroom window—which was actually his only window—I headed down to ground level.

Kakashi’s apartment building had a common room of sorts, down on the bottom floor. I never really visited it on the occasions I’ve been here, because he didn’t spend time there and so why should I have done it?

But today, Kakashi and someone—oh, that was Yatsu Inuzuka—had set up shop in the ancient armchairs in one of the quiet corners of the room. From the feel of things, both of them were calmer and more focused than I had really sensed out of either of them for quite some time.
I was still debating how to approach them when one of the dogs in the room—out of five—trotted out of the building and barked, “You!” upon seeing me.

“Me,” I responded automatically, because there were some stupid conversation techniques that I had never grown out of. This dog had a voice that was as low as his actual bark, and this particular dog was larger than all of Kakashi’s except for Bull. I might’ve been momentarily intimidated if I didn’t recognize him. “Hello, Teikō-san.”

Teikō didn’t look as old as his network of cross-crossing battle scars would have suggested. Around his drooping jowls, his brown fur was still as dark as ever, and there was a spring in his step that belied whatever age he actually was. The only thing that was off about him was the fact that his orange scarf was gone.

The dog paused to sniff the air, then perked both floppy ears up as high as they’d go and said, “You’re Kakashi-kun’s teammate. What are you doing here?”

I held Mr. Ukki up for Teikō’s inspection. “I’m gonna ask if someone here can babysit this guy. Can I come in?”

Teikō sniffed the plant, nosing at the armband I’d left around its stalk, and said, “Yes, but don’t disturb their work.”

I was escorted into the building under doggy guard (puppy-guard?) a moment later, Teikō’s shoulder repeatedly bumping into my hip to steer me around. I assumed that he’d learned the behavior from being Yatsu’s guide dog, because even with Mr. Ukki’s foliage blocking my line of sight, I didn’t exactly need help avoiding tables or chairs.

“You have a visitor, Kakashi-kun,” Teikō announced as we approached.

“Thanks, Teikō,” Kakashi’s voice replied from somewhere past Mr. Ukki’s leaves. Okay, so maybe I did need a guide. I tilted the plant out of the way, holding it with only my right arm, while Kakashi waved and said, “Hi, Kei.”

Once I was guided to Kakashi and Yatsu’s corner, I set Mr. Ukki’s pot on the floor and did a quick head count.

In addition to the two shinobi I had been expecting, Urushi and Akino were curled up under the table alongside Shinkō and Chukō. Kakashi and Yatsu, however, we not paying the dogs the least bit of attention—instead, the two of them were carefully stitching something on a pair of neckerchiefs. One of them was Teikō’s, going by the color, and the indigo one belonged to Chukō.

“So, what are you two doing?” I asked, peering at their work like the busybody I totally was.

And you finally acknowledge it. Will wonders never cease?

Shut up.

Kakashi beckoned for me to sit down in the chair next to him, so I did. “See this?” he asked.

If he was talking about the fact that the scarf he had in his hands was on the bluish side of indigo, then I did see what he was talking about. If not, then nope. “The fraying at the edges?”

“No, that’s because one of the puppies chewed on it,” Yatsu said, not looking up from his careful work. It wasn’t like there was much point to him actually looking at what he was working on, given his blindness, but apparently some habits were harder to break than others.
“Then I don’t know what you’re talking about,” I said. My skill with sewing started and ended at the extreme basic end—I could patch a hole or mend a hem, but I didn’t create original work by any means.

“Yatsu-san wanted me to stitch the Inuzuka clan symbol onto their scarves,” Kakashi said, turning the scarf over so I could see the twin red Inuzuka fangs, in a white circle. “I’m still working on learning how to embroider, but Yatsu-san doesn’t trust any of the dogs to show him the right color.”

“So, Yatsu can embroider but he can’t see any of the colors he wants,” I began slowly, “while you can see but can’t embroider.”

“Can’t yet,” Kakashi corrected me. Since his headband wasn’t pulled down like it usually was, his Sharingan eye opened slowly so he could copy Yatsu’s steady movements.

If only I could get Obito and Kakashi to copy other people’s jutsu at some point, they would finally live up to the bloodline’s name. Like, copying from me hardly counted when I could demonstrate all the live-long day if they needed it.

After a moment’s thought, I remembered why I’d come here in the first place. “Hey, Kakashi, can I ask you to take care of Mr. Ukki for me?”

“You just did,” Kakashi pointed out, but he did put down his sewing and sweep his gaze over the overgrown bamboo plant. “Why?”

“Hayate and I are heading out of town on a mission, so I’m not going to be able to water him or anything,” I explained, shrugging.

“And you decided to ask me?” Kakashi’s tone managed not to be insulting, but he did still sound a bit confused. “I’ll take him, sure, but I honestly expected you to go to Rin first.”

Yeah, well. Um. In hindsight, I hadn’t thought this through, and scrambled for an excuse I didn’t find. So I slowly brought my hands to my face and mumbled, “I forgot.”

Swing and a miss.

Shut up.

Yatsu snorted, but tried playing it off with a, “Sorry, dust.”

I took a deep breath and tried again, because obviously any social graces or situational awareness I’d picked up over the last eighteen years had fled while I wasn’t paying attention. Honesty tended to serve me better than random scrambling. “I wanted to check in on you after that last mission. And I guess I picked a kinda dumb excuse for it.”

“Teammates don’t need reasons to hover,” Yatsu said, while Kakashi ducked his head with a barely-audible cough. Tying off one last stitch on Teikō’s scarf, Yatsu held it up and asked, “Does this look right?”

Like on Kakashi’s—or more accurately, Chukō’s—scarf, there was a large white circle in the middle of the orange fabric. Aside from a few loose threads that could be clipped, the red Inuzuka fangs stood out like blood. It was a stark look, and Teikō pushed his nose against the fabric.

“It looks fine, but I have to try it,” Teikō said, and puffed air out his nose. The scarf rippled, and Teikō went on, “It’s much better than the ones you used to make.”
“That is a backhanded compliment if I’ve ever heard one.” Yatsu scratched behind Teikō’s ears before he tied the scarf around the dog’s neck.

As soon as the scarf was secure, Teikō immediately bounded over to the nearest clear space on the floor and started testing Yatsu’s knots by rolling around. I was pretty sure I heard the word “mine” being repeated like a mantra as he went, shedding short brown hairs everywhere he went.

“How long have you known how to sew?” I asked Yatsu, since it seemed like a safe topic.

Yatsu, who was bending down to unfasten Shinkō’s scarf, cracked his head on the underside of the table and made the sewing equipment jump. Rubbing his head, he sat up and said, “I first learned to sew when I was a child. Though, as Teikō mentioned, there was...difficulty, when I first lost my eyes.”

He laid Shinkō’s olive-green scarf flat on the table and started running his hands over it.

I was itching to ask him how he’d lost his eyes, and Yatsu turned his head toward me with a faintly amused expression. I fidgeted, unsure of how to phrase the question so I wasn’t rude—but I was curious, dammit.

“She wants to ask you how you lost your eyes,” Kakashi said, finishing up the red fangs on Chukō’s scarf.

“Kakashi,” I said, but I couldn’t exactly deny it.

“Am I wrong?” Kakashi challenged.

I deflated. “Well, no, but...Yatsu-san, I don’t want to ask if it’s not something you want to talk about.”

Yatsu tilted his head to one side, still inspecting the fabric for random frays or tears with his fingertips. “That mission happened before either of you were born. Actually, I thought you’d know about it already.” If he’d had eyes and hadn’t also been wearing a blindfold, I imagined he’d be giving Kakashi a pointed look.

“You didn’t give me permission out loud, so I didn’t tell her much,” Kakashi replied to Yatsu’s unasked question.

“...The short version is that I overestimated myself on a mission,” Yatsu said, and Teikō put his huge head on his master’s lap. It couldn’t have been much more obvious that he was censoring what had actually happened, but I wasn’t sure if it was to spare himself having to explain those parts of the story or if he didn’t think we could handle it. “If Fuse hadn’t, ah, had some strong objections to my decisions, I would have been killed after my eyes were extracted. But even with her help, the damage was done.

“As in your team’s case, I faced...consequences, for failing to uphold the Main House’s security procedures.” Yatsu’s hand drifted to where, if I could see his forehead, I would have spotted the Caged Bird Seal. I could certainly feel it. “I may have lost my temper while recovering from my injuries. I believe the details would bore you, but ultimately I was given a choice to either submit to my new place among my clansmen, or to try my luck on my own—with restrictions.

“My choice was obvious,” Yatsu said, scratching behind Teikō’s ears. “Fuse was kind enough to take me in despite the trouble I had caused her—and continued to cause her—while I relearned many of my old skills.”
I glanced at Kakashi, but he’d already gone back to his sewing. He’d clearly heard this story before, and it wasn’t like Yatsu particularly cared about eye contact.

In a way, it did confirm some of my darker suspicions about large, old clans like the Hyūga. While the Uchiha clan had about as many members, they didn’t have the same kind of leadership continuity as the Hyūga due to Madara’s rather spectacular “fuck you” to the rest of Konoha. The weight of years simply didn’t press down on the heads of the Uchiha clan the same way, and there was no formalized Branch House with slave-making tattoos and other fun developments. And besides that, the Uchiha weren’t all born with the Sharingan unlocked like the Hyūga were.

Basically, Konoha got two large groups of insular, moderately paranoid super-soldiers for the low price of iron-fisted control over an unfortunate few. Branch House members didn’t face starvation on the streets or anything so mundane—rather, they faced a possible lobotomy-by-seal whenever they pissed off someone who knew how to activate the Caged Bird Seal. Their cage was a golden one, but still a cage.

About the only positive thing I could think, in the face of Yatsu’s story, was that at least the Hyūga clan hadn’t pulled his eyes out as the price for leaving them behind. He’d lost those already, and they hadn’t decided to kill him either.

(Clan or not, the Third Hokage would probably have gone apoplectic with rage if the Hyūga had “disappeared” one of their own. Or rather, the Branch House members within ANBU would have made sure he did.)

“Probably not the best sort of story to hear just before a mission,” Yatsu said mildly, when the silence stretched long enough to be awkward. He tilted his head toward me and added, “But I have faith in your ability to recover.”

...Eh?

As though sensing my confusion, Yatsu went on, “I realize that losing my sight and your arm’s condition are very different, but you can work around that injury, Keisuke-kun.”

Oh. There I went, being egotistical enough to think that Yatsu shared that story just because I was curious. He had—had always had—his own reasons for what he did. The weight of that knowledge—that I was being trusted with something so painful—settled on my shoulders like armor, or a chain, and I sank down in my seat in mingled shame and gratitude.

I needed to work on more than just my arm. My attitude needed some recalibrating, too. My arm was a liability in the field, but I just...I didn’t know, but my thoughtlessness could have been incredibly rude if Yatsu had chosen to take it that way.

“I’m not...totally sure I deserve to hear that,” I said quietly, fiddling with the tablecloth. Akino got up and stuck his muzzle up against my twitching fingers, putting his head on top of them to make them stop.

A hand came down on my shoulder and squeezed. I looked up and met Kakashi’s eyes, and he said, “I think you do. And you’re not alone in this. I’m here, and so are Obito, and Rin, and Hayate, and Sensei...and Yatsu and Fuse.”

Yatsu inclined his head. “My offer is open, even if you don’t have time for it now.”

I wasn’t sure what to say aside from, “Thank you.” But Yatsu had a point, and I did need to get going.
Kakashi pulled back and I got to my feet, offering one last affectionate scratch to every dog who wanted one. Akino first, of course, or else I wouldn’t have been able to get up. Yatsu didn’t move, since he seemed to have said his piece, so I figured it was time to get the ball rolling on the last two things I needed to do before I left.

“Kei,” Kakashi said, just as I reached the door.

I spun on my heel, turning to face him and the rest of the occupants of the sewing table. “Yeah?”

His chakra seemed to struggle for maybe a quarter of a second, but all he said was, “Take care of yourself out there.”

I gave him a quick thumbs-up and a grin. “I’ll be fine, but thanks.”

I was still pretty sure I heard Yatsu start to laugh just as the doors swung closed, and I spared maybe a half a thought for the cause—but really, I’d used up my curiosity allotment for the day. I still needed to drop in on the kids and on Rin, to let them all know that I was going to be out for anywhere from a month to two of them.

By the time it was time for everyone to meet up at the gates, I’d put my tutoring sessions and therapy appointments on hold until further notice. And, despite a ten-minute detour to gather all of the supplies I wanted to bring along that I hadn’t already packed away—or forgotten about earlier—I was still the first one at the meeting place.

There was something a little worrying about that.

But over the course of the next twenty minutes or so, everyone else sort of wandered in. Yūgao was first, followed shortly by Hayate and Iruka, and the merchant duo managed to avoid making an appearance for almost an entire hour.

And since no one knew I’d been late, the ninjas of our merry circus band got to meet the full force of my Disappointed Face.

It was pretty similar to my normal face, except for the careful raising of one eyebrow and a tiny, itty-bitty bit of tightly directed killing intent. Or rather, chakra pressure—I didn’t actually want to hurt anyone, after all. And people did tend to get twitchy if the resident jinchūriki started to broadcast dangerous impulses like that.

“Did Inoichi-sensei seriously let you three show up late to missions?” I asked the three of them, genuinely irritated.

It was probably for the best that none of them protested. I felt a little spark of defiance from Hayate—who basically never got lectures from me—but I stared him down until it went away. Yūgao and Iruka didn’t have any reason to expect family favoritism from me, so they kept their thoughts to themselves more effectively.

Still, no reason to belabor the point. “Don’t let it happen again. Anyway, did all of you pack what you needed?”

I got three somewhat chastised nods in return.

“Good.” I sighed aloud. “Then all we need to do is wait for our clients.”

Hayate grumbled under his breath, “What’s taking them so long?”
And about forty minutes later, we got our answers in the form of two sets of hoof beats.

The merchant Gekkō duo had decided that walking was for people who’d survive a ninja pace. Not a bad thought to have, given how much time we’d waste trying to get to Kitano Town if we just hoofed it at a civilian walking pace. Since this was a mission where the clients insisted on coming along, I’d actually been worried that I’d have to order people to carry them if they got tired.

But it appeared that the Kitano Town Gekkō siblings were taking “hoofing it” literally.

Compared to the other day, Kōsuke and Tsukiko were both wearing practical riding clothes—which, in the traditional world they seemed to live in, meant hakama pulled out of the last century and all of their crap piled up on their horses’ saddles like they were settlers on the new frontier. Kōsuke wore what looked like a bokken on his hip, while Tsukiko had a naginata tied to her back—and the pole was long enough that I wondered how the horse was getting along with it.

The two of them slid off of their respective mounts, and Kōsuke demanded, “So are we leaving or what?” He stuck his chin out as though challenging me to say anything about how late they’d been.

I decided not to dignify that attitude with a response. I had more important things to think about. “Hayate, you’re on point. Iruka-kun, Yūgao-chan, flanks. Tsukiko-san, Kōsuke-san, set the pace.”

Kōsuke bristled. “You can’t tell me what to do, you—”

“Don’t,” Hayate interrupted, cutting Kōsuke off immediately. Behind Hayate’s back, Yūgao and Iruka exchanged grim looks while the boys glared at each other. Tsukiko was a serene island in the middle of all the barely-hidden strife, which made me suspicious to say the least.

Kōsuke jerked his head away in a huff, as though trying to shake off Hayate’s glare. Then, he said to me, “Don’t talk to me like we’re friends. It’s ‘Gekkō-san’ or nothing.”

Oh, like that wasn’t going to be confusing as all hell.

Hayate looked briefly confused—shinobi culture was the product of an era where people had repeatedly gotten killed over family names, and thus tended not to include that little detail when meeting strangers who could pose a threat. In the Clan Wars era, just being an Uchiha or an Inuzuka or a Senju could get people murdered by an opposing clan with zero provocation. And cracking open a history book could tell anyone that the really bloodstained parts of shinobi history weren’t really so far in the past.

While the Land of Fire’s shinobi populations had integrated pretty well with the civilian backgrounds of many of its citizens, shinobi could choose to use personal or family names with relatively little significant difference in terms of etiquette.

It was one of those weird cultural quirks that seemed to be in the process of fading, but wasn’t gone yet.

“Then I choose ‘nothing.’” Hayate concluded after only a moment’s pause, drawing Kōsuke’s attention back toward him. My brother crossed his arms over his chest and said, “I don’t have anything to say to you.”

Well, this was going to be a fun trip.

“Did Tsuruya leave you two behind?” I asked, though I was mostly speaking to Tsukiko. Kōsuke was too busy glaring at Hayate to pay attention.
“Yes,” Tsukiko replied, inclining her head. “The horses didn’t react well to her, so she sends her apologies.”

Dang. I’d known horses were a bit skittish, but Tsuruya wasn’t exactly the queen of killer auras or anything like that. I didn’t want to see what would happen if my team started throwing jutsu around on the road. ‘Panic’ would probably be an understatement of the results.

It was just one of those little niggling details of civilian life that, as a shinobi, I generally didn’t need to care about. Like having to avoid crowds on the street.

“Well, whatever,” I said with a shrug. “We’re good to go.”

Kōsuke climbed back onto his horse and yanked hard on his horse’s reins, and the big brown beastie did a quick, unhappy tap dance as a result. After a moment to collect himself, Kōsuke scowled at the rest of us and kicked his horse into a canter, heading for the gates and through them lickety-split.

Tsukiko took off after him in a moment, while I sighed and gestured for my team to move out. Yūgao and Iruka took off through the gate, and Hayate gave me one last long-suffering look before running off ahead to take point.

I probably should have just let these other Gekkō kids muddle their way through whatever was going on in Kitano Town. It would have been better for my blood pressure, at least. But now I was invested, and there was nothing else for it.

We’d beat the shit out of these bandits and get to the bottom of everything.

Day one went thus:

We traveled fairly well for the first day, though the merchant duo needed to change horses halfway through. Something about animal welfare, which made sense since there wasn’t a single other creature that could quite compete with the stamina of a trained human. Particularly a ninja.

Speaking of animals, it was also the first night that Kōsuke woke everyone who didn’t take middle watch—specifically, when he found a frog in his bedroll and apparently decided that this meant he was being murdered.

I retrieved the frog and let it go in the woods, all while backed by a screaming merchant soundtrack. And Hayate spent the night after that on middle watch because I knew he was the one behind it.

Day two:

I caught Kōsuke playing with a dog whistle—no idea where he’d gotten it, since they weren’t popular in the Land of Fire for reasons starting with “I” and ending with “-nuzuka.” But since apparently that sound range grated on Iruka’s nerves about the same way that nails on chalkboard did on mine, I confiscated the offending device and informed Kōsuke that if we were attacked by wolves, it would be his fault.

“Then you can control—and offend—your own animals,” I said. “When you are safely back home and around canines that don’t want to eat you.”
Day three:

If there had been more deaths of dysentery, it would have been just like Oregon Trail without the wagons.

It took us a full week to get there, and by that time everyone was just done with the whole concept of being in proximity to each other.

Kitano Town was a fairly large trading town, with a large central road that ran north and south and branched off in a hundred different little side-roads on the other axis. While it was hard to call Konoha a planned city—we basically lived in a giant circle bisected by four different main roads—I still would say it was easier to understand my hometown’s layout than this. Most of the buildings followed a more traditional outward layout, with sweeping roofs and straight walls that didn’t suit my Konoha-born aesthetic sense at all.

There was just enough off about this place to remind me how far from home we were.

Once we found the nearest available stable, Tsukiko and Kōsuke dismounted and led their horses to the care of the nearest stable-hand. Since I’d seen their Pony Express impression all week, and they were on the seventh beasts since we’d started, I imagined that the two of them would walk like drunken cowboys once they left.

Neither of them did, to my disappointment.

“Our home is this way,” Tsukiko said, and beckoned for us to follow her through the town. Kōsuke, as was typical, had already charged off with no regard for the rest of us.

“Is there anything we need to know about this town?” I prompted, as she strode on.

“No,” she said as we turned one of the myriad blind corners in town.

I could practically feel Hayate roll his eyes. “Oh, that’s helpful.”

And neither was his attitude. I needed to pull my brother aside and talk to him as soon as I could, because clearly our talk from before the mission hadn’t sunk in.

As the afternoon sun beat down on us, Tsukiko finally came to a stop in front of a set of wooden gates that cut the associated house off from the rest of the neighborhood.

To be clear, rich people’s houses in Konoha also had two-meter mortar walls to separate the family inside from all of the riffraff outside. It protected the family’s fish pond, which I could hear burbling even through the gate, and it probably kept the family dog from getting loose. Other than that, though, my brain was helpfully providing me with a good dozen ways to breach the building—starting with just jumping the wall.

Tsukiko pushed the gate open, since one of them was already swinging freely. We didn’t need to be told that Kōsuke had arrived first.

Completely expressionless, Tsukiko stopped halfway up the path to the house and said, “If you wait in the garden, my family will provide snacks and tea.”

And right after that, we were bundled into the garden like errant children, listening to the sweet serenade of ten different voices screaming the inside of the house down. It was about as relaxing as being in the same room as a band saw going at full speed.
Yūgao and Iruka sat on the roof, overlooking the house but with better lines of sight, as Hayate and I brought all the tea things up to them. None of us really wanted to have to listen to the shouting match going on inside, and the roof put an extra meter or so of air and wood between us and a bunch of angry chakra signatures, instead of a rice paper screen.

The gist of things basically boiled down to anti-shinobi sentiment clashing with the family’s clear need for shinobi assistance. Thus, shrieking chaos.

“Hayate,” I began, while the bubbling background noise of stupid people died down for a moment. “What’s going on here?”

“Nothing,” Hayate said, and stuffed one of the sakuramochi into his mouth to avoid having to say much else. Over their respective samples of dorayaki and daifuku, Iruka and Yūgao exchanged wary looks with each other from behind Hayate’s back.

Teenagers, I thought, and appreciated the irony of that statement. I didn’t exactly have a ton of high ground there, so there was no point in saying that kind of thing out loud.

“Hayate-kun?” Yūgao asked.

Hayate looked away from the rest of us, grumbling under his breath.

Well, it was probably safe to assume he knew what I wanted to talk to him about. “Hayate, we’ve talked about this a few times. I know you don’t like our clients, but you didn’t like the merchant decoy mission you went on a couple of years ago either. What’s the part that’s really throwing you off?”

For a moment, I didn’t think he was going to answer. Hayate kicked his legs idly at the edge of the roof, still not looking at any of us, but said as I was about to give up, “The other clients didn’t matter.”

I tilted my head to one side. “I...didn’t realize you still cared what Kōsuke and Tsukiko thought.”

“I don’t,” Hayate snapped, then subsided. When he’d taken a couple of deep breaths to calm himself down again, he said, “But these people—they’ve got the same name, and they’re sort of like us, so I guess I thought they’d be less stupid. They’re family, right? So how the fuck are they so—” Hayate bit off the rest and just dropped his head into his hands.

You might as well ask why Kurama didn’t get along with anyone else until a few years ago. It happens.

“When I was a kid, we only ever talked about what Mom’s family might’ve been like,” Hayate said, though his voice was muffled by his hands. “I guess I just thought...I don’t know.”

“They don’t really know you, though?” Iruka broke in, hesitant. “I mean, I don’t really know much about extended family stuff, but none of you got any chance to know each other before this.”

“So if the third thing Kōsuke says is to call my sister a monster,” Hayate said, incredulous, “I should just forgive that?”

Iruka held his hands up defensively. “I didn’t say that.”

“No, but I did,” I pointed out. As Hayate redirected his look of betrayed disbelief to me, I went on, “And I’m asking you to ignore him from now on.”
Hayate scowled. “No.”

I frowned back. “Hayate—”

Hayate stood up, shaking his head. “Just no, Sis. Look I’ll—I’m just going to scout the area. Don’t wait for me.” Without a further word, he leapt off the roof and headed off into Kitano Town.

Well, shit. I turned to the other two people I could count on in this blasted border town. “Yūgao-chan?”

She hesitated. “I...probably shouldn’t go after him right now. Hayate-kun can take care of himself, so he should be okay.”

“I’m not worried about Hayate’s safety in this town,” I said to Yūgao. “I’m worried about trouble finding him and getting its face beaten in.”

“Then I should go,” Iruka said.

Yūgao bit her lip. “Are you sure?”

“I’m not going to be able to help with any negotiations, because no one here respects genin anyway,” Iruka pointed out. “And Hayate listens to me at least some of the time, so I should be able to talk him down a bit.”

Yūgao flicked Iruka’s shoulder, but the tension was gone now that Iruka was stepping up. “You could be a chūnin by now if you wanted to.”

“Yeah, well,” Iruka mumbled with a shrug. “I don’t need to be. And now I can do this, so you two—well, you can do what you have to. I’ll be back soon.”

And then there were two.

“Sorry about this, Yūgao-chan,” I said with a sigh. “We dragged you and Iruka into this...family drama. You shouldn’t have to deal with this headache.”

“It’s fine,” Yūgao said, but she wasn’t particularly convincing. “And anyway, I think it might be good training for later.”

“Later?”

Yūgao shrugged, but answered in a much quieter voice, “I’m thinking of joining ANBU eventually.”

“As a medic?” I asked, since that was what I’d seen Yūgao practice.

“No, I’m thinking...” Yūgao shrugged. “I could be a medic, but I don’t really want to train for that right now. I’m probably behind most of the candidates anyway.”

Eh? “Yūgao-chan, there really aren’t that many medics. Anywhere.”

“As a medic,” Yūgao replied.

“...Yamato’s Tsunade’s adopted son. Or heir. It’d be weird if he wasn’t trained in that direction.”

Though I probably needed to keep an eye on him to see if he eventually picked up Tsunade’s monstrous strength. I didn’t know when he’d have the time to pick it up, but if Sakura could do it, Yamato probably could give it a shot.
“Yeah, well…” Yūgao sighed, flushing slightly. “I don’t want to copy you so much.”

Wait. Kenjutsu, sensing, medi—well, okay. Yes, admittedly our respective skillsets had a lot of overlap, but there wasn’t anything wrong with that. “There’s no shame in being a generalist. And all of the skills are useful, so you can do whatever you want as you get stronger. If you have a ton of skills, you can’t get stuck in just one role.”

“But I want to join ANBU, and they need me to be really good at what I get selected for,” Yūgao explained. “I don’t have time to just become a so-so medic or a so-so kenjutsu expert. I need to get better faster if I want to be able to run those missions. I can’t just…do whatever.”

As someone who was proudly in the “do whatever” camp, I probably didn’t really have much insight into Yūgao’s point of view. I’d gotten Isobu halfway through my development, so it wasn’t like I could say that I’d hit S-rank on my own merits like Obito and Kakashi had. But… “If you want to get stronger, I can give you a few recommendations. I can’t make you do anything, and I guess some of it requires Inoichi-sensei’s permission, but there are options.”

The first of them involved Gai, whom Yūgao had already met. But she hadn’t put her back into training at the time, and it was clear that she was much more likely to take things seriously this time.

Yūgao blinked at me. “Really?”

I nodded.

“Then I’ll take you up on it,” Yūgao said firmly. “I won’t let you down.”

...As someone who tended not to really set expectations, I was really more worried about Yūgao disappointing herself; but didn’t say it out loud. If Yūgao needed a bit of extrinsic motivation, I didn’t mind being the person she projected on.

We sat around for a while after that business was settled, eating the remainder of the tea cakes and drinking all of the tea, and the voices below us eventually quieted down somewhat.

Then Tsukiko’s voice called out from the porch we’d abandoned, saying, “You can come in now.”

Given the barely-hidden hostility between the merchant Gekkō siblings and my team, it was probably inevitable that I would get a bad first impression of the rest of the family. But that, to be blunt, was merely my end of the issue, which could change over time if the others had defied the expectations I was building for them.

They didn’t.

The easiest way to explain the Kitano Town Gekkō family would be to call them a study in contrasts. While the matriarch of the clan, Umeko, was as cold and proud as Cinderella’s evil stepmother, only four other people in the room shared her demeanor. Sure, two of them were Tsukiko and Kōsuke—who seemed to have turned into a particularly surly bottom-feeder—but the other two could only be their parents. I definitely felt like I was looking at a miniature fiefdom, as run by the gnarled fingers of one sixty-year-old woman.

Aside from the-picture perfect family, though, there was a somewhat rougher pair at the far side of the room, acting as though they weren’t associated with the other five. One of them was a man who was, oh, probably three or four years older than me with his hand in a cast, and the other was a woman who was probably old enough to be his wife. Neither of them looked happy, and I kept on eye on them for that alone.
“I thought there would be more of you,” said the man to her right, pushing his glasses further up the bridge of his nose.

To one side, there was a man with a high forehead and square jaw that seemed to be common between the two of them. Behind his glasses, I got the impression that he was measuring Yūgao and me up against some strange standard, and that we had failed somehow.

“I’m sorry. You are…?” I prompted, because I liked to pretend that I had manners.

“Shirosuke Gekkō,” the man replied, his eyes narrowing slightly. He sniffed and said, “You’ve met my children.”

That we did. “Yes. They were kind enough to guide us here.” What I did not say was that they had been complete brats and that we could have found a town along a main road in the Land of Fire with no guidance. I mean, seriously. “My team has split up to explore the town and determine any possible points of weakness in case the bandits approach. You will be meeting the others after they complete their assignment.”

Shirosuke made a noise that sounded like something out of an irked Uchiha. But what he actually said was, “And your name?”

Well, since he wasn’t looking over my shoulder and addressing Yūgao… “Keisuke Gekkō, jōnin of Konoha.”

Kōsuke briefly looked like he wanted to say something, so much so that he almost looked like he was going to explode, but a quelling look from his mother silenced him before he could get started. I assumed that the shouting match from earlier had included the details that had made Kōsuke hate me inside of ten minutes.

But Shirosuke and Kōsuke’s mother stared, even if each of them recovered relatively quickly from whatever shock my name had induced. So the name had meant something. It could have been the shared last name, too, but…

Well. They weren’t going to tell me, so I was free to speculate.

I pretended not to notice.

Umeko’s habitual frown deepened. “That was my husband’s name.”

I didn’t let my blank mask shift. Probably would have been easier with an actual mask like Kakashi’s, but I had gotten a crash course refresher on how not to show annoyance on the trip here. “That is quite a coincidence, Gekkō-san.”

Kōsuke, I noticed, had picked up a scowl to match his old man’s. Probably because there did seem to be something to get the old woman to talk, and it wasn’t him she was paying attention to. On a more encouraging note, the pair in the corner were looking more interested, so I decided not to worry about it.

“It would be most efficient to discuss the mission,” I said, as though none of that had happened.

Rest assured that I will openly remember that.

Oh, I don’t intend to let that go, either. Luckily, we may have less-stuffy family members to interrogate after this.
And so, while my feet slowly went numb underneath me, I got The Story.

Shirosuke spoke at length of the bandit menace, speaking of terrible raids on the roads that led out of the Land of Fire and the terrible powers some of the bandits seemed to have. Some of them could even appear in two places at once! Or spit fire! Or summon great cracks in the earth to foul up wagon tires and scare horses and oxen away from the caravans! It was all quite dramatic the way he told it.

You know, if I hadn’t been a ninja.

And the entire time he spoke, I only got three relevant data points.

One: The bandits were based in the hills to the north of Kitano Town, or at the very least attacks seemed to cluster there. Lacking an appropriate map of the area small enough to have the Gekkō family just point out all the attack sites, I had to go with my gut and assume their stories were accurate until proven bullshit.

Two: The bandits were definitely ninjas. Not all of them, necessarily, but enough that they didn’t seem to give a crap if their prey repeatedly lives to trade again another day.

Three: Several different members of the family were really bloodthirsty.

The rest of it could be summed up as “blah blah blah.”

“Give me five minutes with the leader of these—” was about as far as Kōsuke got before the power of four combined glares shut him up.

For someone whose only weapon on the road had been made of bamboo, he was bursting with confidence. Which, if I was properly correlating chakra with combat ability even in a non-shinobi subject, mostly meant Kōsuke would be the first relative to actually be killed by bandit activity the second he slipped his leash.

“That won’t be necessary.” I said serenely. “There’s no need to risk anyone else being hurt. My team can take care of the problem quickly and efficiently.” I paused, because the young man in the corner—the one who wasn’t Kōsuke and therefore the person I was going to cut a bit more slack—had been building a constant, violent urge that didn’t feel anything like Kōsuke’s concentrated self-righteousness.

Shirosuke followed my gaze, then said, “Those two are Sanosuke and Megumi, shinobi-san. They’ll lead you closer to the bandits’ territory so this ugly business can be over as soon as possible.”

And he wouldn’t even acknowledge my name in the bargain. What a pleasant person.

“Then let’s get payment out of the way,” I said, disguising my eagerness to get this whole thing over with already. “Fifty thousand ryō, payable to Konohagakure upon completion of the mission. Is this acceptable?”

“Yes, shinobi-san,” Shirosuke said, and that was more or less the end of the most awkward family reunion since Obito met Madara.

But as soon as Yūgao and I got out of there to find an inn—like fuck were we staying in that stifling “Did you need something?” I asked, perhaps a bit more brusquely than I needed to.

So the mask was slipping. After meeting the thoroughly unpleasant people who were apparently the only Kitano Town relatives Hayate and I had, I wasn’t in a terrible rush to spend more time with them.

Sanosuke was a few centimeters taller than me, with hair that really reminded me of the epic spikes Kakashi could pull off—only in black. He had a slouch that made me think he was a street punk playing dress-up in some ways, or perhaps that he just hated all the airs his family put on just because they were rich. There was something sharper, keener in his expression than what I had seen with the other members of his family. A spark of life instead of spite.

Megumi...well, calling her foxlike probably would have pissed Kurama off, but she was someone I automatically felt a certain kinship. She was probably a few years older than Sanosuke, but I got the impression that the core part of her nature was compassion, in a way that reminded me a bit of Rin, and Kushina, and maybe bits of myself on a good day.

And yet, something about them both came across as...brittle. Like they were waiting for the other shoe to drop, somewhere, except that I didn’t know what the first shoe had been.

Sanosuke managed to pull himself together first. “Look, I get it if you probably don’t wanna deal with any of us after that...whatever the hell that was in there.” He stuck out his un-busted hand for me to shake, to my surprise. “But on behalf of my idiot family, I’m glad you’re here to help us.”

I don’t like him.

Well, that was predictable. Still, I shook his hand anyway. “Thanks. By the way, this is Yūgao Uzuki.”

Yūgao offered a shy wave, which seemed to meet general approval. Okay then.

I probably would have said something about the family’s bizarre obsession with the “suke” syllable in so many different names, or maybe asked if they knew a guy named Wataru. Really, I could have asked anything at all, just out of sheer relief that someone I was nominally working for appeared to be a decent person.

But I didn’t, because an explosion sounded on the road leading toward the Land of Grass, and my brother’s chakra was right in the thick of it.

Allow me.

Of course. And my eyes itched as Isobu’s chakra bled into them, just a bit. Just enough to shift my eyes away from their normal black.

Yūgao and I ditched the two non-jerk maybe-relatives immediately, darting toward the source of the sound. As fun as finding out that some people are not assholes was for us, my brother was fighting someone. There are such things as priorities. I’m good at those at least some of the time.

And to my immense relief, the first thing we heard as we approached the roadside crater was Hayate’s voice saying, in quite a tizzy, “What the fucking hell was that?”

“Hayate-kun!” Yūgao shouted as we truly rejoined the rest of our team.
Hayate turned, and was promptly bowled over by his purple-haired teammate. Iruka, who was not caught up in ranting at the sky, managed to avoid being knocked flat.

“What happened?” I demanded of Iruka, while Yūgao tried to choke my brother to death in a hug.

“Hayate found a couple of people pretending to be civilians, but they were shinobi. Maybe missing-nin, since I didn’t really hear any accent or anything before they flipped out,” Iruka reported instantly, having clearly resigned himself to my command.

“And?” I prompted, not really caring who answered.

And at that point, Yūgao let Hayate up for air. And he wasn’t any less upset than he’d been about fifteen seconds previous, but he could articulate it better this time.

“They thought I was you!” Hayate complained, and it took me a moment to realize what he was talking about.

Just a bit too long, in fact, because Iruka filled in, “I definitely heard them scream ‘Tidal Blade’ at least once. And then the road blew up, and I kinda didn’t hear a lot else.”

“I can’t—argh! Does that mean every time I took a mission, it got credited to you?” Hayate asked, sounding crushed.

I didn’t exactly have a recent copy of the Bingo Book on hand but…well. I winced and said, “Maybe?”

Hayate flopped back to the ground with a loud groan. “Dammit.”

Maybe if I re-checked my more recent Bingo Book entries, I’d be able to say for sure. Enemy intelligence couldn’t possibly be that terrible, could it?

That was when I knew that I was caught up in Hayate’s moping, because both of us were more concerned that Hayate didn’t have his own Bingo Book entry than the fact that he’d narrowly avoided being blown up. We probably needed our heads checked when we got home.

But in the meantime, Iruka and I dropped to our heels next to Hayate. I reached out and patted his shoulder. “Come on, I can buy us dinner. Then maybe we can make training plans so you can get your own entry.”

“I’m gonna grow my hair out,” Hayate grumbled. “Maybe grow a beard or something.”

I tried to imagine it. A beard made of pure sulkiness. And I guess that tipped me over the edge because I had to choke down a laugh.

“You’re mean.” But Hayate did stop moping and all of us got to our feet. “Screw it, dinner sounds a lot better than this.”

“I’ll let you borrow one of my hair ties,” Iruka said, grinning.

Hayate sighed. “Thanks.”

So after repairing the damage to the road with Earth jutsu, we retired to Kitano Town to rest, regroup, and plan an avenue of attack. If that was how the bandits were going to react to the Tidal Blade moniker, I couldn’t wait to see how they’d deal with the real thing.
This chapter's pacing is all over the place. It's subtitle should be "Kei indulges in a bunch of sidequests before talking a longer sidequest" or something, but that's not terribly snappy.

Also: The payoff of a joke two actual years in the making.

(The song title for this one is "Try Everything" from Zootopia.)

Hopefully the next chapter doesn't jump around quite as much. They're mostly going to be busting heads instead of talking.

Chapter Notes

This chapter's title is from the second Lion King movie!

Here’s the thing: From my experience, there were two basic ways to remove a fortified position. The first was to break the walls and lay waste to everyone hiding behind the defenses, in a typical siege right out of the Land of Fire’s non-ninja playbook. The second was to get rid of a fortress via deception, like by bribing a guard at the right time.

But while I’d done both at one time or another—thank you, Gai—I’d never done it with this particular team.

My brother’s skillset and Yūgao’s had significant overlap issues with mine. While neither of them were jinchūriki, they both specialized in kenjutsu with some ninjutsu filler (or, in Yūgao’s case, the opposite) and whatever other skills would carry them over the threshold to combat effectiveness. I could give both of them my explosive tags or whatever else I had on hand, but it didn’t really change the fact that I was used to working with people with entirely different skills.

Iruka, meanwhile, could use pre-prepared seals—mine, in this case—in his traps. Which, when on the offensive, was probably somewhat less than useful. It was always more effective to prepare the battlefield ahead of time, lacing the kill zone with mines or razor wire, than to try and rig something up in the middle of a fight.

And then there was me. I was more or less capable of all the things the rest of my team could do, but couldn’t be in more than one place at full effectiveness, and was effectively stuck without access to the V1 or V2 cloaks. I hadn’t gotten around to learning the Shadow Clone jutsu, and Water Clones just didn’t seem up to the task.

“And you’re sure they don’t just hang out all over the countryside?” I asked Sano—as he liked to be called—just to be sure. What had been a vague invite to get to know Sano and Megumi better had turned into a joint planning session of sorts.

Sure, out on the road toward the aforementioned bandit stronghold wasn’t the best place, but my team had three sensors. We weren’t going to be getting any nasty surprises of the sapient kind.

“None of the outlying farms said anything about raids since March,” Sano replied, eying my topographical map carefully in the firelight. “So we’re going with the idea that they’ve hold up in one spot. Gangs like these tend to have a bandit king or somethin’, instead of a bunch of chiefs.”
“Speaking from experience?” Yūgao asked, taking the words right out of my mouth.

Sano shrugged as though the question hardly mattered. “Maybe a bit, since my hometown’s the one surrounded. Still fits the pattern.”

Hayate, who had been setting up our campsite, wandered over and dropped into a crouch next to the three of us. “Do we have a plan?”

I grimaced inwardly. It still amounted to “stuff Sano and Megumi in a hidey-hole and then wreck the place ourselves,” but that was a plan of sorts. Keep the civvies safe, deal with the bandits. At least those were objectives, right?

Still, my brother deserved an answer. “Yeah, though we don’t have a lot to go on.”

Hayate blinked slowly. “Improv?”

“Improv,” I sighed. I hated having to make plans up on the fly, but it didn’t seem like we had any choice. Without forward observers, scouts, or any border resources in the area, we were basically on our own.

...Wait a damn minute. I managed to avoid swearing aloud at my lapse, but it was a close thing.

“Okay, the nearest border posting is here”—and I brought my finger down on a dot on the political map, located well back from the Kusa border—“which is what, ten kilometers from here?”

“Probably,” Yūgao said, peering down at the maps. “I could get there in less than half an hour. Do you want me to carry any messages or anything?”

I thought about it. “If you and Iruka could go and get any information they have on the hill clans around here—or maybe missing person’s reports, or anything—it would be really helpful. We’d know what we’re about to get into, that way.”

It probably said something about me—and the way I tended to look at that year of missions—that the idea of asking around the pockets of Konoha-nin forces for info genuinely hadn’t occurred to me. I tried so hard to blot out the memory that I’d forgotten important things. If I got back to Konoha without this oversight biting me in the ass at least once, I’d be astonished.

Yūgao grabbed the map and took it to Iruka, who had been trying knots on something or other. Perhaps a trap. And if it was, it’d probably either explode in someone’s face or make them wish it had.

And then, in short order, the only non-Gekkō members of our team were gone.

“So we might have a plan in an hour,” I sat up straight, then leaned back to stretch. “Break time.”

As our meeting broke up—not much of a meeting with only four people attending, but whatever—Sano turned to me and said, “By the way, I heard the others. You don’t use the ‘suke’ ending either?”

I shrugged. “Dad gave me a guy’s name, but it’s easier to just go with the shorter version. Easier to yell, too.”

He gave me a friendly thwack on the back. “I knew I liked you. That kinda formality doesn’t work for either of us.”
...Huh? Yeah, using my full name was something that only tended to happen when I was feeling like I had to be fancy or unusually precise, but I didn’t dislike it. After all, it was my name. There was something to be said for eighteen years of habit. But Sano made it sound like there was extra meaning attached.

“Might wanna explain that,” I said, confused. “There are plenty of people whose names end the same way. What’s special about ours?”

“This has to be a merchant thing,” Hayate said, frowning. “We met Sano, Kōsuke, and Shirosuke, and Umeko said her husband’s name was Keisuke too. This is like how all the names in Himawari-san’s family start with ‘hi,’ isn’t it?”

“Except Neji,” I reminded my brother. Never did figure out why that was. But since Hizashi was alive, I could always go and ask.

Hayate nodded.

“It’s not that uncommon,” Megumi said, even as she checked the gigantic clunker of a medicine box she brought with her. I’d offered to seal her items into a more portable scroll but, since she wasn’t a shinobi, she would have needed someone to open the seals for her if she wanted to get anything out. She’d politely declined instead.

Civilian doctors were apparently also weightlifters.

“Huh,” Sano said. “Well, the ‘suke’ ending is traditionally used to say who’s gonna be the head of the family.”

Sorta made sense. There were historical notes about the Senju clan, from before the formation of the villages. Hashirama, Tobirama, Itama, and Kawarama all in a row—and then the two younger ones got killed and we got left with the First and Second Hokage. That wasn’t so much a line of succession as a series of backups, given the times they’d been born into. Then there were the Akimichi, Nara, and Yamanaka, who all favored animal names, and the Hyūga obsession with adding references to the sun—as Hayate had pointed out.

“...Okay, then why are there three of you running around?” Hayate asked.

“Mom decided to name me the way she did over Grandma’s shouting, since she’s the oldest kid.” Sano rolled his eyes. “And Grandma pitched a bunch of fits over the years, ‘til she figured only the kid she named got to inherit anything. Which is why Shirosuke’s the way he is—he’s technically in charge of everything and he kinda knew he would be, since he’s the only boy. And he had Kōsuke, and you’ve met him, too.”

My thorough and considered opinion on that was, “That’s a load of shit.”

“Mom thinks so too,” Sano said. “Me, I’m not really worried. Grandma didn’t like it when Megumi agreed to marry me either, since she says women can’t be doctors.”

“You can imagine how well that conversation went, too,” Megumi said sweetly, and I got the impression that her smile was worth a drawn sword at the negotiation table.

“...Anyone ever told you your grandma’s a bitch?” Hayate asked.

“Yep.” Sano grinned. “Line starts at my mom and goes around the town, twice.” He glanced up at the sky thoughtfully. “Y’know, now that I think about it, Mom used to talk about...I dunno, he’d be my uncle or cousin or something. Said Grandma was the reason he ran away when he was twelve.”
There really was something to be said about the healing power of complaining about people nobody liked. But this missing relative… Something about the idea piqued my curiosity more than normal. “What was his name?”

“Wataru,” Sano said without missing a beat. But he did miss the way Hayate and I momentarily froze up, caught up in stargazing. “Like, you know how sometimes people would run away and join a circus or something? Mom was convinced he got away just in time—Grandma turned our whole family into a circus anyway. Maybe he grew up alright someplace.”

It was the moment both of us had been waiting for.

“That was our dad’s name,” Hayate said eagerly, shaking off his shock. “What was he like?”

Sano’s face fell. “Sorry, but I didn’t know him.” A pause, “And I’m sorry you’re related to my family, too.”

Hayate fidgeted. This mission had been one familial disappointment after another, but… “You seem okay. You and Megumi. So it’s not all bad.”

I patted my brother’s shoulder sympathetically. “Can you tell us why he left? Specifically?”

Sano shook his head. “Mom knows the details, but I think you get the gist of things.”

More or less, yes. Dad ran away from his family in Kitano Town at the same age most kids in the modern Academy would be just graduating. Sensei had mentioned that Dad had attended and graduated—somehow—and I could more or less see the normal, average career that had followed. Given what I knew about the Gekkō family, it seemed safe to say that Dad had been happier in Konoha than he’d ever been in Kitano Town.

Even if he was gone now, it was a strangely comforting thought.

“When we get to the village, you can meet our son,” Megumi spoke up, drawing our attention back to her. She smiled. “I promise that meeting will go better than the other family reunion.”

So it turned out that the map was accurate, but the local intelligence was completely fucking wrong.

Sano and Megumi—they were perfectly kind, sensible people. But shinobi could haul ass when given a reason to, and a Tidal Blade sighting was a good enough reason for anyone with a modicum of chakra control to get the hell out of Dodge. They usually did so by completely abandoning their comrades to the mercies of, well, everything that had been supposedly held off by the whole shinobi thing.

We visited the next town’s lockup for information.

The target for the interrogation was a man who looked like he’d gotten clubbed with a gardening tool—and been lucky enough to take the blunt end. I didn’t know his name at the start and didn’t especially care, but the Konoha headbands got us past the local police without much comment. Ninja handled ninja problems, as a rule, and these guys had been ninja problems for long enough that the chief of police didn’t seem to care what I did to them.

Which was why I was going to do absolutely nothing. I wouldn’t smash the table in half, or shout, or try to smack him around.

I met the man’s eyes levelly over the top of an incident report. While Hayate, Iruka, and Yūgao stayed out of the way and Sano and Megumi were elsewhere in the station, I had this task.

Lucky for this guy, I wasn’t really a fan of the “traditional” interrogation methods. I was really more of a student of the Michael Weston school of information gathering—and I wouldn’t lay a finger on a prisoner.

I didn’t need to.

The interrogation room in the local jail was really just the result of speaking to someone from outside their tiny cell. While I got a chair and the prisoner got a bench to sit on, it certainly wasn’t a formal arrangement. In deference to my skills, though, the local police had left the jail cell unlocked as long as I sat directly in the middle of the only escape route, and retreated to deal with the rest of the group I’d brought with me.

If I’d felt more compassionate, I probably would have sympathized with the captured bandit for at least a little while. Though I pegged him as a civilian immediately due to his lack of chakra presence, he was still a bandit and that should have lost him major points.

But the guy was a mess. His eyes bugged out of their sockets when he saw me for the first time and hadn’t gotten much better since. He looked like the wrong end of a bar fight on a Friday night. I could guess why.

Townspeople were a little like herd animals—the second a would-be predator showed weakness and the tables turned, said predator would probably end up as hamburger. The fact that this guy was the only prisoner—despite the police chief’s account of several non-shinobi bandits—didn’t really say good things about what had happened to the rest of them. Without shinobi to act as force multipliers, the untrained bandits would have been badly outnumbered. Anyone who got caught, well…

Mob justice at its messiest.

There really wasn’t that much I could do to him that hadn’t happened, in one form or another, already. Luckily for both of us, that wasn’t today’s topic.

“Please look up,” I said, and waited until those twitchy, fried-egg eyes finally met mine. If I’d had any doubt that this bandit probably needed to spend time safe in prison, well, those thoughts were dispelled.

He didn’t have a chance to gather his remaining courage, however, because he was looking right at my eyes when I let a sliver of Isobu’s chakra slip into them.

Between Isobu’s eyes and my killing intent gently permeating the air like fog, I didn’t lift a finger before he spilled his guts.

Ten minutes later, I strode back into the rest of the police station with a whole page of shorthand notes solely from the interrogation. While the interrogation had definitely not been on Ibiki’s level—hell, it was about as subtle and nuanced as a brick to the face—I’d still gotten the information that I wanted.

“Our friends are Iwa missing-nin,” I announced to the room at large. Given that this was a tiny outpost of a town, there were only half a dozen people and I’d brought five of them here with me.

And three of the people in the room tensed automatically—Hayate, Iruka, and Yūgao. Sano and Megumi had probably lived risky lives along the border in Kitano Town, but that was not quite the same thing as the way that, for about six straight formative years, Konoha had kinda been in a war with Iwa. I’d fought in it, while my brother had been spared that part only to be orphaned along with me. While I wouldn’t kill people from Iwagakure out of hand, most of my contact with their shinobi had involved quite a few deaths.

But that wasn’t really the crux of the issue.

“Not that most of them are around anymore, according to this guy,” I went on, jerking a thumb back over my shoulder toward the man in the cell. “But there may be a little more to it. Like hostages.”

The police chief frowned and said, “How many?”

“He wasn’t sure. Do you have any recent missing person’s reports?” I asked.

“No, the—the incident yesterday has all of our officers out helping with clean up,” the chief admitted. Personally, I wondered if the entire station composed more than a handful of people. “We can’t know for sure until the village is back in order again.”

Which, of course, could take days. If the bandits’ hostages were still alive, they needed to be rescued immediately.

“We can still chase the other bandits as far as we need to,” Iruka pointed out. “That was our mission. Not just to drive them away, but to stop them. For good.”

Megumi, meanwhile, picked up her medicine cabinet thing—I’d never gotten around to asking what she called it, other than possibly “ammunition”—and headed for the door. “I’ll look after the villagers then.”

“But Megumi—” Sano began.

“Sano, you broke your hand and I’m not a fighter,” Megumi pointed out patiently, as though she’d had to explain this concept all too many times. “This is what they were hired to do. Let them do it.”

Sano subsided, grumbling. Following Megumi, he trooped out of the room with the air of someone who would rather have been asked to break faces. Ninja faces were a bit harder to break than the norm, though, so I decided not to stop them.

Well, down to business. “Yūgao, Hayate, check the village for any sign of the enemy before we leave.”

None of us were scent-trackers, but I wanted to give the kids a chance to find some clues before I had to break out Isobu’s chakra. I really wasn’t sure how far I could push myself to extend my detection radius before my left arm decided to melt off. Tsunade’s dire warnings regarding human tolerance of Tailed Beast chakra had been...vivid.

And my range, without Isobu, was maybe twenty kilometers. I needed more to be sure.

As Yūgao and Hayate took off, Iruka and I headed outside at a much more sedate pace.

I’d spoken too soon back when I called Kitano Town a tiny little backwater. This village—with a name I hadn’t learned—had a population of about a hundred people spread out across large family farms. The police station existed, but it was more of a satellite organization to the Kitano Town one. I felt like this was one of those places that fed Kitano Town, like the farmlands around Konoha fed us.

Though the populace was pretty crammed together today, what with the mob from earlier.

I shook my head as I walked, still thinking.
Obviously, it was easier for bandits to isolate places like this village and set up little fiefdoms, but I wasn’t seeing their angle. They had to be keeping the hostages to ward off reprisals, but with shinobi it wouldn’t have made sense that they had anything to fear. Were they planning on getting a ransom?

“Um, I can’t actually read your mind,” Iruka said quietly, breaking into my thoughts. He rubbed the back of his neck awkwardly. “I mean, you didn’t send me off to check anything…”

“I mostly need you to focus on the townspeople and chase a few rumors,” I told him. As he blinked at me—anyone could do that job, after all—I clarified, “Find out who’s missing. The police aren’t going to have enough information for a while, and we can’t waste any time.”

“You don’t think I can track?” Iruka looked crestfallen.

Not as well as a pair of sensors, but… “You’re better with people than they are, especially right now, and your hearing’s second to none. And I need someone to listen to people who doesn’t seem to scare everyone off.” Meaning literally anyone other than me.

Somehow, Iruka’s scarred visage was less intimidating than mine. But hey, advantages were advantages.

“If you turn off the yellow eye stuff, it’d probably help,” Iruka said mildly.

I made a face at him, but my eyes did stop itching. Then I sighed and said, “Just get to work, Iruka-kun.”

He gave me a nod and disappeared into the village.

That left me a moment to try and think my way through what I was going to do.

If—no, when—we found these Iwa missing-nin, we’d probably have to consider our team’s layout again. There was no fortress, and all of us could handle ourselves in a fight, but I remembered the last time a light skirmishing team had run up against an Iwa force they hadn’t been prepared to fight.

Change a few details around, and you had Kannabi.

Never again.

I was...probably not going to get past the lingering anxiety about that clusterfuck easily. I made a mental note to talk about it to Suika-sensei when I got back to Konoha, then tried to marshal my thoughts into some kind of order.

So, when we found the bandits, we needed to accomplish two things: rescue the hostages and get rid of the missing-nin problem by whatever means would keep them from popping up again. I wasn’t...ruling out killing all of them, but would prioritize hostages if given an option. And I wouldn’t put my team at undue risk, either, because this wasn’t wartime and I had more leeway on this mission.

I was kind of hoping that they were more Rikuto’s type of Iwa missing-nin than, say, Deidara’s. There was really only one way to deal with the latter.

And I’m the only one who could do it. Deidara had never been a pushover, and I couldn’t put the kids in danger like that. Sure, I’d be at risk, too, but...

One way for me to deal with him, you mean. Isobu’s tails churned the water into a wild froth in his private bay. I still owe some kind of retribution to that little pest for capturing me in that other
...I think you’re forgetting cause and effect here. Deidara isn’t a part of Akatsuki, because if he was Yahiko would have thrown him out for being an asshole. And since Yahiko’s alive to do that, Deidara wouldn’t have made it into Ame for recruitment in the first place. Because Akatsuki isn’t evil or going after your family anyway.

...You just came up with all of that in that exact order, didn’t you?

So what if my memory’s a daisy chain? It still got me where I was going eventually.

I got the very strong impression that Isobu was rolling his eye at me.

Did you have an idea? I asked him, since he was listening anyway.

Isobu folded his forelegs on top of each other and said, A few. Tell me how you think the enemy will fight. Then I’ll have more of a plan.

I was probably leaning against the outer wall of the police station for a good few minutes, spit-balling with my inner demon, before something else interrupted me. More than five minutes and less than fifteen didn’t seem like enough time for anything to happen, so I might’ve had to shake myself back to reality a bit.

It definitely wasn’t because Sano was in my face, looking like he was about to explode, while Iruka looked mostly like he was waiting for the blowback.

“What is it, Sano?” I asked sharply, since I’d mostly just heard “Aaaaargh” before he actually reached me. It was one of the dangers in getting caught up in conversation with a voice in my head.

Before Sano could grab my uniform collar, I pushed his hands aside sharply and brought my hands down on his shoulders. While it wasn’t an attack, or even a real exertion, I could feel the impact run down Sano’s frame all the way to his feet. And that slowed him down exactly not at all.

“Why the hell are we still standing here? We need to go, now!”

I was pretty sure he didn’t actually hear what I said. When dealing with someone so angry that they were ignoring the whole physical strength gap between the two of us, any mere words turned into nothing more than monkey jabber for all the impact they made. I debated, briefly whether I needed to douse Sano in water to get him to explain his thinking, but his expression was so devastated that I felt my thoughts stutter to a stop.

Pushing him back out of my space, but gently, I said sharply, “Sano, breathe!”

Sano drew a shuddering breath, still trembling with rage. But the pause seemed to give back his verbal reasoning ability. “It’s—Mom, and Haruki”—Sano and Megumi’s son?—“They’re gone!”

Shit. “Sano, do you know where—?”

“The bandits,” Iruka said, while Sano struggled to come to grips with events. “Remember what we were thinking, about hostages? We just found out who’s missing.”

Sano backed away from me, then drove his left fist through the particle board wall of the police station in sheer rage. While shouting started inside, he hissed, “This would never have happened if I’d stayed here.”
...No, instead the bandits would have had more hostages, or the villagers would have more bodies to bury. But there was no way I was going to say that to him. Instead, I turned to Iruka and said, “Report.”

It went something like this:

The Gekkō group in Kitano, being a local rich family, had kinda been the only ones who could afford this whole “hiring shinobi” thing. And since the bandits were at least partly composed of shinobi, they figured that taking hostages would curb that problem—hence, grabbing two members of the family.

Except for one little snag: Kōsuke and Tsukiko had already headed to Konoha by stealthily joining up with the various merchant wagons heading all over the place, and thus my team had been well on its way before anyone had figured out who was planning what.

If lives hadn’t been at risk, the idiocy involved would have been funny.

But we had people to rescue and faces to beat in, so I absorbed the information with my mouth pressed into a flat, grim line and started thinking over those options I’d discussed with Isobu.

“Why are you just standing around?” Sano snapped, as soon as Iruka finished retelling what he’d puzzled together.

Because rushing in without even a basic tactics session tended to end in blood? “Iruka, go and find the other two. We’re moving out soon.”

As Iruka left, I focused on Sano again and said, “We’ll get them back.”

Sano glared at me, left hand still clenched in a bleeding fist. He’d split his knuckles when he hit the wall. Then, “Fuck.” With that, he brought his right hand up and drew the cast over his face, sinking down against the police station’s wall. “Fuck.”

I didn’t exactly know what to do. This being the case, I defaulted instead to what I’d want said or done, because there were only so many points of reference available.

I crouched down in front of him and said, “We’ll get the ones who did this.”

There really didn’t seem to be anything else to say. I got to my feet again once I felt the others approaching, hauling Sano up with me. “Get that hand taken care of, okay?”

Sano shrugged me off, but his eyes still burned. He couldn’t do anything else to help, and it rankled like nothing else. Hopefully, helping put this village back together would occupy him well enough for a while.

Oh, who was I kidding? He’d probably punch something else and really screw his hand up by the end of the day.

“Iruka, did you fill them in?” I asked, more out of reflex than anything.

“Yes, I did,” Iruka replied.

Well, good. I omitted honorifics as I turned to the other two and demanded, “Yūgao, Hayate, do you have a direction and a trail?”

I got two nods.
"Good. “Move out!”"

Of course the bandits crossed the border.

I’d been complaining for two weeks about small towns, borders, and border towns in the privacy of my mind—

Excuse me, not that private. I’m still here!

—And for some reason, the fact that the bandits actually crossed my least favorite political border made me want to kill them even more.

It seemed like every single time I got near Kusagakure, something went wrong. Whether there was a scouting mission that escalated into a massive punch-up for no particular reason, or the mission that ended with me smelling terribly of river fish, or the fucking Kannabi Bridge, I got the impression that the spirit of the place just had it out for me. Like a house spirit or some shit, but for a whole country.

And this time I had some kidnapped relatives.

Nice to know that some things were consistent.

As we passed through depressingly familiar fields of long grass—velociraptors!—I did my best to focus on my team and mission now, rather than bits of the past that I couldn’t change. We hurtled through the forest of giant goddamn mushrooms without any particular notice—aside from mine—and we passed into the land of bamboo and bamboo spike-pits that I had never been fond of. A lot of giant plant life for the mission report.

And we found our targets.

Iruka slipped into the underbrush and out of sight, suppressing his chakra down to nearly nothing as he moved downwind of the enemy group. Yūgao went to the left along with Hayate, flanking the group with intent of severe violence in about a minute. And finally, Tsuruya kept some fifty meters back and well above the main action, ready to spring in if any of us needed help.

I closed my eyes and plucked a tiny thread of Isobu’s chakra loose from the whole at his prompting. Once I had a bead on their exact positions I’d get the party started with a bang.

The two civilians are at least together. Let’s kill the rest.

Sometimes, I wondered if Isobu said things like that solely to spite me. On occasions when I didn’t actually want to kill everything, he could generally be relied upon to advocate for the opposite. On occasions when I did, he tried to hold me back, mostly for my sake.

It’s not that complicated. I want what’s best for you. And here, it’s to kill everyone threatening the only decent humans we’ve found.

...We need to work on your idea of escalating force, I commented, but not without heat. Isobu was old enough that this crap probably counted as a habit. But given what I was planning on doing, well, it didn’t seem like the right time for that kind of lecture.

I waited until I felt Iruka, Hayate, and Yūgao all reach their positions.

My chakra sense pinpointed a band of thirteen shinobi—ranging in strength from “barely genin” to “okay, I’m gonna have to kill that guy personally”—arrayed in a loose circle like they were lounging around a fire. Sort of like a camping expedition, if not for the terrified chakra of the adult hostage. The baby, thankfully, seemed to be asleep.

And Iruka was there, so they’d be okay.

As for the attackers—well, they had me to deal with.

I targeted someone in the middle of the formation for maximum shock value. Then I pulled a kunai out of my thigh holster, wrapped the handle in a paper seal I’d made ahead of time—thank you, Sensei—and lobbed it at center mass of the guy with the strongest chakra signature.

The guy caught it, like everyone was trained to do as a genin. It was a basic survival strategy and it impressed people if it could be pulled off without anyone bleeding. As a jōnin, that kind of thing became second nature, even when catching an enemy weapon stopped being practical and started being an invitation to lose that hand.

And there was a pop, and the guy’s hand and arm vanished into thin air. It wasn’t a clean injury either, given how he suddenly started screaming and woke up the entire camp, but a distraction was a distraction.

Sensei hadn’t been able to figure out how to link Kamui to a kunai, but apparently storage seals were evil enough for his purposes. If I ever got that seal back, unsealing it would result in a severed arm falling out. But that would require a bit more time than anyone had in a melee.

One down. And now everyone knew where I was.

Okay, Iruka needed me to avoid causing undue damage to everyone else with my jutsu so he could get the hostages away. That automatically ruled out larger explosives, a misaimed Rasengan, and probably most of the Water jutsu that tended to work along set-it-and-forget-it lines. And given the potential for panic and how I wasn’t really capable of a V1 or V2 cloak without causing myself to melt or something, I was basically back to my pre-Isobu skillset. Almost exactly.

But it’d been five years since then.

“You,” said the guy I’d have pegged as the group’s lieutenant. Well, so much for the bushes.

Taller than me by at least a head, he...okay, he basically looked like a pirate. Scars everywhere, eyepatch, and a grin that looked like it belonged on the Joker. If his hair had been green, I would have probably looked for a signal in the sky.

He continued on with, “Well, hello there.”

Kill him.

I raised an eyebrow and wrapped both hands more firmly around the hilt of my katana. If I was going to buy time, well, no one had said anything about how many I was or wasn’t supposed to kill.

And if I focused on the pirate, no one could follow my eyes to where, just out of view, Iruka had snatched both Sano’s mother and the baby out from the “defensive” ring of shinobi. My chakra sense just barely picked him up, so it was clear that he’d been suppressing his presence with as much skill as he could muster. I doubted anyone else in this group was as perceptive, or else they would have attacked him already.

Hayate and Yūgao were still working on flanking them, so I had to stall a little longer.
“This is the famed Tidal Blade you were so afraid of, Iwata,” said the pirate, aiming a kick at his groaning comrade. There was clearly a ton of team spirit around. “A little Konoha-born brat with scars from a housecat? Pathetic.”

Well, from a guy missing most of the original skin on his face, I could kinda see where he was coming from. While my scar was messy, it certainly wasn’t as bad as some of the possibilities.

Interestingly, he was one of the only ones who was acting like the whole Tidal Blade business didn’t matter. And even before I’d gotten a reputation with a fancy nickname, there was the little matter of Isobu to consider.

This, I think, is what you call suicidal overconfidence.

Just a little longer. What was taking those two so long?

I opened my mouth and hesitated. I was garbage at banter. People like this guy—or like Sensei or Kakashi or whoever—just seemed to have ready-made action hero lines. I kinda just said what I felt. Usually it came out lame or garbled.

“Cat got your tongue?” teased Eyepatch Guy.

I stared at him, not letting my confusion show on my face. Was he...what, trying to hit on me to convince me not to kill him? Or trying to throw me off? It wasn’t going to work. “Let’s just get this over with.”

Eyepatch McStabface walked out of the crowd toward me, apparently not noticing that his hostages were gone. If he had, I wasn’t sure if he would have changed his tune at all.

“You’re looking at the Sword-hunter, kid,” the guy said. He jerked his thumb up below his chin and shouted, “The notorious anti-kenjutsu fighter, who’s collected a hundred blades off his foes!”

Didn’t ring any bells. Not even as he pulled at the belt wrapped around his waist and...wait. The gleam of steel was distinct, even in a strange form. Some idiot had actually made a sword into something best described as a glorified whip.

I didn’t have the heart to cite physics in discussions of weapon effectiveness in this reality. It just wasn’t worth the effort. If someone had decided to make a whip-sword in a world that already had the Nuibari needle sword, and the fucking Samehada, it was really just par for the course.

“I’ve always wanted to test myself against the Seven Swordsmen,” said the Sword-hunter. He licked his lips. “But I suppose I can start with you.”

...Okay, creepy vibes officially gotten. And in defiance of common sense, the guy started toward me.

He knows something you don’t.

Yeah, and now I’m actually worried.

And then the other dozen shinobi suddenly stop looking so worried. Their chakra was abruptly less of a power level count and more of a general indicator. I didn’t have the ability to assess chakra control. And while, for example, Kakashi had never been much of a powerhouse, that didn’t make him any less of a threat.

Crap.
I slid into an iaijutsu stance, silently picking out targets. Depending on how well the whip-sword performed, I’d have to bump the Sword-hunter further up the priority list, but for the most part I just needed to keep a clear head.

“If you really wanted to scare us, you’d’ve just rushed in and started killing,” said one of the other shinobi—a woman with long blue hair and a purr in her voice. I revised my kill list and did the approximate equivalent of handing Isobu a wanted poster. Anyone who reminded me of Akuro was going to meet the same fate. “So, who are you distracting us from?”

A bolt of panic hit me in the head, but I swallowed it back down. Still, I wondered, What can they possibly do? And hoped I didn’t need to find out.

My eyes itched and I knew Isobu’s gold-on-red was bleeding through. If they wanted me to take this seriously, then I could certainly do that.

There’d just be more corpses to clean up.

Her eyes drifted almost lazily to the side—where Hayate and Yūgao were—right before the Sword-hunter darted in that direction as though it was some kind of signal. Which didn’t make any sense—he was at the front of the pack and she was at least three meters behind him.

What the hell?

Half the group broke for Hayate and Yūgao’s hiding spot.

I let Isobu’s chakra prop mine up. Not with my left arm, but my thought process past that point could be summed up as, Fuck these guys and the horse they rode in on. We’re killing them.

Finally!

And I punched the blue-haired lady in the throat hard enough that my knuckles brushed bone.

While she choked on her crushed trachea, I had to duck under an earthen fist as one of the other shinobi lashed out at me in revenge. Earth-encased fists made for decent stopping power, but slow attacks. All things considered?

With Isobu’s often-unhelpful enthusiasm ringing in my head, I tore after the first rock fist guy and braced a hand against the earthen wall he brought up like some kind of concrete shield. Only about the size and shape of a Jersey barrier, and thinner at the top, so I braced my left hand on the stone and smashed with my right.

I did a thing right out of the movies, ripping the guy out through his supposed shield and flinging him across the clearing.

And if I planted a seal on him that meant he was more or less a human bomb after I let him go? Well, that was me taking out two birds with one stone. He exploded into a decent riff on a Pollack painting—in mainly various shades of red and brown—and I moved on as blood and viscera rained down.

To my immediate right, a different ninja with Earth jutsu tried something a little less stupid in concert with one his fellows. Under my feet, the ground heaved, and I darted for a tree trunk out of some long-ingrained instinct for fighting in forests. Was I going to have to spend the whole fight in the canopy?

As it happened, the answer to that question was “no,” because I never even got close.
“Tetsuo, you fucking asshole!” The other rock fist dude turned the ground to slick mud underneath my feet, but I kept my balance. One chakra-powered leap later, and I was out of the mud but still stuck between multiple very unhappy opponents. I’d just killed three of them, after all.

And who the hell was Tetsuo?

Question for later! OR NEVER!

Right, right.

“We’re fighting a fucking jinchūriki because of him!” yelled another one of the enemies, before I lobbed an explosive kunai at his face.

I missed, sadly. I blew a tree trunk to pieces, though, and the resulting falling timber buried the guy under it—along with half the clearing. While not quite as big as Hashirama trees in the Forest of Death, these things were no saplings.

“You killed him!” screeched one of the remaining people.

Not one for one-liners, I cut him down half a second later.

You’re just terrible at them.

True.

At that point, when it felt almost like the fight was winding down, a mammoth boulder shot out of the tree line and hit me head-on. While I wasn’t hurt, mass differences meant I got knocked off my feet and well out of the original clearing, bouncing as I went. I probably ended up a good fifty meters away from my starting point, though by then I had my feet under me again and the boulder had cracked in two from the impact.

I batted at my hair to get the trapped foliage out of my face, and by that point the enemy was pressing their advantage.

The bits of boulder dissolved into mud, coating the new clearing with a load of mud and dousing me from head to toe.

And the mud around my arms solidified again into rock, yanking downward and as far apart as the creator of the mess could manage. My arms and shoulders started aching as they were stretched, and I found myself leaning back awkwardly from a kneeling position, with my arms trapped in stone behind me.

With a known enemy looming over me.

Fuck.

This kind of position wasn’t impossible for me to escape. Most high-level shinobi had a few ways of getting out of jams without using their hands, and I wasn’t short of those. But any delay meant the enemy had time to reposition themselves and I had to waste time in the actual act of escaping.

But I could.

Then the guy spat in my face.

“Not so tough now, are you?” my captor snarled. While Isobu muttered something that basically amounted to “Kill him” in about five different forms, I just stared right back into the guy’s face with the best non-expression I could manage. “What’re those fancy eyes worth now, you murdering bastard?”

As I sent chakra down through my right arm toward my fingertips, I admittedly didn’t have a lot of attention to spare for him if he was going to gloat.

“Shut up, Ryu.”

Fascinating, I thought with all due sarcasm. But I had enough chakra in my hand by that point, and after that it was just a matter of manipulating it the same way I would have if I could move my fingers. Sensei hadn’t really focused on teaching me one-handed seals after seeing the shenanigans I could get up to on my own, and this particular technique was one I’d been able to use since I was nine.

And I got most of the way through it, subtly enough that my captors could just continue arguing over me, before I heard the first sounds of combat and forgot that I was supposed to be subtle.

As Iruka was thrown into the clearing and the crowd of ninja supposedly debating who’d get a chance to kill me and/or their glorious leader, rock fractured in a dozen places to free my right fist. Before Iruka rolled to his feet and into the waiting arms of another enemy, and Tetsuo strutted back into view, I brought my right hand down on the stone holding my left fist.

I heard the words, “Look who I caught—” before I spotted the hostages, with the baby held aloft by his shirt collar. I maybe heard Iruka swear, loudly.

Red descended. Not Isobu’s chakra, overlaying mind and feeding rage, but nothing less than adrenaline and anger and don’t you fucking dare.

There were words, but none made it through. My legs were free in just a moment more and I was moving, Rasengan spinning right into my former captor’s stomach and flinging him into the distance and through a tree or three.

Eyes on me, everyone.

While his captor was distracted, Iruka slipped wire out of his sleeves and yanked, hurling the much-taller captor over his shoulder by her neck. While she hit the ground and wheezed, Iruka flung several shuriken—god dammit, did I give you those seals for nothing?—to scatter the rest of the enemy.

Except for two of them. While Tetsuo just batted the shuriken out of the air with a somewhat familiar-looking katana, I had just pinned another target and stomped on his throat.

But that sword, the sword, what—oh fucking hell no.

“Look familiar?” Tetsuo asked, as Iruka helped Sano’s mother to her feet. Her former captor had ninja wire wrapped around his neck tightly enough to draw blood.

But Tetsuo was looking at me, bouncing Haruki a little to draw our eyes to the kid. Haruki wailed.
My eyes moved back to my brother’s sword. Blue-wrapped hilt, wave-patterned blade, but snapped off in the middle… I could still feel my brother’s chakra, so it wasn’t like he was dead, but Mom would have pulled Tetsuo’s teeth out through his nose rather than let him parade around with Hayate’s katana.

“He ran, rather than face me with his little girlfriend bleeding on the ground,” Tetsuo said wistfully. “Oh, I could have made them match…”

I didn’t let anything show on my face. I was too busy calculating…

“Say something,” Tetsuo hissed at me, dropping his rapidly-shifting persona into one composed of pure spite. “Scream, rant, or maybe plead for their lives. Anything to make this interesting.”

...Nah.

And as Iruka threw a loop of ninja-wired shuriken forward at Tetsuo’s face to distract him, I sprang into action. Ducking under the wire, even as Tetsuo used my brother’s stolen sword to try and deflect a fucking flexible weapon, I jammed my fingers into the side of his left elbow and cut every tendon I could get my hands on.

Unfortunately, my control was just off enough that I didn’t remove his arm below the joint, but the spasm of pain and the way the bone suddenly bent the wrong way meant that Iruka was able to re-rescue Haruki from Tetsuo’s nerveless fingers.

Iruka threw himself out of the fray, whirling once on his heel to kick an approaching enemy ninja in the nose with a vicious roundhouse.

And I let go of Tetsuo’s useless arm, hacked his right arm off with a chakra scalpel turned all the way up, and drove my knee into his stomach as he bent over in shocked pain.

As Tetsuo toppled, I drove my brother’s broken katana down through his gut and pinned him to the ground like a bug on corkboard. As he wheezed and choked on blood, I leaned over him and whispered in a voice as harsh as death, “Don’t touch my team.”

Then I raised my arm and the nearby tree branches bent in the wind as though slapped aside by a giant as Tsuruya made her entrance at last. One storm of steel feathers later, and every other enemy ninja was dead whether they were on the ground or pinned to a tree.

“Iruka, are you okay?” I asked, as I strode away from Tetsuo’s still-living form and toward where I could sense my brother’s chakra. Iruka could keep up.

“Fine,” Iruka reported, pulling out another set of bandages from his many pockets. “I’ll stay here and make sure Haruki-chan and Inari-san are okay.”

Acceptable. “I’ll be back in a minute.”

I cut my way through the foliage rather than struggle through the overgrown shrubbery horseshit the country was famous for. Hacking through the woods in nearly a straight line, I ran across evidence of the second fight—short that it had been—almost immediately.

Unlike my fight with the rest of Tetsuo’s gang and the mass death that had ensued, the first corpse was nowhere near the second.

Instead of what I had rather expected, I followed a trail of bodies all the way back to a second clearing that looked depressingly familiar. Nearly a kilometer from where I’d been fighting, and six corpses later, I arrived at my destination.

The giant pile of out-of-place boulders was still the same five years later, and some of the old kunai and other pieces of shinobi gear were still in the area. The foliage had grown back, and there was moss where there hadn’t been any before, but...well.

Fucking Kannabi. I’d never be free of this place.

I shook my head to clear it and headed right for my brother and Yūgao.

Going by the bandages on Yūgao’s leg, she’d taken a long scratch right up the length of her thigh. Hayate’s first round of treatment had bled through, given the heavy pad lying discarded on the ground, but round two wasn’t as bad.

Hayate knelt next to Yūgao, looking a little scuffed-up but otherwise okay. His chakra didn’t jump like an angry hornet, so I assumed he wasn’t in pain or in dire straits. His scabbard was empty and his uniform was a little torn up, but the real concern was Yūgao.

“I’m okay,” Yūgao said, meeting my eyes. Her gaze was clear and while her jaw was set against the pain, I trusted her judgment. From one medic to another. “It’s pretty hard to heal yourself, but it’s just a scratch now. I shouldn’t even scar.”

“Scariest part was just getting away from him. I got hit, but...” Hayate wiped at his nose and scowled at the blood along his hand. He pinched his nose and tilted his head down, falling silent.

Yūgao peeked under the bandage and winced. Probably a bit of a mess. “It could have been worse. We weren’t expecting to get ambushed back, but we ran and it’s okay now.” Yūgao looked up at me and said somewhat dryly, “I mean, you wouldn’t be here if he was still a threat, right?”

I nodded. It could have been so much worse, but from the looks of things Hayate and Yūgao had managed to acquit themselves well after the initial shock. Trail of corpses and all. Given my brother’s lost weapon and Yūgao’s injury, it was even more impressive.

“Need a hand?” I asked her.

Yūgao removed the bandage pad again and checked her wound, clearly thinking. Then, “No, I’ll be fine in a second. Go on, we’ll catch up.”

I could hardly ask Yūgao to stay back on her own, so I didn’t argue. But as I returned to the scene of my fight, I checked the corpses left behind as I went. Blades had finished most of them, except for the guy with the crushed throat. If Yūgao had been injured in the initial skirmish, then either she was as good at fighting through pain as I was, or Hayate had been using her sword for the duration. I’d have to check with them when I went through the after-action report or something.

Tetsuo was still alive when I got back. The pool of blood underneath him indicated that this happy state was not going to continue for much longer, so I immediately made my decision: He could fucking die already for all I cared. I wasn’t going to waste a single scrap of bandage or chakra on him.

“Tsuruya, report,” I demanded, unable to summon up my remaining reserves of courtesy on such short notice.

Tsuruya bowed until her head was level with mine. “All enemies are now neutralized. Hostages have been rescued. No one is seriously injured. This mission is a success.”
Not bad for an improvised shitshow of a performance, I supposed. Certainly better than the catastrophic developments of most C-ranked missions, but not great. I was going to have to report this as an A-rank.

_Fucking C-ranks._

Finally, I couldn’t avoid addressing the former hostages. Er. At least, the one who was old enough to talk. “Inari-san? I…” I trailed off, uncertain.

She was probably around forty or so, looking rumpled but unhurt from her captivity. There was a certain cast to her features, though—the angle of her nose, the curve of her brow—that reminded me of Dad. Her pinched expression threw the comparison off by a bit, but there was something in her stare that told me that if I was seeing an eerie resemblance in _her_, she was thinking the same thing about me.

She lifted her chin and looked past the remainder of Isobu’s influence on my appearance. “Who are you?”

Iruka looked like he wanted nothing more than to stay the hell out of this, but there wasn’t really anywhere to run and maintain his dignity.

“Keisuke Gekkō, of Konohagakure,” I said, almost on automatic. “You knew my father.”

“And now you know why my mother and I haven’t spoken since Sano was born.”

Once Yūgao’s leg was fixed up, she didn’t want anything to do with anyone carrying her. By contrast, Inari and Haruki were worn down enough that Tsuruya all but demanded to carry them. When a three-meter bird with a sword-like beak and _actual_ sword feathers finally decided to demand things, everyone listened.

So Inari, when she spoke to us, got to feel about as awkward as someone on horseback addressing someone on the ground for the whole trip back. Self-possession being a significant factor in her personality, the problem lasted approximately five minutes.

Then the barrage of questions started.

“I can’t believe _anyone_ would treat Dad like that,” Hayate said, stunned.

Perhaps it was something about his upbringing—decent parents, decent older sister—that made the reality of Dad’s life with the Gekkō family hard to swallow. Hayate didn’t even have a real frame of reference for abuse except for what facets of the world he saw through missions. While shitty home lives did happen in every human society on the planet, Hayate had been lucky. He’d never had to worry about food, or clothing, or being _safe_ from moment to moment in his own home. With the exception of the Tenth, Hayate’s life-threatening adventures had all been products of his decision to become a ninja.

Made him a bit sheltered, maybe, but there was no way in hell I’d wish Dad’s childhood on anyone.

Yūgao hadn’t been happy to learn about Umeko Gekkō’s heinous child-rearing techniques either. The worst part was the story about the belt, which then transitioned into something with knives, and it ended with Dad running away from home. Inari never saw him again, and hadn’t known he was dead until we told her.

It was an ugly piece to a puzzle that we’d wanted to solve. Now, Hayate looked like he regretted looking for answers at all.

“How could they get away with that?” Hayate demanded, while I walked stoically on ahead. It was taking all of my self-control not to let the information color my thinking.

This was still a mission, and our shitbag relatives were still clients.

Dad was dead. Quite aside from where he’d taken his life into his own hands long before Hayate and I had been born and cut them all out of his life, nothing could hurt him in the afterlife. It just...it wasn’t something we could change. All we could do was finish the job in front of us and move on.

(But if I ever got my hands on some kind of time-travel jutsu, I knew who I’d shove off a pier. I had a list that kept getting longer.)

“You may have noticed that my mother is rich,” Inari said in a dark tone. She brushed her grandson’s hair out of his face and went on, “I’m a village head, not an employer for hundreds of people across the Land of Fire. If I could throw her out of the country on her ear, I would.”

Tsuruya sighed. “One would hope for a better ending for this story, Keisuke-sama, but it appears it isn’t to be.”

“I don’t know about that,” I said after a moment, glancing up at the sky as we went.

“This part of the mission went okay,” Iruka said, optimism incarnate.

“And we did get all of the bad guys,” Yūgao added. “Even if apparently someone might’ve been working for someone else and we still don’t know who that is.”

“If you can think of a missing-nin named ‘Shinjitsu,’ I’d bet it’s him.” Iruka, it appeared, was still going to take that as a win. Overhearing the last words of a complete asshole wasn’t my idea of reliable information, but at this point we weren’t really spoiled for options.

Hayate had to think longer on the subject before looking up at Inari and admitting, “I guess...your son is cool, and you’re nice. So I guess the family isn’t all bad.”

Inari leaned down and Hayate grasped her hand for a moment. She smiled at him and said, “You know, I was going to say the same thing. Wataru must have grown into a good man if you’re his children.”

Hayate blushed and mumbled, “Yeah, I guess.”

“So it’s not all bad,” I concluded, though my happiness was a bit muted. We still had a long walk ahead of us. “Once we get you home, we’ll be heading back to Konoha to report in, so it’s not like we need to see the rotten branch of the family for...basically ever again.”

“Yeah.” Then it was like a light went on in Hayate’s head. “Oh!”

Iruka perked up. “Was there something else?”

“Yeah, hang on...” Hayate dug through his pack for a minute, mostly because he didn’t take it off to sort through any of its contents, and retrieved something long and slim. “I guess you didn’t see this before since I was kinda blocking it, but I found something cool while we were out there!”

Yūgao leaned over and said, in a somewhat confused tone, “I thought you were hiding it—”

“Shh!” Hayate hissed. Then he held the thing out to me and said, “This blade saved our lives when mine got stolen and I had to break it. I didn’t think something this short would help, but I guess it really is a legendary weapon.”

Resting neatly in my brother’s outstretched palm was a tantō. Under the dirt and perhaps a tiny bit of rust, the steel gleamed almost white in the sunlight.

The White Light Chakra Saber.

Chapter End Notes

So, it's been a while since my last update. Sorry for the wait, but I have a job and I get paid now! That's a thing!

This also is a somewhat belated thank-you for everyone who participated in fanweek from Beta and I, and for everyone who enjoyed the work that's now immortalized on my CYB-by-Lang tumblr blog. Go check out the "cyb fan week" tag on the blog if you haven't already, since it's GREAT. I hope you enjoy your new chapter, and everyone gets a chance to see some of the awesome stuff that's been made!
The White Light Chakra Saber was just one of many casualties of the Kannabi mission. But between losing Obito, Kakashi’s getting tortured, and all the other fun consequences of that clusterfuck of a mission, this particular weapon had just...fallen through the cracks. Seeing it again was a major blast from the past. Not sure if I’d call those days “better times,” but at the very least the world had seemed smaller back then.

Kakashi hadn’t asked after it, and I wasn’t sure what I would have told him at the time. Given my state after the mission...well, I imagined it’d be a toss-up between “fuck you” and shell-shocked silence.

But really, Kakashi’s over-named tantō wasn’t the most pressing concern I had. While Hayate had promised to take care of it for me—presumably in place of the katana he’d broken—I still had to work out what was going to happen once we got to the village to drop our clients off.

The problem was that I’d been a bit optimistic about never having to see the Kitano Town Gekkō family again. Given that there wasn’t a pursuit team or other reason for a hideous time-crunch, we at least had to make sure that everyone didn’t die the second we turned around, right? I rather doubted there were any bandits left worth noting. But I just didn’t want to.

I don’t see why you should. Isobu rolled his eye and grumbled, They seem to be miserably small-minded, even for humans. Most of the planet would be better off without them.

Most?

Charitably, Isobu explained, They seem to suit each other, if nothing and no one else.

Talk about damning with faint praise.

I sighed mentally, then turned my attention back to my non-internal companions.

“No, see, I don’t think it works like that,” Iruka was saying, looking at the White Light Chakra Saber. “You just swing it and the white streak thing happens.”

Hayate made a face, but obediently swung the tantō somewhat gingerly. Aside from the usual swoosh of air, nothing happened.

“You’re supposed to use chakra too,” Iruka said dryly.

Yūgao cut into the conversation with, “Can the two of you stop arguing and just clean it properly?”

I’d almost forgotten what it was like to have children complaining about road trips. There was no terrible minivan, just our road-worn feet, but wow did I ever not need to experience that little facet of my old life ever again. It was somehow worse when I remembered that most of these kids had killed people before they turned twelve—and that I’d made my first kill at nine—and yet they still had lapses like this. Two of them were even qualified to lead military units.

The ninja system was so f*cked up.

“Keisuke-sama, would it be better to find a shinobi weapon specialist to treat this blade adequately?” Tsuruya asked, lowering her head to my eye level to hold a proper conversation.

I reached up and scratched the underside of her beak, and she bumped it against my shoulder. “If we’re gonna give it to Kakashi as a birthday gift, we probably should. Our weapon kits aren’t really designed for dealing with rust like that.”

“Can it be from all of us?” Yūgao asked. “I mean, for Kakashi-sensei, there’s not really anything we can buy or find that can possibly top this…”

“His birthday’s in nearly two months,” I reminded them. “If you can’t find anything you’d want to add in to the Team Inoichi collective gift by then, then it can be the sole gift.”

“Team Inoichi-plus-Kei-san,” Iruka corrected. He rubbed the scar across his nose as the rest of us gave him expectant looks. “I mean, Hayate found it, but the mission took all of us, right?”

Sort of? If Hayate had been waiting for a rescue from me, there’d been no evidence of it. The trail of corpses definitely hadn’t been my doing.

...Though maybe Iruka was talking about the rest of the mission. I was still pretty sure that Team Inoichi could have handled basically everything but Tetsuo. His weird weapon might have been a problem even if he hadn’t inexplicably decided to steal Hayate’s sword instead, but he wasn’t a concern anymore and his whip-sword thing was in one of my many storage scrolls.

Souvenirs came in many forms.

I suggested, “Well, if nothing else we can eat the cost by selling Tetsuo’s ugly mockery of a sword.”

I couldn’t really think of anyone in town who’d want to use the Nuibari rip-off, but it would probably make an interesting conversation piece for any blacksmith. And it wasn’t like Tetsuo the Sword-hunter would be doing jack shit with it anymore.

Speaking of, I’d need to check to see if there was any way to add that kill to my Bingo Book statistics at home, or if that was just something people were going to have to learn by osmosis.

“Well, we did sell our house to that one smith, didn’t we?” Hayate suggested.

Tenten’s dad? Yeah, I’d pick him, too. “Ask first, Hayate. Don’t assume.”

And any further conversation sort of drifted off after that. Tsuruya flew slowly overhead, keeping pace with us rather than harrying off into the distance at Inari’s command. We’d decided to stick together, but Tsuruya’s ground-bound gait had turned out not to mix well with a flight saddle. And sitting on the flight saddle—or indeed, any saddle—for six hours was bound to strain anyone’s joints.

Then Tsuruya made a noise like a small elephant getting stepped on—which was basically what a crane of her species sounded like—and started to descend in front of us. At the same time, I got a flash of something that could have been killing intent, but smaller than any similar signature I’d felt before.
Our group slowly ground to a halt as Tsuruya landed. Her eyesight wasn’t anything like a hawk’s, but she had a hell of a view from up there.

Inari sat up as best she could in a saddle designed after a motorcycle one, still holding Haruki, and said, “There shouldn’t be nearly that many people in my village.”

Eh?

“More bandits?” Iruka asked.

I’d be pissed if there were. We’d just cleaned up the actual threat in the area, too!

“They feel like civilians,” I put in, as the sensor with the largest range. But then, civilians were hard to pick up from so far away. “But that doesn’t mean they’re not dangerous.”

The mob from the other day had certainly proved that to my satisfaction.

I signaled for my team to pick up the pace. While we would still need some time to get there, we had a collective top speed of probably sixty kilometers per hour if we pushed it. And Tsuruya could outpace us to shut the crowd down in a single swoop. Inari would probably be happy to shout the villagers into submission if possible, too.

As Tsuruya was about to take off, though, I added, “Tsuruya, play nice with the civilians, okay? They can be fragile.”

Tsuruya’s head bobbed, then she took off with a huge beat of her mighty wings. Hopefully they wouldn’t get too much of a workout.

And the rest of my team and I ran for the village.

When I was fourteen years old, one of the first things I did after outing myself as a jinchūriki was deal with the people who’d wanted someone to blame for the Tenth. Someone—anyone—who they could hate. I talked some of them down, and avoided most of the rest, but ultimately the problem was one that had burned itself out over time. Fighting Orochimaru to a standstill years later had helped, but my reputation had always been a bit of a crapshoot.

I hadn’t gotten any better at dealing with a bunch of angry people since then.

The crowd in front of the village head’s house was mostly made of villagers, which was somewhat heartening. The problem was that the people who weren’t looked like they had wandered over from Kitano Town, and the two sides did not like each other one bit. And then there was Inari, who wasn’t holding Haruki because Megumi was, and quite a lot of shouting, and Tsuruya standing with her head over the crowd and looking at everyone like they were disobedient chicks.

As my team approached, we heard what people were actually saying.

“—if you were the last people on the face of this world—” Inari shouted, as I finally got close enough to pick out some familiar faces.

Shirosuke, red in the face, snarled, “You were declared dead—”

Inari rose up onto the balls of her feet and jabbed a finger right in her brother’s face to cut him off. “That’s no reason to go right over Sano’s head—”

Iruka winced at the noise, putting his hands over his ears and sidling behind me so he was out of immediate view. Hayate and Yūgao flanked me, presenting an impassible wall of shinobi for the villagers to deal with when they realized that they had an audience.

I tapped the nearest person on the shoulder—a man with a katana at his hip and a cigarette between his teeth—and asked, “So, what’s going on?”

He gave me a very long, assessing look, at which point I let Isobu’s chakra seep through to my eyes again. Without missing a beat, he pointed at the two loudest Gekkō family members and said in a very dry voice, “My brother-in-law and my sister-in-law are sorting out their differences.”

I frowned. What, was everyone here related or something? I sure hoped not—it’d make my plan a bit less tenable.

“Well,” I said loudly, with just the briefest flash of non-Isobu killing intent to get everyone’s attention, “isn’t this nice?”

“Shinobi,” was the whisper that ran around the crowd. Iruka probably could have told me where it started, but it wasn’t important.

Instead, I zeroed in on Inari and nudged my way through the throng of people. Not acknowledging anyone else, I walked directly to her and stood just off to one side, ready to intervene between her and Shirosuke at a moment’s notice. Iruka and Yūgao hung back, but Hayate was just one step behind me.

I hadn’t really thought about it before, but Inari was the second-oldest person in the core of the crowd, beaten out only by her mother Umeko. Then there were, in order, Shirosuke, his wife, and then Kōsuke and Tsukiko. Sano was sort of off to one side, further away from the verbal spat, but Megumi was wrapping his hand again and didn’t meet my eyes.

Everyone else, though? Very cautious.

“The mission has been completed,” I said to Umeko, watching the crow’s feet around her eyes compress as she scowled at me. Don’t take it so personally, lady. It isn’t like I wanted to see you either. “The bandits have all been destroyed.”

Umeko met my stare for a moment, as though trying to strike me dead with her eyes alone. No dice. “Acceptable.” She paused. “Don’t tell me you want your payment now. Damned mercenaries…”

“You were the one who hired us,” I said mildly, keeping a bit of my attention on Shirosuke’s little section of the family. Kōsuke looked like he was going to attempt murder if he could just figure out what to do it with. “It’d be a pity if we didn’t live down to your expectations.”

“Don’t talk to Grandma like that!” Kōsuke snapped.

“Don’t see why not,” Hayate cut across Kōsuke like he’d wanted to do for a solid week, drawing the crowd’s attention to him instead. “I mean, she’s talking to everyone else like we’re sharks even though she’s the one who hurt people who didn’t do anything to her.”

The non-Gekkō section of the crowd fell silent.

“You don’t know what you’re talking about,” Umeko replied, trying to stare my brother down. If he hadn’t been through multiple near-death experiences with actual danger involved, she might have succeeded with him. If she’d been Kushina or Tsunade, I probably would have folded like a paper napkin.
But no.

“I have worked for forty years to secure the future of this family, and I do not need a lecture from a band of murderers on the rightness of my decisions,” Umeko went on, scowling.

“Sure you don’t, Mother,” Inari interrupted, and Umeko tried to pin her to the currently-empty police station with a glare. “I still remember Wataru.”

Umeko did her best to look down her nose at her taller daughter, who was clearly having none of it. Nonetheless, she pressed on with, “He was a lazy, disrespectful, ungrateful brat.”

Those words hung in the air for a moment, while Hayate and I silently debated what to say to that. Dad may have been a goof and an explosives expert, but there was so much wrong with what Umeko was saying that we didn’t really know where to start.

Inari went white to the lips with rage. “No, you were a tyrannical bitch who beat him as soon as Dad couldn’t protect him anymore. Just because he was Uncle’s. You might’ve put him out of your mind after he ran away, but some of us didn’t.”

Next to the cigarette guy from before, a matronly woman with her hair done up in a bun pushed her way through and came to stand next to Inari. She crossed her arms over her chest and focused all the force of her scorn on Umeko and Shirosuke, and for a moment I could see the resemblance between the two women as clear as day.

“I can’t believe you’re bringing him up again,” Shirosuke broke in. “And what are you doing dragging these shinobi into our family business?”

“‘These shinobi’ are his children,” Inari said, sweeping her arm out to encompass Hayate and me. “And luckily they didn’t bear a grudge when they came to rescue me. Unlike you and yours.”

There was an even more thunderous silence.

“Step down, Mother,” Inari said quietly. “Trying to make Tsukiko village head over my son is not something I’d stand for even if I was conveniently out of the way. Maybe you didn’t want me dead, but it hardly seems like you’d like me alive after everything else that’s happened.”

Umeko looked like she’d been slapped, and gaped at the sea of disapproving faces it had apparently taken her ten full minutes to notice. With the exception of the cigarette guy, who looked bored, and Shirosuke’s little band of bottom-feeders, there were at least forty people in that crowd that registered as deeply unfriendly.

It was kinda interesting to see all that societal disapproval aimed at someone else.

Inari took a deep breath, and went on, “I didn’t want to have this fight in public like this, but I’m not sure what else you expected to happen after that little trick. Just go home, Mother. Get out of our lives, and leave the family to someone who actually cares about the people in it.”

Umeko seemed to wilt a little.

I didn’t let it show on my face, but I sort of wondered. In the shinobi world, evil tended to operate on a thin veneer of civilization—we had crime, of course, but we also seemed to have a more-than-usual concentration of people who were effectively supervillains. Some of them had tragic backstories, and some didn’t.

What in hell made people like Umeko, who committed smaller evils every single day? Entitlement?
Complete and total failure to realize other people mattered? Or just a conviction that they’d never be caught?

I shook my head as the proto-mob seemed to finally scare the Kitano Town Gekkō family away through the sheer weight of numbers. My team and I retreated to the roof of the nearest building—again, the poor, beleaguered police station—as the crowd cleared out.

“So I guess we don’t get paid?” Yūgao asked, apropos of nothing, as the other Gekkō family talked below us.

“We weren’t really getting paid much more than spare change to start with,” I said with a shrug. “It’s not a big deal.”

The matronly woman from before waved up at us and called out, “Hey, shinobi, you can come down now! They’re gone!”

I glanced at Iruka, who nodded. Apparently, what conversations he could overhear didn’t worry him. With that vote of approval, I hopped down to ground level and was immediately wrapped up in a hug.

“I’m so sorry you had to see that side of us, and of Mother,” she said as she let go of me. Then a thought occurred, and she added, “I’m sorry, I didn’t even introduce myself. I’m Tokio. Your father and I grew up together.”

“Really?” Hayate asked, from behind me. Apparently as the group’s tank, I was generally expected to lead the way into every single possibly dangerous situation ever. Even if the main risk was getting hugged to death.

“Yes, though I didn’t know what made him leave until much later,” Tokio said, and gave my brother a hug in turn. When Yūgao and Iruka subtly shook their heads, Tokio clasped her hands in front of her and bowed. “And thank you for saving Inari. From the sounds of it, it took a lot to get this far.”

Iruka rubbed the back of his neck, even as an embarrassed red tone crawled across his face. The kid needed to hear more compliments. “It was a bit of an adventure, but we made it.”

Tokio frowned for a moment, looking all of us up and down. Including Tsuruya. “Would you like to stay for dinner? Hajime already told me that we’re not paying you worth beans, and considering all you’ve done for us…”

Did I want to deal with that? While most of the villagers were heading back to their homes and the threat of shinobi incursion was over, I was still leery of spending too much time in the company of people who were effectively strangers. And there was still plenty of daylight left, so it wasn’t like we were really going to have that many problems if we got on the road now…

Then Hayate’s stomach growled.

“Suppose that answers that,” he said, even as his face turned red.

“Those gates are a real sight for sore eyes,” I admitted as, a week later, we finally came home. To my team, I said, “Mission office first, then reports, then home. Got it?”

Hayate groaned.
The other two, who were not spoiled, didn’t complain.

“Iruka heard something that might be important. We won’t know until we get that information in,” I pointed out dryly. “Come on, little brother, we’re gonna go get things sorted out.”

The mission office wasn’t crowded at what amounted to teatime—three-ish?—so Sensei and his attendant paperwork ninjas weren’t swamped or anything. The four of us waited for probably a total of forty seconds for the team in front of us to clear out, and then Sensei looked up from his more recent intake form and smiled.

“So you didn’t end up using that kunai after all!” Sensei’s chakra pulsed out, poking at all of us as though testing for injuries since he wasn’t gonna get up from his desk and do it. Yūgao bristled at the unfamiliar sensation, but blinked and was back to normal in a moment.

“Nah, we handled it,” I said, “even if it got kinda rough there for a while. Mind if we make our report?”

Sensei nodded.

“Well, first off, we’re related to a bunch of jerks,” Hayate began. “The Gekkō family out there is a merchant family, but they had a lot of infighting going on and I guess we were sort of...just there. There was definitely a bandit problem and everything, but we’re not really sure who’s going to be actually paying for the C-rank at the end...”

Sensei leaned forward in his seat, but didn’t comment.

“The bandits turned out to be missing-nin, though,” Hayate continued, “and they’d kidnapped our clients’ family, so we went after them, and well...”

The rest of the mission report, in the end, was more or less how I had expected it to go.

My end of the story was pretty straightforward and involved the tortuous death of someone who had hammered my berserk button flat. Once Tetsuo had shown up with Hayate’s katana, all rational thought about interrogation had flown right out the fucking window. I’d wanted Tetsuo the Sword-hunter dead a lot more than I had, say, been thinking about recovering his supposed hoard of swords for Konoha. Sure, putting myself out there as a distraction was something that had Sensei raising his eyebrows, but hey, no mission was perfect.

Iruka, after the initial surprise that involved briefly becoming a hostage himself, did manage to hear quite a bit regarding whoever the fuck Shinjitsu was. I imagined a shadowy overlord—coincidentally similar to Madara or Tobi in my mind’s eye—with a pet cat or maybe a particularly pampered poodle. Sensei didn’t know much about him, but the thing with evil organizations was that, when you got down to it, the rest of the world heard exactly nothing about them until they suddenly didn’t. Boom, Fourth Shinobi World War.

Then it was Yūgao and Hayate’s turn. It was easier to put the two of them together since neither Iruka nor I had seen them until the fight was already over.

“Well, the first thing that happened is that we got jumped,” Hayate admitted, shamefaced. “We should have been more aware, but the Sword-hunter guy went after us instead of Sis like we thought he would, and the next thing we knew he was attacking with this...whip thing.”

Which was something I was gonna have to fork over to Intelligence. It wasn’t like I needed such a niche weapon anyway.
“Go on,” Sensei prompted.

Hayate shifted from foot to foot, still uneasy, and took a deep breath before he said, “Yūgao got hurt, so we were making a strategic retreat. He went after us again, saying all kinds of sh”—and here, my brother paused because he belatedly realized he’d almost cursed in front of the most superior of officers available—“stuff, and we were kinda in a tight spot.”

Yūgao mumbled something, and all of us paused and waited for her to repeat herself. Under the weight of our stares, she said, “I didn’t perform well under pressure. I’m sorry, everyone.”

“Hey, no, you happened to be on the right and got hit first. It’s not your fault,” Hayate insisted. “It’s not a competition.”

“Bad luck, but then you had to carry me around,” Yūgao argued, but without real heat. I hadn’t noticed them arguing with each other on the way back, but perhaps they’d been better at being quiet than I’d given them credit for.

Perhaps this wasn’t the right venue for this conversation, either. I cleared my throat and said, “Moving on, please?”

Hayate shook himself, then said, “The guy—Tetsuo—he got my katana and I guess he wanted it to be poetic or something if he killed us with it? I don’t know.” He fidgeted. “I needed to get my hands on something to fight back with, and since we were under a bush I just grabbed the first weapon hilt I found. And that,” he said finally, as he pulled the White Light Chakra Saber from his pack, “was this.”

Everyone’s eyes were drawn to the faintly glowing weapon as though by magnetism. The shiny effect was down to Hayate channeling a bit of his chakra into it, activating the blade, but it was really all for show. Sensei probably would have recognized that weapon no matter how long he went without seeing it.

Kind of a lot for a tantō, but…

Hayate held the blade out as he went on, “I saw Kakashi carry this around a lot when I was a kid, so I asked Mom about legendary swords. She said there was always a trick to using them, but once I had it in my hand? I cut my sword in half, right out of Tetsuo’s hand.”

I winced mentally. Hayate had never even touched the White Light Chakra Saber before the mission, and now he was down a main weapon as a result of the choices he’d made under pressure. Pressure I wasn’t really sure he would have had to face before—while Tetsuo hadn’t been enough to slow me down by the time I got my feet under me and stopped screwing around, he would have been terrifying for Hayate and Yūgao.

But they’d handled things. And they’d be stronger in the future.

“He left a bunch of lackeys for us after that, then…” Hayate paused, then turned to me. Right, I hadn’t told him this part.

“He thought it was a good idea to show up and pretend he’d killed you,” I told Hayate, but with enough volume that my voice had no trouble carrying. A heavy silence fell. “And now he’s dead.”

Sensei slowly raised his hand to pinch the bridge of his nose. Of course he is, he probably thought. At least Sensei regained composure quickly after that.

“Other than the stuff about Shinjitsu, we were just gonna turn things in, but…” Hayate held the tantō up again. Sensei’s eyebrows rose and Hayate said frantically, “No, no no no, don’t tell Kakashi yet! It’s gonna be our present to him for his birthday, okay?”

Sensei, who had opened his mouth to say something, shut it. “All right.”

Iruka blinked. “It’s that easy?”

“You’re returning a clan heirloom, just a bit later than expected?” Sensei clarified, and got a round of nods from us. “After...maintenance work, probably. I don’t think Kakashi ever expected to see the weapon again, so it will be a welcome surprise.”

The members of Team Inoichi all grinned at each other, wordlessly congratulating each other for their plan.

Well, that was one more thing taken care of. Before the kids could derail the meeting entirely, I put in, “And the rest of Tetsuo’s gear?”

“Weapons go to R&D, and everything else goes to Intelligence. We’ll see what shakes out,” Sensei replied, and his tone implied well enough that we were all done here.

We did what Sensei asked. Then, the lot of us left the building and reconvened on the roof, still laden with our other mission gear.

Yūgao and Iruka looked at each other, then at my brother.

“Is it okay if we go to the smith’s right now?” Hayate asked, apparently quite conscious of the legendary weapon in his pack.

“It’s fine,” I said. Actually… “Hayate, if you can hold off on going to the weapons’ depot for a new katana, I’ll get something for you.”

Hayate blinked, surprised. “You can’t have gotten me one already.”

I waved him off. “You’ll see.”

Once Team Inoichi took off to prepare their gift, I made a rooftop beeline for home. Quite aside from my dire need for a shower, I could already sense the dust that built up over two weeks absent. I needed to make sure that the place hadn’t, say, collapsed into a sinkhole or something. Or a dust-based black hole. Sure, Kotetsu probably would have mentioned that when I checked in if it had, but...well.

I was probably making excuses anyway.

Regardless of any other concerns, hot water awaited!

But once I got inside the apartment, deactivating its devastating security seals as I went, my step hitched as I passed the weapon rack in the front room.

Mom’s katana was on the wall, underneath her wakizashi. Neither blade had been used in the four years since her death. Instead, we’d left them to sit on the wall as a sort of memorial where photos or the family shrine wouldn’t quite suffice. We didn’t have anything similar for Dad, because nothing but his sealing kit had survived, and I’d used up everything in it years ago.

They weren’t pieces of art. Mom had never been shy about explaining the realities of weapons or war. Things like that...they were meant to be used.
I dropped my stuff in the entryway and wiped my hands on my pants before I walked over to the wall mounts. Carefully, I took the lacquered wooden sheath and the blue-wrapped handle into my hands and drew the blade out. The metal didn’t shine, but it had never really been that kind of weapon.

Looks all right. Might need some maintenance, but it's not like it's been rusting in some armory.

The butt of the weapon hadn’t tarnished, and neither had the rectangular guard. I gave the sword an experimental swing, and the balance was still good even though I hadn’t checked the pins keeping the handle secured.

With one last nod to myself, I sheathed the katana and put it back on the wall. My brother would be inheriting it soon enough, but there was no reason to spoil the surprise too early.

Then I cleaned the apartment, because I sure as hell couldn’t trust Hayate to do it.

---

After I spent an hour cleaning up the residual dust from my two-week-and-spare-change absence (since I was under no illusions about what my brother would have contributed to the effort), it was time for dinner. With my brother and his friends still dismissed for the day, and not feeling any particular spikes of their chakra in the immediate area, it was safe to conclude that I was being left to fend for myself in terms of food.

Sure, I was the person who could actually cook in our family, but I didn’t have much to work with. I’d cleared the fridge out before we left, among my other preparations, so it seemed as though my only option was to head out and go grocery shopping.

After dusting myself off the best I could and picking a new, identical uniform out of my closet to change into, I picked up my grocery scroll from a shelf near the door. Checking my wallet—sufficient—I locked the apartment before I trooped out the door and headed to the market. Since the sun was still up, it’d probably be open and I’d be able to get things done.

There was really something to be said for having five copies of the same outfit, and of using fūinjutsu to avoid encumbrance problems. If I was going to do chores, even for my own sake, I was never going to spend more energy and time than was absolutely necessary to maintain a functional household.

Of course, my brother basically expended none, but that was a different issue.

I was in the market for about half a minute before I realized that I felt a cluster of familiar chakra signatures nearby. Lightning, hearth embers, and sunlight on water, if I had to come up with appropriate metaphors. And I immediately strode past the vegetable stalls and toward those chakra signatures, going just slowly enough to avoid coming off as rude. Despite my eagerness, I didn’t really want to run anyone over.

And so it was that, in about another forty seconds, I made my way to the opposite end of the market to where I’d sensed Kakashi, Obito, and Rin clustered all together.

I didn’t get a chance to surprise them or anything like that. Mainly because I was approaching from upwind—scent-trackers always sensed that kind of approach—and therefore Kakashi was already looking in my direction before I got past the late-afternoon/early-evening shoppers and into plain view. Taking their cue from him, Rin and Obito did, too.

“Kei!” Obito shouted joyfully, and then I was being squashed in a bear hug. I surrendered instantly.
Obito was rather good at them. Being bigger than basically all of our classmates except for Ibiki and Asuma, he could wrap both of his arms around me and have room to spare when Rin joined in. On top of that, he also had enough strength to pick both of us up at the same time. One-handed.

Because that meant his other arm could rope Kakashi into things.

Kakashi, who had a bigger personal space bubble than most people, took being crushed against me and Obito’s right arm with surprising alacrity. For him, anyway. It mostly amounted to making a token “oof” and then not fighting the vice.

Obito put the rest of us down once people started staring. Or rather, when Rin noticed people were staring—Obito could not give less of a fuck.

“You have to tell us all about your mission, Kei,” Obito insisted, while Kakashi and Rin finally disentangled themselves and I got my breath back. “You were gone so fast we barely even saw you!”

“Sorry, everyone, it was just…” How did I phrase this? I rubbed the back of my neck, trying to string words together. “Uh, it was something.”

“We got a bit of it from Kakashi,” Rin said, retrieving her grocery bags from the ground where she’d left them. None of the things she’d bought looked too damaged by the rough treatment, so I didn’t worry about it. “So how did the family reunion turn out?”

I glanced at Kakashi, who had been the last person I saw before I met my team and took off. I didn’t remember telling him much of anything, aside from asking him to take care of Mr. Ukki, but the ninja grapevine was not to be underestimated. If Iruka could hear about the mission and pass it on to my brother and me, everyone in the administration center was probably in the know.

Kakashi shrugged. “I’m curious too.”

I grimaced. “It...could have been worse.”

“The way you’re saying that tells me it couldn’t have gotten much worse,” Obito said, crossing his arms. “Did anyone die?”

“...Not for lack of trying.” If Kōsuke had thrown a single ill-timed punch… “It turned out that the Gekkō family that hired us was a bunch of jerks.”

This, of course, roused some interest. Obito in particular had a lot of experience with turbulent families—and not just his. Hooray, MP probationary periods.

“Are you allowed to share any details?” Rin asked, as Kakashi pulled out a few ryō notes to pay for his own groceries. I’d kinda interrupted them, and thus the shopkeeper was giving all of us weird looks until money got involved in the picture again.

I started looking at the fish for sale again, since admittedly the lack of food had been the main reason I’d even emerged from the apartment. Despite the ice seals, I’d never been too fond of the smell of fish. But Hayate loved mackerel, and thus I needed to make some accommodations. On occasion. When I felt like deboning and descaling things.

“Kei?” Rin prompted.

I sighed. I really didn’t want to think about the mission, but it wasn’t classified and hadn’t put anyone in the hospital. It had just been...tedious. But I also owed my friends a story.
So over the rest of my grocery shopping, I told them. About Kōsuke and Tsukiko, and the way they’d made the trip to Kitano Town a constant slog with their complaining, and so on and so forth. I even told them about the family tree that Tokio had kindly made for me and Hayate to take home—which included Dad and us instead of just the people who were “officially” accepted into the family. I probably wouldn’t hang it on the wall or anything, but it was nice to know.

And eventually I wound my way back to the important part. “…And Hayate broke his katana on the mission.” I shook my head to cover the brief pause as I omitted the White Light Chakra Saber from my account. “He’s going to need a replacement, but I already had a plan. I guess it’s more overdue than anything.”

I hoped that no one had noticed the near-slipup. Kakashi might have given me a funny look over the top of his joke book—apt—but he didn’t seem to focus on it.

I might have gotten away with it.

“What are you going to do about Hayate’s sword?” Obito pressed.

Rin popped up on my other side and added, “It’s not a secret, is it?”

“Only from him,” I said, grinning. I told them, of course, because it was something I could tell all of them. Something we could share for a while until the fun really started.

Anyway, I ended up getting everything I needed to make dinner. But as I was heading home, I remembered something rather important.

“Hey, Kakashi, could you drop Mr. Ukki off at my place sometime soon? I’m finally back to take care of him,” I said, before our group split up.

Obito was stuck by a coughing fit, possibly from eating something that disagreed with his esophagus? Rin also seemed a little suspicious, averting her eyes.

But Kakashi just nodded. “Tomorrow?”

“Sounds good to me,” I said, and trotted off.

I got Mr. Ukki back the next day, in a red pot instead of a green one to give the roots some more space. Since he was taller and in a somewhat tighter coil, I assumed Kakashi had trimmed a few leaves here and there once everything got unmanageable. Still, he looked good for a bamboo plant that had been bought at a store.

“Thanks for managing this little scamp,” I said, cheerfully farcical. “I hope he didn’t grow too big too fast?”

Kakashi shrugged again, affecting indifference. “It’s a plant. How much trouble could it be?”

“Point,” I admitted. More normally, I asked, “Kakashi, are you sure you don’t want to stay for the part where Hayate gets his sword? I mean, you taught him too.”

Kakashi hesitated for a moment, clearly considering his options.

“Kakashi-sensei, you made it!” Hayate shouted as he stuck his head into the hall from the living room. He stumbled over, tripping over one of my sandals, and face-planted into the front pockets of Kakashi’s flak jacket.
Kakashi carefully extracted my brother by picking him up by the back of his shirt, then dropped him on his feet. Hayate bounced on the balls of his feet for a moment, then sprang forward again and hugged Kakashi. Then he let go, saying, “I didn’t think you’d show up…”

“I wouldn’t be late for this,” Kakashi said, as though there hadn’t been any debate. There was something to be said for his tendency to wear a mask—it made lying so much easier. As Hayate steered him past me and toward the living room, I heard him say, “Your team’s in there already, right?”

I shook my head and hefted Mr. Ukki up against my hip, then closed the front door behind me with my foot. As the voices inside rose to a fever pitch—with Gai’s rising above the lot like a rocket—I grinned to myself.

This, right here, was home.

Kakashi’s birthday was on a bright, sunny day dead in the middle of September. Right on the tail end of the summer heat, when the weather hadn’t quite caught up to that little fact just yet. None of the leaves had started to turn colors, but dew on the grass could have been frozen once or twice. I didn’t generally get up early enough to check.

Keeping a secret like the White Light Chakra Saber for more than two months was difficult, but Sensei kept the weapon out of the reports and Kakashi wasn’t one to poke around in a case he’d been told was closed. Given all the family drama that had come out of the Kitano Town mission, it made sense.

And thus, when the big day rolled around, everything fell into place.

“You need to distract him until we can finish the cake,” Kushina told me seriously, her hands on both of my shoulders and making me hunch down to meet her eyes. “This has to be perfect!”

“You got it, Kushina-san,” I said once she let go, bowing immediately.

And so I enlisted Gai, who enlisted Obito, who made it basically impossible for Kakashi to visit Sensei’s house before three in the afternoon. The two of them together basically kidnapped Kakashi from his apartment and kept him busy with training, challenges, and miscellaneous other tasks for most of the day.

Delegation was the best skill.

As for me? I met up with Team Inoichi at Sensei’s house to make sure that everyone had all the gifts that they wanted to bring. Granted, this mostly amounted to “the White Light Chakra Saber and extraneous details,” but it wasn’t like we hadn’t given it our best shot. The weapon was simply too good for comparison.

“This is going to be the best gift ever,” Yūgao nearly squeaked, looking down at the tantō resting in its case. Naruto, sitting on her shoulders and pulling her hair into two long purple tails, giggled in agreement.

Temujin had thoughtfully provided a box so we could give the weapon to Kakashi without tragically failing at wrapping paper. I thought it was a nice touch.

“And you’re sure no one told him anything about this, right?” Iruka whispered to me urgently, as though speaking too loud would somehow disturb the blade.
I gave him an incredulous look. “I know I didn’t tell him. That doesn’t mean he doesn’t know, but…”

“If he did know, I don’t think he’d let us know he knew, would he?” Hayate fretted.

“You’re fine, kids,” Sensei said from the kitchen, even as he and Kushina worked on, respectively, frosting a cake and finishing her special miso soup. I’d never seen Sensei pipe little blue beads of frosting on anything, much less a birthday cake, but he was certainly good at it.

It didn’t hold a candle to the impending feast Kushina was working on, but precision and Sensei went together pretty well.

“Sensei, Kushina-san, do you want me to send someone out to go get them yet?” I asked, raising my voice to be heard over the din of the kitchen.

Through a somewhat garbled response—the kettle chose that exact moment to start shrieking—I managed to hear an affirmative.

Leaving my brother and his team on the couch admiring their collective gift, I headed out the front door and hopped up onto the roof. Ducking under a power line, I made my way to the highest point on the building and reached out with the non-Isobu edition of my chakra sense, searching for Kakashi, Obito, and Gai.

If I closed my eyes, I could feel all three of them at the top of the Hokage monument. If I opened them, I could almost see them. Sure, they were a ways past the top of the ridge, but all three of them were tall and, when you got down to it, I only needed to see three greenish specks from this distance.

What I wouldn’t have given for cell phones.

Nothing for it, though. With a mental sigh, I went to retrieve the guest of honor and his two escorts. Or two distractions? Thought for later.

A couple of minutes and well-timed ninja leaps later…

“Hi, Kei! Is it time to go?” Obito asked, while Kakashi and Gai continued their handstand contest behind him. He had a stopwatch in his hands, but wasn’t really paying much attention to it even as both competitors started to wobble.

I nodded.

“Okay!” Obito said, and turned back to the other two. He even clicked the stopwatch. “We’re done here, Gai.”

“Not yet, Obito-kun!” Gai said brightly, while Kakashi silently swayed to one side before correcting his balance again. “There is no clear winner!”

Obito blinked at them owlishly as I approached, tilting my head to one side to watch the two boys continue their competition. To me, he asked in a stage whisper, “What do you think, Kei?”

I responded with a helpless shrug. Kakashi and Gai’s rivalry was something unique and, when you got down to it, not something I really understood. Interrupting just seemed...unseemly? Against the unspoken rules? I was pretty sure unspoken rules were involved somewhere.

“I think we should walk all the way to the Hokage’s house on our hands!” Gai suggested looking up at Obito and me. He even shifted his balance to one hand for a second so he could give both of us a “I’m in,” said Kakashi, but without anything like Gai’s energy. Then again, Kakashi almost never sounded excited about anything.

Obito and I exchanged glances. Our thoughts were pretty much the same, and obvious to anyone who knew us: How did we get roped into being friends with these two? Aside from the fact that Gai was magnetic and Kakashi was our teammate, anyway.

On second thought, it was a stupid question.

We ended up walking to Sensei’s house at Gai and Kakashi’s pace, in deference to their ongoing competition. For all that I occasionally gave Kakashi flack about relative stamina levels versus everyone else, the fact of the matter was that that issue was chakra. In terms of raw physical endurance, Kakashi put his back into training nearly as much as Gai did. There was a reason that the two of them were rivals and not, say, two mismatched idiots constantly playing catch-up.

“So, am I supposed to act surprised once we get there?” Kakashi asked. It was always a bitch and a half to try and hide things from shinobi, and doubly so from a scent-tracker. He could probably smell everyone well ahead of whenever we got there.

“Play along,” I hissed at him, out of the corner of my mouth.

Ahead of us, Gai and Obito were increasing their modest lead to something that, if this competition was a race, Kakashi would need to worry about.

“Fine, fine,” Kakashi muttered. He lowered his head stubbornly and concentrated on where he was putting his hands. Then, once he was sure of his gait again, he asked, “Do I get any hints about the gifts?”

“No.”

After that point, he let the topic rest until we got to Sensei’s front step, at which point it was kinda pointless to ask again.

I peered up at the house. While it made sense for security reasons, I’d never been able to sense anyone in it from the outside. It made it hard to tell if everyone had arrived yet or not, though there were easily a half-dozen people hiding in the backyard, out of view of the road.

I was just gonna assume that everyone else was inside the house. I didn’t know how to manage people for party-organizing purposes anyway. I just had to trust that everyone else had gotten things ready without my completely superfluous input.

Once we reached the actual stairs leading up to the main floor, Kakashi gave up on the handstand business and said, “Gai, you win this one.”

Gai, who by that point had started walking on the hand railings ahead of Obito, gave Kakashi a thumbs-up. “Then that brings our records to thirty-one to thirty, my rival!”

Obito took one look at the two of them, again, and shook his head. Then he beckoned to Kakashi. “Come on, birthday boy. You only turn eighteen once!”

Unless you’re me.

Being morose again?
“You know you totally spoiled any chance of this being a surprise party, right?” Kakashi commented, as he finally reached the front door.

“Eh. You’re not an idiot, so it’s not like we were getting much past you. Just act surprised.” Obito paused, thinking that over and remembering the whole ANBU thing. “In a non-stabby way. Good surprised.”

“I’ll try,” Kakashi said dryly.

Gai bounced off the railing and landed next to him, hand on Kakashi’s shoulder. “Ready?”

By way of answer, Kakashi opened the door.

Spoiler: Kakashi totally failed to act surprised in any way, shape, or form. While everyone did _shout_ “surprise!” at the four of us as we entered, and Kushina scooped Kakashi out of our grasp and into the crowd, Kakashi didn’t so much as twitch to show anything _like_ surprise.

Sure, he flinched at the noise, but so did Iruka. And Genma would have if Raidō hadn’t covered his ears ahead of time.

“You know, this is a bigger group than I expected,” I said, in an aside to Obito.

“Gai and I invited just about everyone we could think of,” Obito admitted. “The really hard part was getting the details past Kakashi. The actual _party_ was a lost cause.”

I nodded. Just what I’d been thinking.

“Let’s join in,” Obito said, and we were both swept away by people.

There was the usual hubbub for a while—there was cake, there were people, and several of the people had not seen either Kakashi or cake in quite some time—and thus it took a while for everyone to settle down. After getting all the gifts piled up on the living room table instead of where everyone was actually going to eat, I did a quick head-count just for my own satisfaction.

Aside from Sensei(‘s Shadow Clone?) and Kushina, and Team Inoichi setting up shop in the kitchen, there were a _lot_ of people around. Asuma and Kurenai were on the couch with Tatsumaki and Naruto in their respective laps solely because they were staying still long enough to be colonized by kids. Gai was standing up, nearer the window, and explaining his victory over Kakashi in the hand-standing contest to Genma and Raidō. Rin was maneuvering the cake out of the path of the party, while Obito was trying and failing to shoo Reiko the Pointer out from under the table. From the sounds of things, Fuse and Yatsu were out back and trying to manage the other seven dogs. Yamato hovered around the fringes of the party, only to be snatched up by Gai and dragged over to Kakashi, where he seemed marginally happier than he had been while adrift.

I tried to hang back and avoid much attention by managing the pile of gifts. I mean, I probably wasn’t going to remember any of them simply because _one_ of them stood out above the pack, and there was just no way anyone else would be able to top it.

Some things were just impossible.

So I piled everything on top of that box to give the others a fighting chance. I didn’t rattle any of them, at least. Even if, otherwise, I boasted the kind of curiosity that made five-year-olds on Christmas seem tame.
But while I ducked responsibility for a bit, my mind wandered.

“I don’t even like cake,” Kakashi said, sounding more puzzled than anything.

“It’s more for everyone else, then,” Kushina replied. “But you do still like miso with eggplant and salt-broiled saury, right?”

Kakashi ducked his head. So much for complaining about sweets, when it was apparent that Kushina had his number after all. And that didn’t even touch the half-a-dozen other items on the menu today, miso and rice excluded.

Somewhere across the kitchen, Obito made a noise like a tea kettle followed by a strangled, “L-lemon…”

I winced. Somehow, getting stabbed or slashed in a fight didn’t quite hurt as badly as lemon juice on open injuries, no matter how small. Rin would probably say something about nerve endings congregating near the surface of the skin while fixing the “injury.”

“You’re joking,” Kakashi complained, and Obito was promptly double-teamed by both Rin and Kakashi about knife safety.

It was hard to believe that all of these people—all of these friends—would never have gathered in one place in the old timeline. Watching them interact now was...it was something special.

“Keisuke-chan, are you going to stay on the sidelines all day?” Kurenai asked, snapping me back to reality from nostalgia-land. If that was what it could even be called.

“I’m just a little out of it today, Kurenai-chan,” I admitted, shaking off my melancholy. “But thanks for making sure I’m being included.”

“It’s hard to avoid being included in this crowd,” Asuma said, even as he bounced Naruto up and down on his knee.

Behind him, Iruka crossed the living room with Yamato, and the two of them sat down in a somewhat quieter corner. Given the drama in the kitchen, I could hardly expect anyone with sensitive hearing—or an aversion to crowds—to stick around in there.

Hm. I got to my feet and decided to see if the kitchen catastrophe was any closer to being completed.

Just then, Tatsumaki wiggled around in Kurenai’s grip until she could clamber onto her brother in Asuma’s lap, then stuck her bewhiskered cheeks up against Asuma’s stubble. Asuma froze in place, dogpiled by small children somehow (despite there only being two of them).

“Your face itches!” Tatsumaki declared. Now that I thought about it, other than the Third Hokage, it wasn’t like she hung around with anyone else with facial hair.

“It’s called a beard,” Asuma protested, when Tatsumaki gripped her brother’s hand and pulled it up to touch Asuma’s face as well.

Kurenai, of course, was being no help at all and was busy snickering at Asuma from behind her hands.

Yeah, they could handle the kids.

I made myself busy assisting with other things. And the kitchen didn’t catch fire.
Somehow, we made it through a meal even though things ended up sorta devolving into standing around a lot. While the kitchen table was big enough (with some modification) to suit about eight people, eighteen was asking a bit much. Kushina and Sensei’s cooking got rave reviews, per usual, and then we started on the gifts.

All of us were sprawled out all over the house, but we had a good view of the proceedings. I had a better one than most, since I somehow ended up on the couch next to Kakashi and became the designated guardian of the trash bag Rin had provided for all the junk paper.

To be honest, I didn’t end up remembering most of them after the fact. Of course, Gai gave Kakashi a green spandex jumpsuit (for what turned out to be the third time). And Sensei and Kushina gave him one of the distress beacon kunai like the one I’d gotten before going to Kitano Town, and a homemade scarf.

Most of the rest of the gifts just kinda flew under the radar.

“Oh, mine next,” I said as I dug around in my pockets, since there was no way Kakashi was gonna find mine under a ton of wrapping paper—as a result, I hadn’t put mine on the table at all. Foresight!

Kakashi gave me a blank look. The last gift on the table was the box containing the White Light Chakra Saber, but the note explaining how we got our hands on it was on the inside. There was no reason to expect a random extra gift out of nowhere.

And so, I pulled out a slip of paper—about the size of my palm—and handed it to him.

“‘The bearer of this coupon is…’” Kakashi trailed off for a moment, blinking rapidly. Obito leaned over and tried to read it, but Kakashi pushed him away. Before the two of them could start play-wrestling or something, Kakashi finished rapidly, “‘The bearer of this coupon is entitled to one meal with and paid for by Keisuke Gekkō, because I’m a jerk who skipped the bill.’”

“Seriously, Kei?” Obito asked.

“Hey, I ran out of ideas and I do owe him,” I said defensively. I poked Kakashi’s shoulder. “And anyway, I can’t compete with this last one and I’m at least mature enough to know it.”

“It’s not like any of us know what’s in the box, Kei,” Rin said, her voice dry. She paused, then she narrowed her eyes at me in a suspicious squint. “And you knew that. Are you just trying to get us all excited about it?”

“...maaaaaaybe.” Wow, I was terrible at deflection. I should have gotten an award for being the worst on-the-spot liar ever.

“Open it!” Hayate shouted from behind the couch.

This, apparently, was enough incentive for Kakashi to zap the little decorative red string apart and then open the box.

The note fell out, unheeded.

“We were on the mission to Kitano Town,” my brother began, leaning over the couch so he could see the top of Kakashi’s head but, as it happened, not his face. “And we got in a fight with some missing-nin and I just happened to grab that—”

Since I could actually see Kakashi’s face, I reached up and covered my brother’s mouth with my hand.
Frozen in place, Kakashi hadn’t so much as twitched in response to Hayate’s outburst. His fingers rested against the hilt of the tantō with a kind of reverence I hadn’t seen in years, and never out of him. But he wasn’t taking the weapon out of the box, or channeling any chakra into it, and for a moment I wavered indecisively.

One false move would ruin the moment.

Then Kakashi stooped to pick the note up again, and read it even though his fingers trembled.

Still, no one moved. Gai, caught out of position, couldn’t steady his rival with a firm hand or anything like that. Not without breaking the tableau.

Crap, what do I do? Did we break him?

Wait for it.

Wait for wha—

The next thing I knew, Kakashi wrapped both arms around me and then I was trapped in a steel vice clamped around my shoulders. Momentarily stunned speechless, I lifted my arms and returned the hug more out of reflex than conscious thought, and Kakashi’s spiky white hair brushed my ear as he hooked his chin over my shoulder. And while his fingers dug into my back a bit, I felt him start to shake.

I leaned my head against his right before he buried his eyes against my shoulder, and the first tears finally snuck through his normally-ironclad self-control. Instead of squeezing harder, I just let my hands rest against his back. He’d take a minute and then he’d be okay.

Everyone deserved a chance to cry from joy.

And thus Kakashi is reunited with his dad's signature weapon.

Since Kei and Kushina’s birthday was yesterday (woo, July tenth!) and Kiba’s was on the seventh, I figured we needed at least one birthday to commemorate all the occasions. CYB is almost three years old by posting date, everyone!

(Oh, and by the way? That's not the same Mr. Ukki Kakashi left with Kei.)
“Are you sure this is gonna work?” Obito asked, staring down at my right arm with his Sharingan active.

“Well, there’s no way to be sure until we try. It’s kinda like your arm, too,” I said, even though this wasn’t at all accurate. While Obito took advantage of the Wood Release bullshit that Zetsu had once been able to bring to bear, my proposal was a bit...more intense.

I was pretty sure that no one had ever intentionally tried to partially activate a Tailed Beast chakra cloak. It just kinda happened, and generally all at once. A compartmentalization experiment today could save me a lot of mid-battle experimentation in the future. Sensei had tried to get that into my head after our spar years ago, but...well. I was nothing if not determined to do nothing for long stretches of time.

And anyway, I wanted to see if I could still grow coral swords without triggering all the horrible medical side-effects of going full V2 cloak, which was the only way I’d ever gotten them to work before. Tsunade would probably kill me if I tried something that stupid, but...well, I did need to know what I was still capable of.

Obito’s eyebrows pinched together and he pursed his lips, thinking. “But...uh, you could lose control of this arm, too.”

No, you won’t, Isobu interrupted, aggravated by our sluggish implementation of his plan. Just try it. I won’t let anything happen.

“Isobu won’t, though. It’s his chakra,” I reminded Obito, though he still looked a bit uncomfortable with the idea of experimenting with Tailed Beast chakra indoors. Even if Sensei had specifically included seals to prevent any chakra inside the apartment from leaking out of it, up to and including intensities that would strain normal security measures.

“If you’re sure…” Obito trailed off, sighing. Then his Sharingan twisted itself into the triple-bladed form that characterized his Mangekyō Sharingan. “I’m ready when you are.”

“Okay.” I shifted my weight so I wasn’t resting the weight of my crossed legs on my toes, then started drawing Isobu’s chakra out of the seal.

I could still remember the first time I’d done this deliberately, spinning Isobu’s chakra through mine like a different-colored thread in a loom. But unlike that time, I was drawing his chakra only through the tenketsu that led to my right arm instead of through my entire body. And Isobu was a lot more tolerant of me and my weakness than he had been back then.

My arm started to feel almost as though it was sitting in the sun, but the heat came from inside my chakra coils in an inside-out sensation that I’d never really concentrated on before.

“Well,” I said, as the blood-red energy surged over my hand and engulfed my right arm up to my elbow, “it seems to be working.”

Obito nodded, though he sat back on his heels as though recoiling from an open flame. “Yeah, and I’m not seeing any problems. It doesn’t hurt, does it?”

“No,” I said, which was somehow surprising. I flexed my fingers, examining the way that the V2 chakra cloak thickened the digits but didn’t provide any convenient claws. “Though it does seem like it should. I mean, I used to think the V2 cloak melted flesh, but I haven’t had that problem since Isobu decided he liked me.”

As if I didn’t have perfect control over my chakra, Isobu grumbled, shaking his head. What do you take me for, a human?

I notice that you didn’t deny liking me.

Denial is a lost cause at this point. Isobu settled back down onto his massive forearms, huffing in disdain. Don’t give me a reason to change my mind.

Aww, you do care!

I changed my mind. I hate everything.

“Uh, Kei?” Obito probably didn’t mean to interrupt the conversation, but he snapped my attention back to the present anyway. “You zoned out again and that kinda worries me when your arm is still doing the glowy thing.”

Okay, so he definitely meant to interrupt, but with the best of intentions. I looked down at my arm, which still didn’t hurt. But to Obito, the red-black-something glow was probably ominous.

“Sorry, Obito. Back to work now.” I clenched my right fist and tried to remember the way that my chakra had flowed on the occasions when Isobu and I had formed coral swords. Theoretically, using them was similar to my weaponized chakra scalpels, except for the bit where people could actually see them.

...Well, and the fact that they stayed after chakra was channeled into them. The Isobu-sized coral swords were still where I’d left them a few years ago, if in a few more pieces.

“If you could go a bit slower than you normally do, I think I might be able to help more,” Obito admitted. He gave me a wry look. “But I’m not really sure if I’m helping at all, to be honest.”

Eh? “Why’d you think that?”

“Well, I mean…” Obito rubbed the back of his neck, looking sheepish. “Except for the first time you did this jinchūriki stuff, you...never really seem to need anyone to look out for you. You and Isobu-san are really good at fighting together, and I guess…” Obito let the sentence hang, shaking his head.

“Obito…” It probably wasn’t the best idea to suddenly decide to focus on interpersonal problems instead of the fact that my arm was channeling enough chakra to blow a hole in a steel bulkhead, but I was a proud multitasker. Besides that, I trusted Isobu.
“We haven’t really just...hung out together, have we? Not lately,” Obito corrected himself, fidgeting. When I patted his shoulder--with my non-V2 cloak hand, because that was a horrible idea--he went on miserably, “And I get that we don’t have the same kinds of missions or anything, but we were...I don’t know, we were combat partners before Kannabi and now we’re not. And I don’t know how to feel about losing that!”

I opened my mouth to say something--probably a kneejerk protest, because Obito was still my best friend and how could I have let him think otherwise--before biting down on the thought and actually listening.

Okay. I had to sort through what he said.

Yes, there were rational explanations for why Obito and I generally didn’t hang out much together. Between our mission schedules since Kakashi’s birthday and the fact that I didn’t want to be a third wheel to him and Rin, we didn’t spend much of the same time in Konoha. Obito did stealthy stuff like infiltrating enemy villages, while I did considerably-less-covert operations in the open with the expectation that my reputation could actually be used.

Sensei had a good reason for never assigning us the same missions, but it did make it difficult to keep in touch sometimes.

“We should try to hang out more, then,” I suggested. Seemed like the simple solution. I paused, watching Obito’s face carefully for a reaction, before noticing that his Sharingan inevitably slid back toward my right arm.

Which was still doing the eerie demonic glow thing.

“Uh,” said Obito, because while he’d had a moment of weakness there was a bit of an elephant in the room. Or a hundred-meter three-tailed turtle monster, on a slightly different plane of reality. “So I think Isobu-san might be getting a little bored…”

Thank you for noticing, was Isobu’s biting response. Are we now going to get past this human drama and work on the actual problem at hand?

On cue, my gaze finally focused on my hand again. For all that it’d been a red-black glowy claw for a few minutes by this point, there was no indicator of how long it had been aside from the low, steady hum of powerful chakra. And since it was coming from me, there had been a bit of change blindness going on once I got used to it.

I flexed my V2-cloaked hand and watched the thicker-than-usual fingers move along with my flesh hand underneath. No damage so far...

“Um, you can try to produce the coral swo—okay, never mind.” Obito’s voice ended on a bit of a squeak as a meter of pinkish material shot upward from my curled fingers as though on a spring. But the end of it rested in my palm, almost clinging to my fingers like dough.

“This is a lot weirder when I’m not in a fight and actually get to think about it,” I admitted, turning the blade this way and that by flexing my wrist. Rather than being the smooth curve of the katana I was more familiar with, this blade looked like someone had pulled an airplane wing design out of nowhere and then ripped out random chunks for fashion’s sake.

It’s an organic sword. Be glad you have one at all.

“I wonder if there’s a way to refine the design,” I wondered aloud, responding to both Isobu and “Obito in one go.

“I don’t see why not,” Obito said, at the same time that Isobu gave me a one-eyed glare and said, What did I just say?

At some point, I was going to have to sit down and just wonder why so many of the people in my life seemed to be down one original eyeball.

“Here, can I take that for a second?” Obito asked, and stretched out a long, winding vine of Wood Release to take the coral sword from my grasp. He tested the weight experimentally once I broke the nascent weapon off my hand, then said, “So, these stick around after you use them, right?”

“Yes,” I said, already growing the next one much more slowly. The blade sort of...extruded, from nothing. If I knew more about physics, theology, or biology, it probably would have upset me.

Obito set the coral down on the carpet, careful not to cut anything with the entirely-to-many edges that had appeared on the first blade.

The second blade turned out lumpier than the first, probably as a result of the production speed. But at least it had only three parts sharp enough to cut through Wood Release.

“This is actually getting a bit scary,” Obito said after the fifth blade almost looked like a katana. Unfortunately the resulting piece was thin, pink, and brittle enough that touching the Wood Release branch at the wrong moment caused it to snap in half.

By the time we gave up due to chakra fatigue, there were seven...things lying on my living room floor, one of which was in a couple different pieces. All of them were Tailed Beast derived weapons, but once they left my grip they seemed to revert back to the physical properties of unmodified coral.

How the hell had I made the Isobu-sized versions?

“Dammit,” I said, when the fifth attempt crumbled under its own weight the second Obito tried to pick it up. Again.

“On one hand, these things seem mostly ornamental,” Obito said, after he’d observed them all carefully with his Sharingan for any sign of dormant chakra. “On the other”--and here, he pointed at my still-glowing hand--“you’ve definitely got access to the weirdest V2 chakra cloak ever. And this stuff might be safe to sell.”

...Eh?

“You might want a second opinion from someone who actually knows like, jewelers and stuff, but I think this,” Obito said, as he picked up a shard of coral, “is maybe something that you could get some money out of it.”

I stared at him. “...I’m gonna repeat what I said in my head a second ago. What?”

“Well, remember when you fought Sensei and one of those big blades got chopped up for souvenir stuff?” Obito asked, and waited for me to nod. When I did, he went on, “Some of it went into jewelry, or like those little ornamental statue things rich people put in display cases. People like having that kind of memorabilia from big events, and cool people.”

“So, what, I should make coral to sell?” I asked, still confused. “I’m not sure that Isobu would...”

“You’re making it anyway for training,” Obito pointed out. Then, he froze, holding up one finger to signal me that another thought was incoming. “Oh, I know! You could sell this to the Inabi Pet Store. I’m sure Satoshi has a few customers that have saltwater fish.”

I smiled in a wry sort of way. “Getting a bit ahead of yourself there, Obito. But I guess I do need to figure out what to do with all this excess...stuff.”

I mean, I could keep some of it, but what I used in combat was way more than I could ever find a use for around the house...

Speaking of things around the house and its inhabitants, the apartment door slammed open to the sound of my brother’s loud, “I’m home!”

Immediately, I doused Isobu’s chakra and sent it skittering back into the seal on my chest. Though Hayate knew about Isobu and had felt his power before, some deep-seated instinct demanded that I return things to normal before he saw me.

Kind of silly, in hindsight.

While Obito swept the coral carefully away and into the dustpan we’d set aside for the job, Hayate crossed the threshold and the living room before flopping face-down onto the couch.

“...Rough day?” I asked hesitantly, while Obito continued cleaning. I got to my feet and put my hand on top of Hayate’s head. “Hayate?”

“I don’t wanna talk about it.” Hayate grabbed the nearest pillow and brought it down on top of his head like a kid trying to hide from thunder, pushing me aside. His voice sounded like it was knotted up inside his throat, but he wasn’t hurt as far as I could tell.

Not physically.

Obito and I exchanged looks. Uh-oh.

I sat down on the floor next to Hayate and the couch, putting my hand on his shoulder, since I only had so many standbys for moments like this.

“Hayate, what happened?”

“Don’t wanna talk about it,” Hayate hissed, as much as he could while sounding like he was going to cry.

Yep, definitely trouble. Obito surreptitiously disappeared out the still-open door, taking up a post outside with all of the coral. I’d invite him back in once the crisis was...well, if not over, then at least identified. Hayate probably wouldn’t want to have a full crying session in front of Obito, even if he’d probably feel better.

“You can tell me,” I offered. When I decided that sounded a bit pathetic, I added desperately, “I’m sorry, I’m just trying to help.”

Hayate seemed to consider this, then loosened his grip on the pillow. Then he nosed his way out from under it and I caught a glimpse of his reddened face before he wrapped his arms awkwardly around me and buried his face in my shoulder.

“Yūgao broke up with me,” Hayate managed, on his second try. He snuffled, and my shoulder got a little damp, but he at least remembered to reach over me and to the box of tissues on the table before he blew his nose on my shirt.
“Oh, Hayate,” I mumbled, pulling back so he could take care of the whole snot business. I kept my hand on his knee, though. “Can I ask what happened?”

It took a few minutes to hear the story from him, in fits and starts.

While Yūgao and Hayate were still friends, it turned out that the breakup was a little more complicated than it seemed. Yūgao wanted space to reassess how she was going to reach her life goals, while Hayate also needed to focus on self-improvement after the scare on the Kitano Town mission. Or at least that was Yūgao’s thought process as far as Hayate knew, because Hayate hadn’t agreed.

And then, one argument later, it was over.

And several hours and a lot of whacking training dummies later, Hayate finally got around to coming home and sitting on the couch with me and an entire kettle of tea. And blankets, and pillows, and one massive case of emotional exhaustion.

I’d thank Obito for the tea later. My best friend had literally anywhere to be that was less awkward, and thus had disappeared into thin air via Body Flicker immediately after making the tea.

I’d have to apologize to him later, too.

But for now, I focused on my brother first.

---

December 24, 1:04 pm

It took about two days for my brother to get sick of being coddled, comforted, or any other words related to them. He was a grown shinobi! He could take on the world like the tough guy he was, even if he had to get into a sparring match with Yamato and train with Gai and do all of the training tasks he’d been avoiding while dating Yūgao.

And that left me free to do what I wanted, just in time for Christmas Eve. Which no one in this lifetime celebrated anyway.

So I walked to Obito’s apartment.

The Uchiha District had never been my favorite place in the village, for reasons that had barely anything to do with the people currently living in it. In one timeline, it was a ghost district that had once been home to people who, by and large, hadn’t deserved to be slaughtered all the way down to one surviving eight-year-old.

And in this one, I stopped at a corner bakery and bought four packaged melonpan to share with Obito.

There was a moment of dissonance, when I walked down a street I knew would have been carpeted with bodies in another moment years past this one.

“Gekkō-san, are you all right?” asked one of the bakery owners when I froze up on the street. The broom in her hands stilled.

I blinked, then gave her an embarrassed nod. “Sorry, Uchiha-san. Won’t happen again.”

Uruchi Uchiha, probably the most matronly woman since Molly Weasley, waved at me with a smile and said, “Take care of yourself out there, then. Come back any time!”
I acknowledged the comment with a wave, then headed off at ground level. Roof-hopping always felt weird in clan districts, and not just because this particular one could set intruders on fire at a distance that would make a flamethrower proud. It felt a bit like I was running across someone else’s property, since clan members used the skyways as much as anyone. In clan districts, that feeling was magnified to the point that streets became a thing again.

I arrived at Obito’s apartment a little before lunch time, noting that he’d updated the seals around it again. While I could still sense him (and Rin) moving around, sound seemed to stop dead once it hit the physical space that made up his apartment. While it meant the weird echo effect of the hallway was deadened, it still sounded odd.

Regardless, I walked up and knocked on the door. “Obito, I brought snacks!”

Obito’s chakra moved to the door, after jumping in surprise at the sudden noise. For a moment, all I heard was the sound of the door being jostled on its hinges as Obito sorted out the traps and locks he’d put on it at Kakashi’s insistence. Still couldn’t actually hear anything inside the apartment though.

Obito opened the door a crack, only moving it the rest of the way open once he could see it was me. “Hi, Kei,” he said, but he kept his voice low. “You can come in if you’re quiet, okay?”

“Why’s that?” I asked, even as I handed the melonpan off to him and went to shuck my coat off on the chair nearest the door. It was a bad habit, since Obito didn’t actually have a designated junk-collecting chair like I did, but he didn’t have a coat rack either.

Oh well!

But really, the most important thing was the fact that Rin hadn’t said hello when I came in, and in fact she hadn’t even moved. Instead, Obito’s futon was still spread out on the floor, with a lightly snoring lump curled up in the middle of all the blankets like burrito filling.

“Oh, I see,” I said in a voice not much above a whisper. “Sorry for interrupting, Obito.”

“It’s okay. Rin pulled a double shift yesterday. She’s been asleep since then,” Obito explained quietly. With ninja grace, he dug a couple of cans of that sweet green tea out of the fridge and set one out for each of us.

“I haven’t seen this since Ame,” I remarked, a little confused.

“It grew on me,” was all the explanation Obito offered.

Well, it didn’t require a kettle, which would have probably woken Rin up. That was something.

“So, how’s Hayate doing? That stuff the other day sounded big,” Obito said, apropos of nothing. Or not. He’d kinda-sorta been there when the meltdown had happened.

“He yelled, ‘Don’t pity me!’ when he ran out the door, so I think he’s in the angry phase right now,” I said, then cracked the can open and took a long sip. When Obito rolled his eye, I said, “Yeah, I know. I’m hoping he joins Gai on a run around the village or twenty, until that attitude bleeds off a bit.”

“Do you want me to spar with him?” Obito suggested, sounding like he was officially out of ideas.

I shrugged, pushing any affronted feelings leftover from the morning out of my mind. “He’s a big boy now. I’ll offer help, but I can’t solve this for him. He might just need time to think things through.
and decide what he wants to do.” I rubbed the back of my neck, “Sorry the other day ended up just being a Hayate crisis.”

“It’s fine.” Obito fidgeted, then blinked as though a thought had just hit him out of nowhere. “Oh, speaking of crises…”

“Yeah?”

“Uh, I’m not really sure if I’m allowed to tell you this,” Obito fussed, before saying, “but you already know basically all of the village’s secrets anyway and you’re kinda the other half of Operative Crane, so…”

I nodded and waited. He had a point, and another one to make.

“You know how you came back a while ago on that mission to Kitano Town, and there was this mystery guy that the bandits might’ve been working for?” Obito asked.

Wait, they’d put Obito on a basic fact-gathering mission?

Talk about overkill.

“You figured out who he was?”

“Not exactly?”

But any further conversation was put on hold, because at that point Rin woke up.

The first hint I got was when her chakra roused, and then she was rolling off the futon in a way that would have put her on the floor if she hadn’t already been there. She took all of the covers with her, turning into an advanced form of the Rin-burrito from before, with her feet sticking out of one end.

The Rin-burrito gave a loud groan as Obito and I waited patiently at the table for her to learn how to form words again. Or tolerate sunlight.

I glanced at Obito, who gave a shrug that clearly said the rest of the conversation could wait for later. We were secret agent buddies, after all.

Then Obito opened one of the melonpan packages and bit into the pastry, while I leaned back in my chair to watch the show.

Under the covers, Rin managed to slowly extricate herself from at least one layer of blankets. Then, with painful slowness, she dragged the remainder with her to the table and sat down in the third chair, still bundled up, and dropped her forehead to the table. The effect was a little like a giant cloth caterpillar had joined us for lunch.

“Rin?” I asked, peering under the edge of the shuriken-patterned comforter for signs of intelligent life.

“But...early…” Rin groaned from somewhere in the mass.

Obito got up and bustled around the kitchen for a moment, looking for something or other. He seemed to know what he was doing, so I assumed that Rin crashing here was pretty routine.

...For some reason I’d never really wondered if Obito could cook or not. He could make tea, obviously, since he had just the other day, but otherwise I’d kind of assumed that he was about as bad as I’d been when I started out.

Entirely ignorant of my doubts, Obito left the remaining melonpan on the table for Rin and me to snack on while he made breakfast.

After a while, Rin wriggled out of the blankets and seemed to finally acknowledge my existence. The melonpan seemed to help. “Kei? What are you”—Rin yawned, cutting off part of the sentence—“doing here?”

“I just came to visit Obito, since Hayate’s drama’s been taking up all of my time lately,” I explained, though badly. After a second, I admitted, “And I only have today and tomorrow free before my next mission, and we pretty much never get time off at the same time.”

“What are you going to be doing?” Rin asked, while Obito started to hum as he worked.

“Well, tomorrow I tutor the kids and then I have my checkup about the arm thing,” I said, raising my left hand and wiggling my fingers. “Though we did already figure out that I can form a partial Tailed Beast chakra cloak. That’s progress!”

Rin stared at me. “I...didn’t Tsunade-sama say not to do _anything_ with the Three-Tails’ chakra the last dozen times you spoke to her?”

Whoops. “...Yes?” And that number only counted the times Rin had been there, too. “It was only my right arm!”

“Kei,” Rin said, in a tone that told me I was in deep shit. Then she groaned and, bringing her hands to her face, she said, “It’s too early for me to be dealing with this right now.”

“I’ve been awake for five minutes. My point still stands,” Rin retorted. Giving me a long look from between her fingers, she eventually said, “I’m glad you didn’t hurt yourself, but please stop doing things like that.”

_It was perfectly safe._

Rin would probably kill me if I said that.

“Especially since Tsunade-sama, Kushina, and I _finally_ had a breakthrough.”

What.

“Didn’t I mention that?” Obito asked, while I choked on a pastry. Rin gave me the customary thump on the back, though mostly because she was being polite.

“You,” I managed, after recovering from aspirating crumbs, “you what?”

“It’s a theory, but once we were on the right track we sort of chased it for...a few hours?” Rin rubbed her eyes, drawing my attention to the dark circles still under them. “While most shinobi don’t get the type of tenketsu damage you did, there were a few people who were willing undergo small-scale corrections of Gentle Fist damage. You’re just going to be the first patient with self-inflicted damage...and so much of it.”

I frowned in concern, trying and failing to squash feelings of guilt related to Rin’s sleep deprivation problem. She’d been working so hard for my sake... “So, what are you going to do?”

“Unless you want us to? Nothing,” Rin replied. “The procedure isn’t...difficult, exactly, but it requires a lot of precision and a _lot_ of time. We’re going to have to essentially overwrite your natural chakra coil network from your shoulder down, using seals as artificial tenketsu as we go.” She gestured vaguely. “You remember how Tsunade-sama said that your normal coils were atrophying without the shoulder tenketsu, right?”

It was a little hard to forget that detail. If I hadn’t been as good with chakra as I was, that development would have ended my career right there.

“Hikaru-san volunteered to coordinate the Byakugan scans, but the procedure may end up taking half the day,” Rin said seriously, “if you agree to it. And even so, Tsunade-sama was clear that this will not make you as good as new. The damage is too extensive. But you’ll be able to use your left arm again.”

“...Are there needles involved anywhere?” I asked, hesitant. “Because if there are, one of them had better be full of something to knock me out.”

“Jinchūriki physiology doesn’t quite make it that easy, Kei,” Rin said, while Obito checked the rice cooking on the stove behind her. “Even if the Three-Tails didn’t automatically purge most poisons from your system, we need you awake for this kind of procedure, especially as we lay the new groundwork for a functional chakra coil system. I’m sorry.”

I winced. This stuff was so much easier when back when I made a habit of basically knocking myself unconscious ahead of any major medical procedure. Granted, it was generally the same thing that led to me needing a major medical procedure that did it, but still. “So, about the needles...?”

“...We’re going to need to tattoo the new seal lines,” Rin admitted, and I shuddered from head to toe. “But at least we don’t have to cut your arm open!”

I’d probably heal too fast for that anyway.

“I almost wish you had like, I don’t know, just a seal earring or something?” Ao had had one of those, but that was for keeping his stolen Byakugan from constantly draining his chakra. And it would only have involved one needle. Once.

Rin shook her head, but her voice was sympathetic as she said, “It’s not that easy. I wish it was, but we looked at all kinds of removable seals and nothing could handle the level of complexity we need. We’re basically building you a new arm...with the old one still attached, granted.”

Dammit. “Is it too late to go dig up a Zetsu?”

“Don’t even think about it,” Obito said over his shoulder. He rejoined us at the table, doling out rice and miso soup into three bowls. “I don’t know if you know this, but it’s not just the arm. I’m missing my entire shoulder, a third of my ribcage, and like half my original right lung. They all got replaced.” Obito shuddered just as badly as I had a moment ago. “Any less and Tsunade-sama said I’d probably have ripped my arm off the second I tried to punch something like she does.”

...I probably should have wondered about that a while ago. It explained how Madara had managed to put the Puppet-Master Seal directly onto his heart, though.

“Our team is a mess,” I muttered. Two eyeball removals, one impending chakra coil replacement, and Obito’s patchwork biology kinda confirmed my long-standing theory that if any team was gonna get mangled and live, it’d be us.

“I’m just glad I didn’t have to be awake through it,” Obito admitted. “But Kei, are you gonna do this? I mean, I heard the basics earlier, but it sounds like it’s going to be a big deal.”
“I don’t really have a choice.” I sighed. “If I want to keep using Isobu’s chakra, I need to be able to use my entire body and the whole chakra cloak too. And it’d be a lot safer to fight knowing that I didn’t constantly have to guard my left arm or else get wrecked.”

And thus, I resigned myself to the worst tattoo session ever.

Chapter End Notes

Lang: Today's chapter title is from Toy Story. Short chapter today for an intermission as we set up the next long arc.
(It's been a few months since Kakashi's birthday, just FYI. We're heading into another new year soon.)

Beta Note: Sorry for the short chapter, everyone. I'm currently dealing with some health problems that are making it difficult to do some things, including beta-ing for Lang and CYB. As such, the next chapter is also probably going to be delayed while I focus on getting better.
July, nineteen months later

“I think the dummy’s dead now,” I said in a dry tone, holding my hand up to shade my eyes. I could just about see the end of Hakusai’s wickedly-curved stinger, if I didn’t mind looking straight at the sun.

Rin tilted her head, peering around Hakusai’s eight legs and finally spotting the remnants of what used to be a viable training dummy. “Oops. I’m not even sure Hakusai-chan saw it…”

Rin’s latest summon was a good fifteen meters long from claws to tail, with her stinger alone as large as a man’s arm and twice as deadly. She was mostly white along her carapace, with light green chitin for her extremities. And she was heavy as all hell—even with eight feet to spread the load, she left footprints far deeper than Rin’s or mine in the damp morning grass.

“I was aiming for a dummy?” Hakusai asked, and shuffled all of her feet so she could turn around and face us.

Yeah, for some reason scorpions didn’t get better eyes the bigger they got, even if they definitely had the physical space for complex optical structures. Whatever forces of evolution went into them had clearly not seen the point of it.

Ugh.

As she moved, Hakusai also ground the straw dummy into what would have, if there had been much moisture left in it, a fine paste. Scorpions got decent ground clearance if they put any effort into moving, but apparently Hakusai wasn’t feeling it.

“Hakusai-chan, you did very well,” Rin said, resting her hand against the top of the giant scorpion’s left pincer. While she was still trembling a little—summoning something that big was a challenge for her chakra reserves to handle—she was smiling broadly. “I know I can depend on you in a fight.”

“Of course, Rin-chan. I am at your service.” Hakusai coiled her tail and lowered herself back to the ground, relaxed. “Will that be all for today?”

“Yes, I think so,” Rin replied, stepping back. “You’re dismissed.”

Hakusai clicked her pincers twice, then disappeared into smoke.

“You’re getting a lot better at this,” I commented to Rin, once her summon was gone. “I barely remember the time when you couldn’t summon anything bigger than Kyūri-chan.”
Rin stuck her tongue out at me. “That was years ago, Kei.”

“Not quite three,” I corrected, shaking my head. Almost three years… Time flew whenever I stopped paying attention, apparently. Almost three years since I’d fought Orochimaru. Almost three years since I’d finally gotten most of my shit together and decided to see a therapist. More than five since Kannabi.

What a journey it’s been.

“Kei?” Rin asked, prodding my shoulder.

Oops. Zoned out again. “What?”

She frowned in concern. “You’re doing it again. Do you need to talk about something?”

I shrugged, sitting down in the damp grass. Given how the sun would heat everything up to scorching levels in an hour or two, I’d enjoy the cool earth for a little longer. On second thought, I just decided to lie down on the grass. “Nothing major. I’m just thinking about life.”

“That could mean anything,” Rin said, sitting down next to me. Only instead of leaving her limbs sprawled out all over the place like I did, she could maintain a seiza for damn near forever thanks to cheating with medical ninjutsu. My legs would fall asleep in moments, no matter what I did.

“Yeah, but it’s not a bad thing.” I lifted my left hand and looked up at the sky, fingers splayed out. Like, this, the lines mapping all of my chakra coils out would have been imperceptible, if not for the subtle…clunkiness? Whatever the word, my left arm’s use of chakra was never going to be as smooth or natural as it used to be.

Still, not bad for a seal that had started out as a full-sleeve tattoo. The design had been simple at the start, since it only had to cover almost seventy individual tenketsu points. But then Sensei and Tsunade and Kushina had actually put the framework in…

Ten hours of work, but definitely worth it.

“You’re not getting any feedback from the seals, are you?” Rin asked, reaching over to touch my upraised palm. I could feel her testing the artificial tenketsu for any kind of decay, but there was nothing to worry about.

“The only part that hurt was getting them,” I said.

Well, technically speaking it was only the tattooing part that hurt. Ten hours of needles.

If that level of exposure didn’t cure me of my fear of needles, then it was the sort of experience that would have instilled a worse one. As it is, I was grateful for the work that everyone did despite the fact that the passive form of the seals still had the occasional lurch.

Looked cool once the blood was out of the way, though.

“What about you, then? The little diamond’s not causing you trouble, is it?” I asked Rin, and she automatically raised her hand to her forehead before stopping herself short of touching it.

“It’s a work in progress, Kei,” Rin admitted. “It’s not...quite the Strength of a Hundred Seal? Tsunade-sama was proud I could get this far, and Shizune-san was a little jealous, but I’m not sure this is really enough to let me throw all the medic-nin combat protocols out the window.”
“So what are you gonna call it? If it’s not the Strength of a Hundred Seal, but it looks like it…?”

“I was thinking more, um, something like… ‘Death Stinger Seal?’” Rin shrugged, continuing with, “Obito suggested ‘Rin’s super awesome explosion’ or something but I don’t think it’s that descriptive. Or needs that much description.”

What. “Explosion?”

“If I punch something really hard it kind of…” Rin pantomimed something either blowing up or possibly shattering. “Boom.”

“But not as much as Tsunade’s version, or else you wouldn’t call it something else.” And it wasn’t like Rin did the thing that I did, where I turned everything I wanted into an explosive of some kind. Woo, seals.

“I don’t know. Maybe I shouldn’t call it anything until I figure out what it’s going to be.” She brushed a few strands of hair out of her face. “And if I do end up succeeding, and making more out of it than just a halfway point, then I won’t need to come up with a name.”

I grinned. “And at that point you’ll be the best medic-nin in the world, barring the woman who taught you.”

Rin blushed, making the marks on her cheeks stand out a little less. “Um, maybe.”

It wasn’t like other candidates were exactly leaping out of the woodwork. And for all I knew, Shizune wasn’t ever going to go as far and I knew Chiyo wasn’t. There just weren’t many medic-nin in the running.

“Congrats, Rin. Always knew you had it in you,” I said, patting her shoulder.

“...Does that include the other me?”

Uh. “Since the other you died at thirteen, I don’t think I’d be able to give you an actual assessment there.”

Rin pinched me. “Kei.”

“Ow! I’m just being honest!”

“There’s this thing called ‘tact,’” Rin informed me dryly.

Hey, I had tact. Why I would need it for a completely casual interaction, damned if I knew. I’d kept multiple actually fragile situations from blowing up in everyone’s faces by using tact.

On alternating weekends, maybe.

Shut up.

Is that the best you’ve got?

I have more tact in my little finger than you do in your entire body.

Are we forgetting that I exist inside you? And how often do you think I talk to humans and practice?

You talk to me all the time!
You don’t count.

Asshole turtle.

“Kei?”

“Sorry, Isobu wanted to share his wit again,” I grumbled. “No big deal.”

“I’m going to meet Obito for an early lunch,” Rin said, apropos of nothing. “Do you want to come with me?”

With no appointments today, it wasn’t like I was going to be needed anywhere. “Sure.”

“No, no no no, you need to give me an idea,” Obito said, with a paintbrush in one hand and a plain white ovoid in the other. While it sort of looked like the flat masks that Kiri ANBU favored, for whatever stupid reason, it was a lot more concave and had more room for actual facial features to be hidden underneath it. And only one eye-hole, in case anyone forgot whose mask this was going to be.

I sure as shit wasn’t going to suggest a spiral.

“Maybe...a tiger?” Rin suggested, tilting her head to one side while squinting at the mask. “I mean, most ANBU are animals, right?”

“I think an owl would work better with a flat-as-hell design like this,” I said. “Why’d you pick this one?”

“Well,” Obito said, and I mentally congratulated myself for setting up a security seal on the table ahead of this conversation. “Uh, I think it looks cool. And I’ve been getting by with like, the Crane mask and whatever I can find when I break it, but I think I want to do my own thing?”

“Did you ask Sensei about it?” I wanted to know.

“He said as long as it hides my face, he doesn’t really care what I do,” Obito said, which struck me as somewhat out of character unless he was taking some liberties with his paraphrasing. “I wasn’t really supposed to have a reputation on my own, but now that I do…”

Yeah, he did: Phantom Obito, the most paradoxically famous infiltrator on the continent. Normal people had to spend weeks or months trying to sneak their way into top-secret places and steal things. Obito? He just had to waltz in and do whatever the fuck he wanted. Outside of Kakashi, no one else had a ghost in a chance of stopping him, and he didn’t stick around places long enough for his Kamui time limit to expire.

It was that kind of talent that led to Obito being the first known shinobi to infiltrate every village on the continent. Normal people had to spend weeks or months trying to sneak their way into top-secret places and steal things. Obito? He just had to waltz in and do whatever the fuck he wanted. Outside of Kakashi, no one else had a ghost in a chance of stopping him, and he didn’t stick around places long enough for his Kamui time limit to expire.

It wasn’t like they didn’t have spies in ours. But that was why we didn’t blow their cover—it was easier to control what information people had when we provided it. Better the enemy you knew or whatever.

“Are you sure you want it to be orange?” I asked him, just to be clear. Obito liked orange, but as far as color schemes went, there were definitely better options. Tigers could get away with it because their stripes helped break up their outlines in places where they hunted, but...well, there wasn’t much call for a bright orange mask anywhere. And it wasn’t like Obito’s mission outfit wasn’t already a decently-concealing dark gray.

Of course, ANBU masks were mostly white...

Obito nodded. “I like orange.”

...Okay then.

“But I haven’t decided what pattern I want to use.” Obito pushed a couple of sheets of paper toward Rin and me, and put his brush down. Instead, he picked up a pencil from the pile, and we copied him. “Little help?”

Well, if our final design needed to be orange, my mind jumped automatically to jack-o’-lanterns. Not that either of these two would have any idea what those were. In a society that did do harvest festivals and ghost things but didn’t add in commercialization of a co-opted pagan holiday, it was...unlikely that anything like that existed or would exist in this world.

And if, somehow, Halloween was a thing somewhere on this planet, I’d probably assume that the universe was fucking with me on some level.

Still, a carved pumpkin look would work out for Obito’s purposes, assuming I could capture the design in my head and put it on paper. I hadn’t drawn anything purely for fun in forever.

Rin was already scribbling away. While Obito had his Sharingan active, there wasn’t any real harm in letting him copy all of our designs—even the unsuccessful ones. He was the one who’d have to decide on something he liked and paint his mask that way, after all.

I got to sketching. While Obito’s mask only called for one eye-slit/hole/whatever, most of the carved pumpkins I’d ever seen had two. What would I do with all of that extra space?

Uncertain, I started on the mouth first instead. After a couple of minutes, I had a large gap-toothed grin that would have fit in perfectly in a hockey tournament or an orange gourd rind, and I added two triangles for the right eye and the nose. Looked a bit friendly for an ANBU mask of any kind, so I made a weird cross-stitch design for the space over Obito’s empty left eye socket. It resembled a badly-repaired teddy bear, in some strange way. If an enemy shinobi spotted someone wearing this, it would probably be difficult to think of the wearer as a threat, much less an S-class jōnin.

“What did you make, Kei?” Rin asked, looking up from her paper. Which had...oh my.

Well, if I ever needed a reference for an anglerfish’s jaws, I certainly didn’t need a diagram anymore. That was a lot of teeth. Sort of a stub-nosed, frowny look, too. Very wide-set eyes, but she hadn’t drawn them all to one side like a flounder...

Probably more appropriate for Obito’s threat level, but wow did that not fit his personality.

“Uh, I think I got the number of eyes I was supposed to,” I said carefully. Good grief, it looked like it wanted to leap off the page.

“...Whoops,” Rin said, and started erasing one of the misaligned eyeballs.

“Other one,” Obito suggested. “I like the teeth, but not the frowning, and the eye on Kei’s looks better.”

“I’m not trying to look too terrifying,” Obito admitted. “I mean, yeah, I’ve got a reputation, but...hm.” In far less time than it had taken either me or Rin to draw our designs, Obito copied the bits he liked onto another sheet of paper.

I tilted my head to one side. He’d turned the single full eye into a rounded shape to match the hole punched in his blank mask, while the other one still looked like a bad stitch job. Not like he needed to see out of it. And instead of copying Rin’s array of needle-teeth as they were, he’d flipped the design so that the evil grin actually was a grin and not significantly more fishy.

And he’d gotten rid of the nose. Wasn’t like ANBU had those.

“What do you think?” Obito asked, holding the paper up so Rin could see.

“You’re not going to have to carve the mouth out, are you?” she asked immediately, grimacing. “Maybe I shouldn’t have included so many teeth…”

Obito turned the paper around again, then said, “No, I think I’ll just paint them white on a black border. It’ll look okay, and I won’t poke myself with porcelain.”

It still looked weird to me, but as long as they were both happy with the mask, that part didn’t matter much.

At that point, our lunch finally arrived, and we put all of our doodles and my security seals away so we could have a perfectly normal lunch. As opposed to...whatever the heck happened. I was pretty sure spies weren’t supposed to talk shop while in a public setting, but then Obito was the spy and I was just the wrecking ball. We all made it work out somehow.

“You’re...you’re serious.” Sensei’s voice was downright disbelieving, somewhere on the far side of “baffled.” He blinked uncomprehendingly, with Obito’s mask design on his desk. “It’s based on a gourd!”

“My end of things was,” I said, slightly hesitant. “I mean, he wanted his mask to be orange and my old life had a pretty strong emotional connection to carving pumpkins. Even if they looked completely different, and turning food into lanterns was a pretty childish thing…”

Sensei just stared for a solid five seconds. Then, he started to tremble in place, trying and obviously failing to suppress—

“Hahahahahaha!”

With his head on the desk, Sensei was almost roaring with laughter. And then he exploded into smoke.

I think I just learned one of the major limitations of the Shadow Clone Jutsu.

It wasn’t that funny.

“Carving lanterns out of vegetables?” Kakashi asked blankly, from the other end of Sensei’s desk. “Where would that even come from?”

Uh...“I think it was a tradition from a different country, somehow, but then people forgot all the context but kept doing it anyway since it’s fun?” Look, I tried. I was never an expert on figuring out why people kept certain traditions going. “But the pumpkins here taste better, so I’m not sure why we’d bother wasting food like that.”
Kakashi looked like he still couldn’t wrap his head around it. But the next thing he said, clearly dismissing the exact thing that prompted the new train of thought, was, “You don’t talk about that world much.”

I winced. “No, I… Okay, I just generally don’t want to talk about it?”

“Why?” Ugh, stab me in the heart why doncha?

...Actually, no, that was a terrible joke and I instantly felt bad for thinking it.

I sighed aloud. “It’s...kind of the same reason you don’t talk about your dad much.”

Kakashi’s visible eye widened slightly.

God dammit. And I’d managed to go for years without mentioning him to Kakashi. Fucking impulse control.

“I don’t...there’s no way for me to do anything about what I left behind by being reborn here. It doesn’t do any good to dwell on it,” I admitted, though my throat was making a valiant attempt to close up. I bit the inside of my lip for a second, trying to get myself back under control. “I lost…”

“Kei…”

“Kakashi, it’s fine. I might as well tell someone, right? Aside from my therapist. And you already know some of it.” I rubbed my eyes. “Since Sensei’s gonna need a minute to come back.”

Kakashi grimaced, and tried to change the subject with, “He wasn’t here in the first place.”

I ignored it and barreled on forward through the conversation like a bull in a china shop. “I guess...if I slow down to think about it, I really lost everything? My family, my friends, my future… You know, when I was born I thought…” I shrugged helplessly. “I lost a lot, but who the hell even knows what happened to the people I left behind? I wasn’t super friendly or anything, but…”

There was a reason I’d spent as long as possible not thinking about this topic. I hadn’t had any control over my death, but it was still...

Fuck.

I couldn’t even think it.

I didn’t even have the right to say that I missed them.

My hands were both balled into fists, my fingernails driving into the palm covering of the armguards I wore. The demands of this life meant that I couldn’t—wouldn’t—dwell on things I never had half a chance in hell of changing. Fuck, for all I knew I’d never even died. I didn’t remember being injured, or doing something stupid, so for all I knew I wasn’t even a reincarnation—maybe I was some kind of brain clone and I was just deluding myself that it all mattered.

Something nudged my wrist, tugging me out of my thought spiral. I blinked my blurry eyes clear, then looked down.

Kakashi’s fingers gently nudged their way forward, intertwining with mine. “I could carve pumpkins with you, if you wanted to try it again.”

Pffahahaha! The knot in my chest released its grip a little, just from the tension snapping.
Kakashi snatched his hand away, apparently affronted.

“I-I’m sorry, I know you meant to cheer me up, but the idea”—of Kakashi up to his elbows in pumpkin guts, making faces with just his eyebrows all the while—“was just…”

Oh god, he’d put the exact same design he put on damn near everything.

Kakashi huffed. “How hard can it be?”

“It’s not about how hard—” was what I was saying when Sensei reappeared with a fwhish right behind his desk. Exactly where his clone had been. “Uh, hi.”

“...Did I miss something?” Sensei asked, raising both of his eyebrows at us.

“Uh...you’ve got a bit...?” I gestured vaguely at my hair, since Sensei’s was quite a sight.

Actually, so was his face. On top of having a mess of hair-ties, clips, and a generous layer of glitter in his hair, someone had drawn a smiley face on his cheek in lipstick, right above an equally-red kissy mark that could only have come from a small child. He was also missing his flak jacket and his flame-patterned coat, but had conscientiously replaced them with a pastel pink apron and a thorough coating of flour.

Sensei scrubbed at his cheek with his sleeve, then sighed when he spotted the red. He left an impressive red smudge on his cheek, but at least he tried.

Kakashi recovered from his shock next. “Sensei, what happened?”

“Baking, until my clone exploded with laughter. Literally,” Sensei rubbed the side of his face again. “It’s not coming off, is it?”

I shrugged. “I mean, you could try mineral oil later, but for now? No.”

“Was the lipstick Naruto’s idea?” Kakashi asked.

“Yes. Hopefully Kushina will be able to talk him out of trying it on Gamakichi. But Tatsumaki will probably be able to help her once she finishes eating her part of the cake batter.” Sensei shrugged, settling more firmly into his chair. I made a mental note that he seemed to avoid looking at Obito’s mask design all the same. “Now, for what I actually called you both here for.”

There was a dramatic pause. Sensei’s circus escapee look ruined it.

And Kakashi broke it properly by asking, “Does this have to do with Shinjitsu?”

I glanced at him. “You read my mission report?”

“It was research for a mission.” And Kakashi was an ANBU captain, and in Sensei’s confidence, and knew pretty much everything I’d ever put to paper for the village’s sake. Why did I even ask those kinds of questions? “They seem to be taking the approximate role of Akatsuki, in the timeline you remembered.”

...Shit. “So Shinjitsu wasn’t just some random jerk with a punchable face.”

“It would make everything simpler, but no,” Sensei told me. “Do you know anything about them?”

“Not without taking a crack at the membership,” I admitted. “If I knew who they were, I could give you an itemized list on how they can be killed...if they were a part of the other Akatsuki, anyway.”
“We already have your initial report after the Mountains’ Graveyard incident,” Sensei reminded me. “If there’s significant overlap, I’ll need to see if we can come up with updated recommendations. It has been a while since then.”

I’d barely been a jinchūriki then. That was a while.

“Thus far,” Sensei went on, “we don’t have much. The group doesn’t seem to have a central hub or base, or at least not one that I’ve been able to direct Obito to attack. Mostly, we’ve been finding their agents—or at least people who gurgle the organization’s name as their last words.”

Like Tetsuo. Guess he wasn’t just a random fanatic. Or he was and I was being blasé.

“So we don’t, say, know who the leader is or what their endgame is going to be.” And to that, I got two nods. Crap, this was as bad as what the canon crew had needed to deal with regarding canon Akatsuki. The only reason Jiraiya had known Akatsuki had existed was because Orochimaru had been a member...up until trying to body-jack Itachi.

That had been a bit of a knot.

“We do know that his name is a pun,” Kakashi said dryly. “Makoto.”

Leaving aside that I already knew a Makoto—one of the scarier Intelligence officers running around the village—an organization named “truth” with a leader whose name meant “honest” was bordering on suspiciously appropriate.

The question was how—or perhaps if—the name and its reputation linked up. We didn’t know their end goals, and for all we knew it was an alien-focused band of conspiracy theorists. With knives.

But whatever the case, if the name was popping up...well, there was too much smoke for there not to be any fire.

I did not want to deal with a knockoff Akatsuki. Not after we’d all done so much to make sure the first one stayed on the straight and narrow.

...Foooooooor a given value of “straight.”

“So, no clan name?” I asked, shaking off the other train of thought.

Sensei shook his head. “Not that we’ve been able to find.”

I squinted up at the ceiling and the note (and its sibling, bearing the message, “Still not up here,” in Kushina’s handwriting), thinking. “What about a reputation?”

Kakashi glanced at the note, too, then said, “You got off lucky. There is...some evidence that some of their agents use samurai techniques to attack before shinobi can use hand seals. Like Mifune from the Land of Iron. Remember how he fought Salamander Hanzō?”

...Hang on.

Strictly speaking, I was trained in samurai techniques too. And I sure as hell didn’t need hand seals to fight any more than Sensei did. And with jinchūriki strength and speed and durability, I had a much easier time doing all that samurai stuff without fear of substantial retaliation from overkill jutsu that generally came back the other way.

That power differential—of which jinchūriki and S-class ninja were the pinnacle—was kinda one of the reasons that samurai culture only really flourished in one country. The rest of us had decided that acrobat-wizards were where the money was at, and history had mostly proven us right.

“I remember that Tsunade, Jiraiya, and Akatsuki got Hanzō in the end, though,” I countered, more gently than my thoughts would have indicated.

“It’s true that we don’t really have a shortage of S-class shinobi,” Sensei said, making placating gestures with his hands. “But I’d much rather nip this problem in the bud before we have to deal with a full-blown infestation.”

Better get the bug-people on it, then.

_Not helping._

“I can’t really help with information-gathering,” I pointed out, grimacing. “When you get down to it, I’m just...I’m a heavy assault unit in one body. I just have information you might be able to use if these are even the same guys as last time.”

“This is why ANBU agents exist.” Sensei nodded toward Kakashi. “We can make plans once we have more information. Thank you both for coming in.”

Hm, actually… “Sensei, could...I get a look at the Forbidden Scroll again?” I asked, drawing raised eyebrows from the only other two people in the room. “Not for the seal-work, but...”

“Are you worried about facing Shinjitsu later on?” Sensei asked.

“Yeah, and if not them, then there’s always somebody who wants to be the next big bad guy on the block,” I said, shrugging helplessly. “Maybe if I learn the Shadow Clone jutsu, I can work on...” I glanced at Kakashi, did a quick mental run-through of my closest friends’ affinities, and concluded, “Probably Lightning Release.”

I was long overdue for learning a second element properly, anyway. Hayate and Kaito were both Lightning aligned, where Obito, Rin, and Aiko all shared Fire, and Sensei and Kushina and their kids leaned toward Wind.

And I had someone who could teach me Lightning Release right here. “Kakashi, are you doing anything later?”

“You do realize it takes months to learn a whole new element,” Kakashi said carefully. It wasn’t really a question.

“Yes, which was why Water Release took forever,” I responded. Been there, done that, got mobbed by Water Dragon Bullets. “But I might have enough chakra to use the Shadow Clone method, right?”

Sensei and Kakashi looked at each other, and then Sensei nodded. “It should work. But don’t use that jutsu unsupervised.”

“So is that a yes?”

YES! No more environmental requirements, here I come!

Don’t make me burst your bubble. Just get going.
“But it would be better to do this tomorrow,” Kakashi put in. “Unlike you, I’m supposed to be working right now.”

Rats. “Tomorrow, then.”

Dear Hayate and Keisuke,

Hello, both of you! I have good news and bad news, just in this last month. I knew that my mother’s health was failing, but unfortunately we lost her to a heart attack two weeks ago. And while my brother was...perhaps less happy about this than the rest of us, it got worse. In defiance of all our expectations, my brother was disinherited! My sisters and I all received a portion of the Gekkō merchant company, with me taking the lion’s share by my mother’s own will!

As a result of this, my wife and I have expanded trade routes between the local villages, and have finally been able to organize three full caravans to rotate on the route to Konoha. We have gotten many interesting trinkets and foods that none of us have seen at home in years. I can only assume my mother’s will is being followed to the letter—after all, we are succeeding beyond we ever managed during her lifetime. Her legacy will be magnificent.

Incidentally, Konoha really does do excellent work in paperwork, particularly accounting. Pass my compliments to the Hokage for allowing us to use your auditing services.

Oh, and my family and I will be heading south this winter to oversee the setup of our newest outpost, likely just outside of Konoha. Sano and Megumi-chan won’t be coming—they both need to learn a bit more about village management while I’m gone—but Tsubasa, Ota, and Uki haven’t met either of you, and are looking forward to it. We won’t impose on your home, but perhaps you can meet us a few times while we’re in town. I look forward to seeing you in a few months!

Inari Gekkō

Chief Executive Officer, Gekkō Trading Company

I put the letter down, thinking.

Isobu stirred, having been paying attention for once. Did this human just insinuate that she had her mother assassinated?

Pretty sure she did.

Admirably ruthless of her, Isobu said, somewhat grudgingly. The old woman was deeply unpleasant, and I would have killed her if you had less restraint.

I still wasn’t sure what to think of it. It sounded like a CSI plotline waiting to happen. I trusted ANBU’s assassination division, but I really hoped no one found out about that. As for the morality of it?

To be honest, I didn’t really care. Her death was a net good for the region, if the financial reports I’d seen were accurate. If someone was that terrible to that many people, I’d consider Konoha morally obligated to shove her off a pier. That we’d done it by a completely untraceable method and arranged for her heirs to be the best of the lot, we’d probably done everything correctly. And the Gekkō family was being led by better people now.

Paperwork?
I projected a sense of confusion at him, not quite sure where he was going with it.

_Doesn’t your teacher have a moniker related to that skill? “Paperwork fairy” or something…_

_It isn’t like ANBU carries out assassinations without Sensei’s approval, _I reminded him.

_That wasn’t my point. I distinctly remember a specific assassin that specialized in untraceable kills, whom you know fairly well._

Wai—

..._Kakashi killed my dad’s aunt?_

_It’s shorter to say “grandmother.”_

_Or great aunt?_ I bit the inside of my cheek, trying to think my way through it. Okay, I knew that Kakashi was an assassin, similar to Raidō but more successful. Given what I thought of Umeko and her impact on people, did it really _change_ anything that I was pretty sure one of my friends was the one who put her out of everyone else’s misery?

No, it didn’t.

I would be lying to myself if I said otherwise.

But...maybe I could ask him about it. Just to be sure. See what he thought about it.

_You’re already supposed to meet him today. Just leave a few minutes early and bring the scroll along. Last-minute studying, if you want an excuse._

Depressing as the thought was, Isobu had a good point. Several of them.

I packed up all of my gear and the Forbidden Scroll, put my shoes on, and headed out. Maybe Kakashi would have something to add. Or a story I could—with some censoring—relate to Hayate.

---

I found Kakashi’s chakra wandering the village, accompanied by all eight of his dogs for once. While there wasn’t really a reason _not_ to bring out the dogs as much as possible (in my opinion), it was possible that they had other business to attend to in the summon realms. Kakashi was really careful about where and why he called on them, since none of them were really designed to tank hits from some of the crazies we fought. As a result, they didn’t get to just hang around the village that often.

I hopped down from a convenient rooftop to approach the mission office. While Kakashi hung back and had his nose in a blue-jacketed novel, all of the dogs clustered around Genma’s knees. They were polite enough not to talk all at once.

“I’m not sure I can accept squeaky toys,” Genma said, gingerly holding a bone that looked like it had come from a rubber rhinoceros. It was covered in dog drool and bite marks, but it was still clearly serviceable.

“If there’s an Inuzuka in the pool, you should,” Pakkun argued, pressing the bone further into Genma’s grip with one paw.

“You know I can’t tell you who’s betting,” Genma replied. “I don’t even keep the records.”
“You can take that, though. I checked!” Bisuke barked.

Genma gave the dogs an impressively blank look, then glared at Kakashi.

Kakashi rolled his visible eye. “It’s not my fault. I just said they couldn’t all use my money.”

“So Bull is betting his bone,” Akino concluded. “Fair’s fair. And it has sentimental value!”

Kakashi gave the dogs a steady stare, not that any of them were paying him the slightest attention, and grumbled, “Traitors.”

What the fuck did I just walk into?

I sidled closer to Kakashi, while Genma continued to barely avoid being literally dogpiled, and asked, “What’s going on?”

Kakashi sighed, closing his book. “The dogs discovered what a betting pool was.”

...What. “Don’t tell me they’re playing Hanafuda.” Card-playing dogs would just about break my ability to process this bizarre alternate reality.

“They’re not.” Well, that was unhelpfully vague. I wanted to know what they were doing! “Is there some reason you’re early?”

Oh, right. I found myself rubbing the lower edge of my scar, feeling a little awkward. How to phrase this...? “Uh, did you...happen to take a mission to Kitano Town recently?”

Kakashi blinked. In the background, Genma was still arguing with the dogs about valid bets.

Something about insider knowledge?

What the hell were they betting on? Dog races?

“Not...recently, no.” And if I hadn’t known Kakashi as well as I did, I would have missed the hesitation entirely.

I leaned in closer, putting a hand between our faces and Genma’s line of sight. Since the dogs were still clamoring to be heard over each other, I wasn’t worried that he’d overhear us. “Did you get the mission to assassinate Umeko Gekkō?”

“Oh, that mission,” Kakashi said, his visible eye darting toward the ground for just a moment as his chakra reacted ahead of my reaction.

Wait. “Kakashi, I’m not mad. I know what your job is like and if anyone deserved that, it was her.” I patted his shoulder. “So, thanks.”

Kakashi relaxed. “Then you’re welcome.”

“Kakashi, would you please get your dogs to go away?” Genma’s voice demanded, and we both turned our attention back to him. And the fact that Bull was somehow sitting on him. Oops. “This is why I’m a cat person!”

Kakashi nudged me. “Try it. Hopefully before Genma suffocates.”

Why, because I gave them toys? I sighed to myself, because of course Kakashi would prefer to go back to reading rather than actually help Genma out of his conundrum.
Nonetheless, I whistled as loud as I could, and watched eight pairs of ears perk up.

“KEI-CHAN!” said eight dog voices, all at once.

_Oh shit._

_Sow the thunder, now reap the whirlwind._

“No, no no, _sit_—” And then what I said didn’t matter, because I was being crushed by over a hundred kilos of dog.

It took another few minutes to get the dogs to stop enthusiastically licking any skin they could find—and to get my hitai-ate back from Urushi—and by that point Genma had _finally_ stopped laughing. Kakashi gave me a hand up, at least, which was more than I expected from him on some days.

“So,” I said to the dogs, once I got to my feet, “what were you betting on?”

Eight pairs of eyes swiveled to Kakashi, and everyone looked shifty for a few moments. Genma was too busy trying to get his breathing fully under control, so I ignored him for a bit.

Pakkun raised his left paw. “Kakashi has a crush on...someone, and we’re betting he’s going to confess to her today!”

Kakashi hid his face behind his novel, but I could see the top curve of his visible ear start to turn red.

I stared at him. Then I snapped my fingers. “Right, Rin said something about this years ago. Is it the same girl?”

“Yes!” said Pakkun.

That...was a bit embarrassing. Explained Kakashi’s reaction, though. If his face got any hotter I could have boiled water on it.

“Do I know her?” I asked the dogs, since Kakashi wasn’t going to be up for responding verbally for a while.

Genma was making funny gasping noises, bent double and leaning on the doorframe for suppose. He ought to have been more careful, given that _senbon_ in his mouth. He could choke.

“Pretty well, I’d say!” Was that _glee_ in Pakkun’s voice? How obvious was the crush supposed to be? How had I missed it?

I mentally disqualified Rin—she would have said something, and she was dating Obito. That left...how many girls were even in our age group? Uh, Kurenai...but she was so obviously into Asuma that it would have been hopeless. Not anyone in Hayate’s group, because I would have seen that and probably punched him in the nose...

Maybe Shizune? I didn’t remember her dating anyone in the old timeline, and Kakashi at least _knew_ her. I hadn’t really been paying her much attention since Rin was my primary medical advisor...

“Genma, can I place a bet?” I asked him, even if he was slumped over on the street and out of breath from laughter.

“Yeah, can she make a bet?” Ūhei asked loudly.

Kakashi looked like he wanted the earth to leap up and swallow him whole.
“I don’t see why not?” Genma managed, getting to his feet again. He managed to sort himself out, taking deep breaths, before he went on to say, “Oh, yeah, you can definitely put money on this.”

“Great!” I said brightly. I glanced at Kakashi, then turned back to Genma and dropped a ten-ryō note into his hand. “Since he hasn’t said anything yet, and it’s been this long, maybe...I’ll bet that Kakashi won’t confess today!”

“You got it,” Genma said, whipping a notebook out of nowhere and recording my bet. “Thanks for adding to the pot.”

“Hey, I plan to win,” I countered cheerfully. “It was nice to save you from Kakashi’s dogs, but we have to go train...and probably grab Rin just to be safe.”

Kakashi, behind me, was doing an admirable impression of a living statue.

“Come on, Kakashi! Safety first,” I reminded him, as the dogs started to herd us away from Genma and the administration center. “And I haven’t seen Yamaguchi-sensei much since he retired, so we’ll get to say hi to him, too.”

Kakashi shook himself, then managed to say in an admirable approximation of his usual drawl, “Just as long as you don’t make me go inside this time.”

“I told you, he quit after his heart attack.”

Kakashi pulled an impressive disgusted face, which was quite an accomplishment for someone who was hiding three-quarters of it. “They’ll need to strip the floor and repaint the walls before the smell comes out.”

“Whiner. Come on, let’s go!”

Chapter End Notes

Author Note: Before you say Kei can’t be that oblivious, I am. In real life.

Beta Note: And we’re back with a chapter and much planning for future ones. Thank you all for your kind words, and for reading Catch Your Breath. This fic has only gotten where it has because of you. As for the contents of the chapter, I should let you all know Lang and I both are well aware of the reactions this chapter is probably gonna get, and I would love to inform you that laughter was wonderful medicine for me.
Truth and Lies Arc: For Good

Kei: Do a different dumb thing.

Chapter Notes

Kakashi and I made our way to Rin’s apartment over the rooftop, with eight dogs in tow. They probably didn’t want to miss the show—or the results of their bet. But how could I get Shizune and Kakashi alone together so it could work?

Well, Rin would be able to help, given that they were coworkers. And two heads were better than one!

They can be, Isobu corrected.

He had a point. Hm. I still hoped that the bet I’d made had just put Kakashi on the spot, not thrown him entirely off-balance. But the fact that he was very pointedly not looking at me didn’t really bode well. I’d need to apologize before we could get this plan going properly.

We were just turning the corner-rooftop that led to Rin’s place when I suffered a momentary lapse of impulse control. I said, “Sorry if my bet sounded like I was betting against you. I can help you ask Shizune out if you want.”

Kakashi’s chakra flared for a second—yep, definitely annoyed—before he hopped down to street level without a word to me.

Erm…

I might have fucked up.

You don’t say.

Kakashi leaned against the nearest telephone pole—or what would have been a telephone pole in a world where phones existed—and pulled his novel out from his shuriken pouch. With his dogs clustering around his feet, it was clearly my job to actually head up to Rin’s apartment and say hi.

The power of delegation in action.

I rolled my eyes at him—though he didn’t see me do it—and trooped up the stairs to the second floor. Rin’s apartment was the second door on the left, which I knocked on. I briefly debated flaring my chakra so she’d instantly know who was there, but she’d figure it out the second she opened the door anyway.

“Oh, hi!” Rin said brightly when she opened the door. “What brings you here...before noon?”

I wasn’t that bad. “Two things: One, I’m going to try learning Lightning Release starting today, and it’d be great to have a medic on hand for when I accidentally blow myself up.”
Rin raised an eyebrow at me. “You say that like you didn’t do that while you were learning every other skill you use now, too.”

“Rin!” I was...probably about that bad. Still, ouch.

“Truth hurts. So, what was the second thing?” Rin prompted.

“I think Kakashi’s mad at me, and he’s going to be my teacher, so…” Uuuuugh, how to phrase this? “So I’m gonna need your help with making it up to him.”

“Kakashi’s mad at you?” Rin didn’t have to be that skeptical. Or surprised. It wasn’t like our childhoods hadn’t included a complimentary “Kei and Kakashi are arguing again” sideshow for literal years. “Actually mad at you? What did you do?”

“Uh, I might have joined in on a betting pool”—at this, Rin’s other eyebrow joined the first—“and bet that Kakashi wouldn’t ask Shizune out today.”

Rin’s face did a very complicated dance for a second or two, backed by the sound of Yamaguchi-sensei coughing up a lung at the kitchen table.

I stuck my head into the apartment, over Rin’s shoulder, and yelled, “Take deep breaths, old man!”

“Easy”—hack—“for you to say!” Yamaguchi-sensei shot back. Still, he managed to get it under control after a few more moments, and got up from the table to head to the door, too.

Honestly, despite the fact that he was retired now, Yamaguchi-sensei only looked a little worse for wear. He was older, and what black pigmentation used to be in his hair had faded to silver to match his temples, and there were bags under his eyes that I didn’t really remember. But otherwise, he was still the same mean old cuss I’d known for most of my life.

“Are you making people’s lives difficult again?” he demanded, as snappish as ever.

“Just one person, and I tried to apologize,” I said. “It didn’t work.”

“There are two parts to an apology, Kei,” Rin reminded me. “Are you going to change how you act?”

“Well, I offered to help him confess to Shizune, but…” I wobbled a hand in midair. It hadn’t really worked out how I wanted it to, so I had to go to plan B. “So, can I count on your help? I mean, you know what Shizune’s schedule is like.”

Yamaguchi-sensei started coughing again, and Rin facepalmed. “Oh, Kei.”

“Did you actually give up smoking, or were you just saying that so I wouldn’t nag you anymore?” I asked Yamaguchi-sensei, since I wasn’t sure what to do with Rin’s reaction. I knew what I was doing!

Sort of.

“Kei,” Rin interrupted, before we could really get going. “It’s rude to leave Kakashi waiting out there.”

“But I don’t have a plan!”

“I do,” Rin replied. She patted me on the shoulder. “I’ll talk to Kakashi and get this sorted out, okay? Just...don’t talk about this with Kakashi without me.”
I trusted Rin to know what to do, here. She knew more than I did about unrequited crushes, as awful as that sounded. She would do better than I would.

Jeez, I’d hammered that sore spot. I was such a shitty friend.

When Rin ran down the stairs and was swarmed by dogs at the bottom—standard, really—I tried to hang back and be unobtrusive. Inasmuch as someone as tall as me...could. Oh, I wished that Konoha uniform designers understood camouflage so much in that moment.

Maybe I could talk to Genma and get the bet rescinded? No, it was too late for that...

Oh man. Rin was already talking to him. It...maybe it sorta looked like it was going well? Hopefully?

Are you going to get to the part where you electrocute people anytime soon? Isobu could charitably be called bored. I didn’t really know how to respond to that.

I didn’t remember the Dreamer being this pushy. Or opinionated. Or...occasionally hostile.

“Kei, you can come over here now!” Rin called, one hand cupped around her mouth and the other raised in a wave. “It’s okay!”

Oh thank fuck. I’d have to get Rin ice cream for this or something. And get her to tell me how she calmed Kakashi down.

I made my way meekly back over to them, rubbing my arm awkwardly. “So, um…”

Kakashi shook his head. “It’s fine, Kei.”

“Uh, the offer to help is still open…” I tried, but Rin made frantic throat-cutting motions behind Kakashi’s back and I let the offer drop like a lead balloon.

“Let’s just go train,” Kakashi said shortly.

“Forgiven, but not forgotten” about sums this up.

Unsurprising. Now get to the explosions.

Aye-eye, captain.

The training field we preferred—Training Field Three—had a lovely river running through it that we were not going to be making use of. Not unless I screwed up in a different way and set something on fire.

I was...kinda hoping not to set something on fire because, given my luck, it was probably gonna be me.

Nonetheless, today’s training found Kakashi and me standing kind of close to the water’s edge, while Rin and the dogs sat back in the shade. While they didn’t really need to be ready to jump in at a moment’s notice, I couldn’t help but feel like their confidence in my ability to use Lightning chakra was a bit...disheartening. Sure, I wasn’t totally sure what I was doing, but they could have had a little confidence in me.

Even if it would be a question of “what would I set on fire first?”
“First thing’s first,” Kakashi said, without a hint of the trouble I’d caused him before. “Did you bring the training paper?”

“Yeah, I did,” I said, and retrieved a scroll from my hip holster. Flipping through the seals for a moment, I popped one open and the stack of chakra-sensitive paper into my hand. Though it was silly of me, I’d never quite made the connection of using them to help train myself.

Showed what I knew.

“Take one piece in each hand,” Kakashi went on, as I pulled two sheets out of the stack and did as he asked. “Now channel chakra into the left.”

“Er, gimme a sec…” Drawing chakra up to my shoulder, I let it pool against the seal node that marked the end of my original chakra coils. Normal flow didn’t quite do the trick, but if I charged the seals correctly… There was a sensation like someone had taken weight off the joint, letting blood flow again. But in my chakra coils instead, and with a sort of humming sensation instead of the harsh buzz of pins and needles.

The sleeves of my training gear ended at the elbow, so I got to put on a bit of a show from there down. The active form of the seal resembled a true sleeve tattoo, and not just the utilitarian medical prosthetic that Tsunade had originally been going for. No, Sensei and Kushina had gone all out, because they had no concept of leaving things un-awesome.

Which was why the seal took the form of a classical ink painting of Isobu and his long spiky tails, with his head and body taking up a position around my upper bicep and his tails spiraling down around my arm to my wrist. Tsuruya’s inked image was ahead of Isobu’s, on my shoulder with her wings outstretched, with her feathers raining down to connect any tenketsu points that the initial design might have missed.

It was beautiful. But also really, really showy, so I tried not to depend too much on it when I didn’t have to. Much like electric cable, energy was inevitably lost as heat as the power moved from place to place. The people who had worked on me had done their best, but I didn’t have enough control over my artificial chakra coils to avoid that problem. And I never would.

Kakashi was staring at me. More specifically, he was looking at the seal on my arm with an unreadable expression, headband up and Sharingan almost glowing.

I didn’t really have it in me to tease him at the moment, but it felt a bit self-indulgent to show off like that. “It, uh, it’s pretty cool, right?”

Kakashi blinked twice, then nodded. “And the needles didn’t bother you?”

“Oh no, they did.” I shuddered at the memory. Still… “But it was worth it.”

Kakashi…actually smiled. Like, I couldn’t tell he was smiling because I’d never seen him do it without his mask on, but his eyes did the crinkly thing and he felt content. “Then I’m glad it turned out well. It looks good on you.”

I felt my face heat up a little. Gah, why did I suck at taking compliments? “W-well I wouldn’t do it again…”

“Can you please get started on training?” Rin called from the shade.

I want to see things explode now.
Ah, right. Both of us got back down to business, which really amounted to seeing if I could make the paper do something new.

Kakashi coughed to clear his throat, then said, “Anyway, channel with your left hand first.”

With my seal tattoo active, it wasn’t like I had anything better to do. I did as Kakashi asked, sending the somewhat-controlled chakra down my arm and toward my fingertips. Once it reached the paper, it was as though I’d run the sheet under a faucet.

Well, at least that was a decent baseline. Wasn’t like I didn’t already know what my chakra nature was.

Kakashi had his own sheet of paper between his fingers, and a spark of chakra from him sent the whole thing crinkling up as though crushed by an invisible hand. And I already knew he could use as many different nature transformations as different kinds of jutsu he’d copied, so I had to tamp down on the surge of jealousy. The Sharingan was such bullshit.

I grumbled and tossed the used-up paper aside.

“I have no idea if I’m going to be able to copy that.” Sure, I had more control with my right arm, but this process still involved stripping my chakra of its natural nature transformation and trying to convert my energy into something else.

“Barely anyone gets this right on the first try, Kei. That’s why this is training,” Kakashi pointed out.

I didn’t really want to hear that, mostly out of pride. I was so used to being good at chakra control that it felt like an insult when I couldn’t do everything I wanted to do. Even if I’d lost medical ninjutsu years ago already, I took failures way too personally.

But I did try. In a way, it was like my rip-off of the Samurai Sword technique—filing everything down to a single cutting point—

The paper split in two.

“God dammit!”

Kakashi made a confused noise. “What?”

Why did I have to do that in English? That was two fuckups in a row. A fuckup squared.

I facepalmed with my right hand alone. “Don’t mind me. I just—that wasn’t even Wind Release. That was me fucking up the chakra scalpel visualization, which is not what I meant to do.”

“And the shouting?” Kakashi reminded me, somewhat dryly.

That was a...a bit harder to explain. “I, uh…” Well, “The world I used to be a part of...had a lot of different languages. That was a small part of one of them.”

“...And probably a rude part.”

He knew me all too well. “Jackass.”

Kakashi raised an eyebrow at that. “Really, Kei? Foreign language insults?”

Argh! “Just let me try this again.”
“Go ahead,” Kakashi said mildly, and let me get back to work.

I sat down on the ground and crossed my legs as though preparing to meditate. Then I got another piece of paper out of the stack and set the rest down next to me. Something told me that I’d be going through a lot of them.

We wasted at least half an hour out there: me, trying to work on a technique that didn’t easily jive with what I could already do, and Kakashi eventually deciding that his time was better spent reading his novel rather than watching me fail at a basic exercise that many times in a row. Granted, he wasn’t a great teacher—Lightning for him was about as easy as pie, and being a genius meant he didn’t often think about why other people didn’t learn something as fast as he did. Or how to help them.

Meanwhile, Rin and the dogs played fetch downriver.

“How about we try something different?” he asked after I’d wasted yet another sheet of chakra-sensitive paper. While I was busy folding it into a very tiny paper airplane out of sheer annoyance, I did nod to him.

“Trying to do this from memory isn’t working,” I complained, throwing the paper airplane out across the river. Once the needle-nosed little monster got to the middle of the water, it exploded into a two-meter fireball.

“From memory?” Kakashi asked, even as he glanced at the remnants of the explosion with some trepidation.

“I know how your chakra feels, and I’m trying to copy it,” I explained. “But it’s not working.”

“Then let’s move on to the Shadow Clone Jutsu instead,” Kakashi suggested.

I made a face at him. Sheer stubbornness said I could do this without needing to divide my chakra into half a dozen different bodies, but this had clearly not been the case. “Okay. Guess we might as well use the Forbidden Scroll for something.”

Kakashi sighed. “Shadow Clone is the easiest jutsu on the scroll.”

Maaaybe Sensei shouldn’t have made a habit of letting us do whatever we wanted with one of the village’s most dangerous resources…

But whatever. It was in one of my supply scrolls, which was about as secure as it had ever been. It had been stolen by a genin last time around…or a not-even-a-genin. Naruto had failed his graduation exam three times by that point, hadn’t he?

Aside from the Shadow Clone Jutsu, the rest of the techniques on it were dangerous enough that I, personally, would have sealed the entire rest of the scroll in a concrete bunker. The world did not need a preview of the regenerating, super-powered uberzombies that the Impure World Resurrection technique made.

Or at least not another one, I thought grimly as I unrolled the scroll. Orochimaru had been enough for anyone.

“The Shadow Clone Jutsu is objectively fairly simply to perform,” Kakashi said, sitting down across from me as I got to the part where the Shadow Clone Jutsu was described. I had a grasp on it in theory, but I’d known better than to try it out unsupervised. “The scroll tells you that the jutsu fully divides your chakra between you and any clones you create, but it’s a little more complex than that.”
“How so?” I asked, since it had always bothered me that Naruto could spam the hell out of the jutsu and somehow not die. Come to that, I didn’t know how Kakashi had managed to use the technique when he was a kid either, and that didn’t even get into the whole Lightning-based clone business.

“The chakra transfer that allows you to use a clone’s memory also returns some of it so you can use it again.” Kakashi raised two fingers. “So if you only make one clone and it stays within, say, a hundred meters of you, you’ll get at least ninety percent of your chakra back. That decreases with distance and by the number of clones you make, so be careful. And since you have Isobu-san with you, you should be able to handle many more clones than, for example, Sensei tends to use.”

For reference, the highest number of clones I’d ever seen Sensei use was five, and that was only so he’d have some distractions-slash-Sage Mode batteries for the fight with me. And then we had his son, whose first use of the Shadow Clone Jutsu had produced five hundred viable clones...and then used them to beat a single chūnin into submission.

One had to wonder about efficient use of force in that situation. Luckily, I wasn’t aiming to be that ambitious.

I got to my feet. “I’m ready. Just the Tiger seal, right?” In execution, the Shadow Clone technique was pretty simple—gather chakra, wait for threshold...and then let it poof away into a brand new me! At least, I hoped so. Water clones were so much easier. Still, the chakra requirements for this technique probably would have killed me before Isobu had come into the picture and done some body work. Even now, I was a bit leery of a technique that demanded that much chakra in one go when it wasn’t even guaranteed to work.

Kakashi simply said, “Whenever you’re ready.”

I gathered my chakra, pulling out all the stops—

Roaring ocean waves filled my ears. My vision went black.

And then.

I—

Kakashi

When Kei’s arms go slack and she starts to topple, I catch her without thinking. My head fills with noise, like power lines buzzing or cicadas screaming, and it’s not until Kei is limp in my arms that I realize I’m not breathing.

Fumbling, I turn Kei over in my arms until she’s face-up and I can check her pulse at her neck. My hands shake, but I at least remember not to use my thumb. There is a pulse, and she’s breathing, but she’s unresponsive to touch and—“Kei!”—and sound, and this has never happened before without an obvious reason.

“Kei, come on,” I hear myself say, ragged and desperate. “Don’t do this.”

There’s the sound of rustling fabric, and Rin’s hand clamps around my wrist and then Kei’s off my lap and on the ground. Rin’s hands glow and they’re on Kei’s head and heart, and she’s talking and I can’t—I can’t—

“—kashi!” is all the warning I get before Pakkun sinks his teeth into my calf. Immediately, I focus on him with a reprimand stuck behind the knot in my throat, but he’s entirely unbothered. “Kakashi, the clone’s unconscious, too!”

The—what?

Pakkun bares all his teeth at me and growls, so I get the picture. Focus, dumbass—this is important!

I tear my eyes away from Kei and shove my headband up and away from Obito’s eye. The clone shouldn’t be unconscious—any kind of hit that would disable a person would outright disperse the clone—and Kei shouldn’t be unresponsive with this much chakra left in her system. This doesn’t make sense.

But the incongruity is enough to snap me out of my daze. “Urushi, Bisuke, go get Sensei and Kushina. Bull? Tsunade. Tell them Kei’s unresponsive with no visible reason, and that it seems to be related to the Shadow Clone technique we were working on. Tell them everything.”

The three dogs barked in unison before taking off in the direction of the village. I’d have sent one more to Obito, but he was on a mission.

That left me and the other five dogs to deal with what might have gone wrong with the clone.

Kei’s clone is face-down on the ground, looking...somewhat warped. It looks younger than she is, with glasses askew on a face that doesn’t have Kei’s distinct scar. It has long hair, pulled back in a tail, and is dressed like a civilian in a loose sweater. Its chakra, too, feels and looks off. The balance of Yin and Yang components is a complete mess—there’s so little Yang that it’s a wonder the clone can even exist.

What the actual hell?

The obvious solution to this problem is to just stab the clone and hope the missing Yin chakra returns to Kei’s body and allows her to wake up, but this entire situation is unprecedented. People who end up unconscious as a result of the technique are supposed to be dying, not stuck in some indecisive half-state. It doesn’t make sense.

“Kei?” I hear Rin’s voice say, as I pick the clone up off the ground and turn around. Kei’s—she’s sitting up but—

Two glowing eyes—gold encased in red—pin Rin and me in place as the Three-Tails’s chakra floods the clearing. Her eyes are open, but Kei’s not in there.

It’s Isobu.

Obito’s eye itches like there’s an eyelash in it, but I clamp down on the urge to use the Mangekyō Sharingan in any way, shape, or form. This isn’t like the time at Sorayama, not when the chakra Isobu is using is fully under his control and not mimicking the worst typhoon I’ve ever seen. The pressure here is just what Isobu is.

“What did you do?” Kei’s voice, at the bottom of her register, still sounds like her. But it’s definitely Isobu speaking.

“The jutsu didn’t work how it was supposed to.” Which is an understatement of the worst kind, but Isobu tilts Kei’s head to one side, just slightly, to show that he’s listening. I shift the clone in my arms and say, “This doesn’t even look like her.”

“That,” Isobu growled, “is not my concern. What I want to know is why I am here, and why Kei is not.

Oh no. “She’s not in there with you?”

“If she was, I would not be asking!” Isobu snarls, but is too uncoordinated to get Kei’s body up on her feet and lunge at me. Instead, he drives Kei’s fingernails into the dirt in frustration, maintaining a low, harsh rumble in her diaphragm.

“Kakashi, the clone—” Rin prompts, not that she has to. I can feel the clone stirring and lower Kei’s botched copy to the ground. As angry as Isobu is, there’s a possibility that this is Kei.

It makes no sense in the context of the technique, but stranger things have happened. Mostly to Kei.

The clone opens its eyes and immediately adjusts its crooked glasses with one hand. It doesn’t even sit up first.

Its eyes aren’t like Kei’s. They’re lighter, duller, and lack the depth in hers. Kei’s a whole person. This...isn’t.

“Kei?” Rin asks, hesitant to turn her attention fully away from Isobu. But he’s looking at the clone, too, and his expression, on Kei’s, looks downright murderous.

The clone focuses on Rin, then on Isobu’s eyes coming out of Kei’s face. Its gaze is still dull and unfocused, acting as though the lights are on but no one’s home. And still, in an approximation of Kei’s voice, the clone says, “We are experiencing...difficulties. I do not know where Kei...is.”

“You.” Isobu struggles to get up again, but fails once more. He doesn’t know what to do with legs.

“What are you doing here? You should be dead!”

A chill runs down my spine.

The last time I heard that tone from Kei, Isobu was fighting her to escape from the seal. The Dreamer had only emerged from sheer desperation, because all of us were going to die if we were down a fighter. And somehow, her existence had let us keep fighting long enough for Kei to recover, Obito to return, and Sensei to rescue us.

“There was a complication with the jutsu.” The Dreamer blinks heavily, as though sleepy, and lies down on the ground again. “I do not have further information.”

If I disperse her—No, not yet.

I don’t know what’s happening, and it could make things worse. “Dreamer—”

“The Dreamer is...what I was.” I don’t miss the definite article there. “But I am not fully her. I am not supposed to be here.”

“And what would happen if I dispersed you?” I ask, as she continues to lie there.

“You have no idea.” Isobu’s voice cuts clean across us, and I turn back to see Rin’s hand resting against Kei’s shoulder to support him. Isobu’s chakra runs across what rudimentary danger sense I had like a saw on a harp, sharpening the world. “Do nothing without information.”

Hard to do that when I don’t have any. All I have is the smell of mud and grass and summertime heat, of sweat and nonexistent blood. It rips through me, drilling in between my eyes like a stake, reaching down my throat.

The Dreamer sighs. “I do not know.”

I don’t—I don’t know what to do.

I leave the Dreamer lying there and get up. I can’t do anything right now and that’s—it’s not something that’s happened in years. Not like this. There’s no one to hurt, no convenient target. I’m helpless. Kei needs someone, but I’m not that person. I can’t help. I can’t—

I don’t know what to do. I know there aren’t hands on my throat but I can’t breathe. I know there’s no blood but all I can smell is—

Just like when Dad—

Something round and furry butts up against my calf, and I reach down reflexively to scratch Akino’s head. My fingers catch on his sunglasses, drawing them across the circular metallic edge as Akino pushes more into my grasp. His fur catches if I stroke him the wrong way, pulling me back.

Pakkun pushes his paws into the hollow of my knee and I drop to the ground and into the hundreds of blades of grass. This is real, this is here. Pakkun makes sure to leap onto my shoulder immediately and shove his nose in my ear.

Cold!

Pakkun’s tongue rasps against the side of my face as the other four dogs pile in, weighing me down. I’m not running anywhere with them intervening, warm and real and solid. They’re the only thing that’s real. Shiba pushes the top of his head up against my fingers, and I can feel myself clinging to him, and to my other dogs.

Focusing on the pack—on my pack—allows the fog to lift.

Rin’s voice sounds like it’s coming from far away when I finally sort it out of the noise. “Isobu-san, do you think the Hokage will be able to help?”

How much time did I lose? I wonder, from under a pile of squirming fur. I can’t quite string together enough words to ask. I can hear, but I can’t...

“He and Kushina-san did help create the seal here,” Isobu says, experimentally raising Kei’s left arm.

“This has nothing to do with that seal,” the Dreamer says, but without any particular inflection.

“Given how helpful you have been, you would do better to keep your mouth shut,” Isobu grumbles. He glances over at me again, leaning on me with the pressure of his chakra. “Are you back with us, boy?”

He noticed. Damnit.

I just about manage an affirmative grunt, but my tongue feels too heavy to make words. It’s taking all of my concentration to just follow the conversation.

I’ll have to snap at him later.

“Kakashi,” Rin says, since it’s not as though she has anything else to worry about. When I glare at her, more embarrassed than angry, she just scratches Akino’s chin. She meets my eyes for just a moment, then says, “Leave it to me.”

Not like I have any choice.

I’m useless. And my dogs won’t let me move if I try.

Guruko fixes his teeth around my ankle as a warning and I return my hand to stroking him. Calm, calm, I need to be calm—

Fwish.

A hand lands on top of my hand and I hear Sensei’s voice saying, softly, “We’ll take it from here.”

I lean into his touch, just for a moment, before he moves on to the important part. Give me an order, I think. Give me something I can do.

“Kakashi, take your dogs and set up a security barrier.” I catch the packet of seals as it’s tossed in my direction. “Use Shiranui-kun’s link scheme. It’ll hold until Kushina sees what we’re dealing with.”

Things slot into place. I know how to do that.

“Hokage,” Isobu says clearly, as I get up to leave. “Find my partner.”

Kei

On the whole, a featureless black void was not the most pleasant place to wake up no matter what way I sliced it. The lack of any kind of binding sensation meant I hadn’t been kidnapped and shoved in a basement, at least, but the world held a ton of terrible things that segued better from a training session. Since Kakashi had been there, and so had Rin, anyone trying to get to me would have probably gotten electrocuted and gotten their limbs surgically removed, regardless of what I could do.

That said, where was Isobu?

If I was unconscious, well, it wasn’t like I’d know, but Isobu was always with me. Though the big old turtle was distracting as all hell, I couldn’t see anything other than solid black and I couldn’t even hear the ringing noise in my ears that was supposed to be “silence.”

Well...shit. The fact that I was still capable of thinking making the whole situation deeply uncomfortable. If I wasn’t aware of the passage of time, via being actually unconscious, I probably would have been happier about it...assuming I woke up.

Speaking of waking up.

Could I try...opening my eyes? Or was this another one of those times when I didn’t even have eyes because all of this mind business was complete malarkey?

No time like the present.

I opened my eyes.

The first thing I saw was gray. Not solid gray, but the vague, somewhat ill-defined white-gray that made up an overcast sky that just refused to allow for rain. The clouds overhead moved fast enough to track and almost hurt to look at directly.
Then I sat up. Still had all my limbs attached, which was nice, but the giant chunk of bone-white driftwood I’d been using as a bed was somewhat less welcome. Gray sand stretched out toward the field of mottled, rounded gray beach stone, interspersed with fresh, dead, and rotting seaweed all along the shore. The sound of water was everywhere—carried by the wind from between two small isles of tree-topped rock in the distance, cut through by a knife-shaped white speedboat. Nearby, a tributary creek of some sort dumped fresh water toward the coast in an unending stream, while beach buzzards combed the sand for shellfish.

From the train tracks that shielded the rest of the world from the sea, to the water stretching out into the distance, I knew this place.

I knew it like the back of my hand, and only one person had ever seen it. And my turtle kaiju friend wasn’t here to share it.

I got to my feet and, for lack of anything better to do, started hiking through the sand, rocks, and driftwood. I didn’t know where I was going, but if I found myself in a place like this again...well, I’d probably know it when I got there.

It only took a few minutes of exploring for me to start to worry. Doubts stirred in my stomach like butterflies of the worst sort, trying to claw their way up my throat to choke me.

I never dream about this place. I hopped up onto the sea-rusted train tracks, placing one foot in front of the other with an ease that could only be me. Not the old me. Just Keisuke Gekkō, Konoha shinobi.

What was this all supposed to mean?

There was a voice from behind me, barely audible over the sound of the ocean wind. “You don’t know by now? I mean, shit, you really haven’t been paying attention.”

It took me a second or two to realize the voice was in clear, unaccented English—aside from the customary drawl from sheer Not Giving a Fuck. By that point, I had already turned around on the spot and dropped into a fighting stance.

“You’re kidding me,” said the woman standing in front of me, on a fallen log. She wore glasses thick enough to distort her face, and Kurenai-style hair crammed into a ponytail instead of short and loose like mine. She had a stronger jaw, jutting out a bit since her chin was in her upraised palm. With her legs crossed one over the other and her hunched body language, she looked like the exact opposite of a threat. She looked more like a bored civilian than anyone I’ve ever met in Konoha.

There was a mole under her left eye. Exactly where mine was.

Her eyebrows lifted just slightly. “Hey. How’ve you been?”

“Dead,” I said, more out of reflex than any pretense of wit.

“Uh-huh. You don’t look dead to me,” the woman said, adjusting her headphones so they’re not falling out of her ears. They’re pierced, unlike mine. “But hey, I’m the one who’s blind. Do I look dead to you?”

What kind of question was that? “You’re me—my definition, you had to die so I could even exist.” I flapped a hand in her general direction, unable to string enough coherent thoughts together to form an argument. But I had—had a thing to say! “So this is it? I find out how I croaked last time? Then...what? I die again?”
The woman—the other me—shrugged, while I continued to chase my brain in circles. Oh man, oh god—“I don’t want to go!” I blurted, my hands clutching at my face. I didn’t even look like her anymore. “I managed—it took me twenty fucking years but I-I’m almost as far as I got last time! And things are trying to kill me a lot more than they did with you! I had to—I’m not you anymore! You—you didn’t fight to protect anything! You didn’t give up what I—what I—”

My doppelganger drummed her fingers on the sleeve of her hoodie, waiting for something. Something I might not be able to give.

Dad. A flash of his funeral, when the recovery team hadn’t even recovered enough to bury. The feel of his stupid permanent stubble as he kissed my forehead.

Mom. I saw her last moments on earth, spent protecting me and Hayate and never getting up again. Her hands on mine, bandaging split knuckles and telling me it’d be all right.

“You d-didn’t lose anyone,” I said, tripping over my words. “I lost them. I lost everyone. You never even knew—”

Obito. His hand in mine when he’d thought he was going to die, clinging to me with everything he had left until—at the last—he found the courage to let go. Messing with his too-long hair the day he got back, showing me that the agony of my failure was worth it for the things I still had a chance to change.

“You never knew when it was over,” I said, looking down at the steel under my feet, which was starting to vibrate. “When I—when you died, I was the one who kept going. Who picked up things where you left off.”

She stared blankly at me. “Yeah. And?”

I made a noise of pure frustration. “You—we—”

“You literally just said that I didn’t have anything to do with it,” she pointed out. “So why are you pissed off at me?” She stood up on the log and held up a hand as though to stop me from saying anything further, which was even weirder coming from someone shorter, softer, and less authoritative than me when I got going. “Look, lemme be clear here. I’m dead. Gone. Absolutely not a thing. But you? You exist. You’re just using my form as a sounding board because you lost the habit of talking to yourself a while ago.”

Well, that was just great. On one hand, it wasn’t like my dream-world wasn’t going to be populated by mental projections. The fact that one had turned out to be an Inception-level self-destruct impulse was distinctly unhelpful, but not entirely unexpected in hindsight.

...Why was I such a jackass to myself? That was a question for the ages.

“You should probably think about talking this over with your scorpion therapist,” the other me said into the silence.

“Oh, like hell this conversation is gonna wait for that,” I snapped. Oh, I recognized this trope. I’d only had to deal with it about eight times! “This is one of those stupid, forced confrontations with my evil inner self or some shit.”

The other me nodded. “Yeah, probably.”

“You’re not helping,” I told her.
She shrugged. “Really? You needed a version of you to yell at to resolve your issues, right?”

Twisting her earbud cords between her fingers, she added, “So, what are you thinking?”

About three different things that were unhelpful, in fact. The first of which was that I didn’t really want to deal with another version of myself in full troll mode. “There must be a reason my mind decided I needed to talk to you.”

“Yeah. And what else?”

“Reincarnation and Shadow Clones probably don’t mix.” Two could play at this game. What else? What other completely accurate but useless non-sequiturs did I have on hand? “Orochimaru’s opinions on souls should probably have come from a peer-reviewed journal.”

“Probably right, but not the point,” the other me said without a scrap of interest.

Dammit, that didn’t work.

I tried not to let my frustration show, biting the inside of my lip since it was about the most subtle sign I could manage. If I’d had a dime for every time I had to deal with pointless information fetch-quests...well, I’d actually be broke. But this was a version of me and I wasn’t exactly a font of patience at the moment. “Then can we skip all the soul-searching, vaguely-mystical bullshit and get right to the point?”

One of her eyebrows slooooowly rose.

I waited, crossing my arms.

Lightning struck a tree in the distance, making the tall birch explode into flying, flaming splinters. That was probably going to start a fire shortly enough. That...might mean that I needed to hurry up.

“Well, if you insist.” She cleared her throat and sat back down on the log, adjusting her glasses. “This is your life.” She glanced away, as though uncomfortable. “Let me go.”

Underneath my feet, the rumbling in the train tracks started to intensify. Wind tore through the upper branches of the nearby birch trees, setting a shower of leaves spinning across the clearing.

It was easier to look at them than to look at her.

Holding on to what I used to be was one of the few cornerstones of my life I’d had left when I had come here. It was pathetic, but I’d held myself apart from the shinobi world simply because I’d known something different—softer, broader, or perhaps just simpler. I’d been coping with this world by clinging to the old me, and my old life. I’d...been in between stops.

I watched the rocks on the tracks start to jump.

I just didn’t want to admit that everything back there was over. I’d done everything I could to make it relevant to my new experiences, clinging to predetermined information and forms and hoping to hell it worked. I hid a sad little core of myself away from everyone else, because I was the only one who could remember any of it. Hiding it so it was mine.

But it had been a very, very long time.

Twenty years there.

Twenty years undecided.
And...maybe something more, here.

The other me gave me a crooked smile. “Just a little further.”

The wind howled. My fingers tingled, and I felt a chill run down my spine as I looked at them. My fingertips were glowing blue, and were dissolving away like smoke. I needed to stop fucking around and get back to my body.

“I’m—” I needed to finish my thoughts, before the train got here. I didn’t really know why, other than the idea that a train stop wasn’t where I wanted to be. It was a halfway point to where I wanted to go.

“Leave me out of it,” the other me said in a voice that sounded like it was coming from far away. “Who are you? What are you?”

I...It was kind of funny, but I’d never really started counting my years cumulatively? I was twenty inside, and was always twenty inside. It was just that my body in this life had been a little behind. Then a little less. Then...I was here. Perhaps it was almost apt that I’d tripped headfirst into more philosophical, existential crap right when I’d finally got that detail figured out.

The sound of a train horn split the air, and I hopped down off the tracks and clear, just as the massive cargo train and its hundreds of cars started to turn the bend. This wasn’t a commuter train track, after all—this was a way for things to end up somewhere else.

Where they were asked for and needed.

The engine of the train roared by, almost deafening me with another blast of its horn. Then the many shipping containers, chugging on southward with the inevitability of a force of nature. I’d probably have been flattened if I’d stayed on the tracks.

“It’s not like you were ever planning on taking the scenic route,” the other me said, shrugging. “You’ve got places to be.”

“Well,” I said after a second, watching the cars storm past us, “this isn’t gonna stop.”

“So? You’re a ninja.” The other me jabbed a finger at me. “Act like it.”

“I’m not just any ninja,” I corrected her, turning toward the train again. My eyes flicked over the train, calculating distances and trajectories. I knew how to do this. In deliberate Japanese, I said, “I’m Keisuke Gekkō, jinchūriki and S-rank shinobi of Konoha. And I’m not you anymore.”

The other me waved as I leapt, hitting the top of a car and digging my fingers into solid steel with unearthly strength. I twisted around, still flat on the top of the train, and saw her still waving for a little longer. As the train tracks curved away, she turned and started to walk away.

The beach, the tracks, and the other me all faded away, spinning away like so many leaves in the wind. It was like the world was dust on a black background, being blown away.

I let my head drop to the rumbling surface of the train, closing my eyes.

I was going home.

It was a rough homecoming.
“Where have you been?” Isobu demanded, with his three-story face right up at the edge of the beach.

It was my mindscape. For reasons mostly related to Isobu and his sense of interior decorating, this beach had never been purely mine. There weren’t nearly enough rocks or dead things. Isobu, unlike me, actually knew what a white-sand beach was supposed to be like.

It was nice to be home. “Uh, possibly dead. Was talking to the personification of my old life or something.”

Isobu surged forward, out of the surf, and nearly flattened me with the wake before I managed to float up and out of the way. His huge armored forearms curved around me in a giant scaled bowl, or at least as well as he could manage it, and the sunlight overhead got blocked out by the sight of his three tails curling over his back.

I floated closer, landing on the uppermost spike of his lower jaw, and put both of my hands against his permanently closed eye. “Love you too, Isobu.”

Isobu made the same kind of rumbling noise as the train from before. “Don’t do that again.”

“I promise,” I said, as his great golden eye finally flicked to one side to meet my gaze. Like absolute hell I was going through that song and dance again. I was much happier right here, thank you.

Isobu’s spiky head shifted somewhat, as though he was listening to something I couldn’t hear, and then he said, “I believe you. But now you need to convince the others.”

“Others?” I repeated blankly. Oooooh fuck. I’d left Rin and Kakashi out there and then there were all the dogs and whoever they’d called in—

“And then there’s the clone to consider. As in, consider popping her,” Isobu added, as though the situation that had gotten me into this mess was a mere afterthought.

On one hand: I made a clone! On the other, somewhat more important hand: I was never going to use a technique that apparently punted my soul out of my body ever again. There was little else I could have possibly done than that, since Isobu couldn’t find me and there wasn’t exactly a lot that medical ninjutsu could do about it either.

“I suggest you get moving before they call in the Rinnegan boy for a...sixth opinion,” Isobu said, because apparently he’d studied up on “having the last word” since the last time we’d spoken. So much sass, so little time.

“I’m going, I’m going.”

One of these days, I was gonna stop using terrible metaphors for bouncing in and out of my mindscape, but that day was not today.

So I woke up again, like I was someone who’d watched way too many screenings of Inception. Goddamn layered consciousness.

“—waking up!” Kushina? Well, given all the other crap I’d gone through recently, calling in the only other jinchūriki seal expert was probably a good idea.

I made the mistake of opening my eyes before I was ready, and thus spent the first fifteen seconds being squished by Kushina. Her hair was about the only thing I could see—pure, solid red that poked me in the face—until she finally decided to let go and let me sit up on my own. Mostly.
“I’m so glad you’re okay!” Kushina held me out at arm’s length, clearly checking for any injuries. Just faintly, I could make out a spark of red in the depths of her eyes that told me Kurama was watching, too. And while she did that, I looked over her shoulder.

Aside from Kushina, there was a bit of a crowd around me. Sensei was scribbling something on the edge of a large circular sealing array around us that didn’t really seem designed to do anything, but instead to monitor the people inside it. Tsunade peered over Sensei’s shoulder, murmuring corrections to a thing or two that apparently he’d forgotten in his haste. Rin hovered outside the faintly glowing seal-work, anxiously twisting a shell bracelet in her hands, while Kakashi stood nearby with his arms crossed and his Sharingan slowly spinning. His eight dogs crowded around, knocking into knees and generally making sure no one forgot they were there.

I made to get to my feet so I could show everyone I was okay, but one of Kushina’s Adamantine Sealing Chains was wrapped around my chest, and I sure as hell wasn’t going to be able to break it. Or budge it.

...Welp.

“I’m all right, Kushina-san,” I said, though it was probably one of the more blatant lies I’d ever told.

Kushina booped my nose. “I don’t believe you. And I don’t understand how using the Shadow Clone technique could lead to all of this!”

“...That is a very, very long story,” I said, eying the others. I didn’t want to talk about it. Maybe not never. Just...not yet.

“Well, you’re still not going anywhere until we figure out what was wrong, and make sure it won’t happen again,” Kushina told me firmly. I twisted in her grip to so I could see what she was looking at, and spotted a rather creepy Shadow Clone lying on the ground in the seal with us. “You made a clone correctly, but...well, enough other things went wrong that I don’t want you anywhere near this technique.”

Well, considering that it felt entirely like Yin chakra...

It's exactly who you think it is. Or it was. After you came back, it stopped responding.

I suppose that after seven years as a non-independent piece of me, there wasn’t much of the Dreamer left. Aside from being composed of Yin chakra, there wasn’t much in common with the splinter I remembered. All that was really left to do was to disperse the clone and get all the pieces back together.

“Way ahead of you,” I half-mumbled. I tugged experimentally at the chains. “Can I get up now?”

Kushina gave me one more careful look, then nodded. “But I’m not letting go of you. The last thing I want is for your soul to fly off again!”

...Leaving aside the fact that a human soul was one of the very few things that Kushina’s chains didn’t work on, I was actually touched. A little annoyed at her overprotectiveness, but still mostly touched.

Be careful when you disperse the clone. I have no interest in going back to being the only one in charge of this body.

That...well, that explained what Isobu had been doing while I was out on spiritual walkabout, but I could wait for the full story there.
I got up and, with Kushina’s chain around my waist still, I walked toward the unresponsive clone. While I didn’t know what it had looked like before, in terms of coloration, it currently looked like it had fallen into a barrel full of bleach. Or something.

“I’m just going to disperse the clone, Kushina-san. And then never use the jutsu again.” I had had quite enough of the whole consciousness-splitting experiment. Any more trauma, and I had no idea what would happen.

Kushina glanced over her shoulder at Sensei, who happened to be looking up (and probably listening to her). I saw him nod, and took that as a sign that was allowed to go ahead.

Kushina loosened her hold on the chain, just a bit.

I walked over to the clone, which wasn’t breathing, and put my hand against its forehead. The Yin chakra inside the clone was entirely still, consistent with an inanimate chakra construct. Of course, pretty much every other point about it was wrong in a different way, but after a certain point I just had to accept that I’d botched every relevant step of the Shadow Clone technique.

One pulse of chakra from me, and I got the Yin chakra back along with a skull-splitting headache. There were memories in the mess, but my main relevant thought after the experience was, “Ow…”

Kushina’s hand on my arm managed to steady me, but it was a close thing. If that was what Shadow Clone bullshit was supposed to feel like when it worked, it was just as well that I was staying out of it. “Never doing that again.”

“I hope not,” Kushina said.

With that, Kushina steered me out of the sealing circle and the barrier seal. Sensei started clearing up his work, while Tsunade patted Rin’s shoulder and nudged her forward as soon as the containment barrier—probably Kushina’s—finally went down.

“You are in so much trouble!” Rin said, and I winced. Noticing my headache problem, she tried again, “Please, I need to make sure you’re okay. Can I check to make sure?”

Like I ever really said no to Rin. She pinched. “Go ahead.”

I trusted Rin, and with Tsunade hanging out right next to us, there was little chance that anyone would miss anything wrong with me. Tsunade wasn’t a miracle worker, but for Konoha she was the next best thing. And I think that Rin liked having the oversight.

One glowing set of medical checks later, and I was given a clean bill of health. Which, admittedly, made not one whit of sense. I had kinda fainted due to soul displacement shenanigans. The fact that I could be fine just after a few literal soul-searching moments sounded completely pat.

“One hand,” Sensei said, once the situation had finally calmed down, “that was a very interesting study into the nature of souls, and I’ve never had to make a soul-catching seal before that didn’t involve summoning and sacrifice. On the other...Kei, never do that again.”

Pff. He’d have added that jutsu to my curriculum eventually. It was only a matter of time. And besides, I was fine. “It’s not like I knew that was going to happen.”

“You didn’t,” he acknowledged carefully. “And truth be told, it was probably for the best that your experiment happened with this much supervision.”

Kakashi looked away, his Sharingan covered once again. I must have really scared him. Once I got past the headache fun, I’d be able to fully process that.

I put him out of my mind just for a moment. To Sensei, I said, “Yeah, but I’m sorry I scared you.”

Sensei and Kushina exchanged looks. Kushina either lost or won whatever silent conversation the two of them had, and said, “We’ll talk about some of the specifics tomorrow. For now... well, no more training for today. Rin-chan can check tomorrow to see if everything’s still working as it should.”

Pakkun nosed my ankle, so I reflexively reached down to pick him up. With the dog secured for petting, I turned my attention to Rin, who set her jaw and said, “And if there’s no sign of trouble, I... guess you might be okay. But we’ll find out tomorrow!”

“I promise I’ll visit you at work,” I offered. But to be honest, there wasn’t anything else to do. If Tsunade hadn’t wanted to put me under observation, and Isobu confirmed that I wasn’t dying… What else could anyone do?

One by one, and with a hug each (except for Tsunade), everyone besides Kakashi filed out of the clearing to go on with their daily routines. Rin looked like she needed a moment just to think on her own, possibly overstressed, and I was left holding Pakkun while surrounded by six of the other dogs.

Bull was by Kakashi, who still looked... brittle. Felt it, too.

“So, uh,” I began. “You’re not going?”

“You have my dogs,” Kakashi said, but there was something in his tone that was, at best, concerning. After a second, he shook his head and went back to petting Bull’s wrinkly forehead.

Mindful of the dogs herding me at knee-level, I made my way over to Kakashi and set Pakkun down on Bull’s head. “Kakashi, did you have something on your mind?”

“More like something in this book,” Kakashi said, and pulled his romance novel from before out of his shuriken pouch.

Um.

Before I could say anything, Kakashi opened the book and handed me a somewhat dog-eared ticket. “Found it today.”

Recognition made me snort with laughter, just for a moment. He still had the IOU I’d given him for his birthday? I’d been half-convinced he’d lost it ages ago, solely because it had never come up.

Still, he got me. “Guess I’m paying this time, then?” I chuckled. “You got me.”

“I didn’t think your pride would let you accept a babysitter,” Kakashi said, somewhat dryly. He looked away. “I don’t want to find out tomorrow that you passed out and got hurt.”

Pffft. Okay. That worked. “Am I paying for the dogs, too?”

Pakkun waved a paw. “We’ll take a rain check. Human food has too many carbohydrates.”

I glanced at Kakashi. “You have something in mind?”

“I was thinking udon,” Kakashi replied, as all eight of his dogs turned their attention to him. “You’re all dismissed. Thank you.”
Instead of the usual round of protests, Pakkun just saluted and said, “Later, Kakashi.”

All eight of the dogs poofed out of the clearing, leaving us alone.

Hm. After a second, I shrugged, walked over to Kakashi, and the both of us started heading back into town. Though I’d gotten a clean bill of health, I’d get my ass whooped by Rin if I tried ninja-traveling without getting very specifically cleared first.

I debated linking arms with Kakashi or something, but I’d probably been enough of a wreck today. It was still pretty early in the day, and Kakashi probably would have been able to salvage things if not for deciding to keep me company.

“I’m sorry I wrecked your chance to go talk to Shizune,” I said, rubbing the back of my neck guiltily.

“I drew everyone’s attention, and now you’re gonna hang out with me to make sure I’m okay…”

“It’s fine,” Kakashi said, shoving his hands in his pockets.

The brittle edge was back, but not as sharp as before. The Dreamer’s memory clearly showed him freezing up in a panic, but I couldn’t do anything about that and I wasn’t going to ask. Kakashi deserved better than to be a target for my curiosity.

I let it drop. I was gonna buy him food and he’d get a chance to recharge and perhaps plan a better day. When I got a chance, I’d withdraw my bet from Genma, too. It was a stupid joke anyway.

Kakashi and I found a nice udon restaurant. While I ate modestly—wasn’t like I’d expected to use that much energy, and dying didn’t apparently take that much out of me—Kakashi took advantage of having someone else foot the bill. While we didn’t talk much, I liked to think that the four empty udon bowls, stacked up next to each other, made up for the apology I’d never have gotten him to accept.

Seeing him smile, between slurping noodles and letting his mood build back up moment by moment, was worth the dent in my finances and every other thing that had happened today.

Chapter End Notes

The song of this chapter is from Wicked, but works best if you remove a bit of the specificity of Glinda and Elphaba's lines that pertain overmuch to the plot.

(Also, that "other me" was essentially the manifestation of Kei's feelings toward her past life, which have been holding her back for quite some time. In several areas. Which will be explored later in this arc, too.)
It took me entirely too long to get back to Genma about the bet, since the next day basically involved getting jumped by half the medics I knew. Rin was concerned, Yamaguchi-sensei was a concerned asshole, and there was much to-do about what amounted to basically nothing.

Yamato was generally nicer about the entire thing, merely taking my hand and giving me a cursory scan before carrying on with whatever he’d been doing before I showed up. Since it involved multiple IV stands, I didn’t want to ask. Tsunade, who had more faith in her students than I’d expected, carried on with her day with barely a glance at me to make sure I was still breathing—and only bothered because I happened to be in the hospital at the same time they passed me in the hall.

It was hard to say which style I preferred.

Still, I eventually got to go the Administration center. I didn’t exactly cross my fingers that he was there—I knew the schedule better than that—but it was still a relief to spot him carrying a gigantic stack of manila folders on top of a box with more folders. Sensei clearly believed in putting people to work while they were at work.

“Hey, Genma,” I said, holding up a hand in a half-wave. Not like he could return it. “About the bet…”

“The Hokage’s the one with the book now. You can collect your winnings from him,” Genma said, not stopping to chat. Thus, I decided to follow him.

“And if I want to withdraw my bet?” I asked, lengthening my stride to match his.

Genma glanced at me, one eyebrow raised. “You already won. Wasn’t your bet that Kakashi would chicken out yesterday?”

“Yeah, but…” I averted my eyes. “You might’ve heard that yesterday was a mess. And it was my fault. I did take him out to lunch to make up for it, a bit, but I think I kinda ruined his chance to ask Shizune out.”

Genma stared at me for three solid seconds, senbon drooping. It took him a bit to get his expression back under control. With forced casualness, he said, “Then take the bone and the money Kakashi’s dogs wagered and call it even. They’re the only others who made a bet centered around yesterday.”

“I can do that,” I agreed, deciding not to comment on the awkward pause. I’d just have to give the dogs their bone back, and ask them if they wanted the money. “Sorry for bothering you.”

“It’s fine, Kei,” Genma said. He paused again. “Actually, you’re supposed to be taking over for me after this, aren’t you?”

That was...certainly a thing that was true. I made a face at him. “Is that a hint?”

Genma took the opportunity to dump the files in my arms. “Yes, it was. Later, Kei.” And with that, Genma wandered off and out of the building in a deceptively quick saunter, just to get away from any potential negative response.

...Well, I couldn’t say I hadn’t asked for it by coming in when I had. Sensei made allowances for me when I was supposedly on light duty anyway. With a clean bill of health, he would have expected me to arrive sometime today, though not necessarily when he’d ordered Genma to do something.

Oh well. I shifted my fingers to get a better grip and continued my trip through the building to Sensei’s office.

I had to elbow the door open, which was never the most graceful solution, but I made it! Per usual, Sensei was at his desk and sorting through the usual mountain of paperwork that a village seemed to generate ex nihilo. His head was bowed over his work, and every once in a while he’d drop one paper or another into his outbox so it could be sent on its way to whatever part of the village needed his input. Today didn’t feature barrettes or rubber bands, so perhaps the kids were learning how to write instead of baking.

I hefted the pile of paperwork a little higher, resting the box against my leg to balance it. “Sensei, where do you want these?”

Sensei took a second to look up, recognize me, and then pointed at a corner of his desk that was neither full of paper nor occupied by his organizational system. “Right here is fine, Kei.” As he got back to his work, he said distractedly, “I was expecting Shiranui-kun.”

“He clocked out,” I said, doing as he asked. Once the paperwork was out of my hands, I started wringing feeling back into them. While doing so, I looked around and commented, “Busy morning?”

Sensei shrugged.

Yeah, that about summed it up. The village’s paperwork burden had become less Sensei’s problem over time, thanks to the improvements he’d made to the management system that put more work in other people’s hands, but he still spent quite a lot of time going over other people’s problems. If he didn’t have the knack for it, and an abundance of patience besides, he probably would have gone gray from this job’s requirements a long time ago.

Well, I did have a few actual things to talk to him about. “Sensei, can I collect my winnings while I’m here? Genma said I won Bull’s bone and some money when I talked to him today, and I need to give them back.”

Sensei looked up again, blinking. Then, “Oh, right, the betting pool. After yesterday, I almost forgot about it.” With that, he opened a drawer on his desk and started digging around for what I’d requested. As he did, and plopped a somewhat gnawed-on bone on his desk next to someone’s expense report, he added, “Though if you’re going to return these things, you’ll have to wait.”

“Oh?” I asked, as Sensei finally emerged with a small paper packet filled with, from the sound of it, an array of coins. Had the dogs gone digging around in couch cushions for their wager?
He placed both the packet and the bone on the edge of his desk so I could collect them. Then he said, “Kakashi left on a mission earlier this morning. He’ll be gone for about two months.”

What? D-Did I have something to do with this?

While the memories were still a bit muddled after going over them with Isobu’s help, the botched Shadow Clone had still been a clone. And thus, its memories were mine no matter what form they’d arrived in.

The clone had seen Kakashi have a panic attack. I wasn’t a psychologist or a psychiatrist, but the clone’s memories were pretty clear. Kakashi had lost control, lost his ability to talk, and his dogs had brought him back around as best they could. Sensei had helped a little bit more by giving him something simple to do. Something he knew down to his bones.

And it had started almost immediately after I’d gotten punted out of my body and Isobu and the clone had had to field people’s concerns.

While I was making a point now to be less attached to my past life’s memories, it was hard not to recognize the fact that Kakashi had post-traumatic stress disorder. His dad’s death, Obito’s, Rin’s and then Sensei’s and Kushina’s all in a row had carved themselves into his core, coloring how he interacted with people from then on. What I’d seen then had been mostly averted here—but saying that downplayed how much had still happened.

Sensei and Kushina and Rin were all alive. I’d managed that much, with help and a lot of luck. But Sakumo Hatake still died, and Obito still ended up crushed half to death by a boulder. On top of that, Kakashi had been the one taken and tortured by Iwa-nin, and I’d gone boldly toward my death on several more occasions than Rin had ever wanted anything to do with. Willingly, each time.

Was I a new trigger for his trauma? I’d known that I’d had a huge effect on his life, and he cared about me, but I’d never wanted to cause him pain like that.

Especially not after Sorayama.

“Did...did Kakashi happen to say why he left?” I asked, having made myself thoroughly miserable.

Sensei, who had let me wallow in guilt for a few minutes while I thought, looked back up from his work and said, “I wasn’t going to let the Shinjitsu issue rest, Kei.” Sensei straightened up and stretched in his chair, and I heard several joints pop. As he went through and cracked each of his knuckles separately, he explained, “Kakashi volunteered to go on an information-gathering mission to reinforce Obito. He’s read the reports and is suited for the job. Yesterday’s events meant he put off leaving for twelve hours, but he was already scheduled to be deployed.”

Oh. So much for my drama-fueled internal monologue.

Still, everything not pertaining to his mission could still be somewhat true. And I still needed to make up for screwing up his schedule—and keeping him from talking to Shizune. Maybe I could talk to her once I finished my shift.

But for now, I was still with Sensei. And I could probably ask him the other thing that had occurred to me late last night.

I shook myself out of my daydreaming, deciding to ask one last question before I let Sensei work in peace. “Sensei, something occurred to me a little while ago. My mother’s file said she had a few living relatives left. Is there any more information on them?”
Sensei blinked. “I didn’t know you cared about that.”

“I...had a bit of a realization,” I admitted. Which downplayed the significance of yesterday rather a lot, but I had a thing for humorous understatement. But it was long past time I found out where I came from here, in the world where it mattered. “Since we already know the Gekkō family—and sort of like them—I thought it might be time to think about Mom’s half of things.”

Sensei tapped the end of his pen against his mouth, thinking. “I’ll look into it, but it may take some time. We don’t have much information about the internal politics in the Land of Iron at the moment, but I’ll keep an eye out for anything relevant.”

“Thank you, Sensei,” I said, and left him to work. I dug my personal project—my best guess at the form and function of a fūinjutsu barrier called Four Red Yang Formation. Sensei hadn’t gotten around to explaining it, but there was a vague memory bouncing around in the back of my mind, of some big barrier being used to contain the Ten-Tails. And I was...mostly sure Sensei knew how to do it?

After the drama of the last couple of days, it was therapeutic to work on a problem I actually had the tools to solve.

“Hey, Shizune-san, can I talk to—why is there a piglet on the table?” I asked, reversing myself most of the way through a sentence.

I didn’t make a habit of bothering medics at work unless I was the one being worked on, but I’d still volunteered at the hospital once upon a time. I knew where all the rooms were, and asking around for a bit had given me a chance to find the break room. Or one of them.

This particular break room was out of the way, and happened to include Shizune, Yamato...and a piglet.

Which brought me back to my original point.

“This is Tonton,” Yamato said, as the piglet pushed her nose up against the side of his hand. Yamato didn’t budge, because otherwise the piglet would have gotten into his lunch and eaten all the...everything, actually. Pigs were omnivores. “She’s our new teammate.”

“Is that why she has a pearl necklace?” I asked, unsure if I was allowed to pet what I was rapidly deciding had to be the cutest pig in the universe. “I mean, it looks good on her, but…”

“I think it does, too,” Yamato said with a firm nod, before allowing Tonton to steal a whole mouthful of carrots from a nearby container—which was notably not Yamato’s actual lunch. I had yet to find anyone under the age of about thirty here who liked carrots, for some bizarre reason.

Tonton was the first.

“The necklace was Tsunade-sama’s idea,” Shizune said, even as she reached over to scratch behind Tonton’s big rectangular ears. Even while eating, the piglet leaned into her touch. “Did you have something to ask me, Kei-san?”

I did, buuuuuuut… “When she’s done eating, can I hold her?”

“Just as long as you wash your hands afterward,” Shizune reminded me. “We are in a hospital, and Tonton’s still in training.”
“As a ninja-pig or as a service pig?” I asked, sitting down with them in one of the empty chairs.

“Both. We’re getting her used to people and the hospital environment.” And as Tonton lifted her head out of the plastic container, chewing contentedly on the remaining carrots stuck between her teeth, Shizune crooked her fingers and said, “Here, Tonton.”

Tonton snorted happily and trotted across the table to nuzzle up to Shizune instead. The fact that Tonton also got access to Shizune’s lunch—until she lifted the piglet out of reach—was more icing on the cake. Once in the air, Tonton looked around and then turned her little piggy eyes on me. “Bui?”

“Hi, Tonton-chan,” I said, my voice having already jumped one octave. Oh goodness. She was so cute.

Tonton oinked in what I hoped was an approving manner, then wiggled all of her legs in an attempt to get out of Shizune’s grip to introduce herself to me. Shizune set her on the floor, and the little ball of pink cuteness barreled into my shin.

Lowered my hand for Tonton to inspect, like I did with cats and dogs I met in and around the village. Basically every animal had a better sense of smell than I did, and that went doubly or triply so for dogs and pigs alike. I was pretty sure Tonton could grow to be a tracker, and one that rivaled Kakashi’s dogs. Sure, for now she was small, but the potential was already there.

Tonton sniffed my hands, then bumped her nose against my knuckles with a happy oink. After a second’s thought, she maneuvered my hand for optimal chin-scratching, and I obliged her.

“She is the cutest little thing,” I whispered to Shizune. “The cutest.”

“She’s got a lot to learn,” Shizune commented, as I picked Tonton up carefully and set her in my lap. “Once Tonton is trained and grows up, she’ll be fine.”

And here I was, probably facilitating a very spoiled Tonton in the future. And given how smart pigs were—even without the existence of summon contracts to consider—she’d have to be put through her paces fast to break up these bad habits.

“Kakashi’s dogs will help,” Yamato said, once I put Tonton back on the ground. She took this dismissal with good grace and trotted off to what turned out to be a small pet bed under the table. “The rest of us have trouble talking to her, but Pakkun translates when he feels like it.”

Tonton turned around twice in her bed and then curled up in it, still looking up at us through her eyelashes when she thought none of us noticed.

And to think I had taken the talking dogs running around all over Konoha for granted. “But if Kakashi isn’t around…?”

“Tsume did volunteer one of her clanswomen,” Shizune said, nodding at Yamato. “Yamato-kun knows a…Fuse-san?”

“Oh, I know her too. Her dogs are pretty awesome.” Which meant I was officially out of things to talk about. I barely knew Shizune, and Yamato felt a little antsy to me.

Then Yamato made a hand sign at Shizune—ANBU sign for over—before packing up the remnants of his lunch. I swore I saw Shizune’s expression soften a bit, and at her nod Yamato had all of his things sorted and was out of the room in less than twenty seconds, Tonton on his heels.
Shizune went to wash her hands in the nearby sink. As she did, she asked over her shoulder, “Oh, Kei-san, did you have something to ask me about?”

And now we came back to the elephant in the room.

I leaned against the counter, trying and failing to act casual. I’d already screwed up so many different things to do with Kakashi’s crush that I had to get this right.

I didn’t know how.

Though it was silly, and defensive, my mind automatically started tallying up everything I knew about Shizune.

She was maybe a year (or a year and a half) older than I was and noticeably shorter and more lightly built. She had big, dark eyes that reminded me of a doe, black hair that looked like it actually knew the touch of a hairbrush and a decent set of scissors, and had probably forgotten more about medical ninjutsu and poison than I could remember on a good day.

It didn’t take all that much wrangling to see how Kakashi could like her. Even more than Rin, she was outside of all the drama that touched every aspect of our lives. There wasn’t any unresolved business when it came to Shizune, in any form. She had her mother-figure Tsunade, her mostly-nonexistent rivalry with Rin, and her little brother Yamato, whom Kakashi already looked out for.

And for some reason, I had basically nothing to do with her. That made this whole process about twice as awkward.

“You’re not sick, are you?” Shizune asked, as she dried her hands.

...Sick to my stomach with guilt over maybe convincing Kakashi to leave to get away from me, maybe. But I was taking appropriate steps. “I’m fine, Shizune-san. Thanks for asking.”

This is painful. Isobu shifted his weight onto his elbows. Continue.

Oh, shut up.

“Do you see Kakashi often?” I asked, and was proud of myself for how even the sentence came out.

Shizune blinked. “Well, peripherally. I’ve treated his injuries a few times, but he makes a habit of...escaping.”

Pffft. Definitely sounded like him. “Yeah, that’s something Rin and I have been dealing with for pretty much forever. Teammates, I swear.”

Shizune nodded, apparently feeling that she was on much more familiar ground if we were mutually grousing about loved ones. “How do you deal with it? Until I came back to Konoha, my patients never tried to run away.”

“I had Sens—the Hokage on my side,” I said, catching myself mid-sentence. Sensei was famous, sure, but Shizune was super respectful of Tsunade in any universe. It was probably better if I didn’t sound too rude. “But you know, he’s gotten better.”

Shizune shook her head. “I don’t want to know what ‘worse’ is, then.”

Not terribly encouraging...

“Is there something going on with him?” Shizune asked, turning to face me fully. “Because unless you’re here to ask about his health, I can’t really give you any answers you don’t already have.” And it wasn’t like she could answer the health questions even if I knew the answers already, since there were some things for which “patient confidentiality” was a severe understatement, because ANBU.

“It’s...well, I sorta wonder if he talked to you about that...village-wide betting pool.” And if some higher power had any mercy whatsoever, it would have given me better phrasing. Because...well, that was just painful.

I should have let Rin handle this entire thing.

“Oh, that one,” Shizune said. As silly as it was, Shizune was nearly guaranteed to know about any and all forms of gambling within about fifty kilometers, solely because those places drew Tsunade in like a moth to a flame. And though Tsunade wasn’t nearly as bad about wasting vast sums of money since she’d returned to Konoha, the village did have a remarkable tendency to spontaneously organize betting pools among the ninja population.

Like that time I’d fought Sensei. I shrugged and said, “Yeah. I’m just glad this one isn’t about me.” Shizune looked completely flabbergasted. “Oh, I... Yes, that’s surprising. You do draw attention.”

“Not Kakashi’s, though.” I clamped down on the flash of confused disappointment that came with that thought. It seemed like every time I had his attention, it was because something had gone horribly wrong yet again.

...Where the hell had that come from?

I cleared my throat and went on, somewhat faster, “That’s the point of this whole thing. Because he likes you.” Which was not what I wanted to say at all, but that was what I got for having a big mouth.

Argh!

Isobu sounded like he was trying to suppress his laughter and, with the inevitability of a glacier on the move, was failing.

I should really have let Rin handle this.

Shizune was frozen, one finger poised in the air like she’d been planning on making a point, and her mouth sagging open like that point had been thoroughly lost. “Wow, I...”

Thankfully, the hospital intercom turned on at that moment and barked, “Code Blue, floor two, room thirteen.”

“I’m sorry, Kei-san, but my break is over now.” Shizune was gone within a heartbeat, the door still swinging behind her.

I gathered up the remnants of Shizune’s lunch, packed them all back up, and stuck them in the fridge with a note attached to the top of the bento box. It read, Sorry about that.

That, Isobu said as I scuttled out of the building, was the funniest thing I’ve seen in years.

Oh, just leave me alone to sulk.

No, because all you’re going to do is mope about how you ruined everything.
I’m...okay. I won’t sulk. I rolled my eyes at nothing in particular, but no one could see me do it while I was running across the rooftops. My hair got in my eyes a bit, but the wind when traveling at high speeds was nice enough that I was willing to put up with it for a little longer.

...Hm. Shizune’s hair was about the same length as mine. If I turned my head to the side and squinted, she looked a little like me. Sure, she was...well, generally prettier, but…

Okay, nope, not having that thought.

What thought?

I am not jealous of Shizune!

I never said you were. But now that you’ve said it, what are you jealous of?

I am not having this conversation.

On one somewhat lazy Saturday afternoon, someone knocked on my apartment door.

It was the kind of day when all I was planning on doing involved trying to make red bean-filled mochi in large enough quantities to scare people. There wasn’t any particular reason behind it, other than the perennial (and highly specialized) cooking itch that hit me every few months—and by the end of one of those sessions, I always ended up with things to give away. No one had complained about the little malformed sweets yet, so it was win-win.

Someday, I would create the perfect mochi. But it was not going to be today.

Washing my hands in the sink, I deactivated the more hostile security seals on the apartment before I went to greet the...that was a lot of people. So, I had several guests.

I opened the door and looked down into six little faces. Aiko, Kaito, Roku, Itachi, Shisui, and...a kid I didn’t recognize off-hand, but who was smaller than the rest of them and not looking at me. A cursory glance and four school bags later, and I hazarded a guess that my apartment was suddenly the kids’ after-school meeting place.

“Hi!” said Aiko, and she lifted her arms for just a second before she wrapped them around my waist and clamped down. At nine, she was a fair bit taller than the little blonde kid I’d helped learn how to channel chakra, and her grip was far stronger. Her hair was in two long brains that ran down to her waist, making her resemble Pippi Longstocking. “We’re here to visit you!”

“I see that,” I said, patting her head. “So, what brings you here instead of your dad’s house?”

Kaito rolled his eyes. The other nine-year-old of the pack, he was still the shortest of the Chinatsugumi kids. Still wearing my old blue jacket—which fit him better nowadays—the main change in him had to do with his vocabulary and, somewhat relatedly, his attitude. “Fujiko and Hisato don’t sleep through the night when it’s this hot out, so Uncle Raiden told us to go play somewhere else. Aunt Chihiro is trying to catch up on sleep.”

Well, that made sense. I’d almost forgotten the many problems that came with having small children in the house. And the twins were probably...what, a year and something? These kids had made the right choice to get out of there and enjoy the sun.

There was just one lingering question I had to ask. “...How do you kids know where I live, again?”
Itachi coughed and raised his hand. “That’s my fault.”

Right. I’d almost forgotten that Itachi was a prodigy—and that he’d been here before, if only briefly, back when I was still moving in. “Well, you can come in. Just don’t touch any weapons lying around.”

Aiko let go of me, barreled right past the entry hall, and bounced off the couch.

Kaito and Roku’s waist-hugs were a lot tamer. Part of it was that Roku was generally just a calmer kid, and in Kaito’s case he had the littlest one of the bunch clinging to his shirt.

Roku was twelve, like Itachi. Despite coming up to my shoulder, he still came across as the thinker of the bunch and almost seemed shy to people who didn’t know him. That, to me, seemed to mostly be a result of his chosen hairstyle, which entirely covered his right eye and made it much harder to tell what he was thinking.

Roku just rested the back of his hand against the littlest kid’s shoulder, and he jumped from Kaito to Roku with completely predictable eagerness. “We brought someone new,” Roku explained, nudging the kid forward.

I knelt down and said, “Hi,” to the new face. “I’m Keisuke Gekkō, but everyone around here calls me Kei, or Kei-san. Can I get your name?”

“Rock Lee,” said the kid, bowing with his hand still in Roku’s. “Thank you for letting us visit!”

“No problem, Lee-kun,” I said, though it was a bit of a shot in the dark. This kid was what, six or seven? He was a class ahead of Naruto, but apparently two behind the Chinatsugumi kids. How had they all even met?

“Are you making mochi?” Kaito asked loudly, peering past me. “Can we eat some?”

“No yet, but in a while,” I said, as the pair moved past me. “Itachi-kun, Shisui-kun, do your parents know you’re here?”

Shisui laced his fingers behind his head, deliberately casual. “They don’t know I’m not here,” he said.

Itachi sighed. “We’re chūnin.”

Good enough. “Don’t eat my mochi dough,” I said, mostly to Shisui. Itachi may have had a sweet tooth, but he was also the only person who could keep Shisui from doing what he wanted when the whim struck him.

On the couch, the other kids were already deep in conversation. By which I meant that Aiko, Kaito, and Lee were all talking—Roku seemed to just be listening and waiting for a chance to jump in.

I got the impression that my input wasn’t needed just yet, and retreated to the kitchen to continue working on what, it seemed, would turn out to be snacks for the kids. I probably would need to consider buying a watermelon or something if this turned out to be the start of a new habit.

“What part of the homework’s confusing you?” Kaito asked, unpacking his schoolbag. There was a commotion of fabric and papers rustling as the others followed suit. Except Itachi and Shisui, presumably.

Yeah, I definitely didn’t miss that part of being an Academy student.
While the kids continued to talk, I mixed water into the rice flour and sugar with a whisk. Sooner or later, the recipe said this was supposed to result in something that was a lot like raw pancake batter. Approximately. Though it didn’t use those words and the recipe didn’t include eggs.

“I don’t know, all of it?” Aiko replied, though perhaps it was more of a gripe. “They’re not talking about the same kind of jutsu we learned when we were little.”

“That isn’t uncommon,” Itachi replied. “Most clans trust the Academy to teach teamwork and basic skills, and leave specialized training to clans or to jōnin-sensei later on.”

“Tell me about it. The only jutsu the Academy even teaches are the three on the final exam,” Shisui complained, and I felt his chakra shift positions slightly as he moved. “You need way more than that to be a ninja.”

That kid had better not be putting his feet on the table. I had to clean things, and blue scuff-marks were not on my list of favorite things.

By this point the mochi mix looked...well, acceptable. I took the bowl and put it on top of the steamer I’d made out of two pots and crossed my fingers mentally. Hopefully, it would be actual mochi in fifteen minutes.

...Assuming I remembered to stir it halfway through. The possibility of failure was still a thing.

“It would probably be really hard to teach Magnet Release, though,” Roku countered evenly. “I don’t know anyone in the entire village who uses it. Not even Kei-sensei.”

Shrugging to myself, I left things to boil for a while. Since that left me with relatively little to do—I already had a rolling pin, a work area, and a lot of potato starch prepped, I headed over to the living room to join the kids with about twice as much stealth as I usually used. Just because.

“Well, that’s harder, but they could still try,” Shisui said, unwilling to give up on his prior argument. His feet were on the table. “Right, Lee-kun?”

“I don’t know,” said Lee. “We haven’t learned any jutsu yet.”

“Right, you’re a first-year,” Shisui said breezily, having apparently not noticed me yet. “They don’t teach you anything.”

I poked him in the back of the head and said, when he jumped to attention, “First: no feet on the table. Second: no shoes past the hall.”

With Shisui scrambling to obey, I plopped down on the floor next to the table like a completely irresponsible adult and said, “You kids are being too serious. Are you sure you want to do homework right now?”

Kaito considered this reasoned argument. For about two seconds. “Nope!” And with that, Kaito’s homework went back in his bag and he slid to the floor like an enthusiastic slug to enjoy the cool floorboards.

“The work is due on Monday,” Roku said. “I need to finish now.”

“I always do my homework before playing!” Lee agreed.

I was starting to see how Lee had made it through the Academy before meeting Gai. As I watched the byplay, I thought. Just to survive the parts of the curriculum that didn’t work for Lee in the slightest, he doubled down on what he could do. And he’d clearly passed the final exam despite not being able to use the three Academy jutsu…

Aiko looked guiltily between the two boys who had come down on the side of homework. Her eyes darted to Kaito, who was frowning already, and she bit her lip. “Um…”

“It’ll only take a few minutes,” Roku reminded Aiko. “Kaito, you know that too.”

“But it’s so boring,” Kaito griped, even as he was slowly coming around.

Maybe I ought to have stayed out of it. Still… “Well, they do have a point. All of this is necessary so you can become ninja for real.”

Kaito crossed his arms and muttered, “I just wanna learn new jutsu.”

“And I can’t be your teacher if you don’t become genin,” I reminded Kaito, as Itachi started flattening out the crumpled paper that used to be his homework. “I can’t take you on missions or anything.”

Kaito blinked, twice. I could almost see the thought run through his head. “Then, Itachi-san, I can do it! It’s okay!”

Within a few moments, Kaito was back on the couch and had his homework back in hand, shoving Roku more toward the middle of the group as he got comfortable. Roku had to dodge one flying elbow to keep his spot more or less intact.

Conflict (admittedly of my own design) resolved, I headed back to the kitchen to stir the mochi...dough. It had been batter before, but the results of my steam experiment would need to be kneaded and rolled before I could bring the bean paste back into play.

Itachi and Shisui joined me in the kitchen, because there was a bit of a gap between the way they thought and the way four Academy students did. Sure, Itachi and Roku were the same age, but there was kind of a reason that Itachi had graduated so early. There was no guarantee either of them could help younger kids with this particular part of their homework.

“How are you two doing these days?” I asked, while scraping sticky mochi off the sides of the bowl I was using. And then, because of course I found myself saying automatically, “Shisui-kun, your butt does not go on my counter. Use a chair.”

“Fiiiine,” said Shisui, and both Uchiha boys sat at the kitchen table instead of messing with my cooking space. At, not on.

“I am considering promotion to jōnin, if I can manage it,” Itachi said, as he toyed with the salt shaker on the table. “But my family would prefer that I take a different route.”

Hard to believe the kid was just eleven and still being pressured into ANBU even in this peaceful timeline. Hadn’t he only made chūnin a little while ago?

I put the mochi back on the steamer for another few minutes, then joined the boys at the table. “Do you want to be a jōnin?”

“I think… I would like to be a teacher most of all. But I will have the skill to be promoted soon enough,” Itachi explained. There was a flicker of red in his eyes—a fully-developed Sharingan, like I had expected of him. “Umino-san just started as an assistant teacher at the Academy, and he seems happy there.”
“Good for him,” Shisui said. “But you know your parents expect you to get farther than ‘schoolteacher.’”

...Hm. Maybe they did. But I didn’t really think that the Mikoto I knew would be quite so enthusiastic about pushing her sons toward the kind of path that had...kiiiiinda ended in an awful lot of deaths. Without Danzō, and with more access to the Hokage because of Obito and the concessions Sensei had made to the clans over the years, the entire conspiracy should have been nipped in the bud.

I rested my head in my palm and tapped my finger against my brow as I thought. It was less of a tell than, say, panicking. In the meantime, I had a ready avenue to stall. “What about you, Shisui-kun?”

Shisui leaned back in his chair and thought about it. “Well...I think I could make a pretty good guard for the Hokage.”

I nodded. “We do need some more people.” While pretty much every organization got new recruits as the years rolled on, the Hokage Guard had only gotten Iwashi Tatami over the last few years. I didn’t even really know the guy that well, but he was young and seemed to be picking up the job. “Once you’re interested in taking the half-step up to special jōnin—minimum—let the Hokage know and we might be in business. I might be able to endorse you.”

“You’d do that?” Shisui asked, surprised.

“As long as you don’t mind me being a mandatory part of your combat exercise.” And every day, Iwashi thanked his lucky stars that I hadn’t been in town that week. And neither had Obito or Kakashi.

Shisui winced, but he took the joke with good grace.

“ITACHI-KUN, IF YOU’RE FEELING UNFAIRLY PRESSURED...YOU COULD TALK TO KUSHINA-SAN,” I suggested, though I wasn’t sure if it would be appropriate to leverage Mikoto and Kushina’s relationship that way. Itachi and Sasuke had been raised to think of Kushina as their aunt to the same degree that Naruto and Tatsumaki thought the same of Mikoto. “She might be able to help you get your mother to come around to your side, if you feel strongly about your choice.”

Itachi went very still for a moment. Then, hesitantly, and in almost the softest voice I’d ever heard from him, “Do...do you think that could work?”

Oh, Itachi. Though I’d never really faced that kind of situation in my family, I knew at least a little of how he felt. As the oldest, all the expectations for success got piled on him instead of giving him any room to breathe. Poor kid. “I think you have a good chance of making your feelings heard. It’s better to get that stuff out in the open instead of being dragged into something you don’t want to do.”

Especially if it was ANBU. Why someone would push a kid with Itachi’s pacifistic tendencies into black ops was just baffling. He was twelve and...and he’d massacred his clan in the other timeline within two years.

Except that timeline wasn’t for this world, there was no Tobi, and like fuck I would let everything happen like that again. Itachi was going to be okay if I had to twist Sensei’s arm into a pretzel to make sure of it.

Itachi nodded solemnly, unaware of my internal conflict. “I will speak to her today.”

Pressure was definitely ramping up at home if he was that eager. I’d had exactly zero influence in how Itachi was turning out, being neither a parent, friend, nor a particularly constant figure in his life, but I felt a swell of pride in my chest at his determination anyway. He could do this.

Shisui patted Itachi’s shoulder. “I can come with you, if you want.”

“Thank you,” Itachi said, and got up from the table. He bowed to me and added, “Thank you for listening to my worries, Kei-san.”

“You’re going already?” I asked, looking pointedly at the mochi that was almost ready to go.

“I…” Itachi trailed off, then sat down again. “Um, maybe not. I do want to see what your cooking is like.”

Hah! Hopefully I would meet his lowest expectations. But as I turned back to the mochi and thus, preparing what the kids all seemed to have showed up for, I said offhandedly, “So, since when do you two spend time with Academy students? I don’t remember that happening when I was a kid.”

“Well, Itachi’s friends with Roku-kun, and I’m Itachi’s best friend, sooooo…” Shisui shrugged, as though that was all the explanation anyone needed. “It made sense!”

I found one flaw with this. “What about Lee-kun?”

“That I don’t know,” Itachi said. “But I admire his work ethic.”

Before I could ask any further on that topic, Kaito walked into the kitchen and piped up with, “Can I get a glass of water?”

“Yep. The glasses are in this cabinet,” I replied, making a vague sort of indicating motion with my elbow. The rest of my arms were busy rolling out mochi wrappers…or whatever these things were called. I just knew I needed to roll them flat and cut them up before I could call my attempt at daifuku mochi a success.

Kaito clambered up the counter with all the dexterity of someone who couldn’t reach the lowest of the upper shelves. He did keep his feet off the wood, though, so I let him get on with his search. Once he found a glass, he reached past me and turned the faucet on so he could get what he needed.

“So,” I said as Kaito slid off the counter and scooped his glass up again, “how do you know Lee-kun? He’s a few years younger than you are, isn’t he?”

“Aiko found him behind the school fence a week ago,” Kaito responded instantly, but much quieter than I’d expected. As I leaned down so he could whisper to me more conveniently, the two chūnin in the room gave up any pretense of not being just as curious as I was, and leaned in to listen. “Lee can’t use chakra like the rest of us, so some other kids were bullying him. They ran away when Aiko yelled at them.”

“Did you go to a teacher?” I asked, though I knew that shinobi children liked settling their differences on the field of combat almost as much as grown shinobi did. We were in the business of training soldiers.

“No. We took Lee home,” Kaito said, entirely honest in the childlike way that doubled as bluntness. And also dared anyone to stop him. “We’re keeping him.”

Shisui exchanged looks with Itachi, then said, “So, if Itachi didn’t have a clan…?”

“We’d keep him too,” Kaito said, and went back to his homework. “We’ll be genin by January, so we can do it.”
I wasn’t sure if he meant Raiden could afford another kid financially, or if genin could just adopt random people. I mean, I’d done that with Rin and Obito too. As a genin.

I couldn’t think of anything to say to that.

I continued the process of constructing mochi for a little while longer, while the two Uchiha boys contemplated the less-literal clannishness of the Chinatsugumi children. In a relatively short time (or something), I had daifuku mochi for all of the kids. They were lumpy and uneven, and two of them outright leaked, but I considered it a good job for a first attempt.

“Kei-sensei, do you think Gai-sensei will let me learn his style when I get bigger?” Aiko asked, having scarfed down her first mochi without breathing. Choking hazards aside, it felt nice to have my work appreciated.

“I don’t see why not.” Obviously, Gai wouldn’t have time for Aiko’s training once he got his genin team, but I trained with Gai enough that I could probably give her some pointers to tide her over between sessions. That said, the idea of Aiko, fully trained in Gai’s Strong Fist style and with the Kasai clan chakra-burst seals was something so terrifying that it had to exist.

Eventually.

“But if Gai-sensei gets a genin team,” Aiko went on, apparently reading my mind, “he won’t have as much time.”

I glanced at Lee out of the corner of my eye. He was drawing a dozen recreations of the Konoha leaf symbol on the back of his homework with a pen, without looking. It’d be a few years before he was old enough to even think of introducing to Gai.

To Aiko, I said, “Gai enjoys training and does it all the time. Assuming he’s not out of the village on a mission, your real concern is if you’re too busy to train with him. Most of the time you’re in school, he’s just doing his own thing.”

Aiko pursed her lips thoughtfully, as though this had never occurred to her.

“We’re gonna be on Kei-sensei’s team, though,” said Kaito, in a tone that implied he’d stage a revolt if it didn’t happen. “Kei-sensei’s better than Gai-sensei.”

Roku absented himself from that debate by shoving his second and third mochi in his mouth at the same time, so he looked like an overambitious squirrel. Between him, Itachi, and Shisui, the unclaimed mochi—including a few I had been planning on saving for Hayate—ended up disappearing in short order.

I didn’t have the heart to scold them. It wasn’t like I couldn’t make a ton more after they left.

...Speaking of. “I think I might have ruined your dinners, but you kids probably need to go home now.” I scratched the back of my neck, feeling a bit silly for enforcing a curfew. Honestly, though, I hadn’t planned on my apartment becoming the kids’ equivalent of a study room at the library.

Then again, the library wouldn’t have let them take food in the building to study with. Not from what I remembered, anyway. Stupid cross-cultural memories.

“Awwwww,” was the chorus from anyone under the age of ten.

Roku, who planned ahead somewhat better than the others, handed Itachi a plate that held the remaining daifuku mochi, “Kei-sensei, can Itachi take these home to Sasuke-kun?”
...I was a complete and total sucker. I’d just have to make more for Naruto and Tatsumaki. “Sure.”

To Itachi, I added, “You can bring the plate back whenever you feel like it.”

“Thank you, Kei-san,” Itachi said, accepting the gift like it was something precious and not just the result of an hour’s clumsy work. The kid liked his sweets.

I waved as the kids took off, with the Uchiha boys vanishing almost instantly and the Chinatsugumi kids (plus Lee) moving as a pack. And just to be safe, I sent Tsuruya to follow the second group and make sure they got home okay.

There was something to be said for delegating childcare responsibilities.

Hayate got back from his mission to the Land of Grass on a random Monday when I happened to be at the administration center, picking up a mission of my own.

Mine was just a B-ranked bounty hunting mission, but I could probably handle it solo. I certainly didn’t have any of my usual mission partners available for this kind of thing, but it paid the bills and kept me out of trouble, and I got to field-test new seals as I learned them. It also wasn’t particularly high-priority, which was why I figured I could just pick it up and get it off the administration’s to-do list.

I got about a foot out the door before my brother cornered me. In a long hallway with no real alcoves, it was an accomplishment.

“Man, I leave for a few weeks and then you almost die again,” Hayate scolded me, but he sounded more exasperated than anything. There was probably something to be said for over-familiarity with death, and most of it was either outright bad or just in bad taste.

August was off to a wonderful start.

“I’m fine,” I insisted, because that was the kind of thing you did after a scare like that. I had my pride, after all.

“Are you sure?” Hayate made a face at me, like he was five all over again and didn’t like the sound of the word “no.”

It was somewhat less effective with the amount of road dust on his clothes and the fact that he had a scrape along his nose that nearly matched my scar. He should have seen a medic about that before asking me how I was doing. I’d only been dead for a little while.

...Though maybe that was an understatement.

“Hayate, if I wasn’t fine, I wouldn’t have this scroll,” I said, holding it up. Sure, it was a “go here, kill this guy, and get paid” kind of mission, but it was a mission that took me out of the village. If Rin hadn’t been sure I’d be okay, then she’d have strapped me to a hospital bed.
Hayate gave this fact his due consideration. For my part, I tried to steer us out of the hall since we were taking up space people actually had to walk in. Hayate didn’t come up with anything to say until we’d gotten to the roof, or perhaps he was just playing along.

“...You know I’m just worried about you, you know?” Hayate said, once we were on the roof of the administration center. He sat back against the railings where, some six years ago, Sensei had officially become Hokage.

“Yeah, but you know how well I deal with people’s concern,” I said, shrugging. Still, I stood next to him and nudged the back of my hand against his shoulder. “I’m never taking that kind of stupid risk again. The Shadow Clone technique is off-limits.”

Hayate blinked. “That started this whole mess.”

“Yes, it did,” I said slowly, raising an eyebrow at his tone. “Don’t tell me…”

Hayate grinned. “I guess I finally learned something before you, Sis.”

I opened my mouth to say something, then thought better of it. The first couple of thoughts were semi-wordless sensations of alarm, because how the hell had my brother learned it? But that wasn’t helpful, so I squished them down until they stopped threatening to come out. Then, “Congratulations. But how, exactly?”

Hayate blinked. “I just requested access to the scroll and worked on it a little before I left. Didn’t you do that?”

If viewed in the right lighting, I kinda had. But I had kinda called in an ANBU captain to supervise, along with a powerful medic, and I was a goddamn jōnin and the Hokage’s student. “That is...not really what I expected to hear. I thought the scroll was more secure than that as a rule.”

...Even though I’d been able to take it home. Erm.

Should I be concerned?

Well, if we face an army of undead soldiers from nowhere at any point in the future, you can tell Tobirama Senju’s ghost “I told you so.” Or possibly his uberzombie form...

Of course it would be something stupid like that, Isobu said, but he subsided without a further grumble.

“Obviously I couldn’t take it anywhere, and there were two ANBU breathing down my neck the entire time,” Hayate said, oblivious to my internal conflict. “But I got it down before I left.”

That was still less stupid than I’d assumed.

“But hey, I did it!” Hayate went on, much more cheerful. “So I bet that means I’ll learn how to use a new nature transformation before you do.”

I wasn’t so sure about that. “How many clones can you make at once?”

“...Two.” Hayate recovered quickly, at least. Hurriedly, he said, “But that still cuts down on the training time by two-thirds!”

Did math work like that? “Just be careful. Just because someone like Sensei can make a ton at once doesn’t mean he uses it for training, and you’ll definitely need a spotter for that.”
Hayate scoffed, but he knew better than to argue with me. After my scare with the Shadow Clone jutsu, it was just sensible.

We sat in silence for a little bit. I rolled the mission scroll in my hand for a moment, looking out at nothing in particular. Hayate sighed and started toying with a lock of hair that had escaped his low ponytail.

If I looked down, I could see Iruka being a recess supervisor in the Academy’s yard. From how his chakra felt, he was happy running after kids and keeping them from touching practice weapons or the targets that were all over the grounds. Sure, it was colored by frustration at the kids’ antics, but the Academy made him happy on the whole.

If I looked a little closer, I probably would have been able to spot Yamato taking a break in the big tree in the Academy’s yard. I could certainly sense him, even if my impression of his chakra just so happened to match how I’d describe that tree anyway. The overlay was amusing, but the ANBU security tattoo was a little disquieting. I hadn’t known he was already in it.

“Are you worried about Iruka?” Hayate asked, looking down at the Academy yard too.

“Not really,” I responded. “I think he’s got things figured out for the most part.” A thought occurred to me. “You know, he wasn’t nearly that loud when you were kids.”

“No while you were around,” Hayate said, as Iruka gave an impromptu lecture to the kids about why throwing frogs was rude and not to do it. The fact that he had to raise his voice was more a consequence of being outside than anything, but I’d heard worse since he wasn’t exactly competing with wind or traffic.

I’d generally done worse, come to that.

Ah well. He’d grow into his role. But I had another topic to broach to my brother. “How’s your kenjutsu coming along?”

Hayate groaned. “Not you too.”

My response was a defensive, “What?”

“Yūgao-chan asked me the same thing the other day,” Hayate explained, which wasn’t a full explanation by any means. I needed more exposition! “I’m fine, but I’m still trying to work out the last hitch for the brand-new technique.”

Going down the list of the random silly names Hayate had come up for his “special techniques” over the years in my head, I came up with the answer in what I thought was an acceptable amount of time. “Dance of the Crescent Moon, right?”

“Yeah. But I can only practice it so many times,” Hayate said, casual in the sort of way that was really a mask for a bit of bragging. “It costs a lot of chakra, but I’m sure it’s a guaranteed kill.”

Like the Chidori? Because that hadn’t worked out. What I said instead was, “And each time your clones get better, so will you.”

“Right!” He appeared quite pleased that I had followed his train of thought. What else were siblings for?

Though I did have something else to bring up. While it was only tangentially related to anything, Hayate’s ponytail had reminded me of it. “Hayate, do you ever wonder what Mom’s family was “Sometimes?” Hayate prodded experimentally at the scrape on his nose, then winced. Yep, he was going to need a bandage for that. “Once we met the Gekkō family, I sort of stopped looking at any of that stuff. Even if Umeko’s dead now, she still put me off meeting anybody new just because we might be related.”

“I don’t blame you for that.” I’d been in the same boat until not too long ago. “But you remember the story about Yuki?”

“Yeah, I do, but I’m not sure what we should do with any of that stuff.” Hayate shook his head. “And I’m not planning on going out and looking for anyone who probably has his own life and doesn’t even know who we are.”

“And if, someday, someone from the Land of Iron asks for our help?” I held up a hand before he could protest. “I know we didn’t get the best experience out of the last mission we volunteered ourselves into, but…”

“If someone needs our kind of help, I kinda hope they’d go to samurai first.” Before I could comment, though, Hayate blew his bangs out of his face and said, “But look, if we’re needed, I’m not gonna say no.”

That was probably the most I could ask of him. If it came up, I’d go despite his reluctance and see for myself just what further secrets were hiding in our family tree. But at least I’d asked.

Hayate glanced down at my scroll again. “So I take it you can’t train with me?”

“Sorry,” I said automatically. I really didn’t want to get into another kenjutsu match right before I went out to kill someone. “But Yamato’s in the tree down there, if you want to find someone.”

Patented Keisuke Gekkō signature move: Throwing someone else under the bus.

But, for once since meeting Yamato for the first time, Hayate demurred. “No thanks. If he’s down there, he’s spending the day with Iruka. I’ll go find Anko.”

“You hang out with Anko now?” I asked, since I hadn’t exactly made a habit of tracking my brother’s whereabouts. As a result, I was somewhat out of the loop.

Hayate just shrugged. “I pay her in dango.”

Pffft. “Need any help with that? I can at least make those by hand instead of paying for them.”

“Do you do shop-quality dango?” Hayate asked, raising a skeptical eyebrow. When I deflated, he said, “Yeah, that was my reaction too.”

I patted his shoulder. “Well, good luck with that. And take care of your face, okay?”

Hayate ducked his head, self-conscious about the scrape once again. “Fine, fine! Enjoy your mission.”

I left him there to go pack my things.

Once I got back from a couple of B/A-ranked missions without a hitch, I was perhaps slightly ready to get my head back in the game. While sitting around and studying yet more advanced seals would probably have been productive, I instead did something a bit...ill-advised.
Admittedly, working through katas on my own would have been a waste of a training field. I needed a sparring partner on my level to push myself to new heights, and there weren’t that many people who could give me a real fight. Of those who could, Kakashi and Obito were on a long-term mission, Sensei was busy planning for the next Konoha Chūnin Exam, and Gai was doing his own thing. Genma and Raidō had un-volunteered themselves for that job until the end of time, so it would be impolite to ask.

And that left Kushina, who presented a different problem entirely.

Ten years ago, Kushina would have been a good fight for me now. After the drama regarding my tenketsu, V2 chakra cloak was entirely off-limits and V1 was pushing the tolerances the seals had for high volumes of chakra. I still had an arsenal of other seals, but...well.

I was a jinchūriki with an automatically-expanded chakra capacity. So was Kushina, but with a higher peak output and a much longer transformation timer because of Kurama and Isobu’s relative strengths. And when it came to Tailed Beast transformation shenanigans, I was woefully behind the curve. Sure, so was everyone else on the continent except for maybe dead people who were definitely not coming back no sir, but the thought stuck in my brain like a Post-It note I hadn’t written. I acknowledged it routinely, but often found that I never ended up being able to do anything about it.

I was a fūinjutsu specialist. Kushina had literally taught my teacher. I could use seals instantaneously, as long as they were the kind that exploded. Kushina had Adamantine Sealing Chains, which had been strong enough to pin Kurama in place even if Kushina herself was half-dead from chakra drain and exhausted from giving birth to Naruto.

Basically the only thing I had going for me was the fact that I knew kenjutsu and she didn’t. Not much of a game-changer in the grand scheme of things.

This was not even going to be a contest.

“Mommy, win this thing!” Tatsumaki shouted from the top of Gama’s bright orange head. She even had a homemade sign proclaiming her allegiance to her mom’s end of this fight.

The completely foregone nature of this event did not prevent spectators from gathering anyway. In this case, Sensei had allowed Naruto and Tatsumaki to come with their mother to a training field in Mount Myōboku. Sure, he’d sent along one of his Shadow Clones and enlisted the two Toad Sages in addition to Gama, to look after the kids, but it said something that he was willing to let his kids out of his sight for something like that.

Just looking around, it was pretty obvious that this combat arena was used by the largest of the toads, given that the battlefield was a roughly circular clearing that stretched for multiple kilometers in each direction. It was deeply eerie, with wind whistling across the...plateau? Whatever the battlefield was, it reminded me of a place where people would fight with giant mecha. Preferably animal-shaped ones, for theming purposes.

“You’ll be fine, Keisuke-chan,” Shima assured me as I walked past her and toward where my doom—who also known as Kushina—was waiting.

“Or if you aren’t, we have medical help on standby,” Fukasaku said, holding up a little flag with Konoha’s spiral leaf on it.

Naruto, sitting next to his sister and Fukasaku on Gama’s head, gave me a thumbs-up and a wide grin. “You’re gonna be okay! You’re strong.”
...Sure thing, kid.

You volunteered for this.

Leaving the cheering section behind with a nervous wave was probably one of the hardest things I’d done since August, and I was including two separate bounty-hunting missions where I had been on my own. I probably looked like someone staring death in the face.

What did I just say?

I KNOW.

“Are you ready to begin, Kei-chan?” Kushina asked with a grin that was as bright as her son’s. She’d tied her long hair up into a bun and donned all of her mission gear. This did not include twin hip scroll holsters like mine, but instead one large scroll mounted above the small of her back.

From what I remembered, she’d never used any scrolls in her mission gear, which was a brand-new worry. Nor had she ever fully tied her hair up.

I was dead meat. I was roadkill.

And yet, I was still doing this.

Just so you know, Kurama is laughing at you.

Of course he was. Far be it from him to do any less.

“I’ll take it easy on you,” Kushina said in a bright tone, even as her eyes started to glow an ominous red.

I dropped into a kenjutsu starting stance and braced for impact. Isobu’s chakra leaked into my coils more slowly, and though my eyes itched it didn’t take any enhanced vision to tell that Kushina was going to flatten me. It barely took eyeballs to see that.

Kushina grinned. Her chakra surged, and eight golden spiked chains sprang out from her back. “Adamantine Sealing Chains!” When she lifted her arm, the chains whipped around in midair and tore through the space between us like musical metal whips.

This looked like an excellent excuse not to be there. Experience—earned by Obito and Sensei instead of my own pain—taught me that Kushina’s fūinjutsu could cancel out any chakra used by literally the rest of the planet. Replacement jutsu? Get real.

Not actually being in the line of fire and instead making a Water Clone take the brunt of the hit? That worked.

It wasn’t much of a reprieve, though. I hopped out of the puddle—ubiquitous in the Toad clan’s territory—and lobbed a few exploding kunai in Kushina’s direction. Short timers meant they’d actually explode on contact—as long as she didn’t move too much.

But Kushina was already turning to face me with her chains batting projectiles out of the air almost by reflex.

Actually, no—she’d set up a barrier. Fuck. At least with automatic parrying abilities, there was the vague hope that the defense would fail. Kushina’s barriers never did.
Do you want my advice here?

Do you know how not to lose?

...Eh. Never mind. Have fun getting smashed flat.

There were only so many ways to get around the fact that Kushina had Kurama for a partner. And I had like...two. Neither option really played to Isobu’s strengths.

“Nice trick, Kei-chan,” Kushina called to me, as her chains dissolved into golden sparkles and faded back to nothing. “But not good enough!”

Not what I wanted to hear at all.

Kurama’s chakra surged again, coating Kushina in a thick layer of orange-red energy. After a second or two, it resolved itself into Kurama’s shape by growing a long translucent tail and pointed ears above Kushina’s head. And that V1 cloak, right there, was as high as I would be able to go for this fight.

Kushina’s upper limits were somewhere in the stratosphere. While I doubted that Kushina made a habit of reveling in her power (given that Konoha was a village full of relatively squishy humans), Isobu’s personality showed through whenever I used that much of his chakra. Kurama was a lot less subtle than even my partner, which was really just a polite term for “showboating.”

Excuse me?

I slipped a seal from my sleeve and onto the wrap of my next kunai. You’ve got to admit that you like being really strong. And letting other people know it.

...Not all the time, Isobu huffed, but he sent me another thread of his power without waiting for the request. The thread expanded into a rope and then a coil, pooling inside my body until I, too, had a V1 chakra cloak protecting me.

“Fight me!” Kushina and Kurama roared together.

Yep, that was definitely personality seepage. Running was out because Kushina was faster once she got Kurama’s chakra boost, and she could sense just like I could, if not better.

I ducked under a barrage of flying chakra-made shuriken, skidding on my knees briefly at one point to get closer without losing too much speed. By the time I found my feet again, Kushina was already close enough that she would have been able to reach out and touch me, but—

Curve of the Moon!

—I could still manage some kenjutsu even at an awkward angle. And the relative simplicity of samurai techniques meant my left arm could just about pull it off. When the iaijutsu technique hit the leading edge of Kushina’s chakra cloak, the cloak parted like the sea for just a second.

Then it slammed shut on my wrist and yanked me into the air. A second later, the cloak had rotated in place and I was suddenly making plenty of me-shaped dents in the surrounding ground. In hindsight, Kushina had seen me spar with Sensei, so maybe this was a just comeuppance for showing off my entire arsenal five years ago.

“Almost, Kei-chan,” Kushina said, with a smile that showed off both the dark whisker-marks on her cheeks and her elongated canine teeth. The hand behind the chakra that gripped me? Claws.
Kurama had cool physical enhancements for his hosts. In between my hammering heartbeats as a result of the induced terror of Kurama’s presence, I could almost appreciate it.

Isobu, from his corner, let out another irritated huff.

I’d learned one or two tricks since then, though. Isobu’s chakra-cloak tail was composed of a ring of spines at the end that almost mimicked a human hand in the right light. At my command, the tail lit up with purple flames on each point, and I threw everything I had into a blow aimed at Kushina’s midsection.

Kurama’s arm manifested out of Kushina’s seal—oh come on—and deflected my attempt at the Five Elements Seal off to the left. After a second, he and Kushina seemed to think this was quite enough from me, and the two of them hurled me to the other end of the training field.

I bounced once, then twice, leaving rooster-tails of dirt behind me as I tumbled out of control. Then I finally remembered that Isobu’s chakra cloak was at least as versatile, and three of his tails tore out of the cloak’s nebulous form to keep me from rolling into the next province. Sure, I went through a tree that looked like it would have fit in among the denizens of the Forest of Death, but it was a small price to pay overall.

It’s too bad you can’t use V2 anymore. Isobu’s single eye seemed to focus on the middle distance for a moment, before he shook his head. Not that it would make much difference. Kurama would just match us.

You’re telling me. I got back to my feet with dirt and splinters cascading off the chakra cloak. I assume that’s why you’re not really helping me with this fight?

The best thing you can do is actually land the seals you’ve been trying to use, Isobu said simply, and besides, Kurama isn’t contributing tactically to how Kushina-san fights. No more than I am, anyway. And if I try much more, he will too.

And then I’ll just lose faster.

It might be an idea worth considering, at least.

...I’ll give it one last shot, okay? Kurama can see the Five Elements Seal coming, but I’m hoping the Chakra Suppression Seal isn’t something he’ll try to help Kushina with automatically. I glanced down at my right hand, and at the kunai still tightly clenched between my fingers. Not if he can’t see it.

And Kushina?

Um. Again, hoping they don’t see it.

To make a not-so-long story even shorter, the end of the fight went almost to plan. I certainly got to employ the Chakra Suppression Seal, almost like Sensei had used on me six years beforehand. It proved itself effective against jinchūriki.

...Except for the part where Kushina batted my hand back into my face, sans kunai, and the seal activated on me.

As they say, better luck next time.
A couple of days after my complete curbstomping via Kushina, I was back to mission fitness and had taken the opportunity to spar with Gai, because my teammates were still gone doing whatever covert thing Sensei needed them for. In between punches, kicks, and on one occasion being hurled into a tree—needed to stop letting that happen—I could almost manage some annoyance over it. The rest of the time, Gai kept me too busy to think about their absence too much.

“A toast!” Gai said, holding up his second water bottle. He was almost entirely drenched in sweat, as was I, but I was still halfway through my first water bottle because I didn’t have the ability to suppress my gag reflex on demand.

“For what?” I asked, even as I was automatically raising my arm to clink our plastic bottles together. Not super dignified, but Gai had a way of adding gravitas to a moment before abruptly yanking it away.

“I heard about your sparring match with Kushina-sama! A fine showing,” Gai said. He even gave me one of his thousand-watt smiles for emphasis. “Naruto-kun was very clear that his mother had a lot of fun!”

“I am sure it was a glorious defeat!”

Depended on his definition thereof. “Well, Kushina-san might’ve broken a sweat for five seconds there.”

“See?” Gai patted me on the shoulder. “Progress!”

Given that it was the first spar, I’d have to wait and see if I got any further the next time. And probably prepare a lot more seals of every kind I could get my hands on. Still, Gai had a point, so I reached up and let him help me stand back up. The log wasn’t a great bench anyway.

As I methodically popped the joints in my hands, I asked him, “So, what are you going to do now?”

“I am going to train, of course!” Gai said cheerfully. Then he paused. “On the other hand, perhaps I am needed in the mission office today.” He nodded to himself. “If I am not needed by the citizens of the Land of Fire, I will devote myself to training once more!”

Gai shot off like a green arrow for the center of the village, taking his gear and recyclables with him.

I screwed the cap back on my water bottle, tucked the second one into my hip pouch, and set off for town from Training Ground Seven at a much more sedate pace. It would have been hard to be less sedate than Gai, but such a state was theoretically possible in some universe.

Konoha in early autumn was a bit of a wreck, weather-wise. While we had sunny days in years where summer dragged on a bit too long, today in particular was a patchwork of sun, rain, and indecisive overcast skies. Even as I walked back toward town for lunch—probably soba—the heavens opened up and started dumping fat raindrops on my head in a way that might’ve been great during the spar with Gai. I always needed more ammo against him.

At the moment, though, rain was just a pain. I knew a few Water jutsu that could shove the water around so it’d inconvenience other people more than me, but the idea of having to maintain any of them for the entire walk back struck me as a waste of chakra.

Still, teaching Kaito how to make a miniature Water Dragon Bullet for the explicit purpose of water fights went in my mental training notes for future reference. Maybe if I could come up with some kind of thin metal shield for Roku to manipulate, and if I walked Aiko through a few barrier fūinjutsu…

Hopefully I’d have a genin team to throw them at by the time I finally got a chance to put together a sparring match like that.

While eating lunch, I had a chance to sketch out a few more rough ideas on a napkin that eventually ended up in my pockets. Otherwise, eating alone was pretty boring.

I’ve been here the whole time.

Do you actually care what I do with my future genin?

No. But you still should have asked.

I just lifted the brim of my bowl to my mouth and drained the soup. That wasn’t worth commenting on.

But just then, before Isobu could come up with something else to say regarding my future genin, I felt a flicker of familiar chakra well within my detection range. Frowning, I set the bowl down and set a mess of ryō notes down on the counter. While it was bad form to just walk away from a bill, even if I’d overpaid, my mind was on other things.

Do you happen to remember when Obito was due back in the village? I asked Isobu as I slipped out into the rain again. A quick hop brought me to the rooftops, and I stuck there in spite of the running water thanks to chakra in my feet.

Another month, I think, Isobu said, giving the impression of looking up. But I think both of them were on the same mission.

I grimaced as I headed in the direction of Obito’s chakra, and the Uchiha district. Yeah, that’s about what I thought.

As the only person on the team without independent teleportation abilities, it took me a few minutes to make it to Obito’s apartment building. But I was probably the only person who was quite so jumpy about my friends’ chakra signatures.

I made it up the stairs, sensing Obito’s panic before I even got close. And yet, it was somehow…muffled? Fatigue was a factor, possibly…

Fwish.

Sensei raised a hand in greeting as I spun in place on the stairs to face him. I might’ve done an undignified pirouette if I hadn’t been keeping such close track of my traction. “I don’t know why he’s here early either.”

“Well, that makes two of us.” I popped a seal along one of my belt holsters, and help up one of Obito’s spare keys. Rin had the other. “Unless you just want to teleport in, Sensei.”

Sensei’s gaze slid toward Obito’s door and focused there for a moment. Then he said, “No.”

…Ominous. I knocked on the door first, calling, “Obito? It’s Kei, and Sensei’s here too. Can we come in?”

We got a miserable-sounding groan in return. Sensei and I exchanged grim looks, and I inserted the key to disable the security seals Obito used. Nothing like the comprehensive set Sensei and I had put around our places, but still plenty dangerous.

I entered the apartment first, and got to hear the dulcet tones of Obito throwing up in his bathroom. With that as the backdrop, I glanced around his usually-neat apartment and spotted melting snow, loose globs of mud, and rusty-red blood footprints. From the evidence in front of me, it didn’t take much to conclude that he’d come straight from the field, dragging a foreign disease in his wake.

Behind the bathroom door, Obito was apparently in the process of coughing up everything he’d eaten for the last week.

“That...is not good.” I swallowed against the urge to throw up, myself. I’d...never really gotten used to the ickier parts of hospital work, and I rarely stuck around battlefields long enough to start dealing with this end of things. Instead of thinking too much on that, I said, “Sensei, the hospital needs to be ready for this. If Obito caught something we’ve never seen before while on that mission...”

Sensei didn’t need me to finish that thought, thankfully. In our world, becoming a field commander was a matter of experience and strength, and everyone remembered what it was like to be knee-deep in disease and muck in the aftermath of a battle. We had more than enough historical texts about shinobi and other warriors dying in droves when something got into the water at camp. And because we were shinobi, those records never minced words.

We’d learned the lessons of our past in some areas.

“Quarantine procedures, then,” Sensei remarked, half to himself. “Kei, I’ll transport Obito to the hospital. It doesn’t sound like he’ll be able to get there on his own without straining himself.”

“I don’t know how far he transported himself with Kamui,” I said pointedly, “so I’ll take your word for it.” The hospital was a relatively short jump, but even so. Then another thought struck me, “Wait, Sensei—if it’s airborne...?”

Sensei mimed punching himself in the jaw. “Shadow Clones are convenient that way.”

_Dammit, Sensei._ Sometimes it felt like he was mocking me. But instead of voicing that thought, I just sighed and crossed my arms. “...I guess that means I’m going to be stuck in quarantine, then.”

Like I’d let you get sick from something so mundane.

_Doesn’t stop me from being a Typhoid Mary,_ I pointed out.

A what?

_Spreading the disease while not showing the symptoms myself._ Damned English idioms. Since Isobu still felt curious, I explained, _The original term referred to someone who worked in public places and refused to believe she was killing people everywhere she went. They had to lock her up on an island somewhere to get her to stop “helping.”_

I suppose that means the hospital might have to burn all your clothes.

..._Argh._ I _hated_ hospital gowns.

Sensei’s Shadow Clone prodded my arm. “Still with us? You were making complicated faces for a moment there.”

“Yeah, yeah, I’m all right. Isobu just had a few things to ask.” I cleared my throat anxiously and knocked on Obito’s bathroom door. “Obito, you’re going to need to go to the hospital now.”

We didn’t get much of an answer aside from another miserable groan, but the fact that he’d had enough presence of mind to go for the bathroom did seem like a good sign. Or would in hindsight. Probably.

Whatever the case, Sensei’s clone and I hauled Obito’s half-delirious carcass out of the bathroom. I had to make sure not to breathe too hard, thanks to the obligatory smell of sickness and other fun things, but it was at least short-lived. Sensei’s clones, after all, were just as capable of folding space-time like a napkin as the original, and the last thing we needed was to leave viral or bacterial contamination anywhere.

Sensei’s clone dropped Obito and I off at the hospital before exploding into smoke. Not in the foyer, because that would have been stupid, but in a completely white ward. The air buzzed with chakra from two or three layers of powerful barrier seals. Besides that, the air itself made my ears want to pop thanks to the lack of pressure, and I didn’t have to look around much to confirm that the quarantine ward was designed to keep a whole lot of dangerous microscopic shit in.

If any got out, it would do so only after being violently atomized.

There were two medics in the room already, dressed head to toe in clothes that looked about up to clean room standards. Sensei had apparently also told the hospital how many people were exposed, which was why there were two beds, a shower section cut off from the rest of the room by a curtain, and all the other fun stuff to take care of.

Since I was already exposed, I just sighed to myself. This was going to be a long, long day.

One of the medics said, “You know the drill. There’s a gown for you in there, so get moving.”

I glanced at Obito, who still seemed out of it. I wasn’t going to argue with the medics, but I worried.

“And—?”

“We’ll take care of him,” said the other medic.

I nodded and headed to the shower without another word. Sure, I had to dump all my training gear into a garbage bag, along with all of my clothes, but it was a small price to pay for not being a plague vector. I’d just have to re-draw all of the seals whenever I had time. I had no doubt whatsoever that contaminated items would probably not come back in the same condition that I’d had them.

Antimicrobial soap and hot water went a long way when it came to preventing disease. Both of these things also meant coming back out into the room felt like stepping barefoot into a refrigerator, but it was a small price to pay.

The hospital gown was more annoying. I happened to like wearing actual clothes, dammit. This papery bullshit did not count.

In the time I’d spent in the shower, a third medic had appeared and was taking careful notes on a clipboard while the other two were bagging all of Obito’s extra mission gear. On a rolling table, I could see his headband, shoes, and the long pressure glove that ordinarily hid his Zetsu arm from direct line of sight. Sure, Obito was having his sponge bath taken care of behind a portable screen, but at least that was progress.

“Gekkō-san,” said the newest masked medic, and I blinked. That voice sounded rather familiar. If I tilted my head the right way, I could see her green eyes past the reflected glare from the overhead lights.
“Yakushi-san, I didn’t expect to see you again here,” I admitted. I’d kind of assumed that the once-member of ROOT had permanently retired from any and all shinobi business to run that orphanage. To see her back here and helping out again was a...surprise. I wasn’t sure if it was welcome or not, yet.

“It’s a favor,” Nonō replied. Then she held up her clipboard pointedly and got right back to business. “Now, as I understand, you were one of the first people to see Uchiha-san after his return to the village?”

“Yeah. Sensei’s Shadow Clone met up with me there, but clones don’t transfer matter when they disperse. Just chakra.” She probably knew that, though. “His apartment is probably a mess…”

“We’re taking care of that,” Nonō informed me, even as she scribbled something in her notes. “Decontamination procedures are quite thorough.”

Thank goodness.

“The Hokage mentioned that you’ve had some medical training.” Nonō said, endlessly patient. “Could you please tell me what symptoms Uchiha-san was showing at the time you entered the apartment?”

I did so, more or less as follows: Besides the obvious delirium that had scrambled Obito’s reactions, I’d also noted the sunken look to the visible parts of his face and additional lines that hadn’t been a part of his pressure scars. Five seconds of investigating his bathroom had also revealed both diarrhea and vomiting, which did not bode well for avoiding dehydration. His skin had been clammy and hadn’t contracted the way it should have when I pinched him.

Nonō nodded along with my explanation, taking notes as I went. When I finished, she said, “We’ll get him started on fluids immediately. Taking samples and processing them will take time, so please be patient. We don’t know for sure if you’ve been exposed to airborne pathogens, but it’s better to play it safe.”

I winced anyway. Medical quarantine was going to suck.

Nonō glanced at the curtain again, where the other two medics were still making sure Obito was clean, and finally said, “I will leave you here to rest. If you save your strength, perhaps you might not catch what he has.”

With that, she left. Over the next few minutes, the other two medics finished with Obito and finally got him into one of the many itchy hospital gowns that I hated so much. IV stands were set up (but not for me), Obito was not really sleeping but still not talking to me, and I sat on the edge of my bed with boredom slowly eating the rest of my mind.

I should have asked Nonō to get me a book.

It was a few hours before anyone checked up on me. Medics came in and checked on Obito, but my stubborn immune system refused to show any signs and left the medics feeling safe to ignore me.

“You know, Obito,” I said (after the most recent batch of medic-nin came in and fussed over us quarantined patients and then left), “this isn’t really how I pictured our reunion going. I was expecting you and Kakashi to both come back and...I don’t know. Maybe we’d go out to eat and celebrate. But I didn’t imagine you’d get sick.”

He did look somewhat better after a few hours of bed rest. Less...dried-up. He’d also stopped muttering at the ceiling tiles not long after getting the IV hooked up to his left arm, because the medics couldn’t figure out where the veins were in his Zetsu arm. I wasn’t completely convinced that he had conventional physiology as far as his upper-right torso went, but clearly his Zetsu-derived resilience didn’t apply to diseases.

At that point, the door opened again. The air took a few seconds to regain equilibrium, and I stretched my jaw to get the pressure in my ears figured out again before I turned to our visitor.

“I’d love to know why you always end up in these messes,” Rin said as she headed over to our isolated cots. Unlike the medics from before, she was only wearing gloves and medic-nin uniform, rather than the full contagion gear.

“Because the universe hates it when things go too well,” I suggested, holding up a hand in a half-wave. “Hey, Rin. Any news?”

“A diagnosis,” Rin told me. Making a few quick hand signs, she approached my bedside and I was briefly lit by the glow of her Diagnostic Jutsu.

“How long do I have?” I asked, only half-joking.

“It’s not funny, Kei,” Rin said, but she let the jutsu dissipate. “You’re fine, at least for now.”

_Forever_, Isobu insisted.

“It’s not as though you were really exposed the way this disease propagates, but even so! You should be more careful,” Rin said. She made a sweeping gesture that encompassed the room we were all in. “Otherwise, you end up in here!”

“Sorry, did you say you knew what Obito had?”

Rin nodded, dropping the topic of my bad judgment. Snapping over to medic-mode again, she headed to Obito’s bedside. As she went, she explained, “The test says that Obito has cholera. It’s not really that dangerous if you get the patient to a hospital as fast as you can, or if you keep them hydrated, but…” For a moment, I saw a wince behind her professional facade. “But otherwise, in small villages? Away from medical help? It really doesn’t look good.”

“And if, say, Obito was in hostile territory on a mission…” I trailed off, letting the thought hang in the air unsaid.

“I-I’m sure Kakashi took proper precautions before dealing with infected food or water,” Rin blurted, obviously uncomfortable with the idea I’d brought up. She shook herself, then went on, “There are, um, vaccines that prevent some strains, and this one’s one of them. I’m sure Kakashi is careful about that!”

“Obito would have brought him back if he wasn’t,” I agreed. “He held himself together really well until he was safe.”

“Right! And your team—and anyone else with type O blood—is more susceptible to cholera than people with other blood types,” Rin said, hitting another tangent and running with it. “No one really knows for sure why that’s the case, but I...erm.” _Yeeeah, about that..._ “Uh. That’s not really a comforting thing to hear, is it? I should stop talking...”

I shrugged. “It’s fine. If talking helps, you can keep going. I actually didn’t know that about cholera.”
“I just…” Rin shook her head. “I’m sorry. I know Obito’s going to be fine now that he’s here, but…”

But while Obito was safe in the village again, that still left Kakashi out in the literal cold. Stuck in quarantine, there wasn’t much else for me to think about other than my friends. Even when I tried to focus on stuff I’d rather be doing in the village other than sitting in the hospital, the worry seeped back into my thought process.

Stupid mental feedback loops.

I just crossed my arms and said, “Don’t worry about it, Rin. How’s Obito doing?”

“Better,” was Rin’s initial assessment via Diagnostic Jutsu. “He’s not as dehydrated anymore, but he’s definitely still infected.” Her hands stopped glowing. “It will be a few days before I’d be even halfway comfortable with letting him leave.”

Sitting at a marginally more favorable angle, I saw Obito’s eyelid flutter a moment before he started to move. Given Rin’s jutsu, she probably knew he was going to wake up, but she still jumped the slightest bit when he started to stretch his Zetsu hand’s fingers.

“R-really, Rin…?” Obito rasped, probably in response to that little mandatory hospital stay. While any attempt at puppy-dog eyes would have been downright pathetic given how terrible Obito still looked, he tried anyway.

He still looked like something a seabird had coughed up.

“Yes, you’re staying in the hospital,” Rin said firmly. “E-Even if I have to have Kyūri-chan make sure!”

“The scorpion seems like overkill,” I commented. “I don’t think Obito would be able to fight his way out of a paper bag right now.”

“Kei,” Obito whined, and then coughed so hard he almost sat up from sheer momentum. Given all the throwing up he’d been doing, I imagined his throat felt roughly comparable to sandpaper, and that he would have problems getting the taste of his own stomach lining out of his mouth. “Ow…”

“Don’t talk right now,” I suggested, entirely extraneously. Not much of a suggestion given his condition, but I at least put up a pretense of not making it an order.

Obito complied, for about the second time in his entire life. “But…”

Okay, so maybe not. There’d be plenty of time for his second time obeying my medical directions later.

“You need to save your strength and get better,” Rin said firmly, neatly overriding me and getting Obito to listen, since he closed his mouth so fast that his teeth clicked. “I don’t know what you did to get so sick, but I can hear it from you later. As it is, I don’t think you’re getting out of here for a week.”

Obito made a noise in his throat that might have been another complaint, but it didn’t get that far.

“Medical quarantine, if you’re wondering,” I added, since I wasn’t sure what Obito understood about the situation. He’d been lurching in and out of full consciousness rather a lot.

Okay, that was definitely grumbling from Obito.
“Oh, and speaking of,” Rin said, as though just remembering something rather relevant. “Kei, you’re probably going to be fine. Between the lack of exposure and what I know about how your immune system works...well. I don’t think bacteria stand much of a chance.”

I told you.

And I knew you’d look out for me. Thanks.

I picked at the slightly frayed edge of the hospital gown I was wearing. “So I can leave when I get my stuff back?”

“Well, if Tsunade-sama says you can…” Rin hedged.

“I’ll look forward to it anyway,” I said, as I settled back into my cot for the wait.

The wait, by the by? Three more hours. While Rin was only around for a little longer, given that she had rounds to complete, I didn’t have much to do other than to keep track of Obito’s progression through cholera symptoms and worry about everything.

And I still didn’t have a book.

Obito, when he wasn’t back to drifting in and out of intense intestinal distress and throwing up, wasn’t much for conversation. Aside from obeying Rin’s directive with much more care than he ever had with mine, being sick with cholera was terrible. And I wasn’t much of a distraction from that.

And on my end? Well, Obito was with me and I knew he’d be fine. I was less sure of Kakashi, out in the field alone. While I was peripherally aware of his ANBU missions, he was generally on a team for most of them—even the assassination ones. Up to a point, having people help watch one’s back was a wonderful force multiplier and risk reducer.

So what if he’d stolen half the jutsu arsenal of the Seven Swordsmen of the Mist, even before getting his dad’s tantō back? So what if he was trying to reengineer the Fourth Raikage’s signature technique (and seemed to be succeeding)? So what if he had one of the highest attributable body counts in ANBU history?

As long as I had enough free time and mental processing power to contemplate it, I’d always be trying to ensure everyone’s safety.

“He’ll...be okay,” Obito rasped, while I tried to stare a hole in the nearest white wall.

Well, he didn’t quite sound like he’d gargled gravel, but it was close. “Yeah. Kakashi’s strong. He’ll be fine. I mean, you’re the one back here, right? He has to be.”

I needed to learn how to stop babbling when nervous. But the idea of Kakashi being out there without Obito, in a mission that had originally been assigned to the only other teleporter on my team, when the environment had taken the one-eyed wonder down… Well, to say I was nervous about the guy originally assigned as a backup was a serious understatement.

Obito snorted, apparently reading my mind. “C-Convince...yourself.”

I looked away, ashamed. I wished I had that much confidence in anyone.

Come back safe, Kakashi.
One week later, when Kakashi and Obito had originally been scheduled to come back to Konoha, my nerves had mostly sorted themselves out solely because I couldn’t sustain a nervous reaction for that many consecutive days. And besides the limits of human biology (which in some ways were more suggestions for me than for other people), I had a few distractions.

Aside from being stuck in quarantine and then on medical watch and then being bothered into submission by Hayate’s concern, I wasn’t able to take a mission even if I wanted to. That came down from on high, so I wasn’t going to disobey and wouldn’t have been able to unless I wanted to go AWOL.

Instead, I bought four novels and went to town.

Yeah, sounded boring. I knew that. Rin wouldn’t have killed me if I’d tried much more strenuous than glorified bedrest, but that was mostly because she was still occupied with work and Obito’s recovery. She would have sent Yamaguchi-sensei instead, and there were some things I wasn’t willing to put up with even for the sake of scratching an adventurous itch.

Aside from my attempts to kill boredom, there were a couple of other developments, too.

Hayate went on a mission, about halfway through my week of enforced downtime. An A-rank this time, which got my heart thudding away from sheer nerves even though I knew he could handle it. You know, the normal big sister jitters about that kind of thing.

“Oh come on, we’ll be fine,” Anko had said when they set off.

Since Iruka had decided to devote his time to the Academy, Sensei had removed him from the mission roster and put Anko on this team instead—not a bad choice, given what I knew of her capabilities. I had faith in them.

Didn’t make me any less nervous, though.

Still, they left and my apartment was once again empty except for me. On one hand: Hayate wasn’t leaving his dirty clothes everywhere and generating work for me. On the other: I found I didn’t have much to do after completing my chores and rewriting those seals that the decontamination process had destroyed. No training meant hanging out with Gai was a wash, and everyone else had either work or recovery to worry about instead.

Me? I had my ways of wasting time productively.

And I win with this circle. Lowest left box. Isobu sat back and radiated an aura of solid smug.

I looked down at the tic-tac-toe board I’d made on spare seal paper and subsequently lost at, then sighed as I put my brush down. Maybe next time I ought to set up a mental checkers board for him to play with?

Actually, I think we should read more of that book before you go to bed, Isobu suggested, even as he scratched another tally into the sand of my mindscape. Isobu had five wins to my two. You always have weird dreams when you worry too much instead.

Sadly, as I’d proven time and again, he not only had a point there, but a point sharp enough to stab me with. I got up from the couch and started to obediently pack up my sealing supplies. It wasn’t like the project I’d been working on was particularly time-sensitive.

I hope your friends appreciate the work you put into all these fūinjutsu gifts. If my spine wasn’t attached to my shell, doing this kind of thing all day would give me a nasty back ache. If I was making these seals in the first place, Isobu commented as I sorted out my brushes and cleaned them.

On the table, a seal-laden chain was the first stage of my contribution to Kakashi’s upcoming birthday. Once it was done, I’d probably be able to give it to him...whenever. If he was late coming back home, then my gift would magically not be late because he’d been late first. Logic!

“Well, maybe the next time I get a chance to halfway manifest you in the real world, we can work on that? I’m sure Kurama would be up for any kind of handwriting challenge now,” I said, since it wasn’t like there was anyone around to hear me talk to empty air.

With his competitive spirit? Probably, Isobu agreed. Isobu tilted his head to one side, thinking. You know, I wonder how Shukaku’s doing with that…

“Maybe we can check up on him and ask, after story time.” Okay, perhaps I shouldn’t have put it like that, but it wasn’t like I was just reading to myself with my mental voice anymore. And I was sure Isobu secretly enjoyed it about as much as I’d missed reading to Hayate when we were kids.

Isobu shrugged as best he could for a giant turtle. It’s easier than keeping you updated when you don’t visit.

Pfft. Softy. Nonetheless, I got ready for bed and got the aforementioned novel out as requested. Maybe reading would really help me get back into a normal groove for a while.

Just get started.

And so I did. It must have worked better than intended, because I ended up falling asleep with my thumb still between the pages as a bookmark.

And I knew that because I snapped awake a little while after that. From one moment to the next, I went from drowsy and content to having a head filled with screaming static and my heart doing its best to beat its way out of my chest before I even understood what the fuck was going on. It was like hitting a brick wall of chakra sense input, which had the net effect of waking me up just in time to actually deal with the problem.

The amber street lamps outside cast a dreamlike light wherever they touched, and my night vision wasn’t the best. But it didn’t take a Hyūga to feel the way the air twisted in on itself when a Kamui portal formed two feet above my bed. It barely took two functional brain cells.

“Obito, I swear to fucking god—” I began, before my brain caught up and started adding details together.

They went thus: Obito didn’t have Lightning chakra by default, he didn’t have any reason to be using Kamui this late at night, and he wasn’t the person who fell out of a fucking portal and landed on me.

For a moment, I struggled under the surprise dead weight of a horribly familiar person across my legs. I couldn’t see color but I could see the outline of ANBU armor and the way the bits that should have been gray-white were dark and felt sticky. The smell of copper hit my nose a moment later, and the warm liquid seeping into my sheets and my clothes couldn’t be anything but blood. His chakra was still there but fading fast, and his breathing sounded like something had come loose inside his lungs.
“K—” No, no, no— “Kakashi!”

At the sound of his name, Kakashi’s chakra seemed to pulse. No louder than a breath, I heard, “K...Kei...”

By the time my fingers closed around the emergency Flying Thunder God kunai under my pillow, the last spark of his chakra—

It—

Help me!

—died.

Kei: Finally get around to that feelings biopsy.

Chapter Notes

Today's chapter title is from Tangled, because I happen to rather like that song.

At the sound of his name, Kakashi’s chakra seemed to pulse. No louder than a breath, I heard, “K...Kei...”

By the time my fingers closed around the emergency Flying Thunder God kunai under my pillow, the last spark of his chakra—

It—

Help me!

—died.

I hurled the kunai blindly, hitting and puncturing the drywall.

“No, no, no,” I heard myself say, detached from everything but a sense of growing horror.

No ANBU mask, no porcelain pressed into my stomach. For half a heartbeat, I waited for him to snap up, mission discipline in place and a complaint on his lips. This—this couldn’t be happening.

It didn’t happen. Every inch of him lay slack and unresponsive. Dead weight.

A pulse, a pulse, I needed to find his pulse.

Kakashi’s white hair fanned out against my blankets as I tried to turn him over for it, but I got as far as tilting his head before I remembered I had no idea how badly he’d been hurt.

My fingers fumbled at Kakashi’s neck, feeling for a pulse even as I felt that start to slip.

No! “Don’t fucking do this to me!”

Okay, okay, he’d just used Kamui and his chakra had—guttered out, died, something. Chakra exhaustion. There was blood, yes, but the blood loss wasn’t the worst—

Sensei’s chakra popped into existence just to my left—slamming into the wall—and made me jump when I didn’t have time for that. “Kei, wha—”
I ignored Sensei. I was already sending my chakra, Water-aligned, into Kakashi’s coils. The gaping emptiness in Kakashi’s coils and the stillness was too terrifying to allow any interference.

Please, work. Please let this work.

My bed stand light flicked on, and then I could really see what had happened.

There was even more blood than I’d thought. Something long and thin had left a gaping hole through Kakashi, tearing right through as though there’d been nothing in the way. The back of the vest only showed a hole, but the size of the blood stain and his rapid decline said the opposite happened on the way out.

I was keeping Kakashi’s chakra hanging on by the thinnest of threads, Water conducting Lightning, but my world narrowed to a needle-fine point when I did. Splitting my attention, even for that—

Any other injuries were so far beyond me that they might as well have been fatal then and there.

Sensei grabbed my forearm and a fistful of Kakashi’s heavy uniform, and then we were gone.

_Fwish._

I hit cold linoleum ass-first, with Kakashi still lying on top of me because like _fuck_ I was letting go when I had his life in my hands.

His head drooped limply, but I could feel him breathing just faintly. Maybe I was fooling myself. Maybe the blood on my skin was doing it for me.

All I could do was keep channeling chakra and pray for something to change.

It was like trying to grasp air.

Sensei’s shadow vanished from above me in an instant. I could hear him shouting at someone, but the only person who mattered was dying in my arms.

_Come on, Kakashi!_

For a second, it was almost like he’d heard me. I could almost feel him take a deeper breath. His heart stuttered back to life. And his chakra seemed to pick up some of the slack in his system and flow on its own. Someone still needed to take over and actually put blood back in him, but as long as I could get him partly stabilized—

The little spark of hope died when he stopped breathing.

You’re not going to die on me—you can’t! I scrambled for anything I could _do_, even as he resumed dying under my hands. I couldn’t let go of his chakra, couldn’t touch his lungs or heart while doing it —

Let me try, Isobu said, and that sounded like a _fucking terrible_ idea except that I didn’t know what else to do.

I didn’t get a chance to think on it.

There were people, suddenly—more people than made sense—but there were hands prying at mine and Isobu’s chakra flared defensively on automatic. They didn’t _understand_. None of them understood. I couldn’t let go!
There was no way I could possibly let him go. I just couldn’t.

The world was red. Wind pulled at my hair and my eyes burned as much from tears as Tailed Beast chakra. It didn’t matter if there were people shouting and panicking. It didn’t matter if Sensei was channeling chakra pressure for all he was worth.

None of it mattered as long as I could give Kakashi the strength to live.

“KEI!”

...Kushina?

My thoughts had slowed to a crawl, but I lifted my eyes and there she was. Hair flying everywhere, chakra pressure screaming at me even as she did. I couldn’t—maybe if she could do something—

Kurama, Isobu clarified. Together, we have a chance.

Hope’s embers were still there. Maybe if I just...

Isobu’s power bent inward, allowing Kushina and Kurama through. I felt her approach more than saw it, with my focus back on Kakashi, until her red hair swept forward and engulfed us.

Through a haze of mingled panic, despair, and uncontrolled power, Kushina’s hands turned Kakashi’s head. She pried his mask down and away from his mouth, shifted so his jaw was open and pushed her arm against his pointed teeth.

Then she shoved his teeth into her forearm.

Wha—

Kushina’s chakra seeped into Kakashi’s coils, pushing Isobu and I out of the way with more care than we really deserved. Even through blurry eyes, I could see steam rising from Kakashi’s leg and back, and even a faint wisp from his hair.

And he—he was breathing. Slowly and haltingly, but it was there and the spark was back and—“Kei-chan, the medics need you to let go,” Kushina said, one hand clamped over her bite wound as the blood trickled down. There were people moving around us, but I didn’t really process them.

I stared at her like I’d never seen her before. Words didn’t form.

I was...a wreck. Hands shaking from stress and chakra overload. Eyes burning. Heart still hammering away. But I got myself together enough, in increments, to nod. Once.

When they took Kakashi away, Kushina got me to my feet. Sensei got a blanket for me and teleported all three of us to one of the less-traveled waiting rooms. And I had to put my shattered composure together again over the strongest tea I could stand.

It turned out that Sensei had teleported Kakashi and me directly to the underground ANBU medical center. Not technically the hospital, but ultimately everyone answered to Tsunade and the point was moot. Except for the security aspect. When he teleported me out, I landed in the hospital because of those same security concerns, because there wasn’t really another convenient area to wait, and because I’d flatly refused to be sent any farther away. I wasn’t considered a security hazard, exactly, but the jinchūriki light show had rattled everyone.
Once I had enough cups of tea in me and had washed my face to get rid of some of the tears and lingering redness, I was finally able to figure a few things out. Like where I was, since that little detail had slipped my mind. And the realizations after that point just kept piling up.

The blood on my pajamas had dried into a crusty mess. Besides the massive stain that seemed to take up half the pant leg above the knee—where Kakashi’s through-and-through stab wound had rested—I had smears on my shirt and on my arms. Cleaning up my pajamas would require a lot of work. And they made me deeply uncomfortable for about half a dozen reasons.

I refused to wear a hospital handout, though, so I was a tiny bit stuck until the cavalry showed up.

Why did it have to be the set with me on them? I heard Isobu ask, miffed.

Your guess is as good as mine. I rubbed my eyes again, staring into the depths of what was probably the third cup of truly abominable tea I’d downed in the past...hour? It didn’t feel like it could have been longer than that, at least.

“You probably shouldn’t drink that,” said a soft voice, as a pure-white hand covered the paper cup and slid it away from me.

My eyes tracked the Zetsu arm upward until I met Obito’s gaze for a few seconds. Then my vision started to swim again and my breathing hitched.

Warm arms wrapped around my ribs as Rin sat down next to me. From around my hunched shoulders, I heard her say, “We’re here, Kei. You can let it out.”

Obito slotted in place on my other side, helping Rin hold me together as I started to cry again. It didn’t take either of them too long to join me.

For a long time, I couldn’t find the words to describe the sheer terror I’d felt when Kakashi had appeared in my apartment. Not even in my own head. But after the fact, and in between Obito and Rin’s supporting arms, I managed to put my thoughts in order.

Kakashi had almost died. Technically, he had died, and more than once. In my arms, while I was helpless to do anything but chase the first desperate notion that crossed my mind.

That had never happened in the old timeline. Not, I thought as Pain’s invasion of Konoha flickered across my brain, this early. Not in ANBU.

Outside of the scare back when he’d picked up Yamato, the idea that Kakashi might die had been a distant thought if it crossed my mind at all. Even at Sorayama, when he’d scared me shitless by not running, there had still been a vague, half-formed idea that he was a survivor. It was his thing, when his world fell down around him over and over again. He’d just make it through by the power of sheer terrible luck, because of course he would.

Someone needed to teach Team Seven. Someone needed to confront Tobi at the end of days. Even if there wasn’t a Tobi in this timeline, the idea that I’d taken his survival for granted so callously made my blood run cold.

This wasn’t then. This was now, and now Kakashi was in the hospital after having crashed twice before even getting to surgery and scared the living daylights out of me.

I didn’t know what I’d do if I lost him.

Sometime between stringing all those thoughts together, I’d stopped crying or trembling. That was probably what prompted Obito to ask, “Feeling any better?”

Mostly, I felt washed-out and dull in between the spikes of fear. But it probably wasn’t helpful to say that aloud. In a rusty croak, I said, “Less bad, maybe.”

Obito nodded, giving my shoulder a comforting squeeze. “Then do you wanna go change? That stuff looks kinda...not comfortable at all.”

...I was still covered in blood, wasn’t I? Looking down confirmed that much. I probably looked like a murder victim.

You know you’re upset when even your terrible jokes don’t help, Isobu said gently, giving me a mental nudge. Go ahead and take care of yourself.

The nearest bathroom had a mirror. And even after getting changed, I still looked like someone who had been through hell. My eyes were red again, and not because of Isobu. I had deeper bags under them than I had in years. My mouth seemed to just turn down at the edges, and my scar stood out on my face like a still-open wound thanks to all the cold water.

And, looking like that, I walked out of the bathroom and straight into Shizune.

To be more accurate, Shizune had joined my friends with a box of tissues and yet more tea, but didn’t seem to be staying. While Rin, Obito, and I were various stages of ragged, Shizune was in full uniform and looked like she was actually going to face the day. Whenever the hell that was.

Rin kept her hands busy out of habit. Today, that meant taking a tissue and reducing it to paper scraps. But she found the wherewithal to answer me with, “It’s four in the morning.”

“Didn’t realize I said that out loud,” I admitted. This had been a uniquely godawful night. I could be forgiven for not looking at a clock.

Shizune fidgeted as she looked between us. None of us wanted to continue the conversation, though. Eventually, she had to give up or get sucked into our collective silence.

“It’s time I get going anyway,” Shizune finally admitted, defeated. She left without another word, which left me to deal with the confused tangle of emotions I’d been trying to unravel for far too long.

I sat down again and grabbed the tea that Obito had told me not to drink before.

“You okay?” Obito asked, though it didn’t sound like he expected a positive answer. Less pressure that way.

“I’m just...not dealing with things well, I think,” I admitted, like that wasn’t incredibly obvious. “I...I haven’t been scared like that for a long time.”

“I get the feeling you’re not just talking about...” Obito waved a hand as though trying to find a word and failing. He gave up and tried instead, “Sensei didn’t tell us much, but it sounded pretty bad. And I didn’t tell him how I woke up, but I get the gist.”

I blinked at him, not quite making the connection for an embarrassingly long time. “Oh, the double vision thing? I...um, I’m not sure if I should apologize or, uh, if there’s nothing...”

“Kei, I woke up because the last thing Kakashi saw was you,” Obito said, and there wasn’t much I could say to that. “It was just a second, but that’s the most scared I’ve ever seen you.”

I drew my knees up to my chest. “I don’t know what I’d do if I lost him.”

Rin tucked the blanket more thoroughly around my shoulders. “You won’t lose him. We have the best medics on the continent.”

I tried to focus on that. Kakashi was in surgery, yes, but Kushina had stabilized him where I failed, hadn’t she? He had to be okay.

But Tsunade hadn’t been able to save Dan. That thought was fucking terrifying.

“If—if I could have traded…” I shook my head. No. Not a good place to go. “He didn’t—he’s never used Kamui on himself, has he?”

“Not until this time,” Obito confirmed. “I didn’t really think he could, given everything else.”

I put my hands over my face. “Of all the—if he figured out how to do it now, why did he come to me? I’m—I’m not a medical ninja anymore and I couldn’t have—”

I couldn’t have saved him myself.

But it didn’t matter. Just like when Kakashi had been in trouble, my world had narrowed down to just us. When he’d been faced with the choice of dying alone or burning chakra and dying with me...there hadn’t been a choice at all.

That fucking asshole.

And with perfect timing, I was crying again. Indecisive angry crying, but crying nonetheless. “H-He was going to—to pull that stupid cliché on me!”

I got a solid ten seconds of baffled silence from Obito and Rin. Rin spoke up first, and got as far as, “Kei, what are you talking about?” before I made a noise like a particularly angry tea kettle.

“It’s a—okay, y-you know how we both read romance n-novels?” I managed, after trying and failing to force my voice back under control. I took another deep breath as the two of them nodded, and went on, “The love interest dying in the hero’s arms after confessing is a tragic ending.” I clenched my fists. “It’s not even good writing! It’s cheap and it comes out of nowhere and it scared the shit out of me.”

“...What?” asked Rin.

“He’s in love with me and he never fucking told me!” I screeched, then put my hands over my face again as I tried to avoid melting on the spot from retroactive mortification. “The bet and the thing with Shizune and everything and no one told me jack shit!”

“Oh,” said Obito.

I rounded on him instantly with, “How long did you know?”

Obito did not say anything, because I was probably not in the best mood. Explosions were a consequence of being anywhere near me, but this type was new and foreign to him.

Rin raised her hand, meek as a mouse. I tried not to explode, even if it was about a minute too late, and gestured for her to say her piece. “Um, Tanabata?”

Ohhhhh no. Oh no. No.
“Which,” I said, and it was not really a question. I knew which one. Oh my fucking god.

“Five years ago,” Rin confirmed, in a voice not much more than a squeak.

Oh my fucking god, I thought again, uselessly.

“If it’s not a bad time…?” Obito piped up, but more cautiously than I’d ever heard from him. Recently. “I’ve known since like...uh, before that.”

Probably a lot before that. I pinched the bridge of my nose. “I don’t even want to know.”

“It was the shuriken thing,” Obito blurted, because of course he did.

That early, hm?

Oh, don’t tell me you knew.

I’ve known since he let me hit him with a full tail’s worth of chakra just to save you.

Which was almost two and a half years ago. There were things that lived under literal rocks that were less oblivious than I was.

I could have screamed.

What did he say, before? Three times, even if I hadn’t been in any state to appreciate the ideas at the time. At any of the times. “No matter what you think, I’m glad you exist. Not your prophecies. Not your power. Just you.”

I sat down hard, once again between Obito and Rin. Reflectively, I clasped my hands together and tried to think through it all. “Is...is it weird that between wanting to strangle him for that kind of risk with Kamui and also being really embarrassed at myself, I don’t really know how I feel?"

“I think it’s pretty normal to be confused after a night like this one,” Rin offered, leaning against me. “No—well, yes, but...” I shook my head, as though that would chase the interfering thoughts away. No such luck, of course. Especially not once another occurred to me. “Obito, Rin, do you...how do you know if you’re in love or not?”

I was nearly certain the two of them were making panicky faces at each other behind my back. But I didn’t look. No need to see their deer-in-headlights impressions.

I sighed. “No, you know what? I’ll deal with that.” I had no idea how to approach this when I knew Obito and Rin were basically as good together as Sensei and Kushina. I was still fumbling around, trying to sort things out. “Who did you two bet on? Me or Kakashi?”

“You say that like it’s a better question,” Obito said, with just a bit of grumbling. When I nudged him, he admitted, “I was actually betting Kakashi would confess before you figured it out. I mean, it’s been years.”

I sank into my chair, shamefaced. It would probably have been easier on Kakashi if he had been in love with Shizune. That kind of obliviousness wouldn’t have happened with her.

“I had faith in you!” Rin assured me, while I rubbed grit out of my eyes. But she hesitated before saying, “But maybe not for a while? I knew you’d figure it out...”

I really was that bad, wasn’t I?
At least I didn’t get too long to stew on that problem. In fact, I was distracted in fairly short order by the arrival of four familiar faces.

“We’re finally back,” Kushina said, carrying a sleepy-looking Tatsumaki in her arms.

The head of the Uzumaki clan looked more awake than I would have expected for well before sunrise, and like she’d actually seen the inside of a shower. Her left arm was bandages, but the linen was clean and I imagined that she’d healed up pretty quickly after donating even that much chakra to keep Kakashi alive. Generally speaking, she probably looked the most put-together out of all of us.

Tatsumaki, meanwhile, looked like she had been roused from bed and resented the rest of the universe for it in between wide, gap-toothed yawns.

Naruto clung to Sensei’s back, with his legs around his waist and his arms wrapped around his father’s neck. The older of the two Namikaze kids didn’t look terribly awake either, but it was a sort of content drowsiness rather than Tatsumaki’s grumpy face.

“I left another clone in the office,” Sensei said to my unasked question, since I always had to ask something. “We can all wait here together.”

With that, Sensei and Kushina joined us in what was quickly becoming not just a waiting room, but occupied territory held by Team Minato and associates. Pretty much everyone else who came by would probably feel too out of place to stick around for long. Even the medics, assuming they didn’t have actual business with us.

When they sat down, Sensei and Kushina slowly ended up swapping kids. Not on purpose on their parts, but Tatsumaki sort of oozed onto Sensei’s lap while Naruto climbed his dad like a jungle gym until he ended up on Kushina instead without disturbing his sister. After that point, both kids settled down for a very early morning nap.

“It’s been a long morning, hasn’t it?” Sensei murmured, rubbing his eyes with the hand that wasn’t being used as Tatsumaki’s pillow.

“You can say that again,” Obito said, and then yawned widely. And after that he pinched his left wrist and twisted the human skin experimentally before saying, “Oh man, there isn’t enough tea in the world to help right now. And since pain isn’t really working either, I need to get up and do something before I fall asleep.” He got to his feet, stretching as he went. “Can I get anyone anything?”

Rin’s fingers twisted the tissue in her lap and she bit her lip like she had second thoughts about it, but she said, “If...if you could find a bakery that’s open, I think we all need some food. If we’re going to be awake for much longer.”

I doubted that Rin was really all that hungry—I sure wasn’t—but I eyed Obito’s nervous bouncing in place and decided to second that idea. “If you can find melonpan, that’d be great.”

“Oh, okay,” Obito said. “Sensei, Kushina-san?”

“I’m fine, I think,” Sensei replied.

Kushina held up three fingers and said, “If you can find anyone selling anpan, I’ll pay you back.”

“And if I can’t?” Obito teased.

Kushina shrugged. “It’s too early to think up revenge schemes for anyone but the ones who hurt
Kakashi.”

Valid point. I hadn’t even started on that.

Obito was gone in a burst of Body Flicker speed, and Rin got to her feet just afterward. “I’ll be right back. I just need something to fidget with that isn’t, well, the tissue box. I’ll clean that up when I get back.”

There was a small pile of shredded tissues that attested to her accuracy. Any more and she would have made a perfect nest for a hamster.

And then Rin was gone, too. Most likely to retrieve a shell bracelet from her locker, or her usual one with large black beads.

I spared a glance for my long-neglected tea, then sighed again. I drew one knee up to my chest and hugged it, letting the other leg dangle.

“Asking if you’re okay seems...off,” Kushina said after the silence must have gotten oppressive. She drew my attention away from my aimless staring at the other wall, at least. “But do you want to talk at all about...anything? Just to get it off your chest?”

...Not with her. Not really. I’d gotten the screaming out my system earlier, but the thinking part seemed better done quietly for once.

And besides, Sensei felt really uncomfortable. Maybe he had some idea of what I was thinking about?

Oh, he’s more observant than you are, Isobu commented, when my thought process stalled out for a moment. Remember that the betting pool regarding your teammate was run out of his office. And you were shouting at the top of your lungs not long ago.

Well, that was a nice cherry on top of the mortifying sundae. If there was any time in my life where the phrase “epic fail” was apt, that...situation was definitely something that qualified for the label a few times over.

I rested my cheek against the top of my knee. I was avoiding the subject, like I did with everything that made me question my behavior. Or thought processes. Hiding was a job skill for me, but hiding from myself? From the truth? To live in a blissful little lie where nothing ever changed?

No.

I would face this...thisness head on until I had a name and a face for all of it. Until it was in the light.

You’re off to a great start there.

Not helping.

I closed my eyes. I took a deep breath. And once I had that breath, I asked myself: Do I love him?

N...not sure if I could answer that.

I put that thought aside for a moment, just so I could come back to it later. There was time for it.

First, then: Did I think Kakashi was attractive?
I felt my face start to heat up just from that question alone, which was probably a sign of something. That part, at least, was a definite yes. I’d managed to avoid letting that little fact distract me whenever I saw his face, but the physical attraction was definitely there. It would have been inaccurate to say my feelings stemmed solely from looks of all things, but they were undeniably a part of the mix.

This was the bad side of avoidance. Of denial. I was….really good at both of those. To the point that I was scaring myself.

Well, no more.

I braced myself and put it into words. Kakashi is hot, and I’ve been avoiding thinking about him that way.

....Okay, that was one truth out of the way. Good grief, I was going to need to go over that perception filter with a chisel just to figure out where the fuck it began and ended.

I could help.

Oh no, you don’t.

I want to use a chisel, Isobu griped.

Not. Helping. At this rate I’d be able to cook an egg on my forehead. Definitely one per cheekbone. Okay, nope, no longer thinking this angle through. I can do it later. I know there’s a thing there and augh don’t even think the word—

I thought your human cycles were stopped. So there wouldn’t really be—

SHUT. UP.

Forget the eggs. I’d be able to bake a goddamn cake with the heat I was giving off.

“Kei-chan?” Kushina asked. “Your face is...very red.”

“’m fine,” I mumbled, but I still felt like I was running a fever or something. Oh man. Why did I have to process these things with people around me?

I could have used some privacy so I could scream my head off in relative peace.

Except for me, Isobu said, because of course he did.

If I had owned a large enough pair of hands and Isobu had been corporeal, I might have strangled him. A little.

I had to take a moment to count backwards from ten just so I could move on. Trying to melt away into the floor wasn’t helping—and it wasn’t like I was a Hōzuki and could do it manually, anyway. I just had to press on and plumb the depths of my feelings. And then put them under the microscope.

I’d avoided everything for far too long, and I owed Kakashi an answer. I rather thought I owed myself an answer first, though.

Okay, the second part. The less-awkward part. The improved sequel question.

And I didn’t have a good phrase for it. Emotional connection? Romantic attraction? It was there nonetheless, but I needed to figure out what it was more than I needed a snappy phrase for it, I supposed.

I was...I was happier when he was with me. We’d been on dates before—though damned if I’d known that at the time—and we’d had fun at all of them. Sure, life sometimes interrupted, but I wouldn’t have traded that time away. If it hadn’t been for the chaos this morning, I would have gone out with him again and enjoyed it just because he was back and we could laugh and discuss books and spend time with each other again.

We’d obviously never kissed one another on those excursions—even I wasn’t inobservant enough to miss that—but hand-holding? Hugs? Yeah, we’d done that and even now, my fingers itched to find his again as much from a sort of cautious joy as from the lingering fear of this morning.

Except I...I had kissed him, hadn’t I? Years ago and on the cheek in an attempt to cheer him up after that hell butterfly mission, but that counted. And...I wouldn’t mind if he...

I touched my fingers to my lips, blinking as I straightened in my seat. Yep, that thought was just thoughted. Oh my.

I’m in deeper than I thought.

“Are you sure you don’t want to talk?” Kushina asked again.

“Um,” I managed. Then I swallowed and said in a very tiny voice, “Maybe later?”

“Okay,” Kushina said, but her expression said that there would definitely be a “later.”

Next to her, Sensei had fallen asleep with his head on her shoulder, and the kids were equally dead to the world. Small mercies. Kushina...well, aside from the fact that she could see my face, Kushina was a sensor. Whatever flashes of emotion were reflected in my chakra, she could feel them.

And yet, the idea of just leaving offended me on a visceral level. I needed to be here, not to run and hide whenever things got difficult. Or embarrassing. I just needed to keep working at this until I understood it.

And what I understood thus far...well. I could look at that first question again, now.

Did I love Kakashi?

I...I was willing to put the tentative “yes” down as an answer. I needed to talk to him first, clear up a few things, before I could think of doing anything with my feelings. I needed to be able to see where he was coming from and clear up the remaining misunderstandings.

No chance, no way, I won’t say it—

I literally just said I would! I couldn’t really shout appreciably inside my head, but I could try when Isobu pissed me off. Stop playing that song! I get it already!

Isobu laughed. His tails curled up and around in the air, like lazy S-shapes to show he was content. Well done, then.

So I hugged the trolling bastard. Sure, I was tiny compared to his head and my mental avatar was certainly not winning any prizes in arm span, but I’m sure his forehead spikes got the message. Thanks for putting up with all of this.

It was the most fun I’d had in quite some time.
...I am really close to retracting that “thank you,” just so you know. But I won’t. Because I’m a nice person.

Isobu just laughed again. Never change, Kei. I’m proud of you for facing yourself again.

But I haven’t even gotten to Kakashi yet...

You will.

I didn’t go home until the medical experts on hand finally gave the news to Sensei: Kakashi would be okay. I missed most of the details by virtue of falling asleep once my stress levels and adrenaline supply both crashed, but Kushina was quite definite about that once I got around to asking her.

It was just that he wasn’t expected to wake up for a while, so sitting around in the hospital wasn’t doing much good. And, love or not, there were things I needed to accomplish before I could so much as sleep in my own bed again.

Which was why I had every door and window in my house open as I cleaned my room. Bleach was a bane on every sense capable of acknowledging its existence, but I had to get the blood out of...well, everything. And that meant both bleach and maybe an assorted mess of other cleaning products, where and when I could get them to work.

The bloodstains did come out, somewhat. Not particularly well, but they faded and ended up being more of a really eerie, suspicious brown after my best attempts to purge them. Or purge the memory attached to them.

At least the mattress and was okay. Not a drop, bizarrely enough. And I managed to save my pajamas, but the bedding was a lost cause.

I ended up dragging my bloodstained sheets and the comforter into a giant pair of trash bags. Then I sealed them into a strip of sealing paper that I’d otherwise screwed up on twice and made mostly unusable.

Then I took them to the dump and set the bad memory on fire. I stayed there until the last curls of ashen paper disintegrated into nothing more than smoke. I scuffed the rest of it into the dirt with my sandals so I’d never have to think about it again.

Then I went home to pile fresh linens on and figure out how to get rid of the smell.

In the end, I more or less turned my apartment upside-down again. I cleaned everything that could be cleaned, not just in my bedroom. I patched the hole in the wall with spackle—or tried to—and dusted everything that had a flat surface. I dug out kunai to sharpen, redrew security seals that seemed faded, and otherwise burned daylight while waiting for news.

I also found the dog bone I’d won from Kakashi’s dogs’ bet, and felt bad for a bit until I decided that Bull would probably just be glad to get it back. Aside from Pakkun and his shampoo preferences, none of the dogs were all that picky.

I was roused from my somewhat meditative cleaning spree by A) running out of things to do other than make tea and settle the hell down and B) a person knocking curiously on my open door.

“Gekkō-san?” said a somewhat strangled voice. I’d gone nose-blind to the smell of bleach and other cleaners, but it was possible that it was still an assault on the senses to unsuspecting passersby. Of whom Itachi was but one example.
“Be there in a moment, Itachi-kun,” I said, getting up from the kitchen table and making my way to the front hall. I probably looked quite alien in all my cleaning gear, but it wasn’t like I was going to be that put together after a morning like I’d had.

Itachi stood a little outside my door, holding a rather familiar plate. ...Point of fact, I’d basically forgotten I’d loaned the Uchiha family anything. Getting it back with a bakery’s worth of sweets on top had not even crossed my mind.

He bowed just the slightest bit and presented it to me with a painstakingly polite, “My mother asks you to take these, with our compliments. I hope you enjoy them.”

“Uh, thanks,” I said, wrong-footed. I accepted the plate more out of reflex than anything and noted that about half of it seemed to have come from that one bakery in the Uchiha district that I’d forgotten the name of. “Itachi-kun, I didn’t give you mochi so you’d owes me one.”

“My mother insisted,” Itachi said. His eyes flicked to the side uneasily for just a moment, then he said in a quieter voice, “And I owe you this much for helping me with...that.”

For just a second, my breath seemed to freeze in my lungs. ANBU.

“Did it work out?”

“Yes. I’ll be working on my Academy credentials in a few years if all goes well,” Itachi confirmed. His eyes darted downward and he added, “I might even be there before Sasuke graduates.”

I debated for a moment whether I dared, but I ended up patting his shoulder with my free hand anyway. “Then I’m glad you’re okay with this. And hey, I can take these with less guilt now.”

Itachi’s lips quirked. “Yes. Again, thank you.”

As he took off, I waved goodbye even if he couldn’t see it.

It was nice to know I could make some kind of difference in people’s lives without having to punch other people. Kushina must have gotten through to Mikoto, who then talked to Fugaku somehow, and he in turn would have been able to persuade the clan once his doubts were cleared. Made things a bit awkward if Kushina had bull-rushed everyone, but ultimately Itachi’s happiness was the important bit.

The biggest problem I had to work on, now, was what to do with more sweets than I could eat.

In the end, I ended up dropping half of them off at the Koizumi household for my future students as well as their somewhat extended family to enjoy once they had time. The rest? That came with me as I trekked back to the hospital with Bull’s bone and a few apples in tow, so the medical staff could enjoy something sugar-laden before they got back to work.

And then, more waiting.

I was mostly left alone through the afternoon and into the evening. I ate one of the apples as a light dinner rather than leaving, and thus I was probably the first person outside of those involved who noticed Kakashi’s chakra finally reappearing in the hospital proper as they moved him out of the ANBU wing.

When a medic finally stopped by to let me know he could take visitors, I went.

Time ticked on by.
Sitting by Kakashi’s bedside, amidst the monitors and IV bags and wires, gave me more than enough time to think late into the night. He didn’t need an oxygen mask, so the medics had deferred to his noted preferences and given him a surgical mask because he probably wouldn’t have been happy otherwise. Aside from being even paler than usual and the medical patch over his eye to remind him not to fucking use it, I could almost imagine that he was just sleeping. Like this morning hadn’t happened.

I whiled the time away playing games with Isobu inside my head, or wrestling with the realizations
I’d gone through earlier as my turtle friend laughed at me. I also had the same novel from last night because neither Isobu nor I were finished with it, and bedtime stories were apparently still a thing.
Even so, I...wasn’t in the best state for concentrating, so we gave up after the third attempt.

He’s taking far too much time, Isobu complained, even though he’d just won our most recent game of Battleship in less than twenty moves. Sharing headspace meant that keeping the position of my imaginary plastic boats safe from his gaze was kind of a losing prospect.

You can’t rush recovery, I told him. Not that either of us really knew what all that Tailed Beast chakra from before would have really done. Without Kushina’s intervention, though, I doubted it would have been enough.

Or it could have made things worse.

My stomach twisted into a Gordian knot. The last thing I needed to worry about was the idea my attempts to help could have killed Kakashi, and yet there it was.

Almost without thinking, I reached out and gently took his hand in mine. It stilled the trembling that had almost started, and it gave me a chance to just focus on something small until my brain calmed down a bit.

Kakashi’s hands were larger than mine. It was probably obvious, but it felt like something I’d never really put actual thought into before. Where Lightning and other nature transformations had left faint, smooth scars on his fingers, mine had slightly raised lines and calluses from blade-work. His nails were a little ragged from weeks in the field, where mine were just bitten down from nerves.

But his hand was warm, and that was so much better than the cold I’d been so afraid of that I almost didn’t have words.

Then Kakashi’s fingers twitched and tightened on mine. As I watched, his visible eyelashes fluttered until his eye finally focused in the darkened room. He shifted his weight, clearly trying to take stock of how many limbs he still had, or maybe try to get up. The latter idea was one I very much did not approve of, even if he hadn’t made a habit of thumb-pushups while an IV was still in his damned arm on previous hospital stays.

Kakashi seemed to let the room sort itself out, closing his eye again with a faint sigh. His hand relaxed, but he didn’t pull away or do much else. Belatedly, I realized that I was sitting on his left, and since he couldn’t open his Sharingan and was probably drugged to the gills, he wasn’t connecting enough mental dots to notice that I was there.

I ran my thumb over his knuckles, more to test that he could feel me than anything. He stirred again, his grip tightening on my hand again.

“Wha...?” was about as close as he got to forming a full word. He was clearly in no real state to hold a long conversation.
“Hi,” I said, and was struck immediately how deeply inadequate the word was. It utterly failed to encompass the terror of this morning or the relief when I’d finally heard that Kakashi would recover. It couldn’t communicate any of the internal turmoil—both self-inflicted and not—that had characterized the dead space in the middle of those two endpoints.

Awkward silence ensued. Kakashi didn’t seem to know what to say next, and I was out of words anyway.

I let go of his hand and moved to his right around the end of the bed, so he could finally see me without straining. I saw his mouth move under the mask, but words didn’t come.

“I—” I blinked rapidly, trying to get my traitorous eyes to stop watering as I sat down on his other side. I didn’t take the chair with me, but the other end of his bed had enough space. “I-I’m glad you’re okay.”

“...Yeah,” Kakashi managed to say, sinking back into his pillows. I was hard to tell if that was because he was exhausted or because he remembered the last thing he’d consciously done with me around. I couldn’t extrapolate from a single word.

“Hey,” I murmured, taking his right hand in mine this time.

Riveting.

Shut up, please.

Tell him about me, Isobu demanded.

“Isobu says he was worried about you, too,” I said, with Isobu continuing to prod at the back of my mind. But I couldn’t deny that it was a serious turnaround from the complete mess that had been their original “working” relationship. Isobu had spent such a long time denying that Kakashi even had a name that I felt like the moment deserved some kind of...celebration.

Don’t push it.

“Ah,” Kakashi mumbled in acknowledgement. “D...didn’t expect that.”

“You did fall out of a portal on top of me and nearly die,” I reminded him, with just a touch of reproach. If there was a ruder awakening possible aside from attempted murder, I couldn’t picture it. “I think it was the shock that did it.”

“...Did what?”

“Isobu likes you now because we nearly lost you,” I tried again, my gaze dropping toward his hand in mine again. Luckily, it was dark and he couldn’t see the color rising to my face. At some point, I would be able to force my thoughts into order and actually deal with this...thing between us.

Maybe when he was capable of stringing thoughts together, too.

Kakashi considered the logic—or lack of it—between the two facts. Thanks to the painkillers, he didn’t apparently get that far before just sighing and saying, “Thank him, then…”

Speaking of thanks… I retrieved Bull’s bone from one of my many pockets and set it on the bed, within reach if Kakashi wanted to either grab it or summon a dog to do so. “I have this, from the bet I won earlier. Bull will want it back.”
“Okay,” Kakashi sighed. His eye had closed again.

“I’ll let the nurses know you’re awake so they can check on you,” I said, squeezing his hand again. “And we can talk in the morning, okay?”

Kakashi made a vague noise and his fingers tightened around mine for a moment. Then, so quiet that I almost didn’t hear it, “...Wait.”

I froze in place, halfway off the bed with my hand still around his simply because I was reluctant to let go. Without any further prompt, I sat back down and leaned over so he could speak without trying to raise his voice too much. “What is it?”

“Stay, please?” Kakashi asked, opening his eye again. “I...I can still sleep...if you’re here...”

I’d always been a sucker for puppy-dog eyes. Still, I asked, “You sure?”

He nodded. While he couldn’t move that much, he tugged at our twined hands and seemed to mean that he could move his arm without trouble. Or at least that I could, and he wouldn’t mind. “...There’s room.”

Couldn’t argue with that after a night like I’d had. Or a morning. I badly needed actual sleep, and not just copious amounts of caffeine placeholders.

I scooted closer, moving Kakashi’s arm mostly out of the way so I could clear a space for myself, even lying on my side. After a bit of contorting, this put me more or less buried in his side, with my ear just above his shoulder and his arm across his stomach. Not the most comfortable position in the world, but as far as I was concerned, it was a power nap and I’d be up in a few minutes to let the nurses know what was happening.

“Y’know,” I said somewhat drowsily, as I started to drift, “this’ll be the end of that pool.”

Kakashi shifted and I felt his heart thud even harder against his ribs. He spent a solid ten seconds trying to process that, before dropping his head so his cheek rested on the crown of my head. I heard a faintly exasperated, “...What?”

Heh. “Good night,” I told him, leaning into him.

And just softly, hardly louder than his slow breathing, I heard him say, “...Love you, too.”

Chapter End Notes

The betting pool will resemble a kicked-over anthill come tomorrow morning.

Also, there may be a hiatus starting after this chapter, depending on how things work out. If I don't have something out by end of the second week of October, it ain't coming until the week of Halloween at the earliest. I'm gonna be out of town and having non-writing fun on an epic vacation. :p
Chapter Summary

Kei: Break personal blush record.

Chapter Notes

Beta: There is all kinds of relationship awkwardness, but your health class would get a MUCH higher rating than what is included in this fic. A semi-health class type discussion happens, but nothing informative is explained. The focus is on the characters, not their discussion.

Additionally, I am aroace and both romance and sex repulsed, and I pretty much react like a little kid who goes “Eew” when people kiss. I have a rather low tolerance for that kind of content, and as Beta I am the filter for this fic, which means nothing gets written or included that I am not comfortable beta reading. So, there shouldn’t be anything to worry about content wise, barring differences in personal preferences and comfort levels with the topic.

We also will not be writing anything Lang is not comfortable writing for whatever her reasons are.

Additionally, please do not ask if we will be including X, Y, or Z. It will either count as asking for spoilers and/or is something we will not be including for reasons above.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Kakashi

At first, all I can feel is cozy warmth. The sensation cradles me as I float in gentle darkness, free and content. No pain or fear follow me to this space, and yet… Something isn’t quite right. The void isn’t a perfect one.

I can’t float freely. Something solid and quietly stirring presses against my side, pulling me back down to earth. A lifeline, pulling me toward shore again.

I open my eyes. Or just the one—Obito’s eye is firmly shut, and covered to keep me from changing that.

The world swims for a moment, but I blink again and it clears up somewhat. I’m…in the hospital? The green walls are familiar, but I don’t understand how I got here. I try to move my head or shift my weight—

I hit a solid wall of ow.

I had a crick in my neck, but now it’s joined by a whole-body ache that runs down to my bones. It feels like I’ve spent the entire day sparring full-strength with Gai, with aching fatigue punctuated by sharp pain in my stomach and both legs. If I’d been run over by an oxcart, it probably would have explained things.

I try not to move much until I feel less like I’m on fire. As I wait, I wonder, What happened yesterday?

I...I was fighting, and I remember two men. Or three? My memory is there, but it’s almost like it’s behind a glass pane that’s been sanded opaque. I can only visualize indistinct shapes, with the occasional flash of detail that vanishes a moment later.

After that, though? It’s a vague mess. I think I can remember something, in the dark. It was...ink and stress and mochi? Kei. Kei was there. I know her scent as well as anyone’s, and the memory cuts through my mental fog just as I’m about to give up. She showed up, even though I could hardly see her, and she...said something about a pool? Something about wrecking that damned betting pool on me and on her.

Must have been my frustration getting the best of my subconscious. Wishful thinking, maybe.

I made vague plans in the past to tell her how I felt, when I got back. The specifics are gone now, but so is most of last night except for fragments of that taunting dream.

Someday, I’ll learn not to get dragged into those. Even if the idea of reciprocity—of actually getting the words and having them accepted—is tantalizing, it’s a fantasy. She wouldn’t hear me. I keep getting so close, but can’t get the words out. Barely can even when I’m dreaming.

Maybe I’m in that dead zone between too many drugs to think properly and not enough to not be in pain.

I test my limits by taking the deepest breath I can. Something pulls, down around my stomach, and my vision goes black for a moment.

N...Not doing that again. Ow.

The solid weight at my side bumps up against my cheek, drawing my attention back to it. Feels like...hair? I can’t move much to see what’s going on. But there’s still smell. Antiseptic and cleaners always dominate in hospitals, but...it’s not overpowering everything. I can get something even past the scratchy sterile mask on my face. I sniff as deeply as I can without triggering any pain.

Wh— I blink, stupefied, as the creeping realization finally finishes the windup and hits me.

Ink. Mochi. Right on top of me. All around the room. It was half the reason I even thought about that dream.

Suddenly, the weight pressed into my side is a lot more important. And on cue, the entire hospital cot shifts on its wheels as the extra person wakes up and starts to stretch. As Kei sits up, deepening the impression in the mattress and pulling me toward her—

I let out a sudden hiss of pain, and Kei jumps as though scalded. Distantly, I hear her hit the floor, but my body is too busy making me pay for moving—for being moved—for me to do much. I take careful breaths, hands flexing against the pain by digging into the sheets instead.

It’s all too long before I can focus again.

By the time I can, Kei’s face is hovering above mine, pale with worry. “Kakashi, are you with me?”
I manage a grunt of assent, letting my head drop back against the flat hospital pillow. Under my mask, I lick my cracked lips and croak, “I’m...I’m here. Okay.”

I sounded worse in my dream, I think. And I’m not so sure it was a dream anymore.

“Good.” Kei looks up, eyeing the IV bag on my blind side. I can feel the line in my left arm. “Where the hell is the replacement bag? Look, lemme get a new one…”

Another sliver of understanding slips through. She’s been here long enough for the bag to run down entirely? More evidence that the fragmented conversation from last night had actually happened.

If I could raise my hands to my face, I would be pinching the bridge of my nose with all the force I could stand. It’s so impossibly frustrating, and yet still quintessentially Kei. She didn’t hear me. Last night happened, and nothing changed. This morning happened and it’s all the same.

One step forward, two steps back.

“Hey,” Kei interrupts, her eyes locked on mine. Framed by her usual epic bedhead, her brows are furrowed and her dark eyes impossibly deep. There’s something... “As soon as you’re not in pain every time you move, we can talk.”

“How?” I ask her roughly, with my throat still a gravel-ridden mess. Did I fall asleep with my mouth open?

Kei pauses, pursing her lips as she thinks. Then she just shakes her head and says, “Why you ended up in my bed last night, maybe?”

I feel my face start to burn. I didn’t—wait. I can remember using Kamui and...seeing Kei, but that had been in her bed? All I’d known was that she was safe and real and I knew I needed both. The “where” didn’t come into it, from what I remember.

I just needed to see her again.

Still, that can’t go unanswered. I clear my throat and ask, “Is it the same reason you’re in mine?”

Kei blushes crimson, averting her eyes for a moment. It takes her a while to just say, “Um.”

That’s different. I blink heavily at her, waiting for some kind of response that gives me something more to work with. When none comes, I hesitate before asking, “Is that a yes?”

Hell, I don’t even know what I was thinking. This is turning into an ANBU briefing when agents have different security clearances.

Kei sighs, pressing her fingertips against the bridge of her nose for a moment. Whatever curse she uses is muffled by her hands, and then she says, half to herself, “I knew you weren’t awake enough for that.”

“For what?” I ask, though hope flutters in my chest. She can’t possibly be talking about…? I swallow hard and decide to just get it over with. “I was awake enough. And I meant what I said.”

Kei freezes in place for a heartbeat, then two. Her hands fall away from her face. And then she smiles at me.

Kei’s smiles aren’t usually just what the word brings to mind. There’s almost always a twist of something else, whether it’s wistfulness, or sorrow, or half-a-dozen other things. The few times I’ve seen her lay her happiness out for the world to see, like all her secrets don’t matter, are moments I treasure.

This smile is more of a flustered mess, hidden almost immediately by her hand. “S-Sorry, I just—I’ll get the nurse and be right b-back.”

She scurries away, and I sigh as deep as I dare.

_Dammit, why am I so terrible at this? _No amount of novel-reading can prepare me for these moments, when the characters there had it so easy.

Still, I resolve to talk to Kei as soon as I can. That conversation we had is painful enough, even just a moment after. We have to sort this out.

---

_Kei_

I was a fucking _coward_.

Though I did make it to the nurses’ station to talk to someone about the mysteriously-unchanged IV bag, I didn’t follow it back to Kakashi’s room. No, instead I trekked back to the floor’s bathroom and stuck my head under the faucet. This was less due to any need for a shower than the fact that I was in dire need of a wakeup call and was thoroughly sick of tea. Maybe if I’d had coffee in the room instead, I wouldn’t have run off the second Kakashi threw my smart remark back in my face. Or maybe I would have been struck just as dumb and done the same thing anyway. I couldn’t be sure.

I picked dream sand out of the corners of my eyes, then looked in the bathroom mirror. Between the water stains on the glass, I could see my ragged-looking reflection and had to heave a sigh. I looked genuinely rough around the edges, but I knew for a fact that I’d been in worse shape just yesterday—back when I’d been biting my nails to the quick over whether Kakashi would be alive in the morning.

Didn’t really take the edge off my nerves, but it was at least a valid observation.

I considered my reflection for a moment longer, then dunked my head under the cold tap again. Once I was sure there was no way my face could still be red, I shut off the water and shoved my bangs back out of my face.

...Well, “wet dog” was at least _different_. I finger-combed my hair into some kind of order and found a towel to solve at least part of the problem with my new look, but anything past that was for another time.

Still, dripping water followed me on my way back to Kakashi. My motions were best described as a bit of a slink, given that I had no intention of speaking to anyone else and getting sidetracked before I finally got the talk I—we—needed.

When I approached the door to his room, I heard a nurse say, “—you were cute together!” before he left to go about his duties. He missed me completely because he turned back to make that little quip, allowing me to sneak into the room undetected.

I felt accomplished for about two seconds. Then I remembered stealth skills were a basic part of the shinobi package and let the good feeling die. To the room at large, I announced, “I’m back.”

Kakashi looked up from examining Bull’s bone, turning it slowly over in his hands. He let it drop into his lap and get lost among the blanket folds.
Kakashi was sitting up in bed, though only through the assistance of a small mountain of pillows. He seemed more alert than before, his eye actually tracking as I headed for his right. The medics hadn’t stuck him in a neck brace, so I supposed that he’d just been stiff before. Or rather, I hoped so and hadn’t seen much evidence to the contrary.

I licked my lips. Think, dammit! “Um…”

A brilliant start. I should have written Sensei’s speeches.

“If,” Kakashi began hesitantly, after waiting for me to come up with anything else to say. “If you need to sit in one of the chairs, or….”

That was the easy way out. Putting distance between us.

Instead, I sat down at the foot of his bed, crossing my legs into a meditative pose and fidgeting with my hands for entirely too long. What could I even say?

“Kei,” Kakashi tried again, but it didn’t go anywhere.

We were the definition of “twice shy.” What a pair we were. “Well…this is awkward.”

Kakashi nodded, his eye downcast.

This is like watching the world’s saddest hedgehogs.

Not helping.

Isobu rolled his eye. Neither of you are. I can’t make it worse.

Then, “What actually happened last night?” As I blinked at him, Kakashi went on quietly, “I don’t remember much.”

It was as good a way to start as any, I supposed. “What do you remember? I can help fill in the parts you missed.”

Kakashi closed his eye as he thought. Then, as though trying to dig through layers and layers of debris in his mind, “I remember fighting members of Shinjitsu.” Given that he’d just spoken to a nurse, I imagined he was reconstructing his day piece by piece. After a moment, his hands flexed again, with one of them over the former gut-shot that had nearly killed him. “I was injured. Badly.”

That was…pretty characteristic of Kakashi, really. Downplaying his injuries. Then again, I didn’t need to relive that and neither did he.

“And you came to me,” I said, folding my hands in my lap. “I…I didn’t understand why you would for the longest time. I couldn’t help you—Kushina saved your life in the end. I kept thinking you’d have picked someone who would have been able to do something, but that wasn’t the point.”

“…No.” Kakashi took the deepest breath he could, then said, “I don’t know what I was thinking, but I can guess.”

“Was it because,” I began, over the butterfly swarm taking up residence in my stomach. It didn’t work so well, so I had to try again. “Was it because…?”

Swing and a miss, again.

But Kakashi understood perfectly well what I couldn’t put into words. “Yes.”
If his chakra hadn’t been going haywire in a nearly literal sense, I would never have guessed he was as nervous as I was. His eye darted to my face, then to the side once, then twice.

And then I belatedly realized I’d spent the last ten seconds without so much as twitching in response. Too long.

All of my mental preparations for this moment abandoned me. I didn’t know what to do with this. I built up my understanding and acknowledged my feelings and made a giant deal out of things, but when push came to shove? Nothing.

I could feel a desperate, discordant laugh trying to bubble up at the sheer absurdity of my freeze-up. Of all times to pull this shit—

“...Kei?” I hated hearing that kind of tone in anyone’s voice. Making people feel small and ignored wasn’t what I did, and here I’d made myself a liar.

While Kakashi watched, I ran my hand over my face and said, “I suck at this.”

Kakashi paused, then shook his head slowly and added in a dry tone, “You don’t say.”

“I had half a million things I wanted to say,” I admitted, leaning back and putting my weight on my palms. “And the second you said that, I forgot everything.” Maybe it was a good thing he’d confessed while he’d been high on painkillers and I’d been half-asleep. It avoided all this awkward runaround.

This is painful.

Shh. I had a point to make.

I didn’t know where to start, but I had a point nonetheless. It was just that I wasn’t any good at putting it into words. I scooted closer on the bed, until I could hold Kakashi’s hand without reaching for it. His grip was stronger today than last night, and I leaned toward him with our gazes locked. “I don’t know how to say how I feel about you.”

“Then don’t,” Kakashi said, drawing our interlocked fingers to his other side to pull me closer. Gently—not insisting—but I followed of my own accord.

My heart hammered against my ribs. Any closer and I’d practically be sitting on him. This was where I wanted to be, and here I was getting caught up in the details. Our faces were hardly a foot apart. His mask—

“I can’t take this off,” Kakashi added quietly, his eye darting downward. So we were on the same wavelength after all. “But you can.”

While he let his other hand rest against his stomach, I hooked two fingers behind the hospital mask and drew it down until I could see more of his face than I ever saw normally. His lips twitched upward, as though he wanted to smile but still hesitated. His eyelashes fluttered briefly, like he was trying to figure out if this, too, was a dream or wishful thinking. The moment he decided to trust me, he closed his eye and tilted his head toward me.

And like that, the ball was in my court. My left hand moved away from his mask and cupped the side of his face, and he leaned into my touch. He sighed, giving me a momentary glimpse of his Inuzuka canines. I swept my thumb slowly over his cheekbone, taking in every detail of this moment.

His eye opened halfway. And when he spoke, his voice was dry. “Kei, you’re thinking too much.”
As a blush bloomed across my face, I had to agree. So much for not being caught staring.

But the longer I didn’t say anything, the less comfortable he felt. “Kei?”

_Fuck it._

I kissed him.

I caught him by surprise, so it wasn’t a classic fairytale “true love’s kiss,” like in the movies. His mouth was open, so I felt our teeth hit and it wasn’t a great first impression. Somehow, it was fitting that my first kiss would be a fumbling rush job.

But it got better. We actually got to enjoy the second attempt, making sure not to hit teeth or noses again.

I pulled back, considered, and then pushed my way up against his side so we were almost in the same positions we’d fallen asleep in. The main difference was the addition of the pillow mountain, which gave him enough leeway to drape his left arm around me as well as he could. I was wedged in place well enough to make his dogs proud.

“Once you get out of here, we can go on a date,” I said as he rested his cheek against the top of my head, just like before. “A real one.”

“So we just do what we were already doing,” he half-teased, but it was true. All we’d been missing was the mutual understanding necessary to actually call them what they were.

And now, it worked. Worked as _what_, I wasn’t sure, but I just leaned back into him and let the moment stretch out. Aside from the steady hum of the observation machines Kakashi was hooked up to, and our synchronized breathing, all was quiet in our little world.

“Are we... ‘together’ now?” I wondered aloud, even while I ran the pad of my thumb over Kakashi’s knuckles. Invisible to the naked eye, I could feel the faint smooth scars his Lightning Release jutsu had left behind over the years.

“I don’t see why not,” Kakashi replied, angling his body more toward mine as best he could. “We’re already going to have our friends in a frenzy about their bets. I don’t see why we have to be that dramatic.”

“And this is coming from the guy who nearly died in my bed,” I reminded him, and Kakashi snorted. It would have been a reprimand if I hadn’t had such a good point. I had a feeling it’d be my trump card for any accusations of drama for the next ten years. “Still, are you sure you want to do this?”

“I’m pretty sure all we’ve done is kiss,” Kakashi said dryly, deliberately missing the point as far as I was concerned. I could practically feel him bite back a smart remark past that, probably to do with the quality of the aforementioned kisses. But maybe that was just me.

“I’m talking about something else, you jerk,” I complained. “I mean, are you sure I’m not too old for you?”

I could practically hear Kakashi suppress the urge to facepalm, and not just because he couldn’t actually pull it off. He was trying to be nice. “...Kei, we’re the same age. You’re barely three months older than me.”

I opened my mouth to argue before my brain caught up and threw numbers in my face. Okay, yes, if I disregarded the reincarnation shenanigans—like I’d been trying to do for a solid month and mostly succeeded at—then he was right. Completely. And really, it wasn’t like I had any more experience with relationships than he did even with the other life taken into consideration. Here and now, I certainly wasn’t any more mature.

Unless paying bills, cleaning house, going to work, and cooking counted?

...Past-me wasn’t exactly a Jack-of-all-trades. I wasn’t now either, but I was better than my other self had been. Just saying.

I sighed and squeezed his hand. “You win that one.”

Now that Kakashi wasn’t at risk of dying, we had plenty of time to figure out the details. For a while longer, we sat in relative silence and, in my case, gathered strength to face the rest of the day despite a crick in my back thanks to sleeping in a weird position. Kakashi wasn’t going to be going anywhere except the bathroom, or possibly into the grasp of more serious medics like Tsunade. I, on the other hand, needed to head home to feel less like a strung-out mess underneath the staggering relief that everything was going to be okay.

It’s what I got for staying in the hospital overnight when I didn’t technically have to.

Anyway, the peaceful moment lasted until my stomach saw fit to remind me that it was time to take care of rather more practical problems. I was hungry, stiff, and in dire need of a shower.

“I’ll be back in a bit, okay?” At his understanding nod, I let go of Kakashi’s hand and slipped out from under his other arm. Getting to my feet took a bit of work after not moving for so long, but a couple of quick joint pops sorted that out enough that I could walk.

“Heading home?” he asked, as I turned back and courteously readjusted the pillows and blanket so he could rest comfortably.

“Just to get cleaned up and grab some food. If you need anything, I can bring it back with me,” I said, thinking automatically of the novels I hadn’t gotten around to finishing. I wasn’t going to tempt the wrath of the medical profession by outright offering food he probably wasn’t allowed to eat yet.

You read the same paragraph four times in a row yesterday. All of those books are unfinished.

Well, maybe Kakashi would enjoy some of them.

Kakashi looked around the fairly bare hospital room for a second or two, then said, “I could use a book.”

My thoughts exactly. If he’d be able to hold one was a different concern, but knowing a book was available held some comfort regardless. I consulted my mental map of my bookcase. “Icha-Icha, or something else?”

“What about that one over there?” Kakashi asked, jerking his chin in the general direction of the chair I’d used last night. Resting long-forgotten on its pages, the novel I’d been reading to Isobu was as plain as day.

I got it for him. And before I left, I kissed his forehead.

It was about the only bit of exposed skin that felt right when his mask was back in place, but I made do.
I ate a container of takeout when I got home, because it was the least effort I could put into food prep. The rest of that late morning haze was taken up by trying to clear my head. Copious amounts of hot water helped.

Once I stumbled out of the shower and back into reality, I looked around my apartment for any changes since the last time I’d been here. There was nothing, of course, but it helped bring my brain back down to earth.

The past twenty-four hours felt almost like a long, super-realistic dream. In that time, I’d experienced enough ups and downs to give a roller-coaster designer some ideas. While this was not that unusual in the life of a ninja, having all of it happen in my hometown was. Especially when so many facts had hidden right under my nose, and then exploded in my face for good measure.

I stared into the middle distance, bemoaning my derailed train of thought. I couldn’t even make decent overdone metaphors. My usual coping mechanism, exhausted. There was a little white flag and everything.

I’d kissed Kakashi. We’d made out, if in a clumsy way. Almost ten years of unresolved feelings and now there was a thing between us. It looked like a good thing from where I was standing. Even if I only had a few examples to work off in that department, and no actual experience. The thought of getting experience sent all those butterflies a-flapping again.

My mental feedback loop was interrupted by a knock at my front door. I dropped the pillow I was supposed to have been putting on the couch, snapping back to reality and left wondering why I was staring at a wall.

Maybe I was more tired than I thought. Nonetheless, I headed to my door to answer the knock, because people did not keep Kushina Uzumaki waiting.

Quite aside from the fact that it was rude, I’d promised to have a conversation with her at some point in a nonspecific “later” timeframe. Apparently, the time was now.

“Hi, Kushina-s—” was as far as I got. In half a moment, Kushina had loaded me down with food and whatever else was in the basket she shoved in my arms. And then she was ushering me back into my own apartment, plunked me down at the kitchen table, and put a kettle on the stove to boil.

I didn’t have the heart or the guts to tell her I was really tired of tea.

It took me entirely too long to put the things she’d brought down on the table, then to sit down and rest my face against the cool wood to try and think. And the thinking itself was like trying to wade through molasses, explaining the first two points.

Kushina joined me at the table and started rubbing circles against my back. “You’ve had a long day, haven’t you?”

I grunted something that might have sounded like a confirmation. I drew my arms up and crossed them under my head to act as an improvised pillow, but I was tired. Even after sleeping...relatively well, I pretty much had the emotional equivalent of a hangover.

There may be a word for that.

I bet. In English, anyway. Mongrel language that it was.

“Though I did hear that you slept the night through,” she went on, since I obviously wasn’t holding up my end of the conversation.
“You heard about that?” I asked, twisting around so I could look her in the face instead of at the grain of the table.

Kushina smiled. “After the tomato impression you did and the hospital rumor mill, it wasn’t hard to guess what happened. I can put two and two together.”

I stared at her.

“Which is why we need to talk before Yamaguchi gets to you.” Kushina paused for a second. “Or Rin-chan, given what Obito said.”

What.

Wait. “Is this the sex talk?” Because I did not need that. I had been medically-trained—or to some degree, anyway—and I did, in fact, own both biology textbooks and a healthy selection of romance novels. And in one lifetime, I’d attended a high school health class. There wasn’t a whole lot I still needed to learn, academically speaking.

“Yes, but you’re a former medic. I don’t think you’d have gotten this far if you didn’t figure things out,” Kushina said, seemingly happier now that she’d roused me from my slump. “I’m just warning you about Rin-chan.”

“...What did Rin do?” I asked, because of course my curiosity was running on ahead and my imagination was scrambling to keep up. It did not paint a pretty picture along the way.

“I heard there were diagrams.” Kushina reached around with one of her Adamantine Sealing Chains and plucked the just-screaming kettle from the stovetop. While she prepared tea, she went on, “After they got to the part about disease transmission, Obito thought he was going to die if they did anything other than kiss.”

I gave Kushina a long, level stare even as she set my teacup down in front of my nose. This, apparently, was a cue to return to the land of people capable of holding conversations. I took my first baby step by holding the cup. “So...he didn’t notice that you and Sensei obviously didn’t have any trouble with that.”

Kushina shrugged. That...about summed up that sort of situation, from Kushina’s perspective. “They worked it out.”

“And, what, you’re thinking Rin’s going to ambush me?” With diagrams. Good galloping grief.

“It’s more of a fair warning at this point,” Kushina said mildly, still smiling. “You know how she gets.”

Did I ever. “Are you gonna warn me and Kakashi to be careful, outside of”—I made a vague hand gesture that went in the vague direction of the hospital to indicate Rin—“whatever she might be planning?”

Kushina looked like she was biting down on the urge to laugh at me. “You mean about sex?”

Argh. Yes, but— “Kakashi and I don’t have the slightest clue what we’re doing,” I pointed out, ignoring the heat crawling across my face as best I could. “But not just—not about sex. Neither of us have ever done this before. Dating, romance—none of it!”

“My advice,” Kushina said slowly, as she turned the question over slowly, “is that you take it slow and always, always communicate with each other. Not just talk, but really work things out.”
...And that had gone so well. If the past nine years had been much of an indicator, we were so far from being able communicators that we would have been outdone by soup cans on strings.

You can manage when romance is not involved. Else you’d be dead long ago.

“It’s not that we’re bad at this,” I muttered to myself. If I had more energy, I would have probably smacked my head against the table. “It’s that we’re bad at this.”

“You’ll figure it out,” Kushina said. As I looked up at her, probably looking kind of pathetic, she added, “What works for Minato and I, or Rin and Obito, doesn’t necessarily have to work for you. You two aren’t any of us. Understand?”

I nodded.

“Good. Then drink your tea,” Kushina said. “Because I think you’ll need your energy.”

Oh?

Ooooooh.

I sat up fully, chakra sense actually primed for once today, and felt Rin’s chakra signature approaching my street. Obito followed along, feeling approximately the same way I did on shopping trips.

“This is gonna suck.” Still, I got up and trooped toward the door with Kushina giggling at my retreating back.

If it makes your friends happy…

Aaaaaaaaagh.

If you die because of some human reproductive quirk I don’t know about… Isobu trailed off ominously.

Oh my god.

Also, he said in a somewhat cheerier tone, I like you. Breaking in a new host would be somewhere between “painful” and “impossible.”

I tried very hard to decide whether to scream at him or not.

I didn’t quite manage by the time Rin and Obito reached my door.

“Hi, Kei!” Rin said as I let them in, immediately hugging me hard enough to get a squeaky-toy noise out of me. She may not have hit the training fields much, but what she did do, combined with her height, meant she could compress my lungs pretty damned effectively.

Behind her, Obito could best be described as looking like he was walking to meet the hangman on business. He was carrying what looked like an easel, along with a selection of rolled-up scrolls. I didn’t have to think very hard to work out what was on them.

My greeting smile froze on my face. Obito about matched it.

“So, how do you like kissing?” Rin asked cheerily, apparently oblivious to the sense of impending doom following her like a cloud.
I managed my fiftieth tomato impression of the day. Rin went for the throat, didn’t she? Point of fact, yes, kissing was nice, but there was oblique questioning and then there was this. I was not prepared, despite Kushina’s warnings.

Which really dealt with what was to come. “Um.”

“I think it’s fun! Don’t you?” Behind Rin, Obito was doing his best to disappear without using Kamui. Since that option was denied to him, he quickly shifted to a series of facial contortions that really would have looked right at home in the old timeline. On everyone.

His expression screamed, Why is she saying this about me?

I did not have an answer beyond “Rin.” Heading the rest of the conversation off at the pass, I gestured for the two of them to enter the apartment proper and said, “Hey, let’s go to the table.”

“Oh, I didn’t know you’d be here, Kushina-san!” Rin said as she swept past me.

Obito, on the other hand, stopped and clapped his free hand down on my shoulder. “You’re dead.”

I patted his head. “And you’re sitting through this again, so you’re double-dead.”

Obito cringed. “She improved it. Maybe it’ll be easier the second time.”

“Doubt it,” I sing-songed. After all, this probably was my second time getting this lecture, and I was still very much not looking forward to it. The things I did for friends.

“Wait until you see all the work I’ve done on these!” Rin’s voice rang out from the kitchen. We were all dead. We just hadn’t stopped breathing yet.

In short order, Kushina and I were on the couch with additional cups of tea and a mess of pamphlets with worrying titles that were all at least twenty words long while Rin set up her presentation. I resolved to burn them as soon as she left. If they were in pamphlet form, there were more of them out there and she wouldn’t miss these.

Even if they looked like med school theses from where I was standing.

Rin probably could have taught a medical class. Scratch that—she needed to get this urge out of her system and put her energies to more productive use. Making med students faint seemed like so much more fun than...this.

“I just want to make it clear,” I said, as Rin finished the last touches on her setup, “that this is excessive.”

“No, it’s thorough,” Rin insisted. “Deciding to have sex is a serious decision and you should know if you’re ready for it!”

“Rin, I literally found out about his feelings last night,” I argued, even in the face of certain defeat. “You’re going way faster than we are.”

Rin blinked, nonplussed. “But...you were yelling yesterday morning. And you spent last night with him. And the duty-nurse said—”

Oh my fucking god.

“Then we didn’t do anything!”
And now I needed to explain that. Me and my big mouth. As I ran a hand over my face, I tried to think. Kushina patted my back encouragingly, which helped.

“Look, Kakashi woke up really late and wasn’t up to talking, and I stayed later than I planned on. And…” Oh, right. “We talked about things, and we kissed, but that was it.”

The declaration hung in the air like a death knell. The elephant had been called out.

“Oh, um,” Rin mumbled, her tattoos standing out a little less as her face turned red enough to match me at my worst. “I…”

“Oh, Rin,” I said, getting to my feet and hugging her just as Obito wrapped his arms around her shoulders. She’d tried really hard, but this was definitely getting ahead of herself.

“You must think I’m—” Rin shook her head and trailed off as I let go, burying her face in Obito’s shirt. “I’m sorry for assuming, Kei. I didn’t mean to cause any trouble.”

“It’s okay, really.” Even if it was embarrassing as hell, I supposed there were few people I’d stand to be embarrassed around outside of this group. I knocked my knuckles against the presentation easel. “And this’ll be good to know before the topic comes up.”

“Really?” Rin asked, perking up.

I sat back down and picked up my cup of tea. “When you’re ready.”

Kushina nudged my elbow knowingly as Rin bounced in place. Obito let her go, and she whipped a presentation pointer out of her sleeve and extended it to its full length. If Rin was this happy about getting to educate me, I could only imagine how much fun she’d have if she had an actual, formal class.

Oh boy.

In the end, I made it back to the hospital about an hour later than I expected. Rin’s presentation was quite thorough, so most of the time was quite informative in a way that was still far too detailed for anyone without medical training. I could see why Obito had been scared half to death.

When I headed out, Rin and Obito took off with promises of gifts for Kakashi, while Kushina ordered me to deliver the heaping gift basket she’d got for me. Apparently, she’d decided that some things were best shared. Given that Hayate wasn’t around, it wasn’t like I had a ready teenager to dump any excess food into. “Everyone at the hospital” was a good substitute.

“I’m back, Kakashi,” I announced as I entered with my basket blocking my entire view. At least I had muscle memory for the door. “Hi, Yamato!”

There was a pregnant pause.

Given the recent discussion, that phrase is a terrible choice. Isobu had not had fun. Childbirth—and what effects it could have on a seal even where mine was located—did not tend to be.

I set the basket down on a nearby chair, then actually looked up to take in the room. Kakashi was still sitting up in bed, and had my novel in his lap. He looked a bit better, like he’d actually had chance to eat since this morning, or maybe cat-nap. Perched on the rail at the foot of his bed like a particularly large, lumpy owl, though, was an ANBU agent in full uniform. Hood and everything.
Oops.

Said agent very slowly looked between Kakashi and me, and seemed a bit at a loss. Yamato’s voice came out from behind the cat mask, saying in a plaintive tone, “She shouldn’t know that. Did you tell her?”

“You get used to it,” Kakashi advised him, as I stuck a security seal to the wall to forgo further screw-ups. “You should hear Falcon complain sometime.”

Yamato cocked his head to one side, imitating a rather different animal, and then just sighed. “Of course.” He swung his legs around so he finally had his feet on the floor again. “Don’t do that again. It could be a security breach.”

“I get that a lot,” I admitted. I considered my options, then shoved the gift basket onto the floor because I wanted the chair. As I sat down, I piped up with, “Can I hear what you’re talking about, or do I need to leave so you can finish your conversation?”

Yamato sighed again.

“Yes, you can hear it,” Kakashi said, because it was clear Yamato wouldn’t.

I was pretty sure I’d exasperated him the second I’d talked to him and Shizune in the hospital a month ago, and he hadn’t recovered since. It was a gift. “Thanks. So, what were you talking about?”

“I was getting Kakashi’s mission report,” Yamato said, though there was something in his voice I didn’t quite catch. It was a bit higher, sort of like he was trying to be more polite despite the fact that we actually knew each other decently well.

I paused at his word choice, though. Generally speaking, Yamato used “ore” like pretty much every guy I knew. “Watashi” was something new out of him. Out of most of the people I knew, even—we were generally a pretty informal bunch.

“It’s a ‘she’ day,” Yamato explained, while the gears in my head turned.

Oh. Okay then.

“Back to Shinjitsu, though.”

Kakashi glanced at me, waiting for the reaction that Yamato clearly wasn’t, before he said, “I only recognized one of them.”

“You didn’t mention that before,” I said, frowning. “Which one?”

“The one that’s full of black thread instead of blood,” Kakashi lifted his left hand with difficulty and indicated the gut wound that Kushina had saved him from. “Kakuzu, from Takigakure. The briefing said he was a free agent, but the Land of Iron was far enough out of his way that we never expected to see him there.”

Jesus fuck. Not good! “Please tell me you didn’t try to kill him one heart at a time.”

Kakashi gave me a flat look. “Of course not.”

“I’m sorry, Kakuzu has multiple hearts?” Yamato cut in, before we could argue or I could pick a direction to flip my shit. “I don’t think the Bingo Book said that.”

“It didn’t,” Kakashi said. “It’s another Kei thing.”
I couldn’t see her face, but Yamato was obviously brought up short by the idea. “How?”

“I can see the future!” I put in.

I was about ninety percent sure Yamato’s eyes were rolling about as hard as they ever had. “If it’s beyond my clearance, just say so.”

Welp. I tried.

“Long story short, I wrote up more detailed profiles on a lot of possible persons of interest,” I said. “And Kakuzu was one of them. I made sure they were comprehensive.”

“But, again, the other two members of Shinjitsu who jumped me were not a part of the data,” Kakashi said clearly. “They were probably samurai, but I can’t be sure so long after the fact.”

“...Were there any glowing swords?” I suggested.

“No. But they fought more like…your mother,” Kakashi admitted after a second to think about it again. “It’s hard to describe in words.”

But I could give it a shot! Samurai tended toward wearing heavy steel armor that was treated to reject chakra hits, whether jutsu or not. They usually fought by projecting constructed weaponry rather than just plain stabbing people, at least while in armor. While not in armor, they were fast, preferred iaijutsu, and were annoyingly good sensors. Take all that and turn it around and you (more or less) had shinobi.

“I could see how that could get overwhelming,” I said distantly. Kakuzu wasn’t exactly slow or weak, but having two more fighters to fill in the gaps in his style? No wonder Kakashi had almost died.

Kakashi nodded. “It does confirm our suspicions, though.”

I raised an eyebrow.

“Shinjitsu is outside our grasp, officially,” Kakashi explained. “We barely have any diplomatic relations with the Land of Iron.”

And ANBU missions were all the ones that Konoha already couldn’t be caught dead handling. Sending Obito and Kakashi after a group that might as well have been Akatsuki 2.0 had been Sensei’s best shot at taking Shinjitsu out without any diplomatic consequences, and that gambit had failed. With people like Kakuzu in their midst, it would be a tough sell to send anyone after them. We could make the mission a success or undetectable, but not both.

I brought my knuckle to my lips as I thought. “So, we’re going to sit and watch.” For now, anyway.

Yamato and Kakashi exchanged a look that was mostly ANBU subtext. It was okay, though, because I didn’t really think I was missing much.

“And ANBU-san,” I said, because I needed to get back into the habit of using formalities for people in uniform, “I’m not sure the Hokage has checked in with Jiraiya-sama recently. Maybe that could help.”

“I’ll make the suggestion,” Yamato responded, though her tone implied that she thought I was perhaps stating the obvious. Polite.
Well, I was stating the obvious in a polite tone, so that phrasing worked both ways. “Oh, and how’s your rivalry with my brother going?”

If Yamato had been less disciplined, she probably would have been tempted to boot me out a window. Or, in this room, make a window by hurling me through a wall. I had a knack for being terrible with security levels, and not just because I didn’t have discipline of my own. The only reason my clearance was so high was because I already knew shit and no one could bring themselves to kill me over it. Something, something, golden goose, something.

“It’s calmer,” Yamato admitted, after visibly swallowing her irritation. “With him on missions, I can spend more time with Iruka.”

Iruka and Yamato?

See, it was things like this that made it so hard for people to believe I could see the future. It was far more accurate to say that I had seen one conditionally-accurate and mostly-useless vision of a future, but that was far too long. And I had a massive blind spot regarding relationships that the past twenty-four hours had proven repeatedly.

In hindsight, it wasn’t surprising that I’d missed this.

“I kept expecting the rivalry would be like Kakashi and Gai-san, but that isn’t the case,” Yamato went on, since I didn’t give a verbal response. She shrugged. “But it’s motivational.”

“You’re already way ahead of most rivalries I see,” I muttered. Most of them ended up toxic.

Kakashi glanced at Yamato, then said, “Speaking of, make sure he doesn’t get in this room with a bouquet.”

“Hayate?” I asked blankly.

“Gai,” Kakashi corrected me, sniffing. Ohhhh. “He forgets.”

“I’m not sure I can stop him,” Yamato said, as I tried to convince my brain to imagine Kakashi in the middle of a sneezing fit. Gai couldn’t be that bad, right?

I quickly learned, because Gai chose that moment to appear out of damn near nowhere and shout, “My Eternal Rival, I have brought flowers to speed your recovery!”

Yamato was gone before he finished the sentence.

Kakashi just sighed.

I couldn’t blame Gai for being glad to have his best friend back, and thus didn’t say a thing as the greenest champion of Konoha presented Kakashi with a massive bouquet full of yellow roses. I just leaned back and let the scene unfold.

“Thanks, Gai,” said Kakashi. He didn’t do anything with the roses other than set them carefully aside and probably thank the relevant authorities that he was allowed to wear a surgical mask even as a patient. It cut down on the mucus levels.

“I am also here to congratulate you on your blossoming Springtime of Youth!” Gai said as he pulled something out of his flak jacket. It was long and green and—since when could Gai knit? Heedless of my confusion—something of a theme today—he dropped the scarf in Kakashi’s lap alongside the flowers.
“I’m not sure what’s going on,” I said after a moment of silence for, well, the silence that certainly didn’t exist with Gai around. His personality was too big.

Kakashi ran his fingers over the scarf and said, without looking up, “He won his bet.”

“And I bought yarn with my winnings!” Gai gave me a thumbs-up. “I have spent the past several hours learning how to knit just for this moment!”

Even if the stitching was a bit uneven, it was really a nice scarf. Gai could do quite a lot when he put his mind to it. And Gai, now that he had this one part of the skillset figured out, was probably never going to stop until he mastered it.

“What’d you bet?” I asked, since it was beyond pointless to ask who knew by this point. From what I could tell, Gai and the hospital grapevine didn’t overlap, but rumors moved fast in this town.

Gai grinned. “I had faith that you would resolve your romantic endeavors through the Power of Youth!” He nodded to himself seriously. “When I heard Tsunade-sama had bet you would never succeed, I had to bet against her!”

In a really bizarre way, Tsunade had kind of been on our side there. If she’d been right, disaster would have followed pretty much immediately.

...I did not want to think about how close a shave it had been. “Gai, do you happen to know when she placed that bet?”

“Two days ago, I believe!”

And it was, what, eleven in the morning on the day after Kakashi had teleported back to Konoha? The woman’s timing was terrifying.

“I’m glad we didn’t break her losing streak, then,” I muttered.

“While it is unfortunate that Tsunade-sama loses so often,” Gai said, “I am also glad that you are both healthy! I look forward to seeing you on the training fields soon!”

A little after that, Gai left to buy more yarn. I didn’t have much interest in learning to knit, but Kakashi probably wanted to add to his needlework skills. Bigger needles, but still arts and crafts.

“D’you mind if I stick some of this stuff here?” I asked, holding up the long-neglected basket that I had brought along.

“Anywhere you...is that one of Rin’s pamphlets?” Though he managed to make it a question at the very last second, Kakashi’s voice had gone flat with horror. “Yamato warned me about those.”

“Kushina warned me,” I said, as I plucked the offending item out of the basket. I didn’t even remember which one it was, but all of them were information-dense and more than a bit disturbing. “I had about a minute’s head start before Rin and Obito showed up.”

“...My condolences,” Kakashi muttered. “Why did she think you needed to…?”

I flushed red. One of these days I’d pop a blood vessel doing that, and then where would I be?

“Oh. Oh.” Under his mask, Kakashi blushed too. Out of the two of us, Kakashi was the one who could actually look like he wanted the earth to leap up and swallow him. Or like he’d turn into lava and melt his way down to meet it.
Both of us sat in silence for a while, solely because this was our life now. Our romantic non-adventures had been a thing for so long that now everyone was invested in what we did. It was like the village’s very own reality TV show.

This is what made people hermits.

Thankfully, we were saved from contemplating public scrutiny of our private lives by yet another set of visitors.

Several of them were on four legs.

“Kakashi-kun,” said Teikō, as the big scarred-up Tosa-Ken stepped into the room. He strode right up to Kakashi’s bedside and put his front paws on the linens, nosing his way under Kakashi’s hand for scratches.

Behind him, Chikō and Shinkō trooped into the room on silent paws, and the former stopped at my feet to lick my pant leg.

“The dogs have missed you,” Fuse announced as she entered, with Yatsu on her arm.

“It’s hard not to!” Shinkō said in his piping voice. “You’re very nice!”

“Mm-hm.” Kakashi continued to scratch under Teikō’s chin, and the short brown fur got everywhere on the linens. “Thank you.”

Chikō pushed his way into my lap, as Fuse helped Yatsu find one of the room’s chairs. They seemed to have multiplied somehow since the last time I’d been here and I hadn’t noticed before.

“I doubt you can tell us what you were doing,” Fuse said as she took in Kakashi’s visible injuries. When Kakashi shook his head, she sighed. “Then I hope you get better soon, Kakashi. And that you have more luck on your next mission.”

“I doubt I’ll be going on any for a while,” Kakashi admitted, while Teikō tried to stick his nose in his ear. Dog affection was more or less the same whether the dogs in question talked or not.

“I’ll say,” I muttered under my breath. Kushina had saved him from dying horribly, but a gut wound was a gut wound. I didn’t know when he’d be released from the hospital, but he was definitely off the active roster for the foreseeable future. And if he wasn’t, I needed to go yell at Sensei.

“Will you be around, Keisuke-kun?” Yatsu asked, not turning to face me.

“Yes.” To be honest, I wasn’t sure if I could stand to take a mission at the moment. There were plenty of other people who could take bounty missions.

“Then will you help look after him?” Yatsu asked.

Kakashi sighed again. He seemed to be doing that a lot lately. “I don’t need—”

“Finish that sentence with ‘babysitter’ and I will be very unhappy with you,” Yatsu warned, frowning severely. “Or I will hire a genin team.”

Kakashi subsided, grumbling silenced.

“Can you stay at Sensei’s house?” I asked, as I stroked Chikō.

“Kushina already set up the guest room,” Kakashi said. “I’ll be fine.”
And Kushina, frankly, would be a lot more use in a medical crisis than I would nowadays. The past twenty-four hours proved that.

“Scratch behind my ears, please!” Chikō barked, pushing his head up against my hand. I promptly lost my train of thought and complied.

Though Shinkō eventually wandered off into the rest of the hospital, the Inuzuka couple and their two other dogs stuck around for the rest of the morning to catch up with us. Kakashi didn’t talk about his missions, but he enjoyed their company and I entertained the fluffiest dog for most of it.

That ended when Tsunade poked her head into the room. “All of you, get out. I can’t run a medical exam with this many distractions.”

Needless to say, we got out. Arguing with Tsunade was not a thing people did.

On my way out of the room, though, I asked, “Tsunade-sama, have you given any thought to letting Rin run a few classes for medic-nin?”

Tsunade’s eyes flicked across the room until she spotted the pamphlet, lying abandoned under a chair. “That kind of class?”

“...And others. To use her powers for good.” As opposed to just scaring people without medical training. Out of love. “She needs an outlet.”

“I’ll think about it,” Tsunade replied. She peered at me for a moment, then looked at Kakashi. Then she returned her gaze to me and poked me in the forehead with one manicured nail. “Congratulations on losing my bet for me, kid.”

Um. Okay?

“Now get out so I can do my job.”

I skedaddled.

Chapter End Notes

The song of the chapter is "The Science Love Song."

So I did manage to get a chapter out of the way in less than the span of eternity! Go figure.

So, quick WOG for stuff that was covered in the chapter. In no particular order: Yamato is genderfluid. Kakashi and Kei are together. Tsunade totally bet against them. The Inuzuka couple's dogs are all therapy animals. Rin's classes are comprehensive. Iruka and Yamato are figuring out their dynamic.

And Shinjitsu is gonna continue to be a thing.
Within the village, there was something akin to a social positive feedback loop hard-wired into shinobi culture. Most people outside of its influence didn’t even know it existed, and were probably happier not thinking about what their esteemed super soldier protectors did in the time between missions. It was capable of extracting, processing, and distributing information at a speed comparable to the internet, as long as everyone was in the know.

It might’ve been more frightening if not for its more mundane name: the shinobi rumor mill.

Shinobi were horrible gossips. If I could write any particular piece of advice for those who might end up caught up in its machinations, well… My advice basically went thus: Run.

Not that running would be any help. Kakashi was benched for obvious reasons that (had) included a gaping hole in his gut, so he couldn’t exactly flee into an ANBU mission. Sensei had also gone as far as to ban Kakashi from even completing ANBU paperwork, which was probably supposed to help him relax. Mostly, it meant Kakashi blitzed through my novel collection while “babysitting” Naruto and Tatsumaki. Really, Kushina watched over all of them together.

As for me? Well, I... I didn’t exactly want to leave. Kakashi was in the village for the time being, so I could spend more time with him than I had in years. I wanted to. So I didn’t run either.

That meant facing the rumor mill and its reinforcing factor, the betting pool, at the same time. Head-on.

“So did Kakashi crack first, or did you figure it out?” Genma asked, spinning one of my teacups on the tabletop as though it were a basketball.

I sighed. “We’ve been over this.” Turnabout was fair play, though. Somehow, this was payback. Probably for Kakashi, by proxy.

If I had to be interrogated by representatives of the Konoha grapevine, Raidō and Genma were probably the best available options. They’d just showed up, I’d invited them in, and then they’d sprung their trap over daifuku mochi and green tea. I’d basically set myself up for it.

“I still don’t believe that’s it,” Genma complained, though he stopped spinning the cup so I could fill it. “Him confessing while high on painkillers doesn’t really count, does it?”

“I think it does,” Raidō said. “He confessed first.”

“But she figured it out before then,” Genma said, as Raidō continued to take notes in the little black notebook that had rested in Sensei’s office. “Make sure you write the last part down.”

I didn’t even want to start to look in that book. I didn’t want to see how much of a mess the betting pool had become.

“Nothing personal, Kei-san,” Genma added after a second or two of thought. “But I’m the Hokage’s personal gofer in this...thing.” Genma shrugged.

“Then why is Raidō writing it?” I asked.

“ ‘Cause I don’t feel like it,” Genma responded. Delegation in action. Genma had learned well.
I peered at them suspiciously. “If you’d said it was because he had better handwriting, I would’ve called you a liar.”

“Good thing I didn’t, then.” Genma took a long sip of his tea.

Raidō looked up from his scribbled notes, thoughtful. “You know, I can kinda see it.”

Huh? “See what?”

“I can see why that nightmare scenario the other day would be what broke the ice,” Raidō explained, while I started to turn red very slowly, like a cooking lobster. Genma, however, just looked intrigued. Under our stares, Raidō shrugged. “High-stress situations can make people say things they otherwise wouldn’t.”

If it wasn’t for the flicker of lingering pain in Raidō’s chakra, I would have assumed he was citing some half-remembered textbook. Genma’s eyes narrowed like he’d picked up the same hint in Raidō’s voice instead of his chakra, and he snaked one hand around Raidō’s back until he was half-hugging him around his waist.

I wordlessly pushed the plate of daifuku mochi in their direction.

Genma glanced at the plate, then changed the subject with, “So, about the payouts.”

Isobu rolled his eye. Subtle.

Wasn’t it? But I didn’t blame him for trying to avoid the topic. This wasn’t the kind of thing Genma talked to me about—and neither did Raidō, for that matter. I imagined they’d prefer not to have an audience for things like this.

“I hope we didn’t make people lose too much money,” I said, since I had thus far adhered to my resolution not to look into the black hole that was Konoha’s betting record.

“I lost,” Raidō said, picking up one of the mochi and squishing it experimentally. “But I only bet fifty ryō, so it’s not a big loss.”

Okay, cue the morbid curiosity. “What exactly did you bet on?”

“I bet that Kakashi would crack before you figured it out,” Raidō said, after turning the mochi into a disc. “But you figured it out even if I got the timing...mostly right.”

Oh dear. “How long did you think it would take?”

“Two years minimum,” he replied. “Though it really took five.”

I put my head in my hands.

“You have to admit that you deserve pretty much every joke about that,” Genma said, though his voice was somewhat muffled by mochi.

I bonked my forehead against the tabletop and let it rest there.

“It could be worse,” Raidō said in a philosophical tone.

“Nope,” I said without raising my head. “Don’t wanna hear it.”

“Well, I bet you two wouldn’t get anything figured out until something drastic happened,” Genma said, because of course he did. “And something did. But the bet was so vague that the Hokage said I couldn’t win more than fifty ryō anyway.”

I made a pained noise.

There was a sound of rustling paper. “Oh, and your brother bet it wouldn’t happen until he got back from his mission, so I guess that’s his loss. His friend apparently believes true love conquers all or something, which is basically Gai’s bet but quieter.”

“How do you make a bet quieter?” I wondered aloud, drawn back in. I was frowning by the time I saw Genma’s little grin. Oh no.

Genma turned the book around and let me see it. True to form, Gai’s bet was actually in his own handwriting, with five exclamation marks. In one sentence. A bit below, Sensei’s handwriting took over again to record Iruka’s bet verbatim, which did not include any excited punctuation.

“That...that’s definitely less energetic,” I admitted. Curiosity continued to prod me insistently in the back of the brain, but at the same time I didn’t want to know who else had profited off the awkward social dance Kakashi and I had done around each other.

For a little while, the conversation about my social life and the village’s fixation on it faded out so my two guests could eat all the sweets I’d set out. I didn’t tell either of them that I had made enough mochi for a small army of children, because there was such a thing as planning for the inevitable, or else they would have tried to one-up many sweet teeth at once. Or at least some of my friends would have—I liked to think that Raidō wasn’t like that. Genma probably was, though.

The moment might have lasted a little longer if not for the bright flash of chakra I recognized as Rin, hopping across rooftops in a clear beeline for my apartment. When not trying, my sensing range wasn’t a whole lot larger than Genma’s hearing range—so he sat up like he’d been shocked, automatically turning to face the exact direction and angle she approached from.

“That’s probably about her new lecture,” I said to Genma, given that Rin’s chakra felt cheerful enough for Gai.

“She’s humming,” was all that Genma said in response. Instead, he turned his attention to Raidō and said to his baffled boyfriend, “We’re leaving before we get caught up in it.”

Raidō’s expression remained bemused as Genma hauled him to his feet, and the two of them disappeared into—oh come on, the bathroom window wasn’t even that big!

“You’re both chickens!” I shouted after them, but by the time I made it down the hall in pursuit, the room was empty and the window was open.

Apparently my friends were spiritual disciples of Harry Houdini or something. I was almost certain that the bathroom window was too small for human shoulders to fit through, but both of them had managed to escape without screwing up the frame. What the hell.

I don’t see why she wants to come here and give you the lesson, Isobu said, while I returned to the living room to clean up after them. You’re not even enough of a medic to be qualified for most of the contents.

I shrugged. Maybe she just needs someone to practice with. I’m a little better than delivering the presentation to a bathroom mirror or something like that.
You’re not going to be able to see the final version, though. What is an “educational workshop” and why aren’t you qualified to see most of them?

You know, I began carefully, as Rin finally knocked on my door, I’m going to leave that one for Rin to explain.

I cupped my hands around my mouth and shouted down at the training field, “Obito, quit screwing around!”

“You know every time you do that,” Kakashi remarked, as sparks flew from clashing weapons, “he looks over here.”

I put my finger to my lips. “Shh!”

Kakashi’s visible eye widened just slightly. Then he shook his head slowly and redirected his attention back to the sparring match, settling deeper into the mound of blankets we’d all forced him to take everywhere he went.

Outdoor sporting events hadn’t been much of a feature of my old life, but whatever entertainment slot it ought to have occupied was now taken up by watching other people training. In this particular case, Kushina had done the mom-figure thing and packed us lunches, snacks, hot tea, and whatever else would fit inside a storage seal labeled “provisions.” Out of consideration for Kakashi’s recovery from chakra exhaustion and assorted other injuries, heating blankets, painkillers, and replacement bandages had been included in the deal.

Between Obito, Rin, and me all nagging in concert, we even got him to actually use those supplies as necessary.

From the inside of his blanket-burrito, he could still see the ongoing match. And thus, he still had some commentary. “Obito leaves his left side too open.”

“Well, usually we’re there,” I pointed out.

True to Kakashi’s word, though, Obito took an elbow to the side from Rin that made him flinch backward. Rin followed up with a side kick, missing only by a hair, and Obito brought the back of his right hand up against Rin’s ankle as the pair of them maneuvered for a more advantageous position. While Rin was sent spinning into an unintentional cartwheel, Obito passed on the chance for a follow-up and pressed his right hand against his side.

My fingers itched, but this was a sparring match. Obito was a big boy. He could handle himself against Rin.

Rin, for her part, didn’t seem to need any help at all. Good on her.

“That’s no excuse for getting sloppy,” Kakashi muttered. I wasn’t sure if this was a sort of misdirected frustration due to Kakashi’s current inability to walk more than fifty paces in a straight line without supervision, or the fact that he was still going to be on enforced medical leave months from now, but either way he still had a point.

Obito tended to outright evade attacks by using Kamui if they were too big to outrun, or just dodge given his Sharingan-granted precognition if they weren’t. But because Kamui was overkill for this kind of sparring match and the Sharingan in general wasn’t warranted, we were seeing a lot of holes open up in Obito’s general combat style.
Granted, most people weren’t Rin, and thus absurdly specialized in picking out every weakness in a human being’s movements for several different reasons, but the idea remained. Even if the two of them didn’t basically live together and know each other’s habits inside and out, Rin was probably one of the worst people for Obito to fight at this level. She probably knew how he’d react better than he did, in some aspects.

“Wow, it’s almost like he needs to spar at this level to be a rounded fighter,” I said, with an entirely appropriate amount of dry humor.

Kakashi nudged me. “Don’t get too complacent. You’ve been relying heavily on Isobu-san since we were teenagers. You have no room to talk.”

I frowned.

Truth hurts, doesn’t it?

Yeah, well, I don’t use your power if you don’t offer first.

So it’s my fault now?

No, no. I mean...it’s more like I shouldn’t use your power unless my opponent is genuinely too strong to handle. I thought back to whenever Naruto from one timeline over would get into fights with Akatsuki members after training with Jiraiya. He didn’t tend to go for Kurama’s chakra until the situation had thoroughly gone to hell. Maybe I’ve been relying too much on you and not my own strength. Sorry, Isobu.

“Talking to him?” Kakashi asked, drawing my attention back to the outside world.

“Yeah, I was. What’d I miss?” I stopped slouching in place and looked around, as though I’d been caught napping. Spacing out was a little embarrassing, but mostly I’d feel bad if I missed something awesome and wasn’t able to talk to Rin and Obito about it later.

“Obito can’t use his left arm anymore,” Kakashi said, as though commenting on the weather.

I did a double take as I looked down at the fight. True to Kakashi’s statement, Obito’s left shoulder drooped and he was not able to easily meet any of Rin’s subsequent attacks on that side.

Every so often, I saw her hands glow in bursts—either she was pouring a huge amount of chakra into her chakra scalpels, or something else was happening that I didn’t understand. Rin didn’t stop to explain, of course, but a near miss from one of her hands scored a long line along the log Obito used for his Replacement technique. She was not playing with safety gloves on.

Much.

“What kind of damage can unstable chakra scalpels do?” Kakashi asked.

Below, Rin struck again and again without fear of retaliation. Between her open-palm and knife’s edge strikes, Obito didn’t have a lot of room to safely approach her from the front even before she started reincorporating kicks into her routine.

Given that Obito definitely didn’t want to be touched by those hands right now, well... I said cautiously, “Think of what a scalpel looks like. She’s putting the same amount of chakra behind each cut, but if the blade is fatter or wobbles when she makes contact, it could be as gentle as a punch or like being hit by an axe.”
Kakashi blinked. “I didn’t realize there was that much variation.”

“They’re not supposed to be used in combat,” I reminded him. I had a few apples to demonstrate with, so I picked one up with my right hand and held it where Kakashi could see it. As I turned the apple slowly, I explained, “I mean, sure, I use the same principles for my samurai techniques, but they’re designed to be used more like this. You take your time, and you cut slowly and precisely. And the blade doesn’t need to follow the way your hand moves, either.”

“I remember you doing this when we were kids,” Kakashi remarked as he followed my movements. When the apple inevitably split into roughly equal halves under this kind of attention, he caught his half without missing a beat. “I didn’t realize this would become Rin’s only attack.”

Thinking of Kabuto, I murmured, “Does she really need another one?”

Kakashi met my eyes squarely. “Yes.”

_OKay, okay, no need to get so serious._ “We can suggest it to her once they’re done here.” It wasn’t like _Obito_ was in dire need of more jutsu or ways to use them. If anything, he needed more means of adapting if he _couldn’t_. “Honestly, I feel kind of bad asking for Gai’s advice so often, but I think they might need him to talk them through this instead of us.”

“Gai likes being asked, though.” Kakashi was cutting the remainder of his apple core out of his piece with a kunai. Maybe he’d eat it after mangling it. “In fact, I think he’d be upset if you _didn’t_ ask when stuck on a taijutsu problem.”

Point. And Kakashi did know Gai best, so I’d do what _I_ did best and refer to the expert(s).

“Ow!” Rin shouted from the training field, while _Obito_ squeaked something like “I’m so sorry!”

By the time Kakashi and I turned to look, Rin was hopping on one foot. I could see little black specks spread out across the ground, almost like seeds.

“Caltrops?” I wondered aloud, frowning slightly. Not something that came up much in _Obito_’s mission supply lists, but very useful to the average shinobi as long as there was a way to make certain the enemy got a spike in the foot.

“The soles of Rin’s sandals are so thick, I’m surprised she noticed,” Kakashi said, mask down and biting into the apple. I debated elbowing him, but Rin’s footwear had been a minor point of contention between me and her a couple of times in the past.

Granted, the gist of these was generally that I hated heels and she didn’t, but that still counted as an argument over shoes. While shopping for them.

As we watched, Rin pried one of the evil little tetrahedrons out of the sole of her shoe, then took off the shoe and examined it for damage. _Obito_ hovered nearby, clearly uncertain of how to proceed.

“I think that’s the end of this training session,” I told Kakashi in a stage-whisper. “Unless she’s—”

_Rin_ lashed out with one hand, pinkie edge glowing blue, and _Obito_ was forced to let the attack pass right through him as though he was made of air. The next few seconds were a flurry of motion as _Obito_ realized his gaffe, tried to go back to _not_ using Kamui, and then had to bend over backwards at the waist and into a flip to avoid getting his nose kicked in by Rin’s bare foot.

_Obito_ made a hilarious yelp when it happened, though.
“Should we break them up?” I wondered aloud, while Rin chased Obito across the training field and up a tree, still missing one shoe.

“Mm, no.” Kakashi leaned to the side and rested against my side. Given that even while sick he was a bit heavier than I was, I put my left hand down against the ground to brace myself. “Let’s stay here a bit longer.”

I was about to say something—or maybe do something—that could maybe kinda be romantic, if my awkwardness didn’t get in the way.

But at that point Rin decided to cut the tree down with her chakra scalpels, and the crash ruined the mood entirely in favor of baffled laughter instead. Obito needed some help to get out of that one.

There was a small benefit to working in Sensei’s office, even when everything had gotten pretty awkward thanks to him running the betting pool. Between being used as the office’s designated paperwork delivery fairy, or getting tea or snacks where necessary, the actual job of being a Hokage Guard consisted of a lot of free time unless otherwise specified. When Sensei felt like breaking that up with further fūinjutsu lessons, we could talk about whatever we felt like.

Sensei peered down at my design of the left corner of what might have been the Four Violet Flame Formation seal.

It wasn’t a real fūinjutsu, but Sensei had apparently looked at my copy of the Uchiha Flame Formation with some interest. Like the other jutsu, it was really a type of barrier ninjutsu I was modifying for more efficient use, but apparently the genjutsu study group had helped change my thinking enough for me to adapt other things, too. I still hated the fact that it required four separate seals in order to put up each corner, where the Uchiha barrier ninjutsu was a self-contained cylinder of doom, but compression just didn’t seem to work.

“You can stop glaring at your work now,” Sensei said in a somewhat dry voice.

“I’ll stop glaring when it starts working,” I grumbled, which wasn’t even a full reason for my dislike of this technique. In one future, Orochimaru’s Sound Four had used it to isolate the Third Hokage for his assassination, and even if summoning the Shinigami had taken that decision out of Orochimaru’s hands, I saw no reason to ease up on something that couldn’t flinch at my resentment.

Nothing akin to that had happened here. I would kill anyone who tried. Still, the feeling lingered.

Sensei sat down next to me, next to the ink and paper mess I’d made in my designated corner of the office. “Having trouble focusing?” When I didn’t respond, Sensei tried again with, “Are you that nervous about your date after this?”

I couldn’t exactly tell Sensei I was still freaking out about a different timeline and a dead snake summoner. I made a face and just said, “Sure, let’s go with—”

Poof!

As one, Sensei and I both whirled toward the noise. Sensei’s pronged kunai appeared in both of his hands as if by magic, where my chakra scalpels flared to life over my fingertips solely because my sword didn’t quite feel fast enough.

“Wait, wait!” screeched the toad on Sensei’s desk, holding up his forelegs in surrender. Blue marks on a generally red body, goggles around the neck—
“Kōsuke?” Sensei asked reflexively, easing out of his combat stance. The knives in his hands disappeared to...wherever they’d come from while I let my chakra scalpels fade back into nonexistence.

I’d kinda forgotten that there was a toad that shared a name with my asshole cousin. Maybe it’d be best if I mentally appended the other one with a label. I fully expected to see more of the toad than I did of my cousins. Ever.

“Reporting with a message from Jiraiya-sama, Minato-sama,” the young toad rattled off in a single breath. “Jiraiya-sama requests reinforcements from Konoha immediately!”

As the bottom dropped out of my stomach, Sensei’s expression flattened into deadly seriousness and his chakra pressure dampened everyone else’s throughout the building. I could feel other people startling as his killing intent generalized outward in a wave, and if I looked at him I could almost see his eyelids darkening to orange before reverting. Isobu’s influence shielded me from the brunt of Sensei’s worry and undirected wrath, so I could actually make pointless color commentary.

But inside, my mind spun. Jiraiya was one of the Legendary Sannin. While, yes, Konoha forces (including me) had killed Orochimaru relatively recently and proved that the Sannin weren’t untouchable, there had only ever been a handful of ninja in history who could match him. Most of them were either dead or allies, at least in this timeline, so it seemed more likely to me that Jiraiya would be calling in reinforcements for someone else. Someone he needed alive was hurt, or maybe a village needed a few more numbers on his side. The idea of Jiraiya needing backup for his own sake just didn’t compute.

“Did Jiraiya-sama say what reinforcements he needed?” I asked Kōsuke, already mentally bracing myself for the inevitable. If Jiraiya thought he needed help in combat, he was probably going to pick the nuclear option.

“Um, I remember some people were hurt,” Kōsuke said, hesitant. How much of the battlefield had he sent on his courier mission? Not really what I wanted to hear with lives at stake.

Still, that made a medic mandatory. Which was standard procedure when dealing with reinforcement assignments, really, but it did mean there would have to be a team involved.

Sensei took a deep breath and the oppressive chakra finally stopped pressing down on the building.

So is he finished with his tantrum? Isobu asked.

Shh.

You know he’s sending you out there. Isobu turned his head until there was a popping sound, audible from ten meters away from his mental avatar. He had a big neck. I could use another punching bag.

Yeah, I know. There was a certain level of inevitability to being sent after people to maul them, at least as far as my life went. Then I turned Isobu’s remark over in my mind a second time. Also, since when have you ever thrown a punch?

Hush, you.

“Kei,” Sensei said, as I redirected my attention away from my literal inner demon. There was no arguing with his voice, which was in full command tone. “You and Obito are going to be on the team.”
I inclined my head. “By your command, Hokage-sama.”

Sensei said nothing for a moment, and I watched the gears turn in his head. “Rin-kun has the largest summons of the medical staff aside from Tsunade. How soon can she be ready to go?”

Well, I didn’t exactly keep the mission log between my ears, but if Obito and I were going, Rin could be out the door just as quickly. Thus, I said, “Immediately.”

“I’ll take your word on that,” Sensei replied, making a quick hand seal. A second later, there was a swirl of chakra and a loud popping sound as air was displaced. “Get the two of them right now.”

Sensei’s clone extended a hand to me. Oh, so now it was a clone relay? One of these days, Sensei would run out of ways to exploit the most exploitable technique in this universe, but today was clearly not the day.

Focus.

I grabbed onto clone-Sensei’s hand. Between one heartbeat and the next, the Flying Thunder God jutsu put me through the usual sensation of getting yanked through space-time with a vaudeville hook. Never pleasant, but I had to wonder if it was because I wasn’t the one teleporting willy-nilly. I was just going along for the ride.

We popped back into reality right next to Obito. Specifically, we managed to catch him just inside his apartment, in the narrow hallway that gave us exactly no room to maneuver.

Obito yelped in surprise, dropping his bag of groceries when he jumped. While the clone caught the bag (mostly), and Obito’s flailing left arm phased through its head, I was already stepping back as far out of the line of fire as possible. As such, I managed to avoid being beaned in the head by a pumpkin.

“Sorry, Sensei!” Obito said, even as a Wood Release...lacrosse net caught the pumpkin bare centimeters off the ground. Somehow, it wasn’t all that surprising that Obito could make one of those without using hand seals.

“Kei? What are you doing here?” Rin asked from behind me, and when I turned I found her sitting at Obito’s desk with two medical reference texts. “Actually, wait—Hokage-sama, why are you both here?”

“You three have a mission,” Sensei’s clone said, while Obito quickly shoved everything into the refrigerator.

Rin shot to her feet, then zoomed around the apartment gathering her mission gear. Mission gear and casual clothes, at least in peacetime, were pretty interchangeable as long as everything was made of durable material. Rin, who shopped for the both of us when it came to clothes, had this principle well in hand and just threw all of her medical aids on top in scant seconds.

Obito, on the other hand, just grabbed a...okay, so he just had a belt full of weaponry and clipped it on. True efficiency in a nutshell.

“As soon as my original has more information, he’ll be able to fill you in,” Sensei’s clone said, as Obito and Rin stood at attention in front of us. The clone held out both hands to them, while I was stuck just latching onto its shoulder.

Obito blinked. “Wait, you’re a—”
“—clone?” Obito blinked and looked around the office, noticing the original Sensei scribbling details of a mission down on a long green-backed scroll. “Oh.”

The clone nodded. “Good luck on your mission.” And with a poof, it was gone and its chakra returned to Sensei. He shook his head abruptly when the feedback hit him, but that was all he did. Otherwise, he continued to write as Kōsuke made small corrections here and there.

Obito, Rin and I all glanced at each other out of the corners of our eyes as Sensei finished his work, unwilling to interrupt. I knew what kind of mission we’d be going on, so the other two were probably busy wondering what kind of fresh hell we were going to be walking into. Obito and I hadn’t been on the same mission—when specifically summoned for it—in more than a year. And Rin? She never deployed with either of us.

Not on purpose, anyway.

Sensei stood up from his desk. “All three of you are going to the Valley of the End. Find Jiraiya-sensei and kill whatever is threatening him. And bring back the body.”

How the fuck were we supposed to get there in time to make a difference? That was at least a four-hour flight on Tsuruya’s back, and that was when she was actively shaping the wind to speed things up. It was much better to use space-time shenanigans to cut out all of the intervening time. Only Sensei’s teleportation range wasn’t that large, and I had no idea what kind of mission would lead Obito there.

Kōsuke hopped forward on Sensei’s desk, then leapt off of it and into my flailing arms. For a frog the size of a golden retriever, he was a lot lighter than he looked. “Ready?” he asked us.

...Right, summon shenanigans. The other kind of space-time manipulation.

Obito and Rin each grabbed one of my arms. “We’re ready,” was the unanimous verdict.

Ker-poof!

The Valley of the End was, if anything, the single greatest monument to the power of S-class shinobi in full DBZ-level bullshit mode. It had nothing to do with the statue of the two culprits—which had been put in much later—and everything to do with the fact that the valley had not existed prior to the First Hokage’s epic throwdown with Madara. Cartographers had fits over this place in the history books.

Strictly speaking, the place wasn’t a valley. It was a canyon with a massive and artificially-redirected river running through it. Steep cliff sides kept non-shinobi from maneuvering enough to be effective fighters here, with two paired statues pinning the bulk of the river between them and compressing the lake above. To one end of the valley, the Land of Rice Fields stretched out into the distance, as the final goal of Sasuke’s ill-advised abandonment of Konoha.

And on this end, there was another epic furball of a fight, as though the original brawl needed a sequel. My chakra sense gave me a sensation akin to a spider web flying in my face—too many interconnected lines, all of which were just there enough to be annoying. I could make out two monster chakra signatures below, in the tangle. The first was Jiraiya, and someone I didn’t know by feel but probably would by sight. There weren’t that many people who could give Jiraiya a decent fight.
I could see something like a hundred red-cloaked figures darting here and there, with a black-cloaked one in the approximate middle of the mess. The white-topped speck had to be Jiraiya. And, woven here and there all across the valley to various thicknesses, black iron thorns made half the space inaccessible on pain of tetanus.

“I’m going in,” Obito said, as we peered down from the clifftops and tried to figure out what was happening. First one off of Gama’s back, and the first into the fray. Some things never changed.

“Obito, wai—” Rin began, but he was already gone. He was running down the side of the cliff, faster than falling, and Kamui did make him effectively untouchable.

Isobu?

Here you go. Isobu’s chakra flooded into my coils, free for the taking. Maybe, for once, he wouldn’t cut me off before the bad guy was dead. Don’t die.

“Are you going down there too?” Rin asked, as I slid off Gama’s back.

Well, I didn’t especially want to head down there. I wasn’t invulnerable, just tough. Leaving Gama and Rin behind, however, was a choice I had to make for both their sakes as soon as I started glowing red.

By way of reply, I threw myself off the cliff. I was pretty sure I heard Rin screaming at me until Isobu’s chakra tail whipped out and slammed into the rock, slowing my descent like the world’s largest and most insane fast-roping exercise. Rock fragments showered down around me, and then Isobu’s tail detached from the wall so I could hit the water’s surface in glorious freefall.

Isobu unfurled all three tails as we brought the V1 cloak to bear. I could feel my tattoos start to warm up a bit as the Tailed Beast chakra flowed cautiously through them.

As I took to the field in probably the second-loudest manner I could manage, a number of the red-cloaked figures peeled off from the fight to hurl themselves in my direction. I felt the spider web of chakra signatures constrict as though around an unwitting fly, but that wasn’t as big of a hint to the reality of the battle as this simple fact: none of the red-cloaked fighters needed their limbs to move.

Instead, they jerked around on invisible tethers and hurtled toward me, revealing themselves as combat puppets.

Specifically, as a lot of shinobi combat puppets, with only one master’s hands at the controls.

Sasori of the Red Sand versus Toad Sage Jiraiya. If the latter hadn’t called for reinforcements, I would have looked around for someone selling tickets. It was a rehash of the First Hokage’s fight with Madara, but Kakuzu would have made money off the bout. Or tried to.

I smashed the first puppet to meet me between two of Isobu’s tails. Wooden limbs and chakra strings flew, the former shattering and the latter dissipating with the hit.

There were a couple of core principles of fighting puppets. The first of them was that, since they didn’t feel pain or react to injury, every active puppet needed to literally be smashed into unrecognizable chunks in order to fully disable them if they were being used by a skilled puppeteer. The second principle was generally to attack said puppeteer as soon as possible, because they had a nasty habit of pulling yet more puppets out of thin air and because, generally speaking, puppet masters weren’t great at close-range combat. The third? Watch for tricks, traps, poisons, and possible body-swapping bullshit.
Since I was effectively immune to disease and poisons thanks to Isobu’s...proactive approach to protecting me in a bubble of demonic chakra, my main concerns involved getting through the horde while inflicting as much mayhem as physically possible. Obito had his end of things covered, thanks to Kamui’s five-minute running time, but I needed to make enough of a gap that Rin could get through.

Allow me.

Isobu’s tails stretched backward, reaching behind me and whipping around to clear the back-field of roving puppets. At the same time, the V1 chakra cloak decoupled from my arms and Isobu’s grabbed the two nearest puppets and crushed them into splinters in his spectral grip.

Rin’s voice cut through the sound of continual destruction, “Coming through!”

In the next moment, she and Gama were through the hole I’d cleared in the crowd of puppets, hopping past Obito in turn. But if I could get rid of all the puppets, then Jiraiya and Rin would have some breathing room, and Obito wouldn’t need to keep running Kamui’s passive mode to avoid getting skewered.

Isobu, if I could…?

If you’re doing what I think you’re going to do, aim for the iron construct. I want that eyesore gone.

Well, okay then. Let’s reset the battlefield. My painstakingly relearned grasp of hand seals wasn’t perfect with my left arm still acting as the lesser contributor in the process, but some techniques just needed a lot of chakra thrown into them with relatively little consideration for such niceties as “form.”

Thank goodness for environmental water. The Great Waterfall technique took the black iron tree—likely leftover from Sasori deploying the Third Kazekage puppet—and rendered it into so much twisted metal. While the Third Kazekage’s iron sand manipulation was utterly terrifying while active, I hadn’t spotted the puppet anywhere and water? To be blunt, once chakra was out of play, physics came back in. And water moving at barely fifteen kilometers per hour had ten times the kinetic force of air at the same speed. Which was why floods were so dangerous.

I had basically picked up the power to create a waterspout as an opening gambit in any fight I got into.

The world around us got very loud.

As the water settled back down into its natural flow—or unnatural, given the whole S-class shinobi thing—Obito tossed a puppet limb that I’d either displaced or missed into the water. “Nice shot.”

“Pretty sure I missed Sasori,” I said, as Isobu lowered our shared chakra usage and stopped making independent chakra arms. But as long as Rin and Jiraiya were on their way to whatever shelter they’d found, my job was one well done.

As though to prove me right, half a dozen cloaked figures emerged from the still-disturbed murky water as though someone had installed an invisible platform under their feet. Kinda creepy.

The black-cloaked one finally threw back his hood.

I’d never seen Sasori in person before. His Bingo Book description pegged him as a redhead, but I was really seeing more pink than red. Without his big scorpion puppet to act as power armor, though, he was probably smaller than Obito and considerably less emotive than the average rock.

“Who’s that?” Obito asked instantly.

“Do you even read the Bingo Book?” I asked him in return.

Obito managed a sheepish look. “Well…”

“Are the two of you supposed to be diversions?” Sasori asked, before I could figure out how I wanted to yell at Obito. For some reason, S-class shinobi did have a tendency to treat other people’s conversations as sacrosanct and not interrupt, but mostly because they (we) tended to view personal drama as a bigger deal than probably realistic.

“That depends,” Obito responded, because he was polite. Somewhat. “I’m pretty sure a distraction doesn’t usually kill you.”

Sasori glanced at me. Then he looked at his minions, some of which felt like they were being held up by his chakra strings, and some of which...did not…

Wait.

Five more hoods came down. Obito and I both recoiled reflexively.

Realistically speaking, the three puppets among the group were last week’s news. Both of us could tear them to hilariously tiny bits in a split second if we wanted to. I’d destroyed as many of them as I could easily catch just one attack ago. But the sight of those blank yellow eyes and chalky white flesh was one I had hoped never to see again. I had managed to get the mummified Ten-Tails thrown into space for the sole purpose of avoiding this kind of shit.

But apparently Zetsu clones were like cockroaches. There were always more.

“Wh-where’d you get those?” Obito demanded, his Sharingan shifting between three-tomoe and full Mangekyō as he tried to stare down the Zetsu clones at the same time. It was a task made more difficult by their position—the puppets (and Sasori) were in the middle with the Zetsu clones acting as bookends in a line.

“I don’t think you deserve to know,” Sasori remarked as he gave us both assessing glances and his lackeys...might have been licking their chops. Anyway, Sasori had a combination of vocal range and tone that radiated unadulterated smug. “Phantom Obito and the Tidal Blade...my, your reputations don’t illustrate much about either of you. Disappointing.”

Oh no, not the art thing. Not again.

Besides, I preferred Deidara’s approach anyway.

“Says the living puppet,” I said, watching for any change in Sasori’s body language. Of course, there didn’t really have to be any since he was both a living puppet and a puppetmaster, and thus some simple considerations flew out the window, but it was the thought that counted.

Obito’s visible eye widened and he did a brief double-take, but when his gaze fell on Sasori again afterward, it was like watching the pieces fall into place.

“That explains what I was seeing. If that’s your secret, you don’t understand who you’re dealing with at all,” Obito muttered. He shifted his weight on the water’s surface, and I saw him change his fighting stance entirely as he drew on a different skillset. He put most of his weight on his left leg, pulled back and knee bent. One arm tucked in against his side while the other was raised in an unmistakable tribute to Gai’s Strong Fist starting pose.

I knew how to take a hint. As far as combat went, anyway.

I brought out yet more of Isobu’s chakra as a general deterrent, then leaned forward over my leading foot. Hand low but on the hilt of my sword, ready to draw at the first instant—

Two of Sasori’s puppets leapt at us first. Coordinated, of course, because he was a puppeteer second to none, but Obito and I had been fighting together for almost as long as Sasori had been a household name. And of the two sides involved in the battle, one had a jinchūriki and an Uchiha. The other had killer puppets.

Even when the third puppet joined in, it wasn’t much of a contest. While I swept my sword across in an overhead arc that split one puppet in half from crown all the way down through one foot, Obito backflipped over me in the wake of my strike and cut the other two puppets down with perfect Wood Release javelin shots. He couldn’t have done better with two Sharingan.

And then the Zetsus.

Now, to be perfectly clear—Zetsu clones were not and have never been skilled fighters in the sense of being trained. But they were fast, strong, unrelenting and unresponsive to pain, and there were always more of them than anyone could spot off-hand.

And as soon as the two corner Zetsus rushed Obito and me, fifteen more of the bastards erupted from the water all around us.

Two sweeps of Isobu’s tails cleared them out before they could touch solid ground again, and in that brief gap, Sasori was nothing more than a black shadow hauling off in the direction of Jiraiya and Rin’s chakra signatures.

“Oh no you fucking don’t,” I snarled, half under my breath and buoyed by Isobu’s chakra.

Obito vanished into thin air next to me, reappearing just to Sasori’s left in the distance and sawing his leg off at the knee. Being Sasori, this meant exactly nothing, and I spotted the severed leg flying back under its own power to rejoin the whole.

It wasn’t enough just to cut him to pieces, given the lovely demonstration of his self-assembling skills. Sasori’s...whatever his heart was in? That bit had to die first. Or last, depending on what way we looked at the problem. And I hadn’t told Obito about that explicitly, but he was smart enough to read his opponent’s’ chakra for anatomical anomalies. A big knot of chakra like that stuck out like a sore thumb to me, so I couldn’t imagine what kind of hideous mess it made in Obito’s vision.

He apparently chose to deal with that problem thusly: “Fire Release: Fire Dragon Flame Bullet!”

Obito’s signature oversized fireball twisted in midair, forming three separate streams of flame the size of tree trunks. Each one promptly sprouted a long, narrow head complete with fangs, and all of them rounded on Sasori’s puppet body. While Obito pumped yet more chakra into his fiery chakra construct, giving it more coils and more heads, Sasori stopped dead on the water’s surface in the midge of all that fire.

...Of course, puppets with no internal organs didn’t need to breathe. Fire did. And immediately after
I remembered that little tidbit, Sasori dropped through the water’s surface like a rock.

Obito landed on the water’s surface a moment later, and then immediately got out of the way as Isobu’s chakra permeated the river like a cloud of blood.

I lifted my hand, visualizing the orb Isobu and I were creating. Chakra flowed down through my legs and stopped the flow of the river dead in its tracks for a dozen meters around me. “Water Prison.”

All the water in the area jumped, waves I didn’t control sloshing over the watery cube that I did. And somewhere in the middle of the not-an-ice-cube, enveloped in water made solid, was Sasori’s puppet body. Once I had his little fishbowl of a trap isolated, I lifted it out of the water to view my catch.

Obito sauntered back over, stepping carefully around the body of the Water Prison. I wouldn’t let him get sucked in, but there was no harm in being cautious. He looked up at Sasori’s limp and unmoving body in the jutsu, perhaps a tad smug. “Ha! Not so slippery now, are you?”

I frowned and turned the Water Prison over in midair so I could see more clearly. A quick hop brought me close enough to examine my prey, and the problem therein.

“You’ve gotta be fucking kidding me,” I muttered, upon spotting the gaping hole in my plan. Or, to be more specific, the gaping hole in puppet Sasori’s chest where his heart should have been. The soda bottle sized cylinder was distinctly absent, which sort of put a damper on my plan to use the Water Prison and crush him under as many fathoms of pressure as I could manage with Isobu’s help.

Yeah, this was leaning toward doubleplus ungood. “Obito, this puppet’s empty! Get the other one!”

Obito saw my expression and, between me collapsing the bubble like a dwarf star and atomizing Sasori’s puppet body, was already moving at a dead run directly toward Rin and Jiraiya’s chakra signatures.

And then more Zetsu clones burst from the ground like daisies from hell, and I cut the nearest two of them down with a pair of Water-coated kunai just to clear Obito’s path.

I didn’t know how this area was laid out, before or after the big historic throwdown. I didn’t have some kind of mental catalog of hiding places, but I was suddenly sure that none of that mattered. No matter how well-hidden Rin and Jiraiya were, we couldn’t let Sasori get that far. Jiraiya wouldn’t have left the battlefield unless something was badly wrong, and the idea of Rin trying to confront a S-class missing-nin who had given super-strength Sakura pause didn’t bear thinking about.

Obito disappeared through the trunk of a tree. I clawed my way up the cliff face with Zetsus barking at my heels, then followed suit into the forest.

“So, where’d you jerks come from this time?” I yelled at the nearest ones, because the Putties were pretty fast and agile when they wanted to be and were keeping up.

Madara was too dead to be behind this new incursion, and damned if I knew who else would willingly hook himself up to a Zetsu control module. Which, then, begged the question of where exactly they’d come from. Given Nagato’s Zetsu-magnet power and the fact that he’d figured it out before leaving the Land of Fire that first time, did that mean that these things had lain dormant for almost six years solely to jump out at us again now? Or had something happened to the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path’s orbit?

“You really wanna know?” asked the nearest Zetsu clone, as I ducked behind a tree in a blur of Isobu’s red chakra.

If I didn’t think too hard about the implications of the Statue being relevant again, I could pretend that this was just a high-stakes game of tag. If the Zetsu clones could corner me, they’d do their damndest to rip me to pieces. This after we’d killed the original White Zetsu, either in the Amegakure purge or when Kurama had gone all Godzilla back in Konoha. All that really meant was that when the White Zetsu clones decided to kill us all, it was partly motivated by revenge and not just orders from on high.

“I’m sure it’s a good story. It might be funny.” I forced some levity into my voice, which came out funny with Isobu’s tones overlaying mine. Due to several additional factors—anger, fear, and so on —the attempt failed miserably.

“Funny?” asked another one, before Isobu’s left chakra tail flattened into a blade and sliced the speaker in two.

And yet, another clone picked up the slack. “Do you think it’s funny that the original died because of you?”

Actually, I kinda did. An immortal monster bent on using the Tailed Beasts to destroy the entire human race, only to be thwarted by a bunch of people applying their resources rationally? Sounded appropriate to me. Even if Madara had gone and died of old age, I was including both Black and White Zetsu in my “monster” category.

I had a somewhat twisted sense of humor.

“Shouldn’t I?” I asked them. There were easily a half-dozen now, trying to avoid being cut down at the same time that they were constantly keeping me from making much progress through the forest.
Obito didn’t have to worry about them with his powers, at least.

One of them let out a wordless snarl and charged me, but Isobu’s tail batted it aside and through a tree.

Someone was going to be getting yelled at about all the ecological damage we were doing. Probably me, since I planned to live long enough for that lecture.

“I mean,” I went on, as I ducked under another flying Zetsu and casually cut him in two at the waist with a chakra-charged katana stroke. The two halves landed somewhere behind me, but I didn’t have much time to dwell on that if I wanted to keep bantering. “It’s not like you’re planning on adopting all the puppies in the world or ending poverty. You eat people.”

“That was only one person, and one time!” said one of the group, only to be punched in the head by his nearest comrade.

This is the best the enemy could send against us?

They pretty much never are. Without the forward planning necessary to grab a chakra sample for a disguise, Zetsu clones were mostly cannon fodder. Sure, I couldn’t really determine which people were Zetsu clones and which ones were the real deal, but…

Ah, hell.

I hadn’t seen Obito in two minutes and my paranoia was already back with a vengeance. This was why I hated Zetsu clones, aside from the fact that they were a merry band of people-eaters.

Water Trumpet. One fountain of water out of nowhere, right on cue, blasted the Zetsus out of my way and into various shrubbery. While making hand signs for my next trick—Water Dragon Bullet
—I kept half a mind’s eye on Obito’s chakra as it continued to move.
Sasori was still ahead of him somewhere, but it wasn’t going to stay that way for long. When those two clashed…

Actually, you know what? Screw this.

And Isobu dropped a miniature Tailed Beast Bomb at our feet. The world got really loud for the second time in about ten minutes, as earthen and wooden debris flew everywhere, leveling the forest for fifty meters directly around me.

While there was certainly no more Zetsu problem in the immediate area after that, that still left us with some catching up to do.
I levered a piece of mangled tree trunk out of my path, grimacing at the amount of damage I’d done in a bare handful of seconds. While I was a poor environmentalist, almost everything taller than a coffee table had been leveled in a twenty-meter ring of death around me. Isobu, for all that he’d helped me construct a miniature Tailed Beast Bomb, had a couple of problems with scaling things down. It probably came with the whole “being a giant monster” package.

The damage isn’t that bad. Isobu surveyed the world through my eyes, then rolled his. Now, if I’d managed to place the secondary compressing layer and added a counter-spin to the surface—

Can we please save that particular refinement for when we can practice with Kushina again? I asked him, clambering out of the crater we’d made. And it was a mess of a crater, full of debris and mud and Zetsu corpses. For all that they didn’t have organs, they squelched as much as any mundane life-form. I tried to avoid getting it on my shoes.

Outside of the immediate blast radius, the terrain gradually shifted from “thoroughly demolished” to “eh, maybe” as I ran toward my friends’ chakra signatures. While there was a possibility that Zetsus were lying in wait for me, whether among the un-flattened trees or underground, moving at near top speed let me avoid their attention. Or perhaps they just knew a losing fight when they saw one.

Maybe.

It could happen, I thought defensively.

I won’t hold my breath.

...Do you even do that? Ever? I ducked under a tree branch that, if I had hit it head-on without my V1 cloak active, would have probably decapitated me from physics alone. I wasn’t currently in danger, but recklessness was a bad habit to get into. And Isobu’s blessings never lasted quite long enough to get the job done.

Your body is the problem here, not my power, Isobu pointed out in an annoyingly reasonable tone. You should be able to last this fight with time to spare.

I made sure my mental avatar gave him my most skeptical expression. Dubious, lifted eyebrow included.

Just get back to work.

I tossed him a grin and did so.

Forests could be tricky terrain, and not just when traversing the lower levels at night. Contrary to popular belief, as inspired by movies and probably a few featuring vampires or werewolves in particular, people simply didn’t move that fast in heavy brush. Caution was the name of the game, because the only thing worse than being in the midst of uncharted wilderness and needing to travel through it is to do so while injured. That didn’t even cover elevation, unexpected geography, or wild animals that might be lurking in the area.
But as a shinobi, I had two major cheats. Even beyond just being trained for this kind of terrain, Konoha shinobi were pretty much all literally superhuman. Bear Grylls had nothing on us. The combination of speed, strength, endurance, and experience were pretty hard to beat. The widespread gymnast’s grace was also pretty helpful. The second cheat was, well, that I was a jinchūriki, and petty concerns like inanimate obstacles didn’t factor into my pathfinding much if at all.

The shortest distance between points? A straight line. Cue me, the turtle-shaped freight train.

I’d never been the kind of person to participate in foot races, for reasons ranging from lack of interest to reincarnation trauma related to gym class, but Isobu and I working together could probably travel a hundred and eighty kilometers per hour in a straight line. Without using a specific technique for a speed boost.

Finding my friends didn’t take all that long.

I just had to keep going past the hundred yards of new charcoal that indicated where Obito made his stand. Knowing him, he only stuck around long enough to confirm that his enemies were doing a Wicked Witch of the West impression before waltzing off into the sunset. His chakra was safely out of the way, though agitated, and I couldn’t pick up any other hostiles near him.

At least, there were none close enough to bum rush Obito. Not that it would work.

“Hi, Kei!” Obito shouted, spitting a cloud of smoke to shroud the battlefield a moment later. Obito, being the kind of person who would find a way to set asbestos on fire with brute force if necessary, wouldn’t be held back by his literal smokescreen. I made a mental note to consider introducing him to thermite later.

“Any news?” I asked him, after three of Isobu’s chakra tails had brought me forcibly to a stop. His tails left massive furrows in the ground behind me, but better brakes had yet to be invented.

Obito shrugged, letting his hand drop from his mouth. He’d long outgrown needing his hands to direct his flames after completing the relevant jutsu, but some habits were hard to break. “I’m just holding everyone here. Rin went on ahead, so go join her. Then I’ll just burn everything and catch up.”

“Bye, Obito!” I shouted back, though Isobu’s chakra colored my response into something a little more guttural-sounding than usual. Since I was leaving faint trails of red chakra as I moved—not enough to be detectable long-term, but still there—Obito’s help in cutting visual contact with pursuers worked out in my favor.

Shortly after I resumed my run, it seemed like everything I’d already damaged was the recipient of a massive, fiery coup de grace. There was no mushroom cloud, or excessive pressure wave, but everything in the area was probably wishing that “stop-drop-and-roll” was still relevant to the situation.

Wasn’t like there weren’t more Zetsus where those came from. I didn’t know where exactly the “where” in that equation was, but it could wait a little longer. I’d burn that bridge when I got around to it.

Well outside of the original battlefield, I finally let the V1 cloak drop and drew Isobu’s chakra back into my body. If I strained my left arm’s seals too much, I wouldn’t be using that arm for a damned long time. On the other edge of the concern-o-meter, Rin wouldn’t like it if I disturbed any kind of delicate medical procedure with Tailed Beast chakra flying everywhere. And I had no idea how Jiraiya was doing.
I tracked Rin’s chakra more than Jiraiya’s, solely because I was more familiar with hers, and found their hiding spot in a shallow cave. More of a lean-to, really, with a rock wall that had tree roots growing over the edges as an improvised wall. The roots, feathery and brown, neatly broke up Rin’s uniform outline and let her work in peace.

Rin’s voice rang out before I could get too close. “Stay right there, Kei.” Or else went unspoken.

Infiltrator protocols were fun. Unfortunately, they were also a reality we had to live with. Zetsus could talk, but their judgment was spotty and their aggression was all too real.

“You know that if I was actually a Zetsu, I’d totally disobey that order,” I reminded her.

Rin’s response was gratifyingly quick. “And you would spend your last minute wondering why your teeth were in your sinuses.”

I’d give her seven out of ten for creativity. “Okay, I’m sitting.” To emphasize my compliance, I plunked my butt down on a tree trunk a good ten meters away from Rin. Sure, it was well within a kill zone but the fact that I was obeying was probably a point in my favor. Then a stray thought struck me. “Do Zetsu clones actually have sinuses?”

“Keep pushing and we might find out,” Rin said over her shoulder. While she’d hidden the chakra her patients gave off by existing thanks to the power of security seals, it didn’t take a Hyuga to know that she had two patients and one of them was Jiraiya. The other patient was hidden by a dip in the ground, while Jiraiya was sitting up. The dull red was perfectly visible if I was looking right at it.

So I was a nosy person. Sue me.

Since my own work was blurring out chakra signatures I wanted to read, I cast my metaphorical line further out into the water. There were other chakra signatures out there, including Obito and Sasori repeatedly trying to kill each other with slightly smaller jutsu than before and the requisite gaggle of Zetsu clones. But as long as Obito didn’t seem to be in distress, I’d let him handle that. Even if Rin could deliver death threats like a champ, I needed to stick around in case she needed to make those threats a reality.

Isobu, if we need to use summon contract...things, I asked him since I had nothing else to do but wait, can I ask you to lend chakra to Rin, if she needs it?

Are you certain we’d need it? Isobu asked back. I can do anything the largest summon animals can do, and I don’t get hurt.

I frowned. Yeah, but you’re held back by, well, me. And Tsuruya should never be within half a kilometer of any fight you’re interested in.

Isobu gave me the equivalent of a shrug, which I had never really understood in a mechanical sense when it came to giant turtles. Isobu having arms just made the whole thing more confusing.

I probably would have gone on in that vein for a while longer if, at that moment, the security seal hadn’t been deactivated. I didn’t stand up, because Rin probably would have mauled anyone making sudden movements around her vulnerable patients, but I did look at the entrance to the improvised medical tent in time to see Jiraiya emerge.

He looked like hell. The last two feet of his spiky white ponytail had been roughly hacked off, and the smell of burned hair hit my nose like a hammer. His clothes were torn and covered in blood, dirt, ash, and whatever Zetsu clones were filled with. One of his eyebrows was split and held together by a butterfly bandage, with dried blood trailing down over one eye. But the big thing, which sent a shudder through me, was the fact that his left arm ended in a bloody stump.

And somehow despite that, Jiraiya met my eyes squarely. Oh, he was in pain, but there was a thing in this universe where limb loss didn’t slow S-class shinobi down nearly as much as would make sense.

“When killed me?” Jiraiya demanded as he approached, his eyes narrowed. His chakra didn’t outright dwarf mine, but the fact that he could still focus it enough to remain a coherent threat? I knew better than to argue.

I had to admit, putting that kind of info to use as a password? Good idea. “Nagato.”

Jiraiya relaxed millimeters at a time, but I wasn’t sure how much of that tension stayed due to pain or just because of how terrible of a situation we were in. Zetsu clones tended to do that. “Took you long enough to get here.”

If I had been more inclined to joke and probably a lot more of an asshole, I might’ve made a crack about him needing a bunch of kids to give him a hand. As it was, I was pretty sure he wouldn’t appreciate me helping him sit down on the log or anything, so I got to my feet to match him and tried not to hover. “Jiraiya-sama?”

“It’s nothing,” he replied, though the way he was swaying slightly—probably from blood loss—betrayed him. “So take it Kösuke got through. How many people did Minato send?”

“Me, Obito, and Rin,” I said. At Jiraiya’s expectant look, I clarified, “Kakashi’s hurt, so it’s just us three this time. Against Sasori and his goons, that should be enough.”

Jiraiya stared at me, then very slowly raised his remaining hand and pinched the bridge of his nose. “Tell me you didn’t just say that.”

“...At least it wasn’t ‘nothing can stop us now’?” I suggested weakly, wincing as I replayed that last statement in my head.

Jiraiya set his mouth into a grim line. Then he said aloud, “Rin-kun, is it safe to move your other patient?”

“That depends,” Rin said, sticking her head out of the lean-to. “Can you summon anything?”

Jiraiya grimaced.

“Then we just need to move faster.” Rin’s expression was entirely closed-off, blank in a way that only ever boded ill. Her eyes met mine and my stomach dropped even before she said, “Kei, if we can’t get him to a hospital immediately, your brother is going to die.”

The world stood still.

Jiraiya was almost frozen with his mouth open, like he had something to say that would matter. Rin was frowning in concern, but her attention was already back on her patient and getting him out of the cave. After flexing my fingers, more to see if I could still move than anything, I joined Rin at the lip of the cave without processing the space between me and it.

His headband was gone when I looked, so dirt caught in his hair when Rin started to move him. A clear mask covered Hayate’s mouth and nose. Blood flecked the inside when he coughed. His eyelids twitched a little, after, but he didn’t get up or notice anything before going limp again.
“Sasori poisoned him,” Rin said, in case I was listening. “I don’t have the right treatment here, but I did have a breathing mask.”

She went on for a while about the exact symptoms. I heard maybe two things. Three at the outside.

My brother was coughing blood.

He’d drown on dry land if he didn’t get help. More help than Rin could provide.

I rested my hand against Hayate’s damp forehead, feeling heat running up my fingers. Rin stopped talking about technical details then, and let me say, “W-we need Obito.”

“I can get him,” Jiraiya suggested. One part of me was shouting about his hand, but the rest didn’t hear it until he was already gone.

“Obito can only move so many people without wearing himself out,” Rin whispered, though she had one glowing hand against Hayate’s chest. “Triage. We get Jiraiya-sama and Hayate-kun out, then we look for Anko-chan ourselves.”

“Anko?” What—

“Obito will be back to help us fight and look,” Rin assured me.

That did not answer my question. I didn’t know what I was asking, but the answer was still not what I was looking for. No, I needed to—

Hayate coughed again and more complex thoughts flew out of my head. He was halfway across my lap and I was trying to soothe him by whispering before I knew it. “Shh, shh, I’m here now. You’re going to be okay.”

Except for my utter lack of advanced medical techniques. I didn’t have the knowledge to fix anything. All I could do was support Rin.

“Kei, if Obito leaves, you need to take his place,” Rin reminded me, and I blinked at her in sheer confusion. Her jaw worked for a moment as she tried to find the right words, and then she said, “You’ll be able to make Sasori pay.”

Isobu rumbled, To say the least.

I looked down at Hayate, leaning down so I could give him a hug. Gently, and even yielding when he coughed blood again. Then I let Rin pry him out of my arms with as much care as she could manage. He was bigger than her, so his arms dragged on the ground.

I got to my feet just as Jiraiya and Obito arrived, pursued by Zetsu clones.

I turned my head and spat a ten-meter waterspout in their general direction. Obito had the level of prescience necessary to drag Jiraiya bodily out of the way, but the Zetsu clones were blasted back where they’d come from. Look Ma, no hand seals!

“Close c—Hayate?!” Obito yelped when he finally had a chance to see everyone. I didn’t ask what kind of silent conversation he had with Rin a second later when their eyes met, but things moved fast after that. He got a firmer grip on Jiraiya’s sleeve, then sucked the Sannin into his Kamui dimension with zero warning.

I was never going to get used to seeing the taffy puller visual effect of that jutsu. Ever.
“Take him to the hospital right now.” Rin produced a list of medical notes, all in hospital shorthand, and tucked it into the collar of Hayate’s shredded flak jacket. She said to Obito, “Make any medic-nin read this first before they start treatment.”

I didn’t even want to think about what might happen if they didn’t.

Obito nodded, then reached down and made Hayate vanish as well. Once both patients were secure in his pocket dimension, he turned his attention back to us. “Rin, you’re staying here?”

“I can hold out for as long as it takes to make a return trip, Obito,” Rin reminded him. She got to her feet and brushed dust from her clothes, then pricked her finger with a needle-thin sliver of chakra. A single drop of blood ran down her finger, and then she brought her hand down on the ground.

Obito and I both knew where this was going, and stepped back post-haste.

“Summoning jutsu!”

If I considered Suika-sensei a representative of average size for the scorpion summon contract, the next oversized arachnid was something two standard deviations too large. Suika-sensei was the size of a minivan, but this scorpion was about as big as a city bus if not counting her tail, which added another entire body length onto the measurement. Her stinger, claws, and thorax were a pale yellow-green, where everything else on her body looked an almost ghostly white. When the summoning smoke cleared, all eight of the new scorpion’s eyes focused on Obito and me, then slowly rotated to look as far back as they could manage and catch a glimpse of her summoner.

“This is Moyashi-chan,” Rin said, patting her eight-legged steed.

I supposed that, if I ignored literally everything else about Moyashi aside from her coloration, she sort of resembled a soybean sprout. She also was about as well-camouflaged as a white whale on a black backdrop.

“What are we fighting today, Rin-sama?” Moyashi asked, clicking her pincers. The eyes focused on Obito and me again. “Are we fighting you two?”

“No, Moyashi-chan,” Rin said, even as she healed the pin-prick in her finger with hardly a thought. “When Sasori comes over here, though, Kei and I will fight to the death.”

“Specifically Sasori’s death,” I added for clarity’s sake. When the scorpion did her best to nod without having an actual neck, I turned to Obito and said firmly, “And Obito, be careful when you get in and out of the area. If I’m gonna break Sasori’s heart, I’m going to be completely literal and it will involve explosives.”

“You got it.” And with that, Obito disappeared into a wormhole of his own creation.

I closed my eyes. Isobu, cut me off if I go too far.

You say that like I don’t.

Deep breaths. Deeeeeeep breaths.

I was going to kill Sasori. It would take time, effort, and a lot of explosives to finally turn him into paste, but there was a reason he was the first member of Akatsuki to bite it.

Jiraiya was missing a hand and we don’t know why, Isobu reminded me. He slapped the surface of the mental sea with one tail, then said, Do not underestimate him.
I glanced at Rin while she stuck herself to Moyashi’s back like Spider-Man at his best. I wouldn’t be involving Tsuruya in this fight, but Rin’s summons were more suited for close-range violence. The three of us, like this, would probably be able to pin Sasori down long enough to make a kill-zone around him.

I needed a chance to test my new jutsu anyway. And Sasori needed to learn to appreciate...science. Rin, to my everlasting disappointment, found Sasori before I did. Sure, he and a couple of puppeteered Zetsu clones and maybe two actual puppets threw the first figurative punch, but I was fifteen meters away and elbow-deep in more Zetsus at the time. Out of position. Sure, taking point kinda meant that kind of thing happened, but I would have given...something to be the first one to cave the local Ken doll’s face in.

But Sasori’s attempt to kill the medic first did not go according to plan.

Rin’s chakra blazed and she thrust one hand forward into the empty air between them—and Sasori’s arm flew off, severed by an invisible blade. Not just from a joint, which he could have easily reattached with chakra strings, but I heard later that she cut through the wooden bicep and the control cables that had replaced the missing-nin’s tendons.

Moyashi called it a “perfect shot.”

I wasn’t inclined to agree, given what happened immediately afterward. Rin’s first hit had apparently only been a range-finder of sorts, because her next scalpel hit was very much not one—instead, she punched Sasori’s legs off the rest of his body by hitting him square in the cable reel.

It was located where his intestines ought to have been, but made him look a bit like a fishing rod in reverse. Rin didn’t do the obvious thing and grab the cable to reel him back in for more face-punching, but that was fine.

Sasori shot off into the depths of the valley from the force of Rin’s punch (or possibly fear), while Moyashi’s long stinger impaled several Zetsu clones in rapid succession. Her claws were like oversized bolt cutters instead of mere appendages, and thus did Rin and her summoned partner scythe through the Zetsu clones like wheat.

Obito would probably have been applauding by this point.

I held up the last Zetsu of my target group by the throat, shrugged, and knocked his head off with a chakra-enhanced palm strike. Then I bounded back over to Rin and her mobile Cuisinart for a status update.

“So, did you ever finish that White Strength Seal?” I asked casually, even as I slid a few of my more wicked-looking weapons out of my thigh holster. Really, they were mostly iron balls that I could rig to explode with a thought, but shrapnel was one of the more effective weapons in my arsenal for squishy targets.

Sure, Sasori mostly wasn’t squishy, but I was willing to experiment.

Rin turned her head to face me, and the purple mark on her forehead matched her cheek tattoos perfectly. As I watched, the little diamond melted away into her skin at the exact moment that dark lines spread out from the same spot and engulfed Rin’s tattoos.

Rin smiled, and the black marks seemed to glow with eerie power. “Does that answer your question?”
I grinned savagely back. While I could safely leave Sasori to Rin now, I wanted him dead just a little too much. I couldn’t stay out of this. “I call dibs on Pinocchio.”

Rin blinked. “What?”

Wrong universe. And language.

I sighed. And it was such a good line, too. “Never mind. I’m gonna stick him in the nastiest barrier ninjutsu I have and then kill him. You in?”

“Lead the way.”

Obito

I first met Hayate back when I was eight, a little after the first time I met Kei. He was a little kid with a serious case of hero worship for pretty much everyone who’d spend the time to teach him things. I didn’t teach him all that much, but I made him laugh and I’m sure that counts for something. Mostly we just kinda grew up together, with his mom acting like my mom couldn’t, and him acting like the kid brother I didn’t have at first. It’s been more than twelve years since then, and while I’m not as smothering as Kei is, I still think of him as family.

I first met Jiraiya when I was ten, and he’s been the weird uncle or grandpa pretty much since then. He knew what it was like to be the one no one expects to be anything. The class clown. The failure. It took me way too long to see it, but he’s been one of those kinda weird role models for me that I’m sure Kei would have tons to say about if she knew I was thinking of it.

I’m not gonna let either one of them die today.

The medics flood us, since this isn’t the first time I’ve showed up with a lot of people in need of surgery. Rin has the main receptionist pretty well trained, and a hospital-wide alert is already going on.

“Get the kid first,” Jiraiya orders the nearest medic, resting his remaining hand on Hayate’s forehead. “Most of this blood isn’t mine.”

“You’re missing a hand, Jiraiya-sama,” the medic squeaks.

“So I’m missing a pint and a hand,” Jiraiya allows, and I wince when I see the bloodied bandages again. He tucks the injury closer to his chest and adds, “But the other liter or so still isn’t mine.”

“Where’d it even come from, then?” I want to know, though Jiraiya’s already being packed up to be...probably yelled at by Tsunade, if I’m being realistic. Maybe she knows how to do something for him.

Zetsu clones don’t bleed, Hayate’s only been coughing and Rin would have caught everything else, Kei and me didn’t get there until after all of this started, and Sasori is a puppet. Who else was there?

“This is Anko-kun’s.” Jiraiya grimaces as one of the medics tries to peek underneath the bandages. Blood tends to stick.

I only really know Anko from a distance, through Hayate or through Yūgao or through other people, but she’s someone I know. And that’s her blood all over Jiraiya, and it got on me and did Rin even know about this? What kind of insane mission did these kids go on, anyway?
“Sasori took her alive, Obito. Get her back,” Jiraiya orders, before the medics finally drag him off.

I don’t leave immediately. Instead, I warp to my apartment and dig through the medicine cabinet for soldier pills. Rin probably has a set with her, but I’m going to be using a lot of chakra if I want to get Anko back alive and I don’t feel like taking any chances.

Then I use Kamui and walk through the dimensional doors to the battlefield.

I think I was gone for about two minutes. In that time, Rin and Kei have torn the place apart. Anything taller than me is now not, because there are smashed tree trunks and upended boulders and decapitated Zetsu clones lying absolutely everywhere. Nothing is flat, but the rubble left after this kind of clash of wills looks like something out of an action manga. Jiraiya wishes he could write this much destruction in this short of a timespan.

Off in the distance, Kei’s reddish chakra glows like a star as she tears her way across the area over and over again. I don’t have perfect Hyuga vision, but I can see one of Rin’s combat summon animals ferrying her around as they rip through the chaff of Sasori’s forces.

I have no idea where he’s getting so many flunkies, but I need to cut them off.

I take a deep breath. No, first I get Anko out of danger and then I burn everything to the ground. It has to be in that order. Anko is more important than any of them.

First, I need to find her.

I’m not a tracker or anything like that, and I can’t really see chakra once the owner’s run off somewhere else. But picking out really large masses of concentrated chakra is dead easy with a complete Sharingan, as long as it’s active.

There’s a little knot of them half a kilometer that way. Luckily, it’s around the side of the cliffs that I’m already on, so I can avoid having to cross wide-open areas and possibly get caught up in the S-class brawl going on between Rin, Kei, and Sasori. Sooner or later Kei is going to break out the Uchiha Flame Formation I taught her, or Rin will punch Sasori to pieces with Tsunade’s strength. I almost feel sorry for Sasori.

Almost. He still hurt my friends. He’s going to pay.

I use my Sharingan as little as possible on my approach. A quick camouflage genjutsu does the job of getting me close to the mob undetected just as well as Kamui would, and it doesn’t have nearly the same risk of dumping me right in the middle of the mess. I can’t risk people finding out what Kamui’s weaknesses are, even if otherwise the approach should be foolproof.

Eventually, I slink through the forest to the clearing I spotted from such a long way off. It’s not all that big, but it’s been cleared of debris from either flying trees or whatever else gets kicked up in S-class fights. Though there aren’t any anchoring stones, the site is clearly a big, fat seal that’s already active. Someone’s inked a whole ring of calligraphy in a circle about two meters across, and the Zetsu clones are all standing around outside of it.

Well, almost all of them. One of them is standing in the middle. Standing over Anko, who’s face-down in the middle of a circle that looks all too much like the one Kushina was trapped in once. Its hand is over the Curse Seal on her neck.

I clench my right hand next to my thigh, then grow a meter-long length of wood from my wrist. Even to my sight, my arm blurs and then suddenly there’s a stake sticking out of the lead Zetsu’s eye socket. The intervening air cracks a fraction of a second later, and the Zetsu takes a little longer than that to flop over backwards.

Then a lot of things happen all at once.

Anko slumps over while something bulges from the inside of her flak jacket collar, and the fifteen other Zetsus turn on me like a pack of pasty wolves. The seal on the ground crawls across it like a length of rope, centering on Anko, and I drive a second spike through the nearest Zetsu clone at the same time that my Sharingan goes momentarily flash-blind.

Who the shit uses that much chakra in such a narrow—

 Nope, eye shut—I know how to do this—and a quick series of stabs rips right through my opponents as easily as one of Kei’s fragmentation explosives. Each Zetsu that charges takes too long to get to me, so I go to them, pulling a secondary javelin out of my sleeve and impaling everyone not named Anko.

Shrapnel is just a bunch of metal or stone flying ‘cause of an explosion, but I need to move almost that fast to really get what I need out of my Sharingan’s viewpoint. Or at least it seems like it right now.

Everyone’s dead inside of a second.

“Kukukukukuku…”

Or not.

I open my eye again.

Kei

I was something of an expert on swords, at least from the user end of things. Weight, balance, and cutting edges were as familiar to me as the back of my own hand. I’d trained for over half my life for the level of skill I had at age twenty, and tended to default to using my katana if jutsu weren’t absolutely necessary. Or if Isobu was staying out of the fight for whatever reason. Or if my opponents were too far away and I didn’t feel like chasing them down.

Look, the point was that I used edged weapons an awful lot.

Rin had never been one for any kind of weaponry bigger than a kunai. She used traps when she had to, but for the most part her personal instant death radius wasn’t all that big. She had more range on chakra scalpels than I did, but didn’t channel them through anything to extend her reach any farther, and anyway she needed her chakra for her medical miracles. To waste energy on killing people while she had teammates to do it for her was unthinkable for any medic.

And then she’d gotten a summon contract.

I still wanted Sasori in pieces at my feet. If at all possible, I’d rip his heart out and stomp on it, then mail the rest of him back to Suna so they could use the wooden bits left over as a trophy. It would be just about enough to smother the rage pounding through my system.

Rin was making the entire process of getting a clean shot at him impossible, because she was taking all of them for herself.

“Leave some for me!” I shouted, as a puppet’s crushed arm flew up and over my head. If Rin kept going, Sasori would be reduced to puppeting Zetsu clones or trying to use one of us against the other.

“Never!” Moyashi snapped, as she grabbed a slower Zetsu and crushed it to death in her claws. Over the summoned scorpion’s head, Rin had impaled another Zetsu clone on a near-invisible chakra blade and jerked the blade upward, bisecting its upper ribcage and head.

I’m starting to like this human. More of them should make contracts with summons like this one.

That was about as close as Isobu had ever gotten to giving Rin compliments.

That said, she’s being selfish. I want to tear this puppet master into small pieces myself.

Or through me, you mean?

Semantics.

Well, I couldn’t argue with Isobu’s whims when I shared the sentiment. I didn’t have much in the way of moral high ground.

So, while Rin sliced Sasori’s chakra strings apart for the umpteenth time since activating her White Strength Seal, I used the Body Flicker to interpose myself before Rin could slash at him directly. One seal wrapped around a kunai later, and one underhand toss directly into Sasori’s face... “Uchiha Flame Formation.”

A massive, cylindrical column of blood-red fire sprang up around Sasori, trapping him and his very flammable chassis in a space that was barely six square meters. Even if he could touch the walls without instantly immolating himself, the column of the barrier ninjutsu extended so far vertically that there wasn’t a way to leap out safely.

It was kind of the reason I’d modified the technique for single-target use.

“You know,” I commented mildly as Isobu’s chakra tails joined Rin and Moyashi in swatting the remainder of the Zetsu swarm, “I think I might just want to try Fire Release for my next nature transformation. What do you think?”

Even when trapped in what amounted to a test tube made of fire, Sasori’s face didn’t shift. Sure, he had the ability to make expressions even as a puppet, but why bother? He couldn’t fight well enough to get away from both of us, and I’d just felt Obito pop back into the battle a few seconds ago. Sasori was basically a charcoal briquette already.

“For poisoning my brother, I’m just gonna kill you,” I told Sasori flatly, and flexed my fingers. The cylinder of fire started to contract. “Go to hell.”

Sasori still didn’t flinch, even as the ends of his cloak caught fire and started to smoke. “I hope you enjoy my last work, Tidal Blade. It’s going to be spectacular.”

And before I could really think on what the fuck that meant, Sasori stuck his arms and face into the flames. Since I’d gotten the jutsu from Obito, and his clan as a whole were basically pyromaniacs pointed in the right direction (read: not ours), Sasori burned to death inside of a minute. Silently.

I cancelled the jutsu once his heart-box fell through the remainder of his body. Moyashi caught it on the point of her stinger, ending Sasori with a little more finality than would have happened otherwise.
I didn’t feel any better.

Hayate was still fighting for his life, I didn’t know why Obito had run off away from the fight, and Jiraiya was still missing a hand. Sasori being dead didn’t change any of that. It just made it so future victims of his mad artist tendencies would be spared of him.

Gaara would never need to know who Sasori even was outside of history books.

I shook my head and turned to Rin, who was sitting next to Moyashi as opposed to on her back. It looked like the scorpion had taken a leg hit, though I didn’t know when or how. “You both okay?”

“We’re fine, Kei,” Rin answered over her shoulder, as though she wasn’t carefully knitting Moyashi’s carapace back together. Once she was finished, she wiped her forehead with her forearm and turned to face me. At some point, the black marks on her face had faded back to the lone purple diamond. “But I think I need a little time to recover.”

I winced. Yeah, the White Strength Seal was looking a little faded compared to standard. I didn’t know how long Rin had been building the chakra to use it, but from the claw-marks on her clothes, she’d gotten some use out of the regenerative part of it in addition to the strength boost. At least it looked like none of those hits had involved poison—not that I thought the White Strength Seal wouldn’t be able to handle that.

“Then I’ll find Obito and we can get out of here.” I still didn’t know what was taking him so damned long to get back to us, but he should have at least arrived in time to see Sasori burn.

After a second’s thought, I dismissed the roiling cloud of Isobu’s chakra from around me. For once, his energy had lasted me the entire fight as opposed to crapping out in the middle and almost killing me.

The fight was shorter than I expected. We could have left most of that to the scorpion. Possibly. I’d still been hell-bent on getting my hits in where I could, even if I wasn’t as effective in the short term as Rin and her battle partner. Maybe someday I’d actually be able to enter V2 again, but for now V1’s longevity was giving me enough to still pass muster as an S-class shinobi.

Or, I thought as I looked at Rin, enough to keep up. She was on a hot streak.

Burning him to death was at least interesting, Isobu allowed after a pause, sensing my melancholy. That was adequate for today.

I wasn’t sure I agreed. After all, I still couldn’t pinpoint Obito.

Right as that thought crossed my mind, Obito’s chakra flared from half a kilometer away. He’d been hiding before, slipping below my detection threshold, but the sensation of summer was suddenly there in a way it hadn’t been since the start of the fight. Immediately, I snapped to attention, reaching out to try and investigate the cause of the sudden shift.

Scales, shifting and sliding over each other—oh fuck.

I knew that chakra. I’d killed the owner of that chakra. His bounty was closed.

“Kei, what—” Rin began, her eyes wide.

Unintentionally, I started pumping out wave after wave of killing intent. It wasn’t so much a conscious reaction as something that kicked me in the hindbrain and sent the “fight” part of “fight or flight” into complete overdrive.

It was a challenge.

Not a challenge between two pure fighters, each wanting to dominate the other. The nature of this challenge was more...basic, than that.

Come over here and I will kill you. So stay the fuck over there.

Not that he needed to know I was afraid.

Then Obito burst out of the side of the cliff, having tunneled through solid stone, and threw a fireball over his shoulder that was big enough to vaporize the Konoha Administration Center. He was already falling, but the blast wave from the fireball shoved him toward the bottom of the Valley of the End faster than gravity. It got him out of the way and crashing into the river below just in time.

The fireball he’d created stopped dead when it hit a...fucking dammit. I recognized the skyscraper-sized Rashōmon Gate just before the fireball plowed into it like a car hitting a brick wall. It didn’t go down without a fight, but that “fight” mostly consisted of setting yet more of the forest on fire.

And knowing the guy who used the fucking Rashōmon as a defensive jutsu, flash-cooking the environment wouldn’t be nearly enough to kill him again.

I could practically hear his stupid laugh ringing in my ears. Kukukuku...

“Obito!” Rin yelled from beside me—and I had no idea when she’d gotten there. Hadn’t she been by Moyashi a second ago? Nonetheless, she was there and shouting as Obito emerged from the river about ten meters downstream.

I looked back at the gigantic defensive summon, inwardly screaming about how that bastard didn’t deserve to be on this planet for even a second longer—and then Isobu cut me off entirely.

No.

I hissed through my teeth, but I knew he was right. We’d accomplished our mission and Orochimaru was...he didn’t have any resources this time and I was perfectly willing to go kill him again later. Preferably before he could reestablish Otogakure. With ANBU backup if I had to. Even if I was sick to my stomach already and whatever animal instincts that carried over from Isobu were telling me to leave it be. To let Orochimaru go in exchange for actually sorting out what the hell had happened here.

And without access to V2, I didn’t know if I could really face off against Orochimaru and win.

Trembling just slightly, I made my way over to where Obito and Rin were—not standing, kneeling. On the ground between them, Anko was breathing shallowly as Rin pumped healing chakra into her.

I guess that explains how the Oreo came back, I thought. Half-hysterical thanks to the adrenaline crash, I probably wouldn’t be any use to Anko. I sat down heavily on a brand-new piece of driftwood, then ran my hand over my face.

I must have zoned out harder than I thought, because my next coherent thought was the observation that someone had pinched me. I looked up and met Rin’s eyes.

“We’re going back to Konoha,” Rin told me. Her expression could have been carved from stone.

“She needs medical attention right now.”
And Obito couldn’t use Kamui on someone he was carrying as well as on other people. I looked over at our still-unconscious patient and noted absently that Obito had grown a neck brace for her out of wood, just in case. No backboard, so Rin must not have detected any spinal damage.

“I can carry her,” I volunteered. It wasn’t like I needed my hands free for any kind of medical whateverwhatsit or convenient teleportation jutsu.

This met with general approval, apparently, because Rin only fussed over the way I was carrying Anko for a few seconds instead of correcting everything. Wasn’t like all the members of Team Minato didn’t know what a fireman’s carry was.

Obito and Rin glanced at each other, and then Obito clasped Rin’s hand. A heartbeat later, she was sucked into the stark Kamui dimension.

Then Obito poked me in the forehead, and got Anko and me at once.

The arrival at the hospital was hectic as all hell, with medics swarming like agitated ants and sweeping Anko away from the main lobby almost before I got the wherewithal to ask an intelligent question. Thanks to Jiraiya and Hayate arriving earlier, the medics must have already been prepared for a few more casualties.

Rin drew both of us over to the side once the commotion was over and the bubble of silence in the lobby was starting to get awkward.

Once Obito was seated in a lobby chair, Rin started healing his eye. I rubbed my temples against an oncoming headache as the last of the fight’s adrenaline finally ebbed away. Still, I paced.

Hayate was two floors above me, and just the fact that I knew that was a relief. Sasori was a master poisoner, but my brother was a fighter and Tsunade had repeatedly stopped all of Suna’s poisons dead in their tracks. It didn’t matter what Chiyo and the other puppeteers had tried to pull, because Tsunade had thoroughly invalidated their effort and, in the nonexistent canon universe, her student Sakura had also been enough of a master of poisons and antidotes to screw Sasori over. At age fifteen, to Sasori’s thirty-five.

Hayate would be okay.

He had to be okay.

My eyes started to burn.

I didn’t know what to do if he wasn’t.

We destroy the ones responsible.

Then why didn’t you let me go after him five fucking minutes ago? I demanded silently.

Recklessly charging after Orochimaru without a plan was going to get you killed. Isobu’s tails twisted and he growled, Or don’t you remember what happened the last time you fought?

...All too well. My entire left arm ached at the reminder. That I’d survived that fight was still something of a miracle in my eyes. If it hadn’t been for so many of my friends showing up to help, I definitely would have failed.

It didn’t really lift my mood, but it doused the anger down to something like hissing coals.
Kinda not helpful, because anger was still more productive than anxiety even if it made me want to punch training dummies into sawdust.

It had taken less than an hour for two things to put our timeline back in line with the canon one: Orochimaru not being dead and Hayate getting his lungs sand-blasted again. I didn’t know how the universe planned on making up this kind of railroaded bullshit to me or anyone else still living in linear time, but at some point it was starting to seem like I was being deliberately targeted.

Saved Obito? Fuck you, Konoha gets invaded anyway! Mitigating circumstances? What are those?

Killed Orochimaru? Well, it turns out no amount of suppression would remove his soul from the Curse Seal and make him perma-dead!

Basically throw all the medics in my life at Hayate the second he started to get a cold? Well, clearly if this hadn’t happened he would have picked up smoking or something!

I felt like punching a wall. Or, better yet, Orochimaru’s stupid face.

“—ei? Kei, stop!” I blinked and spotted Rin’s finger directly in front of my nose. Clearly, the fact that I my face probably looked like a thundercloud didn’t scare her at all.

“What,” I snapped, more out of reflexive anger than anything. Or at having my train of thought interrupted before I could fantasize about a karmically appropriate amount of violence.

“You’re leaking killing intent all over the place,” Obito said, and I belatedly realized that he was right. And yet, his Sharingan wasn’t active.

Rin pulled me over to the line of waiting room chairs and made sure I sat down next to Obito. After a second’s thought, she hugged me around my ribs and Obito looped his left arm around my shoulders.

Come on, what would be distra… I paused. Took a deep breath. One, three, five, seven, eleven, thirteen… Sure, I didn’t know a lot of prime numbers off the top of my head, but thinking about that was probably less likely to give someone on a different floor a terror-induced heart attack. Twenty-three, twenty-nine…

After about thirty seconds of me sitting with my head in my hands, Obito asked, “Feel any better?”

I gave that question all the consideration it deserved. Otherwise known as “none.” “I still want to kill something. Preferably Orochimaru, but I’ll take a training dummy at this point.”

I could practically feel Obito and Rin exchanging alarmed looks over the top of my head.

I dug my nails into the bags under my eyes, slowly dragging my lower eyelids downward. If any of the kids in my life saw me or felt my chakra, I would’ve given them nightmares just from the expression on my face. I needed to do things slowly or else I’d wind up doing something even more reckless than broadcasting killing intent in a hospital.

“D-did someone report to Sensei?” I asked, still glowering at the floor. The hitch in my voice was a warning that the waterworks were incoming, trying to drown the anger once and for all.

Going by their chakra, I was gonna say the two of them hadn’t. How could they? I hadn’t given anyone any time.

“I’m going to report what I can to Sensei,” I said in a surprisingly steady voice, poking and prodding until my two best friends finally let me get to my feet. I didn’t look at either one of them. “He needs to know what happened with Sasori and Orochimaru.”

If I thought too much about Hayate, I wouldn’t make it out of the hospital without crying. I had discipline. I did. I’d been in this goddamn career for twelve straight years. I would not leave this to someone else.

I was gone before either of them could argue with me.

Once I was outside, I made a rooftop beeline for Sensei’s office. In no time at all, I was gently knocking on his office window with a stick I’d pulled from a nearby tree. His stupid security seals were too dangerous for anything less.

Sensei opened the office window. He stepped back so I could get inside the room, then closed the window. “How bad was it?”

I told him. I didn’t know everything, but what I did know was enough to make Sensei’s expression go flatter and darker the longer I talked and (eventually) speculated. The mission to rescue Jiraiya had been a success in the loosest definition thereof—no one was dead except the mission’s target—but it was clearly cold comfort to Sensei as well. Especially since that could change in an instant.

At the end of everything, Sensei didn’t say much. He sat down at his desk and started moving paperwork around, though I wasn’t keeping track.

“Kei?” Sensei said after a while.

I’d been counting ceiling tiles in an effort to get my mind off of the last two hours, so my return to attention was somewhat abrupt. “Yes, Sensei?”

“Go get some rest.”

While a small part of me wanted to protest, since I was still capable of fighting if I wanted to, the rest of me shouted that part down. “Emotionally exhausted” was not a state I needed to get too familiar with.

I bowed before turning and exiting the office through the actual door.

One self-appointed selfless/selfish task completed. Selfish because I wanted to get out of spending my entire emotional cooldown in the hospital for the second time this month. Selfless because, frankly, I doubted Rin or Obito wanted to give that report anyway.

I took a deep breath and finally decided to go after the agitated Lightning signature I’d been sensing for the last half hour. I didn’t have all that far to go.

Kakashi probably didn’t expect that our reunion would start with me hugging him as soon as I saw him. I figured out later that he’d probably been heading to Sensei’s office to check if anyone had heard back from us yet. At that moment, though, the only thought that crossed my mind was that he was here and solid and okay.

The same medics were working on Hayate and Anko and Jiraiya. If Kakashi could almost get killed two weeks ago and pull through, I could have faith in the others. So what if it wasn’t a logical argument?

It helped.

I buried my face in Kakashi’s shirt and held on.
Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the delay, everyone!
Years ago, my recurring nightmares showed me Hayate’s death. Over and over, with a dozen sick permutations just to keep the horror fresh. Every time a particular component lost its edge, my brain would collaborate with the clip show in my head and come up with some new aspect I had either never considered, or perhaps invent something out of whole cloth. A few featured Baki, fueling my now-pointless grudge against him for a crime he might never commit. But the majority twisted every guilty feeling I’d ever had and piled on a healthy dosage of utter failure for every drop of blood.

I started having those nightmares again.

After the second time I tumbled out of another nightmare with dried tears on my face in a single night, I gave up on sleeping. Instead, I pulled out my fūinjutsu desk, a notebook, and a number of writing implements. Then I wrote down everything I remembered about the Chūnin Exam invasion until either the sun came up or my hand completely cramped.

I wasn’t sure which one came first.

Rubbing my eyes with my left hand, I set my pens down. I opened one eye and stared wearily down at my work. The lines had smudged, bent, or devolved into scribbles at a couple of points, but it was still mostly legible. Sensei would be able to put this in a file if he felt like it, though the cryptography department would probably give him weird looks.

I didn’t have all the troop formations noted because of a lack of information, but the big snake summoning circle had been too obvious to miss. A hastily sketched diagram included the barrier ninjutsu the Sound Four had used and I still wasn’t learning, along with a question about why the Third hadn’t just knocked the building down and escaped that way. My handwriting transitioned to something nearly at chicken scratch levels, despite my fūinjutsu specialty, around the time I explained the effects of Kabuto’s mass-genjutsu and theoretical countermeasures.

Then I got to the part about Hayate’s death, and my pen refused to move. Ink had bled into the paper, creating a dark stain that blotted out other lines wholesale.

My vision blurred. What good was any of this if I couldn’t protect him? What was the point of any of the strength I’d gained if I couldn’t save my own little brother?

I pushed the pile of notes off my fūinjutsu table in frustration. Resting my head in my hands, elbows on the slanted surface, I sat there and tried to breathe.
Every meditative technique I’d ever learned seemed grossly inadequate at a time like this, but it was what I had. I needed to focus on anything other than my brother’s chakra sparking away in the hospital, where I still couldn’t make myself go and listen to his monitors beep. Not yet.

It took a long time to get myself under control again, even with my senses turned so far inward they were practically inverted, and I didn’t succeed by the time someone knocked on my front door.

I pulled the bottom of my shirt up so I could wipe my eyes, then blinked at the wall as I tried to maybe make myself look a little more together through mental gymnastics alone. Then I remembered to extend my chakra sense outward again, recognized the lightning bolt at my door as the one I wasn’t avoiding, and decided that it wasn’t worth it.

I went to go answer the door. Kakashi had seen me at my worst already. Multiple times, if I was being honest.

Kakashi let out an “oof” when I opened the door and instantly hugged him. He’d angled his shoulder a bit toward me so I wouldn’t smack directly into his still-sore right side, but otherwise let me hang on for dear life. I pressed my face against his neck and felt him wrap his free arm around my shoulders, resting the side of his jaw against the top of my head.

“It’s going to be okay,” Kakashi murmured into my hair. “They’re going to be fine.”

For a second, I couldn’t remember who else I was supposed to care about other than Hayate. Then a perfect still image of Anko smiling cheerfully hit me like a punch to the chest. I’d forgotten her. Even if I knew, as plain and drab as a report, that Anko had gone on the mission with Hayate and if anything come back in worse shape, my emotions hadn’t registered it. And that didn’t even cover how Jiraiya didn’t have a left hand anymore.

I was a horrible person.

I stopped crushing Kakashi in my grip once that thought sank in, opting instead to let him just hold onto me. Since his right arm could finally move again, he rested his weight more on the crutch and tilted his head so he could look me in the eyes.

Well, his eye, my eyes. Close enough.

His face crinkled as though he was smiling, but it wasn’t much of one. He was at least trying, for my sake. “You look terrible.”

“I guessed as much,” I admitted. “I didn’t sleep well.”

“Nightmares?” he asked, probably taking note of my puffy face and the deep, dark circles under my eyes. He didn’t have to ask, but it was probably polite of him to do it.

I made a vague noise of affirmation, then let my gaze drop. I couldn’t remember if I’d ever explained this properly to Kakashi, as opposed to letting him overhear things or bother Obito for details. “Same ones I used to get when I was a kid. Hayate dying, me unable to do anything about it…” I swallowed. “The usual.”

“Is this something from…last time?” Kakashi asked in an undertone, while I pressed my fingers against the side of my throat as though that would clear the lump inside it.

“Kinda.” I sighed, though my breathing stuttered a bit. I drew in the deepest breath I could manage, then said, “It’s… Can you tell me how Hayate and Anko are doing?”
I felt him nod. “Hayate’s still on a ventilator, and Anko is in recovery. He’s not conscious yet, but we’re allowed to visit them both. Anko was asleep when I was there.”

That was…that was good enough. For now. As though to make up for forgetting about him earlier, I asked, “And Jiraiya-sama?”

“He’s short a hand, but he’s already talking about getting a hook,” Kakashi said, and I thought I felt his chest jerk in an inaudible laugh. My imagination was too worn out to imagine exactly what a pirate Jiraiya would look like, but I kept the idea in my head for later. “If Tsunade-sama didn’t force him to stay in his room, he’d already be visiting and scheming with Sensei.”

“And not visiting the public baths?” I suggested, in perhaps the weakest joke I’d ever made.

Kakashi shrugged. “He hasn’t said anything about that. He just said the next book in the series is going to take longer without two hands.”

My shoulders shook.

“Kei?”

A dissonant laugh bubbled up in my throat, at the sheer—I didn’t even know. I needed a glass of water or something before I started to sob uncontrollably.

I got another hug, but Kakashi shouldn’t have worried. Though my vision was badly blurred, I refused to let the tears actually fall before I saw Hayate again. If I had to bite the inside of my cheek until it fucking bled, I could do it. I could keep some semblance of control if it was the last thing I did.

Kakashi helped me back into my apartment’s kitchen, where he limped around to make a pot of tea like I always did. Meanwhile, I soaked a washcloth in cold water and pressed it over my face. While not a solution I’d have recommended to anyone else, the sensation brought me back from the brink of bursting into tears again. By the time the kettle started screaming, I almost felt back to a sleep-deprived version of myself. If my head still felt like it was full of cotton balls, well, that wasn’t anyone’s business but mine.

“Here,” Kakashi said, setting the teacup down in front of me.

“Thanks.” I let the washcloth flop back to the table, then dropped my forehead to meet it again. The cloth made a squelching sound. “…I’m being selfish.”

Kakashi made a neutral noise, acknowledging that I’d spoken but not forming an opinion just yet.

I pushed the washcloth away as Kakashi sat down at the table, pillowing my head on my crossed arms. Still, I moved my head so I could see the cup of tea and Kakashi slouching in the other chair. “You came here to get me, didn’t you? You said you visited Hayate and Anko and Jiraiya and I’ve just been—I’m just sitting here doing nothing.”

“Have you?” Kakashi challenged me, but in a tone that didn’t quite match his words. I looked at him sidelong, waiting for an explanation, which he immediately gave as, “You’re hurt. Beating yourself up for not getting there in time. And it eats you away inside until there’s nothing left and you can’t even stand to look at the people you failed.”

I stared at him. How could I forget how Kakashi’s emotions worked? He had to be feeling the same way I did, if not worse, but I hadn’t been able to see it. Oh, I knew I was being selfish, but now there were words. Concepts. People.
Shamefaced, I swallowed hard and said, “Y-Yeah. Exactly like that.”

“You already know I feel the same way,” Kakashi murmured. He reached over and pushed the teacup a little closer to me. “I’m worried too.”

And even beyond Hayate’s personal social circle, I just kept meeting new people and having them help out with his training, or look after him while I was gone, or just hang around. Sooner or later, he wormed his way into everyone’s hearts.

I sighed and sat up. “Kakashi?”

He straightened in his seat, just slightly. I was suddenly reminded of Pakkun deciding to focus instead of just letting events roll onward.

“I’m gonna go get dressed and visit Hayate in the hospital. Can you come with me?”

He nodded.

“Thank you.”

“Oh, hey. Where’ve you been?” Anko asked once she spotted us, sitting up in bed and amazingly not looking like she’d almost died on the table four times. She was a little paler than usual, and her eyes had dark circles that might’ve been somewhat akin to mine in bad lighting, but she was alive.

“Home,” I admitted, since I had enough of a spine to acknowledge when I’d been hiding. Reaching behind my back, I produced a storage seal I’d made on loose paper and set it on the table next to Anko’s hospital bed. When I flared my chakra, the seal spat out a puff of smoke…and one perfect plate of dango, complete with sticks and sweet sauce.

“Awesome!” Anko said, beaming before she clapped her hands over her mouth. Her brown eyes darted to the side, where Hayate was sleeping in the next bed over.

He didn’t stir, but the machines around him continued to beep on undisturbed.

“He’ll be fine,” Anko said, once she realized I was staring. “But you should go sit by him. I’m good here.”

By way of response, Kakashi sat on the end of Anko’s bed while I took the room’s spare chair and set it at Hayate’s bedside. I sat down in it and leaned against his bedside, taking his hand in both of mine.

I heard Kakashi and Anko start talking in hushed voices—with hers muffled by her favorite snack—but didn’t bother listening in.

Hayate would live. They wouldn’t have put him here if he wouldn’t recover, not when the ICU was half the building away. That said, a nurse’s station was just outside the door in case something did go wrong, because Tsunade was a percussive remodeler if the hospital’s departments were not to her specifications. Whatever emergency procedures they’d used on Hayate would hold, come hell or high water, because the Konoha hospital gave up on patients when they were dead as doornails. Until then, everyone from Tsunade down would fight tooth and nail for their charges.

And with people like Rin and Tsunade in the mix, there was no way he wouldn’t live. He’d gotten this far, hadn’t he?
At about this point, I realized my thoughts were going in unhelpful circles and had to sigh. But at least I recognized that now.

The swing doors to the recovery ward creaked just on the edge of human hearing, but it was enough for me to turn slowly toward Rin’s chakra signature as she entered. Rin was dressed in her hospital scrubs once more, and looked like she’d actually gotten sleep the night before. She was definitely in full medic mode.

“Hi, everyone,” Rin said, in a voice that was both politely quiet and somehow cheery. “I’m just here to check in really quick. I’ll be back after my shift is over, too.”

“Feel free,” said Anko, who had finished off the dango. She chewed on one of the sticks, then cocked her hand back like—

“Do not throw those into the ceiling, Anko-chan!” Rin said sharply.

“Pff, you’re boring.” Anko pouted. “I was halfway through a perfect Konoha symbol pattern last time.”

“I know you’re bored,” Rin said, “but save that for when you’re discharged. And who brought her dango this time?”

Kakashi immediately threw me under the bus. “She did it.”

“Thanks,” I grumped. When Rin whirled on me, I held my hands up defensively and said, “Hey, I didn’t know anyone else was giving Anko-chan ammo.”

Rin groaned. “It’s her name, I swear. No one can help it.”

“I’m right here, you know,” Anko protested. And yet, she was still grinning like the cat that swallowed the canary.

“We know,” Kakashi, Rin and I droned in unison.

“Good!” Anko chirped. “So, does that mean I can get out of here soon?”

Rin plucked the chart off the end of Anko’s bed, though she was already carrying a clipboard. She set the other one in Kakashi’s lap, then kept digging through the medical data until she found what she was looking for. “Your vitals are good, chakra levels stable…and your Curse Seal isn’t there anymore?”

Anko rolled her shoulder, then said, “Honestly, I feel better than I have in a while. Now, if someone would take the monitor seal off my ankle…?”

“Not until I report in. And then not until you’re actually discharged,” Rin reminded her. She picked the clipboard back up, barely missing bonking her head against Kakashi’s—since he was trying to read his latest novel on top of it for lack of anything better to do—and nudged the thing against Anko’s head. “Understood? Because otherwise, I’m going to be very unhappy with you.”

And no one liked it when Rin was unhappy. Especially now that the village grapevine was starting to circulate about that rhombus-shaped seal on Rin’s forehead and where we’d all seen it before.

“G-Got it, Rin-san,” Anko said, though her smile had gone a bit twitchy. “I’ll be good, I swear.”

Rin stared Anko down for a few more seconds, then patted her head. “I’m glad you’re all right, Anko-chan. Take care of yourself and try not end up back here again too soon, okay?"

“I’ll come back only on social calls, I promise!” Anko said, clapping her hands together. “Really I promise.”

“Maybe don’t go quite that far,” I suggested.

“Hush,” Rin said. “I’ll be right back so you can get out of here as fast as possible.”

Rin Body Flickered away, leaving the rest of us just sorta sitting around awkwardly while the doors swung in her wake. Other than Anko’s relieved sigh and the steady beep of Hayate’s monitors, all was quiet.

“What were you up to, little brother?” I wondered as I went back to holding his hand. Even if he was safe now, that had been too close. After a second’s thought, I brushed his hair back and out of his face. “You’re lucky Jiraiya was there.”

“It wasn’t luck,” Anko interrupted, drawing me back to reality. When I looked at her, she said, “Hayate and I were Jiraiya-sama’s contacts for Konoha. He was gonna head out to the Land of Grass after.”

And now Jiraiya was short a hand, Anko’s old sensei was back like a bad burrito, and Hayate was right next to me with a machine breathing for him. My hand tightened on Hayate’s, but none of this was Anko’s fault. She was just the messenger—and just a little earlier than Sensei would break that kind of news.

Speaking of, I didn’t sense one of those people in the hospital when he should have been. Which meant I’d have to hunt him down—though without using enough of my chakra to blanket the village and disturb small children and animals. And if he was hiding his chakra… “Kakashi, where’s Jiraiya?”

“How would I know?” Kakashi asked, but his chakra did the guilty twisting thing and I knew he was a liar.

“Kakashi,” I said more firmly.

Kakashi fidgeted almost imperceptibly. “…He was in Sensei’s office last I heard.”

He probably thought that counted as being home free. Well, fuck that.

“Are you gonna kill Jiraiya-sama?” Anko asked. “Can I watch?”

“You’re staying in the hospital until Rin says otherwise,” Kakashi told her, getting to his feet just as I did. “Kei—”

“We’re just going to talk,” I told him. So what if I had an expression like a thundercloud? “Come with me if you don’t believe me.”

Kakashi snapped his book shut and followed me out of the room without another word.

“Jiraiya,” I snarled as I entered Sensei’s office, Kakashi on my heels.

Jiraiya, with his bad arm in a sling and probably a mountain of bandages, stood next to Sensei’s desk with a smile pasted badly over his face when he saw who was coming into the office. Sensei, on the other hand, was behind his desk like normal and looking for all the world like nothing was amiss—but his chakra told a very different story. The very air seemed agitated, though he was being careful not to project killing intent.

I made a split-second allowance for the fact that Jiraiya was hurt and decided not to tackle him, punch him, or kick him through a wall. Even though my anger was making me shake right down to my bones, mingled with fear and guilt and just eating me alive.

Then I remembered that not only had Jiraiya not done anything wrong, but that he’d been the reason Hayate had lasted long enough for Rin to get there. And the guilt nearly swallowed me.

“Kei,” Jiraiya said very carefully as he moved toward me, a slight limp in his step. “How’s your brother doing?”

“H-He’s going to be fine,” I said, though I wasn’t sure. I hadn’t read the chart on the end of his bed before running over here. “And you?”

“Minato still says I can’t get a hook, but I’m wearing him down,” Jiraiya joked over Sensei’s near-silent scoff. He leaned down and met my eyes more firmly. “I’m going to be fine. Don’t worry about me.”

And he only had to relearn every single jutsu he’d ever learned, one-handed. Which was something only Sensei and Haku could do. Even for someone as talented as Orochimaru, losing his arms had cost him most of his options until he’d gotten around the restriction by changing bodies.

“We’re here to hear more about the mission,” Kakashi said, steering us back on track. “What happened?”

Sensei clasped his hands in front of his face, glancing to each one of us in turn as he either thought about what we could hear or tried to decide what would go first. He’d prepped a thousand speeches in one form or another, but this one was one of the more important ones.

“I could start at the beginning,” Jiraiya suggested, looking to Sensei for approval. Then again, this was his part of the story, and maybe Sensei had already heard it before.

“Go on,” was all Sensei said.

I don’t think I could do it justice after the fact.

Jiraiya might’ve been a bestselling author of a trashy romance series, but he was also the second or third most famous philosopher on the entire issue of shinobi existence in a world that, to be honest, really needed some deeper thinking. He was the first proponent among ninja to really make a point of trying to end the cycle of hatred that haunted our world, and later passed the idea down to Sensei. The teachings kinda skipped a generation to Naruto, but as far as I was aware, the kid had really taken the idea to heart and made it work.

I was never sure how much Sensei really absorbed on that front. I certainly couldn’t adhere to the idea when there was still shit left to do, when I was so tied up in this world and my bonds that pursuing peace at the price of pain felt like giving up. Felt like spitting on the sacrifices of people who’d lived and fought and died before me.

But Jiraiya was a pretty damned good speaker when he wanted to be.

I didn’t know much about how Jiraiya ran his information network, other than that he did so personally and that becoming Hokage would have ruined it. He needed mobility and schedule flexibility, and in return did his best to keep the village safe from threats brewing in places that we couldn’t always reach. That job became easier when the Ame Trio finally got their big break and declared themselves allies to Konoha, but ultimately there was still a lot of work involved.

“How are the three of them doing?” I asked when Jiraiya paused for breath. I hadn’t heard from any of them in months.

“They’re fine, Kei. Changed their refugee policy to get everyone back on their feet as fast as they can, they have a new public hospital…” Jiraiya trailed off, smiling faintly. “They’re making their dream of a better Amegakure come true. They’re calling it the ‘village of second chances,’ now.”

Yahiko must’ve been thrilled, perhaps carrying Nagato and Konan through the process of nation-building. Or exhausted, given how much effort he put into fighting for that exact cause. All the same, I thought he would be happy whether the dream had an ending or not.

“Anyway, where was I?” Jiraiya considered, then went on as though he hadn’t needed to stop.

From Ame, through former/current Oto territory, and back through the Land of Fire, then on through the coastal regions to catch any whispers of goings-on in Kirigakure. Jiraiya covered land that most Konoha shinobi didn’t see in a single patrol, stopping in bars and slums and anywhere else that he could move unnoticed and still keep his ear to the ground. Not always as himself, either.

And everywhere he went, under the rumors and whispers, there was a sinister undertone. People disappearing and coming back different, or heavier armed presence of bandits, or just a general sense of unease.

Shinjitsu was moving. If anything, the Zetsu clones and Kakashi’s run-in with Kakuzu were pregame warmups.

“Wait, Sasori was a member?” I said blankly.

“And they burned him—however unintentionally—to get Orochimaru back,” Jiraiya confirmed. “I was going to include it in the report I gave to Anko-chan and Hayate-kun, but you saw what happened.”

Yeah, I saw what happened. I’d killed Sasori over that with Rin’s help.

I looked down. “And your hand?”

“Don’t worry about it.” Noticing my expression, Jiraiya added, “Kei-kun, it’s true that I would’ve preferred if everyone went home in the same shape they went out. Me included. But I don’t regret looking out for those two.”

It didn’t exactly make me feel much better to hear that. But the knot in my stomach pinched just a little less.

Jiraiya still seemed to take that as the silver lining it was. Barely. “Now, about what I did find out about Kirigakure…”

In Kiri, Mei had her hands full. Even if she hadn’t been my age, trying to repair the damage done to her village was the kind of task that would take a lifetime’s dedication. Unlike Akatsuki in Ame, she didn’t have a convenient Rinnegan on her side or six straight years of building up a power base. She had closer to four, in between the civil war with Yagura, and only one jinchūriki.

“Utakata is the Six-Tails’s current host,” Kakashi said, because ANBU had their fingers in pretty interesting pies. His eye narrowed. “I didn’t think he’d be interested in nation-building after what happened during the civil war. ANBU lists him as being close to the Third Mizukage.”

“I thought his teacher tried to kill him over Saiken.” When that got me a couple of confused looks, I added, “That’s the Six-Tails’s name. And it’s what happened last time. Utakata ended up abandoning Kirigakure and becoming a missing-nin.”

“I didn’t hear that,” Jiraiya said, “but the rumor mill believes Mei is going to marry either him or one of the Seven Ninja Swordsmen.”

How many of those did they even have? Because the answer hadn’t been “seven” in at least a few years.

“Anything to secure loyalty, huh?” I murmured, shaking my head. If this version of Mei was anything like the one I remembered from the Fourth Shinobi World War or the Kage Summit, I didn’t really want to know that much more.

“I wonder if ANBU set up a pool,” Kakashi said, equally quiet.

Jiraiya snorted as he bit down on a laugh. “Just don’t let Tsunade know.”

“ANBU doesn’t take outside money,” Kakashi responded, but I was pretty sure he muttered “Raidō” while Jiraiya cracked up. Then I snorted just like Jiraiya had.

“Oh, that hurt,” Jiraiya admitted once he stopped, pressing his injured arm closer to his ribs. “But somehow I’m not surprised that’s the only condition.”

Sensei’s eyes scanned the room briefly as we got ourselves back under control. It was sort of like being scrutinized by the strict teacher at school. Which, well, was at least halfway accurate. Then he said, “I wonder if I could participate this time.”

Jiraiya grinned, but he didn’t comment on that. Instead, he mused, “Maybe Obito-kun could check in on Kirigakure later to confirm what I learned. I had an ocean between them and me, so for all I know the happy couple is already terrorizing people.”

“I could also try,” I said after a second to think. “I mean, if Isobu and Saiken want to talk?”

You want to see if I could bother one of my brothers about human gossip?

I hesitated. It did sound a bit strange when he put it like that. …Maybe?

I’ll see what I can do. Saiken is probably bored anyway.

“That’ll be amusing for ANBU, but we should get back on topic,” Sensei said with a cough. His expression went cold. “Moving on. Kisame Hoshigaki is a person of interest with regard to Akatsuki in at least one world. Is he still with the Seven Ninja Swordsmen, or do I have to add him to Shinjitsu’s roster?”

“Thus far, the Seven Swordsmen are at five members.” Jiraiya paused for a second to think, then said, “Sharkface is still with them, as far as I know, but they’ve lost two of the swords already. I just can’t remember which ones.”

“They’ll be down to one by ten years from now if they aren’t careful,” I added. The only one I remembered actually being loyal to Kirigakure was Chōjūrō, but that kid was around Naruto’s age. All of the older members were either dead or had defected by then.
Sensei was already getting a clone to write everything down for him. The man really was the ultimate paperwork ninja. “Anything else, Jiraiya-sensei?”

“Shinjitsu is definitely in the Land of Iron,” Jiraiya said. He nodded at Kakashi. “Which you already know. But I’m fairly certain something big landed there recently, given all the rumors about a blessing from the moon. There’s a massive sinkhole or something in the middle of the country now, but Three Wolves was mostly unaffected.” He sighed. “Hence the Zetsu clones. Shinjitsu barely needs to recruit anymore.”

Fucking hell that statue was never going away, was it? Of course, I’d suspected as much as soon as I’d seen the Zetsu clones with Sasori, but having it confirmed still felt like a Strong Fist punch to the gut.

“I suppose it was never a matter of if, but when,” Sensei said, shaking his head slowly. “I know Nagato did his best, but not even he could destroy it in the end.”

The temperature in the room seemed to drop by ten degrees as that sank in. Kushina, Naruto, and I were all jinchūriki, and the Statue being back in play meant that we could all be fed to it. And that was just our village—one that plan got rolling, if it got rolling, our world was doomed.

…Again.

“Then we just need to kill everyone who can control it,” Kakashi said in a tone that could have been used for discussing cloud formations.

“Easier said than done, Kakashi-kun,” Jiraiya countered.

“But it can still be done,” Kakashi insisted. His hand sought mine, and when I twined our fingers his were shaking faintly. “We just need to figure out how.”

I bit the inside of my lip until it almost bled. “Then I may have something to help with that.” Before anyone could talk, I rushed on with, “Not to do with the Statue. I don’t—I said everything I knew last time. But if we can pick off the Shinjitsu members that control it…”

Sensei sighed and it seemed to go all the way down to his bones. Not exactly the positive sign I was looking for.

“Who do you think is the weakest link?” Jiraiya asked, since Sensei looked like he was already getting a headache.

“…I just have this from last night,” I said, and popped a storage seal at my hip with my free hand. Taking the resulting sheaf of papers, I put them on Sensei’s desk. “Not…not all of it is in the best shape, but I wrote down all the things Orochimaru took advantage of when he tried to destroy Konoha in the other world. I don’t have formations, and anyway he planned with Suna that time and he might not do anything now, but I have all the summoning tricks and the Impure World Resurrection and…well.” I stepped back. “It could help.”

“Did you include…?” Kakashi prompted, and though he didn’t complete the thought aloud, I knew what he meant. It wasn’t much of an intuitive leap to conclude that all of this had quite a lot to do with Hayate almost dying here and actually dying there.

“Y-Yeah. It’s all there.” I could do no less. There were a lot of people who died in that invasion who didn’t deserve it, and a lot who did and didn’t die. Maybe this would balance the books a little.
Sensei picked up the first page, which was probably the neatest of them, and handed it off to his clone to copy as soon as he’d scanned it. “Is that everything?”

“I’m nearly certain that Shinjitsu’s base of operations is in the mountains,” Jiraiya said, “but I haven’t found the particular one.”

And Sensei didn’t want to send Obito back without some kind of backup. Unfortunately, Kakashi was still unable to head out on missions, on pain of Tsunade and Rin.

I was going to get the biggest case of cabin fever on the planet if I didn’t have something to do other than wait around for Shinjitsu to hit us again. The only thing I could think of, though, was basically up Gai’s alley. Between my inability to fully suppress my chakra and the fact that I was a known jinchūriki, the subtle options ahead of us were out of my reach. And that meant I just had to train, and train, and train until…

Well, until we could all make it. Not knowing where that threshold sat, it was a perpetual sort of goal.

“Then we’re done here for now,” Sensei said, as his clone finally poofed out of existence.

The tension in the room, which had been steadily draining the longer we all talked, finally died. Though I’d stormed into the office and probably been the cause of said tension, I noticed that I felt a little lighter now that we had something approaching, well, an approach for how to handle the new situation.

Ten percent of a plan was better than nothing.

“I’m gonna go back to the hospital,” Jiraiya said, since no one else seemed all that eager to talk. He looked Kakashi and me up and down, then said, “Come on, kids.”

I didn’t protest. I still needed to know exactly what was wrong with my brother and what his recovery timeline would look like. And Kakashi probably needed to get off his remaining crutch for a while. Sitting in the hospital, while not fun, would fulfill both objectives.

I needed to get my head back in the game.

That resolve took the first of many hits when I heard the diagnosis.

Irreparable lung damage. The best Rin could assure me of was that Hayate would be able to continue his shinobi career, but it was like the ground had fallen out from under my feet the instant I heard those words. Everything I worked for had not literally been undone, but the Plot was peeking out over the horizon like some unknowable elder god.

Maybe I was just being dramatic. Maybe none of it meant anything.

“It’s just a cough,” Hayate grumbled, off the ventilator at last and eating ice chips. He was awake, he was cognizant of his surroundings, and held my hand while I went to pieces for the third time in two days. His sleep-rumpled appearance, overall, seemed to imply that he was just recovering from another stupid mishap.

But I heard the rasp in his voice and felt the worried flicker in his chakra. As long as he tried his best to be strong, though, I felt like I was spitting on his efforts.

I needed to pull myself together. “C-Can you blame your big sister for being worried?”
“Not really,” Hayate said. When he was going to sigh in frustration, he coughed again instead and ended up wincing when he finished. “Ow.”

“Like about that,” I said in a steadier voice, though seeing him fall into a coughing fit would probably rattle my nerves for years to come. No, no, I had to focus on being productive. “Do you need me to get anything for you?”

“I kinda want to know when I can leave,” Hayate replied, still looking at me like he expected me to crack at any second and start crying. Which, well…fair enough. He’d only known me for his entire life.

“I have no idea,” I admitted, then sighed. “I just—I’m sorry, Hayate.”

He frowned. “For what?”

“I didn’t get there fast enough! If I had—”

“Sis, you didn’t know anything would happen,” Hayate cut me off, though he coughed again as he raised his voice.

While I leaned forward and rubbed his back, he covered his mouth with his elbow until it was over. When he recovered, he hooked his arm around my neck and tugged me closer for one of the least comfortable hugs I’d ever experienced, but I wrapped my arms around him anyway.

“I should’ve known,” I mumbled into his hair. “It’s my job to know.”

“You can’t control the whole world,” Hayate told me, equally quiet. He swallowed a cough down, then went on, “But you already got the guy who did this, didn’t you?”

If I was being strictly honest about Sasori’s physiology? “…Rin did.”

“But he’s dead and he won’t hurt anyone ever again.” My brother gently nudged me back, making sure I could see his smile. Sickly as he looked, and as deep as the hollows under his eyes were, I couldn’t see an ounce of blame in his eyes.

When had my brother become so strong? Why could he see the silver lining when the world seemed so dim?

I started smiling faintly, reflexively, just because Hayate still could. There was a subtle distinction between feeling “better” and feeling “less terrible,” and seeing my brother’s optimism handled both.

“After I get out of here,” Hayate began, pausing only briefly to try and clear his throat again, “I’m going to train.”

“Already?” Rin would not approve.

As though reading my mind, Hayate gave me a flat look and said, “Not right away, but I need to get stronger. I know I won’t always be able to handle everything, but I need to do more.”

Given which one of us was the jinchūriki here, I probably needed to take that idea even more to heart than Hayate did. More seals, more strategies, more emotional discipline… Well, at least I had room to improve. Gai would say that was the important part—as long as I actually followed through.

“I might have…give me a few days and I might have some ideas,” I corrected myself. At that exact moment, I wasn’t sure if I could put my brain to work on something quite so complex so soon.
Thankfully, I was saved from having to worry about coming up with something Nara-worthy by four bright chakra signatures trooping down the hospital hallway. I looked up, past where Kakashi sat by the door like a lanky sentry, and my fuzz-filled brain identified our new guests.

“Hello!” chirped three small voices all at once. One after another, Kaito, Aiko, Roku and Lee all trooped into the room carrying get-well-soon flowers.

Kakashi scooted away from the door and the flowers without making a sound.

“Mitarashi-san told us you were here,” Roku said by way of explanation, as the other three kids put flowers on the nightstand. Once Roku added his bouquet to the lot, it looked like someone had decided to grow an entire planter on the table.

“Big bro, are you gonna be okay?” Kaito asked, laying his arms flat on the hospital bed though he could have probably climbed up on his own.

“I heard you fought an evil shinobi!” Aiko added, holding her arms out as far as they could reach. “Was he this big?”

Lee clambered up onto the bed next to me, braid swinging, and said, “You look super tired.”

Hayate looked blankly around at all the kids for a moment, then said, “I’m glad she’s okay, yes, I did fight someone though I think he was bigger, and yeah, I am.”

“Was he this big, then?” Aiko asked, while Kaito barked, “Get better soon!”

Roku, slightly late to the punch, said, “Can we hear some of what happened? Or is that against the rules?”

“I want to hear a story!” Lee added, like this was a democracy.

Still, that many small votes added up to a victory. Hayate and I both folded like origami.

At least, we explained what details could be told to civilian children, even if they were all Academy students. Raiden would probably be pretty unhappy if we managed to give the kids disturbing imagery to share over the dinner table. Well, more disturbing than what they made up on their own—ninja children could have some impressive imaginations, and frankly there was enough ninja bullshit to make most of it possible.

Lee sat there on the edge of the bed for a long moment, eyes wider than ever as he stared at Hayate. “…Did you die?”

The other kids exchanged looks, because they were old enough to know better, but didn’t say anything to Lee. I was pretty sure I heard Kakashi choke down a laugh when he thought none of us were listening.

“Maybe a bit?” Hayate shrugged. “But I’m fine now.”

“And you’re never doing that again,” I added fiercely.

Hayate coughed twice, and I glared at him since it didn’t sound genuine at all. More like he was trying to hide sarcasm, really.

Roku tapped my leg. “Can I ask something?”

“Kinda just did,” Hayate put in, so I poked him square in the shoulder without looking. “Hey!”
“What do you want to know?” I prompted.

“If—we’re going to be ninja soon. Except for Lee,” Roku explained, stumbling just a bit. He turned his dark eyes on Hayate for the most part, then continued, “We’re going to need to train, and not just with Kei-sensei. Can we train with you?”

I did a few mental calculations, and the blood did not drain from my face when I remembered that Roku, Aiko, and Kaito would be shinobi in less than three months. Oh jeez. Just putting those facts together with the reality of what I could face in the future made my knees feel weak.

I was going to have to watch these kids like a hawk.

Oblivious to my internal conflict, Hayate managed a playful smile. “You bet. Hey, Kaito-kun, don’t you use Lightning Release?”

“Kinda maybe sorta,” said Kaito, dangling off the bed to amuse himself. His feet kicked idly in thin air. “Kei-sensei says so but I’m just doing Water Release stuff and it’s pretty cool.”

Behind the entire group, Kakashi glanced up from his paperback and met my eyes. Yes, I had wanted to learn Lightning Release to help Kaito and possibly Roku with their jutsu, but if my brother volunteered? I could seek out a different nature transformation to cover bases that these two teacher’s assistants would be less suited for.

Kakashi let out a resigned sigh, but knew when he was being volunteered.

“Oh, oh, that means we can call you Hayate-sensei!” Aiko cheered, both fists in the air. “Kei-sensei and Hayate-sensei!”

“I can’t teach you that much yet,” Hayate pointed out, coughing once as he tapped his hospital bed.

“It is okay! Kei-sensei will just do it until you’re better,” Lee said, patting my brother’s knee. “Teach me too, please!”

Lee was still a first-year kid, but maybe…

“Kei, no,” Kakashi said, spotting my scheming expression. He even shut his paperback to focus his accusing stare on me. “Gai’s training is too intense for kids his age.”

Does it really matter? I thought you only wanted to introduce them.

Kinda! Only meeting Gai would start an epic chain reaction.

Aiko’s eyes widened. “Ah, Lee hasn’t met Gai-sensei! This is bad! Lee, Lee, Gai-sensei is super strong!”

Lee’s head might as well have been on a swivel given how fast he was looking around at all of us to follow the conversation. “But I am not good at ninjutsu or genjutsu…”

Aiko latched onto Lee, grinning widely. “He’s taijutsu! All taijutsu, all the time.”

“Kei-sensei is the one who teaches ninjutsu,” Kaito said. Then he looked up at me and reassured me, “That’s okay, too.”

“Ninjutsu is very nice,” Roku added, though more in a consoling sort of tone.

I was being condescended to by small children. How had this become my life?
Kakashi looked from child to child and knew he’d lost. Hell, I’d lost. But since the kids all ended up winners, that was fine.

“We’re creating a monster,” Hayate muttered.

He wasn’t wrong. And it was going to be great.

Talk to me once your hatchlings manage to become truly destructive.

Fair enough.

“Hit me again,” I ordered the moment my vision was clear again.

Kurenai’s hands flashed through her five-seal sequence in no time at all. “Demonic Illusion: Tree Binding Death!”

The other kunoichi swirled away into midair in a fashion worryingly similar to Obito’s Kamui, if the effect started at his feet. Shortly thereafter, the jutsu started in earnest: A tree sprang out of practically nowhere, its branches growing to bind me to the trunk as though it hated me in a way that plants tended not to. Mr. Ukki wasn’t dead, so as far as I was concerned this was disproportionate behavior.

I kinda sat through the genjutsu for a moment longer, though I couldn’t move my hands, then flared my chakra with enough force to disrupt the technique.

Then I grabbed Kurenai’s descending hand, stopping her dead.

The future-past Itachi could have sued me for plagiarism. But with any luck, Kurenai would see this little trick coming the next time she saw it and never fall for a fake-out again.

“Maybe next time I won’t say what jutsu I’m using,” Kurenai muttered, letting the kunai in her hand drop.

I caught it before it hit me in the face with my free hand, then said, “Probably a good plan.”

While ordinarily I had Isobu to shake off genjutsu for me—pretty much none of them were designed to hit targets with two independent chakra types—self-improvement was the name of the day. To that end, I asked Isobu to butt out for a bit and had every member of the genjutsu study group hit me with their best shot.

With that attack foiled, Kurenai sat down next to me to watch the next round. As soon as she did, Kushina shook off the effects of my genjutsu seal and peeled the paper off her forehead.

“That sucked,” Kushina complained as she sat up, fingertips pressing against her temples. “I don’t care how catchy you think that was, Kei-chan, but I’m going to have that song stuck in my head for hours.”

I was probably a bit evil for including “Yakety Sax” in my genjutsu, but I’d needed something distracting and hyperactive brass instruments were it. Sure, the genjutsu tag probably already constituted cruel and unusual treatment of enemies. And sure, using material from my old life was probably cheating. But I hadn’t been able to resist.

“I’m sure Kei-chan didn’t mean to be that annoying,” Mikoto said, but she was really too distracted by overseeing the boys’ autumn adventures to be all that sympathetic. “Naruto, Sasuke, what are you two doing?”
“I’m gonna get more chestnuts than Naruto!” Sasuke shouted back, carrying at least two handfuls in his shirt. With the hem held up, it was almost like a basket.

“No, I’m gonna beat you!” Naruto screeched, having turned his jacket into a collection sling. “I already—I have thirty!”

Must’ve stopped to count.

“…Is it really safe to let them collect those, given all the spikes?” I asked. Back when we had been setting up for our outdoor meeting, we’d been sure to clear the area of the spiny little menaces ahead of time. Even if they tasted all right once they were turned into sweets, I’d never liked shelling them.

“It’s safe enough. I use chakra to—” Mikoto paused as she remembered that neither boy was Itachi’s age and therefore well-versed in basic safety precautions. “Oh dear. Sasuke, Naruto, you need to wear gloves!”

Kurenai winced. “Or maybe we should just gather leaves to roast sweet potatoes…”

“Oh, that sounds better,” Kushina said, and started digging through the picnic basket.

With the boys pulled away from their self-imposed chestnut hunt, we collectively broke up the meeting of the genjutsu experts. With a group composed of Naruto and Sasuke versus Kurenai and me, we competed to see who could make the best pile of loose leaves to slow-cook the potatoes Mikoto and Kushina prepared.

The boys won, but really, as long as we all got a sweet potato of our own, we were all winners.
Intermission: Lesson Number One

Chapter Summary

Kei: Try to get back into the swing of things.

Chapter Notes

This chapter takes place over the course of about three months, spanning early January to late March. Turns out the true timeskip got shoved to the next chapter.

Between Kakashi, Rin, Obito, and me, it was hard to say which one of us was most terrible at being a morning person. Kakashi stayed up late and got up early, but the latter part was mainly Gai’s influence because skipping out on training with him would be the height of rudeness. The former was Kakashi’s reading habits. Obito didn’t have a sleep schedule, given his weird mission parameters, so whether he’d be awake enough to join anyone for breakfast was a coin-flip at best. Rin fueled her early mornings and late nights with quantities of caffeine that would have killed anyone with less medical expertise, but was consistent about it to the point that only a few people knew how much suffering was involved.

On the particular day that my genin graduated from the Academy, it was definitely me. I was the worst.

What kind of horrible person slept through the entire morning when it was the kids’ big day? I excused Kakashi’s lateness by thinking that, though he wasn’t always where he was supposed to be, he was at least up and wandering around the village. Probably.

Er, maybe.

At the very least, I was buoyed by the fact that I couldn’t be too much worse when it came to actually getting my kids out of there. Right?

“You’re late, Kei-sensei,” Kaito greeted me from the first row of desks, where he was sprawled out and looking at the ceiling.

Roku had opened the teacher’s desk at the front of the room and was making paper farm animals out of the contents, while Aiko was basically running stairs on her hands. Once the two of them noticed me, they zoomed to the classroom door and stood at attention while Kaito slid off the desk like some type of ooze. Wait, no, he’d literally iced the desk so he’d slide off faster. Oh, dear.

A quick check with my chakra sense confirmed that my team was the only one still in the room. Whoops.

“You don’t even have an excuse?” Kaito asked, from the floor. The ice, having formed the approximate pattern of a giant snowflake, melted away into a puddle someone else was going to have to deal with.

I thought about answering that in a way that would probably come across as Kakashi-lite and flown right over the heads of two out of three kids. But then, I wasn’t good at coming up with lies on the fly anyway. “No. So, ready to head out to the training fields?”

“Yeah!” the kids responded, though Roku’s enthusiasm for it came across as a little flat. He looked back over his shoulder at the origami farm animals, then scooped them up and took them along with him by stuffing them into his shuriken pouch.

Well, it wasn’t like any of those papers could be important if they were left alone in a room with ninja children.

“Do all of you have your weapons?” I asked, as we walked down the Academy’s halls toward the yard.

“I am a weapon!” Aiko said cheerily, flexing her biceps in a “strongman” pose I was sure Gai had taught her. Then she paused to think about it, patting her pockets. “But, um, maybe I should get my kunai and shuriken.”

“And it’s almost lunchtime anyway,” Kaito added, toying with the water left over from the ice he’d made in the classroom. While he knew a few jutsu, I had always found the free-forming exploration of his elemental affinities too interesting to ever scold him for it. And thus, he kept going.

“I need to get my collection of iron filings,” Roku murmured, and dark markings formed around his eyes for just a second before he sighed in defeat. “I didn’t carry any to class.”

I nodded along as the kids decided what they’d need to do. They clearly had an idea of their capabilities, and I’d be able to run them through a couple of drills just to be certain. Roku’s comment also inspired me to say, “After today, remind me to start teaching you storage seals.”

“Can you do that?” Roku asked, blinking. “Itachi hasn’t learned any fūinjutsu yet.”

“I started learning when I was your age. We’ll see how all three of you do with some of the basic exercises, then go from there,” I said mildly. “And what Itachi does doesn’t determine what you will.”

Roku chewed on that for a while, and the four of us headed for the Koizumi household in thoughtful silence for the most part.

Sure, Aiko was humming under her breath the entire time and trying to get Kaito to join in, but I had a feeling my team would be the type where moments of peace would be few and far between once we got going.

The kids stormed into the house, while I lingered for a second like an interloper on the threshold. Kaito, Aiko, and Roku did not shout as they thundered inside, because from the feel of it there were two sleeping chakra signatures in it, but they certainly weren’t quiet by anyone’s standards. Except maybe Gai.

“Kids, please try to be quiet for your brothers,” Chihiro’s voice drifted softly from the kitchen. She peeked into the hall, noticing me standing awkwardly across the threshold, and said, “Hello, Kei-sensei. Would you like to come in?”

“If it’s not any trouble,” I said, and followed Chihiro to the kitchen. “How are Aoichi and Akahito?”
“They’re doing very well,” Chihiro replied, heading back to the sink. While I sat down at the table, she talked on in a cheerful tone. “They’ve made friends with the little neighbor girl, Shiemi, but she’s sick today. I was thinking of sending some soup over with the boys, but only once Lee gets home to help them. Do you think that might be too presumptuous?”

“As long as Ume doesn’t have allergies, I think it should go over well,” was my somewhat baffled reply. I didn’t know who half the people the Koizumi family associated with were, but it sounded like the household was a happy one.

There was a loud bang as Kaito tripped over something and might’ve dropped a box. The lack of swearing with what curse words he’d figured out by age nine indicated that at least nothing important had broken. The Koizumi family tended not to keep their weapons in plain sight because there were toddlers in the house, which apparently meant that Roku’s collection of scrap iron was put on the top shelf of someone’s closet space.

Perhaps that hadn’t been a great idea.

“I think so, too.” Chihiro hummed for a moment, then asked, “Kei-sensei?”

“Yes?” I asked, looking up from where I’d been daydreaming a bit.

“Did you notice Kaito’s headband?”

That question struck me as a somewhat abrupt change of topic, so I looked over at her back. “I did. What about it?”

In fact, I had noticed that Kaito went for the bandanna style, as opposed to his teammates’ preferences of either a belt or a plain headband like the ones most of my friends wore. It wasn’t a significant difference in the end, because people customized their accessories all the time, and I was a walking testament to how many times a single headband could be replaced. I was almost certain I was on my third or fourth one.

Chihiro stilled. Her hands gripped the side of the sink. Her faint chakra swirled in agitation, and I got to my feet automatically in response to the apparent crisis.

“Chihiro-san?” I asked.

“He looks like you.” Chihiro shook herself, slamming a polite mask into place over her fear. When she turned to face me again, her expression was placid and almost pleasant, but brittle. “Kaito looks up to you so much. He had me cut his hair like yours, he still loves that little jacket you gave him…”

Kaito still wasn’t anywhere near growing into that old jacket of mine, but he wore it anyway. I hadn’t noticed our haircuts being similar because I didn’t think of my messy mop as a style at all, and Kaito’s tended to lay flat.

Chihiro clasped her hands in front of her apron. “I just… Please, take care of them. Don’t let them down. Promise me that.” She briefly looked away, hesitating. “I mean, I know you can’t, and we’ve talked about this before, but I just want them to be safe. To be happy.” She bowed, angling her head toward the ground. “Please do your best.”

“Chihiro-san,” I began, as she jerked back to standing upright as though nothing had happened. “I promise I won’t take any risks with them that I wouldn’t with my brother or the rest of my family. They’ll have as much space and safety as they need, while still getting stronger. Does that work?”

“It’ll have to,” Chihiro said, looking away. “I’m sorry for putting you on the spot like this. I just…” I worry.”

Well, we had that in common. “You’re a good mother to them, you know. Don’t be too hard on yourself for trying your best to look after them.”

“Yes, well…” Chihiro smiled weakly. “Um, don’t let me ruin your team’s big day! I’m sure you have missions to think about.”

“Just wait until they figure out what D-ranks are like.” I didn’t have to force my grin. “And a little… tradition my sensei passed down to me.”

Someone had to get the bell test. I’d never especially wanted to play mind games with small children, but it would be interesting to see how much the Academy had managed to teach them regarding combat exercises versus what Gai and I had drilled into their heads.

Chihiro thought that over, trying to decide if she ought to worry about my cheer or not. Finally, she settled on, “I’ll take your word on it, Kei-sensei.”

We managed to have about a minute of comfortable silence between us before Aiko slammed into a wall and woke up the entire house. While the kids quickly tried to soothe their younger brothers and failed with the lack of Lee’s help, Chihiro went to their rescue.

Roku skidded to a stop next to the kitchen door as the three older children made their escape, and managed a “Kei-sensei—” before Kaito and Aiko slammed into him from behind and knocked all of them right out the front door.

I got up from the table and followed them. Not for the first time, I was struck by how young they all were. It was like leading the Konohamaru Corps with Naruto at the helm, at least considering the old timeline. I wondered if that would cause problems later. They were the last class that was likely to be graduating this young, but…

“Kei-sensei, where are we going to train?” Kaito asked from the middle of the kid-pile in the middle of the street, shaking me from my thoughts.

“Training Ground Three,” I replied, because there was never another location better-suited for the bell test. Plenty of trees, river access, and the three old posts that I’d never seen anyone tied to. Nostalgia had its claws in me and wasn’t about to let go.

“Sounds good to me,” Roku said, from the bottom of the kid-pile.

“Let’s go!” Aiko cheered, scrambling back to her feet. She helped her teammates up as though they weighed no more than toddlers, grinning like Gai on a good day, and did a quarter-turn jump that had her fully facing me. “We can take whatever training you can put us through, Kei-sensei!”

I raised an eyebrow. “You don’t even know what the exercise is.”

“That’s fine,” Roku said, and looped an arm around each of his teammates’—siblings’—shoulders. “Whatever it is, we can handle it together.”

What could I say to that, other than— “Then let’s move out, Team Kei.”

I got three answering grins.

So, the Bell Test.
I was not going to give my kids the version that Kakashi had, in one version of reality, clubbed Team Seven over the head with. The new Team Kei didn’t need the teamwork lesson that Naruto, Sakura, and Sasuke had. My kids all knew and trusted each other, and all three of them had trained with me since Kaito’s freezing-the-classroom incident. And given that all of them were also all too familiar with the concept of death and of people dying around them due to inaction, the other half of the lesson was something that didn’t need to be reinforced through violence.

Likewise, my team wasn’t actually ready for the pure combat exercise that Sensei had made out of it. Sure, I could throw explosives at my teacher willy-nilly because I knew he could handle it, but I wasn’t certain that the kids would be interested in doing the same to me. We had trained together, but not nearly to the same extent or the same extremes as that.

So, after ruling out both examples, what was left?

Well…me.

I’d have loved to be able to say that I had a curriculum to work from, but shinobi tended to be the “learn on the job” types. Most of the lessons I’d learned during my wartime education tended to be sharp, and there were holes—like the fact that I hadn’t been taught a single genjutsu until I was thirteen, solely because Sensei had forgotten about it. While it was true that higher-ranked shinobi only taught small teams rather than the classrooms that Academy teachers dealt with, there were clearly some holes in the methods we used to teach our teachers.

Hm.

My team lined up in front of each of the ancient training posts that had been there since the founding of the village. Aiko stood in the middle, cracking her tiny knuckles like she planned on really showing off in front of me. Kaito was to her left, his hands stuffed in his jacket pockets and his gaze shifting between my face and his siblings’, watching for a cue. Roku, the tallest by a head and by far the most relaxed-seeming, nonetheless had his chakra primed and ready for a fight where the other two were simply excited.

“So, before we get started, I’d like to ask you a question,” I said, resting one arm on the katana hilt at my hip. “What do you want to get out of this training? Or out of being shinobi?”

The kids looked at each other, then got into a huddle. After a silent conversation consisting of mouthing words at each other and some very complex expressions and hand gestures, Aiko stepped forward and raised her hand. “I’ll go first, Kei-sensei!”

“All right,” I said, ceding the figurative floor to her.

“I wanna be the best taijutsu master ever!” Aiko chirped, grinning widely as she bounced on her toes. “And I’m gonna have the best adventures with my brothers and I’ll make everyone proud!”

“Together, we’re unbeatable,” Kaito put in, nodding. He looked up at me with determined eyes, his chin jutting forward as though daring me to argue. “I’m going to get so strong I don’t need to be afraid of losing anyone ever again.”

And just like that, I had an idea for today’s lesson.

Roku remained silent for a little while, perhaps long enough that the other two got confused about why he wasn’t joining in. The sole almost-teenager of the group had a pensive look on his face, and he brushed his bangs to one side before he spoke. “I’m gonna make sure everyone stays safe.”

“Well, that last part isn’t just going to be your responsibility,” I said gently, and he gave me a shy little smile that vanished a split second later. Moment over, I stepped back from my students just slightly and said, “Before we move on—”

“Kei-sensei, you didn’t share your goal!” Aiko interrupted, hands on her hips.

“My goal?” My goal was mostly to get them through their training alive, safe, and whole. While a small part of me insisted that this would best be accomplished by wrapping all three of them in bubble wrap and preemptively killing everyone in the world with a wanted poster in Konoha, that was a little extreme. So, I said instead, “My goal is to help the three of you reach your dreams.”

I got a grin each from Aiko and Kaito, and a fainter smile and nod from Roku. Well, good to know they had faith in my teaching skills. Now I just needed to make sure they learned the first lesson.

I cleared my throat. “Now, the journey is probably going to be difficult, and there are some pretty harsh lessons ahead. You ready for this?”

“You bet!” Aiko and Kaito said together.

“In that case,” I said slowly, digging through my pockets until my fingers closed around the objects I was looking for, “your first task is to get these.”

The kids stared openly as I jingled the two bells in front of their faces.

“And you’re not getting near ‘em if you don’t go all out,” I said, spinning them around by the strings. Then I tied them to the scroll belt I kept around my waist. Sure, today the scroll slots were empty, but it was good for the kids to see mission gear in action.

Kaito recovered first. “They’re just bells, Kei-sensei. I thought we were gonna do something hard?”

“Yeah, Kei-sensei! That isn’t that bad,” Aiko added.

Oh, kids. It was cute that they thought it would be easy.

“I could just…” And Roku trailed off, because nothing on me moved in response to his chakra. “Huh?”

I fought down the urge to smile. “Magnet Release is a good idea, but you’re not getting past me that easily.” I lifted one finger and said, in a tone usually used by Academy teachers, “In theory, a team of three genin with perfect teamwork can defeat a jonin. But I want to see if you three genin can. So, come at me with everything you have.”

“What if we hurt you?” Aiko asked, her gray eyes wide.

Their concern was admirable, but misplaced. “Aiko-chan, I’ll be fine.” Because I was, on average, moderately terrifying even to other jōnin and had a big, fat moniker that parents in Iwa used to scare their children. More importantly, I knew the kids’ fighting styles and jutsu inside and out, having taught them half of what they could do.

Don’t forget about my contributions, Isobu butted in. Though he didn’t have a particularly mobile face, I got the impression he was grinning in anticipation anyway.

Kaito pursed his lips. “We’re gonna be throwing everything at you.”

“Bring it.” I’d had worse. There was no timer, so I’d just have to see how long the kids could sustain an attack as they did so. I just raised my hand and made the Seal of Confrontation, while the kids got into their ready stances.

Aiko and Roku rushed me first, only to get nothing but handfuls of empty air when they tried to grab my legs. Aiko was quicker than Roku, but not by enough to catch me. I left both of them where they’d tripped in the dirt, then pinpointed Kaito’s location with my chakra sense in time for him to launch his attack.

The thing was, Kaito was the first one to use a ninjutsu aimed at my back, from the nearby riverbank. “Water Release: Wild Water Wave!”

And then he was spitting water like a busted fire hydrant. It was the only proper Water Release technique I’d actually taught him, oddly enough. Perhaps he thought that using Ice Release would be cheating.

He’d have to start cheating better.

Though Aiko aimed a punch at my kidneys, I grabbed her wrist, redirected her momentum, and tossed her into Roku. The impact knocked both of them sprawling, with Roku rolling to make sure his sister landed safely, but it mostly made certain that neither of them were in the way of Kaito’s somewhat overenthusiastic offense.

I shot twenty feet to the left in a blink of an eye, and Kaito’s attack missed entirely.

“I missed?!” Kaito gasped, his chest already heaving.

He didn’t have a whole lot of chakra to start with, and ninjutsu ate through most people’s reserves faster than sharks did seals. I could still remember what it felt like to experience that problem with smaller ninjutsu as opposed to the A- and B-ranked mainstays I used now, but it had been a very long time since then. I’d have to revise my half-formed idea of how to train these kids, because I had no intention of throwing them into anything like the Chūnin Exams until they needed to worry about that a lot less.

You’re welcome for that, by the way.

You already know you’re the best.

“Try not to shout what jutsu you’re using before you pull it off,” I suggested, while Aiko and Roku rushed over to him. While the kids regrouped, I added, “Though if you say it afterward, that’s fine.”

“Don’t charge again,” Roku said, when Kaito was on his feet and glared at me. He also caught his younger brother’s sleeve before he could act on that frustration, which gave him a few points in my mental scoring sheet.

“It’s my turn, then,” Aiko said, out of Roku’s grabbing range. “I learned taijutsu from Gai-sensei, you know!”

So did I, kid. And I’ve been doing it longer than you’ve been alive. But since that would be unhelpful to say aloud, I angled my body so I faced Aiko with my right side alone. It wasn’t the Strong Fist, but I didn’t want to reveal that little secret at the moment. I didn’t know if Aiko would be enthused or crushed to realize that I knew every taijutsu technique she did and then some.

Ah, well. She’d find out.

Aiko charged, reinforcing her legs with chakra just as Gai had taught her how. She was even faster than she’d been before, aiming a roundhouse kick at my head after a picture-perfect leap.
It didn’t change the fact that she weighed less than sixty pounds. In a single deft motion, I manually repositioned the angle of her leg and sent her sailing over my shoulder, careening into the river with a shout of surprise.

KER-SPLOOSH.

“Aiko!” Roku and Kaito shouted together, their eyes wide.

“I’m okay!” Aiko called, after a bit of sputtering. “Aaaah, it’s cold!”

Well, it was January. She’d be fine once she got out, though—each of the kids wore their sparring clothes, which dried quickly with little prompting. Aiko didn’t even have accessories to bog her down, and anyway her preferred outfit was basically a swimsuit with bike shorts.

While Kaito went to go drag Aiko out of the river—not that she needed the help—Roku squared off against me. “You’re just playing with us, aren’t you?”

“You could say that,” I said, not wanting to crush their ambitions too quickly. Hm. Maybe I’d step things up after this? “So, your turn?”

Roku dug around in his backpack and pulled out a half-liter-sized jar full of iron filings without looking.

I raised an eyebrow. “What are you going to do with that?”

“Not gonna tell you,” Roku said, and unscrewed the lid before throwing the entire thing at my face.

Roku could have flooded the iron with his chakra before he threw it, since any ordinary opponent would just dodge the flying jar and force him to have to move the magnetized particles back into the fight. Just rushing things like this worked for people like Gaara, who had chakra to spare and moved tons of sand with no more effect than flexing a muscle.

I’d have to make a note to remember that.

As it was, I avoided the glass and most of the dust, but that stuff clung like hell.

“You didn’t even try to dodge that,” Roku said, frowning. “What’s your trick, Kei-sensei?”

“I want to see what you can do,” I replied, holding out my hand in a thumbs-up like Gai would have. The kids saw more of him recently than they had of me, so why not? “So I’m covered in iron dust. What now?”

Roku hesitated, his dark eyes searching my face for a hint to the inevitable reversal. “You’re…not worried. Not at all?”

“Hit me with your best shot,” I said, still unbothered. Sure, I was keeping track of the other two kids with my chakra sense, just in case, but I genuinely wanted to see how creative my mini-Magneto could get.

“Uh,” was what Roku managed. Shaking himself, he managed a Snake hand seal, then said, “Magnet Release: Binding Iron Cuffs!”

The iron flowed off my flak jacket’s various nooks and crannies, then swirled along with the particles I’d supposedly dodged until I had a pair of neat, dark gray handcuffs on each wrist. Roku’s chakra ran thick among the particles, tightening to the point that they’d chafe if I let them stay on for “Now, uh, you’re going to have to fight me every time you move,” Roku said, though his confidence was clearly shot to hell.

I nodded along with his half-hearted explanation, then said, “When we finish this exercise, I’ll have a few suggestions. But this jutsu is really cool, Roku. Well done.”

“Thank you?” Roku glanced past me, to where Aiko and Kaito were very pointedly not attacking, because they didn’t know what was going on, either.

“So, what happens now?” I asked, stepping to one side so he could see his teammates more easily. “If I’m an enemy ninja, and you’ve just weighed down my arms, what are your teammates doing?”

“We attack, duh,” Kaito responded, and his chakra started swirling around in what felt like the first combat usage of Ice Release all day.

“We tried that,” Aiko reminded him, squeezing river water out of her hair.

“No, no.” I held up my hand, and Roku winced when he realized he wasn’t slowing me down much. If at all. “Kaito, feel free. Ice Release works just fine.”

“Stop saying that!” Kaito shouted, clenching his fists at his sides. “You’re not supposed to be just playing with us! This is a real fight, right?”

Well, the hoarfrost he was introducing to the riverbank was a hint that it could be. As Roku skittered over to join his teammates and Kaito continued to turn red a shade at a time, I simply said, “If you want a real fight, sure.”

I drew my hand over my face, slamming my self-control down over my previously playful expression until all that was left was a blank, deadly mask when the kids could see it again. I met each of their eyes in turn, letting a tiny slip of lethal intent leak out through my chakra. Though I didn’t draw on so much as a sliver of Isobu’s chakra, the combination of my lack of emotion and the pressure of pure evil weighing down on them changed the character of the fight entirely.

I hadn’t needed to so much as draw my sword. All three of them tensed up like a sudden cold wind had crossed the village, and Kaito doubled down on his glare in an effort to control the creeping awareness that something fundamental had changed.

“Kaito. Attack me,” I ordered, resting my hand against the hilt of my katana once more.

Kaito snapped his hands into a Dragon seal, causing water to drift out of the river and form a dozen globes about the size of his fist. When his chakra twisted, every single one of them turned into a rough kunai shape and hovered behind him. “Ice Release: Flying Daggers!”

Then they were all flying my way, per the name.

Kaito knew how to throw kunai because all Academy students had to learn, but he was an Ice Release user. He didn’t really need to carry equipment unless he wanted to save chakra. That said, his aim with his ice kunai was only just good enough to manage a glancing hit if I hadn’t been dodging. It was one thing to throw with the hand, and quite another with one’s mind.

I put that on my mental docket as well.

I smacked the last projectile aside with the back of my hand, sending the icicle spinning off into the distance. When it landed point-first in the river, leaving Kaito weaponless for at least a little while, I just said, “So, what are you two doing to help your teammate?”

“Ah!” Aiko clapped her hands to her cheeks, blinking rapidly. “I can—Kaito, let me help!”

“Stay out of this!” Kaito snapped, but Aiko just ignored him.

Uh-oh.

While Kaito drew a kunai and charged after her, Aiko threw herself at my knee with a shout of, “Bird Kick of Rage!”

I lifted my leg out of the way, but she turned her attack into an impromptu baseball slide and latched onto my other leg just in time for Kaito to arrive, with Roku on his heels as they bowled me over.

Or at least they tried. Replacement Jutsu.

And then they were attacking a log.

Kaito let out an almost incoherent shriek of rage, kicking the log into the river. “Ow! Stupid log!”

“That was better than last time,” Roku tried to reassure him, but Kaito didn’t apparently want to hear it. “I can still feel Kei-sensei over there. She’s wearing the cuffs.”

Okay, kids. What are you gonna do about it? They knew I was in the trees, I knew where they were and could hear them, and this was still my game.

Hm, time to be a little less nice.

Water Dragon Bullet.

Out on the river, a pair of glowing yellow eyes formed in the depths. When the kids turned to face the new threat, the dragon-shaped water construct spun up and out like a waterspout. It bared its fangs, then let out a horrific roar that would rattle windows in nearby buildings if there’d been any.

I pointed two fingers at the kiddie ninjas.

The dragon bellowed again, rearing up and scattering the group as it went on the attack. Aiko dodged left, Roku dodged right, and Kaito barreled into the canopy with no regard for my position. He hadn’t had time to ask Roku where I was, not that I’d have let him get the answer right.

The dragon swept onward, its head going after Roku while its body flooded the training ground as its bulk crawled up from the river and spewed freezing water everywhere. I heard Aiko scream again, but her chakra indicated that she was almost more angry than afraid, and Roku backtracked toward her at the sound.

Still, Kaito continued alone.

Body Flicker.

I landed silently in a tree just above Kaito’s position as he said more than a few words a kid his age generally oughtn’t know. He was soaked to the skin, having failed to reach the trees in time, but he was still more than ready to take me on if he could tell where I was.

Humans so rarely looked up.
I was going to hate myself for this later.

I ghosted out of my hiding place, reaching Kaito just as he got to his feet again. With my chakra dialed down to almost nothing besides the general flood of killing intent, the most warning he could get might have been if I ever let my sword rattle in its sheath.

My hand rested flat against his back, between his shoulder blades, before he had any idea I was there. I drew up behind him, then leaned forward and said quietly, “If I’d been an enemy, you’d already be dead.”

Kaito froze. More than that, his breathing stopped in the middle of inhaling for another shout. His chakra shrank so far down into his coils that if I’d been less sensitive to fluctuations, I would have assumed he died.

He made a faint choking sound, which was all the warning I got before his chakra exploded outward. He jerked away from me. Lightning lashed across my senses and I ducked back as the temperature dropped by half a dozen degrees, just before ice bloomed across the ground in my wake.

While I’d been forced to back up, I wasn’t hurt. That was more than I could say about Kaito, who was curled into a ball on the ground and pressing both hands against the scar on his clavicle. He gulped air in irregular, heaving sobs, shaking with the force of them.

Do you need my help?

_Give me a second._ I let out a breath and systematically unwound every nerve in my body, dismissing both my killing intent and the ninja persona I’d snapped into place. Now the area was just legitimately cold instead of being influenced by any psychological warfare measures.

I couldn’t believe how thoughtless I’d just been. I _knew_ Kaito had been traumatized by his experiences at Sorayama. Hell, a similar incident was half the reason I’d decided to take over his extracurricular training from the Academy teachers in the first place! I may not have _intentionally_ triggered another panic attack, a flashback, or anything else, but I’d been fully prepared to “scare” him into taking a lesson seriously.

Fucking hell. I was repeating my sensei’s greatest hits.

I shook my head. Okay, no. Beating myself up wasn’t helping. Isobu’s chakra wouldn’t help either.

“Kaito!” both of his teammates called, rushing into the clearing. They were damp, shivering, and covered in twigs and mud, but I had no doubt whatsoever that the pair of them had realized what was wrong and instantly rushed our way.

Roku knelt next to Kaito’s huddled form, and the ice parted around him. Roku’s voice was already quiet as a rule, but as soon as he saw his brother’s agitated state, he softened it still further. “Hey, Kaito.”

I deliberately didn’t hear anything Roku whispered past that point, or what Aiko actually said when she dropped onto the ground next to Kaito and started to sing softly under her breath. However, I kept a close mental eye on his chakra as it slowly shrank back down from clear distress signal. With his teammates around him, his breathing slowed back down to something akin to normal, and his trembling slowed somewhat.

Rather than being in the depths of a panic attack, he just felt utterly exhausted. Between the attack and the amount of chakra he’d used today in less than ten minutes, he deserved nothing less than a warm blanket and a bowl of soup and a whole day to rest.
I sat down heavily, well out of arm’s reach. If Kaito still saw me as a threat, I didn’t blame him. I didn’t want to crowd him, either. It wouldn’t help. And the guilt eating through my insides made that point perfectly clear.

“K-Kei-sensei?” Kaito mumbled, leaning heavily against Roku as he sat up. His eyes were half-lidded at best, and I winced inwardly once again at the trouble I’d caused. At the pain and the fear.

“I’m sorry,” I said, bowing my head to all three of them. “I should never have done that.”

“What did you do?” Roku asked, since he’d missed the initial incident.

“This entire lesson was supposed to be about how to react when your opponent’s too strong to beat,” I explained, though it still felt deeply inadequate. These kids weren’t experienced enough for this. I should have never gone this far. “But I screwed up. I’m sorry.”

Kaito hiccupped, scrubbing both pulled-up sleeves over his eyes. Fat tears slid down his face when he stopped, but they were slowing down. “Y-you did.”

And the trace of anger in his chakra, cutting through the fear, was the best news I’d had all day. It even made it into his voice, which told me he’d gotten through the worst of the attack. Thank goodness.

While Kaito snuggled deeper into his siblings’ grip, I sat back a little farther, resting my hands on my knees. “The purpose of the Bell Test—originally—was to teach genin the importance of teamwork. You three already understand, as long as you’re not angry, so I wasn’t going to give you that version of the test.”

“So what were you testing us on?” Roku asked, his eyes still a bit wide.

“My version? I wanted to see if you knew your limits,” I said, drawing a confused look from each of them. I went on, “Sometimes, enemy shinobi are just too dangerous to face directly. I’ve fought people like that, and I’ve had to keep fighting them because I didn’t have the option of running away. But sometimes the first try isn’t going to work. Or the second. And you need to know when pulling back and attacking later is a better idea.”

It didn’t work for all missions. Often enough, shinobi had to take the seemingly impossible route to reach a goal. Chūnin Exam proctors liked to test for that level of determination, because many missions couldn’t be refused. For the sake of the village, failure was not an option.

People died on missions like that.

“My goal is to keep all of you safe until you’re strong enough to take care of yourself,” I reminded them, “and that includes teaching you when it’s better to avoid a fight and wait for a better time. So, I made myself too tough to beat.” I did not fidget. I needed to remain in control. I needed to make these things absolutely crystal clear, with no visual distractions. “But I forgot your limitations. You’re new genin, and I’m a jōnin. And I need to remember that it’s not just genin who are learning, here.”

Kaito hiccupped again, but pushed his way out of Roku’s grip. Whether he’d decided that he was a koala for today or what, he wormed his way into sitting on my lap. I automatically looped my arms around him, and Kaito leaned into my chest despite how uncomfortable my flak jacket had to be, fighting back the urge to just sleep.

“So…” Aiko began slowly, sitting up. “Sometimes fighting won’t work?”

“Right,” I said with a nod. I’d… never really learned that one, if I was being honest. Or rather, I had, and then promptly unlearned it in order to be more effective in my new role. The net effect was the same. “Especially at your ages, taking on adult shinobi is a bit much to ask. That’s why genin teams are assigned a jōnin-sensei in the first place.”

“Itachi said stealth is a big part of ninja missions,” Roku said thoughtfully. “And…we didn’t really sneak around at all.”

“Also right. We can work on that later,” I said, and Kaito squirmed a bit in my lap. At first, I didn’t give it much thought, but then I heard the faintest jingling sound.

I heaved him up so he could easily withdraw his arm, and what did I find but a pair of bells dangling from his fist. He gave me an exhausted but triumphant little grin, mumbling, “Told ya I could do it.”

And what could I do but smile? “Sneaky, sneaky. I never said the test was over, did I?”

“Nope,” Kaito said into my neck as I hugged him again, and as his teammates rushed forward to cheer his victory.

He was asleep in seconds, with the bells still clutched tight in his hand.

After getting a very pointed lecture from Chihiro about follow-through, Team Kei was ready for D-ranks. Since we’d gotten such an emotional start, we definitely needed more time to get to know each other’s limits as well as just explore the village. None of them were impatient to get to the business of rescuing princesses or anything so adventurous, so we had a month or two of relative peace. The more time the four of us spent out and about, the more we settled into a much more sedate routine.

With some exceptions.

“Did you decide to hire us so you could be lazy?” I asked Kakashi, who sat on a park bench next to me while the kids earned their allowances.

Kakashi just shrugged, his nose in his book.

My three students attempted to walk his eight dogs. Really, Pakkun didn’t even need a pretense of a lead, since he was sitting on Bull’s back the entire time, but he got one anyway. Even for a dog-walking mission, Kakashi’s pack made for a very easy afternoon. All of them except for Bull would just give the kids advice straight to their faces, which would be useful if they ever decided they wanted a non-summon, non-Inuzuka dog.

“You know, you can always just ask when you want to spend time with me,” I said, leaning up against his shoulder.

“It wouldn’t be as much fun,” Kakashi replied. “Besides, I wanted to see the kids you’re always talking about. It’s been a while.”

“Point,” I said, as the kids took a break from walking the dogs to talk with Pakkun about something. Given the gestures, it might have been a mission-related story, but I trusted the pug to know what to say. “Still, the next time you want to go on a date, let’s go someplace with food.”

There was a flash of amusement in his chakra, and a second later, he snorted. “Of course.”

“Kei-sensei, I have a question!” Aiko called, rushing over toward us two lazy jōnin. “Oh, oh! Kakashi-sensei, I wanna know something from you, too.”
“Ask away,” Kakashi said, which was probably not the correct thing to say.

Aiko bounced in place, looking between the two of us, and asked, “Are you boyfriend and girlfriend?”

It was really a lucky thing that Kakashi was wearing a mask, because otherwise I was sure his sudden blush would be seen from space. The tips of my ears heated up a little bit, but after Aiko asked the question, I had a hard time believing that they’d even notice my reaction compared to his.

“I knew it!” Aiko cheered. Without waiting for a reaction, she started to sing, “Kei and Kakashi, sitting in a tree—”

Kakashi’s shoulders started to shake as he suppressed a mix of nerves and nervous laughter. He would have probably lifted his book to cover his face, only it was already covered and Aiko was still in front of us. He wouldn’t hurt her feelings, even if he wanted to avoid the embarrassing situation entirely.

“K-I-S-S-I-N-G!” Aiko went on, while her teammates looked up and seemed to be thinking about joining in.

“First comes love—” Pakkun howled, conducting every dog except Bull into a chorus.

“Dismissed,” Kakashi managed to say in a strangled tone, and all of the dogs poofed away under the cover of chakra smoke. I was still pretty sure Pakkun was laughing at us.

Roku looked around at the empty leads he and Kaito were left with, then asked, “Does this mean we don’t get paid?”

Kakashi took a second to force himself to put his embarrassment aside, his lightning chakra shifting down through his body. When he finished the focusing exercise, he was able to say in a completely even voice, “Of course you do. I did hire you, after all.”

“I’m gonna buy takoyaki,” Kaito said, rolling the leash up into a coil. “And no one can stop me.”

There was something to be said for modest goals, I supposed.

“Aiko-chan,” I said, leaning forward with my elbows on my knees. “What are you going to get?”

“I dunno. Melonpan?” Aiko shrugged, spinning in place. “I’ll figure it out!”

“Roku-kun?” Kakashi prompted, as Roku gathered all of the leashes on his arm like coils of rope.

“I was thinking of a new jacket? Maybe that’ll take more than one mission, though,” Roku said. Once all of the leashes were secure, he said, “Kei-sensei, are we done for today?”

“I think we can fit one more mission in,” I said, “so get ready for one last trip to the Mission Office.”

“Woo-hoo, missions!” Aiko tossed a bright grin over her shoulder, and then she was gone.

The boys shot after her an instant later, leaving me to catch the leashes they threw haphazardly in my direction.

“Well, they’re certainly full of energy,” Kakashi commented, his nose already back in his book. He still held out an arm so I could hang the leashes on him, though. After all, they were all his.

“That they are,” I replied. “Oh, and Kakashi? Thanks for spending time with us.”
And I gave him a quick peck on the cheek.

He gave me a side hug instead, because there was no way he’d take his mask off in public. As he drew back, he asked, “Ichiraku’s at seven?”

“It’s a date,” I said, and then had to run after my students to make sure they didn’t break anything.

I arrived at the Academy ahead of my students because I knew the Body Flicker and they didn’t.
They were fast little tykes, especially when powered by what little chakra they could channel at their ages. I would probably be able to teach them a few of my smaller techniques someday soon.

The mission we got was a simple one, thank goodness. While Roku sighed, Kaito and Aiko were happy for a chance to test their strength pulling weeds and the like. They got the client’s address from the mission desk workers, while Sensei sat by and watched them rush off. If they were ever interested in going to a new location without running, I would have assumed one or more of them were sick.

“Hokage-sama?” I asked, as my students disappeared in a cloud of dust. “While my kids go on ahead, do you mind if I ask you something?”

“Sure,” Sensei replied. He got to his feet, letting a chūnin take over his spot at the big desk for a little while longer. In all likelihood, I was addressing one of the three or four clones Sensei used to help manage his time, but that part didn’t matter.

We wandered into a side room, and I automatically slapped a security seal up against the wall once the door closed. At some point, I was probably going to confuse any of my other seals with explosives, and that’d be hilarious assuming I lived.

Maybe I just needed to stop using paper-based explosives…

“What did you want to talk about?” Sensei asked. Or a reasonable facsimile of Sensei, anyway.

Million-ryō question, there. I paused for a second to get my thoughts in order, tapping my index finger knuckle against my lower lip. Sort of a thinking pose for people who weren’t Nara clan members. “Sensei, how much do you know about what they teach in the Academy?”

“Not all that much,” Sensei admitted. “Shikane gives me reports, but the most time I’ve spent in a classroom recently was when Naruto went through the entrance ceremony.”

“Okay, that’s…something you’ll have to talk to Shikane about, then,” I muttered, shaking my head.
“Did you get any kind of classes or lectures about how to teach genin when you got Obito and me?”

“No,” he responded blankly. “I’d already taught Kakashi for a few years by that point, so I think Sarutobi-sama fast-tracked it.”

Aaaagh. “Wait, so how did Kakashi end up as your apprentice?”

“His father decided he needed a tutor while he was away,” Sensei told me, though his eyes darkened a bit at the thought of Sakumo. “After Sakumo’s death, I was the only consistent adult in Kakashi’s life, so we ended up sticking together. It wasn’t the best arrangement, but we did what we could.”

Aaaaaaaaagh. Fuck. I ran a hand over my face, trying to think my way through the question. I needed to be a bit more direct. “Okay, I didn’t get any kind of lessons on how to teach genin. And given what happened the first time I tried to train them for real, I think I needed the advice more than they needed to learn the lesson I taught.”
Sensei nodded. He’d heard my self-recreminations over weekly team dinners within two days of that disastrous bell test exercise, and for the next week as well. While it had been a while since I’d done my signature headless chicken impression in the Namikaze household, Sensei had a good memory. And so did his clones.

As did his kids. I was never going to be capable of maintaining ninja mystique around small children, apparently. Just wasn’t in the cards.

“I feel like…okay, hear me out,” I said, thinking aloud as much as I was just talking. “Jōnin-sensei need to actually learn how to teach before they get a genin team. I know that the idea is to pass on our skills to the next generation, but most of us have never really had to teach before.” Though obviously, my social circle had a higher-than-normal proportion of people who had taught someone something in a ninja context. Gai was head and shoulders above the rest, while Kakashi’s “learn by doing” method worked once in a while. “And… I know you weren’t that much older than Kaito and Aiko when you graduated from the Academy. I was their age. But don’t they…seem almost too young? We’re not fighting the Third Shinobi World War anymore.”

Sensei—or his clone—had taken a notebook out of nowhere and was scribbling down notes as I talked. “Anything else?”

“Well, there was—” And that was as far as I got.

“STOP DISRUPTING CLASS!” shouted a chūnin-sensei from across the hallway.

“NO!”

Aaaand that was my team. All together.

“I’ve gotta go, Sensei. Sorry.” And then I was out of the room, tearing the security seal off the wall as I went. I just barely caught Sensei smacking his own forehead so hard that his clone poofed before I was around the corner and picking up speed.

I ended up having to extract my team from the classroom before the chūnin Academy teacher punted all three of them out the door, making frantic apologies as I went. While I chased the kids back off to their actual mission, I made a mental note that there was no way they were mature enough to handle a mission outside of the village. No C-ranks for Team Kei for quite some time, if I had anything to say about it. And since I was the jōnin-sensei, I did.

Something interesting has happened in Kirigakure, Isobu said mildly, as I sat on a rooftop to make certain the kids didn’t try to escape their afternoon work again. None of them were all that happy about being caught in the act of slacking off, but I had to be a nag about at least some things. If they wanted to be shinobi, then they’d need to learn to follow directions from the squad leader, or else something was going to explode.

Sure, in a fenced-in garden there wasn’t much space to go, but they’d already proved they could be sidetracked.

Interesting how?

You recall how you asked me to speak to Saiken, Isobu said, like I couldn’t remember a conversation I’d had almost two months ago. Which, well…I supposed that was fair.

Let’s say the answer is yes. I gave Kaito a thumbs-up when he correctly identified and extracted a weed, then went off to freeze it and chuck it in a compost pile. Then I asked Isobu, What exactly happened?

Saiken would like me to tell you that he is doing just fine, and that you seem like a nice human, Isobu went on, with just a trace of teasing entering his tone. Now he was messing with me.

Okay. Gotta say, it’s about the second time ever that a Tailed Beast has ever complimented me directly, I replied, playing his game for a little.

Isobu snorted. Saiken reports that Kirigakure has finally managed a full ceasefire rather than continuing its most recent civil war or revolt, or whatever they want to call it. I got the impression he was folding his arms one over another, like I would. I expected the Mizukage to enforce the peace with a few dozen executions, but apparently it was unnecessary.

As long as Mei didn’t end up turning Kirigakure into the Bloody Mist, there was relatively little that could probably go worse than the old timeline. Then again, that had been a mind-controlled Yagura’s doing. And the man behind the man certainly hadn’t cared about how many lives he’d been ruining.

She has decided to secure peace by binding Saiken’s host to her, Isobu told me, in…some human ceremony. Saiken didn’t know the term.

Granted, I didn’t know much about Utakata. He had an entry in my Bingo Book and I knew that he used a form of Water Release called Soap Bubble ninjutsu, but I was also pretty sure he was the only jinchūriki in the old timeline to desert his village of origin. Honestly, the fact that he’d managed that while his primary weapon was a bubble wand made it more impressive.

Someone was going to get money from this.

He doesn’t appear happy about it, Isobu said, though I didn’t really know enough to be concerned or not. But that is what Saiken says is going to happen. Not soon, but certainly in the future.

Hm. I wonder how that’ll turn out… Then again, that wasn’t my business for now. The only kage-affiliated family I really cared about was Sensei’s. Gaara’s came next in distant second place, and the rest were mostly concerns of the “I am going to get punched in the face” sense. Anything else?

Saiken thinks that we’re right to be concerned about Shinjitsu, Isobu said, after a brief pause to think. Kiri’s intelligence corps seems to believe the inroads made by such a force are more dangerous than they seem. Kisame Hoshigaki has abandoned Kirigakure.

Well, fuck. Any other roster shifts I should know about?

Nothing else of note, aside from Shukaku saying that Gaara has entered the Academy. He’s doing well.

“Kei-sensei? Did you fall asleep?” Kaito asked, interrupting by waving a hand in front of my face.

I caught his hand and gently pushed it aside. “I was meditating.” Which was…close enough to what I’d been doing to pass for it at a distance. Sort of like different subspecies of the same animal or something, I supposed.

All three of my kids had dirt up to their elbows, and both Kaito and Aiko had dirt in their hair. Roku had snow, instead. I probably should have been paying more attention to them before they started getting a bit too bored.
“Come to think of it, all of you need to learn a bit more about that, too,” I said, shaking my head. Kaito was probably a bit ahead of the class on that score, but I’d need to polish all our skills as we went. “Well, did everyone finish their part of the garden?”

“Yep!” Aiko said cheerfully. “And we put everything in the compost that’s ‘sposed to live there!”

“In that case, it’s time to report to our client and have her inspect our work.” I got to my feet and stepped off the roof, with Kaito following in my wake.

While my team got the usual “good job, tiny children” response from the homeowner, I tried to figure out how to avoid today happening again. We’d had two successful missions today, but I was all too aware I was basically acting as a babysitter instead of a jōnin-sensei. If the kids acted out while on a more important or dangerous mission, there was no way of telling what could happen. At the least, their behavior reflected on the village. At the most, we could get into very deep shit.

Kaito was too impulsive, often getting the other two into trouble. Aiko was like Lee without the discipline that made him effective five years from now. Roku could have a degree of responsibility that would help rein his siblings in, but thus far he was more likely to go with the flow.

And then, as we were splitting up for the afternoon, I uttered the fatal words. “We’ve got a long way to go.”

Instantly, Isobu’s end of my mindscape started to play a rapid-fire drumbeat. Let’s get down to business—

Oh, no. Isobu, please don’t tell me you have that memorized.

Of course I do.

I sighed. And then I went to go get ready for my date, with that song stuck quite firmly in my head.

Chapter End Notes

So, this chapter is named after a song from Mulan, but not the one referenced in its text. Because we already used that title.
Intermission: Melt

Chapter Summary

Kei: Have a decent time, despite yourself.

Chapter Notes

And the song for this chapter is "Melt," which is one of the first VOCALOID songs I ever heard.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Seven years since October 10th (and five years before Naruto's graduation)

Five hundred twenty-five thousand six hundred minutes, five hundred twenty-five thousand moments so dear, I hummed to myself as I headed to the village gates. Unheard by anyone but my literal inner demon, the words went on, Five hundred twenty-five thousand six hundred minutes, how do you measure—measure a year?

It probably says something about both of us that the only time we can maintain a tune involves wishful thinking. Or mind control.

Spoilsport.

I do try.

Nonetheless, I was in…a fairly chipper mood, all told. Which was not what I had expected to be able to say after getting the news this morning.

They will be fine, Isobu said firmly. This is almost an insultingly easy mission, even for children.

Genin, I replied, but didn't argue past that.

"Kei-sensei, you're late!" Kaito and Aiko accused simultaneously when they spotted me.

"I said we were gonna meet at eight," I said, raising my hands defensively. "And it's seven fifty-five!"

Roku looked up from the book he'd been reading and added, "I told you two the clock back home was early."

Aiko puffed her cheeks out as she pouted, then sighed. "Okay, fine. You're not late."

And far be it from me to pull a Kakashi twice. Ever.

"But we're all here, so let's just go already!" Kaito put in. Now, if only he was blond, he'd be a pretty good stand-in for Naruto in terms of overexcitability about missions. It certainly wasn't Team Kei's first rodeo, but it was the first time that my genin would get to take on a job that took them so far away from Konoha. Our previous C-ranks had mostly taken place in the farming areas immediately around the village—larger-than-average pest removal, occasional bandit patrols, and other low-risk assignments. This meant that not only did bigger fish tend to stay out of the area, but also that the kids could cut their teeth on a facsimile of real shinobi life in a safe zone. Help was only ever one Body Flicker or summon contract away, even if I pretended that Sensei didn't monitor my health via Flying Thunder God Seals.

Even this mission was mostly a C-rank because it took place so far from home, not because it was going to present a massive challenge.

"Kitano Town is a week away," Roku informed Kaito in a slightly sarcastic tone, or at least as well as he could as a crackly-voiced twelve-year-old. Didn't do drama all that well, really. But he tried to be the voice of reason on alternating mornings.

"For civilians, maybe!" Aiko said. "Kei-sensei, you did it in less, right?"

"No, I've only ever been there once. And it took a week." Because horses did not compare to ninja. And my cousins made the entire process terrible enough that the story did not need to be repeated for young ears. "But we could probably do it faster."

"Then we should," Kaito concluded, hands on his hips. "Going slow for no reason doesn't make any sense."

Sightseeing tours said otherwise.

"I didn't realize you were so interested in supply chains for border stations," I said mildly. "Maybe I should have put you on busy work rotations earlier."

"It's not the things we're doing that we're excited about." Roku glanced at his teammates for confirmation, and after getting two nods, said, "It's the fact that this is the farthest we've ever been from Konoha."

Well. Recently, anyway.

If this was a world wherein watches existed, I would have made a show of checking mine. We'd probably wasted the allotted five minutes of spare time to head out, right? "Move out, team. We're heading to Kitano. Might as well actually do this on schedule."

The kids raised their fists. "Right!"

With that, all three of them took off ahead with ninja speed, leaving me in the dust. They did seem to enjoy using their powers for the silliest things.

Now who could they have gotten that habit from?

Excited, aren't they?

Well, it is a special occasion. Let's see… I started to hum as I launched into a run. For a long time we've been marching off to battle… In a thundering herd, we feel a lot like cattle…

The second trip to Kitano was at least less awful than Oregon Trail or any of its affiliated games.
There were no beasts of burden, the trip didn't take long enough that it felt like months, and no one caught any road diseases. There were also no pranks to be played on various members of our little troupe, because no one hated each other nearly as much as Kōsuke and Hayate had after their first interaction. Because there was no Kōsuke.

All in all, I'd call it an improvement.

Kitano Town was nearly the same as I remembered it from years ago. The aura of pervasive evil and the bizarrely manicured environment had both been modified by time and the rearrangement of power structures, but it was still fundamentally a trading town.

Hard to believe we'd let a family matriarch get assassinated here. And that I felt absolutely no guilt whatsoever about enabling that conclusion to family drama, though only by rescuing the woman who'd hired Konoha shinobi for it. Sure, I hadn't been precisely involved, but no one would have bothered taking that mission if my team hadn't saved the woman who paid for the job later.

Gah, that sounded more complicated than it really was. But the kids kept asking questions and occasionally their request for details threw everything off.

Aunt Inari was cool, though. While she hadn't made a habit of sending letters all the time, she did like sending monthly things like shirts or whatever along with the merchant caravans that traveled the route between Kitano and Konoha. The shirts basically never fit, but Hayate and I understood the intent behind them. Inari meant well.

"Is that where all the weird shirts you give us come from?" Kaito asked, once I explained that little problem.

"Not all of them," I said, "but apparently Aunt Inari has a similar sense of humor."

"Which house is hers?" Aiko asked as we entered the town, looking around so much that I wondered if she wished she had her head on a swivel instead of a spine. "Does she live in the same house as you told us about?"

That would… That would probably be kinda creepy if that was the case. "No, the address doesn't match. I think her brother's family still owns that one." I pointed down a different street than I had originally visited during the mission to Kitano. "She has a townhouse down that way, probably."

"Then let's go," Roku said.

As we walked, we passed the faint remnants of cracks in the pavement that Hayate's brief encounter with Iwa missing-nin had left in town. Funny how no one seemed to care to fix it. I didn't point the damage out to the kids, but they were so busy looking at the trappings of a merchant town that I doubted they would have cared about that bit of trivia.

"Are we there yet?" Kaito asked, as we walked past row after row of fancy gated houses. People who lived around here tended not to treat shinobi as honorable soldiers—rather, we were expensive servants. He was right to be wary, and perhaps a bit impatient.

It was kinda weird to think that, at one point, these would have been more the kids' people than not. While they were descended from shinobi, their parents had taken on a merchant lifestyle instead and intended to raise their children in it. After Sorayama and after being adopted by Raiden's family, each of the kids seemed to have broken with that culture and ended up in shinobi-land as a result. Mostly.

Anyway, we made it to Aunt Inari's townhouse within another five minutes or so.
"You're looking for Inari? No, she's out of town at the moment," said the person who greeted us at the door. Then, "Wait a second. You're Keisuke, right?"

"Keisuke Gekkō, yes," I replied, stepping back to briefly bow and give my students a good example. For once in my entire career. As my students lurked and tried not to draw too much undue attention to themselves, I added, "These three are my students, Aiko Kasai, Roku Chigami, and Kaito Yuki."

"Hi!" Aiko said, smiling brightly. "Did ya call for a ninja team?"

"I didn't, but Inari told me to expect you." A matching smile split her face. "Tsubasa Fujita. It's a pleasure to finally meet all of you."

Aunt Inari had never actually said what her wife looked like, but I could definitely see the resemblance to Sano from the last time I'd seen him. He had his other mother's jaw and hair color, and the same somewhat lanky build. I was slightly envious that Tsubasa seemed to have also given Sano her height, but heck, I had enough of that to spare for myself.

"Well, come in," Tsubasa said, turning so she could let me grab the door instead. "Just mind the threshold—Ōta hasn't been putting his shoes away properly."

Sure enough, Kaito nearly tripped over a stray set of sandals, but we were able to head into the house without further issue. In a way, it was kind of a relief. While I'd been able to sense building tension in my team throughout our walk through Kitano, being indoors seemed to have quelled it. All three of the kids were relaxing for the first time since we'd left Konoha, just from meeting Tsubasa's friendly face and being invited in, no ifs, ands, or buts.

"I wish I'd had more notice to make something," Tsubasa said as we sprawled all over the family quarters. "But your room are clean and I can send Uki out to get food in a few minutes."

"We do stuff like that all the time in our village, Auntie Tsubasa," Aiko said instantly. "Just tell us where to go!"

"You're guests, Aiko-chan," Tsubasa replied. "That'd be pretty rude, don't you think?"

"…No?" Kaito tilted his head to one side. "Kei-sensei makes us do it all the time. We usually even get paid."

"And each one is another D-ranked mission for your official records," I pointed out in a dry tone. "It's good for you."

"I think we'd better go shopping before Aiko and Kaito explode from too much energy," Roku put in, blowing his bangs out of his face. Or at least over one eye. He pushed himself to his feet and started to stretch. "Kitano's not that big. We'll just approach it like an intel mission."

"Yay!" Aiko said instantly. As she hopped to attention, she gave Tsubasa a thumbs-up in a manner nearly identical to Gai. "This is a freebie, Auntie Tsubasa! We'll be back in a flash."

And here I thought only Sensei used that particular pun.

"If you're sure, I have a list." Tsubasa still sounded a bit unsure, but she dug a piece of paper out of her kimono sleeve and handed it to Kaito.

"We've got this," Kaito assured her.

And then they were off, in a blur of motion and childish enthusiasm.
That left me and Tsubasa in the kitchen, and I got up after a second to close the front door the kids had left swinging in their wake. By the time I turned back, Tsubasa was already digging through kitchen cabinets to find all of the cookware.

"Need any help?" I asked.

"You're a guest," Tsubasa said, as though that determined whether I could help or not. "Please, relax."

"Okay," I said, and took a spot at the dinner table. "I didn't get a chance to thank you earlier for opening your home to us. Especially since we've never met before."

"Oh, it's nothing," Tsubasa replied, setting a large pot on the stove. "Inari talks about you every time she gets one of your letters, so it's almost like you've been here a few times already."

"Thank you anyway," I insisted, because it didn't seem like enough.

Tsubasa finally gave up. "You're welcome, then."

Victory! I wasn't so crass as to actually celebrate employing my manners properly, but I was sure Tsubasa could tell anyway.

"By the way, did you say that girl was a Kasai?" Tsubasa asked after a while, after cleaning out the next few cooking vessels. "It's been a long time since I heard anything from that family. All news out of Sorayama stopped years ago, and the few Chinatsugumi I still see don't seem to talk about what happened."

I winced. Even years later, I could still hear the screaming if I let my thoughts dwell on it for too long. "If it's just curiosity, please don't ask that when my students are around."

Tsubasa thankfully didn't ask anything more. She and I waited in comfortable silence—or at least that's what an awkward silence could develop into if left alone for long enough.

"We're baaaaaaack!" Aiko's voice announced about half an hour later, as one of the boys probably planted a size-something shoe in the door. They may have been taught their manners, but that alone wasn't a guarantee that they'd put them to use.

"Wipe your feet, please!" Tsubasa called from the kitchen. Between the two of us (with only token assistance on my part) we had prepped all the ingredients that were on hand at the time.

The three kids trooped to the kitchen and started unloading their purchases, chattering with each other without a hint of frustration. Seemed like the sub-quest had gone well. Maybe I'd need to assign more of them in the future, just to see how they handled the pressure?

Honestly, they were probably overdue for more complex missions. Aiko had picked up Gai's Strong Fist to a sufficient extent that her opponents were almost obligated to say their prayers before fighting her. Roku's metal manipulation was precise enough that he could almost pull material out of stone if he needed to. And Kaito had long since started developing ways of using Ice Release that had to be unique. They were probably ready for a step up.

While I had avoided getting my team put on missions higher than C-rank thus far, my reasons were a little less high-minded than I liked to pretend.

Simply put, I was afraid.
As I watched the kids leap into dinner preparations with a will, I sighed inwardly. It wasn't that uncommon to hold a genin team back from taking the Exams when there wasn't a pressing need for new chūnin. People would be assigned missions of the appropriate difficulty regardless of rank, in the end, and promotions just determined chain of command.

I was being a coward again.

"Kei-sensei?" Kaito asked, and I glanced to the side to spot him next to my elbow. His eyebrows scrunched together as he tried to read either my face or my mind. Probably both.

"What is it, Kaito?" I responded, snapping out of my slumped position. It was probably rude to not pay attention to the kids' antics, even if they didn't involve me much.

"Is something wrong?" Kaito pressed, while Aiko bounced around the kitchen in an attempt to help cook and Roku started unpacking our travel bags. Kaito poked me in the shoulder and said, "You've been kinda quiet since we got here."

"I'm just thinking about the future," I said, shrugging.

"While making that face?"

I reached out and poked Kaito squarely in the middle of his forehead with two fingers. "You win that round. Now go help Roku unpack."

Kaito rolled his eyes and wandered off to do just that.

Are you still worrying over them? Isobu asked, in an exasperated tone.

I don't think that ought to be such a surprise anymore, I said to him, directing another slightly exasperated tone right back at him. I mean, you know me. I'm a born worrywart. It's half my job as a sensei and half the fault of the old timeline making me wary as hell.

Excuses, excuses, Isobu replied, rolling his eye. Did you ever speak to your teacher about this issue?

We're talking about the same person who threw his genin into the Exams when they'd been ninja for six months.

And you failed, and then several years later you tried again and succeeded.

I made a grumbling noise at him, at least inside my head. But what if they get hurt worse than I did?

Are they shinobi or are they not? For that matter, are you?

I mentally balled up a piece of sealing paper and beamed him in the head with it, because my mindscape had enough flexibility for that. Shut up. I know you're right, but shut up anyway.

Isobu let me go with one final laugh, just to rub in the fact that he'd won.

The next day, the mission began in earnest. After saying goodbye to Tsubasa and her two kids who hadn't moved out yet (Uki and Ōta, whose names I was sure my students immediately forgot), we headed out for the day. We mostly focused on taking only what we could carry with us to the border post to report for specific orders. I grabbed Aiko's and my sealing supplies before we left, though, because I had no intention of being any more reckless with explosives than was strictly necessary.
Explosive seals weren’t as dangerous as unexploded landmines, but I still wasn’t going to leave them lying around where civilians could trip over them.

Heck, I had better explosive management than that even on active battlefields. Chakra-sensitive fūinjutsu mines were an absolute pain in the ass to make, but they got their actual targets nearly every time. The only time I had to worry much about collateral damage was when the explosive was big enough to kill a lot more things besides a single person.

"Kei-sensei, do you know who’s at this border station?" Roku asked, while we approached the border with the Land of Grass. And, per usual, we approached it at shinobi speed because there was no one else to slow us down.

It wasn't like I memorized the duty rotations, but... "I'm sure the commander is a special jōnin, minimum. Other than that, I'll probably figure it out once we get in range."

"You're kinda slacking, aren't you?" Kaito said in a dry tone.

"Kaito, focus on the path ahead of you a little more and on sassing your sensei a little less," I replied, in the same manner. "Just because I know a bunch of high-ranking shinobi doesn't mean I can spot them from this far away."

Sure, thirty kilometers was respectable by sensor-nin standards, but I still didn't pay attention to every little blip I could pick up. Hostile shinobi stood out, and so did allies, but only in a general sense until I got close enough to identify the specific people.

But my reading was better for people I knew well, and I picked Genma's chakra out of the background noise in another few minutes. "Genma's there, but everything else is up in the air. That good enough, Roku?"

Roku made a show of thinking it over. Then, "We don't have any pumpkin to bribe him with."

"He doesn't bring his cats on missions, though," Aiko said with a slight pout. "We'll have to wait until we get back and until he gets back before we can play with them."

This earned a groan from Kaito, too.

Not because they missed Genma or his barrier fūinjutsu practical lessons. But because they missed being able to play with his cats.

Kids these days.

Hypocrite. Or do you think I didn't notice that you're a dog person?

I hurled another mental paper ball at Isobu's face. Shut uuuuup.

Once again, Isobu gave a cackle before he left me to my own devices.

We approached the border station at a walk, once we got within about fifty meters or so. The kids had never seen one before but I'd been stationed here and at almost every other site within a hundred kilometers, during my Hell Year outside of Konoha. Dread pooled in my gut at the reminder, but three years had passed. The old misery was not as sharp as it once was.

Anyway, the old tree complex was at least full of friendly chakra signatures. I couldn't ask for more than that.
"Kei-sensei, what do we do to let them know we're here?" Roku asked, eyeing the structure carefully.

There was a loud pop and a puff of chakra smoke large enough to obscure a shinobi's approach. As the kids instantly reached for their weapons, I rested a hand on my hip and waited for the show to end.

"Speaking in recognizable voices helps," said Genma, as the smoke faded. As his usual senbon twitched in his mouth, he tapped his earlobe. "As does a good set of ears on the other end."

"How's it been out here, Uncle Genma?" Aiko asked instantly, even as she held out her arms for a hug.

Genma allowed her to latch onto his ribs, saying only, "Boring food, but there's good company. Now, anyway."

Aiko grinned. "We can fix the food problem!"

"My hero," Genma replied as Aiko let go to do a quick triumphant twirl. Obliging her whims as usual, he held a hand up so her pirouette looked even more polished.

I caught a gleam of silver on one finger. So he did get around to exchanging rings with Raidō. Good for him. I'd made the mistake of asking about that only once, while the two of them were still trying to settle on a design. Never again.

"If you have time, I wanna work on the ice senbon again," Kaito said. "I'm getting the aerodynamics wrong and I need help."

"You already tried your sensei, right?" Genma cast a knowing glance at me.

I held up my hands defensively. "Hey, senbon aren't my thing. That's your field. Now, if it was kunai—"

"Senbon are easier," Kaito retorted, as he had the last four times we'd talked about this topic.

"Sounds like a work in progress," Genma commented while fishing around in his thigh holster. Retrieving three senbon and passing them to Kaito's eager hands, he asked, "And you, Roku? Got anything you wanna take care of while you're out here?"

Roku blinked slowly, then shrugged. "I don't know. Maybe something will come to me later."

"How long are you all here?" Genma asked, as he led us to the border station proper.

"About two weeks. We'll be doing daily supply runs until you're fully stocked for the next three months," I replied. And immediately handed him two full storage scrolls. "Speaking of, here's day one."

Genma gave the scrolls a skeptical look. Then he said in a dry voice, "You were supposed to tell me when you decided to work on storage seal modifications, you know. Because if this is what you're using to resupply us, you're gonna be finished in half the time and just train for the rest of it."

"Yep," I said.

Genma looked at the kids, two of whom were out to bug him for additional lessons (and cats) and the last of whom was still deciding. Then he sighed. "Sounds about right."
"Don't worry, you won't be handling the lessons alone," I reminded Genma, nudging him with my elbow. "Now, let's get started."

"You're a liar," Kaito said.

Genma raised an eyebrow. "How so?"

"You said 'it's all in the wrist' when it comes to senbon, and you just spat one hard enough to hit the twenty-five meter target."

"This is coming from the kid who just materializes them in midair."

"Shut up!"

"Do you want my opinion?" I asked, from the branches of the nearest tree.

I got two shouts of "No!" in return for my concern. Well, since my specialties tended to be things I needed to keep in my hands to be effective, it wasn't like I had a lot of room to talk anyway. Except for the explosive tags. That would have been a bad idea.

"Also, Roku, don't think I can't tell when you steal my senbon," Genma added, as my tallest student dropped the Magnet Release eyeliner and looked sheepish. "Just because they're made of steel doesn't mean you lift 'em before I throw 'em."

"I'm trying to work my way up to bigger things," Roku said, though he still should have asked permission.

The rest of the conversation was lost in a minor cacophony, because Aiko ran headlong into the tree I was sitting in and shook it from trunk to canopy. I leaned over the edge of my branch and eyed my student, who was shaking her head. Aiko had never been the type to take things slow.

Then she shot to her feet, blindfold still in place, and chirped, "I'm okay!"

I'd tried telling her earlier that even if Genma's sensor ability was based on hearing, it was probably a better idea to start with meditation first. Even if wearing a blindfold would help with her sensitivity, it was still something she hadn't practiced with that much and ought to have been eased into. But nope. Luckily, she healed fast and had high pain tolerance to start with. If she hadn't been that tough, I would have glued her sandals to the ground to force the meditation-first strategy, but as long as she wasn't hurting herself, it was okay.

Well, that and Aiko had reasons for bouncing off everything in… Uh. Everything she could. Since she couldn't currently see anything other than the inside of her headband. Taking superficial physical hits just helped her in the long run, anyway. She'd save up her real strength for any fights we ran into that got serious.

"I think I'm getting the hang of this!" Aiko whooped, before crashing into a bush and landing in a handstand after she tripped. As she cartwheeled away, she sing-songed, "Nailed it!"

I still wasn't sure if she was truly as clumsy as she acted, even when she could see. At least this time she hadn't hit a…fifth tree. In a row.

"Kei-sensei, can I try practicing with kunai instead?" Roku called up to me, right as I felt my thigh holster start to vibrate.
I slapped a hand over it to keep the kunai inside still and reminded him, "Get an answer first, Roku."

Roku waited, his chakra flickering slightly in impatience.

"Roku."

He rolled his visible eye. "May I use your kunai, Kei-sensei?"

Ignoring the attitude he'd clearly picked up from someone (with one Sharingan and white hair), because knew who the other bad influences were, I unhooked my thigh holster and tossed it down to him. "Just be careful."

Why I always felt the need to remind my students of basic safety rules, I had no idea.

Wham! "I'm still okay!"

Oh, right. That was why.

Roku flipped my kunai holster upside-down and added the three weapons to his pile of six. With about a dozen shuriken to play with on the side, he made the Snake hand seal and focused. Metal danced, floating around his head in somewhat wobbly formation, because juggling multiple objects of different dimensions was always harder than just juggling things that were all the same. The principle applied better to when he was using his hands than his powers, though. His hands weren't really in play if he was levitating things.

Besides, Roku had nearly impaled his foot the last time he tried adding my katana to the mix. Maybe he was working his way back up to it.

"Roku, are you watching?" Kaito called out, while he materialized half a dozen ice senbon. "Kei-sensei? Aiko?"

"Can't see anything, Kaito!" Aiko reported.

"Busy," said Roku.

"I'm watching, though," I replied, because Kaito looked like he wasn't happy with that turnout.

Genma didn't let him dwell on it. "When you're ready, aim for the vitals. Ten points in the head, five in the lungs or heart."

"And if I just wing him?" Kaito asked, eyeing the straw dummy they'd set up. It didn't have convenient marking points for all the valid targets, so Kaito would have to draw on his anatomy lessons or on muscle memory from our other training sessions.

"One point," Genma said. "No points for misses."

"Wait, wait, can I—" Roku began to interrupt, his eyes snapping open.

Kaito fired. Instead of the six I'd expected him to stick with, Kaito was producing more senbon as I watched and firing them in volleys. The senbon themselves weren't perfect, because he was still learning, but for the most part his attacks made contact.

"And that's...thirty-seven," Genma said, once the ice stopped moving around. "I like the double eye-shot. But that's half as many hits as I'd expect from someone throwing those manually."

"Give me a break," Kaito complained. "I hit the guy enough to kill him! That's the important part."
Genma didn't look impressed. "Uh-huh. Roku, your turn."

Roku waited long enough for Kaito and Genma to get out of the way, then muttered some attack name under his breath. I'd ask him about it later, but even so, all of the accumulated weaponry he'd been practicing with hurtled toward the now-punctured target.

Genma counted quickly. "...And with less than half as many weapons, Roku ties."

"What?!"

"Thought so."

"Kei, did you teach them to fight the same way?" Genma asked me as my boys walked up to the training dummy to count for themselves. "Because right now the main difference I'm seeing is in the control levels."

I slid down off the branch and landed, idly steering Aiko away from a bush with my free hand. It felt a little like she was playing Pin the Tail on the Donkey on her own, but without pins. "You can take that off now, Aiko. Weapons time."

"I'll do it this way as a challenge!" Aiko said, and mostly ignored me.

"Anyway, Genma," I said, "they're showing off for you. Neither of them really fights like that."

Genma blinked. "...What, just because I throw weapons?"

"No, I mean they're trying to show that they're really paying attention to what you're showing them," I explained. I jerked a thumb over my shoulder, to where Aiko was still stumbling around. "Hearing-based sensing, senbon usage, weapon throwing... See a pattern? They're like sponges."

"Really eager-to-please sponges. Like puppies or something," Genma commented, but he couldn't hide a pleased smile. "So they do this for everyone?"

"If they like somebody, yep." I still hadn't gotten over the realization that Kaito patterned his hairstyle and clothing choices after mine. And he was still doing it. "Congrats. You're a part of a pretty exclusive club."

"Do I get a membership card or anything?" Genma mused.

"You get the undying admiration of a bunch of genin," I replied. "And free cat sitters."

Genma nodded sagely. "Sounds like a good deal."

"You say that now, but they can and will eat your entire pantry," I said. "Be prepared."

"Speaking from experience, I take it?"

Whatever protest Kaito was about to lodge, given his sudden chakra flare, was drowned out by the sound of Aiko finally finding the training dummy and promptly launching it into the stratosphere with a cheerful bellow of, "Bird Kick of Joy!"

"Well," Genma said, shading his eyes and peering after the flying dummy, "that's a lost cause right there. I'm not going after it." He rolled his shoulder, then stretched. "Time for lunch."

"But we don't know who won!" Kaito shouted from ground zero of Aiko's kick, avoiding being caught up in her victory dance through sheer stubbornness.
"We'll settle it later, Kaito," Genma replied, and then vanished in a Body Flicker blur.

Aiko finally pushed her headband up on her forehead again. "I got it, right?"

"You did. It was a perfect shot," I said, while the boys offered their congratulations. "Now go get the dummy so we can use it later."

I got three perfect groans in response. But they'd do it, because impressing Genma was worth a bit of a jog.

"Kei, gonna need to borrow your brain for a sec," Genma said, on the fifth day of supply delivery.

"As long as you give it back," I joked, looking up from a pile of scrolls my team had obligingly filled at the Kitano market and then delivered earlier. They were out getting the last set filled up, but would be back soon. "What's up?"

"Kiku-san says there's someone suspicious approaching the border a bit down the way," Genma explained, as we headed out of the treehouse fortifications. "Screaming about getting ripped off on the price of local peaches, I think."

"…Okay, but we're not really the local police," I said, sort of confused. "What's the problem?"

"You're the one who memorizes Bingo Books," Genma replied in a dry tone. "Tell me if this sounds familiar; tall guy, low voice, borderline glowing green eyes, and he's covered head to toe in black and gray." Genma gestured to his temple, "And with stitch-scars all over the place."

Kakuzu, I thought instantly, a chill running down my spine.

Of course, there was no way it was. Kakuzu was almost ninety in a business that tended to kill people by forty, and he hadn't gotten that old by being careless. Sure, his bizarre string-dependent biology played a major part in why he'd never seemed like he'd keel over in canon, but he was a smart one. And greedy. He wouldn't flip out on a merchant over produce.

But the idea that it could be was sinking into my brain with fishhooks.

He'd hurt Kakashi. He was not going to get a chance to touch my kids. Not ever.

"It sounds like it could almost be Kakuzu," I said, in a voice too calm to be mine. "But if it is… I don't know. I have to see for myself."

I'd need to see for myself because like hell I'd risk anyone else here in an S-class fight. Unlike practically anyone else in the entire village, I could and had killed opponents on Kakuzu's level before. And of the shinobi posted at the border station, Genma included, none of them had the rank to overrule me.

This had better not be a delayed start to the C-rank curse, or else I'll probably end up flattening the area.

"Kei?" Genma asked, though he could probably hear my heartbeat picking up for all I knew. His senbon twitched in agitation. "You're planning something."

"Just a friendly… chat with someone," I said, forcing a smile and failing utterly at conveying any sincerity. "I'll be right back."

Genma paused, scrutinizing my expression carefully. Then, in a perfectly level voice, he said, "I'll let "Keep an eye on my genin," I reminded him, though he hardly needed it. It was nervous energy doing the talking. "Don't let them get in trouble."

"Have you met them?" Genma asked sarcastically, but he was already walking away to take care of it. As soon as he was out of sight, I could already sense my students heading back toward the outpost, their bright little chakra signatures standing out against the background.

Anticipating trouble, I formed a tiny chakra scalpel and drew the point across one of my knuckles. Blood price achieved, I summoned Tsuruya on the glorified game trail that led to the border post.

When the smoke cleared, Tsuruya shook out her feathers with the sound of someone dropping a box of cutlery, then said, "Did you need something, Keisuke-sama?"

"Do your best to help Genma keep my team out of trouble," I said, because basically everyone short of Sensei would need a hand with that. And even then, I wouldn't make large bets.

Tsuruya cocked her head to one side to eye me pointedly. "Have you met them, Keisuke-sama? I'll do my best, but my goodness, that is quite a mission."

And it was one I'd failed at more than once. I still patted her side and said, "Good luck."

Once Tsuruya was resigned to her fate, I turned and headed for the Kusa border.

I was never going to stop hating this place. While there was nothing wrong with Kusagakure, or any of their shinobi from what I could recall from my brief encounters with them, every time I got within a hundred kilometers of the border, something happened. It was like the local equivalent of the Bermuda Triangle, but only for me.

Like Genma had said, it wasn't a long walk. I found the guy with the agitated civilian-level chakra signature within about five minutes, even without looking that hard. The man was probably taller than me, with all the features that Genma had mentioned, but there was one big, gaping hole in my fear-fueled assumptions. A detail that Genma hadn't seen fit to mention.

The guy, in between his rants, only resembled Kakuzu superficially. And even then, only between titanic sneezes that shook him from head to toe, justifying the full-body getup.

In a voice that was muffled by both cloth and an incredibly congested nose, the man shouted at the rather amused-looking fruit vendor, "And anoder ding—"

"Sir," I said, popping up at his left elbow after he'd just made a pretty expansive arm-flailing gesture. As the guy jumped back at the sight of my Konoha headband, I went on, "Could you please explain the situation to me?"

"Oh, please do," said the fruit vendor. "It'll be funny."

 Under his mask and the piles and piles of clothes, the mysterious man groaned out loud. "Again?"

"I'd like everyone to walk away from this happy," I said, ignoring the vendor's contribution. "But to do that, I still need to know how to help."

"Ugh," said the man who was probably being cheated out of his groceries.

"Well?" said the vendor who was probably doing the cheating.
"Den stob making fun of me!" He sneezed again, nearly upsetting the bag of groceries already in the crook of his other arm. "M stob a cold. Grandmoder's recipe dakes a while dough…"

"And I told you before, you're short by five hundred ryo," said the vendor, unsympathetic.

…This guy was being a pain because of a price-versus-wallet difference of five bucks. This situation was a waste of my time. Still, if it wasn't resolved, I wouldn't have a weird story to tell my kids. With that thought clenched firmly in a mental fist, I dug around in one of my many pockets. "If I might interrupt? I'll pay the difference."

This, apparently, pleased both parties enough that they parted on halfway-amicable terms. The big guy even gave me one of the peaches as a thank-you, though he'd sneezed into his hands at one point during the encounter. I accepted it in an effort to get the poor guy home as fast as possible, but shoved it into a storage seal at the first opportunity and went to go wash my hands afterward because ew.

That was a job well done.

You'll have to forgive me for really not agreeing there, I told Isobu, grimacing. Ew, ew, ew.

You have been up to your elbows in human blood before, Isobu said in a withering tone.

That's different. Also, bring up bedpans at your own peril, I grumbled back.

Why would I when you saved me the effort?

I sighed inwardly. It seemed like I was going to continue my losing track record with Isobu snark-offs for the foreseeable future, then.

I hiked back to the border station and was promptly attacked by preteens. Behind the the kids that mobbed me, incredulous and offended that I'd leave them behind to deal with possible danger, were Tsuruya and Genma and a total lack of concern for all the shouting. Instead, Tsuruya made a point of shading Genma from the bright spring sunlight and totally ignoring me.

Guess I asked for that.

"Don't leave us behind when it's something that trivial," Kaito said, radiating as much disapproval as he could.

"If it was someone only I could handle," I told him, "I wouldn't be able to fight him off and protect you at the same time. All three of you would walk right into danger."

"You have to admit that's true," Roku commented.

"So what?" Aiko wanted to know. "The guy wasn't bad. He just needed some oranges."

"Peaches," Kaito said.

"Whatever!"

Apparently, I was forgiven as far as the kids went. Tsuruya made sure to whack me over the head with her wing to make her point plain—summons were not babysitters, no matter what Kakashi could talk his pack into. Then she decided I was forgiven, too, and poofed out without another show of her metal feathers without a goodbye, for reasons I suspected related to Roku's trigger-happy usage of Magnet Release.
Genma, last of all, approached when my kids were done admonishing me and went back to their training.

"So, nothing interesting happened?" Genma asked.

"Nope," I said. "Other than discovering that reading a Bingo Book before bed is a bad idea."

Genma shook his head. "That's…not exactly what I expected to hear, but okay." His senbon twitched as he smiled and then said, "Not a bad run for a supply mission you cheated the hell out of faster than I could have. Back to training?"

"Yep. Come on," I said, pushing past him. "Maybe this time Aiko'll get a bit further on that sensing technique."

"You know you could have probably started her off with your sensing technique, right?"

"And deprive you of eager fans? Nah," I replied. Besides, mine couldn't be taught. "Move it, Genma-sensei!"

"Sheesh, fine." Genma strode on ahead of me and shouted to the kids, "Hey, do you want to see a new jutsu?"

"Hell yeah!"

"Complete your reports, and then you're dismissed for the rest of the week," I told my students, once we got back to Konoha. I'd need to write up a more elaborate document, because I was the commanding officer and my account was supposed to tie all of them together, but it was really a trivial difference. On a mission where everything went as planned, there wasn't much to say. Within limits, "no news is good news" applied.

"Come on, it's almost time for dinner," Roku said to his teammates. "Aunt Chihiro probably has something good."

"I vote hot-pot!" Aiko said, already charging off.

"Bye, Kei-sensei," said Kaito, and I gave up on being able to tell the bureaucracy that those reports would be in by the end of the day. At least, without tracking my students down and standing over them like Iruka would have when they were Academy students.

I decided to do that later, after I got home and could relax. No matter how far I wandered afield, or how stir-crazy I sometimes got, I always felt my tensions drop whenever I could finally close my apartment's front door behind me.

"Hey, Sis," Hayate greeted me, from the kitchen. "I'm heading out soon."

"Anywhere you can talk about?" I asked while I took my shoes off.

"Nope. See you when I get back," Hayate said. He picked up his mission backpack from next to me, slinging it over his shoulder, and was out the door in a few seconds at most. He paused on the threshold, though. "And Sis?"

"Hm?"

"If Yūgao-chan stops by," my brother said, "give her the present in my room, okay?"
"Are you two—?" I began, but he shut the door in my face. Rude. "Well, whatever."

After getting the road dust out of my hair and taking a few minutes to laze around and eat takeout, I cleaned the house because I'd been gone for two weeks and my archnemesis of domesticity had taken root once again. Thus, I broke out the duster and a mop and opened all the windows. I prepared a bucket of soap suds and sealed furniture into scrolls to keep it out of the way. Then I went to war on the dust and grime that accumulated whenever Hayate was the only one taking care of the apartment. I was taking no prisoners, offering no terms, and going to kick the asses of every dust bunny brave enough to intrude.

About an hour and a half later, my mission was a success. The apartment sparkled where it could, was neat where it couldn't, and I decided to call it quits for the time being. I was in the middle of cleaning up after my cleaning up when a familiar chakra signature arrived at my door.

"Come in, Kakashi!" I called, wringing out the mop in the sink. After some thought, I dumped out the mop water after it.

"I'm not intruding?" Kakashi asked, though I heard him kicking his shoes off. When I made a dismissive noise, he changed the topic with, "Also, what happened to your couch?"

"I put the furniture in a scroll. Give me a sec to get it all back out again…" I turned away from the sink, drying my hands on a towel.

Kakashi was already picking up the seals and examining them, while carrying a backpack full of lumps. "Couldn't you seal up multiple pieces in a single seal if it just says 'furniture'?"

"Oh, I wish," I said, untying my hair from under a bandanna that was really more of a hairnet. "So, Kakashi, what's on the table for today?"

"If I had a table," Kakashi said in an extremely dry voice, even though he was unpacking my furniture for me, "it'd be The Romance of Otohime and Shirogane. I promised not to read ahead, remember?"

"And I keep telling you to go on without me," I replied, heading to my room to change. "Because I don't have a spoiler policy."

There were two loud poofs as Kakashi unsealed the couch and the kotatsu, then started popping the other seals. He was already well into rearranging the living room into something workable by the time I emerged, wearing my Isobu/bubble-patterned pajamas. He'd set his flak jacket over the back of the couch and the backpack on the table, and was looking at the blanket I usually left folded up with a speculative tinge to his chakra.

"You haven't had this one out before," Kakashi commented, even as he settled into his preferred spot on the left and continued to toy with the olive green fabric. "It's softer than the usual blanket."

"The other one's being washed," I replied as I sat down near the couch's other arm. I snagged the edge of his backpack and tugged it over until I could see down the neck. He had something like ten books in it, mostly medium-sized paperbacks that weren't his special collection of signed Icha-Icha. Discount bookstores were full of great finds. "And besides, this one's big enough for two people."

"I agree," Kakashi said, and the next thing I knew, I was underneath the blanket. I felt a bit like I was play-acting a ghost as Kakashi added, "So why don't we?"

"Get over here, then," I said, and he did.
I ended up with the blanket for the most part, since Kakashi was still wearing street clothes. His head rested in my lap, and he had his copy of this week's book leaning against an upraised knee. Meanwhile, I had the book pinned between my arm and the couch's, with my spare hand resting in Kakashi's hair. When he and I finally got back to the business of reading, we both cracked our books open to chapter four and I zoned out for a bit.

Until, of course, I hit an objectionable section. "Okay, I have to ask. Does this man have four legs or am I getting really confused about the number of pairs of pants someone can wear at once?"

"You're not," Kakashi responded. "This is a first-edition printing. Though the author and the publisher…"

_Oh joy. Vanity publishing._

What in the world does that mean?

I flipped to the back of the book and checked the industry names there. Then I re-checked the author's name and sighed. _You can get anything out on the market if you own a printing company._

"Editing time?" Kakashi asked, holding up a pen he'd procured from… Hey, that was _my_ pen. He must have taken it the last time we had one of these book club meetings.

I plucked it from his fingers and said, "As usual."

Kakashi sighed and let me get to it. He, on the other hand, continued to actually read the book for the first time without dealing with me ripping it to shreds. He'd join me later, once he felt like listening to my spoiler-ridden rants. We passed an hour or so in relative silence, other than the _scritch-scratch_ of my pen and the sound of turning pages.

And at some point, I fell asleep.

When I woke up, my apartment was dark except for a reading light. While I hadn't drooled while I napped sitting on the couch, I flexed my jaw and swiped at the corner of my mouth anyway, just to be sure. Then I looked down in my lap and realized that even if Kakashi was a dog-summoning ninja, he had some real feline tendencies. While I napped, he'd somehow managed to sprawl across my lap without waking me up, then settled down and fallen asleep himself. And given that my apartment was both clean and nearly impossible to get into without my express permission, Kakashi had taken his mask off and left it bunched around his chin. Since the couch was really too small for him to stretch out to his full height, he'd almost managed to curl into a ball to fit against me.

Therefore, I couldn't move. Aside from setting the book I'd been shredding on the table, along with the pen that was the murder weapon, I just leaned back into the couch and continued slowly carding my fingers through his hair.

Though I couldn't express it too well when my students were jumping all over each other to tease me and Kakashi into blushing, frantically backpedaling submission, moments like this were some of my favorite ones. Just Kakashi and me, enjoying each other's company without expectations or outside pressure, or outside prying.

"I love you," I said in a whisper, so I didn't disturb him.

Kakashi turned his face a little toward me as he moved in his sleep, then settled back down with a contented sigh.

Though I was safe—_home_, in some ways—Kakashi generally didn't fall asleep with a book half-finished and dangling from one hand. He must've been exhausted. I hadn't asked if he was on a mission before meeting up with me, and he hadn't volunteered any anecdotes. Must've been a bad one.

Isobu?

Hm?

Do you mind if I sing? In my head, anyway.

No. I assume you don't want to do so out loud to avoid disturbing him?

Yep.

Then feel free. You won't bother me.

I gave a thoughtful, though effectively toneless, little hum, just to try and figure out a starting note. Even in my head, I needed a bit of a hook.

All those days watching from the windows, I hummed mentally. All those years, outside looking in... All that time, never even knowing just how blind I've been...

I must not have actually kept the song in my head, because Kakashi stirred around the time I finished replaying the song. His normal eye's gaze met mine, while I brushed his bangs back from his face.

"Hey, sleepyhead," I said, though I'd probably fallen asleep first.

"Coming from you," Kakashi said, in a voice muddled by sleep, "that's funny." He reached up and caught my fingers with his, knitting them together. "Guess you were tired, too?"

"Pff, your eyebags are almost as bad as mine," I muttered.

"You fell asleep sitting up," Kakashi pointed out.

"You fell asleep on me," I countered. I scratched the back of my neck, noting the tension knotting in my lower back. So much for jinchuriki regeneration powers, at least as far as this kind of thing went. "So... Still tired? 'Cause I think it might be easier to fit both of us in my bed."

Kakashi blinked up at me for a second, his uncovered eye boring into mine. "Just to be clear... We're not doing anything like any of the books, right?"

Though my cheekbones heated up a bit, I still managed to joke, "Even if we're shinobi, I don't think we're flexible enough."

Kakashi gave a brief, huffing laugh. "Point." He rolled off the couch, then held out his hand to help me up. I ended up putting the blanket in his hands instead, but he didn't mind. "Definitely bringing this."

My bedroom had been one of the last things in the house to clean, and I admittedly hadn't done the best job. But it was dust-free and my sheets were soft. While Kakashi hung back in the doorway, I divested my bed of extra pillows and at least one stuffed bear. The bear, unfortunately, landed on my sealing desk and probably ended up a dollar-store panda, but I'd deal with that in the morning.

Kakashi got into bed before I did, putting his back firmly to the wall. A lot of combat shinobi did that on instinct alone, though I wasn't one of them. Learning all too much about explosives had convinced me that the best place for breaching charges was an innocent-looking wall, preferably as far from the door as possible, so my instincts were a bit unusual. One of the remaining pillows made the position a bit less uncomfortable, but I still winced when Kakashi's elbows hit wood.

I climbed into the bed after him, and Kakashi draped the blanket mainly over me. I made sure I wouldn't roll onto my back—which Isobu still influenced—by moving Kakashi's arms and one of the other leftover pillows, then slotted myself into place.

"You were singing before," Kakashi mumbled in my ear, his arms wrapped around my ribs. His nose was against my shoulder, his forehead resting along my neck.

"Mm-hm," was my response.

"Can…" Kakashi hesitated, then asked, "Can you do it again?"

I thought about it. "Yeah. Hang on," I said, and took a couple of experimental breaths. Then I hummed one note, and another. Once I found my tune, I kept humming until I felt Kakashi's chakra settle down as he fell asleep.

Then I let myself drift off, too.

Chapter End Notes

Uh, sorry about the delay, everyone. I didn't want to post a not-chapter just to get the announcement out there, so I kinda...put it off until... Well, here we are. Also, from this point, I'm gonna include timestamps at the tops of chapters so it's more obvious how much time has passed. At some point, I hope to be able to go back and edit the rest to follow that trend, but for now, this is what we've got.

Kei sings three different songs in this chapter: "Seasons of Love" from Rent, "A Girl Worth Fighting For" from Mulan, and "I See the Light" from Tangled.

Chapter Notes

Apologies for the delay, everyone. But the plot is rolling now!

Fast-forward five years.

So, the Uchiha clan. The powder keg of Konoha as a whole, and historically in charge of the police force or as near as they could get, with the membership numbers they had.

About that…

"So, you're thinking of Itachi?" Obito asked, leaning over Sensei's desk in a blatant attempt to peek at the genin team assignments. When Sensei moved his notes, Obito held up his hands and whined, "Come on, Sensei, Itachi won't be a jōnin-sensei voluntarily for like, at least three more years. He likes the Academy too much."

"You could try to float the idea of him leading Tatsumaki's genin team, someday," Kakashi suggested, though his nose was still in a novel. "They get along."

"Do you think he'd be interested?" Sensei wondered aloud, though he still wasn't letting Obito see his notes.

Obito looked like he would have appreciated having a Byakugan, just for that timespan. "Sensei, lemme see who Kakashi's got this time!"

"Obito, who do you think it could be?" I asked in a dry voice. The Rookie Nine were graduating this year. Tomorrow, in fact, with a big ceremony that all of us were already invited to. There were only so many options when Sensei had tested the waters with Kakashi four times by now.

"Hey, he might've done something different than the Third would ha—dammit." Obito had finally gotten a glimpse, and it wasn't hard to recognize Naruto's orange jacket and blonde hair among the profile photos. "Kei, spoilers!"

"How is it a spoiler? You've known those three were going to end up with Kakashi since you were fourteen," I said, baffled.

"Still," Obito grumped, though he didn't argue further.
Even if Team Seven's old incarnation had crashed and burned and then rebuilt itself (probably) with two extra members in time, the team wasn't unbalanced. A son of the Uchiha clan, a non-clan kunoichi with the potential to match Tsunade, and Sensei's son, altogether, would take the world by storm.

It helped that the shinobi system had undergone a few revisions at not-so-gentle prompting. At least within our little circle.

The "current" generation of jōnin-sensei were pretty much all friends, which meant we compared notes and cross-referenced what worked and what didn't. I'd gotten a team first, and thus they had been the experimental group whenever one of my friends came up with a new idea or a new training method and wanted to see how genin would tackle it. Gai's team had been his for about a year, meaning that he reaped the benefits of the first round of training and could set his genin in sparring matches against mine whenever we both had spare time. Asuma, Kurenai, and Kakashi were next. And they, unlike me or Gai, basically got an actual training manual composed of genjutsu group notes, Itachi and Iruka's Academy observations, and experience with real, live genin before it was their turn. It helped that, for the most part, they'd cut their teeth there first.

Kakashi was a bit of an exception, in the opposite way that Kurenai was. While Kakashi had been out of ANBU for two years, his primary experience with non-Team Kei genin involved handing out a series of rejections. In the months leading up to Naruto's graduation, though, he'd been spending more time with Gai's team to get out of those bad habits.

Kurenai, meanwhile, had only recently been promoted and had perhaps been lulled into a false sense of security by missing my genin team's growing pains for the most part. But knowing the future Team Eight, she'd make it work. Their personalities were less explosive.

Which brought me back to the whole Uchiha clan thing. It wasn't that I'd done anything to ensure the clan's survival. I hadn't in any direct sense, and I was only friendly with Obito, Itachi's immediate family, and Shisui, out of everyone in a clan of hundreds. Clans in general were still off-putting, and I was never one for politics. If I had, I probably would have managed to make things explode in both literal and figurative senses of the word.

The exact wording of Obito's prophecy, from what I remembered, was that he needed to be kind to the right man at the right time for the right reasons. If that prediction had been laid at anyone else's feet, they would have probably gotten a giant sign in the stars letting them know if the conditions had been fulfilled. But this was Obito. He'd likely saved the Uchiha clan from destruction by giving a kid candy one day, and neither he nor I would ever know. While curiosity was one of my (many) vices, I found I didn't feel any need to pry.

It was all right. The Uchiha clan lived, the village had a wider extended family, and time rolled onward.

"You're not objecting to my team configurations, are you?" Sensei asked, resting his forearm over the file so Obito couldn't take it without using Kamui. And even then, it wasn't a guarantee.

"Well, no," Obito admitted, sheepishly rubbing the back of his neck. "But I still wanna see."

"You'll be hovering around the Academy tomorrow anyway, Obito," Kakashi said, unconcerned. "I'm sure you'll probably steal my introduction speech or something."

"I'd never—okay, maybe I'd do that." Obito grinned. "Are you worried about having students, Kakashi?"
Kakashi closed his book and made a show of thinking about it. Then, "No."

Obito made a skeptical noise. Sensei shuffled paper around, now that we'd turned our attention away from bugging him about team assignments. I inspected the ceiling for a new note ("File your mission reports early," in Sensei's handwriting), then scowled up at it.

Guilty as charged, though. I'd even passed my bad habits down to my genin.

"I wouldn't say 'moderate terror' is on the same level as 'worry,'" Kakashi said at last. His voice was level, but his chakra was doing its best impression of a fallen power line. In a puddle. He stilled it by force, then continued without any external sign of distress, "But I'll get over it. I already know Naruto and Sasuke."

Translation: "If I give them an inch, they will take a mile and keep going." Sasuke was the more reserved of the two, but Naruto could make anything into a competition and Sasuke would jump in with both feet. And he wasn't at all afraid of Kakashi's set of serious mannerisms, not like less-familiar genin might be. The only strategy left open to Kakashi involved annoying them into submission, which was a nuclear option if there ever was one.

I made a mental note to check in on Team Seven as soon as possible, preferably with my genin to throw at them as distractions.

Aiko would get a kick out of the experience. Probably literally and figuratively, if I understood Itachi's occasional mochi-fueled gushing about his brother's taijutsu proficiency correctly. Sasuke would hit a fellow firebrand like a battering ram if he got a chance.

Obito patted Kakashi's shoulder. "You'll handle them just fine."

"I'm not convinced I know how to teach," Kakashi muttered. He didn't brush Obito off, though. "ANBU was one thing..."

Well, Itachi wasn't dead. That was something, though obviously I didn't know who had been in charge of Itachi's training. Maybe Yamato had been the one to take Itachi under his wing. Seeing as voicing this thought would be both a breach of ANBU protocol and not all that helpful, I dismissed it.

"Hey, Gai and I have been teaching genin for ages. Your genin are unique, but sheesh, you've been helping with our teams too," I pointed out, squeezing Kakashi's other shoulder. "You can do this."

Kakashi sighed, then held out his hand. "Sensei, the file?"

Sensei handed it over without a second thought. While Obito pouted at him for a bit, Sensei added for Kakashi's sake, "I have no doubt you'll be an excellent sensei, Kakashi."

Kakashi stuck his pocket novel in his shuriken pouch to free up his hands, then walked out with the file—or rather, files—with me on his heels. Before we left the round hallway outside the Hokage's office, he paused for a heartbeat or two. Then he took a long, slow breath and said, "I can do this."

"You can," I agreed.

"...How did the story...?" Kakashi prompted, trailing off before he could finish the sentence when Iwashi walked around the corner, carrying a box of files tall enough that he had to peer to one side to see where he was going.

"They'll have a better sensei," I replied, while Iwashi passed. "If you want, I could go over my notes..."
to help you decide where you might want to start tomorrow?"

"That would help," Kakashi said, leading the way out. "Your place?"

"Sure," I replied, opening the door for him as we left the building. "So, wanna know the first hint?"

"If it's not a secret." Kakashi fell into step beside me as we walked through Konoha, file tucked under his arm.

"Well, the first thing is to always keep them a bit off-balance on the first impression," I suggested. "Granted, I did it by accident when I was late…"

"Sounds like a great idea," Kakashi teased, extending his hand.

"It was even less impressive than it sounds." I twined my fingers with his. "You've got more time to plan and be creative. Mess with them a bit."

Kakashi made a thoughtful little noise in his throat. Whatever ANBU training he'd had would lead to perhaps more lethal surprises than anyone wanted to see, but Kakashi had a sense of humor that didn't revolve around death. It mainly involved puns, messing with Obito, and pretending not to be paying attention, but most of that could be adapted for kids. Sure, genin were more resilient than average children, but they were still young. And unlike my team, there was no Roku to act as back-up babysitter or sensei-translator if the other two got confused by things slightly beyond their maturity levels.

We arrived at my apartment after a leisurely stroll, but I stopped dead on the threshold before heading inside like I normally would have. Instead, I focused on the two chakra signatures that I could pick out from behind the seals, which no one else but Sensei could manage. It was the approximate equivalent of being able to check the backseat of a car for zombies, but far less dire.

Just a lot more awkward.

"What is it?" Kakashi asked, effortlessly in tune with me.

My hand was on the doorknob, but honestly I half-wished I could back away. Unfortunately, my notebooks were all in my apartment. It wasn't like I just carried them around when really, they were modified diary entries.

"Yūgao's here," I told Kakashi in a voice hardly louder than a whisper. "And so is Hayate."

"...Ah," Kakashi said, considering our options. "Where, exactly?"

"The couch," I muttered. Right past the threshold, leaving us no way to avoid them unless I could break the seals on my bedroom window from the outside. Which was rather not what they'd been designed for. "Which means I need to wash everything."

Kakashi nodded, then drew back his hand and knocked three times on the door.

Both chakra signatures startled like deer. Whoops.

I waited a few seconds for Hayate's to get out of immediate view of the front door, since Yūgao had already reacted and retreated faster. Then, while heading inside, I raised my voice to say, "I'm home, Hayate!"

"Welcome back!" Hayate's voice responded from down the hallway. Probably his room, which Yūgao was firmly not in. No, instead she was occupying the bathroom like it was some kind of linoleum fortress.

Man, there was enough awkward I could cut it with a knife. I left Kakashi on the threshold as he studiously avoided the couch, deciding that I would not let this bother me.

"You know he's not going to be able to look us in the face for a while," Kakashi commented, though not loudly enough for Hayate or Yūgao to hear even with ANBU hearing tricks. "He'll know, she'll know, and we'll know. And no one is ever going to say it out loud."

"Could be worse," I replied, in a fake-chipper voice. As I headed down the hallway to retrieve my notes from my room, I stopped at Hayate's bedroom door for just a second. "Oh, Hayate?"

"What?" he asked, his voice strained.

Thank fuck I didn't have the Byakugan. With that thought spinning around in my head as though to mock me, I said through the door, "Do I have to give you the Talk?"

"Shut up!" Hayate wailed back, his chakra and his voice full of nothing less than pure, unadulterated mortification.

"Just remember not to get anyone pregnant," I said with a cackle, letting it go. Then I retrieved my notes from my room and left him to pick up what pieces of his dignity he could still find. It was a bit of a lost cause, but hey, he could try.

"You're more embarrassing than Sensei," Kakashi said when I reappeared in the kitchen, though he was less flustered than expected. "And that was pretty bad on its own."

"Rin killed my sense of embarrassment sometime after the third lecture. Sensei never got a chance," I said breezily. "Anyway, I got the notes."

"And while I didn't expect a demonstration, I see the point of that first tip. Non-threatening flustering and so on. If I didn't know you better, I'd almost think you planned that." Kakashi glanced down the hall, while it sounded like Hayate was beating his head on a wall. Dismissing my brother as a concern, Kakashi opened the front door. "Lunch?"

"Sure. I'll pay." And before he could register that I'd called dibs on the bill, I planted a quick kiss over his masked cheek. Then we were out the door and on our way.

Kakashi and I managed to go over what few tips he hadn't basically figured out already before lunch was over. After, we mainly planned on reviewing his team's files, but a messenger hawk put a kibosh on those plans before we all the way through got through Naruto's and the redacted mess of black ink regarding his medical history (thanks mainly to the events around his birth). I had a mission in the morning, and Kakashi was going to have to deal with his genin...well. Not alone. But without a kenjutsu master cheerleader, like me.

"I'll get Gai if I need more support," Kakashi said, to assuage my worries as I walked him back to his apartment. Not strictly necessary, but with a time limit on my time in Konoha for the immediately foreseeable future, I planned to make the most of it. "I'll just read the rest on my own."

I eyed him, then looped my arm through his. "Are you going to actually read their files or stay up all night reading novels again?"

"Well, I have another idea if you're interested," Kakashi said slowly, smiling behind his mask. His voice had flirty tone that he probably wouldn't have been able to pull off a few years ago, though I was still sure he was blushing under his mask. There were a lot of advantages to being able to hide ninety percent of his expression under fabric, in hindsight.

"We'll put off the novel talks until I get back," I told him as our fingers twined together. It prevented him from putting an arm around me, but there'd be time for that shortly. I smiled up at him. "And this time, read ahead!"

"Where are we going today, Keisuke-sama?" Tsuruya asked, the next morning.

"Solo mission to Amegakure. The Hokage doesn't expect fighting, but hey, flying minimizes most risks of that," I said, holding up the saddle I generally kept around for moments like this. "Know the way?"

"In fact, I do not," Tsuruya replied, "but I am willing to learn it."

Well, that was a bit of a snag. I didn't exactly have topography map with elevations or anything. The last time I'd been to Amegakure, I'd basically run the entire way with Obito and Kakashi. Now that I thought of it, I hadn't summoned Tsuruya while I was there. Before, while fighting Sensei? Sure. And after visiting Ame about the Statue, Kakashi, Obito, and I had used the Flying Thunder God Formation to skip most of the intervening space.

Oops.

Such foresight.

Hey, we hadn't been to Tanigakure either when I first visited there. And we made that trip just fine. Though I'd had a team trained to use the Flying Thunder God formation then. Not so much the case with a solo mission.

Isobu made a skeptical noise, but subsided. We hadn't exactly been on the best terms back then, either, so I didn't blame him if he didn't remember that little butterfly-filled excursion.

Tsuruya bonked me in the head with her beak. "Focus, Keisuke-sama. I can't hear your internal conversations, remember?"

"Isobu was just throwing in his two ryō," I said in a dismissive tone, though I rubbed my head where she'd caught my attention. Regeneration or not, she could make the initial contact sting a bit. "Ready to go?"

Tsuruya bent her legs so I could fasten the saddle properly. "As always."

Once I had everything packed away and Tsuruya confirmed it was all balanced correctly for walking, I stood back just for a second or twelve while she threw herself into the air for a quick circuit of the field. While she did that, I fished out my flight goggles and snapped them into place over my eyes, then tied my headband around my face instead to fend off bugs. I wasn't gonna lose my fifth bandana if I had anything to say about it.

Tsuruya landed, beating her wings with the sound of someone dropping a box full of kunai. "Everything is in order. Shall we?"

I hopped onto her back, looping my fingers into their proper places on Tsuruya's saddle. Wasn't like she needed reins, after all. And even if she did, why in the world would I assume I had the expertise to know where to lead her? Kinda didn't have wings of my own, though Tsuruya had walked me through Wind Release where Sensei couldn't. Even learning from a bird didn't make me as good as
The actual trip to Amegakure took a total of two days, flight-time. For Tsuruya, that meant two ten-hour flights. For me, that meant muscle cramps the likes of which shouldn't have been possible to stand. But I did it anyway, because the only other method faster involved involving Obito and spamming Kamui, or the Flying Thunder God Formation. Not really a route I could take.

I still fell to the ground when I slid off Tsuruya's back, because my legs had fallen firmly asleep. I was just lucky that my crane companion didn't happen to stop in a tree, thus saving me a longer drop. Still landed in a puddle, though.

"I hope not to make such a trip again too soon," Tsuruya murmured, shaking her wings out. Rain rattled off them like a tin roof. "That was not as strenuous as migration, but it was certainly something."

"With any luck, you'll have a few days to recover," I said from the ground, with rain soaking into my clothes and the puddle wreaking vengeance on my pants. After a moment's consideration, I said, "Ow."

"Quite," said Tsuruya. She looked around, then added, "I can see a paper crane heading in our direction. Is that supposed to happen?"

"Yep," I said, and pushed my goggles up onto my forehead as I rolled into a sitting position. Every muscle protested instantly, but I silenced them with a pulse of Isobu's chakra. That just left my joints to complain, but at least I hurt less.

Tsuruya braced her beak against my back, making sure I was stable before she let me balance on my own. Then she lifted her head again and said, "I will leave once your transportation arrives, Keisuke-sama. Not a moment before."

"Oh?" I prompted.

"You have this amazing ability to find trouble," she began, before I groaned aloud. Her next sentence was perhaps a bit annoyed with me. "I only speak the truth."

"I don't exactly go looking for it," I protested.

"Are you sure?"

"Yes, I'm sure!" Though I wasn't.

"Am I interrupting something?" Konan asked, having landed her paper bird about ten meters away. Both Tsuruya and I had been a bit too distracted by our back-and-forth to notice. Though it had been something…sheesh, ten years since I'd seen Konan in person, she still had the unassailable public persona I remembered, and didn't seem at all surprised to find me arguing with a giant bird. At most, she smiled slightly.

I wasn't sure if that said more about me or about her.

You. It's always you.

Pssh.

"Nothing serious," I said, when Tsuruya poked me with a claw to snap me out of the peanut gallery impression. I waved weakly. "Yo, Konan-san. Been a while."
"More than ten years, if I remember correctly," Konan said with a nod. Her gray-eyed gaze landed on Tsuruya, and she said, "It's nice to meet you. I am Konan, one of the leaders of this village."

"Tsuruya, Konan-sama," my first flight-capable friend said, bowing deeply. She turned her head to one side as she eyed the paper crane, just before it flew to pieces and all its component paper squares darted up Konan's sleeves. "My goodness. I can see how you can lead a village. I've never seen paper ninjutsu before."

"You flatter me," Konan said, and bowed back.

Any more of this and we'd be stuck here forever. Like two people trying to hold two doors open for each other and getting caught up in a passive-aggressive politeness standoff. Only with bowing.

"Now, while it's very nice to meet you, I think I ought to head home," Tsuruya said, extending one wing slightly shakily. "I'm afraid it's been a very long trip for both of us."

"Of course, Tsuruya-san," Konan said.

Tsuruya bowed one last time, to me, and I smiled in return though we both were still sore. After a complimentary bop of her beak to the top of my head, she threw herself into the air above Amegakure's giant lake, then disappeared in a midair burst of smoke a moment later.

"Let's get you out of this rain," Konan said as she helped me to my feet. Paper shot out from her other sleeve to form a new construct—a semi-realistic bird that more resembled Deidara's clay creations than the origami from before.

While we rode back to the village-slash-city, I thought. In the years since I'd last physically visited Amegakure, more than a few things had changed. For one thing, there were about fifty more skyscrapers. At this point, I couldn't remember which Path was the cyborg zombie even if I did know what the other timeline's corpse puppet looked like, but was sure Nagato had been busy. Konan's flight path carried us over the non-skyscraper parts of Ame as well, letting me see hundreds of little buildings that resembled Konoha's neighborhoods.

"We expanded somewhat," Konan said in a proud tone.

"No kidding," I murmured, surprised.

While I hadn't given much consideration to Ame's expansion either in the other timeline, the general fallout from border conflicts and a hundred snowballing changes had basically turned this formerly isolated chunk of steel into the next candidate for being one of the Great Elemental Nations. Sure, they still had about as much territory as Kusagakure did, and their power was highly centralized because Nagato's rain-based monitoring system only went so far, but there was something to be said for that kind of model. Having a stronghold was a good place to start for nation-building purposes.

A few minutes later, Konan and I hopped off the giant bird—which now resembled a hummingbird in everything but coloration and size, and onto one of the many tenth-story balconies that were a feature of Ame's skyscrapers. I recognized this one and the fierce oni visage a little above our landing point, which had only been a little tarnished with age and the unrelenting rain.

Konan led me into the Akatsuki skyscraper, her bird dissolving into individual strips of paper. "Make yourself at home, Keisuke-san."

"Thanks," I said. I poked around once she left until I could find the old guest rooms my team had used last time.
As usual, I trapped the hell out of the windows and doors in such a way that my hosts wouldn't be too inconvenienced if I forgot to remove any at the end of my stay. It was a bizarre advantage to having as much experience with explosive notes as Konan did, and a shared fūinjutsu master back along the social family tree somewhere. Then I started to unpack my stuff and dig through a few storage scrolls for the paperwork I was supposed to present to Yahiko.

Or Konan or Nagato. There does not seem to be a reason to specify the person you've interacted with the least.

_Point._ Now that I thought of it, while Yahiko had been the one to inspire his friends—lovers?—to build Ame into what it was now, as opposed to the war-torn wreck that Hanzō had left behind, there was no one person in charge. Instead, the original Akatsuki trio were all basically equals.

There was a knock at the main door, as opposed to the paper screens used to delineate the various rooms. Yahiko's chakra was bright and bubbly, and he was one of the people who could feel it if I deliberately pinged him like a submarine's sonar.

"Yahiko here, Keisuke-san," said the man behind door number one. "When you're ready, meet me downstairs in the office!"

I didn't get to ask which one before he was gone again, and wondered if his laissez-faire approach to scheduling was why I was here in the first place. I looked down at the paperwork again, scratching my head. Honestly, it was just a courtesy, but…

If someone can't manage to file paperwork for entering a Chūnin Exam with nearly three years of warning, I have to wonder if it was simply lost, Isobu grumbled.

_Not every village is run by a one-man bureaucracy._ If I recalled correctly, Ame had a few hundred people in their equivalent of a cube farm. Besides, the paperwork was just a flimsy excuse to get me this far out here to talk about other things. Konan could have made the trip to Konoha herself if all she needed was a diplomatic formality. _But I wonder what else is lurking below the surface here?_

"Underneath the underneath" again, huh? Isobu's presence reared up in the back of my mind, as though he, too, was taking a careful look around from as much of a vantage point as he had.

_Probably._ Lo, a return to form after who knew how long. I tucked the paperwork into a folder and headed downstairs. _Better go see what's really going on._

Tracking Yahiko's chakra, as well as that of Konan and Nagato, meant that I could pin them down if they were anywhere in my range. Sure, I knew other people better, but each of them were a league above their Akatsuki compatriots. Thus, I located their new office space in about two seconds.

But before I entered it, I paused. There were a few distinct chakra signatures in Amegakure, and some of them were familiar. I could pick out two individuals whose energy was fairly similar to that of the Uzumaki-blooded people I knew, and half a dozen different bloodlines had apparently also joined up with Ame's forces. While I couldn't expect to meet any of them unless they were public figures—I was a foreigner, after all—I'd carry that information back to Konoha anyway. Kushina would want to know she had more relatives out in the world, and Sensei would want to keep track of Ame's growing strength.

_Get on with it._

I knocked on the office door, though it was a formality at best. Yahiko already knew I was there.
"Come in!" said Yahiko's voice, and I obeyed.

Konan was already heading out the office's main window as I entered, paper wings sprouting from her back and supporting her as she took flight. Nagato, on the other hand, stood behind what I assumed was Yahiko's desk. Each of the trio had one, and they could be identified at a glance even without nameplates. Nagato's was the messiest of the lot, Konan's had a paper flowering tree on it, and Yahiko's had a model of Amegakure, scaled down well over a thousand times and reproduced in metal. And each desk had a mess of picture frames, which I was quite curious to see once the formal meeting was over.

"Did you bring everything we needed?" Yahiko asked, getting to the heart of things immediately.

"I sure hope so, because having to send a message to the Hokage now would be a little embarrassing," I said, placing the folder on his desk. "Chūnin Exam treatises, directives, and a request from the Hokage to please send actual genin."

"Has that really been a problem?" Nagato asked, as Yahiko flipped through the pages.

"Every Exam seems to have a few people who get accused of being plants," I said, shrugging. "But you can ignore it. The nobles mainly just want a good show."

"Of course they do," Nagato murmured, shaking his head slowly. "Some people never change."

"You can say that again." Yahiko reached across his desk and plucked a stamp from somewhere within the model of Amegakure. So, it wasn't just a statue. It was also a bunch of disguised office tools. "Let's see… Sign here, here, and here…"

I knew what I was putting on the list for Sensei's next birthday.

While Yahiko sorted that out, Nagato sidled around the desk until he could whisper, "So, how's everyone been doing in Konoha? I heard Naruto's graduating soon. Do you know anything about what team he might be on? Or when we can visit?"

Oh, goodie. The customary Family Reunion Interrogation. I held up my hands in surrender and said, "I'll tell you once this official stuff is over, Nagato-san. There's a lot to tell."

Nagato deflated slightly. Then a thought occurred to him, and he snatched one of the photographs off Yahiko's desk, apparently deaf the other redhead's protests. "Here, though!"

While Yahiko complained Nagato stuck the landscape-oriented photo under my nose and I automatically grabbed the frame. Then I looked at the people in the photo. Nagato, Konan, and Yahiko were in the center, amidst a crowd of black Akatsuki cloaks and at least thirty grinning former rebels. I could pick out a few faces I remembered, like Kie and Ren and Kyūsuke, as well as many other Akatsuki members I only knew by sight. It looked almost like a college graduation photo, but no one wore silly hats.

Well, no square silly hats.

And right in the middle, surrounded by the leaders of Amegakure, were four children dressed in what looked like Jiraiya's old style of training gear. Three older ones, and one a little past toddling age. Each of the older kids resembled one of their parents, and the youngest was a little blue-haired shape in the other three children's combined grip.

"Tsubame, Ryōma, and Mikuru," Nagato said, pointing out and naming the kids that resembled Yahiko, Konan, and him, respectively. "And the youngest is Kiku. Aren't they cute?"
"How old are they now?" I asked, like I hadn't just been cornered by Maes Hughes. Raising an eyebrow at Nagato, I added, "And why haven't I heard anything from any of you about them?"

"Tsubame is nine, Ryōma is eight, and Mikuru is six. Kiku's three. We wanted to wait to tell anyone outside of Ame until the first three started their training, since they were born close together," Yahiko said, from the desk. While Nagato took the photo from me, he went on, "Though it doesn't seem like it now, at first… Well, there were a lot of people who'd target the children of village leaders. And you probably noticed they look like all three of us, right?"

"Bit hard to miss it," I admitted. I briefly shook my head, then said in a more upbeat way, "But can I tell Sensei and Kushina she has even more family now? And I'm sure Naruto and Tatsumaki want to meet their cousins…"

"Yes!" said Nagato, at the same time Yahiko said, "Maybe."

"Anyway," Yahiko said, ignoring the way Nagato was making puppy eyes at him, "the paperwork's done. Now, the serious part."

I tensed slightly.

Nagato stopped trying to act a third of his age. Instead, his visible Rinnegan narrowed.

"The Hokage asked us for information regarding the group called 'Shinjitsu.'" Yahiko dug around in his desk, then retrieved a black-marked manila folder that was about as thick as a book. "Take this to him. Don't let it fall into anyone's hands."

And my job would be to destroy it if it did. Or else kill everyone else who got their hands on it. Or both. Oh, the duties of a distinctly un-glorified postal worker. Since I wasn't Kisame and didn't have any teammates besides Tsuruya to freak out at, it would probably involve fewer casualties than the average mission. "Understood. There aren't any storage seals in this, right?"

"No," said Yahiko. "I prepared it myself."

I nodded, and once I could seal the packet away in the lining of my Konoha flak jacket, everyone relaxed.

"Do you mind if we order out for lunch?" Yahiko asked, much more casual than before. "There's this really good takoyaki stand nearby."

"Sounds good," I replied.

"Great! Then after that, we can go introduce you to the rest of the Akatsuki clan," Yahiko said, "and Nagato can hold down the fort."

"Hey!"

"I'm kidding," Yahiko backtracked, before Nagato could pout. "So, lunch!"

Food was duly sent for, and I was bombarded with more family photos. It appeared that one of the leather-bound books in Nagato's desk was an album, and he was eager to make up for lost time regarding the family. Yahiko joined in with double the enthusiasm he'd shown before, noting whichever pictures had even sillier stories behind them than usual.

"And while this was happening," Yahiko said, pointing out a shot that included all four kids, nestled around Konan, "Nagato was trying to take the picture with two spare arms—"
"And I nearly dropped the camera in a puddle," Nagato added. "I almost forgot about that. And you were too busy laughing at me for having two left thumbs to help."

"You didn't do that badly."

There was a knock at the office door. "Delivery!"

Well, it wouldn't be pizza, but…

"Come in, Karin-chan!" Nagato called, and I did a double-take as a pink-haired Ame genin walked through the door.

With hot pink hair and eyes to match, Karin had probably one of the odder variations on the usual Uzumaki red. Her hair was chopped rough and short on one side and long on the other. She had had a dull brown jacket and wore a black skirt, while making use of a ton of shinobi mesh like I had when I was younger.

I didn't know when Karin had originally joined Orochimaru's forces. But because I remembered she was a sensor, too, I clamped down on my initial reaction to her appearance with a vengeance.

"Karin…Uzumaki, right?" I asked, when she dropped off a mess of takeout containers.

"Right," Karin replied, though she was clearly wary of me. Given how precisely she'd been able to read Naruto and others in canon, even if they were suppressing their chakra, I doubted she was all that fooled even by my control. Then again, since Isobu, I had never really been a paragon of it.

Because of your utterly lack of inclination toward stealth missions, I assumed it wasn't a real loss.

Before we started working together, it might've been. Now? Meh.

"Karin-chan, Kei-san is a Konoha jōnin," Nagato said, scooting across the room to stand somewhere between the two of us. Sensor or not, he could pick out the tension. "She's harmless."

"Hey," I protested weakly. "I know I'm not as strong as you are, but…"

"See? Harmless," Yahiko repeated, more firmly.

Karin was still looking at me like she expected me to rear up and bite her.

"The name's Keisuke Gekkō, Karin-san. I'll be out of your way soon," I said, trying my best not to loom or otherwise appear intimidating. Sitting in an office chair like a dork took care of both.

"...Fine," Karin said, crossing her arms defensively and clutched at them, trying not to look at me. She was afraid of me, even with Nagato—who could have thrown me out a window and skipped me across the lake like a stone with a mere thought—in the same room and obviously on her side.

"Karin-san," I said, and her pink eyes focused on mine. They looked almost red in the office lights. "Is it my chakra that's making you uncomfortable?"

Karin sucked in her lower lip and nodded.

"I can't really turn my chakra off," I said in an apologetic tone, "but I won't keep you here. Nagato-senpai?"

"You can head home, Karin-chan," Nagato said instantly.
"By your command, Nagato-sama," Karin said, and left post-haste.

Yahiko stared after her for a bit, then shook his head. "I didn't realize Karin-san was that sensitive."

"I'm not sure..." I trailed off, shaking her head. If Karin was innocent of anything to do with the world's one and only Voldemort cosplayer, it'd be cruel of me to accuse her of being a spy. I didn't have enough evidence, or even a read on her, because her chakra had vanished the second she realized I was acknowledging her existence. "Never mind."

"Is this one of those..." Nagato trailed off for a little, then finished hesitantly, "predictions? Is it going to be important later?"

Well, since I couldn't really see the future and hadn't sensed any Curse Seals in the entire village... "Maybe," I said, unsure. "I don't know enough about Karin-san to be sure. But once upon a time..."

Stop hesitating.

"In another lifetime," I said, refusing to respond directly to Isobu when Nagato and Yahiko were both looking at me, "she was Orochimaru's agent within Kusagakure. The circumstances of her life here are different, obviously, but even if she's innocent here, that knowledge colors how I perceive her."

Well, whenever a teenaged Karin hadn't been busy fawning over Sasuke. I'd skipped most of her focus episodes by virtue of being sick of Uchiha drama. Aside from recalling that she had the powers that the Uzumaki clan were once known for, her devotion to Sasuke was the third item on a short list of prior knowledge I could bring to the table. Nagato had never displayed either chakra chains or any inclination to have people bite him to heal themselves (that I knew of), which made Karin semi-unique even in a town with a higher-than-average Uzumaki population.

...That thought was depressing.

Given that I was sure Karin and Sasuke had never met in this timeline, hell if I knew what would be relevant anymore.

"That's...worrying," Yahiko said after a while, resting his chin against his hand. He hadn't touched his lunch. "We'll check in about that later."

"Preferably after you've gone home," Nagato added, sending a concerned glance in his partner's direction. After a second, he snapped his fingers and smiled, somewhat shyly. "But this is heavy for lunchtime. Come on, dig in!"

And after that, I met the kids. Even after what I'd said about Karin, the Ame trio didn't have any real reservations about letting me see their overgrown gang's youngest members.

Part of that had a bit to do with the brief base-jumping session we had afterward, where Nagato demonstrated the ability to catch me after a multi-story such a fall with no problems whatsoever. The display of power reassured everyone who saw it of Nagato's strength and my easygoing nature, and I got to fly without a bird or a turtle or a parachute. Win-win, overall.

So, it was with a thoroughly ruffled countenance that I met the children, as about as harmless-looking as I could get.

"So, does that make you our auntie?" asked Ryōma. With blue hair and gray eyes the exact same shade as Konan's, I had to wonder if Akatsuki had a cloning facility somewhere. He had pierced ears that he enjoyed showing off, with two studs in the cartilage, and in those ears was his only obvious deviation from his mother's looks. Not that I knew if Nagato or Yahiko was his father.

Since he and the rest of the kids called Yahiko "Daddy" and Nagato "Papa," I supposed it didn't matter.

"If you want me to be," I replied, kneeling in front of the kid so he could easily speak face-to-face with me if he wanted. My voice was much lighter than it had been earlier, too. "Though I think you've got a lot of aunts and uncles already, right? What's one more?"

"It's still nice to have more," said Tsubame, who had spiky hair like Yahiko's pulled into a knot at the back of her head. She leaned over her brother's shoulder, adding, "Akatsuki is a big clan, and there's no rules about clans having people everywhere."

Technically not. We weren't samurai, with domains and simple laws that involved war on a hair trigger, but shinobi culture wasn't that far removed from our Clan Wars roots. Some clans would never be able to spread outside of the villages their ancestors had sworn loyalty to, and villages were pretty damn possessive. Nagato's Uzumaki heritage got a free pass because there wasn't enough of an established Uzumaki clan anywhere to really lay claim, and it wasn't like Kushina would ever try to drag Nagato to Konoha even if she hadn't pointedly abdicated the entire clan head role after adopting him as her brother. On the other hand, a free-roaming Uchiha was likely to get some serious glares at the very least. Or bounty hunters.

"From revolution to established clan in less than ten years," I said to Konan, as Tsubame wandered off to argue about adopting me as an aunt with some of the adult Akatsuki members. "That has to be a record."

Konan preened. "We are a nation of overachievers."

That was one way of putting it. And it wasn't like Nagato ever really used his inherited/adopted clan name anyway. While he was certainly an Uzumaki by blood, his first loyalty was always going to be Amegakure and Akatsuki.

"And we are looking toward the future," Konan added, when I didn't have anything to say. As I watched, she looked out onto the training field, to where Mikuru—the child who most resembled a Rinnegan-less Nagato with purple eyes and Konan's skin tone—was sparring with Kie of the veteran Akatsuki. "Now, we have peace between our nations without a spilled drop of blood to ruin it for the past ten years. I'd like to see all of our children—and all children of Konoha—grow up without needing to know war."

I thought of Orochimaru. Of the Suna invasion force I fervently hoped would never materialize.

And I thought of how little many nations had seemed to learn over the past eighty-plus years of bald-faced lies and kunai to the back. Three Shinobi World Wars, and I kept expecting a fourth. And I knew I wasn't alone in thinking that. Preparing for it would, in time, give us a fighting chance if war did eventually come. I just didn't know what angle it would use.

"It's a good dream," was all I said to Konan.

A futile one.

"Akatsuki was a dream, once," Konan said, unperturbed by my pessimism. "And now it's gotten out of Yahiko's head and into the world."

"You say that like it just ran away," Yahiko complained, after somewhat blatantly eavesdropping from under a nearby pink umbrella.
With the constant rain, outdoor spectating spots came with a selection of what looked like patio furnishings. Umbrellas were the most popular. Enterprising merchants—usually former Chinatsugumi remnants—set up their shops with covered seating most of the time. Even the carts. Especially keen merchants knew where the money was, and there was an umbrella-renting business attached to darned near everything in Amegakure.

It was mostly for the benefit of the tourists and visitors, like me.

"None of us really thought it'd get this big," said Nagato, gesturing vaguely at the Ame skyscrapers with a dango stick. "It's something to look forward to."

Given that this society was probably never going to discover gunpowder, Ame's daring leap forward along the whole technological advancement thing was a surprise to everyone. Ame was an unusual light of innovation on the continent, though I wasn't sure how far the ideas would spread when most of said advancement was the near-literal brainchild of someone who didn't understand how his own powers worked. Innovation didn't mean much if the only means of making the ideas carry over involved finding someone else with the freaking Rinnegan.

But perhaps I was being too harsh. I wasn't allowed to see what Ame was really up to, being a Konoha-nin and all. For all I knew, they were mass-producing cannons in a cave somewhere.

…Wait, no, that was more like Orochimaru's modus operandi. But with fewer bioweapons.

"If Tsubame-chan wants to make me an aunt," I said, changing the topic, "does that mean Obito and Kakashi get to be uncles?"

"Once she realizes? Likely so," Konan replied. "Though now that I think of it, Kei-san, you were already sort of in our clan as soon as Minato-dono reached out to us. It's only that you didn't realize quite how large the clan was."

"Fair point," I admitted. Though to be honest, I had never known. "But Konan-senpai, am I allowed to tell them?"

"If you weren't, you would never know about our children in the first place," Konan replied, because as the village's effective spymaster, she could make those sorts of calls. People feared Nagato if they didn't know him, because the Rinnegan was just that infamous. But if they overlooked Konan, they were living on borrowed time. "If you stay until tomorrow, I can see if there is anything else we may want to send back to Konoha with you."

"Of course, Konan-senpai," I said. While this visit may not have put me at Konan's disposal, I wanted to put at least another day between me and having to ride with Tsuruya all the way back home. Tsuruya would probably appreciate the break.

"Oh, wait," Yahiko said. "You've been kinda pushing the Chūnin Exams. Do you have students in it?"

"It's not for six months," Nagato reminded him.

"I know that, but our village starts looking for candidates early," Yahiko said, probably mostly for my benefit. Then he turned his attention back to me in full and said, "So, are you going to? Actually, wait, do you even have students?"

"Well…"
I arrived back in Konoha with a couple of leg cramps, a completed courier mission, four pieces of art from the youngest Akatsuki members, paperwork galore that I was not supposed to be reading, and a pamphlet's worth of information that Konan had pulled out of a filing cabinet and told me to give to Jiraiya when I saw him. It went in the storage seals along with everything else, but separately because I had already put the other resources away.

Given that the man still walked the length of the continent every few months, hook hand or no, I wasn't sure when that last part would be feasible. But it had the seal of the Land of Iron separately from the alleged intel on Shinjitsu, so I handed it over with everything else.

"And now," I told Sensei, after explaining everything that had happened during the mission, "I am going to see how Kakashi's genin are doing."

"Not your trio?" Sensei asked distractedly, already reading the smaller of the reports. It wasn't like Jiraiya wouldn't just give the information to him eventually anyway.

"I checked in with the chūnin downstairs," I admitted, because he knew me all too well, "and they're not back yet."

It was one of the problems with having a reputation like mine—if the Hokage needed a jōnin of my qualifications somewhere, there often wasn't anyone else to send. And even if there was, the Hokage's orders were orders. In this exact case, Obito might've been able to go if he'd been cleared to use Kamui. Kakashi, though? Not with a brand new genin team. My team could operate on their own, and already had been sent out with Shisui (to his fond exasperation). And Jiraiya was out wandering, Tsunade was literally always more useful in the hospital…

I didn't really mind, though. Kushina got to learn she had an even bigger extended family than she thought she had. That was reason for celebration enough.

"Kakashi's team is on their second D-rank today," Sensei told me, "so perhaps you should wait until later."

Hm. Given what D-ranks generally entailed, I was better off skipping out. "Okay." But before I thought about leaving, I paused with one finger poised in the air. "Wait, Sensei, what day is it?"

"It's a Wednesday." Sensei looked up from the files I'd brought him. "Why?"

"Gotta go!" Because I had a meet-up to get to and a friend to bother. Since I was actually in the village on time, I could still make it. And I exited Sensei's office at speed, without using the ventilation system at all. It would've been rude to kick Raidō out of the ceiling in my haste.

I made my way via the rooftops to the hospital, after pausing for a few heartbeats to confirm that Iruka was around and Itachi was still shadowing him. Yamato was nowhere to be found—probably on a mission—and I felt Anko hanging around a nearby training field, surrounded by smaller chakra signatures. Probably students or genin who were brave enough to approach her for senbon lessons. Kurenai and Asuma were around the village, escorting their teams, and I could sense Kakashi's little band of marauders on their day trip.

And Rin and Obito were in the hospital. Likely in one of the meeting rooms, given Tsunade's presence. Mind made up, I beelined for them.

When I got to the hospital and the relevant room (after getting turned around by the fact that my chakra sense had never compensated for corners), people were already filing out. From their bookloads and excited chattering, the class had gone well and left them with plenty to think about. Some of the students—no, fellow medics—looked like members of major clans, which meant Rin had finally drawn the audiences she wanted. Now she just needed a proper Academy-style lecture hall.

"Back already?" Tsunade's voice asked, drawing my attention back into the room.

I nodded as I headed inside, surveying the repurposed meeting room. Though it didn't have enough seats for more than, say, twenty people, more than thrice that number had left just a few moments ago. Standing room only, I wagered. In the back of the room, Rin and Obito were packing up her medical charts and packing them safely away for next week's session.

"I'm sorry I missed the fun," I said, sheepish. "But I probably wasn't qualified to hear half of this."

Tsunade didn't seem to mind, casting a fond glance back toward the duo hard at work. "And Obito-kun is? I'm sure Rin-chan is mostly grateful for the moral support, not one more head that understands chakra interactions with rare herbs half the people here haven't heard of."

"Fair point," I admitted. As Tsunade strode past me to resume her hospital duties, I stuck my hand in the air and said, "Rin-sensei, what did I miss?"

Rin spun in place, a smile spreading across her face. Obito waited a little longer, since he was busy packing up a (hopefully) model skeleton, and therefore Rin's flying hug-tackle hit me first. "Welcome back, Kei!" she said as she pulled back. "And… Well, you missed a lot, and the summary isn't nearly as interesting, but these classes are really getting off the ground! Soon, we may have a comprehensive understanding of Mount Myōboku herbs and how they interact with Konoha bloodline limits!"

Which was about fifty miles past my understanding, but undoubtedly useful. "And the plan to start headhunting early?"

"Well, Yamato-kun has Iruka-kun on board," Rin said, waving in the direction of the Academy. "And Itachi-kun promised he'd make sure his brother takes a look, too. The whole Academy may not be willing to adopt medic-nin practices yet, but we have full elective classes of first aid training. It's much more advanced than the usual version."

Shikane would have been probably the fastest of the administrators to bow to the sound logic of making everyone at least halfway a field medic, though I had to wonder who else was holding up the process. I couldn't make waves in the Academy—it wasn't my place—but Iruka and the others could. With Tsunade's backing, they'd probably manage something even more helpful by the time the next class graduated.

"Wish I'd known half that stuff when I was a kid," Obito commented, and we fist-bumped once he was within arm's reach.

"You're telling me you haven't watched Rin-chan since then?" I asked. With his Sharingan active, preferably.

"Then, not now," Obito corrected gently, while Rin stuck an extendable pointer into a pocket on her hip. "I've got it now. If there's an Uchiha who can stitch a wound faster, I haven't met 'em."

"Itachi?" I guessed.

Obito pouted theatrically as he hefted his part of Rin's lecture supplies. "Clan geniuses don't count. And since he copied me, it doubly doesn't count."

"Aaaaand done!" Rin declared, clapping her hands. "Let's get out of here and have lunch!"
"...What time even is it?" I wondered aloud. There weren't as many convenient clocks as one would hope for in an official building, and I hadn't checked in Sensei's office before leaving.

"It's 'I'm hungry now that I'm not busy,' so let's go!" Rin said, and we headed out together.

"Ichiraku?"

Obito pumped a fist. "Yes! Oh, and you should fill us in on what we missed. What happened on the mission?"

"Well," I began, because Konan had effectively told me I could share with the ninja-family extended tree, "did you know Konan-senpai, Yahiko-senpai, and Nagato-senpai have four kids?"

"What?!" Obito and Rin gasped together, disturbing nearby pigeons as we exited to the hospital's roof.

"That was my reaction too! I'll tell you all about them over ramen."

It wasn't until after what turned out to be a late lunch, a very long conversation about possibly getting scrapbooking material from Amegakure, and an impromptu Gai challenge (which Obito lost, because taijutsu masters ate more), before I got a good look at the new genin.

At first, I was blatantly people-watching. Ichiraku was dead in the middle of town, so I got to see Kurenai's Team Eight—with Hinata on point—headed back to the Hokage's tower for to report in. I waved as Kurenai headed past, and though she couldn't stay and chat, she reminded me that the genjutsu development group could still use me running around and blundering into new discoveries.

Then Asuma's Team Ten roof-hopped by about fifteen minutes later, also finished with their assignments. They didn't stop to wave or anything, but going by the faint smell of explosive residue that lingered in their wake, maybe that was for the best.

"Do you think they might be taking on harder missions than usual?" Rin asked, watching them go.

Obito shrugged. "Unless it was the old 'dog walking near a minefield' one, I think they'll be fine."

"That happened once, and Pakkun apologized," I reminded him dryly. I looked up once I felt more familiar chakra signatures draw closer, then said, "And here are the last ones."

Team Seven trooped up the street with the three component genin covered in dust and with Naruto in the lead.

"Kei-sensei, Rin-sensei," Naruto greeted our group as he approached at a trot, "and Uncle Obito. Have you been eating ramen without us?!"

Obito cast a pointed look at the ramen bowls stacked on the counter. Then, with an innocent smile on his face, Obito declared, "Nope! We were reading our fortunes in tea leaves."

"Since Kei can see the future," Kakashi added with a serious nod.

"Pff, way to put me on the spot. Still, I could play along.

"It'll rain tonight," I put in, casting a look at the perfectly placid, clear sky outside.

"Liar!" Sakura and Naruto said, but pointed at one jōnin each. Sasuke, after a brief pause to realize that his teammates were both going to goof off, shrugged and pointed halfheartedly at me to round out the triad.
"Are we, though?" Obito asked, as a Water Clone of his creation popped onto one of the street lamps outside Ichiraku. When the clone exploded violently, makeshift rain pattered outside for a few seconds and drew the genin team's attention to the street.

"Eh?" Naruto blinked. "Sasuke, did you-?"

"Not me," Sasuke said, holding up his hands to show that he wasn't making seals.

"Well, if not you..." Sakura began.

CLANG CLANG!

All the genin jumped, and Rin's bright laughter almost cancelled out the thunder-like racket she'd made. Sure, Teuchi and Ayame were a little more careful with the pots and pans than Rin was, but they were certainly in on the joke. And at the same time, Kakashi's chakra gave a little jump and static made everyone's hair stand on end all at once. Not that most people would even notice with Obito and Naruto's respective haircuts.

"Gotcha!" Rin said, even as she hopped the counter back to her seat. That way, Naruto couldn't steal it.

"Told you it'd rain," I said, as though none of the steps to the prank had happened.

"Does it even count if you make your own?" Sasuke wanted to know.

"Ah, but I didn't," I replied. "Did you see me make any hand seals?"

Naruto made a face. "Kei-sensei, everyone knows you don't need to."

"You can use jutsu without hand seals?" Sakura asked, as a mark against the truth of Naruto's statement.

"I can, but I didn't," I replied. "You've got the wrong jōnin."

Obito made a coughing noise that sounded suspiciously like laughter.

"Agh! Come on, Sasuke, Sakura. Mom promised she'd make us dinner," Naruto said, beckoning to his teammates. "We don't need Kakashi-sensei and the others pranking us."

"At least until we get back at them," Sasuke said in a voice that he probably assumed none of us could hear as they walked away. "Sakura, can you get your hands on—?"

"You don't even need to ask!" Sakura replied as they turned a corner and wandered out of sight.

"Ominous," I commented. My, the kids were scheming together already. For all Kakashi's fears that he'd be a terrible sensei, he seemed to have gotten them off to a good start.

Kakashi slid onto the stool next to mine, bumping our elbows together in a way that didn't send pins and needles up our arms. "Teuchi-san, can I get a bowl of pork ramen?"

"Of course, Kakashi-kun," Teuchi said, and got his cooking implements back in order with Rin's and Ayame's help. "Coming right up!"

"So, Kakashi, what d'you think your kids'll do to us?" Obito asked, leaning forward over his bowl so he could peek past me. "Hot sauce? Glitter?"
"I think Sakura dislikes spicy food—" Kakashi began, interrupted only by Rin's quiet gasp of horror, "—so, I'd lean more toward the glitter. But they are going to have dinner with Sensei and Kushina."

"Oh, so we're a bit doomed," Obito concluded. "Cool."

Sounds like an ordinary day.

"It's nice to know we've still got it," I said in satisfaction, resting my arms on the countertop. The bustle of Teuchi and Ayame, and my friends' easygoing chatter let me know whatever the future held, we'd face it as one team.
"Give it your best shot, Sasuke-kun!" Aiko called out, settling into a taijutsu stance that was half-Strong Fist and probably half-boxing. While she was perfectly capable of doing the usual flips and airborne maneuvers as any ninja, she preferred to dodge by sliding from side to side when her feet were on the ground. It was just that, to a more extreme extent than most uncannily tough shinobi, she preferred taking direct hits and blocking instead of dodging where practical.

Sasuke eyed her warily. "You first."

Covered in dust and dirt after their initial exchange of blows, because even Aiko's lighter hits could send a lighter shinobi skidding, Sasuke edged around her to avoid getting caught within her range. Because Aiko was a little taller, her reach was theoretically better, but she didn't use weapons to capitalize on that advantage. Having felt exactly how much Aiko didn't need so much as a shuriken, he knew better than to rush in.

Again, anyway.

"If you lose initiative, you lose the fight!" Aiko reminded him, before taking a running leap directly for him. "Take this! Bird Kick of Rage!"

Sasuke darted out of the way in time, and thus Aiko ended up stomping a crater in the training ground. From a safe distance, I'd felt her only commit to the blow once she realized her opponent was going to be able to dodge, making her super-strength hits score a bit higher on the intimidation front.

"Joint training days are fun," Roku said mildly, while Aiko picked up a clod of broken earth and hurled it straight at Sasuke's head. With her real strength behind it, the supposedly-soft projectile shot across the training field like a bullet.

He ducked in time, then started making hand seals for one of the many, many Uchiha Fire Release techniques. "Fire Release: Great Fireball Jutsu!"

Unfortunately for Sasuke, Aiko had his number. My blonde student shouted, "Earth Release: Earth Wall!"
The battlefield got a bit hard to see after the fireball hit the earth wall, compressing almost immediately and blasting hot air out in every direction, so the sidelines amused themselves by chatting with each other. Today's benchwarmers were me, Kakashi, Roku, Sakura, Kaito, and Naruto. At least until the gloves-off sparring session was finished and we could rotate participants.

But in the meantime, Kaito put his hands on his hips and demanded, "Okay, seriously. Naruto, you sure you don't need a break?"

"No way!"

Naruto, enterprising kid that he was, had decided on the most difficult possible way to learn how to use handholds and footholds effectively in midair combat. Which was why he was standing on a pair of floating kunai-shaped icicles, above a bed of spikes that looked like something straight out of a jungle warfare movie, and was slowly climbing on free-floating icy rungs to a dubiously-existent invisible ladder. Credit where it was due, because even Kaito had trouble creating that many ice constructs at once and keeping them in midair, but Naruto's idea of a challenging training regimen still oughtn't have involved so much potential frostbite.

Sure, at some point he'd master the ability to use those icicles like stepping stones, but why on earth did he want a spike pit? No one knew.

Stubbornness, probably. He'd have an easier time throwing himself around in the air via Shadow Clones.

Sakura, on the other hand, had teamed up with Roku. Since Roku's preferred medium was iron sand and not something below freezing temperatures, Sakura was having a much easier time of the acrobatics. As she leapt from one disc-shaped collection of iron scraps to the next, she said, "I think I'm getting it, Roku-senpai!"

"Better you than me," Roku responded, though Sakura knew better than to take that kind of remark personally. Like Kaito, he'd gotten out of more than one untenable scrape by using his bloodline-granted medium and just running across gaps in terrain that his enemies couldn't. That didn't mean he liked to, though.

"Is it better or worse than climbing trees?" Kaito asked, as his Icy Stalagmites of Doom started to melt. He wasn't putting nearly as much chakra into them as before because Naruto was high enough that the fall alone was a risk, and the ice collapsed in the mid-afternoon sun. And from the backwash of Sasuke and Aiko's ongoing firefight.

"They don't move in the wind," Sakura said, as she jogged a circuit over our heads, "so it's like I'm compensating for what's not happening instead of what is. It's weird, but it's a good kind of weird."

"In that case, try something a bit more extreme. I'll catch you if you need it," Roku said, already working his way through his hand seals.

Sakura planted a hand in one of the iron sand discs, then did a one-handed back handspring into open air. Before she'd fallen more than a meter, Roku had already made an entire blanket of Iron Sand to cushion her trip to the ground. Sakura got her feet under her, and thus the sand parted in time for her to stick a gymnastics landing.

"Nicely done," Roku told her, as the sand whirled out of the air and back into the rice bag he stored most of it in. The storage seal he used to lighten the load was sitting right underneath it, ready for use whenever.
And Kakashi was napping with a novel over his face, so he'd missed seeing the little performance. Then again, that little bow-and-twist, arms in the air as though to receive applause? I recognized that as one of Kakashi's little flairs when he felt like showing off. Seemed like his kids were picking things up quickly. Even if he'd handed off the reins of today's training session to me and my students, he knew what he was doing. Compared to his crisis of "oh my god what am I doing" the day before assembling Team Seven for the first time, it was a nice change.

Speaking of changes, Team Seven had a much more unified skill level this time around. While Sakura was still the one most devoted to the art of being a bookworm, and had correspondingly devoted her time to passing the written tests in the Academy with flying colors, Naruto and Sasuke were both well-rounded. Naruto was far better at academics than his other self had been, because many of the skills involved in test-taking and fūinjutsu overlapped, and he had an actual taijutsu style that relied heavily on his flexibility and countering his enemies' movements, sort of like his dad's. Sasuke, on the other hand, was the group weapon expert and the best at his clan's nature transformation, as well as being the fastest member of the team.

And then there was my team. They were still genin, which was primarily my fault, but if anything, they were overqualified for chūnin by leaps and bounds.

Aiko was fifteen, petite, and basically a tiny blonde Gai. She had a braid on one side that was styled the same way as the one she'd put in Sakura's long hair to control it. While she hadn't gone so far as to wear the green jumpsuit and the orange legwarmers like Gai and Lee did, her clothing style featured fashionable bandages on her limbs and a pair of gloves complete with knuckledusters for good measure. Spandex—in blue, not green—was the name of the day otherwise. If she wasn't still small enough that Kakashi's genin were a single growth spurt from overtaking her, she'd have cut an intimidating figure like her aunt and mother had before her.

Kaito, meanwhile, was marginally taller than Aiko and still wearing his hair nearly the same way I did. At some point, he'd added much longer open-toed boots to his shoe collection instead of sandals most people wore, and he wore mesh instead of bandages or sleeves over his arms. Now, if only he ever made use of the hood attached to his jacket, and all of his outfit would be function-first.

And there was Roku, eye-obscuring hairstyle and all, and he dressed like he'd wandered off the set of a kung fu movie where the only colors were neutral tones. He was also taller than I was by a tiny margin, with long sleeves he tended to use to store weapons, and gloves like Kaito's. A bit more fashion than function on his end, though. Since he was almost nineteen, I supposed it made sense. There were more options for him.

Kaito cupped his gloved hands around his mouth and said, "Keep going and you'll be able to see the Hokage Monument from here," to Naruto, who was indeed still climbing the world's most hostile ladder. "Let me know if you're getting sick of being hit by low-flying birds!"

"I'm fine, Kaito! Quit nagging," Naruto responded, looking down on reflex. Then he went still for a second, except for a faint swaying as he kept his balance through sheer force of habit. "...Okay, this is kind of high. Hey, Roku, do we have a safety net?"

"Are you a ninja or not?" Kaito challenged him, trying to wave Roku's assistance off.

Roku fixed his wayward brother in place with the sharpest glare he'd used all day. Given his perpetually sleepy expression and the Magnet Release-marked eyelids that made him look like a panda, it wasn't much of a feat. "Can we not commit involuntary manslaughter today?"

"Are you a ninja or not?" Kaito challenged him, trying to wave Roku's assistance off.

Roku fixed his wayward brother in place with the sharpest glare he'd used all day. Given his perpetually sleepy expression and the Magnet Release-marked eyelids that made him look like a panda, it wasn't much of a feat. "Can we not commit involuntary manslaughter today?"

Kaito rolled his eyes, but he kept making ice-handholds for Naruto to continue climbing, even as Roku wove his metallic net.
"Fire Release: Phoenix Flower Jutsu!"

"Earth Release: Earth Dragon Bullet!"

From my spot on a nearby bluff, it looked like things were going well. Team Seven and Team Kei got along like a house on fire. Now, if they could just avoid committing arson before they were done training today…

Luckily, perhaps, Sasuke slumped down onto his knees after that last exchange of jutsu, narrowly missing Aiko's Earth Release jutsu hurling mud the other way at high speed. While one of the bigger shots hit a tree, and blasted a handful of branches off, it looked like Sasuke was no worse for wear. Aside from being out of chakra for a while.

Still, I got to my feet just as Naruto plummeted out of the sky, landing safely in Roku's iron net. Once he bounced to his feet again, he pointed straight at Kaito's nose and declared, "My turn now, Kaito!"

"Yeah, yeah, go check on your friend first," Kaito said in a dismissive tone.

With the next match order decided, Naruto and Sakura darted toward their teammate, skidding to a stop on her knees. "Sasuke-kun, are you okay?"

Sasuke sat back on his feet, in an exhausted imitation of a seiza pose. "Fine." Sasuke staggered to his feet, with only minimal help from Sakura's concerned hands. "You didn't use Fire Release at all during our match, Aiko."

"I'm not gonna fight fire with fire," Aiko replied, once he was steady on his feet. "Even if it is cooler than Earth Release."

"Hey," Roku chastised Aiko, though he clearly wasn't serious about it.

Oh, figurative language, how silly you can get, I thought, allowing myself an internal sigh. Still, it seemed like the kids were mostly managing themselves. I could afford to space out.

As though you have any room to talk. You twist words in circles if you have half a chance. Hey, it's fun.

"When was the last time you even used plain Earth Release?" Kaito asked, peering at Roku suspiciously.

Roku shrugged. When not speaking sufficed to communicate his point, Roku tended to keep silent.

"Regardless, it's time for you to swap. Sasuke, Aiko, you're going to go over the match you just had and talk about what you did," I said, clapping my hands to get their attention. "Aiko, you're our expert on Fire Release, so maybe if you had any pointers for Sasuke…?"

"Sure thing, Kei-sensei!" Aiko said, and escorted him toward the sidelines. "Sorry about not showing you this earlier, but…"

"It's fine. You can just do it now," Sasuke replied, and before long they were out of immediate earshot.

"Naruto, Kaito, the field is yours. Don't break anything important," I advised them, but both boys were already making tracks toward the impact crater Aiko had left earlier. I still shouted after them,
"Including each other!" just to be on the safe side.

"Kei-sensei," Roku prompted me. "What about Sakura-san and me?"

Well, since Sakura hadn't been doing much in terms of chakra expenditure… "How do you feel about spotting her for a few chakra exercises? Kaito and Naruto won't last too long, so you'll still be ready to go after they finish with the field. It'll be a good warmup."

Sakura glanced between us, probably checking my logic and finding it wanting, but only said, "All right, Kei-sensei!"

Unfortunately, an explosion from Naruto and Kaito's direction cut off Roku's reply, but I assumed it was also an affirmative. While the two of them headed for the nearby stream, I strode directly into the cheap seats of the genin fight and parked myself where I could easily intervene. Pairing Naruto and Kaito kept two competitive kids with high chakra capacities focused on each other, but it did have risks.

"Mass Shadow Clone Jutsu!"

"Ice Release: Mass Ice Kunai Clones!"

Like that. I tilted my head to one side and one of Kaito's misfires slammed into the tree behind me, splintering bark. A quick glance confirmed that the construct was well-made, but of glittering clear ice. I could have sworn I'd once told him to add wood shavings or sawdust if possible, but it was just a sparring match.

"Cheap shot," Naruto complained, after his clones had fully dispersed.

"It's not a cheap shot if any shinobi could do it," Kaito argued.

"You have Ice Release!"

"Like I couldn't do the same with regular kunai! And you use Shadow Clones like they're nothing!"

"I-It's just something I can do, okay?!"

After he'd invented his own hand seal for it, sure. Naruto hadn't been able to make the three-seal sequence fast enough for his purposes, at least until a thought or two about hand seals had boomeranged back into his head and inspired the creation of the cross seal he'd used thereafter.

Still, I sighed inwardly. Wonderful.

Inevitable, Isobu remarked.

"Naruto, Kaito, you're allowed to use your unique advantages in a fight. Both of you." Once I was sure I had their attention, I went on, "This may be a sparring match, but you can't expect an enemy to hold back against you in the future. Knowing your friends' strengths is one of the best ways to get stronger together. Don't waste that time by arguing over whether a jutsu is 'fair' or not."

I had the worst lectures. It was probably a side effect of hanging out on the sidelines with a running commentary in my head. But at least the two hottest heads on each team were listening to me.

"Naruto, you don't have iron skin or anything. Don't confront Kaito directly," I suggested. "You've got a prankster's mind, so think your way around him."

Kaito, eying the younger genin, didn't say anything about me giving him advice. This was a lesson
Kaito had needed to learn when he was younger, but I'd been much clumsier on the execution. Kaito had about as much leeway with his bloodline limit as his distant cousin Haku did, even if he wasn't as good at precision attacks. And though I had never told Kaito about Yang Kurama, he wasn't going to try and outlast an Uzumaki.

Even though Naruto's favorite multipurpose technique was about as draining as anything short of resurrecting the dead.

"Get ready, Naruto. I won't hold back!" Kaito said, which was of course a blatant lie.

Not that Naruto seemed to care. "Bring it!"

The clash continued, and Kakashi kept sleeping with his favorite novel over his eyes.

Later that week, Shinjitsu cropped up again, as they'd been doing every six months or so since we'd first heard of them. Konoha was still far from their usual stomping grounds, but what information Obito tended to come back with painted more and more of the same, ugly picture. Unlike Otogakure, they had more than one big name involved, but Obito's stealthy approach did leave us without a perspective on how they operated on a general basis in the field. Sure, we knew how much their star players hated our guts, but their field agents were too many and too lightweight to send Obito after them directly.

Kamui was a great weapon in the war of information control, but only when used correctly.

"It may just be something about Amegakure, but I could never have gotten this kind of information without sending Obito to the exact right place," Sensei said in a resigned tone as he stared down at the report on his desk. "And he'd have to steal it."

"Konan got it, didn't she?" I guessed, because nothing happened in or around Amegakure without the Akatsuki's knowledge. Kinda police state-ish, but there were so many outside threats to an upstart village like Ame that I couldn't speak against their approach.

"She wrote this, at least," Sensei replied. "I take it you didn't read it?"

"I was asked not to," I replied. I shifted my weight from foot to foot to avoid fidgeting more noticeably, though I was sure Sensei caught it. "I tried to at least listen to Konan-senpai."

Y'know, because communications between heads of state was supposed to be secure. Sensei probably could have chain-teleported his way to Ame, but hell, it'd been decades since the last time Konoha had really sent the Hokage willy-nilly all over the continent. The death of the Second Hokage had something to do with that, even if staying behind in the wake of the disastrous negotiations and save his guard unit had been his choice. And while Sensei had a very nasty reputation, he was also the Hokage who was good at bureaucracy and paperwork on his own initiative. The village didn't want to lose him to anything short of a Ten-Tails attack.

"It deals primarily with the Land of Iron. And there are a few names in here I never thought we'd see again." Sensei spun the report around on the desk so I wouldn't need to read it upside-down—not that I would—and said, "Here. See for yourself."

Speaking of the Ten-Tails and the likelihood of running into the damn thing...

I shook my head slowly, because of course there was still something going wrong in a country we couldn't affect, and then continued reading. After another second or two, I paused. "Wait, there's a guy named Yūki Uesugi in this mess?"
Sensei nodded. "I thought the name sounded familiar. The Uesugi clan did have two survivors, didn't it?"

"More than that, I think, but this sounds like it could be the kid Mom rescued back then," I admitted, scratching the back of my neck as I thought. "I mean, it could be a coincidence, but…"

Once is happenstance. Twice is coincidence. Thrice is enemy action.

Not sure we've crossed that threshold yet, but this is the ninja world we're talking about here. While I wasn't all that interested in getting involved with yet another branch of the extended family, dealing with Shinjitsu seemed to demand more attention every time they came up.

Sooner or later, Sensei would find a reason couched in political nonsense to send me in there to cause mass destruction. Probably sooner. After all, one encounter with the Ten Tails—sort of—hadn't ended badly. Perhaps a second wouldn't either.

"I don't know," I finally said, shaking my head. "There's not enough information yet. But if he is… Well. I'd suggest treating him like any other member of Shinjitsu."

I'd never met the guy, so it wasn't as though I was overflowing with sympathy for a man whose cause might well involve the destruction of the planet. Even if sometimes humans were pretty terrible, most of my friends were human. It didn't take much thought to decide to oppose that kind of villain.

"Most of your friends." Hah, I like that. Thought you would.

"That's perhaps a bit cold," Sensei remarked, as he drew my attention to a letter left on his desk. I hadn't paid it much attention, because there was such a thing as prying, but I saw it now. "Since he was kind enough to request an A-rank mission that you would be perfect for."

"Think it's a trap?" It was my first thought, at least.

Trap.

Hush.

"It easily could be," Sensei agreed, though he couldn't hear Isobu. He steepled his fingers in front of his face. "Samurai almost never lodge mission requests. It's a point of pride among their forces that they've never needed shinobi for anything. And given that your mother's old clan name isn't public knowledge"—which was, if anything, a gross understatement—"I doubt they know you could be related. It seems more that they simply want to attract a powerful shinobi team… Probably for nefarious purposes."

There was something funny about Sensei using the term "nefarious" without a hint of irony. After all, shinobi were supposed to be the sneaky, backstabbing rogues. And here we were, anticipating being betrayed by "honorable" samurai. Japanese historians would probably have laughed at that incongruity, because a reputation wasn't necessarily a reflection of reality. My mother's family history would have attested to that much.

I sighed inwardly. Oh dear. "Is the village accepting the mission?"

Sensei's response was immediate. "Of course."
Far be it from the Hokage to pass up an opportunity to demolish an enemy force's ability to threaten Konoha, even if there were some risks. I'd been on a mission where the sole goal was to reduce an Otogakure bunker to smoking ruin, and the resulting underground firestorm hadn't cooled to habitable levels for weeks. Yamato's Earth ninjutsu-made clay and mud had taken care of any additional concerns by baking solid. And while that last part hadn't originally been in the plan, no one had minded.

"Tell me, do you think your students will be up to the task?"

"Yes," I replied. Aiko could store kinetic energy for later use, Kaito used ice, and Roku was the village's only Magnet Release specialist. Given how we were going to spend plenty of time on the road, there was time to brush up on their winter combat skills on the way, too.

"It's good that you're confident," Sensei remarked. With a faintly dry tone, he said, "I hope that means you're going to finally enter them in the Chūnin Exams this time."

"Let's not get too far ahead of ourselves," I muttered, a bit embarrassed. Keeping my students out of foreign Exams was almost a running joke at this point, and they'd been patient with me for entirely too long. If only this upcoming Chūnin Exam didn't have an engraved invitation for Orochimaru plastered all over it... "Though if they perform well in this mission, I'll definitely give them the option."

Sensei smiled with perhaps just a bit of exasperation at my attitude. All he said was, "I'm sure they'll leap on the chance."

Like big cats. Or drop bears.

"I'll have the office convert the request into a proper mission scroll, and I'll work out an expense estimate. You'll leave for the Land of Iron with your team as soon as we've finalized the details," Sensei went on briskly, already starting to slip into the bureaucrat mindset. "And I'll tell you how much your team can probably expect to be paid, even if we have to pry the money out. Travel times, expected enemy armaments...maybe if I send..."

While Sensei trailed off, thinking aloud in a mutter, I bowed as a silent request to leave. As soon as I spotted his quick, distracted nod, I disappeared from his office and went to start preparations.

My explosives hadn't been even utilized in our last attempt to destroy the Ten-Tails' mummified form, and likely wouldn't have worked any better than Konan's. But I'd been learning new tricks since then, and planned to eradicate Shinjitsu if given half a chance to do so. They'd been allowed to fester for far too long. This golden opportunity to deal with the organization was probably a trap from the word "go," but I was one of the people Konoha could rely upon—usually—to fight my way out. It was a one-two punch of destructive capability and craptons of chakra to utilize it.

And I really wanted to track down Kakuzu and rip his lungs out. Screw going for a heart when he had five of the damn things. He was about the only person who'd hurt one of the people I loved and gotten away with it thus far, and Orochimaru's bullshit Horcrux strategy didn't count. I'd need a few more shots at him (and perhaps the invention of nitroglycerin) to make it stick.

I went home to prepare my arsenal.

"Are you going to take all of the ration bars?" Hayate asked from the kitchen as I prepared my storage scrolls.

While my team was going to be given expense money for buying food in villages or towns we passed through, I still enjoyed the idea of not needing to use that allowance. Sure, I wasn't going to start packing everything until I knew for sure what the mission parameters would entail, but with the drafts down on paper my students would also be able to pack their own supplies, too. Aiko had the best calligraphy out of my three students, but would appreciate the thought.

"If I can pack them all into a single seal, yeah. Do we still have the box?" I asked, because scrolls and loose items in pocket dimensions did not interact well.

"Yeah, lemme just grab it," Hayate said, and I felt him reach above our fridge for the relevant supplies just as two chakra signatures trooped up to our front door.

Hayate didn't notice until he could hear them.

"Hayate-kun, Kei-chan," Kushina's voice rang out as she—or, more likely, a smaller set of hands that accompanied her—knocked. "Good morning!"

I emerged from under a pile of sealing supplies and loose scrolls, trying to avoid disturbing anything unstable as I picked my way toward the front door. One of the problems of using the living room table instead of the desk in my room to work on seals involved losing track of things. Or possible tripping over them. But I'd wanted to give my poor ink-splattered floor a bit of a break.

I opened the door and was almost immediately latched onto by a tiny redhead. While scooting out of the way for Kushina to more easily carry her huge armload of baskets, sweets, and who knew what else into the apartment, I gave Tatsumaki essentially free reign to hug my waist hard enough that she probably could have only been dislodged with a crowbar. I felt her lock her hands together behind my back for good measure.

"Hello to you, too," I said to the top of Tatsumaki's head. When she responded by looking up and digging her chin into my sternum, I took it as a sign that I'd passed inspection. Her whisker cheek marks stretched a little as she smiled. "Did you help your mother make these?"

"With the mochi. Make sure you eat them right away, otherwise they won't be as good," Tatsumaki reminded me sternly, letting go of my waist. She did it in such a way that, if she'd been a little better at leverage, might've been her setting me back on my feet after an impromptu lifting competition. With gravity, anyway. "Dad said you'd be on the road for-freaking-ever!"

"That sounds about right," Hayate said, as I led Tatsumaki into the apartment to help her mother and my brother unload all the gifts. Or supplies, given how much of this stuff I was bound to take with me. Aiko's sweet tooth was not to be denied.

You say that like you are not in possession of a sweet tooth prominent enough for any two people.

Hush, you. Stop making good points.

You've already taken all the bad ones, so what else is left?

"Here, Maki-chan," Hayate said, after unpacking one of the baskets Kushina had brought. He held out a neatly wrapped pastry from the Uchiha bakery, because the Namikaze family knew where to find the good stuff.

Though the bushy-haired redhead did wait until her mother confirmed that she had permission to eat a part of the gift, she tore into the anpan with all the restraint of Aiko once permission was got. While I hadn't seen Aiko visit the Namikaze household often, I knew my team had a marked tendency to pop by the Academy. Usually with the intent to bring treats to the students. Since Itachi had a fondness for sweets that was a bit of an open secret in their age group, the Academy teachers tended to tolerate their interference perhaps more than they should have. Especially when leftovers ended up in staff lounges for quite unknown reasons.

"Dorayaki?" I asked, as Kushina sat down at the table with us and I poked through the rest of the "eat now" basket. "It's barely noon."

"We went shopping all morning, and Tatsumaki has been very patient," Kushina said, even as she gently adjusted her daughter's fluffy pigtails. If they were a little looser, and if Tatsumaki had tolerated having a center part in her hair, she would have resembled a red-haired miniature Tsunade from the correct angle. "And I wanted to make sure your team left with all the comforts of home in a back pocket."

Once she'd finished devouring her treat and dabbed at her mouth with a napkin, Tatsumaki said, "Kei-sensei, Hayate-sensei, do you pack books for long trips?"

Hayate blinked. Tilting his head to one side, he clearly thought about it, then said, "No, Maki-chan. I mean, I don't want to let anything get destroyed by accident. Besides, most of the missions I've been on involve a lot of running."

Kakashi sure as shit did, though. At least he made sure to only pack the editions of _Icha Icha_ that weren't signed. Sensei hadn't been on a real mission in years, but during diplomatic events (like the many Chūnin Exams I hadn't entered my students in) he tended to either take non-secure paperwork, sealing supplies, or a stack of nonfiction halfway up his shin. Or all of the above, really.

"Not even a field guide?" Tatsumaki pressed, leaning forward. Her elbows were on the table and her face was squished between her hands as she scrutinized my brother's life choices. Oh, the judgement of an Academy student.

"I took a decommissioned Bingo Book once," Hayate said, after some thinking. His eyes shot toward mine across the table, and I figured the rest of what he'd bothered taking along on missions was either imminently burnable or not supposed to be seen by anyone but the recipient. Courier missions were not fun once people started trying to kill over things we hadn't read. "And a guide to local plants while in, uh, a few places I don't want to be caught again."

At least he'd never had to contemplate eating his own shoes, I supposed. Or worse: _natto_.

"I've brought novels before. Only for missions when I expect to stay in the same place a lot," I said, mostly to rescue my brother. That discounted my long stint of bounty hunting and other miscellaneous filler missions during my year away from home. "As for the rest... Well, your dad brings half a library with him when he goes anywhere. Fūinjutsu is awesome that way. I learned some stuff from him."

"Fūinjutsu is pretty awesome," Tatsumaki agreed. "Someday, I'll make my own big storage seals and carry all my stuff wherever I go. I just need to find a way to make it stop making a mess."

"If you do, please share your secret with your father," Kushina put in, smiling. "He'll love to find a way to take _all_ his work home with him."

"I might, if he lets me teach Gamatatsu and Gamakichi how to make mochi," Tatsumaki declared. "I'm almost good enough that I can work around their slimy hands!"

"I don't think Gamabunta would ever forgive us," I muttered under my breath.
Anyway, you should bring books,” Tatsumaki concluded, folding her hands neatly in her map. In a tone that sounded like she'd heard it all too many times before, "Knowledge is power. And you can learn all the time with books."

And power corrupts, and so on and so forth.

And here I thought you were going to skip the school truisms and move straight to Star Wars and cookies. The Dark Side's got nothing on Uchiha baked goods.

Imagine the devastation they could wreak if they had better chocolates.

I did my best not to smile. The others wouldn't get the joke. Forget the Sharingan—world domination is one bake sale away.

"Maki-chan, did you ever decide if you wanted to learn kenjutsu or not?" Hayate asked, steering the topic away from one where he was clearly not meeting Tatsumaki's standards. He needed to bring more books to strange and unknown places.

"I thought Kei-sensei said your family style isn't complete," Tatsumaki said, frowning slightly. "Or do you just mean the basics?"

"The basics," Hayate confirmed. "Since my sister will be out of town for a while, she'll catch up with you after she comes back. By then, you might have enough of a grasp to work on some of the more advanced stuff."

Tatsumaki stared down at the table for a little while, then said, "Yeah, I think I should do that. Dad and Mom always say it's best to learn things when people offer to teach you. Especially if it's a technique! I'll learn since I like you and kenjutsu would be good to know. Can I have another dorayaki? Or anpan?"

Tatsumaki got a nod from her mom, and selected her next treat with a little more care.

"I wasn't aware the Hokage used kenjutsu," Hayate said to Kushina, after coughing to clear his throat.

"He knows the basics, but it's mainly due to association with Kei-chan and Kakashi-kun," Kushina replied. "Not to mention observing other people in the field. It's just that he is less interested in learning anything except how to counter it."

Given Sensei's sheer speed, that didn't seem like something that had stayed on the Yellow Flash's to-do list for very long. Sensei plus katana would be deadly, but not much more than he already was. Which was already enough to intimidate other countries into ditching battlefields if he showed up.

"If Dad doesn't know it, I should learn it," Tatsumaki said firmly.

Well, if Naruto and Kushina had already decided against learning the art of the sword… Why not? Tatsumaki was tiny, adorable, had whisker-marks, and was a redhead. She was half a degree (and at least one universe) away from being Kenshin Himura. I'd be interested to see if she had a knack for it.

"How about you help me pack, first?" I suggested, because it was something I was sure Tatsumaki already knew how to do. Learning could happen once I was out of town.

"Okay!"
While Tatsumaki and I sat down with Kushina to complete the storage seals—and snacked on whatever wasn't going in them—Hayate dug around his room before retrieving his old training shinai from the depths of his closet. He waited until we three were done with the fūinjutsu before speaking to Tatsumaki quietly about practice and forms and getting used to the weight. While he couldn't guarantee he'd be in town much longer than I was, because missions happened unexpectedly all the time, there were enough shinobi with kenjutsu in their arsenal that Tatsumaki could find experts anywhere she needed them. I'd have picked Raidō, at least if he wasn't rushing off to do more ANBU missions.

"And we're all set on snacks," I announced, once (almost) all the sweets had disappeared into their proper seals. Thanks to that box Hayate had found earlier, it had only taken two seals to pack everything up tight. "Thank you, Kushina, Tatsumaki-chan. You were a great help."

"Oh, I wouldn't be sure about that," Kushina demurred. "You've got a long road ahead of you. I'd be surprised if these last the whole trip."

Given that getting to the Land of Iron seemed to take almost two solid weeks even at the fastest shinobi sustained travel speed, and the utter lack of convenient Flying Thunder God seals along the appropriate path, this was going to take forever.

Hrm. "Kushina, do you think it would be appropriate for me to break protocol a little?"

"Regarding what?" Kushina asked, as Hayate once again distracted her daughter. From the looks of things, our living room had become the site of Tatsumaki's first impromptu kenjutsu lesson. I told her my basic outline of a plan to save time.

"Well, they are old enough to make that kind of choice," Kushina mused, tucking her arms into a thinking pose. She tapped her cheek once, twice. "You probably have enough time before you leave, too. It won't do any harm to give it a shot."

"I'll run it by Sensei, then. Thanks," I said.

Hayate's voice washed over us as he crouched next to Tatsumaki, who held her shinai a little awkwardly. "And if you keep your hands spaced out like this…"

"Oh, I see," was her response. She swung experimentally, and the bamboo slats slapped together with a loud crack. "That works a lot better!"

"That's the idea, Maki-chan," Hayate said. And so, the lesson continued.

On the morning my team was scheduled to leave, Aiko was nearly late. After poking around the village for about fifteen seconds with my chakra sense, I traveled across town and half-kidnapped her from a meetup with Team Gai (wherein she, Lee, and Gai all said tearful goodbyes while Neji and Tenten mostly pretended not to be involved) and stuck her portion of the supplies in her arms to save time. Her teammates/brothers had already gotten her supplies out of the house and to the village gates, but I couldn't make them carry them forever.

"It's gonna be months before we can do the epic sunset genjutsu thing again," was what Aiko said when I asked about the delay. "I'll miss them."

I flicked her in the forehead anyway, my nails plinking off her headband as she secured her mission pack to her back. "That's no excuse. Now, let's get going."
As it happened, I did not get permission from Sensei to teach my students the Flying Thunder God Formation. While they were trustworthy, some techniques were the explicit and implicit purview of the Hokage's equivalent of the Secret Service and not supposed to be exploited for the sake of saving on travel time. Sensei didn't say most of that, but I caught the subtext just fine. A different set of contextual clues let me theorize that he had his own way of making sure we didn't stay out of contact with Konoha for longer than strictly necessary, even if he hadn't seen fit to explain his reasoning just yet.

Ah, well. C'est la vie.

In fact, it wasn't until my team hunkered down for the night that we found out what Sensei had chosen as an alternative solution.

Vwip! The air in front of our campfire twisted like water going down a drain, only in reverse as it spat up an Uchiha in a Konoha uniform.

"Hi, kids!”

And Sensei's contingency plan happened to be the only other habitual teleporter in the village. Once he'd fully materialized just outside of our little campsite, he raised his right hand and said, "I'll be your handler for this mission."

"What the hell does that mean?” Kaito demanded, peering over his shoulder.

"It means I'm not technically on this mission, but I'll be around if you need me. Also, I'm your quick escape." Obito nodded at me. "Kei said something that let Sensei know it might be a good idea."

"And I assume you're gonna take the opportunity to spy on the Land of Iron while we're there." I steepled my hands in front of my face like Sensei, though I looked less like a savvy politician and more like a crime lord when I did it.

"Well, sure," Obito replied. He sat down next to Roku, who immediately handed him a flame-roasted...thing that was probably a lizard. Even though we hadn't reached the point where we needed to live off the land, Roku liked to stay in practice. "Thanks. And as I was saying, I can also cut your trip shorter by like...weeks. I've been to the Land of Iron before."

And come home with one hell of a stomach bug. He'd learned his lesson, though. At length.

"Sounds good to me;" Aiko said. "The less time we spend outside of the Land of Fire, the better."

It was difficult for Aiko to act as a human seismograph when she wasn't in the correct country to get readings. The more warning people had of any activity around Mount Soragami, the better.

Obito shrugged, because he was the type of person who tended to assume that the Kasai clan seals were well beyond him. He was right, but that didn't necessarily mean that it wasn't an item of concern anyway. Instead of dwelling on it, he just said, "Maybe you'll change your mind once we get there. But for now, let's relax a bit! The samurai won't be expecting us for weeks."

"That's at least half a reason not to rush to their gates before they'd even expect a reply," I informed Obito dryly.

Obito did his best to argue with me on that, though. As a teleporter and an infiltrator extraordinaire, it wasn't like he generally had to worry about that kind of consideration. "We could just say we handed off the mission to the closest team."
Which would be a load of shit of the highest order. Every team on the border would've won out over us, because it was hard to be farther from the Land of Iron than Konoha was and still be on the same continent. The Land of Water was the only major shinobi nation without land borders shared with anyone else, as much good as it seemed to do them. That said, the Fourth Mizukage at least pretended to be civil, and according to Obito the last Chūnin Exam there had included a free spa day at a beachfront resort. The Land of Iron's idea of civility was less papered over by shiny things—for the most part, they turtled up and made everyone else leave them alone.

Ahem.

You're better at it than them.

Just so.

"We're not going to skip straight to the Land of Iron," I told Obito firmly. "We're going to get some more experience with their climate, we're going to check in at their border, and we're doing this above-board." When my students and Obito looked at me with perfect skeptical expressions, I added, "At least where people can see us."

We wouldn't be shinobi if we didn't have a few extra cards up our sleeves. Mine mostly exploded when I wanted them to, with a few exceptions.

"Do you think we'll run into any other shinobi there?" Aiko wondered aloud. When the rest of us turned our attention to her, she went on, "I know the geography lessons at the Academy say that the Land of Iron is super far away, and history says shinobi aren't supposed to be there. But there's been a lot of trouble out of Shinjitsu since years ago, and we know some of their members are in the Land of Iron and that they're shinobi. So, what gives?"

"I'm not sure how much the Land of Iron really knows about them, though," Obito said. He crossed his arms, leaning back as he thought. It was a bit ruined by the half-gnawed lizard on a stick in his hands. "See, I got to dig through a lot of their records, and I've actually met members of Shinjitsu before. Most of 'em are missing-nin, and we've sent hunter-nin after people with smaller bounties and bigger targets on their backs before. I don't think Mifune would be happy to know his country's been sheltering people like that."

"So… You're going to tell the general about the creeps in his country?" Kaito asked.

It was more likely that we'd kill the lot of them, torch their base, run for the border, and send Mifune a postcard once we were safely home. Better to ask forgiveness than permission. At the very least, we needed to provide enough leeway for Sensei to deny everything if asked.

My problem-solving skills occasionally left something to be desired.

"I think it'd be better if we took them out first." Obito, in some ways, was entirely too much like me. His powers, likewise, made him a little less than interested in following the proper procedure. "Keeping Mifune out of our hair, you know?"

Or keeping us out of his. Really, since we were the interlopers, we were the ones who'd be scurrying around and rabble-rousing. I was sure everyone involved would have plenty of things to scream at us after the fact. Some of them might even be nice enough to avoid being scrubbed from the reports.

Kaito said, "So, instead, we're gonna have to not-explain the giant smoking crater."

"Shinjitsu already did that, so who cares?" Obito shrugged. "Anyway, do you want to know who's made their roster? Or are you more worried about this Yūki guy?"

Kaito made a face, annoyed. "Let's not call him that. It'll get confusing way too fast."

"Whatever you say," Obito replied.

In the end, we decided to spend at least two days hoofing it. Obito could conserve his uses of Kamui.

It ended up paying off in ways we did not initially expect.

See, when ordinary people take a road trip, they expect the usual hazards. Such as wearing comfortable shoes, or not being able to find the correct turn and ending up in the mountains north of nowhere. Or having to shoot buffalo for food. Shinobi tended to expect many of the same things, minus one or two details related to technology and lack thereof. Characters in a horror movie, on the other hand, tended not to expect the hotel on the side of the road to be run by a serial killer and then died as a result. They'd have been fine if the only danger was poison ivy instead, but ended up in a situation beyond their abilities.

We weren't a normal group.

Thus, when we ran into our obligatory hazard just a day after we passed through the Land of Fire's northeastern land border, the universe was poised on a knife's edge. We could determine our genre via sufficient stabbing.

It was "action-adventure." With a dash of comedy.

Now, Obito and Aiko and I all had sweet teeth that were at least a standard deviation past what was considered "normal." It was one of the traits that had allowed us, and others, to bond over my attempts at both baking and making sweets based around mochi. Roku and Kaito ended up sharing the love for sweets somewhat more reluctantly as they grew up, but on a road trip it was traditional to make a pitstop for snacks when convenient. See, by the time we were a week into our travels, we'd eaten all the refined sugar I had brought from home in all its myriad forms. Which was a lot.

For that reason, we visited at a roadside tea house that served dango.

It also happened to be serving a Jashin cultist named Hidan. Who had, to my later astonishment, not randomly butchered the proprietors and stolen everything. No, instead he was being almost nice. I assumed later it was either because he was looking for a change of pace or because he couldn't cook.

Until he saw our headbands, anyway. As much as I swore daily, I'd hesitate to repeat everything he said to us for being supposed lawful authority. Suffice to say that we stalled fighting long enough to lure him away from possible civilian casualties, with Obito on point because he had five minutes of effective invincibility with which to make a mockery of Hidan. As far as my team was concerned, if he was going to be an ass, then we could return the favor with an eye toward making him harmless. By force.

"Quit running, you one-eyed son of a bitch!" Hidan yowled, which was about as polite as he got.

Obito responded with all the maturity that deserved, spinning around in midair. He pressed his cheeks together with both hands and blew a raspberry.

Hidan's scythe shot directly through Obito's chest and slammed into a tree behind him, to no effect.

Hidan shrieked in rage while Obito nonchalantly stepped off the side of the branch and laughed all the way down to the ground.
Obito vanished into solid earth-passing directly through Kaito on the way-and Hidans scythe stopped dead in midair before it could even approach my youngest student. A faint grayish cloud of sand could slow even Hidans swings, apparently.

"I will shove you ass-first onto a fucking cactus," Hidan snarled, even as Roku was already letting go of the weapon and letting me move in. Not that he needed to be in stabbing range to piss Hidan off, but he was a little easier to hurt than the primary combatants here.

I stomped on the back end of the scythe to imbed all three blades into the dirt, keeping it in place against even Hidans unnatural strength by using mine to match his. I wasn't digging into Isobus chakra just yet, because I didn't feel like being the one to utterly break our group's cover. Whenever I wasn't in immediate view, with my hair flying back from the scar on my face, I could be any random jōnin in Konohas ranks. And while there were plenty of shinobi with scars, only one had a face-splitter like mine with Isobus chakra waiting in the wings.

I didn't want anyone to be able to mark our presence on a map. Our progress, rather. Shinjitsu didn't need to know we were even out of Konoha.

"Hands off, you fucking—" Hidan didn't get to finish his sentence, because at that point I removed my foot and Rokus Magnet Release manipulation sent Hidans scythe springing back up into his grip. Or rather, into his face hard enough to crack a normal man's skull.

"Here we go," said Obito as he shot past me, Wood Release spear already at the ready before he swung it straight into Hidans left elbow.

Without three extra years of roaming the countryside, as much a serial killer as any missing-nin, Hidan wasn't as strong as he'd been in that old world. Without Kakuzu at his side, correcting his blatant disregard for his own safety by flinging string-animated puppets with hearts for cores into the fray, Hidan wasn't as able to compensate for varied attacks. Without the advantage of surprise, because his powers were alien as all hell, he couldn't rely on his favorite technique—to basically weaponize his sadomasochism.

Obito was as aware of these facts as I was. And together, with only the briefest support from my students—distracting Hidan, flustering him, adjusting the weight and swing of his weapon on the fly—Obito and I took our opponent apart.

"Mark," I called, and Obito whirled away into empty air just before I passed through his former position, carving Hidans legs open and severing vital tendons in the backs of both his knees.

It was the same principle as disarming a zombie, really. If one's opponent refused to respond to pain, well, there was still the matter of the structural integrity of the human body. Between combat experience and my half-remembered medical training, Hidans immortality was more an interesting factoid than a cause for concern. Ultimately, a skeleton couldn't move without tendons or muscle, and even Hidan needed to bow to the inevitability of physics.

Obitos hand snaked up from the ground, shoving a wooden stake through Hidans foot and nailing him to the dirt even as my best friend once again pulled a disappearing act. Sometimes, Obito did a better mole person impression than anyone from Iwagakure ever had. And though Hidan wasn't a vampire, a stake in the heart wouldn't go amiss.

"Iced!" Kaitos voice called, just as Hidan swore horribly again as he put his other foot down, slipping backwards on a patch of ice that certainly hadn't been there before.

Aiko was already scooping her teammate off the ground and ferrying him away before Hidan could even attempt to get up. Once the ice devoured Hidan's scythe in a storm of angry-looking icicles that had clearly been mixed with sawdust for flavor, Hidan was bereft of his favorite weapon even if he hadn't had several ligaments rearranged.

"FUCKING C—" was exactly as far as Hidan got before cutting himself off and trying to bite my fingers after a desperate lunge.

Perhaps it was Isobu's influence or Sensei's, but I had enough reaction speed to both dodge and coat my fingers in an inch-thick V1 chakra cloak, which would have deflected any damage even if I hadn't avoided the attack. My sword was also back in its sheath in preparation for the next round of attacks.

"What the fuck did I ever do to you?" Hidan howled, twisting his torso upright despite any damage we'd done.

Trying to kill the shit out of us with a dango stick in your mouth was a good place to start.

I was going to refer to an occasion when you have befriended someone attempting to kill you, but now that I think of it? I do not believe you ever have.

Guess we can't all be Naruto.

And with that, I drew my katana from its sheath in the Curve of the Moon technique and severed Hidan's left arm at the elbow. Ordinarily, the mass of bone and tendon that made up a hinge joint would have slowed a normal katana. But a sword like mine, wielded by someone who knew how to use Wind Release on top of samurai techniques? I barely felt any resistance on the upswing.

"One down," I said quietly, while blood splashed across my flak jacket.

Hidan's arm pinwheeled across the ground, trailing blood that probably didn't affect its owner much. Before Hidan could do more than swear, again, Roku seized the loose limb with a coil of iron sand and dragged it well out of range. He may have also hurled it down a nearby embankment, but I was a little too busy to check.

And on the downsing, chakra charged enough that the blue glow was visible to the naked eye as well, which made the blood spurting out of the stump that used to be Hidan's right arm appear almost black.

Hidan overbalanced without the weight of his arms to steady himself, still cussing a blue streak as though any of us were listening. And once Obito followed up my attack with a touch of Kamui's paper slicer qualities, Hidan was down to one leg he couldn't quite get enough coordination to hop on. He was still standing, somehow, but that was it. Roku was already gathering up his severed limbs as though collecting firewood, and seeing that was enough to make our favorite Jashin cultist almost foam at the mouth with rage.

None of us were really impressed by that point, but Kaito was the one to put it into words. "Dude, you might wanna quit while you're ahead. Before all you are is 'a head.'"

"Fuck off, you little—"

Aiko cracked her knuckles pointedly. A man who ended a fight with only one remaining kneecap was not one who ought to have been making threats.

"Hey, Roku, gimme those," Obito said and, one by one, sucked each one of Hidan's severed limbs into his Kamui dimension with all the gravity of a juggling act. He even gave a little bow at the end,
"Give those back," Hidan said, but too late. "You think this'll stop me?! I'll never die as long as Jashin—"

"So fuckin' what?" Kaito wanted to know, wrinkling his nose in disgust. He jabbed a finger at the oozing wounds that made up three of Hidan's once-limbs. "Next thing you're probably gonna say is that this is just a scratch, aren't you?"

That isn't how that reference is supposed to go, I thought idly, as my student continued to argue with the now-harmless cultist. As long as no one got near his teeth, anyway.

Perhaps not. But I doubt you could reenact the scene at all with any other enemy.

That's...true. Thankfully. We were lucky we were the first ones to run into Hidan, not any of the other Konoha teams who didn't routinely travel with powerhouses. For them, an initial encounter with Hidan's powers might've proved fatal. He didn't tend to give people much time to gape at his open wounds before attacking. Lucky us.

"As fun as this's been," Obito said, his voice as dry as he could make it, "this guy's not our priority here. So, Kei, you take the kids and keep going. I'll take this one back to Konoha."

I had flicked almost all the blood from my katana in a single motion, but it wasn't clear just yet. I was in the process of getting out my actual cleaning kit when Obito made his little announcement. "Are you going to find us afterward?"

"Yeah," he said, hauling Hidan up by his shirt collar. "I mean, without me, you're not gonna able to go so far that I can't follow." He grinned. "Isn't that why I came along to begin with?"

"Just get him out of here," Kaito grumbled, while Aiko and Hidan continued to make ghoulish faces at each other. Even without being able to access his power, Hidan was winning on sheer spite.

Obito faked another bow, then the pair of them swirled away in midair.

"Kei-sensei?" asked Roku, once they were gone.

"Hm?"

"Who was that guy, anyway?"

In one lifetime, a serial killer and an S-class missing-nin who might've been able to get the drop on Asuma. Here? I shrugged and said, "Some jerk."

An auspicious start to this murderous field trip.

I'll take it over some of our other options.

Chapter End Notes

Hi, everyone! Sorry for the long delay, but I've been preoccupied by story ideas (which have sidetracked me) and now I'm an official teacher, which means my students get the majority of my energy on most weeks. Doesn't leave a whole lot of time or motivation to write. I hope you understand.
Tempering Arc: Thunder

Chapter Summary

Kei: Have a heart-to-heart with your best friend. (Or: Find all the event flags in this sidequest and hate every second of it.)

Chapter Notes

Oh goodness, I'm really sorry it took so long to get even this short chapter out. It's been almost than three months since I've posted anything, and more like six for CYB. Writing really got away from me when life stuff was going on. Sorry, everyone who's still reading.

Anyway, this chapter's song is that one by Imagine Dragons.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“I see why you had us pack socks,” Kaito said, as the first snowflake of our journey drifted down onto his outstretched hand.

“Konoha spoils you so,” I told him. Not that he hadn’t trained in the mountains—all Konoha shinobi had to take advantage of what opportunities we had in a temperate country—but it didn’t really change the fact that socks and sandals were a garbage combination.

We had boots.

Aiko’s had steel toes, because she wanted them. Incidentally, I was a doormat.

“Excuse you,” Kaito said, “we grew up on a mountain. It just seems outside of Konoha’s usual mission parameters.” He held up his hands as though imagining a billboard. “Going to the Land of Iron? Pack some fucking socks! Seems pointlessly specific. ”

Roku rested his elbow on the crown of Kaito’s head, making my most snippy student sputter with feigned outrage. But it did at least distract him from distracting me from mission planning.

Environmental chakra shenanigans or not, I’d given my students a shopping list once we hit a town that looked like it had snow in winter. Kaito was just the only one to kick up a fuss about it, despite having Ice Release, because it was in his nature to complain. Roku was chill with things, like he always was, while Aiko had made a point of running around for a couple of hours kicking everything.

There were a few rocks that were rather farther over the horizon than they ought to have been.

“I take it no one’s really impressed with their first look at the Land of Iron.” Obito’s voice was dry, but his grin was almost infectious. For a man who’d been gifted with a hell of a stomach bug by his last trip here, he seemed excited. Even his chakra was bouncing a little.
“It’s cold, it’s snowing, and it looks like every mountain range between here and Konoha. Except for the three-headed one,” Kaito said, running his fingers through his hair to unruffle it. Seeing Three Wolves, apparently, hadn’t made much of an impression on him from a distance of two hundred kilometers. “There’s not much to see.”

“Oh, oh, but the samurai would be cool!” Aiko wasn’t a ballerina, but she’d been bouncing around literally on the toes of her boots for a little while now. “I’ve never fought someone wearing tons of metal armor in a blizzard before.”

“Our goal isn’t to fight them,” Roku reminded his younger siblings/teammates. Some days, it was more one than the other. He glanced up at me from beneath his near-blinding bangs. “Are any of them sensors?”

“Didn’t feel like it, before,” Obito said, bringing his right hand to his chin as he thought. “I mean, obviously there can be sensors in any population, and it’d be weird if they didn’t have any at all, but if we stay out of range…”

“Which is fifty kilometers,” I said to him. “For me, anyway. If they’re using a sensing technique, I should be able to pick them out.”

Or hear them coming in your direction, what with all the clanking.

Says the giant turtle.

“Then we’re fine.” Obito gave each of my students a quelling look, which was much less effective than mine on anyone who’d interacted with him for more than ten minutes. “Unless one of you wants to just start sending up all kinds of chakra flares right now and give away our position.”

“Nah,” said Kaito.

Aiko saluted, but her impish smile undermined it. “We’re good.”

Roku just gave Obito a blank stare right back, until he moved on.

“Right! So, we’re gonna just kinda hike our way around…that.” Obito waved a hand in the direction of the mountain. “I didn’t ask for permission from Mifune last time, and I don’t plan to start now.”

“What was your mission even about?” Kaito asked, arms crossed.

“Classified!” Obito said, without missing a beat.

“Don’t ask any more questions,” I continued for him, “and he won’t have to tell lies.”

Kaito groaned, but it was an answer that would have to suffice in the face of his theatricality. Besides, Aiko and Roku didn’t have a problem with it. Despite their silliness, they were shinobi at their core. They’d dealt with far worse than thwarted curiosity.

We left off the conversation there, hiking through the snowfield wilderness of the Land of Iron.

Much like Russia, it wasn’t like the place was constantly blanketed in ice, snow, and the regrets of would-be conquerors. When Obito had visited a few years ago and made a bunch of suboptimal survival decisions, much of the area had been mud, colorful deciduous trees dotted among conifers, and abandoned villages. While some of the conditions hadn’t changed, these were far more favorable to the locals than to us. We, after all, had to wear gloves.
I took point, because as the group’s sensor I could generally steer us around population centers. We were mostly wearing shades of gray and white, which kept us from being easily spotted from a distance, and had even gone so far as to requisition winter camouflage versions of the standard Konoha cloaks. Samurai may not have had immense sensing ranges—that we knew of—but they had eyes. Best not to draw unneeded attention in a place where genjutsu and ninjutsu disguises didn’t work all that well. It was a bit over-cautious of me, but I would assume my mother’s sensing ability was well within the possibilities we would encounter. Kaito and Roku were just behind me, Aiko filling out the diamond pattern, and Obito bringing up the rear because his reaction time was by far the best.

The trees and snowy rocks passed quickly as we broke into our cross-country pace. Twenty, thirty, and then forty kilometers passed in an hour, because ninja in motion were rather like over-enthusiastic kangaroos. We tended toward long leaps and sustainable superhuman speed—we could save the outright uncanny Dragon Ball Z vanishing for a fight.

The Land of Iron was kind of pretty, in a Christmas card kind of way. But then, a lot of things looked great on paper only to involve negative-fourteen degrees Celsius of suffering.

It took us a day and a half—due to terrain, mainly—to get to a place Obito recognized. I had to assume it was the layer of snow that made us backtrack twice, bounding across the would-be tundra like indecisive hares. With the ability to leap tall buildings instead of a bunny hop.

Isobu looked out across the fifth or sixth abandoned village we visited, through my eyes. In my mind’s eye, I saw him rest a thick finger against his beard of spikes.

Do not let him drink from the well.

Skepticism reared its ugly head. It’s frozen.

He is an Uchiha. It is amusing that you think it matters.

I considered that for a few seconds. “Hey, Obito?”

“Don’t say a word.” Obito replied, while studiously avoiding the village’s well. He’d been melting snow for water all through the trip, rather than stopping anywhere in particular for groundwater refills. I hadn’t wanted to touch his canteen at all without having Kaito go over it first with his bloodline powers, because it was boiling what seemed like all the time.

“I was gonna ask if you had any snacks.”

“No, you weren’t.”

“No, I wasn’t,” I admitted.

“I learned my lesson the first time, dammit,” Obito said in a somewhat crabby tone.

I eyed him, then dropped back in our group’s marching order and patted his left shoulder. “Good. So, do you need to get out of here before we reach the Shinjitsu site?”

Obito shrugged. “I think we’re gonna need to make a few stops. Think your kids can handle themselves out here in the sticks for a while? You and me need to make your cousin think we’re playing this exactly the way we said we would.”

“Do we, though?” I wondered aloud. Obito’s eye flashed Sharingan red for an instant, but then went back to plain black as he rethought using Kamui. “Hear me out. We could try something else, since we already don’t think Yūki—”
“Stop calling him that,” Kaito muttered.

“—is an ally,” I said, ignoring the confusion. “Do you think we ought to just take Shinjitsu on, pull their crater in after them, and run like hell?”

“Could,” Obito said, noncommittal.

I wasn’t sure if he could really get away with saying that. Kakashi was the only one on our team who’d actually fought a member of Shinjitsu, and he was busy showing mini-ninjas how to kill people. And he’d nearly bled out in my bedroom, and been put on a recovery waitlist for months, and I had absolutely zero intention of repeating any aspect of that situation.

Other than attacking Kakuzu. Killing him would probably make my day.

And I had no real intention of investing emotionally in a relative I’d never met, even to keep up a pretense. Dad’s side of the family had set half the tone for me. The Gekkō family, in fact, had been working from the advantageous spot of “not actually allied with/capable of killing me.” This new face didn’t even have that much going for him.

So, I said, “Let’s just bring the house down. I’ve got some feelings to work out.”

The kids, perhaps realizing that Adult Conversations were not for genin, retreated a semi-safe distance with a half-hearted pretense of scouting the area. There wasn’t anything capable of killing us within my range in any direction, barring chakra suppression techniques that most people didn’t have, but the excuse got them out of our radius.

“Kei,” Obito began, once the kids were pretending to be out of earshot. “About the Shinjitsu thing…”

“What about ‘em?” I asked, affecting nonchalance though I had a good idea of the direction this conversation would take.

“This isn’t gonna be like when Kakashi did this on his own,” Obito told me, arms crossed. Yeah, I wouldn’t have bought my act either. “No running off, unless it’s into a Kamui portal, and there aren’t any points for heroic duels or whatever.”

“I don’t think I’ve had a ‘heroic duel’ in my life,” I told him.

My voice came out a little firmer than I would have liked. But really, I didn’t tend to call dibs on opponents. If I ever had, there were sound tactical reasons to throw the team’s only jinchūriki at the biggest threat on the field. For the sake of being practical, in the “I won’t die in the face of S-class ninjutsu and can kill the guy using them” way. Otherwise, Team Minato didn’t have qualms about piling on the enemy and tearing him into chunks like a bunch of humanoid piranhas. We’d been trained for it since childhood.

Obito frowned, then reached out and poked me square in the center of my Konoha headband. “I call bullshit.”

“Hey, you haven’t been on most of my missions. I don’t do duels.”

Then what the hell was—” Obito bit off the rest of the thought. I wasn’t sure if he’d run out of steam on that argument because I wasn’t guilty of what he was accusing me, or if he’d just decided not to bring up something potentially painful. “Look, if you wanna kill Kakuzu for Kakashi, I’m helping. And I’m pretty fucking sure you want to mount his head on a stick and march it through town.” His frown deepened. “Am I wrong?”
Oh. I hadn’t thought he’d noticed that. “Obito—”

“But we make it quick, clean, and we tell Kakashi once we get home and that’ll be the end of it.”

Obito wasn’t interested in hearing whatever excuses I might’ve made. “I mean, he’s got five hearts or whatever, and probably tons of minions, but me and the kids aren’t just your backup dancers. We’re helping.”

I looked away first. The twinge of shame burning in my gut was just…just a passing thought. And a small, googly-eyed crustacean with supersonic punches could have seen the sense in what I said next: “Okay.”

When I met his gaze, Obito’s visible eyebrow was raised. “Huh. Didn’t think it’d be that easy. I mean, from one point of view, it’s sort of like kill-stealing, and Kakashi’s the one whose near-death experience kinda became the grudge you picked up, but…”

“It’s not kill-stealing if I’m sharing,” I pointed out, then sighed. “But while I don’t mind if we do it mostly your way, we are not going to do it the way Kakashi did.”

“I never did get that entire story,” Obito admitted. “Spill.”

“None of that center-mass Raikiri-stabbing bullshit. Kakuzu may have five hearts,” I said, to Obito’s instantly recognizable disgust, “but he’s only got one brain. I am not playing Pin the Tail on the Donkey with amateur heart surgery.”

“I’m not much for that plan, either,” Obito said with a huff of a laugh. The tension in his shoulders settled back down. “Okay, we’re doing this. Glad we’re on the same page.”

I fell silent, and Obito let me. While he went to go gather the troops again, I poked at the shape of my thoughts as though they were my worry beads, click-click-clicking between my fingers.

Career shinobi fought often, fought well or badly, and collected scars like stories. Sometimes in the same breath. Obito was a prime example. Isobu’s chakra reduced my version to a highlight reel, leaving such standouts as the near-fatal Kusanagi stab, the scar across my face, and my messed-up left shoulder. I could look in the mirror and—with the exception of some of my kenjutsu training scars from before I stopped being clumsy—name every incident that gave me a little something to remember it by.

Kakashi, though… Kakashi had kenjutsu training scars, too. Patterns like fern leaves along his hands and lower arms from chakra lightning burns. Obito’s left eye, in Kakashi’s eye socket, qualified for its own saga. There were deeper cuts along his forearms that had come from missions he didn’t tell me about, where his ANBU gear failed, but those were job hazards I tried not to think too hard about. What I couldn’t ignore, even years after the fact, were the injuries Kakuzu had given him. The big one was, of course, the giant gash that had nearly led him to bleed out on top of me. The memory of that wound had burned into my mind far harder than it had his.

He also had an uneven ring of tiny divots, almost like acne scars, around his heart. Too faint to notice except by touch, almost nothing in the face of everything else that fight had put him through. But I’d found them.

And I’d pressed that thought as far down into the mire of my soul as I could, letting Isobu keep it for a rainy day.

Or snow, given the local weather patterns.

“Earth to Kei,” Obito called to me, having dragged my students back. “That frozen bush didn’t do anything to piss you off, did it?”

I leaned a little to the right, scooped enough snow off a long-neglected windowsill to form a misshapen snowball, and threw it at him.

He batted it aside, though my students were probably going to remember this and use the incident against me in future arguments about maturity, or a lack thereof.

Being you, I have no doubt whatsoever that there are far better examples of behavior unbecoming of a jōnin.

_Hush._

“Kei-sensei,” Aiko said, “are you okay?”

“I’ll be fine,” I said. *Once I kill Kakuzu._

It was probably a lie. Revenge was a zero-sum game. I knew that. Tearing Kakuzu’s felt-stuffed head off and mounting it on a wall in an ANBU basement wouldn’t help me sleep better at night. I’d be naive to think it would. But since this mission put him in my path anyway, I’d get what satisfaction I could, no matter how cold it would be.

There was a not-abandoned town unacceptably close to Shinjitsu’s lair, as Obito remembered it. Several of them, in fact, and together they formed a cordon of watching eyes that I was quite unhappy to meet. But even when dealing with people who, perhaps, could have detected and stabbed themselves some Zetsu clones, there was a way forward.

Namely, disguises.

It was pretty straightforward, all things considered. Some samurai had eyepatches, scars, and all sorts of otherwise-ninja-exclusive traits that civilians did not. The hair genetics that let Aiko be naturally blonde despite being fantasy-Japanese—and Kaito have green hair despite being human—worked against us outside of ninja territory. So, she got a hat, he got a hat, and Roku looked askance at Obito and me for offering him one. The hats ended up being the part of the entire ensemble, which started from hakama and worked its way up. Luckily, boots weren’t verboten.

Kaito, despite whatever experience he’d accumulated about formal wear, clomped around stiffly in what was a child-sized set of perfectly normal peasant hakama as though every square centimeter was over-starched somehow. “Why the _fuck_ do samurai wear this stuff?”

“They’re old school,” Roku said. Rearranging his hair into more of a topknot was par for the course, but he’d taken one look at his reflection and Obito’s Transformation impression of the locals before accepting the aforementioned farmer’s hat. “It could be worse. Hayate-senpai had all those stories about having to fake being _nobles._” “That’s funny. I remember him complaining about merchant kids before remembering who he was talking to,” Kaito replied.

Obito chimed in, with perfect timing, “And then you guilted him over it for two hours and four pounds of candy.”

Aiko had her gloved hands on her hips. She had her hair hidden, but there was really only so much one could do without dye around these parts. Even Gai’s set of green, orange, and red scarves didn’t soften their appearances that much. “What next, Sensei?”
Eyeing the village and making a mental note of our distance from it, I pulled a scroll out of my pack and started to unroll it. “If we want to pretend to be natives, we need to carry samurai weapons. Everyone’s kunai and senbon are already hidden, but…” I let the thought hang. A drop of blood and a tiny surge of chakra later, and my spare weapon scroll spat out three noticeably cheap katana.

It’d probably be better to say what they were—iron work in the shape of a sword. I’d pulled them out of the iron scrapyard behind the blacksmith shops, because while my students had zero interest in kenjutsu beyond the basics of my training, Roku could make devastating use of iron better than any other metal. He had to, what with it being his kekkei genkai and all.

“Didn’t spend much on this, did you?” Kaito asked, though the usual note of petulance was absent from his voice. His green-eyed gaze was level as he accepted the holdout weapon.

Obito snapped his fingers and a thin spike of wood started to grow out of his right sleeve. “I could spring for a bokutō.”

“That’s…actually worse,” Kaito said, and retreated with his dubious prize.

Roku and Aiko, as always, were a little more gracious about it. Roku allowed his eyelids to darken in the Magnet Release pattern, while the iron sword writhed under his grip like a serpent before settling back down to normal. While Roku hid it well, he had a quiet dramatic streak.

“I’m still going to drop this and punch people,” Aiko said, after considering her sad excuse for a weapon.

Roku patted her shoulder. “Just be sure to throw it my way.”

“Wouldn’t that waste chakra? Since like, well, the enemy tends to be farthest from you and then you’d have to send the metal all the way back.”

“Point,” Roku said, and the pair took up their usual positions on our formation.

“Let’s get moving,” I suggested to the rest of the team, and we went to face our disguises’ trial by fire.

There was a hubbub in the snow-covered village. People were gathered between the most closely-packed buildings in the center of the village as the sound rose. Even if our goal was to avoid trouble, the clamor drew the eye back to it. Much like the mess with Kitano Town a few years back, something had gotten the civilians up in arms, and it was hard to tell if it pertained to our goals at first. Generally speaking, it was best to avoid scenes of public strife while trying to not attract attention, but there were ways of screwing that up. Some of them even involved subtlety instead of explosives.

Obito skulked forward, chakra penned up tightly inside his skin. The kids had all learned chakra suppression in a fairly hit-or-miss way—by being poked at by my chakra sense until they were about as subtle as a house cat—but Obito was professionally tested, too. He’d done the ANBU thing. He’d been the spy in the Land of Iron before.

And he waved us over.

The village wasn’t anything to write home about. It was any old backwater, as boring as the days were short around here. With practiced grace and uncanny stealth, we five ninja made our way through the crowd toward the center of attention.

The crowd screamed, and we flinched a quarter-second behind the general consensus. Fear surged through every person there, leaving babies in slings crying and elderly people around the crowd cowering along with the rest. Chakra flared bright blue in my mind’s eye, steel ringing almost out of earshot. Ducking my head at the right angle let me see past the bowed heads, the upturned market stalls, and the backs of panicking horses before the animals began to stampede.

A lone man stood in the middle of the rapidly-clearing town center. Dressed in a blue hakama with an even darker top, he stood out among the townspeople not just because of his position. To me, the man damn near glowed with chakra, almost all of it focused along the length of his tachi’s blade. An empty scabbard hung on his back, which faced us, and every scrap of his concentration was focused toward his three opponents.

The first was a man with long, lank green hair. He held two forked blades in his hands, each half the length of the tachi the first man wielded. The other two were…basically backup dancers, standing still while the civilians ran. I saw black cloaks cut in a style that looked like they were derived both from ANBU captain gear and Akatsuki coats. Their faces were thoroughly hidden, their chakra muted, and I couldn’t get the read on them I would have liked.

“Is that—?” I heard Kaito begin to say at conversational volume, before Roku yanked on his collar and pulled him under an awning. Even if his voice wasn’t loud enough to attract too much attention over the remainder of the crowd, Roku wouldn’t allow him to take chances.

“Kiri missing nin,” I confirmed softly to Obito, who was eying the fighters’ reflections in a beauty mirror a fair distance away. The Sharingan wasn’t the Byakugan, but his eyesight was pretty good for detail work.

“Yeah. Raiga Kurosuki,” Obito said, because of course he’d memorized the Bingo Book. “Other two might be Kurosuki Family gangsters. Not sure.”

“Shinjitsu?” I murmured.

“Probably,” Obito replied under his breath. His Sharingan deactivated. “Play it safe. I’ll be right behind you if you need it.”

I took that as permission and, with a quick hand signal aimed at my kids to keep them away from the impending fight, wove through the crowd like a salmon fighting the current. Raiga didn’t need a chance to see Kaito’s signature jutsu. At all. And so, I’d keep my students out of trouble for as long as I could.

Creeping closer took some doing. Without ninjutsu or genjutsu to grease the wheels, so to speak, the process depended entirely on my vanilla mortal sneaking skills. Mine were nothing to scoff at, but it was pretty clear that there were two major factors working in my favor: sheer overconfidence on the missing-nin’s part and a great big dose of acting.

I’d never been to the Land of Iron before, but I had samurai techniques and samurai customs drilled into my head since childhood. My mother’s work, of course. Chakra suppression was second nature by now, much like it was for Obito. At first and second glance, I was just another two-bit samurai poking around in this podunk town, and ninja—especially when on a power trip—looked on samurai with disdain. Neither I nor the man in the center of town cut imposing figures.

Probably for the best.

Kaito, Aiko, and Roku’s faint chakra signatures retreated, only to loop around the town to work on what was probably a flanking maneuver. Obito vanished outright.
I leaned back against the nearest market stall’s half-shattered wall, katana across my knees, and listened.

“—order of General Mifune,” was what I caught from the lone swordsman. He had his blade sheathed again, one hand on the saya and the other on his tachi’s handle when I looked. “You’re under arrest, Raiga Kurosuki. Come quietly and I won’t hurt you. Don’t, and I can’t promise anything.”

Iaijutsu. The old samurai special. Well, not a bad choice against a shinobi. But I was pretty sure Raiga’s Bingo Book profile included a Lightning jutsu proficiency. Maybe that was why this supposed country cop wasn’t wearing the usual samurai armor?

Raiga threw back his head and laughed. “And who do you think you are? Who does the general think can capture Twin Fang Raiga? What will I engrave on your tomb, weakling?”

The spiky-haired samurai flexed his fingers where they rested, and replied, “Captain Yūki Uesugi. And you’re coming with me.”

If stealth wasn’t a concern, I would have smacked my forehead. Hitting myself with the hilt of my own sword would have been a distant secondary concern. Even if I gave myself a black eye, it wouldn’t bother me for long.

Once again, your uncanny luck strikes true, Isobu remarked smugly.

Sometimes, I really hate it when you’re right.

But that was the extent of my whining. Even without Isobu’s color commentary, the mature thing was just to deal with the situation as it was. With that in mind, I shifted my weight off my heels to the balls of my sandaled feet instead, eyes sliding shut as I focused on the combatants’ chakra. If it also let me keep track of my team and any other concerns with perfect accuracy, that was just a bonus. Except for Obito.

Captain Uesugi’s chakra sharpened nearly to a singular point, likely using his sword as a focus. If I could concentrate on the way his affinity leaned more toward Wind than my mother’s Lightning, the familiarity hurt less. Their techniques were the same. My kenjutsu felt like a wild, unintended derivative than something directly descended from samurai techniques. Captain Uesugi felt cold, calm, and professional.

And Raiga was some shinobi asshole with two sai blades.

I presume you mean to intervene.

If I have to. It’d be convenient to get an in with the local authorities, but perhaps not convenient enough to justify blowing our operation wide open.

Captain Uesugi’s chakra signature started circling the demolished square. “This is your last warning. Are you choosing to resist arrest?”

Why did people bother with bantering? Captain Uesugi probably got a pass for doing his job correctly, but—

Raiga scoffed. I heard his blades scrape against each other, Lightning chakra racing up the metal. “I don’t like the idea of me in chains. But you would make a great corpse!”

Some people, I thought, and threw myself out of the way of the first murder attempt of the day.
Lightning split the street and scorched wood where I’d just been, throwing dirt, ash, and bits of rock everywhere. I ducked behind a covered well, straw hat held low so it wouldn’t go flying out of town, and kept close watch on the combatants as their chakra clashed again.

Lightning lanced down from the heavens, cutting through cloud and snowfall with a deafening crash. The ground buzzed where it struck, but not nearly as far as natural lightning might’ve done. No, instead I got to keep my shoes and eyebrows when the charge went dead a little before it got close enough to leap to my katana.

Going by the lack of triumphant hooting or screaming, I had to assume Captain Uesugi had gotten out of the way in time. The second threatening peal of thunder told me Raiga was also unharmed, unfortunately. Such a pity. Pretending to be some random stooge meant I had to scramble out of the way when the tussling pair threatened to head back my way, though, and I acted on that impulse rather than sticking around to get turned into charcoal.

I did stick my head out a bit when the fight was far enough from me, though. See, I’d never had a chance to study the paired Kiba swords. Not to be confused with the Inuzuka kid, they were Kirigakure specials and supposedly powerful enough to compare to the Second Hokage’s low-budget lightsaber. The way Raiga’s chakra spiraled heavenward told me they could really call down lightning like the rumors insisted, but I wasn’t seeing an awful lot of control or thought going into those attacks. Raiga would swing his swords, miss, and then find that while Captain Uesugi’s sword did attract lightning to some degree, it wasn’t enough to overcome lightning’s attraction to the ground.

And then he’d get punted across town by a samurai who hadn’t skipped leg day.

“So this is why you’re not bothering with armor! Very clever!” Raiga roared. His chakra flickered, and the sky above rumbled in answer and warning. “But you can’t escape judgment forever! Die!”

Raiga must’ve had a field day here. Maybe that’s why there’s only one arresting officer? Steel and lightning didn’t mix all that well.

Captain Uesugi’s chakra closed the distance in a blink, and thunder crashed. When I peeked around cover again, he’d been blasted back and was sprawled out on the ground with his sword embedded in the dirt just in front of him. Despite erratic twitching as his muscles tried to overcome a nasty zap, Captain Uesugi gamely forced his hand back around the hilt of his tachi.

Sparks leapt from the Kiba blades as Raiga approached.

Captain Uesugi staggered to his feet, sheathed his tachi, and settled into a slightly unsteady iaijutsu stance.

My fingers twitched on the hilt of my katana, though neither fighter had taken notice of me. That could change in an instant. While I couldn’t easily signal Obito and my kids without using chakra spikes like we’d trained for, we did have an entire vocabulary of battlefield explosions to use as the world’s least subtle code.

Maybe things would come to that.

Both of Raiga’s bookend cronies’ chakra signatures, as faint as they were, vanished into thin air. In another reality I might’ve worried about that, if not for the twist of Roku’s chakra explained the sudden lack. Obito’s, a second later, took care of cleanup.

Now, to finish this.
I agreed, coiling my chakra for the perfect moment. Any second n—

Then Captain Uesugi’s and Raiga’s chakra flared simultaneously.

“Nine-Headed Dragon Strike!”

“Lightning Dragon Tornado!”

And cue the overkill jutsu. Just my luck.

Chapter Notes

Sorry it took so damn long to update this.

Y’all ever heard of real life getting in the way? Well, this time it did the opposite: It's NaNoWriMo, so it's time to blow the dust off the disk and get back into things. Here we go!

This chapter’s song is one of the Rurouni Kenshin endings.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

There was no logical reason for two high-powered techniques involving neither flames nor combustible substances to end up causing an explosion.

They did anyway.

I was flat on the ground by the time the chakra signatures collided, conical hat clamped down over my head to keep it from flying away in the blast. With my nose nearly in the dirt, I kept an eye on the continuing action more through my chakra sense than any physical sense. I wasn’t playing dead deliberately; rather, keeping out of anyone’s attention seemed like the best way to continue the mission.

Captain Uesugi was busting out big kenjutsu techniques in sequence. I could have named them after the fact, but in the moment the blur of up-down-cross-spiral was all that needed to be recorded. Lightning flared out from Raiga every time he took a hit or attempted not to, bursting off him in undirected sparks that sought the nearest metal. Since the samurai was the closest target who didn’t wield the Kiba blades, he was taking the brunt of it.

I am bored.

This isn’t our fight.

Which is clearly why you are lingering within stabbing distance of everyone involved, Isobu said tartly. He sent me the impression of one massive eye, narrowing suspiciously. And why your team has killed both of our missing-nin’s compatriots.

One of them must have made the mistake of putting up a fight while Obito wasn’t around, I guessed. For all that the kids could subdue people a majority of the time, only Obito could do it effortlessly.
That said, killing both of the enemy shinobi was a bit negligent.

Meanwhile, Captain Uesugi dug himself out of a pile of broken pine branches and wood chips, swearing loudly enough that I could hear it. If I had to assign a relative strength level to them, Raiga was sitting pretty at approximately jōnin-level strength and genin-level situational awareness. By contrast, the little sharp spike of Captain Uesugi’s chakra told me that he’d probably realized he had an audience.

Across the way, Raiga was laughing as though seeing someone get repeatedly struck by lightning was the funniest thing he’d seen all week. His laughter was drowning out the sparse background noise of my students shifting position and dragging bodies with them.

Like I said. Observant, he was not.

Captain Uesugi booked it for the wilderness immediately.

Which also happened to be nearly directly in the direction of Obito, before his chakra vanished and reappeared elsewhere. Typical Obito, really.

Raiga immediately turned to pursue, lightning stabbing down from the clouds and landing wherever it pleased.

As for me?

I shook debris from my clothes and waved my hat to get the worst of the dust off of it, then shifted across the battlefield with half of my attention on the would-be enemy. Despite not having spotted me, Raiga’s Bingo Book profile painted him as a murderous thug with a tendency for burying people alive. If he did see me, he’d attempt murder just because I happened to be in the area.

It wouldn’t go well for him, but that was more attention than I wanted.

“Hey,” said Obito, warping into existence next to me as soon as Raiga was out of easy hearing. He landed with a little puff of dust and was on his elbows in the dirt, hat held low over his face.

“Hey yourself,” I replied, angling my hat upward so I could see him better.

“Are we gonna do this?” The twisted side of Obito’s mouth pinched further as he frowned. “Much as I like stealth, offing Raiga would get us an in with that guy, won’t it?”

“Not sure how much attention we want from the legal authorities,” I said, as though we hadn’t been discussing how to subvert the Land of Iron’s security measures less than a week ago.

Obito paused, Sharingan spinning slowly. “His clan name’s ‘Uesugi,’ isn’t it?”

Curse his lip-reading. Curse it!

“So what?” I kept my voice from sounding either defensive or snappish, but the result still came out a bit flat. “Anyone can use a name.” But under Obito’s gaze, I admitted in a low tone, “Even if he is related to Mom, he doesn’t mean anything to me. If I had to kill him for the sake of the mission, I wouldn’t lose a wink of sleep. You know that.” Pause. “And you don’t like it.”

Obito’s Sharingan faded. “I don’t really think you do either.”

“I wouldn’t feel anything, Obito. That’s not liking or disliking an idea.”

Are you so certain?
I’m not attached to any member of the defunct Uesugi clan other than my brother, I told Isobu. Not with Mom dead. She’d never even tried to get us in contact with any survivors, so that branch of the family might as well have been dead to me. No matter how cold that makes me sound. People don’t get extra chances just because we might share blood.

Obito eyed me for a long moment, during which Captain Uesugi and Raiga resumed trying to kill each other. “Nah. You’re a giant sap who only wants to come off as cold and clinical. You’re not fooling anybody.”

“Obito,” I began, before he disappeared into his pocket dimension to avoid actually hearing my comeback. Not much to say to that. “Dammit.”

Obito’s chakra reappeared on the opposite end of Captain Uesugi and Raiga’s ongoing fight, well inside the treeline. While I couldn’t tell precisely what he was doing, knowing him as well as I did meant I had a pretty good guess.

Step one: Camouflage.

Well, no one seemed to be attacking him, so he’d gotten that first part down.

Step two: Sabotage.

Raiga’s chakra flared high and bright with pain, and if I looked I could just barely see a wooden javelin sticking out of his bicep.

Step three—

And at that point, Captain Uesugi shook out his rattling nerve endings and drove his sword directly through Raiga’s ribcage. The last rumble of thunder stuttered, clouds overhead freezing for just a split second, and then Raiga’s inner light went out.

Didn’t even need a step four. Might as well have been “omelette du fromage,” then, just to keep up with the rhyme scheme. I’d never taken a lesson in French in my life, but apparently my vocabulary didn’t care much. What of it remained, anyway.

Captain Uesugi did the sensible thing and made sure his opponent was dead, by twisting his sword while it was still pinning Raiga to the ground like an artistic thumbtack. Any living opponent, no matter how good an actor, would have probably screamed or something when the blade carved out a cork-sized divot of flesh all the way through. That left me to consider whether recovering the corpse would be worth the bounty.

Not my kill, I supposed.

Captain Uesugi’s chakra got more intense, and putting my chakra sense on passive mode meant I could feel his attempts at scanning the area. It was a little like someone trying to search for a single screw in an unfamiliar tool shed at night, with a shitty hand flashlight. Samurai sensing techniques weren’t anything like radar, and only worked their best within about five meters.

Inside that range, of course, they were the best in the business. But otherwise, I’d been told it was a little like looking around with blinkers on.

Strong words for someone who has never been a samurai.

Captain Uesugi did not call out to us. When one is supposed to be alone in enemy-held territory, that kind of behavior basically never pays off in a way that benefits the one doing the shouting. Instead, he skulked sort of vaguely in the direction of town, because the last he’d seen, there were still enemies left to harass the fleeing villagers.

My kids had taken care of that, so it was probably time to get lost while the getting was good.

Obito warped back into normal reality practically at my elbow, dropping to the ground with a faint poof of dust. He nudged me, then signaled for a silent retreat with his free left hand. In his right, he held the beginnings of another Wood Release weapon that hadn’t decided what it wanted to be just yet.

I nodded, so the two of us Body Flickered back over to the kids.

Roku was sitting on one of the corpses when we got back, with the near-rusted scrap katana driven straight through the cloaked man’s back. The other one, pinned to a market stall backwards with arm-length icicles through his neck and head, had clearly died just as silently. Those would melt soon enough, even in this cold.

Kaito and Aiko just shrugged when I raised an eyebrow at them. Well, I’d get that report later.

Obito repeated the “retreat” gesture, and the five of us bugged out.

Obito

“We’re being stalked,” Kei said a couple of day’s walk later. It wasn’t exactly news, after the fight in the village. The only real surprise was that it’d taken so long to pin down the misguided fan. Something of a problem in samurai lands. “He slipped up.”

“It’s Uesugi again, isn’t it?” Kaito had taken up a habit of just using Kei’s possible-cousin’s clan name, which at least cut down on the confusion before it could build. But considering that Kaito barely ever used his clan’s name to identify himself, Obito thought it was a little petty. Then again, Kaito was both of those things, so maybe it evened out somewhere.

Kei sighed. “I’d love to know how he got our signatures figured out in all that mess, but maybe we didn’t get enough distance before he got his bearings.”

“He must’ve recovered in seconds, then.” Roku was looking back in the direction we’d come from, which was probably the same direction our stalker would need to approach from until he got closer and decided to flank us. “Samurai sensing range isn’t that wide.”

“That we knew of,” Kaito put in. “I mean, we only have a sample size of about three.”

Kei’s mom and Hayate were about it, from what Obito remembered. Close enough. “Maybe he figured someone had to have offed both of Raiga’s cronies.”

“Yeah, necks don’t just break by accident,” Aiko added. She immediately had second thoughts and corrected, “Uh, mostly.”

Obito, who was still on point, kept pushing forward into the snowy brush. Hopefully, the others would remember to follow him. To this end, he asked, “Does anyone want to see if we can get him off our backs?”

“I mean, he didn’t do anything to deserve getting killed,” Aiko said, suddenly a little nervous. Her footsteps crunched in the snow. She was leaving a path.

Obito hadn’t said anything about that, but Kei had definitely made her feelings known. Kei could put on a mission mask better than almost anyone Obito knew, and it rightfully scared people. He had to wonder if her persona’s bitter cold was because the kids were along for the ride this time. On their rare paired missions, or the ones where they grabbed Kakashi for old time’s sake, Kei didn’t slam doors on peaceful options nearly as fast.

This was becoming a problem. Well, a second problem.

Still, Aiko followed after Obito without any real hesitation, with the rest of the group trying to be only marginally more stealthy. There were shinobi who could move through snow without leaving traces, but only in the Land of Snow and only when their chakra armor was behaving.

Heading where this team was going, though, would probably mean Captain Uesugi would die whether the team had a hand in it or not. That didn’t quite seem fair.

Putting the team on higher ground, no matter how subtle, got them enough breathing room to settle properly. Between the gear Obito and Kei kept in storage for the trip, the terrain having a grudge against people’s eyeballs through the power of glare of snow, and the power to suppress their chakra signatures down to almost nothing, they had something like the makings up an ambush. Sort of. They also had a trail of footprints leading directly off the road and into the woods, but that was a separate concern.

Obito wasn’t worried that they couldn’t overpower Captain Uesugi—that wasn’t in question—but instead on what kind of first impression the team could afford to make. The poor samurai was walking into a worse fight than his last if he thought he was gonna get away with even halfway threatening Kei’s students. Especially with Kei already agitated. It was sort of like handling explosive tags.

As for establishing themselves, stealthily picking off the Shinjitsu members in the middle of a fight, without being caught, was probably enough of a start.

“For what it’s worth, I agree with Aiko,” Roku said once they were all settled. The Magnet Release panda spots were already around his eyelids, and Obito heard metal starting to shift in sheaths and holsters.

Kei didn’t seem all that happy with her students’ opinions, though. If she wanted, she could have overruled them in a second—Sensei used to—but all she did was rub at her permanently-shadowed eyes and say, “I take it we’re not voting on this.”

“We already know the outcome, so what’s the point?” Kaito asked. “You want to meet the guy, we’ll go with whatever you want, and Obito-sensei will probably just follow your decision, but better.”

Kei sputtered, a protest already building before Kaito stared her down.

“Hey,” Obito and Kei said at the same time. But only Kei pinched Kaito’s ear and went on, “I can talk people around.”

And Obito wasn’t that much of a doormat, thank you very much.

Kaito did not take the hint. “You can’t even talk us into splitting Ichiraku bills.”

Kei probably needed to work on getting her students to cut the backtalk on missions, even if it was just what she called “banter.” Joking loosened the pre-fight tension wrapped around everyone’s thoughts. That could be helpful in the correct doses, and her kids were great at quips where Kei just wrecked people. Mostly because they kept practicing on her.

Obito, for his part, was already half-buried in their snow with his cloak wrapped entirely around him. Bundled securely even as the others crowded in around him, Obito debated his phrasing for a second. Then he began, “Kei, do you think…?”

Afterward, Obito couldn’t recall how he planned on ending that sentence. The bedraggled look in Kei’s eyes stopped him before he could put his thoughts into words for real, but the ideas just kept coming. That you might be able to talk him around because he’s your cousin? Even though you were talking like killing him wasn’t any more important than the weather? Obito liked happy endings, and Kei looked half-scared she’d ruin this one before it could even decide what it was.

“Maybe,” was all Kei said.

Liar, Obito thought. But Kei didn’t lie directly if she had other options. Instead, she was a master of redirecting people’s attention when she actually wanted to. She liked to drop hints and let people draw the wrong conclusions, so their curiosity would die off before they figured out too much. She just wasn’t bothering now.

“Kei,” Obito said softly, while her students pretended they couldn’t hear him.

“Look, you’re the handler,” Kei said with frustration leaking into her tone. If his Sharingan had been active, a hundred ryō said he’d have seen her reach for Isobu’s chakra, at least by reflex. The red threads were hard to miss, and so was the spark of gold and red in her eyes. “Make the call.”

All three of Kei’s students turned their attention to him. Because they were ten years out of the puppy-dog stage and one of them was nearly his height, it was a bit more intimidating than he’d initially assumed.

Then again, this was the same group of goofy kids he’d practically helped raise in some ways.

Obito thought about it for a few seconds. Then he clapped his hands and said, with his best smile in place, “I’m gonna go say hello.”

He was immediately countermanded.

“Fuck that,” said Kaito, at the same time as Roku said, “Oh, no,” and Aiko went, “Not without us!” Kei, meanwhile, glared at him and pointedly shook her head just out of her kids’ line of sight.

Well, he’d tried. “Then we can all try this together!”

Kei sighed as though Obito had just told her that the actual reason volcanoes existed was because a Magma Release user got real pissed off back in the day and broke something important. Which he had once, back when they were guppies. It was a sound that might’ve once made him wince, but he’d figured out a long time ago that she hardly ever meant it seriously. Her kids, though, looked at him as though he’d just been handed his own death certificate.

“Captain Uesugi is out that way,” Kei said, pointing firmly toward the direction from whence they’d come. “And I’m going to go talk to him.”

“Didn’t we just talk about how bad you are at talking to people like that?” asked Kaito.

“Let me rephrase it this way: All of you are terrible at kenjutsu, and I’m not dependent on hand seals.” Oh, now she was actually grumpy. Obito watched her students recoil to varying degrees as Kei turned on her heel and marched back out into the snow. She didn’t even bother to disguise her grumbling as she went.

Obito made sure Kaito, in particular, didn’t follow her. The kid had a hell of a mouth and a tendency to overuse it. Samurai tended not to appreciate that. At least, the ones Obito had met didn’t.

Then again, he’d kind of been stealing from them at the time…

Obito’s long-distance vision, especially in the glare off a snowfield, wasn’t as great as Kei’s sensor range. But given how dark her outfit was, it wasn’t so hard to focus on her like a dark spot on clean paper. From there, he activated his Sharingan and waited for something else to light up near her.

It didn’t take that long, really. The Sharingan was designed to track and predict movement with chakra behind it. And it was awful hard to get across the Land of Iron without cheating at least a little, like Uesugi was doing.

Obito drummed his fingers on his leg. Left-handed—his right didn’t ever give the proper feedback. He felt Kaito and Aiko to his left and right, bunched up under snow-gear as they tried to get a better look at what he could see. Not quite possible, unfortunately—Roku’s panda eyes from his bloodline did more against snow-glare than their sensing capacities were worth. And even he didn’t really compare to the Sharingan’s enhanced sight.

Obito still wished they had a Hyūga. The Byakugan would’ve strained less.

Kei

In my samurai clothes, I was nearly inconspicuous.

In my ninja body, I might as well hang a sandwich board around my neck with the slogan “ninja here; please stab” with a big arrow aimed at my head. Samurai sensing abilities, at least at very close range, were as close to bullshit as such a specific skill could be. Didn’t necessarily save them in a fight with shinobi, but it was a nasty surprise for a proper infiltrator to run into right out of the gate.

I didn’t have the specific skillset for it. So, I wasn’t going to act like what I wasn’t.

I was, instead, going to get into my first proper argument with an extended family member in nearly ten years. It sounded like a riot. In both senses of the word.

Probably.

Are we going to actually fight?

_Dunno. If he makes it one…_ Kei sighed inwardly. _Maybe._

I see. He sent me the impression of a jaw-cracking yawn. Let me know when something interesting happens.

_I think you’ll know the second I do._

I kept walking down the snowy slope, keeping Captain Uesugi’s chakra signature fixed in my mind’s eye. He didn’t appear to be struggling with the weather any more than I was, and was getting steadily closer. I couldn’t quite see him just yet, given the random dips in the landscape that I wasn’t quite willing to fight, but I knew exactly where he was. The only sound to mark either of our approaches was the sound of disturbed snow hitting the ground.

His chakra jerked to attention the instant I entered his range, which was only about twenty meters. My range was…hilarious. Twenty meters made sense for the kind of fights samurai tended to get into—close-range duels and a lot of stabbing generally sufficed. My range was a combination of Isobu’s influence, my inherent ability turned outward, and probably mental schema. It was more useful for shinobi fights, at least once people got as dangerous as I’d turned out to be. Getting a long-range fireball tossed in one’s general direction had a way of putting a damper (or blaze) on the whole day.

The two of us were on the same path that cut through the snow, tamped down by the occasional footprint and animal track. The fields around us were empty or overgrown, with no villages within line of sight and nobody other than each other visible at all. Just two figures in hakama and haori, slowly walking on a collision course.

I made it sound a lot more dramatic than it was. If not for my hat cutting Captain Uesugi’s ability to read my expression, I doubt a scrap of our encounter would’ve been worthy of a high school foreign language project. And, once upon a time, I’d made a few incredibly shitty films for Spanish class.

He stopped in front of me, blocking the road. I could see his evenly-spaced footsteps come to a stop and his stance square up about five meters off.

“Stay where you are, stranger,” Captain Uesugi said, in the kind of tone generally associated with military police who were already certain that they had a suspect dead to rights, but were waiting for the person in question to take a hint. Further hints could involve violence, genjutsu, or shouting quite loudly. All of that tonal information was conveyed badly by a rather raspy voice from a man only a handful of years older than I was. “You don’t look like you’re from around here.”

I could also only see his legs. Owing to the hat. I had to angle it a bit to even see that his left hand was on the hilt of his katana.

Guess that was what police work was out here, nowadays. I didn’t know for certain if Shinjitsu was the problem. Maybe Captain Uesugi was just an ass. Maybe this was all that samurai were, beyond the blustering.

Maybe I was making things up to fill time as we stared each other down and tried not to be the one to move first.

“Who the hell’re you supposed to be?” I asked. Obito was the real voice and accent changeling, out of everyone I knew, but I could lower mine by an octave and swap out polite phrasing for vocabulary worthy of a yakuza enforcer. All I really had to do was voice my thoughts more often.

I basically sounded like a lower-pitched Kaito.

…I probably needed to be harder on him about not sounding like that.

Captain Uesugi’s weight shifted. I could feel him getting a little antsy, because suppressing my own chakra signature against a samurai was frankly a lost cause. Hayate had won most of our hide-and-seek practice since we were kids for a reason (and that reason was that I let him, but meh). But he only said, “Captain Yūki Uesugi, under General Mifune.”

My eyebrows rose. He was just…telling me that. Immediately. While not wearing his armor or anything resembling a uniform. What the hell, man. “Cool. Why’d ya stop me?”

“To get a better look at my savior, I think,” Captain Uesugi replied. His chakra, about as sharp as the sword he carried, started doing its best to poke at me as though it would reveal some weakness. “My Well, I did say I was shit at infiltration. And Captain Uesugi wouldn’t find weakness if he tested me. The closest he’d get would be an Isobu-charged punch to the face to show him exactly what was hiding under my human chakra. “Interesting view. Thing is, I dunno why we’re not fighting if you’re gonna talk to me like that. Been attacked for less.”

Captain Uesugi took a step closer to me. I didn’t flinch.

I could kill him where he stood if I had to, kenjutsu or no.

“I don’t have a warrant for your arrest,” Captain Uesugi said, to my mild surprise. Maybe he’d felt my chakra take its own step closer to violence and wanted to de-escalate before he ended up a smear on the pavement. “Therefore, we don’t have a problem.”

“...I don’t think it works like that.” At least, it hadn’t. Um. “So, uh. Hi, I guess.”

Captain Uesugi bowed, and I bowed back on reflex.

I’d ended up doing exactly what I told Obito not to do. Hooray.

You ruined the fight.

And I’m still not sure how. “Uesugi-san,” I went on, once I was sure all he was going to do was bow, “what now?”

“Now? Now I ask a lot of very specific questions about why you helped me clear the village. Please answer them honestly.” Captain Uesugi’s chakra flattened out a bit, forcing itself still for the sake of his professional pride.

“Uh, no. I’ll pass.” And I turned around to walk away.

I knew it wasn’t very diplomatic of me, but I hadn’t signed up to be interrogated by anybody on this mission. Even nominally friendly police officers. Or whatever Captain Uesugi was.

Captain Uesugi didn’t seem to care. Instead of being put off by my refusal, his footsteps followed. I couldn’t signal the kids to ditch and take Obito with them without Captain Uesugi seeing it happen, but it looked like I’d be keeping up a stream of conversation for the next few minutes before I could shake him.

I can make him stop following you.

I’m sure you can.

“Look, if you have something important to say, you’re gonna wanna spit it out,” I told him, because a weird guy following me was not subtle. At all. “I don’t appreciate stalkers.”

“I could just be escorting you to where you’re going.”

“But you’re not.” I stopped and bit down on a sigh. “You want something.”

It wasn’t a question. Not in the slightest.

Captain Uesugi’s chakra flickered with uncertainty. His voice betrayed none of that conflict as he said, “Don’t you, cousin?”
How the fuck even. My mouth opened to protest, which was thankfully about all he could see of my expression. I couldn’t decide what I was even going for, because how.

While, sure, I had a file folder about Captain Uesugi’s existence and survival tucked into a storage seal in a closet, he’d been a toddler at the time. Mom hadn’t known if he’d lived to be an adult and had never checked, because she’d cut ties with the Land of Iron so thoroughly no one even remembered her name. She’d never, for example, sent letters home talking about how cute her kids were. Certainly no pictures. There was nothing to indicate we were related.

I considered possible responses for half a second. What came out of my mouth was, “What the hell are you talking about?”

I would never be a diplomat, and I was fine with that.

“Stop pretending ignorance. It’s an insult to both of us.” Trying to talk my way out of a conversation with a man who was effectively a telepath was a pain in the ass. Captain Uesugi had at least let his hand fall to his side, though, and didn’t feel like he would go for his katana unless I did first. Once again, his hesitation didn’t make it as far as his voice as he spoke. “You read exactly like you’re descended from the Uesugi clan, same as me.”

Okay…what? Leaving aside my preconceived notions of what, exactly, someone else’s sensing technique could be, I’d only heard of this kind of precision from the Second goddamn Hokage. Between Sensei and Karin’s methods, there was some wiggle room. And Hayate hadn’t ever said clans had distinct chakra markers outside of those with notable bloodline limits.

I tilted my hat up, just a little.

I was pretty good with faces, if only because recognizing certain people saved me a lot of waffling about what abilities I’d have to use to shut them down. People like Kabuto made a point of being forgettable? Not on my watch, dammit.

Captain Uesugi, up close, had the same eyes as my mother. Not the eyebags, but the angles were identical.

And so did I.

Dammit.

“What, exactly, do you want?” I asked him in a low voice, as irritated as I’d ever been with anybody from this side of the family. Owing mostly to how I’d never met any of them before, the Uesugi bunch was coming off a little better than the Gekkō clan’s first impression, but the needles were moving closer. This guy was more capable of being a pest than the merchant brats I remembered, for one.

Uesugi’s chakra pressure pushed back against mine. It was an attempt.

“You helped me before,” Captain Uesugi said, which didn’t directly answer my question. He edged closer despite the “fuck off” aura I was lacing across the immediate area, clasped his hands together, and bowed. Deeper than a stranger ever had to me.“I hate to ask, but I need you to do it again. Please.”

“…Okay, what?” As an actual question this time.

“I have arrest authority,” he explained, “but I’m the only one out here trying to root out Shinjitsu. I don’t have backup, I couldn’t bring my armor, and I barely got past the first line of defense.” His eyes seemed to flash. “And I felt the second you jumped when I mentioned that name. You’re already after them, aren’t you?”

I hated being an open book to complete strangers, samurai or not. Still, I asked, “…Your boss sent you out here with nothing?”

Captain Uesugi scratched the back of his head. “I’m supposed to be in Three Wolves right now.”

Oh for fuck’s sake. A cowboy cop. I was half tempted to start looking out for a Clint Eastwood homage the second I turned around. Besides the one in front of me. Captain Uesugi had already done the “this town ain’t big enough for the two of us” bit with Raiga, now that I thought of it. Only there hadn’t been any ten-gallon hats.

It was like my mom’s family, somehow, had a tendency to spit out vigilantes.

“I swore an oath to defend the people of the Land of Iron. To protect and serve,” Captain Uesugi said, when I didn’t react outwardly. “Not to obey General Mifune.”

Not exactly my marching orders, but hey, I was in a foreign country to punch a hole in its seedy underbelly. I didn’t have the high ground, here. I couldn’t feel any deception in his chakra, but I still hesitated. I didn’t particularly want to begin this Land of Iron mission by being backstabbed. It set a bad precedent.

Still, a native guide could be useful.

Captain Uesugi, seeing me stare him down, unclipped his katana from his belt and set it in the snow as he bowed again, almost forming a right angle with his body.

I sighed inwardly. It felt weird watching a guy bow to me on the best of days. I said, rather than acknowledging the whole presentation, “What’s your name? I mean, what do you want me to call you?”

“Yūki, if possible,” he said without lifting his head.

_That’ll go over great with Kaito_, I thought. But I said, “Fine.”

Kaito: Wrest a chapter from Sensei.

Chapter Notes

This chapter's title is from "Family" by Mother Mother, I think.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Kaito didn’t like the Uesugi guy one bit.

Kaito didn’t like most people, but he was firm on that point. It wasn’t his job to be the friendly one, or the diplomatic one, or the one who wanted to interact with village kids when they went on missions. Kaito’s job was to hang back and counter everything he heard to make the others think through their options. So while Aiko was happy to have an ally and Roku reserved judgment until he got a signal from Sensei or Obito, Kaito tried drilling holes in the back of the samurai’s head with his glare alone.

Worse, Sensei and Obito seemed pretty conflicted already. That wasn’t a good sign for this mission as a whole.

Kaito trudged through the snow with a grumble practically rattling through his frame. He felt a little like a cornered alley cat, already poised for a fight before anything materialized. He could ice Uesugi easy if only he’d give Kaito a reason to kick his ass.

“Still mad?” Roku asked out of the corner of his mouth.

Kaito rolled his eyes. “Bubbling.”

“On a scale of one to steam explosion?” Aiko prompted, while adjusting her hat. It was nearly the same color as her hair was normally.

“A little more than a simmer,” said Kaito. He knew perfectly well that his teammates were making fun of him, but it was a long-standing joke. For some reason, referring to his temper like it was made of water just seemed like the funniest thing in the world when they were kids.

Roku didn’t even glance in Kaito’s direction. “Oh, good. If I had to shove you into a pond to make you get over yourself already, I think you’d make sure I died of hypothermia right now.”

“Probably,” Kaito agreed. His eyes darted toward the adults—minus Roku, who didn’t count even if he was nineteen—and he grumbled, “You two don’t honestly think Uesugi is helping us out of the goodness of his heart, do you?”

Roku’s already-dark eyes dimmed a little more as he activated his Magnet Release bloodline again, if only for a split second. It looked like he recovered from the world’s most literal black eye faster than humanly possible. Then, in a whisper, “He’s only carrying what we can see. At least as far as iron and steel weapons go.”

“That doesn’t mean much,” Kaito insisted, equally quiet.

Their team, of all teams, knew better than assume that someone not being able to lay hands on spare steel made them harmless. One of the first true lessons Kaito ever had with Sensei—as a shinobi and not just a kid trying out inherited power—involved making as many senbon as he could out of ice. Kunai and even tantō blades followed. Roku got most of the same kinds of lessons, but earlier, since he was the oldest student on their team. Sensei spent a lot of time trying to weaponize other people’s bloodline limits, and everyone benefited from it.

“He is one of Sensei’s relatives,” Aiko suggested, while toying with the braid hanging from her left temple. “I mean, I think so.”

It was a weak argument, and her fidgeting proved she knew it. Kaito hadn’t had a ton of luck with his extended family, who all lived in a totally different country and probably wouldn’t be happy if they met the members of Team Kei. Kaito couldn’t really remember his parents that well, but he did know that Kirigakure wasn’t someplace he was ever supposed to go. Sensei’s refusal to let them go to the Kiri Chūnin Exams seemed to bear that paranoia out, making those childhood warnings that much more real.

He didn’t see why the Land of Iron was any different for Sensei. Just because they were samurai didn’t mean they had any honor. And Kaito did remember Hayate’s stories about how terrible the Gekkō family had been until somebody got assassinated. Anybody from outside of Konoha played by rulebooks written for them, by them. All of this stuff was just too convenient.

But explaining that to Aiko kind of felt like it’d be bullying, especially because Kaito knew his temper got away from him most of the time. Aiko’s family was okayish. Roku didn’t know who his was. Kaito was pretty sure he was the only one who’d ever really been told to run when anybody from the Yuki or Hōzuki clans ever came looking for him.

Or fight back.

Maybe kill them.

He could do that now.

Kaito finally just blew out a frustrated breath. Ice and snow melted to give them better footing, with hardly any effort on his part. “Sometimes families suck. Especially the parts you don’t know anything about.”

Aiko opened her mouth to argue, then sighed. She picked her way around the suddenly-clear path, dodging snowmelt without looking. “Sometimes.”

“At least if he has some creepy puppet collection or something, we’ll never see it,” Roku said, with a theatrical shudder.

“That bunraku puppet show got to you, too?” Aiko asked, her gray eyes wide. She was keeping pace with Roku by walking sideways with her hands casually behind her head, even if they threatened to dislodge her hat. “Because I think the worst part was really the way the joints—”

“Shhhhh, they’re talking!” Kaito hissed, because he’d had his eyes on the adults.

“—call bullshit,” Sensei was saying.
Uesugi protested, “I’m telling the truth.”

“I’m not sure I believe you, and I actually think most people are honest,” said Obito.

Kaito formed an ice knife in his left hand, under the long edge of his haori sleeve.

“My wife’s name actually is Keiko.”

_Dammit._ It seemed like they weren’t arguing for real. A real argument might’ve had jutsu flying before Kaito had a chance to do anything, but he remained optimistic. For a given value thereof. Something nearly in the same country, maybe. Countries were nice and big. Plenty of space for gray areas.

“You’re doing the thing again,” Roku muttered, while the sheath of his salvaged katana poked at Kaito’s side. “Don’t get caught up thinking of ways to justify it as self-defense.”

Kaito snorted. “It’ll be over too fast for anything _after._”

Roku put a hand on Kaito’s shoulder. “Kaito.”

“Roku,” Kaito sniped back.

Metal creaked; a sign that Roku’s patience had limits, somewhere. “Kaito, don’t push it.”

“I’ve never seen a more obvious trap in my _life,_ Roku.”

Roku was not impressed. “That’s what you said when I went on a blind date. And followed me.”

“Anko could have set you up with anyone!”

“You’re just mad they left and you didn’t get takeout and you couldn’t raid the fridge,” Aiko rattled off all at once, because she was a traitor. Kaito felt his face heating up even before she said, somewhat defensively, “It’s been a month. Statute’s over! Right, Roku?”

Roku sighed.

“If you kids don’t stop arguing, I _will_ mail you back home. Possibly in a shipping crate,” Sensei called over her shoulder. “Don’t think I won’t.”

And with Obito right there, she probably _could_ really do that. She’d originally tapped Obito for the handler role because he was so good at folding space-time into a dumpling. The three students quieted, though Kaito’s cheeks still burned a bit from the scolding. It was phrased like it could be everyone’s fault, but he knew better. He ducked his head before Uesugi looked back to see what the big deal was.

“I didn’t believe Aunt Sumomo’s stories until now,” Uesugi said, apparently accepting that none of Team Kei were going to give him any ammunition. With Kaito’s glare burning a hole in the back of his topknot-adorned head, he continued obliviously, “After bringing me to her home, we never heard from Aunt Tomoe again. No letters, reports, or anything else.”

“That must’ve been nerve-wracking,” Sensei commented, and Kaito cheered up slightly at the thought that she was still on guard. She might’ve been remarking about the weather. Which was snowy, forever. It was fucking awesome.

“It was over thirty years ago,” Uesugi said after a while, shaking his head slowly. “Aunt Sumomo was the one who had time to worry. And…I guess she was sure her baby sister would be able to accomplish anything. And you’re here, so she must’ve managed to survive.”

“Mom’s been dead for twelve years,” Sensei said, as blunt as a hammer. Even Kaito wasn’t that bad most of the time. She sighed, still stomping through the snow. “But, well, I do have an idea of what she was doing right after you got dropped off.”

Not for the first time, Kaito wished he’d been able to meet more of the people who helped make Sensei who she was now. From the scraps of stories he’d gotten from Hayate and sometimes even from Sensei, their mother had been about as fierce as Aunt Misaki and Aunt Chinatsu. Kaito didn’t remember either of them that well anymore—ten years felt like a whole lifetime ago—but he got the idea. There was a personality type that was made of solid steel.

“Wait, you mean you guys never figured out what she was up to?” Obito asked. Kaito couldn’t sense chakra nearly as well as Sensei (or Uesugi, apparently), but Obito wore his heart on his sleeve. His scarred-up face never hid his emotions, except in a fight.

Sensei poked his shoulder, hard. “She couldn’t exactly tell them, Obito.”

“I’m not sure this guy ought to know, though,” Obito protested. When Uesugi gave him a funny look, he held up his hands defensively. “Look, there had to be a reason she never came back, right? Even if she’s dead now, it seems a little…weird.”

“I’m not sure if I would use the word ‘weird’ to describe what happened,” Sensei muttered, as all of them rounded a curve in the road.

“Story time?” Aiko asked from the flank of their group.

“No,” said Sensei.

Aiko groaned in dismay and Kaito decided to follow suit a second later. Roku grabbed both of their haori collars and just dragged them forward into the snow, practically off their feet, before either of them could take a second breath and try wheedling the truth out of Sensei again. It made ignoring the urge to jump Uesugi a little harder, because they hadn’t had a single fight since coming to this weird snowball country.

Kaito knew that was the point of dressing up like samurai, but still.

“I can feel that,” Sensei said, as Kaito picked up the pace a little to get away from Roku and almost smacked into her. When Kaito got closer, she looped a long-sleeved arm around his shoulders and squashed him against her side for a split second. “Keep a lid on it.”

Kaito sighed when she let go. This was going to be such a long mission. And it had already been a couple of weeks. Or felt like it. “Sensei…”

“If I know anything about fighting,” Sensei told him, her voice a little lower so it wouldn’t carry at all, “you’ll miss the boredom when it’s gone.”

Kaito eyed her grim expression and then shook his head slowly. It was one of those things Sensei said sometimes, in the same vein of remarks such as, “You’ll understand when you’re older.” That particular promise never seemed to come true. Kaito might’ve been forgetting examples, but if he’d forgotten it was a bit pointless to remember them now.

“You’ll see,” said Obito. He thumbed the warp of his mouth, where the pressure scars changed its shape. Kaito didn’t know if it was a nervous tic, or just a show he was putting on for Uesugi.
“Maybe,” said Kaito, but he at least remembered not to stick his tongue out at anybody.

“Are any of you hungry?” Uesugi asked. The not-quite-genuine concern made Kaito’s skin crawl. “We have been traveling for a while…”

“Yes,” said Kaito.

“I’m good,” Aiko said.

“I brought my own snacks,” said Roku, pulling onigiri out of a long sleeve. Because of course he carried his stash everywhere. His exact loadout changed with the times, but somehow he always had food on him. Local dogs loved him. Cats, less so, but only because they tended to have marginally more of what humans called dignity.

It looked similar enough if people squinted.

Uesugi looked a little surprised, but he didn’t comment further. He was going to be doing a lot of that, and it’d only get worse the more he hung around the team. If Kaito let him.

He still hadn’t decided yet.

“I don’t like him,” Kaito said, once the adults moved off again. Except for Roku. He didn’t really count, nineteen or not.

“You’ve made that obvious,” said Roku, because he was an adult in a specifically annoying way.

Kaito grumbled. Whatever he said seemed to bounce off everyone’s ears like someone had put wax in them. What, did he have to break out an itemized list (which he didn’t have) to make his case against Uesugi’s involvement in this mission? Or a chart, like Rin-sensei used for explaining complex biological concepts.

Bleh. This sucked.

The rest of the day passed with more meaningless conversation until frigid nightfall.

Uesugi led them to a village he assured them was abandoned, or near enough. Kaito didn’t relax until Sensei confirmed it, saying that she couldn’t sense anything more threatening than a winter fox for four kilometers. Her range was way larger than that, but even the omission impressed Uesugi, from what Kaito could tell.

They found a house with an intact roof after searching for only a few minutes, and then it was time to camp. Indoors, for once. Only two rooms, for all that it mattered in a country overrun with glaciers and a barely adequate growing season.

“I’ll get a fire going,” Aiko volunteered, once Obito dug enough wood out of the pile in the back of the house and dumped it in the hearth. The firepit in the center of the room was practically iced over, but it’d serve. And in the end, Aiko kind of liked starting fires. Her chakra nature pointed that way to start with.

Sensei had talked to her about that once, so it was under control.

Sensei and Obito dug the rest of their supplies out of scrolls. Though Kaito didn’t like showing exactly how many concealed resources their team had to Uesugi, seeing his eyes bug out was pretty funny. He only carried what turned out to be the basics, packed into a pair of bundles that swung from his neck all day. Seeing the samurai balk was just weird, and Kaito had only known him for like a day.

Did fūinjutsu not exist out here? Out of all of Sensei’s skills, it was probably the one that got the most use. Out of her students, Aiko was the expert, mainly because she had to learn it just to use her family’s techniques. It was the same way Roku was the best at kenjutsu, of the three of them. Kaito kept all of Sensei’s Water Release and Wind Release ninjutsu, though all of them had the basics of all of those disciplines.

The only thing Sensei wouldn’t let them touch was the center of it all—Isobu, the Three-Tailed Beast.

It worked out for the best.

Kaito helped set up the various sleeping bags, once they were free. They didn’t have a spare, but searching the house turned up a futon that hadn’t been aired out in months. It’d work in a pinch, but seeing the comforter and everything else made Kaito frown nonetheless.

They’d also found an old, well-loved cooking pot, the better part of a family shrine with the portraits and incense missing, and other signs of habitation cut short. Any fields outside were long snowed under, and breaking into the well required Kaito’s skills instead of just Obito’s right arm. A thick layer of dust covered everything, shifting when disturbed.

It reminded Kaito uncomfortably of Sorayama, during annual trips to see the wilds reclaiming the village. So much for a fortress of a town. Kaito hadn’t trusted static fortifications since.

Judging by the shadow over Roku’s expression, even with the firelight casting everything with a warm glow, he felt it too. Worse, maybe, because Roku had been older then.

Still, might as well consider it dinnertime. It got dark at like three in the afternoon here, at best. Not that Kaito could really tell, given the snow-laden clouds that had blocked the sun all day.

Sensei didn’t bother with melting suspect snow for the cook-pot. She flexed her hand into a half-seal and water streamed out of the air exactly where she wanted. Kaito wasn’t there yet, but it was always cool to get an idea of where he could be if he kept training.

Cup ramen for dinner, but Kaito wasn’t going to whine about not getting to eat anything better with Uesugi right there. Sensei’s scrolls contained fresh food on long-term missions like this, so the cup ramen was just a way of staving off any questions from someone they didn’t fully trust. They’d lived through worse. If they didn’t go for the ramen now, it’d be a matter of breaking into yet more storage scrolls. Far on the end of the preferences list lay a hazard no one wanted to chance—standard-issue rations.

Obito once told them that he had nightmares about living off of those things, and Kaito was never entirely willing to chance it. Ten was a formative age for those kinds of stories to stick, though Kaito had long figured out that whoever made the things didn’t actually intend to poison whoever ate them.

“Thank you for the food,” was whispered all across the circle, though only half of them meant it.

So there they all sat, lounging around a now-snuffed fire and digging through packaged food. With a stranger in their midst, they couldn’t speak freely, but hell, it was dinner. If everyone was talking, then they hadn’t come up with anything to complain about yet.
The silence couldn’t last forever. They still needed to figure out watch rotations.

“Why was this village abandoned, Uesugi-san?” Kaito finally asked, when curiosity got the better of him. He kept the hostility well out of his voice or face. Mainly by curling up in his sleeping bag with his chin on his folded arms, but who cared?

Samurai did the thing where they responded best to being addressed by family or clan names. It was weird after a lifetime of being raised in the shinobi model, but if he fell out of the practice now, he’d never get back into it. And there was still no way in hell he was calling this guy “Yūki,” even at swordpoint.

“‘Yūki’ is fine, kid,” Uesugi said, but Kaito ignored that. Wasn’t like he was using his name either.

“Still waiting on an answer,” Kaito insisted, a bit less polite this time.

Uesugi hesitated, glancing at Obito and Sensei. Without his hat, it was a lot easier to read his pinched expression. The flecks of gray at his temples weren’t as extreme as the white streak in Kaito’s hair, but everything about the firelight made the guy look older somehow. Even though Kaito was pretty sure he wasn’t even half a decade older than Sensei.

Kaito glared at him for real this time.

“The hell are you looking at me for? They’re adults here,” Sensei told him. Oh right, the Land of Iron thought people were adults when they turned fifteen. It still sounded back-asswards every time Kaito remembered. “Get on with it.”

“If you insist.” Uesugi pinched his chopsticks together and laid them across his empty cup, signalling that he was clearly done with the whole eating business. With entirely unnecessary gravitas, he asked, “How much do you understand about the way the Land of Iron is put together politically?”

“Enough,” said Kaito. Which wasn’t true, and Uesugi could probably tell, but he was sticking to that story. His teammates nodded along.

Uesugi gave him a skeptical look, but Sensei cut off the potential interrogation with, “How many villages has Shinjitsu taken from you? How many local lords are either dead or scattered?”

“The word you’re looking for there is probably ‘disappeared,’” said Uesugi. He sat in seiza on his borrowed—stolen?—futon, hands on his thighs. Formal and uncomfortable, except for the bit where he wasn’t directly on the wooden floor. “The local government was gutted years before Shinjitsu set up shop in our country. Around here, —He waved a hand, indicating the windows— “there’ve been several groups of magistrates and other officials, but no one’s lasted more than a year or two. Landslides, fires, sickness.” Uesugi sighed. “The only real difference with Shinjitsu’s influence is that we have an explanation better than ‘bad luck’ for all of this.”

Kaito frowned into his crossed arms. While this particular political lecture didn’t sound familiar, a lot of things never filtered down to lower-ranked shinobi, who wouldn’t generally be asked to do much more than “go here, stab things” on most missions. Even on this one, the briefing was aimed mostly at Sensei and somewhat less at Obito, who probably wasn’t really supposed to be traveling with them the entire way. He didn’t have to, and he didn’t like snow anyway.

“For how long?” Aiko piped up from her sleeping bag, gray eyes wide.

“The destruction of the Uesugi clan,” was the reply. As the rest of them watched, Uesugi stared blankly into the fire for a long moment. When he looked up, it was like the orange glow got caught in his eyes. “This land’s overrun with ghosts.”
Sensei, leaning on one hand and expression forced impassive, said, “Makes sense to me.”

“I was two years old when it happened,” Uesugi said, shaking his head slowly. “I don’t remember any of it. But I’m almost the only officer ever stationed here who came back to the capital with all my limbs after the second rotation. Strange, isn’t it?”

_It’s not if you’re working for the shitheads out here_, Kaito thought. By now, even a better class of sensor-nin would’ve probably just given up on trying to befriend Kaito. Putting out hostility consistently saved time.

Obito was lying on his sleeping bag, head propped up on his right arm. The one that wasn’t really his, according to what he said about it. “So, question.”

Uesugi blinked, either expecting more of a reaction or less of one. Saying stuff that was supposed to spook people had a way of killing conversations. “Yes?”

“Do you actually know what happened back then?” Obito frowned. “Because if you were two, and you don’t remember anything, there’s a lot of holes in the story that might or might not make it a better ghost story, you know? Sorry to kill that dramatic moment, but seriously.”

“I…I’m sorry?” Uesugi didn’t have feathers to ruffle, but Kaito figured he could use it. “What does that mean?”

“It means my mother gave a full account of the events of the Uesugi clan’s demise, as far as she understood it, when she applied for asylum in Konoha thirty years ago. I read the censored report a while ago,” Sensei told him, after only the barest glance at Obito. She took a slow sip of her lousy road-quality tea, then added, “Do you want to hear it?”

During Sensei’s little speech, Uesugi leaned forward with interest by centimeters. By the time she finished, he was almost bowing, and actually did so once he realized what she was offering. Without looking up, hands crossed in front of him, he said, “Please!”

“Okay, then get up. And get comfortable, all of you,” Sensei said, while she settled into a more comfortable position, too. With her headband gone, her hair flopped forward over her eyes like a real ghost, and the grin Kaito always associated with Story Time appeared on her face. He wasn’t sure how real it was, given how little she trusted Uesugi, but it was something.

“I think I know this one, but let’s hear it,” Obito said. He rolled onto his back and rested his head on his hands. “It’ll be fun.”

“Not sure if I’d use that word, but sure.” Sensei cleared her throat. “All right. A long time ago—”

“—Thirtyish years—” Kaito interrupted.

“—Yes, thank you, because you’re being picky about things.” Sensei rolled her eyes. She tossed a chopstick at Kaito to shut him up. “Before I was born and when Yūki-san was two, there was a castle in a snow-cloaked country. Which is where we are.” This last was added with a glare at Kaito, who smiled. “The owners were the Uesugi clan.

“There were plenty of other clans around here, near as I remember. One of the bigger ones was the Asakura clan, who decided to marry their adopted youngest son to the youngest daughter of the Uesugi—my mother,” Sensei said. “The head of the Asakura, Murasaki, was a proud woman, and so was our great-grandfather. The two clans had clashed over their shared borders for so long that nobody remembered who originally owned what. But because of it, they hoped that intermarrying would finally allow the two clans to have a lasting peace. Or at least as long as the married ones managed to live. Maybe their kids, too.”

Sensei wasn’t the best storyteller in the world, but Kaito figured that a story that got passed down as badly as this one was just going to have to work. None of her students lived in Konoha early enough to have met Sensei’s mother, but they got little things sometimes. This kind of night was the closest they got to learning anything about Miyako Gekkō.

Besides, it had Uesugi distracted. That way, Roku could find his spot for first watch without really being noticed and start setting up traps.

“Mother met her future husband, Isshinta Asakura. They prepared for the wedding like anyone would,” Sensei said, “with her entire family invested in the party. It was probably a pretty big production.” She poked at her container of instant ramen. “It was probably better than this.”

Uesugi had his eyes closed. “I… I almost…”

Sensei forged on without acknowledging him. “Isshinta Asakura was a kid. Barely an adult even by samurai standards. Mom said he got along well with all the children of the clan. You probably knew him back then, or your cousins did. And the Asakura used him and the wedding to get them into the Uesugi castle in the dead of night. After drugging all the Uesugi clan members they could find, they killed everyone.”

Uesugi bowed his head. His fists clenched against the comforter atop his futon.

“Isshinta Asakura died saving my mother’s life, and she saved yours,” Sensei told him, merciless. “Then she took everything she had—every clan secret she buried with her old life and took to her grave with her—and killed them all. Every Asakura clan member she linked to the attack. Every official who turned the other way. Six months of death and bloody vengeance in the name of dead family.” She turned a kunai over in her hands. “The Ghoul of Three Wolves is your aunt, and my mother.”

Or she is if you are who you say you are, Kaito thought. He’d heard this story before, even if he could tell that Sensei was leaving things out of this version. Even when he’d been a kid—for real, not just by technicality—Kaito liked the stories where doing evil meant punishment. The person who razed the world didn’t get to sleep peacefully in the ashes.

But this had strategy behind it.

“I…” Uesugi looked up. “Isshinta had red hair, didn’t he? The only person I’d ever seen with it.” In the tone of someone trying, desperately, to chase down a far-off memory, Uesugi said with his face scrunched, “I think my mother stopped me from pulling his hair.”

Sensei shrugged. “After that night, Mom took you to your other aunt, with the Kato clan. Crossing enough borders meant you’d never be chased down and could live whatever life you wanted.” She waved a hand to indicate all the snow. “I don’t think she ever meant for you to come back to the Land of Iron, but you did.”

“She wasn’t my only aunt,” Uesugi said after a while. The man wasn’t half as tense as before, but he was still cautious.

“Oh?”

“Grandfather’s sister married into the Takeda clan, here,” Uesugi said. Eyes open now, he looked away. “I’m just the only one who still carries the Uesugi name. No one from that side of the family could tell me anything, you know. Aunt Tomoe never went to them.”
Kaito got the impression Uesugi had done a mock interrogation of his distant relatives to be that sure. “Does that mean we’re gonna drown in more of Sensei’s relatives?”

“No, no—they wouldn’t come this far out into the snowfields,” Uesugi said dismissively. “But… They were the ones who kept the Uesugi sword style alive. Not really on their own, though. It turns out the one who actually knew how to perform the last few techniques was a mountain hermit. I think he’s a potter now. Or he was. It’s been years since I last saw him.”

Sensei sighed. “I’m going to assume this mountain hermit taught you.”

Uesugi winced. “More or less?”

“We should probably compare notes,” Sensei suggested, but not like she cared. Like it was just a passing whim. “Or we could get some sleep and start early tomorrow.”

“We could do both.”

All five shinobi gave him skeptical looks until Uesugi gave in with a jaw-cracking yawn. “Fine, fine. I know when I’m beaten.” He nodded to Sensei. “I… You’ve given me a lot to think about. I’ll meditate on it before going to bed.”

“Fair enough,” Sensei told him placidly.

A flick of her fingers, however, let her team know that their watch order. Roku and Aiko first, then Kaito and Obito, and finally Sensei herself. They were to wake her if there was any trouble at all, and damn the consequences. Obito could get them out of the Land of Iron if they needed to leave in a hurry. Uesugi could die in the snow for all Kaito cared.

Kaito planned to sleep with one eye open that night, just to be safe.

He didn’t manage it, but at least he tried.
