Catch Your Breath
by Liangnui

Summary

FF.Net Summary: "Inspired by Silver Queen's "Dreaming of Sunshine." Ripples turn into waves and crash upon the shores of what is and what could be, and I was just someone else who got pulled under. I didn't realize that even a drowning person makes waves of their own. A SI OC story."

Cross-post for formatting shenanigans and discussion. Rating based on language.

- Inspired by Dreaming of Sunshine by Silver Queen
Chapter Summary

Hapless Idiot: Be reborn.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

What happens when you die?

Bit of a question for the ages, isn’t it? It’s one of those questions that’s followed my ancestors around ever since the first one dropped dead of a bad banana or something, and it’s pretty hard to say that there’s ever going to be a definitive answer. I’m not convinced that that Far Side cartoon was right, what with the surgeons faking out some poor guy under anesthesia, but whatever the cliché Hallmark thing that’s supposed to happen after death is, it didn’t happen to me.

Well, actually, since my family was varying degrees of Protestant Christian or Buddhist or some variation in between (don’t ask), I don’t think we really came to a consensus other than to say that we’d probably be reunited with grandpa and grandma and everyone else that died before us. Given that I was twenty-going-on-twenty-one last I remember, I figured I’d have a lot of ancestors probably demanding to know why I didn’t have a boyfriend yet, or maybe others wanting to know why I only got three-fourths of the way through a non-medical degree before dying. Sure, I wanted to be a teacher and got pretty close for being only two years out of high school, but I’m not sure my distant ancestors really cared and I’m almost glad I didn’t meet some of them—every family has its crazy people and some of them scare the crap out of me to this day.

For the record, my death was boring, pointless, and probably had people huddling in groups and nodding to each other about how expected it was. Doesn’t matter too much what it was—fact is, I still don’t know what happened. I was sitting at home watching TV, and then nothing.

That’s all in the past now, anyway. After all, I’m dead. Didn’t end up meeting any of those relatives—and I’m regretting some of that—before being dumped into some warm, if boring and occasionally thumping, darkness to await judgment day. Maybe? I’m not particularly religious in any organized sense—never have been—but I figured that’d be it for me and I’d…I dunno, just hang around. Maybe get ground up into the force which moves the planes of reality—yes, I’m a passing fan of Dungeons and Dragons and you can shut up now, because the fate of the Faithless is no goddamn joke when you’re possibly qualified for it. It was boring, but probably better than eternal damnation for not being a particularly good or bad person. Purgatory doesn’t seem to involve a lake of fire, and I’m okay with that.

Or I was. I guess I never really considered three really important points, in retrospect.

One: Never assume a given religion had it right. I’d made the assumption of figuring that all those stories about Grandma watching over us from heaven were true. Turns out it was the wrong family belief system to go with, at least for me.

Two: Infantile amnesia only works out if you don’t actually have the mental capacity to remember things. Hence, infantile amnesia and not general, all-purpose amnesia. I would kill to take this second fact back to whoever made it up and throttle them with it.

Three: Any unexplained physical sensation after death should be investigated. I mean, now I know that the constant, faint itching sensation I felt must have been the development of my internal chakra circulatory system. It was building me up, so one day I’d be able to pull off the insane ninja magic bullshit that made this world work. The itch stopped being so intrusive later, when my coils stabilized from the rapidly developing stage they were in before birth. It was sort of like the development of neurons, I think—you’ve got the potential storage space for everything you’re ever going to have room to learn when you’re born, and they don’t grow back. If something had happened in utero, like what I now suspect happened with Rock Lee, I’d be permanently crippled as far as chakra goes. I always feel a little like there’s warmth under my skin that no one but me can know about, now. I can feel the same thing in other people, but it’s probably less because I’m actually talented in my new life and more because, when you get down to it, chakra was foreign. Like having an extra limb or the sudden ability to see the entire light spectrum. Magic ninja bullshit wasn’t exactly a staple of my old life, so of course I’d be extremely aware that now it was.

Er. Would be. I’m getting ahead of myself here.

Imagine this as an adult—suddenly the warm darkness is getting a bit too tight, a bit too unstable, and then there’s a pulsating wall of muscle forcing you to move around or be squished like a grape. It’s a little like how I imagined being eaten by a snake would be like, when I’d been five and too young to understand how snake jaws didn’t detach that much. All I knew at the time was that it was too small and I was too big and I needed to get away before I was turned into taffy. Funny thing about that, though, was that none of my limbs seemed to want to work the way I wanted them to and I ended up getting pretty squished regardless. And then I was out.

One of the things that I read about, before, was that a baby’s instinct was to inhale immediately upon feeling air on his or her face. It works pretty well for porpoises and whales, who are pushed up to the surface for their first breath by their mothers, but it was one of those things that nearly killed me twenty years early in my old life because the nurses hadn’t gotten the fluid off my face completely. My parents told me that story a lot growing up—I think they were amused by the whole situation, after the fact, even if they were terrified at the time. Now I got to experience it myself because my lungs weren’t quite listening to me just yet.

It is fucking terrifying.

But between the fact that the nurses here had been careful enough to clean me off and clear my airways, the warm if scratchy towel, the swaddling, and a bunch of hands on my body that were absolutely huge and lifting me up, my lungs got a pretty good workout with my first scream. I was genuinely terrified, even when the hands carrying me didn’t end up dropping me. I think I kept screaming even when I was placed on my new mother’s chest, until I started suckling. My body, unsurprisingly, still wasn’t listening to me.

I was effectively blind—though my vision in my old life was actually worse than what I could see now, with less light sensitivity and more depth perception—my hearing was hypersensitive due to what had been months of effective sensory deprivation, I could feel everything from the swaddling blanket to the heat of my mother’s skin, and my sense of taste was pretty much nonexistent.

And I that was how I was born again, more or less.

I’ll skip over the whole thing with potty training and stuff. Frankly, I’m almost glad that I didn’t have any control over my body then—the developing human brain isn’t designed to have the nerve impulses of a twenty-year-old human running through it anyway. I could at least justify the memories of needing an adult’s help for everything as being due to true helplessness. It made me feel more grateful and less humiliated. My memories of that time are about as detailed as if I’d been an actual adult, but the sheer boredom means even my not-quite-physical adult brain and memories sort of let it all bleed together. It’s like anything else after enough time goes by—nostalgia essentially means filing off the edges of stuff that was boring or dull or mediocre, leaving only extreme highs or lows in its wake. So, out of it, I mostly got a deep need to be in control, to never be helpless again, and a fierce love for my parents for putting up with my needs for so long.

And a very strong conviction never to have children of my own, but that’s not exactly new for me. I’m still quietly terrified by the idea of being solely or jointly responsible for the future survival and happiness of another human being, but now I just added the whole issue of diapers to the pile of reasons to use birth control.

More on that later, though.

Originally, I’d been a fairly quiet child. I mean, I cried since that’s what babies do, but you weren’t going to be finding me screaming my head off at three in the morning as an infant in my last life unless something was really wrong. I guess I had my parents trained to respond to the little squeaks I made, sort of like how cats get their owners to do things for them. Here, I was still pretty quiet as a rule, but the feel of my chakra settling in my coils never stopped being there. It’s sort of like someone poking you every ten minutes or so, just to remind you they’re still around. Or maybe like having someone lean on your shoulder. It was annoying and only occasionally comforting, so I think I was a bit noisier out of sheer temper more than anything. I still tried to have a proper screaming match with the world only when I actually needed something, to save my parents’ sanity.

Mom was…I think she was ill somehow, honestly. As my vision improved and I could actually see the person carrying me, I’d look up and see Mom holding me most of the time. I’d gurgle at her, to say hello, but her smile back was always a little strained. She was paler than I remember myself being, once upon a time—and since I didn’t get out a hell of a lot, I think I might have been an expert on it. She was pretty, though. She seemed a little thin and waiflike, but her eyes were dark and kind when they weren’t sunken due to my periodic wakeup calls, and her hair was a straight black curtain around her face. She was delicate. I still loved her, though, in a way only children can, because she and Dad were my world and she loved me back.

Dad seemed older, a little wearier with gray already in his hair and scars on his jaw. He had a wider, more solid build and darker features, but I was wearing him down as surely as Mom just by being a baby. It was only because of him that I realized my predicament at all. He’d been holding me, since Mom was in the hospital again for some kind of post-birth follow-up thing. I had an idea of what that could entail, in all its gory detail, so I don’t think I would have asked even if I could have made my vocal chords work voluntarily. Dad was making faces at me, trying to get me to copy him, and I was waving my little fists around just because I could.

And I guess my vision was finally good enough for me to look at what I was holding, once I grabbed it. I had his forefinger in a chubby fist and I wasn’t about to let go, whether he tried gently pulling loose or not. It was an accomplishment! Baby steps toward success and independence happened all the time, and as an adult in a baby’s body I was going to enjoy as many as I could figure out.

Not like I had anything better to do, anyway.

It took me a while to recognize the vest Dad was wearing as a flak jacket, even when I was looking right at it—hell, if I hadn’t been familiar with the Naruto series as a whole, I doubt I would have realized what it was—and I only really got the totally unintended message when I caught the gleam of metal on his forehead. I couldn’t tell what symbol was on it, though—infant eyes aren’t good for distances of more than about eight inches or so.
I don’t think I panicked, but the thing with being a baby is that there’s only one reaction for anything negative. I started sniffling. Dad started panicking. Guess there was a reason Mom was the one who held me most of the time.

“Gekkō-san, daijōbu desu ka?” someone asked, and my dad’s head turned toward someone else. The rest of the conversation passed by a little too quick for me to keep up.

I was only a week or two old, all right? Cut me some slack for having trouble with a language I never learned before. Most of the other stuff I’d chalked up to just the fact that my new ears were a little sensitive and my brain was probably scrambled from being born. The fact that I know any Japanese at all is a miracle of coincidence and annoyance—watching subbed and raw anime wasn’t compensating for the fact that in my old life, English was my first language and my old memories were not helping me adapt at all.

They might actually be getting in the way.

“Daijōbu ka, Keisuke-chan?” Dad said, presumably to me.

…Yep. That’s my name: Keisuke Gekkō, born on July 10th. I even have the baby footprint and birth certificate to prove it. I found out later that Mom’s name was Miyako and Dad was Wataru. I get the feeling that my parents wanted a boy first. Don’t you? I also had the sudden feeling I would grow up a very angry child, like a boy named Susan or something. Maybe it would lead to me trying to destroy the world, like Mandark. I’d have to convince people to call me Kei or Keiko for the rest of my life.

Or maybe I could grow up into ten feet of anger in a five-foot frame for other reasons entirely!

I’d bet on the latter, personally.

Chapter End Notes

Originally published 7/19/13.

AN [12/14/2016]: Hi everyone! Lang here, welcoming new readers into this...whatever this thing’s become over time. A doorstopper, certainly. It’s been about three and a half years since I started writing this fic, and you can pretty much see my writing from that time preserved for all eternity in the form of the first thirty or so chapters.

Long story short: I hate it, which is a sign that I’ve improved as I’ve gone on writing this story. While I can’t give you an exact date, at some point in the future this story is going to be getting a rewritten form. And what does this mean for you, the new reader who is probably considering backing out right now? Pretty much nothing. All I want is to see new folks enjoy this fic, even in its current imperfect form, after braving the gauntlet that is the early part of this story.

Some bits you find will be silly. Others may be the result of writing by the seat of my authorial pants. But a surprising number of people seem invested in this story, so if you’re one of them or are just stopping by, I nonetheless hope to work this thing into a form worthy of all of you in time. Please be patient with past-me and her shortcomings, and thanks for reading.

See you at chapter 118.
The thing about chakra is that it is everywhere. Sure, most of what sensor-class shinobi can perceive is generally human chakra, and that’s what makes them so useful. It’s all that most normal shinobi can sense, either, if on a lesser scale. But thanks to the Sage of Six Paths and the Ten-Tailed Beast, the entire world is infused with chakra that, if you touch it without the proper training, is going to mean being turned into a stone frog. The normal stuff is plenty dangerous for most people, who tend to stick to what works for them and won’t backfire horribly if they’re shinobi, and tend to go along in their boring lives without ever noticing it if they’re not. I can’t sense natural chakra, by the way. I only know it exists because I watched a certain TV show way in the past.

Anyway, how is this relevant? The fact is, though I don’t have any particular aptitude for natural chakra (and holy crap am I glad for that), I’m constantly aware of my chakra. While my body’s had it since before birth, hence all the itching, my mind keeps saying that this is not normal. I need to focus—a bit—in order to use my chakra, where most people just do it automatically. I’ll need to train as I grow in order to be able to do some of the other crazy ninja bullshit people like, say, Sasuke can do without even so much as thinking about, but I think I might have an advantage as far as initial control goes.

It’s a lot easier to manipulate something when you actually know exactly how much you’re messing with at a time. It’ll be an advantage later on, but as a toddler it just pissed me off.

Anyway, as a baby, I ate and slept and cried a lot. I mean, I love my parents here and I’m sure they made my infancy as comfortable as possible, but it didn’t make it any less boring. I couldn’t do anything on my own, other than babble like a brook.

This, eventually, led to me coming up with my first words. I think I was six months old—the same thing happened last time around. Unsurprisingly, my first words were “Mama” and “Dada.” In that order. Mom was serenely proud, in a kind of smug way, while Dad seemed to want to do some kind of victory dance because I’d actually addressed him on the same day.

I was sorta…toddling around by about a year old. I could only tell because of the birthday bash they threw for me—when it comes to babies, the waking world is pretty hard to keep track of. Days blend into weeks into months, mainly because not a whole lot happens from a deeply bored adult’s point of view. I was trying to get into things like cupboards or bookshelves, like children are supposed to, but Mom and Dad had apparently thoroughly child-proofed the house. The living room was the only place where I had the ability to roam, and certainly no one was going to let me do so without supervision—Dad’s a ninja, after all, and I sometimes saw Mom pull a practice sword from above the kitchen window.

I would gum someone to death for the opportunity to read something just for a distraction, even if relearning how to read would probably be triple the pain it was the first time. Didn’t have teeth yet, then. Also? Teething is a pain and should never be voluntarily undergone a second time. Most people have infantile amnesia to thank for never having to deal with that. And I don’t.

A lot of toys got gummed to death, mostly to solve the issue of teething but also because I was bored out of my tiny toddler skull. Learning to read would be a bitch. Being a toddler at least gave me the option of stalking my parents and pestering them to read to me, though it’d be a while before I graduated from blocks.

Speaking of the birthday party, I guess Dad and Mom are pretty popular. I didn’t know the names Miyako and Wataru Gekkō from before, but they knew everyone with a kid around my age, or so it seemed.

The birthday party involved cake, though it had a kind of red bean filling that I know I hadn’t liked before being reborn. The adults stood around and talked shop, because that’s what adults do when the kids are apparently safe and well out of range of any weaponry, and I spent the party gnawing on one of my presents. Literally. Still teething and all that.

I think, in total, I ended up with a whole set of those pompom hair tie things, a teething ring, a rubber kunai (hint hint) that would probably also be used for chewing on (hint failed), three sets of baby clothes in varying shades of purple and pink (could be worse, like orange), a stuffed tiger I privately named Tigger (who was not orange), a new bottle, and a set of block puzzles. What anyone would want with that last item, I have no idea—I didn’t like those things when I was growing up the first time, either.

There were other kids there, too. I didn’t recognize Genma until his mother called his name—he’s around four or five—and I ended up crawling over and demanding that Ebisu play blocks with me. Not that he agreed gracefully—he’s three—but he could make a steadier pyramid than I could and tried to show me how it was done. I think he had the knack for teaching, even when he was little, though he was a little pompous about it.

Still ended up knocking the pyramid over, though it wasn’t his fault at all. Being a year old means being clumsy.

There were other children there, too, but I don’t remember seeing them often after the party. I guess Ayumi-chan and Miyuki-chan and Tatsuo-kun all decided to stay civilians. At least, I hope they did—the idea that they died is too ugly to linger on.

I think I might have seen Sakumo, Kakashi’s dad, show up and leave within a ten-minute period. I don’t think his social circle and my parents’ one really overlap, but he’s apparently a nice enough person to stop by and offer balloons and steal cake. Kakashi, if he was there, was probably the little white-haired bundle I only caught a glimpse of.

Balloons are the best thing in the world and no one can ever tell me otherwise. Especially when Dad did the helium trick and made all the adults burst out laughing.

As a side note? I’d figured out what time period I’d been born into.

When I burst into tears in the middle of my own birthday party, Dad panicked again and tried to soothe me while Mom politely ushered everyone else into the kitchen and then the yard, saying I was just tired from such a long and exciting day. It was even true, in a way, but that was nothing compared to the sheer magnitude of the situation I found myself in.

It’s one thing to think I’ve been reborn into a shinobi world, even with the sheer overkill certain people can sling around like nothing. It’s another to be born into Konohagakure, where most of the main plot of the series seems to gather. It’s another thing again to be born during the gap between two Shinobi World Wars.

It’s another thing altogether to realize that my age group is going to make up the front ranks of the Third Shinobi World War.

Incidentally, that was the day I discovered my ability to suppress my own chakra signature down to below my parents’ sensing threshold, which freaked them out plenty when they realized that their kid was kind of a chakra void when upset. I think that after that, they started to realize that I was going to be a really, really weird kid.

Maybe that was why they tried for a second one.

Chapter End Notes

Originally posted 7/28/13.
I was waddling around the house at age two and some months when I finally got a good look in a mirror, and could see the person I would be. Before that, my hair hadn’t even bothered to grow in for some stupid reason, meaning that the only way I could tell what my hair color could even be was by looking at my parents and making a guess. I mean, I obviously wasn’t going to be blonde or a redhead, but I hadn’t been last time around either and I was curious to see what I was built to be.

My hair was short and kind of tufty, even if Mom had pulled it back into this dumb little ponytail that sat at the top of my head like a palm tree with pompoms. I wasn’t as pale as Mom, which makes me think that either my parents’ coloring was averaged out to get mine or that Mom really, genuinely was sick with something. I had a wide face, mostly because of the baby fat, but the way my face was developing would probably mean that I would have an average look to me, aside from my jet-black hair and dark eyes. Dad’s body type didn’t seem to be dominant, exactly, and it was hard to tell with toddlers anyway.

Oh well. I guess I’ll see when I grow up.

That was about when I heard Mom drop something in the bathroom. I toddled over to figure out what had happened—partly because I was worried but mostly because I was curious, as all children are, and said, “Mommy?”

Mom didn’t answer. Mom always answers, and yet this time all I got was a sob.

I headed for the bathroom as fast as my stubby little legs would carry me, bouncing off a wall or two along the way, calling, “Mommy? Mommy!”

I found Mom sitting on the floor of the bathroom with her hands over her face. On the floor in front of her was an open box, as well as a white-tipped stick that was starting to send a rather suspicious feeling through me. I wasn’t quite sure what to think, though, because Mom was both crying—a little—and smiling as she scooped me into her lap.

“Isn’t it great, Kei-chan? You’ll be a big sister soon!” Mom said into my hair.

I scooted around in her lap so I could hug her properly, listening to her heartbeat and imagining the heart of my new sibling—or siblings, if there were twins—beating along with hers and mine. “Does that mean Mommy and Daddy are going to love the baby more?”

“Oh of course not!” Mom said fiercely, surprising me. She pushed me back into the crook of her other arm, so she and I could look eye-to-eye without having to let go of each other. “Mommy will love you both with her whole heart! But I don’t want you to have to play alone anymore.”
It was strange, to be afraid of this new life as much as I wanted to hug it. I was a bit lonely—I can’t actually remember any point in time when I was without my brother, before I died—but it’s a child’s need to be reassured that kept me there, clinging to Mom. I did love her, because I could guess why she’d been crying—she was afraid that being pregnant again could endanger her and the baby, but she wanted to keep us all safe and happy so much that my heart was breaking for her. I didn’t want her to have to give up her life for that—it seemed selfish, I guess, because she obviously wanted the baby.

I honestly don’t even know what I thought at the time—in the end, it became more of this massive jumble of feelings that didn’t really end up proving anything to me other than that I was incredibly indecisive.

Still, if Mom wanted the baby, I wasn’t going to say no. I kept turning around and expecting find someone who wasn’t there, now that I was old enough to walk and wander from room to room. I kind of hoped for a brother, despite the ways it could all go wrong (excluding sibling fights, which were expected and normal).

In the end, it actually didn’t.

By the time I turned three, Dad had managed to get me to the point where I could read on my own. This was mostly because I had taken to bugging him half to death about it every time I could, since knowing that a sibling was on the way only increased my need to know about the world I was slowly getting big enough to explore. I’d babble about how I wanted to teach my little sibling everything ever, including what kind of book had the best pictures and which way was the best way to stretch and where the really nice food vendors were—the kind that would give free food to cute kids, of course. I was going to be the best sister ever.

I might have wanted a hustler for a little brother. Nostalgia was biting me pretty hard.

Dad was starting to teach me other things, too. Little exercises—cat’s cradle, stretches that I probably wouldn’t have managed to pull off in my old life, and so on—designed to test and enhance fitness. Though I think the whole cat’s cradle thing was for dexterity, and with hand seals being a priority for ninjas, I kind of wondered why I’d never thought of it before. It would be easier with a sibling to practice on, since Dad’s hands were so big, but it was fun anyway. He even gave me a picture book on more of them, and it wasn’t long before I was pestering him with new questions for the exercises in the book.

I think he started me on the chakra control exercises solely so I’d wear myself out. He was a ninja after all, and it can’t be fun to come home to a babbling three-year-old with severe word vomit after a long day at the outposts. I was in the “why” stage, even if I saw some civilian children who turned it all up even further than I did.

When it came to Mom, I noticed that she got tired more often and quicker than she used to. It scared me because I knew she wasn’t especially healthy, but she went to the doctor often and there didn’t seem to be any real problem. If I’d really been three, I think the other main thing I would have noticed was how Mom’s belly kept growing and her lap kept shrinking, until I couldn’t sit in it anymore and Dad would have to bounce me on his knee until I got dizzy.

On the due date, Mom went into the delivery room alone and Dad sat with me outside. I had my toys with me—I still liked to chew on rubber kunai, for some reason—but I just sat there and stared at them for a while. Even my book about the Sage of Six Paths and the Tailed Beasts (censored to hell and back, of course) seemed boring with all this nervous energy in the air.

I yawned, rubbing at my eyes and feeling my toddler body start to succumb to the inevitable—mainly an early bedtime I’d never managed to get around, since I had ninjas for parents. Well, at least one ninja—I’d never seen Mom in a chūnin vest.

“Keisuke-chan, bring that book here and I’ll read a story for you.” Dad said. I crawled up onto his leg, book in hand, and he opened it to the page on the Sage and his two sons.

I was probably asleep before he finished the first page, but I woke up again when Dad carried me to see the new baby.

Only we didn’t end up in the maternity ward. We went to the Neonatal ICU.

Mom was there too, and though she was paler than normal and was being wheeled around by a nurse all in white. She looked okay, even though it must have been less than an hour since the birth, so what was wrong couldn’t have been with her. She’d be in the normal Intensive Care Unit or something otherwise. Instead, we all turned to the window and looked into the room full of incubators, though only three were occupied, and Mom held my hand, even though Dad was still holding me.

Dad said, “Keisuke-chan, do you see the box on the far right?”

I looked. I couldn’t read the writing on it from this far away with bad lighting, but I could see a tiny form in the plastic. There were two ports with gloves attached to them, so no one would get close enough to make the baby sick with adult germs, and I thought I could see enough of the wires and tubes running into the box to make a guess that something was very wrong.

“That’s your little brother, Hayate.” Dad said, and Mom let go of my hand so he could lift me onto his shoulders.

“Why’s he in there?” I asked, leaning over with my tiny hand fisted in Dad’s hair. “I wanna see him!”

Besides, the name Hayate Gekkō was setting off warning bells I hadn’t even known I had.

“He’s…he’s having a little trouble breathing right now. He’s a new baby—they’re pretty fragile.” Dad said, hesitant. “We’ll take him home as soon as he’s better.”

Little Hayate started coughing, sending the medics in the room into a frenzy of activity I couldn’t follow.

Of all the things I remember from my first life, the clearest memories involve my family. It’d taken two weeks before I even realized I was in Konohagakure, and some of the earlier details about the plot of the series had sort of fallen through the cracks. I knew that, for example, Kakashi was pretty important to the plot in a lot of ways—I have my favorites among the cast, after all—and that the story was ultimately Naruto’s, and so on and so forth. But if you asked me in my old life about some of the minor, one-shot ninjas—especially if they showed up in filler arcs or movies—I’d have probably needed a minute to exercise my Google-Fu and figure out who you were talking about.

But with the breathing tubes and the incubator, and the strange echo of a lower, more insistent cough running through my head, I knew then that my baby brother was the same person who ended up being the first named Konoha-nin killed for Orochimaru’s Chūnin Exam invasion, in the far future. He’d be a lamb to the slaughter, despite his skill and speed, and all for knowing just a bit too much. The man who killed him would become an ally, and no one would ever know he’d done it.

I don’t think I ever really knew what hate was, until that moment.
Or fear.

Chapter End Notes

Originally published 7/29/13.
I started having chronic nightmares not long after we finally got to take Hayate home.

Children generally don’t become the center of their own unconscious narratives until they’re eight or so, when the world of me versus not-me is clearly defined and suddenly it seems like everyone decides to be the hero of their own story all at once. I still had the occasional dream where I was just watching the world go by, like clouds, but when Hayate finally replaced me in the nursery was when the dreams of my old life started coming back with a vengeance.

I don’t blame Hayate for it. He couldn’t help having sensitive lungs or being a baby. He couldn’t help being a part of my memories from before I died. The fact that my imagination wanted to combine my baby brother and the sight of the dead special jōnin on the rooftop, with blood everywhere and crows pecking at his thoroughly mangled corpse? Wasn’t his fault, but it ate into my brain all the same. Sometimes I’d wake up in the middle of the night, shaking with grief and rage too big for my body, and I’d creep into the nursery to make sure he was still breathing.

Mom and Dad both noticed that I wasn’t getting a lot of sleep—it’s pretty hard to get anything past a ninja when you’re barely capable of speaking in complex sentences—but I think Mom was just glad I wasn’t jealous of all the time she and Dad spent with Hayate as he got bigger. A normal child would have fussed, or whined, or maybe demanded a refund (which is really more my memories of my old life talking than anything). I wasn’t a normal, fussy little girl around Hayate.

I didn’t want to be a burden when Hayate needed them all hours of the day. I couldn’t do that to any of them.

Knowing my brother would (or perhaps I should say could) grow up to be a dead man walking killed any envy before it could pop up.

That said, when the all-consuming worry eased off a bit—which was mostly when I was awake and could see him wiggling around on the living room rug as he figured out how to make his limbs listen to him—I was hopelessly attached. Hayate wasn’t a big child at seven months, and he wasn’t quite as solidly built as I was, which might have been due to me being a first-born kid who’d had our parents’ undivided attention for almost three years. But he was curious and sharp-eyed despite the amount of time he kept himself and everyone else awake with his persistent little cough.

God, I hoped it wasn’t whooping cough. The doctors hadn’t freaked out the last time my parents took him to the hospital, but I’m also not sure if they know what whooping cough is. Granted, I’m not totally sure I do either, but suddenly all of those vaccinations I got as a baby started being really, really relevant and worrying in their vagueness.

“Haa-chan?” Getting his attention could be a pain, sometimes. He was sucking on a rubber kunai not unlike my old one, mainly because it was too big to choke on while I was around and could get it out of his mouth, and occasionally gumming on it. If I’d really been three, I wouldn’t have been at all trustworthy when it came to my baby brother’s safety, but I wasn’t and my parents apparently figured that as long as one of them was in the house, we’d be okay.

Man, when he started teething for real it was going to be hell.

And all I wanted was to see if I could get him to grab onto a rattle. I figured, hey, he’s squirming around on the carpet and trying to grasp things with his tiny fingers anyway, so it had to be worth a shot. If I could get him to stop focusing on the kunai, anyway.

He looked at me at the sound of my pet name for him, at least. It was better than what Dad had managed—I think the way I’d been so hyper-aware as an infant had spoiled him on the whole child development thing. Hayate was probably at least a few months from being able to speak actual words, if he followed the normal progression for boys (as far as I knew, anyway).

“Rattle.” I said, waving it. He looked at me, then at the rattle. Then back at me.

Hayate made a complicated, indecisive sound around the kunai.

“Haa-chan, what?” I asked, and he spat out the kunai to wiggle after the rattle. I didn’t move it much—it’s not fair to tease someone who doesn’t really have any motor skills, even if he is my brother and will probably grow up to be a pain in the ass someday.

You know, if he doesn’t die before that. That thought scares me so much I can’t think sometimes.

“Kei!” Hayate said.

I blinked, pulling back a little. Had he just…?

“Haa-chan?”

“Kei!” Hayate said, starting to turn a little bit red from frustration since the rattle wasn’t in range anymore. I immediately gave it to him and he stopped pouting, waving it around as well as he could given that he was still a baby. I scooted over so he could reach me if he wanted, and he ended up drooling into my pajama bottoms a bit when he abandoned the rattle to gnaw on the kunai again. I didn’t really mind.

Okay, so maybe I was wrong about the talking thing. Hayate is officially a genius in my book.

“Mommy! Haa-chan talked!”

That night, at least, I didn’t dream about Hayate’s death.

Chapter End Notes

Originally published 7/30/13.
During peacetime, the minimum age to enter the Academy is five. Or, failing that, a student has to turn five within the next calendar year. Generally, only students with parent endorsements head there that early, meaning that orphans, civilians, and people who just don’t want their kids to end up on the front lines before losing their baby teeth (i.e., most people) join later, with less experience. Most of the rest of us join at around eight or nine. Early graduation is possible, though uncommon, and passing by a ridiculous margin was the main reason for it. People like Yamato and Kakashi could do it easily, and I was worried to some degree because, while I grew up with ninja parents, I still didn’t consider myself especially fit or intelligent by the freakish standards set by people like them. The only reason I even considered the Academy at all was a result of a few thoughts colliding in my brain, when Hayate turned two and I was five-plus-a-few-months.

One: Even though I was probably being slowly driven insane by recurring nightmares of Hayate’s death, I couldn’t just let it happen. Not without fighting it. Hayate might have been just an unfortunate casualty of the plot a lifetime ago, but here he was my little brother and I would kill anyone who dared touch him. The ferocity of my love and protective streak surprised me at first, because in my old lifetime I’d been on more-or-less equal terms with my brother and never really needed to defend him from anything in the peaceful world I remembered. But the more I thought on it, the more it stayed with me.

Two: I didn’t want to be helpless anymore. Five years of essentially complete dependence on my parents had put me off the concept for good, even if Mom was starting to teach me kenjutsu using a pair of practice swords out in the training fields. I wasn’t great, but between that and Dad starting to teach me the basics of the Academy taijutsu, I was off to something of a head start.

Three: Despite what some members of the village could get up to, I really did love it in Konoha. It wasn’t the strongest village—that title belonged to Iwagakure or Kumogakure—but it was one of the vanishingly few places that didn’t fuck up quite as thoroughly as, say, Sunagakure. Konoha wasn’t perfect by any means, but I didn’t know enough about the other villages other than their treatment of their jinchūriki to really tell how they behaved. And that Minato Namikaze would end up slaughtering most of them en masse. I wanted to protect the village my brother and I would grow up in, because there was a spark here worth protecting. Hopefully I wouldn’t die in the attempt.

It’s probably one of the worst motivations for becoming a ninja: fear. It was still mine.

By the way, when I said I wasn’t great at kenjutsu or taijutsu, I’m not really sure what “great” even means. I’d never seen a shinobi younger than the age of eight in the field, even though I knew a couple of people who would be just that when they got to that age, and definitely no one with extensive kenjutsu or taijutsu experience. Hell, if it wasn’t for my parents, I have to wonder how I would have gotten any physical conditioning done. I’m more prone to worrying myself silly than training myself into a coma, as a rule.
On the other hand, Mom brought Hayate to training one day—apparently the supply of genin babysitters was running low, no matter how horrible that thought is—and that changed things up quite a bit. Not because of anything Mom or I did, though.

I’d only been training for about a week in kenjutsu, so we weren’t exactly going all out. I mean, I was completely getting my ass handed to me every single moment of it, and Mom wasn’t even winded, ever, but it was still clearly a step in the right direction.

“Again, Kei-chan, we’re sticking with shinai at this point.” Mom said, holding her shinai up like a teacher’s collapsible pointer. Mom didn’t look pale and tired like this. She looked like a female samurai, all pride and power and I-will-beat-the-shit-out-of-you-if-you-look-at-me-cross-eyed. I think saying that I wanted to learn kenjutsu put fire back in her, though my backside would probably live to regret it.

“Yes, Mommy.” I said, but I kept looking at Hayate, who was sitting underneath a tree and holding a shinai the approximate size of a wakizashi. He was swatting at the leaf litter with it. Mom’s shinai slashed through the air in front of my nose, nearly as fast as a real sword, and I squeaked.

“Here and now I am your sensei, Kei-chan.” Mom said seriously. She held her shinai in a ready stance. “If I didn’t think you could handle this, I would have let your father continue teaching you only chakra control and basic taijutsu, but as my daughter, I think you have what it takes to go all the way.”

I felt my face heating up at the praise. Yeah, I could do this. It’d be hard and painful, but I couldn’t give up!

“We’ll move on to bokken as you advance,” Mom continued, “because even if the bokken isn’t a katana, there’s plenty you can do with a solid length of wood and don’t let anyone tell you otherwise.”

“Yes, Mo—er, Sensei!” I chirped, excited. Sure, she’d probably beat me silly again, but that was part of the training.

“Good. Now, let’s see your stance.” Mom said.

The thing about kenjutsu—or at least the version that shinobi used—is that you need to be highly mobile. There is a starting stance, for the beginning of formal duels and for centering yourself, but by the time a shinobi was using a sword out in the field the rigid swing-snap-retreat routine was useless except for moving meditation. It was mainly used to build discipline and strength in new students, but the average genin was likely to have double or triple the physical strength of a non-shinobi once chakra enhancement came into play. There was no other way that we could send genin on bodyguard missions from bandits, given the average age of an academy graduate nowadays—they’d get slaughtered.

Feet apart, with the right leg ready to lead, hands placed well apart on the shinai’s handle for leverage, and chakra quietly reinforcing my muscles. That was the only way to practice, even if I wore myself out more thoroughly that way. I’m sure that any actual aspiring-shinobi kid wouldn’t have bothered with the chakra part, mainly because most of them couldn’t even feel it backing each and every one of their movements, but I need to make using it second nature.

I figured I’d actually move on to the mobile stuff once I had the basics down.

“Strike-one!” Mom barked.
I jumped to obey. “Hah!” I shouted, snapping the shinai out sharply and making it emit a slapping sound as the bamboo slats touched each other from the force of it.

“Strike-one! Block-one! Duck! Backstep! Backstep! Backstep! Strike-two! I didn’t hear a snap on that last one, Kei-chan! Strike-two!”

Mom was kind of a drill sergeant.

After a while, there was sweat pouring down my round face and I was breathing harder than normal. I wasn’t really fit—sure, I was more active than I had been the last time around, mostly because there was nothing else to do unless I wanted to move into a freaking library for the rest of my continued existence—but I was also five. I had a right to the baby fat I had, okay? And Mom was making me work myself to the bone for, hopefully, a bit of an edge when it came to the Academy.

Basically, my endurance wasn’t great and Mom called practice to a halt just before I collapsed.

“Well done, Kei-chan!” Mom said brightly, patting me on my probably sweat-soaked shoulder. I was wearing a training gi, but that meant pretty much nothing when there was lots of physical activity and Konoha had the kind of summers I was never going to like. Hot summers, to be specific. With no air conditioning in sight. “For someone who’s just started, you’re doing great.”

“T-Thanks, Sensei.” I said, panting.

“Hah!”

Mom and I both blinked at the sudden intrusion of a higher voice and automatically turned to see where it was coming from.

Hayate stood under the tree—somewhat wobbly, but he’s two and could be forgiven for many things—and snapped his little practice wakizashi out again. “Hah!”

The sad thing? His form, given time and another foot of height, would be better than mine. I could tell even then.

“Haya-chan?” I was incredulous. He was a toddler learning kenjutsu.

“Kei-nee! Mommy!” he called, running over to us unsteadily.

Mom picked him up automatically, smiling widely. I took the shinai out of his hands, so he wouldn’t make Mom see stars, but it was clear that she didn’t care too much about that. She lifted him higher, twirling and making him giggle.

“You want to learn kenjutsu too, Hayate-chan?” Mom asked, as she nuzzled his face and he played with her long black hair.

“Ken…?” Hayate asked, pausing in his ruffling of Mom’s ponytail. “Wha’s that?”

“Swords, Haya-chan!” I broke in, grinning. “You’ll be a big boy soon, and you’ll get to learn kenjutsu with me and Mommy!”

“I can!” Hayate said, though I wasn’t sure he knew what he was agreeing to.

“Mommy, let me show Haya-chan what to do, when I learn more! I wanna help!” I said firmly, more sure of this than anything in my life.

“Of course, Kei-chan.” Mom said, and hugged us both.
I don’t really know how much I’d ever really be able to teach him that he couldn’t surpass me at in short order. But I guess that the true mark of mastery is whether or not you know something well enough to teach it to someone else, right? Even if that someone else is my two-year-old brother who’s probably a blade prodigy and will be more dangerous with a katana than I ever will.

I was feeling pretty good about my goals in life, then. The Academy was going to be cake.

Then Hayate started coughing again and the magic was gone.

Chapter End Notes

Originally published 7/31/13.
Lessons with Dad got more focused the closer we got to the year I actually joined the Academy. Sure, after a certain point he pronounced me sufficiently durable and skilled to keep up with the non-major-clan kids and flipped to focusing on chakra control, but I think he had his reasons, and those reasons probably revolved around not wanting me to graduate too early. I don’t blame him for it. The idea of being sent out on infiltration missions as a kid—and I hoped no one had ever looked at a six-year-old and thought they could do it, though with people like Kakashi and Yamato running around I really wouldn’t put it past the creepier assholes around here—scared the crap out of me. I was still planning on enrolling when I turned eight, and my parents seemed okay with that. That would give me anywhere from a year to three years to graduate, depending on both the how compressed the curriculum became as war approached and on my own completely-not-legit brilliance.

Anyway, around the time that Dad got around to asking me what I thought I wanted to do with all this chakra control, I’d been mulling the whole ninja thing over pretty much on continuous loop. Dad had noticed my very cautious use of chakra and eventually asked why I spent such a long time gathering it before ever even trying the leaf-sticking exercise, to which he got the answer of hyperawareness. I guess if Hayate got to be a kenjutsu prodigy—and as time went on and he soaked up Mom’s lessons like a sponge, I think any doubt about that faded from my parents’ minds—I could be a half-decent genjutsu-type kunoichi.

Er, shinobi. Let’s not get into how badly I suck at kunoichi-specific stuff just yet.

I was thinking about a possible specialization, since Dad asked and I hadn’t really thought about specifics before, and I ended up looking possible options up in books before I gave him an answer. Being a genjutsu-type shinobi, or a sensor, seemed well within my potential. If I had a sword for backup, then I could probably figure out how to take out an entire opposing team. A sensor’s range wouldn’t compete with a Hyūga’s Byakugan, but there were only so many Hyūga clan members in active positions, so I’d be able to find a spot for myself if I wanted. I was studying on this for about two days total, with the thought always in the back of my mind, when I got a wake-up call.

I’m not sure what brought it on. It could have been the heat wave we were having, or something in the water. I still don’t know. I wish I did.

Hayate and I shared a bedroom, once he was out of the nursery and my parents decided to revamp it into a playroom. It mostly meant getting rid of the crib and buying another bed for Hayate in my room. I slept across the room from him, still dreaming of his death every time my brain said he wasn’t breathing loud enough—blood everywhere oh god what happened to him no Hayate-chan please wake up—but it wasn’t as bad as before. I wouldn’t have to get out of bed to make sure he was still alive.

But one night, I was woken up in the middle of a perfectly normal dream. It was so hot then, hot enough that I’d asked my parents for a bamboo mat to sleep on since the sheets were sticking to my skin, and Hayate’s breathing was a little more labored than normal. Mom got a mat for him, too, and a thin sheet so he could feel like he was covered up, and we suffered through it together.

Waking up from stage three sleep is a pain normally, but my heart was pounding in my ears that night. It wasn’t like I was sleeping well when the weather turned muggy, but it still shouldn’t have involved jolting awake like someone had stuck a needle in my foot.

I rolled over, sticky with sweat and feeling in dire need of a bath to wash the stress away, and looked over to Hayate’s bed. “Hayate-chan?”

Hayate was coughing again. I got up and walked over to him, feeling his tiny childish chakra blaring an alarm that must have been too subtle for my parents to detect. I brought a faint blue glow to my hands, which was kind of like my night-light, and looked at him. Then I turned on the light.

I screamed.

Hayate has weak lungs, relative to what you’d expect from the son of a pair of shinobi. He catches a cold every time any of our neighbors’ kids get one, and his is almost always worse. His breathing is abnormally shallow, though I’m not sure my parents can hear it with the same precision that I can. I’m the paranoid one when it comes to my little brother.

All I know is that Hayate was rushed to the hospital within two minutes by Dad. He even spent his third birthday in the hospital, sick with something that sounds like whooping cough crossed with pneumonia and maybe poison. His lungs were giving out on him and there wasn’t a damn thing I could do about it. Mom looked paler and gaunter than ever, like all the life she’d shown in training had been sucked out as surely as Hayate’s breathing hitched, and Dad seemed stretched-out and helplessly angry.

I sat by his bedside more often than not, reading either aloud or to myself. He had an oxygen mask on, with little tubes running all over his skinny chest and a couple in the back of his left hand, and he was unconscious most of the time, but I read anyway because even if he wasn’t able to hear my words, I thought he might be able to hear my voice. I tried telling myself it was like back before he was born, when the only things he’d really hear clearly were Mom’s heartbeat and the voices of those close to her, like me. Mom sat with me, picking up the story when my voice cracked, and Dad stopped by every hour on the hour, looking more and more haggard as he demanded to see someone or something. I couldn’t really keep track of it all.

I was six years old. My brother’s hand was so small and pale in mine.

Normal doctors didn’t have any real way to fix what was wrong with him. They prescribed medicines and hemmed and hawed about, but ultimately what they do isn’t healing. It’s an attempt to kill the possible bacteria or viruses that were killing Hayate, but he was three. The bacteria and viruses probably had a stronger hold on life than he did. I hadn’t been there for his vaccines so I had no idea what he was supposedly resistant to and no one was going to tell a six-year-old civilian girl anything.

Hayate was there for a total of two days before a medic-nin—I could tell by the headband, after—stomped into the room with a glare that was two degrees short of making things spontaneously combust. “What’s going on here?”

I squeaked and my free hand went scrambling for the shinai strapped between my shoulders before Mom’s hand closed over mine.
“Yamaguchi-sensei, is there anything you can do for my son?” Mom said sharply. I’d never heard her voice like that, all steel behind the weariness and stress. She had a champion glare, too.

Also, where the heck did she know this guy from?

“Hand me that chart.” Yamaguchi-sensei said, rather than answering. Dad snatched it off the foot of the bed, shoving it into the medic’s hands.

Yamaguchi-sensei’s eyes swept over the charts and all the notations, marked only by the occasional grumble. My parents’ eyes never left his face, but I turned back to Hayate and squeezed his hand. He didn’t wake up, but I thought his eyelids might have twitched a little. Heck, he was probably under so many different kinds of sedatives that nothing would wake him up.

“Yes, I can.”

Those were the magic words I’d been waiting—praying—for.

What happened next was a blur, due as much to my exhaustion as the medics’ speed. I was still a child, despite my adult memories and thought processes, and Dad had to pick me up so we could all get out of the way. What I remember involves four medic-nin bending over my unconscious baby brother—each with their hands glowing with pale green chakra that hummed to my advanced chakra sense—the tubes in Hayate’s chest being removed for some reason or another, and my parents leaving the room with me still in Dad’s arms.

I don’t know how long I was asleep—or possibly unconscious, given how hard I’d been pushing myself to stay awake beforehand—after that. But I do know that when I opened my eyes, it was because Hayate had stuck a tissue under my nose and was tickling me. He was sitting in Mom’s lap, while I must have been in Dad’s. There weren’t any tubes in him anymore, and just a few wires remained connected to monitors that were beeping steadily and without stress.

He looked paler than Mom and more worn-out than ever, his eyelids drooping, but his breathing sounded miraculously even. He was smiling at me. He let me hug him as hard as I could, even if I sort of made him squeak for air by the end.

When we could finally bring Hayate home—again—I resumed my ninja lessons.

“What is it, Keisuke-chan?”

“I wanna be a medical ninja.”

Dad didn’t argue with me about it at all. He got me books, since he wasn’t a medic himself, and Yamaguchi-sensei would at least stop by the examination room every once in a while to give me pointers when we brought Hayate in for check-ups. I wasn’t going to be the next Tsunade, but if I could keep people alive long enough to make it to a real medic, that’s what I’d do.
So, here’s the thing about medical ninjutsu: It’s all about control.

Not even joking. While some of the bigger techniques for worse injuries can require a medic-nin to pour chakra steadily into a patient for up to four hours at a time, the important part of rituals, seals, healing techniques, and the anatomical considerations involved makes everything come down to chakra control crossed with mental discipline.

“Kei-kun, stop bullshitting the fish test.”

“Yes, Yamaguchi-sensei.”

Mental discipline is not exactly something I have an abundance of. Neither is chakra, primarily because my physical body was still seven, and mixing my abundance of spiritual energy with my physical stamina basically had a lack of the latter as a limiting factor. Assuming that the levels of my spiritual energy remained consistent throughout my lifetime, as the lopsided data was likely based on my adult soul, I’d have to wait for another eight years before I was anywhere near my old potential power. It was worse than trying to figure out phosphorus fertilizer proportions necessary for maximum crop yield.

Not that I needed to know that in my new life. Or my old one. It was just a relevant thought. Making a mockery of science tests is fun.

Speaking of which, medical ninja training involves slightly less paperwork, studying, and knowledge of human anatomy than becoming an orthopedic or emergency room surgeon. I was only a year in, and I could already see my sanity going down the drain worse than usual.

I still had the dreams, which always ended in blood and screams and death. Maybe the familiarity was wearing some of the edges off, but at least my waking hours were less affected than they had been in the past. I had a feeling that it’d be the best I could do on my own.

Anyway, back to the fish test.

One of the earliest exercises in becoming a medical ninja involved trying to keep a fish alive out of water for about five minutes. A wannabe medic-nin ought to be able to keep the fish alive, healthy, and capable of returning to the water with no ill effects. We weren’t trying to raise the dead, which usually meant the damn thing was flopping around everywhere because that’s what fish do. It was smelly and slimy and an animal that didn’t want to die of asphyxiation.

Which was why I’d come up with what Yamaguchi-sensei called “bullshitting the fish test.”

I removed my hands from the trout’s gills and the water I’d held against them splashed uselessly to the ground. The fish immediately flopped out of my hands, off the table, and back into the lake I’d pulled it from.

Cupping things—especially water, for me—with chakra was a basic exercise in what amounted to expulsion and molding. Most people chose water or dirt since those things stuck to skin anyway, and since fire or lightning would involve getting layers of skin or nerves being put through hell with no benefit in a medical sense. Wind would have been the easiest and likely the most useful in the field for medical purposes, but I used water because my subject was a goddamn fish.

Keeping the water oxygenated had been as easy as agitating it with my chakra. I wasn’t perfectly aware of the CO$_2$ levels of the water in my grasp, but I could adjust the cycling speed and watch my “patient” for a reaction. Was I doing it right? Was I killing it?

That said, because medical ninja were supposed to be able to pull oxygen into the fish’s lungs and blood manually via chakra control alone, my method was a cheat because I was making my fish do all the grunt work of respiration. I was only enabling it.

Oh, and sedating it, with my chakra slowing the transfer of signals in its fish-brain, so it didn’t freak the fuck out and flip all over the place. I didn’t have any interest in having to chase my fish around the shore.

Technically, I suppose that what I was doing might have been considered more advanced because of the multitasking I was doing, but it was still cutting corners somewhere.

“Begin molding chakra in your core, again.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. “Do not form any seals until I tell you to.”

I nodded and closed my eyes to focus. I also shrank my chakra signature to almost nothing to reduce the…well, the best way I can describe it is “noise.” In the electronic sense. Like radio static, or that stuff on a TV screen that says your signal’s shit and the digital device of your choosing needs a thumping. It was a lot easier for me to focus my own chakra to a knife’s edge when I wasn’t constantly feeling the random discharges my coils were prone to when I wasn’t paying attention.

“If there’s one thing you should take away from our lessons, Kei-kun, it’s how to approach a new case.” Yamaguchi-sensei said, walking around me as I stood at the table. I could feel the odd tingling sensation that made up his chakra signature as he went—he had a lightning affinity, he’d said, and he had to work around it every day he went into the Intensive Care Unit. “You will be thorough, you will be precise, and you will be right. You don’t get a chance to screw up in the field! If you do, someone could die.

“Hell, even if you get everything right, you may not be able to do a damn thing. You may fail to save a patient in the field—you will fail to save someone in your career. Failing is a part of life. Sometimes there just isn’t anything to do, and your patient is too far gone for anyone to save.” His voice went low then, like he was remembering something painful. “My goal is to make it so that you don’t make a habit of it.”

“Yes, Sensei.” I said, keeping my eyes closed.

“We will begin hand drills now.” Yamaguchi-sensei said, as though my voice had pointed him in another direction to rant. “On my mark, and do not channel chakra.”

“Yes, Sensei.”

“Dog.”
I folded my left hand under my right.

“Tiger.”

Thumbs together, index fingers raised with the tips touching, and the rest of my fingers interlaced.

“Ox.”

And so on. There are twelve basic hand seals, though anyone who pays attention to shinobi in fights (or is an Uchiha with a Sharingan) will notice that individual shinobi have their own particular variations. While these tend to vary based on village and clan, real modification of seals tends to mean something special. Techniques such as the Shadow Clone Jutsu use what I refer to as the Cross seal, while Haku Yuki’s claim to fame was his ability to use half-seals in combat as thought they were full ones.

What Yamaguchi-sensei understood, and what I did for different reasons, was that hand seals were primarily mnemonics.

The most dangerous advanced shinobi barely need to use seals for their favorite techniques. Orochimaru hadn’t needed the use of his arms to take on the other two Sannin and get away alive (with considerations made for drugging and phobias). They can pull off the same thing by merely molding their chakra the same way as a shinobi using seals. While undoubtedly slower without the memory aids, it had the distinct advantage of making it damn near impossible to predict or copy the technique involved unless one was both equipped with a Sharingan and either a sensor or blessed with a Byakugan.

So I guess that the hypothetical offspring of a Hyūga and an Uchiha would have a better shot at deciphering Orochimaru’s techniques than most.

I was learning, even at age seven, to dissociate seals from chakra molding. Not that I wouldn’t have probably done it anyway—my chakra sense made me all too aware of how my chakra was supposed to move for the techniques that I knew. Eventually, I might have been able to basically bullshit the seals to any technique as soon as I had the feel of it down.

You know, if I managed to live that long. Or avoided pissing off Yamaguchi-sensei too many times.

“Rat! Come on, Kei-kun, you can do it faster than that!”

Or if I managed to get through his training without wanting to murder him.

Chapter End Notes

Published sometime in August last year.

Note, because I forgot and I don’t think it even comes up in the narrative: Akihito Yamaguchi’s personality is some bizarre cross between Gregory House and Walt from Gran Torino, despite neither being in chronic pain nor being an angry Korean War vet. Aside from his gray eyes, he looks exactly like a generic medic-nin.

Also, this is the end of the first arc.
The thing about the Academy is this: while students do learn all of the necessary skills to become rather crappy genin, it’s also boring as hell.

Don’t get me wrong—ninjutsu (what there is of it), taijutsu (if your family style doesn’t blow it out of the water), and kunai throwing (which is something I resolved to learn, since Mom wasn’t exactly teaching me to throw things anywhere Hayate could see and then copy me) are all very important to a shinobi. The thing is, any kid with decent clan backing and enough ambition can cheerfully substitute the math, the weapons training, the taijutsu, and the chakra control exercises with their homemade schedule. The Uchiha clan’s training regimen—particularly when it comes to kids with a high chance of developing the Sharingan—is completely insane. Kakashi probably got trained by his dad starting from whenever he learned to walk. I don’t even know what the heck was up with Yamato and I really don’t want to.

It’s just that I was twenty-eight years old (if you counted both lifetimes) in my head, and an adult mind crunches through the text-based stuff way faster than the average eight-year-old. I wasn’t as quick when it came to things like taijutsu, since I sure didn’t have any memories to fall back on aside from Mom’s training, but that was okay. Everything else I could learn from Dad or Mom or books.

That’s what I tell myself, anyway. There are genuine geniuses here. I’m just not one of them.

I don’t think the other students knew what to think of this strange girl who could sleep through half the lessons and still ace the tests. Fact is, I wasn’t all that concerned with the tests—the only penalty for failing was in the class standings, not in real life just yet—and instead focused on my constant sleep deprivation. Even if I hadn’t been doing well by the books, I’d have needed to take naps to make up for all the nightmare interruptions I had to live with. When it came to naps, at least, I was home free. I don’t think I had enough time to drop into Stage Three, given the whole class schedule thing and the fact that the lunch was only an hour long.

Of course, someone had to stroll along and break the monotony that was my school life, and he did it by tripping over me as I snoozed on the playground. Eventually, I would get used to sleeping in trees solely so people didn’t trip over me ever again, but that wasn’t the day.

Anyway, the first indication I got that trouble was coming was when I felt a sandal scrape across my foot and totally twist it the wrong way. As a side note, I’m kind of a crappy sensor when I’m sleep-deprived. Which is all the time. This isn’t really saying much about my sensing abilities, now that I think of it.

Both of us ended up yelling “Ow!” at the same time. I pulled my foot back, because a tweaked ankle is no fun when taijutsu training is later in the day, and pulled my sandal off so I could get a better look at the damage. About a second later, I realized I probably should also take a look at whoever had just face-planted into a tree root or a swing, and was greeted by the sight of a boy’s butt sticking up in the air as he tried to get his face off the ground and do his own assessment of his injuries.
“You okay?” I asked. My hands were glowing a faint green as I preempted any swelling from my ankle—I was good enough with medical ninjutsu to manage that much, at least. I’d probably be able to make sure Mr. Awkward Landing was all right, too, assuming he hadn’t knocked a tooth out.

Then again, we were eight, so maybe that wasn’t even much of a big deal.

At the sound of my voice, he rolled over so he was sitting on the ground, clutching his face. He even had dirt in his spiky black hair. It was like instead of going for a faceplant, he’d tried to be an ostrich. “Ow... Man, if I didn’t have my goggles that would’ve been bad!”

My experience with fashion is and probably always will be limited. I nonetheless maintain that snowboarding goggles are not actually a reasonable accessory in Konoha, which hasn’t seen a snowfall in the course of known shinobi history. Land of Fire and all that.

The boy continued muttering, “Though I didn’t need goggle lines on my face like that...” All of a sudden, he glared at me and said loudly, “Hey! What were you doing sleeping here anyway?”

“I’m tired, the tree provides shade, and people usually don’t run around it too much, because of all the roots.” I suggested, looking over at him with half-lidded eyes. I was tired all the time, true, but that didn’t mean that I wasn’t aware of things when I had to be. “Anyway, are you okay?”

Sure, people tripped over me, but as far as I was concerned that was more their problem than mine. I wasn’t exactly napping in the middle of a hallway, after all.

“I’m fine!” he insisted, waving his arms for emphasis. “It takes more than a pratfall to defeat the great Obito Uchiha!”

Oh what the fuck.

On one hand, the kid in front of me was a genuinely well-intentioned if clumsy person. He was probably, at the moment, the only explicitly identified Uchiha alive (since I couldn’t remember if Itachi had been born yet) who wasn’t some kind of arrogant douche. He was kind, thoughtless in a kind of endearing way, and trustworthy unless it came to paying attention to a clock.

On the other hand, Obito could grow up to be Tobi.

For about five seconds, I just stared at him like he was from another planet.

I was also solidifying my reputation as a total space-case. Oh well. I don’t think Obito even noticed, and I think it was because his goggles had dug uncomfortably into the bridge of his nose, and he got distracted by the pain again.

“Seriously, though, that hurt!” Obito said.

I frowned. “Take those goggles off so I can see what’s wrong.” I said, getting up onto my knees.

“What? No, there’s nothing wrong!” Obito insisted. He might have tried crab-walking away from me if it wasn’t for the fact that the root he’d hit was in the way.

“If you want me to heal that, you have to stay still.” I said. He froze. I continued, “I know it’s probably not serious, but there’s taijutsu later. It’s no fun to fight when you’re getting a black eye.”

“What, seriously? Oh man, I didn’t know it was that bad!” Obito fretted, pushing his goggles up so he could touch his nose. Bad idea. “Ow!”
“Stop that.” I ordered. It must have looked odd to outsiders, if there’d been anyone looking at us. The playground was always busy with tag games, though. I wondered what Obito had been doing before tripping over me, but I never asked. “I’m gonna make it look less like you got in a fight, okay?”

It seemed, even then, like Obito had to be held by the hand to avoid hurting himself. I’m still not sure if it’s a boy thing or just an Obito thing—most of the boys I knew later had different takes on the whole self-destruction thing.

“Okay, fine.” Obito said sullenly, pushing his goggles up on his forehead.

It wasn’t really that bad—like with other bruises, it was just a matter of closing up burst blood vessels and urging the body to clean up the now-useless extra blood. It was only a bit worse than my foot, even if Obito’s issue was way more colorful. I was just speeding up what his body would do naturally over the course of a week, and it didn’t really take that much chakra to accomplish that on something so minor. At least he wouldn’t look like a panda, like me.

“That feels funny.” Obito said, closing his eyes against the green glow of my chakra.

“It’s supposed to feel better.” I said, taking my hands away. I felt drained—it took chakra to heal, and as an eight-year-old I didn’t have much in the way of reserves just yet. I would, though. Even if I had to train to exhaustion.

“Well, yeah, it feels better too.” Obito said. He opened one eye, seeming to check if I was done poking him, and then poked at his nose experimentally. “Oh! It doesn’t hurt at all!”

“And the bruise is mostly gone.” It would have been a pretty interesting bruise, too. Oh well. “You can check in the bathroom mirror later or something.”

“Nah, I trust you!” Obito might have been a bit too trusting, really. I hadn’t even told him my name. “So what’s your name? We can’t be friends until I know what I can call you!”

Obito wasn’t one for patience, I guess.

“Keisuke Gekkō.” I said, a little stunned by how fast he’d turned around from being a sullen klutz. After a moment, I added, “Though you can call me Kei, if you want.”

“Keisuke?” Obito paused, wrinkling his nose. “I don’t remember you being in any of my classes.”

“I’ve been sitting in the back of the room a lot.” I admitted. It’s easier to sleep there, without fear of someone shooting spitballs into the back of my head.

“Oh, you’re the guy who’s always asleep! Man, I know class is boring, but I thought it was just in class!” Obito said. He pouted. “But you’re higher in the class rankings than I am!”

Wait. What.

“Hey, do you want to play? I mean, it’s not much of a game of tag if we only have two people, but I’m sure I can find something else that we could both do.” Obito continued, oblivious to my growing dismay. He grabbed my hand, pulling me to my feet. “I think there’s still wooden kunai in the play shed and no one’s using the targets, and even if there are we can run them off.”

My expression went a little flat. “Obito, I’m a girl.”

That, and I still needed to put my sandal back on before I went running off into the wild. The rest of the world has splinters in it.

Obito has one of the most luminescent blushes I’ve ever seen. “Oh, uh… But you have a boy’s name…”

“My dad wanted a boy first. Though I don’t mind playing with you anyway; it was an honest mistake.” I added, feeling my lips turn up into a slight smile. Even though I was tired, he was pretty funny. “Where’d you say the kunai were again?”

At my easy dismissal of his major faux pas, Obito grinned brightly and tightened his grip on my hand. Blarg. Sandal. Wood chips! “This way! Come on, I’m sure we can get Rin-chan to join, Kei!”

Huh. The other aspiring medic-nin in the class. I hoped Rin wouldn’t mind us crashing her jump-rope session.

Rin Nohara—Obito’s only love, the lynchpin to the Plot, and all-around nice girl in a bad spot. I didn’t expect to like her at all, given how little I knew about her other than the fact that she was probably going to be in the same graduating class and how her death made everything go straight to hell.

“Rin-chan, wanna practice kunai throwing with us?” Obito called out, bouncing over to her with me hopping on one foot in his wake. Sandal!

Rin, bless her heart, agreed despite how utterly weird we both were. And I eventually did manage to get my sandal back on, finally.

So, that’s the story of how I made my first friends at the Academy.

That night, I had a nightmare about Rin’s death and Obito’s psychotic break. My subconscious was officially becoming unmanageable. So instead of just carrying on as usual, I went to Dad.

Dad didn’t really have a study or a lab or anything, even to practice his sealing work. Dad used fūinjutsu only to make explosive tags, mainly by copying the mass-produced ones down to each separate stroke. He used his blood, or sometimes Mom’s, in order to get better results than the market standard, but he never did anything else with it. He didn’t have a summoning contract with any animals that I’d ever seen, and I think Minato and Jiraiya were some of the few people to really innovate when it came to seals. Nonetheless, Dad was up late all the time, just polishing up his equipment for a mission or reading things in a mission file, or other stuff I wasn’t really supposed to see.

I guess if I hadn’t been a chronic insomniac, I never would have known.

“Dad, what do I do when I can’t stop dreaming about things that haven’t happened?” I asked, rubbing my eyes in the lamplight. Another sleepless night and I’d probably collapse in the middle of class. Not that me being less-than-conscious in the Academy was new, but I didn’t like the idea of not being able to choose when to drop off.

Petty, I know, but after five years of weekly or bi-weekly nightmares that never seemed to lose their edge, I think that I probably earned whatever sleep I did get. About the only thing I can say is that the really bad ones only happened occasionally, though as long as Hayate didn’t have a crisis of some kind I could usually get at least six hours. Nine was a blessing, when it happened.

I was so going to be a stunted adult.

“What do you mean, Keisuke-chan?” Dad asked.
I’d never really told Mom and Dad the real content of my nightmares. It was easier for them to believe that I was afraid of things like the first day of school, of shots, or of visiting the dentist.

“I’ve been having nightmares since…I don’t know. Forever?” I was hiccupping. “Daddy, I want them to stop.”

“What are they about, Keisuke-chan?” Dad asked, picking me up and settling me in his lap. “Are you having a tough time at school?”

Forever, to a kid, could mean anything from a day to the rest of their lives. Children are prone to exaggerating so much as an hour-long car ride, because not being able to move around and affect the world is incredibly boring.

“No! School’s fine, b-but I can’t stop…I can’t stop seeing things,” I started crying. Dad, thankfully, didn’t panic like he used to. Much. “Haa-chan…”

“Does something happen to Hayate?” Dad asked, rubbing my back. I looped my arms around his neck and buried my face against his stubble, even though it tickled my face.

“They killed him!” I sobbed, “I keep dreaming he’s a grown-up and dead and I can’t stop! H-he was there, and they sensed him, and they fought and there were traitors and he died!”

It was like five years’ worth of fear and rage and grief were trying to tear out of me all at the same time.

Dad ended up taking me to see the Yamanaka clan the next day.
One of the questions to ask yourself, when you're awake at night and unable to get to sleep, is “what am I really, when no one’s around?”

It’ll keep a person awake if they’re anything like me.

This isn’t due to anything like guilt—I was eight, and it’s hard for an eight-year-old to be responsible for much when there aren’t even any pet fish in the house. If I felt guilty, it would be because I hadn’t told my parents what was worrying me to death and thus worrying them by proxy. It might have saved us all some sleepless nights, especially me.

It stuck in my head because everything I used to define my “self” in this world—Keisuke—was tied to other people, to this world. The rest—the laziness, the knowledge, the maturity? That was the stuff from before. And I’m not sure Keisuke Gekkō as everyone else knew her would have been the same without the rest of me.

Anyway, Yamanaka mind jutsu tend to leave the victim—or patient, in my case—unconscious. When they don’t want you to know what they’re doing, they don’t bother to knock and say hello or use mental manners in any way before tearing your brain open. Granted, most people the Yamanaka use their jutsu on are enemies, or maybe each other for the sake of practice, so politeness was never the first course of action. Killing stuff was.

I guess the first sensation I felt after I “went under” was the feeling that someone was knocking on my mind. It’s weird to be pulled out of the day-to-day workings of the body, like breathing and stuff. I knew the Yamanaka clan jutsu weren’t actually supposed to be lethal on their own—it was what the jutsu did to you that was the real killer—and so I tried not to worry about the basic functions of my body while my mind was off being analyzed.

Speaking of which, my mind is actually pretty boring. I mean, how many people really have a mindscape that looks like a completely white room, with random images floating through the air and a Freudian couch, coffee table, and high-backed chair in it?

“My brain is weird.” I said aloud, listening to my voice echo. It was actually a pretty cool effect, if I ignored how empty it made everything seem.

“I’ve seen worse,” said Inoshi Yamanaka. I think he might be Ino’s grandpa or something, though he actually has visible pupils and his hair is dark blond instead of Ino and Inoichi’s spun gold. It’s very pretty all the same, though. “Though I have to ask—why are there two of you?”

I blinked (insomuch as I could without real eyes) and looked over at the couch, where Inoshi was staring. And there, lying on the velvet, was a smaller version of me. She was about four or so, looking exactly like I had at that age, and seemed fast asleep. A mirror floated by at just that moment, spinning lazily, and I got a look at my reflection.

I was an adult, with a fairly average, nondescript build. My face was somewhere between what I would look like as an adult in my real body (based on what I could understand about artificial aging and what I knew about my parents’ bone structure heritability) and a bit of what I’d looked like before, with the mole under my left eye that I’d had before I’d been reborn. I wasn’t especially sickly-looking, though I did have noticeable bags under my eyes, and my face seemed to have naturally downturned lips. I looked a little like a college librarian, if librarians wore Konoha flak jackets, had swords strapped to their backs, or wore bandanas with the metal hitai-ate plate on them.

Also, when the hell did I get glasses again? I must be the intellectual half, though fuck if I know how exactly there ended up being an intellectual half.

“I didn’t know I even had a split personality.” I said, frowning. “Or am I supposed to be the fake?”

“Neither half of a dissociation event is ‘fake’.” Inoshi corrected me. He looked very patient about the whole thing, considering that he’d gone into an eight-year-old child’s mind and found two different beings in it. “Now, how long have you been having these dreams?”

As if on cue, a dream fragment floated by. I caught it with one hand and brought it in front of me, flipping the planes of its surface so I could see it properly and not through a distortion that seemed like a TV viewed the wrong way.

Hayate, eavesdropping on Kabuto and Baki after Gaara obliterated Dosu for being a pest. Normally, that scene was the start of one of my most common nightmare episodes. Hayate would be discovered, Kabuto would disappear, and the fight would start. It only ever ended one way, and I never wanted to see it. But it was like watching a movie while my eyelids were taped open or cut off —nothing I could do could change it. It just went on and on, forever, and every time I saw this future I woke up crying.

Sometimes I wondered what it would be like to have normal nightmares, about dinosaurs and tornados and things.

But when I was like this, feeling and looking like an adult, the memory didn’t reach out and try to consume my consciousness. Instead, the younger version of me started to whine in her sleep.

“One thing that I obviously had a psychotic break when I wasn’t paying attention.” I replied, looking up. One of the dream fragments was falling. “Can you even have a personality older than you are? I never read anything about this before.”

“Normally, shinobi with dissociative identity disorder don’t develop their first split until after a mission gone bad. The alternate selves tend to be younger or older, depending on the trauma and which age group might be better able to handle it. People vary.” Inoshi replied. The guy was completely unfazed. I guess that as a Yamanaka, that was the whole point when it came to mental stuff like this. “Otherwise, the cases we see have to do with children exposed to extreme violence at a young age—the kind that a, say, four-year-old is entirely unable to handle. The split happens to protect the child’s mind from the trauma.”

“…I guess constant nightmares about my brother’s violent death could do that.” I said, and I caught the other dream fragment as it landed.

This one featured Rin’s death. ANBU, Chidori, Wood-Release-wielding Obito and everything.

“This one’s about a pair of kids I just met, when I was awake.” I said, sending it spinning off toward the other side of the blank white space with a flick of my wrist. “But the other one was all about Hayate. The rest… I mean, how the fuck is it that I have that many triggers? I don’t even know a kid with white hair!”

It wasn’t really a question. I knew exactly why the visions were there. But even if I couldn’t lie in my mindscape, misdirection isn’t impossible. There was a reason the mind could be represented as a maze. And technically, I’d never met Kakashi. But I did know of him—it was hard not to know about the Hatake genius, who entered the Academy and graduated within a few months, and who made mockeries of all the clan kids in his year.

Little-me started to stir. I decided to call her Id. Most of the Id is sleeping under the influence of the Ego and Superego, after all.

“The subconscious doesn’t deal entirely in facts.” Inoshi said mildly. “How do you know who the subjects of your dreams are?”

“I just… know?” I paused. That didn’t feel quite right. It wasn’t a lie, exactly, but it wasn’t accurate either. “…Even in my dreams, I’d know Hayate anywhere.” True. But not Truth. “Wait, no… I think I recognize him by his chakra. The feel of it… it’s part of what makes him Hayate and not some asshole under a genjutsu or a transformation. I know who he is.”

Inoshi nodded. “And do you know yourself?”

Shit. This was how I imagined meeting Socrates would be.

“No.” I said. “I’m eight. Or at least I think I am.” I waved my arms, gesturing mostly at myself but also at a passing memory, of my eighth birthday party. “This version of me is twenty-something and she’s four. And our body is eight.” I paused. “This is so confusing.”

“The mind is always a puzzle.” Inoshi said. “Do you have any idea why?”

Because I’m the subject of a botched reincarnation? I didn’t say. I’m not sure he would have believed me. Then again… wasn’t this my mind? And wasn’t my current appearance that of an older kunoichi version of me?

“I keep getting these dreams,” I said distractedly, as an image—grainy and warped—passed by our faces. I think it might have something to do with the Fourth Hokage, but I didn’t get anything more out of it than that. “They don’t feel like dreams—they feel like memories, because I can still picture it all even when I’m awake. Dreams fade. Memories—visions—don’t work the same way.”

Nightmares didn’t fade the same way, though. Fear stays in the mind longer than anything other than pain, because the brain tries to remember so the cause of the pain and fear can be avoided in the future. It’s useful for survival in terms of inducing a kind of threat-oriented mindset, but PTSD still has a major toll on mental health and the quality of life that follows after it develops isn’t really all that great. And it degenerates into paranoia all the fucking time, even though ninja are only paranoid when all of their enemies are dead. It’s not paranoia if they really are out to get you.

I closed my eyes. “I wonder, am I supposed to be…acting on them, somehow? I might be protecting myself from the pain…maybe I’m just a defense mechanism, and this is a warning for someone other than me. If I knew what was causing them, I’d be able to tell who the hell this is supposed to go to. Maybe they’re visions of a future. Maybe they’re nothing but utter paranoia.”

“And if they’re just anxious dreams?” Inoshi asked.

“Then I wish I didn’t have them.” I said, rubbing my eyes. Next to me, Id stirred.

“But you don’t believe that.”

“No, I don’t. There has to be a reason.”

I guess it was more accurate to say that I hoped there was a reason I had to remember all of this. Why couldn’t I have been reincarnated normally, and been born an average girl in an average world? Why here? Why now of all times?

“I wonder, am I supposed to see the future? Or is it just a possible future?” I mused aloud, with a sigh. “Is it just a fucked-up dream? Is any of this shit supposed to be real?” I waved a hand, gesturing to all of the cloud of memories and possible visions at once.

I was getting distracted. Id brought me back to earth, reaching up to grab my wrist without me noticing her move. I looked down.

For being a four-year-old version of me, she looked so tired I almost wanted to tell her to go back to sleep, but this was her mind too. Instead, I picked her up and held her, balancing most of her weight on the shelf of my hip. She clung to my neck.

“I don’t have any idea what I’m doing.” I said. I ran my fingers through Id’s hair as she sniffed. “But I don’t want Hayate to die. Or Rin, or Obito, or anyone else I might dream about. Maybe the stance I’m going to take is a selfish one—I’m really only protecting myself from pain, at the end of it all—but I don’t want to just sit on my hands and do nothing.”

Inoshi made a noncommittal noise.

He was the best sounding board ever.

The sad part is that, as the only soul of this body, I’m the one who created Id to protect me. She’s the child, the innocence, the carefree part of me who clings to her parents without ever thinking of the life I used to have. She’s the one who loves Hayate with a child’s understanding and easy affection. I love him with the fierce, defensive love of an adult with responsibility for his life. The same translates outward into the rest of our relationships with other people, because splitting our reactions means there’s no middle.

Both of these things are a part of me. I just partitioned them off like they were different countries because I’m an idiot and because I’m under stress.

I think.

“I wish I could take all of these and just…I don’t know, put them in an album or something.” I said, looking up at the seething mass. The cloud of visions and dreams seemed to titter, as though the murmur of a crowd had suddenly increased to a proper speaking volume. “That way I’d be able to take them out, in order, if I wanted to see something. I mean, some of them could be like alarms, when they’re coming up, but some of them are just trying to turn me into a sobbing wreck.”

Not that they really needed to work at it.

God, I wished there was some kind of manual for being a half-assed retroactively precognitive crazy person. Though the fact is, if anyone else did manage to write it, I’d be too busy feeling sorry for them to read it. I’m terrible like that.

Then the cloud above our heads began to roar, as though a thunderstorm was building. There was the clashing of cymbals, along with the sound of a trumpet blast, and a line of the floating menagerie of images extended outward from its main mass. As I watched, the line morphed into a swarm as the rest of the visions followed along, almost as though something was sucking them away from the flock.

The lead vision was heading right for us, leading the horde.

I raised my free hand to meet it.

Inoshi and Id’s hands joined mine.

Pain’s Almighty Push turns Konoha into a crater…

The Ten-Tailed Beast’s attack strikes the Alliance headquarters in Kumogakure, killing hundreds…

“*Sakura. Thank you.

Kurenai’s eyes widen as Shikamaru tells her of Asuma’s death…

“*…or your son dies at the ripe old age of one minute…

“I’ll take care of the mess…”

I blinked. The white room’s customary haze of memory and prophecy was fading, leaving me sitting in the high-backed shrink’s chair without Id, feeling inexplicably shorter and glasses-less. The younger version of me was nowhere in sight. Inoshi was, though, and he sat on the couch with his legs crossed in front of him.

“Well, that was something.” Inoshi said.

I made a mild sort of noise and kept looking around for both the missing cloud and Id. There was this stupid fog everywhere. “Yeah, and now the other me is missing. Hey, Id!”

“Hello.”

Oh holy shit.

The result of the…storm, I suppose, wasn’t what I expected. I’d expected that Id would be there, and she was. It was just that there was also a new girl there, hovering in the center of her personal light-show—almost as though she’d picked up the Fourth Raikage’s Lightning Armor, if the armor could be made up of light, colors, and sounds that hit me like slaps to the face. She was older, looking around eight or nine, and she actually looked like what our real body was supposed to, if I could mentally subtract the light show, the way her eyes glowed gold, and the way her feet didn’t quite touch the “ground” of this mental world. And yet she was still Id in the way her energy still had that childishness that mine lacked.

“I’m the Dreamer. It’s nice to finally meet you.”

“…I’m just gonna take a guess and say that you’re basically everything I haven’t really been managing that well.” I said in a strangled voice.

“Yes and no. Neither of us are the ‘true’ Keisuke Gekkō, but she’ll make herself known in time,” the Dreamer replied. She didn’t move her mouth. It was a little disconcerting. “I am hope for the future. And your dread.”

I looked at Inoshi, who shrugged. I had no idea if this kind of thing was supposed to be normal.

“Okay, between the visions and the memories and the sleepless nights, I guess I should have figured that something else was going on.” I admitted. “So, which one of us is going to be the one to wake up?”

“You, of course.” I blinked at her. “You’ve done well. I’ll hold your visions back until they can be useful, and in return you’ll help me analyze them for clues.” The Dreamer smiled sheepishly. I couldn’t help but think that the expression didn’t belong on her face. “Two heads are better than one, right? I can’t claim to know everything that goes on when you’re the one doing the thinking.”

“Yeah, but usually the two heads in question aren’t in the same head.” I sighed, scratching at the base of my ponytail. “Why are you offering me anything?”

“You gave me love.” The Dreamer’s smile became sad. “All of your love is mine, too. And I’ll help you protect our precious people.”

“…oh.” I said in a small voice.

“After all, I’m a part of you, too.”

I nodded. Everything in the mind was representative of something, whether how someone viewed him or herself to deeply hidden and reviled issues. It was all symbolic, mostly, but I had a feeling that the Dreamer was more or less what I ought to have had a handle on to start with. She felt friendly, but she was young and despite holding my memories back, I knew that there had to be a reason for it.

I think she was supposed to represent my attachment to this world. All of it, good and bad alike.

“Inoshi-san? I think we have it together now.” I said, turning to the Yamanaka in our midst.

“Yes, that’s probably enough for now.” He held out both hands, offering. “Ready to come back to us?”

The Dreamer and I grasped one hand each at the same time.

I woke up in Dad’s lap just as Inoshi was pulling his hand back from my forehead. I smiled tiredly.

“Hi, Dad.”

“Doing better, Keisuke-chan?” Dad asked, pushing my bangs from my forehead so he could take my temperature, even if I didn’t have a fever. I guess that between my instability and Hayate’s chance of a relapse, Dad was always worried about at least one of us.
Was I really? Well, between the spiritual trip and meeting my other self, I think I managed pretty well! Sure, I wasn’t ever going to be a normal kid, and I’d probably worry my head off all the damn time because of both being a ninja and what generation of ninja I was going to be, but I was…okay. Yeah. It sounded right. No one else here fit my old definition of normal anyway, so I guess I was in good company.

“I’ll be okay, Dad.” I said.

(Or rather, I was pretty sure I would be. As soon as I knew for sure that what Inoshi had seen hadn’t been entered in any secret shinobi archives for later perusal by the Hokage. Except that I never would get that reassurance. Even confirmation was a long time in coming. Almost too long. But that can wait for another time.)

That night, I didn’t dream. Not a normal dream, anyway.

“Ready to give it a shot?”

“You bet.”

Chapter End Notes

Inoshi Yamanaka: Ino’s great-uncle. OC.
Of Things to Come: Links in a Chain

Chapter Summary

Kei: Socialize.

I didn’t have a plan.

I mean, I knew broadly that there was a point A (wherever I was in terms of the timeline) and a plethora of point B possibilities (the various visions). I even knew the details of some of them. But it had been so long since I actually saw some of the non-nightmarified quasi-future that I could only read them as though out of a book. Sometimes the specifics were missing. Sometimes very big details were entirely gone.

I still didn’t know when the Third Shinobi World War started.

The Dreamer’s job was partially just to hold back the stream of unnecessary images that had been driving me completely crazy over the past five years. The other part, which we worked on together, was in hammering out some kind of plan of action in order to make sure that we and everyone we knew made it out alive.

I mean, sure, the thing about life is that no one does, but I’d at least like to make it to twenty again. It’d be a shame to fail so hard at this ninja business that I couldn’t even beat my old record of time spent alive.

Sharing the burden over two people helped. I wasn’t drowning anymore. Someone had thrown me a lifeline.

We’ll be okay.

I sure hoped so.

I went back to school the following Monday, since Dad and Mom declared the next few days and the weekend after a family extended weekend. It was really just an excuse for them to watch me for any changes, but I had fun drawing with Hayate anyway. He was getting a lot bigger, and soon he’d be quicker on the draw than I was when it came to kenjutsu. About the only thing he couldn’t seem to figure out how to do for himself was cook, but since he was about three feet tall and I didn’t like to move the footstool, I didn’t mind taking over for him.

Besides, the day I let my five-year-old brother near a stove uneducated is the day I trip down a well and drown.

“Kei!” Obito shouted, bounding into the classroom well over ten minutes late. I wondered what he’d been doing beforehand that was so distracting, but it didn’t really matter. Obito was reliable in that he could always be counted on to be doing someone a favor. “Oh man, we haven’t seen you in forever! Were you sick?”

I guess the teacher was a bit too busy to note Obito’s entrance, even when Rin drifted over to us as though pulled by some strange gravity. After all, the Inuzuka in class was being overexcited again.
Koga was excitable in a totally different way than anyone else, though.

“Sort of.” I replied, resting my chin in one palm, elbow on the desktop. “I’m better now, though, and I don’t feel quite so tired anymore.”

“That’s good.” Rin said. “I was really starting to worry—I mean, we only met a week ago, but you seem like a nice person and it would be terrible if you were sick or hurt and we didn’t have any idea.”

I have a hard time believing that I’d be so openly compassionate about someone else a week into knowing them. But then, that’s why Rin’s Rin and I’m me. Rin’s too nice to really dislike, even if I wanted to.

“Thanks, Rin-san, but it wasn’t really anything big.” I said mildly. At their disbelieving looks, I added, “Dad just wanted me to take the rest of the week easy. And I haven’t fallen asleep randomly since!”

“So does that mean you’re actually going to listen in applied chakra theory period now?” Rin asked.

“No.” I replied. I’d done more chakra control exercises than the Academy could cover, period. It helped that I was aware of it, and the Dreamer tended to help just by pushing back at me so I’d have a better understanding of what and what not to do. It was like wearing training weights, but in my head.

Rin sighed, but Obito grinned. “Oh come on, it’s not like we’ll need to know how to stick leaves to our foreheads in the real world.”

I made a neutral noise and unloaded my school bag as Rin frowned. I was starting to think that having a conciliatory personality, when it came to being friends with someone like Obito, might not be the best tack to take. I wasn’t especially confrontational either, but that was more because of laziness than a desire to please everyone, most of the time. It just wasn’t worth jumping down Obito’s throat about things.

Then again, we were eight, and none of us were especially set in our ways (with an exception made for me and my habitual laziness).

“But Obito, it’s the first step toward learning some of the more useful exercises.” Rin said, looking a little disappointed that someone else wasn’t taking their studies seriously. It must have been trying to have two apparent slackers as friends.

My grades said otherwise, giving that I was sitting at the top of the charts. Obito’s…not so much. He’d just never been especially intellectual, from what the Dreamer and I had surmised. I theorized that he learned better through movement than books or lectures, like a few other people I’d known.

Of course, he could be genuinely slow, but I doubted it.

“I started there.” I offered, flipping my book open to the page on chakra pathways. I planted my elbow in the middle of it. “But Dad had me move on once I managed to do three at once and got bored.”

“Wow! You learn fast!” Rin said, surprised but pleased. I’d given her an easy explanation for my boredom in class. “How far are you now?”

“I was starting to work on tree climbing, but I don’t have enough chakra to do it much.” I admitted. My reserves weren’t ever going to be all that great. While I did have shinobi parents, and very good chakra control, someone like Obito—who was descended from generations of ninjas—or Kakashi—who’d been training since he could walk and had the goddamn White Fang for a dad—would easily outdo me. Rin probably wouldn’t need huge reserves, though as an orphan it was hard to determine if she’d ever get them anyway.

Anyway, it wouldn’t be until we were about nine or ten when our cores started to really stabilize, according to the book.

“So, how long have you two known each other?” I asked, since I knew I hadn’t seen either of them when I joined the Academy.

“About three years now!” Obito said brightly. “Me and Rin joined the Academy when we were five!”

And yet I’m in the same class as both of them. Apparently my teachers paid attention only too well during the entrance examinations. I know I sure hadn’t been paying attention to the year ranking.

Don’t look at me.

“Huh. And I only joined a month ago…” I murmured, staring at my book without really seeing it.

“Really?” Obito sounded genuinely surprised. “That’s weird—I thought everyone joined up at five!”

“I think my parents held me back.” I said, though I’d been aware of it and had agreed at the time. I could see why they would want to—the older I was when I went into the field, the better chance I’d probably have of making it to being a sane and stable adult. I guess when it came to children from ninja clans, especially in wartime, the bars got set differently. Everything was about prestige and showing up everyone else.

That’s a lot of pressure on a five-year-old. No wonder people snapped.

“Huh,” said Obito. “Well, you caught up really fast! I wouldn’t want to have to teach you stuff just so you could catch up to our age group.”

“Obito!” Rin said, lightly scolding, and Obito wilted.

“It’s okay, Rin-san.” I said. “Neither of you knew. And I didn’t know it was a big deal.”

Actually, I was mostly interested in graduating by eleven. I probably should have taken it easier, though I don’t know how I could have. I was the class sleepyhead, after all.

“Well, we’re in our final year.” Rin said. “So you’ll be graduating with us, right?”

“I think so.” I said.

“It’d be so cool if we could be on a team!” Obito said enthusiastically.

I didn’t want to burst his bubble, but… “I don’t think I’ve ever heard of a team with two kunoichi on it. Not to start with.”

“That’s just because fewer girls pass than boys.” Obito said dismissively. “You’ll do great!”

I doubted that. Rin and I either had or would have some of the same specialties—mostly in medical ninjutsu and genjutsu—and putting us both on a team with Obito would probably lead to a disaster of some sort. And Obito and Rin, at least in my head, were destined to end up on a team with Kakashi and be subject to all of the shit that would follow. With Rin, Obito, and Kakashi on Team Minato, they made a pretty good generalist/fast response team, which was pretty rare. Most teams specialized, like the Ino-Shika-Chou trio and Team Kurenai’s scouting setup, or even Team Gai’s close combat assault team. But rapid response teams weren’t common.

I wondered what type of team I could end up on.

“I hope so.” I said. “It’d be a shame to skip three years and then fail the graduation test.”

“Hey, if you can skip three years, some lousy test is nothing!” Obito said.

“We’ll all do great.” Rin said, and we all shared a smile.

“NOHARA, GET BACK IN YOUR SEAT!” Takahashi-sensei yelled.

And then the magic was gone, but it didn’t die. Rin, Obito, and I were fast friends, and when it came time to fight over seating placements again the next morning, we all sat together.
Of Things to Come: Head Case

Chapter Summary

Kei: Chat with voices in head.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

On nights when, normally, I’d be due for another nightmare according to my once-a-week bout with precognition, I was dragged into my mental world. I honestly thought that I’d probably had way more conversations with the Dreamer than that, but like normal dreams, only certain things stuck with me. I think we put our heads together at night solely so I wouldn’t crack horribly in the morning, and the Dreamer paid me back for contributing to the collective and sharpening our abilities for the days ahead by erasing my explicit memories of the sessions after the fact.

If I’d remembered everything clearly, it would have been no better than the visions themselves. Less terrible, but no less taxing overall.

This is one of the ones I remembered:

The mental world I’d made had gotten a few new features since the last time I consciously recalled visiting. Where the floor had been a badly-defined white void that happened to let everyone feel like there was a floor to stand evenly on, with physics and everything, something had apparently sprung a leak. Where once there had been a white void, there was the usual setup of chairs and coffee table, but they were surrounded by soft blue-white light and the lowest six inches of everything happened to be underwater. There was the sound of dripping or sloshing water, everywhere.

Since I hadn’t learned the art of floating inside my head, I would have been wet up to the middle of my calves if this was real.

“How much do you know about the way that the world works?” the Dreamer asked, perching on the top of the high-backed Therapist Chair. Gravity, momentum, and the conversation of matter and energy sort of went out the window when it came to my dreamscape. Then again, dreams are weird in general. That’s the point. Neurons fire randomly when humans are asleep just to keep in practice, and then dreams follow.

After creating the Dreamer, I was starting to get more of those. Not visions.

I sat on the couch, legs crossed in front of me and Id’s head on my thigh, and said, “For a while there, I thought I knew at least a bit. Only being reincarnated and stuff threw that right out the window.”

“I didn’t mean cosmology, precisely. I meant this one. You know, the world you’ve been having visions about? That you live in?”

“Are we talking events or just the way this place is put together?”

“The latter.”
I lowered my chin into my hands, thinking. “The only reason this place is so weird is because of chakra, and that all came from the Ten-Tailed Beast. So, if it wasn’t for a giant unknowable monster whose death-slash-sealing became the source of all things natural energy, physical, or spiritual chakra, this would be like my old world.

“And yet, the Sage of Six Paths had to have figured out something beyond special to do anything at all to it, unless chakra’s somehow the local equivalent of radioactive fallout from the Giant’s existence, pressing down on the world and warping its structure. He had to have been the first—the Bruce Banner of the shinobi world.” I paused, thinking that over. “He made the beast’s energy his own. Only, from what I’ve seen, Tailed Beast chakra isn’t human enough to be used by humans unless there’s some kind of filter. Otherwise…”

The image of Naruto’s skin cooking off and regenerating and then burning again floated by, unnecessarily. And that was only from four out of the Nine Tailed Fox’s signature nine tails, and he’d been its jailor since he was born.

I didn’t want to imagine how much damage the Ten Tailed Beast could do just by existing.

As though on some kind of cue, a vision of the Tailed Beast Ball vaporizing Allied Shinobi HQ collided with the first image. The problems with thinking out loud in one’s mindscape were becoming obvious.

“True, the existence of the Ten-Tailed Beast did change this world from what we’d refer to as ‘vanilla mode,’ but its real value was in how it changed the creatures that live here,” the Dreamer said. “All humans are born with chakra. All beasts, birds, and fish are born with chakra. The air has chakra. The plants can grow exclusively off of it. This world is dependent on it, much like how life originally adapted to the expansion of oxygen supplies. If there is a resource, it will be exploited. Life finds a way.”

“Please don’t quote Jurassic Park at me.” I mumbled, massaging my temples. It would be some kind of world-ending paradox if I managed to get a headache inside my own head. “So, the world runs on chakra. We can’t say for sure, but if this world runs on chakra, there’s gonna be bad things if it suddenly doesn’t have it anymore.”

“Yes. You already know one form of it as chakra exhaustion. Or ‘death by chakra exhaustion,’ anyway. We won’t be allowing that to happen to us.”

“I don’t exactly have a large chakra supply.” I pointed out.

“That’s why I’ll be acting as your reserve.”

I blinked at the Dreamer, not quite comprehending. “Chakra is a mix of physical and spiritual energy. Like gas and oxygen, not enough of either or the wrong balance of both and there’s no ignition. And you don’t exactly have a body and it’s not as though either of us knows how the Yin Seal works.”

“You’re thinking of it a bit too narrowly,” the Dreamer said. “What are the elemental forms that chakra can take? Keep in mind that my being the storage center for your more detailed visions doesn’t mean I’m explicitly preventing you from using them if you want.”

Having the Dreamer in my head had reduced most of the visions to a feeling instead of a collection of possible triggers attached to a million flashbacks that kept going off every time my brain found a neuron to flip to On. If I focused, I could remember things like the first time I ever rode a bike. If I didn’t, I could still remember how to ride a bike, though there weren’t really any bikes in the new reality I found myself in. It’s the difference between an explicit and an implicit memory.

“Water. Fire. Wind. Lightning. Earth. Then there are the advanced kekkei genkai fusion setups, like Ice and Wood. Or Dust Release, for a three-way connection and stupid levels of destruction.” Some of the kekkei genkai weren’t advanced nature manipulation. There was Kimimaro’s Dead Bone Pulse, along with Sakon and Ukon’s freaky not-actually-conjoined twin act. I’d never figured out the name for that one.

“You’re missing the two big ones.”

I frowned. “Well, there’s Sage Mode and natural energy and sage chakra, which can turn you into a frog if you do things wrong.” Yeah, not testing that. “It’s also used by the curse seals because of Jūgo.”

“Off by a mile.”

“What, then?”

“Try looking a little further back. What did the Sage of Six Paths use in order to distribute his human-filtered chakra? What was he so famous for, barring the creation of ninja techniques?”

A picture of the Sage, wreathed in darkness, with his hands glowing red and blue with chakra that didn’t look like any of the normal elements. A Hyūga clan member, likely a jōnin Neji, setting up for Eight Trigrams Sixty-Four Palms on a background of the Taoist Taijitu.

“Yin-Yang Release.”

“And I am almost entirely composed of Yin chakra. Yours, yes, but I’ve been saving it up.”

“I thought you were a mental construct.” I said, dumbfounded.

“That too. This is your mind. It doesn’t have to make sense except in the most roundabout, half-assed, illogical way possible.” She shrugged. “I am the multipurpose, artificial personality-slash-mental-construct whose whole purpose is to make up for the fact that your soul wasn’t scrubbed out right. You run the body.”

I’m pretty sure she was insulting my Wikipedia-esque thought patterns. I go on mental tangents and get lost a lot. Along with my existence.

“What would we be if I’d been incarnated normally?” I asked.

“I wouldn’t exist and you’d probably dead by twenty.” The Dreamer said it so matter-of-factly that I almost felt chills. “This isn’t an insult to your intelligence, but we’re not particularly driven people when apart. Or ambitious. With no outside pressure, there wouldn’t be any visible or tangible need to improve. We’d be behind the curve eventually, and then probably die.”

“Oh.” I said. At least she was being nice about it. “So. Yin chakra.”

“The birthplace of all genjutsu and medical ninjutsu. It’s about getting something from effectively nothing. Or making it look like there’s something. Honestly, if we had a proper chakra storage seal, I wouldn’t even need to multitask like this.”
“What’s that actually mean for us? I was already going to be a medical ninja, even if I stab people on the side.” I pointed out, ignoring her complaints.

“With a year’s worth of Yin chakra saved up, I could create a very complex genjutsu,” the Dreamer suggested. “Or maybe heal broken bones. You really don’t have a lot of chakra to spare, so I’ve been trying to only take what isn’t used and won’t be missed.” And letting go only when she felt like it, probably.

“I’m nine.”

“And growing up will help. But we don’t really have that much time.”

I knew that much. If Tsunade could get away with keeping her Yin Seal intact for decades or however long she had, and could release it complete with hilariously overpowered regeneration capacity and super strength, I wondered what we could be with four years’ worth.

Except that I was never going to be one for punching. Stabbing, maybe.

“How the pair of you and Rin, I’d say she’s the combat-capable medic with emphasis on the medical half. Or she will be—it’s hard to be certain of something when we never saw anything about her other than the Kannabi mission and her death.” The Dreamer sighed, “You, on the other hand, will be a combat medic with the emphasis placed on combat.”

Well, I’d already known that. I hadn’t been a doctor in my past life, or a biology major, or even a particularly interested chemistry student. I’d been a psychology major with an interest in ecology, history, teaching, and half a dozen other major fields. I wasn’t one for technical details in anything other than my field, and learning cellular energy processes in high school had nearly bored me to tears. I didn’t have enough of an inclination, even with my external motivators of a) death and b) possible death were strong enough to change the basic fact of the matter. I didn’t have a brain geared toward medical ninjutsu the way Rin did. Mine was all analysis, for some reason. Cross-discipline.

And Yamaguchi-sensei noticed that. He knew I was motivated by my brother, not myself. It wasn’t quite what he was looking for in a full-time apprentice, and therefore I wasn’t one. I learned on weekends only. It wasn’t like kenjutsu, where Mom drilled me into the ground every day and I was happy to let her.

“Counterintuitive, but it can work.”

It’s just somewhat depressing when your optimism shuts you down.

“So, I guess that means no Hippocratic Oath.”

“For the enemy, no.”

I paused. “Also, did you ever say why you were gathering all my excess spiritual energy and converting it to Yin chakra, or why it was even remotely necessary?”

“It’s because of your situation.”

Bwuh?

“I’m not sure if you noticed, but your brain and the age of your soul have never matched up.” The Dreamer sighed again. I think I was the kind of person who drew frustration out of people. “If the reincarnation cycle had scrubbed your memories clear properly, it wouldn’t even be necessary. But how, exactly, did you think that you kept your adult mind when your baby brain wasn’t remotely capable of handling either the thought processes or memories?”

…I’d kind of just chalked it up to soul-body dissociation in the vein of Yu-Gi-Oh! and let it drop. I hadn’t had a lot of time to think on it, since I’d been a bit busy just trying not to freak out.

“So, chakra—one way or another, has been supporting my existence.”

“Chakra does the impossible. You’re an impossibility. The connection is a little obvious.”

The problem with arguing with yourself is that even if you win, you still lose. The other problem is that, because of the immense mental resources that had been entrusted to her, she was also coming to conclusions faster than I could. We were different, but the same pool of general information was there. I’d apparently handed analysis over to her for the course of this conversation.

“I give up.” I muttered, hugging my knees to my chest. I sighed. “So, we keep storing Yin chakra. We keep looking forward. We keep practicing. We keep hoping for the best.”

“At this point? Yes. It’s all we can do.”

With no actual evidence of anything, it’d be hard to convince anyone with actual power to act on my visions. Even Inoshi, who’d seen some of them almost a year ago, hadn’t seemed to really think anything of them. I didn’t even know if they’d stay accurate—you could be off by as little as half a degree, or less, but in the long run that was still a possibility for major changes. My visions wouldn’t change over time to reflect my existence. They weren’t, on their own, entirely reliable.

I could build on what I knew wouldn’t change. That was all. Everything else I’d have to play by ear.

Chapter End Notes

Metaphysics!
Of Things to Come: Unity

Chapter Summary

Kei: Pester Obito.

“Obito, what happened to your face?”

Not the most tactful thing to say, I guess, but I’d never seen Obito come to school with a bruise before. Especially not one in the shape of a hand. I mean, even in class spars we weren’t really going for knockout blows yet, since everyone involved was a kid and we were all future comrades. The bruise was bigger than my hand, which was on the upper range of fist sizes for our class, so it couldn’t have been a kid.

Not a kid our age, anyway.

“Holy—uh, Kei, did you want something?” Obito asked nervously, carefully angling his cheek away from me. I probably wouldn’t have even noticed the problem if he’d made a habit of sitting on my other side, but he was in Rin’s seat.

“I want you to show me what happened to your face, Obito. It looks like it hurts.” I said firmly. Rin wasn’t in yet, which I think was the only reason I got the obstinate expression out of him instead of a nod. He’d set his jaw and after that, only Rin would be able to get him to do anything.

Actually, the fact that Obito wasn’t late ought to have clued me in before I saw his cheek.

“No way! I’m fine, Kei.” Obito insisted.

“Then let me see your face.” I said.

“I’m fine!”

“No, you’re not!”

“What’s going on?” Rin’s voice came from practically nowhere and both of us jumped, though Obito immediately covered his cheekbone with his hand. “Obito?”

“It’s all good, Rin-chan!” Obito said.

“Then put your hand down.” I said.

Obito scowled, leveling a glare at me that looked more like a pout. “No!”

Every once in a while, I would forget that we were still eight, given that we were learning how to become killers while in school. Rin could be mature and modest, and Obito could take stuff seriously when he wanted to. And I was me, in spite of any craziness. Then stuff like this would happen.

“Obito, please don’t hide from us.” Rin said in a deeply disappointed voice. Obito wilted. “I’ll take care of you.”

Well, that could sure be taken a couple of different ways. I was suddenly glad that Rin was eight.
“Hey, I fixed you up the first day we met, too. Do you think we’re going to make fun of you or something?” I wanted to know.

“I know.” Obito groaned. At least he lowered his hand so Rin could get a look at it. “But it’s embarrassing.”

“I offered to beat up anyone who said anything about cooties.” I said. And I would, even if I had to smuggle my shinai into the classroom. Obito would just have to cough up the names.

Obito flushed, which looked pretty bad with the bruise. “That’s not the point!”

“This looks like you tried to block.” Rin said. When Obito tried to jerk away from her, she grabbed his chin. “What happened?”

“Uhm…Rin-chan…”

Owned.

Obito ducked his head. “It’s really nothing.”

I poked him in the side and he flinched. Bruised ribs, too? Had to have been a pretty bad beating. “That isn’t nothing, Obito.”

Obito tried to glare at me, but he gave up. He grumbled, without looking at either of us aspiring kunoichi, “It’s my asshole cousins, okay?”

At the word ‘cousins,’ I got the impression that the boys—probably boys, anyway—were older than Obito. They probably were embarrassed by Obito’s status as the class loser, ranked dead last in the academic standings, and of course decided that beating the crap out of him sometime before class was the best option to change that.

Sometimes I was really glad I wasn’t a part of one of the big clans.

Rin’s look made me think that she didn’t really know what was going on. As an orphan, she wasn’t exactly going to be missed if she died in the field—another thing that made me think that the ninja world was irreparably fucked-up even though it shared that with my old one—and she didn’t really have any major expectations riding on her shoulders like an albatross or a millstone or something. Heck, I didn’t really have any major discrepancy between my parents’ expectations and my accomplishments, unless you counted exceeding them in basically every way. Being better than expected was, while not perfect, a hell of a lot better than being worse.

Especially in the Uchiha clan.

Neither Obito nor I really wanted to have to explain it.

“You might have to go to the nurse’s office.” I said, my hands glowing green. I could fix a mild bruise like the one on his face without the teacher even noticing, but if Obito had any cracked ribs or damaged organs, well, I was out of my league. Granted, he probably wouldn’t have gotten to school at all of that’d been the case, but I still didn’t want to take any chances.

I also wanted to track those Uchiha punks down and beat the shit out of them, but that would have to wait until I was strong enough for my revenge impulse to be worth the name and not just a get-myself-killed impulse.

“I’m fine. I can skip if things get to be too much.” Obito said stubbornly. “Just don’t tell Sensei
“If you skip, I’m dragging your sorry butt to the hospital.” I said flatly. I remembered only too well where it was.

“Like you can.” Obito snapped back. He really must have been in pain. Obito usually didn’t snap at anyone—he just yelled.

“Between the two of us we might be able to take care of it.” Rin said after a moment.

Honestly, I thought she’d be the type to call on Sensei right away. Even if Sensei was an overworked chūnin who had so much trouble controlling thirty kids that he didn’t even notice the three of us conspiring in the back. He wasn’t even the first sensei we’d had, since the first three had been called to the front and killed or something.

“I don’t want this getting back to the clan.” Obito muttered sullenly. He didn’t look at either of us.

“…In that case, let’s ditch after lunch.” I suggested. At my friends’ looks, I explained, “Yamaguchi-sensei’s known my family since I was little, and he’s been the one teaching me how to heal. He might be a medic-nin, but he’s all ninja first and confidentiality agreements will help us.”

Obito asked, “Do you think he’d help us? Really?”

“I think so.” I said. I couldn’t really offer anything better. I tried anyway. “At least he’s better at healing than the school nurse or I am?”

“If we’re caught, we could say we were doing some extra work to polish up our scores.” Rin suggested. “Having a medic-nin cover for us would work, if we could convince him.”

Obito groaned. “I don’t have any choice in this, am I?”

“Nope.” I said, deadpan. “Just surrender to the loving care of your girlfriends and maybe we won’t break out the ribbons and glitter.”

“Kei-chan!” Rin said, half scolding and half laughing and all blushing.

Obito pouted, cheeks almost glowing red. “Kei, that’s mean!”

“I’m cruel to be kind.” I said loftily. Still, my expression softened. “We’re friends, so we’ll all look after each other.”

“Well, duh.” Obito said, rolling his eyes. “You two win this round.”

It turned out that Yamaguchi-sensei was pretty willing to take care of Obito for us, even if he didn’t exactly approve of the whole playing hooky thing and he was technically on his lunch break, too. We met him on the hospital roof, where he generally had his smoke breaks, and hiding from other people in the forest of drying sheets made it less embarrassing for everyone.

“I don’t even want to know what kids like you are getting up to nowadays.” Yamaguchi-sensei said, with Obito sitting on the concrete next to the chain-link fence that bordered the roof and kicking his feet idly. Rin and I hovered like overprotective parents, though we really weren’t being all that useful.

All the energy we had made us feel like sitting still was even worse, though.

“All right, so the obvious injury is the one on your cheekbone—I assume it was a sucker-punch.”
Yamaguchi-sensei said.

Obito mumbled something indistinct under his breath.

“If there really had been four of them, I hope you would have chosen to run instead.” Yamaguchi-sensei said, frowning. His cupped hand glowed green and Obito’s bruise disappeared under his fingers as we watched. “Unless you couldn’t.”

Obito shook his head minutely, scowling.

I wanted to shake him until his baby teeth rattled out of his head so I’d know who’d punched him and then would be able to plan my revenge. A few years down the line, anyway.

“Um, Yamaguchi-sensei, what technique are you using?” Rin asked.

“Mystical Palm Jutsu,” he replied, though absently. He wagged his finger under Obito’s nose and said, “Okay, you take off your shirt so I can see the rest of the damage. I don’t have enough chakra to heal broken bones at the moment, but I’m sure I can find someone who does and make them do it.”

As Obito grumbled but still shed his jacket and T-shirt, Yamaguchi-sensei continued, “I’ve been teaching Kei-kun here as much as she can handle for the last few years, but it’s always slow going with civilian children.”

It was my turn to scowl at him.

“You aren’t a ninja yet, so don’t you dare give me that look.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. He turned back to Rin and went on, “I take it you’re interested?”

Rin’s eyes lit up. “Oh, yes! If I could be as good as any medical ninja we have, that would be amazing.”

“Well, if you’re interested, I could spare some time. Kei-kun meets up with me on Sundays, mostly, but I could free up Saturday afternoons if you want. Unless you want to join her?”

I wondered how long it had been since anyone had given Rin a chance to learn one-on-one, and immediately tried not to think about it. Dammit, as an orphan Rin wouldn’t be missed by anyone other than us if she died, and that was so much less than the love she deserved. She deserved to reach for the stars like any kid, and Yamaguchi-sensei had offered her his regard inside of five minutes of meeting her.

I told myself not to be jealous. This wasn’t my show. I was not the center of the universe.

I felt envy anyway, since I always got a little possessive of people, which was stupid and irrational but still true. I’m still childish in some ways.

Obito gave a hiss of pain and I immediately stopped the pity-party to see what was wrong. And I winced.

Obito looked pretty bad. He had bruises on the outsides of his arms, on his back, and even one a little below his ribcage. He looked like someone who’d been knocked down and kept getting up despite or because of the curb-stomping session he’d been in.

I immediately started making the hand signs for the Mystical Palm Jutsu, even though I wasn’t exactly much in terms of chakra capacity, but Yamaguchi-sensei grabbed my hands and shook his
“This looks like it must have been one hell of a fight,” the medic said casually, already numbing the pain with medical chakra.

“Yeah, you should’ve seen the other guy.” Obito said, though most of his signature bravado was forced.

Uchiha clan kids are such shitheads.

“And I see you mostly managed to protect your face and ribs. It’s better than it could be.” Yamaguchi-sensei frowned suddenly. Given the harsh angles of his face and his gray eyes, it looked a little like a death glare without a target. “Let me see your hands.”

“Uh…” Obito hesitated, which meant that Yamaguchi-sensei grabbed his wrist and turned his hand palm-down. His knuckles were scraped up, but not as much as I’d expect from someone who punched training posts only every once in a while. There was blood under his nails, though.

I mentally smacked myself for not noticing earlier. Check for defensive wounds, idiot!

Obito wasn’t trained enough to punch people silly, though he’d be able to stand up to totally untrained idiots, and it confirmed my suspicions that the entire affair had been more of a desperate attempt not to get stomped to death. Obito would have been able to handle himself against pretty much everyone except ninjas. I was starting to see why the Uchiha clan had gotten such a shitty reputation in my visions, if this bullying was something they didn’t even bother to discourage.

“Officially,” Yamaguchi-sensei said in the driest tone I’d ever heard, “I’d have to tell you to go easy on training. Unofficially, I’d like to see what happens when Yoshi and Matsumaru Uchiha end up in the hospital in the future and spend their time strapped to their beds due to being a pair of flight risks.”

Obito flinched. “Ah, Yamaguchi-sensei, it wasn’t…”

“The two of them are thirteen years old and genin.” Yamaguchi-sensei said flatly. Okay, his glare was almost worse without a target to aim it at. Brrrrrr. “They should be disciplined enough not to pound on someone four years younger than they are who hasn’t even received his hitai-ate yet.”

“How’d you get their names?” I asked, crossing my arms.

“Some people come to the hospital with interesting injuries; nail marks, bites, that sort of thing.” Yamaguchi-sensei looked at me and said, “And you, Kei-kun, shouldn’t be spoiling for a fight you can’t win yet.”

Busted. I subsided, grumbling.

“Yamaguchi-sensei, um, what were the seals for the Mystical Palm Jutsu, again?” Rin asked.

Yamaguchi-sensei shrugged. “It depends on who’s using it. Personally, I use a modified Ox seal and then move to Tiger, but everyone I know bases it on what feels correct. Seals are just a shortcut in some jutsu, and when you have enough control over your chakra you can more or less do what you want. I’ve seen techniques with forty hand seals reduced to four.”

I was suddenly reminded of the Water Release: Water Dragon Bullet technique that Kakashi and Zabuza used against each other, and that the Second Hokage had been able to use without even really trying. I wasn’t sure if that meant that Zabuza, Demon of the Hidden Mist and master of the Silent Killing Technique, wasn’t inclined toward water-natured chakra, or if that something funny had happened when Kakashi had hypnotized him. I supposed I would never know.

“Wow.” Rin said.

“And if you’re asking, you probably have pretty decent control already.” Yamaguchi-sensei went on. He nodded at me. “Kei-kun has similar levels of control to a chūnin or low jōnin, and she’s smart. While you’re somewhat shyer, I think you’ve got the same potential.”

One of these days, I’m going to stop talking about school friends to anyone who’ll listen. I didn’t expect Yamaguchi-sensei to remember the stuff I said about Rin and her possible awesomeness. Heck, Dad didn’t generally even remember that kind of thing, and I lived with him! Not to mention bringing Rin over a lot, both to collaborative studying and just to eat dinner with us.

“R-really, Sensei?” Rin’s lip was wobbling.

“You can do anything, Rin-chan!” Obito said, and I noticed that all of his bruises had faded to almost nothing. Yamaguchi-sensei was good.

“If nothing else, I can teach you enough to stand out.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. “That should also be enough to make sure you make it to genin alive. And even if either you or Kei-kun washes out of the Academy, I’d be happy to take either of you as apprentices as long as you keep striving toward fulfilling your potential.”

Well, given that I had no goddamn idea what I was doing, that sounded like a neat backup plan for me. It was also a perfect out for Rin, if something happened. She’d never be without a path toward the future. Maybe Rin would do better at it, ultimately—at thirteen, she’d been able to transplant Obito’s Sharingan into Kakashi’s eye socket without any tools and in a combat scenario. She’d be a genius if she had a chance to be.

“T-Thank you, Yamaguchi-sensei!”

“By the way, what’s your first name anyway?” Obito asked.

“Akihito. The name’s Akihito Yamaguchi.” The medic shrugged. “Who knows? I may even apply for sensei this year. I am a jōnin, after all. Anyway, back to the Mystical Palm Technique…”

So, he and Rin hit it off right away and he gave both of us pointers toward what would, eventually, become mastery of the Mystical Palm Jutsu. Rin wasn’t allowed to use Obito to experiment—Yamaguchi-sensei recommended fish and small animals, between each application of healing chakra—and I was still supposed to be volunteering in the hospital before he’d let me heal people on my own, but I think we learned a lot.

And Obito learned that we’d go the extra mile to look after him.
Chapter Summary

Kei: Grieve.

I missed about a week later that year, maybe three and a half months before the exams. It wasn’t because I was sick (since I had been known, even in my old life, to show up at school come hell or high water or family crisis), or because Hayate had a crisis again, or even Mom’s apparent anemia. I wasn’t pulling out of school due to financial problems, there hadn’t been any injuries, and my mind hadn’t decided to fracture again.

But a little after I turned nine, Dad died.

Later, I found out that his rotation at the border station had been overrun by shinobi from the Land of Earth. Not all of them were Rock ninja—some were from Kumogakure, apparently—but the reinforcement team dispatched from Konoha didn’t get there until the fight was long over. It was part of the reprisal attacks for things that happened a couple of years back, apparently, and ultimately marked the beginning of the Third Great Shinobi World War. Dad and his team were all killed, even if we got the bastards who did it and tore them to bits after. All of the bodies were recovered, though that didn’t mean much for the families.

There was barely enough left to cremate, in the end.

Mom held Hayate through the ceremony, and I think he was just old enough that he understood what had happened. All of us dressed all in black, and while the sky didn’t open up to cry with us, it was shadowed by dark, heavy clouds and I made up for it in gross sobbing—it was Dad who’d been reduced to just a picture in a frame, with flowers from us and his friends and fellow shinobi. I’d grown up practically on his knee, learning everything I could from his low, scratchy voice and feeling his warmth when I was inconsolable to Mom. Dad wasn’t mine like Hayate was, because ultimately I couldn’t be responsible for anything about his life, but he was family and now his place in my heart was empty and the hole was bleeding.

It’s not possible to go through a life like ours without losing someone, unless dying young was in the cards. The life of a shinobi is full of pain and loss if you live long enough. I just didn’t ever want to feel that pain, even if it was inevitable.

It was naïve.

The hardest part was being back in the house after the memorial service.

“Sis?” Hayate said as I drifted from room to room, like a zombie. He followed me on my circuit of the house, quiet as a cat except for his voice, and I stopped at our parents’ room. My hand formed a fist on the wood of the door.

“Yeah, Hayate-chan?” I sounded exhausted even to my own ears.

“Daddy’s not coming back, is he?” Hayate asked.

“No, Hayate-chan. Dad’s not coming back. He’s gone.” I replied, listening to Mom cry through the
I turned away, picking up Hayate on the way back to our room. With Mom like that, it seemed that it fell to me to explain things to my brother. She’d recover, but Hayate needed an explanation now and I was just on the odd little neutral zone between being all out of tears and collapsing into bed to sleep off reality. I could do it.

We both sat on my bed, up against all the pillows I used to throw at him when we were younger, and he curled up against my side.

“Where’d he go?” Hayate asked, and he looked like he was going to cry again. He understood when things changed permanently, but I guess he didn’t quite get the permanency that came with death. Not just yet. It was sinking into both of our minds, like water through the ground.

“He’s dead, Hayate-chan.” I said, squeezing his shoulders. I tucked his head under my chin, so he wouldn’t see me start to cry. “I don’t know if he went somewhere better, but Dad died protecting us and Konoha. And he won’t forget us and we won’t forget him.”

“Why couldn’t Daddy protect us and come back?” Hayate asked, sniffling.

I squeezed him harder. “That…I don’t know. They tell us in school that there’s always someone faster, stronger, or smarter than we are and,” I swallowed, “Dad couldn’t do everything.”

Hayate buried his face in my neck. “I wish he could. Then he’d be here.”

We’ll survive. The journey of life is not painless—but with luck, we’ll be okay. Cracked, but okay.

I closed my eyes and buried my face against his hair. The Dreamer was right, but I didn’t want to hear it then.

“It’ll be okay, Hayate-chan.”

Privately, I resolved to graduate the Academy that year. Mom was still listed as inactive because Hayate was so little, and no one thought they could let a nine-year-old Academy student take care of a younger kid. I could exceed that admittedly low bar, but not for the months a chūnin could possibly spend on a mission during wartime, and not without some desperate scraping for money. Mom would need to get a desk job despite how her skills were all for combat, and we’d still be in trouble, since Dad’s tag-making had been a pretty significant part of our income. We didn’t have any extended family to fall back on in tough times, just friends with their own problems.

It’d be easier for us to survive if I was a genin and had my own income. So that’s what I resolved to do.

I went back to school on Monday. I must have looked terrible, slumped over on my desk, and not showing half of the exuberance necessary to keep up with the rest of the class. I barely felt like I could breathe—the Dreamer stuck with me, whispering reassurances, but it felt empty. It felt like I was drowning by inches, even though I had so much I still had to do.

“Kei, where have you been?” Obito asked.

“We haven’t seen you in a week!” Rin said. “We thought something happened to you.”
I lifted my head out of the bowl of my arms.

“Oh no…” Rin said, looking horrorstruck at my expression.

“Kei, what happened?” Obito asked, much quieter this time.

“Dad died.” I said with my voice barely above a whisper. “It’s…it’s been a hard week.”

“How?” Obito asked, dropping into the chair next to mine. Rin sat at my other side, hand on my shoulder, and I sank lower into my seat.

“The border station got attacked. No one made it out after the hawk got sent.” I don’t know how my voice stayed steady. I felt like I was drifting in place, as though the world wasn’t quite real. “We got the news on Tuesday.”

I was drowning.

“Oh, Kei.” Obito didn’t quite seem to know what to do. Eventually, he settled for a one-armed hug around my shoulders. “Rin-chan…?”

“We’re here to support you, okay?” Rin said firmly. “If you need anything, come to us.”

“Thanks, Rin-chan, Obito.” I murmured. I put my hands over my face.

“You’re going to graduate with us, right?” Obito asked.

“Obito!” Rin began, but Obito scowled.

“I’m serious! If you graduate with us, we’ll look out for you, okay? No one will ever, ever say anything bad about you or your dad while we’re around!” Obito insisted. “That’s a promise!”

Rin nodded. “Right.”

There was no way I deserved such amazing friends.

You’ll pay them back by doing what you can to save their future. The Dreamer seemed to sigh. We already knew we weren’t going to let them go it alone.

“You two are the best.” I told them gratefully, hugging them both. “No matter who ends up on what team, I’ll hold you to that.”

The rest of the school day seemed to pass us by, even though it was one of the review days and there were pops and smoke from imperfect Transformation and Clone jutsu going off all the time. And when I went home that day, they followed me.

“Hayate-chan, this is Rin-chan and this is Obito-kun.” I said later that night. “They’re my friends from school.”

Hayate held up both of his hands. “I’ll show you where you can wait! Dinner’s almost ready!”

Bless them, neither almost-genin minded being led around by a kid who wasn’t yet six. And Mom, while not happy, exactly, seemed more animated when there were people to take care of.

For the first time since Dad died, I was smiling again. It was a little cracked and a little broken, but it was a smile nonetheless.
After all the drama of the year, the final exam was practically a cakewalk. Unless I horribly failed the practical—and I wouldn't, given that I'd practiced with Rin and Obito and…and Dad, back when he was alive—my scores would carry me through. I was easily within the top ten percent of the class in books and ninjutsu. My taijutsu wasn't as strong, but I hadn't been allowed to bring my shinai for the class sparring sessions. The teachers said it wasn't fair, even if the two Inuzuka clan kids were allowed to bring their dogs. The only thing I had trouble with, other than taijutsu, had to do with the special kunoichi classes, mostly due to lack of interest. In the last month, though, I had Mom and Rin help me polish up my feminine skills.

Hayate might be a bit traumatized in the future, given that I used him as practice for putting hairclips on someone else. Mom's hair was too full of ribbons.

Rin was less skilled in the physical realm, but she was better at the Clone Jutsu than I was. I think her brain was just generally more oriented toward genjutsu than mine was, while I had my former artist's brain backing me up for the Transformation Jutsu. Replacement was less than perfectly stable for either of us, but Obito had that more or less down.

Actually, the only one we were really worried about was Obito, since his test scores sucked.

He did have a very low intelligence rating before. The Dreamer wasn't being especially productive in her opinions, since we were rapidly approaching a pretty dangerous gap in our information. We needed to meet up properly and reassess our understanding of everything that happened or would happen over the course of the next year. I couldn't think of much.

Rin and I waited anxiously outside of our classroom for him, since his last name meant going way after either of us. Both of us had passed, so he was just keeping us in suspense.

On the other hand, Rin and I were sporting fashionable new headgear—we'd both passed easily, and while Rin had chosen a traditional hitai-ate, I preferred the bandanna style. It made me feel a bit more grown-up and fit better with my distinctly boyish hairstyle.

Hey, if I was gonna be named Keisuke for the rest of my life, I might as well get some amusement out of the endless misunderstandings.

"I'm sure Obito passed." Rin said, sounding unsure despite her words.

"He'd better hope so!" I said crossly, to cover my anxiety. After my test, all of the worry I'd failed to use on myself was apparently stored up for Obito's sake. "After everything you two have done for me, we're supposed to graduate together!"

And at just that moment, Obito exploded out of the classroom in the midst of a victory dance. "I PASSED! I told you I could do it, Rin-chan, Kei! Isn't this great? We might even get on the same team tomorrow!"
I punched the air, graceless in victory. Rin laughed with relief.

"So, ready to find an awesome sensei and join Team Awesomeness?" Obito asked, bumping shoulders with both of us.

"Is there even any room on Team Awesomeness for us?" I asked.

"You bet!" Obito laughed, throwing his arms into the air. "Come on, I'll buy us all lunch!"

"Buy me strawberries and we'll be even." Rin said, "It's too early for lunch."

"Dango for me." I said. "I'll even pay for enough for all of us."

"You haven't paid for any lunches yet." Rin teased.

"Strawberries and dango? Sure. I like those too. Sounds like a picnic! Anyone got a spare blanket?"

Remember, these are the moments we're fighting for.

Obito kicked the Academy doors open and we stepped out into the bright sunshine together.

In the Academy yard, there was a huge crowd of proud parents, siblings, and various other relatives. Since Rin and Obito were orphans, we'd agreed ahead of time that we'd all be celebrating together. I just had to find Mom and Hayate in the sea of people, while Obito would make his way back over to use whenever he calmed down enough to remember. He and Hayate would be the only boys. It was a good thing that Hayate liked him.

Speaking of which, it was pretty easy to find my family because Hayate was sitting on Mom's shoulders, putting him well above the average height of the crowd. Hayate had his child-sized shinai in his hand and a grin on his face, while Mom seemed to glow with pride. I danced my way through the crowd so I could greet her without making her set my brother down.

"Mom!" I called, waving my arms. "I passed!"

"I knew you would, Kei-chan." Mom said, and she looked a bit misty-eyed. "I just wish…"

"I know, Mom." I said. I didn't need to hear the words to know Dad would be proud, too.

Mom blinked a couple of times and finally let Hayate down. He bopped me with the shinai, but not very hard, and Mom said, "Hayate-chan, your sister is a real ninja now. Isn't that something?"

"I'll be a ninja too!" Hayate said. Bop.

"Hello again, Hayate-chan." Rin said, having decided not to risk bowling people over when it came to greeting my family. "Will you be joining the Academy soon?"

At age five, I suppose that Hayate could have joined, but I'm not exactly sure I would be content to just leave him alone if he did. On one hand, he'd be learning how to be a ninja. On the other, he'd be learning how to be a ninja. And earlier than I had, to boot.

If Mom hadn't taken any chances with me, she probably wouldn't with Hayate.

"Maybe." Mom said, discreetly directing Hayate's shinai away from Rin's face with one hand. "I like to be sure my students have the skills to be successful before I send them running off into the wild."

Unspoken: Academy teachers don't bother, figuring the rest is up to the jōnin leaders of each team to...
"Hayate-chan will probably be ready before I was." I admitted. "Give him a year and he'll probably be better than I am now."

"But he'll still be able to learn things from you." Rin reassured me. She was just a reassuring kind of person, I think. It certainly explained why Obito went after her.

Obito, as though called by the siren song of his name and the idea of things happening without him, appeared in a blur of blue and flailing limbs.

"Mom, we're gonna go get a snack. Can I bring Hayate-chan with us?" I asked.

Mom, occupied by Hayate's tug-of-war with the shinai, said somewhat distractedly, "Where are you all going in such a hurry?" she asked, "I thought that we'd have a proper celebratory dinner at home later tonight…"

"I'll be home in time and I won't spoil my dinner," I said, "but we're going to celebrate our last day of classes first, okay?"

"Well, I suppose that this is the last day before team assignments." Mom said. She sighed, "Dango?"

"Exactly!" I said.

"We'll try not to keep her out too long." Rin said.

"Yeah, Kei will be home before you know it!" Obito said, bouncing back into the conversation. "I promise!"

Are you marrying them or something? This sounds familiar. It ought to involve porches and shotguns and cars and meeting the parents…

"You both suck." I said flatly. "And Obito, you never get anywhere on time anyway! Don't talk to me about schedules."

Mom said, "Try to be home by five, and stay safe." Mom punctuated this by taking Hayate's shinai from him, but handing me a pouch full of kunai. "Run along now."

We did.

Later, sitting a riverbank next to what would, eventually, be the Team Minato training grounds, we had eaten our way through three sticks of dango each, along with a giant carton of strawberries. I'd have probably gone for ice cream, preferably of a green tea flavor, but we were content to watch the world go by otherwise.

"You know, as ninja we're going to be dealing with some pretty heavy stuff." I said after a while, the last dango stick still in my mouth. I liked having something to chew on, if possible. It was an easy distraction, and being able to throw stuff shaped like senbon as actual weapons, like Genma, sounded pretty cool.

"So what?" Obito scoffed. "We're Team Awesomeness and there's no way anyone can stand against the power of our teamwork!"

"I wonder who our sensei will be." Rin said mildly. She sighed. "We don't even know if we'll end up on the same team…"
"They're probably still going to stick with the two boys, one girl format. I think we have enough girls graduating for that, at least." I suggested.

What I didn't say was that, as the top two kunoichi in our year, Rin or I would probably end up with Obito one way or another, just because of tradition. I kind of hoped it would be Rin—she had the personality to deal with Kakashi and Obito without wanting to murder either of them despite the way they grated on one another. I loved Obito like a brother, but that didn't mean he wasn't capable of pissing me off with his antics. And Kakashi would probably drive me up the wall just by being himself.

Yeah, it'd be better if Rin dealt with the boys, and I stayed by the sidelines to help when asked.

Except if she did end up on Obito and Kakashi's team, she'd be dead before fifteen.

Fuck.

I was glad that Hayate had found the river utterly fascinating, because I didn't need him to see my utter failure to keep from breaking out into a cold sweat. I kept an eye on him and an ear on my friends, because the idea of Hayate drowning on my watch? So many levels of terror were involved there that I didn't have words for them.

"Well, even if we end up on different teams, we'll still be friends." Rin said.

"You're both allowed to come over to my house whenever." I said firmly. "Mom and Hayate-chan have pretty much adopted you two anyway."

"And you?" Obito teased.

"I wouldn't put up with you if you weren't pretty much family." I replied. Wait, no. "Well, actually, if you were enough kinds of crazy or asshole or both, I'd drop you like a hot iron and then beat the crap out of you."

"Aw, you can tell she loves us." Obito laughed. Rin giggled.

"Cruel to be kind, you said?" Rin mused. "It's amazing that we can even find you under all of those spikes."

I stuck my tongue out at them.

"So, if you're a sea urchin," Rin began, making Obito laugh and me smile, "what does that make us?"

"You're a stuffed animal, Rin-chan." I said. "With a set of lock-picks and a brick in it."

"Then what am I?" Obito asked.

Rin and I looked at each other.

"I don't know. He kind of reminds me of a tomato." I said.

"Hey!" Obito didn't seem quite sure if he was supposed to be offended or not.

"Um…maybe a puppy?" Rin suggested.

"You mean incredibly lovable and huggable?" Obito asked.
He's got it bad. And puberty hasn't even happened yet!

"Sure, let's go with that." I said.

Obito pouted.

Then it was time to go home. I fished Hayate out of the shallows, where he'd shucked off his sandals and been wading around chasing fish, and let him roll around in the grass until his feet were dry enough to accept shoes again. Obito packed up the picnic blanket and Rin took the basket, while I grabbed my brother's hand and we all walked to my house for dinner.

Like hell I was gonna leave anyone I cared about alone.
The next day, the only real reason to head to school was the prospect of team assignments.

I didn’t sleep well that night. Despite the Dreamer’s help, I couldn’t help having nightmares of Team Minato’s last mission as an unbroken team (no Obito please don’t die). And its last mission, period (Rin Kakashi oh god I’m so sorry). And I thought, when I woke up, That isn’t going to happen to me.

I didn’t really have any idea how to make that a reality, though.

Since Rin slept over at my house, we both wandered around to make sure Obito wasn’t going to be late. Mom had given us huge lunches, because of the chance that we’d end up on separate teams and possibly have to share with our less-prepared teammates, and aside from the usual business of herding Obito around, and we were feeling pretty optimistic.

“At least one of us will be with Obito.” Rin said, as we headed into the Academy. Obito hadn’t been spotted running errands for anyone, so we assumed he’d be more or less on time.

“Yeah,” I agreed.

“If I didn’t know better, I’d swear he was trying to stay at the bottom of the rankings just for that.” Rin said.

I shrugged.

To my surprise, Obito was actually there before either of us. He waved, grinning. He was also almost vibrating in his seat from sheer excitement, which was slightly contagious. Rin and I sat on either side of him.

“So, this is the big moment.” Obito said, almost uncharacteristically serious. I guess he was a bit nervous too.

“PIPE DOWN AND GET YOUR BUTTS BACK IN YOUR SEATS!” Sensei shouted, because Sensei was an asshole who lived solely to shout at pre-genin brats and couldn’t actually control them worth a damn.

Considering that Rin and I weren’t exactly early, and since the rest of the classroom wasn’t full, I could only assume that about half the class had failed. Obito might have had reason to be nervous, but he had passed where some of our classmates had not. I couldn’t even feel any of their chakra signatures anywhere near the building, which was about the maximum range I had at age nine, so I wasn’t expecting any last-minute additions. Actually, if anyone had shown up late, I would have automatically guessed Obito, if it wasn’t for the fact that he had decided to be punctual for once in his life.

I folded my arms on the table and rested my head on them. The other shoe was going to drop regardless of whether we freaked out, so I decided not to worry too much.

“We’ll be great.” Rin said, smiling.

“Of course we will!” Obito said, though there was a twitch in his voice that indicated he wasn’t nearly as confident as he acted. It’d been there for most of the time I’d known Obito, but now it was more pronounced. “Right, Kei?”

“Yes.” I said, though my voice was muffled by my elbow and somewhat distracted.

There was someone else nearby, and I didn’t recognize the chakra signature.

While normally I’d probably run into about thirty to eighty people per day and not actually bother memorizing their chakra, I could recall all of our classmates and our teachers, as well as my neighbors and everyone I considered myself close to. It’s like recognizing a face or a voice, though without using conventional senses. Everyone’s feels a little bit different, and I had an easier time distinguishing between people I’d mentally marked “unsafe” or “safe.”

Given that Konoha was a ninja village, the list of unsafe people was pretty fucking long. I hadn’t developed an actual ability to sniff out hostility, but anyone who felt anything like Orochimaru, Danzō, or too powerful to accurately gauge was automatically put on the “avoid at all costs” subsection of the list. I’d never actually met the former, but I figured that I’d know what his chakra felt like eventually and had a whole space in my head allotted for it. The latter I’d seen a grand total of once in passing, and I resolved to avoid coming to his attention more due to what I knew about him than anything I felt.

Yeah, relying entirely on foreknowledge or chakra sensitivity wasn’t going to happen. I’d use both and the Dreamer to figure out what I was doing. Even if it meant floundering around like an idiot without a lifejacket in a hurricane. Or even with a lifejacket—I’d need a real lifeline to make my way out of some of the shit I could get into as a ninja.

After about ten seconds of contemplation and suppressing my own chakra down to practically nothing to account for interference, I pinpointed the stranger in the hallway outside of our classroom. Whoever it was had more chakra than most of the students in the room, sans maybe the Akimichi kid, and the kind of focus that none of us did.

I memorized the feel of his chakra, prickling and sparking like a battery, and returned my attention to the teacher.

“Didn’t sleep well?” Obito asked me.

“Not really.” I said. “Nightmares.” I tapped my fingers on my arm; that chakra was making me restless, because I really wanted to go out and interrogate the interloper and maybe make him or her stand around holding water buckets for an hour for trespassing. It was annoying, like a fly buzzing around my head.

Never let it be said that I didn’t have it in me to do some pretty stupid stuff once I set my mind on it. Or, more likely, not doing the smart thing due to laziness.

Sensei had started reading out the names while none of us were really paying attention. All I’d been listening for were names, and only with half of my attention. So I was surprised when I heard, “… Satoshi Inabi, Rin Nohara, and Kōji Aida. Your sensei is Akihito Yamaguchi.”
Oh what the fuck. I thought, sitting up.

Well, we did realize this could happen.

“Dammit.” Obito said, dropping his head onto the desktop. Thunk.

“It’s okay, guys. I’ll be fine!” Rin said reassuringly.

I nodded. I didn’t know either boy that well—Satoshi had been decent at taijutsu and pretty good at all of the weaponry tests, while Kōji was pretty laid-back for a kid sitting barely above Obito in the class rankings. He was gifted with a large chakra supply for a kid, which mostly translated to insane endurance, but I didn’t think that either boy was really enough of a standout to be worthy of being on Rin’s team.

I might have been horrifically biased—Rin was kind of like a little sister, after all.

Obito slumped at his desk, not quite feigning crushing despair, but I ignored him and reached across his back to give Rin a reassuring squeeze on her shoulder. She smiled hesitantly back.

I wasn’t really worried about Rin—she could have made friends anywhere, with anyone. The fact that she chose to hang out with Obito and me was a blessing, and I was sure she’d be successful in the future. Besides, she had Yamaguchi-sensei as a new teacher. She’d be okay.

Eventually, more and more names were called and more teams were assigned.

Obito’s name didn’t come up, and neither did mine. The teacher even rolled up his list and chucked it into the trash bin, where it was promptly eaten by the remains of the previous day’s pranks and lunches and things. I think we were the first people in some time to feel their stomachs drop simultaneously. We could have made a synchronized sport out of our reactions to sheer dread.

And that strange chakra’s buzzing sensation didn’t abate in the least. I narrowed my eyes in its direction—I did not need a headache ever, but especially then.

“Keisuke Gekkō, Obito Uchiha.” Sensei began, as the rest of our classmates started to drift out of the room.

My head snapped up. “Yes, Sensei?”

I didn’t like the guy, but he’d had his fun. We probably both seemed like ADD-ridden slackers (despite my scores), but we’d passed, and therefore we needed some kind of team structure.

“After lunch, you’ll meet your third teammate and your new jōnin-sensei,” our teacher said. “I’m just not supposed to spoil the surprise.”

So he’s testing us this early? Bastard. I bet I know exactly who it is, too.

Not that I didn’t want to meet Minato and probably Kakashi, but I also kind of wanted to kill them both right then. There was no reason to test us before we even got to meet them. Especially considering that nearly everyone taught by the Third Hokage or Jiraiya or someone taught by their line tended to go with the goddamn bell test.

And then Sensei left, leaving us to our devices.

“Fuck it.” I muttered under my breath, standing even if I was in a pretty annoyed slouch. I was up, conscious, and had managed to quell my brief flare of impatience. “Come on, Obito. The roof’s nice this time of year and Mom packed me a gigantic bento.”

Obito sighed. “Dammit, I wish we’d gotten Rin and not some mystery kid.” He paused, as though reviewing his words and his attitude in his head, and added, “Though you’re with me, so that’s pretty cool. I think we’ll make a pretty good team!”

“So do I,” I said, and we headed out of the room. “Thing is, we don’t train much together normally.”

“Yeah, but only because your mom doesn’t want you to break people’s arms.” Obito said. “As if I’d let you.”

I stuck my tongue out at him. “It isn’t about letting me do anything, Obito. I’m a girl. I do what I want.”

Obito snorted. “Oh, we’ll see. I’m too awesome to stay down for long!”

In the hallway, the crackle of strange chakra was stronger. I paused for half a breath, determining distance, angle, and strength, and noted that the stranger had moved to the roof. There was the faintest trace of chakra smoke in the hall, though Obito was too distracted to notice, and I bit the inside of my cheek in thought.

On one hand, we could avoid it and no one would notice unless it was some kind of unspoken test. On the other, biting the bullet appealed to me somewhat.

“What’d your mom give you?” Obito asked, distracting me.

“Dunno. I’ll check when we get up there and unwrap it.” I replied. “But you don’t get to complain because Mom packed it.”

“Like I’d ever complain about your mom’s cooking! She’s really, really good and she always makes the fish just right.” Obito replied, almost drooling at the thought.

I didn’t ask why he didn’t have a lunch.

We headed up to the roof, mostly chatting idly. While I was never going to be as close to Obito’s goofy open heart as Rin, I’d also never totally leave it. They’d known each other for years longer than I’d been in the picture, and I couldn’t begrudge them that. That said, Obito and I knew each other well enough to know what topics were safe and what was probably not worth talking about. As a result, most of what we talked about came down to current events.

“So, who do you think our third teammate is?” Obito asked once we’d spread the cloth cover of my bento box across the concrete between us. Mom really had packed a giant lunch—I’d never be able to finish all of the rice or fish alone, let alone the pickles. Why anyone would ever need so many pickles was totally lost on me. Luckily, Obito would eat anything.

“Maybe an older genin.” I suggested, spearing a slice of salmon because I was too lazy to eat it properly with two chopsticks. “You never know what kind of stuff goes down out there.”

“So you mean basically someone who was too stupid or useless to keep his comrades alive.” Obito said around a mouthful of onigiri. Mom had made them in the shape of a triad of pandas, apparently because even the family eye-bags were worth memorializing in food.

Mom had a strange sense of humor sometimes.

I felt the sparking chakra flare up as though in annoyance. I turned my head in its direction, briefly ignoring Obito, and said, “You can stop hiding anytime you want, you know.”

There was a sensation that read, broadly, as surprise. Obito blinked at me and said, “Kei, who are you talking to?”

I ignored him again. “Sparky, I don’t know if you’re stalking us, but it’s not polite and we have a third onigiri panda if you want it.”

Obito narrowed his eyes at me, apparently for lack of any better targets. “Where is he?”

_Behind us._ I thought, and didn’t jump when a hand swiped our last panda while we weren’t looking. I could tell he’d done it, because Obito’s squawk of indignation was loud enough for anyone, and because my chakra sense let me know that he’d been within a foot of me when he’d done it.

“Thieving bastard!” Obito shouted as our third party member finally appeared in full view.

He was…small. Smaller than I remembered or expected—he was shorter than Obito, actually, even counting his spiky silver-white hair. His eyes were like river stones set in a pale face (or what I could see of it, anyway). He wore his signature mask, which had a bit of rice stuck to it, and wore a sleeveless navy blue shirt with what I would hesitantly categorize as arm-warmers. Man, I knew autumn in Konoha wasn’t exactly worth breaking out the sweaters for, but he dressed more like a girl than I did. He also had a kunai pouch strapped to each thigh and a pocket for scrolls on his shoulder.

“A ninja should be more aware of his surroundings.” Kakashi said. His expression—what I could see of it, anyway—was flat and unimpressed.

I rolled my eyes, chin in hand.

“So you’re the one who’s supposed to be our third teammate?” I could hear the scorn in Obito’s voice. It sounded weird—there generally wasn’t anyone for him to look down on in the Academy, and he didn’t even dislike most people enough to bother. He was too busy being excitable or ignoring the way other people mocked him.

Apparently Kakashi was exceptional in many different ways.

“More like I’m your babysitter.” Kakashi replied.

First impression of Kakashi Hatake: He’s a pint-sized jackass.

Then again, he was also a chūnin with hundreds of missions under his belt, who’d probably been killing people for longer than I’d been contemplating ninja-hood. He was, in a way, a stellar example of what happened when the shinobi system worked exactly the way the elders wanted it to—a powerful, competent child prodigy who could be sent to the front lines early and survive long enough to actually gain experience from it all. He’d never be ambitious the way that Danzō was, or even the slightly loopy way _Naruto_ was, and he’d always be loyal to Konoha despite what being a shinobi would cost him over the next twenty years.

It made me feel slightly ill, even though I knew what I’d signed on for. Or at least I thought I knew.

“You’re not a genin, are you?” I asked, though I knew the answer. “And by the way, I’m Keisuke Gekkō.”

Kakashi’s eyes narrowed a bit. The sad part was that I could manage a marginally better glare, almost solely due to the shape of my eyes and the persistent shadows under them. I kind of reminded myself of someone with a hangover when I looked in the mirror. “No. How did you know?”
“I guessed, since I don’t remember seeing you around before.” I said. “Also, a name would be polite. It’d be sad if Obito and I had to call you ‘you’ forever.”

Kakashi made a noise that made me think he didn’t particularly like the answer, but he wasn’t allowed to punch me for more information. “Kakashi Hatake. Chūnin.”

“Well, I’m Obito Uchiha!” Obito broke in, scowling impressively. “And I don’t like your attitude.”

Double fuck. Did they really have to start this now? I knew that Rin had a crush on Kakashi as a member of Team Minato, possibly starting some years beforehand, but I had thought that with me on the team and not Rin, they’d be less polarized. I didn’t want to have to choose between my best guy friend and the new kid on the first goddamn day.

“Hey!” I said. They both sent sidelong looks my way. “Seriously, hold off on the fights until after lunch. We’ll have loads of time to beat each other black and blue later.”

The siren song of food worked its magic.

Obito made a face. “But… Oh, fine. Your mom’s cooking’s too good to miss over a bastard like him.”

That was not what I wanted to hear, but at Kakashi’s thoroughly disdainful huff, I supposed it wasn’t being taken seriously anyway. I had a feeling I’d be spending a lot of my time and energy keeping the two of them from killing each other. Or rather, I’d be preventing Obito from trying to kill Kakashi. I wasn’t sure if the homicide attempts on this team would be mutual.

I pointed my chopsticks at Kakashi. “You ate one of the pandas. You have officially been recruited to the traveling circus in penance. Join us.”

“Aw, Kei, he doesn’t have to, does he?” I couldn’t tell if Obito was complaining on his behalf or on Kakashi’s from the way he phrased it. He still had a pretty amazing pouty face, though. I wanted to pinch his cheeks and tell him he was just adorable, but that I wasn’t going to fall for it and that he still owed me an unloaded dishwasher and a new bike.

I’d had cousins like that, before. They were terrible.

“You’re insane.” Kakashi said flatly, but he wasn’t running away. He ninja-poofed onto the railing between us, perching there like some kind of gigantic misshapen pigeon. It also put him well within food-swiping range, which I didn’t mind but Obito did, from the way his chakra flared.

“I’m a girl.” I replied, snagging the umeboshi before Obito could get it. He was too busy glaring up at Kakashi. “It’s the same thing.” I’d be on a team with two boys anyway, so it wasn’t like they could really dispute my claims without tracking down someone else as a counterexample who wasn’t Rin, and Minato would start dating the craziest kunoichi this side of Hidden Mist sooner or later. So sue me.

“…You’re a girl?” Oh, the deadest deadpan yet. I liked dressing as a boy.

“Bastard! It’s obvious that Kei’s a girl! You take that back!”

I decided not to say anything about Obito’s nearly identical faux pas a year back. It didn’t seem like the right moment, and I didn’t mind.

I gathered my thoughts as Obito was only barely dissuaded from attacking Kakashi via the sudden discovery of red bean mochi in my bento. Kakashi, for his part, had stolen a pickle via spearing it on the end of a kunai. It was not remotely hygienic, but I supposed that Kakashi had seen or eaten his way through worse.

I said, “Since you’re our new teammate, I guess your sensei is ours now, too. What’s he like?”

There was the briefest flare of subtle chakra, almost like a breeze had blown through the area, and a yellow flash of light.

Our new guest was tall enough that even my head (since I was the tallest of the kids in the area) only came to about the middle of his ribcage. He had a crown of blond spikes, along with two longer sections framing the sides of his face. His eyes were a clear, sky blue and he wore a standard jōnin uniform, with additional white bands at his wrists and just below his elbows, to minimize wind resistance. If I had to guess at his age, I’d say he was about nineteen years old to our nine.

“Making new friends already, Kakashi?” asked Minato Namikaze.

"Sensei!" Kakashi almost chirped, and it was instantly clear that he respected his teacher far more than Obito or I had ever respected anyone. His tone was some odd combination between eagerness and embarrassment— I mean, I knew that Obito and I weren’t exactly impressive, but we really weren’t so terrible that even being seen with us was a bad thing. Unless a classroom had recently blown up, but that was never my fault.

I mentally equated Kakashi to a puppy, following his sensei around like he was always out for an extra treat or ear-rub, and left it at that. The mental image would make me laugh if I thought on it for too long.

Obito was openly staring, eyes flicking back and forth between on our new sensei’s face and Kakashi’s attitude, and his mental gears were clearly turning.

And then Kakashi caught himself and the magic died. He cleared his throat. “Keisuke Gekkō and Obito Uchiha, Sensei. Brats, this is my sensei, Minato Namikaze.”

Well, it was nice to know that he could figure out to how to be an awkward human being for small stretches of time. The rest of the time was going to involve me trying to separate the boys, I thought.

Also, he was a bit of a hypocrite.

Obito growled, “Who are you calling a brat, you bastard!” He was already on his feet, fists clenched, and I concluded that I really ought to look into making friends with less excitable people.

I was kind of glad that I had my bokken strapped to my back. According to Mom, it was amazing how much being confronted with a solid length of wood and sufficient skill could make even the most annoying people back down long enough to talk.

And if it didn’t, you could always hit them with it.

“Can we please go back to eating like normal people?” I wondered aloud.

The answer was probably “no.”

“Easy, Kakashi.” Minato said, but I thought it was a bit late. “Obito, you too. We’re all teammates here, and it isn’t worth getting worked up and drawing battle lines on the first day.”

Not that I really knew that much about being a boy, but I couldn’t help but think that Minato didn’t have a lot of experience with people with Obito’s personality type. Kakashi seemed to be his only “Anyway, now that we’ve all met, I think we ought to have a chance to get to know one another better.” Minato went on, leaning against the railing and folding his arms. “So, what should I know about you before we start on the path to being shinobi together?”

I thought about it.

I’m Keisuke, though I mostly go by Kei. I have a second personality hidden in my head that’s composed of all the memories I have from before I died, any relevant information about this world that I can’t seem to remember consciously, and my attachment to things like friends, family, and country. Oh, and did I mention that I died? Because I did, and then I reincarnated, only I kept my memories and thus I have a mental age of about thirty. It’s why I have this urge to chase people around and mother them instead of acting like a normal Academy fangirl wannabe-kunoichi. I like dogs, cats, my family, and my best friends. They’re Rin and Obito by the way, and the former will be dead before she turns fifteen while the latter is probably going to go supervillain if that happens. I dislike a whole bunch of people you’re probably not going to live to meet and/or kill horribly, and I live in terror of the day that my brother gets eviscerated by a Sand-nin who probably hasn’t even made chūnin yet. My dreams for the future include locking myself in a room with a couple of therapists and maybe driving them crazy with all of this baggage.

Yeah, that probably wouldn’t go over well without some serious censoring.

“Well, I like dango.” Obito offered. “I also like my best friends, Rin-chan and Kei. I like making people smile—and as a shinobi, I can do more about that when I’m in the village than I could without training.” I had a sudden suspicion that we’d be doing D-ranks for a solid month. “My hobbies include helping people out when they need it, training, and hanging out with my friends. I don’t like stuck-up bastards like him”—here, Kakashi snorted—“or when I have to go to the hospital.”

A flash of amusement appeared on Minato’s face at that last comment.

“And you, Keisuke?” he asked.

“Um.” I thought my answer over again, mentally adding some things and subtracting the unhelpful sarcastic confessions. “I like Obito and Rin-chan, too, since we were all friends in the Academy. I also like my mom’s cooking, dogs, naps, and playing with my little brother. I don’t like swimming, or the hospital, or getting up early.” I clicked my chopsticks together a few times, thinking. “I have a lot of hobbies, but the ones that come to mind now are practicing medical ninjutsu, learning kenjutsu with my mom, and reading.”
Do I even have any dreams or goals that don’t have to be censored to hell?

“Eventually, I hope to get strong enough to become a jōnin.” I concluded.

"I want to be able to be Hokage someday! I’ll be the greatest Hokage ever!" Obito added. He turned to me. “What do you think, Kei?”

As a member of the Uchiha clan, I didn’t think it would be possible for Obito to get within ten people of the position in the current atmosphere, but I didn’t say anything about it. Politics and political alliances were something I didn’t need in my head at that age. Even if the Senju-influenced structure of the village and its leadership wasn’t a thing, there wasn’t much chance for Obito to be the next Hokage, who was basically sitting in front of us like a parent crossed with a cat-herder. Maybe there’d be time in the future, but not the near future, and not with the current batch of asshole elders running the show.

“I think if we’re thinking long-term, then fine.” I said. “We both have a long way to go before anything big happens.” I hoped.

Kakashi made a noise that said exactly how much he thought of our chances for achieving either of our dreams. And of how likely it was that he’d introduce himself the way we had.

“It’s good that you’re already thinking of the future.” Shinobi didn’t often actually get one, though. Minato went on, “As for me, I like inventing new jutsu, training as a team, and most of all, my girlfriend Kushina Uzumaki. You’ll meet her eventually.” He leaned forward. “Now, personally, my dream is also to be Hokage someday. I don’t know if we ought to make it any kind of race, but if I get the hat, I’ll be sure to have you all around as my lieutenants if you want to be.”

“…I think I’d pass on the responsibility, Sensei.” I said honestly. I was barely capable of being responsible for Hayate without scaring myself silly. The sphere of “things I feel like I can handle looking after” had just barely expanded to include Rin and Obito, and mostly took the form of harassing them into letting me make sure they were both healthy.

Having to look out for the well-being of the entire village would probably result in chronic ulcers by the time I turned fifteen.

“I wouldn’t! That sounds awesome.” Obito said.

I bit the inside of my lip and didn’t say anything. Responsibility: my greatest weakness.

Aside from possibly shrimp. I still hated them.

“Anyway,” Minato continued, “We’ll be having your real genin test tomorrow morning. Go to bed early and come prepared for a mission, all right? I think you’ll do fine, but it’s always worth seeing if our new genin have what it takes to work in the real world.”

Triple fuck. It just had to be the bell test, didn’t it?

“I thought we were already genin?” Obito protested.

“Yes, but if you fail, you won’t be working with Kakashi and I.” Minato replied. “Genin who prove that they can’t pass their jōin-sensei’s test either have to tough it out and find their own mentors, or they’ll be a part of the reserves forever. If you can’t hack it, we won’t be taking you into the field at all. There’s no sense in adding to the list of the dead for no reason.”

Rather chilling.
I nodded like I understood the whole idea, though it was possible that Sensei’s test would be different from the one that Kakashi had created for Team Seven a lifetime ago. Sakumo Hatake had died recently and I didn’t know how much his ideals had sunk into the village as a whole or Minatosensei in particular. It was cold to think of my new teammate and possible friend’s dad that way, but I didn’t know Sakumo. I knew my dad, and that they’d once been close enough that Sakumo had brought me balloons in congratulations for surviving to one year old.

This was going to involve tons of good memories. I could just tell. I made a mental note to speak with the Dreamer about it when I got a chance to meditate properly, because being kept up all night by visions probably wouldn’t be much good for my performance in the morning. I needed to clear the clutter and have enough information to focus on, but not be distracted by.

“We’ll do great!” Obito said brightly, and I smiled somewhat hesitantly.

What can I say? I’m not much of an optimist.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter written before Kishimoto’s possible-retcon of Obito’s past. Not really sure what’s going on there.
So, it turns out that Minato is a bit of a troll. Or maybe he just enjoys watching his students flail.

More on that in a minute.

On the day of the test, I walked halfway across the village to get to Obito’s before our new team was supposed to meet up. Technically, I could have used the shinobi “skyway,” also known as roof-hopping shenanigans, but if the bell test was going to happen later that morning, it would be best to save my chakra. Besides, I’d probably need to remember the way to the Uchiha clan grounds at some point or another from a ground-bound perspective.

Obito’s apartment was actually located on the far side of the Uchiha District from where I first entered. I’d had to stop an MP to get that much information—I’d never actually been to his place before. Not sure why. Just hadn’t.

Anyway, once in the Uchiha District, it paid to play it like a civilian. Generally speaking, only the Konoha Military Police or ANBU used the rooftops when in residential areas. It kept roofing tiles in place and road dust from picking up, and littering citations from having to be put on everything. I didn’t want to be the subject of any unusual attention, so I decided to hoof it. It took way longer, but by casting my chakra sense out as widely as I could and searching for Obito’s cheerful warmth, I could at least cut down on the time I spent searching for his chronically tardy ass.

(Sadly, shinobi are still human. That means trash finds its way everywhere.)

As I walked, I looked around a lot.

I knew, intellectually, that the Uchiha clan was one of the four noble clans of Konoha. It was in the history books (no matter how shitty those books were), as were the rough histories of the Hyūga, Akimichi, and Senju clans. Of course, clans with unique kekkei genkai—such as the Sharingan or the Byakugan—generally remained isolated at least in terms of marriage. Most of them lived in the district, as much because their clan liked to keep tabs on everyone as anything else. The further you lived inside, the higher rank you held and the older your family probably was. They weren’t especially social when compared to the Akimichi clan, who owned shinobi-approved restaurants all over Konoha, and it was said that the Uchiha clan signature popped collars were symbols of their arrogance. I personally thought they looked a little like the anti-bite cones people back in my old life had put on dogs, but I was never going to say that much to any Uchiha on pain of death. In their own way, they were worse than the Hyūga, despite the fact that the gene for the Sharingan seemed to be recessive to the Byakugan’s dominant.

And vanishingly few Senju still used their family name, so they were less a clan and more like everyone’s cousins. I think that, if I’d had an extended family, they might have been part Senju or something. Just about everyone from a shinobi family (but not a clan) in Konoha had some old clan blood somewhere, though the Byakugan could be seen six generations after the initial ancestor and most everyone else’s genetics were a little subtler.
For my part, I theorized that Mom wasn’t from Konoha initially. Konoha shinobi usually used kunai and shuriken unless they had special training or weaponry at their disposal. A ninja with a katana could be trusted to know how to use it, but most of our styles were sort of...well, we didn’t do schools. Ninjas taught their apprentices or maybe their genin teams, if the students had the knack for it. Otherwise, the style generally died with the ninja who wielded it.

Either Mom had learned from a school, given her method for teaching me, or she had learned from someone who had. It was also possible that she had developed her own, but it felt too polished for that. Too finished. A ninja, after all, was always learning. And probably compensating for having various extremities removed.

Anyway, this line of thought kept me occupied for most of the walk to Obito’s place, in between noting that my house was a hell of a lot smaller than most of the core Uchiha clan ones and wondering if there were any houses for sale. The buildings were older, the people more settled. No one seemed inclined to budge, in any sense of the phrase.

I felt like I was walking through the ninja equivalent of a gated community. It was probably about accurate, anyway.

Still, I could feel Obito’s chakra about a street before I actually turned and saw him. Noble clan or not, very few of them could suppress their chakra to the point that I couldn’t sense them. Obito was not one of those select few and I doubted he ever would be.

He was standing on the stoop of one of the larger buildings, the kind with three floors of apartments and a small Uchiha fan painted on the front gate, and speaking to a pair of older shinobi—they looked like genin, maybe, with unscarred hitai-ate and distinct swagger to their movements. Obito was an orphan within the clan and he didn’t have any siblings. I’d only found out by accident, but it explained some of the loneliness I felt from him, when the school yard grew quiet and Rin wasn’t around. He didn’t have a lot of peers who would hang out with him.

(I didn’t either, but I was a self-admitted freak, so who cares?)

I waved. “Obito!” If the other boys he was talking to were friendly, I’d know. Sure, their chakra supply altogether was actually smaller than Kakashi’s had been yesterday, shenanigans included, but killing intent and malice aren’t exactly subtle. Obito wasn’t broadcasting fear—he seemed uneasy, sure, but that could have had any number of causes.

He jolted, chakra spiking in clear dismay. The other two boys turned to face me, too. I thought I recognized some of their facial features, relative to Obito’s, but resemblances between cousins are somewhat hard to quantify and may mean nothing. I didn’t look like any of my cousins from my old life, for example. Given that there were two of them and Obito didn’t seem happy to see them, I took a mental leap and assumed that the unidentified genin in front of me were Yoshi and Matsumaru Uchiha. Also known as Obito’s asshole cousins.

Well, crap.

There were many ways I could play things. I could freak out. I could attack. I could do any number of things that would mean a morning spent in the nearest police department and not with our new teammate and sensei. All of them would suck and get us in trouble with too many different people.

Or I could give Obito an easy out.

I ran up to them, focusing all of my attention on Obito even as my chakra sense picked up the indignation from the other two Uchiha boys. “Obito, we’re going to be late!”
“Wait, what time is it?” Obito asked, as though he’d entirely forgotten about the other two. I knew he hadn’t, but I was a convenient change of topic in some ways.

“It’s eight forty-five.” I said flatly. I was pretty sure he’d genuinely forgotten, given that Yoshi and Matsumaru were terribly distracting. “We’re supposed to meet Sensei and Kakashi with all of our equipment at nine, remember? The one by the Memorial Stone.”

Obito’s expression shifted from mild surprise to “oh, shit,” in about half a second. He whirled on his two cousins, with a rapid, “Sorrygottagonowpeoplearegonnakillme.”

And then we ran like hell, chakra-enhanced speed and all.

We didn’t stop until we were well out of the Uchiha District, when both of us had to stop for air and explanations.

“So, were those the two assholes?” I demanded, once I got my breath back. While I was better than I’d ever been at running in my previous life, I still didn’t consider myself blessed with much stamina. At least I had room to improve, I supposed.

“Wha—oh. Yeah. Sorry you had to see that.” Obito said, wiping his face on the inside of his sleeve. He shook himself. “Anyway, what time is it, really?”

“Eight forty-six, now,” I said, glancing at a clock on the wall of a nearby shop.

Obito’s mouth dropped open. “Wait, you were serious? Oh man, we’re going to be so late.”

I wouldn’t have been, if I’d been able to trust that Obito would make it to the training grounds on his own and on time. But then his cousins got in the way, so I guess we were just going to have to be late together.

“We could use the roofs.” I suggested.

I had a sneaking suspicion that Obito didn’t know that there even was a training field next to the Memorial Stone, but I didn’t ask. We were both too busy bouncing from rooftop to rooftop like over-cafeinated gerbils to bother wasting breath on it.

We arrived a grand total of fifteen minutes later, meaning that we were about a minute late. I think it was pretty much a record for Obito.

Kakashi, of course, was there to greet us.

“You’re late.”

Of course.

I rolled my eyes and returned to breathing on manual mode, trying not to feel the unaccustomed burn in my thighs and calves. Roof-hopping was a lot harder at age nine than the prodigies made it seem. I could only imagine that it would come with practice, and made do in the meantime by walking around to cool down. Obito, meanwhile, had dropped more or less onto his face and had raised the middle fingers of both hands in Kakashi’s general direction without looking.

Minato-sensei appeared in a burst of yellow light about thirty seconds later. I had no idea how someone with teleportation abilities could ever be late.
Sometime afterward, I realized that Minato had marked the inside fold of Kakashi’s hitai-ate with a Flying Thunder God targeting seal. At the time, I could only think, What’s the bombshell, Sensei? Because we’re fucked anyway!

While Obito and I weren’t going to fall for the bell test’s most obvious trap, mainly because Obito valued my friendship too much and because I was cheating outrageously with my precognition (as well as being far too lazy to try and fight my teammates in addition to our sensei over cat ornaments), I didn’t know what sort of trick Minato would have. Kakashi, as a jōnin, had preferred outright lying, trolling, and being a jackass to his students. Minato-sensei had been straightforward, so I didn’t really know what to expect.

“Now that we’re all here,” Minato-sensei said with his arms hidden behind his back, “we can get started.”

I braced myself for the bad news. If I could feel the spike of chakra from the Flying Thunder God Jutsu, I could probably feel and interpret any kind of rising amusement with our inevitable fated beatdowns. I thought so, anyway. Obito, who was sitting next to where I was standing, mumbled something rebellious that I didn’t catch.

“No, Minato-sensei.” Minato-sensei said with his arms hidden behind his back, “we can get started.”

I braced myself for the bad news. If I could feel the spike of chakra from the Flying Thunder God Jutsu, I could probably feel and interpret any kind of rising amusement with our inevitable fated beatdowns. I thought so, anyway. Obito, who was sitting next to where I was standing, mumbled something rebellious that I didn’t catch.

“Here you go, Keisuke-kun. And you, Obito-kun.” I blinked. The next thing I knew, I was holding a manila folder in my too-small hands. “Our test today will be in information analysis and in forming conclusions.”

“Keisuke Gekkō” was written across the top in large black characters. The one Obito was holding had “Obito Uchiha” written on it.

Okay, I give up, said the Dreamer.

Well, at least I wasn’t the only one who thought this was kind of surreal. Kakashi also had one, though I’d totally missed the moment when Sensei had handed it to him. Going by the look on Obito and Kakashi’s faces, neither of them had expected the folders in the slightest.

“Sensei,” Kakashi began, but Minato clapped his hands.

“Right! So, the first thing we’re going to do today is check out the Hokage’s assessment of our skills.” Speaking of which, Minato also had a folder. “It’s like a report card for real life, in some ways.”

I suddenly know why this man was so eager to become Hokage. He is the paperwork ninja.

This is what I meant when I said Minato was a bit of a troll. I got all worked up over the idea that he’d probably give us a sadistic bell test, and here he was, handing out report cards. It was very, very strange, not to mention off-putting.

I opened my file. The top left corner of the first page was taken up by a picture of me, sans my new headband, that had been taken immediately after I passed the final genin test. It was a fairly lousy picture, since I hadn’t gotten much sleep the night before and my eye-bags were more prominent than ever, but it was apparently only for a year before the file would be updated. The photographers for our ninja registration paperwork were kind of overzealous, meaning that even Obito had managed to get his paperwork done yesterday before school, since the paperwork ninja in charge had probably been chasing him around to get it.

I sat down to read.
Name: Gekkō, Keisuke

Age: 9

Height: 120.3cm

Weight: 28.1kg

Blood type: O

D.O.B.: July 10

Gender: Female

Ninja Registration: 010871

Ninja Rank: Genin

At this point, I got bored and started to flip through the pages in the folder. I already knew my basic information, aside from my blood type. Since Hayate had AB to my O, I could only assume that our parents were heterozygous for types A and B, though I’d probably never have to know the specifics unless it was time to donate blood to someone. Unless it came to plasma—blood was almost never given whole in transfusions, since if O was the universal donor in terms of blood cells, AB was the universal plasma donor. It had something to do with antibody vs. antigen generation, and I wasn’t really interested in the details.

I kept flipping through the pages until I came to an octagon chart. I was strongly reminded of a stat block for Pokémon, and I glanced at the rest of the page to confirm that it was supposed to be a breakdown of our scores in all relevant and easily-quantifiable shinobi disciplines.

So this was how the Naruto databooks were supposed to be relevant to our lives.

I looked at the chart, and then at the total. It didn’t seem possible to have that much of the octagon in red at my age. But the numbers were right there, staring back up at me.

It was one of the few times that the Dreamer and I were in perfect agreement and synchronization.

Holy fucking shit.

Part of me, which I was pretty sure had to be Id or maybe an unnamed fourth personality, was gibbering in a corner of my mind and making a noise like “mimble-wimble.” Or maybe that was me. The world was retreating and I could see my future flashing before my eyes. It was going be short and explosive.

“Kei? What’s so surprising?” Obito asked, leaning over to see what I was looking at. He held up his chart for comparison, though I didn’t look at it then.

After a few seconds of my thunderstruck mumbling and some quick math on Obito’s part, Obito’s eyes went wide and he said, “What the hell? Eighteen?”

I made a whimpering noise and shoved my files into Obito’s hands. I didn’t want to look at them. Internally, I continued to freak out. Gotta keep it together, gotta take deep breaths. Just because my scores are insane doesn’t mean I’m going to have to take the Chūnin Exams! I don’t want to die on the front lines! I hid my face in my hands.

Yeah, I was panicking over getting an awesome score. Go me. The thing is that, well, I didn’t want to be a super special ninja princess sparkly bullshit-meter-breaker. I wanted to have a chance to survive to see thirty, being an average cross-discipline shinobi the whole way, and maybe have enough strength to be useful to the people I cared about and keep them alive. People who stood out got knocked down like bowling pins, and I could name more examples than most.

I didn’t want to be Kakashi, in short.

(Sans the princess comment, anyway. He’d look adorable in a dress at this age, even if the mask would break the outfit’s synergy like a fortune cookie.)

“…This wasn’t exactly the reaction I was going for.” Minato-sensei said after a moment.

Kakashi made a dismissive noise that could have meant any number of things but probably came down to “I’m surrounded by idiots.”

A hand landed on my head. Going by chakra signatures, all of Team Minato were sitting within a five-foot radius of each other. Kakashi was probably reluctant, but I think he’d live with it.

“Easy, Keisuke-kun.” Sensei said, patting my head as though I was some kind of pet. I guess that’s what I get for being a kid. Still, he was just a teenage jōnin, so the fatherly angle didn’t work so well, and I didn’t have any idea what having an older brother would feel like. “Mind telling us what’s wrong?”

I groaned. I didn’t want to talk about it.

Look at it this way: Those are yours and mine, as well as that of our parents and teachers, the Dreamer suggested in the empty echo chamber of my mind. I wasn’t coming up with any clever ideas then, that was for sure. You’ve been keeping up with everyone by putting your mind to things, I’ve been helping most of the time I’ve been properly awake, Mom taught us kenjutsu, Dad taught us taijutsu and chakra control, and Yamaguchi-sensei taught us medical ninjutsu. We are the sum of our pasts, and three awesome teachers.

Okay. I could think of it that way if I tried.

“I don’t think I really deserve that score.” I mumbled, seeing the numbers dance on the insides of my eyelids. No one here knew how much of a leg up I’d been given. “I had more teachers than anyone.”

Ninjutsu: two out of five, due to medical training. Taijutsu: two, supplemented outside of the numbers with kenjutsu. Genjutsu: two-point-five, because it was hard to put a genjutsu on someone whose chakra was aligned to both cast and cancel them, based on sensitivity to foreign chakra. Intelligence: three-point-five, due to my adult mind and nighttime sessions with the Dreamer. Strength: one-point-five even with general chakra boosts. Speed: Two. Stamina: one-point-five, ignoring the Y’in chakra I could probably borrow from the Dreamer if I had to. Hand seals: three-point-five, because of loads of extra practice and hyperawareness of the way chakra moved in my body. Total: Eighteen.

I was all sorts of paper tiger, I thought.

“I noticed that, and I wrote a report to the Hokage on the topic of rotating specialists in the Academy, if that’s the result you got.” Sensei said. I looked up, and he didn’t seem disappointed or anything. To Obito and Kakashi as well as me, he said, “But it’s time that we break down our scores, now that we’ve taken a look. First, though, we’re going to pass our files around. Don’t worry if Kakashi’s and my files have a lot of redacted information.”
I rubbed my eyes and nodded. I hadn’t cried, but I needed a second.

We passed our folders to the left, which meant that I got a chance to look at Obito’s file first.

I memorized his blood type and birthday, which were O and February 10th, respectively, before looking at his assessment.

The first thing I thought was, That is way too low.

Ninjutsu and stamina were solid twos. Obito’s taijutsu, genjutsu, and strength scores sat squarely at one-point-five, while his speed and hand seal ratings were two-point-five each. His lowest score was intelligence, which sat at a rather dismal score of one. All in all, his score was fourteen-point-five. Even the test scores were calling him an idiot.

That is exactly what Naruto’s score was when he graduated.

Of course she would know that.

Personally, I was pretty sure there was a particular reason for Obito’s low scores, and it wasn’t just because he was slow. Obito could be remarkably book-dumb, but he was an awkwardly affectionate, sensitive person when he cared about someone and learned far more quickly when we were still attending taijutsu lessons at the Academy. He didn’t like reading, he didn’t like studying, and he didn’t like to be talked down to by people who did. But given that I’d managed to boost my scores through tutoring, I think it was more about what resources Obito lacked than any brainpower.

Obito, who was looking at Kakashi’s folder, scowled thunderously. Even though I knew Kakashi had to be impressive.

On second thought, that was probably the problem.

“What does it look like, Obito?” I asked, leaning over and passing Obito’s folder to Sensei.

Obito shoved it under my nose. Wow, he really was in a bad mood.

“Keep in mind that scores mean very little in the field.” Sensei said, as I scanned Kakashi’s file. Mine was in Sensei’s hands. “Numbers based on a single point in time can’t explain or really assess the effects of fighting under real battlefield conditions. There’s no place in these for willpower, determination, or the effects of morale levels.”

Kakashi had a total score of twenty-two-point-five, with three separate scores (intelligence, speed, and hand seals) rated higher than three. Barring strength, which was probably dependent on the fact that we were all nine years old and had the same one, none of his stats were lower than two. I doubted the numbers encompassed the stupid levels of experience he had even given how long he’d been a chūnin, but his mission records were entirely blotted out with black ink, so I couldn’t be sure.

“Here’s an example, Obito-kun.” Sensei held out my file, turned so that we could both see it. “See this? Keisuke-kun has high intelligence and hand seal scores, which make it easier for her to pull her nin- and genjutsu scores upward by learning them quickly. On the other hand, her physical scores—speed, strength, and stamina—are actually lower than yours when you add them up.” He flipped the folder over and handed it back to me, extending his hand for Kakashi’s file. “Now Kakashi was rated as less intelligent than Keisuke despite the fact that he’s been in the field longer than both of you, while you and Kakashi were both afforded the same strength and stamina score. Keisuke shares your strength score, too, which means that the physical limitations of your bodies are the problem, not you. You’ll all grow out of it.”
Kakashi rolled his eyes. I had no doubt whatsoever that he could take both Obito and me in a fight with his eyes closed.

“…Okay, Sensei.” Obito mumbled, and Sensei smiled.

“I didn’t set these out for you to fight over.” Sensei said. He flicked his fingers and all of our files vanished. His was still on the ground. “They’re not necessarily accurate, and can seem arbitrary based on things like observer bias and whether or not any of you were holding back for one reason or another. But the general trends—such as the fact that Kakashi needs to work on his genjutsu and Keisuke-kun has some trouble with her stamina, and that we can polish up everyone’s taijutsu? That gives us a place to start setting goals.”

That made sense. I just hadn’t expected that the future Hokage would be so obsessed with number-crunching.

“What are your scores like, Sensei?” I asked. After seeing what we were capable of, I had to wonder what Sensei could do.

Minato-sensei picked up his file and handed it to me. “Take a look.”

Turns out that they don’t just hand out jōnin report cards to anyone. Sensei’s stat chart had been left entirely blank, with only a lonely little number in the corner informing us that he had a total score of thirty-two.

I had a hard time believing that he wouldn’t make mincemeat out of literally everything once he got going.

“For today, we’re going to set goals and begin working out how to achieve them.” Sensei continued, “We’ll finish our training today with some sparring sessions so we can all get a feel for each other. Sound good?”

We all nodded, though I was pretty sure none of us really wanted to.

I’d hated setting goals before. It implied work.

You set goals with me.

That’s different.

The results of the planning session ended up being this: I’d be running up and down trees until I had more stamina, Kakashi would be trying to cast and dispel genjutsu while paired off with Obito, who also needed to work on his genjutsu, and then we’d have a three-way fight between us kids while Sensei corrected our stances and refereed to make sure we didn’t all kill each other.

(Given that Obito and I were completely okay with doubling up to take on Kakashi, this was a more equal prospect than even Kakashi had thought.)

Before we knew it, the afternoon was upon us and we were all hungry, dirty, and tired enough to stop. Except for Sensei. The guy always looked like he could go five more rounds and then kill a dragon at the end of it as a cool-down. It was surreal.

“At this point,” Minato-sensei said, pulling Obito and I back to our feet so we’d stop keeping Kakashi in the world’s most complex and pointless joint-locks, “Kakashi and I usually go grab a bite to eat before we work on meditation and strategy. Want to join us?”
Obito nodded, though not without a sidelong glare at Kakashi. “Sounds good, Sensei.”

For my part, I cast a glance the Memorial Stone. “Um. I’ll be along in a second. Gotta do something first.”

“Wha—? Oh. I’ll wait.” Obito said instantly, giving me a concerned look. I was grateful that he seemed to have forgiven me for my stupid display earlier, and silently promised to do everything I could to help him improve.

“It’ll just take a second.” I repeated, holding up one finger, and I walked over to the stone.

The Memorial Stone is one of several monuments to shinobi in Konoha’s history. There used to be an older version here, I’d heard, dating from the days of the First Hokage and the First Shinobi World War. It was just an oversized headstone, with plain stone sides and a space for names in the middle. The one that occupied training ground three, which had been put up since the previous one had started to crumble and had been moved to just below the Hokage Monument, was black marble polished to a reflective sheen. It was shaped like a kunai blade, standing on a three-sided brace of black stone surrounded by concrete and granite, flanked by silver flagpoles. The flat face of the blade had what seemed like hundreds of names written on it.

I could see my reflection looking back at me, around the shadows cast by the small, solid characters spelling out Wataru Gekkō. I placed both of my hands together and bowed my head.

Sometimes I couldn’t believe it had already almost four months.

I’ll make you proud, Dad. I’ll look after everyone, like you did for us. Don’t worry about Hayate and Mom. None of us will forget you, and we won’t make you cry.

Love you.

I wasn’t sure if he was listening. I wasn’t sure if he was even there. But I felt like, if nothing else, I could at least try.

Prayer finished, I turned around and headed back to my team.

“Ready?” Obito asked.

I slung an arm around his shoulders and squeezed, conveying a wordless I’m sorry and You’re still my friend. “Yeah. Just had to say something to Dad.”

Kakashi, I noticed, was looking pointedly away from me. Sensei had his hand on Kakashi’s shoulder. I knew why, and felt like something was squeezing my heart.

Minato-sensei sighed, but he didn’t seem unhappy. “All right. There’s this ramen bar I know…”
Genin Life: Ceasefire

Chapter Summary

Kei: Strike a deal.

I’ll be perfectly honest here: the only standards by which the brand-new Team Minato would not be considered a walking disaster were those set by the as-yet-unborn members of Team Kakashi in the future. I was pretty sure that the Sannin had a better record than we did at the moment, since if every minute of Team Hiruzen’s existence had been a disaster, they probably would have all been dead by twenty despite their skills.

Obito hated Kakashi. It was almost a given. Kakashi was stronger, had graduated younger, had apparently held the affection of every girl in their age group back when he and Obito had actually been in the same class (including Rin), was an arrogant little shit, and spent almost all of his time either talking down to us or beating the crap out of Obito. He’d kind of given up on pounding on me after I asked Sensei for permission to use my bokken, since it gave me range on him and Sensei hadn’t given Kakashi the okay to use his dad’s tantō. Obito, on the other hand, hadn’t received any specialized weapon training and was prone to getting the brunt of things because he was a boy and because of his personality.

Personally, I didn’t have anything against Kakashi. Most of his vitriol toward life in general was actually a reflection of how much of a fucked-up little kid he still was. But I didn’t like the way he treated Obito, and unfortunately my loyalty tended default to chronological order. Ergo, I’d protect my brother before Obito and Rin before Kakashi before anyone else (since most of the rest of the people I knew and cared about could take care of themselves). During practice, I’d have to remind myself that hitting the resident prodigy with a vertigo genjutsu while he was concentrating on Obito was not actually a good thing to do.

I don’t think Kakashi hated either of us. It would have required him to view us as more than bugs. Or maybe babies, I suppose. True, he didn’t lash out at me as much as he did with Obito, but I’m not sure if it was because I was a girl, because I was a prodigy in my own right, or because I just didn’t have Obito’s personality. I think he figured he had my measure and then more-or-less erased me from his personal universe.

On the other hand, Obito made Kakashi pay attention to him, if only because he hated being ignored slightly more than he hated Kakashi in general.

It took less than two weeks for Kakashi to give Obito a concussion. We weren’t even taking combat missions yet.

Sensei had to knock me on my ass to keep me from hurling myself at Kakashi when Obito just dropped, because all of my impulses were saying kill him and not holy fuck someone call an ambulance. Then, scooping Obito up from where he’d been lying dazed on the ground, Sensei vanished in a burst of white chakra smoke.

Well, I guess it was possible that Sensei didn’t have the hospital marked with a Flying Thunder God seal already. I bet he’d change his ways after this, though.
I sat there for a moment, staring blankly at where they’d both disappeared, and then I stood up. I grabbed my bokken off the ground, tossing its sling on over my shoulder. I dusted myself off. I readjusted my hitai-ate on my head.

Then I walked over to where Kakashi was standing, apparently not quite sure what to do at Sensei’s sudden disappearance. It was possible that he didn’t even know that head injuries were extremely serious, that anything more than a momentary stunning needed to be looked at in case of brain damage. I wasn’t sure what books Kakashi had read, or if he’d really even dealt with brain injuries. Most of the time if shinobi got stunned or knocked out in the field and there wasn’t any help nearby, they died. Sometimes horribly.

“Come on. We’re going to the hospital.” I said.

“Why should we? We can continue training just fine without them.” Kakashi said, eyebrows knitting together because of the “you’re a prodigy too” and “why do you even hang out with that loser” in his tone and the way I was frowning back.

I had this urge to introduce my bokken to his face. Or maybe my face. I wasn’t sure who I was angrier at.

I held out my hand instead. He and Obito hadn’t made the Seal of Reconciliation after the match, but I could at least offer it. It’d keep me from doing something stupid, at least.

“I wasn’t fighting you.” Kakashi said.

“If Sensei hadn’t been there, you would be.” I informed him.

Kakashi’s eyes narrowed.

Still, he did complete the seal. I think he had enough respect for shinobi traditions to at least allow that much between comrades, even if we weren’t friends.

“Anyway,” I began, shoving my hands into my pockets as soon as he let go, “I need to get a second opinion about something.”

Mainly, whether or not I’d be able to learn how to use chakra scalpels from Yamaguchi-sensei now that he had his own team. Unfortunately, this little episode proved that I was too aggressive when it came to people around me when I was stressed by someone else’s injury—too much Kabuto and too little Shizune, in a way. To protect people, I liked the idea of fighting more than I liked the idea of patching people up after, or even in the middle.

The best defense was a good offense and all that.

Kakashi grumbled something as we left the training grounds. We walked about four feet apart and he trailed behind me, apparently to give the impression that we weren’t really walking together. I wondered if he didn’t want to be seen with me or something.

“Sorry, I didn’t catch that.” I said over my shoulder.

“‘I said, ‘don’t you already know medical ninjutsu?’” Kakashi said, more clearly. His tone still implied that I was a lily-livered wannabe ninja more than a peer.

“I know the Mystical Palm one, yes.” I said. “Along with a couple of minor healing jutsu, and lots of chakra control exercises.”
Someday, I was going to find a way to make the Bullshitting-the-Fish-Test Jutsu relevant to my life.

“What about you?” I asked, because it wasn’t as though there was anyone else to talk to.

“What about me?” Kakashi parroted, probably to be annoying.

I frowned, though he couldn’t see it. “I mean, do you know any stuff that’s particular to you?”

“Nature manipulation,” he said tonelessly. “Lightning.”

That actually brought up another point I hadn’t really considered.

I knew Sensei had developed the Rasengan as a teenager. There wasn’t really any other timeframe where he could pulled it off, given how he’d died in his early twenties, and even after making a stupidly destructive A-ranked technique that was literally all chakra control, he had to have known that his goal of a Wind Release version was years of refinement away from completion. Kakashi had developed the Chidori in a failed attempt to create a Lightning Release Rasengan variant, if I remembered right, even if he only demonstrated it as a teenager.

I wondered if Kakashi knew the Rasengan even at age nine. I also wondered if Obito or I would ever be able to learn it.

More than that, though, I was concerned that I was the only member of my team with no elemental ninjutsu. Obito had Fire Release jutsu to play with as a member of the Uchiha clan, even if he wasn’t particularly good at the Grand Fireball technique yet. Sensei probably had a little bit of everything, but mostly Wind Release. I already knew Kakashi was lightning-natured, both from my foreknowledge and the fact that his chakra felt like a sparking wire.

It was kind of weird to realize that I had no idea what my own chakra nature was.

“Is that the boy?”

I put my thoughts on pause, wondering why that voice had jumped out at me at all, vehement and yet whispered as it was. Being in the village meant that background chatter was a fact of life, and with Obito as a friend whispers had been following me for a while now, but I’d actually felt Kakashi’s chakra shrink back into his skin a little as soon as we left the training grounds behind.

“Such a pity…”

I looked back at him. “Kakashi?”

Kakashi’s body language was stiff, locked-up in a way that it never was when Sensei was around. He stared straight ahead, eyes narrow and dark with some unknown emotion, and he didn’t acknowledge me. He seemed to be looking at something over my left shoulder, and he kept putting one foot in front of the other and walking right past me when I stopped.

Apparently Obito wasn’t the only one with All of the Other Reindeer syndrome, even now.

Kakashi’s dad was barely six months dead. I didn’t know the exact date of the mission that went FUBAR, and I’m pretty sure even now that my parents had kept me close to home because they didn’t want me to see the fear, the resentment, and the rampant rumor-mongering that went on in a village that existed because of its secrets. I just knew that in the end, there hadn’t been anyone there to stop him from taking the only way out he had left.

Not even Kakashi.
I didn’t want to know the specifics.

But I couldn’t let him stew in it.

“You know,” I said lightly, “I never really wanted to punch people in the face until I met Obito.”

That was a complete and total lie. It was also phrased so ambiguously that only people who knew me would be able to see the truth in it. I’d never hurt Obito. I’d come pretty close to hurting the people who hurt him several times already, though.

And only the Dreamer had a handle on just how many people I wished dead, and how much.

Kakashi gave me a sidelong look, trying to gauge my honesty.

“And since I’m probably going to if we keep going this slowly, I offer you a proposition.”

One eyebrow went up.

Whack! My open hand smacked into his shoulder, shoving him off balance. And I had my revenge.

We were teammates, after all. Comrades. Putting him in the hospital didn’t seem like the right thing to do unless our team had suddenly morphed into the Sannin while no one was looking.

“You’re It.” I informed him.

Kakashi was faster than me. A lot faster, if he wanted to be. That was how I knew that, even as I leapt onto the nearest market roof, he wasn’t really trying to catch me.

It did give him an excuse to chase, though, and therefore an excuse to leave the whispers behind.

I wasn’t all that great at the kind, compassionate, serene temperament Rin could pull off as easy as breathing. I didn’t know how not to be mildly insensitive and prone to flashes of irrational anger. I didn’t know how to leave stuff alone.

Oh well.

We made it to the hospital within five minutes. I only got tagged twice, and I was still It when we skidded to a stop outside the door. Just being near the hospital was enough to put me on edge. Aside from the one time Rin and I had brought Obito to see Yamaguchi-sensei, I didn’t have a whole lot of good memories of this place. Hayate’s crises, periodic childhood shots, and having to follow doctors around like a nurse-capped duckling weren’t really the types of things that made up a good impression.

Going by the way Kakashi eyed the doorway, I guess he picked up on my apprehension. It was also possible that he expected Minato-sensei to swoop down on him like some kind of bird of prey and start lecturing him about Not Being A Dick.

Personally, I wasn’t convinced that it would take. Ever.

I walked up to the front desk and said to the receptionist, “I’m looking for a patient—Obito Uchiha.”

The receptionist glanced up, recognition in her eyes, and said, “Oh, Kei-chan. I didn’t know you were coming back.”

“Well, I’m not coming back to stay, but I am looking for my teammate.” I said, shrugging. “Sorry, Shirohana-san.”
“Oh, it’s no big deal.” Ayako Shirohana was one of the receptionists who had been around long enough for her to recognize me from my volunteer hours over the previous year. She wasn’t a ninja, but she was studying for her own internship as a civilian nurse and was at least ten years older than I was, with teal hair and brown eyes. I rather liked her, even if she did insist on making me fetch her coffee for her. “Uchiha, Uchiha… Ah! Here we go: he’s still in the waiting room. It’s just down the hall, though we’ve got so many people there at the moment that there’s interference everywhere. I’m sure you would have found him otherwise.”

The thing about coworkers is that they find out a bunch of your secrets, if you’re like me. I’d told Ayako that I was a chakra sensor mostly so she’d stop messing with the intercom when she wanted someone to take over for her when she went on break. All she’d have to do once I was around was flare her chakra in a shave-and-a-haircut pattern, and then I’d pop in to take her place for ten minutes or whatever.

Though we’d had to stop doing that once the head nurse found out that she was letting an eight-year-old sub for her.

“Thanks, Shirohana-san. It was nice seeing you again!” With that, Kakashi and I wandered down the hall. I knew exactly which waiting room Ayako had been talking about—I’d only had to clean blood and senbon and kunai out of the linoleum four or five times.

Mini-ninjas make pretty good manual labor, I guess. At least the major combat cases didn’t spend a lot of time in said rooms. Else they’d probably all die.

The waiting room was…well, I’ll put it this way: the waiting room to my old pediatrician’s office was worse. Slightly, and only because the place had involved clown wallpaper. This particular waiting room in Konoha General was almost offensively beige. The only spots of color were the bits where someone had apparently decided to stick free bandage samples, crappy outdated magazines, and a painting of a bowl of mangoes.

Almost all of the available chairs were occupied by someone in bandages or looking somewhat dazed, and Minato-sensei and Obito were on the couch. Obito had his eyes shut and was leaning pretty heavily on Sensei. Sensei, for his part, didn’t seem to mind all that much, but I noticed that he squeezed Obito’s arm to keep him awake. And that there was a bucket nearby, in case Obito had to throw up.

Concussions were nasty business, and the thing with head injuries was that they were a little too complex for my level of medical ninjutsu expertise.

Obito groaned. “I’ve got a killer headache, I’m tired, and I keep seeing stars. And I feel horrible.”

“All right, at the moment.” Minato-sensei said to me. “To be honest, I almost expected something to go wrong sooner.”

“You suck, Sensei.” Obito grumbled without looking. “You suuuuuuuuck.”

I was starting to see why Mom had insisted that Hayate and I train our butts off before we ever met our jōnin-sensei. I hadn’t realized that Sensei was still learning, too. He’d been promoted twice by the time he was fourteen, but it didn’t change the fact that he was still a teenager training kids.

I sat down to Obito’s left, while Kakashi flanked Sensei. He didn’t sit down, though. I wonder what his problem with hospitals was.
I bumped Obito’s shoulder, gently. “Well, we are training to be ninjas. Since you didn’t black out, I think you should probably be fine.”

Obito buried his face in Sensei’s flak jacket to block out the light, but I still heard his muffled, “Thanks, Kei.”

“You’ll forgive me if I want a medic to take a look though, right?” Sensei asked, teasing.

“By the way, Kakashi, you never did complete the seal.” Sensei went on, poking Kakashi with his free hand. Kakashi muttered something incomprehensible, sitting down next to Sensei to sulk, but Sensei said, “Come on, don’t be like that.”

I reached over, behind Sensei’s back, and poked him. “And you’re It again.”

Kakashi gave me an incredulous look. “What, you’re still doing that?”

“I never stopped.” I said.

“When did you two start getting along?” Minato-sensei asked.

“We didn’t. I just decided to bug him.” I replied. “In the name of vengeance.”

Obito snickered, though it was muffled by his mood and Sensei’s vest. “Your revenge is Tag?”

“Yep. If I beat the stuffing out of him before you could, you’d complain.” I said.

“Like you could.” Kakashi said.

“While I think the idea of fewer unsanctioned fights is a great idea,” Sensei began, “could you two please wait until we aren’t in the hospital anymore? The last thing I want to see is how much you can escalate things.”

“Oh, yeah. We can save that for training.” I agreed.

Minato-sensei snapped his fingers, as though remembering something important. “Speaking of which, Obito. No training for at least a week.”

It was Obito’s turn to mutter something distinctly unhappy and sullen.

“And if you fall asleep on me, it’s going to be two weeks.” Minato-sensei said. “Not because I don’t like you, but concussions are not something to fool around with. The last thing I want is to see if you can be the youngest patient in the hospital with a brain hemorrhage.”

“Yes, Sensei.” Obito mumbled.

“And as for you, Keisuke-kun, keep a handle on that temper.” Minato-sensei said. I blinked. “Don’t think I didn’t notice.”

Ehehe. Whoops.

“I’m not mad anymore.” I said.

“Well, no, or else I would have expected murder instead of Tag.” Sensei said. “But I have to ask, what set you off anyway?”
“Um.” I began. Shiiiiit. I looked at Obito, who didn’t look exactly conscious.

“He’s mostly out.” Sensei said, sounding a little exasperated. “We’ll start again with him in two weeks. Anyway, like I was saying…”

“Obito gets bullied a lot.” I said quietly, uncomfortably rubbing the insides of my arms. It hadn’t even been my intention to find out about his home life in the first place, but when he was one of my best friends, it happened anyway. “It didn’t exactly stop after he made genin, but…um. He shouldn’t have a record for it, but Rin and I had to drag him here to get healed a couple of times.”

Kakashi frowned. “The Nohara girl?”

I was kind of surprised that Kakashi even remembered her, but I just nodded. “I worry, okay?”

“Is that why you always show up together?” Sensei asked.

“Yeah. Obito gets distracted easily and he helps people with chores and stuff all the time, which means otherwise he’d be late.” I said. I looked at the floor. “And the first day, I…um. I cut in and dragged him away before it got bad.”

I wanted to rush back to the Uchiha District and beat the hell out of Yoshi and Matsumaru anyway. It had been a while, but it didn’t make the urge any less powerful.

“So that’s what I’ve been doing.” I concluded, hoping Sensei and Kakashi wouldn’t ask anything else. I only had speculation to go on past that point.

“…I’m going to have to talk to the clan about this.” Sensei said under his breath, though I could hear him perfectly well.

Ahahaha. No.

“You should probably ask Obito first.” I urged him. “He knows that I know and Rin might, even if she hasn’t said anything, but there hasn’t been as much trouble since we graduated.” Maybe it was just my habitual distrust of everything showing again, but I didn’t trust Obito’s clan at all. I didn’t really trust any of the big clans, actually, since that would require assuming non-hostility or acceptance from hundreds of people under one big, fat umbrella and, well…no.

That, and at seventeen, I wasn’t sure Minato-sensei had all the answers. Actually, I rather doubted it. Even though he was a jōnin and I was just a kid.

“I…I don’t know much about clans. Or about having a big family.” None of us did, actually. And I hated myself for stumbling over the words, “But for now, I’ve been dealing with it. Obito’s been dealing with it. It’s working so far.”

“It won’t work forever.” Minato-sensei said.

“I figure it’ll stop once he grows up into a kickass ninja.” I admitted. I hoped so, anyway.

Minato-sensei sighed. Kakashi looked away. A very small nurse (or perhaps an assistant) walked into the room with a clipboard, calling the next patient into the exam room.

I wondered if they were thinking about Sakumo.

“Kei-senpai?” It was the nurse-like figure, all dressed in white and…wait. That was Rin’s face and her purple tattoos.
I grinned. “Rin-chan! How have you been?”

Rin smiled. “Pretty well. You?”

“Okay. But, uh…” I made a helpless gesture at Obito.

To Rin’s credit, she immediately looked at Obito before anyone else. She actually ignored Sensei and Kakashi entirely, eyes dark with concern, and I pinched Obito (subtly) in an attempt to get him to wake up and say hello.

He blinked, but he mostly looked unfocused and annoyed and oh god why did we let him fall asleep.

“Rin.” I said.

Rin’s eyes went narrow and dark and Sensei was alert inside of a second. Kakashi was booted off the couch because I wasn’t feeling charitable at all and Obito needed the space, and Rin raised her hands. They were already glowing, but not with the faint green of medical chakra. Instead, there was a faint bluish screen between her hands, and she brought it to Obito’s head.

So that’s what the diagnostic jutsu looks like, I thought, memorizing the way it felt.

“…So, apparently Rin’s been busy.” I said, apropos of nothing. Rin seemed too distracted to offer a comment.

“Did she graduate the same time that you did?” Minato-sensei asked.

“Yep.” I was so far past freaking out that I was almost serene. I must have used up all of my anger, fear, and possessiveness earlier. “Though I never did get a clear picture of what happened after. She was one of the top two kunoichi in the class, but she wasn’t placed with Obito and me.”

Because Kakashi was.

“You seem to have had a very busy life as a student.” Sensei commented neutrally.

“I had really good teachers outside of school.” I said, not looking at him.

Mom. Dad. Yamaguchi-sensei. And the Dreamer, given how much I bounced ideas off of her.

“So I see.”

I think I could hear Sensei stepping up his training plans. Agh.

“I think you and Obito should start working on pair training, after he recovers.” Sensei said speculatively.

“What is that and why?”

“It’s specialized teamwork, and because you’ll both get much stronger.”

I was not convinced. Mainly because every time a ninja said “to become stronger” I kept thinking that someone was going to sell their soul to something. Such as a snake demon.

It was at about that time that I felt Rin’s chakra calming down again, so I decided to ignore my impending doom in favor of my friend. Obito, it seemed, had fallen back asleep without so much as a word in greeting.
“Obito will be okay, Kei-senpai!” Rin said, obviously stressed but not actually panicking. I figured that was enough. “It’s true that we don’t like it when concussed patients fall asleep, but it doesn’t seem as serious as it could be.

“In that case, I’ll let this one slide. And I’ll make sure to let Obito know we saw you and you’re doing great,” I said, distracted by another thought, “Also, when did you start calling me senpai and why didn’t I get the memo?”

“Oh! Um.” Rin leaned in, as though sharing a secret. “I’m Akihito-shishō’s apprentice now.”

I had officially blown a hole in causality and changed one of the subsets of my visions by existing. Go me.

“That’s great, Rin-chan! Though I have to hear how it happened.” I glanced back at Sensei and Kakashi, of whom looked amused and the other of the two looking apathetic. “Later. Sorry, Rin-chan. Anyway, these two are Minato-sensei and Kakashi. Though I think you already know Kakashi.”

Rin paused. “You were in our class when we were five, weren’t you, Kakashi-kun?”

So Kakashi still rated a “-kun” while Obito was just that? Crap.

“Probably.” Kakashi said with a shrug.

I sighed. “Anyway, Rin-chan, how long until Obito’s up and about?”

“About an hour, probably, and I would still recommend seeing Akihito-shishō or another medic-nin to be sure. He’ll want to sleep the rest of the day off, though.” Rin looked sad. “Though I have to ask, how did it happen?”

I pointed wordlessly at Kakashi.

Let it never be said that I wasn’t petty.

Later, I did manage to find out that Yamaguchi-sensei had utterly flunked his team. I didn’t hear why, exactly, but the boys went to the Genin Corps while he picked Rin as his personal apprentice. Since my sense of compassion was somewhat truncated when it came to people I didn’t actually know, I decided that the best thing to do would be to support Rin any way I could. She seemed happy, having a purpose in life and something she was really good at, so I wasn’t going to hold her back at all.

I still invited her home for dinner, though.
Genin Life: A Different Kind of Graduation

Chapter Summary

Kei: Be melodramatic.

I know I’m not sane. I knew it even when I was nine years old and still getting my feet under me.

Thoughts like that don’t just come out of nowhere. The split personality-slash-sanity-preserving-mental-construct that the Dreamer turned out to be hadn’t just come out of nowhere, after all. Neither had Id. Partitioning parts of one’s mind off from the rest is not a sign of a stable, well-adjusted individual. Just look at Dark Naruto or Inner Sakura and the way they were born of a disconnection between inner and outer selves that their originators denied but nevertheless still experienced.

Inner Sakura, I’ll admit, was probably more dramatic and less practical. Hide behind a mask for too long and you start to forget what’s supposed to be underneath it, unless you let it out to play every once in a while.

Dark Naruto had been a justified reaction to systemic rejection by Konoha as a whole. Whatever else I could say about the Naruto in my visions, “happy childhood” was not a thought that came to mind despite his habitual fox smile. Suppressing those feelings had probably been the only thing keeping Naruto from ripping the seal to bits and letting the Kyuubi loose again, other than ignorance. That, and hope that tomorrow would be better.

Precognition is the antithesis of hope.

It’s the precursor to fear.

I don’t think any normal older sister, particularly one who had breezed through the Academy with perfect scores inside of a year, would have reacted the way I did when Hayate and Mom announced at dinner that he’d be joining the Academy the next year.

“Sis, you’re gonna attend my ceremony, right?” Hayate asked,

I couldn’t help it. I froze up. My chopsticks stopped halfway to my mouth. My right arm started shaking so badly that the soba noodles flopped right off the end of them. I couldn’t breathe over the force of my own helplessness. The room was getting smaller, wasn’t it?

GET UP, HAYATE! PLEASE, GET UP!

In hindsight, I suppose it was somewhat fitting that my first reaction was fear and not rage. My first memory of Hayate had always been the worst. It was the fact that all I could do was watch…

“Kei-chan?” Mom asked.

I think I froze for about a total of five seconds before I was interrupted.

WAKE UP! the Dreamer screamed at me, giving me the equivalent of a mental slap across the face. This is not the time to get caught in a vision!
I blinked. Mom was standing in front of me, her hands on my shoulders, with Hayate by her side. I blinked at him, too, trying to shake the image of the dead special jōnin he might grow up to be. Then and there, he was too small, his face too round and unmarked, and he looked up at me in blank innocence, as though any protests against his decision to become a ninja were from completely out of context.

Which they kind of were.

Mom let go of my shoulders. “Kei-chan, are you feeling all right?”

“Just a little tired, Mom.” I said, hugging Hayate. He made a confused noise, but he let me do it. “Sensei’s been keeping us busy this whole month, and I haven’t been getting enough sleep.”

He had, actually. Whatever other adjectives could be used to describe Minato Namikaze, “lazy” was not one of them, and he didn’t like to see it in his students either. As for not getting enough sleep… well, I don’t think I’ll ever have enough sleep after a life like this. I’d been pretty bad before, too, but this was ridiculous as well as self-destructive. I’d probably head back my former habit of sleeping whenever I could, wherever I could, and I could already see that becoming a problem.

The visions had never intruded on my waking hours before, though.

The Dreamer replied, I hope you plan on training soon. Holding your visions back is like trying to plug a breached dam with your bare hands. I don’t have enough chakra to pull this off forever at your current level.

It would be really nice to know why the fuck I keep getting them in the first place, I thought viciously.

Setting my chin on top of my brother’s head, I said, “So, the Academy already? I was three years older than you when I joined up!” Funny how that had been only a year ago.

“He’s as good as any clan student at this point.” Mom said, ruffling my hair. She’d apparently decided to let the issue lie.

“I’ll be fine. If you could do it, so can I!” Hayate insisted, and he wiggled enough out of my grip that he could put his head on my shoulder. He squeezed my ribs reassuringly.

“Well, don’t try to graduate too early.” I said. I let him out of my grip so I could poke him in the forehead to keep his attention on me.

“Sis!” Hayate protested.

“I’m serious, Hayate-chan!” I said, “I barely got a year to learn everyone’s names and figure out who might be okay to be on a team with, and I got lucky. You should enjoy your days in the Academy, because I’m gonna help Mom drill you into the ground when you get home.”

“You’re the worst sister ever.” Hayate said, pouting.

“Speaking of drills,” Mom broke in, “Kei-chan, it’s about time that you had your second graduation ceremony.”

I gave Mom a strange look over Hayate’s head. “Um. What?”

“You can’t carry that bokken out into the field, Kei-chan.” Mom said patiently. “I know I haven’t had a chance to teach you much about the difference between bokken and a kodachi or katana, but I won’t allow you to take C-ranked missions without a proper blade.”
“Does that mean…?” I trailed off, too overwhelmed to speak.

“After one last assessment, I’ll determine which blade you’ll be using and buy one for you.” Mom said, nodding. “It won’t be the best quality in the world, but it should be enough to get you started until you can accept upper-level missions and afford a good one.”

Oh. I’d forgotten about the family money trouble for a while. I’m an idiot. Mom was killing two birds with one stone—with Hayate in the Academy and me as a genin, she might be able to reenter the active roster and actually get something like an income. At the moment, we were living off her and dad’s savings and I had no idea how much was left.

“Meet me at the usual training fields in an hour, all right? There’s still enough daylight to take care of this.” Mom smiled, and after we were all done eating like normal people, she disappeared. I only had to check the slot above the couch to realize that all of the training swords were gone with her.

Was I imagining things or did Mom look kind of bloodthirsty when she’d said that?

And then I realized that she left me with the dishes. Sigh. Mom, really?

Anyway, I grabbed my bokken and Hayate and headed to the training ground. Hayate wasn’t really on a set school or training schedule, so I guess it wasn’t any trouble that he tended to follow me. I figured he’d want to witness his big sister’s ignoble defeat at the hands of Mom, anyway, which would probably encourage him to listen to Mom forever. At least he probably wouldn’t cut his fingers off with his shinai.

…Though I might have been underestimating the ingenuity of small children on that count.

When we got to the training field, Mom was waiting for us in her training gi and the sun was starting to dip behind the tree-line. Hayate climbed one of the nearby maples and sat on the lowest limb, while I unstrapped my bokken and brought it up in front of me in a defensive pose.

“Remember, Kei-chan, this is your final test. Your task is to touch me three times, or else achieve a possibly fatal injury. Got it?”

I was going to get my ass quite thoroughly kicked and I knew it. Still, I nodded.

“You can do it, Sis!” Hayate called, and Mom charged while I was processing it.

Mom was fast. I still wasn’t completely sure of her rank, though at that moment I was thinking “special jōnin with a combat focus” and “oh shit.” Not exactly in that order, though.

I was blocking as soon as I could perceive the strikes, but she had the force of her chakra moving in perfect synch. I was being driven back not just by the weight and strength difference, but by the force of her chakra and her skill. I was practically skidding along the ground, too surprised to compensate by using my chakra to keep traction on the dirt.

Damn it, I’m not losing without putting up a fight.

The Dreamer chose that moment to jump in. NOW!

I focused my chakra into the bottoms of my feet and heaved. Mom was thrown back for a split second by the force of my chakra, but that was all.

I’d only won a second’s reprieve, so I immediately turned and bolted for the nearest tree. I didn’t have strength, stamina, experience, skill, or reach on her. All I had was my brain, and the Dreamer.
That, and a willingness to do a lot of stupid things.

I could feel Mom following me so, without giving her a chance to respond, I ran right up the tree’s bark and past Hayate, weaving between branches too close together for Mom to easily follow. I only needed a second to do what was necessary…

Mom appeared in front of me and crack went the sound of my ribs under duress.

Or, you know, that would have been the sound if I’d actually still been there.

I got a good look at Mom’s stunned face at my seal-less Replacement Jutsu from about three trees over. Suppressing my chakra signature to almost nothing. I used the bare minimum necessary for a camouflage genjutsu. It wasn’t strong, or even particularly useful in most situations, but seeming like I was actually crouching a few inches to my right thanks to simultaneous use of the Clone Jutsu could be a lifesaver.

Mom dropped out of the tree, spotted my clone, and the next thing I knew she was practically in my face, bokken chopping neatly through my illusion.

Yeah, I was really gonna have to work on my speed.

And that was about when I brought my own bokken crashing into her ribs.

Bomp!

Turned out Mom knew how to make shadow clones. Shit.

Thank the merciful creator deities of your choice for camouflage techniques, even if Mom probably knew where I was. Of the various clone techniques, shadow clones remained the only ones that transferred the information they picked up directly to their creators. They also required a massive amount of chakra to create in useful numbers, unlike the various elemental clones, but Mom demonstrated quite handily that most ninjas didn’t need more than one.

Guess Naruto was compensating for his early-series weaknesses, then.

Our mother is too strong to take on directly or without distractions, the Dreamer pointed out unhelpfully. She’s to our right. Ten degrees. Fifteen meters.

I had my chakra running slow and low, almost as imperceptible as natural energy to normal people, and I think that was why I managed to catch Mom by surprise with my second rapid-fire and seal-less replacement with a tree branch. I had enough chakra control for any jōnin, and it just barely made up for my total lack of chakra resources.

I was so out of my depth it wasn’t even funny.

Still. I didn’t plan on losing without a fight.

The second time Mom and I clashed blade-to-blade, it was in midair. I was promptly sent careening into the ground, though I got my feet under me in time and used the momentum to zoom off into the underbrush. The G-forces I pulled then were more than I remembered even in my old life, on a rollercoaster.

The funny thing about shinobi kenjutsu is how much time you spend airborne, really. And how much time is spent setting up or reacting to ambushes. When you get down to it, a katana was actually a handicap for a ninjutsu specialist, because of the basic fact that most shinobi need both hands to do basically anything with their chakra. About the only seal most of us could make would be the Seal of Confrontation, which is supposed to be a half-seal and barely works in any sense of the word, even for activating exploding tags (unless you’re Deidara) or for focusing one’s chakra (unless you’re Deidara).

Or the Seal of Reconciliation, but that’s a ceremonial thing and not really relevant to my situation.

Fuck it. I cast outward with my chakra sense, confirming my mother’s position and that of another shadow clone.

Eleven o’clock, seventeen meters, the Dreamer confirmed.

I killed the clone with a thrown kunai before scurrying off into the underbrush to avoid Mom’s inevitable counterattack.

That was about when Hayate landed on my back, knocking the wind out of me and sending me crashing right to the ground. I actually face-planted in the dirt.

“Get off, Hayate-chan.” I said, my voice muffled by the ground.

Mom was so cheating.

“But I’m going to help!” Hayate insisted, getting off and drawing his shinai. “Mommy’s not being fair!”

Mom came rushing out of nowhere, smashing her bokken into mine as I barely managed to raise my arms to divert it away from Hayate. I was on the defensive, even with Hayate barking at Mom’s heels and swinging his shinai just after she’d moved out of the way or gotten her bokken up to deflect the blows. I aimed a thrust at her ribs, but she turned the tip of my bokken aside with barely a thought.

And then she cracked me in the ribs with it, which knocked the air from my lungs for the second time in five minutes. Hayate immediately went to fill the gap, blocking our mom’s swings with astonishing solidity for a kid.

That said, he was promptly knocked ass over teakettle when Mom swept his legs out from under him.

Okay, my little brother was adorable with his little training sword, but seriously? I was going to die if he kept it up. I didn’t have the skill to defend him and complete my test.

Maybe that’s the point.

…Mom had a bell test.

GOD FUCKING DAMMIT.

I stepped over him, planting my feet with chakra, and met our mom’s slash with everything I had. Behind me, Hayate got to his feet and threw his arms around my waist, bracing me as much as he was trying to just cling to me. He was shaking—he’d never seen Mom like that. I hadn’t either, but I had more of an idea of what to do.

Mom’s and my bokken started to crack at the point of contact.

“Why won’t you dodge, Kei-chan?” Mom asked, almost serene despite the countdown to splinters
“Like hell I’ll leave my brother alone!” I snarled back, chakra surging to reinforce my muscles. “If I dodge, Hayate gets flattened, or used as a kunai, and I’m not letting you!”

Blood on the rooftop, wind blades whistling through the air, a choked-off scream…

Remnants of red sand and splintered wood, the metallic gleam of a dismembered Melody Arm weapon, the curl of blood and sweat and steel in the night…

“You should have tried harder…”

For a second, I didn’t see Mom. I saw Baki, and I saw Kabuto, and I had enough hate in my blood for any Uchiha including Tobi. “I will never let anyone hurt him!” I threw everything I had into it. It wasn’t going to be enough. It wasn’t ever going to be enough.

But like hell I’d let that stop me.

Mom’s eyes widened.

Hayate squeaked.

I used the Replacement Jutsu. For me and for Hayate.

We both landed back in the clearing, since I’d replaced us with a couple of rocks and trusted that Mom could get out of trouble on her own. I was shaking, reeling from the effects of the vision crossing with my reality and from sparring with Mom at full tilt, and Hayate was sprawled across my ribcage. He didn’t seem like he was interested in moving, given how noodle-like he was acting.

“Sis?” Hayate mumbled into my shirt.

“Yeah, Hayate-chan?” I puffed.

“You scared me back there.” Hayate said, rolling over so he was lying with his head back against my stomach. “I’ve never seen you so mad.”

“I scared myself too, Hayate-chan.” I mumbled, ruffling his hair with my right hand. “And I hope I never do that again.”

Mom reappeared, standing above us with nary a scratch on her. She actually looked worried, and I realized belatedly that I was running worryingly low on chakra. Hayate was still a little unsteady, too. I don’t think he’d insisted on clinging to me so much since we were really little.

“Kei-chan? Hayate-chan?”

“We’re okay, Mom.” I said, sitting up with difficulty. Hayate managed to cram himself into the space between my side and my left arm and latch his arms around my ribs, which made it a little hard to breathe and made me feel like I had some kind of growth attached to me.

That was about when Mom swept us both up into a somewhat strangling hug.

I did end up getting a sword. It was a rather nice kodachi, for all that I was still a ways away from my full growth and full potential. I practiced with it for a week before Mom dared let me carry it without a bokken for backup, because she didn’t want me to cut my fingers off. She didn’t really seem to care if I cut anyone else’s fingers off.
It was a pretty nasty surprise for Kakashi the next time we sparred, though, to my everlasting glee.
Genin Life: Team Minato in a Nutshell

Chapter Summary

Kei: Do D-ranked missions.

In Team Minato, team practice went a little like this:

Obito and Kakashi always sparred first. I think Sensei was trying to see if he could wear them out before either one faced me, which was nice but probably not entirely necessary. I didn’t need to be coddled. It was a house rule of sorts that we could only escalate the fight to jutsu and weaponry if Sensei said so. And since Obito didn’t have a sword or any training in using one, and Kakashi only had a tantō, I didn’t get to use my kodachi as much as I’d have liked.

So, after Kakashi and Obito beat the crap out of each other, with Obito ending the match with the most developing bruises, I’d spar with one of the boys. If I still had any chakra to spare afterward, I’d also fix everyone up as best I could. Not because I was better than the hospital, but more because I needed the practice and because they were convenient guinea pigs.

I maintained that the only reason I ever won was because I was completely willing to be a cheating little shit and also because I bit people. It was easier than saying or thinking that either of my teammates had weaknesses.

“Well, I think we’re just about ready to take on our D-ranked mission for today,” Minato-sensei said after we finished. We hadn’t actually beaten the stuffing out of one another this time, so we’d probably make it through a D-rank or two without complaining too much.

Still, Obito groaned theatrically. I sighed. Kakashi made a noise in the back of his throat that made his opinion of having to do D-ranks as a chūnin very clear.

All things considered, though, I was kind of surprised that Sensei even stuck around for our D-ranks anymore. While I knew he was still a teenager, if an insanely talented one, I kept thinking that as Konoha’s Yellow Flash, he ought to be in the field doing things. Kakashi was probably used to tagging along as the world’s deadliest puppy, because I couldn’t see Minato-sensei being deployed anywhere without him.

I wondered if having Obito and me around was actually slowing down the war effort, given how deadly Sensei could be. Then again, I also didn’t know yet if Sensei even had his wartime reputation. I knew that he’d earned the nickname and killed probably two or three hundred enemy shinobi by the time Team Minato had their first casualty. That reputation was part of what got him sent on the mission to the front lines while Kakashi, Obito, and Rin got themselves nearly killed in Grass territory.

And that would all come to a head within four years.

It’d be nice to get my hands on a Bingo Book. Even if it was just a copy from Konoha, anyone more dangerous than the average chūnin was listed, just in case. Then I’d have an idea of who would be active and dangerous enough to either avoid or expend all of the team’s explosives allowance to kill.
Not that that would be enough for some of the freaks of nature running around even now. Kisame Hoshigaki kept coming to mind for some reason.

Leaving my worries of the future aside for a while, I trailed the rest of Team Minato as we headed into the mission office.

The odd thing was that, even in wartime, the Hokage always overlooked the entire room. While I suppose that leaving missions of critical importance was generally not the type of thing a chūnin could be trusted with, we were getting a D-rank. It wasn’t exactly a matter of national security, but I supposed even Hiruzen Sarutobi needed to stay in practice. He gave out really important missions from his office, and we hadn’t been called there yet.

Well, I’m sure that Kakashi and Sensei had, but Obito and I were green enough that it probably wouldn’t happen for a while.

“Team Minato reporting for duty, Hokage-sama.” Sensei said once we’d all trooped in. Kakashi’s back was as straight as a plank, always professional in the presence of someone who could call him on failing to meet expectations, while Obito bounced on the balls of his feet and I maintained my habitual slouch. Good posture was for people who thought they had a good chance of reaching thirty, or Kakashi.

I’d actually left my kodachi at home, because I figured—

“Your mission is to report to the hospital and assist the staff in any way necessary,” the Hokage said.

Yep. Chore mission, again.

Obito actually slumped, while I sighed inwardly. Every two weeks, like clockwork, it was time to head back to the hospital and get up to our elbows in trash bins, mops, brooms, and laundry detergent. I hadn’t liked that part of the job much even when I’d been volunteering with Yamaguchi-sensei and learning as I went. Whenever the hospital put out a request for an actual D-rank, though, I knew I wasn’t even going to get that much out of it.

At least we’d probably see Rin there.

When we got to the hospital, Ayako Shirohana met us at the front door. She shoved a mop into Obito’s hands, gave Kakashi a trash bag, broom, and dust bin, and I was loaded down with dirty linens. We were all promptly told to get to work until our jobs were over, at which point we’d converge on the rest of the laundry and beat it to death with sticks and soap. When I looked toward Sensei for confirmation, or at least sympathy, he was already gone. I could still sense his presence nearby, but I kind of wondered if he’d been drafted into patient-transporting duty.

So, all in all it was a pretty typical mission.

That said, I wondered why I was on laundry duty when Kakashi and Obito were more or less both put on cleaning duty, likely with overlapping assigned areas, but I supposed that they’d have to learn how to deal with each other somehow. I wouldn’t always be around to mediate or punch someone, and neither would Sensei.

Frowning, I made a mental note to check on the boys if I went twenty minutes without feeling something or other. I couldn’t entirely trust Obito to keep on task, and Kakashi would probably use his full ninja speed just to finish his assignment faster. So would Sensei, actually, and as far as I could tell he was at least still in the building.

I decided to leave it to him.
I made my way up to the roof about an hour later, gratified to know that at least Obito and Kakashi’s most recent spat hadn’t ended with anyone needing medical attention (because there was only so much damage a pair of nine-year-old children could do with dust-bins and buckets). I still had a basket of linens to hang to dry, and enough clothespins to suspend a small child up from a washing line with little trouble.

It’d have been a cinch if it wasn’t for the fact that there were about enough of said washing lines and linen sheets to qualify as a small forest.

I sighed. Might as well get started.

The Dreamer commented idly, I find it hard to believe that Team Kakashi could enter the Chūnin Exams with dozens of this sort of mission under their belt and vanishingly few C-ranks.

There wasn’t enough training in the world to make up for a total lack of field experience, in my opinion. I hoped Sensei would come up with something to bridge the gap, or else we’d probably all die on our first team C-ranked mission. I had no doubt whatsoever that, as the team partially composed of the walking neuroses eventually responsible for the Fourth Shinobi World War, our missions would not go smoothly once the risk of enemy ninjas became reality.

There was the brief puff of wind chakra and displaced air as Sensei appeared behind me. “Are you doing all right, Kei-kun?”

“Yes, Sensei.” I said without looking, shaking one of the sheets out. It was still damp and twice as heavy as it needed to be.

Flare out, snap, done. Clothespins next…

“You’re awfully quiet today.” Sensei commented.

I glanced at him. He was sitting on one of the overturned baskets that had been sitting up here since who-knew-when, as innocent as a puppy after demolishing its owner’s shoe collection. I didn’t trust that look. I said, “There wasn’t a lot to talk about. Ayako-san expects me to do a good job, Obito and Kakashi are busy somewhere else, and folding laundry means I only have pigeons to talk to.”

As though to illustrate my point, two of the aforementioned birds flew overhead. Thankfully, they did not do the typical pigeon thing and crap all over everything.

Sensei made a neutral noise. “You don’t have to be on the defensive.”

I sighed, returning to my sheets. Shake, snap, flare…

“On a related topic, I was going to ask you something.” Sensei said. I sensed him stand up and walk over to the basket, pulling one of the sheets out to help me. “So, have you considered the idea of doubles training with Obito?”

“I have, though I don’t have any idea where to start.” I admitted. To be honest, training to fight in sync with a specific partner was probably the solution to my problem with Obito’s combat skills. I just didn’t want to depend on anyone in a full fight, and I also didn’t want to exclude Kakashi from what amounted to our “in-group.” Sure, Kakashi didn’t appear to give a damn, but he was nine. Most opponents would be stronger, faster, and have more reach when compared to him at this age. It felt a little like I’d be leaving him vulnerable, even if I knew that Obito and I were the team’s real weaknesses. “The level of understanding we’d have to have, both about our mindsets and our fighting styles… It’s pretty daunting.”

“But not insurmountable.” Minato-sensei pointed out, clipping the sheets onto the line well above my head.

“How many people have you known who have trained for tandem fighting?” I asked curiously.

“A few.” Sensei said lightly. It was not a helpful thing to say. “Most of them had at least one Uchiha or Hyūga involved, but I’ll grant you that it isn’t necessarily common.”

No shit, Sensei. Half of the point of the Sharingan was the ability to predict someone else’s movements, while the Byakugan made it possible to see everything in a range that was frankly kind of ridiculous. I remembered that Hinata, while not exactly having the best detail for an all-Jyūken tenketsu-maiming fight, still managed to see in a range of up to ten kilometers by the time of the Fourth Shinobi World War. “What makes you think Obito and I can pull it off?”

“It’s because you want to be able to do it.” Sensei replied, looking down at me fully. I blinked upward at his suddenly steely blue eyes. “Kei-kun, I know you have some trouble with how protective you are of Obito. But you both need to stand on your own two feet sooner or later.”

“I understand, Sensei.” I said. Sooner would be better, if the Kannabi bridge mission was still in the cards. A thought struck me. “We’re probably going to upgrade to C- and B-ranks soon, aren’t we?”

Minato-sensei paused. “What makes you say that?”

“Kakashi’s too talented to waste his skills cleaning hospital rooms.” I said, flicking another sheet out full-length with a simultaneous flick of my wrists. “And your score on the report alone puts you on par or better than most of the jōnin we’re fielding now, which means keeping Obito and me in the village to hone our teamwork is actually holding the village back a bit. Kakashi probably took missions with you before, and holding both of you in reserve… It’s a waste.”

Sensei’s hand landed on my head. On a related note, I hated being short.

“You’re too hard on yourself.” Sensei told me. “You and Obito both.”

I shrugged. “It’s not being unfair if it’s true, Sensei.”

Honestly, I think it was a little like Team Kakashi in some ways. While, granted, Sasuke wasn’t exactly on mini-Kakashi’s level, the fact remained that Kakashi was almost too valuable then to waste on training a gang of brats. I think it had mostly to do with the fact that, as a prodigy whose whole thing was information analysis and learning stuff faster than anyone had before, he’d probably never actually learned how to break down his techniques for someone else to learn. Teaching other people how to break down his best techniques was probably anathema to him. He had also never seemed super interested in the idea of actually teaching anyone anything, ever, and I wasn’t sure I could really blame him for it.

I’d have probably requested a transfer from Team Seven if they’d been my students.

I went on, “Also, while we’ve been training against each other, we’ve never actually fought anyone, genuinely.” I thought that over. “Well, I’m sure Obito thinks he has, but Kakashi isn’t ever really trying to kill him.” And my mom didn’t count, no matter what form her final test had taken.

Sensei sighed. He seemed like he wanted to ruffle my hair, like he probably did with Kakashi when Obito and I weren’t around, but my bandanna hitai-ate remained an obstacle. “You’ll do fine, Kei-kun.”
I sure hoped so, though I wasn’t at all sure it would go so smoothly.

“Hey, we’re done with the lower floors!” Obito said, bursting out onto the roof. I took one look at him and had to keep from laughing, because there was no way I was letting him anywhere near the clean linens with mop water all over him.

Kakashi, who appeared about a second later, seemed to have had a dustbin upended on his head.

It was nice to see the boys were getting along.

I said, “I hope you’re not planning on getting anywhere near the linen looking like that.”

Obito paused, assessing his condition and Kakashi’s in a quick glance. “Well, no laundry duty for us.”

Kakashi gave him a sidelong glare just as Minato-sensei said, “Go get washed up, you two.”

I made shooing motions with the sheet, just so Obito would get the message. He pouted at me. “Really, Kei? With the sheets?”

“I said. The boys skedaddled.

I saw Sensei open his mouth to say something, but I wasn’t really paying much attention to him because there was another chakra signature approaching at an insane speed. I snapped my mouth shut so quickly that I felt my teeth click together and turned to face the oncoming chakra monster. From the way it was moving, it was running up the side of the building…

The next thing I saw was green. Lots of it.

“DYNAMIC ENTRY!”

Sensei moved, grabbing the intruder out of the air and holding him up by his belt—a red-banded hitai-ate—before he could slam his feet into my face. I’d dropped into a defensive crouch, hand on my kunai pouch before I even really processed what was happening, and then I paused.

Unless there was another taijutsu monster in green running around, Sensei had caught a miniature Gai. The bowl cut and gigantic eyebrows (far dwarfing whatever issues I’d had with mine in another lifetime) made it obvious.

For a second or two, all three of us just sort of stood there like the world’s weirdest statue, and then Sensei dropped the genin Gai on the roof.

“While it’s nice to see you again, Gai-kun, Kakashi is actually a floor down at the moment.” Minato-sensei told the genin, mild as ever. “You just missed him.”

“Oh,” said mini-Gai. He paused, then he bowed deeply. “My deepest apologies for almost committing the unforgivable mistake of striking an unprepared Konoha ninja! I am Maito Gai! Who are you?”

“Keisuke Gekkō.” I said, holding out my hand. One of these days, I was going to contemplate the mystery of how Rock Lee and Maito Gai’s names were always in the same order. Then again, “Lee Rock” and “Gai Maito” just sounded weird. Maybe they were really titles? Hell if I knew.

He took it, shaking it enthusiastically. It almost felt like my arm was about to be pulled off after a certain point. “It is very nice to meet you, Keisuke-san! Are you my rival Kakashi’s new teammate?”
“One of two, yes.” Yeah, I was going to need my hand back sometime before my shoulder or elbow decided to pop out of joint. “How long have you been a ninja, Gai-san?”

“I graduated from the Academy when I was seven,” he replied cheerfully. “And you?”

“Obito and I just graduated in the last month.” I said, shrugging with my free shoulder. “We’re not exactly awe-inspiring yet, and—”

There was a muffled thud from the stairwell. Gai finally let go of my hand, distracted, and I clasped my hands behind my back so he couldn’t see me trying to massage feeling back into my fingers. Taijutsu was clearly his specialty already, if he could cause that without even trying.

“…And we still have our problems getting used to the new arrangements.” I concluded, glancing at the door. “Sensei, I’m not totally sure they won’t kill each other.”

“Then it’s my job to stop them, Kei-kun.” Minato-sensei replied, and he handed me another sheet so that he could do just that and keep me just busy enough that I wouldn’t test out Gai’s Dynamic Entry on Kakashi’s face if he turned out to have hurt Obito somehow. Then he disappeared down the stairs.

I looked at Gai. “Sorry, we’re really supposed to be on a D-ranked mission at the moment. It’s just that Kakashi and Obito are too busy trying to beat the hell out of each other to actually work.”

“Oh my eternal rival is slipping!” Gai told me. “He has never been the kind of shinobi to neglect a mission before!”

I held up a linen sheet dubiously and said, “I kind of doubt this is what he considers a real mission.”

“True! My rival has been on much higher-ranked missions before, but he is not lazy and it must mean that you and Obito-san are more interesting than missions, Keisuke-san!”

Well, that was one way to look at it.

About a second later, Minato-sensei reappeared with Obito and Kakashi in hand. Specifically, he was holding Kakashi by the back of his shirt and Obito by one ankle. They looked somewhat scuffed-up, but they were at least dust-free and didn’t seem to have thrown each other out any windows. It was about the best I could ask for.

“Hello again, my eternal rival Kakashi!” Gai enthused, making Obito blink at him even while upside-down. Kakashi just rolled his eyes.

“Kakashi, do you know this guy?” Obito asked in a strangely flat voice. I think he was in awe of the mystique of one Maito Gai, even if it sounded more like total disbelief.

“No,” said Kakashi.

It was the closest thing to a non-hostile interaction between the two boys in a month. Even after Sensei dropped them both and went back to hanging the laundry.

“Again with that cool and hip attitude!” Gai shouted. “I challenge you to a match of your choice! If I lose, I will walk five laps around the village, on my hands!”

I clipped another sheet up. Obito seemed too distracted by their bizarre male bonding ritual to remember that he was supposed to help me. “Go team.” I muttered.
In the end, the Duel of the Day was decided by Rock-Paper-Scissors.

Gai lost. We didn’t see him for the rest of the day.
The Dreaded C-Rank: Dive On In

Chapter Summary

Kei: Upgrade.

It took about two months for us all to get bored to the point of utter insanity. Sensei might not have liked the idea of having us on C-ranks before we could, say, beat the crap out of each other some more, but even he couldn’t deny that he was getting a little restless. Sure, we wouldn’t really be anywhere near the hellish warzone that the Land of Grass was developing into, or the mess that was the Land of Rain, but it would probably be best for everyone to get us out of the village to work off the excess energy.

That said, it wasn’t like the time we spent in the village was wasted. We took and completed dozens of D-ranks, including the dreaded pet retrieval missions. Tora hadn’t been born yet, I think, so at least we didn’t have to deal with him.

I went to Hayate’s Academy entrance ceremony, and I managed not to die of a panic-induced heart attack from sheer nerves. Going by who I’d seen in the crowd, it looked like Hayate was going to be in Iruka and Mizuki’s graduating class. I didn’t really see anyone else I recognized, but I also understood that it’d been forever since I’d seen half the “major players” in the plot and quite possibly wouldn’t recognize them at age five anyway. Since Hayate had elected to start a year late, he was one of the older kids in his year as opposed to the youngest, which really didn’t mean all that much. It made me feel better, though.

Aside from that, I was also able to start contributing to the family funds with all of those D-ranked missions. Sure, the pay wasn’t all that great and I was about two years from being able to afford my own shinobi-grade katana, but it at least took care of the question of my pocket money and took some of the burden off of Mom.

Speaking of which, I’d totally missed the fact that Konoha did, in fact, have a Widows and Orphans Fund. We didn’t quite seem to qualify, since Mom was a ninja too and the damn program had apparently been designed with civilian wives and children in mind, but we got something and it was enough to at least pay for food and basic necessities, while my extra pay and Mom’s savings took care of the more esoteric stuff. I’d never realized how much money went into paying for all the mission equipment I’d need for a real trip.

For reference, five thousand ryō was about the maximum anyone ever paid for a D-ranked mission, and even then it was split between Sensei, Kakashi, Obito and me. S-ranked missions, on the other hand, went for millions of ryō, depending on the specifics. Basically, the difference was generally in the number of zeroes tacked on the end, even aside from the fact that even inexperienced ninjas could generally be expected not to die on D-ranked missions and the fact that S-ranked ones tended to be handed off to jōnin and ANBU.

The fact that both Team Minato (then composed of two jōnin and two chūnin) and the Sasuke Retrieval Squad (with a new chūnin and four genin) would be sent on A-ranked missions anyway did not exactly inspire confidence in the system, though.

Aside from the dread, though, I was actually feeling okay on the day we went in to get our first Cranked mission. Even if we hadn’t been frustrated, I thought that Team Minato was capable of taking a C-ranked mission and not dying. Obito and I had been working for two months on nothing but coordination, even if we were mostly gaining ground individually. No matter what Sensei tried, he couldn’t quite get us to click as a duo, and we’d almost been killed by each other’s techniques once or twice.

Team Awesomeness (sans Rin) was still a work in progress, but at least we’d refined what we actually had. Obito had figured out the Grand Fireball and was working on the Phoenix Sage Fire jutsu. We’d burned through a month’s supply of straw dummies with that one and my Sensei-sanctioned exploding tags. I’d probably used up my allowance on that count, though.

As for me, I’d managed to get chakra scalpels down well enough that I didn’t need seals to form them. The ones I made without hand seals could only cut through things the way an axe did, though. Because they weren’t precisely solid, since the chakra cost of that would have been enormous, the damage could only be seen if I was able to practice on cadavers and maybe sides of pork. They left the skin mostly intact, but the results on the insides of soft targets were…messy. They weren’t so much chakra scalpels as chakra kitchen knives, but I could work with it as long as no one needed me to do any actual surgery.

When it came to Kakashi, it was hard to tell how much he made progress with. He rarely used anything but taijutsu in spars, even though I knew he had more to play with than just that. I was pretty sure he knew the Shadow Clone jutsu, though, if only because he had to learn it sometime and I knew he had it down by the time he turned thirteen. I knew his chakra capacity was expanding, like Obito’s and mine, but at a slightly slower pace. Then again, I seemed to remember something about how his stamina would never be more than average.

But hey, we’d been a team for about two and a half months and we were all still alive. Go us.

When we arrived in the mission office, the atmosphere was subtly different, even though Sensei still greeted the Hokage with a mild, “Team Minato, reporting for duty.”

We braced for disappointment.

The Hokage puffed on his pipe once or twice, exhaling a cloud of thick white-gray smoke. I narrowed my eyes a little—growing up with a smoker dad in one lifetime and a brother with what seemed to be asthma on steroids in another, I wasn’t exactly approving of the habit. I didn’t say anything about it, though, since it was the Hokage.

“Hm. Today, we have a few C-ranked missions available,” the Hokage said around his pipe. “Minato-kun, do you believe your team is ready for one?”

My heartbeat quickened. Really? A C-ranked mission?

Granted, the only C-ranked mission I’d ever seen in my visions had promptly gone A-rank, but I could at least hope for the best, right?

C-ranked missions could pay up to a hundred thousand ryō. This was balanced by the fact that they were a lot more likely to kill the shinobi involved than D-ranked ones. They were usually assigned to chūnin teams, or possibly jōnin-led genin teams if the mission risk was judged to be lower than normal. The Wave Mission undertaken by Team Kakashi was one example.

Before the missing-nin had gotten involved, anyway.
“Very well. At the moment…” He paused, looking through the scrolls for an appropriate task. “At the moment, we have three C-rank missions that are within your team’s capabilities. However, I believe it would be best if we kept it within the Land of Fire for now. It is your first, after all.”

“Yes, Hokage-sama.” Kakashi, Obito, and I said as one. Then we blinked and looked at each other, because that was kind of creepy.

Sensei snorted with laughter, hiding his mouth behind a hand. When we all turned to glare up at him, also at once, he moved on with a quick, “What are the mission parameters, Hokage-sama?”

“This particular mission is dependent on your ability to locate a band of merchants within the Land of Fire.” The Hokage unrolled it.

I looked up at the ceiling, thinking. In cheerful orange hiragana, someone had made a poster that said, “Do your best, everyone!” There was also a large black character for “shinobi” painted on the ceiling. It was like shorthand for the contradiction of our lives—we could be civilians living in peaceful ignorance, or we could be shinobi whose lives would have actual impact on the world, and probably die in the process.

Can I just say how utterly disturbing that was?

“Chinatsugumi is the name of a merchant caravan that operates within the borders of the Land of Fire. While not tied to any city, her merchants nonetheless provide the village with supplies in wartime and have for two generations.” The Hokage swept his gaze across all of our faces, to make sure we were paying attention. “With Kumogakure and Iwagakure increasing their aggression toward our borders, the lieutenant of the caravan’s operations and head of security has asked that we provide an escort between their home base of Mount Soragami and our village.” He flipped the scroll shut with a flick of his wrist and Minato retrieved it from its place on the desk. “The estimated length of the mission is three weeks if all goes well, and the most likely opponents will be bandits driven out of their usual hiding-places.”

“No enemy ninjas?” I blurted.

“No, Keisuke-kun,” the Hokage said with a grandfatherly smile. “Mount Soragami is well within the borders of the Land of Fire.” He paused. “But don’t take the risk of bandits lightly. As your first C-ranked mission, you’ll be learning as you go.”

“Yes, Hokage-sama.” I said, bowing.

On one hand, C-ranked mission! On the other, oh fuck, a C-ranked mission.

“How large is the caravan this year?” Sensei asked.

“There are approximately thirty members willing to venture outside of their stronghold at the moment,” the Hokage said. “Though admittedly the numbers may be skewed one way or another and may differ when you arrive.”

Sensei sighed. “All right then. Kids, we’re meeting on the roof in five. Go.”

And we left.

“I don’t think I’ve ever heard of the Chinatsugumi.” I admitted, sitting on the concrete. The name wasn’t ringing any bells, and the Dreamer wasn’t coming up with anything either.

“Neither have I.” Obito said, frowning.
Kakashi sighed. “The leader’s name’s actually just Chinatsu. The locals around Mount Soragami just decided to call the caravan that because she’s the whole reason they exist. Mount Soragami has a bunch of small towns around it that depend on the money she gets from places like Konoha and Kusagakure, mostly by trading luxury items and food.” He assumed a pose I could only describe as “lecturer mode.” “I’ve taken two missions with Sensei as a bodyguard for that caravan, though we didn’t really end up doing much either time. She sticks to allied villages for the most part, so all we really ended up running into were two-bit bandits and maybe the occasional larger bandit group, since Chinatsu-san travels with up to forty other people, half of whom are normal security forces, and only needed ninja to fill a couple of reconnaissance gaps.” He stuffed his hands into his pockets. “It’s not really a high-risk mission, so you should be able to cut your teeth on it without losing any.”

Before Obito could decide whether or not to punch Kakashi in the face, Sensei popped back into existence in front of us in a burst of displaced air.

“Sensei?” Kakashi asked.

“It’s like before, Kakashi.” Sensei confirmed, which told me precisely fuck-all. Kakashi may have been a condescending jerk, but at least he explained things. Sensei clapped his hands, apparently to get Obito’s and my attention. “All right! This is going to be your first C-rank mission. Despite what the Hokage said, Chinatsu-san is generally pretty patient with new shinobi and doesn’t actually need genin most of the time. We do, however, have an agreement with her that says as long as we send a sufficiently experienced ninja along, we can all share defensive duty. That might not mean much to you right now, but it’s easier on all of us and it’s a gentler introduction to the shinobi world than most of us get.”

I think it was Sensei’s way of being protective of us, even if we were already pretty dangerous. Solely because Obito and I could use chakra and had a couple of jutsu to play with, we could already take on non-ninja fighters with relative ease.

In theory, anyway. Neither of us had ever been in really serious fights and personally, I completely expected to freeze and need someone to save my sorry ass.

“Anyway, you have the rest of today to rest, pack, and polish up your skills. We’ll be using the entire mission after we leave Konoha tomorrow as a training exercise, so we won’t be having our usual morning training. Everyone clear?”

“Yes, Sensei!” we chorused.

Minato-sensei smiled. “Good. In that case, you’re dismissed!”

Then Sensei and Kakashi were both gone.

“Well, that was abrupt.” I commented. I looked over at Obito. “So, want to get any last-minute training in?”

Obito grinned, now that Sensei and Kakashi were gone and we could hang out together. “Sure.”

That night, after training was finished, my bags were packed, and I finally collapsed in bed, I pillowowed my head in my folded arms and wondered about the future.

I didn’t ever really not wonder about the future, mainly because my odds of survival seemed to be dependent on how much I could predict and counteract with as much precision as possible. But when my future knowledge wasn’t giving me any hints, I didn’t really have a lot of go on other than my own fear.

I didn’t know what Team Minato’s first C-rank had been in my visions, mainly because it had never been shown. I’d only ever seen two missions, both of which had ended in disaster, and a brief flash of two attempts at being promoted to chūnin. Come to that, I didn’t know all that much about Team Minato’s first incarnation, either.

Hell, I didn’t have anything in the Dreamer’s vision archive about Hayate’s life other than the way he died and the fact that he’d been in a relationship with Yūgao Uzuki. I hadn’t had any idea who our parents were, or their fate, or how Hayate had developed his signature cough. And yet, that hadn’t really bothered me since I always thought of the visions as events.

Discrete events could be directly countered. The details could be fudged. Maybe a lucky stroke would keep Archduke Ferdinand from being assassinated—that was the purview of speculative fiction writers. Maybe my existence had shaken up the status quo something fierce, at least for my family and friends. I’d never know for sure.

And yet, World War One would have still happened even the Archduke’s driver hadn’t made that one turn, because Europe had been a clusterfuck of alliances and intermarriages and utter stupid that had started long beforehand. The tensions weren’t any less real just because someone was or wasn’t getting their head ventilated. And twenty years later, there would have been a second World War solely because of how the “great powers” had handled the last one.

Ferdinand Foch once said, “This is not a peace. It is an armistice for twenty years.”

I stared at the face of my alarm clock and the Dreamer said quietly, Can we turn history aside? I didn’t know.

I didn’t know if having me around would make it possible for Obito to stay safe and sane. I didn’t know if Rin would survive the war, even if she wasn’t on Team Minato. I didn’t know if Madara would be able to find a way to start the Fourth Shinobi World War despite anything I did. I didn’t know if any of the changes I’d made—by existing, or through my actions—would kill people I cared about. There was just so much I couldn’t pin down for sure.

I did know one thing for sure, though: Even if I was so scared I could hardly breathe, I would try. And I’d keep trying, until there wasn’t anything left to try for.
The next day seemed to dawn bright and early, which put me in a somewhat crabby mood before I even left the house. Though Hayate seemed excited for me, Mom was undoubtedly worried, and she’d given me a sword-cleaning kit to make absolutely sure I was prepared for the next month or so of living on the road. I didn’t know if I’d even end up using my kodachi at all, since Sensei seemed to have mastered the trick of being nearly everywhere at once and Kakashi was combat-tested, but I appreciated the gesture and tucked it into my jacket pocket anyway.

“My little girl is growing up so fast,” Mom said quietly, hugging me.

“Not so fast. I’ll miss both of you,” I said, and as soon as Mom let me go I was hugging Hayate so hard he almost squeaked. “Be good for Mom and your teachers at school, okay?”

“You know I will, Sis,” Hayate said, muffled by my jacket, but I got the message. I love you, I’ll miss you, come back safe.

“I’ll be back before you know it.” Not because I actually would, but people said that kind of thing before heading out on long journeys, so it felt right.

I waved a final good-bye to my family before scurrying off to make sure Obito wasn’t late.

“Obito!” I called, having taken the long way around the district so I could hop on people’s roofs without getting a citation for it. I made pretty good time, and I found Obito on one of the main thoroughfares to the market district, heading back toward his house.

Obito looked up. “Bit busy, Kei!” he called back, and I blinked.

While usually he waited until the afternoon to run around helping people, I guess this was the morning when all of the older people in the district decided to do their shopping. Obito was carrying the older Uchiha’s bags for her, with two plastic bags with vegetables and tofu and fish on each arm. He had all of his mission equipment with him in a backpack that was bulging with its contents, but that wasn’t really the important bit. I hadn’t seen him with Old Lady Sayako while, it didn’t really change the fact that we had about half an hour to meet up at the gates and depart for distant lands.

Well, Mount Soragami was still within the borders of the Land of Fire and we probably wouldn’t be exactly charting new lands, but it was still something!

I thought about Kakashi’s reaction, and Sensei’s. Then I thought about how much time Obito spent just getting to know the people he lived with, and helping them with their problems as best he could.

I hopped down from the roof, backpack straps cinched across my chest and waist, and said, “Need a hand?”
Obito promptly dumped one arm’s worth of bags in my arms and said, “Yep.”

We ended up being about ten minutes late, which was pretty good time for the situation. We both got candy from Sayako Uchiha, who seemed to be very pleasant for a retired kunoichi with a bad leg, but that didn’t really mean much when Kakashi was waiting at the gates to make disappointed eyebrows at us.

Actually, I decided I didn’t care about that as much as I did when Sensei looked askance at us. Nevertheless, I just offered a shrug and commenced trying to figure out how to unwrap a piece of sweet rice candy using just my teeth and tongue. It was like trying it with Starburst, only the rice paper wrapping was edible too.

Om nom nom.

“Sorry about being late, Sensei, but there was an old lady who needed help with her bags, and Kei and I stopped to help because she’d bought too much food,” Obito said blithely, grinning.

Sensei just sighed. Maybe if I hadn’t talked to him in the hospital waiting room, there would have been a lecture waiting. But the journey to Mount Soragami was three days long at even shinobi speed according to a topography map Mom had found for me, and ten minutes meant nothing in the face of it.

“The mountain isn’t getting any closer,” Kakashi said bluntly.

I threw a piece of candy at him.

Sensei caught it. Turned out Sensei had a bit of a sweet tooth too.

“All right, since we’re all here, let’s head out,” Sensei said around his allotment of candy. Kakashi was giving Sensei a weird look, like he couldn’t quite believe that his teacher was giving us any slack at all, and I poked him in the shoulder as I walked past.

He almost instantly poked me back.

“Kids, don’t make me have to turn this squad around before we even get out of the gates.”

Obito snickered, and then I poked him. He squawked. “Hey!”

“Someday I will draw everyone into my web of tag games and you will all rue the day you met me,” I said dramatically.

Obito giggled and threw an arm around my shoulders. “So, what’s the policy on tag-backs?”

I grinned. “You’ll see.”

And then we were off.

“You know,” Obito said about five minutes later. “This is the first time I’ve ever been outside the village. What about you, Kei?”

“Same here,” I said. “There isn’t really a lot you have to head out of the village for, unless you’re on the active duty roster.”

We were moving in an easily-defensible diamond pattern, with Kakashi on point while Obito and I made up the somewhat more vulnerable middle, and Sensei brought up the rear. Granted, we were also moving at a speed of about twenty kilometers per hour, both because the shinobi scale of what made an appropriate overland speed was somewhat advanced compared to that of untrained civilians and because we tended to travel by trees around Konoha itself. At least until the Hashirama trees ran out, anyway—most of the more common pines, oaks, and maples were more difficult to maneuver through. The trees that had, in a way, named our home village were really more like buildings than anything—traveling through them was less like forest exploration and more like an extended lesson in entirely pre-industrialized parkour.

I was still keeping an eye out for basic obstacles and possible trap-setting points, though. There were a lot of ways to horribly maim or kill someone moving at twenty to thirty kilometers per hour even without anyone inventing cars. Most of them, here, involved razor wire. And maybe explosive tags.

Sure, there was no reason there would be any this far out of the village’s range of defenses—I think we used seals for this particular area—and this far from the front lines, but I always expected trouble anyway.

Still, the rest of that day passed mostly without any incidents. Sure, Obito tripped and face-planted when we were getting close to our stopping point for the day, but he was fine and only took a little patching up on my part. We dug out the privy-pit, started a fire (with some happy assistance from Obito’s miniaturized Grand Fireball), and cleared the campsite of branches of rocks as Kakashi hunted for our dinner and Sensei set up a perimeter seal to make sure no one would trip over us at night.

“For tonight,” Sensei said, “Kei-kun has first watch. Kakashi, you have middle watch. Obito, dawn watch. I’ll be nearby in case something happens or you have questions, but this is really about getting into the habit of always having someone looking out for you.”

I gave Sensei a somewhat skeptical look, even though everything he said made perfect sense.

“And if you wake me up for no reason I’m tying you up in an ankle snare for an hour,” Sensei informed us.

Obito gulped.

I considered that warning. “Okay, but if we all die it’s your fault.”

Sensei ruffled my hair as soon as I took my hitai-ate off to sleep. I had the weirdest feeling he’d been waiting for it, because it was more a noogie than anything. He didn’t stop until I screamed, “I give, I give!” while laughing madly.

And then, since Obito had seemed like he was feeling left out, Sensei grabbed him too and did the same thing. He caught Kakashi by the ankle and managed to repeat the feat, even though he only had two arms and I hadn’t even moved because I was laughing too hard.

He might have been our teacher, but he was also pretty much an evil older brother.

The next day almost wasn’t even worth mentioning. We’d left the great Hashirama trees far behind, and the next major obstacle was basically hills. I think they might have technically been foothills, even if the mountains they actually represented were pretty far away and probably also volcanoes.

Actually, even from this far away, Mount Soragami—once it had been pointed out to me, anyway—reminded me of Mount St. Helens. In some ways, it was also a bit like Mt. Kilimanjaro in that there were no other comparable mountains nearby and the top was ringed with clouds in a normally-clear sky, but the western face had apparently been blown out sometime in the past by a massive eruption. It had snow on it, so at least it hadn’t been recent.
Hey, Land of Fire. Gotta take what you can get, I guess.

Personally, I suspected that there might have been some kind of hotspot under the continental plate, sort of like the one under Hawaii in my old life, since I wasn’t aware of any other volcanoes in the area. Granted, that could just be ignorance, because I was pretty sure that almost all of Japan, Hawaii, the Aleutians, and most of the rest of the Pacific Rim had been volcanically active one way or another. It was the Ring of Fire, after all.

I wondered again just how big the Land of Fire actually was, because I was pretty sure that even Mt. Fuji had been further inland. Sort of In some ways, a whole lot of Japanese people had more or less been living on it. Or at least the lava plain if it blew its top off, I guess.

Then again, given the magical physics-pretzel-making bullshit inherent to this universe, I had to wonder if Soragami was an artificial mountain. It was still in the classical cone shape of a stratovolcano, with considerations made for the fact that the western face was probably in a hundred trillion pieces and fertilizer for the foothills. I wondered what kind of jutsu could even begin to tap into the power in the world’s crust, and then I stopped.

If Madara could knock a fucking asteroid out of the sky to flatten the Shinobi Alliance, and the Sage of Six Paths had created the fucking moon, I guess the sky really wasn’t even a limit anymore.

Then again, since those things were mostly already there, I think it was more a matter of bringing stuff upward to play with. That said, creating a new volcano was nothing to sneeze at, even for the famed Lava Release users of Iwagakure, and it would probably involve the deaths of absolutely everyone in the area just because volcanoes brought so much else to the surface besides lava.

Poisonous gases, for a start, and some of those could actually catch fire once released into an oxygen-rich environment. I didn’t really give a crap if Mei Terumī of Kirigakure had Lava and Steam Release techniques, or if Mū and Ōnoki had Particle Release down pat—a volcano wasn’t something anyone could fight.

Redirect, yes. Fight? Fucking hell no.

Because shinobi are out of their minds as a rule, someone must have tried to do something with it.

“Sensei, how long has it been since Soragami erupted?” I asked.

“Going by the records the Chinatsugumi have for us, longer than there have been shinobi,” Sensei replied.

He glanced at me as we walked, since the foothills were a mite too dangerous to be using our shinobi speed without an experienced Hyūga on point. We could easily land on top of a battlefield or a bandit stronghold if we didn’t pay attention.

So, at least a couple hundred years. It didn’t really make me feel any better, since shinobi records were hilariously spotty because of the Clan Wars era. Still, someone would have noticed a volcano blowing up, so maybe it wasn’t down to overambitious idiots anymore.

I made a noise like “hm” and said, “I wonder how precise their analysis of the surface strata is.”

“What?” Obito said blankly.

“Basically, every eruption throughout history leaves a deposit of ash and other volcanic material on the area around the cone.” I explained, frowning. “I don’t know the specifics, but if you dug down far enough, you could probably find evidence that the dirt we’re standing on was once covered in ash from whenever the nearest volcano exploded. The ash layer doesn’t go away, so you can see basically everything about the geological history if you know what you’re looking for and how fast soil layers accumulate on top.”

Kakashi and Sensei were blinking at me.

I grinned sheepishly. “Sorry. I know it’s not really relevant to being a ninja, but it’s interesting!”

It was my fault for being into volcanology as a kid, I guess. Seriously. I’d been fascinated by everything that could have made my world collapse in ash and fire, for some reason. Norse myths were a favorite for a similar reason.

The interest wasn’t as strong in my new life. I guess I had enough potentially fatal things to worry about the second time through to bother worrying about whether or not the local geology was going to decide to flatten us like ants under a flipped semi. That said, I still remembered.

The lava dome doesn’t seem to have built up again yet. It only took Mt. St. Helens thirty years to get back to full size, pyroclastic flow and all. The Dreamer seemed to frown. Save possibly Madara, Hashirama, and the Sage of Six Paths, there are literally no ninja in the history of this world that could play with a volcano and not get blasted to a fine grit. Sans perhaps Obito as the host of the Ten-Tailed Beast.

Of course, the Tailed Beast Ball makes the entire question rather academic anyway. Who needs a volcano when any hack with a Mangekyō Sharingan can just hijack a Tailed Beast and do the same thing with less collateral damage? Well, assuming no one needed that mountain range anyway.

I was already contemplating the pros and cons of setting a volcano off in the resurrected Madara’s face. I’d die a quick and fiery death, either at his hands or at the nonexistent mercy of a volcano, but the look on his face might be worth it if I could last long enough to see it.

I think Sensei was looking at me funny for the rest of the day, while Obito peppered me with questions and Kakashi pretended I didn’t have the ability to talk at all.

Yeah. Day two was kind of boring.

We did get into what amounted to an extremely vicious three-way game of exploding Tag—literally Tag with explosive notes and Replacement jutsu—in the clearing closest to our campsite. We stopped pretty quickly after Sensei caught us, though.

Anyway, there was always the third day to look forward to.

Speaking of which, the third day was the one where we finally reached the Chinatsugumi compound, about two hours before dusk.

It wasn’t…subtle. Not really. The city the Chinatsugumi used as their base was more of a fortress built on top of one of Soragami’s daughter peaks, with several tiered walls and buildings squished into the interim space. A giant pair of characters emblazoned across the front gates read “Sorayama-no-Sato,” or the Village of the Sky Mountain. The flag of the merchant house—or maybe it was a lot more than a merchant house, given the city-state they apparently occupied—was streaming in the mountain wind from the top of the largest, highest building. It was also written across most of the smaller ones.

At least they didn’t call the damn thing a hidden village, because it certainly wasn’t that.
Minato talked to one of the gate guards, both of whom were dressed like proper non-ninja soldiers and therefore could be easily bypassed the moment any of us felt like it. The guard he was speaking to, with a mustache like a pencil line and a beard to match, gesturing vaguely with his spear, and Sensei beckoned to us.

We trooped up to him in a neat little triangle. I was in the back this time, because apparently the total lack of hostile attention from anything bigger than a mosquito meant that I could at least be trusted with that much.

Speaking of which, I needed to remember to look up malaria and West Nile equivalents sometime soon.

“All right, we’re going to be meeting Chinatsu-san in the longhouse up top. The guards just gave us permission to take the shortcut over the roofs, so we’ll be heading in now,” Sensei told us. “Follow my lead.”

“That’s it?” Obito asked. “I thought there’d be a security checkpoint or something…”

Sensei shrugged. Then again, he had been here more often than Obito or I had just because he actually had been here before, so it was going to be in our best interests to follow his lead. “For now, yeah. Keep in mind that we’re on their territory now, and try not to leave any ration bar wrappers where they shouldn’t be.”

Obito and I nodded anyway. We followed Sensei and Kakashi’s subsequent leaps, though perhaps not quite so high or as easily.

Once at the longhouse—which really looked more like a castle that had decided to sit on top of a slightly larger castle and not a longhouse at all—we were escorted into the inner sanctum of the building. The buildings were wood and concrete with steel struts for support, with high, angled ceilings and interwoven four-by-fours providing the structural integrity of the roof. The main room was long, though that may have been as much a visual effect of the long green rug running the length of it as the real dimensions. Most of the guards seemed to be, while not exactly shinobi-caliber, at least experienced and confident even in Sensei’s presence.

Then again, he was a nineteen-year-old blond with a pretty face, no visible scars, a mild-mannered attitude to people he didn’t know, and a winning smile. The rest of us were nine and, by definition, not very impressive. Even if I carried my kodachi openly on my waist.

At the very end of the room, surrounded by a desk covered in paperwork and two rather harried assistants, was the person I assumed was the eponymous Chinatsu of the Chinatsugumi. Aside from the fact that she wasn’t wearing any kind of headgear—such as the Hokage’s hat or an elaborate hairpiece typical of a noble lady—she looked every bit the merchant queen. Her clothes weren’t overly elaborate, though they were very well-made, and her sleeves had been tied up so that she could work on the onslaught of forms without getting ink into the silk.

I tried to catch a glimpse of her face as we approached, even if it was mostly pointing away from us and at the desk-top. Her hair was lighter than Sensei’s, with the majority tied up in a businesslike knot on the back of her head and a fringe and two long side-locks framing her face. She didn’t seem to get out much, at least compared to Obito and Sensei, and was paler than both. She had calluses and burns on her manicured hands, though I couldn’t imagine where they’d come from.

She looked up once we got within about ten feet, and I blinked.

Her eyes were pale gold.
There were maybe three people I could name off the top of my head with gold eyes in all of my visions. Orochimaru had been one of them, but his had visible serpent pupils. It didn’t seem to be a dominant trait anywhere, really. This woman, however, made me think of a bird of prey. I had the strangest feeling that she was looking right through us, even though she couldn’t have been older than twenty-five and she didn’t seem to be a shinobi.

Also, I had the strongest feeling of déjà vu and I had no idea why.

“Misaki-dono, the team from Konohagakure has arrived,” said the aide on the left. I honestly couldn’t tell if either of the aides was a guy or a girl, and that meant something coming from me.

“So I see,” she replied, gathering up the papers in front of her and setting them aside. She looked back up at us. “You may approach.”

Sensei led the way, again.

“Team Minato, at your service,” he said, bowing.

Misaki nodded, shooing her aides out of the room with a dismissive flick of her wrist. “Hello again, Namikaze-san. It’s been a while since your last visit, hasn’t it?”

“Well, six months pass by quickly,” Minato admitted. “We’ve been a bit busy lately. So, how have the other teams been?”

“Decent, though not spectacular in any respect,” she replied, turning her gaze on each of us kids in turn. “Hello to you as well, Kakashi-kun. I see you have new teammates.”

Kakashi nodded.

Misaki looked from him to Obito and I.

“Oh! I’m Obito Uchiha, Misaki-dono!” Obito said, smiling brightly.

“Keisuke Gekkō,” I said a moment later, noticing how her eyes seemed to linger on me. “Um, I’m a kunoichi.” I added belatedly.

Misaki frowned. “Yes, I am aware of that. Is this a common misunderstanding where you are from?”

“Kinda,” I admitted.

“Hm. Well, no matter. My sister will be here in a moment to show you where you can stay for the night,” Misaki said, and retrieved a sheet of paper from her desk. “This is a copy of the contract for Konohagakure’s bi-annual business agreement with Sorayama as well as the Chinatsugumi. Due to recent considerations and increasing hostility from the forces of Kumogakure and Iwagakure, some aspects may need to be revised. Have you been empowered by Hokage-dono to accept or suggest revisions?”

Sensei’s eyebrows knit together. “Not as such. I was told only that we’d be working on the assigned C-ranked mission, but if you have a messenger hawk I can use…”

“Of course, Namikaze-san.” Misaki clapped twice and another aide, apparently interchangeable with the other two, appeared. “Fetch a messenger hawk for our shinobi guests, would you?”

“Yes, Misaki-sama.” And then the aide was gone. I suddenly had a sneaking suspicion that the aides were ninjas, even if no one else was.
That was about when the door at the far end of the room, the same one that we’d arrived through, opened again. Outlined briefly in the evening glow of the city, the figure strode into the room with long, self-assured strides and arrived at the desk in what seemed like no time at all.

My brain took a minute to work out a few things. One, the person in front of us was female and taller than Sensei by a good four centimeters. Two, she was wearing road clothes—meaning a practical, sturdy set of shoes, plain dark pants under a cotton skirt and wrap, and her hair tied back into one of the longest braids I’d ever seen. Three, her face was exactly the same as Misaki’s, sans makeup.

She also seemed extremely familiar for some other reason, though I couldn’t for the life of me figure out why.

And she was looking right at us. “So, you’re the most recent team to take the mission?”

“They are, sister dearest,” Misaki said, drumming her fingers on the tabletop. Was it just me, or did she sound just the slightest bit mocking.

Misaki’s twin looked at us again after the briefest frown. Then she shrugged. “You’ll do just fine.”

“I’m glad we meet your approval, Chinatsu-dono,” Sensei said mildly.

“I’m sure my approval doesn’t matter as much as you seem to think,” Chinatsu said, turning. “Anyway, come along and I’ll show you where you’ll be staying tonight. We’ll get that hawk for you in a moment.”

We followed her out, but all the while my head was spinning. I’d already confirmed that neither the Dreamer nor I had any idea of what was supposed to happen on this mission. We knew so little about Team Minato’s earlier exploits that everything would be a mystery at this stage. And for all I knew, my sense of familiarity was just because I’d seen a filler episode with this caravan. I probably wouldn’t remember that clearly, right?

After a while, though, I started to notice something else that set me a bit on edge.

Normally, I could sense civilian chakra signatures. I usually didn’t bother because, well, civilians didn’t generally have enough chakra to actually stand out all that much. It was a lot easier and more important to be able to sense anyone who trained their chakra, since that was the kind of thing that usually meant a threat or an ally were around, depending on intent. Either way, I could determine how to act on it.

But in the office with Misaki, Chinatsu, and the interchangeable aides, I’d only felt three chakra signatures at all. All of them had belonged to the aides. It was like Misaki and Chinatsu were ghosts, their chakra blending completely into the background buzz of natural energy.

I felt cold.

Either those two really were ghosts, or they had kage-level suppression skills. I didn’t really know which was worse.

Chapter End Notes

~Here I am again on my own~
It was kind of nice to get a chance to stay in a hotel. I mean, I’d been in roadside hotels and motels in my old life, but I’d never been traveling as Keisuke Gekkō before. I’d also never liked camping in my old life either, which meant that sleeping under the stars was kind of annoying. It was all in how much time I had to spend picking rocks out of my things after. I was used to my own bed, even if the mattress was starting to dip a little in the middle and some of the sheets were thinning out due to age.

I’d also never stayed anywhere with a traditional onsen. Swimming pools and hot tubs, yes, and even a hot spring pool once upon a time, but there was something special about being able to walk outside and realize that nature was providing all the hot water anyone would ever need. It was nice.

Of course, the springs weren’t for both sexes and the sides were separated by three-meter walls, but it wasn’t really a big deal to take a bath without my teammates around. Actually, from the ruckus coming from the other side of the wall, Obito had probably discovered that Kakashi bathed with a mask on and engaged in a water fight when he couldn’t wheedle Kakashi into taking it off. Sensei’s laughter made it obvious, even though the boys were loudly trying to drown each other.

Yeah, I was glad I wasn’t over there, even if I was curious about what his face looked like under it. I leaned against the rocks, enjoying the cooler night air and the way the steam from the water made everything seem kind of mystical. I closed my eyes, content.

Sure, tomorrow I’d probably be busy hating everything in existence because caravans were slow, but I could enjoy this moment.

And of course, the day started bright and early again the next morning. It was becoming extremely clear that the world was full of morning people. Evil, evil morning people who were completely willing to literally kick me out of bed if I didn’t get up on time. And then pester me for a goddamn hour to get ready, down to outlining the steps for getting dressed, getting breakfast, brushing my teeth, and putting my damn sandals on. And then jab me with a tantō when I took a swing at them.

As a side note, I made a silent pledge that the first sufficiently large bug or amphibian I found was going down Kakashi’s pants.

Anyway, I really ended up spending most of the morning watching the caravan get ready from a nearby rooftop. Since they took up almost the entirety of the main road out of town, it wasn’t exactly hard to find them, and it did make an interesting version of a traffic jam, in a world without internal combustion engines. Obito sat next to me, a lollipop between his teeth, and occasionally pointed out something interesting or someone falling down.

“Oh, there’s Chinatsu-san.” Obito said after a while, pointing at the blonde as she emerged from the longhouse.

While not dressed all that differently from any of the other merchants, she was still visually distinctive simply by virtue of being taller than nearly everyone while having boobs. I hadn’t met Jiraiya yet because he, along with Orochimaru, seemed to be spending a lot of his time on the front lines, but I assumed that he’d be taller. Probably.

“Is it just me or is she looking right at us?” I asked, staring back. Of course, I didn’t exactly have the Byakugan or anything, but it still seemed like Chinatsu was looking me in the eye even from forty meters off.

Obito squinted, then said, “…It’s not just you. Man, that’s creepy.”

She waved before turning to talk to someone with an apparently bandaged head.

“Less creepy.” Obito said.

“I’ll take your word on that.” I said, and cast my chakra sense out in search of Kakashi and Sensei. Sensei, it seemed, was still inside of the longhouse. Kakashi was in the crowd somewhere, though I couldn’t get a fix on his position because someone else with lightning chakra kept running around and disrupting things. It didn’t quite feel like Kakashi’s loose wire impression—actually, I imagined that it would have been like the results of walking on a carpet with thick socks.

Bzzzt.

Then again, Kakashi was also heading our way, and had finally left the crowd behind to travel on the roofs.

“What are you two doing?” Kakashi demanded once he landed next to us. Neither of us jumped—we were getting annoyingly used to his drill sergeant routine. That, and Kakashi wasn’t quite as good at appearing out of nowhere as Sensei was, since I could always sense Kakashi when he was nearby and Sensei’s Flying Thunder God range was just slightly insane.

“Observing.” I said.

“Providing color commentary.” Obito added.

Kakashi made a complicated expression at us that was only complicated because neither Obito nor I could see half of his face.

“Sit down and pull up a roofing tile.” I suggested. “From the looks of things, we’re not going anywhere for a while.”

“You know you want to!” Obito chimed in, grinning.

“You two are a pair of disgraces.” Kakashi said flatly. He ended up sitting further up the roof, almost on the apex of the structure, and glaring down at the backs of our heads.

“I think we keep scaring him off because he doesn’t want to be overshadowed by our awesomeness.” Obito told me in a stage whisper.

“I think he’s just a stick in the mud.” I said.

“Well, he’s that too.” Obito agreed.

Kakashi grumbled.

Sensei’s chakra finally left the building and reappeared right next to Kakashi. “So, is everyone ready to go?” he asked.
I held up my pack, which hadn’t been used all that much in the past few days. I hadn’t even taken my spare weapons out. Obito grinned and said, “Whenever you are, Sensei!”

“Good. I was just speaking to Misaki-dono, and our treaty with the Chinatsugumi and Sorayama has been revised.” I saw Kakashi sit up as Sensei spoke. Minato-sensei went on, “This means that the Chinatsugumi will be dealing exclusively with Konoha and our allies, even after the end of the war. The hawks went out earlier this morning, so we might be seeing some hostile attention from any Rock or Cloud forces that have made it into the Land of Fire undetected, even if they might have ignored us before. As a result, the mission’s classified as a B-rank the minute we run into trouble. Do you understand?”

I thought I did. “So, does that mean that we’re going to be working on the security procedures with Chinatsu-san’s guards?”

“Actually, no.” Sensei replied. I blinked, and Obito and Kakashi looked surprised as well. “Not more than we already were. Leave that to me and Chinatsu-san to figure out—this is jōnin business.”

“But they’re not shinobi!” Obito said, apparently torn between concern and feeling insulted.

Sensei replied, “They may not be, but there are some things that aren’t our business to interfere in until someone asks. It’s a courtesy thing, for now.”

Kakashi’s eyes narrowed. “Are we going into this situation blind?”

“We’re not blind, Kakashi. We actually know quite a bit.” By which, apparently, Sensei meant that he knew quite a bit and his students got to feel stupid for a while. “I’ll explain more once we’re on the road.”

Sensei was met with the full force of our combined judgmental stares.

“We’ll be fine,” he said.

Given Team Minato’s future track record, I was inclined to increase the intensity of my glare.

Sensei responded to all of this hostility by booting us off the roof in rapid succession. By the time we’d gotten all sorted out from that, it was time to hit the road.

This time around, we weren’t allowed to take the overland route to Konoha. The same things that made it a decent and generally safe pathway for shinobi, moving through the trees or the forest floor at breakneck speeds as we did, made it borderline impassable to large groups of wheeled vehicles. Even if we’d had, say, a cattle train or something, it’d be easier to stick to open land and established roads, which sacrificed stealth and sometimes speed for security.

For our part, that meant the closest thing to a suitable road was the one that followed a river that flowed downward from Soragami and her daughter peaks.

“While it would be interesting to see you attempt to defend a caravan moving at one mile per two days, it’s a pointless and ultimately frustrating idea.” Chinatsu had said dryly to Obito when he complained within earshot. She jabbed a thumb over her shoulder at the lead wagon, which was about the size of a large pickup truck and pulled by oxen, and said, “That? That is not going to get through a gap between trees no matter what we do. I know it’s slow going—a single rider on horseback would make it to Konoha and back twice before we could, but we have cargo and people to move.”

Aside from that one rather pointed comment, however, Chinatsu-san mostly left us to our own devices. She was busy all the time, with various advisors and wagon-leads always popping over to ask for advice on the occasions that we stopped to rest or change the oxen, and eventually ended up handing control over to her second just so she could eat lunch in peace.

Speaking of which, Minato-sensei was in the lead for most of the first day and walking next to Chinatsu’s wagon, to my mild surprise. I think he was trying to get a leg up on negotiations later by listening in then. Once again, Obito and I were on each side of the caravan, with me further toward the back of the train because there were twelve wagons to keep track of. Kakashi brought up the rear, hands in his pockets, and only had to walk a little to the left or right to keep track of everyone else.

The first day on the road passed without incident.

That night, we circled the wagons to make sure the oxen didn’t wander off while unharnessed. Most of the wagons kept to themselves, with the particular merchant families sticking pretty close together even when we had a bonfire going in the middle of our camp. At most, they sent a representative to Chinatsu for something or other, but they always returned to their wagons in the end.

The occupants of the last wagon—a married couple, it seemed—and the biwa-playing man in the second wagon, along with the strawberry blond man who sat next to Chinatsu most of the time, all gathered around their leader regardless of what everyone else did.

“They’re planning on setting up new shops within Konohagakure.” Sensei said, when I asked about the social shut-ins. “Sorayama, despite being protected by Soragami’s peaks and the fact that it’s well within the Land of Fire, isn’t quite the same as being protected by Konoha shinobi. I suppose that they think that Chinatsu may be disappointed in them somehow for making that choice.”

“Why do they live out here in the first place?” Obito asked. I imagined, personally, that a volcano was the kind of place the ancient Uchiha clan might have been interested in.

“It has to do with the seals put in place around Mount Soragami.” Sensei explained. Wait, what? Who the hell would put seals on a volcano? “It’s said that only the seal masters of Uzushiogakure understood the processes involved, but honestly? It’s a blood seal. If the last members of Chinatsu’s clan die, then Soragami erupts.”

“Well, fuck,” I thought.

“What clan is that, Sensei?” Kakashi asked.

Sensei shrugged. “I don’t know. That said, I also know that if they want, they can set off one of the minor peaks at will to let off pressure. Most people aren’t willing to risk that kind of reprisal and thus they’re usually left alone.”

Double fuck.

“If they can throw a volcano at someone who pisses them off, it’s no wonder they’re still there even with the war.” I said, frowning thoughtfully. “I’ve heard that Iwagakure has Lava Release users, but there’s a whole order of magnitude of a difference between a shinobi and the forces of nature.”

“And that is exactly why we won’t be seeing enemy shinobi for a while.” Sensei said.

That doesn’t help much, if Misaki turns out not to care about a fuckton of collateral damage if she decides to go to avenge her sister.

We’ll just have to make that unnecessary, then.
We ate dinner in relative peace, at least. I mean, Kakashi and Obito sat on top of a wagon together and didn’t try to throw each other off, and Sensei and I sat with Chinatsu and her party of four followers. Friends, maybe? I didn’t really ask, since I was a kid at the grown-up table and I’m not sure how they would have reacted to my weird comments. As it was, I caught Chinatsu staring at me almost every time I looked up. After a while, I scooted closer to Sensei and tried to forget about it. She stopped eventually, at least.

The feeling of déjà vu was still there. I’d seen her before, but I didn’t know where, and the feeling intensified the more the adults talked.

Sensei’s hand landed on my head again. He was getting used to using me as an armrest, I think.

“Easy, Kei-kun.” Sensei said quietly. “You’re safe.”

But everything still bothered me.

And I still couldn’t sense Chinatsu’s chakra.

“Kei, what’s got you so tense?” Obito asked once he made his way over.

“I don’t know, and that’s the problem.” I told him, still frowning.

“Just like an idiot to get worked up over nothing.” Kakashi muttered.

Sensei hooked his foot around Kakashi’s ankle and dropped him on his butt. Everyone over the age of ten tried politely not to giggle while Kakashi sputtered like an angry cat.

“Rikuto, do you have any songs for us this time?” Chinatsu asked once everyone was done eating.

Rikuto, the man with the biwa, was about ten years older than Sensei. He was deeply tanned, which made me think he spent a lot of time on the road regardless of whatever the rest of the caravan got up to, and he had short black hair arranged into loose curls. He also had a goatee, which was a little bit overgrown, and pretty big sideburns. Aside from the fact that he was wearing the caravan “uniform” of sturdy clothes and road dust, he really seemed more like he’d be the kind of person who would be happier on the road alone.

He grinned, showing off a mouth incongruously full of fangs. “What have you got in mind, Chi-chan? A love ballad?”

The strawberry blond to Chinatsu’s left started to choke on his tea.

Chinatsu slapped Rikuto upside the head before pounding on the other man’s back. “Stop getting so worked up over things, Akira!”

“This feels really familiar for some reason.” I said to Obito. “But I don’t know why.”

Obito shrugged. “I don’t know about that. Seems a bit like us, doesn’t it?”

As Chinatsu proceeded to attempt to choke Rikuto to death and Sensei kept snickering so much that I could feel him shake, I glanced over at the other two people at our gathering, who hadn’t said anything.

The impression I got from them was unusual. I mean, I couldn’t sense Chinatsu’s chakra, or Misaki’s, but I could sense something from just about everyone else I’d ever met. The couple I was talking about…one of them felt like ice, while the other felt like static. Neither of them were looking “Oh, and these two are Shirozora and Nanami,” the just-identified and recovered Akira said, indicating the couple I was looking at. “For reference, Shirozora’s on the left and Nanami is on the right.”

Akira, for his part, was pretty nondescript. He had reddish-orange hair, with two braids running down the sides of his head, and a completely average build. He had gray-colored eyes, though they were downturned at the corners. Actually, aside from his hair color, he looked pretty much like any other perfectly ordinary man.

It set my teeth on edge for reasons I couldn’t name.

The just-identified Shirozora shot Akira a dark look. “I can speak for myself, you know.”

Nanami just sighed.

There was something oddly familiar about both of their faces.

Shirozora had white hair, which made me think that his parents weren’t terribly original, and gray-blue eyes. I didn’t see any pupils, but the Yamanaka clan didn’t seem to have them either, so it wasn’t worth worrying over. He had a build that reminded me a bit of Sensei, all long limbs and lean lines. I actually couldn’t see part of his face if he turned toward me, because his bangs were longer on that side, and his hair actually went most of the way down his back in a ponytail. He was also, somehow, paler than even Misaki had been.

Nanami, by contrast, had extremely dark green hair and green eyes. She was all sun-bronzed and actually rather pretty, though she didn’t seem inclined to talk much and hadn’t actually done anything that I saw. She was probably shorter than, say, Mom, and her clothes were a trifle more feminine than anyone else’s, since she actually had a skirt sans pants.

Speaking of pants, I was starting to get some idea of why Chinatsu didn’t wear kimono like her sister. It made it hard to kick people in the face.

I was reminded of Obito and Kakashi all over again.

“It’d be nice if we didn’t all fight all the time.” I said under my breath, sighing.

Obito bumped his shoulder against mine. “We’re fine.”

Yeah, no. We still hadn’t run into any trouble on this trip, Obito and I had only been shinobi for a couple of months, and our team cohesion was in the tank because we couldn’t get any time to practice as a unit. We also spent most of a given day walking some ways apart, which meant that if Sensei couldn’t keep an eye on us we’d be fighting four separate battles the minute we got attacked by something on the road.

You need to stop taking such a negative viewpoint.

I couldn’t really help it.

“Chi-chan…” Akira started. He was doing a rather oddly indecisive dance as he tried to figure out how to get Chinatsu off of Rikuto without actually touching her and flailing around in indecision at the same time.

I think.
“What?” Chinatsu, for her part, was totally casual about having Rikuto in a chokehold.

“Um. You asked for music before, and…” Akira trailed off.

“Oh. Yeah, choking Rikuto to death is probably somewhat counterproductive, isn’t it?” With that, Chinatsu dropped him like a sack of potatoes.

I don’t think Sensei stopped laughing even once.

After everyone had recovered, Rikuto finally started playing his biwa. Shirozora and Nanami produced a set of drums and a flute from nowhere, while Akira disappeared into the head wagon to retrieve a second biwa. I wasn’t at all sure how they could make a tune out of that mess of instruments, but they did.

Back in my old life, I’d been fond of a lot of different types of music. As long as the melody was good, I could listen to just about anything. Country, rock, pop, techno, metal—it was all good, really. I mean, I had stuff I hadn’t been all that fond of before, since everyone does, but I used to immerse myself in music. I used to sing, too, even if I hadn’t been all that great. Music just…it was one of those things that made me content, even if I wasn’t happy, because it was better.

Better than just being left alone with my own thoughts for hours, anyway.

In my new life, though, the main music I ran into was during festivals. Working songs, too, but they weren’t as common in shinobi districts. Civilians had more fun with them.

Before I even noticed what was happening, I was already drumming my fingers on my leg.

Sensei was humming. Kakashi groaned and clamped his hands over his ears. Obito started giggling, probably because of Kakashi’s reaction.

This is the ninja version of Kumbayah, isn’t it?

Even if it was, I didn’t mind.
The Dreaded C-Rank: On Being Invisible

Chapter Summary

Kei: Have a bizarre flashback.

Chapter Notes

Song ahead.

The next day, we were in the foothills. Watching the river next to us speed up was pretty interesting, since it reminded me of my once-home, a lifetime ago. There weren’t any salmon in the rivers that ran through the Land of Fire—I think—and the wildlife could get pretty oversized in places, but it was still something! Out here, the trees had turned orange with autumn colors the way they never did in Konoha, and some of the mountains had dark rings of clouds around them that signified snow.

I remember standing on the top of a hill, just looking back at the shadow of Soragami and wishing I could fix that moment in my memory forever.

It was just our second day on the road with the Chinatsugumi caravan, but we were already starting to fall into a pattern. Early in the morning, Kakashi would be on point while Sensei walked behind us the whole way until lunch. Then they’d switch. Obito and I would be wandering up and down the length of the wagon train, slowing down or speeding up whenever it seemed like we were needed. All the while, all of us were keeping watch.

Kakashi had a strong sense of smell from what I remember, so I guess he could have been sniffing our route out for us. Sensei just seemed to catch everything no matter where he was, though I wasn’t sure how. Obito, despite not having activated his Sharingan, was still an Uchiha and had very good eyesight even if his mental focus wasn’t great.

For my part, I just kept suppressing my chakra and searching for other signatures that I couldn’t identify.

The second day passed without incident.

That night, though, I asked if Rikuto knew any songs other than Ninja Kumbayah.

This, in hindsight, was a mistake.

“Well, yeah. I like to tailor my songs to the listener, though!” Rikuto said after we finished dinner. He whistled. “Hey, Za-chan, get off your ass and help me out with something!”

The woman who emerged from the fifth wagon was, in some ways, not all that dissimilar to Rikuto in looks. Like him, she looked like living outside in the sun was her favorite thing to do, and her hair was actually bleached by it—it was a kind of dirty blonde—and she, like Rikuto, had teal-colored eyes. She stared when she saw me, though I honestly was too busy wondering why she hadn’t bothered to emerge from the wagons for more than a few minutes at a time so far.

The reason became obvious when I saw that she was practically waddling. In the back of my mind, I had to wonder who the hell would send a pregnant woman on a trip like this one.

Then again, if she was anything like Chinatsu, she would have made the choice on her own anyway.

“Oho! So someone needs my singing voice, do they?” the woman said, smiling broadly. “About time! I heard that racket last night.”

“Zakuro, try not to traumatize anyone.” Chinatsu said bluntly.

“No promises!” Zakuro said with a terrible grin, and then the music started.

Zakuro took a deep breath.

_Seems that I have been held, in some dreaming state_
A tourist in the waking world, never quite awake
No kiss, no gentle word could wake me from this slumber
Until I realize that it was you who held me under

I froze. It was so…familiar. And far too close to home. I hardly realized that I was shaking until Sensei pulled me into a one-armed hug. His voice seemed to come from very far away. “Kei-kun?”

_Felt it in my fist, in my feet, in the hollows of my eyelids_
_Shaking through my skull, through my spine and down through my ribs_

Rikuto’s eyes were boring into mine. Zakuro was staring at me, eyes wide open.

_No more dreaming of the dead as if death itself was undone_
No more calling like a crow for a boy, for a body in the garden
No more dreaming like a girl so in love, so in love
No more dreaming like a girl so in love, so in love
No more dreaming like a girl so in love with the wrong world

How did I know them? How did they know me?

My head was full of triggers and I couldn’t make the visions stop. I heard the Dreamer screaming her defiance at the weight of my memories, at something so deep and dark that it was blotting out the real world.

I dug my fingers into my hair, trying to focus on something else. Something was wrong, something was always wrong. The pressure was building.

_And I could hear the thunder and see the lightning crack_
All around the world was waking, I never could go back
Cause all the walls of dreaming, they were torn wide open
And finally it seemed that the spell was broken

I blinked when the music stopped. Sensei’s right arm was clamped around me and around Obito, who had decided that I needed a hug around my ribcage. Kakashi was nearby, giving me and the merchants a pretty speculative look.

Chinatsu, it seemed, had slapped Zakuro across the face and kicked Rikuto into his knapsack. She had an expression like a thunderstorm as she bit out, “Stop. Traumatizing. Kids.”
I didn’t want to look up to see Sensei’s expression. Suddenly, I didn’t want to be anywhere near anybody else. Gently, I pried Obito’s arms from my waist and shrugged off Sensei’s hug. I got up, walked away from the campfire, and walked outside of the ring of wagons. Once I was out of sight, I dropped to my knees and slumped against a sack of rice someone had left out.

I needed to take a deep breath, so I did.

I needed to stop crying, so I dragged a sleeve across my eyes and called it good.

I needed a hug, but I’d left that option behind.

I was an idiot.

“Kei? It’s me.” Obito dropped to the ground next to me.

“Hey, Obito.” I said, turning to face him.

“You okay?”

“Yeah, it’s just…” I dropped my gaze for a moment, blinking my kneecaps back into focus. “It’s nothing.”

The look Obito gave me when I looked back at him said that he rather doubted that.

I sighed. “Look it’s…it just brought up some bad memories.”

Obito bumped my shoulder with his. “Like what?”

Might as well tell someone, right? It took me longer than it should have just to think of any words at all, though.

So Obito said quietly, “You don’t have to tell me.”

“No, it’s…I just don’t know how.” I said, “I’ve never…”

I’ve never shared my problems with anyone. I can’t…

I needed to stop assuming the people around me could read my goddamn mind. I had too many things in it for anyone to learn much of anything, much less what I needed.

We sat in silence for a while.

It wasn’t really hard to think of the ways my life could, ultimately, mean absolutely nothing. They say that the measure of a person’s value is in how they affected and improved the lives of those around them, and if the life, once lived and finished, made the world a better place. I knew that Rin hadn’t really done anything especially noteworthy other than be kind to Obito throughout their childhood the last time around, while Obito had carelessly shot his own life’s worth into some kind of infinite negative zone with no way out.

I didn’t know if being around was going to help anyone, and sometimes I felt like I had to do something, all the time, just to feel like I wasn’t being a dead weight. The thing about the world is that it keeps spinning regardless of any individual lifetime, no matter how cruel that sounds, and it was like running on a treadmill just trying to keep up.
Rikuto had stabbed at the heart of it. I wanted to save people from what I kept seeing as their fate, to prevent pain and misery. I wanted to help someone—anyone, even—live a little longer, or a little better. But this wasn’t, in the end, the world I remembered. I was an extra.

But I still wanted to help.

“When I was little,” Obito said, apropos of nothing, “I used to spend a lot of my time in my room. I just…I liked to imagine things. I still do, but I don’t have to do it a lot anymore, since I have you and Rin-chan and Sensei and I can live them.” He drummed his fingers on his leg as I looked over at him, expression blank. “Sometimes, I’d be so mad at everything I wished I could scream. I’d lock myself in my room and just…sulk, I guess.”

I wondered where he was going with it.

“I used to think, ‘I wish someone could see me.’” Obito said quietly. “I used to think, ‘I wish someone would save me.’ Being alone…it hurt worse than anything. So…”

So I wasn’t going to let anyone else suffer the same way.

I thought of dark rooms, of retreating when the world became too much. I thought about reading books about times and places I’d never have lived to see. I thought about the amber light from the streetlamps in my old life, highlighting rain as it fell. I thought about staring at my alarm clock until I was too tired to keep my eyes open.

The difference was that, in my old life and in my current one, someone always showed up in the end to make sure I was okay.

I didn’t think anyone had done that for Obito.

“When you’re upset, someone should always at least ask if you need them.” Obito continued, still quiet and unusually serious. “Even if they have to break the doors down to ask.”

“You’re a really good person, Obito.” I said, rubbing my eyes. “Thank you.”

“Ready to talk about it?” Obito asked. “You don’t have to, but…”

Like I wouldn’t, after you just bared your soul to me.

“Yeah, I…my brother was born when I was three, you know?” I said, looking up at the sky. “He wasn’t really that strong, but it didn’t seem to be a problem. But when I was six, he had to spend time in the hospital and no one was sure he was gonna make it.”

“Wait, is that how you met Yamaguchi-sensei?” Obito asked.

“Yeah. He’s the reason Hayate-chan is still alive.” I said, putting my chin in my hands. “Ever since…I worry. A lot. And I keep getting nightmares.”

“Is that why you asked Sensei for the dawn watch yesterday? You said something about more nightmares happening closer to sunrise.”

“Yeah. It didn’t really help much, though.”

I was such a fucking wreck.

“But…thank you. Obito, you really are the best boy I know.” I said, swiping the tears from my face with my sleeve again. “You didn’t have to come after me.”
“Yes, I did.” Obito said seriously.

Maybe he did.

I didn’t say anything about sensing Kakashi’s chakra eight feet above us, on the roof of the wagon.

But I did refrain from kicking Kakashi out of turn, in the morning.
The Dreaded C-Rank: Close Calls

Chapter Summary

Kei: Fight.

On the third day, we were out of sight of Sorayama and Soragami entirely by lunch. Our path had taken us into a valley, which meant that we really couldn’t see all that much of the horizon and that Sensei was on edge all while we were eating. A valley was, if it was any smaller, an excellent point for an ambush. The wagons couldn’t maneuver very well in the hilly terrain, hemmed in on one side by a river and unfortunately burdened by the limits of pre-industrial wheeled vehicles with cargo in unstable terrain. Then there was the fact that, for most of the length of our trip through the valley, it was a twenty-meter drop to the water. And the rocks.

If they went off the road, we weren’t gonna be able to get them back on it. And then we’d all be sunk.

It was about an hour after lunch before anything happened.

We had some warning, of course. I saw Kakashi’s head whip around in pursuit of some scent I hadn’t noticed, felt Obito’s chakra indicate that he was alert again, and I felt the maelstrom that was Sensei’s chakra begin to pick up. More than that, though, I felt multiple approaching chakra signatures, heading for us at a speed I could barely keep track of. They were coming from all directions, closing in on us like a ring of sharks.

And then a scream of rage sounded from the head wagon.

Part of what I’m going to describe was only pieced together after the fact. There are still gaps. I just remember enough to say that I had serious tunnel-vision when the chips were down.

I saw Chinatsu fall out of the first wagon, bearing a man I didn’t really recognize to the ground.

There was a pulse of heat from Obito’s side of the wagon, too intense to be anything like Obito’s Grand Fireball, and the sound of screaming and clashing metal. Behind me, Sensei sounded like he’d engaged half a dozen fighters at once, from the sound of ringing metal and the pop of the Flying Thunder God Technique’s usual displaced air. Kakashi’s segment, the head of the wagon, felt unaccountably cold, and I saw a spiky mass of ice and blood and human body parts fountain into the air.

Five mammoth chakra signatures had all made themselves known at once. One, creeping and merciless like lava from a shield volcano, must have been Rikuto. Another, howling like the Pacific in a full gale, was as much “Alaska” as “Hurricane Katrina,” and registered as Shirozora once filtered out. A third, while subtler, was no less deadly—like a thunderstorm churning the ocean’s surface in open water—Nanami. The fourth was wildly energetic, and I heard a screech like shearing metal from Rikuto’s section—Zakuro.

The fifth I’d never sensed before, but I could pinpoint easily. Chinatsu almost glowed with chakra, the excess wisps of it heating the air so much it distorted and looked like a mirage. The very ends seemed to actually catch fire. It was like watching someone unlock several of the Eight Chakra...
It felt like standing on the surface of the sun.

But I didn’t have time to dwell on any of that, because there were too many enemies. Last count had been nine—the number had doubled since. And almost all of them were shinobi.

My left hand closed around the end of my kodachi’s scabbard, thumb primed on the blade guard. My right was around its handle. My entire body was angled forward, low to the ground, with the curve of my sword facing downward.

I barely even realized what I was doing. Mom and Sensei had trained me only too well, even though my body was so small and fragile still.

The enemy I saw first was older than me by about four or five years, and he was about thirty centimeters taller. He had brown hair and a scar across one cheekbone, a white line against a tanned face. He had black eyes, like mine, and a grin that showed four prominent eyeteeth. He didn’t wear a hitai-ate, but I could sense his chakra all the same. He had curved kunai as primary weapons, and from his stance and chakra I could tell that he didn’t take me seriously at all. There were so many more dangerous people, after all. He thought I was the Achilles heel of the formation.

(I won’t say he was wrong—I was just insulted at the time.)

I drew.

Gekkō-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Hunting Tiger Strike.

Within the Land of Iron, a neutral country defended by samurai rather than shinobi, the most powerful techniques are those that are so fast that shinobi can’t counter them before being cut down. Given the speed of most shinobi, samurai have to use chakra in order to multiply the speed and force of their strikes or else they’d be sitting ducks for other things. Like getting pounded by long-range ninjutsu, which is sort of our thing. And yet the Land of Iron is still there, despite the pressure.

The catch, though, was that ninjutsu, genjutsu, and even taijutsu generally relied on the assumption that the shinobi in question had enough time to use their hands to form seals. Or, when facing skilled samurai on the warpath, keep their hands. Samurai didn’t have time to be slow, or indecisive. They had to pick an opponent out and remove them as soon as possible before the ninja magic bullshit popped up.

Some of the things Mom had taught me made me think that she, or her ancestors, had been samurai.

One of those things led to me cutting my chūnin-level opponent’s fingers off with a single swing. I had the blade flipped around and swinging upward at his throat before either of us really even had time to process anything.

Gekkō-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Curve of the Moon.

There was blood everywhere.

I didn’t have any time to stop and maybe freak out a lot—oh my god I just killed someone—because my opponent’s reinforcements were way faster than he was. Even as I was drenched in arterial spray, which neatly fucked over any attempt I could make to navigate the battlefield by sight.

Enemy closing on your six! The Dreamer screeched, clearly reading my own chakra sense better than I was at the moment, because argh fuck blood in my eyes.
In hindsight, I’d have to say they were chūnin, or maybe special jōnin without a combat specialization. Not that I knew that then. I just knew that someone tried to stick a genjutsu into my brain and the Dreamer was promptly distracted because she had to extract the foreign chakra from my system without any help from me. I was a little too busy trying not to die.

Even blinded, I at least had the advantage of knowing about the movement of my opponents’ chakra. It meant that I didn’t get myself cut in half or stabbed in the throat, at least.

But I also didn’t realize I was being herded toward the river until my foot slipped and I was already falling.

I tried blinking, tried to clear the blood from my eyes, but I didn’t have time. I hit the river hard, the freezing water closing over my head before I could do more than gasp for air, and then one of my enemies landed feet-first on my chest. A cloud of bubbles exploded from my mouth, driven out by the pressure and the shock, and hands closed around my throat.

There are no words for how terrified I was in that moment.

I was nine. I was barely a ninja. I was a girl who’d just killed a teenager with a sword. I weighed less than thirty kilograms. I had never learned how long I could hold my breath.

Can’t breathe can’t breathe can’t breathe can’t breathe can’t breathe…!

For a while, all I did was claw frantically at my enemy. I’d dropped my kodachi in the midst of my panic, my fingers occupied in trying to pry his hands from my neck and dragging bloody furrows in his unprotected hands. I could almost see his face, distorted by the water and the fact that I was busy trying not to drown.

The next thing I knew, I couldn’t move at all.

The blood was finally cleared from my eyes, though, and I blinked in an effort to figure out what the fuck was going on.

Okay, so I was still underwater. I could feel it, and my vision was predictably distorted. However, I was also apparently floating motionless in a bubble of water, while my enemy’s non-distorted arm was in front of my face. The rest of him, though, seemed to be above the surface—sort of, though for some reason my inner ear was still telling me that I was upright. My enemy’s arm was stuck in the side of the bubble.

I was stuck in my opponent’s Water Prison Jutsu.

I hate my life.

My eyes closed.

There are, technically, two variations of the technique. One is used for live captures, and thus automatically filters oxygen from the water to keep the subject alive (see also: Zabuza Momochi, The Wave Mission). The other isn’t, and therefore no chakra is wasted on keeping anything or anyone alive (see also: Kisame Hoshigaki-avatar, Kazekage Rescue Mission).

There are also two ways to disperse the technique. One, which was exemplified in the battle of Team Kakashi versus Zabuza Part the First, was to force the user to disengage and give up maintaining the technique. The other, as demonstrated by Team Gai versus clones of Kisame Hoshigaki, involved expelling chakra from every tenketsu at once in the hopes of disrupting the technique’s cohesion.
I didn’t have the chakra capacity necessary for the latter and I didn’t know if any of my teammates were close enough to do anything to help per the former. The chakra-infused water was screwing with my sensing ability, and I was having a hard time figuring out what to do in order not to die in the meantime.

FUCKING MIST NINJAS.

My brain, which was thankfully occupied by more entities than just me, flew into action.

I wasn’t going to be a helpless little girl. I’d gotten this far—on my illegitimate smarts for most of it, granted, but I’d done it—and I wasn’t going to let it end so soon. I had too much to do, and what I’d accomplished so far didn’t feel like enough. My successes needed sequels. I needed more.

And as a completely relevant side note, I’d finally found a way to make Bullshitting the Fish Test Jutsu relevant to my life.

Making a patient breathe in defiance of the laws of physics and their bodies’ capabilities was just the starting point for medical ninjutsu. I didn’t need to use hand signs for most of my techniques, and I sure as hell couldn’t make any at that moment even if I’d wanted to. No version of the Water Prison allowed movement, though it’d have been nice if this one had allowed breathing.

But as long as I was surrounded by my favorite medium for medical ninjutsu, I could at least take advantage of it.

Even the Water Prison has air circulating in it—only still water doesn’t, and the Water Prison relied on having a rotating sphere of water charged with chakra around the victim. If it was still, the jutsu would be extremely expensive to maintain and to no benefit—without chakra circulation, there wasn’t a lot of ways to maintain water outside of water. Disrupting the technique was based on knowing that much and on taking advantage of it with all the pragmatism being a ninja could offer. While it would be extremely chakra-intensive to force my lungs to accept water as a medium for oxygen transfer—not to mention the fact that I’d basically drown the second I stopped focusing, if I let more water in willingly—it would be much easier to force the air in the bubble to work with me.

I’ll focus on channeling chakra into our tenketsu. Direct it!

I could do that.

Bubbles streamed through the water, directing themselves toward my nose and mouth. I’d have enough for one breath—maybe two—and then I’d have to use that chakra I kept manipulating to fuck with the prison itself. It wasn’t a perfect plan, but it bought me some time to think and my team some time to possibly mount a rescue effort.

I looked out at the rest of the world. Apparently my captor had decided to put me on display like a crystal ball on a pedestal. Or a snow globe, I guess.

Part of the landscape was on fire, though I couldn’t tell if it was because of Chinatsu, Obito, or Rikuto. Half of the attacking group was already dead or in various states of grievous injury. At least one person had been swamped by lava, while the strange man from before had been literally burned to death by Chinatsu (probably). Someone looked like he’d been shocked to death—so was Kakashi a Hei-type lightning user? There were half a dozen dead soldiers around Sensei, who casually destroyed the seventh with an offhanded Rasengan.

I learned later that it had been the first time he had use more than two Rasengan in a single fight, and mostly because he’d been separated from his students.
And then there was the statue of ice and blood and chunks.

I had a sudden vision of November 11 wiping out his traitorous superiors by killing them with the flash-frozen contents of a bottle of scotch. Even if he’d died doing so.

It was at about that point that I determined that I was probably going loopy from oxygen deprivation.

Breath one. Take it and hold it.

Got it.

There was a pause. We’ve got company.

It’s hard to describe a chakra signature without comparing it to something else. Or at least it is for me—maybe other sensor-class shinobi have it easier. They’d been born with their chakra sense, or trained it, and didn’t really seem to have a concept of what it would be like to be unable to sense it at all. Point is, there’s a “feel” to everything and there was definitely a “feeling” that had decided to superimpose itself on the Water Prison, apparently without my captor noticing. It was focused mostly around my waist and back, swirling around counterclockwise to the jutsu’s clockwise.

Looking out at the road, I saw Sensei shout something. I saw Obito and Kakashi behind him, with Sensei’s hand out to hold them back, while Rikuto had a bow—a bow, seriously?—trained at my captor. Chinatsu was still doing her glowing thing, while Shirozora was standing on Sensei’s other side.

I was pretty sure he was the one that kept making gore-popsicles out of people. Having him looking at me was kind of a bad thing.

Then a lot of things happened at once.

The Water Prison jutsu exploded into what was basically a water ball of spikes and death, though I had no idea how or why. I think I saw Shirozora hold up his arms, like a waterbender, but when the water ball broke down due to lack of chakra, I was being held in someone’s arms like a sack of rice. I heard someone scream, though distantly, and the world seemed to pitch sideways. I was suffering from what felt like swimmer’s ear or something, because my head hurt and my lungs burned and my ears felt like they were full of water still.

FOCUS, DAMMIT.

Sound came back in a terrible rush. Everyone seemed to be talking at once, which was distinctly unhelpful for my headache.

Whoever had decided I made a decent stuffed toy had decided let my feet touch the ground, at least. I blinked once or twice and realized a lot of things at once.

One: I had killed someone.

Two: All of the enemy shinobi were either dead or suffering from various states of being frozen, burned, or dismembered. Sometimes more than one of the above.

Three: My team was crowding around me, even though I was just kind of sitting stupidly on the ground with another person for support.

Four: Chinatsu was biting Akira’s arm, and he’d helpfully rolled his sleeve up to let her. It had a lot of bite scars on it.
Five: Sensei was pretty much up to his elbows in blood. Kakashi had blood spattered on him, likely from arterial spray or something, while Obito was just a little scuffed up as though he’d taken a tumble in the dirt.

Six: The guy I’d fought first was lying headless on the ground next to the wagon-ruts. Holy shit.

Conclusion: The entire situation was a lot beyond my solo coping abilities.

“Kei, are you all right?” Sensei asked.

If I’d been a hardened shinobi, I could have probably chalked up my reaction to having exploded eardrums or something considerably less mundane. I didn’t have any real experience with killing, and on my old life I’d only thought vaguely about it. Not in the sense of “I will kill him,” but the more passive, “I wish he was dead.” Or “I wish [insert person here] was hit by a bus for being a waste of oxygen/pity/money/humanity.”

Anyway, my response was to throw myself at Sensei and hug him as hard as I could, burying my face in his flak jacket. And if I managed to get Obito and Kakashi as collateral huggees—which I did, since I was growing just a bit faster and turning out just a bit lankier at the moment—then I could force the reality of the situation away for a bit. Sensei’s arms, in turn, wrapped around all of us. I felt someone’s hand mussing my hair, but that was okay. I needed that.

“First kill?” I heard Chinatsu’s voice ask.

I felt Sensei nod.

“Ah,” she said. “Nanami, did you get her sword and the hitai-ate?” Nanami—apparently my rescuer—must have made some kind of affirmative gesture, because Chinatsu said, “All right, then. Kick the icicles in the river and bury the rest. Also, Shirozora-chan? Stop freezing people. It just makes a mess.”

And on and on. I didn’t care about her anymore. I didn’t care about any of their stupid déjà vu bullshit—none of that meant anything when compared to the fact that all of Team Minato was alive and together.

Though I was gonna get answers when I recovered, make no goddamn mistake. I’d waited long enough.
By nightfall, we were well away from the battle site. Between Rikuto’s Earth Release jutsu and Shirozora sweeping everything into the river with some strange Water Release technique I could only call “ninja waterbending,” the area was at least clear of bodies and blood. While any tracking-type group would have no trouble finding us, hopefully the bodies they discovered would deter any further attack.

We’d made…a bit of a mess. To say the least.

So, I found myself sitting with my team and Chinatsu’s inner circle when it was time to debrief everyone on the situation late that night. Granted, I was leaning pretty heavily on Sensei, since my childish stamina was pretty much bottoming out, but at least I was attending the conversation. Obito was on my other side, while Kakashi was by Sensei’s left, and the merchants-of-doom had apparently decided to make a semicircle around Chinatsu, who sat directly in front of Sensei.

Chinatsu tilted her head to the side. “Starting from my right, here, let’s have proper introductions this time. Name and kekkei genkai, for the record.”

Shirozora rolled his eyes. “Shirozora Yuki. My clan is originally from the Land of Water and our bloodline is Ice Release.”

The Dreamer mused, I wonder, are we looking at Haku’s uncle here or something?

Haku’s psychotic uncle Mister Freeze, maybe, I thought.

Nanami inclined her head, rather than being rude like her apparent lover. “Nanami Hōzuki. My clan’s ability is known as the Hydration Jutsu, which allows me to liquefy my body at will.”

“That explains how you rescued me,” I said, brows knitting together briefly. “And the strange chakra I sensed before the Water Prison collapsed.”

She bowed again. “Yes. Though Shirozora’s icicle spears dealt the fatal blow.”

“Well, I can go next.” Rikuto said, having raised his hand in a half-hearted wave. “Name’s Rikuto Tetsuyama, former Iwagakure jōnin and wielder of the Lava Release kekkei genkai. Ditched the rest of the world and the forehead plate about eight years back.”

…what the fuck?

“Currently, Konohagakure is at war with Iwagakure.” Kakashi said quietly, but in a very pointed tone.

“More power to you, then.” Rikuto replied bluntly. “I stopped caring and the village can go fuck itself for all I care.”
Chinatsu’s hand lashed out and wham, Rikuto was nursing a broken nose in no time flat.

“Uh…I can fix that.” I said hesitantly. I didn’t really want to get close to the guy who’d been a party to my freak-out the previous night, but I didn’t like not healing people.

“No need. He needs to learn to control his behavior around children sooner or later.” Chinatsu said, glancing at Zakuro briefly but significantly. Then her laser-like golden stare focused on Akira. “Your turn.”

“Ah, right!” Akira looked rather sheepish, actually. “I’m Akira Uzumaki—though really, I don’t have any special kekkei genkai other than a large chakra reserve. I’m not even a trained shinobi!”

Something in Sensei’s expression seemed to momentarily shift to shock, but it was gone pretty quickly. I think he must have been thinking of Kushina and her supposed status as the last daughter of the Uzumaki clan.

As far as Akira went, though, I know I hadn’t sensed him when the fight got rough. At the very least, everyone else in the area seemed to have him thoroughly outclassed. Then again, he was technically a civilian. He mostly felt like warm sunlight, though next to his burning sun of a lover I’m not sure how he could have really compared.

Zakuro raised her hand. “Oh, and I’m Zakuro Suzu, from the Land of Rice Fields. My clan isn’t really all that large or even that important, but our kekkei genkai is actually genjutsu-based. It’s called the Hypnotic Echo.”

Okay, that was a new one.

“What is that supposed to do?” Obito asked.

“Oh, it lets me tailor my genjutsu to whatever my target will find the most unsettling.” Zakuro said cheerfully. “I only have to aim for a mental state and the target’s mind does the rest! I have plenty of other genjutsu that are based on sounds and not hand seals, and actual sound-based attacks! It makes everything very confusing.” Zakuro went on, grinning. “I don’t even really have to hear what my targets do if I don’t want to!”

Are you fucking kidding me?

In summary, my brain had been turned against me and apparently the existence of genjutsu kekkei genkai made my genjutsu affinity fucking worthless. I’d essentially been made an accomplice in my own mind-fuck, which was all kinds of fucking crazy and I kind of wanted to punch someone.

“You used your genjutsu on me yesterday, didn’t you?” I asked, not quite accusing her of anything. I couldn’t keep the irritation out of my voice.

“Well, of course!” Zakuro said, oblivious. “I use it on everyone who travels with us! It’s how we can tell who we can trust or dump in a river.”

I didn’t have words for that.

“Oh, wait! I forgot something!” Zakuro said brightly, and clapped her hands.

Akira’s hair went from strawberry-blond to deep red, while Shirozora and Nanami swapped hair colors leaving him with green-black hair and her with white. Rikuto’s hair turned brown, while Zakuro’s hair reddish-orange.
“I also maintain genjutsu disguises for everyone!” Zakuro concluded.

“Moving on.” Chinatsu said dryly, looking rather like she was contemplating slapping Zakuro again. “My full name is Chinatsu Kasai. My sister Misaki and I are former kunoichi, though we both retired four years ago in order to pursue the success of our mother’s merchant caravan. I’m actually the third generation’s firstborn daughter bear the ‘Chinatsu’ name, though the Chinatsugumi-specific caravans are named after me. My clan’s specialty, rather than ninjutsu, was in fūinjutsu.” She rolled up a sleeve and Sensei leaned forward slightly in completely blatant interest now that the conversation had turned to his area of “expertise.”

Her arm was covered in five-point seals, the ink twisting out from the pentagram on the back of her wrist and curling around under her skin like a nest of thorns. The daughter seals were on her elbow and shoulder, with their own branches of ink. They were all tattooed on.

“A five-point seal.” Sensei said contemplatively. “They’re mostly used for chakra storage, though I guess you could make them work for weapons or supplies if you were really desperate. But I’m sure no one wants metal stuck in their arm, so…”

Chinatsu nodded. “My sister and I have mirrored seals, along the opposite sides of our bodies. My left, her right. Both allow us to store our chakra for long periods of time. Unleashing a single seal is like opening one of the Eight Gates.”

That explained the Super Saiyajin thing I’d seen. And how Chinatsu wasn’t effectively crippled at the end of the fight…though I imagine that she hadn’t been biting Akira just because. Unless there was some kind of sadomasochistic thing going on with them that I hadn’t noticed, I guess.

“Is that why I couldn’t sense you?” I asked, since apparently my tact was all used up for the foreseeable future.

“Yes.” Chinatsu said, though her eyes narrowed a bit. “The shoulder seal allows me to hide my chakra among the natural energy field of the planet. I had them added after visiting a Fire Temple and learning of the concept.”

So, Sage Mode chakra invisibility for the price of not actually being able to use Sage Mode. Good to know, I guess.

Oooookay then.

“Does that answer all of your questions?” Chinatsu asked, one eyebrow going up.

“For now, yes.” Sensei replied, rather than letting us form our own answers. He stood up, and we all took our cue from him.

Then Sensei’s hand landed on my head again. I was starting to think he was getting used to having me for an armrest. His other hand mussed Obito’s hair. “And for you three, Kei is on first watch. Obito, you’re on third watch, after Kakashi. Kei-kun, wake Kakashi up in a few hours and try to be exact about it this time.”

Sensei did not deserve to be a lousy morning person while still making us go on watch rotations.

Then again, I suppose we’d have to get used to the idea of running on little or no sleep if we were going to survive shinobi life. Then again, again, we were nine. I wasn’t looking forward to growing up stunted or maintaining my signature eye-bags for the foreseeable future.

I still ended up taking first watch without complaint, though. Not like complaining was gonna get me anywhere.

About forty-five minutes in, when my team had mostly dropped off to sleep (sans Obito’s drowsy tossing and turning and occasional flopping limb that caught Kakashi in the shoulder), I sat on top of one of the wagons and tried to keep my eyes open. It’d been a long day, and I’d happily go to confront my nightmares if it meant I’d be able to get some shuteye. I just didn’t want to be awake to deal with shit.

There was the sound of a footstep behind me and, the next thing I knew, Chinatsu was sitting next to me, her legs dangling over the edge of the roof while mine were crossed one over the other. I didn’t jump, since she didn’t take me by surprise now that I could sense the chakra from her seals, and neither of us said anything for a while.

When the silence finally bordered on becoming oppressive, Chinatsu said, “I suppose you’re wondering why Zakuro targeted you, out of your team?”

I nodded.

The Dreamer gave me a mental poke. Hey, wait…

“This might require some background. Do you mind?” Chinatsu said.

“No, it’s fine.” I said. I mean, it wasn’t like having less information would help.

Chinatsu sighed. “All right then, kid.” She held up one finger. “Perhaps you’ve felt the first sensation—the strong feeling of familiarity between you and I, as though we’ve met sometime before and made an impression? Nod if it sounds familiar.”

I nodded.

“I’ve felt that déjà vu with nearly every person under my direct command.” Chinatsu said squarely. “In order, Rikuto, Shirozora, Zakuro, Nanami, and Akira have all felt extremely familiar to me since we met, and the feeling was mutual. You see the result.” She made an expansive gesture, clearly meant to include the entire caravan, and possibly its success. “We knew we could trust each other implicitly from the moment we met, like we were tied together by fate. Do you understand?”

I actually didn’t. The Chinatsugumi’s familiarity had actually been off-putting for some reason. It might have been the age gap.

Chinatsu must have seen my expression in the firelight, because she explained, “But when we met you, my sister and I, like our friends, felt dread. I’ve felt unrelenting hatred before, and acted on it, but you…you could be the cornerstone to something great, or a cause of nothing but pain.”

My blood ran cold.

Hey!

“I don’t know which path you’ll choose. I don’t know if it’ll even be a choice.” Chinatsu said grimly. “But my first idea was to ship you off to a Fire Temple and see what they’d make of you once your sensei loosened his control a bit. But it’s clear now that you won’t go.”

I looked at Obito and Kakashi, almost unwillingly.

Kakashi was an arrogant jerk and I wanted to slap him more often than not, but he didn’t deserve to be alone and miserable and hated. I wasn’t sure how much of an influence on him I could really be, given that the catalysts for his attitude shifts had always been the deaths of those close to him, from what I remember. But I had to try, right?

And Obito... dammit, I wasn’t letting him go off and crash and burn without a fight. Ever. Between me and Rin, we might even be able to keep him sane. And maybe alive.

Don’t you remember them? Ask her...

But I already had an idea.

“What would you do, if you had to choose between love and duty?” I asked out of the blue, staring up at the starry sky. I had a hunch...

Chinatsu gave me a strange look. “You’re a pretty weird kid, even for a possible devil-child.”

“Yeah, I know.” I said.

“Well...since I’m here, I’d say love.” Chinatsu said after a moment. “I loved my family more than I loved being a shinobi.”

And she made her own secure world out of nothing... The Dreamer and I thought together.

...Akira the noncombatant healer. Rikuto the earth-aligned archer. Shirozora, king of mood swings and most prone to brutally murdering his opponents. Zakuro, the illusionist... Nanami, the wallflower with water powers...

FUCK.

I knew them. Not on a person-to-person basis, but more in the sense of “Mwahaha! Dance, my puppets!” sense.

While remembering non-Naruto or non-personal aspects of my life seemed to be a thing that came and went depending on what was triggered in my wacky headspace, I’d been a writer the last time I’d lived. Not a great one, or even a decent one with enough luck to get published, but I’d been one all the same. I’d lived inside my own head for at least a third of my waking moments, it seemed, which contributed to my unwillingness to do much in the world around me. I’d been a dreamer. I still was, but my dreams were much more practical than they had been, since I’d be dead by fifteen if they weren’t.

And I’d written the Chinatsugumi.

Not in their current form, not under these names, and not with this exact team composition, but I’d written about people with the same personalities and the same pasts. And their futures, and their children, and their ending.

In another life, I’d literally been responsible for everything that happened to them or anyone they knew. Good, bad, joyous, or fucking horrible. Ultimately.

No wonder we’d gotten a mutual sense of “oh fuck.”

“At the end of this mission, I’d like to stay in Konoha for a while.” Chinatsu said quietly. “You seem like a good kid. I don’t know if my presence will be good or bad for your development, but damned if I’ll let you let yourself destroy the world.”

“...Uh, likewise?” I said hesitantly. “I mean, um, it’s not like I’d say no, but...”
“I’d be staying regardless of whether or not you were some kind of hideous bomb.” Chinatsu said bluntly. “But you’ve made me interested enough to extend the trip. Misaki can get along just fine without me.”

“Uh. But isn’t it called the Chinatsugumi?” For a reason, even. Chinatsu shrugged. “It can be the Misakigumi for a few months.”

I thought about that. While I had a watchdog for my actions in my head already, for all that I was actually capable of affecting given my age, it’d be…interesting, to see what a supposedly uninvolved bystander would see. I didn’t know if she’d end up reporting to the Hokage or anything, but…

“I think I knew you too,” I said, watching the stars drift slowly by overhead. “But…look. I don’t trust you much. Not even based on a weird feeling.”

“Understandable.” Chinatsu said mildly.

“I feel like I knew you from…maybe a past life or something, but that doesn’t mean that much for this one.” Aha! A near-confession!

“So you’re saying that I’ll have to earn your trust. All of us will?” Chinatsu asked.

I said, “Yeah. Talk is cheap.”

“Talk is expensive if you do it wrong.” Chinatsu corrected me. A merchant to the core, then. “So, what do we of the Chinatsugumi have to do?”

I bit my lip. “Well…there’s this technique Obito and I are having trouble with…”

Chinatsu gave me a funny look. Then she laughed, quietly. “All right. Tell me about this terrible new skill…”

I did.

The next day, when we all took a break for lunch, Obito and I squared off. Rikuto dug his biwa out again, tweaking the strings. Chinatsu’s civilian began to clap for percussion, while Akira, Shirozora, and Nanami primed their own instruments and Zakuro took a deep breath. And then the music started.

We didn’t quite manage to stay in synch, but we were a lot closer than before.

Turns out that, for me anyway, the flash of inspiration for pair-fighting was based on music. It was a lot easier when I had some kind of external timer, and I guess that was why Sensei brought a metronome to our team practices after that.

Obito’s and my hands met in the center of the practice arena, perfectly in time after a couple of practice rounds, and we both grinned.
The Dreaded C-Rank: Leaving a Nest

Chapter Summary

Kei: Get dropped.

We got to Konoha within a week, thankfully. There were no other major distractions, though since Obito and I spent what felt like nearly every waking moment trying to get used to each other’s movements and time our attacks precisely (mostly using Kakashi or Sensei as targets), I could easily have missed something that one of the others saw, assessed, and dealt with. Rikuto’s stock of arrows seemed to shrink every time I turned around, though we ate pretty well with all the game he seemed to bring down as collateral. Not that any of us were incapable of hunting, but he seemed bored and our team was a little busy with multiple accounts of attempted murder.

I mean, sure, technically we were only ambushing Kakashi when Sensei was busy and we weren’t quite as dangerous together as he was alone, while jumping Sensei only took place at mealtimes. There was no actual killing intent involved.

Honestly, I think Sensei wrote it off as typical team roughhousing.

I kind of wondered what his team—the old Team Jiraiya—had gotten up to in the past, since I didn’t know anything about them other than what they had looked like in a team photo. I assumed they were all dead, though. All of Jiraiya’s students sans Naruto ended up dead one way or another, even though it was completely unfair.

And one of them had even ended up killing him. One of Minato-sensei’s students could end up being the cause of his death as well. Sasuke had attempted to permanently kill Orochimaru for power…

I honestly think the only Sannin not to pass down some kind of bizarre murder-succession ritual is Tsunade, though she only has two students total from what I remember.

Anyway, back to our triumphant return.

Sensei got the gate guards to open the door, while the Chinatsugumi and their wagons finally made it back to civilization. So did we, of course, but Konoha was pretty wild when you were a ninja. Not because it was dangerous to live in, as a rule, but there was always something going on and about half of it involved shinobi arts somehow. I could at least guess that half of the shinobi in town were probably training, recovering from training, or preparing for more training. Stuff was probably exploding or being stabbed in every single training area.

It was nice and sunny, though the angle told us that it was past lunch and also well past time to get some good old-fashioned comfort food in celebration of making it back from a B-ranked mission alive.

Or C-ranked. We hadn’t made the rank change official yet, we hadn’t gotten paid, and we hadn’t checked into the hospital to make sure we hadn’t all caught some kind of foreign death plague that only showed up after the infectious phase was over.

Okay, so I was paranoid.
“Obito, Kakashi, head to the Hokage’s office. I’ll meet you there in a bit.” Sensei said, once the last of the merchant wagons had cleared the gates and set off for the market district.

“Sensei?” Obito began, and Kakashi blinked.

That was about when Sensei picked me up by the back of my jacket like I was an unruly kitten. “I’ll be taking Kei-kun to the hospital for a quick checkup. As soon as I know for sure that our misadventures didn’t cause any trouble, we’ll join you.” Sensei waved with his other hand. “Try not to kill each other before we get back!”

And then we popped out of reality and then back in between blinks. We’d apparently traveled the entire length of the village and ended up in the hospital foyer due to the Flying Thunder God Jutsu. I guess it was nice to know that Sensei really did have the hospital tagged, for future reference.

“I hope you have a story for Mom about how I almost died.” I said, still being lugged around.

“As long as you get a clean bill of health, I think that’s your problem.” Sensei replied, carrying me over to the receptionist’s desk. Somehow, it was Ayako again.

“Oh, hello! How have you been, Kei-chan?” she asked, leaning forward over her paperwork. “And you, Namikaze-san?”

“I’m being a dead fish.” I said flatly.

“We just returned from a C-ranked mission and Kei had a mishap with a river.” Sensei replied. “I’d like to make sure my student’s all right before we head in for a briefing—I’ve heard that water in the lungs is a serious risk for pneumonia.”

“Oh! In that case, I'll get you checked into the mission-priority office right away.” She scribbled something on her paperwork and handed a clipboard to Sensei. “Fill this out in the third room on your right.”

Sensei nodded and I took the papers. He didn’t set me down once.

We were shuttled through the waiting room so quickly that I barely had the time to scribble my name into the Patient Name box. We ended up in one of the smaller examination rooms, since it wasn’t as though either of us were totally at our full growth, and because we were both conscious. Most casualties either weren’t or wished that they weren’t, and there were both stretchers and surgeries waiting for them.

“So, Kei-kun, how long have you been able to sense chakra?” Sensei asked, curious. I didn’t really sense any particular feeling from him, but I also knew that there were ways to get around my chakra sense, now. Mostly because I was inexperienced, but that was really all that was needed.

“Pretty much forever.” I said, shrugging.

Being able to sense chakra, while unusual, wasn’t precisely rare. It kind of depended on what sort of chakra and under what conditions. Most shinobi could, at close quarters, get a fairly accurate reading on their opponent’s level through concrete experience and because chakra could be felt, particularly through blows and through the usage of killing intent. But the range that I had, even if it wasn’t much when compared to a Byakugan’s much more solid and detailed perception, was abnormal. Sensor-type shinobi, at least in Konoha, tended to be Senju, Yamanaka, or Hyūga-descended. I was a kunoichi descended from two non-clan shinobi, and I hadn’t exactly made a spectacle of my usage of my chakra sense. It wasn’t the kind of thing that was, say, on the level of having a kekkei genkai or anything like that. It wasn’t flashy, but it was useful.
I mostly used my sensing ability as a way to make it so my chakra control was limited solely by my attention span, and to tell where people were without looking. It also made it somewhat easier to copy chakra control techniques off of people, since it wasn’t like I was really learning at the same rate or with the same material that my teammates were.

I was starting to see why most new teams were made of genin alone. The differing education and experience levels involved in our team were causes for frustration for everyone.

“Why didn’t you mention it before?” Sensei asked.

“It didn’t seem like a big deal.” I replied. And it hadn’t—most shinobi could tell enough from their environment based on other sensory cutes that my own extra perceptive ability was pretty much just compensating. That said, it was probably a little odd to see that awareness in a new genin, even if the chakra sensing was probably actually stunting my other investigative skills a little. “You and Kakashi do pretty much the same thing, though Kakashi uses his nose and I think you use seals somehow.”

Sensei’s left eyebrow rose. “Obito doesn’t have that ability yet, Kei, since he’s still new. You are too. And Kakashi and I have been in the field for a while.”

No shit, Sherlock, I thought in a burst of petulance. I didn’t want to be in the hospital again. Even if the chances of seeing Rin were higher than normal, and I could see Yamaguchi-sensei again (and get criticized), I was also rather tired of always being told to either explain myself or shut up or something in between.

It’s at times like this that I wonder how old you are, and if you really did work in retail.

“It’s not a criticism, Kei-kun.” Sensei said. “It’s just that I don’t see why you didn’t tell anyone.”

I frowned. “But…”

I stood out for enough reasons already, didn’t I? I was a genius according to other people, my stats were insane, I actually had a weapon specialization, and now I was a known sensor. I’d have happily never have gotten involved in the ninja business at all if I’d been born as, say, the ramen chef Teuchi’s first daughter. But I hadn’t and now I was neck-deep in the mess and a part of my brain that wasn’t the Dreamer or Id was telling me I didn’t have enough to make it.

I have some self-doubt problems. Always have. Seems like I always would.

Sensei patted my head. “Kei-kun, it’s all right. I was just curious.”

No more dreaming of the dead…

I drew my knees up to me chest, even though they’d been dangling off the side of the exam table, and wrapped my arms around them.

“Are you sure you’re all right, after what happened on the mission?” Sensei asked, concerned.

“I don’t know.” I said. “A lot of stuff happened…”

Our team’s first out-of-village mission, my first kill, my first near-death experience…

Man, what a shitty month.

“Does anyone even know what happened?” I wondered aloud, because I didn’t even really remember if I’d told my story during the early part of the debriefing. I’d been too tired to do or think all that much for a while there.

“I have an idea.” Sensei replied. “You engaged an enemy shinobi in combat, and were captured. He was an upper-level chūnin, Kei-kun. It happens sometimes. That’s why we’re deployed in teams.”

No, that wasn’t… “There was another one before him.” I said, swallowing. “I killed him.”

Sensei said nothing for a long moment.

And just as he was about to say something, there was a knock at the door. “Hey, I heard my reckless former student was injured on a mission. Mind opening up?”

Good old Yamaguchi-sensei. But where did he get off calling me a “former” student? As far as I knew, I still wanted to learn medical ninjutsu, and I sure as hell hadn’t quit.

“Sure, you can come in.” Sensei replied for me, and the door opened, allowing both “Kei-senpai!” Rin said, since apparently she’d also heard the news and decided to follow along. Or maybe she always followed Yamaguchi-sensei around—I didn’t know much about internships, other than the fact that Rin was in one and being an apprentice at the same time. I wasn’t sure if she was taking missions at all or if her apprenticeship counted for a lot of them.

“Hey, Rin-chan.” I said, uncurling from my defensive ball. “How’ve you been?”

“Good, but I don’t think I can say the same for you.” Rin said, grasping my hands in hers. “What happened?”

“Enemy shinobi, mostly.” I replied blandly.

“Somehow I doubt you’d attempt to drown yourself for fun.” Yamaguchi-sensei said dryly, fishing a stethoscope out of a drawer. He looked at Minato-sensei, “And by the way, where were you when my former student was getting herself killed?”

“Dealing with another seven of them.” Sensei said in a somewhat frosty tone.

Yamaguchi-sensei made the sort of face that made me think that he thought that wasn’t a good explanation at all. I guess he did like me. Kinda.

…Well, it wasn’t like this was exactly the Kakashi vs. Orochimaru confrontation over Sasuke, since none of us were psychopaths, Minato-sensei was a combat shinobi while Yamaguchi-sensei wasn’t exactly the same way, and I wasn’t going to go off on a crusade for power to kill a nonexistent older sibling due to a brain-frying tattoo, but I could still feel the tension in the air. Minato-sensei and Yamaguchi-sensei didn’t seem to be buddies at all.

Rin seemed cheerfully oblivious, at least.

“So, how’s your apprenticeship been?” I asked.

“Oh, it’s been interesting! I mean, I’m not out doing C-ranked missions or anything, but I do get a chance to help other teams out with D-ranks and I spend a lot of time learning from everyone in the hospital! Even the civilian doctors are really very good at what they do.” Rin said earnestly. “I’m learning a lot every day.”

I smiled back. “Well, it’s better than what I’ve been learning.”

I was sure I felt a spike of interest from Sensei.
“What?” Rin looked so adorably confused. She really was a nice kid, though she had some pretty major blind spots when it came to Obito.

Obito: Mr. Friendzone.

I was kinda hoping it wouldn’t stay true this time around.

“What, have I been skimping on your training?” Sensei asks.

“I still haven’t learned water-walking yet.” I replied. “It might have helped.”

Sensei’s eyes narrowed slightly. “You…are trying to guilt me into something.”

“Depends. Is it working?”

“Shut up, both of you.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. He looked at me. “And you, turn around so I can listen to your breathing.”

I found out later that, no, I hadn’t swallowed or inhaled harmful amounts of water and that Yamaguchi-sensei thought Minato-sensei was incapable of walking and chewing gum at the same time. Minato-sensei, meanwhile, had the completely accurate impression that Yamaguchi-sensei was an arrogant jackass with a soft spot for maybe three people in the course of ever. He usually wasn’t quite so bad, though I suppose that my promotion to Team Disaster had made my status as his student, as well as my mom’s and Minato-sensei’s, somewhat nebulous.

Then again, I’d been the informal type of student since day one. Sort of like the neighbor kid you taught how not to mow his legs off.

“Do you even want to continue with your lessons?” Yamaguchi-sensei had asked.

“I would, if I could find any time between Mom and Minato-sensei and missions.” I’d said. “Heck, even if I can only learn when Rin is and we have totally different lessons, I’d still do it!”

Yamaguchi-sensei had looked at me for a long moment. Then, “No.”

A cold ball of lead seemed to form in my stomach.

Wait, what? No! We need to learn, for when Obito and Kakashi need us the most!

“Kei-kun, you have mastered chakra scalpels and the Mystical Palm,” he’d explained. “There isn’t anything else I can teach you without having you enter a formal apprenticeship like Rin did, where you dedicate nearly every waking moment to medicine, and it’s just too early to risk your team’s dynamic. You’ve only been a genin for three months.”

“I…” I’d bitten back tears and said in a small voice, “Oh. Okay.”

Yamaguchi-sensei had given Minato-sensei a very cold look. “But for your sake, I’d better not see her in here for at least three months with anything more severe than a head cold.”

Minato-sensei had put his hand on my head. Again. “We’ll be fine.”

Yamaguchi-sensei made a dismissive noise and shooed us out.

Rin had followed, though. “Kei-senpai…”

“I’m not sure I’m your senpai anymore, Rin-chan.” I said around a lump in my throat. I was hard to “Talk, then. “Not that I was for long, but…”

“You’re still my senpai.” Rin had said seriously. “And you should look after Obito and Kakashi-kun, because you’re there when I can’t be. And I can’t be there for you, either, so you have to take care of yourself better than you have been! A medic-nin can’t die until the last of her team is beyond saving!”

“…I’m not a medic-nin, Rin-chan.” I said.

“You might as well be.” Rin insisted. “You never studied the oaths or the precepts but you’ve still got healing jutsu and that’s enough!”

And then she hugged me.

“Thanks, Rin-chan.” I said. Then an idea struck me. “Should I hug Obito and Kakashi too? Saying it’s from you?”

“Why can’t they be from you?” Rin asked.

“Because I punch them and they’d believe you instead of me.”

“…Kei-senpai, you should be nicer to your teammates.”

“I agree.” Sensei had said. “Come on, it’s time for that delayed debriefing. The Hokage won’t wait forever.”

And then we were gone.
The Mission Assignment Desk was actually pretty crowded when we got there, since I guess it was the peak season for missions before the far inland parts of the Land of Fire finally realized it was late autumn. The Land of Fire, true to its name, was pretty goddamn warm all year round, but it shared some climate traits with, say, the Andes in some particularly high altitude places. It wasn’t much compared to the Land of Lightning or Earth, where mountains were the geographic feature of the millennia, but we had snow and actual winter in some places. A lot of merchants, not just the Chinatsugumi, were making their last trips of the year, and that meant a lot of money coming into town and a lot more local missions for those shinobi who could take them. There were a lot of genin teams there, along with the occasional reporting chūnin and a few lone jōnin.

I kinda didn’t want to ask what everyone above genin was doing this time of year. While Team Minato hadn’t been deployed to the actual front lines yet, the war was still on. We weren’t going to stay at home forever.

Some of the genin teams looked like they had already been deployed. A couple of them were missing members. Obito, Kakashi, and I were the smallest kids in the room, even if Kakashi had probably seen more action and more battlefields than all of us genin combined.

Sensei stopped a chūnin desk worker and said, “Team Minato, delivering a mission report and requesting paperwork for a mission class upgrade.”

The chūnin, who looked a little like Obito and therefore might have been an Uchiha (though I didn’t see the clan crest anywhere), nodded and pulled the relevant paperwork seemingly out of absolutely nowhere. “Here you go.”

Paperwork ninjas are a breed all their own, I swear.

“Thanks,” Sensei replied, and the chūnin just sort of seemed to disappear into the background buzz of the room. He turned to us. “I have three copies of the mission report paperwork here. While normally Kakashi and I would fill out our own sheets, I’ll be proofreading what we have before we file them. No making yourself out to be some kind of super-ninja unless you actually did something super-ninja-like, and no tangents. Try not to get a paper cut or something.”

Filling out paperwork with no embellishments is possibly the most boring thing in existence. So I’ll quietly skip over that part—it’s not like what happened isn’t obvious at this point, anyway.

After the paperwork was filed, and after Sensei attached a fifth form to justify the bump up in mission grade as well as pay, we all left the office entirely. We could have, technically, been debriefed by the Hokage if our mission had been particularly important, but it hadn’t so we didn’t. Anyway, despite Sensei’s obvious skill, he was a few years away from being made Hokage-to-be and we were a couple of years from being much more than dead weight.

As soon as we were outside in the late afternoon sun, Sensei yawned and stretched. Then he said,
“Well, at this point you’re all dismissed. There won’t be any training tomorrow, so rest up for the next big session and the next mission while you can.”

Internally, I was torn between whooping in joy and reflexive cringing. On one hand, I was back in Konoha and that meant my bed was well within walking distance. On the other hand, I was definitely going to have to explain the events of my mission to Mom. I’d tried lying to her before, about minor stuff like chores and the occasional “where did you get that bruise” during my school days, but if nothing I said would fly then, serious stuff never would.

_Dah-dah-dah-dah, we’re dead_, I thought.

Lighten up.

Bluh. I needed a distraction. Even if I knew Mom was probably gonna kill me for almost getting myself killed (and wasn’t that a stumper), I figured I could at least have one last hurrah.

Well, if my family’s financial straits had improved any I would have probably invited my team for dinner. As it was…

“What’s it gonna be?” Obito asked instantly, never one to turn down snacks or sweets.

“Well, we could go out for dango, but I can also get apples in the market.” I shrugged. Personally, I would hit my limit for dango in no time flat if I ate it like Obito did, but I hadn’t gotten tired of apples yet. I wasn’t sure if they were really a favorite food, for me, but I remembered vaguely that Kakashi disliked sweets.

Despite the fact that he and I didn’t get along, I didn’t actually want to exclude him from stuff. It just…kinda happened.

I think that might have been worse, in a way.

Besides, apples were cheap this time of year.

“Well, since you’re buying, I guess you get to pick.” Obito said after a while. I could tell that he was a little disappointed—he knew me well enough to know that I wouldn’t choose dango again.

“Apples.” Kakashi said instantly, and I think it might have just been to spite Obito. Of course, whether it was or not, Obito took it that way and glared.

It could also have just been that Kakashi liked apples more than dango. Slightly or otherwise.

“One vote for apples and two abstaining,” I concluded. “Apples it is. Sensei?”

“That sounds all right. So, should we meet around eight or so?” Sensei asked. “Training Ground Three is still open.

“Sure.”

And then we were all off to our various afternoon tasks.

For my part, that meant stopping by the market district and grabbing apples. I was pretty sure Mom didn’t have any stocked up, since Hayate and I generally were okay with whatever she put on the table and hadn’t really been much for special requests. I also knew basically nothing about buying apples, other than the fact that bruises probably weren’t going to be conducive to a long shelf-life and organic stuff was the name of the game.

Oh well. No time like the present to learn, I thought.

In summary? Listen to the merchant who runs the fruit stall. That stuff is their livelihood, and they’d damn well better be able to figure out what is and what isn’t going to sell well and get them paid. Otherwise they’re lousy and they don’t get customers and they fail.

Also, talk to the old ladies who visit said stalls religiously.

So, I had ten (for safety’s sake) apples in two grocery bags when I made my way home at long last.

“I’m home!” I called as I entered, dropping my bags and my pack by the door. I’d started to kick my sandals off by the time I got any responses.

And it was like I had somehow picked up mole summons. Only they were my family and sticking their heads into the hallway—and Hayate seemed to have picked up a couple of extra voices or something. I couldn’t see the living room from my position, but I could sense extra chakra signatures easily. Hm. It bore investigation.

“Sis!” Hayate shouted, and promptly knocked me onto my back and into a pile of shoes. Now that I thought of it, Hayate didn’t own this many pairs of kids’ sandals and none of his were black heel setups. Even if they were tiny and the heels digging into my shoulders were nothing compared to the combat heels some kunoichi wore.

Now that was interesting.

I promptly noogied the hell out of him. I was learning something from Sensei after all!

“Nooooooo, stop it!”

“Welcome home, Kei-chan.” Mom’s voice said from the kitchen. I guess seeing that I was still intact enough to start play-fighting with my brother had assured her that I was also in good enough condition that she could return to dishwashing duty. “By the way, you can let Hayate-chan go now.”

I did so, and we giggled in the hallway like idiots for a moment. I put my hand on his head, notably not going straight to manhandling, and said, “So, how’s my favorite little brother been while his sister’s been away?”

“I’m your only brother.” Hayate said.

Pah. He’d still be my favorite if I had another brother.

I think.

You’re seriously trying to turn your brain into a pretzel, aren’t you?

“Details, details.” I said dismissively. “So, who are your new friends?” I asked, trying to get a better look at the source of the sudden squeaks I was hearing. Hayate was limiting my movements because he was still sitting on my leg.

“Come and meet them!” Hayate chirped, pulling me to my feet.

Well, he’d sure gotten stronger.

We stumbled into the living room once I’d ditched my sandals and pack and groceries, and nearly crashed into our two guests. Score one for ninja grace and poise—but what the fuck, I was tired anyway and I was torn between wanting to meet Hayate’s new best buddies and maybe collapsing in bed for a nap.

The kids were both about Hayate’s age, give or take months either way, and thus shorter than me by about a head. They were skinny as heck in the way that ninja children tended to be (if they weren’t Akimichi clan kids), and stared up at me like I was some kind of ultra-badass superninja or something.

The first kid, a boy, was about Hayate’s size. He was tanned, like he spent a lot of time in the warm Konoha sun, and had very dark brown hair tied up in a pineapple-shaped tail, sort of like the Nara clan’s signature style. He wore a light beige shirt with ninja wire mesh underneath, and was missing two of his front teeth.

The second kid was a girl, with her purple hair tied up in a pair of adorable pigtails. She was actually bigger than either of the boys by a bit, with dark eyes and super-long eyelashes. She wore a white-and-blue dress with flowers on it, with standard dark blue shinobi leggings underneath.

I had a couple niggling suspicions that I knew these kids from somewhere, but my brain wasn’t attaching names to faces all that well.

“So, I know that you’re my brother’s friends, but I have no idea what your names are.” I began, even as I unstrapped my kodachi and stuck it on its holder well above the grabbing height of enterprising six-year-olds. I could walk on walls, but they probably wouldn’t learn until they were old enough to understand that real steel blades were not toys.

Hence why our family’s wall mounts for stuff were always at least a meter and a half off the ground.

“T’m Yūgao Uzuki,” said the girl, and my brain automatically conjured up an image of a purple-haired ANBU standing in front of the Memorial Stone.

The boy raised his hand, as though he was in a classroom. “Iruka Umino.”

Double dammit.

“Hayate-chan, you’re officially making friends faster than I am.” I dropped my hand onto his head, and he jumped. I grinned as he gave me a pout—he’d been expecting another wrestling match. “So, kids, how’s life been since I was gone? How are classes going? How are your families?”

While the kids talked, I thought.

Yūgao Uzuki, assuming she grew up at all, would be a very skilled kunoichi and eventual ANBU member. Her specialty had seemed to be kenjutsu, which she could have either learned from Hayate, from ANBU, or, in this new reality, from someone in our family. Eventually, she’d surpass Hayate in blade work, and remained a successful shinobi well past Pain’s hideous stomping match with Konoha.

Iruka Umino, as a chūnin Academy instructor, had been instrumental to the lives and sanity of several different kids in the future and more skilled than Anko. Despite being dubbed too nice to be a jōnin, not to mention lacking in any major trump cards aside from his exceptional intelligence, Iruka had been strong.

And my brother had somehow managed to befriend both of them and possibly a number of other kids in his class.
My graduating class was made of cannon fodder by comparison.

I was, of course, assuming that the skills that allowed them to survive the gauntlet of genin and chūnin rank stayed useful even in a warped timeline.

Anyway, Iruka and Yūgao hung around for a while, but I ended up sort of just falling asleep on the couch whenever they and Hayate finally decided to go outside to play. When I woke up, Mom had just dropped a blanket over me and made the couch rock by sitting down by my head. Hayate, it seemed, had taken off with his friends—I could sense his presence, but out in the neighborhood as opposed to inside the house.

“Kei-chan, what happened on your mission?” Mom asked.

…So, I wasn’t as good at acting normal as I thought.

“We got attacked.” I said quietly, wondering what had given me away.

Let’s see. I killed a boy maybe six years older than me, I nearly drowned, and I was mind-hacked by a crazy lady with a genjutsu kekkei genkai and a penchant for friendly fire. Oh, and Yamaguchi-sensei had told me to get lost.

…Yeah, maybe I needed to get a lot off my chest.

So I told her.

The whole time, Mom’s fingers threaded gently through my hair.

“What am I supposed to do?” I asked after I’d finished.

Mom said nothing for a moment. Then, “Kei-chan, you’re younger than I was when I killed someone for the first time. My situation was different than yours, but…” Mom paused. “Listen. And think. Ask yourself if there had been another, practical way to make sure you made it home safe. Think on whether you would trade an enemy’s life for your teammates or your sensei. Then you’ll know if you can live with your decision.”

I said nothing for a long time. And I thought, like Mom asked.

I wasn’t some kind of soldier fighting for some cause of a nebulous country or philosophy I didn’t give a shit about.

I wasn’t some revolutionary.

I wasn’t a mass-murdering psychopath.

I wasn’t a martyr.

I was just a girl on a battlefield.

And I fought for the people around me, so they’d have a better future. I couldn’t control the future, but…but I could do my best, and try to help everyone I could. I could only act in the moment, not the future or the past. I could only defend the people within reach.

I could live with that. I’d have to, but it wasn’t a hard decision on its own.

Besides, if I was gonna be much of a shinobi, I’d need to learn to stuff battle emotions away into a box for later sorting. Combat came with adrenaline and endorphins and fear and pain and anger, and untangling that Gordian knot would take time and practice.

I resolved to talk things over with Mom as much as I could.

Later that day, after I’d showered and changed and eaten a bunch of onigiri that had been in the refrigerator, I headed out to meet my team. I stuffed the apples into my now-empty backpack, took my kodachi from the wall (in case of random fights), and took off.

“I’ll be back by bedtime, Mom!” I called.

“You’d better be!” Mom called back.

Konoha at night is actually rather pretty. I remember reading, somewhere or some-when, that some cities in World War Two used to turn all of their lights off after dark in order to try and baffle enemy bombers. The logic went that only factories kept their lights on, since their products would obviously need to be worked on around the clock to make their way to the front lines, and any bombers flying over cities would obviously target the light-show in order to cause as much damage as possible. It was the days before night vision eyepieces and things, and I’m not sure the strategy always worked.

The reason I mention this is because Konoha, despite being at war, doesn’t really act like it when it comes to the civilian part of the populace. Then again, airplanes don’t exist here and the number of shinobi who can attack from above in any strategically meaningful sense number in the single digits. The civilians were generally safe, if not content.

Besides, most of our fighting seemed to take place well outside the Land of Fire at the moment, despite Iwagakure’s repeated incursions. I don’t think any of the major villages get hit directly with much of anything other than infiltration attempts until Orochimaru’s attempted invasion far in the future.

Barring the Nine-Tailed Fox’s appearance after the war, anyway.

There were more than a few ways to avoid the latter, though they’re just theories and half-formed plans.

I ended up at Training Ground Three at about seven-fifty. No one was there yet, and I ended up hanging out next to the Memorial Stone for a while even if it killed my night vision horribly.

I hope I’m making you proud, Dad.

Miss you.

I had to wonder if Dad would have been proud of me if he could see what I really was. If he had, when he was alive.

I felt the crackle of Kakashi’s chakra long before he actually got close enough to see, in the dark. It made sense that he’d be the first one there, though being anal about mission start times and stuff was kind of missing the point of some of the shinobi regulations.

Ninja life was a long, long string of improvisations, panic attacks, stabbing, and maybe getting away alive.

I put my hand against the cool stone, tracing Dad’s name slowly. My reflection wasn’t clear in the dim light, but I thought I could see a little of him in the way my mouth was always a little downturned and the way my hair spiked like crazy while it was short.
Dad hadn’t managed to make it, but…I’d do my best to make sure I never had to choose between giving my all and coming home. I had to, didn’t I?

“Hey, Kakashi.” I said quietly, not turning to greet him.

“You’re early for once.” Kakashi said in a flat tone, walking up beside me.

I gave him a sidelong look. He wasn’t looking at me, but at the stone.

Sakumo Hatake will never be remembered here.

The Stone was for heroes who died in the line of duty. Most of the time, we’d never recover the body and any funeral was held with the monument and a photograph. If the timeline went the way it had “originally,” the Hokage and Sensei would end up as names under my fingers. So would Iruka’s parents, and Kushina (who I had yet to meet), and Rin, and hundreds of people I’d never meet. Obito would have his name here, too, but survive and twist into something horrible.

Sakumo Hatake was a goddamn hero, and yet at this time, in this place, he was nothing.

Spending too much time around the Memorial Stone was probably bad for my continued mental health, honestly. I knew it wouldn’t do Kakashi any favors later.

So, I tore my eyes from the granite and handed Kakashi an apple.

Our camaraderie was based on an awful lot of meaningful silence.

At least, I think so.

Sensei and Obito showed up eventually, in that order. I threw an apple at each of them as they appeared, and we got to eat together. We didn’t talk all that much—all of us seemed to be spending our time regaining our equilibrium after the mission—but it was kind of nice, all the same. Obito and Kakashi didn’t fight over anything—though they weren’t really talking to each other either—and Sensei and I got really into a game of I Spy after a while, with Obito joining in,

I hoped it wouldn’t take another disaster of a mission for us to be a real team.
Kei: Meet the Bloody Habanero.

Honestly, most of the next few months were basically a gigantic blur. We squabbled less frequently, we trained a lot more, and we went through a bunch of missions. None of our later C-ranks were turned into unmitigated disasters, though we toed that line a couple of times and we got more rank upgrades over time. While Sensei didn’t say much about it, I could see a line of tension in his back and a certain twitchiness in his movements that told me, at least, that he was more worried than he let on about the war. I was pretty sure that Sensei wasn’t supposed to be handling the bulk of the enemy combatants for a C-ranked mission.

About the only thing that changed for me over that time period, at least in terms of physical ones, was that I had longer hair and my jacket had full-length sleeves. I was also about two centimeters taller and a kilo heavier, which made me suspect that I was going to hit my full size before the boys did. In my old life, it had taken until I was thirteen or fourteen to be essentially finished growing, and I’d been somewhat taller than average. I had no idea how tall I could get, here—mainly because my parents were completely different and I wasn’t completely sure if Dad had been really tall. Being nine didn’t give me much in the way of perspective.

Obito, meanwhile, had also ditched his short-sleeved black jacket for one with sleeves long enough for thumb-holes and sturdy metal hand guards for the backs of his hands. He’d also gotten around to tying the standard dark blue shinobi pants down with bandages, like nearly every other boy did, and he might have been a little taller than he’d been at graduation.

Kakashi had invested in sleeves, too, though the shuriken-patterned scarf was a bit over the top. I couldn’t help but think it was about time—he actually looked more like a boy, now, even if he was practically swimming in his jacket, despite the ninja mesh undershirt. I kind of wondered about the weird trailing half-skirt thingy, though I think I’d seen something similar on Neji when the guy had been promoted to jōnin once upon a time.

One of these days, though, I was going to find out where my teammates bought shoes and go there instead. I could only find the generic ugly shinobi sandals, while Kakashi’s looked like a pair of heels I’d probably owned in my old life. Minus the heel bit.

But hey, at least Obito and I were getting better at that whole sync-fighting thing. We weren’t perfect, but we were learning and conversations with Kakashi had stopped degenerating into fistfights. I think we’d learn to compensate for our respective growth rates essentially as we went, and maybe all three of us could start becoming an actual working team.

And maybe pigs would fly.

It was after one of those mostly-interchangeable winter training days that Sensei, once again, decided to celebrate our success.

I think Kakashi was starting to learn to hate us and Sensei’s indulgence of us and everything else ever.
Sensei brought his hands together in a loud clap, signaling the end of the day’s attempt to give Kakashi third-degree burns. He grinned and said, “You’re all improving by leaps and bounds. I’d say this calls for ramen. We’ll be paid by the end of today for our last mission and it’s a couple of zeroes more than we’ve been getting lately.” Sensei said with a smile. “So, everyone know what they want? I can buy this time.”

Our last mission had been a bit of a clusterfuck. I mean, none of us kids had been in all that much danger, but any mission where Sensei had to solo a pair of enemy jōnin was the kind of mission that require serious decompression after.

Also, Obito had been getting frustrated with his lack of progress—mostly in the speed department—and with no Shadow Clone workaround I was kind of at a loss as to how to make more headway.

“I’ll go with beef this time.” I said instantly. I don’t know how I’d ended up with shrimp last time but I sure as hell wasn’t repeating that mistake. My brain insisted on making a series of connections that went basically like this: a shrimp is an arthropod, which is the same phylum as bugs, crabs, spiders, and lobsters (and I knew that several of the named categories had closer relationships to one or the others, but I didn’t care). I had a thing against bugs. Or anything with a texture that was anything like that of a bug.

I think if I went on vacation in the Land of Waves, Rivers, Water, or Rice Paddies, I would starve to death.

Not to mention possible Death by Aburame For Being a Bug Hater.

“Aw, but shrimp was good too,” said Obito, who had ended up with my order since I was busy being picky as only a child could be, then.

“Then you can have it.” I said. “But I’m not getting it again.”

Shrimp is my nemesis.

I could practically hear Kakashi rolling his eyes.

Sensei looked up at the sky, then at the shadows of the buildings nearby. “I think it’s about lunch time now, actually. If I remember right, there’s a friend of mine who ought to be around Ichiraku right about…”

“Hey, Minato!”

The “friend” in question was a kunoichi Sensei’s age with crimson hair streaming out behind her like a flag from the top of her head, and a grin that threatened to crack her face in half. She was wearing a short-sleeved variant of the Konoha uniform, with the more feminine (meaning skintight) pants available for mix-and-match. She had a hitai-tate tied across her forehead, above a pair of deep violet eyes, with two long side-locks of red hair in front of her ears. And she was moving at top speed.

Kakashi’s chakra was suddenly directly behind me, and then I was flying forward because he’d shoved me square between my shoulder blades. I was almost instantly swept up into a crushing bear hug that had probably been meant for the unrepentant coward behind me.

It didn’t save him, by the way. It might have bought him like, thirty seconds, and he wasn’t allowed to run.

“Minato, how could you hide your cute little students from me?” Kushina Uzumaki—seriously, who else could she be?—shouted, one finger wagging under Sensei’s nose. I was swinging from her other arm like a rather large plush toy, both because I was kind of running out of air and because resistance was futile. “I demand reparations in the form of ramen and foot massages!”

Okay, getting dizzy.

“Kei’s turning blue, you know!” Obito said loudly.

Oooh, pretty colors.

Kushina promptly dropped me. On Sensei.

Okay, so she kind of threw me in his face. Details, details.

Anyway, right after Sensei caught me and turned me upright again, she rounded on Obito and I was pretty sure Obito went almost a whole step backward when he flinched away from her.

She followed, and pinched his cheeks once he was in grabbing range. Obito squeaked, too.

“So you’re Obito! Minato told me that one of his students was an Uchiha, but I can kind of see the resemblance now that we’ve actually met,” she said sagely. “You look a bit like Mikoto, though she’s a kunoichi and prettier and doesn’t get out often enough even if she’s going to be a jōnin sometime.”

Bwuh?

“And you don’t look like Fugaku because he has a funny face and huge stress lines and you don’t.”
Kushina went on. “Who are your parents, again? I’ve met pretty much the whole clan at this point even if I’m terrible with names sometimes.”

I wasn’t entirely sure Kushina stopped to breathe at all during that rambling mess of a statement.

“This, by the way, is Kushina Uzumaki.” Sensei said over the top of my head.

“Oh, I never did introduce myself to you two, did I? Whoops.” She let go of Obito, who scrambled behind Sensei and me for safety. “Kushina Uzumaki, chūnin of Konohagakure! People also call me the Bloody Red Habanero when they think I’m not listening, though.”

“Uh.” I said.

But Kushina’s attention was already off on an adventure.

“Kakashi-chan, what are you doing all the way over there?”

I could practically see his expression morph into the perfect example of a nonverbal “oh shit” in the history of this lifetime. I say “practically” because, technically, I still couldn’t see half his face.

Eh. It was a riddle for another time. And maybe adulthood and alcohol and stuff.

And the next thing I knew, Kushina had Kakashi in a bear hug.

I was starting to realize that Sensei’s tendency to manhandle us kids had to have come from somewhere. I just hadn’t realized that it might have been his girlfriend.

Then again, Jiraiya doing the same thing would have ended in a sexual harassment suit or something.
Jiraiya was like thirty-seven or something close to that number, while Sensei was still a teenager.
“Anyway, is the plan still to get ramen?” Sensei asked, finally setting me back on the ground. I promptly hid behind him with Obito, leaving Kakashi to his fate.

Some teammates we were.

Actually…

Since Kushina was apparently ignoring Sensei in favor of giving Kakashi the Lennie treatment (Of Mice and Men, 1937), I squeaked, “Uh, Kushina-san?”

“Oh?” Kakashi was looking distinctly like a pissed-off owl—though his hairstyle made it a bit hard to tell, sometimes—but Kushina’s smile was kind of…intimidating, over the top of his head. Basically, if I was given the choice of being glared at by a tiny chūnin or being given a mischievous smile by Kushina Uzumaki, I’d choose to invoke Kakashi’s wrath instead.

But hey, what were frenemies for?

“I think we’re all getting hungry…” I said.

Obito’s stomach gave an obliging grumble. He winced.

“Oh? Sure, we can go get ramen.” Kushina said, as though she wasn’t still squishing Kakashi like a plush toy.

She let go of him eventually. When we all sat down for ramen, all of us kids were planning on sitting together on the opposite side of Sensei from Kushina, just to be sure we had some kind of barrier. We didn’t exactly talk about it, but the intention was there and we’d planned for that, sort of. Or at least we tried to—Sensei grabbed the end seat and Kushina took the one next to that, leaving the three of us to have a quick Rock-Paper-Scissors duel over who got to sit furthest away.

Kakashi won the first round—which I attributed to the constant duels with Gai—and Obito beat me, which meant that I had to sit next to Kushina and be the sacrificial lamb to her affections.

I barely remembered what to order in the face of her overbearing personality.

“So, you’re Keisuke-chan, right?” Kushina asked, slinging an arm around my skinny shoulders.

“R-right, Kushina-san.” I didn’t even really want to correct her when it came to my name.

“R-right, Kushina-san.” I didn’t even really want to correct her when it came to my name.

“I’ve never seen you this quiet before, Kei-kun. Are you feeling all right?” Sensei asked from Kushina’s other side, looking curious.

The Dreamer said dryly, This is our submissive state. It helps us not get eaten by bigger and badder things.

Speaking of bigger and badder, as long as I was sitting this close to Kushina and not being occupied with the possibility of imminent suffocation, I could sense the Nine-Tailed Fox. There was no bigger and badder (chakra construct/beast/person/individual)…thing in the world at the time.

And no, I couldn’t sense it as well as I might have if it—Kurama—had been actively throwing its weight around, but there was definitely an undercurrent of this thing wouldn’t even have to chew to eat me and danger danger DANGER.

All wrapped into the five-foot-something frame of a woman who, if she killed me, would probably do it by accident.
“I’m fine, Sensei.” I forced out.

“Kei-kun…” Sensei said warningly, but Kushina cut him off, saying, “If he says he’s fine, let him be. You don’t need to hover, Minato.”

Actually, yeah, he kinda did. The thing with raising superpowered ninjas was that you kinda had to get them to that point and not get anyone killed in the meantime. Well, anyone you gave a shit about, anyway.

Also…

“Kushina-san? I’m a girl.”

“I thought I told you about this.” Sensei remarked into the sudden silence.

Kushina, for her part, seemed to have finally discovered a social faux pas she actually cared about. She blushed, embarrassed, and mumbled, “I was a little distracted.”

Too distracted to notice that we’re a little girl?

I guess most kunoichi wore skirts at my age.

“It’s okay. Just about everyone makes that mistake.” I said reassuringly, as Obito coughed and Kakashi looked pointedly away.

“Still.” She patted me on the head, which was considerably less suffocating than just about anything else she’d done. “Anyway, your birthday is July tenth, right?”

Um. Yes. It’s the same day every year and we’d just about gotten to Sensei’s birthday (January something or other) without actually discussing birthdays once. I was planning something for Obito’s, which was the month after, even if I had no goddamn idea what.

I nodded.

“Then we’re birthday buddies! I mean, sure, you don’t know me all that well yet, but I think you’re adorable and it’s always fun to celebrate with more people.”

Okay…personally, I would probably be happier if I could just get Obito and Rin and Kakashi all in the same room with Hayate and Mom and blow out candles and then go back to training, without any unannounced fights or catfights or Mom hitting people with a shinai. Partying with Kushina seemed like an unspeakably exciting idea.

And at this time, in this place, “visions” weren’t much of a guarantee that someone would live to celebrate their next birthday anyway. It was kind of why shinobi stopped caring after age fifteen or so.

Kushina is an extrovert.

I am not. At all. I scored a thirty on introversion in my last attempt at Myers-Briggs personality type indicator, at least back when I’d been an adult and had a non-ninja job and stuff. Introversion does not generally come any more blatant.

The only reason I kept hanging out with people in my free time was because I was scared of what would happen if I didn’t.

I was all too aware of how short our lives could be.
“Kushina, I think they might be a little young for that.” Sensei pointed out.

“Well not now, obviously, but I can get like, a cake and stuff.”

“My—er, our—birthday isn’t for seven months, though.” I said.

“Then we can practice on everyone else who has one in between, obviously!”

I think Obito might have winced again.

“Don’t get too ahead of yourself.” Sensei said.

“Says the guy whose birthday is next.” Kushina said, pouting.

Obito heaved a sigh of relief.

Sensei gave her an amused look. “Not what I meant. It’s just that…well, I was planning on entering them in the Konoha Chūnin Exams this month.”

Slow down, hit rewind. What the fuck?

The Dreamer squeaked, What?

How did I not know about the Chūnin Exams?!

“Really, Sensei? You think we’re ready?” Obito was almost shaking from excitement. His eyes were huge.

He nodded.

“YES! Kei, we’re going to be chūnin by this time next month!”

“Who’s going to be our third teammate?” I asked, because even Obito’s normally-contagious exuberance wasn’t making much of a dent in my attitude. “Kakashi can’t be—he’s been promoted for longer than we’ve been shinobi. It would be unfair to the other teams.”

“Oh, right! Hey, that means I don’t have to deal with you for a month!”

“Shut up, you useless idiot.”

“Why’d you hit me, you bastard?!”

To me, Sensei replied, “Oh, you’ll see. I’ve been in talks with another jōnin sensei for a while and we’ll be doing drills with your temporary teammate in the next couple of weeks.”

…Oookay.

On one hand, I was pretty sure that I could come up with something to pass, if the exams were anything like they’d been in the future (and wasn’t that just a mess of tenses). On the other, we weren’t ready. My chakra capacity was still shitty and Obito had consistently failed our shuriken and kunai throwing tests and we’d only been shinobi for about five months…

This was going to suck.

And then the next day…

“Obito! Kei-senpai!” Rin called, running up to us in Training Ground Three, “We’re going to be taking the Chūnin Exams!"

Funnily enough, I wasn’t quite so worried anymore.
Chunin Exam Arc: Cliff's Notes Version

Chapter Summary

Kei: Scheme.

A full, international Chūnin Exam would have been a hilariously bad idea given the current state of affairs between the various elemental nations. If the Exams are supposed to be a substitute for war, and we were kinda at war and needed a whole lot of bodies to throw at the enemy…well. Suffice to say that if the “canon” Exams that Naruto and his fellow Konoha Twelve went through was the full and proper version someone ought to attend after nearly thirteen years of peace (though no Rock teams attended, because they suck and hate us), Team Minato/Yamaguchi/Awesomeness was taking the abridged version.

At least, that was what Sensei had told us. I don’t think he really knew what that entailed, anyway.

Mom’s reaction to the news was pretty straightforward.

“This is a terrible idea.” Mom said, over dinner. Hayate was at Iruka’s house with Yūgao, and had at least given me a quick hug before taking off. It was kind of weird to see him hanging out with other people, but I trusted the Umino family and wasn’t all that worried. He had to grow up sometime, right?

“I know.” I grumbled, propping my head up in my left hand. “But if I don’t enter Obito’s never going to forgive me.”

“It’d be difficult to forgive anyone if you all die.” Mom countered, obviously annoyed.

“Does it help any that it’s Konoha-only?” I asked. Sensei had told me that much, at least. While at war, Konoha didn’t have time to vet its supposed allies.

“Marginally. But none of you are old enough to have gone through sufficient levels of survival training to work well in the training ground most Konoha Chūnin Exams use.” Mom said, frowning over the top of her clasped hands. “What is Namikaze-san thinking?”

I had an idea.

“I think that he thinks we can do it.” I said, and then I paused to slurp up more soba. Training worked up an appetite, but talking about the possibly drastically shortened future countered it. As a result, I wasn’t really any more hungry than normal, but I needed a second to articulate my thoughts. “Maybe Kakashi spoiled him—I know that he passed on his first attempt when he was six.”

“Kakashi Hatake is a once-in-a-generation shinobi.” Mom replied. “Not even the Legendary Sannin were promoted so quickly, and everyone knows it.”

Yeah, that was the gist of it.

She sighed. “And yet…from what I’ve heard from you and what I’ve seen, it isn’t enough.”

I wasn’t entirely sure if she meant that our team wasn’t enough to take on the Exam—which I happened to agree with—or that Kakashi wasn’t going to be able to carry the burden of being a shinobi on the front lines if us genin were counting on him. Of course, it could have been any number of other things, but those were the relevant thoughts in my head.

We were so dead.

Speaking of deadness, I was contemplating my team’s prospects as I walked to Training Ground Three a while later. I had my paperwork rolled into a tightly bound scroll, which I’d stuck in my kunai pouch. I hadn’t even really taken much of a look at it since Sensei had given it to me. It brought up a lot of horrible thoughts about the myriad ways we could manage to die before we turned ten, and I didn’t really need any more.

“Oi, Pint-Sized Prophet. It’s been a while, hasn’t it?”

Da-da-da-da, Rikuto Tetsuyama of the Chinatsugumi makes his grand reappearance!

It might have been a bit more impressive if he wasn’t carrying a pair of twin babies in slings, with one infant on his back and the other across his chest. Zakuro was walking next to him, looking distinctly amused even at my twitch of discomfort at being cornered, even if we were in the middle of a crowded street.

I did have a couple of things to ask them, though. Such as, in no particular order, what their kids’ names were, where the nickname had come from, when they were planning on leaving, and if they were planning on leaving at all now that their kids had been born.

So I did. All at once, and in one breath.

Not my finest moment.

“Miyu and Kazuki, because you are one, in about a month, and no.” Rikuto answered, smirking. Wiseass.

Hey, you did write him.

That was before I had to deal with him.

“I heard the Chūnin Exams were going to be in a week or so, and I asked if we could stay for a bit.” Zakuro said, grinning. “I hope you make it to the finals so we can watch!”

Yeah, I was starting to hope I didn’t.

On one hand: promotions.

On the other: promotions, gladiator matches, and yet more missions Team Minato’s current setup barely allowed for, with a much higher chance of death. All before hitting puberty.

Rikuto gave me a funny look. “What’s the matter?”

“A lot, but not anything you can fix.” I said. “I’m going to train.”

Rikuto made a contemplative noise. “Well, how about I trade you something? A bit of information, in exchange for some advice.”

I looked at him. Did he seriously believe I was a precog?
“Half-Pint, I’ve been getting a weird feeling from you since we met, and I’m sure Chi-chan gave you the short version for easy understanding.” Rikuto said in a voice pitched to be ignored by any civilians. I felt a subtle shift in Zakuro’s chakra and knew that no one would notice us.

I could be dead in the street in half a blink and only a Hyūga would even spot my corpse.

Cheery thought.

“But frankly, I just get the feeling that you know way more than you’re saying.” Rikuto said. When I said nothing in response, he added, “Take it from an old spy, kid. I’ll have a couple more tidbits for you if you do.”

Well…I could tell him a couple of things that wouldn’t compromise the village.

I looked at the twins. One of them—I couldn’t even tell which was which, honestly, since babies are pretty much the same at that age, barring a significant anatomical difference—opened an eye and I saw teal. “I can’t be certain, but…”

Oh, it’s those two.

I looked Rikuto square in the eye. “How many people can hear us?”

“None!” Zakuro said cheerfully.

“Don’t trust Orochimaru of the Sannin at all.” I said bluntly. “The Chinatsugumi has so many kekkei genkai users that he won’t be able to resist going after you. His primary ambition may involve the Sharingan, but he’s got so many irons in the fire that he could build a wrought-iron fence.”

Rikuto and Zakuro paused, exchanging glances.

“I take it you haven’t mentioned this to your sensei or anyone else.” Rikuto said slowly, but he didn’t sound skeptical.

Old spy indeed. Jiraiya was maybe ten years older, and he wasn’t presumed dead.

I’d checked Sensei’s Bingo Book. Rikuto Tetsuyama, also known as the Stoneshaper during the Second Shinobi World War. He wasn’t quite old enough to be a contemporary to the likes of the Sannin or the White Fang, but he’d been a rising star. And then he’d quit the battlefield, taking out thirty Sand ninjas in a suicide mission that had turned out not to be, I guess. Not bad for someone who had to have been about Sensei’s age then.

“Who’d believe me?” I asked rhetorically. “The Legendary Sannin are practically the Founders for the new generation, and I don’t have any evidence other than a lot of disturbing dreams.”

“Hm. Actually, it meshes with a few rumors out of the Land of Rice Fields.” Rikuto said mildly. “I think I’ll have to put out some feelers, but I could easily come up with something for Chi-chan’s sake.”

…Okay then.

“Anything else you’re dying to tell us?” Rikuto asked.

“…Keep an eye on Hidden Cloud.” I said. “They tried to kidnap a Konoha kunoichi less than five years ago for her chakra, and they have their eye on the Byakugan. I can only guess that they’d be after any kekkei genkai they can grab.” What else, what else… “Don’t trust Danzō Shimura either—he might be an elder, and from a big-name clan, but he’s even more twisted than Orochimaru in some ways. He has a thing for traumatized orphans and not a lot of restraint in avoiding making them orphans. And stay safe. You’re the only people I’ve told this stuff to, so I hope you’ll be able to keep yourselves alive to act on it."

Rikuto patted me on the head.

Apparently I just attracted people who did.

“You haven’t seen how stubbornly people can cling to life until you’ve met a missing-nin, Half-Pint.” Rikuto said. “And here’s my advice to you: Nothing in this exam is worth dying over. You keep yourself alive, too.”

“Also, if you see Akira-chan,” Zakuro put in, “try to remind him that spending time with his cousin is fine, but Chi-chan gets lonely at night.”

Ahahaha, no.

“So, Kushina-san found Akira-san?” I asked.

“Within a week. It was kind of disturbing, really.”

And as though on cue, Kushina rocketed by while dragging Akira by one arm. I think I caught something about “cool jutsu” before they were out of hearing range, with Sensei and Chinatsu determinedly chasing after them. They were all gone in a cloud of dust in less than four seconds.

“This is one crazy village.” Rikuto said mildly. “I like it here.”

Since Sensei was going to be busy for a while, I went to go see what Obito and Rin were up to.

It turned out that the answer was “not a lot.”

Obito was skipping rocks, all while rapidly chattering about whatever topic came to mind, while Rin humored him. If they weren’t training, that meant that Sensei had either already dismissed them or he’d never gotten around to telling them which drills to run today, what with Kushina being the world’s biggest distraction and mobile dust devil.

Or something.

“Hey, can I cut in for a second?” I asked.

“What, are you gonna run away after?” Obito asked, and the rock he’d thrown shot across the water, bouncing a cheerful four times. “Yes! New personal best.”

Simple feats of coordination: Used to impress girls since time immemorial.

“Yeah, I just have a couple things and then I’m gonna go bug someone else for a bit.” I said. I decided not to bother about the paperwork, then. What would happen, would happen. No use getting my team worked up over it.

“What things?” Rin asked, standing up.

“Oh, just a couple of training ideas.”

I hadn’t just been sitting on my ass worrying, after all.
My idea was simple, though that didn’t really mean much for its utility. It’s just that we only had so many options at our age and stamina and we’d never run full combat drills without a target.

But hey, why not?

Obito hadn’t figured out the trick to water walking just yet, while Rin and I had to learn enough chakra control bullshit to figure it out ourselves anyway. So while Rin and I walked out onto the river, Obito stood back and stretched his fingers, waiting.

Anyway, for my plan, we needed a bit of flexibility and a lot of practice. The idea was that, since Obito was the only one of us who knew any ranged combat jutsu, he’d try to box our enemy in and keep them from maneuvering out of my range. I was the best close combat fighter we had—given that Kakashi had been essentially excluded from the roster for this month—and had the longest reach inside of that category with my kodachi. Rin, though she was good at dodging and smarter than Obito, didn’t really have much to her arsenal other than utility jutsu. She would need to stay out of the line of fire entirely.

So, we were learning—or making ourselves learn—the art of dodging fireballs. I knew it could be done, since Obito’s signature Grand Fireball was pretty much useless against faster opponents. It was just a matter of getting used to his timing.

And then using Rin’s and my skills to destroy anyone who was dumb enough to think that fire was all we had to fight with. Jutsu weren’t the end-all of lethal tools in a shinobi’s arsenal, even if they were a pretty good place to start.

We ended up stopping after I dodged a little too late and the end of my fledgling ponytail caught fire. I cut the chakra to my feet and ended up getting dunked, but at least I wasn’t on fire anymore.

I guess I was due for a haircut anyway.

“You aren’t seriously planning to use that in a fight.” Kakashi said as I emerged from the water, shaking myself off like a dog. I mean, it wasn’t effective at all, but then I started wringing out my hitai-ate bandanna and decided I didn’t care anyway.

“It’s a work in progress.” I said, and then I started shaking out the burned bits of hair with my fingers. Blackened, nasty-smelling fragments fell out. Ugh.

Squelching water out of my sandals before taking them off, I made my way back to the bank and proceeded to take off my jacket, my T-shirt, and all of my weapon pouches (including my kodachi). That left me in pants, aesthetic bandages, and an undershirt.

Then I pulled out a kunai and started trimming my burned hair. It didn’t take all that long, really.

“Kei, are you okay?!” Obito shouted, running over. Rin was at his heels, and whipped around to place a glowing green hand against the back of my neck to heal me. I could probably have done it myself, but my brain was running on autopilot.

“Hm? Oh, yeah. I’m fine.” I said. “The water took care of the fiery bit and the fire chakra limits the heat bloom from the fireballs. I shouldn’t get anything worse than nasty sunburn.” I turned. “And thanks, Rin-chan.”

“No problem, Kei-senpai.” Rin replied. “Though I guess this means I should stock up on burn medication…”

I shrugged, as Obito turned red.
I was taking things a bit too calmly.

What, am I not supposed to be keeping you from panicking unnecessarily? Sheesh. That’s gratitude for you.

I’ll be fine, now. The shock’s over.

Also, where the fuck had Kakashi come from?

When a Mommy and a Daddy love each other very, very much…

I took that as a hint to just ignore her.

“Anyway, how’ve you been?” I asked, since I hadn’t seen him for about two days and that was kind of a record since Team Minato had been formed. And also because some retail shit you seriously can’t deprogram. It’s freaky.

“Fine.”

Fucked-up, Insecure, Neurotic and Emotional.

Do they make Adderall for split personalities?

“In that case, Sparky, do you have any pointers for us blundering amateurs? Preferably the easily-applied type of thing that means we don’t die.”

Kakashi gave me a baleful glare.

Then…

“It’d be a pain to break in new genin.”

Hahaha, predictable dickery! I’m onto you, Kakashi Hatake!

He did, in fact, give us a couple of very useful tips. Most of them didn’t actually have much to do with our technique (though he criticized that too), and more to do with the Exams in general and survival strategies. Obito bristled the whole time through, while Rin took mental notes and I continued to dry off, listening in a sort of meditation.

And then Sensei interrupted us. Yay, drill time.

You’ll just have to see what we came up with later.
Chunin Exam Arc: Bring It On!

Chapter Summary

Kei: Enter the lion's den.

In hindsight, it might have been a better idea just to take my entry form for the Chūnin Exam that year and burn it.

Hindsight is twenty-twenty, after all.

Anyway, the day of the Exam dawned bright and horrendously early. I had breakfast with Mom and with Hayate, before he went off to school, and crammed all of my rations and tools into a special storage scroll Sensei had given me the night before, all tucked inside a backpack. All I needed to do, if I wanted my stuff back, would be to drip blood on the central seal while using chakra to activate it, somewhat like using a summoning contract.

“I know I said that it’s a Konoha-only Exam…but try to keep your head on straight.” Sensei had told me. “After the last try we had at an international version, I don’t think you can be too careful of the others.”

Technically, it’d only been tried a few times, and never between the same two nations. The attempts had…not ended well. Assassinations and general infiltration of enemy spies everywhere anyone looked.

I guess it would take the shock of the Third Shinobi World War, in total, to get everyone to sit down and shut up for a while. Shinobi as a social class tend to be paranoid bastards, and cramming a lot of paranoid people in a small space and offering any confirmation for any of the suspicions…

Yeah, I guess the Third Shinobi World War would be a little like World War One. We might (not) get twenty years of armistice for this one, though.

Personally, I would have liked to know how to make my own storage scrolls. Sensei, being one of like three Sealing masters in the village, could make them pretty much anytime he sat down with enough paper and ink, but none of us genin could, and neither could Kakashi as far as I could tell. Oh, I knew that he’d pick up something of the art later, like he seemed to do with everything (like the Rasengan, specifically), but that didn’t actually help us at the moment and I thought I could at least be okay at it. Even if I never learned to use them on the fly, like Sensei did.

Dad had known how to create his own explosives, after all. He hadn’t really gotten me started on much more than just the calligraphy and a couple of basic forms before he died, leaving me without the tools or experience necessary to create my own seals just yet, but it was a thought.

A thought involving the equivalent of the part where, in Jaws, a guy shoots a scuba tank and the pressurized air and metal and stuff blows the shark in half, anyway.

After swinging by the Uchiha district to pick Obito up from apartment, we both grabbed Rin before making our way to the administrative building. There were about ten of them around the Hokage’s Office/Academy/Mission Assignment Building mishmash of a structure, and no one seemed to find any reason to taunt the new prospective chūnin candidates.

I guess Kotetsu and Izumo were unique cases.

Granted, in the “present,” they were probably a year or two younger than my team, and therefore not much of a factor, but their genjutsu came to mind nonetheless.

I kind of wanted to know if that was just a thing for when there were foreign examinees or standard practice.

I cast my senses out as we approached the limits of my range (which was, depending on chakra masking or expression rates and wavelengths, about a hundred meters when in “active mode”), but I didn’t feel any active chakra usage. Well, that’s inaccurate, but genjutsu felt very distinctly clingy, and most of what I could feel was mostly like simmering water—it was probably the other examinees’ chakra agitated from nerves. I couldn’t get a lock on their location, mainly because I was too distracted by my own agitation.

“Nervous?” Obito piped up, making me glance at him. He was smiling, though it wasn’t quite reaching his eyes.

“Terrified.” I said bluntly.

The thing about kids is that they often rise to meet your expectations. They’re not often genuinely stupid; they just haven’t lived as long as adults have. Ignorant, rather.

Now, I’ll grant you that Obito has never been the sharpest kunai in the holster, but he’s not incapable of learning. He’d dealt with my intermittent freakouts long enough to get a handle on the pattern.

“What for?” Obito asked, rather than jumping down my throat about my lack of confidence in his or Rin’s skills.

“I’m a little nervous too, Obito.” Rin admitted. “We must be some of the youngest genin to make the attempt.”

“It’s not the young part that bothers me.” I said. “It’s the fact that we’ve only been genin for five months.”

I mean, shit, Kakashi at least waited for six with his genin team, later.

…Though that was due more to scheduling problems than anything.

“We have each other, though. That has to count for something.” Obito said, “And anyway, the exams are all Konoha genin only, so there’s nothing to worry about.”

The Dreamer commented sarcastically. I suppose Neji almost killed Hinata by accident.

I could actually think of a few people I’d like to get my hands on, but this just seemed…off. I mean, I’d like to see how far I could push Matsumaru Uchiha, for one, but solving my personal issues with someone who was nominally a comrade by punching them stupid just didn’t seem like the right thing to do. Call me crazy, but I was okay with fighting enemies. They were usually clearly indicated, what with the attempted murder right off the bat. But fighting fellow Leaf shinobi over something as trivial as a promotion…

The Dreamer asked, What will happen if you’re matched up against Rin or Obito in the finals?
…Shit. I didn’t know.

I’ll have to get far enough for that to even be a problem, first. I replied, Most teams didn’t even make it that far.

Seemed a little shallow to me, though. I was putting off the future in case it didn’t actually come around, but the possibility remained. If our team made it to the finals intact—though, granted, we’d have to survive the gauntlet of other genin first—we might end up squaring off against each other. I couldn’t say for sure how that would go, only that it would be difficult to put on a show with my stomach twisting in guilt and I should not be doing this.

What about a sacrifice play?

Also known as the other Big Problem.

I had a theory about the First Exam, even if I didn’t particularly want to voice it then, but the looming shadow of the Kannabi Bridge mission was still there, casting reality in a strange and terrible darkness. But…if it came down to one of us…

“I think we need to have a leader, before we go in.” Rin said as we approached, quietly. “So we don’t argue about what to do.”

“Like Sensei?” Obito asked.

“Or Akihito-shishō.” Rin agreed. “Just to keep us pointed the right way.”

This is going somewhere weird.

“Usually we either argue or Sensei just kinda leads us onward.” I pointed out. “Sometimes Kakashi does, but that doesn’t happen often and we complain when it does.”

Well, mostly Obito did.

“Still, it would make things simpler.” Rin said.

Jeez, Rin must have hated leading more than I did. I usually just went with whoever had the strongest personality, since most of what we dealt with as genin was low-risk enough to allow it. Thinking, management, and social skills didn’t necessarily factor into it. It was easier than making all the decisions and…

Obito frowned in thought.

Then he and Rin exchanged a look.

I had a sudden sinking feeling.

“No.” I said instantly.

“Come on, Kei! You can do this!” Obito wheedled.

“You’re putting your lives in my hands!” I hissed back, aware that we were still in the street and could be easily overheard. “That’s crazy!”

“Who else are we supposed to trust; the other teams?” Rin asked. I snapped my mouth shut so fast my teeth clicked. She had a point, and a look in her eye that was actually pretty scary. Obito probably barely knew that Rin had a core of steel, given that flashback sequence before his Tobi-mask cracked off (another side, another story, and another life). “We’ll all be looking out for each other too, but you’re just going to call the fights before they start.”

“Look, Sensei and—and Kakashi aren’t here.” Obito said, scowling. It must have stung to admit that Kakashi was better at anything, even in the face of overwhelming evidence. His face relaxed. “I know we haven’t been friends for a super-long time, but you can do this.”

I wondered, in a somewhat distant way, if this was what having Naruto reassure you was like. It felt good, but kind of scary at the same time. Naruto was never really relying on the object of his attention/conversion attempt to save his life. Obito and Rin might be, later.

“…We’ll see how it goes.” I said, grudgingly. “I really don’t want to do it, but…”

Rin and Obito high-fived.

“You suck.” I said.

Then we made our way inside the exam building.

I’ll say this for Konoha—we know how to make a reception hall. Must be all the wood.

(Yes, this sounds like I’m damning my own hometown’s construction ethos with faint praise, but there’s a reason the building is important to me. Hang on.)

Honestly, if not for the desks lining one wall, we could have been in my old university’s meeting hall. The room was mostly wide open space, with wooden floors and smooth plaster walls and huge windows to let the sun shine in. Probably saved them a load on lighting bills. There was a raised stage to one side, with a wheeled podium for whoever felt like making a speech or taking cover, and the administration had helpfully put signup tables everywhere so there weren’t long waiting lines for the Exam. The room was pretty crowded despite that, with genin of every age and their jōnin sensei as well, and there was a steady roar of voices that echoed off the walls and high ceilings.

But if you looked closely, you’d see something a little less like a parent-teacher conference and something a little more like what it actually was. The windows had a strange tint to them that I was pretty sure meant shatterproof—or at least storm/jutsu-proof—glass, and there was a mirror against the base of the stage that might have been one-way. The doors themselves, unlike my auditorium of old, were lined with metal and I could see the faintest glimmer of shinobi wire. The building itself hummed with the chakra of well-maintained genjutsu traps in case of rowdiness.

Just from the entrance, I could see Gai and Ebisu with their teams. Gai was actually one of the shorter kids over there, though Asuma and Kurenai were in the room with their sensei as well. Going by the hair and the senbon, I guessed that Genma was the kid hanging out with Bandage-nose—oh, that was Raidō—on the edge of the stage. Hm. Genma wasn’t a chūnin yet, apparently, but Raidō was gonna be one of our proctors, going by flak jacket.

That kid over there seems to be Aoba Yamashiro. Second goofball on the right and straight on until you hit a wall. And…that guy looks like Ibiki Morino. You know, back when he had hair.

Instead of focusing on Aoba or Ibiki, I caught a glimpse of a man with red, ringed eyes that matched Kurenai’s perfectly, though I was pretty sure I wasn’t supposed to see him. There was the shimmer of a genjutsu around him, but my chakra sense and a silent kai had dislodged it. Maybe he was gonna be a proctor?
The Dreamer commented, This is an auspicious time.

Nice of fate to get all our minor players in one place like that.

Interestingly, it was a lot less hostile than I expected. While granted, this exam was pretty insular and I could name about a fifth of the participants on my own, I was still surprised to find that no one seemed to care all that much that rookies were entering the exam this time around. Actually, some of the looks I got from the other teams were downright respectful, which is something I am absolutely sure I could not have done anything to earn in the timeframe I had been a genin.

“Ah, Keisuke-san! Obito-san, Rin-san! I see that you have decided to join our most youthful exam event!” Gai shouted, making his way across the room with the kind of speed I doubted Kakashi could match.

“Hi again, Gai-san. It’s been a while.” I said, stepping forward.

“Far too long!” Gai agreed enthusiastically, taking my offered hand and shaking it every bit as hard as he did the first time we met. I wasn’t gonna have feeling in my fingers soon enough.

“Oh, you’re Maito Gai?” Rin frowned suddenly. “You’re a terrible flight risk at the hospital! The doctors and nurses complain that you always break out to go train more.”

“The power of youth cannot be contained by four square walls!”

“Or restraints, apparently.” I muttered under my breath.

Obito frowned. “Say, Gai, how many times have you taken the exams?”

“Only once, now!” Gai said brightly. “I have no doubt that we shall triumph as only those with true determination can.”

Well, I could honestly say that a lack of determination wasn’t going to mean much. In that giving up seemed more and more attractive the longer I thought of it, and that I was all kinds of dead the second I said as much. At least Gai was distracting.

I managed to spot Ebisu coming before he poked Gai in the shoulder.

Ebisu had grown up in the previous eight years. He was taller, obviously, and his hair was all swept out to one side like a J-rocker or an anime character. His cheekbones were just starting to become the jutting monsters they would be once he was grown up (I kid, I kid), and he seemed to have already started wearing the perfectly rounded shades he was known for.

“Gai-kun, if you don’t mind…” Ebisu said calmly.

“Hello, Ebisu-san.” I said. “Do you remember me?”

He adjusted his glasses with his index and middle finger, sort of like how I used to. “Have we met?”

Kinda-sorta. Same thing with Genma.

I said, “You’re in a picture my mom took of my first birthday. Your mom got me hairbows.”

Ebisu’s eyebrows rose, along with a faint flush in his cheeks. “Sorry, I still can’t recall meeting you before.”

“Since you would’ve been like three, I can see why not.” Obito said under his breath.
“Shush, Obito.” I said.

Gai had apparently had enough of waiting for Ebisu to get back to what he’d been trying to say before I cut in. “Obito-san, I challenge you!”

Obito blinked. Then, “Bring it!”

At least Gai had to let go of my hand to issue a challenge properly. I was really going to have to stop shaking hands with the guy.

“Oi, Gai, don’t go picking on the kids before the fights start up.” Genma called out from the stage.

I glanced his way. “Teammate?”

“Unfortunately yes.” Ebisu said with a sigh. “Our team’s roster has been…shifting, lately.”

Shit. Ebisu had managed to convey more than he thought, just with one sentence. Most of the time, genin teams were made up of kids who were around the same age, in order to account for things like differing promotion rates and (lack of) experience. Exceptions tended to be due to either exceptional skill or casualties—sort of the difference between the Sand Siblings and post-Kannabi Team Minato. Ebisu and Gai were close enough—two years difference, basically—but Genma was around thirteen. Maybe twelve. Raidō was probably fifteen, though I didn’t know whose team he was on. I had no idea if their original teams had suffered normal injuries, career-ending injuries, or worse.

The oldest likely-genin in the room was a Hyūga girl with long, purplish-bluish dark hair. She looked about sixteen or so, and was one of two major-clan genin around—the other was, well, Obito. I had no idea what team she was on, but I wondered if her team had died or simply been promoted without her.

I wondered if that would happen to our team.

“I’m sorry.” I said to Ebisu, empathy making my voice much more emotive than normal.

“It’s a part of life.” Ebisu said, frowning. “But I accept your apology anyway.”

“What are you two talking about?” Obito demanded, even though Gai had him in a loose version of a full nelson.

“Gai-san, let go of Obito!” Rin’s hands were glowing—if she wanted to, she could knock Gai silly for at least twenty minutes with a feather-light touch. That chakra was designed solely to incapacitate, though it had a tendency toward friendly fire.

“Give it a rest, Gai.” Genma said sharply, but no one listened.

There was a crack of displaced air, and suddenly Sensei was standing to Gai’s left. Kakashi was there too, sort of half-hidden behind Sensei, and he looked somewhat peeved. I just wasn’t precisely sure why.

“…Well, you’ve certainly settled in just fine.” Sensei said, apropos of nothing.

“Hello, Minato-sensei!” Gai said brightly.

“Hi again, Gai-kun. Mind letting go of Obito before he faints of oxygen deprivation?”

“I will not faint.” Obito argued, but Gai let go anyway. Obito rolled one shoulder, grimacing, and Rin immediately moved to take care of his (superficial) tweaked joints.
“Because blacking out is manlier.” I muttered, shaking my head. Oh well. “Anyway, Sensei, Kakashi, are you here to see us off?”

“Obviously.” Kakashi said, mostly under his breath.

I raised an eyebrow at him, while Sensei’s hand landed on his head. Sensei smiled. “Don’t worry, Kei-kun. He’s just worried.”

I looked at him. He…didn’t exactly look worried. More annoyed at being caught out being possibly worried because it would damage his street cred.

Is that a blush?

The parallels between Kakashi and Sasuke were looking stronger than ever, then.

“Really.” Sensei assured me.

“…Thanks, then. Anyway, are we gonna do this?” I asked.

“Yep.” Sensei replied.

“FORM UP, KONOHA GENIN!” someone shouted. Everyone in the room—particularly the older genin and some chūnin, who seemed a little keyed up—jumped. Sensei reached over and turned both Obito and Rin toward the stage manually, while I was already looking in that direction anyway. All around us, heads whipped around to where the red-eyed man was standing, center-stage.

He seemed to have kicked both Raidō and Genma off the stage pretty much just because.

“Welcome to the Chūnin Exams,” he said, much quieter now that we were all paying attention. “Some of you may have been here before, whether six months ago or longer. Some of you are new. I am Shinku Yūhi, and I will be the examiner for the Second Exam of this multi-phase single-elimination event.” His red eyes swept the room, searching for weakness. “But first, you must make it past my partner. And most of you will not.”

There was a steady buzzing sound, just hovering on the edge of hearing, and I turned my head toward what felt like a hundred thousand tiny chakra signatures grouped around a much larger one—sort of like ants around an anthill, or a termite mound.

And then, out of what seemed like nowhere, there was suddenly an additional special jōnin in the room.

He was taller than Sensei, wearing a high-collared coat that masked the lower half of his face. He had a pair of dark sunglasses over his eyes, and I thought I saw…yep. Those were holes. For the kikai insects.

Shinku Yūhi smirked. “Meet Shibi Aburame, the proctor of the First Exam.”

…You know what? Bring it on.
The thing about the Chūnin Exam is this—it is, ultimately, a test of squad leader aptitude. Chūnin-level shinobi can be trusted to lead groups of genin on C- and the occasional B-ranked mission with minimal loss of life and limb, make tactical decisions on a unit or squadron level, and have an understanding of what to do and how when worst comes to worst on a battlefield. Again, on a limited command level.

In my old world’s military parlance, genin were roughly analogous to privates—there were and pretty much always are tons of them, and they weren’t specialized yet. Chūnin were sergeants or perhaps lieutenants in major combat operations, usually managing squads of genin or less-experienced chūnin. Specialist or special jōnin were one step up, serving full jōnin in their specialized areas—often, they had roles not tied to the battlefield. Ibiki would grow up to be like that—master interrogator, but somewhat lackluster in open combat. Full jonin could occupy any upper-level command role depending on their experience and aptitude, from captain to major to colonel to general.

And I, a genin of five months, had been made impromptu squad leader—as though all of our superior officers had been killed by a mortar in the right place.

“Well, this is gonna be fun.” I said, my tone dripping with sarcasm. Obito grinned.

“Please report to the front desk for your seat assignment.” Shinku said. “After you get your number, get to your seat immediately. There will be points deducted for tardiness.”

In other words, Obito was screwed.

Everyone else seemed to be getting in line, though.

“Later, Gai. See you in the finals!” Obito said, lightly punching the much stronger genin’s shoulder.

“I hope to see you later in this exam as well, Obito-san! And you, Rin-san, and Keisuke-san!” And then he was gone.

I could only assume that anyone who pissed Kakashi off was Obito’s new best friend or something.

“At this point,” Sensei told us quietly, “Kakashi and I will have to leave you three here. If you pass the Second Exam, we’ll be waiting for you at the end. If you don’t…” Here, he winked, “Yamaguchi-sensei will see you in the hospital.”

Obito made a face. “Sensei, don’t you have any faith in us?”

Rin said, “I do.” It made Obito blush.

I sure as hell didn’t. But I kept my mouth shut.
“Kei-kun?” Sensei asked.

I could feel my teammates’ eyes drilling into me.

“What the hell.” I said. “Let’s get started.”

Rin and Obito gave a whoop and headed toward the line.

Then Sensei disappeared. Kakashi was still there, though.

Kakashi made a chuffing noise that might have been a scoff or a laugh, and said, “Don’t make me have to come in there and rescue you from all the bugs in the second stage.”

“Why, Kakashi, you almost sound like you care.” I said flatly. I spread my arms out wide. Funnily enough, I still had more reach than he did. “Hug for good luck?”

Kakashi made a face. “Not on your life.”

I stuck my tongue out at him.

And then he was gone. Stupid chūnin tricks.

Okay then.

“Name?” Raidō said, once I got to the front. He didn’t bother looking up.

“Gekkō, Keisuke.”

“All right. Seat sixteen in room 115. Get going.”

I didn’t actually leave until I was sure my teammates had gotten out of the crowd okay. Call me crazy, but I really didn’t want to see anything happen to them before stuff got serious.

“You don’t need to hover, Kei-senpai.” Rin said.

“The hell I don’t.” I said.

“Let’s just get going before we get demerits for being late or something.” Obito said, and ushered us kunoichi along.

“So, what seats did you get?” Rin asked us, once we were out of earshot of the assistant chūnin mob.

I replied, “Sixteen. You?”

“Forty-seven.” Obito said.

“Four.” Rin concluded. “We’ve been split up.”

Thank the gods that Obito had only been cursed with a short attention span. I don’t think I could have taken it if he’d also had a terrible sense of direction.

(Speaking of which, my sense of direction had actually gotten better since I had been reincarnated. Mostly because, now, I oriented myself by finding the strongest friendly chakra signature and heading that way, depending on the circumstances. It was like being a human-shaped homing pigeon.)

Anyway, we made our way to the room. It was on the first floor of the building, as the number implied, and…going by the way the rooms were numbered, it wasn’t going to have any windows. It kind of reminded me of my old university building, where about half the rooms were built into the side of a hill. Only…there weren’t any hills in Konoha proper.

And, just to make things better, I could feel my chakra reserves depleting at a steady, if slow, rate.

The trick, which I always knew had to be there, started with the seat placements. Going by the general Konoha philosophy of “Teamwork Conquers All”—which was the sort of thing that, while safe and reasonable in my old life, was repeatedly shown to be bullshit by the \textit{Naruto} series proper—it made sense for most teams to stick together. Group work, group planning, group action, and occasional group punishment or annihilation. Go, team.

That did not seem to be the sentiment they were promoting today, exactly.

Add in the chakra drain, probably courtesy of a female kikai insect that had crept onto me at some point in the previous few minutes, and it looked like a stress-test was in order.

If the pattern held true from what I’d seen, this would be a test of resolve.

At least, I hoped so.

I hate pop quizzes. Forever and ever.

Anyway. We got to the room, we went to our assigned seats, and sat down. I think the room had enough space for about a hundred and twenty entrants, which left our crowd with plenty of room between each participant.

If this was anything like the Chūnin Exam that would take place fifteen years in the future, we’d have to have some kind of plan for possibly cheating our way out of the majority of the pressure. Teams that had successfully answered nine of Ibiki’s “ten” questions then could have been reasonably certain that they could face any hypothetical tenth scenario, even if most of them had to cheat to do it. I was, for my part, reasonably sure that Rin and I could answer most of the questions just because we’d been extremely good students before. That was probably our saving grace—neither of us had any extra skills that made cheating a viable option, and Obito hadn’t gained access to his Sharingan yet. As far as a covert team—at least in terms of gathering information in a rigorously scrutinized area with no real preparation time—went, we were sorely outclassed.

I’m pretty sure I could have snuck past chūnin with judicious use of Transformation, Clone, and Camouflage Jutsu, though.

Shibi Aburame stood at the front of the room, even though I was pretty sure none of us had actually seen him enter at all and he \textit{definitely} hadn’t been there when we started.

“Welcome to the First Exam,” Shibi said, in his barely-audible way. Everyone had to shut up—even if it was by force—just to hear what he was saying.

“Why can’t he speak up?” someone next to me muttered, and I turned my head to spot Genma Shiranui taking up space to my left, flicking a senbon from one side of his mouth to the other every few seconds.

I sighed internally and let my head drop onto the desk. I didn’t get anything \textit{like} enough sleep the previous night.

I’m absolutely sure Shibi said something about cheating. Though I can’t recall what. All I really remember about those first few minutes involves how sleepy I was, and how the walls didn’t quite seem to be lining up with how I understood dimensions.

Release!

It was getting really, really annoying to find out how many genjutsu could sneak right past my defenses.

Though… Oh hell. The walls weren’t moving because I’d been poisoned with a hallucinogen, or because of a genjutsu—those were camouflaged kikai insects.

I don’t have much against bugs, personally. Like, I’ve never been stung by a bee or had much worse than mosquito bites. But that’s small peanuts compared to waking up one day and realizing that the entire room is covered from floor to ceiling in bugs.

Around me, everyone else seemed to be realizing the problem in a sort of ninja version of the Wave. Basically, one genin would freak out, followed by the closest neighbors, and so on. Mostly, the kunoichi seemed to be having the most dramatic reactions, sans Rin and the Hyūga girl (while Obito made up for them both with his enthusiastic flailing), but no one was taking it stoically.

Except the proctor, who commanded said bugs.

Shibi waited for us to quiet down before saying, “…Finally, if you cannot perform in an environment within which your opponent holds all the cards, you might as well roll over and die.”

Cheerful thought.

“You may begin your test.”

Speaking of which, the tests arrived on the backs of several large kikai-variant insects. Most kikai weren’t longer than the length of a fingernail, but these…I guess they might have been soldiers or something. Anyway, no one was dumb enough to squash them once the sheets were delivered. Not only was that bad manners (since there was an Aburame in the room), it was also pretty liable to get someone drained of all their chakra (since there was an Aburame in the room). Maybe a foreign team might have flipped out, but Konoha genin knew better, apparently.

After all that, I still wasn’t exactly sure there was a sleep genjutsu in the room at all. Maybe I just needed to invest in a white noise generator or something.

Too bad I couldn’t handle coffee as a kid.

I scanned the questions, thanking the kikai insects that were handing out pencils under my breath. No need to antagonize the chakra-eating monsters while I didn’t have all that much to start with.

Describe the strategies used by the Second Hokage during the first three months of the First Shinobi World War.

That was easy. The term I’d have used in my old life was a “Fabian strategy,” which basically amounted to tracking down and eliminating the scouts and/or foraging parties of a larger enemy force, never directly engaging the opposition while nonetheless wearing them down. A war of attrition, in a larger conflict that had put Konoha up against the superior militaries of Kumogakure and Iwagakure (though not their full might) as well as that of Sunagakure—at the time, we couldn’t afford anything else.

And yet we were still alive. Go us.
Name the four chokepoints used by…

Basically, there was a lot of history.

If a kunai is thrown from point \([x]\) to point \([y]\) while the target is moving at a rate of \([z]\) \(k/h\)…

And the kind of math that made me wish I had a calculator.

Name the second principle of medical ninja regulations as handed down by Tsunade of the Sannin…

And some stuff I was pretty sure a genin wouldn’t know solely because genin didn’t specialize to the same degree that chūnin did.

Obito isn’t going to know any of this.

But Rin would.

I’d have killed for access to, say, the Shadow Possession Jutsu. That way I’d be able to help Obito and Rin out as needed.

But nope.

I wrote down all of my answers, at least. Yay, progress.

For the rest of the time, though, I decided to take a nap rather than get caught blatantly trying to help Obito or Rin cheat. Anyway, Rin would have to turn around, which was also hilariously blatant and therefore completely not going to happen.

It’d have been easier if I could somehow… I don’t know, translate chakra and ping my answers off Obito’s head or something. This would only have worked if several breakthroughs in the name of chakra communication and Obito’s brain happened in the next couple of minutes.

Or if I’d reinvented Morse code ahead of time.

Or if Obito was a Yamanaka, I guess.

About five minutes until the end, everyone was starting to sweat bullets if they hadn’t already. Next to me, Genma had tried to cheat off me twice (to no avail, because I was drowsing literally on top of my test sheet, which was face-down, besides), while I could sense a variety of chakra techniques being used to gather information. While we didn’t have the Suna genin in this exam, and the only Aburame was the proctor and not the examinee, we still had our share of inventive cheating techniques.

The Byakugan was in use, of course, as was something involving the mirrors on the ceiling. I think someone might have been casting a genjutsu on their teammate to get a message across that way, too.

Actually…

How about Demonic Illusion: Hell Viewing Technique?

The Dreamer knew the hand seals for it (snake, rat), and I was pretty sure I could control the images my teammates saw…

Pretty sure. Not exactly. I wish I’d remembered to get someone to “teach” me the technique, because frankly the seals and the name of the damn thing weren’t enough to go on. I’d only seen it used once, before my reincarnation, and that had been to expose one of Sakura’s then-worst nightmares (as seen
It ended up being something of a moot point, because that was about the time I felt an actual genjutsu settle over the entire room.

This time, I was ready for it. So was the Dreamer.

Release.

And then I cast outward with my chakra sense, searching for the likeliest source as well as checking the status of my teammates.

It didn’t quite feel like something Shibi would be willing to do, but I couldn’t dismiss the possibility that Shinku had once again stepped in on his fellow proctor’s behalf. Rin had dispelled the genjutsu near-instantly, going by the way her chakra was moving smoothly and without agitation compared to, say, Genma’s.

I guess genjutsu wasn’t his specialty. Either that or the pressure really was getting to him.

On the other hand, though, Obito’s chakra was moving oddly and I was pretty sure he was stuck in the illusion.

While area-affecting genjutsu were rare, as well as expensive to maintain, I think that the variant we were being hit with was self-sustaining once it had a hook in the victim’s chakra coils. Obito, having somewhat terrible control and lower awareness of his chakra’s feel, might have been more vulnerable than Rin or I.

There are, technically, two ways to dispel a genjutsu. One: Disrupt your own chakra. Usually, that’s where the whole chakra flaring dispel technique comes from, though suppressing it works just as well. Two: Disrupt your opponent’s chakra, usually by inflicting pain.

There was a third way, though. Sort of. It’s really more of a variation of the first, and has a range limited by chakra supply. I was already operating under the strain of a constant kikai drain, as well as the understanding that chakra flaring was hard. Basically, if the normal two methods were analogous to either pulling a fishing hook out or snapping the line, this one involved reaching out and pulling the hooks out of someone else.

And chakra, outside of the body without a specific shape, was a bitch to maintain.

But I wasn’t going to let Obito get beaten down by something like that.

Here, let me help.

The Dreamer’s chakra was all yin-aligned—spiritual stuff, genjutsu stuff, and maybe something involving clams.

Anyway, we reached out with our shared pool of yin-aligned chakra, which was a lot deeper than I’d expected after only nine and a half months, and basically slapped the genjutsu out of Obito’s chakra coils.

I am absolutely sure that the Hyūga girl knew exactly what I was doing.

Funnily enough, Obito didn’t. While his chakra was back to normal, he did spend a good few seconds being rather nervous about something.
Oh well. I’d let him know later.

Three minutes left.

I drew a rather crappy sketch of a pug stuck on a tire swing on the back of my test. Not because I was bored, exactly, but…okay, yeah, I was bored and impatient and it’d been ages since I had a chance to draw something silly.

The pug looked kind of like Pakkun. Only fat.

Anyway, the test ended. I think maybe half of the participants had therefore spent five minutes under genjutsu, without anyone to dismiss it for them or the training to recognize the problem. Then whoever had cast it—probably Shinku—finally let up.

There was a lot of blinking and general “oh my god did I really leave the last three questions blank” going on.

“The testing period has concluded. Please place your pencils on the desks—my partners will retrieve them as well as your tests.” Shibi said when the genin finally managed to focus on him. “And now, you will face your true test.”

There was a bit of a hubbub at that. Test? What test? Weren’t we already in one?

(Also, about twelve people had been disqualified for excessively obvious cheating while I wasn’t paying attention. I’d guess that at least three of them were chūnin plants, though, because their chakra coils felt different than most of the others’.)

I levered myself up so the kikai insects could take my test and pencil away, and then propped my head up on the heels of my hands. This could go any of a dozen ways…

“Perhaps some of you have already noticed.” Shibi went on, quietly. “Are you quite certain that the teammates you came into this room with are the same ones here now?”

Oooh, sneaky. Anyone without some genjutsu experience would be reeling from the lost time, while everyone who wasn’t could be under suspicion of being a spy. After all, Shibi still hadn’t given us permission to talk without losing more points.

Having been perfectly cognizant the whole time, I could state that, in fact, no one had actually moved around the room at all. No genin, and no chūnin. And yet, aside from the Byakugan, there was no way to be sure about that without being a sensor.

And sometimes even then. After all, the Zetsu clones had made a mockery of security during the Fourth Shinobi World War.

“Those teams that attempt to move on from here may attempt to correctly answer the tenth question.” Shibi said. “But if you pass, and your trust is misplaced, you risk bringing a spy along to the next Exam.” I wondered if he was smirking behind his collar. “Leave now, and you will have a chance to take the exam again next year—it would be rather difficult to do so after your traitor has dropped you directly into an enemy ambush in hostile territory.”

Ergo, half the training fields in Konoha. I swear we weren’t consciously trying to kill off our genin, though sometimes it seemed like criminal neglect. Shit happens.

Shibi gave us a few minutes to process that.
Someone—a chūnin plant to breach the dam—said “I’m out.” And he was escorted to the door by a swarm of kikai, along with his team. The insects actually seemed to be there to guard them from any attacks from the rear. After that, teams started dropping like—well, pardon the pun—flies. By the end, there were only sixteen teams left in the room.

Meanwhile, I was wrestling over which option was the right one. What was the lesson here? Trust in your comrades, or take time off to beat a potential spy for information? The latter, while significantly less child-friendly, was probably more practical.

Again, it came down to ideals.

I looked at Rin, who gave me a faint smile despite her nervousness.

I turned around in my seat and looked at Obito, who looked a little green around the gills.

I tried to smile for his sake, though my stomach was doing crazy flips.

While, technically, we can afford to screw up here, I’d really prefer if we didn’t.

That makes two of us.

Fuck it. I’d see this through. The worst they could do was make us take a year off from this examination bullshit, which was something we kind of desperately needed anyway. I turned back to the proctor.

Shibi turned his head slightly from side to side, examining us. “…So much naïveté.”

Not a good sign.

I gulped.

“…No one else will take the practical route?” Shibi asked.

No one said anything.

“I see.” Shibi sighed. “In that case, you are now qualified to take the Second Exam.”

“What?!” Obito shouted. “But what about the tenth question, or the spy?”

Shibi gave Obito such a long, considering look that he started to squirm in his seat. Then the Aburame adjusted his shades and said, “There was never a tenth question. Or a spy. The goal was to see who of our current class of aspiring chūnin would be willing to trust in their teammates for the foreseeable future. Without trust and teamwork, there is no team. There are simply overworked and underpaid shinobi with no loyalty, and will collapse under pressure.

“We cannot afford to be so divided.” Shibi said bluntly. “In war, we will either band together or die alone—we are not the most militarily powerful village, and it is only our trust in our comrades and the strength of our bonds that will keep our village strong.

“Remember that.”

Someone had taken Sakumo Hatake’s lesson to heart.

“And the genjutsu?” I spoke up, frowning. Not that I’d even seen anything in it…

“A cheap trick designed to play on your fears.” Shibi explained. “Suspicion and paranoia may characterize some shinobi for their whole careers, but you cannot afford to allow yourself to be ruled by fear.” His insects buzzed against the walls. “That way lies madness.”

…I hate this time period.

“But—!” someone began, but Shibi shook his head.

“Spies are a fact of life.” Shibi told us. “But look to your friends and comrades here. Know their faces. Their habits. Their pasts. Trust in your team, and they will bring you home.”

…I still hate this time period. Just a little less so.

“Dismissed. You will be meeting Yūhi-san in the auditorium for your Second Exam.”

Needless to say, we kind of stampeded out of there.

“How did you know it wasn’t real?” Obito asked once we were out of earshot of pretty much everyone.

“Um, I’m sensitive to genjutsu.” I said. “Also, I thought the walls were literally closing in, which… was kinda funny. Not funny ‘ha-ha’ but more funny ‘oh shit.’”

“Same here, sort of.” Rin said. “Only I was focusing on the leaves…”

There had been leaves? And here I got the pot hallucinations, which had turned out to be totally real.

Obito flushed. “Oh, I…didn’t really see any of that. I mean. It just kinda ended. Out of nowhere.”

“Yeah, that was me.” I told him. He blinked. I explained, “I’ve never done a ranged dispel before, but I think I got it right. Right?”

“Oh, uh. Yeah.” Obito mumbled.

“What’d they make you see?” I asked.

Obito was quiet for a strangely long and incredibly awkward moment.

“Obito?” Rin tried.

And then, nearly so quiet as to be a perfect mimicry of Shibi Aburame, “I saw you die.”

…What, exactly, was I supposed to say to that?

“It wasn’t real, though.” Rin said. “And we’re fine!”

“Yeah, but I thought it wasn’t real because I saw that Kei was fine earlier and then the proctor was talking about a spy and…uh. Yeah. Not my best moment.” Obito said.

“Wait, just me?” I asked, frowning. “Because I thought for sure that it’d be both of us.”

Either that meant that Obito thought I was a more likely candidate for a kill-and-replace scenario than Rin, or I needed to invest in anti-paranoia meds.

“No.” Obito said.

“Maybe it’s because you two have been teammates longer?” Rin suggested, though she didn’t sound sure of herself.
“…I dunno.” I said. “But we’re wasting daylight.”

Unspoken…well, let’s just say I was glad it was a vision of me dying and not Rin. No telling what would happen there.

Or rather, I would really prefer if the possible consequences for that stayed the hell off my radar forever.
Chunin Exam Arc: Phase Two Begin

Chapter Summary

Kei: Take on the Second Exam.

We ended up heading back to the same room we’d started out in, since I guess there was really only so much you could do to shuffle forty-eight genin around. And yeah, there really were a full forty-eight of us, from the ages of nine—my team, as well as Team Asuma (since I had no idea who their sensei was)—to fifteen or sixteen. No sensei groups running around, though—Raidō was there, with a bunch of other chūnin assistants. I kind of wondered if there was some…faculty room solely for the jōnin who were waiting for their students to get their asses in gear.

Hm. I suppose if I ever got that far, I’d find out.

Anyway, Shinku Yūhi was on the stage again, saying, “The Second Exam will take place in one hour at Training Ground Forty-Four. All paperwork and registration will be completed on-site at the time of entry.” He glared out at all of us. Tardiness will not be tolerated. There will be no late entrants.”

…I was starting to get the feeling that Kakashi only got away with half the shit he did either because Shinku Yūhi was dead in the future, or because he was just that good. Sort of like Gai, but not.

Anyway, as the crowd thinned out, we of Team Minato filed out as well.

“That…could have gone worse, but it could have gone better, too.” I said.

“It’s not like we had any ridiculous cheating skills.” Obito pointed out.

“Yeah, I know, but it’d’ve been nice to be able to get more of a read on the other teams before we got shoved into the Forest of Death.” I replied.

“…The Forest of Death?” Rin asked.

“It’s a nickname.” I said as we walked. Obito was to my right, with Rin on his. We were kinda flanking the only guy on our team for some reason I really couldn’t name. “It’s a training field that’s about twenty kilometers across, with a river running through and a tower in the middle. Mom said it’s where they usually hold the Chūnin Exams. Or, well, the survival test part of it.”

Okay, so Mom never said that, but I was a busybody and could see (a version of) the future. I had connections that I had totally made up myself.

Or made up of ourselves, perhaps.

“How bad can it be?” Obito sounded like he’d like to scoff, but wasn’t quite managing it. The genjutsu must have shaken him up pretty badly.

“Three words: Three-meter centipedes.”

We all shuddered.
“Who—why do people even have things like that? Because you can’t tell me that having a huge forest full of super-bugs is a good idea.” Obito complained. “We could just, say, burn the whole thing down and start over without the huge bugs and whatever else’s in there.”

That’d be like the Spartans handing one of their recruits a free meal, with no killing or cheating or stealing required. Too easy.

I hated the whole ninja way of life sometimes.

“I think Training Ground Zero is like that.” I said, thinking of what amounted to killer wildlife—the kind that was totally trained to be killer wildlife. Boxing kangaroos and stuff. The only reason they were all still alive was because someone at some point had said, “BUT WHAT ABOUT THE POOR ANIMALS.”

(Personally, I thought that any animal that could beat a chūnin down probably needed a hitai-ate and a place in the chain of command, but that was just my opinion.)

So, no one technically trained there. It was a wildlife preserve.

Rin blinked. “We have a Training Ground Zero?”

I nodded. “It’s only called that because no one uses it. Ever.”

“Bah. If you want to train and there aren’t any public fields open, just come over to the Uchiha district.” Obito said, interlacing his fingers behind his head. “No one’s ever in the one near my house.”

“Aw, I might just take you up on that someday. Just to see your stupid cousins’ faces.” I poked Obito in the side, making him flail around. Like a lot of kids, Obito was ticklish. Horribly so. It was also completely hilarious.

“Kei, don’t do that!” Obito whined, having slapped my hands away.

I stuck my tongue out at him. “When am I gonna get a chance to tease you in the exam zone? Never! So I’m preparing.”

Obito made a face.

“Kei-senpai, stop picking on Obito.” Rin said. “You’re supposed to be the team leader now, and you have a responsibility to be professional.”

I thought about that. I really did.

“Nope.” I said, and slung one of my arms around Obito’s shoulders. God, the kid needed to damn well start growing or I was gonna be the biggest kid on Team Minato and be able to pull off being a boy forever and that would be tragic. “Professional stuff is for Kakashi, and he isn’t here. So clearly, I need to forge my own leaderly path.”

‘Leaderly’ isn’t a word.” Obito said bluntly, though he didn’t push me away.

“It’s a word if people say it enough.” I replied. “And anyway, do you feel picked-on, Obito?”

“I feel like an armrest.”

“So, you feel like me? Because I am Sensei’s favorite armrest.”
“Maybe Minato-san shouldn’t use you two as armrests.” Rin said.

“I dunno, I’d do it if I was taller.” I said.

“Me too.”

“…What happened to ‘treat others as you’d want to be treated?’” Rin demanded. Oh, we were terrible. Together and separately.

Obito shrugged with some difficulty, since I was still hanging off him. “I dunno, if I had a bunch of tiny bratty students I don’t think I’d be all that interested in pretending they were my height if they weren’t.”

I added. “Which is not, technically, about height and more about the fact that they’d be brats.”

“Pretty much.” Obito concluded.

Rin gave us both a funny look. “Okay, I know I wasn’t there for a lot of your training, but you really are acting in sync a lot now.”

Yay! That meant we could probably fight someone on a higher level than us for a while and not die. Most likely, anyway, since we hadn’t tested our coordination in a real fight yet.

You know that episode of Neon Genesis Evangelion where Shinji and Asuka have to play a DDR clone for hours? Just to get their attacks to sync up so they can destroy that weird twinning angel? Yeah, our lives had been a lot like that whenever Sensei got us to specifically practice pair fighting.

Well, we’d see how that would work out.

Anyway, it took us less than fifteen minutes to get to the “main” entrance of the Forest of Death. A bunch of genin teams had gotten there before us and were spread out all over the place, filling out wrongful death waivers and things like that. I managed to grab three separate sheets for us, which we filled out less because we actually thought we were going to be dying and more because they wouldn’t let us into the damn place without them.

(Well, I’m sure Orochimaru would have, but he wasn’t a proctor and the point was therefore moot.)

“Welcome to Training Ground Forty-Four. I will be the head proctor of your examination today, and as such, I will explain the rules.” Shinku had, once again, somehow found a podium thing. At least, he was standing on top of something, even if the crowd was a bit too thick to see exactly what. I like to think it was a soap box.

“This is another dual-purpose exam, as I’m sure you’ve come to expect by now. Behind me is the entrance to Training Ground Forty-Four, colloquially known as the Forest of Death. Once inside, you will be fighting for your lives against the hostile environment. In addition, you will be attempting to secure one of these.” Here, he held up a scroll that was marked with the kanji for Heaven and painted with two colored bands—deep, dark red. “There are two scrolls of each color, with eight colors total. One Heaven, and one for Earth. In order to advance to the next round, you must find the scroll of the opposite denomination in the same color as yours, and open them at the same time as the other team. The team with the opposite scroll will be your deadly enemies for the duration of the five-day span of the exam.”

Okay. A matching game as played by ninjas. God, we were terrible and my brain was incredibly so.

“Once opened, the scroll will summon a special jōnin proctor for your match—and without being witnessed defeating the opposite team, you will not advance.” He flipped the scroll over. “All team members must be healthy enough to complete the mission by the time any team makes their final run at the tower. Teams with incapacitated or dead members will not be allowed to advance.” He went on sternly, “Opening the scrolls before encountering the opposite-denomination team will result in immediate disqualification. Leaving the examination area during the five-day period will result in disqualification. Arriving at the tower without the two colored scrolls and one victory scroll, from the proctor summoned to your match, will result in disqualification. Attacking a proctor will disqualify the entire team.”

The scroll vanished into thin air. “And, finally, teams that fail to either arrive at the central tower or complete their mission objectives at the end of five days will be disqualified, with a complimentary corpse hunt taking place during the day after the exams.” He shrugged. “Though by that point, I fully expect that there won’t be anything left to find other than bones. If that.”

“So,” I said to Rin as Kurenai’s dad (or, at least I thought he was Kurenai’s dad) went on to talk about the entry gates, “what do you think about taking care of the combat part as soon as possible?”

“I say we need a plan.” Rin said firmly.

The chūnin were directing people over to booths so we could be assigned a scroll color and kanji. I kind of wanted to hold back, since I had no idea what we were going to do in order to beat the crap out of another team if they turned out to be way more powerful than we were. Other than, you know, fight as hard as we could. The whole sanctioned match thing really threw a wrench in the idea of having traps and things set up in advance, which seemed counterintuitive to the whole ninja thing.

I frowned, thinking over how much stuff Sensei had packed into those sealing scrolls for me. “… Maybe we need to take inventory first.”

“Hey, Kei, Rin-chan.” Obito broke in, watching the other teams. “I think the Hyūga girl is…yeah, she’s looking at everyone with her Byakugan.”

Oh. I hadn’t thought of that, but it would make a lot of sense to have a Byakugan user figure out who had the relevant scroll so her team could target the one that was actually relevant to their goals.

Don’t just coo over how awesome it is. Can we do anything similar?

That, I didn’t know.

“Obito, how good is your eyesight?” I asked.

“Um, probably better than average.” Obito hedged.

“Well, then you try to figure out who’s carrying the other scroll, once we get a color.” I said. “I’m pretty sure my vision’s terrible.”

A lie. My vision before had been an unmitigated crippling weakness, complete with an effective range of…two and a half inches. At best. Barring glasses, contact lenses, or a surgical rearrangement of my eyeballs, anyway. It wasn’t bad in my new life, since I obviously didn’t need corrective lenses, but I was still pretty sure Obito’s was better.

“So, we’re planning on going after them right away?” Rin asked in an undertone as Obito scanned the crowd.

At the thought of spending more than a few days in the Forest of Death, I winced almost imperceptibly. “Our weakness is endurance, compared to the rest of the genin. And field experience.
We can’t afford to be stuck out there fighting animals for days on end.”

Rin pressed her lips together in a tight frown.

I just hoped that we ended up fighting someone who wouldn’t kill us all if they won.

Anyway, we ended up with a green-bound Heaven scroll. I still wasn’t sure who had the Earth counterpart, but at least we were kind of prepared for the idea of having to duel for dinner later. Granted, sixteen genin teams in, what, three hundred and fourteen square kilometers wasn’t exactly a crowded situation, but the forest was a minefield whatever way you looked at it.

“A chūnin will escort you to your starting gates. When the siren sounds, you may enter and begin your test.” Shinku told us all. “Good luck, and good hunting.”

He poofed away, leaving us genin to be escorted around the perimeter of the forest. It was a pretty tense walk, all told, and took about twenty minutes of shinobi-style running to get away from all the other teams heading around the same way. Then we were there. It all seemed to be moving too quickly.

My hands were shaking, so I clenched them into fists and stuck them in my pockets.

At least our first opponents probably won’t be human.

Not helping, I thought.

“I think,” Obito began as the chūnin left us at our gate, “we might be looking out for either Gai or Asuma’s teams. It was a little hard to make out, though.”

“It’s a good start.” I told him seriously. “Good job, Obito.”

Obito flushed a little, and Rin said, “Have you ever met them before, Kei-senpai?”

“Probably? I don’t really remember. Asuma’s one of the Hokage’s sons, though, and I know he has Kurenai Yūhi on his team. I think we might have been in the same kunoichi class.” Come to think of it, I really hadn’t bothered to associate with or befriend many people in school other than Rin and Obito. I sure hoped Hayate was being more sociable than I had been.

“There’s those two, yes, but there’s also Ibiki Morino.” Rin frowned. “I don’t really remember much about him specifically, but he’s not a pushover.”

“You mean he’s creepy,” Obito corrected.

“No, he’s pretty strong, too.”

“I guess we’re not the youngest team in the Exam, at least.” I muttered. I was pretty sure that Ibiki hadn’t actually been on the same team as Asuma and Kurenai in my visions, but…well, we were all about the same age and apparently none of us had been killed. Maybe there was more team shuffling going on than I thought.

Putting loads of kids under the age of ten on the same genin teams for a Chūnin Exam seemed kind of stupid to me, though.

Hypocritical, I know, but I also happened to think that Sensei was making a major mistake even giving us the option of taking the exams.

The siren sounded, cutting off any further team speculation.
And we were off.

I want to just reiterate this before the games begin: I hate camping. I can appreciate nature just fine without having to risk getting eaten by tigers by sleeping in what amounts to a blasted Hot Pocket wrapper. If I want to sleep outdoors, I damn well sleep in a tree to avoid ground-bound predators and traps and people’s feet. Also, there’s more comfy moss and fewer rocks the farther up you go in a decent Hashirama tree, which is nice.

We didn’t end up meeting any teams the first day.

To be perfectly honest, the forest was enough of a problem.

I mean, I sure sensed all sorts of chaos and as people got used to the whole issue of Oh god this place is actually actively trying to kill us. Some of the trees were scarred from old battles, with kunai and shuriken rusted right into the bark and huge chunks of wood just plain missing from a few of them. We ran past a skeleton entangled in tree roots, then doubled back to see if we could salvage any of his equipment—the answer was no, by the way. We fished a little, until some explosions got a little too close for comfort and we had to leg it back into the trees. I think I woke up that night with screams ringing in my ears, sounding like someone must have basically tripped over a nest of those evil Konoha winged tree leeches (which are totally a thing, if you’re stupid about campsites).

We slept in the high canopy, in shifts, and with enough ninja wire around our sleeping places to cut a man to chunky salsa if he ran into it fast enough.

It did mean that we fought with birds for space, but that was better than fighting for our lives.

On the second day, we spotted the Hyūga girl with her team far below, during the first couple of hours of daylight. They traveled in roughly the forest’s understory, some thirty meters below us, and Obito shook his head when I looked to him to see if we should engage them. Given that their team blew right past us even though I was sure they’d seen us, I guess we didn’t have the scroll they were out for. Even if Obito had it in his jacket, not a lot got past the Byakugan.

That was also the day we ran into Gai’s team.

That thing about chunky salsa and ninja wire I mentioned before? Well, Gai almost reduced himself to ground hamburger.

He probably would have actually done it if Rin hadn’t put one of his legs into a stasis mode—basically, it fell asleep on him and he fell and his face smacked into the wood about a foot short of what I mentally referred to as the “wood-chipper threshold.” They got more finely rated the closer you got toward the actual sleeping boughs we were using.

“Hi, Gai-san.” I said, watching Ebisu and Genma arrive a little after he did. No dynamic entries this time.

“Hello again, Keisuke-san! Hello to you as well, Rin-san, Obito-san.” Gai said cheerfully, heedless of the fact that he’d almost been killed by accident.

“Hold still, Gai-san.” Rin ordered, hands glowing green. While she reversed the damage, I turned to the rest of his team. Obito was above all of us, sitting on his heels on the underside of a tree branch, and I frowned briefly.

We were all in the right places to cause damage, even if we weren’t actually ready for a fight to start. Close enough, right?
Genma reached into his jacket and pulled out his team’s scroll. It’d be a challenge to beat him…

“Our scroll’s green, Shiranui-san.” I said bluntly.

Genma glanced upward when neither Rin nor I produced it.

Obito scowled and unzipped the inner pocket of his jacket, dropping it into my waiting hand.

Green, to Team Genma’s blue. Then I tucked the scroll away. Red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet, black. Off by less than a quarter-turn of the color wheel. Just a few shades and we’d be at each other’s throats inside of a minute.

“Guess we all got off lucky there.” Genma said mildly. “Thanks for fixing Gai up, kunoichi-san.”

This last was directed at Rin. “Kid charges ahead too much.”

“What technique are you using, Nohara-san?” Ebisu asked curiously.

Hey, at least the tension was mostly gone since we didn’t actually have to be enemies. In the immediate sense.

“Any luck?” I asked Genma, since apparently everyone else was fawning over Rin’s cool jutsu.

“Not at all.” Genma said, shrugging. “I did see a team get picked off, but by giant tigers. Not something everyone expects to run into out here. You?”

I had to admit that I wouldn’t have really expected tigers either, mostly since I though the apex predators were bugs, but I just shrugged. “We haven’t been looking as hard as we could be.”

“Might want to consider it.” Genma said. “Thing is, you can’t pass without the other team at least living long enough to get their beating on record. Scavenging’s not gonna cut it.”

No kidding. The teams that failed were failing their enemies, too.

Fwip-fwip went the senbon in his mouth. “So…you might wanna track down the other team. Keep them alive long enough to get in a real fight. You’re not gonna get anything done if all you do is hide up here in this nest of razor wire.”

I had the strangest feeling that we’d probably have to do exactly that. “Thanks for the advice.”

Genma shrugged. “No problem. It’s not like we get points for beating you guys now.”

Ha. Ha.

“Anyway. Gai, Ebisu, we’re leaving. Gotta go find that other team sometime.” Genma ordered. As the oldest genin, I guess that was really all he was there for.

“Of course, Genma-san! I have already recovered from my most unyouthful mistake, and will be ready for anything!”

Ebisu said something to Rin that I didn’t catch, but since Obito just was frowning I guessed it couldn’t have been too bad. Really nasty stuff would have led to an instant fistfight. Then he straightened his shades and said, “Yes, captain.”

Genma sighed. “Whatever, just get a move on.”

I waved to them as they left. It felt kind of awkward, like someone had left me hanging without returning my high-five. Weird.

“So. What do you say to leaving the whole turtle strategy behind?” I asked.

“I was getting bored anyway, Kei.” Obito said firmly.

“I wish Gai-san hadn’t run off before I was sure I’d actually woken up all of those nerve endings.” Rin mumbled, distracted.

…Yeah, I was just gonna leave that bit be. Hopefully their team made it out okay.

The next team we ran into was having trouble on day three. Technically, we probably hadn’t needed to take such a long time to find them, but as group sensor and leader I had an obligation to make sure we didn’t actually get into any fights we couldn’t afford to. If anyone was in severe distress or there was some kind of huge fight going on, we probably couldn’t risk actually intervening unless it was the team we needed to pass. We weren’t strong enough yet.

The cold mathematics of survival.

That said, I still used chakra in my feet to cling to a branch long enough to slingshot myself into a direct line of interception with the newest group. I only sensed one team, which was somewhat better for our chances of living to see next Tuesday, but I wasn’t at all willing to meet them on the ground until I knew who they were.

I was pretty sure that Team Asuma didn’t have any sensors, but they might not have needed one.

Then their team shot past us, about fifty-some meters below, and I corrected myself. Whether they needed a sensor or not, having one might have helped.

“Rin-chan? Obito? Get ready for a fight.” I said over my shoulder, looping around the branch. Pursuit mode, go!

“Which one do you want to take on?” Obito asked, frowning. “I think I might be able to take Asuma…”

“I’ll go for Ibiki, then.” I replied under my breath. “Rin-chan?”

“If I remember right, Kurenai-san was a genjutsu-type kunoichi.” Rin said, glancing up at me. “Either one of us might be able to take her on and win.”

And maybe we'll finally see if you have any actual resistance to genjutsu.

“Okay. I’ll hold you to that.” I began the descent, bouncing off trees with the practiced ease of someone who spent entirely too much time doing just that. It was a Konoha shinobi thing, I swear. We make better time through trees than on the ground.

The air rippled.

Genjutsu. I’ve got this.

The Dreamer, when not working in concert with me, uses a genjutsu-canceling method that feels a little like someone decided to take my nerves and chakra coils and twang them like a rubber band.

Highly annoying, but effective.

“That wasn’t nice, Kurenai-san.” Rin said as we finally landed within spitting distance of the other
All of us stuck the landing. I was absurdly proud for all of two seconds.

“It wasn’t really supposed to be.” Kurenai replied.

Kurenai Yūhi was a girl our age or so, with those distinctive red eyes that were, in defiance of all things rational, not actually a kekkei genkai of any type. She was really a cute girl, with a fair, round face and untamed black hair. She had a hitai-ate on her forehead, like she would as an adult, and dressed in a white-and-pink thorn-patterned dress that looked at least more practical than her adult version.

Then again, Kakashi apparently picked up a shuriken-patterned scarf and I knew that Rin had a dress with the same pattern in green, so maybe our team wasn’t really fit to judge that kind of thing.

Kurenai’s greatest advantage was her genjutsu.

“So, what color scroll did you guys get?” Asuma asked.

Asuma was a fairly big kid already—bigger than I was in the shoulders and in arm-span. He wore a short-sleeved shirt with a ninja mesh-lined black undershirt, along with black pants and a white belt, and had spiky black hair and sharp brown eyes. He was the Hokage’s second child, and perhaps a little rebellious as a result despite being nine. I didn’t see his signature trench knives anywhere, but I wasn’t entirely certain where he’d first picked up their use in the timeline.

“Green.” I said, holding it up.

“Ah.” Asuma said. He glanced at the third member of their team.

Ibiki Morino was bigger than Asuma, despite the fact that he was probably only a bit older than we were. He had silver-gray hair stuffed mostly under a bandanna-style hitai-ate, like mine, and a rather defined jaw-line for a kid barely on the cusp of puberty. He wore one of those beige utility-style flak jackets—the sort we had for people who wanted the protection but weren’t promoted yet.

The scroll was produced. It was green, too. Ibiki tossed it to Asuma, who held it up to mine.

“On the count of three, then.” I said.

“Sure. One, two…”

On three, Asuma and I both flipped the scrolls open. I hurled my scroll across the clearing, away from Asuma’s team, and Asuma followed suit with just a split second’s hesitation.

When the smoke cleared, there was a woman in the standard Konoha uniform with a huge dog standing there. She was at least ten years older than us, putting her at about Sensei’s age, and had literally the wildest hair I’d ever seen. She looked downright feral, with Inuzuka tattoos on her cheeks and a distinctive wolf-eyed look I’d never seen on a human being before. I liked the little touches, though—lipstick and eye shadow, mainly. It was kind of like meeting the Joker and then realizing a second later that oh, it was only the Creeper. Not much of a downgrade in terms of scary, but at least you probably wouldn’t die.

I guess that made the huge wolf-dog next to her—black and white, sort of like a Siberian husky—an Inuzuka soldier as well.

Damn, and I’d wanted a second to hug him. Irrational, I know, but dogs are pretty much my favorite “I’ll be the proctor of today’s match between…what’s it say here…Team Minato and Team Sasukibe. Name’s Tsume Inuzuka, special jōnin. And this here is my partner, Kuromaru.” Tsume told us, in a tone that made me suspect that she was not the kind of woman anyone would be able to argue with. “There aren’t really any huge rules, but me and Kuromaru will be stepping in if it looks like anyone’s gonna die. Since you’re dead if your teammates are down, we’ll boot the losing team out of the exam area for free.” She rolled a shoulder. “By the way, you can start anytime.”

Us genin eyed each other speculatively. We were sizing each other up, trying to weigh pros and cons to each opponent.

“That means start now.” Tsume snapped, and we were jolted into action.
Chunin Exam Arc: Phase Two Complete

Chapter Summary

Kei: Make it to the Tower.

The thing about combat? It’s fast.

Unlike what movies and TV make it seem, any fight in real life is probably over in a matter of minutes, if not seconds. Most people don’t engage in hours-long drama-filled diatribes about their stupid tragic pasts while trying to beat the stuffing out of someone else. It’s a terribly efficient way to do things, only possible in the case of a hilariously lopsided power differential—and if you can beat your opponents that soundly, why bother? In fights where both sides were evenly matched, there wasn’t time to stand back and shout about how Mommy and Daddy didn’t love you enough.

We were exchanging blows before Kuromaru even got a chance to bark his assent.

I immediately leapt back away from the fight, while Ibiki took a swing with a kunai through the space where I’d been. Obito launched a two-meter-wide fireball down range, scattering their team, and Rin threw a tagged kunai into the resulting explosion before we all retreated.

Strike, retreat, regroup, strike…

The next thing anyone on Team Sasukibe saw was me, coming in low and nearly at top speed with my kodachi out and swinging. It took both of Asuma’s hands to block me, which was something of a mistake.

I still had another hand, after all.

While Obito ducked around Kurenai’s kunai throws and started lacing the battlefield with Uchiha-made ninja wire—which was, like steel wool, almost hilariously flammable—and Rin kept trying to get a hit in on Ibiki with her hands glowing green, I gave a savage grin.

While my right hand had swung my kodachi directly into Asuma’s paired punch-knives, my other hand had been pulling my sturdy metal sheath in turn.

If Asuma didn’t dodge, he would have avoided death by bisection only to get a broken rib as a consolation prize.

Disengage, you punk. Or else eat Gekkō-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Double Tiger Strike.

I felt his chakra flare.

Replacement jutsu. The Dreamer confirmed it, at least.

Asuma exploded into smoke and I ended up launching a log across the clearing at Kurenai. Whoops?

She dodged, at least, and that was when Obito picked up the ninja wire again and improvised a trip-line. Rin was already there waiting, and Kurenai spun in midair to land a kick directly on Rin’s crossed forearms. Then she bounced off, having shoved chakra toward her feet, and Rin was sent stumbling at least a meter back by the force of it.

And then I was there, the same time as Ibiki, and while Rin bounced off my back and toward the fight between Asuma, Kurenai, and Obito, I ducked under his swing and skidded across the dirt, aiming a knee at the inside of his knee.

He promptly screwed that plan over by stepping over me, but in the time he was only on one foot, I whipped around and aimed for his supporting leg with my other foot.

Goddamn it, I was gonna knock Ibiki on his ass if it took all day.

Then Obito crashed into the fight again, tussling more amateurishly with Asuma. Obito was on top, at least, but Asuma weighed more than he did and the second Obito lost balance he was going to get his face pounded in.

I tossed a few explosive kunai at Ibiki to drive him back, then grabbed Obito’s jacket shoulder and heaved just as Asuma swiped at him with the punch kunai.

“Careful.” I said in Obito’s ear, and he gave me a cocky grin that I completely agreed with. We could do this.

“Rin-chan, Kurenai’s up to you, okay?” Obito called. He kept his eyes on Asuma and Ibiki, who had finally recovered enough to group up normally.

“Right.” Rin said, squaring off with the other kunoichi. One of Kurenai’s arms wasn’t moving correctly, which made me wonder if Rin had already used that odd stunning jutsu on her.

Obito and I exchanged looks. Rin would be fine, though we weren’t necessarily so well off.

Well. Taking stock, our team was probably going to have some bruises, but everything else checked out. Team Sasukibe was a little worse for the wear, what with the burns since our team insisted on making everything explode. If I had to guess, I’d say that we were ready to go another ten rounds or so.

Except Kurenai. Rin was going to beat her just fine.

That said, Ibiki and Asuma were the heavy hitters to Kurenai’s genjutsu support.

Well, time to put our teamwork to the test, then.

I charged, leaping at the last possible moment with my chakra slamming into the ground to give me just that much more speed.

Asuma had already seen my double-draw technique, and instead of a full block he tried to redirect my momentum. Not necessarily a bad plan, but that meant that he caught my knee with his shoulder at the same time that Obito ducked behind both of us and rolled. Where he went, Uchiha ninja wire followed. Ibiki wasn’t as fast as any of us, but he whirled on Obito with a brand new weapon—a thin, collapsible blade he’d pulled out of one sleeve.

We were all too close together for him to get a real swing going, and Obito planted one hand on the ground and launched himself to the side, still trailing wire.

For my part, I’d knocked Asuma on his back on that run, but I skittered away and around the fight to regroup with Obito.
I flipped the scroll Sensei had given me into Obito’s waiting hand.

“Oh, you’re kidding me.” Obito said in disbelief. “You had this the whole time?”

“Yep!” I said. “Though I don’t have the slightest idea what’s in it.”

“Well, one way to find out.” Obito said. He still had a bloody nose from his tussle with Asuma, and swiped the blood away with his thumb.

I moved forward again, channeling chakra into my feet for another hit-and-run.

I felt someone—probably Ibiki—try to place a genjutsu on me, but the Dreamer tossed it aside with a sharp, Hands off, you jerk.

Asuma approached from one side, Ibiki from the other. I don’t know if they were expecting me to be a sitting duck, but I sure as hell wasn’t going to let them get any free hits.

Asuma jabbed three times in rapid succession, but I redirected the first one and smashed his left arm aside with my sheath. Then I planted my sheath in the soft ground and leapt onto it, springing out of the way of Ibiki’s combined shuriken/blade offense. I spun in the air and aimed another slash at his back, but he replaced himself with a log.

There is a distinct lack of big jutsu in this.

We’re kids.

And then Obito broke the seal on the scroll.

Technically speaking, the only thing you should have in weapon scrolls is, well, weapons. Less sane ones are designed to launch their contents at a speed just short of “absolutely lethal,” and are thus incompatible with most other contents. A lot of people therefore don’t even bother with the things, and just pop a weapon out of a seal one at a time and toss them by hand. Even Tenten.

Someone must have forgotten to tell Sensei that, because the scroll disgorged enough camping equipment—tents, utensils, sleeping bags, packaged food, and canteens—for three people and fired everything the length of the clearing.

I was already in the air, at least. While I got a little tripped up and failed to stick my landing when a sleeping bag hit my foot, at least I didn’t get mobbed by a bunch of tents like Asuma and Ibiki did. They’d cut their way out in a second, but I could probably knock at least one of them out before then.

“What the hell was that?” Tsume demanded, though I wasn’t really listening.

“Obito?” I was about to punch Asuma in the head regardless of his answer, but I was still interested in hearing his opinion.

“You might wanna back up, Kei.” Obito said.

Oh. Plan A was still valid, then.

I backed up.

“Good?” I asked.

“Good enough. Go help Rin out, okay?” Obito said distractedly. He was finally out of Uchihatrademark ninja wire, but I’d handed over my allowance of explosive tags and he was already attaching them to kunai and wire and putting them everywhere in the time it took for Ibiki to resurface from under a tent. They were linked by plain wire, which could carry a chakra charge without exploding into flame, which was really the best part about it.

I checked the wires and the tags, briefly, before going over to see where Rin and Kurenai had gotten off to.

Genjutsu, again. The Dreamer reported, and my chakra shuddered.

And then, rather abruptly, Kurenai went tumbling past me as though flung there by a chakra-charged punch. I looked back in the direction she’d come from and saw Rin trying to massage feeling back into her fingers.

Rule one of genjutsu (or something like that): Dazing the user works just fine if you can’t dispel it normally. I could, but Rin’s intervention was nonetheless awesome.

“Got her?” I asked.

“Yep.” Rin said, and her hands glowed briefly green to close her split knuckles. “Just like Akihito-shishō said, it’s all in the timing.”

“Sorry to leave you without backup against her, anyway. Though you got everything handled just fine.” I said, but I was already thinking about the implications because I really didn’t have the power to turn my brain off. My mouth, yes. The hamster wheel of my brain, no.

Exactly how good did you have to be in order to use Tsunade’s super strength technique?

In a way, the version that Sakura ended up learning in the future wasn’t precisely the full potential of the technique. While her strength was dependent on precise release of chakra at the time of impact, as opposed to the usual “hold it and hit them with it” technique that most shinobi used to enhance their muscles, Tsunade had been renowned for her immense strength in general. That was a woman who could crush rocks with her bare hands at age ten, and only got around to doing things like swinging Gamabunta’s sword around long after that.

I wondered if that had to do with the Strength of a Hundred Seal and how it was designed.

Even the first stage had knocked Kurenai silly, so I guess that would have to be enough for now. Later, though, I’d have to ask Yamaguchi-sensei what he was teaching Rin. Then I resolved to ask Sensei for sealing lessons after the Exam was over. Not like Yamaguchi-sensei was interested in teaching me anymore.

“Ready, Kei!” Obito said in a maniacally cheerful sort of way as we joined him. We’d only been a few feet away, but it became clear that when Obito wanted to blow something up, he went all out.

 Seriously. A good four meters around Team Sasukibbe was a spider-web of two types of ninja wire, about fifteen kunai rigged to launch on hair-triggers, and all of my exploding tags.

“I’d suggest giving up, but that’d imply that you actually have a choice.” I said to the boys, since Kurenai was either out or effectively out, sliding my kodachi back into its scabbard so I could put my hands on my hips in a dramatic fashion. “Give up and you won’t explode.”

“You’re such a drama queen.” Rin said under her breath.

“Like hell!” Asuma snapped, but then one of the wires twched ominously, with a noise like a twanging piano wire.

Obito gave me a thumbs-up, though all of his fingers were occupied. In my opinion, anyway, it was a bad idea to have the chakra-reactive wires wound around his fingers, but…well, it wasn’t my part of the plan anyway.

“We’ve lost, Asuma.” Ibiki informed us all rather gravely. Then again, I was also pretty sure he was the smartest member of the team as it was. You didn’t get to be the head of interrogation by age twenty-seven by being either a pushover or a moron. Sure, most of us didn’t have our careers set in stone at age nine, but Ibiki had the makings of a survivor.

Or maybe I was looking too hard for something that wasn’t even there yet.

Still, I didn’t drop my guard. I’d been hit with three genjutsu inside of five minutes and not all of them had been Kurenai’s.

“I’d have to agree there. Even if Yūhi wasn’t out of it, you’re up to our chins in razor wire, Uchiha flaming wires, exploding tags, and camping equipment. That Uchiha kid twitches wrong and everyone here gets blown into hilarious chunks.” Tsume grinned. “Or if he does it right. Either way you’re dead.”

Asuma looked at Tsume, then at us. I could draw my blade any second, and Rin had proved that that field medic training gave her lightning reflexes. We were pretty good to go for anything like a round two. Meanwhile, of us, only Obito had used chakra-intensive jutsu, while Team Sasukibe had been throwing around genjutsu and replacements all over the place.

I didn’t doubt that Asuma and Ibiki had more stamina than any of us, but we used our chakra more effectively. And if I had to punch Asuma in the nose with a chakra-enhanced fist to prove that point, I would.

“We…surrender.” Asuma said at length, looking as though the words were literally painful to spit out.

“Good choice, Sarutobi.” Tsume said. “Knew you were your dad’s kid.”

Asuma glared.

“Now, let’s pick our way out of this maze and get your whole team to a medical station.” Tsume continued, ignoring his pint-sized fury. “Mind if a clip a couple wires, Uchiha?”

“Yeah, that’s cool.” Obito said, already unwinding some of the less hopeless knots. “You don’t need to worry about more than like, ten of them. Most of the tags are duds.”

“What?” Asuma snarled. Not that I couldn’t take him on my own, but I didn’t feel like having him resent Obito forever and ever.

“My idea.” I admitted. “Sensei wouldn’t let us have more than about thirty tags between us, so I copied a crapton of them onto tracing paper and called it good.”

It’d only taken me three nights to do it. And some of them were still kind of shitty-looking if you paid attention.

Tsume threw her head back and laughed. “Well done, kid! Gotta admit, that was pretty clever. They even smell real.”
I shrugged. “I tried.”

“Yeah, yeah. All right, Team Sasukibe! Time to get the hell out and let the tricky brats move on.” Tsume ordered, clearly done with us. “Oh, and Team Minato gets a victory scroll.” Idly, Tsume reached into her vest and pulled out a scroll without any colored borders. She tossed it at us, and Rin caught it. “Now get moving. The tower’s a good ways away and there’s a lot of trouble in between here and there.”

They left in something of a lurch, since Tsume had Kuromaru carry Kurenai, but we didn’t mind. We still had to gather up all of the wire everywhere and re-spool it. We also stuffed all of our scrolls into Obito’s jacket, because he had bigger pockets.

“By the way, Obito, I lied.” I said as we extracted the last tag.

Obito, taking the wire from me and winding it around the coil, said, “About what?”

“Technically, the tags I made are real.” I explained.

Obito froze.

“Only they’re kind of shitty. They’re stable, though.” I held one of the tags up, wrapping it around the handle of one of my kunai. I could spare it for a demonstration. “Probably wouldn’t do more than burn your hair off if they got set off.”

“So, wait, you made all these working tags in less than three days?” Rin asked, frowning. “Why’d you tell us they were fake?”

“Because they’re shitty tags and I didn’t want you to be afraid to use them.” I repeated. I held up the armed kunai. “Watch.”

I slammed my chakra into the tag and hurled it across the clearing, where it imbedded itself point-first in a tree.

After about a quarter-second’s delay, the kunai made a crack noise and there was a lot of smoke.

And that was it. It might have scorched the linen wrapping of the handle, at most.

“See what I mean? They’re distractions at best.” I said, frustrated. “You need a load of chakra to activate them, they only make noise and smoke, they’re on tracing paper, and I can tell that I got the kanji wrong.”

“They still work, though.” Obito said. “I mean, a distraction in the right place is pretty good. When’d you start?”

“My dad used to make tags. I got one of his old designs out when Sensei didn’t give us enough for the plan.” I replied, suppressing the irrational flare of hurt that had come with opening that old box. “Most people can’t tell when a tag’s been made badly or not under pressure.”

Obito punched me in the shoulder, mostly to shock me out of my pity-party. “Hey! Don’t get so down about things. We’re halfway through the Chūnin Exams now because of those ’shitty’ tags, so don’t worry. We’ve got this in the bag.”

“Speaking of which, we should probably get going before anyone else gets any ideas.” Rin said, since we’d cleaned up.
“Yeah, okay. Too bad about the supplies, but I guess they sacrificed themselves for a worthy cause.” I added, shaking off my malaise with a rough grin.

Obito shrugged and said, “Not like we used them anyway.”

“True, but let’s not tell Sensei that.” I said. I shook myself to clear my head. “All right. It’s still the second day, so teams won’t be clustered around the tower just yet. Let’s book it before they do.”

“Book it?” Rin asked.

Whoops.

I waved a hand dismissively. “Beat feet, run like hell, move out, I don’t care. Let’s just go.”

We did, thank god.

The run to the tower was, thankfully, mostly uneventful. To be honest, after a certain point, some shinobi just aren’t worth intercepting if they’re going fast enough. Our team wasn’t one of them, but we had some of the principles down—presenting a small, constantly moving profile, and refusing to engage enemies unnecessarily. I took point again, leading us well around the other teams I could sense, and with Rin in the middle and Obito at the rear we were making pretty good time.

It was honestly kind of surprising when we made it to the tower in about twenty minutes.

Then again, with an effective speed of about twenty kilometers per hour and flinging ourselves around the canopy like a bunch of long-distance jumping monkeys on crack, perhaps it was really less unexpected than I thought.

I kicked the front door open and we scrambled inside.

It looked pretty much exactly the same way it would seventeen—maybe sixteen—years in the future. Aside from the metal stairs running up both sides and the massive statue with a poem on the wall over its head, the arena was pretty bare. Both the floor and ceilings were lined with square tiles, and I reached out with my chakra sense to confirm that there were, in fact, chūnin in the building somewhere. It’d suck to show up and then have wait around for so long.

“The poem on the wall…” Rin began, but I was pretty sure I didn’t really care. The poem was essentially pointless if you knew enough about shinobi life already, and I was curious about the “victory” scroll.

A sound soul dwells within a sound mind and a sound body…

Wrong show, but you can see what I mean.

“Obito, can I see the thing we got from Tsume?” I asked, holding my hand out.

“Yeah, but I thought we weren’t supposed to open it.” Obito pointed out.

“I’m not sure anyone actually said that, but I figure if we’re at the tower there can be exceptions.” I replied, and broke the paper strip on the scroll.

Then I threw that sucker right across the room.

Sparks from a busted wire…

“Sup, Kakashi?” I asked, almost before the smoke cleared.
Obito made a sputtering sound and growled, “That bastard won’t stop following us!”

“How’d you guess?” Kakashi asked suspiciously, thunder stolen.

I grinned. “Sensor-type shinobi, remember? By the way, you totally left me hanging on that hug.”

“One, you obviously didn’t need whatever ‘luck’ you claimed you’d get from it. Two, if you haven’t bathed in three days, stay over there.” Kakashi snapped, backing up in case I didn’t get the point.

Pfft. I totally stripped down to my skivvies in enemy territory to bathe.

Not. I like my blood where it is.

“Um, Kakashi-kun, what are you here for, exactly?” Rin asked, because Obito and I were off on tangents and needed to be redirected before we hurt ourselves.

“Tch.” Kakashi jabbed a thumb back over his shoulder. “See that? How much do any of you brats understand about what it takes to be a chūnin?”

“Watch who you’re calling a brat, Kakashi.” I said, equally blunt. I crossed my arms. “It’s simple enough. If your mind is lacking, hone your knowledge. If your body is lacking, hone your strength. A chūnin has to be balanced in the shinobi arts, adaptable, and a squad leader on missions that, sometimes, will come with a high probability of death. You can’t back down then, because your comrades are depending on you, and a shinobi carries their village with them on their shoulders.”

Kakashi gave me a flat look. “Thank you for proving that you have basic reading comprehension skills.”

“Welcome to the tower, anyway.” Kakashi said dismissively. “You heard the speech, and now you get a chance to rest and recover since you made it two days before the deadline. Have fun with that.”

“Yeah, no.” I said, and managed to grab his scarf before he could poof away. “No. We are having a team dinner and you are cordially invited to stick around.”

“Just let him go, Kei.” Obito said, but I could be stubborn.

Kakashi had a pretty good glare, I’ll give him that, but he didn’t try to pull away. “And why should I do that?”

“Because I need to thank you.”

I could practically hear the “What?” Obito said before he said it. Like an oncoming roll of thunder.

Kakashi said, “You don’t need to thank me for pointing out the obvious.”

“In that case, I really want to know how many genin know how to string together enough exploding tags to make a minefield in midair.” I said. The fireballs and the other distractions had been my decision, but that first spark of an idea had been Kakashi’s. “Look, Kakashi, just accept my gratitude and eat with us like a normal person. Unless you have some kind of urgent chūnin business?”

There. My olive branch. He offered one first, in his condescending way, but I could at least reciprocate that much in a more cheerful spirit than it was offered.

“Um.” Rin began, making me glance at her. “Maybe it’d be best to get cleaned up and settled in first. We did just spend three days in the woods.”
I blew out a sigh. “All right, Rin-chan, have it your way.”

Rin beamed.

“How come you can get her to listen but I can’t?” Obito asked Rin, probably because he thought I couldn’t hear him.

Eh. I could really have gone for a bath, I guess. For like the next three hours, just to get all the forest gunk stuff out.

Acknowledging the inevitable, I let go of Kakashi’s scarf. “So. Yes or no?”

Kakashi wound the shuriken-patterned mess back around his neck. “…Fine. Only if you promise to leave me alone for the next two days afterward.”

“Sure.” I said.

And then we parted ways, with him poofing away and me taking off at a brisk trot. If I had to fight Obito or Rin for hot water privileges, I’d probably curl up in a corner and cry or something. If it was any other team, though, I’d fight them for it. I still had chakra to spare, for once.

Dinner was awkward as all get out, even with Obito trying to take a peek at Kakashi’s face as we ate ramen. Rin might have been showing more interest than normal, but honestly? I was okay. I was almost happy. Everyone was alive, Sensei was probably going to visit on the fifth day, I wasn’t nursing a concussion, and the most lethal part of the exam was over.

Life is, I thought as I downed another cup of tea, pretty damn good.
For the next two days, Obito, Rin, and I killed time by any means possible. We managed to beg a set of hanafuda cards off of a passing paperwork chūnin, but ended up stymied by the fact that none of us knew how to play. The extent of my experience consisted of knowing about the Ino-Shika-Chō trio and watching Summer Wars once upon a time, which added up to “less than useful.” We gave them back to him before resorting to casual sparring to test each other, with me and Rin playing at medic duty on alternate matches.

All in all, we didn’t really need recovery time. We hadn’t been injured at all, and when compared to the stuff we’d either gotten up to before (which Rin and Obito knew about) or would probably get up to later (which I had a few theories about), the Forest of Death hadn’t really been all that bad.

I’m sure that if we’d been, say, taking the version that the Rookie Nine would, we would have been in much bigger trouble.

I didn’t end up seeing or even sensing Kakashi for that timeframe, which sort of made me wonder what he was doing during all that.

Anyway, on the last day of the exam—after the 120-hour time limit expired—all passing teams gathered in the atrium that we’d started out in. All told, there were six teams of three genin each, putting us at eighteen competitors. I spotted Gai’s team and the one with the Hyuga, but, to be honest, I didn’t really care about anyone else in the exam.

I can honestly say that I didn’t pay attention to the Hokage’s speech. For better or for worse, I was a lot more focused on keeping my eyes shut to block out excess stimulus (which, oddly, gave the impression that I was either thinking intently or about to fall asleep) so I could search for Sensei and Kakashi’s chakra signatures. It might sound cruel, or callous, but the gist of the Hokage’s speech could be summed up as “congrats on passing, now try not to die again.”

We were having preliminaries.

It could be worse.

How?

I admit to being less than creative at that particular moment.

Kabuto could be here.

…Or Orochimaru, or Danzō, or half-a-dozen other potential threats. I sighed inwardly. Even without them, though, the whole thing is such bullshit.

Well, look at the brighter side of things. Sensei only just got here.

I glanced up at the walkways lining the atrium. Yep. There Sensei was, waving with just his fingers at us kids. He seemed rather...unenthusiastic, really. While he wasn’t like Kushina, with her cheek-pinchning and tendency to hug so hard that something sprained, he usually was a bit more approving whenever we did something worth praising. Openly proud, perhaps. I dunno.

That...was really not a good sign.

But I guess it could probably wait until we were all really done beating the crap out of each other for arbitrary invisible points.

The Dreamer suggested, If you manage to lose, he’ll probably hold off on whatever he’s upset about right now until he can stop being upset over you getting hurt, later.

If anyone ever asks me to think happy thoughts as a cure for anything, I am going to point to that sentence right there and say that it is just not going to happen. I am permanently cracked, I tell you.

Something, something, get your asses off the floor so we can have you beat each other unconscious...

Yeah. I didn’t care about the specifics, there. The spirit of it all came through loud and clear.

“Sensei, did you see how awesome we were?” Obito said, running up to Sensei where he—and suddenly Kakashi was there, too—was standing.

“Yep. You did very well for your first time in the Exam.” Sensei said magnanimously, but I kept feeling like I was hearing something in his tone that he wasn’t making really obvious. “We’ll discuss it after the prelims.”

…Dodged some kind of bullet there, I think.

“So, one-on-one matches…” Rin prompted.

“Right. No ties—only double disqualifications. Try your best, but don’t be too disappointed if you don’t make it past—you’re the youngest kids in the Exam.” Sensei replied.

I wonder if it’s possible to mess up the winner so bad that it’ll hurt their performance in the Finals. We’ll probably find out.

I’d just skip over the matches for people I didn’t care about, but as it happens, the first match came up about fifteen seconds after Sensei said that.

“Maito Gai versus Obito Uchiha. Please come down to the combat floor.”

…I think the proctor might have been a Sarutobi, but damned if I’d ever learn his name between my inattention and his probably-short expected lifespan.

Obito grinned, wider and yet fiercer than I’d ever seen him. He was still a kid, and a major goof, but he wanted to fight and win and his opponent was someone he actually seemed to like and respect (if only because Gai’s existence seemed to annoy Kakashi quite a lot), and now he had a real chance to test himself.

“Ready, Gai?” Obito called, pitching himself over the railing to land nearly in the center of the room. And we’d only just gotten up the stairs, too.

Did he seriously just stick the landing?
Yep.

Gai, for his part, vanished from the upper deck and reappeared in a swirl of leaves about three meters from Obito, which made me wonder where the leaves had come from. “I am always ready, Obito-san! Come, and let us do battle!”

Obito paused, nonplussed. “…Okay, sure. Why the hell not.”

This is going to end badly.

Also yep.

You sort of have to have a bit of context to understand my thought processes here, I think.

Gai is strong. As a genin, the only opponent who defeated him (as far as anyone knows) was a then-genin or newly-made chūnin Kakashi. In the story of Naruto as I knew it, Gai had gone with zero on-screen or on-panel defeats until running into Madara Uchiha during the Fourth Shinobi World War. Madara then, it should be noted, was leagues past where he would have been even in his prime—for fuck’s sake, normal people do not survive getting kicked in half by Lee, or being punched by Tsunade while she’s channeling her Strength of a Hundred technique, or any number of other things. Non-zombie shinobi have to deal with things like not having the Rinnegan, with being unable to use Wood Release, and having actual chakra limits imposed by their physical bodies.

The fact that Gai managed to run roughshod over everyone before that speaks volumes.

On the other hand, at this point in our lives, Gai has about as much tactical acuity as a thrown brick.

The same could be said of Obito, actually.

Obito was sort of the perennial loser in some ways—the klutz, the goofball, the non-Naruto dead last from a generation before. Loyal, headstrong, but not particularly adept at any shinobi arts other than teamwork, which was explicitly banned by the current rules. Naruto had least had the advantage of being able to make his own teammates. By the thousands.

Then again, he was the one to put our explosive deathtrap into motion. I’d trusted him with that. Rin had trusted him with that. We’d put our futures (or at least a small part of it) in his hands and he’d come through just fine.

“Obito is going to lose.” Kakashi said in an undertone, eyes locked on the slowly circling genin below.

My knee-jerk reaction was to deny it, but… Gai. There are some things a genin fresh out of the Academy isn’t meant to run into and someone who could keep up with Kakashi, like Gai, fell into that category.

As soon as the examiner’s hand sliced through the air, both of the boys were on the move. Gai was blindingly fast—even then, he was displaying the kind of speed that Lee would eventually learn from him, and the kind of combat aptitude that showed very clearly the type of shinobi he would grow into. If Obito had the Sharingan then, he would have been just as thoroughly outmatched as Sasuke was eventually, against Lee. Obito threw about six kunai in the process of hurling himself to one side, out of Gai’s attack trajectory. The difference between Obito and Gai was staggering.

The arena exploded.

It just so happened that Obito had never gotten around to redistributing all of that ninja wire and those explosive tags we didn’t use. Including the crappy smoke bomb things I’d made.

The difference, it seemed, was staggering, but not quite insurmountable.

Amid all of the billowing smoke, I could feel Gai’s chakra swirl around in confusion before he leapt free of the chaos and stuck to the ceiling, trying to take stock of the situation. For someone without a sensing ability, I guess it was a lot more confusing to him than to me.

Obito had used the tags—my tags, specifically—as a smokescreen. I was pretty sure he’d attached some of them to the undersides of his sandals and to the backs of the plates over his hands, and activated them as well as the ones he’d thrown. The result was a lot of choking white smoke and the smell of something burning.

Kakashi looked vaguely ill, briefly. I guess his mask filtered out the worst of it, but having a dog’s sense of smell was probably a bit uncomfortable sometimes.

“Where did he get smoke tags?” Sensei asked quietly, making me blink.

There was actually a name for the weird scribbles I’d made? And here I’d just thought they were defective.

“Oh, Kei-senpai made them.” Rin said.

Sensei’s laser-gaze focused on me. For my part, I immediately looked away and down, to where the smoke was thinning out a bit and Obito was still determinedly not visible. I could sense him, though, on the underside of the catwalk we were standing on, but Gai couldn’t see him from the ceiling.

“I just…found some old designs Dad made.” I mumbled, torn between embarrassment and something that felt just awkward. One of these days, I was gonna stop drawing suspicion to myself.

“Senpai?” Rin felt confused, but I didn’t want to look at her.

“…Obito isn’t doing badly, for a rookie.” Sensei said, at length. “But let’s see where he goes from here.”

Obito, who was not as stupid as some people liked to assume, seemed to know better than to engage Gai in taijutsu. Instead, as the smoke dispersed and Gai finally realized where he was, Obito spun a web. A web of lies and deceit and…wires.

Gai charged, of course, because Gai is Gai no matter what the age involved.

“LEAF WHIRLWIND!” If Obito had actually still been there, I’m sure he would have lost instantly.

But as it was, Gai swung his legs through a rapid succession of basic Clone jutsu projections. They had no substance whatsoever and were about as obvious as could be—Obito had a knack, but they were still incapable of projecting any chakra—but they kept Gai distracted for just about two seconds.

Obito, who had picked up a thing or two in the past few months, skittered across the arena behind Gai, low to the ground. He was keeping his eyes trained on Gai, who had finally smashed through all the clones with completely unnecessary force, but he also unspooled a coil of wire as he went. I couldn’t tell if it was the flammable sort or the basic kind but it didn’t really matter. Obito had something like a plan and it would probably involve setting just about everything on fire.

And then the air was full of metal. It was also full of Gai, who was stupidly fast and could bounce with the best of them.

From my perspective, it was actually easier to keep track of the fight if I just followed their chakra signatures instead of trying to use my eyes. I tried to keep my eyes open, though, since if Obito realized I wasn’t watching it might have distracted him.

Gai was fast, and strong, but Obito’s wires were absolutely everywhere and what I’d said about the wires before was still valid. If Gai wasn’t careful, he’d start losing extremities until he lost momentum, and none of us really wanted that to happen.

Obito’s chakra remained mobile, spinning out yet more wires wherever he scrambled out of Gai’s way. Some of them had tags attached, and after one of them exploded, I think Gai was a little more cautious about the whole idea of charging in.

Then Obito set a whole section on fire.

“Fire Release: Grand Fireball Jutsu!”

With one of the most useless fire jutsu in the history of fire jutsu. Some of the real tags refused to go off until Obito sent his chakra screaming down the wires, nearly timing it perfectly.

Of course, Gai got out of the way, but it was a pretty straightforward demonstration of what an Uchiha could do with some planning.

Stalemate—Obito didn’t have the explosive strength necessary to knock Gai out, while Gai couldn’t get close enough to demonstrate his skill at just that.

There was one major flaw in this plan.

Now, I don’t think there was really any way to win against Gai without some other overwhelming advantage. Ninjutsu or genjutsu would have had to have been the focus in any match with him, since Gai wasn’t particularly adept at doing anything along those lines. He wasn’t as bad at it as Lee, as evidenced by his later summoning contract with a turtle, but ninjutsu and genjutsu weren’t really his thing.

Fact is, they weren’t Obito’s thing either. He knew a grand total of five ninjutsu and no genjutsu and couldn’t perform any of them without hand seals.

And he’d never gotten around to manipulating all those damn wires without having them wrapped around his fingers.

Gai grabbed some of the wire and pulled.

Obito yelped in surprised pain and was summarily dragged forward out of his protective web of wires, meeting Gai’s fist coming the other way at slightly subsonic speeds, with his face.

Obito flew across the room and hit the ground shoulder-first before rolling to a stop. Rin and I both flinched.

He didn’t get up.

The proctor had barely gotten the words, “Maito Gai is the winner,” out before Sensei and I had both vaulted the railing and gone to check on Obito. I was trailing in his wake, really, since no one outpaced Sensei, but it was the thought that counted, right?
“Kei-senpai, don’t touch him.” Rin ordered in a low voice, making me stop just before I would have probably tried to roll Obito over. Sensei wasn’t moving him either, except to gently lift one of his eyelids to see if he was unconscious or concussed or both.

Probably both, or else that shoulder would have gotten at least a yell out of him.

I twitched with barely-restrained anxiety.

“Back up so the medics can get to him.” Sensei ushered us both away as he said it, while white-clad medic-nin bustled over with a stretcher between them.

“How bad is it?” I called to one of them.

“Nothing fatal, and that’s enough for now,” said the other. I guessed that any more news would have to wait until I could visit Obito in the hospital. Hopefully, I wouldn’t have to stage an escape from my own hospital room to do it.

Still, I reached over and clasped Obito’s wrist for just a moment. “See you soon. Get better, or else.”

I swear he looked like he heard me.

Once everyone was more or less settled back down again and Gai had apologized for kicking Obito’s ass (though I wasn’t really sure why), and so on, we got back to the matches.

I kind of zoned out for a bit, leaning against the back wall with my arms folded over my chest. I didn’t really care about the other participants, since I was more than a little self-centered. Most of them were fairly straightforward fighters I could figure out just from peripheral chakra sensing, and I didn’t really know them anyway. I was focusing inward.

_i don’t think I can be a medic-nin._

What, because you’re not as calm as Rin?

I watched quietly as Ebisu and his kunoichi opponent traded blows and eventually ended up knocking each other silly. Ebisu had the basics down pat, with no obvious holes in his taijutsu and enough of a cool head to recover from the kick to the back of his knee without being reckless. By comparison, the kunoichi—a pigtailed thirteen-year-old girl in green, probably with about as much clan backing as me or Rin—was a little too quick to attack.

_i don’t think that should stop you, given what we’re going to face in the future._

And it won’t. _But as far as career paths go, I am never going to be a medic-nin._

…So, what, you’re going to learn enough to transplant an eye and then stop?

_Pretty much._

I knew as soon as I thought that that it was a stupid, _stupid_ plan. Preparing to deal with the worst that could happen was _not_ what I was doing then. I…just didn’t want to do it. But I still needed to fulfill my role, didn’t I?

What happened to wanting to help people? What happened to your promise to Rin?

She was right, of course, which is exactly why I didn’t reply.
When Ebisu finally gave his opponent a knockout blow to the solar plexus about five minutes later, I wasn’t necessarily surprised.

When Ebisu collapsed two seconds afterward as a result of being poisoned, I was.

“Double knockout. For our next match…”

Above the proctor’s head, the screen began shuffling through the names left. The medics, meanwhile, hauled the two unconscious kids away.

Bing! went the screen.

Rin Nohara vs. Genma Shiranui.

...This is going to be less one-sided, at least.

I wasn’t so sure about that. “Rin-chan?”

“What is it, Kei-senpai?” Rin asked, already halfway to the stairs.

Nothing especially poignant was coming to mind, so… “Don’t get yourself too badly hurt, okay?”

“I’ll be…not fine, but I promise I won’t break anything.” Rin said, and then she was heading down.

Kakashi made his way over to the railing spot next to mine as Rin and Genma finally got to the center of the floor, in front of the proctor. So did Sensei—I wasn’t really sure if he was trying to make sure Rin would be okay (even if he had to leap into the fight and separate the combatants by force and disqualify Rin) for her own sake or for Yamaguchi-sensei’s. Between them, they pretty much had me boxed in.

Lecture incoming in three, two…

“Anything to share with the class, Kei-kun?” Sensei asked.

“Like what? I sort of know how Genma fights, and I definitely know how Rin fights.” I offered, sans any detail.

Kakashi poked me in the shoulder and I whipped my head around, opening my mouth to say something. The look in his eyes stopped me. “I know you weren’t made genin for a brain that thinks that is good enough.”

Bluh bluh.

Even though I was bigger than Kakashi, I still shrank away a little even if there wasn’t really anywhere to go. It was kind of funny, in hindsight. “Uh…”

Hurry up and say something less stupid.

“Well, Genma uses senbon.” I offered. “He’s bigger and stronger than Rin, which is going to mean a lot of running around, but it doesn’t seem like he’s a power hitter like Gai was. If I had to guess, I think he’s like Gai in that it’s taijutsu first, but I think he has ninjutsu backup where Gai just kinda beats people silly.”

To be honest, I really didn’t know that much about Genma’s exact capabilities. His two pre-timeskip fights had been skipped over, but the results were at least fairly telling: versus Baki during the Chūnin Exam invasion, he’d survived where Hayate hadn’t. During the beginning of the Sasuke
Retrieval arc, he and Raidō had fought well enough to force all of the Sound Four to use the second stage of their Curse Seals and partially tire themselves out, even if they’d lost. Sometime in the intervening seventeen years, he and Raidō had been taught the Flying Thunder God jutsu in their role as Sensei’s bodyguards, but they couldn’t use it separately. He could spit a senbon hard enough to deflect kunai thrown by experienced shinobi, and appeared to have a relatively calm and slightly snarky personality.

Whenever you’re done gushing, we can get back to the problem at hand.

…Uh.

I continued, as though my train of thought hadn’t just derailed and wiped out a small town of imaginary people, “Rin-chan should be smarter than him, though, which counts for a lot.”

“I heard that, you know.” Genma called up from the ground floor.

“And that’s why I’m talking about you and not Rin.” I shot back.

“This really isn’t the time for this, Kei-senpai!” Rin rebuked.

I decided to shut up.

About four seconds later, Sensei said, “I’ll talk to you about your performance later.”

“I haven’t fought yet.”

“I mean what you did during the Second Exam. Tsume mentioned it to me.” Sensei corrected.

“…Okay.” There was a very good chance everything I’d done in the past week would be (or had already been) picked apart by a pair of older ninjas, and I didn’t like that idea one bit. Not looking forward to that, but there was a good chance I could end up unconscious after this anyway.

Anyway, enough dilly-dallying. Rin’s match was starting.

“Ready?” asked the proctor.

Genma and Rin both nodded.

“Begin!”

It was probably the only match that whole day where both fighters initially moved away from each other. I mean, Rin and Genma both leapt backward to get enough room to throw something, but it didn’t change the fact that it was the first match all day where neither of the fighters had been hotheaded to push the issue anyway.

Genma had senbon.

Rin had shuriken.

Metal bounced with a ting.

Genma moved first, charging across the room while bringing a kunai up to slice at Rin’s face, while Rin immediately moved through the hand seals for a Replacement. Rin was no slouch, for all that she still used hand seals, and I felt her move from her position to nearly the opposite end of the hall.

Genma ended up stabbing his own backpack.
And then Rin came flying in, hands glowing green and white, and Genma made the mistake of blocking rather than dodging. I heard a grunt of pain and both Rin and Genma separated, landing in crouches some five meters apart, and the fight seemed to pause. Rin got back to a fighting stance first, and when Genma followed, his left arm was notably slower to respond.

Genma’s arm wasn’t moving right, and without a diagnostic jutsu I couldn’t tell precisely why that was. Either Rin had numbed that arm, or she’d stabbed him with a chakra scalpel.

“Man, medical ninjutsu at your age,” Genma grumbled. “What is it with this Academy class?”

Oh, right. Gai had joined the Academy the same year that Rin, Obito, and Kakashi had.

I guess Rin had chosen to numb his arm rather than sever the tendons in it. Good for her (and for him).

“Fight me and find out.” Rin said, and slashed again and again with her numbing jutsu.

Now that Genma had figured out her range, though, he was swerving this way and that and deftly avoiding taking any more hits. Except to his unresponsive arm, which probably couldn’t even transmit pain. Having never been under the influence of Rin’s jutsu, I couldn’t know for sure.

Rin addressed the issue of the slippery older genin by cancelling the jutsu on one hand, and then flinging kunai after him while she closed the distance.

Her hand glowed blue-white in my chakra sense. The scalpels had come out and I wasn’t sure if Genma noticed.

Come on, Rin-chan! You can beat him!

When Rin and Genma clashed next, he may have successfully kicked her in the ribs, but she also managed to sever something in his leg. He collapsed on top of it, making a hissing noise from between clenched teeth, while Rin stumbled around wheezing for breath. Then she collapsed, curling around herself.

“I think she might have broken a rib.” I said, frowning and leaning over the railing to get a better look. Sensei’s hand grabbed the back of my shirt so I didn’t consider flinging myself into the ring to make sure she was okay—well, maybe he just didn’t want me to fall, but that was how I saw it.

“If she has, she’ll have to live with it for now.” Kakashi pointed out, though I was pretty sure that he wasn’t as indifferent as he liked to act.

“I know, but…”

Rin was a kid. She was in tears from the pain, not to mention the whole I can’t breathe thing, and her chakra scalpels guttered and died as her focus lapsed. I jerked against Sensei’s grip—Rin needed help!

“Ow…” Genma forced his way back to his feet, trying to keep as much weight off his bad leg as possible, and it quickly became clear that most of both of their offensive potential was shot.

Genma was better off, for what it mattered.

“Ow, ow, ow…” Genma said under his breath as he limped over to Rin. “Ow! Nohara-san, can you move?”
After a moment, Rin shook her head. She didn’t get up.

“Rin-chan!” Dammit, you promised you wouldn’t get hurt!

“All right, we’ll call the match here. We’ll get you a medic real quick.” Genma glanced at the proctor, who nodded. Then he looked back down at Rin. “Nohara-san?”

“I-I give up.” Rin choked out, gasping.

Genma didn’t look happy about it, but he finally dropped to the floor next to Rin. “Okay, now give me your hand. The medics will be here in a minute.”

Sensei finally let go of me, so I was able to sprint over to Rin and Genma.

“Diagnostic Jutsu!” I said, hands blurring through the seals and I spread my chakra out between my outstretched hands. “Okay, hold still.”

“Not going anywhere.” Genma muttered, and I scanned Rin first.

Rin whimpered, but at least the scan confirmed that she’d only broken one rib. Genma had cracked another one as collateral damage, but it was still in place and would probably heal with minimal interference.

“Everything’s going to be okay, Rin-chan.” I said, taking a few deep breaths to steady myself. “Shiranui-san?”

“Yeah? I’m fine—I just can’t walk.” Genma told me, but I looked him over anyway. “And I think she’s breaking my fingers.”

Rin had managed to get one good cut in, which had only severed muscle and no tendons of note. Genma wouldn’t be walking or fighting well, but it wasn’t enough to keep him out of the Third Exam on its own. The numbness of his arm wouldn’t last another hour, either.

Genma’s hand would be fine.

“Move aside, please.”

The medics had arrived. They loaded both Genma and Rin onto stretchers, and I heard Genma say something about putting him next to Ebisu, with Rin ending up next to Obito. Gai, from across the catwalks, looked rather worried. After a second, he trooped off after Genma, since it wasn’t like he had to stick around for any more of his teammates’ matches anyway.

There were only four genin left in the room, and a couple of the jōnin-sensei had also taken off. I kind of expected to see them later, if any of their students had passed, so they’d know the tournament roster later.

“So, we’re zero for two, now.” Sensei commented. I couldn’t figure out what he was thinking from either his tone or his expression, which was worrying.

Given that having Kakashi for a teammate had made me rather good at interpreting expressions with minimal cues, that was one hell of a poker face.

Bing! went the screen.

Keisuke Gekkō versus Himawari Hyūga.
I looked across the room, to where the Hyūga girl was making her way down to the ground floor, and felt my hands start to shake. My first solo match, against the oldest genin in the exam, and without any real idea how to fight the Gentle Fist style. This was going to suck.

Damn you, Murphy!

“Everyone else, please get off the exam floor,” the proctor said.

Kakashi and Sensei left, leaving me alone with the Byakugan-user.

The Dreamer gave the impression of a grimace. This…is probably not going to end well.

No shit.

“Hello, Gekkō-san.” Himawari said. Damn she was tall—she was at least a head and a half taller than I was. I was a bit big for my age, but clearly seven years made one hell of a difference. She wore the Hyūga clan symbol on a sash around her waist and a hitai-ate around her neck. Her hair was waist-length or longer, and she had a sleeveless shirt with bandages wrapped around her arms up to her elbows.

I was getting a Neji vibe from her, honestly. She was a Main House member, sure, but since the other Main House member I really knew of was the as-yet-unborn Hinata, I guess the confidence was sort of throwing me off. Even if it seemed like Neji was more arrogant than dignified.

“Oh would you prefer if I called you something else?” Himawari asked.

“Uh, everyone else calls me Kei.” I said.

Himawari considered this for a moment, then nodded. “In that case, do you mind if I call you Kei-chan? I’m afraid I can’t get used to calling girls ‘-kun’ at all.”

I nodded.

“Well, in that case, you can call me Himawari-san or Himawari-chan, as you like.”

“Um. Okay, Himawari-san.” I said.

“Now, I know you’re a rookie, but we’ll be going all out for this match. Good luck, Kei-chan.”

“Same to you, Himawari-san.”

We both bowed.

“Ready?” the proctor asked.

I lifted my hand to my kodachi. Himawari settled into a basic Gentle Fist stance.

“Begin!”

I watched Himawari activate her Byakugan without hand seals and knew right then and there that I was screwed.

She charged, chakra swirling around her like an aura, and I was immediately on the defensive. I tore the scabbard from my waist and scrambled backward, trying to remember if Mom had actually said that any of my drawing techniques were useful against someone faster than I was, but I couldn’t think of any. Instead, I had to improvise.
Gekkō-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Double Tiger Strike—Claw!

I swung my kodachi, still in its sheath, with a chakra-enhanced speed I didn’t even know I was capable of before. Himawari blocked it, turning the weapon aside so that it swung over her head, but I yanked it out of the scabbard and swung again, this time with the blade.

It was ripped entirely off of something I’d seen on TV in my old life, taken to Mom for her opinion, and attempted to make into something more realistic.

That? That was Hiten Mitsurugi Style: Sōryūsen Ikazuchi.

Himawari ducked under the swing as though she’d known I was going to do that all along.

Shit, shit, shit, the Byakugan wasn’t supposed to do that—!

Himawari’s hand wasn’t glowing with medical chakra. It wasn’t glowing at all. I just knew that if I let her touch me, I was done. I’d never taken a Gentle Fist strike, but I wasn’t dumb enough to think that I could just tank hits like Naruto and his fuzzy little problem. The Dreamer was literally made of my Yin chakra, not that of a Tailed Beast, and wouldn’t be able to do anything if my chakra network was blocked off.

I panicked. I didn’t slash at her again. I planted one hand against the floor, coated with chakra, and hurled myself backward like I was being fired out of a slingshot. It was completely uncontrolled, meaning I went spinning around like an idiot for a while, but I managed to find my footing again eventually.

And when I did, she was barely a second behind me.

“Eight Trigrams Thirty-Two Palms.”

Replacement jutsu!

Genma’s backpack took another nasty beating.

“Eight Trigrams Vacuum Palm!”

I skittered away, using my chakra-enhanced speed to stay the hell out of range, and I felt the burst of chakra-infused air gouge a chunk out of the wall behind me. Shit, how was Himawari still a genin? It was taking everything I had just not to be taken out of the fight in one shot.

“Stop running, please.” Himawari said, and I took that as a sign to keep running.

Still, it wasn’t like I was going to be able to outlast her. I had a lot less chakra to start with, for one.

Focus on the fight!

In the end, it really seemed like what we were doing amounted to a retread of the Pain vs. Hinata fight. While I wasn’t anywhere near as nonchalant about dodging as that Rinnegan-wielding asshat was, the point was that Himawari was doing all of the attacking and I was doing all of the running the fuck away. I didn’t have any overkill jutsu to use on her to turn the tide—no Almighty Push or Amaterasu was going to make itself known in any of my fights.

FOCUS.

The Byakugan made my genjutsu useless because they weren’t going to affect more space than the Byakugan could observe at once, not even counting the issue of how the bloodline allowed the user to literally see the flow of chakra. Clones weren’t useful enough to serve as distractions when Himawari was capable of blurring through them faster than I could make them. Medical ninjutsu was dependent on chakra flow and focus, which I wasn’t going to have much of in short order.

It was down to me and kenjutsu. It was the only thing I had that she didn’t.

Gekkō-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Tiger Clan Attack!

I slashed what felt like a dozen times in the span of a few seconds, burning chakra as I went. It was the first time I’d gone on the offensive during the fight, and Himawari was actually forced to retreat for a while, because blocking swords strikes with one’s bare hands was a really risky proposition at the best of times.

She took out a kunai and finally managed a proper block, but I came in low with the metal scabbard, aiming for her kneecap. In doing so, I had to stretch until my body and the angle of my legs was practically parallel to the ground, which is what, in the business, we call “hideous overextension.” I thought it was worth it.

Gentle Fist users don’t use their feet for anything other than maneuvering. There are no kicks in the Hyūga style, as opposed to Gai’s Strong Fist or the Uchiha acrobatic signatures.

Himawari leapt over my strike, twisted in midair, and brought her palm gently to rest against my left shoulder.

“Eight Trigrams Vacuum Palm.”

The world went white with pain. I heard the Dreamer screaming, distantly, before all that was left was a high-pitched whine.

I hit the wall, and then everything was blessedly dark and silent.
Chunin Exam Arc: After-Action Report

Chapter Summary

Kei: Wake up.

The Dreamer was the first living (kinda) thing I saw in what felt like a long time.

I was on one of the psychologists’ couches in my mindscape, watching water stream down from wherever the hell the ceiling was in a metaphysical place. The colors were oddly muted, like florescent light after a long stint in the sun, and the perpetual haze of memory fragments were clogging the water like a salmon run in September instead of flitting through the air on wings of color and light. I didn’t know how long I’d been there without being aware of it, or how much had really changed since the last time I consciously remembered it.

I looked over at the Dreamer and said, “Hey.”

“Hey yourself.” She didn’t put any particular effort into her reply, distracted as she was by the attempt to reattach her left arm. Instead of blood, the Dreamer’s wound was shedding stuff that looked like bad pixels—bluish-yellow sparking things that drifted upward and looked like they’d been cribbed from the special effects department of a cyberpunk movie.

I think the gears in my brain jammed for a second.

That is the only explanation I had for how calm I was about the entire situation.

“Is there anything I can do?” I asked, concerned. I’d never seen the Dreamer wounded at all, and her body was so much smaller than mine—even at the peak of her overacting, she was only ever the age of our physical body. Nine, to my…fourteen, I think, after her awakening and reintegration of my memories. I could see our reflections in the water, despite the ripples that ought to have been there.

“Hold my arm here,” the Dreamer ordered, handing her detached arm over. She turned so that I could press the stub of the arm to the ruined shoulder it had come from.

The situation is just a bit sticky here, gents. I thought, absurdly. I could still think in British accents if I wanted to, dammit. “By God, sir, you’ve lost your leg.” “By God, so I have.”

Her natural light show intensified for a moment, though only at the point where her arm and her body connected. “Thanks.”

The light flared.

“That…should hold.” The Dreamer shrugged me off and resumed floating around the mindscape. Her reattached arm continued to spark and twitch as she went.

“So, what’s been going on since I took a dirt nap?” I asked, as though I hadn’t just been a witness to the strangest regeneration mechanic this side of Orochimaru.

“Nothing that I know of.” The Dreamer spun lazily in midair, glancing at Id with her glowing eyes.
“If you’re knocked out instead of asleep, I can’t do much at all. The fact that you’re here now means you’re on the way to waking up.”

“Oh, good. I can’t even tell how long it’s been since I got my ass kicked.” I said distractedly, “And I think I had incredibly bad reaction to the Gentle Fist—I can’t remember if there’s supposed to be some kind of timeframe for the effects to wear off, but it can’t be all that long.”

“You just had to reattach my arm.”

True. That was an important fact.

“I meant more that the Gentle Fist chakra blocks wear off a normal person in a few hours, if the damage isn’t too severe.” I paused. “Though, we aren’t normal and I think the Vacuum Palm is at least two steps up from the rest of the Eight Trigrams series. I think, at full power, she’d have killed me outright.”

“Neji was capable of killing Kidōmaru in the second stage of his Curse Seal. Hm.” The Dreamer shrugged the thought off. “Anyway, it’s time to wake up now.”

So I did.

In my old life, I’d never woken up at a hospital. That’s because I was a sedentary, risk-averse college student whose most dangerous activity on a given day was driving from place to place. Granted, American freeways and highways and parkways and so on are, in fact, hilariously ill-designed in some respects and thus dangerous, the risks seemed normal. I hadn’t hurt myself or anyone else (though my car had had a few mishaps over the years), and on the few occasions I had been to the hospital late at night I had been inevitably shooed out to go home when visiting hours were over. On top of everything else, I was usually too keyed up on free coffee and nerves to fall asleep anyway.

Yeah. I was a pretty boring person.

In my new life, though, I knew from the moment I decided to become a ninja that the hospital was going to be a home away from home, whether I liked it or not.

In conclusion, it wasn’t that surprising that I woke up in the hospital after the Prelims kicked my ass.

Now, I wanted to be mad. Waking up among the bleach-or-lemon-water smell and white linoleum meant I’d lost, which I’m pretty sure a nine-year-old boy or a real nine-year-old girl would be plenty pissed off about, out of wounded pride if nothing else. (Well, okay, maybe I was thinking more of the ten through twelve-year-olds I had once had more experience with. They were more competitive.) But there was a warm weight taking up space against my back, and I immediately moved to figure out what it was. So sue me for curiosity.

Turned out that Hayate had somehow clambered into my hospital bed and dozed right off.

I decided that being mad came a distant second to knowing the world hadn’t ended while I’d been indisposed.

Quickly, I decided to take stock.

Limbs: Attached.
Chakra: Acceptable.

Other chakra signatures: Mostly doctors and nurses and medic-nin. I could sense Mom moving around the building, probably in search of non-terrible hospital food. Hayate was next to me. It felt like Rin and Obito, as well as Ebisu, Gai, and Genma, were all hanging around. So was the Hyūga—er, Himawari. I wasn’t sure why, since I’d been knocked out five matches in, but I guess it wasn’t worth worrying too much over. Sensei and Kakashi were out of range, which meant they could be essentially anywhere.

I sighed inwardly.

It’s a mess in here.

Does it have to do with the fact that you were missing an arm?

Sort of. Though that was more because the Gentle Fist attacks the chakra network and organs directly and I didn’t pull back fast enough. Or, you know, at all. Nothing we couldn’t fix, anyway.

I somehow doubted that even she was sure what had really happened. Most of the time, the Dreamer’s Yin chakra remained gathered well under my normal chakra, which ought to have just meant that flow would have stopped. For it to have been severed, she had to have been either actively reinforcing me or actively pulling chakra away to form more Yin chakra and reinforce herself.

Then again, if one Gentle Fist attack was all it took to destabilize her, I guess I couldn’t be mad about that.

I put the issue out of my mind for the moment and scooted so that I was sitting upright. Hayate rolled over sleepily in response, almost flopping off the other edge of the bed, and I put a hand on his shoulder. “Hayate-chan?”

“Five more minutes, Sis…” Hayate mumbled, apparently still too drowsy to add two and two together to get four.

I smiled. “Hayate-chaaaaaan, naptime’s over.”

He reached out and blindly whacked me in the arm.

“Hey!”

There was a moment in which nothing happened. Then Hayate flipped over again as though someone had zapped him, clambering into my lap and then scrambling upward to throw his arms around my neck. “Y-You’re awake!”

“Yep.” I said, grinning despite the pressure, one arm around his ribs and the other hand ending up in his mop of hair. “I’m okay, Hayate-chan.”

“You’ve never stayed sleep for so long, though!” Abruptly, he pulled away, and started studying my face intently. It was actually kind of disconcerting to be scrutinized by a…Christ, he was already seven by then—by a kid. “Not even after you stayed up all night that one time.”

The joys of finding a time for wrapping birthday presents for ninja kids. That had not been a fun night.
“Well, you already know I was in the Chūnin Exams. Sometimes recovering after a real fight takes longer than a spar would.” I told him.

That, thankfully, sent him off on a tangent. “You lost.”

“Yep. Guess your big sister just wasn’t good enough yet.”

Hayate was immediately indignant on my behalf. “Well…whoever won must’ve cheated! You’re the strongest big sister ever!”

Point of order, kid: Tsunade would probably disagree. And Nawaki, if the kid wasn’t dead.

Stop depressing yourself. It’s not healthy.

“Sad to say that it’s not the case, little brother. Your big sister’s just not big enough or bad enough for promotion yet, even if I can do this.” I said, and started tickling him.

Coochie-coochie-coo!

“Ack!” He wriggled, trying to escape from my trap, but I was too strong.

“Tickling builds character!”

Whatever Hayate had been about to say dissolved into shrieks of laughter.

Unfortunately, the fun was cut short by the door slamming open. The bar-shaped handle just barely missed gouging a hole in the nearest wall, and the sound of it alone had me and Hayate both freezing in place. Sure, Hayate was still giggling breathlessly, but at least I’d let him go.

“You’ve only been awake for a few minutes and already you’re back to normal.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. He didn’t seem sure whether it was more important to facepalm or just sigh, so he did both.

“Well, you know me.” I replied, “And I guess I wasn’t really that hurt to start with.”

Yamaguchi-sensei approached, flipping through the clipboard in his hands before checking the chart at the foot of the bed. After a minute, he said, “It could have been worse.”

Well, that was not exactly comforting.

“How bad was it?” I asked. “I think I was out before I really realized what happened.”

“Aside from hitting a concrete wall, your opponent’s attack nearly made several key tenketsu in your arm and shoulder explode.”

…Meep.

“But with emergency care and some luck, it seems you’re going to be the same as ever.” Yamaguchi-sensei glared at me over the top of his glasses. “But, for the love of all that’s sacred, don’t do that again. If you have to fight a Gentle Fist user again, run the hell away or surrender if it’s viable. There are very, very few people who can take more than a few Gentle Fist strikes from a skilled practitioner and live, and I’d rather not see the crippled mess that’s left afterward.” Especially if it’s my student, went unsaid.

I might have taken a bit of the stress off. But yeah, we’re not doing that again.

I nodded, since they both were right.
Hayate looked rapidly back and forth between us. Then he crossed his arms and said, “I knew that the winner must’ve cheated.”

I ruffled his hair again. “Nah, she was just better.”

“So it seems.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. He placed the chart back on the end of the bed. “If you’re already so excitable, I suppose we can allow more visitors. From the records, your mother’s already been in—and I saw her downstairs, so it’s a given. And your brother, of course.” He nodded at Hayate. “Other than that, your teammates have all been in at least once and I’ve seen that airheaded sensei of yours around.”

…Even Kakashi? Praise the gods; he was becoming more human by the day!

“How long was I out?” I asked.

“About three days. Your teammates are up and about, but if Obito comes in again and starts acting excitable, punch him in the stomach for me. He’s not supposed to be straining that shoulder.” Yamaguchi-sensei huffed. “And yell at Rin-chan if she does the same thing. They’re supposed to be on light duty for the next month.”

My lips thinned. “I… I guess I knew they were badly off, but…”

“They’ll be fine.” Yamaguchi-sensei said. “Broken bones may be serious, but with the war on… well. I see worse. No one died in the Prelims this time, which is good enough for me.”

There was something vaguely depressing about that thought, but it didn’t really stand out from the shittiness of the whole war situation in general. Bluh.

“But you don’t need to worry about that just yet.” Yamaguchi-sensei told me.

“…All right, Yamaguchi-sensei.” I said eventually, though I didn’t believe that was the case. I’m sure he was being totally honest and all that rot, but just by being on Team Minato, I was pretty sure I’d sealed my fate from the get-go.

Yamaguchi-sensei gave me a scrutinizing look, then seemed to dismiss my weirdness from the list of things he cared about. “Anyway, I still have rounds to complete. Try not to strain yourself, eat what the nurses tell you to, blah blah sentimental drivel.”

Hayate and I giggled.

Yamaguchi-sensei walked right out after that. I heard him say something to someone outside of the room, and I felt Obito enter before I could stop giggling long enough to look up. In hindsight, I heard him, too—Obito crashed everywhere he went, sometimes.

“Hi, Hayate-chan! Hi, Kei! Man, it’s about time you woke up!” Obito enthused, hobbling over. He wasn’t on crutches, but I could tell that he was on some kind of painkiller for his tightly-bound shoulder and arm. He was little clumsier than normal. “That makes us three-for-three on the ‘now we can say we survived our first Chūnin Exam’ records. Like, there ought to be a Hall of Fame or something.”

“Maybe there is and we just never noticed?” I suggested.

We thought about that for a moment.

“Nah,” we said together.
“Yamaguchi-sensei told me you lost to Himawari. I guess it could’ve been worse, you know?”

I gave Obito a blank look. Next to me, Hayate inhaled sharply, probably with the intent of arguing. I elbowed my brother to distract him.

“How so?” I asked.

“Well, Himawari’s kind of scary.” Obito explained. “I mean, she’s supposed to be engaged to Hiashi Hyūga, right? And he’s the next head of the Hyūga clan.”

Wait. Slow down. Hold the fucking phone.

I got my ass kicked by Hinata’s mom.

…On second thought, that made a terrible amount of sense. She was only two years or so younger than Sensei, and I knew that Sensei would be a dad in…about four years, give or take. If Himawari was sixteen, she’d be about twenty or so when Hinata was born and her husband would be…eh, twenty-eight? I remembered that Hiashi and Hizashi were older than the rest of the parents of the Konoha Twelve—the ones had been given specific ages, anyway.

In hindsight, I guess I didn’t mind that much.

“Well, I guess that makes it a little less embarrassing.” I concluded.

“But you should be promoted, Sis!” Hayate protested.

I’m still not sure he understood what a promotion meant, then.

“I’m fine with being genin for another year.” I told him. Pointing at Obito, I said, “If I wasn’t a genin anymore, I wouldn’t be able to hang out with Obito and Rin-chan as much, and that’d be horrible.”

Hayate thought about that. “Well, Obito could play with me and my friends?”

Obito gave a choked sort of laugh. “Oh, so I don’t get to be promoted when your sister does?”

“No.” Hayate said clearly. “Because if you did you wouldn’t have time for anyone anymore.”

“Aw, Hayate-chan wants his big brother around?” I teased.

“He’s the only one who can really play ninja.” Hayate whined.

Obito and I exchanged looks.

I don’t know what he was thinking, but the thought in my head at that moment was something along the lines of well I know who I’m getting to babysit Naruto when he’s born.

That thought was built on the assumption that Obito didn’t go mass murderer on us, but…well, it was funny.

Funny, but sad.

“Kei-senpai!” Rin’s entrance was thankfully more restrained, but I wasn’t happy to see the reason for it—mainly, that she was still in a hospital gown and pants and looked rather pale. I could feel the faint tingle of medical chakra from Obito, because of his shoulder, but Rin’s ribs were making a sort of jangling sensation to my sixth sense. It wasn’t really bad, precisely, but it told me that it was going to be a while before Rin could join us in the field. She also noticed Hayate, “Hi, Hayate-chan!”
“Rin-chan, should you really be walking around already?” I asked.

“Actually, I’ve been cleared for light exercise.” Rin said. “Sort of.”

“Define ‘light.’” I said, as Hayate started climbing on Obito.

“No sparring, but I can run and stretch and things.” Rin said. “What about you?”

“I think I’m okay.” I replied, since Yamaguchi-sensei hadn’t mentioned anything about taking special precautions. “I mean, I feel…okay-ish, with no major weakness that I’ve noticed. I’m just a little tired. It’s nothing compared to busted ribs.”

Rin frowned. “But I heard from Akihito-shishō that your opponent nearly destroyed your tenketsu!”

“…Yeah, but she didn’t and I’m okay now.” I said. “It could’ve been way worse than it was, and I’m on the road to recovery now or whatever.”

“Hayate, would you please get off?” Obito said, because by that point the enterprising seven-year-old had clambered onto Obito’s uninjured shoulder.

Rin frowned more severely. “But Kei-senpai…”

“Don’t worry about me, Rin-chan. Worry about yourself and about Obito. I think Hayate’s going to break him.” And, because I’d said that, Hayate abruptly decided that today was not the day to conquer Mount Uchiha. This may have been because Mount Uchiha was starting to shake. An eruption was imminent.

Hayate ran out of the room, with Obito on his heels.

“…So, that was a thing. I think he’s going to use Mom as home base again.” I said, as Rin giggled.

“Sounds like a plan, I suppose.” Rin said. “Also, Kei-senpai?”

“Yeah?”

“Thanks for being our captain.” Rin smiled. “I’m not sure we would’ve gotten that far without you.”

_Actually, if Kakashi had been allowed into the Exam, if I’d never been born, and if you had all still been the same Team Minato, you might have made it exactly as far. I thought._

“It was really nice to be able to do that, if stressful as hell.” I admitted. Still, it could have been a hell of a lot worse. “Now, since I’m still not sure if I can leave this room without an official sticky note, could you please figure out where Hayate-chan and Obito ran off to? I’d like to see the hospital intact past noon.”

“It’s already three. But yeah, I’ll go get them.” Rin turned to leave.

“Thanks, Rin-chan.” I called after her.

When the door shut, it felt oddly final. Like I was closing the gates on something important I couldn’t recall, even if I tried.

So the Chūnin Exams were a bust.

_Yeah, but I think we already knew that when we were signing up. I thought. Team Minato didn’t get promoted until eleven in canon, barring Kakashi._
But no one died, we met some major players, and I think we made some new friends.

So it wasn’t a total bust, then. I paused, casting outward with my chakra sense. Gai and Genma and Ebisu are still in the building. Mom and Hayate and Obito are in the cafeteria, with Rin headed their way. Yamaguchi-sensei is somewhere on this floor, probably making the rest of his rounds. And that leaves…

“Glad to see you’re awake, Kei-kun.” Sensei said from my bedside, nearly making me jump out of my skin.

In a tone that made her a liar with a giggle-fit, the Dreamer said, That is not at all funny.

Pull the other one, it’s got bells on.

“It’s good to be awake, Sensei.” I told him, with my heart rate kicking up again as I remembered that he’d wanted to discuss something with me before I’d gotten myself knocked out for a day or two. I’d kind of hoped he’d forgotten the whole thing, but with Sensei right in front of me I was aware that my chances of avoiding a confrontation were shrinking rapidly.

Shit, shit, shit, shit, shit…

“Are you really okay, after all that happened?” Sensei asked, sitting on the edge of the bed.

“…Yeah, I think I am.” I gave a nervous, incredibly insincere laugh. “I mean, what’s a nearly destroyed core tenketsu to being up for promotion, right?”

Whoops. The sarcasm kind of burst through there.

“If you didn’t want to compete, you could have just refused to sign the forms.” Sensei pointed out. He was patting me on the head again.

Yes, I could have, which is exactly why I didn’t. I said under my breath, “I couldn’t do that to them.”

Sensei’s eyebrow went up.

“…Putting that aside for the moment, I have a few things to talk to you about, Kei-kun. I’m just concerned.” Sensei told me, though I was sure that he had just jotted down another mental note about my weirdness in that steel-trap skull of his. “Obito mentioned that they chose you as the captain of the team during the Second Exam. I saw the footage, after, and I spoke to Tsume once she’d escorted Team Sasukibe out of the training grounds.”

Sensei has this habit of giving you just enough rope to hang yourself with.

“What are you asking, Sensei?” Of course, I also tended to butt in before the question actually popped up, which was one of my failings.

“A lot of things at once, actually. I have a list.” And sure enough, he produced a list. It came on a scroll and he wouldn’t let me see it. I even grabbed for it and missed.

Why does he have a list?!

PAPERWORK NINJA.

“First off, you and your teammates made it through the Chūnin Exams alive. That’s better than anyone had any right to expect.” Sensei told me, leaning back so the List was out of convenient reach.

Easy for the guy who fucking nominated us to say. WE’RE NINE YEARS OLD.

He didn’t seem to notice my directionless anger. It was neatly squashed when he finally looked up at me. I quailed under his stare. Meep. “But let me make this perfectly clear: despite the success you and Obito had with the explosive seals, never use untested seals again.”

“Eh?” I’d thought they were just duds, but…

Sensei emptied one of his flak jacket pockets and produced two crumpled paper tags—one of mine, done in scribbles and blood and ink and on rice paper, and a standard Konoha tag. “This is one of yours. This is one of the mock-ups I made of the Konoha standard—they have the same design, essentially. Mine’s a deliberately designed dud. Yours is an accidental dud.”

“…Okay.” I said, not sure where this was going.

Untested seal.

Like something from a memory long forgotten, the voice of R. Lee Ermey said inside my skull, “An ordnance technician at a dead run outranks everyone.”

…Well, I’m a fucking moron.

I facepalmed harder than I had at any point in this life before, and repeatedly. “Stupid, stupid, stupid!”

Sensei chuckled. “Well, at least I didn’t have to spell it out for you any more than that.”

“How could I be so blind?” I despaired, furious with myself and with my past self in particular for forgoing sleep to save a few ryō. Past Me was a stupid, stupid person. “Untested exploding tags? How did we not lose fingers?!”

“You were very, very lucky.” Sensei told me bluntly. Still, he didn’t seem quite as annoyed as he had before. “While it was a boneheaded move, Tsume tells me that it worked to scare Team Sasukibe into surrendering, which is probably the closest thing the Exams had to a bloodless victory this time around. Before you ever do that again, though, damn well let someone teach you more about sealing arts than just the form.”

Holy shit, is he saying what I think he’s saying.

“…Then can you teach me, Sensei?” I asked in a small voice.

Sensei smiled. “I was honestly waiting for you to ask.”

Yes, he is.

But I couldn’t have my “oh my god fucking finally I can get started on this preventative time travel/prophecy bullshit” moment. Not while Sensei was still being serious under the smile.

That was one item on the List.

In a way, I was glad that I was still in a hospital bed whether I needed it or not. Sensei would probably have just gone full Gunnery Sergeant With A Tack In His Boot if I had been hale and hearty and at the training grounds instead.
“Do you promise to actually pay attention, and to never use sealing techniques again until you actually know what you’re doing?” Sensei asked.

I nodded.

“Good. Then we’ll move on.” Sensei cleared his throat and unrolled the List a little more. “Under normal circumstances, most of what you pack for a mission falls under the category of ‘if it’s dead weight, leave it.’ A shinobi always has to be ready for a quick retreat, or a fight.”

“‘Never bring anything on a mission that you can’t afford to lose.’” I quoted, nodding.

“Yes, well.” Sensei looked sheepish for a moment. “I just realized I might not have actually told any of you how to get things back into a storage scroll. I honestly should have noticed earlier, but when you were playing with experimental tags it slipped my mind.”

I could feel the bottom drop out of my stomach. “How expensive was the stuff I ditched?”

“All in all, about ten thousand ryō or so. Some of it was yours, mind, so I’m sure you’ll have to explain that to your mother sooner or later.”

I’d have rather played fetch with a Chain Chomp. If I’d had the power, I’d go back in time to throttle Past Me.

After all the financial freakouts I’d had in this lifetime, after graduating early to take some of the burden off my mother, after holding back from buying the equipment I sometimes needed, I’d still do stupid things like that and it made me want to scream.

Stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, stupid, STUPID.

I didn’t realize I’d started to slap myself in the face again until Sensei caught my hand halfway there. I blinked at him stupidly, because he was giving me a sad look and I couldn’t, in that moment, figure out why.

“That’s enough.” Sensei said firmly, forcing my hand back down to my side. “You didn’t know, and I should have made sure you actually knew what you were getting into before I let you enter the Exam. Any tool you don’t understand well enough to use is a tool of the enemy, and I know you know that, Kei-kun. You didn’t know and you didn’t know to ask. That’s okay. That’s my fault. Next time, you’ll know everything you need to in order to earn that promotion.”

I nodded numbly.

“Which brings me to my last point.” Sensei sat back, letting go of my hand. But his expression was just as concerned as ever, and I didn’t get it because my brain was just refusing to make connections.

There was a silence that stretched just long enough to be awkward. I started twisting my sheets with anxious fingers. What could be worse than my idiocy, at least now that we were all out of danger?

“…What?” I asked at length, wishing I could sink into the mattress in shame. Leave me alone, leave me alone…

Sensei looked me right in the eye and said, “Kei-kun, you deserve to be here. Stop acting like you think you don’t.”

I immediately ducked my head, drawing my knees up so I could hide my face against them. Pat, pat. I probably ought to have told Sensei to stop treating me like a dog, but my throat was suspiciously clogged.

“You make some bad decisions, Kei-kun. You don’t think so well under pressure. You don’t have much of an attention span for things that don’t interest you, and you pick fights with Kakashi whenever you think Obito’s getting the worst of his attitude.” Sensei told me, still petting away. “You don’t talk about your problems even when your teammates could help. You hate shrimp ramen.”

At that last bit, I looked up, and Sensei waggled his eyebrows. I gave a hiccupping laugh, somehow.

“Good, you can still laugh.” Sensei smiled, too. “Now that I’ve outlined your flaws, keep in mind that it’s not really possible to be all bad. You were placed on my team for a reason, and not just because Yamaguchi-sensei seems to think Rin-chan is the next Tsunade.”

I gave another strangled laugh, because I had my own thoughts on the matter.

“You’re intelligent and driven when you have a reason to show it.” Sensei leaned over, pulling a spare blanket from nowhere, and draped it over me so I could hide in it like a turtle. Then he went on. “You care about your teammates, even if you’re not much for balancing the strained egos that involves. You’re on your way to becoming a kenjutsu expert in a few years, and you’re a decent medic if Yamaguchi-sensei thought you could get by on what you know at age nine.”

But I shouldn’t exist here! I don’t know if I stole this life from a girl who should have been Hayate’s sister, if I stole Rin’s role in the world, if…I don’t know if I can ever do enough to make everything hurt less than it does.

The wreck of the Kannabi Bridge loomed at the front of my mind, a memorial to a long-lost bright future and meaningless deaths.

I don’t know if I can save anyone.

“But you need to learn.” Sensei put his hands on my shoulders, as I hunched down further. “And you can’t do that if you hide everything away in a box and won’t let anyone know what you can and can’t do. Kei-kun, I need to understand what it is that you need from me in order to be a better shinobi.”

I need to know how to seal a tailed beast. I thought, biting down on my lower lip. I need to know how to save the people I care about, and what use is this stupid foreknowledge if I can’t even figure out how to do anything once time catches up?

“Some of it will come with time, and with growing up.” Sensei went on. “But for now, just know that you’re better than you think. I’m glad you’re one of my students, and I’m sure Obito and Kakashi are happy they’re on your team. You’re not stupid or useless, you’re just inexperienced. And practice makes perfect, you know?”

I nodded again, not trusting myself to speak.

WHAM.

While Sensei jumped, I huddled deeper into my blankets and tried to sniffle less obviously.

“I’d like to hear a good explanation for why my daughter is crying, Namikaze-san.” Mom said, and I didn’t even need to look to know that she’d probably knocked a hole in a wall from the force she’d used on the door. The doorknob would never be the same.
“It’s f-fine, Mom.” I said, before she could break out the katana or Sensei could decide whether or not to just teleport away. I sounded terrible—that lump in my throat hadn’t gone away.

“Kei-chan?” Mom asked, and as Sensei got off the bed, Mom sat down. She immediately pulled the whole bundle that was me into her lap.

“Just a post-mission debrief, Gekkō-san.” Sensei told her, but that might have been the wrong thing to say.

I don’t think Sensei had a lot of experience with parents. His, or anyone else’s.

“I understand, Namikaze-san, but this is a hospital, and my daughter is currently a patient. If you want to raise her blood pressure, do so when she’s not hooked up to so many machines.” Mom said flatly, confirming the idea that Sensei had, in fact, said the wrong thing.

Using the Dreamer’s control over her half of my chakra, as well as mine, I worked on forcing my emotions back under control. Technically, it wasn’t really possible to meditate like this, but if I was careful I could kick-start the parasympathetic half of my nervous system. I could force normalcy, in a way.

By the way? Don’t try this at home. Get a glass of water and a hug like a normal person.

Forcing my mouth into a smile, because that helped too, I took a deep breath and said, “It’s okay, Mom. Sensei was just helping me with a couple of things.”

Mom stared at me. She looked at Sensei a second later, as though for confirmation, before looking back to me. “You’re sure, Kei-chan?”

“Yeah. Not everything you need to hear is sunshine and sparkles.” I dabbed at my eyes with the hospital sheets—which was probably unsanitary but whatever—and gave her a wobbly sort of smile. I repeated, “It’s okay.”

Mom hugged me right after that, Sensei teleported out of the room, and I had the weirdest feeling that I’d managed to avert World War Three.

“Don’t ever do something so risky ever again.” Mom said into my hair, squishing me against her.

“Not until I get promoted, at least.” I teased, a huff of laughter on my breath. My fingers tightened in her shirt. “Sorry for making you worry.”

“Oh, I think you’ll give me plenty of reasons to worry the longer you’re a shinobi.” Mom said. “You and your brother. Don’t apologize if you don’t plan to change that.”

I didn’t, and I’d stay on this path until it killed me. I buried my face in her shoulder and wasn’t sure whether to laugh or cry. So I did both.

Eventually, I must have fallen asleep. It was dark when I woke up again, and I faintly suspected that Mom had done some kind of weird parenting miracle thing where I could go to sleep in her arms and not even have a Dreamer vision kick me in the cerebral cortex.

No matter what happened, I woke up and wriggled in my blankets until I was more or less upright, looking out the window at the street lamps. It was raining, with the drops dancing in the faint bluish hue of the backlit night. I could see shop fronts closing for the night, the glow of lights winking out and hearing the sliding metal shutters.
I leaned on the windowsill, against the bug screen, and hummed.

Made a wrong turn

Once or twice

Dug my way out

Blood and fire

Going by the lack of their chakra around, I surmised that Mom and Hayate had gone home for dinner. Obito and Rin were gone too, and I hoped that they’d gone with my family and been able to get a decent meal. Sensei was out in the village—I wanted to say around the Hokage’s office or the Academy—and I could feel Kushina bustling about due to her immense reserves.

That accounted for almost everyone.

“Nice night, isn’t it?” I asked.

“I guess,” said Kakashi.

I glanced at him—aside from his hair, he was pretty much invisible in the darkened hospital room. I waved him over. “Come on, the bed’s big enough that you don’t need to hover.”

Kakashi made a noncommittal noise, but he still made his way over. He sat on the metal railing on the edge of the bed with one ankle hooked between the rails to keep his balance, which was just about as far away from me as he could get while being on the bed at all. Still. I didn’t ask him how long he’d been waiting for me to return to the land of the living.

“Thanks for visiting.” I told him. At his sidelong look—he was mostly looking out the window—I added, “Yamaguchi-sensei told me you visited. So. Thanks for that.”

Kakashi shrugged, looking uncomfortable. “Everyone else did.”

“You’re not everyone else and you showed up late, so shut up and let me thank you.” I said.

“Always pushy, aren’t you?” Kakashi replied, huffing.

“I can’t get anything done otherwise.” I looked out the window again, as people scurried out of the rain. They were the size of mice from up here. “...I’m glad we all made it out okay. I know we aren’t the best team, but it’d really suck if we weren’t anymore. You know?”

“Yes, I do.” Kakashi said, sounding a little unfocused. He looked at me again. “I did say that I’d hate having to break in another genin team, didn’t I?”

“Yeah, and I can’t really imagine you being as accepting the second time through.” I said, almost under my breath.

He hadn’t been, when Team Kakashi’s triad of walking disasters had come along. No one really gets over the loss of their first comrades, I think. Especially Kakashi.

“By the way, here.” Kakashi said, pulling something out of one of his many pockets. He tossed it idly at me, and I caught it without thinking, “It took me a while to find any that grew in the winter, but I guess that’s what I get for waiting so long. Figured you’d get sick of hospital food, if you aren’t already.”
It was an apple.

I rolled the apple around in my hands for a moment, contemplating.

I guess this is contraband.

Tasty contraband.

Kakashi raised an eyebrow at me. “Are you going to eat it or hide it away for six months like a squirrel?”

“Better plan.” I said, and focused my chakra into my right hand. Since I knew I’d taken the knockout hit with my left side and thus suffered the most damage there, I was pretty sure my right arm was working fine. I couldn’t feel anything wrong with it and the Dreamer would have spoken up if she had.

Without hand seals, I activated my chakra scalpel and sliced the apple in half by rotating my fingers around what, on a globe, would have been the prime meridian.

“You can use that jutsu without hand seals?” Kakashi asked, blinking.

Another secret out, I supposed. But anyone who watched my performance during the Chūnin Exams would know that I was at least capable of a seal-less Replacement, if not the other Academy jutsu.

“Yeah. I’ve been working on it with Yamaguchi-sensei since I was seven.” I told him distractedly, plucking seeds from the middle of the fruit with the same technique. I held up the half without the stem stuck to it. “Want any?”

Kakashi took his half wordlessly, and I turned away to watch the rain fall.
When I wake up, it takes me a minute to remember why there’s an elbow in my ribs.

If I was at home, all I’d feel in the morning would be my scratchy sheets and maybe some scrolls—I fall asleep at night looking at notes, sometimes. I guess sometimes the inkpot I use falls over, but that’s okay because the ink always dries up sooner than that. It’s not okay when the pencils I use other times stab the mattress, since it’s old and deserves better than stab somes. In the morning, sunlight gets in my room from the windows and it’s too bright to stay asleep for all that long, which sucks because I don’t ever seem to get a lot of sleep.

There’s never anyone in my apartment.

Just me.

It gets kind of tiring, being alone all the time.

I mean, I don’t clean my apartment much but I just don’t have people over. The place is okay. It’s not that big. Maybe I wouldn’t be able to have a game night anyway, without other kids having to sit on upside-down buckets and stuff.

I wouldn’t know, since I never have. You kind of need more than two friends for that.

Someone decides to kick in the door then. I roll over, grumbling, but the cast on my arm gets in my way and the sunlight beats down on my face like a hammer. Then I blink, because whoever opened the door also decides to stand over me and yank the covers off.

“Obito, Hayate-chan, Iruka-chan, it’s time to get up!”

Rin is the cutest girl in the entire world, but she loves mornings way too much.

“But Rin-chaaaaaan.” I whine, throwing my free hand over my face. “It’s way too early…”

Rin is already shoving the smaller kids out of the bed. Iruka flops to the floor with a thud, while Hayate manages to get his feet under him before promptly tripping over Iruka anyway. Rin doesn’t have to drag me out of bed because I’m not dumb enough to push my luck, but even when I’m upright I don’t feel too awake.
“Feeling any better, Obito?” Rin asks as the other two boys finally remember how to use their legs. Hayate is yawning and Iruka’s hair’s all over the place, but they’re up and a sharp look from Rin sends them scurrying out of the room.

“A little, Rin-chan.” I say, glancing down. My shoulder still hurts, but not as much as it had. I mean, I broke it earlier because Gai was a freak with super-strong punches, but after the medics took a look, I was okay. Rin hovered a lot and Kei kept pulling her brother off me and Kei’s mom made concerned faces at me when she thought I wasn’t looking, but I was really fine with that. That they were looking at all was better than being at home, you know?

“Let me see it.” Rin says, and I’m about to argue before I bite my tongue and just let go. She puts one hand on my shoulder and the other against the side of my neck, and I feel myself go warm where her hands are.

There are worse things than having friends around when you’re feeling like crap. It’s better when it’s Rin.

Rin has small hands. She always has a smile for someone who needs one. She cares, when a lot of people don’t. Recently she’s learned to use all of that and become a medic-nin, even if she’s still a genin like Kei and me. I still think we should’ve made it past Team Genma and to the finals, but I guess it’s not really gonna happen now. If we had, Rin could be a chūnin and get started on all the cool medical stuff Yamaguchi-sensei says she can’t learn until she gets older. She would be able to learn all the medical jutsu ever, if she was just a bit closer to being a grown-up, and then maybe we’d be able to get on the road to becoming really cool.

I still want to be Hokage. It’s just that I’m starting to get how long that might take. There’s a long road ahead of me, with pitfalls and roadblocks and things. After all, a real Hokage wouldn’t be beat up by Maito Gai. I think I might be able to take him if I train a lot more, but I can’t until my shoulder heals.

So, really, the first thing to do is let Rin check up on me and see if she can speed things up.

I can feel my face heating up, so I turn my head away so she can’t see it. It’s not cool to blush a lot around girls. They get nasty about it, and even if Rin isn’t like some other girls I know, I don’t like thinking about it.

There’s a knock at the door and Rin lets go of me. Getting interrupted in the middle of a checkup is so not cool.

“Hey, Rin-chan, Obito, it’s almost time for breakfast.”

“We’ll be out in a moment, Kei-senpai.” Rin says.

Kei chooses that moment to poke her head in anyway.

“Liar. If you’re looking at injuries, Rin-chan, you’ll be in here forever and breakfast will get cold and Mom will yell at me later about being a lousy host.” Kei replies, all in one breath.

“Your mom never yells at you.” I say, because I don’t think I’ve ever seen Miyako mad before.

“Not where you can hear it.” Kei says, smiling crookedly. “Anyway. Breakfast. Seriously, Rin-chan, we can get him to the hospital after we eat if you’re that worried.”

“If I was that worried, I’d think we should go the hospital now.” Rin says.
“Hello? I’m right here and I’m hungry.” I say, to keep them from arguing more.

“You okay with eating left-handed?” Kei asks.

I scoff. “Well, yeah. Been doing it since before you woke up.”

“Point.” Kei says. She leads the way out.

Kei always leads.

Sometimes I’m not really sure what I’m supposed to think about Kei. She’s not cute or nice like Rin, or at least not in the same way. She always looks tired out, like she just rolled out of bed, and she can be mean sometimes in a way that’s funny if it’s not aimed at you. She talks a lot if she knows you, and she gives nice hugs when I need them. She’s also stronger than me—or at least that’s what the reports on us said. She doesn’t act like it, though—if she did, it’d be like having two Kakashis on my team and I’m not sure I would be able to stand that. Instead, she gets into all kinds of fights with Kakashi and always is on my side.

I’m not sure how to feel about that. I’m not sure if she likes me more or thinks I can’t fight on my own. I’m not sure if I should be angry at her for being like that or at Kakashi for always being a bully.

Kei bumps my shoulder as we enter the kitchen. Somehow Rin’s ended up in front and Kei is back by me and there’s already a conversation going between Iruka and Miyako and Hayate and Yūgao and Rin. I can’t follow most of it because the littler kids always talk over each other about weird stuff.

“Something wrong, Obito?” Kei asks quietly.

Someday I’m gonna have to ask her how she always knows when my feelings aren’t making any sense.

“Nah, everything’s fine.” I tell her, and she gives me the look that lets me know that she doesn’t believe that for a second.

I’m not sure how to tell her that I’m tired of being weak and of being alone and now that I’m not alone on my birthday I’m not sure how to deal with it at all.

I’ve got dust in my eyes again.

Kei stops before we get within sight of the others, grabbing my hand to stop me, too. “Obito, I didn’t invite you over to make you cry.”

“I know that,” I tell her. My voice shouldn’t be squeaking but it is and I hate it.

She frowns. It’s not her “I hate you and everyone else” frown that she uses when she loses to Kakashi in spars (which is pretty much all the time because she can’t use her sword), or the frown she uses when she’s confused because Rin is starting to speak Medic and Kei never got that far into the whole thing. She’s thinking about something.

“Rin-chan, could I borrow you for a minute?” Kei calls, and I want to hit her for a second because I don’t know how to deal with this and Rin doesn’t need to see me fail at it.

“Yes, we were just—oh, Obito.” Rin doesn’t need to think before she takes my other hand, pulling herself in.
Kei puts her arms around my neck and Rin hugs me around my middle and I hug both of them unevenly because they aren’t giving me a lot of room and then I really start crying.

“Mom’s getting the kids out on the porch.” Kei says, almost like she was going to say it anyway and the fact that they’re hugging it out isn’t part of it.

“No one has to see if you don’t want them to.” Rin says, picking up the thread without pausing.

“Well, except Mom.” Kei says, and Obito can hear the wonky smile in her tone. “Mom’s been wanting to hug you for ages and—”

“No! No, no, I’m fine, can we just get something to eat?” I’m babbling, I know that, and Rin pulls back enough to give me a really disappointed look that sends my stomach somewhere around my toes. When Rin gives me that look it’s…it’s like all kinds of bad and I feel awful after.

I push my way free because I can’t stand it, being the one who always has to be picked up and put back together. On my birthday, too. I rub my sleeve over my eyes because it feels awful to cry over something so dumb even if Kei and Rin don’t make fun of me for it.

Kei’s gone and back before I even realize what she’s doing, while Rin sticks with me. Guess all that sparring with Kakashi meant something, because she has a bowl of steamed rice with fish and dried seaweed and egg in front of me. Chopsticks, too.

“Thanks.” I say, and settle down cross-legged on the floor. Kei and Rin are both giving me these looks, and I have to ignore them or I’ll start again.

Kei looks at Rin, who, after a moment, sits down next to me. Then Kei squeezes my shoulder before walking out of the hallway and into the kitchen.

I can hear her saying something to her mom, while Rin sticks to me like glue.

“It’s hard.” I say to Rin, not even trying to start eating. “I…I don’t know what to do with this.”

“With what?” Rin asks, and her fingers move mine so I’m actually holding the chopsticks.

“This is…I think this is the first birthday I’ve had with so many people around.” I admit.

Rin’s face…can’t decide if it’s sad for me or just sad. Maybe she’s feeling both.

Then she sighs, shaking her head. “Then you have to get used to it, Obito. Because me and Kei-senpai and Miyako-san and Hayate-chan…we’re never going to leave you alone.”

That doesn’t sound like a bad idea.

Kei comes back, leading her mom. She has the kind of look that says that she’s embarrassed because she feels like someone else should be embarrassed, not because she is, and I can’t see why for a moment or two.

Then Miyako hugs me, in front of Rin and Kei, and then I kind of want to turn red myself.

I’m ten now and way too big for being picked up like a little kid anymore, but it still feels nice to be hugged by someone bigger than me.

I don’t know what it feels like to be hugged by a mother, because I can’t remember mine, but I think I have an idea.
“Happy birthday, Obito-kun.” Miyako says.

“Thanks, Miyako-san.” I say shakily.

Miyako lets go of me, brushing imaginary dust out of my hair with a pat. “Now, let’s concentrate on what you wanted to do for your birthday.” She smiles, crooked like Kei’s but also warm. “Birthdays aren’t for sitting around in hallways. Let’s get to the rest of it before the sun burns out.”

You know what? I think the big thing to take away from here is to not sweat the small stuff. I mean, yeah, I’m not great at being a good person and I want too much stuff and I can’t deal with people being around all the time, but it’s my birthday. I’m surrounding by people I like, who like me back. Whether I got up with a foot that fell asleep on me, or if I was a bit twitchy? That’s all right. That’s okay. Because whatever I do next…well…

It’s going to be awesome.

Here’s to another awesome year with my precious people.
Making Progress: Second Time's the Charm

Chapter Summary

Kei: Take the Exams again.

Moving meditation is something that isn’t emphasized enough. Sure, I have a preference for sitting still whenever possible, but I’ve always been prone to pacing. I got it under control over the years—teachers tend not to like it when a student spends half the day walking around the classroom—but when at home or alone I still like to move to think.

In the end, I almost like shadow-boxing because it facilitates just that.

On rest days, Training Ground Three is a pretty nice place to do both—and, on top of everything else, to practice water-walking.

I drew my kodachi.

I shot across the river, weaving and slashing the empty air as I went. I might have needed a sparring partner any other time, for the sake of balance and safety if nothing else. But I didn’t want anyone to see me. Between constantly adjusting my chakra output as I moved across the surface of the water and throwing out punches and kicks exactly where I wanted them to go (and the occasional vicious slash of my kodachi), I practiced how to read the chakra in the air around me and my own body, so I could move blind if I have to. Since being reborn, my feel for my own body was much stronger—I could gauge distances and my strikes much better than I had ever needed to in my old life. But it never hurt to keep in shape.

After a while, I changed over from the Academy style, which is a warm-up at best, to the combination taijutsu/kenjutsu that my mother had taught me. It’s more acrobatic, requiring more flexibility as well as speed, and I loosened my control over my chakra’s anchoring properties to give myself more of a challenge. If I had to, I could slip across the water as though on ice skates, but I never thought of myself a great skater and it’d be better to hold off on that until I had a moment to grab Obito for the sake of comedy. He needed to laugh more.

In a brilliant moment of cosmic timing, I nearly ended up slipping and landing in the river. Somehow, my flailing translated to doing a completely unplanned frontal split (which, in my old life, I would never have even contemplated). Instead of taking a dive, though, I slapped one hand onto the surface of the river, chakra flaring, and executed a perfect double front handspring (which would have just been physically impossible for the old me). As I rotated through the air, I changed up my game and landed in a rough mockery of Kakashi’s freestyle taijutsu starting stance.

I had no idea what I was doing, but why stop when I was on a roll?

Kakashi’s style is faster and than mine, but it’s all about flexibility and unexpected angles. Kakashi was the only kid my physical age I’d ever seen attack from above, below, upside-down, a handstand, and from underground. He didn’t use his dad’s chakra saber when he could have—my kodachi is longer and more cumbersome in a style like his—but he used kunai similarly. From what I could tell, his style was really more about the ability to attack from any stance or direction regardless of the user’s size. It’s the exact opposite of Gai’s style at his age—the Strong Fist was basically about turning the opponent into a quivering ball of agony in as few steps as possible—and thus better for me to learn.

I may have been a medical student for a couple of years, but that’s nowhere near enough to learn stuff like Tsunade’s monstrous strength. Honestly, I’ll probably never pull it off. I couldn’t say I minded all that much, because ultimately that technique didn’t really mesh with any of my other techniques—why be the queen of blunt force trauma when I was already on my way to being the hack-and-slash type? I figured I’d be fine as long as I learned a wide variety of techniques, which Sensei would help with if we both lived long enough.

I had my own take on one-hit-kill jutsu anyway, provided that I could make it as automatic as Kabuto did (or rather, would).

I sheathed my kodachi again.

Tiger, horse, rabbit, rat, dog.

Chakra scalpels flared to life over my hands, providing surgically precise offense (if I timed it right, anyway). I lashed out in a sweeping motion, using two fingers rather than my whole hand in order to maintain precision even at speed, and the air seemed to split.

If I had a choice, I’d still go for my kodachi first, but there would be times when that wasn’t feasible. I had to prepare.

I let them go after a moment or two. Chakra scalpels were my backup weapons, and they weren’t especially chakra-efficient. As long as I could call them up in a heartbeat, I at least had a chance.

I slowed down. I only knew two major types of taijutsu, and I wasn’t exactly going to practice my ninjutsu on the water if most of them were kind of useless. They weren’t for direct offense—distraction was always key.

Well, I thought, time for the airborne stuff.

I pushed off from the surface, launching into a cartwheel to build momentum. Twisting in the air, now leading with my feet rather than my hands, I executed a double back handspring as I went. I kind of hoped I wasn’t underestimating the width of the river (considering that my eyes were still closed), because hitting the bank now would suck and probably hurt, but it was too late for that. As my feet touched the water again, I sprung upward and bent my knees, swinging my arms along with them, and there, I’ve landed again. I went for one last rotation, leading with my head, and my legs splay out in the air into a very deliberate split. The fact that I probably got five meters of air on each move meant I was on the other side of the river by the end of the sequence.

I would never get over the sheer physical difference between shinobi and baseline humans. I went from average idiot in one life to someone surpassing Olympic-level gymnasts over the course of eleven years and one probable death.

And I wasn’t anywhere near the strongest one here. A sobering thought.

I opened my eyes to the sound of slow clapping. Glancing up at the sky, I guessed that it was about noon. I’d burned an hour flailing around on my own in Training Ground Three.

Good. That gave my interim sensei time to get back from a ramen run.

“Not bad.” Kushina said. She had the sarcastic slow clap down, but I didn’t think she was being sarcastic just then.
I bowed, hiding a grin. “Thank you, Kushina-san.”

“Don’t let it go to your head.” Kushina said, wagging one finger in a mockery of seriousness. “You still have a ways to go before you can face that Gai kid Minato keeps going on about.”

“I know. I’m not ready yet.” I admitted. It stung only slightly—Gai was simply better than I was. Still, it did say something about my progress that neither Sensei nor Kushina seemed to think I’d have any trouble fighting Asuma, who was my actual first opponent in two weeks.

Obito would be facing off against Gai first. I wasn’t sure how to feel about that, but at least Sensei and Kakashi were both on hand to help him train. There were four others in the tournament: Rin, Kurenai, Tonbo Tomitake (that one guy who wore bandages over the top half of his head) and Shimon Hijiri (the other guy with long bangs whose eyes somehow stayed invisible). I wasn’t really sure what to expect out of the latter pair, but I knew that Rin could do no worse than a draw against Kurenai.

Kushina patted me on the head, which made me briefly wonder if there was some kind of magnet installed in my brain.

“Well, even if you’re not actually read to face Gai—or you think you aren’t—don’t worry.” Kushina told me. I blinked up at her. “I think you are ready to be a chūnin. Everything else will fall into place.”

It was maybe the third time anyone had said that.

That I could be chūnin. First, Obito had said it two years ago. Then Mom, after I’d made it through the Second Exam again with my team alive and well. Sensei hadn’t said anything, but he might not have needed to—the fact that he’d asked his fiancée to train with me spoke volumes without any words at all.

Now Kushina.

I hoped everything would go as planned. It’d be nice to see that happen at least once.

“Now, let’s see where you’ve gotten with your explosive seals.” Kushina said, and we sat down together on the riverbank, poring over scrolls for the rest of the afternoon.

I’ll say this for the Chūnin Exam arena: it’s dramatic as hell. The only thing I ever thought was missing was a ring of fire separating the spectators from the fighters—that’s probably because I watched too many movies as a kid the last time around. There wasn’t enough of The Lion King’s atmosphere. It wasn’t raining, it wasn’t surrounded by fire and/or hyenas, and no one in the crowd had much riding on who won. Except maybe gambling money, because some things never change.

Then again, if there was, I guess that would make me Scar. I sure as hell wasn’t Simba.

I kept my hands at my sides, rather than reaching for the blade at my left hip. Even in official matches, “false starts” didn’t really mean anything, but if I punched my opponent in the face before the match started…well, let’s just say that I’d be on the Hokage’s shit-list for at least a month.

And besides, Mom and Sensei and Rin and Obito and Kakashi were all watching, which made me somewhat less likely to just haul off and sort my opponent out the way I’d liked to have.

“The first semifinal match will be Asuma Sarutobi versus Keisuke Gekkō.” The proctor—Tsume Inuzuka—gave us both a grin that threatened to crack her head in half. She seemed to be looking forward to the bloodletting. Or maybe she wanted to see if I could mess with Asuma the same way I had two years ago.

Speaking of two years ago, both of us had gotten physically bigger. I’d put on a few inches and more pounds of muscle than I’d probably ever had in my old life (because I was a mouse potato with no real strength at all), and was almost tall enough that I could use a real katana smoothly. I was actually about the same size as Asuma, barring the fact that he was still wider in the shoulders. It wasn’t enough to intimidate him, though. Not after out-thinking him back then.

I was kinda glad that Hayate was stuck at school, though. Mom could have written him a note or something, but I guess her priority was a combination of “school is important” and “he shouldn’t see his big sister lose.”

I’d already put in my hours of practice and I could almost fight my teammates evenly. I wasn’t sure if I was supposed to find her lack of faith disturbing or what.

And anyway, I wasn’t afraid of Asuma. I knew what he could do—I’d watched his match against Ebisu and hadn’t been all that impressed. Ebisu wasn’t the be-all and end-all of opponents, but he was tricky enough to at least force people to fight him with guile and tactics. I hadn’t seen much of Asuma doing just that—he was all power, and when you got down to it he wasn’t even strong. (Granted, that was a month ago, but I assumed there would be some consistency in how Asuma fought.)

Assuming I won, I was afraid of Gai.

(Seeing the ridiculous beat-down Gai and Obito gave each other an hour ago, my fear of one Maito Gai was renewed with a vengeance.)

If I didn’t, then…whatever. I didn’t see myself losing to Asuma, but if I did, Gai was his problem.

The arena went silent, waiting for the cue.

“Ready?” Tsume asked. Kuromaru lay by her feet, lips pulled back from his teeth.

My greatest accomplishment in life is being quality entertainment for a giant Inuzuka dog. Clearly, this is the life. I thought, crazily.

Asuma and I both nodded, though we didn’t take our eyes off each other. That would have been stupid.

“GO FOR IT, BRATS!” Tsume shouted, one hand slicing through the air like an axe.

Asuma charged.

I sure as hell didn’t.

Because of Kushina’s help, I mostly needed to stall to complete my plan. I was going to seed the entire arena with explosive tags and traps starting in this match, in case I moved on. They’d only respond to me, and I needed every advantage against Gai that I could get. The traps weren’t activated by physical pressure, but I still liked the idea of having enough explosives to make even Deidara pause. Obviously I wasn’t nearly in the Rock-nin’s league, but I figured that demonstrating some forethought would be a bonus in the eyes of the judges.

I slammed my palm into the dirt and shouted, “Explode!” with my chakra following the dormant lines I’d laid.
I closed my eyes against the dirt and smoke thrown up by the blast, but I could still feel Asuma’s chakra warp to the arena’s sole tree as he used the Replacement jutsu. Just as well, really—it would have been bad form to knock the Hokage’s son out in the first few seconds of the match.

I pulled my kodachi loose from my hip strap just as Asuma crashed back into me, kunai out.

I didn’t even have to draw to block—my metal sheath was enough. There was a bit of a scrape along the outside edge of the metal, taking off some paint and paneling, but not enough to compromise its structural soundness.

He was still in the air.

Bad idea.

Blocking overhead might have given me some leverage problems, but being in the air had made it so that the only leverage he had was based on his launch speed, vector, and weight.

Asuma hadn’t hit his growth spurt yet, and I was still on the ground.

My right thumb flicked my kodachi loose from the sheath, just as I planted my forward foot solidly in the ground with my chakra. With my left hand, I grabbed Asuma’s jacket collar as he passed overhead.

Twist aaaaaand launch.

Asuma went hurtling toward the far arena wall.

I straightened, kodachi level with his throat as he recovered and stood. I might have been too far away to directly threaten him, but I could damn well do it indirectly.

After a second, I finally thought of something to say, even if it was under my breath and incredibly lame. “And once again, Physics class rears its ugly head…”

Asuma scowled up at me, looking like a pissed-off lion cub. Even if he was from the freaking monkey clan.

Come on, Simba, remember who you are.

I grinned crookedly.

Come at me, kid.

I ducked under Asuma’s roundhouse, planting one hand and launching myself away when he tried to follow up with a stomp. His punches weren’t weak at all, but I’d been training with Kakashi and the long-established chūnin had long since decided that if I was going to try and really punch his lights out, he should get to repay the favor.

Too bad for him that, by that point, the gap between us wasn’t overwhelming. He was still stronger and faster than I was, but it wasn’t the kind of gap that, for example, existed between Minato and everyone else in speed.

And the difference between Asuma and I, when you got down to it, was about the same as the distance between Kakashi and I. But in reverse.

Honestly, half of my attention wasn’t even on Asuma at all.
It was on planting explosives all around the ring for the next round. While Sensei hadn’t gotten around to teaching me how to lay seals by touch and will alone (presumably because he thought I was going to get myself blown up by accident), I was pretty good at laying mini-tags everywhere if I had to. If a normal tag had the explosive power of a large grenade or a stick of dynamite, mine were very tiny chunks of C4.

By the time I finally got around to forcing him into a submission hold, outward curve of my kodachi resting against his Adam’s apple, I had enough explosive tags hidden all around the stadium to make my next match a little bit more even.

“EXPLODE!” I roared, slamming my chakra through the pre-prepared lines I’d woven through the ground.

Gai was launched skyward by the blast…only to explode into smoke and leaves as he used the Replacement technique.

Sonovabitch.

Gai, as expected, was a lot harder to deal with than Asuma had been.

The way my forearms were throbbing after blocking just one of his signature overpowered kicks…well, suffice to say that I sure as hell couldn’t beat him in a slugging match. He was at least as fast as Kakashi, if not faster, which meant I was lagging behind. He had twice the physical and spiritual endurance I did, whether on offense or defense. Sure, his taijutsu specialization meant that I could outrange him, but fuck if I could get away long enough to actually take advantage of that.

Still, he wasn’t quite as quick as some of the people I trained with. I felt his chakra shift farther away, but he still landed directly on top of another trap.

EXPLODE!

He wasn’t going to get another running start at me if I could help it.

“The hell was that, Gai?” I called. “At least dodge somewhere safe!”

I didn’t dislike Gai. I was just afraid of getting pounded into the ground. For some reason my mouth refused to listen to either distinction.

“Your concern for your opponent’s health does you credit, Keisuke-kun!” Gai said at the top of his lungs.

Once again, we were trading close-range blows and I felt my bones rattle under each strike. I could at least manage to turn his blows aside, which was better than nothing even if it hurt like hell. I ducked under a roundhouse and over a follow-up sweep, throwing myself into a back handspring.

Gai followed, and I leapfrogged over another would-be punishing kick.

“Thanks for the compliment, Gai-san,” I grunted, because a spin and a full-powered punch had followed immediately after and I blocked it badly. The strike drove my own elbow in a glancing blow against my side, making me wince.

I ducked again and drew my kodachi one-handed, slashing at his supporting leg.

My sword gave a hideous shriek as it met Gai’s leg weights.
I straightened, completely screwing up a blocking stand. Gai, being Gai, got past it easily.

And then Gai punched me in the chest.

Specifically, my developing eleven-year-old left breast.

Suffice to say I got the wind knocked out of me in short order. My eyes watered enough that everything was a swimming blur and I could just barely tell that Gai had slowed down quite a lot. In hindsight, I have no idea how I managed to avoid his much-slower follow-up punch, which should have left me unconscious. I just remember staggering backward, wheezing, and landing on my knees.

I even dropped my sword, curling inward around the brand new weak spot that puberty had given me.

After what felt like a while, my blood stopped pounding.

“—kun? Keisuke-kun? I appear to have done you a most unyouthful injury.” Gai was saying, sounding more confused than I’d ever heard him.

It was my fault for fucking up when I went for a block rather than a sidestep, but I was pissed off. It had less to do with feeling like Gai had landed a cheap shot (since, in hindsight, he hadn’t), and more that I’d been reduced to a kid in the fetal position in public. Shame burned me—I wanted nothing more than to destroy him for humiliating me like that.

What can I say? Sometimes I’m not a good person.

All in all, I was probably down for about ten seconds. About long enough for Gai to notice and then say something.

I sent chakra to my hands without any seals at all, and went for Gai’s face with my chakra scalpels.

He just barely jerked back in time. As it was, my glowing hands passed within centimeters of his nose, and I was too angry to care about anything but the fact that I’d missed.

I settled into my mockup of Kakashi’s style. Blood pounding in my ears, I was almost too angry to think. How dare you, I thought. How dare you?

It was like a mantra.

It was also an awful tack to take.

Gai was my friend. Maybe we weren’t especially close and maybe we weren’t the sort to see eye-to-eye, but if I’d been thinking straight I wouldn’t have risked our friendship over a promotion. Sorry, but no. Not that ambitious, normally.

“I am glad to see that your injury has not dampened your enthusiasm, Keisuke-kun, but—!”

“SHUT UP!” I shrieked, slashing again and again. I was too dangerous to block—I was acting more like Kabuto and less like Rin, only neither of them ever attacked in a blind rage. I was acting, all told, like Sasuke.

Sasuke of the far future, anyway.
I managed to stay pissed off for about another thirty seconds, by which time I’d cut muscle fiber in both of Gai’s arms, before my higher thought processes caught up with me.

Gai was looking at me like he’d just found out that his friend was a werewolf. And not the Remus Lupin type, either. Still, his weights were too thick for me to cut through, which means he could, in fact, block with his feet. It’d saved him from a thorough mangling.

I dismissed my chakra scalpels, pushing down a brief sensation of horror. What the hell was wrong with me?

Other than how I apparently could be pissed off enough by public humiliation to go on a revenge-bender for a minute.

“Keisuke-kun…was…are you a girl?”

…For God’s sake, Gai.

“…You are literally the last friend I have to realize that.” I told him flatly, in a voice that was still a little warped by residual adrenaline.

The Dreamer chose this moment to chime in with a cheerfully evil, THIS IS THE STUPIDEST THING YOU’VE EVER DONE.

Gai, I noticed, seemed like he was on the brink of some kind of shouting fit.

And I was too far away to stop his word vomit.

Oh hell.

“Forgive me, Keisuke-chan, for I have offered you unbelievable insult!”

Gai was like a speaker system at a concert. Loud enough to rock your bones. I was torn between clapping my hands over my ears or rushing over to slap him in the face, so I ended up being too frozen to do either.

“FIRST WAS THE TIME WE MET, WHERE I ASSUMED YOU WERE A BOY WITHOUT NOTICING YOUR UNDENIABLE CHARMs! THE SECOND WAS WHEN I CHALLENGED MY RIVAL TO A SUMO MATCH IN YOUR PRESENCE. THE THIRD WAS AT THE PUBLIC BATHHOUSES, WHERE—!”

I ended up contemplating a lot of courses of action while he was talking. Among them, ritual suicide.

I settled for slamming my chakra into my legs, launching myself at him like a rocket.

And then I kicked him in the groin.

It was quite possibly the stupidest match in the history of the public arena.

Overall, Gai and I decided we were even. Gai didn’t mean to cheap-shot me, and I didn’t really mean to try and take his nose off. He did, however, choose nearly the most embarrassing method of apology short of being Major Alex Louis Armstrong, and I definitely cheap-shotted him.

In penance, I agreed to be his sparring partner for two weeks (during the time he was developing the Primary Lotus). And he agreed to stop lamenting his past transgressions against a “flower of Konoha.” Forever.

All in all the exams ended with my entire team being promoted—Rin, Obito, and I were all officially chūnin-ranked shinobi right on schedule. Gai was also promoted (based mostly on his match with Obito, I think), as was Asuma. Overall, we had a much higher proportion of graduates than most Exams did, but we needed them.

Either that or standards were lowered during wartime.

I sighed mentally. Chūnin at age eleven.

There were only two years until we were handed That Mission.

We’d just have to be ready.

To: Kei-chan/Half-Pint/Keisuke Gekkō/Squirt

From: Rikuto of the Chinatsugumi

(After a huge blotch of ink indicating someone’s failed attempt to cross something out without ruining a page…)

So…uh. It’s been a while, hasn’t it?

Shit. I keep thinking, well, you’re a kid and it’s not like kids grow that fast, right? I mean, you’re probably still knee-high to your sensei and barely capable of reaching the kitchen counter and stuff.

And then I remember that Miyu-chan and Kazu-chan are a hell of a lot bigger than they were when they got here, and then Za-chan had to go and remind me it’s been like two years already. Two years! Two damn years since you choked before the Chūnin Exam finals and saved me a thousand ryō I was gonna bet and then didn’t.

Got a runner to confirm it, after some bribery and also a punch in the face, but hey—congrats on your promotion. I’m not even sure if there was an Exam, and really, I wouldn’t have gone if there was since the twins are at that age when they start to try to gum me to death or get themselves ground to death in the wagon wheels because clearly walking is the shit. Going by the screaming an hour ago, Kazu-chan nearly did it again. Either that or he found out how I was getting ants into Nami-chan’s bags.

Uh, where was I… Oh, right. So here’s your stupid promotion gift from me, but if you tell anyone it was me I’ll be sure to come back from the dead and haunt your ass, until you gouge your own eyes out in penance for being a shitty secret-keeper.

P.S.: Don’t be surprised if your first attempt to call on ’em knocks you out.

-

To: Keisuke Gekkō

From: Chinatsu Kasai

Rikuto isn’t as smart or as stealthy as he thinks he is. Even for a former Rock-nin, he’s a blockhead.

The first scroll—red ribbon—is a summoning scroll. I think it used to be Rikuto’s, but I haven’t seen him summon anything since I met him. Maybe he stole it. Regardless of what particular species this scroll is tied to, they’re probably not battle summons, so make of that what you will.

The second scroll is green with gold caps, and it contains a number of sealing techniques that Akira has compiled over the years. Some of the seals, if written wrong, may take your hands off, so try to learn these with some kind of supervision if you must.

The last scroll contains a box with several basic elemental jutsu. Everyone contributed one, though it’s likely that Shiro-chan’s particular technique is useless to anyone without the Ice Release bloodline. Once again, only use while supervised.

Best of luck, congratulations, and happy belated birthday(s).
Making Progress: Welcome to the Real World

Chapter Summary

Kei: Report.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Unraveling Obito’s spool of chakra-sensitive wire had taken us five minutes.

Setting the charges: another ten.

Getting into position to wait: one.

Actually waiting: twenty.

During that time we’d checked and re-checked the lines as well as the charges, had a chance to grab a snack from our packs, and wiped out every trace of our presence aside from the trap itself. It was raining hard enough to chill us all to the bone and mask our scent, and our chakra was suppressed as much as we could.

I could feel at least six shinobi chakra signatures in the depths of the valley, clearly attempting to circumvent the front by taking a hazardous nearly-underground route through Kusa-Konoha territory.

Kakashi, under a camouflage genjutsu that made him hard to see from any angle but straight-on, raised one hand. Obito and I dropped onto our bellies, waiting for his signal.

Next to me, Obito pulled his ear protectors and his orange goggles into position. Kakashi also had earplugs, but he was mostly concentrating on the view below us.

“Boom.” Obito mouthed. Simultaneously, we ducked and he sent his chakra through the wires wrapped around his right hand. I did the same, though my wires were clutched in my left.

All of my pre-prepared paper tags went off at once. There were only thirty of them, strung barely under the first layer of muddy rock by Kakashi’s expert hand, but that’s a lot of boom for an enclosed space. The tags themselves were the strongest I’d ever made, and had been approved by Sensei for this mission.

The narrow canyon’s walls collapsed on top of and around the Iwagakure squad, not to mention below. If I had to make a comparison, I’d guess that it was like being inside a foxhole and not hearing “Fire in the hole” in time to do anything about it.

No one got away.

The next two minutes were spent salvaging any wire or explosives that we could.

And ignoring the bodies the best we could.
“We’ve achieved our objectives. Kei, do you sense anyone else?” Kakashi asked, checking for survivors and finding none.

“I can’t feel anyone besides us.” I replied, and then handed Obito’s wires back to him. “We’re good.”

Kakashi nodded sharply. “Back to base, everyone.”

Obito grimaced briefly at the blood on my hands, but he still tucked the spool back into his thigh holster. To Kakashi he said, “Right behind you.”

I spared one glance back for the corpses we’d made, and then followed my teammates out of the canyon. This particular backdoor into Konoha territory wouldn’t be one for much longer.

“Blow last charges,” Kakashi ordered.

I did.

The whole place collapsed in on itself.

A lot has changed in two years. Sensei is the new Hokage-to-be. Orochimaru deserted Konoha. I’ve started to grow boobs.

(Actually, that last one’s a lie.)

Let me start over.

A couple of months ago, Team Minato triumphed over the Chūnin Exams. It took us two tries, but Obito and I were both promoted. Rin was, too, but as a temp member of Team Minato, the main benefit to her is that she’s now allowed to learn more advanced techniques. Obito and I got our flak jackets in a ceremony that was at least half tongue-in-cheek and promptly hung them up in our respective closets to ignore.

(There’s such a thing as subtlety in enemy territory. Village-based uniforms are not it.)

The Hokage probably just wanted all of us to get the hell out of his office. Promotions are great, but they’re also less important to the war effort than, say, reports of the enemies’ movements.

Sensei was announced as the future Hokage pretty much the next day.

Not especially long afterward, Orochimaru fled the village after being caught performing horrific human experiments.

I could tell myself that one thing didn’t have much to do with the other, but that’d be a lie.

Orochimaru was a hero to the village. Everyone knew that. That’s why he became so infamous after he ran off to found Otogakure. He’s like Konoha’s version of Benedict Arnold (only a million times more successful). He’s like Voldemort. Saruman the White, maybe. He was great in a way that most of us normal people never would be—the man was one of the many heroes of the Second Shinobi World War. And then he turned to evil because apparently being good wasn’t the same as good for Science.

I hated him only slightly less than I was terrified of him. If Sharingan Kakashi plus Chidori wasn’t even a blip on the guy’s radar, then I was going to be absolutely nothing.
Basically, if and when Orochimaru came back for a dramatic homecoming, I was more than okay with the idea of killing his minions. If the man himself put in an appearance within a hundred feet of me, though, I’d probably hide under a rock.

Not that it’d help. But it was a thought that at least had some merit so long as I didn’t attract his attention.

It also took my mind off of what I was supposed to be doing.

At that exact moment, my team and I were deep in the interior of the continent, lying in ambush for a much less famous turncoat than Orochimaru.

Sometimes people turned, whether for money or fame or prestige. We’d only gotten the hawk the other day, and our mission parameters had correspondingly shifted to keep the traitor from getting where he was going.

While we hadn’t hit the border yet (and probably wouldn’t, unless the mission went horribly wrong), I couldn’t help but expect trouble from Iwagakure anyway. It wasn’t like there was some kind of wall that blocked our territory off from everyone else’s—the border between the Land of Fire and the Land of Grass was only a political boundary. Iwagakure had been making some incursions into land held by Kusagakure, but they had to fight Grass ninja from their shared borders all the way through their territory. We only had to worry about Rock-nin and maybe the occasional asshole from Takigakure, depending on which way they were swinging this week.

(Since Takigakure had neither invaded nor been invaded by any country in its history, I wasn’t sure they really mattered in the long run.)

Kusagakure may not have been big, but they were our allies and there were tons of Konoha-born ninja running through the country. On the whole, our nation still lagged behind Kumo and Iwa in terms of military strength, but we’ve always made up for that with numbers.

Where Kumo would plant a single shinobi in a traitor’s path and expect them to succeed (and they probably would, given the number of S-class shinobi they could field), Konoha preferred teams of four. We were the only team in the immediate area, and thus were scrambled to meet the new threat.

Hence, Team Minato running an ambush.

I could feel the hairs on the back of my neck standing up straight just at the thought. We hadn’t been in a border station for three days, but I couldn’t help but wonder if that was the last thing Dad ever knew before they were overrun. While I knew that the particular building had been blasted to ash, it was still eerie to realize that, four years ago, Dad would have been out here running similar, if not nearly so specific, routes. No one who had been alive then was assigned to the Kusa border, so I couldn’t even ask them about it.

I zipped my jacket all the way up under my chin, frowning to myself.

The chill that went down my spine had nothing to do with the cold.

Middle watch gave me far too much time to drive my thoughts in circles. I sighed inwardly, resisting the urge to swing my legs in restlessness. The last thing we needed was for our quarry to be startled away by me breaking a branch.

That said, sitting in a tree for an hour straight, even with my back to the bark, was making me more bored than I’d thought possible. To stave off the urge to regret my life choices (and the fact that the Game Boy Color wasn’t going to be invented in my lifetime), I looked over the edge of the branch and down at my team snoozing below.

It was Obito’s turn to sleep the whole night through, and he hadn’t budged after bedding down. He’d accidentally taken two watches the night before, due to nerves and because we were so far from home, so he’d moved like a zombie all day. Luckily he didn’t snore anymore, or else the whole stealth thing we’d been training for would have been wasted. It had taken us almost two weeks to train him out of it, and we didn’t always succeed. He was still sleeping with his mouth open, but he didn’t do much more than drool.

Sensei was sleeping with his back against the tree trunk, with Obito and Kakashi bracketing him on each side like the world’s most belligerent pair of bookends (when they were awake, anyway). He’d taken his pack and mine and turned them into a sort of wedge pillow, so he didn’t wake up with a crick later, and had crossed his arms loosely under his ribs. Sensei, I knew, had been more or less running double-time since the Hokage had declared him the new heir, and in a way this assignment had been a way for him to relax and come to terms with the way his life was soon going to change. Weird how such a mission could almost be comforting in how routine it was for him, but with Sensei it didn’t always pay to question stuff like that. He didn’t often give straight answers if he didn’t feel like it.

Kakashi slept on his side, back to Sensei’s crossed legs. The way he had his metal armguards still on, even while pillowing his head on them, seemed a little uncomfortable, but he’d handed second watch over to me three hours in with no complaints. When asleep, he was less of a porcupine and more of a hedgehog, and I didn’t have to fight down the urge to make a smart remark if only because he didn’t start shit while unconscious.

It was odd how looking over my teammates was calming, in a way.

We were less than fifty miles from the front, and somehow just knowing that they were alive was enough to make the world less cold.

Wasn’t comforting enough for me to allow myself to fall asleep on watch, though. I wasn’t stupid, and it didn’t, ultimately, change the fact that the particular asshole we were looking for had already dodged two other teams.

Neither of those teams had a chakra sensor like myself, granted (which I think was part of the reason why we were tapped for it), but it was no small thing to avoid an Inuzuka.

Only the fact that Sensei had once again rigged up a security barrier prevented me from being jumpy enough to power a small electrical device.

If I had anything other than moonlight, I could have at least started looking over the scroll Sensei had given me after I got those letters from the Chinatsugumi. They’d arrived attached to a mid-sized package, which indeed contained three scrolls like the letters had said. Sensei had immediately confiscated all of them, and I guess he and Kushina had spent a week poring over them. While the Chinatsugumi had apparently meant them for me, it still made sense to have a couple of seal masters look over everything before handing them over to a barely-promoted chūnin.

Jutsu aside from the three basic Academy ones were rarely, if ever, available to the public. Shinobi preferred having absolute control over flow of information, which usually meant that techniques were passed from master to student and that was it. Konoha’s scroll of Forbidden Jutsu was more of a record than a how-to guide when it came to things beyond Shadow Clones. Having never seen it, I could only conclude that it existed mostly to provide counter-strategies to the techniques inside.
Here’s an example: While the Hokage would have undoubtedly seen the Impure World Reincarnation technique sometime before Orochimaru’s invasion, if Tobirama Senju had been nearly as fond of it as the other undead Kage had implied, the strategies against it were probably in that scroll somewhere. I doubt he got to practice them much, but out of the available options, three of which were nullified by a lack of prep-time and Orochimaru overriding the first two Hokage’s wills, using the Dead Demon Consuming Seal was the one most likely to succeed.

I didn’t even know where to get started on defeating zombie shinobi. Hopefully, my training in fūinjutsu would lead me to the right path. Eventually.

At least this wasn’t that war. Our opponents were going to be human.

Anyway, back to the topic of techniques.

The blue scroll focused on starting exercises and C-ranked elemental jutsu of all five types. I have no elemental jutsu, due to a lack of focus on ninjutsu as a whole. I guess the Chinatsugumi were interested in rectifying that, but many shinobi didn’t get started on elemental techniques until they were well into their careers. Sensei rarely uses the Wind jutsu I know he has, while Kakashi has at least a couple of C-ranked Lightning jutsu as a result of his being Sensei’s prodigy and because he’s a genius. Out of all of us, though, Obito uses his Fire jutsu the most. Elemental jutsu can be kind of situational, sometimes, and I’d gone for long enough without any that I was somewhat hesitant.

Besides which, learning elemental jutsu usually left you locked in with your affinity and maybe another set of techniques if you had time to practice. Unlike sealing arts, where you could learn nearly anything if you had the brains for it, many shinobi couldn’t use more than the bare minimum of techniques outside of their affinity. It was what made the Sharingan and the Rinnegan so special. Especially the Rinnegan.

It was why I was pretty sure I’d end up passing the damn thing around to my teammates in the hopes that someone else would get something out of it.

I still hadn’t gotten it back, though.

And the sealing and summoning scrolls? Forget it. No way was Sensei letting me mess with those until I finished puberty or something.

Mom had actually agreed with him, which made it worse.

Then again, while I was interested in the contents of the scrolls I got, I wasn’t willing to push against far more experienced shinobi about what they thought I could handle. The time to prove myself would come eventually, which was simultaneously gratifying and extremely worrying.

The scroll Sensei had actually let me take, by contrast, was about meditation.

Still. It’d be better than nothing, since no one was going to spontaneously invent handheld games anytime soon.

I reached out with my chakra sense, scanning for anomalous signatures. Usually, I didn’t have to focus at all—passive was good enough for advance warning about things we’d have to care about.

My shift, as it turned out, passed without incident. After lounging on the tree branch like a cat for what felt like hours (and probably was), I walked down the trunk and woke Sensei for his shift.

At a safe distance.
The next day was less simple.

We found our deserter, for one. Many famous villains came from Konoha, due to our tendency to produce stupendously powerful head-cases and only belatedly remembering to instill morals when it was far too late to matter, but our target for this mission was neither.

Ichiro Komaeda was a perfectly average chūnin-level shinobi. He even looked entirely average—brown hair, brown eyes, and an entirely forgettable face under a Konoha headband. If not for the fact that he’d been discovered leaking information to Iwagakure shortly after Team Minato was sent on our first border patrol, we probably could have passed each other on the street without noticing.

The problem is that he’d somehow picked up friends.

Instead of fighting a single intelligence-specialized shinobi, we were fighting a three-man squad of Iwa-nin escorting the lily-livered motherfucker out of our territory.

Combat-wise, the Iwa team was lackluster. I cut one man’s legs out from under him before following up with my version of Rin’s paralytic medical ninjutsu (which she had graciously taught me while I was floundering), while Obito set one of his friends on fire and Kakashi flat-out killed the last one. It was all over in just under a minute, counting the frantic stop-drop-roll sequence that helped exactly nothing when Kakashi killed him anyway.

In the end, all Sensei really had to do was stand directly in Komaeda’s path, and the guy froze up like a deer in the headlights of an eighteen-wheeler.

Kakashi, Obito and I finished securing the Iwa prisoner, but I stopped first. Sensei’s killing intent was swamping the clearing where the enemy had decided to make a stand.

“T-the Yellow Flash…” Komaeda was nearly squeaking.

“Hello, Komaeda-san.” Sensei said pleasantly, but I wasn’t fooled.

I didn’t want to see the look on his face, and the way Kakashi’s eyebrows knit together told me that he already knew what was going to happen. Obito blinked rapidly, staring at Sensei with a face nearly white with fear.

Sensei never felt like that before.

“One false move against my team, and I will cut your hands off.” Sensei continued, still in that polite way of his. “Hurt any of them, Komaeda-san, and your feet will follow suit. Do you understand me?”

…I’d never seen Sensei’s war persona before. I wasn’t sure if he was always like this, or if it was just because his students were at risk.

Komaeda nodded quickly, eyes never leaving Sensei’s face.

“Now, you are going to come quietly with us.” Sensei went on quietly, as though he didn’t have Komaeda practically pissing himself in terror. “We will be returning to Konoha, and you will cooperate. Or else you will understand how imaginative I can be.”

Almost without noticing, I reached out to Obito and squeezed his shaking hand. Both of our palms were damp.
There was something ironic in how the scariest thing we’d yet faced was our own teacher.

Kakashi’s hand closed over mine and Obito’s, briefly. Then he was off, idly disarming Komaeda and tying his arms behind his back.

I let go of Obito’s hand, standing and sheathing my kodachi as though nothing had happened. After a second or two, I even managed to force my voice to work. “Sensei, what do you want us to do about this one?” I asked, astounded at how calm I sounded.

“Is he disarmed?” Sensei asked, still using that uncannily even voice.

“Yes, Sensei.” Obito replied, instead of me.

Sensei’s expression, I noticed, had evened out somewhat. The killing intent had also dropped significantly. Probably because of that, I felt rather than saw Obito get to his feet behind me.

I still didn’t feel entirely safe turning my back on Sensei, and I wasn’t sure why. Kakashi had killed dozens of people in front of me, I’d killed at least ten already, and Sensei’s total probably wasn’t worth thinking about. Obito had killed too, though less so than the rest of us.

Why was this different?

“This won’t be the last one.” Kakashi said quietly, as Sensei began fiddling with some kind of seal he was drawing on the ground. I could only imagine that he was planning on transporting the two prisoners straight to the border outpost. Or, preferably, Konoha.

I gave Kakashi a blank look.

“The last traitor,” he clarified, as Obito joined us. “And it won’t be the last time we get so close to the front.”

Well, no shit.

“Or the last time we see Sensei do that.” Obito remarked, similarly subdued. Distantly, I was surprised they weren’t arguing.

I bit my lip. Now that we’d all been promoted, it wasn’t a game anymore. We were real soldiers. On a real battlefield. And someday soon, we’d be sent on a mission without Sensei, and we’d probably fuck up.

“Sensei is Konoha’s Yellow Flash. He’ll be called on more and more.” Kakashi explained. “And we’ll be caught up in everything the Hokage needs him to do.” His tone and expression were flat. “Deal with it.”

It made me wonder, briefly, if he’d ever seen Sensei carry through with threats of mutilation against prisoners of war. Because, no matter how we in Konoha tried to market ourselves to people, we were still a military village. We traded in secrets. We fought with them. And we’d kill in a heartbeat to protect them.

And Konoha, as a whole, despised traitors. Komaeda wasn’t getting out of this one.

I nodded absently, thinking.

So did Obito, though he looked a little green.

I didn’t…I didn’t like the idea. But I understood that this world didn’t work like my old one. Aside from the lack of cars and guns, the society I lived in now placed much less value on human life. Why not, after all, when we’d barely had a handful of consecutive years of peace in our entire recorded history? The ends justify the means, right?

Well. Not in my head. But I wasn’t about to argue POW rights then.

Fucking hell, I prayed that Naruto’s generation would be able to do something about it. Because mine? Already screwed.

(Maybe not forever, and maybe not thoroughly. I’d have to see what this generation’s Narutos had to say about it.)

We ended up dragging Komaeda and the surviving Iwa infiltrator back to the border station, and from there we went home. The station itself provided an escort for the POWs, which left somewhat later than we did. I don’t know what happened to them afterward, but I didn’t think much about them, either. I tried not to. There are some things you don’t want to think your hometown is capable of.

But it is, anyway.

Chapter End Notes

Minimal timeline fuckery involved--between the testimony that Yamato was one of the infants Orochimaru experimented on, Anko's experience with the Curse Seal, and the flashback pertaining to the time Sarutobi tried to arrest his wayward student, it's...somewhat difficult to tell when the hell Orochimaru took off.

All we know for certain that it comes down to "sometime before the series started."
A different month, another seasonal shift, and a lot of missions later, I got to do something a little different.

A couple of days after I got home (and I was willing to reenter the land of the living), Mom had me take Hayate and his friends to the public baths in order to get all of us out of her hair. I had been getting antsy, and a long soak in the springs would have done me some good in the relaxation department. Being the assigned babysitter put a damper on that plan quickly enough. As it was, I regretted the lack of public swimming pools for about five minutes and then decided to tell the kids to get their things together.

This being Konoha, we had hot springs too. So I went in that direction.

There were enough different springs and partitions at two in the afternoon to give me and my ducklings some privacy. For my part, I’d ordered the kids to bring their own towels since I didn’t feel like running back and forth between gender-segregated halves of a spring to make sure no one drowned. Also, Yūgao and I had exactly nothing in common to talk about anyway, besides Hayate. It’d be easier on my sanity to just keep them all in the same place.

Iruka dunked Hayate underwater anyway. Yūgao pulled Iruka off him by his hair. Shortly thereafter, a water fight ensued.

I held my book out of the line of fire and thought, Oh, to be a kid again. Never mind that I still was a kid.

Technically, I suppose I wasn’t even supposed to have the black book, never mind having it at the hot springs. Sensei had taken to giving me older editions of his Bingo Book, which were generally anywhere from six months to a year out of date, if not more. They were small enough to hide behind the pages of a weapon magazine I’d randomly picked out of the newsstand, which made covert reading somewhat easier.

I wasn’t even planning on going in the water—onsen were nice enough, but I’d much prefer to run up the water bill at home if I had a choice between public and private. The fact that I hadn’t even bothered to take my own bathing equipment did say a lot on that end. Lounging around in my oldest zipper hoodie, cut-off shorts, and a tank top, I felt like a cheap knockoff of James Bond on vacation.

Only I’m pretty sure James Bond would have made a terrible babysitter. And he’d never have been caught dead in anything less stylish than designer swim trunks.

Anyway, back to the Bingo Book. Silly name for a headhunting manual.

Sensei hadn’t seen any harm in letting me read about the bogeymen of this war, apparently because he figured my chances of actually encountering one of them were pretty slim. To be fair, it was true—as far as I know, Team Minato never did attract the attention of people like the Kinkaku Squad.
(okay, okay, so maybe that was the wrong war), even if Sensei would face off with A and B sooner or later.

I did find it kind of funny that Sensei had his own profile taped inside of the back cover. Flee on sight order and everything. The dork.

Flipping through the pages meant reintroducing myself to a lot of familiar faces. Also a lot of unfamiliar ones that I could only assume would get mauled to death over the course of this war, but that part was less important.

For one, I could see that A and B were making names for themselves. As the son of the Third Raikage, A was well on his way to succeeding his father and the rest of the world knew it. His Lightning Release Armor made him basically untouchable to Mist and Sand forces, which cut fully twenty thousand combatants out of consideration when it came to facing him and not dying horribly. Sensei could—and would—face off with him on even terms. The only question was when.

B, as A’s combat partner, adopted brother, and host of the Eight-Tailed Beast, was understandably no less dangerous. He was only a little older than Sensei, but much more excitable and also a hell of a lot slower. The Eight-Tails made him too dangerous for anyone short of a jōnin to face period, never mind the idea of a solo fight. Jōnin were often of vastly different skill sets and levels even within the rank, however, which told me that the only one I’d trust to face him now would be Sensei.

Jiraiya probably could take him, of course, and maybe the Hokage, but anyone else would probably not be walking away from that fight.

I pursed my lips thoughtfully.

I knew that the Eight-Tailed Beast’s host was always a member of the Raikage’s family. The fact that B had been adopted as A’s combat partner and brother merely solidified that association. Konoha had a similar, though much more accidental procedure.

Then again, Mito Uzumaki had been the First Hokage’s wife. There hadn’t been another host until Kushina, who had been forced, eventually, to turn Kurama over to her son.

Shukaku had had three hosts, the last being Gaara, the son of the Fourth Kazekage.

Rōshi, the current host of the Four-Tailed Beast, was likely still an Iwagakure powerhouse. The same could be said of Han, though I didn’t really remember anything about him aside from his steam armor and that he was from the same village.

Yagura, the future Fourth Mizukage, wasn’t a host yet.

Utakata, Yugito, and Fū were too young to take the field, I think. Sure, Yugito was at least my age, but I couldn’t see A allowing a half-trained jinchūriki of a lesser Beast onto the same battlefields that he and his brother did.

I couldn’t say if the First Hokage’s decision to distribute the Tailed Beasts to the other nations had helped or hurt the situation. It simply was, at this point. We had to live with it.

And that was about when I had to roll up my sleeves and walk out onto the surface of the hot spring to make sure the kids didn’t actually drown each other. While the book was safely inside my waterproof satchel, I pulled Iruka, then Hayate out of the water by one wrist each. Yugao followed a moment later, crawling out via the nearby rocks.

“Hey!” Hayate started to protest, of course, but the day I let my nine-year-old brother boss me around is the day that I pledge my undying love of shrimp. No dice, little brother.

I hoisted Hayate over one shoulder, slung Iruka along under my other arm and dragged the boys back into the building. Yūgao followed, giggling like crazy.

In hindsight, I give my mom massive amounts of credit for being able to wrangle kids during bath time. I don’t remember giving her that much trouble ever, but apparently either Hayate was a more difficult child or he had a particular problem with me chasing him around with a shampoo bottle. In my old life, by the time I was old enough to be in control of a showerhead for the sake of another person, the only ones in my house small and/or unintelligent to require my assistance were my dogs.

That said, there was similarity between catching dogs for bath time and catching kids.

Also, I was a ninja this time around.

(Then again, so were they—mini-ninjas, to be more precise.)

By the time I got everyone on the path toward cleanliness, I was pretty sure we’d been gone for nearly three hours. Between the half-hour walk to the spring itself, the kids horsing around for another two hours, and however long it had taken me to corral Hayate and Iruka into finally submitting to the cleaning part of the program, the post-supper crowd was starting to move in. For my part, I was helping Yūgao comb out the last few knots in her long purple hair, and ignored the crowd of other Konoha citizens getting ready for a relaxing soak.

(Incidentally, I was briefly jealous that her hair stayed mostly straight apart from a few snags. I had cowlick problems and perpetual hat-hair.)

That was about when I felt a subtle, but still strong, chakra signature on the edge of my range.

By the time I tied her hair off and both of the boys were starting to remember to get back into their street clothes, the strange signature was a lot closer than it had been.

It was also near the women’s half of the baths.

_Hell’s bells._

Ryō for your thoughts?

Well, there were now two paths before me: One, I could go and bother one of the Sannin. Or two, I could ignore him entirely and just get the kids home.

Yeah, _nope_. I wasn’t Naruto, and therefore was not interested in pissing off Jiraiya.

“Come on, kids, time to head home.” I said.

_Nope, nope, nope!_

“Obito, Kei-kun, this is my teacher, the Sannin Jiraiya.” Sensei told us the next day, standing next to a white-haired man who was at least half a head taller than he was. They shared hairstyles, somewhat, though Jiraiya’s was an order of magnitude longer. He was at least wearing the standard Konoha uniform—his normal one, in the future, was so much weirder.

Imagine the look on my face. Put laconically: Pure, unadulterated, _What The Fuck Is This?™_.

“Hey, if you’re one of the Sannin, that means you’re super strong, right?” Obito was practically trembling with barely contained excitement.

Kakashi was pointedly not looking at any of us.

“You bet, Uchiha!” Jiraiya said brightly. “I am the legendary Toad Sage!”

He was also the teammate of the Snake Sannin, by definition, and the Slug Princess. Their team was in shambles.

“You’re that pervert who was at the hot springs yesterday.” I said flatly.

“Wrong, boy!” Jiraiya said. “I’m a super pervert!”

This is sounding very familiar.

“My mistake.” I replied, unblinking.

Wow, I was turning into Kakashi.

“Sensei, I did mention that one of my students was a girl…” Sensei stage-whispered.

Click! went Jiraiya’s brain. I wasn’t quite sure what he had an epiphany about, though. Sensei could have told him anything about our team.

“Anyway, that’s not what I invited him for.” Sensei said quickly, holding his hands up to stave off any sort of commentary. He cleared his throat. “Jiraiya-sensei is the only other person who, due to a clear lapse in judgment, knows a technique I invented. He’s here to help me teach you the basics.”

Putting the issue of Jiraiya out of my mind, I focused entirely on Sensei.

No way…

There were basically two major techniques that Sensei had Jiraiya had in common. One was based on the summoning contract both of them had with toads. Not exactly something someone could just learn, what with the sapient beings hooked up to the other end. The other, and Sensei’s original technique, could only be…

Sensei held out his right hand, palm up and fingers curled inward. As we watched, chakra began to swirl around with enough speed and density that, in a burst of light and wind, a glowing blue ball formed in his hand.

“I don’t actually expect any of you to learn how to use the Rasengan in a month, or two months, or even three.” Sensei told us. “If I could create this technique, I have no doubt at all that all three of you can make your own as well. Of course, it took me three years. You don’t have to create an A-ranked technique, though.” He grinned. “Never underestimate the value of a surprise attack in the right moment, especially if it’s one your opponent can’t have ever seen before.”

I thought of the Rasenshuriken and nodded enthusiastically.

(I also thought of Bullshitting the Fish Test Jutsu and tried not to giggle.)

Obito was grinning. “Betcha I’ll have a super-awesome new jutsu before you do, Kei!”

“And I bet you won’t.” I said, barely resisting the urge to stick my tongue out at him.

Sensei proceeded to spend the next five minutes explaining how the Rasengan worked. Rotating my chakra was something I already knew how to do, but compressing and intensifying the spin…well, I’d never really thought about learning the Rasengan, so I’d consequently never thought about it. Most of my techniques were based on precision application that put most people in the mindset of thinking about blades. Killer Frisbees were more the Rasengan’s way.

As Obito screwed up his face in concentration (while getting no visible results) and Kakashi was, of course, already halfway to a sphere, I stared at the palm of my hand and at the spiral squiggle in the middle of it. I wasn’t even channeling chakra—I was trying to visualize the technique. Kind of dumb, but I didn’t have the chakra to waste on half-assed attempts.

“Hey, Minato, mind if I have a chat with Kei-kun here?” Jiraiya asked Sensei after a while.

Sensei gave Jiraiya a flat look. “Don’t corrupt her, Sensei.”

“Sheesh, you say it like I could. Kid’s as cold as your other brat over there.” He gestured vaguely at Kakashi, who ignored him.

“Sensei…”

Jiraiya flapped a hand. “She’ll be fine, Minato. It’ll only take a second.”

“What do you need, Jiraiya-sama?” I asked, not getting up. I did, however, look up at him. I concentrated on the mole on his nose, because if there wasn’t some kind of levity within the next couple of seconds I’d probably be spontaneously itching to create some.

(Also, if I look right into people’s eyes, I sometimes get the urge to giggle. Or at least I used to.)

Jiraiya paused, realizing that he had both of my teammates’ eyes on him already. Then he shrugged. “Not many people can find me when I don’t want to be found. And I don’t remember actually seeing you yesterday, much less meeting you.”

“I’m a chakra sensor.” I told him, “And it wasn’t worth causing trouble when I had kids with me.” Besides, Tsunade used to beat him bad enough that even a lifetime of Jiraiya-grade perversion isn’t balanced out yet.

“You are a kid.” Jiraiya said.

“I’m a chūnin.” I said. “And if I’m going to pick a fight with one of the Sannin, it’s not going to be when my baby brother and his friends are right there.”

Sets a bad example.

Jiraiya didn’t question my knowing who he was, though we’d never met. Neither did Sensei. I’d gotten my hands on enough paperwork to know who he was without a problem, even if his combat prowess and lack of genin students kept him in the field just shy of perpetually.

This was the man who, in the end, could only say that his dream had been to have an awesome death. And he’d succeeded.

Christ on a cracker.

Then Jiraiya laughed.

I blinked.

“You’ve got an interesting pack of brats, Minato.” Jiraiya chuckled. He sat back on his heels, holding out one hand. “So, Kei-kun, let’s see how you do on the Rasengan when you actually try.”

I frowned just for a second, because I wasn’t sure why he’d reversed himself so quickly, then started to channel chakra into my hand. Of course it fizzled out, but not until the chakra itself was visible and I could definitely feel the drain.

“Dammit.” I said.

“You’re doing better than I am, Kei.” Obito grumbled, making his way over. He sat next to me. “See, I can’t even get it to spin!”

“That’s because you’re not putting enough chakra into it, kid. Can’t spin if there’s nothing there.” Jiraiya told us.

Sensei, I noticed, had gone on to critique Kakashi’s wobbly, but somewhat solid, sphere.

“Well, how am I supposed to do it then?” Obito asked. “I gathered as much chakra as I can already!”

“Obito, let me see.” I sat up, hovering over his hand. His chakra wasn’t doing much more than ruffling my hair anyway.

Jiraiya sat back and watched us work it out for ourselves.

Sort of like a proud grandparent, really. An incredibly perverted badass grandpa, anyway.

Not a bad start, I think. Here’s to the future.

Obito tried for a couple of seconds to come up with something to say. After a while, he gave up and just went with the obvious. “…Sensei, there’s a dog on your shoulder.”

“So there is, Obito.” Sensei replied, as though having a pug on his shoulder like a furry parrot was an everyday event, and continued writing out an equipment storage seal as though none of us had said anything.

I, meanwhile, was barely tamping down on the urge to squeal like the worst sort of fangirl.

Lemme rewind and set the scene a little better.

Because we’d only just entered the chain of command, and because Sensei was who he was, we were easing into what I’d call an “active roster” sort of schedule. One month in (meaning we were more than likely to be sent on a mission that would almost kill us, or more than one), then a month off, then two months with a two-month break, and so on. I’d asked about it, and Jiraiya had told me that some shinobi could be sent to the front for up to six months once they got higher up in the ranks. The fact that I hadn’t met him until I was nearly twelve told me that he’d been gone for way longer.

Or that he’d never had a month off from being on-call that whole time.

Compared to the eighteen-month (or more) tours that soldiers in my old life had been prone to, it didn’t seem like much. That said, there was a difference between being an American soldier and being a shinobi—one of them was the fact that Konoha was being threatened. Sure, most of the time smaller countries took the most damage, but it didn’t change the fact that we were still in range of many attacks and our enemies did usually overpower us on a one-to-one basis.

Also, no cars, guns, or nukes.
Basically, during our one-month break, we worked on things we thought would make us more likely to survive our upcoming two-month run at near-death.

For Obito, trying to figure out how to use the Rasengan at least helped with his chakra control. He didn’t seem interested in the technique itself—it demanded more control than he’d have for a while—but since it was also about the time in his young life when all mini-Uchiha started to go a little pyromaniac, I was kind of glad that he didn’t even get close to trying to infuse his chakra nature into the technique. At least, not after he set his sleeve on fire the first time. None of us could quite figure out how he managed it.

As for me, I managed to come up with something. For one, Jiraiya took me aside one day and stuffed a slip of chakra sensitive paper in my hand.

“Honestly, I don’t understand how Minato could have you kids for so long and not check your chakra nature.” Jiraiya had grumbled. “You’re all chūnin now, and everyone knows that’s the time to do something crazy.”

“Given how much adult supervision we apparently need, I don’t think so.” I’d replied under my breath.

Jiraiya had snorted derisively. “Everyone’s got to leave the nest sooner or later. Now, channel a small amount of chakra into the paper. Carefully; it’s expensive. We’ll do the same for the Uchiha in a minute.”

I had agreed, and let my chakra flow into the paper.

It went damp and floppy in my fingers.

“Water… Not bad at all. You’re a medic, right?”

I’d wobbled a hand in midair to communicate “so-so.” I’d explained, “I got cut from my apprenticeship years ago. Everything I’ve learned since is based on that, and making stuff up.”

“You are so a medic, Kei!” Obito had shouted from halfway across the clearing.

“I don’t have a license!” I’d shouted back.

“Who cares?”

“Will you two just shut up?” Kakashi had demanded, from somewhere in between. The Rasengan fizzled out between his fingers when he looked up, so I guess we had to.

Uh, anyway. Summary of events: I learned I had water-natured chakra, Obito had an affinity for fire, and we both tried to work on Sensei’s super-special signature technique.

Kakashi…he mastered the Rasengan. But he didn’t use it in training or in combat, and probably never would. Because, as the perpetual overachiever, he immediately tried to come up with a way to infuse his lightning chakra into the technique.

And it kind of exploded.

So, uh. He wasn’t doing that again until his hand recovered.

Instead, I guess he got the urge poke through some stuff he hadn’t in a while. Without being able to use his right hand, he had to come up with some other way to use the training time we all had left, and there are some techniques that skilled shinobi can use with little more than blood and willpower.

Such as summoning.

That, eventually, led to the reason why Sensei had a tiny pug on his shoulder in the training grounds. After a moment or two, Sensei gently scooped the little dog off his padded shoulder and offered it to Kakashi.

Kakashi said, “Sensei, Pakkun needs to get used to your scent as quickly as possible.”

Pakkun made a high-pitched growling noise at being separated from his perch, and Kakashi quickly took him out of Sensei’s hands. Pakkun immediately buried his nose into the crook of Kakashi’s elbow, clearly content to simply take up space in his master’s arms.

“Don’t you think he needs to meet your teammates, too?” Sensei responded.

The way Kakashi’s eyebrows knit together made me think he didn’t agree.

Then, “Here, Kei. You take him.” Kakashi said, and I took the pug puppy from him without even thinking about it.

Funny how, even after nearly twelve years without a dog, I still remembered how to hold them. My left arm stayed low as support, while I looped my right around so I could create a rough bowl between my chest and my arms. I rubbed the underside of his jaw, gently, with one thumb.

God damn, I missed my dogs. In this life, anyway, I’d known from the start that there wasn’t going to be any room in my life for pets. Between Hayate (who, in his early years, was really more a pet than someone to talk to) and my ninja career, I’d never be able to take care of anything more responsive than a rock. Dogs had been ruled out by how I hadn’t been born an Inuzuka—nin-dogs were the only accepted option for a career shinobi.

Pakkun wasn’t nearly as fluffy as the dogs I remembered, but he was tiny and adorable. He was a flat, plain brown color that wouldn’t stand out in the field, with a darker brown muzzle and facial mask. He had a long, straight tail rather than the tight curl I was used to, and pink paw-pads. He was also about the length of my forearm and wearing a blue vest with the usual scarecrow face outlined on the back. Definitely Kakashi’s dog, even if he didn’t have his own miniature headband yet.

The first words out of my mouth were, “He’s so cute.”

“Uh…Kei?” Obito sounded odd.

“He can’t talk yet, but he can understand us.” Kakashi said, but his tone was also off somehow.

I ignored them. “From the looks of it, you’re about eight weeks old. But since you’re Kakashi’s, you’re probably closer to a year or two, right? Ninken live so much longer than civilian dogs, and you’ll be able to use chakra just like your master soon enough.” I forced a giggle back, but was only partly successful. “We’ll be counting on you!”

“Kei-kun?” Sensei patted me on the head, as though to make sure I was still capable of focusing on reality.

My head snapped up. “Yes, Sensei?”

Sensei looked like he was trying not to laugh. “Come on, Pakkun can’t fall asleep before he gets a
I glanced at Obito, who was hovering at my left elbow. “Do you want to hold him? Only, don’t hold him like a baby—I’ve never met a dog that liked that.”

Reluctantly, I let Obito hold Pakkun—though not after critiquing him thoroughly on how he was doing it. By the end, only the fact that Pakkun had his jacket between his little puppy teeth kept Obito from immediately trying to give the puppy back to me out of sheer nerves.

As it was, he ended up holding Pakkun up and against the side of his neck, sort of like a baby after all. Pakkun responded by sticking his nose against Obito’s collar and going to sleep again.

“He’s adorable.” I said, barely resisting the urge to pet him again. Puppies need their sleep!

“Heh, yeah, I guess he is cute.” Obito said, but he was giving me a weird look. “Kei?”

“Yeah?”

“...I guess girls really do like dogs.” Obito said, teasing grin already in place.

I replied, “Hey, I like dogs because they are both adorable and kickass. I don’t know about Rin-chan.”

Obito turned red. “T-That’s not what I was talking about!”

“I know, I know.” I said. It’d been ages since I’d called him out on not telling Rin about his crush on her. While I’d thought that she would have picked up on it eventually, I couldn’t exactly criticize someone for not noticing another person’s romantic feelings.

Long story, there.

Sensei had long since given up on holding his laughter in. It was amazing that he hadn’t smudged the seal he’d been working on. Especially since we were all sitting around it like the overgrown schoolchildren we weren’t anymore, cooing over a puppy.

 “…I checked the scroll.” Kakashi said after Sensei got his breathing back under control. “There are eight dogs, total.”

Pakkun, Bisuke, Bull, Guruko, Shiba, Akino, Urushi, and Ūhei. The Dreamer sounded almost giddy.

“Are they all still puppies?” I asked.

Trust me to ask the important questions.

“...Yes?” Kakashi said.

I don’t think I ended up getting anything done that day. But who cares?

PUPPIES!
Making Progress: Paper Trail

Chapter Summary

Kei: Realize.

Walk-stab-walk.

Clearing battlefields just sucks, okay? All active-duty shinobi have, at some time or another, had to clear the dead guys off a battlefield before they rot. Since fighting doesn’t stop until everyone’s dead or one side’s retreated, given how many shinobi fight just as effectively at night, Obito and I weren’t allowed anywhere near the main body of the attack until Sensei’s corps had already routed the enemy. Kakashi was with him, since he was technically one of the senior chūnin involved (even if he was still short).

It was only when the folks still fighting were more than twenty kilometers away that rookies like Obito and I were allowed to see what carnage was left.

The worst part is the silence.

Well, actually no. The worst part is the actual physical job of dragging corpses to the mass graves that used to be defensive trenches half a day previously.

Obito and I tended to stick together even on jobs that awful, and we both grabbed one of a dead Iwa-nin’s ankles to drag him toward the nearest pit. Alive, he might have outweighed us by thirty to thirty-five kilos each. Dead, it seemed more like sixty.

It probably would have been easier to stick him a corpse scroll, but Sensei hadn’t gotten around to teaching me how to make one and I didn’t have nearly enough scrolls for all the corpses lying around.

And once he was in the pit, we went back for another body.

Aside from collecting the wounded (and occasionally being called on to help keeping them in the land of the living, or not), that was our day. It sort of bled into the next day, and the day after that, until the smell of blood and rot and feces and acrid smoke practically clung to our clothes and hair and I wanted nothing more than to dive into a river and scrub.

It wasn’t until we were about to leave to head back home, with our cleanup mission completed at last, that I actually got a chance to sit still. I was packing my bag, glad to be finally getting the hell out of the junction of nowhere and hell on earth. That I happened to be doing it inside of a medical tent was less because I cared about anyone inside and more because it had started to rain.

There was only one almost-dead guy around, and he was easily ignored.

He looked...normal. Not like a bad guy, really. He’d gone white under his tan and looked more corpse than man by this point, lips chapped and expression pained if he was conscious. Aside from the remnants of an Iwagakure flak jacket, he really could have been just anyone (with a handlebar mustache). I didn’t care. I was so far past caring that he was around—besides, he wouldn’t be for much longer.
It was the last tent. End of the line. He was just the only one left of the fatally wounded that was taking three days to die. The rest had already been buried.

He coughed. I didn’t look at him. Instead, I gave a sharp whistle designed to alert the head medic that his patient was dying on him, finally.

But once I was done packing, I stood up. The head medic—a man named Hisoka something or something Hisoka—stuck his head into the tent and was leaning over the patient while I shuffled around, going about my business.

Obito, as it happened, also stuck his head in. His spikes were lying almost flat on his head because of the rain, but he’d packed and seemed ready to go.

“Good to go, Kei?” Obito asked.

“Yeah,” I replied, slinging my pack over my shoulder.

That was Iwa-nin on the cot coughed, “Yellow…Flash.”

Obito and I both looked at him.

He didn’t…exactly have the look that most of Sensei’s victims did. Ergo, he still had the ability to talk—Sensei had a tendency to go for the throat in most cases that didn’t involve the Rasengan, and the guy’s innards were also mostly on the inside. I could only guess that one of the other jōnin had gotten him—there was a through-and-through pair of stab wounds in his stomach and chest, but nothing else.

(Of course, he’d been bleeding for days on end and his injuries already smelled awful, so I guess it didn’t matter that no one else had decided to end his misery.)

(The fact that he’d been interrogated in the field, with all that entailed, hadn’t helped at all.)

Hisoka rolled his eyes. The expression didn’t really sit well with him—he looked, honestly, like what happened when one’s sideburns and beard took over one’s face in brown hair. He kind of looked like Hagrid, but short.

Oddly, the almost-dead man was looking right at us. Obito and I, I mean.

Something was flickering in those fever-clouded eyes. Something I didn’t like, which spoke of recognition.

How the hell does this guy know who we are?

“Y-Yellow Flash…childr…” He started to sit up. His eyes were laser-focused on us, and Hisoka was a second too late to push him back down.

I never want to see a man look at me like that ever again, as long as I live.

Obito grabbed my hand.

What the fuck?

“…K-kill…cap…ture…”

Then a kunai whipped past my head, so fast that I only belatedly realized Sensei had arrived right behind me in a burst of chakra.
1. The Iwa-nin reeled backward, a kunai embedded up to the handle in his eye. He was definitely dead now.

“Oh, ick.” I heard myself say, numb. Obito was tugging on my hand insistently by then, but I hardly even noticed.

Sensei wordlessly grabbed both of our shoulders and steered us out of the tent. I caught a last glimpse of Hisoka waving his hands in frustration at being deprived of a patient (or victim), and then we were off into the dreary, never-ending rain.

We found Kakashi under a tree, arms crossed and visible expression grim. He looked tense. Most of the time he was bored or frustrated or maybe even unwillingly entertained when Obito and I were around, but the stiffness in his posture went up a notch or two when he spotted us.

I agreed, even if I wasn’t quite sure what I was agreeing with.

Sensei ruffled Kakashi’s hair when we finally reached him, which struck me as odd even considering the events just beforehand. When Kakashi didn’t lean away or bristle, I knew we were in trouble. Obito and I kind of slunk over to his side like chastised puppies—he did, in fact, scoot away from us. But not by a lot, and not obviously.

Sensei crossed his arms, looking at us with a completely expressionless face.

Uh-oh.

After a few moments, I guess he felt we were aware of the gravity of the situation and broke the stare-off by reaching into one of his vest pockets and pulling out bloodstained, jet-black book. It was only the size of a pocket calculator at most, and probably about fifty pages thick, but I still recognized the symbol on the spine.

An Iwakagure bingo book. You don’t think…?

I do.

“Over the past couple of weeks, I’m sure you’ve been wondering why I’ve only let Kakashi into the field with me,” Sensei began.

Obito nodded, but I shook my head.

Of course, not wanting to be on the battlefield meant I was really more inclined to count my blessings when I was allowed to stay back with the Medic Corps.

“Here’s the reason.” Sensei opened the book, flipped a few pages, and finally tore one up. Then he flipped a few more and tore that one out, too.

He let me have the first one.

Name: Konoha’s Yellow Flash

Distinctive Characteristics: Blond hair, blue eyes. Attacks in an instant using teleportation.

Orders: Do not approach. Flee on sight.*

*Note: The Yellow Flash is often accompanied by three children, assumed to be his students.

Orders: Live capture; kill as last resort.
There was the sound of a page ripping, again. I looked over, and noticed that Kakashi had already shredded the sheet he’d been given. His chakra was agitated, but he was hiding his anger better than I would have.

“They mistook him for the White Fang last time.” Sensei told us.

Obito looked blank. I bit my tongue to keep from saying anything.

Sensei sighed. “For the next stretch, I’m going to be assigning you a different mentor.”

I felt a protest well up in my throat—no, no, that’s how we’ll get killed—and Obito actually said, “But Sensei—!” I felt Kakashi’s chakra jump.

“That’s enough.” Sensei snapped.

We went quiet, wide-eyed.

“You’re chūnin now.” Sensei said, calmer. His gaze lost its laser focus as he looked at the three of us, and his tone softened somewhat. “I’ve taught you all since you were brand-new genin. You’ve come farther than I’d ever…oh, that isn’t important.” His eyes were dark. I could only imagine what he was remembering. “Iwagakure knows you’re my students. So, Kumogakure will know soon enough. If they don’t already. If they can’t get to me—and they can’t—they’ll come after the three of you in the hopes that hurting you will keep me from fighting. I won’t stop until the war’s over, and you know that, but they don’t. Or if they do, they won’t care.”

...That must have been why Minato couldn’t reach Rin and Kakashi after the Three-Tails was sealed inside her.

My blood ran cold.

Rin’s death was the catalyst for Tobi’s birth.

And hadn’t Spiral Zetsu said that Minato was stuck on a separate mission, just before the moment of truth and despair?

He’d been fighting A and B at the time. Kumogakure shinobi.

Kiri had been backstabbing us.

Sensei went on, “I’ll be taking solo or group missions from now on. I should have done this before—now that you’ve been promoted, you should have been shuffled around and allowed to gain experience alongside older chūnin and learn what the rest of your graduating class has to offer in terms of teamwork, talent, and personality. You’ve been isolated by sticking close to me, and…we can’t afford to be that lenient anymore.”

In a way, it was almost a repeat of the time Yamaguchi-sensei cut me loose. “You’re doing so well, you don’t need me anymore,” in a nutshell.

But that was a lie. A damn, dirty lie. It didn’t feel like an accomplishment—it felt like abandonment.

It felt like a death sentence.

“They won’t stop trying to kill us.” I heard myself say, distantly. I crossed my arms, mirroring Sensei and Kakashi and also trying to stave off the cold. Everything felt wrong. “It’s not going to stop them.”
“Maybe it won’t.” Sensei murmured.

I suddenly wondered if that was why both of Sensei’s genin teammates were dead. Maybe someone had gone after Jiraiya, or even Sensei, and settled for the next best thing.

Sensei had scars too, even if he’d hidden them so well that I’d have never known they were there, if I didn’t think to look.

“We’ll still be training together.” Sensei told us. He frowned. “As far as I’m concerned, you’re still my students, and I’m certainly not going anywhere. But for now, I’ll ask that the Hokage keep you a little closer to home. If you get any missions without me, Kakashi’s in charge unless there’s a senior chūnin. Understood?”

“Yes, Sensei,” we chorused.

I mean, it wasn’t like we could exactly argue with him. There’s a difference between arguing with a big brother figure and arguing with a superior officer, which was the role he was stepping into. We gave in without a fight and were eventually shoved off on other shinobi for the sake of mystifying our enemies, which we hadn’t actually even earned on our own merits.

Or so I thought.

“Now, listen closely.” Sensei told us a little later. The three of us stood at attention, and Sensei went on, “In a month, I’ll be off the roster for a few days. If we can get together in time, I’ll put you three to your final test.” He scratched the side of his face, sheepish. “I really should have done this right after you were promoted to the same level, but…things happen.”

“What kind of test, Sensei?” Obito asked. “I mean, the Chūnin Exam would’ve counted for fighting against opponents of the same level, and the writing part was evil.”

“You’re right, Obito.” Sensei said. “But it’s not that kind of test.”

“You want to know if we can handle ourselves against a much stronger opponent.” I suggested after a moment, since Kakashi didn’t seem to have any input.

Then Kakashi said, “The bell test.”

The side of Sensei’s mouth quirked up. “Did you really have to spoil the surprise, Kakashi?”

“Yeah, he probably did.” I murmured. “So, what exactly is the bell test?”

“That’s for me to know and you to find out.” Sensei told us. “Now, get moving.”

We skedaddled.

Thinking about it, I supposed that the infamous bell test didn’t necessarily make sense for genin unless the goal was explicitly to screw them over. New genin, in particular, had all of the normal issues with attachment and getting along with strangers. It was just amplified by the nature of the challenge.

Still…the idea of fighting Sensei set my heart pounding.

We’d all sparred against Sensei before—it’s a basic part of shinobi training, to get us used to fighting people taller or stronger than we were. He’d always given us a challenge, sure, but he fought us one-to-one and generally the others were waiting in the wings for their turn. He never had to take us seriously, or as a group.

It was strange, but I wanted to test myself against the Yellow Flash. If I couldn’t test myself, I’d never know if I could go the distance.

…Wow, I sound like a Disney movie.

Okay, to be honest, I was kind of terrified too.

Who wouldn’t be? I knew Sensei was capable of more things than I probably ever would be. He was capable of fighting A and B at once, of beating the Nine-Tailed Fox down to a draw, and of out-speeding any shinobi alive. He knew timing and precision inside and out, could wipe out an Iwa contingent so quickly that most hardly realized they were dead before the flash of yellow, and had a dozen powerful jutsu he’d never used in front of us.

The idea of facing someone like that was daunting and thrilling in nearly equal measure. He was our teacher, after all. And our hero.

When I got home, I got started on the explosive seals. A month wasn’t that long.
Making Progress: Wherein Kei Misses the Point Entirely

Chapter Summary

Kei: Be oblivious.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

I swung experimentally, readjusting to the balance of a bokken after years of swinging a kodachi. It was easy enough to bring the blade to a snapping halt, even going fast enough to make the air whistle. I swung again, one handed, and batted a falling leaf out of the air.

“I see you’ve been keeping in practice.” Mom said, even as she had most of her attention on gently correcting Hayate’s stance with her own bokken.

“Not entirely.” I admitted.

I was no Miyamoto Musashi—even if I was pretty good with a sword, I still preferred carrying steel to wood when it came to real missions, and that required some adjusting to weight differences. Musashi, by comparison, had been famous for taken a bokken to every fight ever and winning. Also, my bokken was actually my mother’s spare, and therefore the size of a katana. I’d never gotten around to using one of those, and I had the oddest feeling that I’d be paying for it shortly.

…Come to think of it, carrying a bokken around would be a pretty neat tactic for someone with the Wood Release bloodline. I’d have to remember to mention that to Yamato, if I ever met the guy.

As it was, I rolled my shoulders and tried not to think too hard about being turned into my brother’s graduation exam.

Hayate swallowed nervously as Mom stepped away, and his chakra gave an anxious flicker. He didn’t look happy with the idea of sparring against me instead of Mom, and I fought down a grin in response. It wouldn’t help him any if I acted like a fox preparing for a henhouse raid.

“Stand and face me on your own two feet, little brother.” I said quietly, almost inaudible.

Hayate’s attention snapped to me anyway, and I briefly wondered if Itachi felt this—a surge of protective instinct and pride—when Sasuke confronted him after five years of planning revenge. Without the hatred and pain, of course.

From now on, your brother will measure his progress against yours. Mom had told me that, while I was still getting into my hakama for the day’s training. He’s young, but I expect you both to rely on each other as you get older.

How delightfully ominous.

“I want you to do everything you can to defeat Kei, Hayate.” Mom said as she paced between us.

…Yeah, bad idea to tell that to a ninja kid. Just saying. I narrowed my eyes.
“You can do this,” I said, and leveled my bokken at his face.

“I don’t want to hurt you.” Hayate mumbled.

“You probably won’t be able to, even with handicaps.” I replied, and one side of my mouth quirked upward. “Chūnin, remember?”

“No ninjutsu, genjutsu, or taijutsu.” Mom reminded us. “Pure kenjutsu and physical conditioning, like we practiced.”

Still, there was a significant gap between my skill level and my brother’s. Blade prodigy or no, Hayate had never used his kenjutsu in the field. He’d never been allowed to so much as touch a steel katana, per Mom’s orders. I’d been training with a team on my level—prodigy chūnin or mini-jōnin or whatever—and had been keeping up for years.

The real question was how hard it’d be to avoid stomping him.

I didn’t think that Hayate was anything like post-Massacre Sasuke—what with the ping-ponging self esteem and inferiority complex—but generally speaking, completely overpowering a nearly-ten-year-old boy was hardly going to go over well. Also, Mom was there, which meant I wouldn’t expect to win by that much.

I completely expected Mom to intercede on Hayate’s behalf if she had to.

“If you perform well, Hayate-chan, I’ll allow you to carry a bokken to school.” Mom told him. She was smiling, like there was no way he could disappoint her. “And when you graduate, I’ll see if I can get another kodachi for you.”

“R-Really?” Hayate stumbled, wide-eyed. “Really?”

I hid my own smile. Oh, brother, you don’t think it’s going to be that easy, do you?

“And all you have to do is last long enough against your big sister.” I added in a teasing tone, unable to resist.

Remember, don’t be too terrifying, the Dreamer put in dryly.

…I wasn’t sure if that was something to worry about or not.

“Begin!” Mom shouted, and the game was on.

Hayate attacked first, swinging high toward my head. I blocked, letting his bokken slide along mine and sending him sprawling past me. He’d overestimated how strong he was and underestimated the size difference between us.

Then, I was twelve and he was nine-and-a-bit. I’d hit the start of my teenage growth spurt, meaning that I was head and shoulders taller than him and probably outweighed him by ten or fifteen kilos.

I have to be honest here: as far as I could remember, this was basically my first time fighting someone smaller than me by that kind of margin.

I whirled on the spot, meeting Hayate’s second charge with only one hand on my bokken this time. I smashed his blade downward, throwing myself into a forward airborne flip over his back as he hit the dirt again.

Hey, I could show off if I wanted to. A little. I couldn’t resist, really.
¡Olé!

Honestly, most of the rest of the match went like that. Using bokken stripped us of some of our more advanced techniques—for example, my iaijutsu—and basically forced us to try to trip each other up or beat each other into submission. I let Hayate do things like launch attacks from overhead, or from behind, but ultimately he wasn’t getting anywhere.

Frankly, keeping up with Kakashi had made everyone else seem a bit slow.

(Except Gai. And Sensei.)

In the end, Hayate collapsed in a heap, exhausted. I was okay, even given how I wasn’t really trained for long fights, but I admit that my sword arm was a little numb.

Mom gave Hayate permission to carry a bokken to school after that, anyway.

“This is bullshit.” I said flatly.

Kakashi ignored me. “If I can write my name with shuriken, so can you two.”

“Says the guy whose name is the least complicated,” Obito complained.

Kakashi huffed, and Obito and I glared at the metal characters against the bark.

Oh, it was easy enough to hit bull’s-eyes at this point. We had a baker’s dozen of beaten, stabbed, and gutted wooden circles all over the forest pretty much just to prove that point under varying circumstances. Obito and I could both hit dead center of any of the rings while running, leaping, or while sliding past, and even while upside-down and being propelled by the force of an explosion/leg-up/sheer terror.

We weren’t necessarily perfect, but we were good. Guess all those late-night practice sessions paid off.

Anyway, Kakashi’s name was written as simply as possible with kanji. Out of all the possible characters that could be put together to make the same sounds, they required the fewest strokes I’d seen. They required fewer strokes than just writing the word “scarecrow,” which should tell you a thing or two.

Obito’s wasn’t that much more complex, actually, but he hadn’t decided to learn how to spell his name with shuriken solely to impress people. Starting cold always sucked.

And in my case, my parents had decided to use the most complex characters possible. Every one of them required at least five strokes of a brush to accurately recreate. Starting cold and burdened with a visually complex name. Ugh.

“Recreating your signature can’t be that hard.” Kakashi said.

I was saved from having to articulate my point more eloquently by a flare of chakra. All three of us immediately whirled to meet the new threat, and were greeted instead by Sensei’s carefree grin and the sort of huge hug that knocked all of us off our feet.

I don’t know about you, but there was going to be a time when Sensei wouldn’t be able to tackle all of us like that.

With Kakashi and Obito’s pointy elbows digging into my sides, I almost hoped that time would come sooner rather than later.

(But then, I didn’t. It’s complicated.)

Sensei let us up eventually, and I took note of his appearance. Konoha uniforms are fairly dark, all told, but I could still see bloodstains on the lower edges of his sleeves and the fabric of his flak jacket was slightly scorched and torn. His hair was more mussed than usual, which is saying something, but he nonetheless seemed pretty cheerful just to be back.

“I hope you three have been training while I’ve been gone,” Sensei said rather brightly, and I wondered if he’d already gone to see Kushina.

…Was that a lipstick mark above his eyebrow? Well, I guess he had.

“We’re ready for anything, Sensei!” Obito insisted, looking more enthusiastic about the upcoming test than I felt was justified.

There are no words for how much I’d hated pop P.E. tests in my old life.

“Good! Because you’ll be tested beyond your limits.” Sensei’s smile went crooked and I thought, oh shit, which was partly fear and partly dread. “What did you expect? You’ll be facing a jōnin.”

“You say that like we haven’t been preparing all month.” Kakashi said.

You know, when we weren’t running minor missions.

(Also, it was amazing how quickly a mission with Gai could turn into a farce. More on that later.)

“I think we’re as ready as we’re going to get.” I said. “Also, what has you in such a good mood?”

“Can’t I just be glad to be home?” Sensei asked me, and I gave the lipstick mark on his forehead a skeptical look. “Oh, all right. I discussed things with Kushina-chan and we’ve set a date.”

…Whoa.

“Congratulations!” I said. Sensei and Kushina were both about twenty-two or so, and I’d only vaguely heard of some of my former classmates getting married that young in my old life. Of course, I’d been a civilian in a world where just about everyone was getting married later than they used to. And I didn’t really know that many people, when you got down to it. “Though…what does this have to do with our training?”

Then again, I knew both of them pretty well and could honestly say that they would be happy together.

“Absolutely nothing, aside from how I’m not going to go easy on you regardless.” Sensei informed us.

“Okay, Sensei. Not like we expected anything less.” I replied.

“When are we going to do this?” Kakashi asked.

Obito said, after a moment, “And do we really have enough space here? Or are we gonna get to use the jōnin training fields?”

Sensei briefly brought a fist to his lips in thought, then said, “We’ll meet here tomorrow at seven o’clock. Then I’ll show you the training field we’re really going to use—and hopefully barely avoid destroying.” He winked.

Joy of joys. I needed more explosive tags to do that, though.

Lacking any destructive jutsu other than my tag-making skills, I really didn’t have a choice if collateral damage was the goal. And anyway, Obito’s fireballs had gotten big enough that my explosives were basically small change in comparison.

Personally, I can’t make a fireball the size of a house even with my biggest and most overcharged tag. Obito can.

“I suggest that you start making your plans now.” Sensei told us, still disturbingly cheery.

Is it wrong that I find that smile terrifying?

That makes two of us.

“Why tomorrow? Why not now?” Kakashi asked, and I abruptly realized that this was also the same kid who found joy and pride in testing himself against his teacher. Repeatedly. Until he won (which would only come about on the tenth of Never).

I’d rather have stayed a genin, almost. Ambition is not really in my nature. Mainly because, in this case, ambition means being kicked around like a football.

“...I just got back from the front and am really interested in spending the evening with my fiancée,” was the response.

I think Kakashi ended up biting back his first three thoughts so he could say, “Fine.”

“By the way, what were you three doing when I got here?” Sensei asked, waving a hand at the tree with Kakashi outlined in shuriken.

“Kakashi had a dumb idea and was trying to get us to do it.” Obito put in.

“If you can’t write your name with shuriken, you don’t understand accuracy.” Kakashi sniped back.

“So basically, yeah, it’s a dumb training exercise for impressing girls.” I concluded.

“...So, like this?” In an instant, Sensei had nearly forty shuriken in the air and all of us scattered, avoiding flying metal by a hair.

There was an avalanche of thunk noises.

I was the first one to look up, but Obito found the tree Sensei had used for target practice.

Minato Namikaze was written in matte black metal.

“Dammit, Sensei, you’re making us look bad.” Obito grumbled.

“I happen to think it’s a good exercise.” Sensei told us airily.

Kakashi almost glowed with pride.

“...So, what, are you expecting us to be able to do this by the time we’re jōnin? Because I’m pretty sure you didn’t practice that.” I said, getting to my feet again.
“Never underestimate a teenage boy with a girl to impress.” Sensei said, and then walked off.

Most of the shuriken poofed out of existence as soon as he was gone. So, on top of everything else, they were the products of Shadow Shuriken Jutsu and not just ordinary metal.

Basically…yes, he did that to show off.

Now that means I actually have to work on it. I sighed. “All right, Kakashi, you win.”

Kakashi gave me a look that said, As if there was any doubt.

Some things never change, it seems.

---

Chapter End Notes

Kei’s name is written two different ways, due to her samurai heritage.
Katakana (like everyone else in Naruto-land): ケイスケ
Kanji: 恵丞
Hayate’s would be 疾風 if his name had a canonical kanji spelling. Instead, it's ハヤテ.
Making Progress: Growing Strong

Chapter Summary

Kei: Take the Bell Test.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Like all good days, it began with an explosion.

Okay, so maybe that was a lie—for one, I have had plenty of good days without ever having to blow something up before teatime—but there was nonetheless an explosion involved. Also, it wasn’t my fault.

What can I say? Obito’s been getting better.

But it’d been a while since we got to really play with Sensei, and we made up for the time lost with enthusiasm. Kakashi was more serious about it than the wording there implies, but I knew for a fact that he’d been toying with the lightning-Rasengan theory all month and wanted to show and tell.

Or show and stab, as the case may be.

For my part, I was basically a walking landmine-generator.

In my opinion, the best plans are the ones that mean you never once have to confront the enemy directly. This is as much cultural conditioning as it is practicality—if your enemy never knows you’re around, he can’t hurt you. He also can’t do much about getting blown into the lower stratosphere. I was good in close-combat, but laying exploding seals all over the forest meant that I’d be able to put off facing Sensei directly. Given that Sensei was faster, stronger, and more experienced than all of us, it seemed like the best option.

Never let it be said that U.S. military doctrine wasn’t good for something, even in my new lifetime. When in doubt, strategically placed explosives are your friends.

I’m very aware that all of this makes me sound like a total pyromaniac/Deidara wannabe, in case you were wondering.

But hey, even tiny explosions are pretty distracting. They were also my new contact-based variants—ergo, chakra mines. As long as I didn’t let any of my teammates stray into the killzone, I could basically make Sensei’s trip through the forest as loud and inconvenient as physically possible. I wasn’t under any illusions about actually being able to hurt a guy who teleported for a living.

The initial phase of our day basically went like this: Meet up at Training Ground Three, follow Sensei to Training Ground Thirty-Five, and then commence laying traps. Sensei promised to give us a two-minute head start with which to play around and booby-trap everything. Kakashi immediately went his own way once the timer started, though, and Obito muttered something about lone wolves and stupid people in response. I just tried to lay as many of my new traps as I could.

Sensei made good on that promise, as far as I could tell. Two minutes into our training session, my bombs started going off.

Obito had split off from me about when I started laying traps—I knew where he was the whole time, though we hadn’t talked much about where to meet up afterward—and another huge fireball plowed through the forest at about…hm, I think it was about parallel to my path, going the other way and about a hundred meters off my right side.

Sensei must have been over there.

I stopped for a second, looking over my pre-prepared tags for a bit of inspiration. Hm…

The Dreamer asked, What’s the likelihood that you can herd Sensei toward Obito or Kakashi?

Pretty good, if I knew what I was doing and if the boys continued being distractions. Kakashi was darting here and there, probably running interference for Obito by accident (or by “accident”). I couldn’t quite tell what the boys were doing from so far off, but from the random flares of chakra everywhere (and also random fireballs), a fight was already ongoing.

Sensei was already in the right place, more or less. I just needed to keep him there and distracted.

I pulled a scroll from my hip pocket and started on my way.

One of the first things you learn about being on a team with a scent-tracker is to approach from downwind if you want to catch him by surprise. What goes for hunters goes for shinobi, really. I wasn’t precisely hiding from Kakashi, but any hint that he knew I was around would probably be picked up by Sensei. And even then, Sensei probably had some basic understanding of scent-tracking and sound-tracking that made keeping my distance a good idea.

I think a better question would have been, “How can I keep Sensei in enough hot water that Obito and Kakashi can take him?”

Realistically, there wasn’t a way for me to do that. If he’d been going full-force, Sensei would’ve probably summoned Gamabunta and squashed us all, or else just stopped pretending that he didn’t have each of us marked with the Flying Thunder God Seal. It’d be over in seconds.

But as long as he was still playing around, I could do something.

First, though, I needed to corral him. Then I’d need to get back on the same page with Obito.

Easy enough.

Or easier said than done. Not sure which, yet.

The scroll in my hand was relevant to that, in fact—it was basically an entire slew of explosive notes in a portable form. Sort of like paper towels, the edges of each note were perforated so they could tear free easily—at the very least, I found it more useful than the twenty-packs I usually had to make up in advance.

I could also blow the lot in one go if I wasn’t careful, which was why I was saving it for Sensei.

He’d shown me how to make them, so I figured he wouldn’t mind getting them back, too.

I found them quickly enough, even if I traveled on the forest floor rather than in the trees, for once. Kakashi was still taking Sensei on with taijutsu, spinning round and round and also upside-down, while Obito dodged this way and that in an attempt to get a better angle to set Sensei on fire.
I untied my scroll and, grasping it by the loose end, started unspooling the paper across the nearby trees. Frankly, the whole clearing was going to look like it’d been hit by teenage pranksters, but it’d be worth it.

…I think it says something about me, as well as about the boys, that Sensei didn’t react to me at all. If he had, he probably would have gotten a flying knee to the face, courtesy of Kakashi. Kakashi wasn’t a jōnin yet, but he was damned close to being promoted, and it didn’t pay to underestimate someone with a few things to prove.

And then I did my own ducking and dodging and scrambling, making my way to Obito.

“Hey, having fun?” Obito said with a laugh in his voice. He really did look happy, even though we were still probably going to lose.

“You bet.” I checked his chakra levels quickly, then did another sweep over Kakashi—both boys had more chakra than I would have, if I’d been the one taking Sensei on directly. Of the pair, Obito had been using the bigger jutsu and thus had less to spare. But he wasn’t down for the count yet.

And as for Kakashi…well, if he hadn’t busted out the Chidori yet, I figured the situation was under control.

I thought of the Chidori as a kind of checkpoint, plot- and timeline-wise. If Kakashi could actually pull it off, we were getting close to what I thought of as crunch-time.

If he couldn’t…well, who knows? Maybe that meant I’d been having a detrimental effect on said timeline and ought to punch myself in the face or something.

I was pretty sure I hadn’t managed to destroy the canon timeline yet.

“Anyway, fall back.” I told Obito, since my explosives were already laid. Either Kakashi would break off from the fight and follow us to plan (while I blew the clearing sky-high), or he’d continue attacking like a bullheaded idiot (and I wouldn’t blow everything up).

“Why?”

Okay, make that two bullheaded idiots. I had no interest in fighting Sensei in hand to hand. Or kunai to kodachi—Sensei may not have ever demonstrated proficiency with longer weapons, but any shinobi worth their headband knew how to fight them. At least in theory.

“We aren’t getting anywhere.” I told him, and we both ran off into the bushes. I had another signal in mind to tell Kakashi to break off, but unfortunately Obito had all of the smoke pellets I’d managed to gather. Kakashi probably had some of his own. “Obito, once we’re clear…”

“Yeah, yeah, I got it.” He spun on his heel and hurled a pair of smoke pellets—really egg-sized chemical containers that expanded in air—back toward Kakashi and Sensei. They only inhibited vision, which meant that Kakashi would be able to track us down easily as soon as he realized what was going on.

As soon as the smoke filled the clearing and Kakashi was out of the way, I hurled a kunai with a lit explosive tag back at where Sensei was. I wasn’t quite sure if he was in one of the booby-trapped trees, but I think it was a close thing.

Kakashi dropped out of the canopy, practically on top of us, and we all ran from the impending fireball.
And then it went off.

And I must say, the fireball would have probably been glorious. If, you know, we weren’t running from it. As it was, the blast knocked me off my feet and into Obito’s back. I think Obito tripped Kakashi, but he recovered gamely and was gone inside of another second.

“Well, that was fun.” I said once I got my breath back. He got to my feet a little after that, helping Obito up.

“Maybe to you,” was Obito’s reply as he picked bits of charred wood out of his hair. He shook himself, trailing bits of ash. “So, where’s Sensei now?”

I closed my eyes briefly, concentrating.

Five o’clock, two hundred meters. Guess we scared him quite a bit.

And wasn’t that saying something?

“Not far enough that he can’t get at us.” I went through a mental tally of all of my explosives. I was just about out, by that point. It was a little like having a box of fireworks on the Fourth of July—two hundred bucks for about an hour of entertainment if you were enthusiastic about it. I certainly hadn’t lacked for that.

Pity Sensei’s top speed was nearly in the triple digits.

“We’d better get to Kakashi. He’s…that way. Sixty meters and popping a lightning jutsu.” I leapt into the lower branches of one of the nearby trees, Obito on my heels. I was still half-focused on what my chakra sense was telling me, so I wasn’t up for naming cardinal directions. I just needed to get to Kakashi. Then Sensei’s chakra signature was also over there. Whoops. “Correction, Sensei is going after him and he needs backup.”

“Are you sure about that?” Obito asked plaintively—while Sensei hadn’t gotten around to tagging us out yet (because this really was basically ninja tag with explosives), we certainly weren’t cut out for fighting him directly. “Kakashi can take care of himself, can’t he?”

“Nope.” I replied, and we burst into the relevant clearing just as Kakashi’s shadow clone got its head kicked off.

Not that I was opposed to seeing Kakashi get taken down a peg, but really?

Kakashi appeared behind Sensei, on a higher branch, and I…

Well, I’ll put it this way: the Chidori is the kind of thing you can feel with every one of your senses. Even half-charged, I could practically taste the metallic buzz and the chirping of a dozen starlings seemed to fill my head. My chakra sense went briefly haywire, making me stagger. It was like getting every single sensation from a concert—the lights, the sound, the smells and thud-thud-thud of the bass line—all crammed into the space of about half a second.

Move it!

I pushed my way past it, unsteady, but by then Obito was already halfway up the tree to distract Sensei, Kakashi was getting ready to charge…

And then Obito crashed into me, knocking both of us down and driving the breath from my lungs, and Sensei had hurled Kakashi into a tree trunk.
Ouch. For both of us.

By the time Obito and I managed to get our limbs sorted out and Kakashi was dropped unceremoniously on the ground by Sensei, it was pretty much a given that we’d lost.

Sensei landed next to us in a crouch while we spent a minute or two trying to just get a breath back.

“So…that went well.” Sensei told us, looking absurdly pleased with himself.

“Says you,” Obito wheezed, and I tapped his shoulder with chakra racing up and down my arm. I had plenty to spare, in fact, and healing him of residual soreness and more legitimate injuries was no big deal.

I added, “None of us managed to get the bells.”

“Well, no. But you came very close, in your own ways.” He held them up for emphasis. “I have to admit, I expected slightly less in the way of attempted murder—Kei-kun, were you even trying to get the bells, or were you planning on salvaging them off my smoking corpse?”

I shrugged. “Six of one, half-dozen of another.”

Obito made a grab for the bells just then—Sensei was faster, of course, but it was certainly a game attempt.

“Nice try. I didn’t say the test was over, did I?” Sensei was grinning.

“No, you didn’t.” Kakashi told him seriously. His eyes were still on the bells.

“Well, if that’s how you feel.” Sensei stood up, tying the bells back onto his belt. He paced the clearing a little, eyes never leaving us. “How about round two? Try to stick to taijutsu this time—don’t think I didn’t notice you both hanging out in the back, Kei-kun, Obito.” His grin widened. “I will, too. Let’s see some teamwork!”

I wasn’t quite sure how my overuse of traps didn’t count as teamwork, but I guess getting a second chance was good, too.

I got to my feet, right hand on the handle of my kodachi. Obito was up, too, in the loose Uchiha starting stance. Kakashi hardly looked like he was ready at all—which was kind of the point.

Sensei laughed. “Sudden death mode, go! Get the bells if you can!”

I went low, Obito went high, and Kakashi went sideways.

By which I meant that I tried to cut Sensei’s legs off, Obito went for his face with a giant foldable shuriken—and damned if I knew where he’d gotten that, given that our packs were elsewhere—and Kakashi tried to flank him.

Of course, it didn’t work. This was Sensei.

I fell back, skittering around the edge of Kakashi and Sensei’s continued clash, and Obito’s arm met mine.

Without so much as a glance at each other, we went for Sensei’s legs. Kakashi was in the middle of a front-flip axe-kick at Sensei’s head, which he blocked with both arms, and Obito and I were just fast enough to hit him in the backs of both knees.
That Sensei didn’t topple like a felled tree had a lot to do with his freakish reflexes—he shoved Kakashi backward and rolled with the impact, launching into a back handspring. Obito and I didn’t even get a proper grip.

I flooded my hands with chakra, securing a solid grip on the ground, and swung my legs around to try and sweep at Sensei as he landed, while Obito raced around me and attacked with a pair of kunai. Kakashi struck from above, twisting in midair to build momentum. Sensei was still in midair and I already knew we simply weren’t fast enough.

Round two was going to be kind of disappointing.

It passed quickly, at least.

While Obito and I were coordinated—we’d learned to read each other and certainly didn’t have any mistimed attacks today—and Kakashi was both fast and aggressive, there was just too much of a gulf between us and Sensei.

Though, when you think about it, the list of people whose asses Sensei had kicked was pretty long. At least we were in good company.

About ten minutes later, we still didn’t have the bells, and on top of that had pretty much used up our chakra and bruise tolerance for the day. It’s one thing to say it’s a bloody three-on-one match, and quite another to actually try to fight someone who outclasses you by a league and a half. In a world without ninja powers, those odds might have worked out all right—I mean, obviously three nearly-thirteen-year-olds weren’t necessarily going to win against a single highly skilled fighter, but it would’ve been more even.

Sensei had faster reflexes than was physically possible for the average human. Seriously.

Most shinobi do, but there was…well, Sensei.

He still played nice at the end.

I dropped onto my butt with an “oof,” feeling every muscle ache all at once. I was down for the count even if I didn’t have a concussion. Kakashi was still on his feet, in a wobbly kind of way, but Obito wasn’t in much better shape than I was. In fact, he was probably worse off—a bad block had sent his own fist back into his cheek, giving him a big red mark that was probably going to bruise badly.

I wiggled my fingers experimentally, trying to either get feeling back into them or use medical ninjutsu, but no such luck. Obito was just going to have to deal with it.

“Better, but I see that I still have the bells.” Sensei told us cheerfully. He waved Kakashi over. “Come on, sit down. We’re having a team meeting.”

“Aw, Sensei. Do we have to?” Obito groaned, flopping sideways so that he was resting most of his weight on my shoulder. I briefly debated shoving him off, but we were probably equally sweaty and gross anyway.

“Yes, we do.” Sensei sat down with his ankles crossed in front of him.

Kakashi visibly debated where to sit for a second, then settled down on my other side. It put him about as far from Obito as possible without being especially awkward about it.

I sighed, leaving Obito to pout about things. Best to get it over with. “So, what’d we do wrong?
Well, more wrong than normal, anyway.”

“I actually think you all did rather well, considering.” Sensei looked a little disappointed with my pessimism.

“We didn’t get the bells.” Kakashi pointed out.

Thank you, Captain Obvious.

“I didn’t really expect you to.” Sensei said, shrugging. He looked at me rather pointedly. “Even if a certain someone took that as an excuse to blow up half the forest around here.”

“Guilty as charged.” I replied, grinning crookedly. “You’re too fast for me, Sensei.”

“Too fast for anyone, I hope.” Sensei told me. “That would have killed nearly anyone else you could be facing at this level, though. Keep it up.”

If the Explosion Corps can do it, so can we. Sure, a good chunk of them were basically Deidara but more loyal, complete with explosive clay, but I could certainly do a lot of damage if I had some time to prepare.

“That said, try to coordinate more with your teammates.” Sensei continued. “I didn’t even see you until the last few minutes of the first match, and that stunt with the scroll could have killed Kakashi if you timed it wrong.”

True. I scratched the back of my head. It hadn’t killed him, but sometimes it was hard to remember how dangerous we all were. I certainly had more firepower going for me than Rin did, and it’d pay to remember that. In the future, I was gonna have to save the big bombs for when we were starting to retreat. No more timing-dependent stuff.

Also, I wasn’t going to time it wrong if I could pinpoint his location. The Chidori would throw a wrench in that plan, though…

“What was that jutsu, Kakashi?” Obito asked. “It was loud enough that I think I felt my ears bleed.”

“Your ears weren’t bleeding.” I said.

“I said it felt like it, didn’t I?”

Kakashi drew himself up, seeming to inflate with pride. “It’s my own original jutsu.”

“It was bright and lightning and also really freaking loud. And really impractical if it’s as strong as it felt.” I commented. Kakashi glared at me. “What, did you expect me to not notice how it also drained half your chakra in one incomplete shot?”

“She has a point, Kakashi.” Sensei tilted his head quizzically. “That said, while the jutsu could use some refinement, I think you’re well on your way to coming up with a very useful jutsu.”

“Then I’ll just practice.” Kakashi said. He sounded kind of huffy, really.

Sensei mimed a wince. “Well, be careful about it. I’d prefer if I was able to sit on at least one of your training sessions—if the technique is anywhere near as draining as I think it is, I might be able to help mitigate the damage.”

“Damage?” Obito asked.
“High-powered techniques can have blowback problems.” Sensei nodded at Kakashi, and I noticed the bandages peeking out from under his dark gloves. “It’s nothing out of the ordinary, really, but you do have to train that kind of sloppiness out. And…hey, have you named that jutsu yet?”

“It’s called the Chidori.” Kakashi replied, looking away. I wasn’t sure why.

Obito, however, was looking at his hands. “Well, maybe the Chidori is gonna give you these kinds of burns eventually.”

He held up his hands, which were shiny along the inner edges of his fingers from old burns—the results of his long struggle to master the Grand Fireball technique. All Uchiha had them, to a greater or lesser extent, and Obito’s were fairly minimal—Rin had gotten around to working on them eventually. And none of them were recent.

For my part, I mostly had little nicks—mostly from my first couple of weeks with a kodachi. Before that, most of my blade-work had been done with wood, so I supposed that the worst I could have possible sustained would have been a cracked bone. Since I probably would have remembered that kind of thing, I had to conclude that I’d never really sustained injuries more serious than bumps and bruises throughout my childhood.

Sans, I think, the moment when I nearly drowned on that first mission.

And the time I fought Himawari.

Maybe I was making light of things.

“Do they hurt?” I asked. I mean, I didn’t have much in the way of chakra to spare, but I could dredge up some of the Dreamer’s Yin chakra if I really had to.

Hey! This is kind of a waste, don’t you think? I mean, we’re how close to the village?

She had a point.

“No.” Kakashi said.

Sensei shook his head. “Well, burns sting for a while, but at least they don’t open your whole hand up. It’s easier to control the charge with a lightning nature—wind nature? Forget it. Hope you like paper cuts.”

“Oh.” I said, all sympathy.

Hey, in my old life it was about as serious an injury as I got regularly.

Aside from crashing into things. I was kind of clumsy.

Obito shifted against my side—afer a second, he ended up mostly lying down, with his head resting on my thigh. I absently patted his hair, trying to ignore the urge to shove him into the nearest river. Best friend or not, I could feel his sweat soaking through my pants. Ugh, ugh, ugh.

“We can continue this later, you know.” Sensei told us. He looked amused and sad all at once, and I ignored a spike of dismay that came from Kakashi.

Gah, no one could ever accuse me of being that much of a teacher’s pet.

“But Keiiiiiiii,” Obito whined, and I pulled one of his ear covers off his head, almost dragging him up by the rubbery band. Then I let go, and it smacked him in the head. “OW!”

“Up.” I commanded.

Obito took his goggles off as he got to his feet, unsteady as he was. He rubbed his ear. “That hurt!”

“We’ve done worse. Mostly to each other.” I said.

“…True. But that was still mean.” Suddenly, Obito’s face lit up. “Oh! I can visit Rin-chan for this!”

Wait, wha—?

And then he was gone.

“…Well. Guess I don’t have to ask if he still has a crush on her.” I remarked to the space one Uchiha boy had recently occupied. I shrugged to myself, untying my headband and wringing the cloth out. My hair was a wreck—between my hat-hair problem and the exertions of the day, I think any resemblance to Sasuke’s infamous haircut was no longer a coincidence.

Or flattering.

“Gah, I need a shower.” I glanced back at Sensei and Kakashi, who were still sitting.

“Leaving so soon, Kei-kun?” Sensei asked.

“Yeah, I think I’d better let you two get on with your training stuff.” I said.

“Hm,” was all Sensei said at first. Kakashi was just ignoring me again. Then Sensei added, “In that case, I’ll make a suggestion.”

I paused.

“If you can, try focusing on your medical ninjutsu a bit more.” At my raised eyebrow, he went on, “So far, I’ve seen plenty of growth on the kenjutsu and fūinjutsu fronts. But I think you shouldn’t let your third major talent go to waste before you even make jōnin, Kei-kun.”

…I wait.

“You think I’ll get promoted again?” I asked.

“Eventually.” Sensei shrugged. “You’re not ready yet, but who knows what the future’s got in store? Just keep working at it.”

“All right. Thanks, Sensei.” Inwardly, I was giddy. But I had too much pride to let it show.

And then I ran off.

To: Pipsqueak

From: Rikuto of the Chinatsugumi

I got your letter—hell, I should’ve figured that pretty-boy sensei of yours would confiscate the scrolls. Tough luck, kid, because I’m not getting another scroll of dangerous forbidden knowledge for you. Used up all of Chi-chan’s good will on that one, you see. Even if it’d be funny.
Anyway, you’ll be glad to know that there are indeed more bouncy baby bratlings running around—Shirozora and Nanami had a boy, and our fearless leader has a niece to spoil rotten now. Who would’ve thunk it—Misaki, with a kid! They’re both a bit wobbly and all that, but I guess that’s what they get for trying to follow Miyu-chan and Kazu-chan around! Neither of the twins are spitting lava yet, but you just wait.

Speaking of which? Turns out Nami-chan’s boy is like his dear old dad. Never seen a tantrum that ended in icicles for everyone, but turns out it was typical or something technical. I wasn’t listening—it’s a lot more fun to get little Kaito to ice people. Misaki’s girl is normal enough, though with a name like Aiko, I expect either a tomboy to end all tomboys or the pretty little princess I think we have instead.

Anyway, sorry to cut the fun parts short, but I kind of have a schedule to keep.

Things are heating up, as you probably figured. Hell if I ever know what Ōnoki is planning, but the old bastard’s weak points are starting to show even from where I’m standing. Guess that means an offensive, sometime in the next month. Could be Konoha, could be Iwa. All I know is that none of us are going to be anywhere near the blast radius when it all goes down. Chinatsu’s pulling us back for the next year—no more carnivals and whatever other cheerful bullshit we put on for the kiddies. We’re preparing to have to hide out, and you know what that means.

Hand this over to your sensei, or maybe the Hokage if it bothers you. I’ve got a reputation to keep and whining in public ain’t a way to do it.

Look: I’m sorry we can’t help more, but we are retired. I like you, and maybe your idiot teammates, but we are not getting involved in a major dustup between two countries that can’t keep to one side of the bedroom. Been there, done that, burned the hitai-ate.

Anyway, good hunting, kid. Keep your blades sharp—when the earth moves, you might not feel it coming.

And I hope the politicians choke on it.

[The remainder of the letter is unintelligible. It seems to have once been attached to another slip of paper, and eventually burned after being thoroughly soaked.]

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title partially owed to the Tyrells. :)

Chapter title partially owed to the Tyrells. :)
It’d been a while since I had a chance to see the stars out in the wilderness. Even the training fields don’t count—Konoha is close enough that the light can blot out some of the cooler stellar configurations. I have to get much further out—kilometers upon kilometers—before the stars are really shining. But this time, there wasn’t any real time to enjoy it and try to figure out constellations. Such was the life of a shinobi on a mission.

It felt weird, really. I’d never been outside of Konoha without my team, and without the constant back-and-forth sniping between Obito and Kakashi, and Sensei’s muffled laughter, everything seemed…off. Like looking at a picture frame on a wall and trying to figure out if it was \textit{really} level. Or coming home and discovering that all the frames in the house suddenly \textit{weren’t}.

Today—tonight, rather—I was well outside of Konoha and in the middle of the Land of Fire. My team and I were arranged around a smokeless campfire, well-hidden in a grotto surrounded by trees and more rocks. Two of us were asleep, and two weren’t. I should really have been on watch, but between the perimeter alert seals Sensei had taught me and the fact that half the area was mined, it felt safe enough.

“And…hold it there.” Rin said, surveying my work with a critical eye.

I let her poke and prod, and eventually pull out a diagnostic jutsu in order to figure out the technical details. At least she didn’t actually touch my hand at all—if she had, it’d be down to my reaction time to keep her from possibly losing a finger.

“This was a lot more fun in theory.” I said, watching her work.

“You did ask for my help, Kei-senpai. I’m just doing it my way.” Rin replied, then she clapped her hands together and the diagnostic jutsu faded. “Okay. Let it go, then try again.”

I nodded, letting my chakra settle back down.

“Use the seals this time, though,” she added, and I complied.

Somewhat unsurprisingly, though, there wasn’t much in the way of progress. An extra two or three centimeters, maybe.

“Dammit.” I said. I cancelled my chakra scalpels again and scowled, clenching my fingers. “I don’t see why I was able to pull off the first stage of the Rasengan and not this.”

“With the Rasengan, it sounds like you’re trying to keep the chakra rotating, right?” Rin asked.

“…Yeah. I mean, chakra circulates in our coils like blood, so it’s not like it was made for sitting still.” I shrugged, disappointed. It just…I’d been capable of creating chakra scalpels since I was nine. I was thirteen, now, and realizing that Sensei’s lecture on jutsu creation was still relevant was kind of annoying. I’d only been working on extending the range of the scalpels for about a month and a half, and that simply wasn’t long enough.

“True, but I think the problem you’re running into has to do with keeping the edge.” Rin told me, sitting back on her heels. “Too much chakra, and it’s like hitting someone with a paper fan—it’s difficult to keep solid, you know? I know some medic-nin who only use two fingers so they can keep the edge compact.”

Well, that meant my plans to create an in-universe lightsaber were unfortunately put on hold. I didn’t quite have the level of shape transformation control that was necessary in order to perform the Flying Swallow or Samurai Saber techniques, or at least I thought that was the problem.

It was also possible that I was just shit at controlling my chakra once it left my skin.

I drummed my fingers on my thigh. I knew I could, say, dispel genjutsu at a distance. I could plant chakra mines on anything solid. I knew a dozen different types of seals and had been on the same team as one of the most terrifying prodigies Konoha had produced in recent memory. I could use kenjutsu well enough for a teenager with an undersized blade, and I knew most basic medical ninjutsu. Thing was, while my inherent chakra control had helped, I’d also worked at all of them for…well, I wasn’t done yet. But the point was that I’d been at it for years and logically couldn’t expect to just be good at something the first time I did it.

“Guess I’m just going to have to work at it.” I said. Or maybe harass Asuma into helping.

“It’s not such a bad thing,” Rin said, half-teasing. At the look I gave her, she giggled and added, “It’s all right! These things just take time and hard work.”

“Thanks for your help, Rin-chan.” I said. Rin giggled again—apparently my frustration was amusing—and headed over to pull her bedroll out of one of my spare supply scrolls. I’d packed pretty much everything I could get my hands on for this trip, and then packed all of it into scrolls to save weight.

Seriously, I don’t know why Sensei didn’t teach me storage seals first. It’s like having the whole of Capsule Corp. at my fingertips.

Once Rin was settled (which took some doing, since the poof of white smoke woke our teammates up briefly), I climbed up into a tree for my watch. I had a better vantage point to see the stars from up there.

Aside from the chance to stretch my legs, getting out of Konoha was a mixed bag. On one hand, we were heading for Mount Soragami. I’d gotten lots of letters from the Chinatsu暑期 over the years, but I hadn’t visited, and it’d be neat to see how things changed over time. On the other, I’d never been outside of the village with this particular cast and crew.

Rin was familiar, at least—she was brilliant as ever and would be our designated medic. I really wasn’t sure how she’d even gotten on the mission roster, given her lack of an established team despite her rank, and wondered if Yamaguchi-sensei was waiting back in the village to bite both of our heads off for running off. I think that was what surrogate dads were for, right? I mean, I hadn’t seen much of his apparent flip-out over her decision to start wearing blouses and skirts that made her look less like a mini-medic and more like a young lady, but I was sure that they were having some kind of argument.

Yamaguchi-sensei might have been just a tutor for me, or Hayate’s doctor, but he was practically Rin’s dad. I figured they both were justified, no matter how the snit-fit turned out.

It's interesting to see how things change, isn’t it?

It was.

My other two teammates…well, at least I could say I’d met them before.

Genma Shiranui, now age…seventeen, I think. He was the senior chūnin on this mission. He was taller than the rest of us by head and shoulders (or more), but he was also probably the most laid-back guy we could have been partnered with. Aside from being taller, though, he pretty much hadn’t changed. I’d only seen him fight twice since the Chūnin Exams where he beat Rin, but he had deadly aim with senbon and the tiger had never stood a chance in hell. Neither had the bandits.

And as for the last person on my team. Well.

Anko Mitarashi was something else, let’s be honest. She’d been Orochimaru’s student before the world found out how much of a sociopath the guy was, and he’d ditched her after sticking a cursed hickey on her neck. If there was anyone who had a right to be pissed off at him, it was her, and I admired her for standing up every day and facing the world. I’m not sure if I could. She was cute and enthusiastic and a brilliant student when she’d still had a teacher, but his shadow hung over her.

The investigation may have cleared her of any involvement in Orochimaru’s schemes, but that left a ten-year-old genin to the whims of a village with a bad record for social ostracism.

I was kind of hoping that the Hokage had sent her with us because we were, on average, pretty open-minded. Genma was calm and collected even under fire, Rin had been working on the same shift when Anko had been brought in, nearly dead, and…well, I was me.

And the story behind that one was embarrassing, anyway.

Suffice to say that while this wasn’t the team I’d have gone to hang out with after school, I was okay with things as they stood.

The next day dawned bright and early, and we set off in various states of sleep deprivation. While normally, camping in our own territory should have been secure enough, none of us were willing to risk a Rock-nin onslaught by being careless. We never knew where everyone in the Land of Fire was, and there was a half-decent chance some of them were hostile.

After I resealed everything into my various scrolls, we at least had relatively light burdens.

“What are they like?” Anko asked as we walked, with her bouncing ahead of the pack by a few paces. “You’re the only one who’s been out there, right? Hey, Gekko-san, I’m talking to you!”

“It’s just Kei. Keisuke-san if you’re feeling super formal, I guess.” I corrected mildly. “And anyway, the Chinatsugumi are pretty cool with Konoha-nin. “ Sans Danzō’s gang of psychos and Orochimaru himself, anyway. “They’ll probably have a couple rooms at the inn open for us, along with dinner.”

“Do they have dango?” Anko prodded. I couldn’t blame her—Konoha’s was the best, of course, but her parents had certainly named her aptly.

“Yeah. Remind me to tell you about the time Obito—” And I stopped, because Rin poked me in the shoulder. Fine, fine, no more giving up blackmail material. “Er…well, the food’s good and the people like us most of the time. Good enough, right?”
“Sounds like it.” Anko agreed, and went to bother Genma.

I’m convinced that the only thing that’ll really make Genma lose his cool is the Sound Four, so I decided not to mediate.

We only got attacked by bandits once the whole way to Mount Soragami (which was quickly sorted out with extreme prejudice), so all in all I’d have to call it a nice, peaceful trip. We arrived sometime in the late afternoon on the third day out of Konoha, and I was struck by how little the mountain fortress had changed. Sorayama-no-Sato was maybe a little smaller than I remembered it, though that was probably because I was about twenty centimeters taller, and maybe the flags looked a little more worn. Other than that, though, I wasn’t seeing much change.

We walked up to the gate guards and I was once again struck by déjà vu. Sure, Sensei wasn’t around at the moment, but the protocol was mostly the same.

“All right, pass on through,” said Pencil-Mustache. Being a gate guard for four years had to suck, I thought. He’d probably go gray early.

We walked under the gates, since I didn’t hear anything about rooftop racing this time around, and we headed for the main building. Hopefully, Chinatsu or Misaki were around.

Anko was looking around at the town, brown eyes wide and curious. Genma idly dropped a hand onto her head, steering her back toward the main thoroughfare when she tried to dart off to explore. Rin was looking around, too, but she wasn’t ten and I’d seen pretty much everything worth noting the last time I was here. I was more focused on my aching feet and the idea of a bath at the onsen, to be honest.

“You’re no fun.” Anko complained, pushing Genma’s hand away.

Genma snorted. “There’ll be time for fun later, Mitarashi. For right now, just follow my lead.”

I rolled my eyes while Genma wasn’t looking. Aside from Konoha itself, Sorayama was one of the least dangerous places for a Konoha-nin. Rin pinched my arm, though, so I stopped being a brat.

We managed to make it to the main office before anything unexpected happened. I could see Chinatsu and Misaki at the opposite end of the impractically long hallway, with Chinatsu sitting on her sister’s desk, and one of the three interchangeable aides hovered at a nearby doorway.

The guard who’d been at the office door followed us in and announced, “The Konoha shinobi have arrived as requested, Misaki-sama.”

“Welcome back, Keisuke-kun.” Chinatsu remarked, inclining her head toward me. I nodded back, and she added for the benefit of my team, “My name is Chinatsu Kasai, of the Chinatsugumi merchant group.”

Misaki finally looked up from whatever she’d been signing to say, “And I am her sister, Misaki Kasai. Chief of the financial end of things, if you must know.” Then she went back to scribbling.

“Genma Shiranui.” Genma said, bowing a little.

Anko puffed herself up and said, “Anko Mitarashi, genin of Konoha!”

“And I’m Rin Nohara. It’s nice to meet you.” Rin, unlike the rest of us, actually did a full bow.

Chinatsu waved a hand. “Feel free to rest here at the inn. We’ll have the delivery ready for you
Yep. Four Konoha ninjas on a week-long trip to a merchant caravan’s home base…to pick up mail.

Okay, okay, so it wasn’t just mail: Sometimes, local seal masters and blacksmiths weren’t sufficiently insane/available to provide everything necessary for the war effort. While there were no AK-47s or ammo stockpiles in this universe, the Chinatsugumi were capable of providing reusable storage scrolls, food, explosives, kunai, shuriken, and swords in massive quantities. Personally, I never quite figured out where or how they got all of their stuff, and I never asked.

I think this shipment included solid explosives, for one.

(Paper tags and chakra mines are great and all, but sometimes you just need to make Iwa’s Explosion Corps cry.)

“Please show our guests to the inn, Itsuki-san.” Misaki said to apparently empty air, and then, quite suddenly, a fourth near-interchangeable aide pops up out of nowhere. I could tell the first three apart from this one solely because she was a woman, as opposed to the three rather feminine men. It’s all in the shoulders, really.

“Follow me, please.” Itsuki said, and my team complied.

I hung back for a moment, looking at both of the Kasai twins. “Did you need me for anything? After the mission scroll…”

It was weird for me to be specifically requested for a mission. Maybe if I was famous, I wouldn’t have the strong urge to check for an ambush. Or maybe it’d be replaced by a stronger one, even if I knew the Chinatsugumi were mostly harmless.

“Ahh, yes. Actually, Keisuke-kun, Rikuto requested that you meet someone with him.” Chinatsu said, finally getting off the desk. Misaki ignored both of us. “Just follow me and we can get this over with.”

Ominous…

The hallways weren’t getting smaller, at least, and I could still sense my teammates. So I was pretty sure she wasn’t going to shove me into a side room and brick up the entrance—would’ve been bad PR.

“As it happens, I don’t think you should be anywhere near this part of the complex.” Chinatsu commented, not looking back.

I didn’t reply.

“But he seems to think it would do you good.” Chinatsu shrugged, and we came to a door that led outside. I could hear afternoon crow calls seeping in through nearby windows—the light from outside looked rather orange, too. She slid it to one side and stepped through.

I hesitated—I was feeling a good half-dozen chakra signatures at least, and I didn’t really recognize most of them—before following.

I don’t know why, but I never thought that Misaki or Chinatsu were very interested in gardening.

The garden itself was beautiful—maples reigned supreme, with cherry trees slightly closer to the compound’s walls. They were out of season, but with Cherry Blossom Boulevard as one of Konoha’s many attractions I could at least recognize the trees. The terrain itself sloped upward and downward in perfectly sculpted miniature hills, lined with gravel-and-slate paving to delineate a path for the best view. There was a gazebo to one side of the garden, connected to the path by a short wooden bridge and otherwise standing on six thin legs. The koi pond in the middle of the garden was long and gently curved rather than circular or stubby, with a tiny stone lantern house suspended over it by a cobbled arc. The trees were lined with lanterns that had apparently just been lit, with more sticking out of the ground on pikes and making the garden glow.

For a moment I just wanted to sit and stare.

Then I finally paid attention to my tingling chakra sense and shot Chinatsu a look. She shrugged and walked on, heading toward the gazebo. From what I could tell, that was where the chakra signatures were hanging out, and I could hear faint, high-pitched laughter coming from that direction.

It wasn’t until I made it to the gazebo itself that I realized what—or rather, who—I was looking at.

One of the other aides—and I swear I’ll try to learn their names eventually—was sitting in the middle of a rug, surrounded on all sides by children. For a second, I didn’t really know what to say.

The oldest two kids were probably around four or so, with brown skin and jet-black hair that was more wavy than straight or spiky. I had a feeling that they were the infants I’d met once before—Kazuki and Miyu, the fraternal twins Rikuto had briefly introduced me too. They were both listening to the story the aide was telling, though I could tell just from my chakra sense alone that one of them was rapidly getting bored.

Another child—a black-haired boy, probably around the same age as the twins—had fallen asleep on a cushion well away from the others, and was curled into a blanket like it was a nest and he was a tiny bird.

The next one was a toddler with greenish-black hair who might have been two years old, at most. Rather than listening, he (or she?) was curled up on the aide’s lap, and drooling into the man’s pants. Next to him was a little blonde with big gray eyes, with her hair in a pair of tiny pompom-ridden pigtails. She was chewing on her fist, looking around when she heard newcomers.

The last kid was pink-haired and rather smaller than the others, snoozing the afternoon away on the aide’s calf. I wasn’t sure who she (he?) belonged to, but I could make a guess at most of the others.

Chinatsu and I sat down on the rug, and the blonde toddler immediately wobbled over to her much bigger blonde counterpart.

“Auntie!” the little girl said, raising her arms, and Chinatsu automatically lifted the girl into her lap.

“What’s her name?” I asked quietly, while the toddler twisted her tiny fat fists into her aunt’s long hair. I also noticed that the two younger napping kids were starting to wake up, though the boy in the corner snoozed on.

“Aiko-chan. She’s my niece.” Chinatsu told me. She pointed to each of the other children with her free hand, saying, “You’ve met Miyu-chan and Kazuki-chan.” I nodded, and she went on, “Then there’s Kaito-chan—Nanami and Shirozora’s son.”

My eyebrows shot up. “…I didn’t really think they would have any kids, come to think of it. Shirozora’s…the way he is, after all.” It didn’t seem polite to say “one step down from axe murderer on a bad day.” Then, thinking about how she and Akira had seemed so close, I started to say, “So, you and Akira-san…”
Chinatsu shook her head. “Not yet. Maybe not ever.”

I didn’t want to know how she discovered that, though I could imagine. “I’m sorry.”

“Don’t be. It’s not your fault.” Chinatsu ignored any twinge of pain I might have caused her and went on doggedly, “The other two are foundlings.” She paused, briefly. “War never really changes.”

No, it doesn’t. And there’s no mercy for those caught in the wrong place.

“Roku-chan is older—he remembered his name, at least.” By that, she seemed to mean the kid who’d turned himself into a burrito. Chinatsu continued, “Unfortunately, Tayuya-chan is still a baby, so we renamed her. I think it suits her.”

…Tayuya?

I thought, I might have jinxed myself with that Sound Four comment, before.

We don’t really know anything about the Sound Four, other than their personalities and their devotion to Orochimaru, the Dreamer pointed out. Kimimaro was picked up after his clan got themselves massacred by Kiri, and the three Sound genin were taken in from the street if Zaku is anything to go by. There’s no reason he might not have managed to find more orphans elsewhere—or make them.

What is it with this universe and Vengeful Orphan Syndrome?

But…we also don’t know if Tayuya of the Sound Four was ever adopted by the leader of a merchant troupe, in the old timeline. The Dreamer scratched her head, inside of my head. Talk about a trip. There’s just so much that was never covered…

That’s putting it lightly, sadly.

I have no idea how I managed to keep my voice steady, but “I’m sure they’ll grow up strong” came out perfectly even, as though nothing was wrong.

I needed to talk to Rikuto. Where was the superstitious missing-nin when I actually needed him around? Sadly, he didn’t appear like Beetlejuice would have, and I ended up spending the rest of the reasonable hours of the evening with Chinatsu, the still-nameless aide, and the kiddies.

I spent a lot of that time being drooled on, to be honest. I knew more or less who these kids would grow up to be, if they had the chance. Like Chinatsu’s generation, theirs would be fraught with the sort of danger and misery that only really seemed to happen to protagonists. Kaito would probably be mouthy and emotionally dishonest because distance, in his mind, would keep him safe. Aiko would probably be pretty normal, and the moral center of any group. Miyu and Kazuki would be forever at each other’s throats if things went as they had once before, but they’d always find a way back to each other and their family. Roku would be…something. I wasn’t sure.

At least, that’s how they’d turn out if they followed the stories of those they reminded me of.

Tayuya would probably be an exception, if she did end up as a member of the Sound Four—at least, her misery would be short and end in one last blowout.

Later that night, I spent a long time in the bath, just thinking about things. It must have been at least an hour, since time slips away when you’re daydreaming. Eventually, Rin knocked hard enough on the bathroom door to rattle it and asked if I’d drowned.
Fat chance.

“Just thinking, Rin-chan.” I called back.

“How about you think out here before you turn into a raisin?” Anko’s voice demanded.

I laughed at myself, just for a minute, and obeyed. There had to be a more proactive way of doing things.

Well, actually. I already knew there was. I just wasn’t willing to chance it, most of the time.

The primary value in my foreknowledge was in how relevant it was. The second I started telling people about it, it’d start depreciating. Like a new car off a lot, really. And I wasn’t willing to risk my foreknowledge affecting people I knew were central to the Plot, not yet. If I couldn’t predict anything, any changes I made were up to fate. And Fate, as everyone knows, is a gigantic bitch.

I felt safer throwing things out in the open with the Chinatsugumi—specifically with the ever-irreverent Rikuto—mostly because they were generally further removed from events and didn’t seem to have much effect. Only…now they might.

I bit my lip.

It’d be a good idea to start here.

Of course it would be. It was small-scale.

Once all my teammates were asleep, I went looking for Rikuto.

He was in the city. He just wasn’t around the kids when I was, probably because of one errand or another. I didn't know what'd take precedence over attending a meeting he'd been interested in, but I decided it wasn't important. I left a note stuck to one of the main house windows before heading back to the inn, back through the same garden I’d used to sneak out.

Almost as soon as I reached the inn’s garden, I felt a gentle pop of chakra and then Rikuto’s magma-like chakra signature was barely ten meters away. I looked over at him, squinting in the darkness, before wandering over to one of the wooden bridges. The inn garden was a lot smaller than the one for the main house, but it was pretty enough and included a type of privacy seal that made conversations inaudible to anyone more than five meters away from the speaker.

“Evening, Pipsqueak.” Rikuto said as he approached. He sat down on one of the lower steps on the bridge, back to me, and said, “You got taller.”

“You got older.” I responded, but there wasn’t any heat in it. I sat down, too, and crossed my legs in front of me. “I met Miyu-chan and Kazuki-chan. They’re cute, like you said.”

Rikuto made a noise like “hah” and nodded. “Yeah. Can’t tell you how many former comrades would’ve pegged me as dead by twenty. And here I am, pushing thirty-three and a father of two.”

I swallowed. “Yeah, I…I’m glad you’re happy.”

“Nice sentiment, Half-Pint, but I’m betting you didn’t ask me out here for good news.” Rikuto said. “So, what is it?”
“I…” It was like the words got stuck in my throat. I swallowed hard and I think my voice came out strangled, but… “I think Orochimaru will come after you, sometime in the next five years.”

Rikuto froze.

“I don’t know when.” I said bleakly, looking up toward the slightly-dimmed stars. In a lantern-lit garden, the interference from ground lights was too strong. “Tayuya—the baby—I dreamed about her as a teenager. As…as the second-in-command of one of Orochimaru’s hit-squads. I know it’s her, but I don’t…I don’t know how it happens. If maybe, in my dream, Chinatsu never found her.”

“Why?” Rikuto managed.

“Orochimaru looks for bloodlines.” I said, refusing to look at him. “Maybe it’s because of that. Maybe you get in his way. Maybe it’s because you’re friendly with Konoha. I don’t know.

“Or maybe I’m wrong, and you leave Tayuya out in the wild to fend for herself.” From the way Rikuto actually flinched at the suggestion, I decided it was unlikely. Even knowing the baby could be a sign of bad things to come. “All I know is that Tayuya-chan is a cute little baby girl that Chinatsu cares a lot about. And, in my dream, she’s running with Oto and there’s no mention of the Chinatsugumi at all.”

For all I knew, a similar group had existed somewhere in the blank spaces of Naruto canon. And then…nothing.

For a long time, neither of us said anything.

“…It’s a hell of a thing, Half-Pint.” Rikuto sighed, shoulders slumping.

“What?” I was confused.

“It’s interesting, you know. Chi-chan probably talked to you about the feeling we get, around people we feel like we should know?” At my nod, Rikuto continued, “Ever since Miyu-chan and Kazuki-chan were born, I knew they were my blood. My children, mine. Chi-chan talked with Misaki about getting the same feeling with Aiko-chan and I know Shiro and Nami-chan felt the same for Kaito-chan.” He dropped his chin onto the heel of one hand. “Akira felt it, too, and I swear the man’s about as competent as a brick.”

“…I don’t see where this is going.” I said quietly.

“Chi-chan found Tayuya-chan in the burned-out wreck of a border village about two months ago.” Rikuto told me. “And I didn’t get any ping off her.”

“Maybe it’s because she’s adopted?” I suggested.

“Except Roku-chan is too, and all of us felt that one.” Rikuto corrected gently.

Well, yeah, I thought. Tayuya was one of the Sound Four—she was never a part of your story.

Until now.

“Not getting a déjà vu feeling isn’t a bad thing.” I said. “You probably meet tons of people who don’t stick out one way or another, all the time.

“Never said it was.” Rikuto said.

I frowned. “This isn’t Tayuya-chan’s fault.”
“You don’t think I don’t know that? How the hell can it be a baby’s fault that we get targeted by a crazy Konoha missing-nin?” Rikuto ran a hand through his hair. “What’ll he do to her?”

“…She’ll be a loyal minion, up until the day she gets killed.” I said. “That’s why…it’s probably going to happen in a few years. If she gets too old, she’ll remember who killed her family.”

“Hah, yeah. Can’t have that happen.” Rikuto said bitterly. “If she was old enough to remember that, he’d just kill her and save himself the trouble.”

Or use her in horrible experiments. I still hadn’t met Yamato, but I knew he’d already met Orochimaru.

“Shit.” Rikuto said.

I agreed.

“Hah. Look at me—barely four years younger than that snake and I already know I can’t fight him.” Rikuto’s voice was strangely flat. “None of us can.”

“I’m sorry.”

Rikuto sighed again. “No, no, I’m glad you told me.” He looked back, teal eyes seeming to glow in the dark, “I just need you to tell me anything you can about him. Can you do that for me? Even if none of us can face him and win, it…it might help some of us survive.”

I did. I told him everything I could remember—the Curse Seals, the white snakes, the body jumping, the experiments I knew about. Every single damned jutsu and summoning contract I could find, anything about his obsession with kekkei genkai. Any scrap of his physiology I could remember went into the pot, too, and I hoped it would help. Anything and everything my dream-memories had supplied, I told to Rikuto.

“Tell you what, kid,” Rikuto began, as I finally ran out of steam, “I’ll write a letter to your sensei.”

“What for?” I asked.

“This is too important to just keep to the Chinatsugumi, and you can’t be the one to break the news. You’re a kid, still.” Rikuto said. I winced and nodded. “It’ll be anonymous, but take it back anyway. It’ll have everything you just told me, all right? All his weaknesses, all his jutsu, and all packaged into a neat little bow for your Intelligence department. It won’t even look like your info—it’ll look like mine. Just promise me one thing: Do your level best to get that bastard killed, whether he does us in or not.”

“I…”

“You’re not strong enough to do it yourself and probably never will be. Hell, you’re in good company—most people won’t.” Rikuto shook his head sharply. “Take it to your sensei or the Hokage and tell them we’ve been doing an analysis on everything to come out of Oto—at the very least, we will be once I take this to Chi-chan.” He patted my on the head. “Understand, Keisuke?”

“…”

“…” Yeah.” I swallowed. “Thank you.”

He gave my hair one last ruffle before running off.

I sat there in the garden for a long time, looking up at the stars and hoping that, between the training my team had done over the past four years and the information Rikuto was going to parrot back to Konoha, I’d know I’d made the right choice.

The hand’s been dealt, now.

Two months after I gave the letter to Sensei, telling him it was some kind of report, my name came up again. Along with my entire team.

I ran a quick Mystic Palm jutsu over my scraped and bleeding knuckles healing the damage in one swipe. Nearby, a training dummy lay in pieces in the ruins of another one, shredded where it stood by a hurricane of chakra.

Obito grinned at me, giving me a thumbs up for my success. I didn’t feel much like smiling, though I did anyway.

It was December, almost a year before Naruto will be born.

While Obito went home, I went shopping for a present. Kakashi was going to be officially promoted in about a week, after all. It wouldn’t do to show up short a gift.

And then…well, then we’d face the gauntlet of Kannabi together, or die trying.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title owed to the house motto of the Tullys.
Kannabi Bridge Arc: Descend

Chapter Summary

Kei: Embark.

Things fall into place with startling ease, sometimes.
It’s actually rather surprising, then, how easily they fall apart.

Kakashi’s promotion was actually fairly similar to the businesslike meeting in which Obito and I made chūnin two years previous, according to what I heard about it. Sensei told me that the order was handed down from on high, and we ended up having about two days to celebrate the occasion before he actually outranked us.

I went out shopping with Rin in order to find something suitable—mostly because I still hated shopping and needed motivation in the form of another person in order to do it—and while he could afford anything I could give him, I just needed something to customize to give to him. Hearing about his promotion, Rin also decided to chip in. It was a bit of a rush job on both of our parts, but we pulled it off.

The day Kakashi’s promotion was made official, he got a customized med-kit from Rin (though she gave one to me and there was another to give to Obito, which lessened the novelty somewhat), a Flying Thunder God kunai from Sensei, and a black utility belt from me. The belt had built-in pouches I’d practically covered in security seals, making it so that he’d be the only one able to open them without getting a high-powered lightning jutsu in the face when they were active.

Well, I assumed it’d be lightning jutsu—the seals were supposed to be somewhat customizable.

One of the side effects of pulling out most of the stops for Kakashi’s gift, though, was forgetting to grab Obito from the Uchiha district.

And he arrived late, with precisely fuck-all in the way of congratulatory gifts.

Exactly as expected.

“Will you just give me a break? I’ll get something for you later!” Obito snapped, flushing red with embarrassment and frustration.

There might not be a “later” for us, I thought morbidly.

Kannabi began today.

I spent most of that team meeting feeling vaguely ill.

“Better to get nothing than something from you.” Kakashi sniped back.

I also had a steadily growing headache.
Over the past few months, we’d finally picked up what I considered our iconic outfits. Well, at least Obito and Kakashi were—I didn’t, by definition, have one.

I was still wearing a jacket and standard shinobi pants, but I’d managed to cram a flesh-toned mesh shirt under everything. I also wore shinobi mesh under my pants, which extended down to the tops of my new open-top sandals. I had a strap slung across my back that kept my kodachi between my shoulder blades, and my jacket had a tail that hid both of my supply pouches from cursory sight. Other than a small scroll holster in each sleeve and one hidden across the small of my back, that completed my ensemble.

Obito was dressed in blue edged in orange. Actually, there was more blue than I’d seen since the last time Sensei took his flak jacket off—it had the effect of making the wearer look a little blob-like, if not for Obito’s white belt. The Uchiha fan was huge and bright on his shoulders, which gave me a weird feeling just at the thought. He was otherwise equipped mostly with standard gear—like the other members of our team, he wore two shuriken pouches rather than the one that most genin (who were less confident in their weapon ambidexterity) stuck with, a kunai holster with room for at least four, and metal guards over the backs of his hands.

Kakashi, for his part, was decked out in darker colors aside from the white stripe along his sleeves and his elbow-length metal armguards. He had two brown straps that crossed his chest and served as a mount for his tantō holster—to a blade he used maybe once in a bloody blue moon. He had two pouches for shuriken, though I was also pretty sure his kunai holster had a scroll instead of the normal blade allotment. It seemed like all of us were going to be equipped to kill a platoon.

“Kakashi, Obito…” I could hear my own voice rise into a snarl, rather than my usual detached sarcasm, and stopped short. Both of the boys were looking at me. I sighed. “Look, not now. We can do this ‘dance around the problem and eventually have a slugging match’ thing later. Sensei, what were you going to say?”

“I’ll explain as we go, Kei.” Sensei told me. “Everyone got everything they need?”

“Yes, Sensei,” we chorused, because some things never got old.

I remembered watching Kakashi Gaiden a couple of times as a twenty-year-old social shut-in. It wasn’t hard to tell where this mission was going to get us. Oh, sure, Sensei just told us to meet up for a mission briefing and it just so happened to fall on the same day Kakashi was officially promoted… bah. It was a waste of time to be bitter. Events were already in motion.

I traveled relatively lightly—aside from the contents of my pockets and pouches, everything else was sealed into storage scrolls in my pack. I’d offered to do the same for Obito and Kakashi, and ended up with their bedrolls and about eighty percent of our food. They kept the rest. Without the weight of a full pack to distract me, I spent a lot of time looking around at the scenery and trying to keep my emotions under control.

We were well into our trip before I felt anything like normal, and even that was a tentative thing.

“So, a mission with Kakashi as team leader.” I mused aloud. Not like that was new. “Well, at least it’s something we practiced. Kinda.”

“Like hell we did.” Obito muttered.

I punched him in the shoulder, in a friendly kind of way. “Come on, Obito. Quit sulking.”

“It’s always about Kakashi, though!” Obito made a helpless sort of gesture with his arms, frustrated.
“Ah, just let him have his day. We can always jump him later.” I suggested, smiling crookedly.

“I heard that.” Kakashi shot back at us, from where he was leading our formation.

“But you didn’t hear a date and time and therefore that means jack.” I told him.

Kakashi gave both of us an exasperated look, then looked to Sensei. Sensei shrugged and held up his hands in a gesture of surrender. “You’re no help.” Kakashi complained.

“I’m just an innocent bystander,” Sensei insisted, and Kakashi huffed.

“Okay, yeah, I feel a bit better.” Obito said to me, too quietly for Kakashi to hear.

“Good.”

It wasn’t until Sensei had us stop for lunch that we finally got a look at the strategic reasons for the mission.

Sensei pulled a map out of his pack and laid it flat on a rock, while the rest of us gathered around him. He traced a line with one long finger, passing the old line that delineated the front lines as of a week ago, and tapped the symbol representing Kusagakure. “As of one week ago, Iwagakure has launched a full-scale invasion of Kusagakure territory. So far, the village itself hasn’t fallen and many Konoha and Kusa-nin are fighting within this territory. Reports suggest that we’re looking at an invasion force numbering over a thousand.”

I frowned. I hadn’t seen a thousand shinobi in one place since the day Sensei’s Hokage candidacy had been announced, but I did have an idea of what scale the Naruto world tended to work on. To devote this many shinobi to any single cause…Iwagakure had to be both sure of a counterattack and very, very interested in making sure they prevailed.

“Where are they getting their supplies from?” Obito asked, scanning the map. “You can’t feed a thousand combat shinobi on bamboo and grass seeds.”

I stifled a snort. True.

“I’d bet on a massive supply train, possibly crossing from Iwa territory by bridge.” Kakashi said, and he brought two fingers down on Kannabi and one of its sister structures, further from our location.

“I’d bet on Kannabi.” I put in, and Kakashi removed one finger, leaving only his index on Kannabi. “It’s close to the front lines while being in more heavily-Iwa-held territory than the other Kusa-Iwa bridges.”

One of the many, many, many topics covered in the Academy included tidbits about other countries that I think that they thought we wouldn’t know. Kusagakure, as a semi-permanent ally, had entire units devoted to its geography in case we someday needed to travel there. I supposed that no one had ever thought we’d need to infiltrate Kusa territory for the express purpose of blowing up something that big, but I was also pretty sure the Kusa-nin wouldn’t hold it against us as long as the Iwa-nin suffered for it.

I also couldn’t help but think that it’d be much easier if someone in our roster was flight-capable, like Deidara. The idea of a B-29 bomber run was really appealing just then, rather than the idea of playing at being French resistance fighters.

“That’s what the Hokage thought, too.” Sensei told us. He looked pleased, but under it was a kind of concern I hadn’t seen in ages. He exhaled, long and slow, before going on, “Team Kakashi.”
“Your mission is the infiltrate Iwagakure-held Kusa territory and destroy the Kannabi bridge.” A trio of black spheres appeared in Sensei’s hand—concentrated high explosives. I felt my jaw drop. Sensei went on, “As a small unit, you have a better chance of getting these in place. Blow the bridge and get out as fast as you can, understand?”

“What are you going to be doing, Sensei?” Obito asked as we all nodded our assent.

Sensei’s expression was deadly cold. “I’ll confront the enemy directly. The front is only a few days from here and twelve hours from where you’ll be going. Our friends need all the help I can give them.”

That, alone, told me that Sensei would have another hundred kills under his belt before the week was out.

Sensei handed the explosives off to Kakashi—while I felt my fingers twitch with envy—and started folding up the map. “That’s it for now. I’ll be tagging along for the next day or so, to make sure we get past the border patrols safely. I’ll be doubling back after that, and I hope I’m enough of a distraction that no one wonders what a few Konoha-nin are doing so far into their territory.” He smiled tightly as he said it, but I couldn’t help but wonder if he’d just jinxed us.

As he turned to get one of the food storage scrolls out, though, he added, “And Kei—no using the high-grade stuff before you get to the bridge. And no stealing them off Kakashi for it, either.”

I tried to pout, but my heart wasn’t really in it.

_Fucking hell, if we screw up here we’re all dead._ That one fact kept floating around in my head, pressing down on everything else. _And if we don’t…I have absolutely no idea._ There was always a possibility that succeeding could end worse than fucking up. I wasn’t sure how, but I wasn’t willing to discount the possibility out of hand.

Lunch passed quickly, and even though I downed half my canteen’s contents, my mouth still felt dry.

It didn’t really get any better when we entered the Forest of Oversized Trees and What the Hell Do They Feed Those Mushrooms. The entire forest was dim from the sheer volume of foliage in the canopy, and the fact that the local were fungi was both big enough to stand on and solid enough use as a bludgeon didn’t help much. I could sort of tell what time it was thanks to what light peeked through the trees, but it wasn’t especially relevant.

The chakra signatures I was picking up, on the other hand, were downright unnerving.

_I knew_ there weren’t that many Iwa-nin in the forest. All of the signatures but one were far enough off that they weren’t really distinct, so I figured only the nearest was a problem. He was suppressing well, but I needed only a moment to pinpoint him and, at the very least, puzzle out how to neutralize him.

I stopped dead in the middle of our formation, eyes narrowed. If I could just pick that asshat out of this gigantic compost bin…

“How many, Kei?” Sensei asked quietly, hand on my shoulder.

“One.” I whispered back.
Ahead of me, Kakashi threw one arm out, clearly either smelling or hearing our mysterious guest. Obito bumped into Sensei’s back with a squeak before he realized that we’d stopped.

Sensei let go of my shoulder and signaled for Obito to look around. He did, but since he wasn’t a Hyūga it wasn’t going to mean much unless the guy actually entered our line of sight.

My head jerked up as I felt one of the chakra signatures spike in fear. My eyes closed, I could make out the enemy about fifty meters off along a diagonal z-axis—probably thirty meters above us.

All of crouched together in a circle, behind a huge fallen log that would cut off the enemy’s line of sight. I kept half of my attention on the forest even as Sensei got ready to explain our findings.

“All right. There’s one enemy—” Sensei began, but he cut himself off just as I felt nineteen more problems pop out of nowhere. Fucking shadow clones. “Careful, everyone. Twenty, now.”

“Clones.” I supplied, tracking with my eyes still shut. I could only assume that Sensei could do something with air currents, because I was pretty sure he wasn’t a sensor. “Shadow clones, most likely.”

“Agreed.” Kakashi said quietly. I opened my eyes as he got into a runner’s starting stance, and I felt a flash of fear. “I’ll lead the attack. Please, back me up.”

This was, of course, coming from the fastest of the three teenagers in the squad. Sensei would be his reinforcements/follow-through for this bout—Obito and I were backup dancers at best.

“No, Kakashi. I’ll lead today.” Sensei said, but it was clear that Kakashi wasn’t interested in hearing that.

“Sensei, I’m a captain today, too.” He was already halfway through the seals for the Chidori. “I want to try the Chidori out in real combat—I’ve been working on it for months already.”

I felt the enemy’s chakra spike again as the Chidori’s harsh blue light lit the area around us and its shriek started to become audible.

Oh, for fuck’s sake. I knew how this was gonna end.

“Kakashi, I reserve the right to say ‘I told you so.’” I informed him in a flat tone, pulling my kodachi out of its sheath.

Kakashi ignored me. “Here I go.”

Sensei’s arm snapped out ahead of him, stopping him short.

“Sensei, I can do this.” Kakashi insisted. “I can take any number of enemies out with this jutsu, just like you.”

“Fifteen says he’s never killed even one person with it.” Obito muttered, barely audible to me over the buzz of the Chidori.

I agreed, but decided not to say as much.

“You told me that as soon as we entered Kusagakure territory, I was captain.” Kakashi went on. Oh god. “The rules clearly state that the team needs to obey the captain’s orders, Sensei.”

Sensei wordlessly pulled his arm back, looking like he was going to pinch the bridge of his nose.
Okay, yeah, kodachi out. I signaled Obito to follow my lead, though I wasn’t planning on tearing after Kakashi. Sensei would be able to handle that—if Obito and I were going to stay on the ground, though, we needed to be prepared for a fight.

So, showing that even geniuses occasionally had moments of more pride than sense, Kakashi tore off through the log we’d been using as concealment, punching a hole the size of a manhole cover through the middle of it.

Obito immediately moved to my back, heels briefly touching mine so he could confirm where I was without looking. Sensei, nodding to both of us, disappeared in pursuit of his wayward student.

From the sound of flying metal, I could only assume that Kakashi was doing the really dumb thing and rushing right down the middle. Of course. The Chidori had a neat effect where it effectively increased the user’s speed in order to make the kill more likely—sort of like a watered-down version of the Third Raikage’s Hell Stab and Lightning Armor techniques.

Only Kakashi, like anyone without a Sharingan or the correct usage of Lightning Release, simply wasn’t fast enough to keep up with the speed of lightning.

Sensei was the one, glorious exception.

While Kakashi played pop-the-clone, Sensei was throwing shuriken to counter the Iwa-nin’s kunai with the kind of deadly accuracy that made signing his name in shuriken look amateurish. None of the weapons got within a meter of Kakashi, which made his self-imposed mission a lot simpler.

I looked away then, counting on my chakra sense to figure out where the idiots got off to, and concentrated on the clones that would inevitably come for Obito and me instead.

Right on cue, a clone popped up out of thin air and went for Obito’s face.

Obito leapt back, knowing that I had a technique primed and he didn’t, and I dove into the gap he left. The enemy clone took a kodachi to the eye socket and exploded into white smoke. Even as I was following through with my thrust, Obito was running through the hand signs for the Grand Fireball in preparation for the next round.

A clone obligingly showed up and was set on fire.

“Doing all right?” Sensei asked, warping in with kunai in both hands.

“Fine.” Obito replied, kicking dirt into the flames left over after the clone’s horrible death.

“Good.”

The forest was filled with the sound of exploding clones—Kakashi was mowing through them faster than expected. Sensei vanished again, leaving Obito and I to handle ourselves for a bit.

We only got one more clone before the buzzing of Kakashi’s Chidori finally fizzled out. I felt my breath catch for an instant—what if Sensei didn’t grab him, what if, what if—and by the time I got myself under control again Sensei and Kakashi were both there. Sensei lowered Kakashi to the ground carefully, which said more for the injury than it did about Kakashi’s reaction to said injury (mostly grimacing).

“Iaijutsu?” I asked, peering at the slash wound. It looked a little like something I’d tried before, actually. Mostly on training dummies and a couple of guy’s I’d killed—whoever this Iwa asshole was, he was fast. Even as Obito forced Kakashi to stay sitting by grabbing his shoulder, I looked at Sensei for a second.

Sensei’s expression was like ice.

I looked away, attention on my patient as though we weren’t still in a fight. After all, it wasn’t really much of one with Sensei around.

The Iwa-nin was dead. He just hadn’t stopped breathing yet.

Between Sensei dropping his bag and the bag hitting the ground, the enemy’s chakra cut out.

Cheerful thought.

“Stay still.” I said to Kakashi, scowling even as I knit muscle and skin back together. The blade had cut a wavering line from the outer edge of his right pectoral to a slightly deeper slash along his triceps. It’d have been easier to fix if the damage was contained to one muscle group, but between the advances Rin and I had made in our medical techniques, there wasn’t much chance of permanent damage.

After a while, I pulled back. Healing techniques weren’t perfect, of course, and the muscle would be weak for a while before natural healing took hold properly. As long as he didn’t strain himself—which, I had to admit, was actually pretty likely—he’d be fine.

“I told you so.” I muttered, irritation fighting worry.

“Kakashi’s injury is serious.” Sensei said, dropping out of the trees. There was no sign of blood on his sleeves, which mostly made me think that he was rather good at disposing of evidence by this point. Also: No fucking shit, muscular damage is serious. “We’ll retreat and set up camp.”

Finally, Obito gave up on stabilizing the injury. Kakashi rolled his shoulder, wincing as the injury stretched and I made the sort of gesture that suggested I was about to backhand him across the face if he did it again. The look Obito shot me over Kakashi’s head told me that he was going to say his piece, though, teammate’s blood literally on his hands or no.

“I’m fine.” Kakashi insisted. I kept from slapping him, though I wasn’t sure how.

Honestly. Wasn’t almost getting killed once enough for this mission?

“No, you’re not.” Obito argued. “This is all because you ignored Sensei’s orders and charged in there like an idiot!”

“I don’t want to hear that from you.” Kakashi snapped back, “You, the elite Uchiha who always brags and gets nothing done. Weren’t you crying back there?”

My eyes narrowed. “Kakashi, this is for your own good.”

And I hit him in the face.

Kakashi reeled and landed hard on his rear, left hand flying up to his cheek. Sensei had my wrist in a grip like steel immediately afterward, but I wasn’t planning on a follow-up anyway.

“Obito did exactly as we trained to do.” I said coldly. “Don’t make this about him.” My nerves were frayed—fuck, fuck, fuck we’re all going to die—and I think that one moment showed everyone exactly how I felt. “The twenty-fifth rule of shinobi conduct may say to never show tears, but I think it’s more about knowing when to save emotions for later and when to think about now. This means you shut up, and he shuts up, and I shut up and we get moving.”

Obito was looking at me like I’d grown an extra head.

I stood, Sensei’s grip still cutting off blood to my hand. I looked at him. “You were saying.”

Sensei let go of my wrist. “That’s enough from all three of you for today.” He crossed his arms. “Kakashi, rules and regulations are important, but I told you before that you also have to step back and adapt to the situation as it is.”

“Told you.” Obito couldn’t resist a parting shot, and Kakashi glared wordlessly at him.

“Obito, stop.” Sensei ordered. Obito shut his mouth with an audible click. “There are enough enemies in this area that we don’t need to give them an upper hand by antagonizing each other. Save it for later.

“And Kei—” Here, I bowed to the inevitable and felt my stomach drop. I didn’t want to see Sensei’s disappointed expression. “Never strike a superior officer. If you have to, make your point and live with the consequences. But keep your fists to yourself.”

I closed my eyes, wincing, and nodded. Idiot, idiot, idiot!

“Finally…Kakashi, don’t use the Chidori again.” I looked at Sensei just as Kakashi’s head shot up, and Sensei went on, “It’s a powerful technique, but despite its strength and speed factors in a fight, by the time you get anywhere near an opponent you can’t see what they’re doing anymore. If you’d been able to react normally, you wouldn’t have been injured at all. It’s still an imperfect jutsu.”

Sensei sighed. “Now, before we move on, let me say one last thing. For shinobi, the thing above all else is teamwork.”

I sighed inwardly. Way to go, team. First semi-solo mission’s already a fuck-up right out of the gates.

I just…let go of it. The impending freak-out, the frustration, the shame, and the urge to scream into a pillow. It could go and hide under a rock because there wasn’t time to deal with it all now. I’d be able to cry myself to sleep later, once Kakashi’s shoulder was fully wrapped up and Obito had his revelation and whatever else needed to happen…happened. I don’t know. Just…later. As long as there was a later.

Kakashi needed his arm patched up, so I opened one of my scrolls and extracted a roll of bandages to bind his arm for the night. I also had enough antiseptic to put a small clinic out of business, which I used to sterilize both the wound—making Kakashi wince in the process—and the inner layer of bandages before I tied the whole mess off.

“Sorry about earlier.” I told Kakashi.

He huffed and looked away.

We all had dinner together, but it was a quiet affair and none of us were really all that comfortable talking about the day. After Sensei decided that he had first watch, Obito, Kakashi and I agreed to the second, third, and fourth shifts in that order. I got another scroll out and unsealed all of our bedrolls, took off my hitai-ate, and curled up to await my shift.

I didn’t end up crying myself to sleep that night, in fact. Too much to do, even while unconscious.
My mindscape that night looked like someone had drained all the water, at first. Looking around, I spotted the usual floating cloud of memory fragments, hovering close together above my head. In the distance, something huge groaned and cracked—the water, it seemed, had retreated to form a glacier.

I floated upward, looking for the usual Freudian setup of chairs and coffee table, and spotted them on the top of the glacier. The Dreamer was there, sitting on top of the table while Id snoozed in the high-backed Victorian therapist’s chair.

From my new vantage point, I could see a vast expanse of dark water churning just beyond the edge of the ice. Looking around, I noticed that the water was caught between two barely-connected ice shelves that looked to be slowly, inexorably drawing apart.

After a moment’s thought, I had to agree that it encompassed my mental state rather well.

I floated over to them, donning my biggest, goofiest possible pair of glasses. I like to think that I looked incredibly stupid, if only for the purpose of startling a laugh out of the Dreamer.

It didn’t work.

“We have a problem.” The Dreamer looked tired, and I didn’t have to ask why.

The memory cloud had become something more akin to the combined voices of a thousand shrieking starlings, all babbling at once. Then there was the terrible noise of the glacier—representative of my emotional repression, I think—adding to the cacophony. I was agitated, but the memories of my old life were doubly so due to their sudden relevance.

Sadly, I knew more of the story from here.

I bit my lip. “I don’t know if someone getting captured is inevitable. But if it’s a given…I’d be the best choice.”

“And there’s a very good chance that if you are captured, you won’t survive.” The Dreamer looked sad and exhausted and I knew I wasn’t making my case very well.

“I’m—we’re—just a girl.” I looked away, toward Id. “There’s nothing special about us, outwardly. But Kakashi looks like his dad—fights like him—and Obito…”

Obito wore the Uchiha fan across his thin shoulders like a cape, or maybe a bull’s-eye. And thanks to Madara’s actions back when the First had been trying to get everyone to the conference table alive, everyone knew that sigil. If the enemy realized what clan he belonged to, they’d pull his eyes out and leave him to rot if they didn’t torture him to death first. Kakashi would be at risk of the same, sans maybe the eyeball-extraction. At most, I expected the same genjutsu-torture that they’d treated Rin to, once upon a nightmare.

“I can’t let that happen.” I said quietly. “I can’t.” Just like I couldn’t even bring myself to think of killing Obito before the risk he represented became reality.

My heart was a traitor.

“And if you can change his fate?” I knew exactly who the Dreamer was talking about, and it was agonizing to think about Obito like that—crushed under ten tons of rock, helpless, as his team abandoned him to Madara’s schemes. Hindsight made it unimportant that Rin and Kakashi and Sensei couldn’t have known. As a sensor, I would or I will or whatever tense I was using today.

I wasn’t scared, you see.
I was terrified.

“If I can, I will.” I told her. If only I was really as confident as I sounded.

“Then we have to plan.”

You know what they say about the best-laid plans of mice and men, right?

I woke up for my shift with tears in my eyes.

I scrubbed at my eyes before the boys could see me, but I was sure that Kakashi did anyway. Oh, whatever—it wasn’t like he hadn’t seen me have a meltdown before. It’d just happened when I was awake last time around.

“Thanks. Catch what sleep you can.” I muttered as he crawled into his bedroll. I climbed up onto the rock we’d been using as a wind-break, rubbing my arms for warmth.

He grumbled something I didn’t quite catch and dozed off.

Despite being barely awake, I still jumped when, a few minutes later, Sensei plopped down next to me and said, “Your turn, Kei?”

“Nah, Sensei. You don’t need to worry about me.” I mumbled, dropping my chin onto the heel of my left hand. “I’m f-f—” I was cut off by a jaw-cracking yawn. “—Fine. Sorry.”

“You’ll forgive me if I don’t believe a word of that.” Sensei replied.

“Yeah, well, it’s not the best time.” I muttered, looking away.

“Kei…”

“Look, I’m…” I swallowed hard, running a hand over my face. “I’m terrified things will go wrong. It’s…it’s our first mission in enemy territory, and you’re not going with us, and Kakashi’s brand new at this captain thing.”

Look at me, I’m a sea cucumber! I spill my guts at the slightest provocation.

“…I can’t tell you everything will be all right.” Sensei said, after a pause.

If he had, I would’ve had to call him a liar.

I gave a soft, fake laugh. “Yeah, I…I know. No guarantees in a shinobi’s life.” At least my breathing was still mostly even.

Sensei tugged me against his side, and I briefly hated myself for so outwardly unstable that everyone apparently knew it. Inside…well, the dam was still there. Creaking, but there.

“Trust in your teammates, Kei.” Sensei told me. “They’ll lead you through hell itself and out the other side.”

Or just into it.

“Good talk.” I muttered.

“Kei—”
“No, Sensei. I know this. I just…need time to think on it. Sorry. Not much for rational conversation right now.”

Sensei said nothing for a while.

Then, “All right. Night, Kei.”

I think I spent most of my shift shifting between checking perimeter seals and trying to meditate. It helped, a little, but my nerves were only barely settled by the time my teammates actually got up for real.

“Looks a lot better than it did yesterday,” I said to Kakashi after breakfast, dismissing my diagnostic jutsu and moving to re-wrap his arm. The line on his pectoral wouldn’t even scar, so I left it as-is.

“Try not to strain yourself, though.”

Kakashi made an agreeable noise and, as soon as I was done bandaging him back up, pulled his shirt on over his head.

Yeah, he still wasn’t talking to me. It was getting kind of annoying, even if I knew it was my fault. I’d have to apologize again sooner or later.

“Ready to go?” Sensei called, hoisting his pack onto his back. Nearby, Obito was kicking dirt over our cooking fire. Once I stood up and Kakashi had pulled all of his clothes back on, it was just a matter of getting all of our stuff in order.

“Think so, Sensei!” I called.

And…Kakashi and Obito weren’t looking at each other. Great. Just great.

We ended up stopping in a bamboo forest that set my teeth on edge, sometime in late morning. Crunch time approached, and I sort of wanted to say something irreverent that would have gotten me some weird looks. Guess that was what the internal monologue was for.

“The enemy we encountered yesterday was a lone scout. From here on in, we can expect to be fighting teams. Be careful.” Sensei told us, something flickering behind his eyes.

Obito crossed his arms behind his head. “Well. Let’s get going, captain.” This last was addressed at Kakashi, and I hid a smile.

Kakashi shook the shock off after a second and nodded sharply.

“All right, let’s go.” Sensei cut in before the boys could get into a staring contest.

We said together, “Yes, Sensei.”

Sensei shot us one last look, sort of sad and yet proud. “Scatter!”

We did.

And we made it a total of four hours away from Sensei before I started getting really bad vibes.

-

Normally, I think I would have appreciated the scenery. Bamboo forests remind me of the trip I took to China once, where the stuff grew like some weird combination of saw-proof weed and picket fence, and of the time I got to see a panda in person. Hell of a time, that was. Walking across streams and rivers cut down on wading time by one hundred percent, most of the foliage was huge, and I was physically fit enough to actually kind of enjoy the walk.

But after we crossed the second stream, I realized that we were really not in Kansas anymore.

Obito and Kakashi didn’t have the eyes for it, not yet, but my chakra sense picked up two hostile presences at about the same time that we made the decision to slow to a walking pace to cross a river. There was nothing special about the site, other than how the water moved slower and the bamboo curved overhead in such a way that the “clearing” was barely any lighter than the forest proper.

Obito saw me tense up first, given that he was taking rear guard again. I signaled two enemies—two fingers—to him with one hand behind my back, feeling my heart hammer in my chest and hoping I’d make a difference. In front of me, Kakashi stiffened suddenly as the wind changed, holding up a hand for us to halt.

It did make the difference. I didn’t know it then, but it did.

Obito was halfway through the seals for the Grand Fireball before it started raining bamboo spears. And then everything was on fire.

I could feel the bigger Iwa-nin moving in behind our group even as the one with two sleeve-blades popped out in front, and I spun to face the invisible guy even as Kakashi moved to engage the one we could actually see. Obito followed my lead, rather than Kakashi’s—whether we could see our enemy or not, we could always find him.

His back to mine, my eyes closed…well, it wasn’t orthodox.

Obito still managed to land a roundhouse on Mr. Sneaky, even without seeing him, as I started the spin for Gekkō-style Earth Tiger Strike. The technique wasn’t meant to be used on the water—it was a heavily modified Earth Release technique, basically the For-Dummies version but for samurai—but the splash threw up enough murky river water and debris for Obito to spot our opponent even as he tried to maneuver around us, based on the shouting.

“Got you now, you bastard!” Obito shouted, and I could feel the fiery chakra of his Phoenix Fire Jutsu engulfing the shore. The Iwa-nin was shouting something, probably curses, and I felt him retreat sans camouflage.

I opened my eyes again, looking for the other fight because Mr. Sneaky was heading that way.

“Obito—!”

“On it!”

Usually we didn’t need to talk, but we needed to warn Kakashi that his deadly dance of steel was going to get a few more partners. Kakashi and his opponent were bouncing from bamboo spire to water to rock and back again—again with the jōnin showiness.

I took a second to catch my breath, trying to figure out where Sneaky had gone, and managed to catch the tail end of the fight. I was on Obito’s heels within a fraction of a second, though, because jōnin had freakish reflexes and I was not going to let him charge into the lion’s den alone.

I was just in time to see Kakashi smashed out of the air by the guy with two blades. He hit the ground hard—
No!

Kakashi didn’t hit the ground. He sank through it for a second, and I saw Sneaky rising out of it at the same time and crack him over the head with both interlaced fists.

Kakashi slumped.

Obito started to charge at Sneaky, spitting fire, but Two-Blades skidded in front of him and Obito nearly lost his nose. I skittered by, trying to stick my kodachi into the face of at least one of the Iwa bastards, and Two-Blades broke my sword between his.

The rest of the fight was a blowout—smoke bomb city. It was the nasty, clinging kind that burned like hell in the eyes and I dropped through the surface of the water to get it off. Obito didn’t, though, and he hauled me out after a moment of frantic flailing.

And then…

Obito and I stood there, stunned. The clearing was in ashes, the water was dark with burned wood, metal shards lay everywhere and the handle of my kodachi was still clutched in my whitening fingers. And Kakashi was gone.

I had to…I had to…

“They just…” I started, and couldn’t finish.

“We’ll get him back.” Obito said with a voice like steel. The look in his eye was more like Sensei’s than I’d ever seen on him, and it was enough to snap me back to the present. “We’re going to save him, Kei.”

A tiny part of my brain was in awe—this was what Obito had become, in the four years I’d known him? But I had to shove that thought aside and into deep storage, because there wasn’t time.

Right. Right. Freak out later. Always later.

I slid what was left of my kodachi back into its sheath, hand shaking the slightest bit—but with anger.

Anger stoked by fear, but anger nonetheless. I could use that.

I exhaled, commanding my shaking hands to stop. “Right. Let’s get our captain back.”
Kannabi Bridge Arc: Things Fall Apart

Chapter Summary

Kei: Do the wrong thing.

Chapter Notes

Previously on...Catch Your Breath!

Team Minato embarked upon a mission to destroy the vital Iwagakure supply bridge, Kannabi. Faced with challenges both from within the team and without, Team Minato's mission becomes a disaster when the team captain, Kakashi Hatake, is kidnapped by enemy ninjas!

Kei and Obito launch a rescue mission at the same time that, elsewhere, their teacher Minato is turning a last stand for Konoha into a rout against Iwa. Working together, the chunin pair defeat stealth expert Taiseki in a high-stakes battle! Though Kei is injured, Obito activates his Sharingan and the pair is still primed for round two! Kei and Obito then take on Kakko, their captive captain's captor. After a short but intense fight, Kei kills Kakko with the Samurai Saber Technique. Now, Obito and Kei check on their teammate...

(Good god I sound like a Dragonball Z announcer.)

Neither of the Iwa-nin seemed to think that we’d willingly go after them after our abrupt defeat and the loss of one of our team members. Many ninja villages won’t go after a downed teammate, for various reasons. I remembered that Kakashi gave the POW justification—while Konoha and Iwa certainly don’t have any accord along those lines, it’d make sense to treat a medic like Rin well and have her heal their soldiers instead of ours. That was common sense. Use your resources to their fullest.

Only Kakashi hadn’t planned on the two Iwa-nin being complete dumbasses with no idea of what tactical value a medic-nin would have, even under duress. If not for Obito’s loyalty, Rin might have died in that other timeline. Or, alternatively—if Kakashi hadn’t gone to reinforce Obito, Obito would have died there and there would never be a Tobi problem.

Here, Kakashi hadn’t anticipated being double-teamed by stronger opponents.

I hadn’t planned on being enough of a pain in the ass that they’d go after the lone fighter instead. I’d just assumed that I would be the best target, based on being female. I hadn’t accounted for the variables—my heightened combat skill and what that meant for my viability as a target, Obito’s combat synergy with me, and our paired perceptiveness and reaction time. I didn’t think that, what with my relative androgyny and chakra sensor capability, I wouldn’t actually stand out as a weak link in the team. I didn’t think, I just was.
That, apparently, was enough.

One thing hadn’t changed, though: they hadn’t bothered to hide their tracks.

I don’t know if they thought we’d be too afraid of them to act. They were both jōnin, of course, and Obito and I were merely chūnin on an infiltration mission. There wasn’t any way for them to know that, though, which made their lack of caution more confusing in hindsight.

Arrogance, I suppose. They were strong and, if not for Obito’s sudden activation of his Sharingan in canon, they might have been too much for Team Minato to handle.

But by the same token, I like to think that Team Minato was stronger now than it had been in the old timeline. Rin had been taken because her situational awareness and the enemy jōnin’s stealth capabilities were a very bad mismatch. My awareness was heightened, and thus I wasn’t taken by surprise and neither was Obito.

Kakashi, though…I wonder if they were just trying to prove that they could outmatch us in a fight.

Or if the Plot was.

“Do we have a plan?” Obito asked as we followed the trail the blockheads had left. To Konoha-born ninja, tracking through a forest was child’s play, enhanced senses or not. “Because right now ‘kill them and salt the earth’ is looking pretty good.”

“It depends on which one fights us first.” I admitted, having the Dreamer queue up a series of memory fragments.

Team Taiseki consisted of stealth expert Taiseki, also known as Sneaky, Kakkō of the two sleeve blades, and the several-days-dead Mahiru, who Sensei had taken out in about two seconds. They were all jōnin-ranked, but Kakkō was the strongest out of the pair we’d be facing. Taiseki was the least dangerous in canon, due mostly to Obito’s sudden onset of additional Uchiha bullshit powers, while Kakkō was the hardest to kill of the lot. He had strong nin-, gen-, and taijutsu skills, and could hit hard enough to break both my kodachi and, at one point, Kakashi’s White Light Chakra Saber.

I dreaded the thought of facing them together—hopefully, Taiseki would take the same tack as he had before and try to kill us on his own. I didn’t know if it’d be best if he assumed we were talentless hacks and walked into the fight with the expectation of an easy kill, or if he tried to take us seriously.

Kinda hard to be wary of someone half your size, I guess.

We can’t kill Kakkō without the Sharingan or a sneak attack.

I agreed, much as I hated it. I said aloud, “Best bet’s to play dumb.”

Obito shot me a look. “And if they don’t fall for it?”

“Then I’m just going to have to rig up a little surprise for them.” I said, and popped the catch on one of my sleeve scroll holsters as we rocketed through the forest.

The scroll in my left sleeve was small and slim, but contained a good dozen of my tear-away seals. This particular scroll was full of mines—since I couldn’t create many spontaneous seals, pre-prepared jobs like this one were very important to the aspiring demolition expert. They may have had an upper limit on force, which was why Sensei had given Kakashi solid explosives, but they could kill you just as dead.
And…wait.

“Kakashi has all of our viable demolition charges.” I said, eyes narrowing.

Obito gave a harsh, sarcastic bark of a laugh. “Well, we weren’t gonna go complete the mission without him anyway.”

Not like we could have if we wanted to.

The main reason I was running through so many rational justifications for our actions went thus: I was fucking terrified, and distractions were a great idea.

I spun the scroll in my hands, detaching five tags, and tossed the rest to Obito. “Remember how to hide these?”

“Of course.” He tossed me a smirk, but I wasn’t really feeling the banter at that moment.

I hadn’t asked him to do it often, but there were times when it wasn’t practical to do all of the trap-setting myself. To be fair, this was going to be about the trickiest attempt we’d ever made, but I’d try to booby-trap Orochimaru himself if it got us out of this alive.

If I thought about it too much, I’d start shaking again. I pushed the worry away as best I could.

Instead, of course, my mind got caught up other possible complications.

Even odds on torture by this point.

Yeah, I didn’t need to think that.

_They may only be some fifteen minutes ahead of us at most, but we have to consider the possibility that he’s already dead. Kakashi is no medic, and Kakkō recognized his fighting style in the old timeline. He’s also already injured._

I did not need to think about the possibility that our self-imposed mission would be rendered null.

My brain was not feeling obedient, and neither was the Dreamer.

We have to consider it!

_Nope. Not happening._

“Obito?” I began.

“Yeah?”

“…If something bad happens, get Kakashi out.”

“…No. No, you don’t get to play hero and die.” Obito’s voice was low and cold, but there was an undercurrent of anger. “We’re all getting out and we’re completing the mission and we’re _going home._”

I bit my lip.

There was a very real possibility that we were running to our deaths.

“Hey, wanna play tag?” Obito asked, and his voice had the edge of desperation in it that I didn’t have to listen for to hear. “It’ll take your mind off things.”

“…Not really.” I muttered.

The rest of the treetop chase was spent in relative silence, oddly. Obito got quiet when I didn’t respond to his slightly manic observations, and I felt a steadily increasing dread that creeped up my spine the more I recognized the area. We were long out of the bamboo thicket and into a true forest, with trees so thick that barely any light even hit the understory. I was in the lead solely because my chakra sense was an accurate first-alert setup, and I had their signatures memorized.

With a broken sword and a crapton of set-and-hopefully-remember explosives, I was mostly nullified in terms of long range offensive capability. We had to consider the possibility that the enemy would be able to hear us approach, and plan accordingly.

Thing is, no plan ever survives contact with the enemy.

Ours, not being an actual plan as such, had less than a snowball’s chance in hell.

I landed on all fours on a tree branch just outside of what looked, honestly, like a jutsu-made cave. It was far enough from the tree line that I was leery of getting any closer, and signaled to Obito to meet up slightly further away. We didn’t want to be heard before we were prepared. Obito hit the new branch a second later, equally silent, and I signaled him to start planting tags with my free hand. He nodded and disappeared into the canopy with hardly a whisper of rustling branches, while I pulled a second scroll from my other sleeve.

This one was a supply scroll, and I bit my thumb in preparation for a very rapid and possibly very stupid mass unsealing.

With my hand poised above the first seal, I waited for Obito to finish.

When he was, he dropped back onto the branch with me and gave me a silent thumbs-up.

Bomph.

On cue, I felt both of the enemy chakra signatures within the cave jerk to attention. Kakashi’s chakra remained dull and didn’t so much as twitch, even as the enemy started to move. I was pretty sure he was still conscious, but I’d need to get closer to tell if that lack of response was due to genjutsu or… something else.

Only one shinobi came out to say hi.

And given that I couldn’t see his ugly mug, I’d have to go with Taiseki.

My line went like this: “…I probably shouldn’t have just done that.”

Because there was something hilariously predictable about enemy shinobi with stealth capabilities, I heard Taiseki say from behind me, “No. You shouldn’t.”

I was gone—Replacement jutsu, motherfucker—by the time he got around to actually sticking a kunai in my back. At the same time, Obito whirled away from Taiseki’s follow-up with a second kunai, missing impalement by centimeters. His eyes were locked on Taiseki, tracking faster than should have been possible, and the jōnin had made the mistake of uncloaking for what looked like a perfect kill.

I shot downward from the branch I’d swapped out with, hitting the “mass release” seal of my opened
A hail of metal rained down, but it turned out that we weren’t the only ones to understand the principle of basic Academy jutsu. I landed among all of the kunai and shuriken embedded in the bark, eyes closed to track Taiseki’s movements more accurately.

Obito landed next to me, facing the other way.

“He’s regrouping.” I murmured. “Thirty meters, twenty, ten…”

An explosive tag—one of my larger mines, specifically—promptly exploded when the enemy stepped on it.

Taiseki started swearing, just loud enough to hear.

Kakkō, though, didn’t make an appearance.

Stalemate—I was pretty sure that between my chakra sense and Obito’s ability to read my movements, we were okay facing Taiseki, who would have pulled out more tricks if he thought they’d work. Kakkō didn’t seem willing to leave Kakashi unsupervised, even to reinforce his teammate. I couldn’t tell if it was because neither of them especially gave a damn about the other or if whatever information they were looking for was just that important.

I mean, I knew that the info we were carrying was important. I just didn’t know if they knew that we were carrying anything significant in the first place.

Taiseki made a couple more passes, always countered by either my explosives or Obito’s taijutsu, or both. He was testing us.

Then a lot of things happened at once.

From what I pieced together later, it went a little like this:

Taiseki created a pair of Earth Clones, though he kept them hidden underground for his plan. Obito and I were running out of pre-planted tags, and Obito was wrapping another one of my higher-output tags around the handle of one of his kunai. I had my right hand on the handle of my tragically-shortened kodachi—ten centimeters of blade was still more than any of my kunai had, so I figured I could use that—and prepared for the next round.

At the same time that Obito finished preparing what was basically a hand grenade, Taiseki made his move. I drew my shortened kodachi, preparing to meet his charge even with my broken blade.

Obito threw the kunai, and a second one hit the forehead of the Earth Clone in the shadow of the first, exploding in its face and mouth. Taiseki met my kodachi, blazing with chakra in a way that doubled its length and cutting power, and exploded into a dust cloud.

I coughed, trying to pinpoint him again when my eyes were streaming and he’d pulled two replacements in seconds.

Obito’s side. Closing…

I maneuvered Obito out of the way, planning to block again even if it knocked me right off the branch.

All of that flew out of my head when I felt Kakashi’s chakra scream.
That split-second of hesitation—immediately looking toward where I’d felt the jolt—cost me precious reaction time.

Then pain.

The next thing I knew I was on my back, choking down on a scream of my own, both hands empty and pressed to my face as warm blood gushed out. The world became nothing but sensation—of my kodachi scabbard digging into my back, of the ache of my chakra going briefly berserk as my concentration shattered, of the white-hot brand that had been dragged across my face and left me reeling.

Between the blood pounding in my ears and the blinding pain, I could hardly hear Obito’s shocked, “Kei, no!”

No, no, no, I am not dying on my back. If I have to die I won’t be a dead weight!

I was already on my knees by the time I felt the Dreamer react in full, with Obito’s arms helping me stay vertical. I could feel him saying something, but I wasn’t listening that well.

Yin Release: Pain Binding Jutsu!

The Dreamer’s Yin chakra shot through my coils, forcibly restoring order. It wasn’t healing me—instead, I could feel the pain fade to manageable levels and my chakra come back under my control. She was selectively cutting signals to my brain from my face and arms, with the clear intent to remove the blocks once I’d gotten my act together.

I made a hissing noise between my teeth, carefully removing my hands from my face and seeing red when I looked.

With both eyes. I could hardly stand to open my right, given the blood running down my face, but I could and my left was untouched.

For a flash, I felt like laughing. Lucky I hadn’t lost an eye like Kakashi had, right? Given the angle of the strike, I could've lost both if I'd been any slower.

And then my face reminded me why that was a bad idea, muscles screaming and still weeping blood. Testing my chakra again, I brought up a Diagnostic Jutsu with one hand.

The ragged kunai slash extended from the forward edge of my left cheek, sweeping over my cheekbone and a little above the bridge of my nose and tearing a chunk out of my right eyebrow, before finally ending on the right half of my forehead, nearly to my hairline. I’d been retreating when I’d felt the first flash of pain, and as a result most of the damage was relatively superficial. I didn’t think the kunai had scraped bone, but it was a close thing and head wounds bled like hell regardless. My hitai-ate looked to have taken a hit, too—given that I found it on the branch with the metal plate and cloth split.

Mystical Palm Jutsu. I thought, and started to seal the wound mechanically. My chakra sense, though, was still scrambled. “Don’t—” Talking pulled at the wound and I winced. “Not dead, Obito. Neither is he.”

“You don’t think I don’t know that?” he hissed back, eyes wide with dismay and self-blame.

“Not your fault.” I said, trying to scan the trees while healing and also trying to get my chakra sense back in order. “The enemy…”
“I know.” Obito said, voice tight with strain. With one last squeeze of my shoulder, he stood up.

“Obi—” I wanted to warn him—Taiseki was that way even to my thoroughly scrambled chakra sense, but there wasn’t time.

Obito whirled.

Taiseki’s chakra sputtered. “H-how…could you see…me?”

I stared. Taiseki was easily half again Obito’s height and probably outweighed both of us, and Obito had stopped him dead.

Taiseki’s face showed only uncomprehending shock. “What…what is…that e-eye?”

Obito jerked his kunai free, letting the enemy jōnin fall. “This time, I’ll be the one protecting you, Kei.”

For a moment, neither of us said anything else.

Then Obito turned back to me, and I saw his eyes.

“Congratulations on activating your Sharingan.” I said, smiling despite the residual pain. My injuries had stopped bleeding, at least. All I needed to do was bandage them—while it was possible that I could have just closed the wound entirely, I wanted to save both my and the Dreamer’s chakra for Kakashi. It wasn’t like a facial injury was going to kill me.

“Yeah, thanks. It’s…wow, seeing how chakra flows is weird.” Obito said, and he reached into his back pocket to pull out one of the duplicate med-kits Rin had made. I could only guess that he’d decided not to give it back to me for sealing because of the possibility of disaster.

Well, he was right.

He crouched next to me, holding the kit out to me with one hand while his other gripped my shoulder. “Are you okay?”

“Only mostly.” I admitted. Ow. The slash wound wasn’t serious, but it was certainly distracting.

“Then let me help. Then we’ll save Kakashi.” Obito said, and pulled a roll of bandages from the kit when I broke the seal.

Luckily, Rin had included butterfly stitches in the kit, or else it would have just been a mess. As it was, I had a series of the strips gently holding my probable new scar shut, and a sterilized bandage over the lot of them to wind around my head and secure everything. I also cleaned the excess blood as well as I could with Obito's help, though by that point I probably looked like a horror movie victim. Too bad my hitai-ate was a loss, else I would have tied everything down that way and just said to hell with the rest of it.

At least I didn’t have any blind spots (unless I tried to look directly across the bridge of my nose at my other eye, which was a dumb thing to do anyway. One weakness eliminated or avoided, I supposed. It had been very, very close.

Then we gathered supplies—or rather, got more weaponry out of my pack—and set off for the cave.

It was a deathtrap and we knew it, but like hell we were leaving Kakashi there.
The cave hadn’t changed any in the previous five minutes. I had honestly expected something out of Kakkō, but apparently he was too busy picking on Kakashi to bother. It seemed weirder than it needed to be—Kakkō was now the sole survivor of a three-man squad, though I recalled that he wasn’t going to be nearly as affected by Taiseki’s death as...well, just about any other person confronted with the death of a teammate. Iwa might have been kind of shit at the whole teamwork and camaraderie thing.

Obito and I dropped to the ground and bolted into the entrance, hardly leaving even a whisper of our presence for anyone to follow. There were other Rock-nin around, though damned if I knew where when my chakra sense was being disobedient. We were well into enemy territory by this point.

But to be honest? I didn’t care. I was almost too angry to care.

The inside of the artificial cave was very dark, and we were back-lit by the entrance. Nothing else was even in the cave, though I wondered if it was supposed to be some kind of shelter. Maybe that’d explain where all the Iwa-nin came from, and why they’d come back eventually.

I could see Kakkō with his back to us. As I watched with fury building slowly in the back of my mind, he turned gave us a dismissive sort of glance over his shoulder.

“Tch. Everyone else is useless.” Theory confirmed—Kakkō didn’t care that both of his teammates were crow food.

A little voice in my head kept up a constant chant: Kill him kill him kill him—

Behind him, I could barely make out Kakashi’s outline against the back wall. He wasn’t moving.

Obito’s eyes narrowed, spinning slowly. “Kei, there’s something wrong with his chakra.”

“Genjutsu.” I replied. God, I hoped it was just genjutsu. Kakashi had the most freakish mental endurance ever seen in a human being—if the Tsukuyomi couldn’t break him, I doubted an Iwa-nin’s best shot would work either.

“Seems you’re not just kids…” Kakkō began, a smirk crawling across his face.

“Careful, he’s fast.” I said, widening my stance and drawing my broken kodachi again. I slipped the scabbard into my other hand. Halfway-solid chakra shaping or not, it was better than a kunai for this kind of thing.

“I remember.” Obito said in a growl, a kunai appearing in his hand.

Kakkō charged, blade sliding out of his sleeves. Obito and I followed suit.

Kakkō spun, blades cutting through the air almost too fast to see. I deflected, allowing the kodachi scabbard to take the hit and be shredded instead of my blade, while Obito leapt over the strike and rolled to a stop behind the jonin.

Obito reversed his momentum, lunging at Kakkō’s back while I bounced high and away, out of range.

Kakkō’s first blade went up, scraping against Obito’s blocking kunai with a metallic screech and a shower of sparks, pushing him back. The Iwa-nin’s second blade lashed out, sweeping over my head and allowing me to get inside his guard with a kodachi slash.

He slashed at me again and again, while I deflected left-right-left with my sword squealing under the... strain.

Obito dashed in again, trying to impale Kakkō through the thinner side panel of his flak jacket, only for the jōnin to flip over him with minimal effort. I leapt, trying to catch him off guard, but the jōnin knocked me aside again and I landed in a crouch with full intent of wheeling, charging, and staking him to the ground with blade or with scabbard.

Kakkō turned all of his attention on Obito, both blades ready to open his throat like a reversed pair of scissors. Obito threw himself backward, under the swing, and I closed the gap.

I could already tell that Kakkō wasn’t a prisoner of his momentum—he could reverse his swing and did—but I was too angry to care.

I wasn’t going to content myself with a shallow swipe across his chest like Kakashi would have—I was going to kill him.

Obito saved me from the “suicide” part of my attack, slamming his heels down on Kakkō’s wrists even from his disadvantageous angle.

Kakashi would have gone for a swing. I went for a stab.

Both of my “blades”—one ten-centimeter job with a ragged broken edge and one scabbard that ought to have been blunt—sank into Kakkō’s flesh as though his vest wasn’t there. I’d been in the middle of a roll across his back when I launched my killing strike, meaning that they were embedding themselves deep into his rib cage through his back and punching a hole through each lung.

I left my weapons where they were once Kakkō hit the ground under me. When I was sure his chakra had sputtered out, I followed Obito to Kakashi’s side. I didn’t bother retrieving my weapons, not after feeling both of them start to crack in my hands. He was the only Iwa-nin I could sense, and he was busy being dead.

“He’s…” Obito began, tipping Kakashi’s head upward.

The genjutsu was gone, dismissed by Kakkō’s death or otherwise. His headband was gone. As Obito made a distressed noise in the back of his throat, words failing him, I wondered if the Iwa-nin had cut off Kakashi’s fingers or removed his nails.

It would have matched his left eye.

Or the bloodied socket that remained.

“Kakashi…?” I heard myself say distantly. Oh god, oh god no…

Without even really realizing it, I took Kakashi from Obito, supporting his weight on my arms and shoulder. I felt along his still-covered neck for a pulse, ignoring the feel of blood seeping out of the fabric and onto my hands—they were bloodied enough that I hardly would have noticed anyway.

Obito got to business faster than I did—I was semi-aware of him cutting the ropes keeping Kakashi’s arms tied behind his back, of him helping me lay our teammate flat on the ground.

“Kei! You have to help him!” Obito’s voice… I looked at him, and saw tears streaming down his face even though his eyes were still the blood-red Sharingan. His voice was cracking, like it hadn’t in months, and he looked younger than he had since this clusterfuck of a mission had started. Help him, help us, make things better!
Why was it always me? Why was I apparently the axis on which the entire fucking world turned? I couldn’t fix things because my existence threw things into chaos that I could barely compensate for! I could heal injuries and punch the right people, but it wouldn’t matter because there was always something bigger and badder that could eat me for breakfast.

Why was I even on the fucking team? Rin hadn’t had to do anything other than stand there and her team would make it through with fewer injuries! So what if she fucking died down the line? In the immediate sense she didn’t do anything and made it out all right and argh why was I being such a bitch.

Now, not then. The Dreamer was barely audible. Do the job in front of you.

I found the lever for my emotions—needs versus wants—and crammed everything into a new mental box. Later. Always later.

Hopefully I’d be alive to see it.

“Mystical Palm Jutsu.” I murmured.

I didn’t need to use it for long. I just needed Kakashi stable enough to move, because there was no way we were going to stay here. Whether this place was Iwa’s forward base of operations or not—and I was leaning toward “yes” out of the two options—we couldn’t afford to be caught anywhere we’d be outnumbered. All three of us versus two of them had ended with one kidnapping, while two-on-one confrontations resulted in two wins. Neither Kakkō nor Taiseki had demonstrated the variety of techniques that Mahiru had yesterday, but I couldn’t assume that would be the case for everyone.

At the same time, I was performing a diagnostic scan the best I could.

Aside from his eye, Kakashi was also missing all the fingernails on his right hand. Someone had reopened the slash on the underside of his arm, too, and it was bleeding sluggishly despite all the healing chakra I’d put into it over the last day. I could feel the bruise I’d given him yesterday, and there was a possibility of brain swelling thanks to Taiseki cracking him over the head. I didn’t know if he’d woken up at any point between then and now, which made little alarm bells go off inside my head.

All of the medical jargon was a way to keep my mind off the specifics. Ergo, who was so badly injured. I didn’t know how to deal with that.

“Is he going to be okay?” Obito asked, and I noticed his Sharingan spinning in what I assumed was a nervous tic.

I’d stopped the bleeding by then, and snapped my fingers experimentally in front of Kakashi’s nose. No reaction. “I think so. At least we can probably move him now.”

Obito gave a laugh that was a shadow of the real thing. “Never thought I’d be glad Sensei made us do all those carry exercises.”

All you need to know about “carry exercises” is as follows: Any two of us can carry Sensei or Kushina, and any one of us can carry any of the others for at least a hundred meters at a significant fraction of our top speeds.
It was easier to think about that than about what we were using that training for.

“Well, when I get him patched up we can think about that.” I replied, and I pulled a third scroll from my kunai holster. One unsealed med-kit later and I could get to work.

I brushed Kakashi’s hair out of the way with my free hand, preparing to clean the wound site where his left eye had once been. Mystical Palm Jutsu had stopped the bleeding, but the injury was still raw and vulnerable to infection.

That was when Kakashi’s uninjured hand shot upward and caught my wrist in a grip strong enough to grind the bones together.

I had so many conflicting feelings crashing around in my head just then—fear, relief, pain, joy—that whatever I meant to say got stuck in my throat. The predominant words that came to mind were “ow” and “augh!” and neither got out.

“Kakashi, it’s just us.” Obito said, as quiet and unthreatening as possible. He didn’t move to stop Kakashi from breaking my arm, instead curling his hands into fists against the tops of his thighs.

Kakashi looked up at Obito with one scarily focused eye, then up at me. Then at where he was grinding all of the bones in my wrist together. I slowly reached up with my left hand to make a gesture of surrender. Sure, my wrist hurt like hell, but there were another couple of warring impulses to consider—the winner specifically wanted to avoid fighting or otherwise hurting Kakashi any more than Kakkō had.

“I…” Kakashi’s voice cracked and he blinked again, rapidly. Then, as his near-neutral expression morphed into dawning horror, he let go of my arm and his hand shot toward his empty eye socket.

Obito stopped him. “Don’t! You shouldn’t…”

“…I can’t see out of my left eye.” Kakashi’s voice shook just the slightest bit. “What happened to my eye?”

“It’s gone, Kakashi.” I said, finding my own voice at last. “I’m sorry. But I need you to hold still until I can finish healing what I can so we can get out of here. We don’t have any time.”

Kakashi closed his remaining eye for a second. He was apparently rallying, despite the loss. “…Okay.” I could see him shoving the thought—I’m half blind now, what use am I?—aside for later. Always later.

“Can you even move?” Obito asked, even as he helped Kakashi sit upright.

From the way he slumped even while leaning against Obito, I assumed that Kakashi was feeling at least a bit wobbly.

“Nnno. Not well.” Kakashi mumbled.

We need to give his chakra levels a serious boost to compensate. The Dreamer even helpfully provided a mental item catalogue of one of my other scrolls. I had food pills somewhere in one of them, but using that sort of metabolism stimulator on someone who had recently been bleeding all over the place didn’t strike me as a good plan. A blood replenishing pill would be a better choice—less chakra, but more, you know, blood.

“Obito, search this scroll.” I said, handing him a fourth scroll I’d stowed away in my clothes. This one came from the brace on my lower back. “The blood pills should be close to the edge. I’m pretty “Sure I packed a bottle, at least.”

“Probably.” Obito said, and he broke the wax seal on the edge of the scroll to take a look despite the fact that mine was also unsealed. I needed it open anyway—my med-kit’s bandages had all been used up—and caught the bottle he tossed at me a moment later.

The benefit of having a lot of small scrolls was, well, in always having relevant items on hand. The disadvantage was that most people only had two hands with which to use them.

(I packed a total of eight, four of which were on holsters on my hips and forearms, and there were redundancies of everything.)

At the very least, patching Kakashi back up was straightforward. Winding the bandages around his head was easier than it had been with my own, even using Mystical Palm Jutsu to close things further as I went. I was just finishing up on the bandages around his fingers when Obito made a quiet noise of triumph.

I tore open a packet of glucose and salt as Obito found the pills for me, spilling its contents into the mouth of my canteen. It was still mostly full, and together with the pills it could make a sort of emergency consumable IV. While everyone on our team sans Sensei had the same blood type, I wasn’t willing to risk any transfusions in the field. Guess Kakashi would just have to deal with the nasty taste, though.

Kakashi remained very, very silent the entire time. He drank the contents of the canteen in a flash—I mean, I was sure Obito saw his face but I just so happened to be looking away to re-seal my supplies. When I looked back, Kakashi was holding the canteen in front of my face and the blood on his face had smeared a bit to show that he’d removed his mask and put it back on in a fraction of a second. He was also sitting up on his own, which was something a fair bit more minor.

He must have been feeling better to pull that off.

“What’s the mission’s status?” Kakashi asked, only a little rougher-sounding than usual.

“A mess.” Obito said bluntly.

“Yes, I gathered that.”

“I’m down two supply scrolls and missing a bit of my face, you’re missing more of your face, and I have no idea where our explosives went.” I summed up quickly. Situation normal: all fucked up. One of these days we were going to have a mission that doesn’t devolve and we’d die of heart attacks from shock.

Kakashi’s remaining eye narrowed suddenly. “I thought—”

And that’s when all of us heard the hissing.

Saw the black ink spiraling outward from Kakkō’s corpse, trailing blood, into a pattern I remembered and suddenly wished I didn’t.

Solid explosives were related to, and yet distinct from, explosive seal tags that I’d been working with for years. They were dense with chakra and chemical components that were most often found in dynamite, and often too dangerous to handle until coated in sawdust and plastic. A stray flame wouldn’t set them off, but a concentrated chakra charge or a Fire jutsu would cause a chain reaction within the structure of the device. It would happen slowly at first, subtly, until it had thoroughly infiltrated the surface it was attached to and lit the area up like a glowing spider web.
Then the ink would appear, a last-second warning that could only be disarmed by the chakra and blood of the person who had first set it.

They were bombs for shinobi without access to Explosion Release jutsu and exploding clay. Time bombs.

I should have known that Kakkō would be familiar with them. I just couldn’t tell you if his plan would have been to rig Kakashi to explode once the interrogation was over—maybe he would have just killed him. It didn’t matter either way, anymore.

All that mattered was that we were all going to die.

All of us got to our feet instantly. Obito may not have known what the problem was but he was good at reading people and even better with his Sharingan at last.

"Fuck, fuck, fuck, fuck—!" was my initial response, faster than I’d ever spoken before, even as I lurched to my feet. I started making seals with my bloodied hands, back against the wall. “Obito, it's a bomb. It's our bomb. Kakashi, please, I need you both up—I can't make a wall and I need time—"

Kakashi and Obito began making seals almost faster than I could force my chakra to listen to me. I knew that Obito had never learned Earth Release at all, but apparently having Kakashi around and having the Sharingan made the entire question moot.

They slammed their hands down together, and the ground rumbled. "Earth Release: Earth Wall!"

As the wall was rising, I could feel the chakra of the bomb start to condense still further in the nearby rock. With blood already on my hands, all I needed to do was take my completed seals, one of my scroll, and a bit of cover. I slammed all of them down on Kakashi and Obito’s wall. "Sealing Art: Reinforce!"

Ink lines wrapped around the makeshift barrier, glowing slightly purple, and I felt the earth harden into solid rock in the center. Hopefully that would be enough—

The explosives fanatic in me was extremely appreciative of the bomb itself when it went off. The rest of me was in mindless panic mode because we weren’t supposed to be that close aaaaaaaaaugh…

I remember an explosion, and hitting something.

That’s it.

It was dark.

I blinked a couple of times, thoughts moving slowly and bouncing around the inside of my head—or at least the headache made it feel like it. Light-dark, light-dark. Oh. Yeah, my eyes were still working. And most of my back felt like it was on fire, which was a nice bonus to the “fuck you” vibes the universe seemed to be sending me lately. Something wet was seeping down my neck from my hair, and the inkling that it was yet another head injury didn’t go away the longer I tried to think my way through the fog.

When I tried to move, I was briefly confused—what the hell was on my back?—before I cracked my eyes open again and tried to lever myself up onto my hands and knees anyway. I saw white, and after a second realized that Kakashi was lying limp on top of me. The explosion seemed to have thrown both of us into a heap of sprawling limbs.
I just hoped that nothing was broken. I could feel Yin chakra pumping around my coils, speeding what healing it could, but Kakashi was in for his second concussion of the day if he was out again. At least he was alive, though—

I wiggled out from under him, trying to figure out what the hell had happened since the bomb went off, and heard a faint rustle of fabric that was slightly too far away to be me or my unconscious teammate.

I didn’t need to consult my fractured chakra sense to have an idea of what I’d find if I looked. Heaving myself onto all fours, I looked around. And saw almost exactly what I expected. "No...no, no, no, no, this can't be happening, it's not real it's not happening it's just a dream oh god no..."

The boulder was different, not as big. It looked like part of our own goddamned wall had collapsed, pinning Obito under slightly less in the way of raw tonnage. He was still stuck, still bleeding sluggishly as half his body was trapped under rock. Part of his head, his entire right half of his torso. Legs were free, though.

I could still hear him say, haltingly, "...Kei...please...d-don't give up..."

"Obito?!" I burst out, scrambling over to him.

He looked up at me, visible Sharingan still spinning a little. He almost smiled, and it would have been marginally comforting if he wasn’t coughing blood out of that collapsed lung. “H-Hey...you're alive, right?"

I drew a shuddering breath. "...Yeah. Me and Kakashi both. We're alive. T-Thanks to you."

"That's good...Kei, I can't...I can't feel much of anything, now..." No, no, you're not allowed to say that, stop it!

"I..." I wanted to scream. I wanted to cry. I wanted to curse the gods and the demons and everything I could think of, but the words jammed up under my collarbone and I could feel my chest constricting under the pressure. I wanted to throw up, even, but I'd just choke and make a mess and be fucking useless.

I grabbed Obito’s hand, putting the other over my mouth because all that was escaping was a high-pitched whine of I can’t do anything.

Distantly, I heard Kakashi stir.

"Wha...” He groaned, rolling over, and I heard him make a choked-off noise. He lurched up onto his feet and ran over, dropping to his knees next to us. I could see him put one hand on the rock, the other on the ground next to my leg. He could see Obito clearly. “Obito?! This... No, no, this can't be happening..."

Obito made a noise that was half laugh and half choking on blood. "Hey...you jerk. Finally awake, h-huh?"

Kakashi’s expression was one I’d never wanted to see, and I froze up. He pushed against the rock pinning Obito with all of his strength, to no avail.

It didn’t even twitch. After a moment of pointless struggling, Kakashi slipped to his knees as the enormity of the moment finally hit him. His fist met the rock again, this time in a futile gesture of defiant, helpless anger. “DAMMIT!” He was crying. “Why can’t I—if I’d never been captured, you wouldn’t be—you shouldn’t have come back.”
Obito’s hand tightened around mine, just a bit. "Hey...I finally thought of something..."

Kakashi’s voice was nearly a howl. "What could you possibly be thinking of at a time like this?"

I closed my eyes, hardly aware of the tears tracking down my face. My voice didn’t seem to be worth much, even in my head. We’re twenty meters underground in hostile territory. Shout some more, will you? Real helpful, that.

Obito gave one of those laughs again. It was awful. I looked up when he sprayed blood across our joined hands. "Your present...for becoming a jōnin. Remember?"

"No..." From the look on Kakashi’s face, he’d forgotten entirely.

I didn’t blame him. Trust Obito to remember something like that. I only did because of what it meant.

Obito went on doggedly, as though Kakashi hadn’t said anything. I wasn’t even sure how much he could hear, anymore. "I promise it's...not a burden. I-It's useless to me, now...Kakashi. Take my Sharingan..."

Kakashi stared. "But..."

Obito’s Sharingan focused on me. I stared back, feeling my stomach settle somewhere around the center of the earth. It’s happening. "Kei...do this for me...okay? Kakashi...needs a sharp left eye...someone looking out for him..."

I nodded, even as I felt my throat constrict completely.

Obito smiled, even as blood stained his teeth red and tracked its way down his jaw. "I-I know it'll hurt...I'll be fine."

"F-Fine. Fine?! You're..." I forced it out, barely, and my free hand formed a fist in front of my mouth. No no no no no—

His smile was so sad. "I-I know."

I swallowed hard, feeling a hiccups build in my chest. "Obito...what...what do you want me to tell Rin-chan?"

"...T-Tell her... No." Obito grimaced, and I saw him make an abortive motion that might have been a flinch if he could move. “Don't...don't tell her anything that w-will hurt her..."

_Fuck you fuck you fuck you._ I clamped down on that though, trying to force that helpless anger back. I said, very quietly, "...You love her. I'll tell her that."

Obito looked at me like he’d never seen me before."Kei...don't."

"Fuck you, fuck you for dying on us,” was my half-shrieked reply, and I was crying everywhere, “fuck you for going away without even telling Rin-chan you love her more than anything! You don't get to die without settling things with her!"

For a long moment, neither of us said anything. Obito squeezed my hand gently, and I tried scrubbing at my eyes with my other sleeve. It didn’t really work.

Obito choked out, "...T-take my goggles to her. Tell her..."

"...Yeah.” I drew a shuddering breath, “Yeah, I will.” His goggles had been dropped in the debris—I could see the orange from where I was sitting, out of the corner of my eye.

"Now...my eye. Please, Kei..." Obito’s voice was pleading.

Kakashi made a choking noise of his own. "Obito..."

Obito wheezed. "Kakashi...listen to me. P-Protect Rin-chan and Kei...with your life." No, no, don’t leave us. “Please, p-promise me you’ll protect them...with my eye. Please, Kakashi..."

Kakashi’s hand closed over both of ours, and I bit my lip hard. Kakashi was saying, "I'll protect everyone, Obito. I promise. I'll protect them with my life...” Another strangled noise. “…like you should have been able to. Like you did and still are..."

Obito coughed blood again. "Heh...I'll...I won't forgive you...if you don't..."

It took me a long moment of internal struggle to get myself to let go of Obito’s hand. I stood, trying to settle my nerves. It wasn’t working and I knew deep inside that it wouldn’t, that nothing ever would. I couldn’t admit that. Couldn’t let them down.

I felt the Dreamer queue up as much Yin chakra as she could spare. For once, it was without comment. I turned back to the boys, to where Kakashi was still clutching Obito’s hand. "...Lie down next to Obito, Kakashi. I'll...I'll make this as painless as I can."

Extracting an eye wasn’t hard. Kakashi and Obito didn’t let go of each other’s hands, and I could see the pain make Obito’s whole body seize up for a moment. It should have freaked me out more that that was the case, and I was sure it’d hit me later. My hands glowing with medical chakra to keep the Sharingan alive, I gently pulled the eye free.

Obito gritted his teeth.

I’d already undone the bandages around Kakashi’s head. The gaping bloodied socket was staring up at me, making my stomach briefly turn over. The optic nerve dangling from Obito’s Sharingan was swinging, ends seeking connectors. I had to connect Kakashi’s severed nerve with the Sharingan’s, and brought my other hand down on Kakashi’s forehead to open the connection. The myriad muscles around the eye would follow suit afterward.

Nerve first. Eye in a bit.

I was going to throw up once it was actually convenient to do it.

Snip. Snip.

With Obito’s eye safely in its new home—augh—I brought both hands together over Kakashi’s face. My hands were glowing green and I could feel the muscle in his face knit itself back together, despite brief hesitation around the Sharingan’s alien nature. Oh god, oh god.

Eye surgery should not be that easy. It was almost like the Sharingan wanted to…

Nope, not having that thought.

As I finished, I felt my chakra sense reorganize itself into something sensible. I’d been ignoring the feedback it’d been getting, being the mental equivalent of a speaker shrieking in my ear, but even as I let Kakashi sit up and reclaimed my place at Obito’s side, I could feel the whispers of incoming enemy chakra signatures.
A lot of them.

“How many?” was Kakashi’s response to my sudden twitchiness. He was already standing, if leaning against the boulder. God, if he looked like such a wreck, I didn’t want to see a mirror for a while. All of us were so fucked it wasn’t even funny.

“More than we can take.” I said quietly, feeling the dread chill of death settle in my bones.

We were all dead. Our “defensive position” was a half-collapsed artificial cave that had once been Iwa’s forward operations base, with Obito down and both Kakashi and I on our last legs. The Dreamer had gone quiet, now that she was depending on a bare minimum of our stored Yin chakra to maintain coherence.

Kakashi gave both of us a long look—pain, regret, fear—and then he turned away.

Oh god. He was going out there.

And I couldn’t leave Obito alone.

I didn’t stop him and immediately wondered why the fuck I wouldn’t. And then I felt Obito’s hand tighten on mine and I remembered and felt horrible about it.

"Kei...go.” My head whirled back toward Obito so fast I nearly got whiplash. I couldn’t look into his eyes—eye—anymore but reading his chakra told me a story on its own. He was so afraid, but his voice didn’t betray any of it. “Please...don't let him die. He needs to...to keep his promise."

"N-No, I can't..."

Obito laughed and it was an awful sound. I could hear the fluid in his lungs. "...I'm not going anywhere, Kei..."

"...I'm so sorry.” I said, leaning in close. “I'm sorry I couldn't... I should have done something! You shouldn't be stuck here..."

Obito’s laugh was hardly audible at all. He was still smiling. "Heh... That's just I-like you, Kei...” Please don’t leave me alone. “G-Go. Move forward..."

"I...okay.” Hot tears tracked down my face. “Okay. You win.”

Obito didn’t let go. Not just yet. I wasn’t sure I could have taken it if he had. It would have been too much like goodbye. "But...wait. Take my headband...yours was torn..."

His hitai-ate had come mostly undone after the rock-fall. If he wanted me to, I could carefully work the metal and the fabric out from under the stone without hurting him any more than...well. I bit down on my lip again before finding something to say. "...Your gift to me, huh? K-Keep giving things away and there w-won't be anything left..."

"I know..." I'm sorry.

"Oh, Obito. I'll...” Why couldn’t I stop this from happening? “I'll treasure it.” I had to say something or else I’d just start blubbering and be in no shape at all to help anyone. Only after I’d extracted the hitai-ate, I leaned in and kissed him on the forehead, above his eyeless socket. My hand was still clutching his. "Sleep well, Obito... I...we'll see each other again soon.”

“You...know it.” Obito murmured, and let go.
If only he know how true that could turn out to be.

I left, after grabbing his goggles where they sat and slinging them around my neck.

It took almost all of the self-control I had left, but I left Obito there and leapt for the outside world. His headband’s metal plate cut grooves into my hand, I was clinging to it so hard, and landing next to Kakashi gave me a perfect view of what would have, at one point, been Kakkō, Mahiru, and Taiseki’s reinforcements. Twenty Iwa-nin of various shapes and sizes, looking down at us from the first rung of the canopy with various levels of interest and/or sadism.

We were on the ground, looking up. Kakashi was still as stone, newly-implanted Sharingan whirling as he tried to pick out the best idiot to start on. I could feel all of their chakra, and the prognosis wasn’t good.

Then the cave collapsed behind me, and I tried very hard not to think about it. If I thought about it, I’d break. Instead, I tied Obito’s headband in place, where mine once would have been.

If I look back, I am lost…

Everyone seemed to be waiting.

"...We’re outnumbered." Kakashi commented. His tone belied the way his chakra was in utter turmoil. He wanted to kill everyone and knew he couldn’t. It was just barely keeping him from trying anyway.

My voice was astoundingly steady, and I could feel the same sensation burning in my chest. "Yeah. We’re pretty much fucked."

He looked to me, with Obito’s eye. "...Kei. Is Obito...?"

"...Soon, if not already." I said, staring right back.

"I’ll protect you.” Kakashi said, looking away. He was watching one of the Iwa-nin to his right, who had gone for a weapon. “Stay back.”

"Not a chance."

Kakashi looked at me again. "That was an order." He was already working on the Chidori’s seals.

I slipped into a ready stance behind him, trying to focus for the Rasengan. Ahead of us, the enemy shinobi began to fan out. "I don’t care. Rank means nothing when you’re dead."

"...On my mark." He gave in without a fight.

I closed my eyes briefly. "Right."

We were dead.

I went first, counting on Obito’s eye to give Kakashi an edge in following my movements. I was outwardly unarmed, sans a kunai in one hand and a budding swirl of chakra in the other.

The first enemy lunged, but I was ready. I’d only have two shots, max, but I was ready. "Rasengan!"

Behind me, Kakashi met someone else with the metallic shriek of the Chidori.

I was about to meet the second guy, since I was about to go out fighting anyway, when my vision was obscured by yellow.

No...

Sensei had found us. Sensei had found us and he pushed me to the ground and started killing Iwa-nin like he was a fox in a henhouse and all the chickens had less than two seconds to realize that they were on the menu.

NO, YOU DON’T FUCKING GET TO DO THIS, I HATE YOU I HATE YOU I HATE YOU I HATE YOU—

Dying would have been easy. I’d done it before.

Living…I didn’t know if I knew how.

And I couldn’t feel Obito’s chakra.

We killed every last one of those motherfuckers. Kakashi got two before he dropped like a rock, and I ran back over to him without even going for the guy who, honestly, should have probably been my next target. Sensei killed him anyway, so what did I care? Sensei could kill every single one of them and I wouldn’t care at all.

My legs turned to jelly right when I reached Kakashi, rolling him over to check his pulse (okay) and chakra levels (argh fuck). He’d be okay. He had to be okay.

I was trembling.

Sensei landed next to me a minute later, flicking blood from his kunai. He crouched over Kakashi, but he was looking at me. "Kei-kun, where's Obito? What happened to all of you?"

I stared at him. Thought about the bandages over my face, about my flagging chakra levels, about Obito and his fucking eye and Kakashi and the Iwa-nin who were so thoroughly dead. I thought about everything. Everything I’d been trying to put off. I croaked, "...You're late, Sensei. You're too late."

Sensei put his hands on my shoulders, trying to get me to make sense. I wasn’t making sense at all, was I? “Kei …please. Tell me what happened.”

“…Obito’s dead.” I said it and it was a lie and yet it wasn’t, because I didn’t know if the Obito we knew would ever survive to come back. “Kakashi was captured and tortured by Iwa-nin. I…I’m in…I’m okay, but all of the explosives are gone.”

I could see the storm looming and couldn’t get out of the way.

Sensei’s voice went very quiet. “…No.” It sounded a little like how I did when I really meant to say “oh god no, no, please” and I wished it didn’t.

"...He wanted..." I was shaking under Sensei’s hands. “…he wanted us to go home safely. We can still complete the mission. I...I'm fit for duty."

No, I wasn’t.

Sensei unintentionally echoed me with, "...No, you're not."

Sensei looked down at Kakashi, who was entirely out cold with a chakra system that looked like a well in Death Valley. Then he eased his arms under Kakashi’s shoulders and knees and lifted, carrying him against his chest like he was a child. I sat there amongst the bodies and the blood, thinking in circles.

Wasn't he a child? Wasn't I?

"Sensei?" I said blankly.

“Come on, Kei. Just follow me.” Sensei told me. His voice was so soft and…and it felt like he knew I was breaking.

I agreed, and obeyed.

I didn’t remember much of the trip away from that thrice-cursed place, after the fact. I mostly just remember stopping for the night somewhere else, putting one foot in front of the other the whole way. Kakashi didn’t wake up and I mostly just followed Sensei’s back. I had no idea where we were going until we stopped.

Sensei reached a tree and set Kakashi down among the roots. They were big enough that the hollow underneath was shelter and not just a terrible lean-to. I followed and dropped next to him, resting my arms across the tops of my knees. "We're going to stop, rest, and reevaluate. We're going to plan. We will not let Obito die in vain."

I said distantly, “Understood, Sensei.”

It was getting dark and cold out and I was still covered in dried or drying blood. I wasn’t in the best shape at all, and I couldn’t bring myself to care.

Sensei’s hand dropped onto my head. I blinked up at him, even as he sat down next to me and kept his other hand on Kakashi’s forehead."...I'm sorry, Kei."

"For what?" I asked. “We fucked up, Obito's dead, and our mission's done for. Our fault.” My fault.

Sensei’s eyes were so dark. He almost looked away, but stopped halfway and looked back. "...If I’d let you have that summon scroll earlier, none of this would have happened."

"...No," I heard myself say, hearing my tone pitch upward and unable to stop, “no, that can't be—Sensei, it's my fault, I'm sorry, I should have known we were heading for a trap—"

I didn’t realize that I’d started to pull away, to lash out, until Sensei caught both of my wrists in his hands and I couldn’t do it anymore. "No, Kei! Listen to me!"

I swallowed hard, protest dying on my lips. "I..."

"Kei...that scroll was for a minor crane summon.” Sensei pressed on, even as I was shaking my head. “It wasn't anything you couldn't handle. I was planning on letting you sign it after we got back..." Oh god what have I done. “And if I hadn't wanted to wait, you would have been able to find me before this. I'm sorry, Kei-kun. I'm so, so sorry.” The next thing I knew, Sensei was crushing me in a hug that didn’t help at all.

I went limp. "...I don't want to talk about this anymore," I whimpered into his flak jacket. Leave me alone, please!

He didn’t.

I cried myself out, screaming inside my head and into Sensei’s vest, pounding my fists against his chest. I was flat-out sobbing, sides heaving as I howled my grief. It felt like bleeding, only it wasn’t real and instead of getting weaker and dizzier all I could feel was the sensation of being drained. I was distantly surprised I was still in one piece after.

I ran out of tears eventually.

It was a long time later, when the moon was out in full, that Kakashi finally woke up. I was standing out in the middle of the field next to our campsite when I heard him jolt awake, and didn’t look back for a long while. Sensei was closer, anyway.

I rubbed my hands together and wished that something, anything would take the dried blood away. We weren’t near a river, though, and our canteens were empty. I felt it under my nails and coating the ridges in my hands and fingers, crumbling as it dried. I just…didn’t care about much else.

Kakashi made his way over to me, slowly. He stood at my right side. "...We're still alive."

I closed my eyes."Yeah. Sensei...found us."

"...And Obito?" Kakashi asked hesitantly. As though he didn’t already know the answer.

"There was nothing we could do. He was too far gone."

"...I thought so.” Kakashi murmured. He didn’t look at me. “What are we doing now?"

“Tonight? Nothing.” I’d heard that from Sensei, though I couldn’t remember much else that he’d said. “Tomorrow, we’ll complete the mission.”

Kakashi said quietly, “Just like he wanted.”

I nodded, one hand resting on the goggles dangling around my neck. I didn’t see the world go black at the edges. I didn’t see anything at all. I just felt…a warm nothingness, reaching. I didn’t fight it.

My knees hit the ground, and that’s the last thing I remember.
Kannabi Bridge Arc: Aftershocks

Chapter Summary

Kei: Break down.

Chapter Notes

If someone said three years from now
You'd be long gone
I'd stand up and punch them out
Cause they're all wrong
I know better
Cause you said forever
And ever
Who knew

~ P!nk, "Who Knew"

See the end of the chapter for more notes

I don’t remember very much from the next couple of weeks. What I do, though, I can at least record so I can try and wrestle with it later. Maybe never. Dunno yet.

It feels like looking through a scrapbook or an old photo album—context comes back when you’re looking directly at it, but they’re still just snapshots when you get down to it. The connective time is missing, and sometimes you don’t have any idea where it goes.

I have my own theory, and it involves a blanket fort, but that’s just me.

Training Ground Three hadn’t been my first choice for it. Hell, there wasn’t a “first choice” at all—if I’d had the choice, I wouldn’t be the one delivering the news of Obito’s death to Rin. But I had promised to carry news back after browbeating Obito into telling me what to say, and it wasn’t fair to ask anyone else. Still, I probably would have gone to Rin’s apartment and not the field next to the Memorial Stone.

It felt…well, it felt like the last bastion of happy memories, despite what the place really represented in the larger picture.

If Rin hadn’t come looking for me and Kakashi, I don’t know what would have happened.

Seeing Obito’s goggles in her hands made it all real. I bit my lip, fighting not to look away from the expression on Rin’s face. It was slowly morphing into the same dawning horror and grief I’d felt when I woke up in that collapsed cave, and Rin’s fingers clamped tight over the durable plastic.

“So it’s true.” Rin murmured, clutching the goggles to her chest. Tears slid down her face, dropping toward the ground from her chin. “I-I thought, when I didn’t see his name…I hoped…”

Only two members of Team Minato had checked into the hospital that day. And Kakashi sat next to me, new hitai-ate slanted sideways over Obito’s eye and expression totally blank. That the three of us were sitting together was a minor event all its own, because someone very important left a palpable hole in the scene.

My hands twitched badly before they went still on my thighs, white-knuckled. I was looking down, and I had plenty of time to contemplate my epic fuckup that way.

I should have been able to do something.

But no—between my traitorous soft heart and how I was cracked in the head, between the changes I’d made and whatever the hell popped up in response…Obito had been buried.

And I still didn’t know for sure if he was dead or alive. I hadn’t felt his chakra and if he really was dead then everything would be different. If he wasn’t, I’d left my best friend to die. If my chakra sense hadn’t failed me then…

“—I’m sorry.” I choked out, blinking rapidly. I hadn’t realized my throat was so constricted until I tried to talk through it, and then it hurt. “You…you wanted me to look after him, right?”

“I wanted…you to look after each other.” Rin corrected, scrubbing at her eyes with her sleeve. It wasn’t helping. “I wanted you both to come home. I wanted you to be safe.”

“I couldn’t—shouldn’t have promised that.” Did I even promise that? Or was it just implied? “I can’t say anything that could…I’m sorry, Rin-chan. I can’t do anything else.”

“Yeah, it’s too late, isn’t it?” Rin gave a hiccupping laugh that came with still more tears. “I just…thought he’d be late, like usual? If you were here and he wasn’t…”

“Oh, Rin-chan…” I reached out, offering a hug or something, but Rin shook her head.

“And I know—I know you were there too and it’s not fair to cry like this—” Rin was still crying.

“Why the hell would I be mad at you?” My voice rose in pitch and volume, but it wasn’t really yelling. Gods above, I felt horrible too. “You’re allowed to be sad—”

“All of us are.” Kakashi said in a murmur, and I stopped.

“…Right. Right. It’s okay to be upset and mourn.” I said, refocusing. I drew a shuddering breath. “He—I promised to tell you—”

“He loved you.” Kakashi put in, gently, and Rin stared back and forth between the two of us.

Then her face crumpled. “Then why couldn’t he come home?! I’m—I’m not angry at him but—” Rin hiccupped. “I…I would…”

Can you accept these feelings, knowing that he might really be gone forever?

Why were my hands shaking?

Oh, right.

I hugged Rin tightly and held on for as long as she needed me to.
But life always had to come back, in the end. And there were consequences to everything, as I was learning.

The Hokage could generally be trusted to make hearings as painful as possible, being a military leader in a nation under fire for five damned years. To that end, rather than taking place at the Mission Desk or the Hokage’s office like most ordinary debriefings would go, we’d been called to the Council room. The room itself was designed a little like how I’d imagined the Wizengamot chambers to be, with one of jury-box-like structures to each side of the Hokage’s podium. The central chamber floor was sunken into the ground, meaning that those on trial would always be looking up at their accusers.

“This is the special hearing with regards to the joint mission recently completed by Team Minato and Team Kakashi.” The Hokage wasn’t smoking, just then. His expression was pinched and grave, and the shadow of his hat made anything else difficult to determine. I knew he was worn down, by age and the nature of the Hokage office, but at that moment he looked and felt like the war leader he’d pretty much always been.

I felt very, very small.

Sensei stood behind Kakashi and me, hands clasped behind his back. Kakashi was to my left, in the same position and with Obito’s eye closed. I tried not to squirm, shifting my weight subtly from foot to foot despite my best efforts to stay still. I was caught between swaying in place due to fatigue and fidgeting—never a good combination. Both of us had only recently (as in three hours beforehand) been discharged from the hospital, but Kakashi hid it better.

The chamber’s box seats were full, with representatives from the Uchiha clan making up fully one-half of the right side. The rest were assembled from various other groups in the village—the Intelligence division, the Hyūga clan, half-a-dozen jōnin, someone who was probably from ANBU, and the two members of the Konoha Council—Koharu Utatane, Homura Mitokado, and Danzō Shimura.

And on the floor with us, either acting as legal representative or on-hand interrogator, was Inoshi Yamanaka.

“We will begin now,” the Hokage ordered, narrow-eyed glare sweeping the chamber.

I wondered, in a distant sort of way, if Fugaku or one of the other older Uchiha had said or done something before the trial started that had irked the Hokage, given how the Uchiha clan’s corner was literally all theirs.

Or maybe I was reading too far into things.

The Hokage said, “Team Minato, begin your report.”

I was staring at the floorboards with the intent to try and sink to the center of the earth, and so Kakashi stepped forward in my place even though he shouldn’t have. Captain or not, he didn’t know.

“Four days ago, my team split off from Sensei in order to infiltrate Iwa battle-lines and destroy the Kannabi Bridge in Kusagakure territory.” Kakashi’s voice was steady, but his chakra was in severe emotional turmoil. “In our initial contact with Iwa forces, we killed an advance scout. Once our team was on the move, we encountered his reinforcements.”

“Bingo book profiles list the three Iwa-nin as Mahiru, Taiseki, and Kakkō—all jōnin.” Inoshi put in, when Kakashi momentarily drew a blank.
Kakashi hadn’t seen much of Kakkō or Taiseki, in comparison to Obito and me.

Kakashi went on, “In the ensuing fight, Keisuke and Obito managed to fend off Taiseki. However, I was captured.”

“Captured” implied a lot of things, some of which I’d seen and would swear an oath about in the coming days. But for the moment, it was nicely vague and left the rest of the narrative to me.

Kakashi would probably be ordered to meet with the Intelligence division at some point, for information about Iwa’s interrogation techniques and possibly for (something like) counseling since Sensei was shit at it. Sensei is a lot of things. A child therapist is not one of them.

I took over. “We immediately made the decision to abandon the mission and pursue.”

I could feel everyone in the room disapprove.

Kannabi had been a vital chokepoint for our offensive. Failing to destroy it would have cost lives in the sort of numbers comparable to Sakumo Hatake’s blunder five years ago.

“Kakashi, prior to the start of our mission, had been supplied with all high-grade demolitions equipment capable of damaging the bridge.” I continued in a monotone. “If we couldn’t retrieve him—or at least recover the explosives—our mission was automatically doomed to failure. Further, if he broke during interrogation, all future expeditions against Iwa forces in the area would be at an increased risk of failure.”

I could feel the eyes of everyone in the room, sans Kakashi and Sensei, on me.

“We laid a trap for Taiseki in order to counteract his demonstrated stealth skills.” I kept my gaze fixed in the middle distance, but my voice was clear. “Between my explosive tags and sensory skills, and Obito’s reaction time, we held out as a distraction for nearly four minutes. During that time, Kakkō made no move to reinforce his teammate.”

A lifetime when in combat against a jōnin.

“I was injured.” I said, and knew that everyone was looking at the scar on my face. “And Obito killed Taiseki when his Sharingan activated in the aftermath.”

I felt a flash of…something…and Fugaku. Pride, maybe?

“After administering basic first aid, we continued our self-imposed rescue mission.” Kakashi’s nearest hand twitched. I tried to ignore it. “Obito and I engaged Kakkō in close combat—the space inside the cave was too small for his larger Fire Release jutsu. I killed Kakkō in the end, with Obito providing the opening.”

“I regained consciousness shortly afterward.” Kakashi said quietly. “Kakkō had extracted my left eye as part of his interrogation when genjutsu torture failed, even after reopening my injuries from the first fight and removing fingernails.”

And if Kakashi did break…well, no one knew. Kakkō certainly wasn’t going to go reporting anything to anyone, now. But I didn’t doubt that at least a few people in the audience were already trying to figure out what that would mean for his mission viability. People who were bleeding out were generally more susceptible to a lot of things, and that probably would have brought most people to their breaking point when combined with the other stuff Kakkō might have done.

Unless, apparently, your name was Kakashi Hatake.
I tried not to look at his hand. It was still bandaged.

“While we were trying to stem the bleeding and stabilize him, I realized that we hadn’t actually managed to recover the explosives.” I picked up the thread, unwilling to let Kakashi stay in that dark place if I could help it. I closed my eyes. “Kakkō had taken them, and rigged them on a dead-man’s switch tied to his chakra. We managed to organize a shield wall, but…”

“The blast knocked all of us unconscious.” Kakashi filled in. “When we came to, Obito was lying under a boulder, half-crushed but still alive by some miracle.”

Or curse.

Sensei’s chakra was leaping all over the place—it was the first time either of us had talked about Obito’s last moments. Still, he didn’t lose his straight-backed military stance.

“Obito…asked to make up for not giving me a promotion present.” Kakashi’s voice hardly wavered. “He begged Keisuke to transplant his eye.”

The last time they had a full, decent conversation, and it was a fight.

“And I did.” I tried not to remember. “We were immediately confronted by somewhere between twenty and twenty-five enemy shinobi upon leaving the cave, which collapsed on Obito. During our fight with them, Sensei arrived.”

“I neutralized all enemy combatants.” Sensei told them. “We rallied, completed the mission, and returned home.” I could only assume he had given his actual report while we were in the hospital.

After that, the room was silent for a while.

Then the Hokage nodded. “The floor is now open to question.”

“How did you know that Obito Uchiha was dead?” Fugaku asked sharply.

Dammit. Give me a question I can answer.

“Three pints of lost blood, a crushed lung, and ten tons of rock.” Kakashi said levelly.

That did not cover the mysterious lack of his chakra signature—which could have been because he was dead, or because he wasn’t there anymore. Or even because my chakra sense had been hideously unreliable on the mission. I didn’t know.

“Then did you recover his body?” Fugaku asked.

“No.” Sensei replied.

The Uchiha sector didn’t look at all happy. I couldn’t really blame them. For different reasons than they had, I kind of felt the same way.

“How did you know you could transplant his eye?” This came from Danzō, even as Fugaku was about to ask us something else.

“I didn’t.” I said quietly, forcing myself not to shake. Oh fuck oh fuck oh fuck— “But he asked me to.”

I did not want to look into Danzō’s face, regardless of how it’d be impossible for him to have already acquired Shisui’s Sharingan. Fucking nope. Putting myself on his radar by accident was bad enough, holy shit.

That silence stretched for a while, too.

“What reason did he have to give up his eye?” Fugaku asked.

Well, to paraphrase, “Someone needs to watch out for Kakashi. Needs a sharp left eye. Also what use is a Sharingan to a dead man?”

“He said that he didn’t need it anymore.” I said. “That Kakashi…needed someone looking out for him.” Literally.

Kakashi grimaced under his mask. “He may have felt some misplaced guilt about my capture. Or about the argument we’d had earlier.” Clear in his tone is the note of but I don’t understand why.

Obito had the biggest heart out of any kid I’d ever met. That was why.

“What right did he have to ask for the transplant operation?” Fugaku continues as though I didn’t say anything.

“Uchiha-dono.” Inoshi got the full force of Fugaku’s glare for interrupting. The older blond man merely blinked and commented, “This line of questioning is unproductive. But I might have a solution.”

“Yamanaka-san?” The Hokage raises one graying eyebrow.

“I’ve used my family jutsu to enter Gekkō-kun’s mind before.” Inoshi said in a mild voice. “I can do it again and confirm everything we’ve discussed.”

I think I can point him where he needs to go. And away from where we don’t need him to go.

Reassuring, I guess.

“This will be easier with your cooperation, you know.” Inoshi said, and I got all kinds of weird pings between his tone and his chakra.

Or maybe it was just the fact that I didn’t want anyone poking around in my head ever again. I was okay with prodding my own soul and my other personalities to see what made them tick and had even figured out most of it and could use them as backup chakra seals or something. But while I’d let Inoshi in once under extreme stress, I certainly didn’t want to repeat the experience with the Council as the primary goddamn reason.

If Inoshi had been hostile, he could have destroyed me five years ago. And he still could. Fu would eat my brain.

I’ll make a note about mind probes under duress. The Dreamer winced. At least it’s Inoshi.

“I…all right.” I saw Kakashi twitch again, out of the corner of my eye. I didn’t look at him.

I knelt.

Inoshi put his left hand on my head and his right formed a seal.

I closed my eyes.

Then white.
Obito’s voice.

“I promise it’s...not a burden. I-It’s useless to me, now...Kakashi. Take my Sharingan...”

Kakashi’s.

"I’ll protect everyone, Obito. I promise. I’ll protect them with my life...like you should have been able to. Like you did and still are..."

“K-Keep giving things away and there w-won't be anything left...”

...

That's enough.

Someone knocked at my door while I was in bed like a lump, feeling sorry for myself and also mentally apologizing for existing.

Going over Kannabi hadn’t helped my mindset much. At all.

I...to be honest, I had probably been building up to a breakdown for the better part of eight days, by that point. I’d held my feelings inside when Rin got her chance to let go. I’d held it together for the council hearing. I’d even held it together long enough to almost interact normally with my family (though Mom wasn’t fooled).

And then, come day nine, I refused to leave my bed.

It was a shitty time all around—Hayate didn’t really understand what was wrong with me, despite hearing the news about Obito, and Mom had her hands full just trying to get me to eat. I wasn’t hungry—everything tasted like ash, when my stomach didn’t just try to crawl back up my throat for some godforsaken reason. And I wasn’t interested in dragging my ass out of bed long enough to take medication for that sensation, either.

Everything was just too much effort.

About the only positive thing I can say about that time is that I never picked up sleep-talking. From what I understand, the worst noise I’ve ever made is either a hideous snore or a sort of subsonic growl in the bottom of my chest that would wake up anyone next to me. It was a toss-up sometimes whether Obito would wake me up via pillow to the face or not, when we were on the road.

I didn’t want to think about him, or about anything.

And then there was someone banging on my door anyway.

I made a noise that could only grudgingly be called human.

The knocking continued.

I rolled over and pulled my blankets over my head.

The door opened.

“Kei?” said Kakashi’s voice.
Okay, that was a surprise, but I still wasn’t interested in hearing anything he had to say. I wanted to sleep and pretend nothing bad had happened yet. Or ever would.

And then Kakashi went on, speaking in a quiet voice I almost had to strain to hear, “I asked your mother if I could come in and try talking to you. I was there when Obito died—I thought…maybe I could help, because we’re feeling the same way. I guess she believed me. She let me in, even if I’ve never spoken a civil word to her before.”

“I’m…not good at words.” I felt Kakashi sit down on the side of my bed, his weight causing the mattress to sag. “So.”

A flare of chakra followed. And then there was one more dip in the mattress, and the new one was sniffing around my hiding-spot on four wobbly legs as the springs shifted.

And then a tiny tongue licked my exposed hand.

I wiggled partly out from under the covers, because apparently nothing was as motivating as a small furry animal, and surrounded the half-grown pug with my arms. He didn’t seem to mind being stuck between my crossed forearms and my neck, and folded his legs neatly under his body before sticking his nose against my shoulder.

I stroked his now-stiff fur, chin resting on the scarecrow face on his jacket. He made a whining noise.

I still wasn’t looking at Kakashi.

We sat in silence for a long moment.

“It wasn’t supposed to be like this.” I said, staring at the wall.

“…it wasn’t.” Kakashi agreed quietly.

“We were supposed to come home.” I whispered. “All of us.”

It would be hard to describe how I felt at that moment. It wasn’t nothing, but I…was kind of in two minds about everything, which was terribly unhelpful for record-keeping after the fact. Numb, yet aware that so many feelings were waiting to turn me into a sobbing wreck. Angry, yet also grateful to Kakashi or being willing to reach out.

“I…” Kakashi paused. “I’m going to visit the Stone, later.”

“I’ll come with you.” I said, closing my eyes. “I need to say goodbye. And attend the service.”

Kakashi’s weight shifted a little on the mattress. His chakra was uneasy, but I didn’t look at him.

“Okay.”

I sat in my room with Pakkun in my arms for a long time even after that, listening to the sound of gentle breathing and waiting for Kakashi to say anything, and let the thoughts slide together until something pinged off of some other important idea. I wasn’t in any hurry.

Eventually, I got up. I had shit to do. Funeral to attend—Obito was an orphan, we were his family—friends to visit. I kicked Kakashi out of my room so I could change, though he didn’t leave the house.

I got dressed in funeral black, for what seemed like the first time since Dad’s death. Sensei, Rin and Kakashi were the only ones I really cared attended with me, even if I know that my old classmates were probably going to attend if they could. I didn’t think about the Uchiha clan much. I tied Obito’s headband around my arm. I finished the knot slower and more carefully than I would otherwise, and headed out.

Kakashi was sitting at the kitchen table with Mom and Hayate, both also dressed in black. Pakkun was on the floor by his feet, and before we left our street, the other seven ninken had joined us. They were all half-grown, but bigger than Pakkun, and each one is aware of the gravity of the situation.

My brother rode on Bull’s back, silent for once, and Mom guided us through the streets. Sensei joined our procession after a while, warping out of nowhere without a word. He briefly squeezed my shoulder, before drawing Mom aside for a quick, whispered conversation I entirely missed.

I picked up flowers from the Yamanaka shop. Sensei got aster blooms and Kakashi took the daffodils. I kept the daisies. The lotus flowers were for Rin, when she joined us. There were early cherry blossoms, too, but they were for whoever else ended up attending. The stuff with meaning—and sometimes I wondered how Inoichi knew—was for our team alone.

Rin showed up then, Obito’s goggles around her neck and incense in her hands. I slung an arm around her shoulders and tried to keep everything from showing on my face.

It didn’t rain, but it was cold.

There were probably a total of fifty people attending. Gai, Kurenai, Asuma, Aoba, Ibiki, Iruka, Anko, Yūgao, Genma, Ebisu, Yamaguchi-sensei… While the majority of the ranks were made up of Uchiha clan members, it was clear that Obito had touched many lives. Maybe not always significantly, or in a positive way—but they understood self-sacrifice and the pain of coming home one man short. Maybe some of them were just there for us, not Obito.

Funerals, memorials, and wakes… they were for the living, after all.

Sensei carved his name into the stone, while Kakashi, Rin and I placed flowers. I had a photo of our team from the first day we were made official, and I had kept it safe for years. I placed it at the base of the stone with incense and my sweet peas. I wanted to leave the headband there, too, but couldn’t make myself part with it. Rin didn’t leave his goggles, either, and I felt a mix of guilt and relief for that.

—should have been stronger faster better—

In the end, it was over all too quickly. The crowd broke off with some general condolences and Sensei had to leave, because the world didn’t stop spinning for a single life. Kakashi, Rin, and I stood there for a long, quiet hour, with Mom and Hayate in the wings and Kakashi’s dogs surrounding us like an honor guard.

It was there that, in front of what would have to serve as Obito’s grave—for now—I decided that I was going to change. I couldn’t just rely on Sensei or Kakashi to save the day, or even to take care of themselves. So obviously, I was going to have to pick up the slack.

And when training resumed and both Kakashi and I were taken off medical probation, I damn well signed that summoning scroll.

Tsuruya is the new girl’s name, by the way. She’s a passenger-flight-capable battle crane with feathers like swords.
We started running messenger and scouting missions that month.

Chapter End Notes

And I could hear the thunder and see the lightning crack
All around the world was waking, I never could go back
Cause all the walls of dreaming, they were torn wide open
And finally it seemed that the spell was broken

And all my bones began to shake, my eyes flew open
And all my bones began to shake, my eyes flew open

No more dreaming of the dead as if death itself was undone
No more calling like a crow for a boy, for a body in the garden
No more dreaming like a girl so in love, so in love
No more dreaming like a girl so in love, so in love
No more dreaming like a girl so in love with the wrong world

~ Florence and the Machine's "Blinding"
Intermission: Preptime

Chapter Summary

Kei: Devolve.

Shaking off that negative mindset took a while. I’m naturally prone to brooding, which doesn’t help when the problem is all in the mind, and being forced to relive Kannabi thanks to Inoshi’s jutsu and the memory swarm going berserk didn’t help much. I didn’t blame him for it—Fugaku had asked for the account, after all—but it was still unpleasant and the effects clung.

Suffice to say that that period of my life is not one I especially want to revisit.

But I had something concrete to do, which helped.

Having missed my first chance to prevent the rise of the interim Big Bad before Madara would appear, I decided to focus on the second option.

Intervening on the second botched-as-fuck mission required precise timing that, frankly, I didn’t really have—the image of Obito post-squashing and pre-Kannabi was different enough to imply a several-month hiatus before things went to hell. Once Rin got kidnapped—which I only knew about because the characters had talked about it, not because I’d seen the scene—there was a limited timeframe in which anyone could intervene. Sensei certainly wasn’t going to be available. I didn’t even know if I was going to be around, since Kakashi had been the only one who had responded before.

I didn’t have much time or much information.

So… I made do.

Sensei had finally given me all of the scrolls supplied by the Chinatsugumi—basic elemental ninjutsu, fūinjutsu, and the crane summoning scroll.

Somewhat unsurprisingly, I’d torn open that last one and signed it immediately with both spellings of my name, with Sensei standing over my shoulder in case something went wrong. Training Ground Three was perfect for our purposes, given the wide-open clearings and nearby water in case the crane was interested in wading.

The resulting explosion of smoke revealed an oversized crane—red spot on the forehead, white wings with black secondary feathers, long black legs, and a black streak running from its lower beak to the back of the base of its neck. It had the wingspan of a large hang-glider or a very small airplane, and stood taller than Sasuke’s hawk summon would ever be. It was looking down its long gray beak at Sensei and I, then bowed with a flourish.

“I am Tsuruya,” it—she—said in a distinctly female voice. She sounded a little like how I imagined Mito Uzumaki’s would; calm, and full of wisdom. “I ask of you: Are you my master?”

“Yes,” I said. “I am Keisuke Gekkō of Konohagakure.” Sensei poked me. “Do you have a test I need to pass before I can summon you in battle?”
If it was down to drinking contests and endurance tests, like Gamabunta would ask of Naruto in the future, I’d have to pass.

Tsuruya seemed to smile, despite her lack of lips. “No. What is your command?”

I paused. “…For right now, I want to know what you can do.”

What followed was something like a weapons test.

Tsuruya leapt skyward, swooping upward on the barest gust of wind. While summons that could use various forms of elemental manipulation weren’t uncommon—just look at Temari’s personal summon, for example—I hadn’t seen one in person. Tsuruya was using some kind of Wind Release technique in order to make herself more maneuverable in the air.

Sensei and I had set up straw targets in advance, either anticipating a practice spar after dismal failure or the need for convenient things to shoot at. Tsuruya flapped twice to stall her progress, then nearly slammed her wings together in the general direction of the targets.

There was a controlled rain of feathers that sounded like Tenten had set up shop.

“Her secondary feathers are made of steel!” I nearly squeaked in glee, picking up a feather that had landed near us. Oh, I could wreak so much havoc with this power…

“Close.” Tsuruya said, flying back over to us. She tilted her head. “Tell me, Keisuke-sama, do you know anything of kenjutsu?”

“Yes, I do. I…” I paused again, feeling myself freeze up, and a shadow crossed Sensei’s face. Then, “I used to have a kodachi. I haven’t gotten a new sword yet.”

Tsuruya nodded. “Then, when you do find a new sword, I can spar with you.”

“…I’ll have to clear that with my mother, first.” I admitted. “But I’m sure you two will get along just fine.”

“I’d recommend you introduce Tsuruya-san to Kakashi, too.” Sensei suggested. At the curious look the crane gave us, he added, “Her teammate. I assume you’re familiar with the team structures of shinobi nations?”

“I may be a little rusty in that regard.” Tsuruya commented, and I had the feeling that that phrase meant more to her than to either of us. She bobbed her head and folded her wings against her sides. “Keisuke-sama, I am willing to meet with anyone you wish.”

“Well, uh…” I looked at Sensei. “Do you mind getting Kakashi to come here? I don’t think I’m allowed to let a battle summon walk through Konoha.”

“I could always fly.” Tsuruya suggested.

“I’ll bring him here.” Sensei agreed, and poofed out of the clearing.

…Typical.

“So, what do you like to do?” I asked Tsuruya as the huge crane decided to sit down on the nearby riverbank, folding her legs underneath her.

“Hm? I enjoy reading poetry, if I have the chance.” Tsuruya said, “Along with swordplay and silk-weaving.”
“How do you weave?” I asked. I had a theory, mostly because I’d played Okamiden in a certain significant past life, and could notice mythological references when they were shoved in my face. Also, I wasn’t sure if she used her feet or her beak to manipulate the cloth—unless she had the third option of Donald Duck digits.

“That is a secret.”

Of course it was.

“And you, Keisuke-sama? What do you do?” Tsuruya asked.

For a moment, I was stumped. I was about to say that I liked reading books, or that I enjoyed feeding stray animals, or hanging out with my friends. I…just hadn’t done a lot of any of those, recently. Oh, Kakashi and I were training partners when he wasn’t getting caught up in some jōnin thing or another, and Rin and I certainly practiced medical ninjutsu and experimental use of chakra projections, but the fun had gone out of things.

I spent a lot of time practicing seals and jutsu on my own, now. I couldn’t even remember the last time I’d gotten to spend a worry-free moment doing something entirely mundane. I had too much to do to prepare for Obito’s possible return.

For fuck’s sake, I wasn’t even sure if he would.

I shrugged, and Tsuruya let me get away with that.

As it happened, Sensei didn’t show up for another half-hour, which was something of a record in tardiness for him. By that point, I had progressed to sitting next to my new summon animal with the Chinatsugumi ninjutsu scroll unrolled on the ground in front of us. Even if Tsuruya couldn’t use any of the techniques from the scroll, due mostly to lacking hands, it gave us something to do.

We didn’t talk that much.

Though I think Tsuruya was already developing this habit of poking me in the head with her beak, sort of like Sensei seemed to think I was some kind of dog when he wasn’t paying attention. I was convinced I had some kind of magnet in my head by the time I’d spent five minutes with her.

Sensei was accompanied by both a grumpy-looking Kakashi, slung under his arm like a sack of rice, and a cloud of paperwork that fluttered to the ground at their landing point.

Which was basically me.

Yes, my teammates landed basically on top of me and Tsuruya, who made a furious squawking noise.

After we all managed to get our limbs sorted out and Tsuruya stopped muttering about bent feathers, I also got to remove the paper that was stuck to my face.

“We’re back.” Sensei announced unnecessarily, dropping Kakashi. “And I have news.

“Good news or bad news?” I asked.

“…Both, sort of?” Sensei tilted his head.

I winced.
“On one hand...I know it hasn’t been long since Kannabi.” Sensei told me, in a low voice that I was sure everyone heard anyway. “But the Council wants both of you back on the mission roster as soon as possible. We can’t afford to have you on the sidelines.”

“Yeah, I get that.” I said, looking at Kakashi instead of Sensei.

Kakashi’s visible eye was closed, and he didn’t feel especially happy either.

“I’ve managed to narrow down some of the options.” Sensei explained, indicating the paper everywhere. Both Kakashi and I helped Sensei gather them. Sensei rubbed the back of his neck. “Hopefully, you can work with a couple.”

I spotted Rin’s name on the sheet sticking out of the back.

“Is Rin-chan an option?” I asked. I didn’t really want to hear a positive answer in that case.

Sensei gave me a strange look, then realized where my eyes were.

…I wasn’t really sure what response Sensei wanted out of me. On one hand, Rin was my friend and very nearly a sister to me.

On the other, it was another reminder of what had happened to Obito.

On a third hand, putting Rin on our team put us at risk. Mostly her, yes, but I still would have been happier if it’d been Gai. I could at least trust Gai to kick his way out of basically anything—I wasn’t even sure Rin had been taking combat missions recently.

(Well, okay, as a medic-nin she wasn’t supposed to be in the thick of things anyway, but still.)

“I… I’m not entirely sure about that. By all accounts she’s a brilliant medic-nin, and you both know her well enough.” Sensei frowned. “But Rin was just as close to Obito as any of us. It might not be a good choice to stick her in our team, even if Yamaguchi would allow it.”

“Then who is?” But when I said that, Kakashi looked over his shoulder as though he expected someone else to show up in a “speak of the devil and he shall appear” sense.

Sensei replied, “Gai, probably. Well, assuming that the paperwork goes through.”

…Well. Speak of the devil indeed.

I cleared my throat. “Anyway—Kakashi, this is my summon, Tsuruya.”

Tsuruya interrupted her meticulous rearranging of her flight feathers to give my teammates a respectful nod. Then she went right back to what she’d been doing.

I went on, “Uh, could you introduce your dogs, Kakashi? It’s best if we all know who’s who on the battlefield and not find out at the worst possible time.”

“Right.” Kakashi said. He pulled a kunai from his holster and pricked his thumb—I doubt Kakashi would ever be the kind of shinobi to use his teeth. Then, “Summoning Jutsu.”

And a lot of smoke.

And then eight dogs of varying growth levels and sizes.

“Kei-chan!” Pakkun said.
…Um.

Sensei and I looked at Kakashi.

Kakashi looked away. He said to the dogs, “Pakkun, Bull, Ühei, Guruko, Bisuke, Urushi, Shiba, Akino, meet Tsuruya.”

Neither dog pack nor giant crane said anything for a moment.

Then, Tsuruya stretched one wing out. “You…are all adorable.”

Nice to see that Tsuruya and I had something else in common. The dogs swarmed her, with the smaller three climbing onto her back and Bull, in particular, nudging his way under her wing and against her side.

…Well, anyway, that’s the story of how a pack of ninja-dogs ended up befriending a giant not-yellow bird, and also the story of how my giant bird friend ended up with eight furry babies to brood over. Even if they weren’t actually puppies anymore and the entirely wrong genus was involved.

I happen to think that her favorite dog was either Bull or Pakkun. Bull, because he was a mobile heater even when only halfway to his full size. And Pakkun, because that dog is the one that talks the most.

---

Current research into barrier seals indicates the unmitigated superiority of a multi-pronged structure, activated by multiple users. According to Kimato and Ryujin (56), a single seal collapses under the weight of a single B-ranked elemental ninjutsu of the appropriate counter-type, inhibiting attacker momentum and chakra transfer by 25% at maximum allotted power…

Over the next month, I increased my study of seals and continued to train myself into the ground. I was neglecting kenjutsu a bit, despite discovering that Tsuruya could fight Mom almost on an even keel. As I hadn’t been able to afford a replacement kodachi yet, it seemed to be a lower priority than ninjutsu and fūinjutsu training. Kakashi and I beat the crap out of each other on a nigh-daily basis, and I remember bringing Gai and Rin to separate days just to see how we all fared.

…Suffice to say that Gai did a hell of a lot better than I did. Rin inevitably did worse. We still went on missions anyway.

I admit to being less than focused. I had my own issues. Which, for a reason that is not much of a reason in hindsight, I didn’t really talk about to anyone.

How am I supposed to prep all the seals I might need?

The sealing scroll the Chinatsugumi had sent me had a lot of interesting ideas. Something called the Red Strength Blood Seal looked like it had plenty of battle potential and that it might have been similar to what the Kasai twins used for their chakra suppression. There was also a much less chakra-intensive version of what was called the Evil Sealing Method—a seal slapped on top of unwanted effects, like the Curse Seal of Heaven or maybe someone’s troublesome kekkei genkai. Then there was what looked like a version of the Chakra-Suppressing Seal, strong enough to use even on a Naruto busy going berserk under the influence of four tails’ worth of chakra. Hell, there was even a compacted version of a barrier seal, which I thought was definitely a thing I needed to look into.

And not one of them was the kind of technique I could sustain with my own chakra levels as low as they were. And they weren’t designed to be used collaboratively.
I chewed on my thumb, staring at the scrolls spread out over my bed-sheets. I could probably find a workaround with the Chakra-Suppressing Seal, if only because the drat thing was similar in form to the explosive tags I was so fond of, but the rest would be tricky. Half of the effectiveness of the Evil Sealing Method was the strength put into it by the user, not to mention the intense prep-work for a non-paper seal.

I would definitely need to talk to Sensei about these ones. Even if he asked me why the hell I’d need to know any of them—all of them were probably too advanced for basic chūnin missions.

The confounding variable was the fact that we wouldn’t be facing normal missions. Normal missions were for people who didn’t attract danger like flies to honey. Normal missions didn’t involve the possibility that someone would come home with an additional hundred-meter passenger in their head—though, granted, I don’t think that rescuing Rin had really been a mission in any official sense.

…I hoped that the Evil Sealing Method provided by the Chinatsugumi would be enough to suppress the Three-Tailed Beast’s will. Or that the Chakra-Suppressing Seal would be. I didn’t know which would work, but hopefully I was covering all my bases.

I rubbed my eyes.

No more excuses.

I’d prepare everything I could get Sensei to approve me to carry. Everything I could explain to Kakashi in four sentences or less, if I even needed to. I’d make at least a mock up of every seal I knew. I’d train, I’d bring Tsuruya around to meet everyone I cared about, and I would strangle Fate as thoroughly as possible.

I couldn’t plan for everything that could possible happen, but I could damn well try.

I threw myself into my work.

I think that Kei-chan isn’t coping well. She doesn’t talk as much anymore, and when I see her she’s always very pale, like she hasn’t been outside very often. I overheard her mother talking about how little she’s eating, and her brother doesn’t seem very happy either. We lost Obito, but…none of us seem to have any direction anymore, least of all her.

I don’t know what to do.

Akihito-shishō isn’t being very helpful. He keeps saying that Kei-chan needs to work out her own problems, and rise above them. I’ve asked Kakashi, and he doesn’t know what to do any more than I do. His sensei doesn’t help much either. Gai, Kurenai-chan, and Asuma don’t really know her the same way I do.

No one seems to understand what Kei is doing to herself. This isn’t like her. She’s getting more and more secretive, and she loses herself in whatever work she’s doing.

I’m scared.

---

BONUS SECTION:

=>> Be the androgynous moron.

Your name is KEISUKE GEKKŌ.
You are a REINCARNATED ADULT in a CHILD’S BODY. You are KIND OF A NINJA but also kind of not, since you are sure that ACTUAL NINJAS are better at their jobs than you are. This NOT-TIME-TRAVEL BULLSHIT is not helping your STATE OF MIND because you were normal, once. You had normal inspirations that did not involve SEALING DEMON GODS INTO THINGS. You still use sarcasm as a DEFENSE MECHANISM because your sense of humor is terrible and because RAGING OUT is not a valid move.

You are NOT SURE what you’re supposed to be doing aside from ADAPTING because you have a tendency toward PROCRASTINATING LIKE A BOSS. Before you were reborn, you had DREAMS about being a BADASS BITCH that you never lived up to because you were a GIGANTIC NINNY. You are still that way, but not as much, because your life choices will KILL YOU if you let them.

You know you have HELLS OF ISSUES and that you are not getting past them. Your BEST FRIEND is kind of dead or something, because your life is not complete without some agonizing over SCHRODINGER’S NINJA. You are making a plan for a WORST-CASE SCENARIO because you are not dumb enough to believe THINGS WILL BE OKAY.

You are TERRIBLE AT PLANNING. If this BLOWS UP IN YOUR FACE, you can’t say you’ll be surprised.

(You kind of get the impression that YOUR WRITER HATES YOU.)
===> Be the Cute Medic.
Your name is RIN NOHARA, and you are currently FREAKING OUT.

I normally have nothing to do with the front lines, ever. That was one of the things Akihito-shishō promised me, back when I first decided to take him up on his offer to join the Medic Corps. I would have a safe space to perfect my medical ninjutsu, and never have to worry about fighting anyone other than my fellow apprentices.

But by joining Kei and Obito’s team to take on the Chunin Exams, I think I might have jinxed myself. Or them. I don’t know. Did they have insane missions before I joined? If so, neither of them really said anything to me about it.

Oh, that just makes me worry more.

Working in the medical tents isn’t so bad, really, but I keep turning around thinking the next body they drag in will belong to someone I know.

Nothing yet.

…I also worry, just a bit, that the next person to come through the tent flap will be an enemy. I’m the best out of my group at the hospital when it comes to dodging, but the medical tents are rather small compared to the fields we practice in.

I also know some things that aren’t…well, Kei figured them out, but I’m not sure if that means anyone else knows how to overclock chakra scalpels. At least, that’s what she called it.

They’re really good for peeling oranges, too.

My mind is still wandering a little, under stress, when the next person opens the tent flap.

“Still hanging in there, Rin-chan?” asks Kei.

“As best I can, Kei-senpai.” I tell her, popping the joints in my hands one at a time. It’s very tedious to stay in the same position all afternoon, and my back is also aching. “How was patrol?”

“Paranoia-inducing.” Kei says. “With just me and Kakashi on this run, it started to feel like Kumo-nin were waiting behind every bush.”

“But they weren’t?” I mean, it didn’t seem like she was hurt…

“Not a one.” Kei shrugs, crossing her arms over her chest. “Honestly, it’s making me edgy.”

I frown. “I think that not encountering any enemies would be a good thing.”

“But we know they’re out there.” Kei blows out an angry breath. For a moment, it looks like she’s going to say something else, but she shakes her head. “Look, just keep your guard up.”
“We’re so far back from the front lines, we should be safe.” I point out.

Kei blinks. “…Two of the people confirmed on the enemy’s line are A and B. You know, the Third Raikage’s sons?”

“Well, I still think you and Kakashi should be all right.” I say, though it sounds hollow even to me.

“Yeah, well.” Kei mumbles, and trails off. She sits down on an empty, though slightly bloodstained cot, and pinches the bridge of her nose.

After a moment, I go back to rolling bandages. I may be a certified apprentice medic-nin, but there are plenty of people in the field who aren’t going to be anywhere near a medic when they get hurt. If we have any idle time at all, the field medic in charge is very clear about our orders to keep busy. I can think and talk while rolling bandages, while I’m not sure everyone can.

Kei isn’t an accredited medic by any means, but I think that she’s good enough for emergency response. I…just don’t know if I would really trust her in surgery. She might not have the chakra capacity for that (and to be fair, neither do I. I just work better with my fellow medics after years of knowing them and their chakra).

But sometimes, I wonder if the stress of being a medic-nin would be good for either of us in the long term. Kei doesn’t look like she’s slept very well since…well, since Obito’s death, and I know I’m not feeling on top of things. It feels like every time I have to rest or take a break, the future slips through my fingers.

And if I feel that way, chances are someone’s dying.

Kei takes off her hitai-ate—Obito’s, because she hasn’t gotten a bandanna replacement or remounted the metal plate—and re-ties it around her neck. Then she runs both hands through her hair, ruffling everything as though she had fur instead of sweat-spiked black hair.

“Me ‘n Kakashi are heading out again in ten, Rin-chan.” Kei mumbles.

“Isn’t that too soon?” I ask.

“Probably is, but…” Kei pauses, and both of us hear the sound of muffled screaming. We wince together. “Traps along patrol routes mean not everyone’s going to be able to run a second one.”

I purse my lips. “You should do your best to stay safe, not to run the fastest.”

Kei nods.

“Where’s Kakashi?” I ask.

“Reporting,” she shrugs. “Probably getting something to eat while he can.”

I tilt my head to the side, struck by an interesting thought. “Um…Kei-senpai, have you ever seen his face?”

Kei pauses. Then she shrugs again. “…Nope.”

“Really? But you’ve been his teammate for years.” I…kind of want to know what’s under Kakashi’s mask that he’s so afraid to show. A cleft palate? Fish lips? Buck teeth?

“Yeah, and it never really came up. Kakashi and I have whole conversations by not actually saying anything.”
That…is really very odd.

“Shouldn’t you want to know your teammate better?” I ask.

“Yeah.” Kei says, looking away. I hear her mumble something that sounds like a meaningless string of syllables, but don’t ask about it.

Then, while Kei is starting to nod off while sitting up, the tent flap opens. I look up.

It’s Kakashi.

“Kei.” Kakashi says sharply, ignoring me.

“What,” Kei says in a tone that doesn’t even really sound like a question. She sounds grumpy.

“We have our new route.”

“Additional squadmates?” Kei asks.

“None.”

It’s a very terse conversation, almost like they don’t like to talk at all. It’s really kind of sad.

“Stay safe, you two.” I say quietly.

Very briefly, Kakashi nods at me. So does Kei. Then they exchange looks and head out together.

I go back to rolling bandages and hope that they won’t be the next ones to need them.

Eventually, I get away from bandage duty. While rolling linen is all fine and good, I think my fingers really can’t take any more today. Oriko, a green-haired, bespectacled medic-nin who has to be at least nineteen, takes over for me instead, and I’m just glad that it’s over.

I hear Oriko make a hilarious squeaking noise when she realizes how much linen still has to be turned into supplies, but I have no intention of heading back. About the only thing more boring is working in the Konoha Hospital’s laundry room. Sorry, Oriko-san, but I really don’t want to have anything more to do with chores today.

I make my way to the mess tent, such that it is—we haven’t got very much in terms of utilities out here. I mean, there’s a command center and Ryusei Kiyotaka (tall, lanky blue-haired man with sunglasses) is probably manning the desk for the third time this week despite being in charge, and a weapon’s tent and a medical tent, but…well, we’re a small forward base. I haven’t seen anyone more famous than a minor Yamanaka clan member out here so far.

It’s been a dull week.

We’re just far enough back from the combat lines that we avoid enemy action, and close enough that the injured can be brought back from the brink if their medical escort runs the whole way. Other than an awful lot of injuries, we haven’t seen hide nor hair of the enemy. Our scouts do, and often, but no one’s been stupid enough to attack a forward military base with a scouting patrol. At least, so far.

I’m just sitting down, trying to figure out how to make a bowl of plain rice more appetizing, when furious barking splits the wary silence over the camp.

Everyone immediately jumps to attention. I ditch my bowl of rice and try to track the sound, only it’s coming from two—three—directions at once.

Then a small brown blur rounds the corner and darts to the command tent. I catch a glimpse of a hitai-ate and a blue vest, and it immediately makes me think of Kakashi. That dog is followed shortly by a larger hound with brown ears and a white muzzle, and then a third dog with spiked fur along his head.

They’re all Kakashi’s dogs, but where—?

The base siren starts going off, and suddenly everyone is armed.

The nearest jōnin—Junpei Akasaka, twice the size of every other man in camp and outrageously mustached—waves me away since I’m in the open and unarmed except for my chakra scalpels. He has a pair of curved kunai, painted stealth-black, and his eyes are on the direction the dogs came from.

Something explodes in the distance, throwing a massive cloud of dust into the air over the tree-line. Just as the debris almost reaches the edge of camp, two figures burst into view. I can recognize Kakashi immediately, and he’s moving faster than I’ve ever seen him, with a fourth dog—huge and jet-black, with a wrinkled face and massive jowls—just barely a step ahead. Gripping his trailing hand like a lifeline…that’s Kei.

Even from this distance, I can tell she’s not moving correctly.

Junpei surges forward as I skip back, trying to get a bead on whatever’s following them.

Kakashi shoots past Junpei with Kei in tow, not stopping, and other shinobi move to reinforce the older jōnin.

It isn’t until he reaches me that he slows down. Kei lands on her back first, legs giving out briefly, then rolls to a stop. She glares up at us both, but mostly Kakashi.

“Paralytic gas,” he says, eyes already back on the impending fight.

All right, I know how to deal with that. “Skin contact?”

“No, inhalant.” Kakashi begins to make seals, and I can’t see who he’s staring at. I’m busy pulling on a pair of gloves just in case.

…Maybe the dust cloud is hiding some kind of genjutsu? He has Obito’s eye out…

“Kiri?” I jolt, whipping around to find Base Commander Ryusei looking at Kakashi speculatively.

“Yes, from their hitai-ate and uniforms.” Kakashi says shortly.

As though on some kind of cue, four forms shoot out of the smoke and dust. Junpei cut one down immediately with a Wind jutsu, and three of Kakashi’s dogs latch onto the second, bringing him back down to earth with tooth and claw. I look away, back to Kei, who looks more and more unhappy with the situation the longer she can’t move.

“Just hold still, Kei-senpai. We’ll be able to get you back into the fight in no time.” I tell her, bringing up a diagnostic jutsu. First off, the paralytic seems to be plant-based…

Kei makes a noise that tells me what she thinks of my word choice.

“Get her out of here.” Kakashi snaps, once Ryusei darts forward to assist Junpei. How are there enough Kiri-nin to be a viable threat? Isn’t this supposed to be a patrol area? How could they amass this many shinobi without us knowing?

“Got it, Kakashi-kun.” I reply, and grab Kei’s arms. I can’t carry her outright, and she doesn’t seem to be capable of helping…

Kakashi gives a grunt and charges, hands sparking with white lightning.

“I can help!”

I turn, spotting green braids just in time. The other medic’s sense of timing was perfect. She also had more upper-body strength than I did, which was going to work out well. “Oriko-chan, thank you!”

“It’s no problem,” Oriko picked Kei up without any hesitation. I saw Kei make a face as best she could, but as long as she couldn’t move at least she wouldn’t start yelling at Oriko or anyone else.

“You’ll be fine, Kei-senpai.” I say as calmly as I can. “I might not have the tools to help here, but I’ll be fetching supplies. You’ll be fine before you know it!”

…Well, if the backup medical tent wasn’t across camp, I think it would be faster just to fish the paralysis on the spot. But since the main one had all the vital supplies and the Kiri-nin and our shinobi were duking it out almost in the foyer…well.

Resolve made, I dart around the fighting to look for the crate of antitoxin. I am pretty small—Kakashi, Kei and I are the youngest here, and I’m only a chūnin on loan from the hospital, after all—so I usually can move around mostly unnoticed. There’s a lot of noise, but as long as I’m not in the thick of things I’ll be fine.

And…oh no.

A Kiri-nin corners me almost immediately.

I’m…not a bad fighter, exactly? But I’m certainly not the best, and there’s a reason for that. Most of them center around the role of a medic-nin on any team of mixed range combat shinobi. I remember the tenets of being a medic-nin clear as day:

First clause: No medic ninja shall ever stop medical treatment until the lives of their party members have come to an end.

Second clause: No medic ninja shall ever stand on the front lines.

Third clause: No medic ninja shall ever die until they are the last of their platoon.

Fourth clause: Only those medic ninja who have mastered the Strength of a Hundred Technique of the ninja art Creation Rebirth are permitted to discard the above-mentioned laws.

I put almost all of my training time into evasion as a result. Between Kei and Akihito-shishō and even some training with Kurenai-chan, I could dodge better than even my shinobi rank implied.

I duck under the Kiri-nin’s swipe almost as an afterthought, before feinting left and leaping right an instant later. Barehanded…what is he trying to pull? Can he use chakra scalpels too?

Well, if he can, I’m almost certain he can’t do what I can with them.

Kei may get easily frustrated with herself, but she can teach willing students just fine. I understand chakra manipulation theory a different way than she does, but we both get to the same place eventually.

I create a chakra scalpel—seal-less, like Akihito-shisho insists—that sprouts seven invisible centimeters past my fingertips, and slash down.

The Kiri-nin howls in pain.

Kei taught me how to do the same thing with my elbows, but there’s no way I’m letting him get that close.

And then a huge black bulldog lands on him and kind of…eats his face.

…I just sort of scurry off. I don’t want to know what Kakashi’s been teaching his dogs to do.

As the fighting starts to die down—mostly because there are a lot of dead bodies around, oh man—I make my way back over to the backup field hospital. The antitoxin comes in the form of a saline bag—I mean, the human body will fight things like that off eventually. It’s just a question of giving a little more protection to nerve endings, like dealing with snake venom neurotoxin sans some of the urgency. The oxygen supply in the backup tent should be okay for everything else…

But when I do make it to the tent, it’s empty.

Shelves are all in order, nothing amiss…but there aren’t any people around.

I look down.

Oriko-chan hadn’t been wearing her glasses, when I saw her. Now I know why. And why I hadn’t seen any other medic-nin moving through the camp.

It’s hard to remember to wear glasses when they’re snapped at the bridge.

Or when one’s head is twisted all the way around.

Or when my fellow medic-apprentice has been replaced by some kind of shape-changing imposter.

Something explodes nearby and I have to turn away from the corpse, trying to push the image out of my head and do something.

“Nohara, we’re leaving.” Kakashi says out of nowhere, and I jolt again. How does everyone keep sneaking up on me?

“Where—?” I begin, but Kakashi shakes his head.

“No time.” And Kakashi grabs my arm and we’re off.

“I know, Pakkun has her trail.” Kakashi snaps. “Now we run or we both die.”

We run.

I just…kind of sit there in the trees for a minute once we’re out of the line of fire. The camp is on fire and everyone’s scattered, trying to make sense of the attack and regroup, but there are secondary explosions and attacks going off all over the place. I can feel myself start to shake—nervous shock, I can diagnose that even in myself—and signal for Kakashi to start explaining what the hell happened.

He clearly doesn’t want to sit still to do it, but…I can’t. Can’t do things right now.

He whistles, high and clear despite his mask, and a fifth dog (…why is it wearing sunglasses?) barks up at us from the ground.

“Akino, get Bisuke and Ūhei. Find Sensei and tell him what happened here.” Kakashi tells him, glancing around to find the other canines.

“You got it!” Akino barks back, “But shouldn’t someone go after Kei-chan with you?”

“I’ll take Pakkun and Bull.” Kakashi replies. “Tell the other three to stay here.”

Akino barks a third time and runs off. The camp’s in pieces and who knows how many of our comrades are dead, but Kakashi just keeps going. I don’t know if Ryusei is dead or if he’s hurt but if anyone should be able to do something, I should, right? Kakashi just doesn’t seem to be thinking of that, though.

…He’s going after Kei. Oh god.

“We can’t leave!” I say, and oh is that ever the wrong thing to say.

“Nohara, our base has been destroyed. We can’t stay.” Kakashi argues. He kneels next to me, eyes narrowed and tone harsh. “Until we can regroup, it’s against anything like regulations to stay in an area that’s already been hit by what looks like Wood Release and high-grade explosives.”

But that can’t…

I can’t…

I can’t stay here. We have no idea what enemy forces will be linking up with patrols and investigating. I’ve never been in the field except for the time I took the Chūnin Exams. I can tell that I’m not suited for it, not now. I should be somewhere safe so…so Kakashi can go on his rescue mission.

Even thinking that makes me feel bad, despite how useless I might be.

But Kei…

Then, “I’m going with you.”

Kakashi blinks, taken aback. “What?”

“If Kei-senpai is hurt, you won’t be able to move her without medical help,” I say, and look down at the camp. “And I can’t stay here, like you said.”

Kakashi goes silent, weighing options. I don’t know what kinds of things he’s thinking of. I hope it’s not Obito.

“Then keep up.” Kakashi says.
Minato: Get mad.

I am the fastest man alive.

That’s what people tell me, at any rate. I know that there’s a difference between speed and speed.

Teleportation is one thing. Specifically, it’s my specialty. Most people can’t fight it effectively, or mimic the split-second timing that is required to fight using space-time ninjutsu. Lightning-powered battle armor in the vein of the Third Raikage’s is another thing entirely. The Eight-Tailed Beast’s chakra cloak is an out-of-human-context and nearly unique conundrum. Fighting both with no backup is a situation that I’ve actually been in twice.

This is the second time.

This particular stretch of forest is about fifteen kilometers from the nearest field hospital. I should know—between my jutsu requirements and the fact that Kakashi and Kei are both stationed there, it’d be remiss of me to forget. High-speed shinobi can cross that distance in a short enough time that I was asked to join the interception squad. Kumogakure in particular has a lot of them, so it made sense to put myself on the front line.

The last two confrontations have been inconclusive, with no casualties on either side. I doubt anyone in B’s squad is dead, or else he probably would have tried to attack in spite of operational sense by now. His brother might be there to hold him back, but Tailed Beast hosts can be unpredictable and occasionally as unstoppable as the sea.

I should know. Kushina told me what she was when we were fifteen, even if she didn’t demonstrate the Nine-Tailed Fox’s power, and I haven’t looked back since.

Gaku Inuzuka stands in a ready crouch with his huge brown partner, Aomaru, fifteen meters behind me. Kurojō Furude and Dōtō Akimichi are five meters from him on each side, fanning out in a roughly triangular formation. I’m on point, turning the triangle into a diamond. Under normal conditions, we would be long gone, and Aomaru would be in the lead instead.

We’re only not moving because we’ve run into a Kumogakure group.

Just our luck that A and B are both here, I think dryly.

At least both Kumo-nin are probably going to focus on me. Perks of being famous, I suppose.

A and B are both twenty kilograms heavier than me in terms of muscle mass, at least. Dark-skinned and white-haired, they’re both wearing the Kumogakure single-shouldered white flak jacket. B’s white hair is covered by a white-backed Kumogakure hitai-ate, and he wears sunglasses that don’t quite suit the locale. I can see the Iron Seal on his right shoulder, but I just make a note about it. While the seal would be a massive weak spot if I was willing to risk releasing the Eight-Tailed Beast, it would be better to save that particular last-ditch effort for another time.

A is actually bigger than B, with a narrow strip of cloth rather than a bandanna, and his hair is slicked back over his head and down his neck. Going by the new gauntlet-bracer combination he’s wearing, I have to be careful that he doesn’t land a punch. It looks like he could knock me either flatter than dead or right through a tree. From what I remember, though, he doesn’t have the same hole-punching power that his father’s Hell Stab did.

At least Wind beats Lightning.

“Yellow hair and the Body Flicker jutsu,” says the third Kumo-nin. “No two ways about it—that’s the Yellow Flash! They say escape’s the only option with him.”

…One of these days, I’m going to have to sit down with someone from either Iwa or Kumo and ask why everyone seems to mistake the Flying Thunder God jutsu for the Body Flicker one.

A, sounding much calmer than his compatriot, says, “So, he’s the shinobi that stopped the Nine-Tails abduction mission singlehandedly.”

While I know I’ve actually foiled more dastardly plots in my career than most people have fingers, I was thirteen then. People in other villages really don’t keep up with the news much.

“You’re the Raikage’s son, then—A the Unruly.” I say, utterly calm. “Rumors say you’re quick on your feet.”

B, crouching somewhat further back and with two red-handled blades in his hands, puts in, “If Bro and I are together, we can take ya, ya dumbass phony.”

“Nobody move,” I order my teammates, Flying Thunder God kunai raised. None of them need to risk getting into a fight here, particularly with these two Kumo-nin. “Leave them to me.”

My other hand, though, slips into my hip pouch. In an instant, my special kunai are out and in the air, embedding deep into bark and soil all around us.

My eyes narrow, and lightning explodes around A like an aura. Crackling blue chakra lights up the clearing, making the shadows dance strangely. Lightning Armor…hm. Perhaps his father had passed on more than expected. Whether this has any bearing on the man’s mastery of Black Lightning, well, I can’t say. Either way, he should be a difficult opponent.

I can hear Aomaru whine, briefly, and then the ball drops.
A charges, leaving a trail of chakra that raises the hair on the back of my neck even ten meters off. He’s certainly fast, too.

I watch his approach without blinking, simultaneously feeling and seeing his fist headed right for the bridge of my nose.

Fwish.

I pull a Flying Thunder God kunai out of a branch. A keeps going in a straight line for a while, back on the ground.

I stab downward, practically curled into a ball and lashing out with all the force my uncoiling body can muster.

And my momentum meets tentacle instead of A’s back. A is bashed out of the way, and I cut halfway through the slippery, rubbery mass before my momentum stops.

It at least confirms without a doubt that B is the Eight-Tailed Beast’s host. I know it already, but it also reduces the chance that my teammates will jump in. No one wants to face off with a demon host with the ability to manifest tails. It always implies the ability to manifest other things.

“No way…” Dōtō mumbles, sounding numb with shock.

“That tail…that has to be the Eight-Tailed host!” Gaku growls, and Aomaru mimics his partner’s low tone.

Well, it’s not as though it could be the Two-Tailed Beast. It hasn’t made an appearance yet, but everyone who follows historical records knows that Kumogakure was given two Beasts to Konoha, Taki, and Suna’s one apiece.

I lay my hand on the tentacle, transferring the tiniest possible amount of chakra necessary to create a Flying Thunder God seal unnoticed, and then warp out of the way before B shifts.

“Sorry, B. That was a mistake.” A says, rejoining his combat partner.

A shrill metallic whistle slices through the air, and Gaku shouts, “That’s the retreat signal!”

I pause, briefly. Does the Kumo patrol still plan to attack? I don’t know enough about A’s personality to say for sure. They are not under orders to cease hostilities and break away.

Then a second whistle sounds.

Retreat/regroup; attack warning.

I have a Flying Thunder God tag on the camp. I could warp over and see what was wrong, but that could mean running right into an ambush if I’m not careful.

And still, Gaku says, “Minato, we’ve got to fall back for now!”

Thankfully, the other three (and Aomaru) leave before the Kumo-nin can decide to attack anyway. I gather up what kunai I can—sometimes, it’s easier to warp them to me rather than the other way around—before turning to cover my team’s retreat.

“That’s nothing,” B says, and I glance back. "Learn it by rote. I'm Killer B and the Hachibi's my high note."
Well, I can't let that go unanswered. From what I've seen, there's a lot more to B than what he's implying. There's something a little sad about seeming to consider the Tailed Beast his only selling point. I say, "Your valor is most impressive. Not as the Hachibi, but as a shinobi, it seems you possess something very powerful."

The tentacle moves, retreating as B pulls the beast's power back.

A points at B, sounding at once proud and threatening, "If you're talking talent, he's even better than me."

Hah. No. Why do shinobi always seem to think that battlefield strength is the key? That way leads to megalomania. "No, that's not it. He already has something more important than that."

The tentacle is still moving. On some level, I still expect one of them to notice the seal. Their teammate, meanwhile, seems to be a non-factor in this confrontation.

A is staring at me.

He doesn't get it.

I stare back, eyes narrowing slightly. "A. You have good friends and a family. I do, too." Kushina, Sensei, Kakashi, Kei… I hope they're all safe. I can't fail them again. "Either way, when we meet next, we'll probably both have the title of Kage." I hope he improves his attitude by then, or else works with B as a person more. Flawed as my own approach to team-building may be, I have no interest in seeing other people fail. A seems like he could be a great Raikage, but he needs to work on a few things. "If you don't realize soon what's important to your brother, you'll lose him both as a jinchūriki and as a person."

I've said my piece. I hope he takes it to heart.

Then, "You can try to confuse us with your blathering, but I won't let you get away."

…Well. A hardly seems to have listened. In one ear and out the other, as Sensei used to complain. Hah.

I watch A look back and forth, trying to understand my Flying Thunder God technique before he makes another move. It's a good plan, but he's falling for the same assumption that many other people do—he thinks that the kunai are the only markers.

Neither one of them has noticed the seal on B.

Lightning flares around A once again. I'm going to have to remember to introduce the idea to Kakashi, when I get back. Perhaps he'll get something out of it to improve his Chidori.

I have time to say, "I have my own burdens to bear." Such as survival, and figuring out what happened back at camp.

There is no way I'm going to allow myself to die here. Even if A were capable of killing me—and he is, given the gap in physical strength between us—I always have a way around a problem if I can't go right through it.

And then he's pretty much within spitting distance. Half a meter of leeway, at best.

It's almost like he's daring me to jump to a kunai. His arm isn't even fully pulled back for his signature haymaker.
Well, I can certainly warp to another kunai, but that’s far too easy. He won’t get the point I’m trying to make unless I do something unexpected.

The element of surprise may be a great equalizer, but among S-rank shinobi it’s more than that.

Fwish.

A scans the area even as he begins to reverse momentum, trying to figure out where I’m headed.

I’m already there. Just not where he wants me to be. As it is, I’m poised over B’s bent back, kunai raised to strike thanks to the seal I put on him. Amazing, how much people don’t notice when there’s someone with lightning jutsu to watch.

B should never have assumed that I would leave him out of the fight. At this point, it’s a debate technique. Killing him would be easy, and both of them realize it now.

As much to B as to A, I remark, "I won't fail."

Not here. Never again.

For A, the ball finally drops. He releases his technique and whirls on me, furious.

A and B’s teammate—a black-haired man who probably also has a single-sound name, makes a surprised choking noise followed by, “Huh? That's...” I have to say, the moment he realizes the danger is actually kind of funny. It’s not his life at risk at the moment (at least not as obviously). “The technique markings are on the Eight-Tails’s tentacle!”

I can hear A growl, more at me than at himself. At least, I think so.

If B hadn’t been quite so quick to draw his spare blades, he would have been defenseless. As it is, he can probably gut me at nearly the same time as I can plant a blade in his spinal column. I stop mostly out of respect for his determination—it’s not as though I don’t have all the leeway in the world to kill him anyway. There are far more seals than even these, and the principle of always having a getaway route is one I know all too well.

(For one thing, I still have a seal on Aomaru’s collar and he’s not out of range yet.)

Still, B says, "Ready to die together? I am. Got my dagger all prepared to jam." His left-hand blade is reversed and poking into my flak jacket.

Hah. Well done. "You're my enemy, but I do like you." I know that many shinobi harbor nothing but hatred for other villages, but that always struck me as unproductive. It’s perfectly natural to have respect for one’s enemies. “You truly move like a shinobi killer.”

Odd, how A hadn’t reacted nearly in time.

Hopefully, he understands why.

I smile a little, and then Fwish.

“Minato, there you are!” Dōtō says as I land almost on Aomaru’s back. Almost. I stick the landing otherwise. Not bad for a moving, nonessential target, really.

Also, it puts people at ease if they think I can make mistakes. It also makes them a little less shocked when I inevitably do.
“There shouldn’t be any additional pursuers,” I tell my team with a nod.

“Ah, yes. Well, that’s not what I was going to say.” Dōtō says.

“You have a message.” Gaku puts in, and he’s four meters away, holding a pair of dogs that certainly don’t belong to him. The third is on the ground near him, staring at me.

Akino, Bisuke, and Ūhei.

“What are you three doing here?” I ask. They’re half-grown, still—I wouldn’t expect Kakashi to summon them in combat just yet, even if puppy teeth hurt like hell. I feel a sense of dread building, far more than I felt during the confrontation with Kumo.

“Camp burned!” Ūhei barks.

“Kei-chan’s been kidnapped!” Akino adds.

My stomach fills with lead.

No no no no no no no...

“Kakashi and Rin-san went after Kei-chan!” yips Bisuke, kicking his legs in midair with the urge to run.

Shit, shit, shit.

The Nohara girl is Kei’s best friend, and will follow along on any rescue mission she can without being ordered not to. But Kakashi…after Obito, Kakashi will chase her to the ends of the earth. My students didn’t tell me what Obito’s last request was until far later, but I’d made a guess before.

Kakashi will get both of them killed before turning back. He’ll think it’s fair for him to trade his life, after Obito did it before.

“Show me.” I say before I have a chance to think.

“But Minato—!” Kurojō cuts himself off, catching the look on my face.

I feel cold. Cold, and very, very angry. I want to break something; I’m terrified that this is going to be a repeat of Kannabi. I’m furious at myself for letting it happen again—but this time, the message is here. I know what’s going on. I’m not running to the rescue half an hour late. This won’t be like when we lost Obito.

I won’t let it.

“Head back to camp with Akino and Ūhei.” I order them. “I’ll be back shortly.”

Or not.

Might take longer to make sure my kids are still in one piece. Might take longer to kill everything at fault. Might take longer to bring my kids back safely.

I am going to kill everything between me and them.

The rest of my team is giving me dubious looks.

“Go.” I snap, eyes narrowed.
“Yessir.” Dōtō says quickly, and Gaku and Kurojō follow as fast as they can. Aomaru bolts out into the lead before they’re out of site, along with Akino and Ūhei.

I turn to Bisuke, the last dog. He may not have the best nose out of Kakashi’s pack, but he can find his summoner anywhere.

“Lead on,” I tell him. Once I’m in range, I can just warp the rest of the way.

---

Rin: Enact redundant rescue.

Kakashi and his dogs lead me farther and farther away from the ruin that used to be our base, until I can’t see the smoke even if I turn to look. The trees would get in the way normally, sure, but I think we’re honestly too far away.

We’re heading in a direction that seems to be between northwest and just west. Roughly. I don’t understand what Kirigakure would be doing with a base this far away from their home territories, even if we hadn’t known they would be betraying us. It just doesn’t make any sense. But Kakashi said they were Kiri-nin, and I knew the symbol on the headband of the man who attacked me in camp…

Something about this just feels off.

Kakashi signals for our group to come to a stop just as Bull and Pakkun start to slow down, and the constant growling abates a little. The dogs are both furious, but I don’t know how much they’re going to help. They’re still small, from what I can tell from how Inuzuka dogs are supposed to be. I haven’t seen any of them use jutsu, or even walk on water.

Kakashi, meanwhile, has just finished a string of patrol missions and could be short of chakra for a full-out fight.

This doesn’t look good.

We land in the thickets, rather than the trees, because tree cover is spottier up ahead than brambles, and no one wants to land in that. Ahead of us is the well-hidden mouth of a cave, if not for the faint light peeking out of its depths. It’s faint, but I can also feel a faint buzz of chakra in the air—that explains why the dogs are on edge. If it’s strong enough that I can feel it, it must be hell on them.

I’m not familiar with Kusa-Konoha geography, as such, but I’m also not sure how Kiri-nin would find this kind of place, barely an hour away from our camp, and set up their camp without us noticing. From the way Kakashi tenses, I’m not sure if he’s angry about not noticing or about something else entirely.

No one had ever…told me how Obito died. Not exactly. Maybe this has something to do with that.

“Stay down.” Kakashi says in a whisper. “Kiri patrols should be in the area.”

“They would have already heard us heading this way!” I hiss back.

“…any force that kidnaps a chūnin should have guards.” Kakashi says, and his eyes are distant again.

True. I pull Obito’s goggles up from their resting place around my neck and put them on properly. This is probably going to get uglier before it gets better.
“I can hear something going on,” Pakkun mutters, nosing up against Kakashi’s forearm. “Kei-chan is in there.”

Kakashi scratches Pakkun’s ears.

Next to us, Bull’s hulking black form is lying flat on the ground, ears perked up as far as they’ll go. He kneads his claws in the dirt, as though waiting for a signal.

“We’re going to have to break in.” I murmur, feeling my pulse quicken just at the thought. I am not trained for this.

“Follow my lead—” Kakashi begins, but a lot of things happen right then.

Bull hurls himself forward and clamps onto the leg of a Kiri-nin that bursts out of the cave right at us. He stops the first enemy shinobi’s movement, but he can’t go after the other five. Kakashi goes high and Pakkun goes low when it comes to the next two, biting at ankles. Kakashi aims a kick at a man’s head, and I duck under and around a pair of quick jabs.

The enemy seems to consist of hunter-nin. We’re so dead.

I have to conclude that this is the worst rescue mission I’ve ever been on. Also the only one, but that part’s not worth mentioning. I think.

And then an explosion sounds from the cave, blowing the last hunter-nin off his feet with the force. I stumble a bit, but I don’t fall.

And then, flying out of the smoke like a kunai, Kei bolts into view.

She looks awful. There’s blood splattered all over the front of her jacket and her pants, and her jacket’s got a big ugly slash across the front. She still has Obito’s headband, but it has a new dent that didn’t used to be there. Her expression is cold and almost dull, as though she’s not really seeing anything that’s going on even as she ducks around another enemy attack.

Then her eyes focus on us.

Kakashi shakes off one of the ANBU, rendering the bigger maybe-jönnin into a twitching heap thanks to his lightning strikes. “Kei!”

Bull intercepts a Kiri-nin that tries to get between Kei and me, bone crunching under his jaws. Kei flips over him, skidding around the bare dirt on her hands and sinking her foot into the stomach of one of our attackers. The man falls and Kei rights herself in a moment, scrambling toward us.

When did Kei learn to create chakra blades with her feet? I don’t remember her showing me that last month!

“We’re getting out of here.” Kakashi almost whispers, or maybe I just can’t really catch what he says. He’s moving so fast, keeping the enemy shinobi from getting anywhere near either of us.

How long can he keep this up?

Kei shoves my shoulder, ignoring the blood on her and what’s transferred to my sleeve. We can’t stay here, but how badly is she hurt?

Kei grimaces, giving Kakashi and the dogs a quick scan. Then she slams her left palm flat against the ground, even as she’s already springing forward and towards me.
She’s left seals on the ground. Ink spreads like water, twisting outward in a massive spiral that almost touches the lip of the cave.

As Kei grabs my hand and drags me out of the clearing, with Kakashi and his dogs hot on our heels, I recognize the seal.

We’re clear of the blast radius before it goes off, diving through the trees well ahead of our pursuers, but the sheer size of the fireball is unbelievable. Kei doesn’t have this much chakra—and I still have her seal scroll, so it’s not like she’s just spontaneously sticking them anywhere her hand goes! She should still be limited, right? This doesn’t make any sense.

And she’s still not talking, even as the ringing in our ears dies down and I can actually sort of hear things again. Her movements don’t quite seem normal—sometimes she freezes for a nanosecond, as though thinking too hard about how her body works, and other times it’s like she’s following a script. Lightning-quick and stalled by turns, where she should be as fluid as Kakashi is.

“So we’re the Tailed Beast Host now?” Kakashi demands over the sound of us all crashing through the canopy. I can almost hear our pursuers, but hopefully being Konoha shinobi gives us an advantage in forested terrain.

“What happened, Kei-senpai?” I ask, stomach clenching in fear. She should be talking right now if she’s okay! What did they do to her?

Is this even Kei?

Kei’s jaw works and she makes a noise in the back of her throat that doesn’t sound happy at all.

“Smells like her.” Pakkun comments, just as we break through the tree line. I think our pursuers are too far back to hear, at least.

This area is so desolate. It’s all rocks and twisted trees, dead from drought or fire. There’s no cover here—if we’re cornered, we’re dead.

Then, Kei turns her head to face us. Slowly, as though still trying to work her way past the frustration building in her chest, she opens her mouth to try and talk for the first time since…since before the paralytic, probably. Is she still being affected?

Then her expression goes flat. It just looks weird.

Also creepy.

Blink, blink. “Hello. We’re, ah, experiencing technical difficulties.”

“What is that supposed to mean?” Kakashi demands.

“We’ve lost…equilibrium.” Kei says. She shakes her head, “Before, we weren’t a Tailed Beast Host. Now we are.”

“What the hell?” I squeak.

Kakashi hardly looks any less surprised.

And we’re still being pursued by enemy ANBU. Oh god. Kei has to have a breakdown now? Is it even a breakdown? And a Tailed Beast?! I take back everything I ever said about Kei’s missions even if I never said them. She’s too calm for this!

Kei tilts her head again, like Kei always does when she’s confused or just stalled out. “We have to get away from here. Find Sensei. He’ll fix us.” Pause, again, even as we run. When she starts again, her voice sounds much more normal. “Between the Three-Tails, the compulsion seal, and the noise, I’m not going to be very coherent. Sorry.”

She holds up a hand when she lets go of mine, letting me run on my own. Three fingers are raised. “We were kidnapped by a shapeshifter—probably called Zetsu, likely artificial. Sealing the Tailed Beast inside us allowed another seal implant, which was placed over our heart. The Puppet Master Seal demands that we head for Konoha and unleash the Three-Tails on it.”

Kakashi goes pale under his mask, and I feel the bottom drop out of my stomach.

Kei goes on, “We’re not going to let that happen.” She almost smiles, but the expression doesn’t reach her eyes, “Because neither seal was designed for a shinobi with multiple personalities, like us. Even if it results in a war on three fronts.”

“…Who are you?” Kakashi asks.

“The Dreamer. Nice to finally meet you.” She glances back at the trees before continuing, “Data storage and processing, but not interaction. That’s not my job.”

Kakashi comes up with a response first. “What’s Kei doing right now?”

Kei—the Dreamer—says, “Running interference. The compulsion affects the dominant personality—the kunoichi you both know. She is stalling. As for the Tailed Beast, the Three-Tails activates hindbrain impulses toward destruction and rage in order to weaken the seal, personified and confronted by Id. I am neither, and have been forced to act in their stead until the situation can be resolved.”

“We need to get you out of here, then.” Kakashi says, all business. Both of us look at him. “I don’t have enough experience with seals to help right now.”

“Hm. I do, sort of, but I lack materials.” She lifts her arms to show that her sleeves and hip pouches are all empty. “All of my supplies and weaponry were either confiscated beforehand or destroyed in the escape. Else I would be able to use pre-prepared scrolls.”

“You prepared for this? How do you even prepare for becoming a Tailed Beast host?” I ask. It seems impossible.

“It was necessary.” The Dreamer shrugs, then, and we have to give up asking her things because it turns out our enemies are faster than we are.

The Dreamer blocks for me when someone tries to stab me, redirecting the man’s momentum as though he didn’t outweigh her by some twenty kilos. I can almost see Obito’s influence there—I remember watching Kei and Obito spar together, throwing each other all over the place. I remember Minato-sensei’s tendency to toss his students everywhere, to avoid hurting them with joint locks or anything like that.

But the Dreamer’s follow-through is sloppier. Less practiced.

“Muscle memory,” she explains in a dull tone, as though she doesn’t really see what’s going on. “Chakra sense helps.”

She’s never been in control? Oh god.

We’re outnumbered twenty-to-three by Kiri ANBU and who even knows how many enemies waiting in the wings, and we’re three kids. There’s no cover, because multiple ANBU have cut off our escape route into the next chunk of woodland. Not that I’m sure we’d be able to run even if we could reach the forest—many shinobi are trained for that terrain, much as I hate to admit it. Kei’s a jinchūriki and in the middle of an identity crisis, Kakashi’s used up who even knows how much chakra, and I’m not rated for close combat.

Kakashi lashes out, striking one man in the temple while his dogs take out the same target’s legs. The Dreamer darts around me as though I’m some kind of signpost, while I duck and blood flies. I have to be away from the fighting and have a chance to examine Kei to do the most good, but in the meantime I can certainly dodge.

I throw myself backwards, toward Kakashi even as Bull bowls another man over and crams his entire head between vast black jaws.

Kakashi’s hand sparks with white chakra and someone else is suddenly short an arm. It’s not a full Chidori, but Obito’s eye is out and spinning so I know it’s not far away.

A Rasengan forms in the Dreamer’s hand, then vanishes and reappears at her elbow just in time for a cross-blow that sends the man rocketing across the clearing with the force of the combined strike.

Wait. What?

Maybe a lack of access to the physical world equals more chakra control? I can’t be sure until we have time to talk, and I don’t think that we’re going to get that anytime soon.

“Kakashi,” I hear the Dreamer remark, “Kei wants you to know something important.”

“What?” Kakashi bites out.

“If…we lose control over the Three-Tails, she wants you to use Obito’s eye,” the Dreamer ends up back-to-back with Kakashi for an instant. “All Tailed Beasts have a Sharingan weakness, and you’re the closest thing to an Uchiha around.”

I can see Kakashi turn the info over in his head.

“Better idea,” Kakashi begins. As he and the Dreamer move almost in sync, with him flipping a kunai into her expectant hand without a word, “We fight together.”

The Dreamer’s expression changes from neutral to mildly surprised. It just looks weird on Kei’s face.

I get it. “Kei-senpai, you lead. We’ll follow.” Kakashi can predict her movements with the Sharingan and I can dodge with the best. She’s still having trouble, so…

Kakashi nods, though a second later he’s fending off another ANBU kunai strike with two shuriken to the mask’s eye-slits.

“…I see.” The Dreamer turns away. “Eyes on me, everyone.”

We move. The Dreamer rips through enemy fighters first, burning massive amounts of chakra by using contact explosive seals and miniature Rasengan copies from her hands and fingers. Kakashi moves next, tearing the gap wider with the initial phase of the Chidori and lightning-charged projectiles. I move last, between them with chakra scalpels extended.

We’re not really moving, as such. We’re fending off attacks. We’re standing our ground.
But our strategy depends on being too dangerous for the ANBU to try to grab, and we can’t do that forever. All of us have finite amounts of chakra (except maybe Kei, now).

And ANBU are older than we are. More experienced. Less motivated, yes, but all the teamwork in the world doesn’t make up for an ANBU wetworks squad facing down three teenagers.

And especially not when they’ve bolstered their numbers with Water Clones.

As we go, we’re accumulating small injuries. A rip in cloth here. A slash there. Chakra overextension somewhere else.

I hope Kakashi’s dogs find Minato-sensei in time. Otherwise we’re not getting out of this alive.

I’m not going to tell that to Kei though. She doesn’t need to hear it from me. And anyway, she probably already knows.

I feel a hand close over my arm and even as I turn to slice—

Lost boy: Wake.

I’ve been here for months.

“Here” is…kind of underground. So I don’t really know where I am. I know it’s kind of a cave and kind of an underground base, and that I can’t leave because there’s a huge boulder sitting where a front door should be. It’s probably not too far from Kannabi, though. Since I woke up the first time minus an arm and like, half my ribcage, I don’t think I’d have made all that far away without insane amounts of help. And, to be honest, nobody here really looks like a medic. Or acts like one.

There’s a creepy old man in here, who calls himself Madara Uchiha and can only move a few meters unassisted. He’s got these huge gray tubes linking him back to a creepy-looking statue. Zetsu said it’s called the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path. I can’t help but look at it and think it’s a gigantic kindahumanoid desiccated corpse, like what happens to dead people in deserts. Only huge. There may or may not be multiple misplaced eyeballs on its face.

It’s taken months for this…transplanted white flesh stuff to feel normal. Or natural. Even though it’s not either thing, and looking like Guruguru is kind of scary even when you know the guy. Chalk-white doesn’t suit anyone and it looks really freaky even though I’m used to Zetsu, too. It really is. Maybe Madara ripped Zetsu in half to give me a new arm. I don’t really know, and I sure don’t plan to ask.

But I’ll be able to leave soon. I’m stronger than I used to be. I’ll be able to move that rock, and damn Madara for thinking I couldn’t!

I’ll be able to go home.

I’ll see everyone soon. Rin-chan, Kei, Kakashi, Sensei…

I miss them so much. I want to go back, to tell them I’m sorry for getting trapped and for making them worry. If I have to I’ll beg them to forgive me for not…I wanted to go home. I did! But I couldn’t let Kakashi and Kei get hurt after the rocks fell. If I was the only one up, I was the only one who could make a difference! So what if I lost some things! They’re okay. I just need to break away from the insane babysitter and his lackeys to get home.

I can still remember Kei’s face like everything’s burned into my brain, promising to tell Rin how I felt about her. I can remember Kakashi, before I gave up my eye for him, looking like his world was ending. I remember visiting Rin at the hospital, hanging out for an afternoon of strawberries and dango. I remember Sensei pulling me to my feet and into a hug after a long day of training, like he was a big brother.

There’s a sound like wood twisting and I blink, sitting up. Half of Zetsu is sticking out of the boulder in front of what used to be the entrance to this stupid place, about ten meters up.

“I was just outside!” Well, that’s new. Or not. Stupid Madara won’t let me out yet, even if his lackeys can go wherever they want to just by floating through the ground or something! “Your friends are in trouble! Rin-chan and Kei and Kakashi—all of them!”

Okay, no, this wasn’t the plan what happened? “What happened?!”

Zetsu leans down, gap-toothed mouth wide, “They’re completely alone and surrounded by Kiri-nin!”

No, no, no! I need to get out of here fast. I need to help! I’m going to go out there and save them and damn the consequences because I am the consequences.

I leap out of what’s been my bed for the last few months—more like a huge slab of wood plus blanket than anything—hard enough to crack the structure underneath my foot. That doesn’t matter, though because I need to get out of here.

And then I skid to a stop, in front of the boulder.

I can’t break the wall. Boulder. Thing.

God dammit.

Guruguru wanders over while I’m standing around like an idiot, ready to scream in frustration. This isn’t how it’s supposed to go! He comments, “You can’t break through boulders with that body yet.”

I am currently resisting the urge to punch him in his stupid hollow head. I know that and that’s why I want to punch this stupid wall hard enough to break my own arm off. But I won’t. Kei’d be pissed at me if I hurt myself trying to be a hero, again. My new hand clenches hard enough that, if it was still flesh, I’d be bleeding. “I…I need to be out there. I have to save them.”

There’s a noise like someone pulling a zipper open, and Guruguru unravels in midair. As I watch, dumbstruck, he says, “Why don’t you wear my body?” He’s already wrapping around me, and I’m too surprised to say uh, no, that’s creepy as all get out.

There’s also another kinda important concern, and I blurt out, “But you guys serve Madara. You sure about this?”

Zetsu chimes in with his two ryō, “He’s…a good boy.”

…I think Kei would have something really sarcastic to say there. But I’m not gonna get to hear it if I never see her again, so I just look up at Zetsu. Then over my shoulder, back at the apparently-snoozing Madara.

Guruguru said in a sharper tone, “Don’t you want to help Rin, Kei, and Kakashi?”

No shit. Might as well not look a gift horse in the mouth. I clench my fist, just to make sure it still works properly through Guruguru’s…stuff. Then I stretch my arm out and roll my shoulder. Okay. Still got it. “Thanks, you guys!”
Then I line up a shot at the wall. I put all of my strength into it, but I can also feel Guruguru pulse around me and add his power to mine.

The rock explodes, showering chunks of stone harmlessly all over the place. I mean, I’m not in any real danger inside of Guruguru and I’m not sure Zetsu can be hurt and Madara was too far back, but still!

Damn, I could’ve used this a certain couple of months back. Oh well, I have it now!

“You kept the root tethered and used the statue’s power? Nice!” Oh, so that was what happened? Thanks anyway, Zetsu.

Guruguru seems cheerful enough, commenting, “Pretty good, huh?”

Yeah, I think this’ll do. I pull the tether attaching Guruguru’s head to the creepy hell-statue, tearing us both free. I am not sticking around.

Madara pipes up from the back of the cavern, “So, you’re going?”

“I’m grateful that you saved me.” I hedge. Wow, I am not happy about being stuck in a friggin’ hole in the ground for months on end. Counterpoint. I take a deep breath, looking back at the old man. “But I’m leaving. I have to go.”

The look on his face probably couldn’t have been more disapproving in a crotchety old-man way if he tried. And I’ve helped out my share of seniors, so I know what I’m talking about here. If he really is Madara, then he’s about the crankiest old man in history. “You’re being too hasty. It may be premature to thank me.”

…but what exactly are you planning, old man? Still, I shake my head. “I’ll probably never come back here. Everything I need is out there. But thanks for everything.”

His expression doesn’t change. “You…will return. And that’s when I’ll get your true gratitude.”

…I don’t care anymore. Yeah, I’m done with him. Forever.

Instead, I turn my attention to the guy who’s kind of the ultimate fly on the wall. “Zetsu! Where are my friends? Take me there right now!”

“What you’ve got on your body is a clone of mine.” Not the question I asked. Zetsu goes on. “And we can talk to each other telepathically over limited distances. Others of us are scattered here and there underground. We’re able to exchange intel. I’ll use them to guide you.”

Guruguru unravels a little, letting me turn my head fully. One of his white tendrils extends and pokes me in the head. “First, we need to get outside.”

Gotcha! “I’m counting on you.”

I make sure to grab a cloak from what looks like Madara’s old living room, before I go. I have no idea how long that stupid boulder’s been there, but I figure if I show up looking like a white mummy-guy I’m not going to get the best reception.

And then we’re off, heading toward the forest as fast as Guruguru and I can manage. As we move, I ask, “How are the others doing right now?”

Guruguru sort of throbs against my shoulders. I think it’s a shrug? “According to the others, it looks pretty bad. They’re talking about some Kiri test subjects, but I don’t really understand.”

Test subjects? Kei, Kakashi, what have you two gotten Rin into now?

Guruguru continues, oblivious, “Anyway, it seems like they’re totally surrounded. And they’re saying they all look like jōnin or ANBU.”

Oh man. I need to hurry. Kakashi’s a jōnin but he’s also a kid, and I don’t even know what the girls have gotten up to since I went under.

We break into the tree line, rushing through the undergrowth. Much as I hate it, all I have is time to talk to Guruguru until we get somewhere he can navigate. Meanwhile, I’m biting my metaphorical nails to the quick because these are my friends in trouble.

An idea strikes me. “Where’s Minato-sensei?”

“Who’s that?”

I raise my voice, more out of frustration at the situation than anything. “I’m asking you what Konoha’s Yellow Flash is doing!”

After a moment, Guruguru says, “Seems he’s on a different mission.”

}What, again?! Dammit, Sensei, why can’t you stick by your students?!

Kakashi, you made a promise you’d protect them! Please... Please protect Rin and Kei somehow! I take a deep breath. “I’ll be right there!”

Does this forest go on forever? I can’t even hear any big jutsu going off, so it’s not like I can decide where to go while Guruguru is being quiet about things.

“Obito, it’s probably going to turn into some kind of battle.” Uh, yeah, that’s what I’m counting on. I didn’t spend months stuck in a rehabilitation program for broken shinobi just to not fight when my friends need me. If I have to I’ll fight half-freaking-naked while Guruguru stands by with a megaphone for encouragement. Guruguru continues, “So I want to tell you a bit beforehand.”

I am pretty much out of patience. “What is it?”

“You’re not as strong as I am.” Like I care. “And right now, it’s like my big body is wrapped around your little wounded body.”

Scratch that. Now I’m out of patience. “So what?!”

“I think it would be better if I do all the fighting.”

“Remember what Madara said?” I reply, drudging up some not-so-distant lecture from the old man himself, “That a pair of Sharingan together is when they’re at their greatest power? Kakashi has my other eye, and he’ll be on this battlefield. We’ll be unstoppable together!”

And besides, it’s not like I didn’t spar alongside Kei for years. We have this doubles thing down, and I’m still the one with the Sharingan on this team (plus one, because Kakashi exists). It’s going to be awesome when we can show each other what we’ve learned. I’m sure not letting them fight alone!

I brush aside his warnings with a sharp, “We’ll all work together and protect Rin!”
Guruguru says nothing for a while. Then, “…Well, you do have Hashirama’s cells implanted now. A whole new strength may also appear when you combine Senju and Uchiha powers, but…”

Why does he have to start mumbling in typical Madara mode? And why can’t I hear him despite being inside him? This makes no sense. “What was that?”

Then drops of water start to fall, quick and unusually fat. I hold out a hand, watching them splat on my…not-my skin, as though someone decided to blow a huge lake into the sky or something. Distantly, I can hear the rumble of something that definitely isn’t thunder.

Together with Guruguru, I vault into the treetops to see what the hell is going on.

Off in the distance, against a backdrop of darkening sky, massive plumes of water explode out of pretty much nowhere.

I press my lips together, thinking. This isn’t rain. Not even close. I wonder…

Guruguru breaks into my thoughts with a somewhat hesitant, “I just got word from one of my guys. It seems…that’s the location.”

More explosions throw up enough water to drench us again. Well, I know where Kei is now.

I clench my fist. “Let’s go!”

Dashing through the woods is doing nothing for the worry curled in my gut. My heart pounds up against my ribs. It just doesn’t seem possible, that I’m almost back home and yet it’s like I’m gonna lose everything again, like Kannabi. I can’t let that happen and I don’t know if I’m going to make it, at the same time.

And then left eye socket starts to throb.

What the hell?

Parts of the forest go dark and red in alternating colors. It’s like the world’s made of brick and someone just replaced a bunch of random ones with supplies from another building, so things stand out. What I’m seeing is as much part of the scene I understand has to be real, and yet… It’s like my left eye’s still there, but not really. It’s seeing a place and image that doesn’t make sense. It’s like I’m looking past a wall set up to align with where I’m standing—one side has a building and the other’s just woods. They don’t sync up.

Only…

Are these visions?

If so…why’s Kei wreathed in red?

And that…that’s about when the pressure hits.

Killing intent floods everything. I see the phantom part of my vision blink in and out, forcing scarlet chakra to overlay what I see from my right eye. Distantly, I can hear a roar. My left eye throbs again.

…Kakashi?

Oh, hell.

Hold on, guys! I'm almost there!
Guruguru and I reach the edge of the forest—

And that’s when I feel chakra so strong that it’s almost like heat. Like I got too close to one of my own fireballs. The wind stirs up in a way it hadn’t before, with the explosions, and with it there’s that sense of being tiny. There’s a faint red glow up ahead that seems to be the source, and I head for it. The dome of power the thing’s broadcasting is transparent and bubbles a bit in my Sharingan sight, but more than that it feels evil. Oppressive. Like the time Sensei used his killing intent next to us, but inhuman.

It’s Kei.

There are Kiri-nin everywhere but they’re backing away, ignoring me and keeping their eyes on the girl standing in the middle of the clearing. Kakashi’s kneeling next to her, next to a limp dark shape that I really hope isn’t Rin, but his eyes are on her too.

“The Three-Tails is going to escape!” screams one of the Kiri-nin.

“Kill her!” shouts some other man, and I remember his position and his mask pattern almost automatically. Commanding officer. “Kill her and take the beast back before it escapes!”

My empty eye socket throbs again, and I get a glimpse of Kei from Kakashi’s standpoint.

She’s glowing with orange-red chakra that is in no way human. It just looks like a flame from here, flowing outward from a point on her chest. Her jacket is torn open and all of her clothes are spattered with bloodstains. Her eyes are closed, but her stance is actually relaxed.

“KEI!” I shout, drawing attention from the Kiri-nin but fuck them.

Her eyes open.

They’re gold-on-red and suddenly wide, looking toward me.

Kakashi’s vision immediately shifts and then I can kind of see myself, clamping a hand over my empty socket.

“Uh-oh,” says Guruguru.
Rashomon Arc: Be the Snarktacular Team

Chapter Summary

Be the snarktacular teen.

If, a couple of hours ago, I’d known I’d be the target for cruel and unusual experimentation instead of Rin, I probably would have hyperventilated for a minute or two.

As it was, I didn’t have time to do that.

Patrol with Kakashi should have been boring. We didn’t have dogs on the route, which means that it was just me and him, giving each other the silent treatment followed by field sign language. Much as I hate to admit to sometimes, we work very well together and understand each other’s tendencies on missions. Kakashi may have to rely on Obito’s eye more than Obito did when he was around, but natural genius also bridged the gap formed by several years of cooperative combat.

Anyway, back to the point.

Much like the rest of the Land of Fire, this particular chunk of territory was heavily forested. The trees were a lot smaller than they were in Konoha itself. The First Hokage probably had something to do with that particular ecological quirk. Out here, where presumably he’d never bothered to get in a tree-based fight with anyone, the trees were normal. Twenty, thirty meters. Just small enough that some branches would break under our weight. Not exactly conducive to stealth, that.

We were, in fact, eventually confronted by Kiri-nin. That was something I’d expected, since a conspiracy ended up being the thing that ended Team Minato in the old timeline. I’d known Kiri-nin were in the area, at least theoretically.

The fight was short and we ended up running, but not before I breathed in some kind of yellowish gas that made it harder and harder for me to move on my own.

Should have seen that coming. It was yellow and just…ugh.

At least it was some kind of muscle relaxant and not acid. The things I learned from Pokémon…

I ended up being dragged by Kakashi. Thankfully, I could run long enough that he didn’t need to slow down too much, at least until he hit the camp. Increased respiration through physical activity finally caught up to me about when I met up with Rin again, which just so happened to be when the camp was under attack by our pursuers. At least I didn’t face-plant, right?

Speaking of, one of the things we ended up getting hit with was Wood Release. I could see that much, even while being lugged around like a sack of potatoes. It’s kind of hard to miss the roots, to be honest, when they’re towering over the camp and reaching down and smashing the hell out of every structure taller than a thirteen-year-old girl.

Wood Release, at that time and place, could only mean one thing.
Zetsu.

(Okay, so technically Yamato could have been involved. Theoretically. But generally speaking, Konoha tends not to allow ten-year-olds to run assault missions against our own bases, no matter how powerful Wood Release might be. Also, Yamato didn’t have the chakra capacity for that scale of chaos, even as an adult.)

The green medic-drone picked me up when Rin got distracted, supposedly to carry me off to Medical, but that didn’t work out that way.

Since I was still perfectly conscious, I got to watch as medic-drone dragged me out of camp and handed my useless carcass off to a Kiri-ANBU before turning into a Zetsu and melting into the ground. His chakra entirely disappeared, which struck me as kind of unusual, to say the least. This, for some reason, didn’t prompt any comment from the Kiri-nin, which was setting all kinds of alarms off.

My tone was off, by the way. I had managed, through some finagling on the parts of enemy ninjas, to pass through anger and terror entirely and into the kind of Zen calm on the other side. The stabby sort of Zen, really. You know, if I could move.

Basically, I was a little bit out of my mind.

Zetsu, from what I remembered, would serve Madara’s goals over all others. That included Tobi’s, toward the end—I remember something to do with a Black Zetsu takeover, as far as that goes. And If Madara was involved…well, I was fucked. That’s the long and short of it.

I wouldn’t give up just yet.

Joking.

The Kiri-ANBU carried me for what seemed like a long time. I wasn’t exactly able to complain about it, since the paralytic hadn’t worn off yet.

Four other masked Kiri-nin arrived to meet my captor, just outside of some weird cave. Two of them took me from Asshole Alpha, hoisting me into the air between them. It probably wasn’t necessary, though there was the chance of the paralytic conveniently wearing off to worry about, on their parts. While I hoped that’d be the case, it wasn’t.

At best, I was able to glare up at them with a growl building in my throat.

“This the one?” the Evil Bookend on the Left asked.

“The other was too fast,” said Asshole Alpha, leading the way. Probably talking about Kakashi. Only other idiot in the field and all. “We’ll take what we can get.”

When I got out of this, I was going to kill them. I was going to pop Left and Right’s heads off and kick them across a field. I was going to cut Asshole down to size, too. Even if I didn’t know what they wanted, there was a good chance it’d be revenge-worthy and I’d be obligated to repay them tenfold for the slight on my honor. Like a good Uchiha (which I wasn’t, but revenge had always been something solidly Uchiha in my mind).

I refused to consider the possibility that I was going to die down there.

Still, my heart pounded and I could feel sweat break out on my forehead, under Obito’s headband. As the goon squad manhandled me down a sloping tunnel, I was getting more and more certain that the entire situation was going to end a certain way. As in, I’d end up a Tailed Beast time bomb and have to avoid the huge bloody pitfall known as That One Time Kakashi Punched a Hole in Rin. Or not avoid it, and save Obito a mental breakdown.

Sarcasm as a defense mechanism: exhibit A.

Alpha said to one of the others, who I privately called Squiggly-Line Guy, “Get the monster.”

…Fuck, it was what I thought it was.

Just my luck.

Left and Right Bookends lowered me to the rough dirt floor, and I ended up with my head turned to the side a little, even as I’m spread-eagled on the ground and unable to do anything about it. It didn’t help—the cave was dark, the walls were bare aside from mold and one lousy lantern, and the floor had ink scrawled up and down every surface. I couldn’t see what the entire seal looks like, but I could make a guess—spiraling, since of course Kiri would rip some of their sealing techniques off of old Uzushio.

Right Bookend pulled one of my sleeves up and drew a line of black ink down my arm, from the inside of my elbow to the end of my middle finger. He looped the line around my hand, before leaving a big dab of ink in the center of my palm. I could feel Left Bookend doing the same thing with my other arm. In both cases, my forearm scroll holsters were removed.

Speaking of, my hip and thigh pouches were also gone. I forced down a brief flare of panic. Not that I’d be able to do anything with them, what with the security detail, but I wanted them around. That was where I’d put my backup plan.

So much for that.

And then Squiggly started pulling my jacket zipper down.

I made a keening noise, alarm klaxons in my head already blaring. I didn’t have enough motor function to move, much less punch him in the face and run, and my jaw clenched and unclenched almost at random. My heart hammered against my ribs as I heard the little teeth scrape, cycling the poison through my bloodstream still faster.

Stay calm!

How the fuck am I supposed to stay calm?!!

Just as Squiggly sliced my mesh shirt open halfway down to the bottom seam, Left and Right Bookends’ knees slammed down on my wrists, cutting off what little feeling I was starting to get back. Purple light flared from the ink all around the chamber, and then it…well. The poison wasn’t an issue. The fact that I was stuck to the floor like a fly to a spider web—that was a problem. The Bookends got off, and disappeared out the tunnel as far as I could tell.

Alpha was holding something. Just barely, I can twist my head to get a better look at it.

It was an ancient clay jug, with ceremonial rope twisted around the neck. The rope itself was red and trailing little paper tags, like they had on shrines. On the jar, in ink that shouldn’t be fading, was a paper seal that runs from the front of the vessel and up, over the cork, and back down to make a solid binding. There were also bells tied to it that jingled faintly as Alpha steps closer.

The less obvious problem with it, perhaps, is the fact that Alpha’s hand was channeling chakra directly into the seal.

And a certain something inside was reacting.

Squiggly stood over me, then pricked his exposed thumb with the tip of a kunai. A tiny bead of blood welled from the cut.

…He’s going to be the dead guy, then? The Dead Demon Consuming Seal required one sacrifice mostly because it invoked the Shinigami, but whatever Chiyo had done to seal Shukaku into Gaara hadn’t done the same. And I had no idea about the Iron Seal.

To be perfectly honest, I was hoping that he’d get eaten.

Then Squiggly held his hand over my face, with his bloodied thumb presumably leaving a red mark between my eyebrows. Once he pulled back, he drew a straight line from there, down my face, chin, and throat to the middle of my sternum, though there was no way a blood smear had lasted that long. I tried to glare, but it wasn’t terribly effective.

“Is the Three-Tails ready, captain?”

“Yes. Complete your seal.” Alpha ordered.

Squiggly placed his right hand across my forehead, and two fingers poked just above my heart. I could feel the chakra building in his core, spreading outward.

What—

“What the hell is this thing? It…whatever it was, it took up space in my head with a sensation like the hum of distant power lines, after the first wave of pain subsided. The chakra leaking from it started from my heart, even as I was gasping for air. I could feel it sending out little feeler tendrils, anchoring itself into my system. The weight in my chest didn’t dissipate—if anything, the mass of evil chakra sank its hooks in deeper and got comfortable. It was like it was building a lair, like it’d hollow me out and wear my skin like a suit.

There was no suppressing the exhausted, terrified shudder that followed.

Still, I could follow the trail of breadcrumbs when it was right in front of my face.

Ergo: Evil chakra in me. Evil chakra in Squiggly’s arm. Evil chakra not in the rest of Squiggly, or in the ominous glowing sake jug.

Conclusion: Squiggly’s arm was an anomaly. Alternately, chakra transfusion. Theory: Chakra transfusion provided by the evilest crotchety old bastard this side of Kakuzu—one Madara Uchiha, since everything else seemed to be courtesy of his schemes.

The day was just getting better and better, I thought dizzily.

“Next.” Alpha said sharply, though Squiggly was a little slow to react this time around.
Alpha ripped the seal off and, to my chakra sense, that was the moment when all hell broke loose.

The Nine-Tailed Fox was the only Tailed Beast I’d ever sensed before this, and even then he’d been bound up in Kushina’s stomach somewhere. His chakra had been compressed and hardly any of it was circulating in her system due to the difference in seal designs between the Uzumaki seal and the Dead Demon Consuming Seal. If I stood by Naruto, some ten years from now, and he had the fox sealed inside him, I probably would have been much more conscious of the kaiju in his guts. Kushina’s seal was older, as well as the sort that could be created over years of patient experimentation with Uzumaki methods.

Mito had had that time. Sensei and Kushina hadn’t.

Wouldn’t.

The Three-Tails wasn’t the biggest or baddest of his siblings. Not by a long shot. But in close quarters, I felt like the mouse that had just brushed the barn cat’s whiskers. If I could move I would have run, and damn whoever got in my way. I needed to get away.

I suspected even before then that humans in this world were predisposed to a primal fear of giant chakra monsters. It just sucked to have it confirmed in the worst way.

The next thought that hit me between the eyes was this: It won’t fit.

The Three-Tailed Turtle might not have been the most powerful of its siblings, but even the weakest Tailed Beast had way more chakra than a human did. They were living chakra—energy made solid, even, if human chakra could be compared to a gas in a lot of really tiny tubes. Only the most exceptional human beings ever came anywhere near attaining a chakra capacity comparable with a Tailed Beast.

I was in no way exceptional. And even half-depleted, my chakra coils had never had room for that much energy.

The Puppet-Master Seal hasn’t been activated yet, the Dreamer was saying, distractedly. Anti-suicide, anti-deviation, chakra hooks for some…thing…

Shut up!

Squiggly started making seals: Rat, Dog, Bird, Ram, Dog. The transferred chakra was staying put—it looked like this one was going to be all him.

I am so f*cked.

I honestly think my ears popped from the change in air pressure in that room. The jar was open and I swear I could see a face peeking out of the hazy cloud of red, lined with spikes and scales and one glowing golden eye. The red chakra bloomed, like algae or a cloud of radiation, saturating the air with stuff that honestly hurt to breathe. If I squinted, I could see the skin of Alpha’s hand start to warp under something that wasn’t heat but burned all the same.

“Spiraling Blood Seal!”

There was red. Then white. Then ringing, and then silence.

And then I landed on my head, on a couch, and bounced into ankle-deep ice-water.

Woo, mindscape.
“Get up!” the Dreamer buzzed by my head, almost invisible in a cloud of frantic gold and blue sparks. I sat up, sputtering, and looked around.

My mindscape was bigger, I think, but that was an adaptation to circumstances. Our little therapy setup was still sitting on top of an ice shelf next to a glacier-blocked lake. Two glaciers meeting tends to involve a couple hundred thousand tons of ice, which is enough to stop the water from moving. I remember something about a prehistoric ice lake, back home, and the effects when the dam broke. The bowl of ice was keeping the water from rushing out and possibly destroying the ever-present memory-cloud, which was hovering around below us rather than above, like a particularly stupid flock of birds.

They’d been shunted out of their usual place by a massive cloud of red energy, which was more like an actual cloud in terms of size and behavior than the memories were. Over the crack where the two glaciers met, straining upward at the cloud, was a gigantic black thing that looked as much like a Hell-octopus as anything. Only it lacked features, other than four long, barbed tentacle limbs around a central round bulge, which contained a purplish-gray Rinnegan eye. Its hooks were dug deep into the ice.

Just looking at it made me sick.

The Dreamer floated by, prodding at the hooks with her Yin-aligned chakra and watching them dig in deeper. The ice started to fracture, just a bit.

Instead of helping her, I focused on the solidifying, angry cloud of red chakra as I floated away from the Freud couch. And on physics.

Let’s just say you don’t drop a giant demon turtle into a lake any more than you drop a moderate-sized car in a swimming pool. At a hundred and twenty miles per hour. From a cargo helicopter.

The memory-cloud was preemptively getting out of the way.

Also, where was Id?

CRACK.

FSSSSSSSSHH!

“Elvis is in the building!” shouted an unfamiliar, slightly squeaky voice from what seemed like far away.

…Well. Id was also awake, and had manifested somewhere on the Three-Tailed Beast’s back. Speaking of which, apparently displaced air made a noise like a gigantic firecracker going off.

I probably should have been more interested in the fact that Id was awake for the first time I could remember, or maybe I should have been paying attention the fact that she’d talked in more than sleepy mumbles. But there was a gigantic demonic turtle hanging out in the glacial lake like the ultimate rubber duck, which sort of took up most of my attention.

“This is in no way what I signed on for.” I said, as Id danced through the air in front of the Three-Tailed Beast’s nose.

“Look out!” the Dreamer called to me, and I dove out of the path of a long black tentacle. I threw the couch in the way, and watched things get smashed to bits. Even the coffee table.

I leapt off the side of the glacial wall and flew out over the thrashing Three-Tails. Overhead, huge red cracks had started to form in the sky.

“What the hell is going on?” I said to the Dreamer, hanging in midair.

“The seal is after you. She,” and this seemed to indicate Id, “can get close to Isobu without being burned.” The Dreamer seemed to be fading—half of her sparks had disappeared, and so had her left arm and leg. Her face was following suit. Id, meanwhile, actually seemed to be getting stronger. Though I couldn’t be sure, what with the layer of agitated spray between us and the turtle monster, it seemed she hadn’t let go of the spike yet. That was a good sign, if weird.

“I assume the seal will rip you right in half, then.” I said, thinking aloud for a given value thereof. I paused and swooped away from another attempted tentacle strike. As I rejoined the Dreamer, I went on, “Okay. The seal wants to grab me, which means I’m the target personality. It’s ignoring you, and Isobu is…”

Isobu was roaring and trying to shake Id off by diving. I could have told him that he’d have to do better than that to dislodge a freakishly determined mental construct while splashing around in my mindscape, but I didn’t. Not that he would have heard me.

“Isobu is busy. I’m a tentacle-magnet—and I’m aware how wrong that sounds. You’re literally half dead and I have no idea how that happened!” I summed up. “Do you think you can, I don’t know, take over for me so I can concentrate?”

“Take over?” the Dreamer repeated, stunned. “Now?”

And then another of the tentacles shot toward me. We shot out of the way.

“Yes, now, because I really don’t want to see what that does if it goes active and it does what I think it does.” I said really quickly.

Like mind-controlling me into exploding in Konoha. That would just ruin everyone’s day.

“You’re not a target.” I told her, spinning out of the way of another strike. But every time, the spindly hell-tentacle was getting closer. It was learning my movements. “I’m delegating!”

“I’m not sure I support the kind of delegation that has me on the front line.” The Dreamer scowled, despite the fact that her head was half missing. “In fact, I’m sure I don’t.”

“Too bad! Remember, right-left-right!” I said, just as one of the purple-black tentacles hooked around my left ankle. “Oh, shit.”

“Good luck!” The Dreamer called.

And down I went, screaming all the way.

Blink. Blink.

Masked Kiri ANBU detected: designated Tango 1 through Tango 5. Tango 1 designation reassigned —addendum, Tango Alpha.

Blink. Inhale. Exhale.
Recalibrating…

...Ouch.

“Go to Konoha,” whispers Tango Alpha.

Ineffective.

“Break the seal,” he continues.

Assessing seal strength…

Moderate and gaining, but misused. Target of seal: designated primary personality. Threat assessment: High.

Conclusion: Break binding seal. Creative reinterpretation required…

Tango Alpha leaves. Tango 1 through 4 follow. Tango 5 stays, kneeling.

Target in range.

Engaging remaining Yin chakra. Shoulder, bicep, elbow, forearm, palm, index finger…

Never needed to move before. Don’t now.

Seal broken. Hand up, to Tango 5’s throat. Black chakra lines spread. Tango 5 falls, chokes.

Blood splatter. Main seal lines broken.

Close enough.

Query: Remnants of seal in Tango 5? Analyzing… Conclusion: Tango 5 carrying related mind-altering seal. Query: Other Kiri-nin?

Not important right now. Filing it away as evidence.

Flagged for further review: Multiple instances of Puppet-Master Seal. Self-replicating???

Stand up. Stagger. Rebound off wall.

Recalibrating…

Fluidity is the goal here. Motor control is the goal.

Accessing…

Combat protocol engaged. Speech protocol loading…

Priority: Combat protocol.

Priority order processed.

…Okay. Time to kill our way out of here.
Holy crap it’s dark in here.

Like, really, really, really dark. I not only can’t see my hand in front of my face, but I can’t even be sure I have a hand. I’m even trying to kick my legs and snap my fingers and…nothing.

…Crap. Where am I?

…Is there even a ‘me’?

This is the weirdest version of an out-of-body experience ever.

I need to get out of here. The Dreamer can’t do shit for me in here, and I don’t even know if handing the controls over to her is the right choice. Maybe I’d be better—she has Isobu’s ear. Er. “Skull protrusion that conducts sound,” anyway. His chakra would be enough to save everyone!

…And also probably kill everyone. Bad plan. Not handing reins of giant monster over to someone with the emotional maturity of an actual thirteen-year-old might have been a better one. Too late now, though.

I really need to get out of here.

And there’s only one way to do that.

Hey, Madara-based jerkwad! Fight me!

It was like someone, somewhere, said, “LET THERE BE SOME DAMN LIGHT IN HERE.”

I turned my head as soon as I was sure I had one again, watching as my arms and legs rematerialized. By the way, don’t do that if you have a chance. It’s creepy in the kind of way that makes a little voice in the back of my head scream. And I was also naked, which was kind of par for the course for this stupid literalized extended metaphor.

As soon as I thought that, a gray hoodie and pair of jeans materialized on me. Out of habit, I stuffed my hands into the shirt’s central pocket. It made me look like a social shut-in, which was really rather nostalgic. You know, despite the fact that I really talk a lot. Or at least it seems like it…

Well, well, well.

I stood on a tiny gray island in a brilliant white vista that was, as usual for my mind, also an ocean. The gray dipped into water that was blinding via reflection, and I was alone. I was also pretty sure that if I wanted, I’d be able to shout and never hear an echo. The space was just that big, on top of being bereft of macroscopic life aside from me.

…Who am I kidding?

I’m never alone in here.

“Oi.” I said.

Somewhere in the distance, something huge and black exploded out of the water.

“Yay, hell-squid.” I muttered. I wished I still had Obito’s headband in here, but since I didn’t and it didn’t appear when I thought of it, I shrugged and moved on. I was so far past freaking out over all of the events today that I’d gone right into a Zen mode of calm, and it hadn’t worn off yet. “Today is just getting better and better. First the kidnapping, then the demon…”
There was a bulge in the water indicating that something very large was moving very, very fast right below the surface. It was heading my way.

When it hit my little island full-force, the water leading the charge split in front of my face like there was an invisible wedge in the way. And in that moment, I got a better look at the thing that had infested the open ocean of my mind.

…It was a parallelogram with a great, pulsating Rinnegan eyeball on it, with four stringy tentacles wiggling on the end of each corner. Given that the rest of the world was kind of in three dimensions, it was, effectively, like looking at a cardboard cutout the size of a billboard. It was not, in fact, a squid. It would have had to evolve another plane of existence before it would get close to qualifying as a squid.

“Somehow, I figured your avatar would be a little less literal.” I informed the thing looming over me, with a tone that could have been used as a knife.

“I’m Kei.” I said with a shrug, ignoring its mandate. “The first. Probably also the last, barring shenanigans.”

“Nope.” I said. For once, I was the spare. The distraction. And if that meant holding a conversation with a non-sapient seal, possibly while getting squashed—an imminent possibility—then I would keep it up.

Metaphysics. This whole situation was such bullshit.

I sighed. “So. What am I supposed to be doing here?”

“Shut up.” I said, tucking stray strands of hair behind my ears. I needed something to do with my hands…

Obey.

I glanced at the monster looming over me, as though it was an afterthought. I didn’t give a flying fuck about it since it didn’t do anything. It wasn’t Madara. It couldn’t even think. “Fuck off.”

The black abomination shuddered, folding inward. I caught little sparks of red, flashing in the white void. The red reached down, falling like dust, and surrounded the burgeoning cube. The Rinnegan eye was still looking at me.

…I may have pissed off a tiny, artificial, but nonetheless existent eldritch abomination.

Or maybe the Tailed Beast had co-opted the seal. Needed to make a note about that. You know, if I got out of this.

…I also probably needed to remember to make a will.

The black stuff swirled like a tornado, twisting with enough force to toss me off the little gravel island and into the water.

If I hadn’t already known the trick to water-walking, I probably would have had a very splashy landing. It would have been undignified and probably would have resulted in my immediate death.

Crouching on the water’s surface, I watched as the tornado of darkness reformatted itself.

When the water was finally calm again, there was a figure standing in the middle of the gravel island where I’d been.

It was entirely normal, aside from the glowing eyes with red irises on black sclera. From head to toe, it appeared to be my height, my rough configuration, and wearing my clothes.

It looked like an older version of my physical body, complete with scars and accessories and swords.

I, on the other hand, pretty much felt like my old physical body. The one with long hair, a retainer, and stupidly thick glasses.

(Speaking of glasses, a pair appeared on my nose. Boop.)

And despite the script I’d just walked into, I was more annoyed then afraid. Isobu, it seemed, was sufficiently on board with the “squash Konoha” plan that he’d gone so far as to reinforce Madara’s mind control. Maybe it was a Rinnegan or Sharingan thing. Maybe it was a Tailed Beast thing. Maybe the concentrated power of my self-loathing had decided to take the mental attack weaponry for a spin.

Or maybe I was reading the situation wrong and the existence of a Dark Kei was somehow analogous to something else I’d never heard of.

…Though Dark Naruto was related to the boy’s suppressed resentment after a lifetime of neglect by his hometown, apparently common with all Tailed Beast Hosts. Like I was, now. For about five minutes.

What did I have that was so devastating?

And then she opened her mouth.

“Useless.”

I blinked. “Excuse me?”

“Four years of planning, and it amounts to nothing,” she hissed, stalking toward me. I backed up, confidence neatly punctured. “Training. Fighting. Making friends. And nothing you did kept him safe.”

…Oh hell.

“He nearly died. He should have died. You had the fate of the world in your hands and you let him live.” Dark Kei snarled.

I skittered backward. “Obito is my friend!”

“What is one life in the face of those he’d kill if he grew up? The formation of Akatsuki, the Nine Tails attack? The Uchiha massacre, the fall of Kirigakure into the Bloody Mist, the Fourth Shinobi World War? How does the life of one teenage boy match up to the deaths of half a continent?” She was furious. “Why let him live? Why not slit his throat the minute he’s squashed? Why didn’t you kill him?”

“Oh, so we’re going around killing kids now?” I snapped back, anger boiling in my chest. “You want me to kill my best friend, because he might be a monster?”

Dark Kei circled around me, hissing, “He is one!”

“But not yet!” I didn’t lash out. I could have lashed out. But old-me had only ever slapped bugs. Dark Kei was very, very different. “Obito isn’t a monster yet. And if I have anything to say about it, he won’t be.”

“Then you should have killed him when he was helpless.” Dark Kei scoffed. “Could you even kill him now?”

I scowled. “So this is what it comes down to? Why I haven’t punched Fate in the face? Or why I’m still friends with Obito?”

“You have done nothing.” Dark Kei repeated, eyes glowing.

“Excuse me? Canon looks like the fucking Flying Spaghetti monster from where I’m sitting.” I snapped. “Madara is to Obito as Darth Sidious is to Anakin goddamn Skywalker. But he hasn’t crossed the threshold. Rin isn’t dead.” He hasn’t started killing kids.

“How long do you think you can keep it that way?”

“A hell of a lot longer if you would let me!” I shouted.

“And if you fail?” Dark Kei asked quietly, beguiling.

Fucking bitch. “Then I’ll…”

Then I’ll...what?

Fear stabbed at the core of me, like an ice pick to the chest.

When it came to the Plot, Obito was the equivalent of a nuclear bomb over Hiroshima. Everything short of Madara’s manipulations could be traced back to him. Or more specifically, it could be traced back to a combination of Rin’s death, the patented Uchiha genetic psychological and physiological vulnerability to insanity, social isolation, broken promises, and skilled emotional manipulation by a geriatric nihilist. Obito simply acted, based on the busted hamster wheel in his head. It was also becoming clear that Madara’s spider-web was broader and more subtle than I’d expected, which was another nail in our collective coffin.

And yet at the same time, his massive body count could have been even more devastating. He could have neatly sidestepped any need for the Akatsuki just via his Kamui ability. He could have just grabbed Naruto ten or fifteen years before the Fourth Shinobi World War and kept him in a box, and never had to fight a war. It wasn’t like fucking dimension hopping was a thing anyone but Kakashi would be able to fight on the level. And he hadn’t been able to do that until he was thirty.

And Obito, even as early as age fourteen, could have reduced Kakashi to compost in two seconds flat.

I pressed my lips together in a thin, whitening line.

And yet he hadn’t. He’d displayed a bizarre mix of villainous competence and childish amusement in screwing with everyone from his subordinates to the Five Kages. He could have stolen every Tailed Beast host in approximately an hour, barring shenanigans.

He could have crushed the world under his heel.

…And he didn’t.

I could just say that he was a moron no matter how old or evil he got, but that didn’t feel right.
…Though it’d be accurate for a couple of people I knew…

“We haven’t hit the point of no return yet.” I said quietly. “If I fail to protect Rin, I’ll still try to bring Obito back.”

“Why? Why not kill him and save yourself the trouble?”

Because I had to start as I meant to go on.

Premise: I kind of want to keep the world from getting more fucked up, or even fixing it a little.

Okay. So. How do you bring about a kinder world, without using really freaky methods such as the Eternal Tsukuyomi, which are reflective of a profound disillusionment with reality? How do you change people? How do you make things better?

Well, going by the previous era, cynicism and the cycle of revenge hadn’t worked out for anyone.
Suppose the Uchiha wiped out the Senju, or vice-versa? Different clan would pop up to take their place. Same shit, different day. Hashirama Senju’s willingness to work with other clans, to take them into the fold, and to make alliances where before there was neutrality, had build Konoha. It’d built the shinobi system which, while flawed, was better than the old ways.

Madara had been a walking snag in that plan. Maybe if Hashirama had killed him properly, I wouldn’t be here.

Killing Obito wouldn’t prevent Madara from finding another cat’s paw. And I wouldn’t be able to locate Madara without Obito’s help. At least I knew that Obito had been Madara’s flunkie.

And unless I planned on waiting until Naruto was a teenager, I had to start now.

…The only potential snag in this was the possibility, however narrow, that Obito had died.

In which case I was probably fucked, because ANBU.

Though Madara wouldn’t have needed to set all this shit up if Obito wasn’t still kicking.

“I won’t deny that killing certain people would make everyone’s lives easier.” I said after a while. “I just don’t think Obito’s one of them.”

Dark Kei hissed, “Excuses! You saw—!”

“I saw a lot of things. And despite that, I’m on Team Minato.” I said. “I was there when Obito was crushed. I was kidnapped. I was made into the Three Tails’s host. All of those were things Rin was supposed to do.”

I wasn’t looking at things the right way. I had assumed that Obito was the same, despite the differences in our lives. But who could be? We are defined by the events in our lives and our reactions to them, and they’d gotten off-track somehow.

I met her eyes. “Thing is, I also don’t remember anything about Hayate having a family. I don’t remember Kakashi being kidnapped. I don’t remember the Chinatsugumi.” I spread my hands out, shrugging. But I got it. I understood. And the thing I understood had gotten bigger without me noticing, much to my pleasant surprise. “It might not seem like much of a difference. But it never does at the center, does it? But if I chucked a rock into a lake, the ripples end up quite a lot bigger than the rock.”
I almost smiled at her. At her existence, bound up around fear and pain.

“T’m the rock.”

Nearby, water started to gently flow around us.

“But still, I need to own that.” I remarked, to Dark Kei’s turned back. “I’m not helpless. Not useless. But I think I need to keep you on board.”

Nothing good has ever come from denying parts of yourself that do, in fact, have a point.

“Or at least your advice.” I hedged, lowering my arms to my sides. I didn’t need to hurt her. I didn’t want to hurt her anymore. I probably wasn’t capable of it anyway.

“What makes you think you can change anything, after four years of nothing?” Dark Kei demanded, but her voice was so much smaller. She was less threatening, too.

I paused.

Great Man theory of history, or did I take a populist stance? Was influence over the world opportunistic, or inborn?

“I don’t think that history is made solely by big names.” I said carefully. Though here, it might be, there was a whole world of human beings who contributed to the way things went. Madara wouldn’t have become the threat he was without the contributions of his clan and its history, or the Sage of Six Paths. The shinobi system wouldn’t exist without the people in it.

And yet, what would Madara have been if he’d been born a member of the Kaguya clan? Or if he’d been born a no-name civilian child, like Rin? Clan, talent, historical placement, and luck had all been a part of his rise to notoriety.

There were astoundingly exceptional people in this world, yes. But I think that they owed something to their bloodlines, at least here. Or they owed things to the people who never made it into history books—the farmers, the soldiers, the cousins, the lovers. Everyone around them, who had a hand in their continued existence, was owed some of that credit. If not everything.

And I, reborn into the body of a child from a no-name family, had been lucky or unlucky enough to end up standing on the fulcrum on which the world balanced.

(I was holding the gun that could kill Archduke Ferdinand and his wife. Would I? And would it matter if I didn’t?)

Madara’s particular plot for the world would keep going if I didn’t find a way to nip it in the bud. I wasn’t sure I could do that alone, or at that exact moment. It didn’t seem like an immediate thing.

But could I remove Obito from the line of fire?

One way to find out.

“When I get out of here, I’m going to make sure that Sensei knows what’s coming.” I told her, looking down at the ripples spreading below my feet.

“You aren’t going to live long enough for that.” Dark Kei said sharply, fists clenching.

“And you don’t get to decide that.” I replied. “Whether you’re the Three Tails or Madara’s seal or a bizarre amalgamation of both, there’s enough going on right now that if I do get killed, I expect it’s going to be because of the assholes outside of my head.” There were probably enough of them that they outnumbered the voices bouncing around in my skull. Simple statistics and all that. “But if I can’t do shit on my own, then I need to find people who can.”

Though didn’t I already know that?

_Thanks, Rikuto._

I held up my hand. So did Dark Kei. She kind of looked like she was gonna slap me, but I was more going for a formal oath. Oh well. Hopefully, I wouldn’t have to hug her—she probably would have stabbed me.

And then the sky started falling. As pieces fell away—like crashing wallpaper to something as big as an ant—crashing into the water a long ways off, the pattern underneath was pulsating red-orange.

_Rin goes limp, head snapping back and her nose trailing blood into the air._

Then everything went red, backed only by the sound of screaming.

---

I slammed back into control of my body with the rough impression that I’d been caught in an especially aggressive revolving door. I’d gone through and come out the opposite side of where I’d come in, sort of dizzy, and the Dreamer’s Yin chakra left a sort of trailing line of string back through the hell-device in question. Maybe from an unraveled metaphysical sweater.

…I’m probably misusing the word “metaphysics” at this point, so I should stop.

“Kei?” said Kakashi’s voice.

Also, I was on fire.

Metaphorical fire, but still. And had a couple of slash wounds I couldn’t quite remember getting. The Dreamer really wasn’t ready to take the old meatbag for a spin, I suppose. _Push past it, push past it…_

I shook my head to clear it, but it mostly made my head bang like a drum. Ow. I blinked, twice, and everything was bizarrely orange-red. Other than that, though, I could see everything more clearly than I had in some time.

And I could feel everything. Tailed Beast chakra in my coils where it bubbled and burbled where mine had been gentle to the point of being unnoticeable sometimes. I could feel other chakra signatures even without trying, pinpointing twenty normal human signatures and a bizarre seal on each one that marked each as not-us, not-ally.

It felt like the seal clamped around my heart.

I blinked again. Looked down.

Immediately, I brought up a diagnostic jutsu on the unconscious kunoichi in Kakashi’s arms, as though nothing at all had changed. My chakra seemed to sputter, as though Isobu couldn’t believe his chakra was being used for non-stabby purposes.

“Kei.” Kakashi said again, and his hand closed around one of my wrists. I looked at him over the top of the screen—_mild concussion, broken nose_—and remembered.

…I probably needed to focus on the threat. Kill everyone, _then_ heal Rin if possible. Okay. I could do that. The hell-creature essence pounding through my chakra coils would help. I could sort of feel it bubbling along aggressively, as though pleased that I was t-minus five seconds from committing horrible violence.

I dropped the jutsu. I placed my other hand over his, just for a second, and he let go. I stood. Felt Isobu’s chakra pulse. Felt someone else’s chakra get close.

Lashed out with one fist and hit someone hard enough in the chest to make the rib cage give way. I could feel it when he bounced off the ground twice, and went still. And when the seal in his chest died with him.

Kakashi still had Obito’s eye trained on me. He didn’t look at the guy I’d smashed. He did, however, look really surprised anyway.

“Hey.” I told Kakashi, while also listening to my own voice and being surprised by how deep and guttural I sounded. “I’m…I’m back now.”

“…Right.” His voice was a little too confused to be truly skeptical.

“I know things have been strange lately.” I said, keeping half of my attention on the enemy. “But I promise, I’ll explain later. Keep Rin safe.”

Kakashi’s eyes narrowed and he gently eased himself out from under Rin. His chakra was slighter and more subtle than the cauldron boiling in my chest, but I could still feel it and I could see the anger in the way he moved. And aside from Rin, he was the only uncorrupted person in range.

The only person not carrying Madara’s little helper around in their chest cavity. Hell if I even knew what everyone else’s did.

Mine seemed to involve a possession attempt and (at the moment) an awful lot of internal screaming matches with a giant turtle.

Kakashi’s hand remained on Rin’s shoulder. But…

“No more suicidal heroics on this team, Kei.” Kakashi informed me. Obito flashed through my head, not for the first time that day. I frowned. “We’re all going home this time.”

“…I’d like that.” I admitted, looking down at Rin even as our enemy was busy trying to figure out the best way to flank us. “Thank you.”

And if things went wrong, then…well, Kakashi’s Sharingan ought to give us a measure of control. For a bit.

Then, just as I got ready to lead the way, I felt the faintest trace of a very familiar chakra signature.

Obito!

And that is exactly when I heard a wonderfully familiar voice shout, “KEI!”

…the only problem was the fact that the owner of both that chakra and that voice was also carrying around two alien presences.

One, a near-match to the thing that kidnapped me.

The other, a copy of the thing sitting in my chest.

Oh fuck.
Even as my head twisted his way, I knew we were in for a hell of a ride.
Rashomon Arc: Deceleration

Chapter Summary

Kei: Maintain a constant state of loopy competence. How do you even do that?

I don’t care who you are—if a thought-dead teammate pops up out of fucking nowhere, you stop and stare a bit.

That said, I’d solved the issue of Schrodinger’s Ninja, which had only been a debate in my head. It was just a stunner to everyone else (conscious). By which I meant Kakashi. Rin didn’t count, and the Kiri-nin probably didn’t give a fuck. Obito was alive, Rin was alive, and Kakashi was conscious. All of the Kiri-nin were wary of me, which meant they’d stay out of immediate stabbing range. So far, I was doing a lot better in my corner of the universe than canon had!

Basically… I rolled with it. If you don’t roll with things, you tend to get run over anyway. “OBITO, GET YOUR ASS OVER HERE!”

Kakashi made a choking noise. The figure by the tree-line, while his chakra jumped in shock, was already dashing across open ground toward us.

And everyone who tried to stop him got punched ten meters through the air. It was a change—in canon, Obito’s Mangekyō had been active by now, so he would have gone right through people. But even in our little pocket reality, one of the guys who got punched by him was never going to get up again, since a bit of Zetsu’s Wood Release grew through his body and roots burst out of him.

…Zetsu was a game-changer, all right. I couldn’t help but imagine that he’d do the same to any of us if the urge pinged off something important in his freaky mutant brain.

Kakashi overcame his shock within two seconds—it wasn’t like I’d told him Obito wasn’t really dead (since I hadn’t been sure anyway), and immediately whistled his dogs over. Bull let go of someone’s leg and bounded over, Pakkun on his back, and the two of them clearly planned to stand guard over Rin.

Well, if it was going to be down to puppy-guarding a downed teammate…

Just as Obito reached us, arms whirling as he skidded to a stop before crashing into Kakashi, I swiped some of the blood from my shoulder wound off onto my index and middle finger. Good enough.

I slammed my palm to the ground with a sharp, “Summoning Jutsu!”

Tsuruya appeared out of the smoke, towering over us by at least two meters. Immediately, she jabbed at a Kiri-nin’s mask with her beak as he tried to get behind us—he fell back, screaming about a mangled eye. Her wings also blocked incoming kunai, with a sound like rain on steel siding.

(I finished that guy off. Six down, fourteen to go or so.)

“Whoa. What have you been doing these last few months?” Obito asked.
“Recovering.” Kakashi said bluntly. When Obito blinked at him, Kakashi went on, “So. This is a new record for tardiness.”

Obito, even though his head was in the middle of Spiral Zetsu’s unfurled spines and he obviously hadn’t had a haircut in the months he’d been gone, still managed to look quite indignant. “Oh, come on! You can’t blame me for this one! How’s Rin? Is she okay?”

“Unconscious, but she’s fine.” Kakashi said. As though to prove him right, Rin made a noise that probably meant she was going to be wobbling to her feet soon enough.

Obito’s lone eye lingered on his goggles, which Rin was still wearing. The edges might have gotten a bit chipped or cracked, though. He gave me a blank look, eye focused on my forehead, which I ignored.

“Do you need me to guard her, Keisuke-sama?” Tsuruya asked.

Thank goodness for team training and not having to use full sentences anymore. “Pakkun, Bull. Stick by Rin.”

“You got it, Kakashi.” Pakkun said.

“So…I guess we just need to kill our way out of here now?” Obito asked. “Just like old times!”

“Probably easier said than done, but yeah.” I said. “You and your suit up for it?”

“Sui—oh, Guruguru? Yeah, we’re going to be fine!”

Not yet. I still needed to figure out a way to kill that thing.

Speaking of killing things, the Kiri-nin looked like they’d recovered from the bizarre introduction of two extra fighters. They still outnumbered us, but between the dogs and Tsuruya’s towering height, it wasn’t like they had more range or reach anymore. Rin groaned by our feet.

…Damn, I wish I had a new kodachi. Too little, too late.

“Obito, take the lead.” I said, thinking aloud. Guruguru wouldn’t let him die—at least, I thought so—and Kakashi’s chakra was flagging. My own was unstable, and I’d prefer to choose how close I was to everyone when it inevitably blew up in my face.

…And I needed to look in my scrolls. Screw the Kiri-nin for confiscating them—I didn’t even know which asshole had them.

“You got it, Kei!” Obito seemed cheered, at least.

I nodded at him, but I held my hand out to Kakashi. “Kakashi, do you still have that scroll I gave you?”

Kakashi pulled it out of his thigh holster and flipped it into my waiting hand.

“Thanks.”

Hopefully, something in here would be able to shut Guruguru down. And me, if it turned out that two Sharingan eyes wouldn’t cut it.
Overhead, Tsuruya leaned back and flapped her wings, sending a flurry of steel down-range to scatter the enemy. Under the cover provided by flying feathers, Kakashi and Obito both charged.

I unrolled my scroll on the ground and silently despaired.

Only one compacted Evil Sealing Method variation, and one Chakra Suppressing Seal. I bit my thumb, thinking. I...might have been able to seal Obito’s mind control thingy, since the easiest access to the heart for sealing purposes was the sternum and that would just mean getting Guruguru out of the way. But for me, that would mean putting a seal directly over Isobu’s seal—interference would render the effects of either seal useless.

Then there was the conundrum surrounding the Evil Sealing Method as a whole. Was it actually capable of so much as holding back the Cursed Seal of Heaven? On a non-Sasuke subject, in particular. If it really was based solely on willpower, then keeping the “destroy Konoha” suppressed would be no problem. If it wasn’t…

“Ow...” said Rin’s voice.

I ignored my scrolls for a moment. “Hey, Rin-chan. You feeling all right?"

“...I feel like I got hit in the face by a flying clipboard...”

…I have to ask, someday, exactly what she does at the hospital. But at that moment, it wasn’t important.

“Well, your nose might be broken, so that’s one point in common.” I replied.

“...What about you?”

“...Eh, demon container status confirmed. I also have a bunch of voices screaming in my head, my chakra feels funny, and I’ve finally been outed as a shinobi with split personalities to my friends.” I shrugged, trying to be as blasé as possible. I put all the irreverence I had into that. “Also? I think I need that scroll I gave you.”

“Um. Okay, here.” Rin sat up with some trouble, leaning on Tsuruya’s leg, but she did give me the scroll she’d stowed away in her pockets. Tsuruya paused in her metallic feathery onslaught for long enough to reach down and nudge Rin’s head with her beak, but that was all.

“Okay, now we’ve got two of these seals...” I muttered. “And no explosives.”

“Kei-senpai...you can just fight with them.” Rin said, indicating the boys. Probably. “I would just slow you down.”

I looked up.

The best way to describe how Obito and Kakashi fought, together, would have been “cleaning house.”

When I was still an ordinary college student, I’d seen episodes of Naruto where it seemed like every single person on the show was psychically predicting the moves of people on their side. The Sharingan pretty much embodied that, which was why it struck me as odd that people didn’t use it to enhance their intra-team coordination as much as they tried to out-awesome each other. It was perfect for teamwork and no one used it that way!

Over the previous few years, Obito and I had trained for a kind of pair fighting based more on kinesthetic awareness, since he hadn’t had his Sharingan then. He had to know how I moved, fought, and even thought in order to do what was necessary. I had to train for the same thing. Kakashi and I hadn’t, but the eye had made up for it.

And now there was nothing to compensate for.

Aside from maybe the fact that Obito-plus-Guruguru was taller than Kakashi by about ten centimeters.

Long time no chat. What’s going on in there?

…Nothing good. The seal’s going insane.

Which one?

Both of them, really. Id is still busy turtle-wrangling, but the other one’s starting to deconstruct things around here. We only have so much time.

Dammit. Then what was all that “Chat in the Center of the Mind” shit for?

That bought us time. And then we paid you back. But this can’t go on as it is.

“Is…Is that Obito?” Rin asked, sounding more hesitant than ever. Still, she successfully jolted me out of my thoughts.

I nodded.

Rin’s expression was blank and disbelieving, despite the evidence of the boy’s movements, shouting, and chakra signature. Okay, so maybe that last bit was just me. Rin swallowed hard and said, “How?”

“Gonna have to ask him that.” I said. I tucked the scrolls up my sleeves, though only loosely. Fucking Kiri-nin broke my safety catches.

I knew, of course, but I also wanted to know what had changed, since obviously Obito was running around and Rin was still alive. That had not been a part of Madara’s game plan—it wouldn’t make sense. If he was also responsible for Rin’s capture in canon—which was a possibility I was warming up to—then there had to have been a reason for it. The Kiri plot could have easily been an excuse for…well, for picking up a Robin to his Slade. An Anakin to his Darth Sidious.

Seemed convoluted, but anything to do with the Uchiha clan got way more complicated than necessary.

Rin’s fingers clenched around the goggles she wore round her neck. “Do you think he…?”

That question, sadly, had to go unfinished, since a pair of Kiri-nin had gotten past the boys and was heading right for us, with some kind of paper seal in hand.

Sometimes the fun moments are interrupted by people who need to be punched in the face. That was one of those situations. There were, after all, still a significant number of hostiles around. Even if, since I was channeling Isobu, everything seemed to be moving a little slower than average.

For a turtle, Isobu’s chakra somehow still included a noticeable speed component. I’d have to ask him about that later. Assuming I lived.
I punched one of them in the face hard enough to send him skidding toward the tree-line. Sooner or later, I was going to regret hitting anything that hard, but for the moment Isobu’s chakra was keeping up with the strain I was putting on my body. Even if he had to shave the ends of my cells’ telomeres to do it. Nothing about cellular regeneration was free.

(I was trying not to think about that part, but of course that meant I thought about it more.)

The second one, though, got two dogs to the knees. Then I kicked him in the chin.

Can I just remind you that the seal on Isobu isn’t especially stable?

_Much as I hate to admit it, I actually can’t do anything about that._ For one, even theoretical Tailed Beast sealing was beyond me. I could only suppress chakra using the seals I had, and that was the sort of thing that would knock me out since I _also_ happened to be channeling Isobu at that moment. For another, repairing a seal on your sternum is just asking for a screw-up, based on the awkward angle involved.

Of all the times to hate the fact that Sensei hadn’t gotten around to formalizing any kind of advanced apprenticeship...

Never mind that.

Anyway, the herd was thinning. Astoundingly, the boys’ teamwork was cutting a bloody swath through the Kiri-nin, which would have been impossible just a few months ago. A punch from Obito could launch someone skyward or implant a horrific root monstrosity in the vein of something dreamed up by Yōko Kurama, depending on which arm he used. Kakashi’s Chidori-charged kunai were more energy-efficient than the Chidori itself and no one among the Kiri-nin had the know-how to block them.

Or maybe no one was wind-aligned. Dunno.

With Tsuruya guarding Rin, I kind of felt like not joining in on the fight was a cheap way out. Sure, I’d been captured and kind of tortured a little and certainly put in fear for my life, but I was also carrying around a monster made of pure chakra. Tailed Beast Hosts were rightly feared on the battlefield, since most people didn’t _expect_ to have to deal with one due to our rarity, but I was feeling like I didn’t really merit that much of a threat.

…Eh.

“Rin-chan, are you okay here?” I asked.

“I…I think so. If they need help…” Rin trailed off.

Seal of approval! Yay!

Also, Isobu’s chakra was a bit like an adrenaline high in that I could _already_ tell I’d regret hacking my way through these guys. In both a physical and a mental sense.

And funnily enough, Isobu was one of the Tailed Beasts who didn’t have claws and therefore couldn’t grant any to his host if he wanted to. He also didn’t have rear legs. Amazing, the kinds of things that shoot through one’s mind when stress and adrenaline are having a punch-up in the back of one’s head.

So, chakra scalpels it was.
At that moment, two Kiri-nin rushed me.

Isobu’s chakra boiled up inside my chest, spreading like translucent reddish gas over my vision and the immediate meter or so of air directly around me. Then it solidified, condensed, and an orange thing swept across my field of vision from the left—

—oh hell it’s a tail when did I get a tail—

—and smashed tip-first into them, sending the first man slamming into the other and shoving them both across the clearing at speeds that would have made Sensei proud. When the orangey chakra limb pulled back, I could see spikes forming along the length of it, with the end spines curving into what looked like a caricature of a human hand.

…Okay. Autonomous demon chakra cloak. Great. Clearly I needed to be ready for my flesh to start boiling off any minute.

I swallowed hard. I was…almost sure I shouldn’t have been entering Version 1 Chakra Cloak or growing tails until I was angry. And, well, I was but I wasn’t. Adrenaline was probably making a mockery out of me, but I was sure I wasn’t feeling anything like what Naruto had gone through at the Valley of the End. There was no way.

End it quickly.

…Okay. Yeah, whoops, running out of time. All of it.

“Tsuruya, hold down the fort.” I told him, and damn if my voice didn’t sound like I’d been a smoker for ages. Woo.

“Of course, Keisuke-sama.”

I didn’t want to see the look on Rin’s face. Not when I was starting to feel my skin burn.

I charged.

The first Kiri-nin to get in my way got smashed flat against the ground by my brand new chakra appendage. He might have survived, I suppose, if I hadn’t dragged my chakra scalpels across his face and throat a moment later.

I spun, Isobu’s chakra flowing in weirdly unsynchronized movements that were alternately too fast or too slow by bursts. As a Kiri-nin’s blade passed overhead, I went low and introduced him to a double-mule kick that probably didn’t need to be reinforced with Tailed Beast chakra but was anyway.

Brained the next one with a backhanded punch.

And by that point, I had made it over to where Kakashi and Obito were continuing their do-si-do session against the idiots in flat masks.

“Kei!” Obito said, once he spotted me—not hard, given the “perpetual motion murder machine” impression—and Guruguru had shot a spike of his own flesh through the clingiest Kiri-nin. There. Free of enemies for a moment.

I smiled weakly. “Hey, Obito. Long time no see.”

“No kidding! Um…wait.” He paused. Then, “What the hell is going on?”
Oh, Obito.

And, well, Kakashi. Gotta take care of that. Kakashi’s final opponent was smashed off-course and into a tree trunk by the chakra tail I had at hand, while he stood there with his next kunai raised and sparking. Then he lowered his hand and turned back to me.

Somewhat unsurprisingly, he was looking at me like I was about to explode at any second. Probably actually a thing!

Still. Obito. Been out of the loop for months. Filling him in, right.

“That…is a very long story.” I said. “But the short version goes like this: I was kidnapped by a white not-human thing that knew Wood Release, Kakashi and Rin-chan busted in to save me, turns out I am the current container of the Three-Tailed Beast as of ten minutes ago, we were fighting the guards and stuff, and now you’re here. And not dead. How the hell did that happen?”

I got all of that out in two breaths and felt immensely, disproportionately proud of myself for a few seconds.

“…What? Man, what the hell!” I wanted to hug Obito for his sheer indignation at the entire situation, though Isobu’s chakra would probably make that a bad idea. “I’m gone for a few months and this happens?”

“This had nothing to do with you.” Kakashi said, but he sounded more tired than anything, really.

“It has everything to do with me!” Obito argued. He was getting angry. What? “The only guy I know who has Wood Release is Zetsu, and he’s creepy and white and talks about poop with Guruguru and he was the one to tell me you guys were in trouble.”

…What the fuck.

“We would never do something like that!” Guruguru protested, spines wiggling.

I was glad Obito was in the middle of an astonishing epiphany that took me a while even though I had all (most of) the goddamn cards, but maybe it wasn’t a good idea to have it when he was wearing the thing that had helped him massacre the Kiri-nin and could easily do the same to all of us.
You know, just for safety’s sake.

“If it helped the old man keep me there, you would.” Obito said darkly.

His eye was spinning.

Kakashi’s was, too. “…So this is what attacked the camp and is responsible for this mess?”

…For some reason, I couldn’t stop myself from putting my two cents in. “I’m not even sure what Kiri had to do with it. The mind-control seal I have is the same as the one in all of them.”

Kakashi’s expression was downright murderous.

That was when Guruguru spat Obito out, launching him at me. I managed to shove Isobu’s chakra aside in order to catch him without burning him, but my sealing scrolls slipped out of my sleeves. At the same time, Guruguru threw himself backward and started to reassemble himself into a vaguely humanoid shape, while Kakashi tore after him, Chidori sparking.

Crap, crap, crap. Time to put all my excess energy to good use. I shoved Obito back onto his feet and concentrated on keeping the bubbling Tailed Beast chakra from affecting my thought process more than it already had.

And... Kakashi shouldn’t have been doing that.

Isobu’s chakra slammed down between them, forcing Kakashi to skid to a halt even as Guruguru’s spikes shot through the empty space he would have occupied. As it was, the tail absorbed the hit and started to burn through the spiraling spines, forcing Guruguru to stop attacking too.

The Zetsu variant’s hollow eye socket was burning into both Obito and I.

“I am so glad I was training that whole time.” Obito stage-whispered in my ear.

“You’re taking this well.” I replied, eyes still on the living suit of armor.

Kakashi skirted the edge of Isobu’s chakra and made his way over to us in a deadly silence. I withdrew Isobu’s tail, and watched as Guruguru melted away into the ground.

“What is that thing?” Kakashi asked, his tone as cold as I’d ever heard.

“It’s, uh—he’s kind of like a clone.” Obito said. “He works for Madara, so—”

“Madara?” Kakashi demanded.

I shook my head and he bit down on whatever else he was going to say.

“—So he’s way stronger than he should be.” Obito finished. I wondered what he was thinking of. Any particular incident. “Tsunade-strong.”

“Tsuruya, get Rin off the ground!” I roared, and watched as my summon immediately snatched the concussed medic up and onto her back. Tsuruya was in the air in seconds, even with Pakkun and Bull riding shotgun on her back and keeping Rin on board.

“What are we going to do?” Obito didn’t have the kind of visual range we needed—though, to be more accurate we needed someone with a Byakugan looking straight down.

Sure, Kakashi and Obito might have had a sort of Rinnegan multi-vision-thing going, but…

And then an echoing voice said, “Spoiled little children should learn to play by the rules.” Guruguru surged out of the ground behind Kakashi. Everyone jolted in shock and we all nearly made it out of his reach, but his hand still managed to close on Kakashi’s shoulder.

Guruguru only needed contact to kill.

I saw red. Isobu’s chakra reached out, twisting one tail into two, coming at the Zetsu clone from both sides—

—Kakashi was already moving, Rasengan in his hand—

—And Obito was moving, too. I could feel his chakra twist—the betrayal, the anger, the no I need to be stronger faster better—and knew his eye was evolving because so was Kakashi’s, like a mirror, and—

Two tanned hands, one over the other, came to rest on Guruguru’s back. The faint sound of crisp paper was all that told me that there was a paper seal involved. Mine.
“Chakra-Suppressing Seal.”

And it was Sensei, oh god, how did he fucking do that.

Guruguru spasmed, releasing his hold on Kakashi just in time to take a Rasengan to the face-analogue because our team’s mini-jōnin played for keeps, making his body explode from the neck on up. Sensei ducked underneath Isobu’s tails, as though he played Limbo with Tailed Beasts all the goddamn time, dragged Kakashi out of the way, and Guruguru got smashed between them. Obito shot over it all, tucking and rolling in midair and landing on the opposite side of the subdued and possibly dead Zetsu clone.

At most, Isobu’s tails might have clipped the ends of Sensei’s hair. Oh, and killed Guruguru. That was cool too.

…My brain was fucking fried.

“We don’t have enough chakra to survive this.” The Dreamer’s voice was saying.

And why the hell was my mindscape dark?

Wait. Back up. Turn the damned lights on!

Oh, hey. I blinked.

Lights went on. Cool. Distinctively red light, since Isobu was now in residence, but it was light even if it wasn’t steady and it really reminding me of a submarine’s warning lights—like, before the vessel sunk. In a terminal sort of way.

The Dreamer was barely more than a shattered torso and half a head, with all of her limbs drifting off into scattered motes of dust. She looked like…I don’t know, like any Claymore after fighting Priscilla, like what happened when someone took machine gun fire across the torso. Only, you know, no blood was involved. Id, somewhere below us, had lost her human form and morphed into a sort of humanoid thing with massively extended, rubberized arms that circled Isobu’s neck and head twice or more. I could only tell what she was based on the process of elimination.

“…Um.” I said, feeling very stupid.

“I’ve crossed the event horizon already.” The Dreamer drifted along, upside-down. Her remaining eye wasn’t tracking my movement at all.

“What the hell does that mean?” I asked, even though I was already almost sure of the answer. But I had to ask.
Some things have to be said aloud.

“…I expended our combined Yin chakra to maintain control over the Three-Tails and over Madara’s seal.” Her voice was distant and fading. “…my existence is at an end.”

Oh.

Given that the Dreamer had been my backup (in the electronic sense as well as the figurative one), a sort of reminder app and a sounding board, I could guess how that would work. I’d lose everything that made me more than just Keisuke Gekkō, chūnin-level shinobi of Konohagakure. I… didn’t necessarily know what that meant—I mean, I was more than just a collection of pop-culture references. I was more than my “foreknowledge.” I didn’t know what being really reset to age thirteen would mean.

Nothing good, probably. And there would be problems if it meant me-at-thirteen or Kei-at-thirteen. Without my context, Kei was someone entirely different from the girl my teammates knew. But without Kei’s context, I would be useless.

“I….I guess we find out what happens when I lose my adult mind, huh?” I said, numb.

“NoT qUiTe.” Id’s voice was hideously distorted, and she shot up toward us without letting go of Isobu’s head. It was the kind of thing that would have fit in well in, say, One Piece, but reminded me of Slenderman instead.

The Dreamer’s sole remaining eye blinked, once. “…she’s correct.”

Id’s voice was still disturbing, as was the way her grin stretched a little past what would have fit on her face. Oh dear. Alice in Wonderland indeed. “We ArE pLaNnInG sOmEtHiNg FoR tHaT. eVeN tHoUgH wE wOn’T eXiSt AfTeR…”

One of the Dreamer’s arms came back together, though it still looked like a visual glitch. She put that hand in mine. Id, on the other hand, grew another jet-black tendril that looped around my other wrist like a bracelet.

“…Goddamn it.” I said. I had an idea of what they were going to do, and couldn’t even decide what part of myself to be angry at.

“…my chakra will reinforce our seals. Both of them…” The Dreamer’s eye went unfocused again. “…I’m sorry it has to be like this…”

“hEhEhEh! I’m NoT! tHe WoRlD iS wAiTiNg FoR yOu.”

The memory cloud, buzzing around us, condensed.

"...Preparing data dump."

…this was going to hurt.

There was a sensation like a sledgehammer to the head, and a bubbling in my veins. Then falling.

I woke feeling like someone had run me over with a truck.

Worse yet, not all that much time had passed. I could still feel the aftermath of the power high kicking around—ergo, I hurt like hell, and was shaking rather badly. So I hadn’t been out that long.
If I’d managed to be transported home and to the hospital, I probably would have just felt like lead. As it was, I was sort of regretting the fact that this was not the case.

I sat up anyway, though, since I could feel a branch underneath me instead of bare stone and need to figure out why that I had changed.

And…I kind of cracked Kakashi in the forehead in an impromptu headbutt.

“Of all the stupid—quit standing over me!” I hissed, clutching my head. Ow, ow, headache from earlier emphatically not gone, ow.

But instead of running away like he usually did, Kakashi immediately squished me in a hug.

…Bwuh?

I looked over his shoulder, to where Sensei was sitting with Obito and Rin and Tsuruya was standing over them all like a gigantic living umbrella. They were well within reach, and were facing my way. Obito also kind of looked like he wanted to get in on the hug business, but since Rin was also kind of glued to his side and Sensei had one hand clamped down on his arm, that didn’t seem to be in the cards.

“I’m okay.” I told Kakashi, patting his back awkwardly.

“…We’ll see about that.” Kakashi allowed, and gave me one last squeeze before letting go and sitting back on his heels. That gave me enough space to try and get my bearings properly, at least.

Yeah. Gonna have to be sure. “Sensei, I…I think we need to use the other seals.”

Sensei nodded, and held up one of my scrolls. It was blank, used up. “Evil Sealing Method? Already done.” At my blank look, Sensei continued, “Kakashi told me about the mind-control seal. Ingenious but evil, and also easily shut down.”

He patted my shoulder, but my mind was already whirling as I looked down at the exposed strip of skin on my chest. I couldn’t see anything aside from the barely-visible seal holding Isobu back, which was already fading into invisibility as I watched.

“It’s on your back, Kei-kun.” Sensei told me.

…Well, I knew who I’d bet on if Sensei ever had to throw down with Orochimaru.

“And the Three-Tails?” I asked.

“Modified the existing seal with a couple of safety releases. You’ll hold until we get back to Konoha.”

…Well, damn. There went most of my immediate personal worries.

Still… “What about Obito?” I asked sharply.

“Obito?” Sensei’s expressed shifted to concern in an instant and he pulled back from his sole shirtless student to get a better look. Rin also moved out of the way to give Sensei a better chance to examine Obito.

“Kei, I feel fine! There’s nothing…” Obito began, then stopped at the look on Sensei’s face. I was sure that mine and Kakashi’s matched it.
“Actually, there is. How could I have missed this…?” Sensei ended up trailing off into a mumble. “Kei-kun?”

“Sensor. Also got a look at like twenty other ones.” I wobbled a hand in midair to indicate ‘more or less.’ I’d initially been in blinding pain, after all. “The Kiri-nin.”

“Well, now they’re all too dead to be much use for templates, but I see what you mean.” Sensei replied. He seemed to bite down on the inside of his cheek, thinking carefully. “This isn’t the place for this discussion. Now that everyone’s awake, we need to get out of here.”

“Are we going home?” Rin asked, her voice very small and a little strained.

“Yes, via someplace else.” Sensei stood. “All right, everyone up.”

We stood.

“Link hands.”

We all did. Tsuruya also ducked her head, resting her beak on my shoulder.

“Reverse Summoning Jutsu.”

…There was a sensation like going through a Portkey—yes, the iconic fishhook behind the navel, yay—and then a crapton of smoke and also feeling like gravity was out to lunch for a moment. Then Kakashi and Rin’s hands left mine and, quite suddenly, I smacked face-first into a turf while my sense of balance was still shot. Blech.

Suffice to say that I was never summoning Tsuruya frivolously ever again.

“Rin-chan, Kakashi, Obito, Kei-kun, Pakkun…” Sensei was muttering as I got up, sounding like he was trying to keep track of a kindergarten class on a field trip.

As I started to pick grass out of my clothes, Kakashi was chatting with both of his dogs in a very low voice. Rin swayed, only to be steadied by Tsuruya’s wing, and Sensei’s hand was on Obito’s shoulder again. We all felt tired—well, us kids more than Sensei, for all that he’d done three sealings in less than an hour and probably been fighting before that—and I was mostly just glad that I couldn’t feel anything remotely related to a Zetsu in the area.

…Speaking of which, aside from us, there weren’t any human chakra signatures either.

Looking around, I was left with the impression that I’d dropped into Alice in Wonderland by accident, or perhaps ended up somewhere in Kusagakure again. While there was short grass, some of which had gotten in my face, mostly the stuff that stood out included oversized leaves, brightly colored toadstools, and the sound of distant running water. And not just streams—I was thinking of an actual, worth-putting-on-a-map waterfall.

“Sensei, where are we?” Obito asked, looking up at the nearby stone monuments through his bangs. In fact…

Wait. He would have had to arrange it ahead of time, but…

“Welcome to Mount Myōboku, home of the toads.” Sensei told us, grinning.

Tsuruya shook out her wings, looking around. “This place is much larger than I expected…”

“Some of the toads are pretty big, too.” Sensei’s gaze swept along all three summons in our group.
“Can you all get home from here?”

“Easily.” Tsuruya said. She twisted her neck around so that she could see Pakkun and Bull. “Do you mind if I fly you home?”

“It would probably be best.” Pakkun said, before nosing his master’s palm. “Later, Kakashi.”

Kakashi nodded.

As the dogs scrambled up onto Tsuruya’s back, Rin moved over to lean on me, instead. The huge crane gave us all one last bow before running off, flapping her wings in long strokes that quickly lifted her skyward. Within moments, all three of them were out of sight.

“…Is there any chance that the toads could think she was a bug?” I asked.

“No.” Sensei gave me a funny look. Well, better than a suspicious look…

“Why here, Sensei?” Obito broke in, before pausing to blow his bangs out of his face.

“It’s the safest place I know of.” Sensei told us. “Not to mention, I managed to send Kōsuke to Jiraiya-sensei, so he should be ready to summon us back to Konoha when we’re finished here. Gama should be able to give us a hand.”

“Gama”? Or Gamabunta? Hell if I knew. With Gamabunta being a boss summon, I’m still not sure if he would take issue with being used as a glorified taxi, but it ended up not really coming up.

Sensei led us past the groves of gigantic foliage, even if he ended up having to carry Rin on his back. Obito seemed okay—Madara’s seal wasn’t kicking in, despite Sensei not dealing with it yet—and stuck close to Sensei anyway. I was itching to examine his discolored arm, because I wasn’t sure if that was something Madara had ripped off of White Zetsu or if it was something else. I didn’t, though. Kakashi stayed pretty quiet, but I reached out and he took my hand for at least a couple of seconds, so at least I knew we were doing all right.

I still owed him an explanation, and I doubted he’d forgotten.

And then we got out of the forest.

As the environment really opened up, I was struck by how extreme the topography was.

The path Sensei had been following ended when the oversized toadstools and clover did, fanning outward and a little as though we were walking through a giant toad’s footprint. I looked up, and in the distance could make out a mountain that seemed more of a perfect cone than any lava-spewing geological feature would ever be. There were more of them all around, reminding me of the time I’d visited southern China and been baffled by the limestone pillars that made the region so distinct. Much closer, though, were gigantic gold-yellow shafts of what looked like bamboo arced overhead, before disgorging hundreds of gallons of water from their tips.

“This place is weird.” I said.

Sensei bit down on a snicker.

“Are we going to see the Grand Toad Sage?” Kakashi asked.

“Mn, no.” Sensei shifted Rin’s weight on his back, but didn’t complain that she’d fallen asleep again. “We’re going to meet up with Gama and possibly Gerotora to get a ride home.”
…Wait. Gerotora was…that scroll toad thing. Huh. What the hell was “Gama,” then?

…Eh. I decided I didn’t care. To be honest, tragedy only ever hit our team like a tire iron whenever Sensei wasn’t around, so I wasn’t worried that we’d end up with a horrible fate while walking among the toad clan. No Velociraptors here!

And the more I thought about topography and genetically-modified dinosaurs, the less I had to think about the eerie silence inside my head.

Of course, thinking about not thinking about it didn’t work. Never does.

The problem with letting my mind wander while adjusting to new formatting, though, was that it was very easy for my crazy thoughts to ping off of something suspect. My headspace was full of memory fragments running loose like sheep without a herder, and it was only a matter of time until one of them tried to butt me back over the fence.

I was mixing metaphors a lot there, but it had to do with my scrambled state of mind. My mind was so scrambled, in fact, that I must have zoned out for quite a while.

For one thing, I ended up feeling Kakashi try to get my attention while my brain was on walkabout before I noticed his chakra move, mainly by prodding my arm. For another, I walked right into Obito’s back.

“You all right, Kei?” Obito asked, catching me when I wobbled.

I bonked him in the shoulder with my forehead. “…no.”

“Do you need someone to carry you?” Obito scratched the side of his nose with his left hand, as though he still wasn’t entirely used to his artificial right arm yet.

“…no, thanks.” I wanted to drop off to sleep, even if doing so would probably herald the first night terrors I’d had in years, if things were going to revert to before Inoshi walked around in my head. Also, my pride wouldn’t let me do that.

“Kei-kun.” Sensei said over his shoulder, but when I looked up he was giving Kakashi a wordless order.

“You can’t walk without hitting something.” Kakashi said.

“Can too.” I said.

“Can’t.”

“Can!”

“Kei-kun, just let Kakashi lead you. All right?” Sensei interrupted before we could really get going, sadly.

“…Fine.” I sighed. Okay, back to hand-holding, but with more belligerence!

I felt like I’d been demoted to preschool.

Though the first time Kakashi yanked me back upright when I slumped, accompanied by a toneless, “We don’t need you cracking your head open on a rock,” I at least tried to pay more attention.

So…fucking…tired…
There was no answer.

It was about then that I realized that Kakashi hadn’t actually lowered his headband. In fact, his three-tomoe Sharingan was locked on me, spinning. I compounded my mistake by making eye contact with it.

SON OF A BI—!
I woke up again, feeling less like roadkill.

I was three-for-three in passing out, flipping out, or otherwise losing the thread of reality. Having noted this pattern, I decided that the best thing to do would not be to sit up and possibly hit a certain asshole mini-jōnin in the face, but instead to lie on whatever I was already lying on and try to take stock without opening my eyes.

Okay. So.

I was lying on something that felt like a gigantic leaf, at least without any additional visual info. My outer shirt and jacket were gone, and I could feel something wrapped around both my arms, and something else stuck to my back. Flexing my fingers and toes was easy enough, though I felt stiff and I didn’t have my shoes or forearm holsters on for whatever reason. After a second or two, I prodded cautiously at the world around me with my chakra sense.

Rin was lying down, curled onto her side with her back to my right side. From her chakra, she was relaxed and exhausted but not asleep, and not in any particular pain. Small mercies, I suppose.

Sensei was…somewhere about ten meters away, and his chakra was jumping a little as he (probably) talked to one of the Mount Myōboku residents. Ergo, some kind of giant frog, given the shape it had. Kakashi was close to him, probably close enough to be soaking up whatever relevant information there was, like a sponge.

I was distantly glad that Kakashi was out of reach, because I kind of wanted to punch him into the sun. You know, in a “I am going to do something I regret if I am tempted” kind of sense.

Obito, on the other hand, seemed to be…kind of putting himself through some kind of exercise regimen, alongside yet another toad. For some reason, the toad that came to mind was big and green and wore lipstick, though damn if I knew why. Not all of my disorganized memories had slotted into place yet. I’d have to get up and check to be sure, and I didn’t really want to do much moving around anyway.

I kind of wished I’d gotten around to writing them down, but then, anything I wrote down could be decoded or stolen. And that wouldn’t do anyone any good.

I opened my eyes.

Okay. Lying under a big leaf, too. Lilypad? What do I know about toad architecture, anyway? I decided not to worry about it.

…Turns out sitting up, on its own, gave me a lot to think about. I bent my knees in order to sort of roll upright as I swung my legs, but stopped halfway to get a look at myself. Resting my forearms on my bent knees and feet flat on the ground, I tried to take stock.

I was bandaged from my knuckles to the lowest curve of my shoulders, and moving my fingers confirmed the feeling of burn cream and herbal medicine dried onto my suspiciously-pink skin. I was wearing nothing shirt-wise other than a training bra and had more burn medicine smeared across my stomach and chest. There were adhesive gauze patches stuck to the left side of my ribs, my right shoulder, and the side of my neck. There was another large, flat gauze pad stuck to my back, directly spanning the space between my shoulder blades. And if I moved my legs, I could feel more bandages and more burn cream on my legs, under my pants.

About the only particular patch of skin that wasn’t in some way treated was the center of my chest, which was where Isobu’s seal was a washed-out gray on my skin.

Looking at it, even upside-down, I could confirm a couple of different things. One, the seal had originally only had four “locks,” shall we say. Sealing large or powerful things required a minimum of three “corners” on which to rotate the prisoner’s chakra and maintain seal stability. Four was barely above that, but it was also indicative of a different sealing style. If I remembered correctly, four was the base number that Uzumaki sealing styles used, and more durable for it.

Naruto’s seal had comprised eight trigrams, was composed by one of the greatest seal masters ever, and had Shinigami backup. Mine was stuck at four, sealed by an asshole who didn’t even have the decency to die in the process, and designed to be temporary. The four alone might not have been enough to hold off Isobu’s mental influence, though, so Sensei had added the Five Elements Seal on top.

…Which had the neat and rather depressingly effective ability to fuck with my chakra control like no one’s business.

I’d have to ask about getting it removed. Hopefully, Sensei would have better options for reinforcement.

Looking around, I quickly located my jacket and my mesh shirt. After some consideration, I left the jacket—which had been somewhat thoroughly shredded, even if I couldn’t remember quite how—and pulled the shirt over my head with minimal difficulty. And since for some reason my shoes were nowhere to be found, I got up and walked barefoot out into the sun. Rin could nap without me, I reasoned, and I needed to know things more than I needed to spend the rest of the day snoozing.

Though I admit that it would have been nice.

Also, no one was telling me not to get up and walk and I wasn’t in much pain, so I suppose it was all right.

The sun felt nice, really. It was another way, for me, of confirming that I was still alive and also not in immediate danger of losing that status. Hopefully.

I mean, it was the region owned by toad summons. People couldn’t get here without a map, a compass, a guide, and a sextant. I was pretty sure that meant that Madara couldn’t have seeded the area with spies, or done the Orochimaru thing with the seals Obito and I were still probably carrying —why would he?

…Speaking of which, I had a theory about why Sensei had brought us here rather than straight back to Konoha.
Sometimes I wished I could turn my brain off and watch TV like I used to.

It took a bit, but eventually I found all the boys.

Obito was indeed mimicking a big green frog with lipstick, Sharingan out and spinning as he copied the katas. I couldn’t remember his name, but he didn’t seem to be half as resentful of Obito’s spirited mimicry as he would with Naruto during Sage training. Maybe it was the fact that Obito was laughing at himself the entire time, flailing around in a shirt that was two to four sizes too big for him and probably belonged to Sensei. The ends of the sleeves flopped around well past his fingertips, and he seemed thoroughly distracted.

Kakashi was sitting on a huge curved leaf, sort of like the one that Rin and I had been napping under, and watched Obito and his new frog buddy dance. From his chakra, I could feel a bizarre mix of mild envy, lingering surprise, and a sort of belated happiness, which I decided made sense. I still wanted to punch him into next week, though, and didn’t go talk to him. I only met his eyes for a moment, and he looked away first. I didn’t need to talk to him.

Instead, I headed toward Sensei.

Sensei was, for his part, talking to a triad of toads. One was a large, orange-and-blue-striped creature with prominent spikes over both eyes. Even sitting, it was about three times as tall as Sensei was and a good dozen times as wide, if not more. It wore a ceremonial necklace with beads as large as a man’s ribcage, and had a belly band running across its midsection. He also wasn’t talking. But on his forelegs, dwarfed in comparison, were two tiny toads that were oddly familiar.

Shima (off-yellow with purple highlights and lipstick) and Fukasaku (green with a goatee, fuzzy eyebrows, and a topknot)—also known as two of the most powerful masters of toad Sage arts, and some of the only people alive who could call Jiraiya “-chan.”

“…Minato-chan, your student is right behind you.” Shima was saying.

Well, so much for being able to eavesdrop. Oh well.

Sensei turned and blinked at me for a moment, before saying, “I didn’t expect you to be up already.” He knelt next to me as both cat-sized toads hopped off of Gama, making me feel a little cornered. He had my wrist in his hand practically before I noticed, and turned my arm carefully. “Are you feeling all right?”

“Stiff, and my chakra control’s awful.” I said bluntly. I tapped my chest with my free hand and Sensei had the decency to look a little apologetic. “But I’m not on fire or melting, so I guess that’s okay.”

“That’s what I like to hear.” He let go of my wrist and, somewhat hesitantly, ruffled my hair again. Back to old times, really.

“You set very low standards.” I told him.

“True. But I think that I’m justified.” Sensei nodded at Obito, who was laughing at Kakashi, who had been the victim of a Water jutsu from the lipstick frog while I wasn’t looking. I could only imagine what had triggered it.

“…Point.” I gave up. Then another thought hit me. “Wait a minute. I still have all my skin. How did that happen?”

“You had help, Keisuke-chan.” Shima piped up from around shin height.
I sat down so she could speak to me eye-to-eye, since I didn’t want her to have to climb on Sensei. “I didn’t know toads had medics.” I admitted. Most of the toads Jiraiya and Naruto favored were powerful fighters, rather than supporting units.

“Well, of course we do.” Shima patted my bandaged hands. “And of course little Rin-chan helped. Wore herself out that way, sadly, but you’re both fine.”

“Being a jinchūriki helped.” Fukasaku added. He crossed his arms. Forelegs. Whatever. “A normal human probably wouldn’t have lasted so long, and definitely wouldn’t recover quickly.”

At that moment, I was sort of belatedly trying to decide whether to take offense or not. The word “jinchūriki” was used to mean “Tailed Beast Host,” but its literal translation was “power of human sacrifice.” Often, the people carrying Tailed Beasts around weren’t considered human, and treated accordingly. At most, a lot of hosts had lonely, miserable lives if their status was known, and a number of them had gone berserk. It reinforced the public perception of hosts as inhuman monsters. Whether the incidents were due to seal degradation or accumulated mental trauma, I couldn’t really say. I only had about, what, ten examples? Much as I hated to rely too heavily on scientific methodology when it came to people, I didn’t know enough about seals, people’s lives, or the effects of one on the other to be sure.

I was currently Isobu’s metaphorical landlord, so I got an automatic pass into a club I wasn’t sure I wanted to be in. Too late for that now, though. Anytime I talked about the issue, I’d have to use “us” instead of “they.” It hardly made sense to disqualify myself from host status when I knew I’d start hearing Isobu eventually.

“Kei-kun, are you listening?” Sensei asked.

“Not really.” I mumbled, balancing my head on one hand. Shima let go of my other one, though my brain decided to continue spinning even with both hands to support it.

“As we were saying, Minato-chan, it really would be best if we could get everyone together again.” Fukasaku said, as Shima climbed up to sit on my knee. “The Great Toad Sage may not be as quick as he used to be, but he did say there was something important we had to all know.”

My train of thought basically went “Great Toad Sage equals prophecy equals important therefore Jiraiya.”

…Or, in a more coherent way, everyone involved with the toad summon contract was usually obligated to shut the fuck up and pay attention. I didn’t know how many prophecies the gigantic old toad usually made, but he was famous for being accurate. Far beyond the usually Harry Potter sort of way that most fortune-tellers had. Or the Oracle of Delphi, I suppose.

“Who did he ask for?” Sensei asked, brows furrowed.

“Jiraiya-chan, of course, and you.” Shima said. “But also your students, and a girl with long red hair. I don’t suppose you know someone like that?”

Sensei, I noticed, had gone a little pale.

“…It’d be best if we sent a messenger to Konoha.” Sensei said, closing his eyes. “Kōsuke, if he’s back already, or maybe Gekomatsu. Have him ask Jiraiya-sensei and Kushina-chan to come along. We…may be here a while.”

“What about Rin-chan?” I asked. Both of the sages looked at me. “Rin isn’t one of Sensei’s students, but…”
“She can stay.” Shima said firmly.

And that was the end of that.

Messages were sent, and people were summoned through bizarre methods I would have to research later. We didn’t see much in the way of results for a while, though, so that meant waiting.

Also, Obito finally had a chance to vent while we were waiting.

“I can’t believe he thought I was going to fall for that!” Obito was saying, waving his arms with the sleeves of his shirt rolled back to his wrists, so he could gesticulate properly. “I mean, yeah, maybe I owed the old man a thing or two since he pulled me out of a rockslide and stitched me back together, but that’s not enough to excuse anything he’s done.”

Rin had gotten up at some point and was sitting between Kakashi and Obito. I could feel her attention jump back and forth between everyone in our little circle, since Sensei was off arguing with a messenger toad about summoning weight limits or something.

I was lying down, eyes closed, and trying not to think about the knot in my stomach. I was a little distracted by a feeling of impending doom, but I didn’t mind letting him ramble.

“I told Sensei everything I could remember. The network of Zetsu clones and, um, then there was the thing about the statue. What was that thing, anyway?” Obito then abruptly switched to, “And I guess Madara’s gotten so old he really is senile, because his evil master plan is a dream world. Like a permanent genjutsu, but powered by the freaky old statue? If it could boost Guruguru, I guess it could give more power to a genjutsu, but…”

Thank the Powers That Be that he hadn’t managed to lose his optimism after months in that pit.

“But telling Sensei kind of doesn’t work ‘cause I already did it and then I remembered about the Zetsu clones.” Obito frowned. “I don’t know how many there are, and there’s a good chance one of them saw our fight and told Madara to leave. I mean, I don’t know if he can but that’s the idea. He’d probably break a hip. Better to let the statue do everything.”

“I just don’t see how a huge evil statue makes any sense.” Rin said. “At all.”

“Well, it could move. It was really freaky when it moved, since it spends all its time with its hands over its face, but it’s not really a statue either.” Obito paused. “Maybe a really weird summon? Kei, what do you think?”

Well, having an idea of what statue Obito was talking about… “I think that if there is a thing that exists at the end of the universe and eats time, that statue is its bastard grandchild.”

“…What?” Kakashi said.

“Never mind.” No one here had heard of Weeping Angels. Or of Anima. And no one there had heard of the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path.

Kakashi’s chakra maintained its nonplussed sensation.

“And it had ten eyes.” Obito went on, as though he had never asked for my opinion. “And it looked like those mummies, you know, from the reports about people who get hit with Scorch Release bloodlines? Only it was even bigger than the Hokage Monument!”

“You were in a cave.” Rin pointed out.

Obito pouted. “It was a big cave.”

I also thought that the aforementioned statue was basically a gigantic Diglett. Tunneled like a champ, but through space-time. I didn’t share that thought with them, though.

Or maybe it was the thing under a Diglett. No one ever checked.

“So, anyway, I didn’t wake up and see all of that for a while. I mean, it wasn’t so long that my hair grew out—that happened later—but I think Madara must have used the seal then. When I think about him sticking his claws…” Obito trailed off, shuddering.

“The seal doesn’t actually require open heart surgery, Obito.” I told him.

“Doesn’t matter!” Obito argued. “You weren’t there and I didn’t wake up for a while and augh.”

“Didn’t Sensei take care of it?” I asked Kakashi, since Obito seemed to be in the middle of whatever he was doing. Histrionics, probably.

“He did. Then he went back and tightened the securing seals on yours and told us to wait for a second opinion.” Kakashi answered. I still wasn’t actually looking at him, because that would probably remind me to attempt murder.

No, I still wasn’t over the hypnosis thing.

“Will you stop moping? Kakashi used the Sharingan on you like you asked!” Rin said.

What?

When…did I…?

“When your second personality took over, she made a request.” Kakashi said. It wasn’t really an explanation, but I was filling in the blanks anyway.

That bitch. That horrible, stupid, brave…

“Whoa, what? Kei, you don’t have a second personality, do you?” Obito asked.

I opened my eyes and sat up abruptly. I looked around at my friends, who were giving me various degrees of the Funny Look, and said, “I never told her to do anything other than keep us alive.” I held up a finger. “Further, just because she and I shared a body doesn’t mean she gets to call the shots after she’s dead. Further again, yes, they’re both reincorporated, and shut up.”

And then I flopped back down, unsure why the hell I was even angry but prepared to wallow in it anyway.

“…How long have you had other personalities?” Rin wanted to know.

“Since I was eight and my dad took me to a Yamanaka and the mind technique he used did weird things,” was my response. Accurate as anything. Probably more accurate than whatever I’d theorized before, even. Yamanaka mind-walking plus weird shit equaled weirder shit.

“So, wait, you’ve been walking around with extra voices since we met?” Obito looked stunned.
“No, it was after.” Which wasn’t the point, and I could see that he didn’t appreciate the technicality.
“Look, yes, I’ve had two extra personalities in my head for a while and thanks to pressure from the events of the last day or so, they’ve been squashed back into me. But up until then, I never lost control or blacked out unless you count occasional sleepwalking.”

I’d never sleepwalked, actually, but let them believe that I had and maybe they’d stop being so nosy.

…if the Dreamer hadn’t reincorporated, I would have wondered where this sudden urge to explain things came from. As she had, I didn’t.

“But that doesn’t make any sense!” Rin argued. I blinked at her. “Why would your dad take you to a Yamanaka if you were fine before? Was there some reason you needed to be put through that?”

“Rin-chan… I’m not sure you noticed, but I am okay. As in, ‘not dead’ and ‘not on a murderous rampage,’ sure, but they helped out.” Because I could channel aggression away from my mind and leave the unbridled energy that made me chatty for the twenty or so minutes Isobu had been raging, and the Dreamer had done her job in the end. Protected us. “It’s fine.”

“Why do people insist on defining ‘okay’ like that?” Rin muttered.

“Uh…” said Obito, who had fulfilled disqualifying one condition or the other in a different timeline, without his knowledge.

“I’m more interested in why you needed to see a Yamanaka in the first place.” Kakashi said bluntly, and yet still not meeting my eyes. He was staring off somewhere to the left, like whatever was over there had given him personal insult and he was about to demand a duel at dawn.

On second thought, maybe it was better that he was glaring at a rock.

And, of course, he asked the big question.

“…Constant night terrors made it impossible for me to sleep at night.” I said after a moment. “They started a little after my brother ended up in the hospital for the first time.”

Aaaaand he was looking at me instead of whatever stupid target had earned his wrath first. Great.

I rolled back into a sitting position, forcing myself to loosen up a little. Still not supposed to choke him for being annoying and not apologizing since anyway I was doing the same thing. Two wrongs, etc. I let myself sit cross-legged and supported my head with one hand, elbow on my thigh. “It was a difficult few years.” But obviously the concerned faces around me weren’t going to be satisfied with that.

…Crap. I obviously couldn’t tell them the entire story. But…

They’d waited long enough, in some respects, for the story of a lifetime. Just not theirs.

“Why didn’t you tell us about any of this stuff?” Obito asked, looking hurt.

“After about the fifth time I dreamed Rin-chan was dead and you were drenched in blood, I figured Dad’s idea of mind-walking had more merit.” Whoops, honesty. Sort of. “Of course, I say that now, but I was eight and still figured Dad knew what to do.” And I’d been so desperate that I’d been willing to trust a mind-reader. Clearly that had been a wonderful, wonderful time. I closed my eyes briefly. “I went to him to get the nightmares to stop, and he did.”

“…I’m almost sorry I asked.” Obito said quietly.
“Don’t be. It’s not like you knew me that well back then.” I shrugged. Kakashi was still staring at me. “And I didn’t know you, Kakashi, so don’t even start. I got used to the idea of not actually needing to think about it.”

“But Kei-senpai…” Rin looked so disappointed that I almost stopped.

Besides, I was a lot better at being disappointed in myself and at that point it had turned into a sort of motivational kick in the pants.

I crossed my arms over my chest, muttering under my breath. “Right. Well. Here I go.” Wow, why was this so hard? Oh right, soul-baring time. Crap.

“What?” Obito asked.

“I’m going to tell a story.” I said, looking between Kakashi and Obito and Rin and hoping I was doing the right thing. “All I ask is that you don’t interrupt, and that you hold questions until the end.” Not like I knew what the end was.

“Am I missing something?” Sensei asked, and every single one of us jumped in surprise, whirling on our butts to look at our newly arrived Sensei.

Well, Sensei plus guests—he was carrying Kushina, and Jiraiya was holding onto his sleeve.

I found my voice first and said, “Well, you’re just in time for the confessional.”

“What’s a confess—OH MY GOD, WHERE HAVE YOU BEEN?!” This last was directed at Obito by a surprised and actually rather angry Kushina, who immediately targeted the wayward Uchiha for a cuddle-tackle.

Obito lost.

“I have to admit, Minato, I never expected one of your students to come back from the dead.” Jiraiya was saying, though I could just barely hear him over the noise generated by Kushina throttling Obito and including Kakashi in the freak-out just as collateral damage. Rin was spared.

I didn’t expect either of the boys to be especially coherent afterward.

“Are you all right?” Sensei asked.

“I’ve been asked that a hundred times today—the honest answer is ‘no,’ but I keep answering ‘yes’ anyway.” I said.

“And you.” Kushina said, leaving the boys where they were. I made a noise like “eep.” I could sass Sensei, but Kushina…haha, no. She’d kill me.

“Uh.” I said.

She hugged me. “Oh, Kei-chan. It’s going to be all right.”

I looked at Sensei over Kushina’s shoulder, who held up his hands to ward off any possible wrathful response and said, “I had to tell her what happened.”

“And you didn’t tell my mother.” I said flatly.

“Oh no, we did.” Kushina interrupted, giving me another squeeze. “And let me tell you, I can see why Minato’s afraid of her.”
“Am not.”

“Are too, infinity.”

Sensei groaned.

“Settle down, kids.” Jiraiya was chuckling, though, which defeated any kind of serious air he was trying to achieve.

At least Kushina didn’t get to go on about “the first thing you have to know about having a demon in your head.” That would have been bad. Also awkward, even though everyone here probably knew and they’d partially been called in to check on the seal.

Shima and Fukasaku had also come back. I didn’t even know where they’d gone, actually—between the two of them, they were probably our babysitters. I remembered vaguely that Shima in particular was one of the greatest sensors alive (with possible allowances made for those whose species couldn’t live for centuries), so it wasn’t like we could have wandered out of her range by accident.

“Can we do something before we go to meet the Great Toad Sage?” I asked everyone.

Jiraiya blinked. “…Why?”

“It’s kind of important and you arrived in the middle of the beginning.” I said, as Kushina finally stopped squishing me. “And…well, you probably deserve to know.”

“I doubt the Great Old Geezer will notice if we’re late.” Shima said, shrugging. “Go on, Keisuke-chan.”

“Uh.” I’d never quite expected to get even that much of an endorsement. “Okay. Everyone sit down first.”

They did. Shima and Fukasaku decided to sit on Jiraiya and Sensei’s shoulders, respectively.

“I’d better start at the beginning.” I muttered, half to myself.

“Is this where you explain why you were carrying around chakra suppressing and seal-canceling seals?” Sensei asked. All of us looked at him. “I just want to point it out. Every other mission has involved explosives, with minimal storage seals. There must have been a reason for you to change your preparations.”

If Sensei wanted to hand me an opportunity, I guess that meant I had to take it, right?

“That’s because I had a hunch they’d be needed.” I said.

“…Huh?” That was Obito.

“You knew there was a chance you’d need to suppress an active seal?” Kakashi demanded.

“Yes.” I said.

“But that’s impossible.” Rin said. “You can’t see the future.”

“The fact that the Great Toad Sage is known for his prophecies says otherwise.” I countered, vaguely aware of the look on Jiraiya’s face. He didn’t exactly seem confused… Well. Anyway. “Remember those dreams I used to have? Well, it turns out that what I was seeing was a combination of the future and the past, usually of people I hadn’t met. And please, can we go back to that thing about not interrupting? That’d be great.”

Everyone decided to stay quiet.

“Starting from about when I was five, I’ve had chronic nightmares. At eight, Dad took me to see Inoshi Yamanaka, which got them mostly under control.” I paused, thinking. “By age nine, I was starting to understand what I was seeing.”

Luckily, Jiraiya was here. Made things a little easier.

“Jiraiya-sama, you had three students in the Land of Rain before the end of the Second Shinobi World War.” I said, and watched Jiraiya blanch. The events of that time had been before I’d ever met anyone connected to the Plot, and should have been impossible for me to know. “Their names are Yahiko, Konan, and Nagato, and Nagato carries the Rinnegan. You thought he was the child of prophecy, because that bloodline was a throwback to the time of the Sage of Six Paths. He and his friends are in the middle of a civil war in Rain, but if things go the way they did when I saw them, only two of them are going to make it out alive.” I looked down. “Yahiko dies to save Konan, who is being held hostage by shinobi from both the Land of Rain and Konoha’s ROOT division. Nagato kills every last one of them, and they never report back to Danzō or Hanzō. Nagato goes on to kill every living person with any connection to Hanzō, completing his takeover.

“Eventually, the organization that those three founded—Akatsuki—will become known as one of the most notorious criminal gangs in the history of the Five Elemental Nations. Their goal is to collect the Tailed Beasts in order to create a superweapon—at least, according to Nagato.” I wasn’t looking at anyone. “Nagato masters the Rinnegan in time, and when it comes time to capture the Nine-Tailed Fox, attacks Konoha. But not before killing you, Jiraiya-sama, when you try to chase down rumors that your students are still alive.

“He, along with Konan, flattens Konoha over the course of an hour. In the search for the then-current host of the Nine-Tailed Fox, he and Konan kill hundreds of shinobi—Kakashi included. The Hokage falls into a coma.” Kakashi’s chakra jumped. I kept going. “And then the Nine-Tailed Beast’s host arrives to see the damage and the death toll, and goes berserk.” Kushina winced. “He’s talked down, though, and beats Nagato into submission instead of killing everyone. He…I guess he’s something else. The child of prophecy, I mean. He talked Nagato out of his plan. Then Nagato dies, using his Rinnegan abilities to revive everyone he killed at the cost of his own life.

“And later, when Konan takes Nagato away for burial and can finally give up the insane dream…the man behind everything appears, and kills her. He takes Nagato’s eyes. He goes on with the plan as though nothing happened.”

I took a deep breath. “That vision doesn’t change. It doesn’t account for change—already, hundreds of parameters have shifted and in all likelihood nothing will turn out that way. But the fact that I was able to act on some of the knowledge I did have—with regards to Tailed Beasts and conspiracies—and change something means that my vision of the future was rigid and is rapidly becoming useless.”

“While that’s an interesting story, Kei-kun, I’m not sure how—Sensei?” Sensei blinked as Jiraiya’s hand came down in front of his face, cutting him off.

“Keisuke,” Jiraiya said to me, “do you have any idea how rare that information is?”

“Yes, actually.” I frowned. “The only people who knew about those three Rain kids were Orochimaru and Tsunade. I know that.”

Jiraiya’s frown was all-encompassing. “What does your gift have to say about the rest of us?”
…Well. Awkward. “You already heard how you died.” I said after a moment. “When they called the Sage of Six Paths that, they weren’t just talking metaphorically. Rinnegan-users can puppet other bodies to use in combat, and at least one of them has the ability to revive the other five if they get disabled. There are six fakes, and one real one.” I’d only seen it twice, but it was enough to guess that the six-spare thing was a rule. “You…didn’t know that. Shima-sama and Fukasaku-sama were with you almost to the end.”

I bit my lip. Kakashi was still staring. “Kakashi, you died of chakra exhaustion. Technically.”

“You’re kidding.” His voice and visible expression were equally nonplussed.

“There was a team of six or seven shinobi trying to take on the Deva Path at the same time. That one had the ability to…well, push things really hard.” I tried to think. “When I say ’push,’ I really mean something more like ‘manipulate gravity.’ You died buying Chōza Akimichi and his son time to escape and warn the rest of the village about his power limitations.” Which didn’t amount to much.

“What happened to Minato and me, though?” Kushina broke in. I gave her a blank look and she said, “You said the host of the Nine-Tailed Fox was a boy. And…and I’m the host now. What happens to us?”

Ah, fuck.

Sensei looked worried. “Kei-kun?”

“In the dreams I had?” I said bleakly. “You were both dead before Kakashi turned fifteen.”

"WHAT." Kushina, again. She struggled for a couple of seconds to get her anger under control before demanding. “How?”

“In about six months, a masked man appears just after your son is born.” I said, imagining the moment even as I spoke. “The…the seal on the Nine-Tails is weaker, after labor, and he broke the seal. Killed everyone in the room just before, so neither of you had backup. Sensei fought him and chased him off eventually, but he controlled the Nine-Tails with his Sharingan and set it on the village.”

“Is that how you knew a Sharingan could control the Three-Tails?” Kakashi asked.

“No. That was a different thing.” For one thing, there were historical records of Madara Uchiha controlling the Nine-Tails in his climactic fight with Hashirama Senju, before Mito Uzumaki sealed it into herself. That last part wasn’t common knowledge, though. And for another, Sasuke of all people had managed to disrupt Naruto pulling out the Nine-Tails’s chakra during their first meeting in Shippūden. That kind of shit was distinctive. “And besides that, I think it only works for three-tomoe Sharingan on up.”

“Uh, Kei, that’s kind of the definition of a fully-evolved Sharingan.” Obito said.

“The Mangekyō Sharingan says otherwise.” I said. I shook my head. “Anyway, Sensei beat it back with Gamabunta. Kushina, you used your chakra chains on the Nine-Tails and tried to pull it back, trying to make it die with you…but it wasn’t enough. You were dying and Sensei was the only one who could…could make the choice.” I blinked rapidly. “You both sealed the Nine-Tails into your newborn son.”

Sensei didn’t have to die that day but he did and they could have saved Kushina too and argh fuck that entire sequence of events with a cactuar.
Sensei and Kushina had both gone deathly white. Rin had both of her hands over her mouth. Kakashi was stock-still, and Obito looked sick. Jiraiya, I noticed distantly, had his hand clenched over his knee.

“I…you knew I was pregnant. That I’d have a boy.” Kushina said after a moment. “That… everything might happen after.”

“I knew you’d have a son, if things went the same. But they won’t.” I looked at Rin. “Rin, did you want to know what happened to you?”

“…No. Not really, but if it helps…?” Rin’s voice was very small.

“If we go by the visions, you died four hours ago.” I said, and pulled my knees up to my chest. “Just goes to show, they really don’t account for variation.”

“What about you?” Kakashi asked.

I smiled darkly. “Funnily enough, I don’t know. I don’t know what the Powers That Be were thinking, showing a girl visions of every single person around her dying horribly, but not going to the normal nightmare stuff.” The persistent nightmares about velociraptors, sadly, were a relic of my old life. The fact that Jeff Goldblum was in them was a hint.

Kakashi frowned anyway. What was his problem?

“How did I die?” Rin asked. Her brown eyes were wide.

…Dammit. Should have bugged Kakashi anyway.

“...Instead of me, you were kidnapped and made into a Tailed Beast host.” I began, hesitant. Well, at least that kind of seemed like it was within the realm of possibility. “You got the same treatment I did, with the mind-control seal, and they told you about it. If you made it back to Konoha without neutralizing it…well, it would be bad. And you’d die anyway, because broken seal or not a Host can’t survive if the Beast is removed. Kakashi was the only one on the rescue mission and he got you as far as we did, this time, before you were both cornered.

“When Kakashi was going to try and fight them off, buying you some time until hell if I know, since it wasn’t like you could run with that many guys on your tail, you…took a different way out.” I swallowed hard. “It turns out that the Chidori can kill a Tailed Beast Host. Especially if she throws herself on it.”

Simultaneously, Kakashi and Rin both paled.

“When Kakashi was going to try and fight them off, buying you some time until hell if I know, since it wasn’t like you could run with that many guys on your tail, you…took a different way out.” I swallowed hard. “It turns out that the Chidori can kill a Tailed Beast Host. Especially if she throws herself on it.”

Simultaneously, Kakashi and Rin both paled.

“Obito, when you broke the tree line and yelled at us? It happened then. That exact second.” I watched Obito turn red.

“That is bullshit.” Obito snapped. “That didn’t happen! You were there, and—!”

“But that’s the point.” Kakashi interrupted, still a little shaky. All of us blinked at him. “Kei, your visions don’t account for your own existence.”

“…Well, yes.” I said blankly. I’d kind of taken that as a given, since I knew the origins of my visions. Of course they wouldn’t account for me. “That kind of plays into the answer to Obito’s question.

“In my visions, I don’t run in the same circles as any of you do.” I said nonchalantly. I’d come to terms with everything quite some time ago, really. And had come up with a talent for understatement that made everything seem a little less horrible in the meantime. “I effectively don’t exist. Instead of Team Minato being made up of Obito Uchiha, me, and Kakashi Hatake, Rin was there instead.”

That sank in. Slowly.

“While I don’t know Rin-chan so well,” Kushina said after a moment, into the silence, “I’m not sure how much that changes the story. She’s a smart girl and a talented medic, and I suppose that none of us would miss you, Kei-chan, because none of us would know there was someone to miss.”

“Exactly.” I agreed. But Rin was normal and I was a specific kind of head case.

I sure as fuck wasn’t normal. Normal only survived so long.

“Strong emotional surges made the visions impossible to control.” I continued, “Even though I had two personalities as pressure release options, it did fail me at least a couple of times.” When Obito got crushed. Mostly just that. “Anyway, I did get a series of compounding bad feelings about Kannabi before we were even really on that mission. Thought I could do something about it. Failed.”

“Kei…” Obito began. I didn’t know if he was going to try to absolve me of blame or what.

“That’s not the worst part. I failed to make a difference while acting on my visions.” I talked right over him. Probably would need to apologize later. “Thing is? The string of events that led to Rin’s death in my visions started there. And what I did— what I failed to do, “—wasn’t enough.” I pinched the bridge of my nose. “If I was so sure that Kannabi was a keystone, I should have done something to keep you away from the rocks, or gotten us all out sooner, or something. Instead, I let my freak-out take over and lo, we all nearly got killed anyway. I was sure you were dead, Obito, and if you could see the things I did…”

“Kei, what happened to me?” Obito asked. “What’s so bad that you’ve skipped over me twice and can’t even look at me right now?”

“…Obito, what do you think would have happened if you had showed up just when it looked like Kakashi was killing Rin-chan?” I asked bleakly, and Obito went pale. “If no one had been able to tell you about the seals, or the kidnapping, or anything about what really happened? What would have happened if you didn’t realize Madara was playing you?” I paused. “Keeping in mind that I effectively didn’t exist in that world. I didn’t know you and you didn’t know me. But Madara knew how the Mangekyō Sharingan can destroy an Uchiha’s sanity when it activates, and it did.”

“Let me show you something.” I said, and sat up a little so I was on my knees instead of my butt. I started drawing a sequence of circles in the dirt—Sharingan designs, from left to right. The leftmost one had only one tomoe, the next had two, and the third had three. The fourth, fifth, and sixth ones rapidly developed into some of the Mangekyō designs I’d seen over the course of what seemed like hundreds of nightmares. Itachi’s—simplest by far, but also overused. The one after that was the one that Kakashi and Obito shared, with more bladelike structures in black than Itachi’s had had, and finally Madara’s Eternal Mangekyō variant. “These are the most prominent Mangekyō Sharingan designs I remember. The middle one is yours.”

“…But I don’t have one.” Obito said weakly.

“And you might never.” I said quietly. “But if you do ever see your Sharingan evolve again, this is what you’ll see in a mirror.” My fingers curled into a fist in the dirt. “It’s…probably one of the strongest ones I’ve ever heard of—it’s the only technique that can stop Madara dead aside from Sage powers. But the cost…”
One dead girl. One dead friend. A few souls, nothing major.

I hated Madara, but losing Izuna broke him as sure as losing Hayate would break me.

“I’m not planning on killing anyone for an eyeball upgrade.” Obito snapped, startling me. As I sat there, sort of surprised that he knew what the cost was, he went on, “Every Uchiha who makes chūnin has a chance to look at clan historical records. I might not be the best Uchiha ever, but there was no way I wasn’t looking up things about my Sharingan even before I got it. I was always worried about falling behind, but the cost of some stuff is just too high.”

“No kidding.” Kushina murmured, shaking her head.

“Why are you only telling us this now?” Jiraiya asked.

“As of about four or five hours ago, we passed the ‘crisis point.’” I said, making air quotes with my fingers. “At least that’s what I called it. At everyone’s blank looks, I explained, “Rin-chan’s death leads to a series of disasters in my visions. Since you didn’t die there, Rin-chan, my visions’ version of events becomes useless.” I shrugged. “Basically, if Rin-chan died, Sensei and Kushina-san would be next. Then Jiraiya-sama, then Fukasaku and Kakashi. Only that didn’t happen, so damned if I know what Madara’s going to do now.”

“So, you’re saying that in the sequence you saw, Madara was the root of everything.” Jiraiya mused. “Is he still alive?”

“He was the last time I saw him.” Obito said, indicating his replacement right arm. Jiraiya fixed him with an intense stare that he ignored. “He’s the one who gave me this arm and put that seal on me. Unless he had Zetsu do it, which is really the same thing…”

“He’ll die sometime in the next thirteen years, if we go by the visions.” I frowned. “Though… I don’t really know if old age finally got him or if he just gave up. In the other world, he had an apprentice to pick up the slack.”

“…God, that Obito you saw must have been an idiot.” Obito huffed.

“No more than anyone at the lowest point in their life, I think.” I offered.

“No, really. Kei, how lonely do you have to be to go crazy like he did? What happened next?” Obito demanded.

“…It took some time, but eventually the other Obito—who I’ll call Tobi, since that was what he called himself—came back to Konoha.” I said after a while. “During the night that Kushina-san’s son was born.”

“…Damn.” Obito said, which seemed to be a severe under-reaction going by everyone else’s faces. “He really did get Tobi good, didn’t he?”

“That might be an understatement.” I said. “So, he broke the seal, set the Nine-Tails on Konoha, and started that.”

“But if our Obito is here, then that won’t happen.” Kushina said.

I shrugged. “Probably.”

“Then why did you even need to tell us any of this?” Rin asked.
“Because even if the events are off, some stuff stays the same.” I looked at Sensei. “Remember that letter the Chinatsugumi gave you, a couple of years ago?”

“…That was you?” Sensei looked stunned. “It outlined more information about Orochimaru’s combat abilities than we’ve gotten in months.”

“The Chinatsugumi have a vested interest in not getting killed by him. And for whatever reason, Rikuto-san figured out that I knew things most people didn’t…pretty much when I was nine. He confronted me about it just before the Chūnin Exams.” Sensei looked like he couldn’t decide whether to be retroactively worried or what. “After some other stuff happened, I told him about Orochimaru during the mission to Sorayama seven months ago. His idea was to give the info back to Konoha, since it’d sound more real coming from an adult.”

Sensei ran a hand through his hair. “Or an established missing-nin, like Orochimaru.”

“What would make a missing-nin from Iwa care about what happens to Konoha?” Jiraiya sounded more curious than outraged—I imagined getting the exact opposite reaction from anyone else in Konoha’s upper command division, because fighting the same assholes for years on end tended to foster resentment.

…I wondered if I should be worried that Rikuto’s attempt at faking his own death would probably need an encore if Iwa got anywhere near Soragami.

“Recently, Chinatsu-san adopted a little girl. While I know there are probably other girls named Tayuya on the continent, I don’t think the others are the right age, with pink hair, and happen to be outside of any shinobi village.” I hesitated. “…In my vision, Tayuya is the second most powerful of Orochimaru’s child soldiers—she, with her comrades, can take out a team of adult special jōnin at age fourteen.”

“So can we.” Kakashi pointed out.

“Under the right circumstances, or with a Tailed Beast, yeah.” I allowed. “But even aside from that, in the vision, she and her teammates were instrumental to the death of the Third Hokage.”

“…Well. I think that’s enough for now.” Rin said, and all of us blinked at her.

“…Rin-chan?” Obito began, but Rin shook her head and turned to Sensei.

“ Didn’t we have an appointment with someone very important?” Rin asked.

Jiraiya smacked his forehead with his hand. “Yes, yes we did. All right, kids, up and at ‘em. We need to get the Great Toad Sage’s input before we all run off and decide to ruin the possible future.”

“All futures are possible.” Shima argued, “You’re just not wise enough to see it yet.”

“I don’t think I’d live that long even if I wasn’t due to get killed by one of my own students.” Jiraiya griped, but he threw me a reassuring wink before bounding off, both toad elders in tow.

I sat there, rooted to the spot in a sort of stunned silence. I’d done a lot of talking, and it was just hitting me how I could definitely have done that better. But…somehow, the world hadn’t ended. No binding seals, no blunt censure… What the hell?

“…Believe it or not, Kei-kun, that wasn’t the biggest news I’ve ever heard.” Sensei told me, as he and Kushina also stood up to go. Quickly, all of us kids hurried to follow them. Revelations or not, no one wanted to be stranded in toad country.

“Or maybe you’ve had so many shocks recently that you’ve run out of potential heart attacks.” Kushina quipped. She grinned, quite gleefully despite the circumstances, and began ticking items off on her fingers, “Becoming next in line for Hokage, losing a student, getting that student back, finding out you’re going to be a father…”

Sensei’s expression went kind of dopey.

“…I think what they’re trying to say is ‘roll with the punches,’ Kei.” Obito said, as the happy couple sort of wandered along in Jiraiya’s wake.

“Does anyone else get the impression that there is literally too much crap going on for people to process?” I mused aloud.

Kakashi gave me a look that said, “No shit.” But silently.

I opened my mouth to say something else, as Obito punched Kakashi in the shoulder with his normal arm and started a chase between them that felt…relieved, and stopped. Rin put her hand on my shoulder.

“They just need time to think, Kei-senpai.” Rin said.

“…I sprang this on them at a bad time.” I mumbled.

“Well, yes, but we’ll recover.” Rin poked me. “By the way, are you sure there was nothing about you in the visions?”

“…There was, actually.” I said, fighting the urge to sigh. “It was…just not very interesting. I was a civilian with no power or impact on anything, and if I died it was like that.” I snapped my fingers for emphasis. “I’ve been trying to do more, since finding out…” …That I was stuck in a bloody TV show.

“Oh.” Rin looked a little disappointed, like she couldn’t believe my life was that mundane. Had been, was, wasn’t anymore! “Then I’m glad you did decide to come with us. The world without you didn’t seem like it was going anywhere good. I’m glad I got to live this one. I like having you as a friend.”

“…Thank you, Rin-chan.” I said, and waved her on. I could follow in a minute.

Whenever I stopped tearing up.

I could tell when I recovered when I shot Obito’s headband at the back of his head and called him out for letting a loan go unpaid for that long. It only took five minutes of walking or so, with Rin at my side.

“I think we’re beyond owing stuff, Kei.” Obito said, rubbing his head. He grinned. “Hey, now me and Kakashi can match!”

“Are you sure you even want to?” Kakashi asked.

“…Eh, not really. Hm, maybe a mask?” Obito rubbed his chin contemplatively, but there was a spark in his eye that put me at ease again.

Rin jumped in then, with, “Boys, boys, settle down.”

“What about an eyepatch?” I suggested.

Obito balked. “What, and look like a pirate? Who would choose a pirate Hokage?”

“Since Sensei has that job locked up for the next twenty years, I think you’d better start choosing an image now.” I mused. “Hm…”

“What about ‘Undying’?” All of us looked at Rin. She flushed. “You’re alive, aren’t you?”

“Yeah.” Obito frowned in thought. “Hey, Kei, what did the other me have as a special power?”

“…It’s something called Kamui.” I said, surprised that he was already willing to mine the other universe for ideas. Especially about something so, well, traumatizing. In context. “It let Tobi look like he was walking right through solid objects—actually, he would shift parts of his body into a shadow dimension only accessible through the eye. The other Kakashi could do the same thing, but only at range and only on offense. Tobi was mostly defensive, and he had to touch someone to use his power on them.”

“And this is all based on the Mangekyō he had, right?” Obito asked.

Kakashi’s eyebrows knit together. “And both eyes had the same power.”

“Yes and yes. Sort of.” I hedged.

“Well, in that case I’ll make up my own name!” Obito said, cheered.

I blinked.

“For Tobi’s power?” Rin asked.

He nodded. “Yeah! If he can be Tobi or whatever, then I can be Phantom Obito!”

“…Huh?” Rin and I exchanged blank looks. Kakashi just stared.

“Well, if he didn’t use the obvious nickname, then I should get to.” Obito huffed. “He’s an asshole anyway.”

“He’s also you.” Kakashi said.

“Yeah, right. And you’re the guy who dies of chakra exhaustion.” Obito sniped.

In a way, I was almost glad they could make fun of their counterparts’ fates. I didn’t mind it, really. I mean, the more they distanced themselves from the wreck that was the other reality, then maybe they’d be less likely to follow that path. It would help. It would maybe stop the vision problem I was probably due for, once I got to sleep naturally. I wasn’t looking forward to that, but being able to have something concrete to fight them with would be nice.

“I don’t think you get to choose your nickname, Obito.” I said, “And Kakashi, the other-you’s death was way more badass than it sounds.”

“Well, if he gets to die in an awesome way, then I get to choose my nickname anyway. But really, chakra exhaustion?” Obito glanced at Kakashi, who glared back.
“Anyone who managed to stall Nagato for more than two minutes counted as a badass.” I pointed out. “Even the Nine-Tails host breaking out Sage Mode and manifesting eight of nine tails almost lost.”

Kakashi appeared mollified at that, at least. We basked in the warm glow of non-dysfunctional friendship for a while, even though a toad the size of a skyscraper was waiting at the end of our path. Though I guess I was the only one who knew that. At least Sensei and Kushina and Jiraiya would be there.

“Speaking of weird things,” I said, breaking the companionable silence, “are you all really okay with this?”

“With what? The fact that you know a future?” Rin asked.

I winced internally. “…I was really going to talk about the whole ‘I am carrying a Tailed Beast in my chest’ thing, but that works, too.”

“Kei, we already know you.” Kakashi said flatly. “All I saw when you were using the Three-Tails’s chakra was someone hopped up on caffeine and a power high. You’re still the same.”

“And I guess the vision thing makes sense, you know?” Obito added. “You were always more grown-up…though some of that was the swearing. Is that where you learned it?”

“Uh, yeah. Sorry about that.” I rubbed the back of my head. “Though, thanks for the ringing endorsement.”

“Don’t worry about it.” Rin advised. “Minato-sensei should be able to get everything fixed, now that Kushina-san and Jiraiya-sama are here.” She paused. “Though I suppose they might have to be reminded. A lot of important things happened.”

I sighed. “I doubt they forgot. Let’s just get to the Great Toad Sage before they have to come looking for us.”

And we were off.

Chapter End Notes

Everyone is really good at suppressing their reactions, huh? We'll see more from them in the next chapter!
Chapter Summary

Kei: Cause problems.

Chapter Notes

Chapter title is that one song by Neon Trees.

So, prophecies. Just thinking too hard on that word brings half-a-dozen examples to mind.

Neither can live while the other survives.

You know, if it weren’t for the fact that I was not and am not a boy and that my name has never been “Harry Potter,” that would be almost pithy. After all, that tends to be the way a lot of shinobi grudge matches go—beat each other until one side falls down for good. Pretty straightforward and full of pointless bloodshed. It did kind of describe Naruto and Sasuke’s relationship in the later parts of the manga, if only on Sasuke’s part.

Fire alone can save our clan.

Yeeeeeeah, no. Not a cat. And again, not a boy. Though I suppose if I twisted the words a little and ignored the context, I could make the argument that the Uchiha clan would find that prophecy relevant. Speaking of which, I had to figure out if there was going to be anything we could do to mitigate some of the fallout from the Nine-Tails’s attack, which had canonically eventually gotten around to killing them.

If you attack, a great empire will be destroyed.

Not a king! Also, not an authority figure. I’m sure there are plenty of other people who can come up with fun ways to destroy their own countries but I’m not one of them. Mostly because of the whole “not actually owning a country” thing.

I knew way too many people who could totally fulfill that. In spirit if not in fact.

Disturb not the harmony of Fire, Ice, or Lightning…

Oh, if only I was a Pokémon trainer and not a shinobi. I’m almost certain that my life would be filled with a lot less fighting and death. Or maybe lots of fighting and no death. Still, I’d probably more likely to get jumped by some douchebag with a team of uber-monsters and beaten up for my lunch money, which would be downright embarrassing.

All of the examples I have refer to men or boys. Except the one about the Witch-King of Angmar. That one was pretty damned cool. Hehehe.

Look, the point I’m trying to make here is that prophecies are a writing tool that comes a dime a dozen. Every heroic fantasy story or whatever includes a Chosen One and a Fated Girl or something along those lines. Or maybe even a Prophesized Plague. Hell, the world I was in had like five of them. The vehicle for distribution tidbits about the future was different, but the spirit of it stayed the same.

I ended up wondering, really, what the procedure was for meeting the Great Toad Sage. The guy was the size of Gamabunta, meaning that our entire party could probably dance a merry jig in the space between his eye-ridges and not touch either the edges or each other, and I couldn’t help but think that would make conversations awkward. We’d certainly have to crane our necks a lot if we wanted to look him in the eye, even if that would also be weird according to a few protocols I’d learned about foreign dignitaries. Couple that with the fact that the Great Toad Sage was old enough to have spoken to the Sage of Six Paths, and it felt like…I don’t know, like trying to talk to the Lincoln Memorial. Or the Statue of Liberty. Or that huge photo of Chairman Mao in Beijing.

Only no one here would think I was especially crazy for chatting with the Great Toad Sage, aside from the likely breach in protocol and lack of respect “chatting” implied.

I resolved to just follow Sensei’s lead, just as we caught up with them.

“What do you think the Great Toad Sage will be like?” Rin whispered. We were shoulder-to-shoulder at the back of the group, which made quiet commentary easier than it was most of the time. I’m sure that if I tried my theater-whisper technique, I’d have been fine. After making allowances for enhanced shinobi senses, anyway.

(Yes, yes, special hell and all that. Guilty.)

“Big.” I said in quiet voice that matched hers.

She pinched me. “Not what I meant!”

“Wise?”

Another pinch.

I mock-slapped at her hand, saying, “Hey! I’m still re-growing the skin there.”

Rin immediately looked ashamed.

While milking the injury was very in-character for the old me, because I was a bit of a crybaby anyway, I just clasped Rin’s shoulder and gave it a reassuring squeeze despite the bandages running up and down both of my arms. Besides, I think Isobu’s chakra was taking care of the critical stuff. My skin probably wouldn’t have fused with the bandages. I trusted both Rin’s expertise and Isobu’s self-preservation instinct. More the former than the latter, though.

“We’re here.” Shima said, turning herself around on Jiraiya’s left shoulder. “So quiet down for a little while, children.”

I nodded, deciding not to add the reflexive, “Yes, Shima-sama.” She may have been the size of my head, but she could kick my ass up one side of the mountain and down the other. Besides that, she kind of had told me to be quiet.

We were inside of a temple. Well, I’m going to call it a temple, anyway, because calling it a cave would be to downplay the obvious signs of stone masonry and to call it a shrine would be to understate the sheer size of the place. It was kind of dark, and damp in a way that said “yes, everyone who lives here is an amphibian,” in case it wasn’t obvious. There were no torches or open flames anywhere—probably a fire hazard with the number of oil-spitting toads around—instead, there was the light cast by the entrance way. Nothing more.

In the center of a dais, at the back end of the hall, was a toad easily as big as I expected Gamabunta to be. He sat in the middle of what looked like a gigantic bathtub, marked with the kanji for “sage.” I’d sort of expected a faint sheen of slime, common to toads, but his faded brown skin and white belly both seemed dry. His eyes were nearly shut from the weight of the wrinkles around them, but I could see them shift a little as we approached and both Fukasaku and Shima disembarked from Jiraiya’s shoulders.

They hopped onto two separate raised platforms, to either side of the Sage’s knees.

The Great Toad Sage wore one of those hats that reminded me a little of the graduation caps I’d expected to be able to wear in my old life—a professor’s hat, with faded red tassels and topped with the biggest crystal orb I’d ever seen. He wore one of those big bead necklaces, too—the kind with the crystal in the middle, like the Jewel of Four Souls, but his had the kanji for “oil” in print large enough to dwarf even Jiraiya. To either side of him were massive scrolls the size of buildings—or maybe they were pillars, and I was just being dumb. At his right elbow, someone had placed a bottle and a glass for what was probably liquor.

We approached at Shima and Fukasaku’s signal.

The Great Toad Sage leaned forward in his seat. The movement was slight, but for someone that big even shifting his weight made everyone edgy. Or maybe that was just me.

Tsuruya was the biggest animal I’d gotten used to recently, but there was a whole order of magnitude of difference between Tsuruya and the toads and again between the toads and the really big ones. I was in dire need of a reframing of my internal reference points for the word “big.”

“Greetings, shinobi.” The Great Toad Sage’s voice was…actually kind of high, given the size difference between us. Jiraiya’s was deeper by at least an octave, but the honored elder’s voice was clearly audible and at a higher volume than I’d expected. This close, I could also see the wrinkles around his mouth that, again, highlighted his immense age.

There was a long pause.

“Oh, I remember now,” the Sage nodded slowly, as though trying to play off the fact that he’d forgotten anyway. Then again, he only had to remember two names. He’d genuinely never met the rest of us. “Er…and the rest?”

“Kushina Uzumaki, sir!” Kushina seemed cheerful enough for five people. I was struck by the thought that she did know the Toad clan. She’d been in a relationship with Sensei for years, after all.
That thought quickly made me wonder if they were planning on having Shima and Fukasaku at the wedding, since most of the other toads were too big. “Remember me?”

“Oh, yes, Kushina-chan…” The Sage rumbled, nodding.

“Sound-off.” Sensei ordered, in a stage-whisper.

“Kakashi Hatake.” Kakashi piped up, from the front.

“I’m Obito Uchiha! Remember that!” Obito said, bouncing on his bare feet.

“Rin Nohara.” Rin said, bowing. I thought I saw the Sage’s eyes focus on her, but it only lasted a moment and it was hard to tell what he was looking at through all those wrinkles.

“Keisuke Gekkō,” I rounded us out, bowing as well.

“Now, that’s rather odd…” The huge toad shifted his weight. “I don’t remember seeing you, Keisuke-chan…”

“We’ve never met.” I said, keeping my head lowered.

“No…I mean more that I don’t recall seeing you anywhere.” The Sage corrected gently, and ice went down my spine.

But I’d already known that, hadn’t I?

“And I don’t remember your friends here, either…how strange.” The Sage seemed to direct his attention toward Sensei. “Minato-chan?”

“It’s a long story.” Sensei offered. Jiraiya gave him a sidelong look that was exasperated at best, so he went on, “I think one of my students may have the same gift that you do, Gamamaru-sama.”

That was probably the best way to put it.

“Oh, I see.” The toad’s huge head slowly turned toward me. “I’ll simply have to do another reading for you, then. It’s very rare that a human has the gift of seeing events in their own lifetime, you know. I shouldn’t be surprised that you acted on them, eh, Rin-chan?”

Sweatdrop round two! Rin giggled behind her hands, while I tamped down on the urge to sigh. “My name’s Keisuke, Gamamaru-sama.” I said, wincing at the way my voice came out a little higher than usual because of my skyrocketing stress levels.

“Right, right.” The Sage nodded, though I wasn’t all that sure if it stuck. Wisdom and short-term memory apparently didn’t always go hand-in-hand.

With the not-slow-at-all sluggishness of magma or a mountain on the move, the Sage lifted his hands and removed the crystal that had been sitting on top of his hat. At the same time, Shima and Fukasaku summoned a gigantic cushion (complete with chakra smoke explosion common to summoning anything) to hold the orb, since it was far larger than either of them and would probably have been rather inconvenient to hold. It hit the cushion with enough force to dislodge a huge cloud of dust—testimony to how long ago the previous reading had been.

“You’ve changed a number of things, haven’t you?” The Sage said, sounding slightly amused despite the trouble I was causing for him. Had caused. Whatever. “I so very rarely see faces, and yet I know that you were not involved before, Keisuke-chan.”
A nervous sort of chuckle escaped me despite my best efforts. “Yeah, sorry about that…”

Sensei prodded my shoulder. “Shhh, give it a minute.”

“How accurate is the Sage, normally?” Rin asked quietly, seeming directing her question at Jiraiya.

Jiraiya gave her a cheerful grin that, frankly, I’d always associated with Naruto’s “promise of a lifetime” tendencies. But before I could dwell on that and drive myself into a downward spiral of depression, he said, “He is the best there is, Rin-chan.”

“There we are.” The Sage said, silencing the peanut gallery.

Both of his long-fingered frog hands hovered around the crystal ball, and I could feel a huge swell of chakra that dwarfed most things I’d felt in the past six months aside from Isobu himself. If I paid very close attention, I could feel it flow from the Sage’s belly and up along his ribs until it entered his arms, then surged into the crystal. Not very clearly, mind, but if there’s a lot of chakra on the move anyone can get an idea that something’s up.

“Obito Uchiha.” At the sound of his name, Obito immediately stood up straighter. The Sage smiled and said, “You will bring hope to your clan by being kind to the right man at the right time for the right reasons. Watch yourself—not everyone can be trusted—but know that your future is bright.”

“Thank you, Gamamaru-sama. I’ll keep it in mind!” Obito said brightly.

I’d honestly thought that Obito’s grin couldn’t get any wider, but apparently I was wrong. Even after everything that had happened recently, we were all okay and I guess the months of virtual isolation could be played off if they led to a moment like this? I didn’t know for sure. But if Obito could be happy, then I would be happy with him.

I’d just have to keep an eye out for any ninja psychologists, just in case. Frankly, that needed to be a field and soon. And not just in the “Yamanaka does a mind walk and shit sorts itself out” way. Too much magic, not enough interaction. While that had worked out for me as a result of a fortuitous mix of coincidence and bungled use of chakra resources, it wasn’t like it was a cure-all. I’d argue that it was nearly the opposite—there was a reason that there were a number of Yamanaka clan members in both T and I and in the various internal offices among ANBU.

“Rin Nohara.” The Sage said, and Rin’s spine immediately went ramrod-straight. I could feel her chakra fidgeting even if the rest of her wasn’t.

Odd how I could sense that, even with my chakra control scrambled. I’d have to look into the methods other people used to sense chakra when I got home, assuming I wasn’t immediately tossed into a containment room by Danzō and his cronies.

The Sage leaned forward. “Those you love will always breathe easily around you.”

…I wasn’t sure if that was supposed to be figurative or literal.

Very fortune-cookie, nonetheless.

After a second to let that sentence sink in, the Sage added, “And remember, all medicines are poisons.”

…What?

“I’ll remember, Gamamaru-sama.” Well, apparently Rin got more out of it than I did. I was too busy fussing over literal or figurative meanings of the prophecies to really take comfort in much the Sage was saying.

Such was my curse.

“Kushina Uzumaki.” Kushina straightened, too, and I wondered if she really had forgiven me for telling her all that crap about her possible future. Selfish, I know, but sometimes I get really self-centered like that. “Your chains will set you free.”

There was at least one really obvious meaning for part of that, and based on the Uzumaki family jutsu to boot. I just didn’t want to think about it.

Kushina bowed anyway.

“Kakashi Hatake,” the Sage continued, “you will befriend a sapling.”

Oh, what.

I bit the inside of my cheek to keep from laughing as I watched Kakashi’s thoughts crash to a halt. It wasn’t the kind of thing that would have been obvious to a random passerby, but I knew him well enough to see it in his body language and see it in his chakra. He was so confused.

Ten-to-one odds that the “sapling” was Yamato, at least in my mind.

I was still probably going to get him a bonsai when we got home. Odds were he wouldn’t manage to kill it.

“I didn’t manage to see that one clearly. My apologies.” The Sage seemed to frown. “Perhaps I’ll have a more profound vision later…”

“It’s nothing to worry about, Gamamaru-sama.” Kakashi said quickly, and I wasn’t sure if it was to avoid the embarrassment or because he really didn’t want to see what the Sage could come up with, given time.

“Keisuke Gekkō.” I admit it; I froze up at the sound of my name despite the tension-breaker Kakashi’s prophecy had been. Sure, the prophecies were generally positive, but there was such a thing as dramatic tension. Like being called on in class when you don’t know the answer to the question because you were too busy reading a book under the table. It felt like the world hung on a thread even if the “world” honestly couldn’t give less of a fuck.

I swallowed hard and waited.

“You will teach three dragon hatchlings to fly.” Then the Sage paused, tilting his head and looking at his crystal ball as though wondering where the hell that had come from.

I wasn’t aware that this universe even had a concept for “dragon” other than what the Uchiha used to name their bigger techniques. Though, given the size of toads and snakes around here, maybe there was a place where dragon summons had once roamed. Or something. Maybe they’d been eaten by the snakes. The home of Manda and the other snake summons was called Ryūchi Cave, wasn’t it? But I couldn’t see Tsuruya approving of me deciding to subcontract to the serpents.

Metaphor, then.

If the crystal had been a snow globe or a Magic 8-Ball, I could totally see him shaking it to get another, less-stupid answer.
“Lastly, a prediction for all of you.” The Sage inclined his head to Sensei and Jiraiya, which seemed to surprise them. “Beware the man in black.”

…What? That could only refer to, I don’t know, half of the shinobi population. A lot of us, as it happened, dressed in or accessorized in black, and most of the big bad jackasses did too. Hell, I liked dark colors too, because I was an unfashionable hack.

“Old gods still dream.” The Sage concluded.

Again, what? I know I’m saying that a lot, but there’s something of an upper limit of fate and stuff I can really react to with a five-page essay in 12-point font. I have an innate aversion to being told what to do from on high—it’s different, I guess, to be told what to do in a shinobi context. Being told that I’m going to be doing something by a higher power…not so much. Maybe it’s because divine mandate hadn’t been an explicit thing in my old life.

Or maybe I just always despised that “chosen one” trope.

Also, I was pretty sure that this setting didn’t have Reapers.

…At least I hoped so.

Metal squid monsters would be bad. While a number of shinobi had really big techniques with which to hit people (and here, I was thinking of Madara’s meteor strikes), Reapers had unfortunately always been in their own weight class.

Anyway, enough of that.

“Thank you for everything, Gamamaru-sama.” Sensei told him.

The Sage inclined his head. “Go, then, and…er, what is your name again?”

Group facefault!

“You can leave now.” Fukasaku stage-whispered at us.

“I’ll escort you out.” Shima said, and hopped over to Jiraiya again.

I turned to Sensei. “So…how are we getting home?” I asked.

“Reverse-summoning in the other direction. A messenger’s already gotten through to Konoha by now.” Sensei said, as we followed Shima and Jiraiya back out into the sunshine.

I could see the sun start to turn the sky sapphire-blue and the sunlight itself fall bright and intense as afternoon began to give the slightest bit way to early evening. The wind shot through the deep canyons and nearby peaks hard and fast enough to ruffle my sweat-stiff hair, and Obito’s head briefly became engulfed by his own un-maintained locks. If I had to guess, it was four or so. Too early for dinner, but I was hungry anyway.

I missed home.

We decided to gather around another one of those strange bamboo-fed ponds, which conveniently had worn away the rock with the weight of water over the years. It made a small beach, and there were plenty of rounded rocks for seats for anyone who didn’t want to sit on the dirt/sand/leaf-fall combination underneath us.

Shima and Fukasaku had somehow had a reunion while I wasn’t paying attention and sat on Jiraiya’s knees. At least the whole crew was together.

“What about Madara?” Obito piped up once we were all seated.

“We were discussing that.” Jiraiya answered, before Sensei could. He rubbed his chin. “After we get back to Konoha, we’ll have to organize a task force to assess the threat. Never would have thought Madara Uchiha would have lived this long, but if there’s a chance . . .”

“There is. It’s more than a chance, Jiraiya-sama.” Obito said, rolling back the sleeve on his right arm. Even without the white bands Sensei used to tie his shirt-sleeves down, it was easy to see the sharp contrast between his replacement arm and the rest of Obito’s skin, even if he’d lost some (or most) of his tan. “Whoever managed to do this didn’t have the skill or resources of an ordinary ninja.”

The replacement arm didn’t even have visible veins. It was just . . . white. Like putty or paste.

“Even if that wasn’t the real Madara,” Obito was saying, looking contemplatively down at his arm, “I don’t want a man who could plot like he could to just run free. He couldn’t even leave the cave and we still nearly all died.”

“Well, we did.” I said, and Obito blinked. I clarified, “It’s definitely the real Madara, sadly. And his plot was to make Obito his puppet by cutting away his supports. Which we are.”

Obito nodded. “Kei, what does he do after this part?”

“Dunno.” Obito blinked. I continued, “I know that Madara finally dies of old age sometime within the next few years, but whatever he did after Rin’s death in the other timeline is a total blank.” I paused. “Further, I know that either Orochimaru picked up a sample of his DNA or else he deliberately passed it off to someone.”

“Why is that important?” Rin asked, looking blank.

“There’s this technique called Impure World Resurrection.” I said, frowning. “It was last used by the Second Hokage, I think, but the worst part of the whole thing is that it pulls dead people out of the afterlife to use as foot-soldiers.”

Everyone, I realized, was looking at me.

“That’s an S-ranked forbidden jutsu, you realize.” Sensei said dryly.

Kushina needled him with, “Why is it that I’m getting used to the things she knows faster than you are?”

“I’m not . . . not used to it.” Sensei said after a while.

“Shut up.” Kushina said. She snapped her fingers to catch my attention past my anxiety. “Go on, Kei-chan. I realize this is forbidden, but why is it important to you?”

“The Fourth Shinobi World War is fought with them.” I held up both hands, to represent different sides. “And I mean us versus them. Dead shinobi from every country and their summoner and one other guy—” one hand waved, “—versus every shinobi country we could recruit.” Other hand! Woo.

“How far back are we talking?” Kakashi asked.

“…At least as far back as the First Hokage.” I said. I could feel everyone wince. “And Madara. And the Second and the Gold and Silver Brothers and…I’m just going to stop talking now.”

“If this is how you act when someone’s in on the secret, I’m starting to think that Obito isn’t the only one I’m going to have to place in protective custody.” Sensei muttered, rubbing the bridge of his nose as though to stave off a headache.

“Does that still mean I have to talk to Fugaku-san?” Obito asked.

“No.” Sensei replied. “No, I think we’re going to have to have a long talk with a lot of people about informational security and about planning for a possible doomsday scenario.” He sighed. “Not exactly how I wanted to start my run as Hokage…”

Jiraiya whacked Sensei on the back in a playful way, at the exact same time that Kushina decided to. Consequently, Sensei stumbled under the weight of both blows.

“Too bad, Minato.” Jiraiya said, with the kind of cheer derived from another’s suffering. “You’re the one who said yes to Sarutobi-sensei’s nomination.”

Obito slung his normal arm over my shoulders. “So, we’re going to be prison-buddies!”

I couldn’t pretend to be enthusiastic about that. Instead, I asked Sensei, “Am I going to be able to see my mom and my brother?”

“Probably.” Sensei allowed. He sighed again. “Sometimes I wonder if students exist to raise their teacher’s blood pressure.”

“So, Kei-chan, who do you think is the biggest threat?” Kushina asked. “Within the village, of course.” She wobbled a hand in midair. “The rest of this is sort of iffy, as far as control issues go. If Iwa decides to explode a mountain pass, well, that’s not our deal, but if there’s another Orochimaru running around…”

Well, who was? Itachi was all of five years old, Obito was with us, Kabuto had probably already been recruited by ROOT.

Well…

“Danzō Shimura.” I said flatly.

“You mentioned that he’s the head of ROOT. What is that?” Obito asked, but all of the adults immediately looked rather less than happy. He looked guilelessly around at them. “What?”

“If ANBU is already secretive enough,” Jiraiya said, “ROOT is the secret division within ANBU. They report directly to the councilman, rather than the Hokage.” Jiraiya frowned. “All of the Hokage have had a spymaster of some sort, but ROOT was very much Shimura’s design.”

“The Third Hokage disbands ROOT after the war is over.” I added, nearly growling. “But only officially—turns out that if you have a secret shinobi army loyal to only one man, they don’t have to listen when the Hokage says ‘jump.’”

“ROOT members are traditionally embedded in other groups of ANBU.” Sensei looked worried all of a sudden. “Jiraiya-sensei, do you think that the Hokage…?”

“Tossing Shimura out on his ear is going to be nearly impossible.” Jiraiya told us. “He’s discreet and unquestionably loyal to the village, and his expertise will be invaluable if Sarutobi-sensei is really going to drop you in blind. Which I doubt, but Shimura is going to be around until you install a replacement commander of either ANBU or ROOT. It’s just that Shimura won’t be letting go of ROOT unless he’s dead.”

“Which is pretty much exactly what happened in the non-future,” I added.

“Hush, you.” Jiraiya said. His attention was still mostly on Sensei and Kushina. “We’ll talk more about this later, once the Madara situation is addressed.” He glanced at the four chūnin in the group and said dryly, “I hope you all know that this information is confidential. Until Minato is Hokage, you’ve gone through more promotions and security authorizations, and maybe you’re old enough to drink, none of you get to talk about this to anyone.”

“Let the adults deal with things, right?” I quipped.

“You should hope so.” Jiraiya said. “If the fate of our village falls on a bunch of half-grown chūnin, we’re doomed.”

“...Would it be a good idea to seal our memories?” Kakashi asked.

“Why would we do that?” Obito argued instantly. “I have to know where Madara is because otherwise no one will be able to find his base!”

“But what about after that?” Kakashi crossed his arms over his chest. “Do you want to know who’s pulling the strings, when knowing makes you a target and you can’t fight them off?”

“Then I’ll just get stronger!” Obito snapped.

Rin, who had been sitting pretty silently for a while, sighed. “We’re not the Sannin, Obito.”

“There aren’t three of us, but I think we could make it work!” Obito countered. “Didn’t you hear about how strong we got in that other world?”

“We all died in that other world.” Kakashi said crossly.

I had a building headache.

“Slow down, everyone.” Sensei told us, using his commander voice. He didn’t look unhappy or disappointed despite the arguments—mostly, he seemed resigned to whatever he’d decided to do. “The first thing we have to do is get back to Konoha. Everything else will follow.”

“Who are you going to hand the kids off to?” Kushina asked.

Sensei suddenly looked rather sheepish. “Well…”

“...Dammit.” Kushina said. “Why do you always give me the tough jobs?”

“Consider it horrible, horrible practice for when your son becomes a teenager.” Jiraiya suggested.

“You are all awful people.” Kushina grumped. “Fine, fine, I’ll get them to the Hokage. We’ll lock things down.”

“I’m not sure that your son could ever be as bad as we are right now.” Rin said. “At least about all the trouble we keep running into…”

I said, “I wouldn’t put money on that.”

There was trouble. That’d be things like missions involving someone breaking a leg or maybe skipping a watch. Maybe that’d involve not paying rent on time. Something mundane.

Then there was Team Minato trouble, which meant kidnappings and violent physical revisions to our bodies and maybe more than a little mental instability.

And then there was Naruto. And everyone around him.

(Granted, I’d probably have to revise my problem assessment scale if Team Minato would go on as we started.)

(We probably would.)

Kushina gave me a smirk. “Oh, really?”

“How bad could he be?” asked Rin.

Rather than answer directly, I said, “Do you want the chronological or categorical list?”

“That bad, huh?” Obito actually had the gall to grin.

I hoped he’d end up babysitting Naruto, a lot. It was petty and vindictive but, frankly, I figured they’d get along great.

“Worse.” I said theatrically.

“Enough about the nonexistent future universe.” Sensei interrupted. I wasn’t sure if the talk of the nebulous other story was getting to him, or if he was just tired of us constantly wandering off topic and into a conversational minefield. Maybe he was just worried that his son was going to be the parenting equivalent of getting a cherry bomb in the mail. He said to me, “We need to take a look at your seal.”

I’d almost forgotten about that, despite my total inability to use my chakra at the moment.

“As it is, it’s secure enough for now. You may be unable to control your chakra properly, but no one is going to die because the Three-Tails found a gap to slip through.” Sensei explained. “But I’d still like to have at least some idea what to do when we get back from the front.”

“And of course, as the two other resident seal masters in Konoha,” Kushina added, “Jiraiya-sama and I are the perfect sources for a second opinion.”

Before they asked, I pulled my mesh shirt off over my head. Above the bandage-and-bra line, Isobu’s seal looked like an old, faded tattoo in dire need of a touch-up. It hadn’t changed much since earlier, at least, and I hadn’t heard Isobu roaring or anything.

Kushina was immediately in my space, and I barely resisted the urge to flinch backward. Not that I’d have gotten away—her hand was vice-like on my bandaged arm, too tight to pull out of. It was mildly terrifying how quickly she could switch from teasing and silly to deadly serious.

Everyone leaned in to see if they could get a better look. Obviously, the adults had priority.

“I see that you put the Five-Elements Seal over…” Kushina frowned, tilting my head back because apparently I was in her light. “Ah, a knockoff Uzumaki seal. Kiri-derived, probably. You did mention the enemy shinobi were Kiri-nin, right?”

“Under compulsion seals,” I felt compelled to add.
“At least it’s not a Kaguya-clan variant.” Jiraiya said.

I wasn’t aware that the holders of the Dead Bone Pulse bloodline even knew what sealing was. They were, after all, the only clan with the dubious honor of being wiped out by Kirigakure’s central government after their coup attempt. How very Uchiha of them.

…Eh. I gave up on following their discussion of seal pedigrees pretty much at that point. The words “derivative” and “traditional” and “spiraling trigrams” cropped enough that I knew I was up a creek without a paddle. Judging by Obito and Rin’s faces, so had they. Kakashi was a little better about his poker face, what with not actually having much of a visible face anyway.

“…I’d wait to deal with this one.” Kushina concluded, eventually. At my expression upon hearing that, she elaborated, “I have the supplies and setup we need back at the house, not here. And if catching Madara is really as time-sensitive as I think it is, we won’t have the hour needed to redraw the seal or anything fancy. It’ll hold for weeks like this, Kei-chan.” She turned to Obito and said, “And I want you to tell Minato and Jiraiya everything you can remember so we can get you home safe sooner rather than later.”

“Got it.” Obito said, and he was sort of drawn off from the main group to have a more intense conversation with the sole two jōnin not named Kakashi in the group. Kakashi, frankly, didn’t need to be in any more fights or involved with stuff beyond his clearance level today. We were all tired, except maybe Obito, and tired chūnin were trumped by fresh jōnin every time.

I had a real problem with not being able to use my chakra properly for the aforementioned “weeks,” but catching Madara with his pants down mattered more than even my prospective job security. Heh. If we could catch him here…

“Does Akihito-shishō know what happened?” Rin asked.

“We didn’t go out of our way to find him, but there’s a chance that Gekkō-san would have.” Kushina shook her head. “She shouldn’t have, but things have a way of getting around. Operational security trumps rank and even family ties, with something like this.”

“Is there actually a rule in the book for this?” I wondered.

“Not in so many words.” Kushina admitted. “But I think we managed to get the interception mission rating bumped up to at least A, if not S, which shoves Yamaguchi-sensei off the list. Need-to-know missions are, by definition, not exactly supposed to be leaking details everywhere.”

“…And you still told my mom?” I said blankly.

Kushina’s expression turned sheepish. “She caught us before that part. She was also threatening to gut Minato if he’d come back without you, so…”

Of course she would. Of course she—she was my mother, yes, but she’d also basically adopted Obito and Rin and she’d been at the epicenter of the shitstorm all those months ago. She didn’t want to live through that again. It’d be worse if it was me and Rin, at once, after Obito. Like we’d followed him down into the dark, somehow, and if Kakashi was gone too…

“She was afraid.” I said quietly. “She saw what happened when we thought Obito was dead.”

“Afraid or not, I don’t think Minato wants to be on the wrong end of her temper again. And since he’s not going to be coming with us directly back to Konoha, he gets to sit out the initial blast wave.” Kushina snickered. “For all the good it’ll do him.”
Rin looked to the side, “Kakashi-kun?”

Kakashi gave her a sidelong look. “What?”

Whatever Rin wanted to say was cut off by Obito bounding back over to us and knocking Kakashi onto his face. I wasn’t sure if it was supposed to be a really enthusiastic hug or if it was a deliberate attempt to keep Rin from talking to Kakashi for any length of time. Either way, Obito seemed cheerful.

“I’M GOING HOME!” Obito practically shrieked, squeezing Kakashi to the point that I could feel the young jōnin’s palpably mounting frustration. Some things never really changed, I guess. Why Kakashi, of all people, seemed to be one of those mysteries for the ages. I’d have thought that Rin or I would have been less spiky or stabby targets.

Jiraiya and Sensei followed at a much slower pace, and didn’t end up knocking us around like bowling pins. More power to them.

“Jiraiya-sensei and I will head back to the forward base and scramble any capable fighters.” Sensei told us without preamble. “Much as I hate to admit it, we don’t have any other forces close enough to make a difference, particularly if this statue actually can maneuver.

“The rest of you are heading to mine and Kushina’s house in Konoha. The Hokage should already be there, Kei-kun, along with your mother and at least some medical staff. Whether he’s informed Fugaku Uchiha yet…I can’t say. But Shimura should be aware, for better or for worse. Kushina-chan…stall him. Or all of them, if you have to.” Sensei gestured to Shima, who had been waiting rather patiently on his shoulder for him to finish.

“I’ll be taking you back.” Shima told us. “Kōsuke-chan and I have a relay set up, and believe me when I say that an uppity councilman is a few hundred years too young to be getting past me.”

“Sensei.” I said, just as they were about to go teleporting around the continent again.

“Kei-kun?” He…hadn’t lost patience with me. Thank goodness.

“If you do fight Madara, Sage techniques are your best friends.” I told him. Oh god. Ohhhhh god; they were about to try to short-circuit the Plot. Oh god. “I don’t know if you have any, but he won’t have seen frog katas or anything before and hopefully that’ll be enough.”

Sensei’s ruffled my hair. “Don’t worry, Kei-kun.” His eyes were clear, even if his chakra was somewhat less than calm. “Your sensei’s the fastest man alive, remember?”

That won’t be enough! I wanted to say, but the words got stuck behind the sudden lump in my throat.

“See you all soon.” Sensei said.

And…we left. Shima stuck with us and Fukasaku went with Jiraiya and Sensei and then there was just smoke.
Ripple Arc: Hit and Miss

Chapter Summary

Kei: Be sidelined.

Chapter Notes

Chapter title comes from some song or another with that title. There has to be at least one, right?

“Minato, you’re not doing yourself any favors by panicking about this,” Jiraiya-sensei says as we teleport toward the front lines once again. It takes about five jumps, and I can feel my chakra start to flag a bit as we get closer. Reverse-summoning would have been easier and would have spread the cost between two or more toads instead of just piling the long-range space-time ninjutsu drain on me, but arranging that kind of relay takes time. Using Flying Thunder God seals with a passenger is harder still, but damned if I’m leaving Jiraiya-sensei behind on a mission this important.

I’m not feeling patient enough to take the time to prep everything anyway, and Jiraiya-sensei knows it.

We don’t have time if our opponent really is Madara Uchiha.

We only pause briefly between jumps. It’s long enough for me to get my feet back under me, figuratively if not literally, and long enough to argue. Fukasaku has remained pretty quiet thus far, apparently because he knows that Jiraiya-sensei and I need to hash things out. Just his presence keeps us from arguing, at least.

I’m almost anxious to try anyway.

“My students are all disaster magnets and apparently Kei-kun has been hiding the ability to see the future for years,” I say, showing more worry than I’d have allowed in front of my students. But Jiraiya-sensei is safe in a way that even Kushina isn’t, sometimes. He’s seen me at my worst, too. I bite the inside of my cheek anyway for a moment, then continue in a more measured tone, “I’m not sure this is the sort of thing I should be nonchalant about, Sensei.”

Jiraiya-sensei gives me a dirty look I can practically feel burn into my brain, though we’re running through trees to the next seal’s range and can hardly maintain a visual on each other half the time. Bless and blast trees, depending on your preferences.

“Nagato has the Rinnegan,” Jiraiya-sensei tells me. I abruptly feel a pang of guilt—it’s not like he’s ever talked about the… I don’t know, the Ame kids? As a name as any, really. But he doesn’t talk about them. Like how he doesn’t talk about Haruka or Satoshi, and neither do I. And those kids—adults, now—are in just as much trouble as my students are. “According to your student, he, Konan, and Yahiko are all going to end up dead.”
I remember that. But I don’t want to think about it.

I’m starting to see why Kei has such explosive emotional breakdowns when she does. Building up pressure like we have been, whether by deferring emotional catharsis or suppressing emotion entirely, isn’t healthy.

“Though, that said, that doesn’t mean your students are in any less danger,” Jiraiya-sensei continues after a moment.

“Keisuke-chan was clear about the timeline,” Fukasaku says, still clinging to Jiraiya-sensei’s shoulder. “While we may not be aware of all the variables, we can make an educated guess. Obito-chan told us enough, too.”

Obito told us enough to be able to work backwards from the site where Kei was captured, at least. I’m still not entirely sure what to make of what he said about a strange statue, but the issue of a living Madara (no matter his age) with an army of cloned creatures is pressing enough that letting them be is not an option. I don’t care if Madara drops dead of old age in five minutes—the man is too much of a threat to even allow the possibility that he might not have.

It’s one thing to curse the First for, I suppose.

But before we can launch an assault on Madara’s hideout, we need more people to help. There are more than a few Konoha teams in the general area, if we seek them out, and I have every intention of doing just that.

Which is why we’re traveling to the secondary base, since—as Kakashi mentioned—the forward post has been all but obliterated by those strange white soldiers Obito and Kei described.

The newly-named forward base is actually a fair bit less exposed than its predecessor—rather than being located in thick, Kusa-like forests or in a glade filled with Hashirama trees, the new base is carved into the side of a mountain some fifty feet above ground level. While shinobi have no trouble traversing that kind of distance, tunnels are somewhat more daunting for most people.

Normally, Konoha shinobi favor forests because we’re familiar with them. But we’re not above taking things that Iwagakure leaves behind in our territory.

If it’s closer than I’d like to where Obito said Madara would be…well, it won’t matter.

“Hold on!” says the shinobi at the entrance. Blue hair and sunglasses mean he’s the previous base’s commander. Bandages and an impromptu eye patch indicate that he didn’t give up that position without a fight.

That’s a worrying thought.

“Ryusei, it’s me,” I say, holding both hands up. Jiraiya-sensei lands next to me a moment later with Fukasaku sitting on his head, but Ryusei can’t seem to spare them a glance.

Ryusei narrows his eyes anyway. “Security code, now.”

…That is not a good sign.

I hold out my right hand, palm-up.

In less than a second, a fully-formed Rasengan is spinning in my palm.
“…Good enough,” Ryusei allows, and backs down. He sighs. “Sorry, Minato—it’s just been a really, really shitty day.”

I nod. I can guess, and also mentally kick myself for leaving the battlefield even if it was to make sure my students made it home safe.

As Ryusei leads us into the cave system, Jiraiya-sensei asks, “How many survivors are there?”

“Enough,” Ryusei says with a grimace. The expression deepens after a second. “I didn’t notice until after, Minato, but we lost your students in the fight. And when your team came back without you…”

“Minato’s students are fine,” Jiraiya-sensei cuts in. “Just tell us the situation here, Kiyotaka.”

Ryusei gives Jiraiya-sensei a dubious look that I don’t appreciate much. But there’s nothing we can do now but focus on the present—neither of us is willing to snap at him over brusqueness. The situation is tense enough as it is.

“You’ll be glad to hear that Dōtō, Kurojō, and Gaku made it back in one piece, with Aomaru and two summoned dogs,” Ryusei says after a moment, turning left at a new hallway under the cliffs. If this area didn’t have a bizarre proliferation of glowing cave moss and the occasional manmade torch to dot the walls, we’d be going in blind. “They’re both gone now, though.”

“They’re Kakashi’s,” I say quietly. “What about the rest of camp?”

“We lost people, Minato. I won’t deny that,” Ryusei sighs.

Ryusei makes it maybe half a meter down the hall before he abruptly jerks and falls back, giving me a perfect view of the kunai imbedded between his eyes.

My kunai is up and raised in a block before the attacker comes barreling down the hallway via the ceiling. The air shifts in a small space like the tunnels, giving me more than enough warning (but apparently not Ryusei).

Then Jiraiya-sensei and I throw ourselves to the sides of the hall, because something is seriously strange here.

The attacker lands on top of Ryusei’s body and immediately yanks her kunai out of the corpse, then offers it handle-first to me.

“Makoto,” I say, voice entirely flat. “What is going on here?”

Makoto Kiyotaka, Ryusei’s red-haired younger sister, snaps, “Take a look yourself, Minato.”

Gleaming against the dull grey of the kunai’s steel is a gooey white-orange substance that is definitely not blood. Under her foot, Ryusei’s corpse goes white and vaguely doughy before turning into something that certainly isn’t a human corpse. If anything, it reminds me of the strange substance that that spiral-clone-thing was made out of. Obito’s replacement arm is similar.

We’ve been infiltrated.

I construct the Rasengan with my left hand this time, and I can see Makoto relax slightly.

“How do we know you’re who you say you are?” Jiraiya-sensei asks. He also has a Rasengan, but in his right—and Jiraiya-sensei doesn’t look like it’s going to be a technique just for show.

Makoto pulls a long, needle-tipped hairpin out of her orange-red spikes and pricks her thumb.
Normal, human blood wells from her finger.

Everyone exhales.

Makoto Kiyotaka is a little older than I am, and about five years younger than her brother. She wears the black overcoat of an Intelligence officer on top of her Konoha uniform, and is one of the most discerning sensors the department’s had in years. For being a tiny, spiky, and occasionally vicious spitfire of a kunoichi, she seems to have the best idea of what’s going on.

“We’ve had repeated incursions from shape-changing monsters since the attack on Site Nine,” Makoto tells us, even as she stomps on the corpse of the…what did Obito call these? Zetsu-clones? Her sandaled foot caves its face in as though it were made of dough. She growls, “The easiest way to tell them apart is based on security codes, but since we discovered one of them eating Junpei, we’re not taking any chances. We have no idea what they can learn through chakra or blood transference.”

“Have they been using their victims’ jutsu?” I ask.

“No,” Makoto replies. At the looks on our faces, she adds, “Oh, it’s not like they haven’t tried, but they don’t have the same level of experience.”

Even more worrying.

“I’ve received reports that they have the ability to travel underground,” I tell her, “Or that they’ve been used as an underground information network. Possibly both.”

Makoto stares. Then, “Well, that explains quite a bit. What sort of structure do you think they have?”

Even as she talks, Makoto walks briskly down the tunnel.

“I’ll tell you once we’re in a secure location,” I tell her.

“If they’re anywhere near as competent as ‘underground information network’ implies, then no location is safe. Unless we change countries,” Makoto says. Her green eyes narrow. “Look, I accept that we’re facing a challenge. But one of them broke my brother’s leg so badly that he’s likely never going to be able to walk again. Half of the base’s original roster is dead. We lost enough ground that Kumo could walk in and have a dance party on the ruins and we wouldn’t be able to respond. I want to know who’s behind this.”

She has a point.

“Allegedly, Madara Uchiha,” Jiraiya-sensei says.

Makoto stumbles and I hear a sharp inhale, but that’s about it. Besides, we’ve reached the center of the base.

Unlike the other parts of the mountain, this particular cavern is actually brightly lit behind the rock-over-steel-door that we’ve used to conceal the entrance. Someone, at some point, had decided that installing horrible fluorescent lighting was the thing to do, and the interior decorators might have been on strike when it was designed. The chamber was a stark, plain pocket in the mountain that had one half designated for command coordination and the other half for a medical center.

The medical center was more crowded than the communications area was.

Ryusei Kiyotaka is lying on the first hospital cot, with his left leg practically mummified and elevated on a stack of cheap cushions. His shades are nowhere to be found—except perhaps on the Zetsu mimicking him, even if Makoto had split them at the bridge—and his usual samurai topknot is in disarray. He doesn’t seem conscious, which could be due to blood loss or chakra drain or any number of other things.

In the next cot, there’s a familiar face. Or muzzle, rather. And next to Aomaru’s bed, a man sits.

“Minato!” says the man by the second cot. It seems that Gaku got out of the clusterfuck alive. He’s not in great shape, but at least he apparently still bleeds red, going by the bandages. “Did you get your students back?”

“Yes, they’re fine,” I say, grasping Gaku’s offered hand.

“Good. Tell Kakashi his dogs are life-savers,” Gaku tells me. A shadow crosses his face. “If not for them, I would’ve lost Aomaru.”

“I will. But are they okay?” I ask.

“Should be. They un-summoned themselves a little before we got here.” He gestures at the next bed over, where Kurojō is helping a heavily bandaged Dōtō sit up to greet us.

“Are any of your team fit for combat?” Makoto asks.

“I’m well enough, even if Aomaru can’t follow me this time,” Gaku says.

“Same here,” Kurojō adds, and Dōtō subsides after a brief wave.

“And I am, of course, ready to kill something that bleeds actual blood,” Makoto concludes.

There are maybe four other shinobi capable of fighting at the moment.

Maybe this is a bad idea.

Jiraiya-sensei pats my shoulder.

Oh, the joys of command.

“Fukasaku-sama, please take the injured to Konoha,” I say.

“Of course, Minato-chan.” The old toad looks at me seriously, though, and I pause. “But if you need any reinforcements, please call on Shima and me before you get into too much trouble.”

“I’ll make sure to do that,” I tell him, and the sage immediately hops off to start gathering casualties together for a reverse-summoning trip. It’s going to be incredibly unpleasant, but it’s better than coming back here and finding out that our entire base has been eaten.

I’m still not sure if I should take Makoto’s account as absolute truth, but there are some things shinobi just don’t deal with well. Seeing comrades die that way has to be the top of the list.

There’s a reason that no one likes the few Kiri-nin who’ve figured out how to summon sharks.

I take a deep breath.

Fact one: We’re maybe ten kilometers from where I think Madara is hiding out.

Fact two: Makoto Kiyotaka is a stupidly advanced sensor who hasn’t been killed by Zetsu clones.

Fact three: Jiraiya-sensei and I are both on this team and he hasn’t used up much of his chakra today.
Fact four: There’s an army between us and the probably-still-combat-capable target.

This doesn’t look great, but I think we can minimize our exposure time. That’ll have to be enough to get us there.

“Everyone here is clean,” Makoto answers my unspoken question. “Even if I had to stab them myself to make sure.”

Ryusei raises a middle finger at her, though he’s still pretty wobbly. Everyone else seems fine with the hairpin-pricks, at least. Or maybe we’re all too keyed up by the thought of near-flawless infiltrators to be worried about Makoto’s stabbing tendencies.

Fukasaku warps out as soon as he’s gotten all the casualties secured.

That leaves me with a group consisting of Makoto, Jiraiya-sensei, Kurojō, and Gaku-sans-Aomaru.

It’ll have to do.

We move out.

We also hit the first wave of Zetsu clones almost immediately. The surge of white bodies is nearly like a flood, and none of them have bothered to disguise themselves this time. As a result, there are an awful lot of green-haired, yellow-eyed, naked, one-armed putty-creatures heading our way at what can only be described as homicidal speed.

Between the five of us, though, and two of Jiraiya-sensei’s summoned warrior toads, we clear them out in short order. Makoto captures two of them in specialized sealing scrolls I tossed her way earlier, then breathes fire on the one left in front of her. I dart through the crowd, cutting throats and impaling hearts as I flit from kunai to kunai. Jiraiya-sensei coordinates with the toads, mashing the Zetsu clones into paste under their collective weight on more than one occasion. Gaku launches into a single–person version of the Fang Over Fang Inuzuka technique, while Kurojō manages to lead a number of them into a cloud of corrosive gas.

“This should be enough to argue your case to your superiors,” I comment to Makoto as she hands one of the capture scrolls back to me.

“I don’t think it’s my superiors I need to convince.” She says it so seriously that I blink. “Are you the next Hokage or aren’t you?”

Well…

I grin sheepishly.

“Minato, quit walking around with your head in the clouds and confirm we’re on the right track,” Jiraiya-sensei shouts at me.

Hm. Based on the remnant Flying Thunder God kunai around here, Obito’s testimony, plus the evidence of Wood Release jutsu…

“Yes. This way next,” I say.

The rest of the journey is…well, ten minutes of anxiety followed by two of excitement, mostly. Not that I wish we had more Zetsu clones to beat to death, but it’s starting to become apparent that they’re not really as powerful up-front as their stealth record allows them to be. Perfect infiltrators they might be, but having Jiraiya-sensei and me here has tipped the scales in our favor. It helps that they’ve been apparently giving up on the idea of disguising themselves, or else Makoto would have to put her security protocol through a few more paces.

The last one falls to a Rasengan that makes its head explode like that weird, hollow Zetsu clone Kakashi killed.

On that note, I think we’ve found the place.

I haven’t seen a cave that big since the last time I poked around the evacuation shelters in the Hokage Mountain. The entrance matches it, bizarrely, which is actually even more worrying.

Either something really big burrowed out of the formerly-modest entrance, or Obito’s account of the strange statue enhancing the Zetsu clones’ strength is all too true. I signal for my team to hang back if at all possible, though I don’t expect for a second that Jiraiya-sensei will listen to me.

Then I head in, ready to summon Gamabunta if this turns out to be a trap.

Not that I’m entirely sure that I have the chakra to do so, but…well. No one needs to know that, and Jiraiya-sensei is half a step behind me at most.

We make our way inside, our path lit only by a chemical glow-stick.

And there’s nothing there.

Let me preface this next section by saying that I am grateful for my families in both of my lives. While I may not always get along with the members thereof, I’ve never been abused or neglected or made to feel unwanted. I’ve always had a loving home, which has contributed significantly to my mental stability over the thirty-odd years I’ve been running around with roughly the same soul. This, on its own, puts me at a significant advantage over most of the people I’ve met in this lifetime. I can never thank Mom or Hayate or Dad or my other family enough to establish how grateful I am for that.

This does not change the fact that Mom scared the ever-loving crap out of me.

Immediately after leaving Toad Mountain behind, my vision had filled with smoke and I got that hook-behind-the-navel sensation again that told me we were all on the move. When the smoke cleared and the world spun a lot less, I could identify a bunch of chakra signatures I recognized and a room I didn’t.

I’d never been in Sensei’s house, as it happened. In four bloody years of knowing him, I’d never so much as stopped by to bug him in his off-hours.

Sensei and Kushina’s shared living room was actually pretty messy, considering who lived here. Sensei may have been an expert at paperwork, data, and crunching numbers, but he’d never struck me as an obsessive housecleaner. Somewhat understandably, the living room was actually strewn with papers and half-filled scrolls over a neat if misshapen coffee table, a couch with mismatched cushions, and a stuffed bear that was obviously well-loved once-first-date material. Other than the Sensei-derived mess, though, everything seemed to be in order. There were red-framed photographs on the walls—Sensei’s team photo with us, Sensei and Kushina on a date, Kushina and Mito Uzumaki, Sensei and Jiraiya. I got the impression that the house was actually a lot bigger than that—there were way too many doors and halls leading off from the entranceway for a small, modest sort of place. Their house took up the entire top two floors of a building, if I remembered the TV show correctly.
All of that I had to establish over the previous few seconds.

The reason for that involved my mother.

Mom was in the room when we appeared out of a fold in space-time, which I realized immediately. The number of total occupants of the house had increased by six—Shima, Kushina, Rin, Obito, Kakashi, and myself—in addition to the three already around. I identified them as the Hokage, my mother, and a woman who seemed vaguely familiar and was about twice my mother’s age.

Mom immediately rushed me. Before I could react, she was kneeling and had dragged me down to her level with her hands clamped around my face. As she obviously checked me over for injuries, I was also observing her.

She looked pale with worry—paler than usual, anyway—and wore a Konoha uniform instead of her usual lavender yukata. Her long black hair was tied up and braided and crammed up against the base of her neck in a knot, and a Konoha headband looped around her neck like Hinata’s had in the future. There was a full-sized katana strapped to her back, over the shoulder pads of her chūnin flak jacket, and her long dark blue sleeves were rolled up to her elbows.

Also, she was squishing my face.

“Kei-chan,” Mom breathed, and bumped her forehead against mine. I closed my eyes. I basked in the feel of her chakra and, yes, even the fact that she was suddenly hugging the stuffing out of me. I could breathe later, right?

Hell and high water came and went, and I was home.

After a long, silent moment, Mom pulled back and—while still leaving one hand clamped onto my shoulder because I sure as hell wasn’t going anywhere—finally looked around. I felt her chakra wobble in relief when she saw the rest of my team still intact, and then stop dead upon recognizing Obito.

By the time I really processed that, she had dragged me over to Obito and pushed his hair out of his face with her free hand, as though to be sure it was really him.

“Obito-kun?” Mom asked, immediately focusing on the pressure scars around his remaining eye. She traced one line with her thumb, almost absently. I noticed belatedly that she had let go of my shoulder and tried massaging feeling back into it. “How is this possible?”

Obito gave a sheepish sort of grin. It was the kind that made Sensei want to pull his hair out when we downplayed sprains or cuts with a stupid, stupid smile. My blood refused to boil at that moment, though. The gleam had worn off of things. “Uh, the rock didn’t do it?”

Kushina tugged on a lock of his overgrown hair. “Obito,” she reprimanded.

“Ow!” Rubbing his head and leaning away from Kushina, Obito held out his artificial right arm for Mom’s discerning eye. Mom prodded at it curiously, so Obito explained, “I, uh, I got a spare and I’m really okay. Really.”

Kushina tugged on a lock of his overgrown hair. “Obito,” she reprimanded.

“Then where have you been?” Mom asked, and there was an undertone to her voice that implied threat. I just wasn’t sure to what degree.

“Um…” Obito said.

Kushina, thankfully, saved his bacon. “Gekkō-san, I completely understand if you’re feeling frustrated,” Kushina said, redirecting Mom’s anger from Obito to being patronized by Kushina. The redhead held up both hands in a placating manner. “I didn’t know he was alive until Minato told me a couple of hours ago.”

“Though I suppose he could have written from that hole in the ground,” was Shima’s mildly sarcastic comment.

Mom didn’t say anything.

Then, just when I was about to wonder if I should have asked Obito and Shima to dive for cover before Mom exploded due to suppressed outrage, Mom deflated. The tension went right out of her frame and everyone in the room relaxed a little, even the severe-looking brunette woman standing by the Hokage. I wasn’t sure that the Hokage had been anxious at all. Shima either.

Mom ruffled Obito’s hair—and wow, I hadn’t even thought about how long it’d been since he’d had a shower with soap—and said, “It’s good to have you back.”

I made a mental note to bully Kakashi into getting Obito cleaned up, if no one else would do it. Or maybe Mom would take Obito back under her wing. Then I wouldn’t have to worry about it.

“I’m glad to be back,” Obito said, and I pretended not to see when he wiped his face with those too-long sleeves. I wanted to hug him, but I wasn’t sure if he could take it if I did it while he was crying—even if it was because he was happy.

Mom hugged him. After a second or so, Obito’s arms came up and his hands clung to the back of Mom’s flak jacket. I could see the tendons stand out on the backs of his hands—even the Zetsu one.

Kakashi looked away, and Rin brought her hands to her mouth to keep from saying anything.

I decided to join in on the hug, making “come over here” gestures to Rin and Kakashi. In both of my lifetimes, I’d been lucky enough to be born into physically affectionate families. No one else on my team had, and it showed. Oh boy, did it ever.

I didn’t even know if any of them remembered what it felt like to be held, except by each other. I hugged Obito semi-regularly and so did Mom, and both of us hugged Rin at least once every time we saw her.

Kakashi was ignoring me.

…Since he’d hugged me earlier, pulling him into this one to be squeezed to death by Mom would be fair game.

Kakashi abruptly changed tack to glare at me, as though reading my thoughts. Sourpuss.

Unfortunately, we had to cut the group hug session short (meaning after Rin had joined, but while Kakashi and I were still in a stare-off) because the brown-haired woman in the room cleared her throat loudly. After a second or two, we came to the collective realization that we were not the only people in the room, and that two of the others were the freaking Hokage and a woman I suspected was his wife. The group embarrassment was almost palpable.

Well, unless your name was Miyako Gekkō.

My mother’s face was as still and blank as stone.

“Sarutobi-sama, Hokage-sama,” Mom said, in a tone flatter than a dead note on a piano. She only spared a glance for Shima—I guess she didn’t know who she was.

“I think we need to explain a few things,” Kushina said, stepping in before Mom and Biwako Sarutobi could even think about getting snippy at each other. There was something disarming about Kushina and her smile, no matter how sheepish it was. It was a trait that her son had definitely gotten from her, for all that his looks were pure Namikaze otherwise. “Gekkō-san, I mentioned that Kei-chan had been in an altercation with Kiri-nin…”

“So you did,” Mom replied.

“I left out a few things,” Kushina told her. She nodded at the Hokage, adding, “May I, Hokage-sama?”

The Hokage clasped his hands behind his back. “Proceed, Uzumaki-san.”

“Thank you,” Kushina straightened, making the gentle bulge of her pregnant belly a little more obvious. I’d never really given much thought to Kushina’s pregnancy, but it was already July, and I was going to be fourteen in about a week. Naruto was damn well on his way. The world would tremble.

…As long as I hadn’t managed to invalidate his existence. Oh, that wasn’t much of a comforting thought…

“Keisuke Gekkō, as a result of her recent patrol mission and interference from Kirigakure, is now the host of the Three-Tailed Beast,” Kushina said, as though she hadn’t just opened the bomb bay doors on a B-52 of revelations.

(I’m a bit of a hypocrite that way.)

Mom went even paler than usual.

Oppressive silence!

“It’s true!” Obito broke in, shattering the suffocating silence as things sank in. I wasn’t sure what he was thinking, but he had a determined look on his face anyway. “There was this awful chakra, and her eyes were this weird gold-on-red and there were tails.”

Rin shook her head. I wasn’t sure if she was disappointed in us or if it was just an admission that she didn’t really have much to contribute to the testimony about my ninja turtle problem. She’d kind of been unconscious for most of the chakra brawl.

I always thought I was more a Donatello than a Leonardo, at least back when I’d been able to watch cartoons. Now Rin had that role, I guess. That meant that one member of our team had to be Michelangelo, if Obito didn’t have that role. Then again, with Kakashi as Raphael…

Well, now I’d never be able to stop comparing Sensei to Splinter.

“This is why we were supposed to debrief first,” Kakashi muttered.

“Then you take a stab at it,” Kushina said, raising her eyebrow expectantly.

Kakashi gave her a long look, and I felt a brief flash of surprised annoyance from the way his chakra twisted. It was gone in an instant, but I sure remembered it. I wasn’t really sympathetic. If he hadn’t wanted to be called to the floor, he shouldn’t have said anything.
“Keisuke became a jinchūriki as a result of a plot against Konoha by Madara Uchiha,” Kakashi said clearly. He closed his visible eye. Apparently ignoring the way the Hokage’s mammoth chakra signature jumped, he went on, “Further, Madara Uchiha’s plot involved rescuing and subverting Obito’s sanity through six months of isolation, without our knowledge. Thus far, we haven’t determined the depths of his motivations, but Sensei and Jiraiya-sama have gone to confront him on their own initiative.”

“…That’s an awful summary,” Obito said.

Kakashi glared sidelong at him. “It’s not my fault that the situation became stupidly complicated as soon as too many Uchiha were involved.”

“HEY!”

“Is this how briefings would go if Minato-sensei wasn’t around?” Rin asked me in a whisper.

I nodded. Eventually, I explained things. Obito hadn’t been there for most of it, Kakashi had missed the crucial part, and Rin had been unconscious. I was really the only one who could explain what had happened. I even had the sealing background to explain what had happened in terms that made sense to every adult in the room. And besides, hearing everyone else try to explain for me made me feel weird and oddly irresponsible.

I mean, it wasn’t like the sealing thing was anyone’s fault but Madara’s, and he wasn’t really around to catch all the slinging blame. Somehow, that translated to Obito and Kakashi getting snippy at each other instead of plotting horrific revenge together on a scheming war criminal.

These boys, I swear. They never learn.

Ten tons of rock didn’t seem to change anything, and neither did the ritualistic exchange of eyeballs, so I was at a loss to find something that would. They were basically blood brothers at this point, but apparently also still eternal rivals.

When I was done explaining…well, everyone needed some time to think. The Hokage and his wife were going to have a quick talk with Mom and with Kushina, which I wasn’t allowed to hear. Apparently, the rest of us were put on R-and-R duty. I didn’t even know that had to be a thing.

“While the adults are talking,” Kushina said, with a sort of cheerful malice, “your job is to get cleaned up.”

“I’m a jōnin and the rest of my team is composed of chūnin. Is our security clearance not high enough?” Kakashi wanted to know. At least he was the one asking—it was a big turnaround from Mr. Sensei-Knows-Best from even a few months ago. It could be a good or a bad thing. Right then, it was a thing called “semantics.”

“Yes and no.” Kushina held up two fingers. “I’m a specialist jōnin, and so is Gekkō-san—even if she’s retired. But it’s not about rank. It’s about the fact that the Hokage said so, that Minato said so — ” I guessed that meant Kushina was using what authority Sensei had given like a sledgehammer on Kakashi’s sense of What Should Happen— “and because you’ve had about the longest day anyone can think of and we all want you to take a freaking break before you fall asleep standing up.”

“Don’t we deserve to know what’ll happen to us?” Obito demanded.
“Sure. Once we’ve decided what that is,” Kushina said. She pointed toward the washroom. “Get moving.”

We tried to appeal to Shima, who had hopped on top of a bookshelf and been oddly quiet for the past few minutes. Puppy-dog eyes, in my case.

“Don’t look at me,” Shima said, giving us the look that a lot of parents had. The kind that said you were on thin ice. It just looked weird on a frog. “I am waiting for Fukasaku and Jiraiya-chan. In the meantime, I’m deciding the futures of a gaggle of mudpuppies.”

That was about the least subtle admonishment and dismissal I’d ever heard from a frog.

And see, we did that. We really did try.

We ran into a snag almost immediately though.

“Exactly how long is your hair now?” I asked, tugging on the end of Obito’s formerly-spiky hair.

“I don’t know,” Obito said, twisting around to check. He reached back and found the longest tip of his hair after a second or two. Since I could see it, I was even more baffled. His hair had somehow gone from about three centimeters to reaching almost to middle of his back in six months? Zero to emo in no time flat, seriously. “This long?”

“Oh, whatever,” I grumbled. Not my problem. At least he wouldn’t have to deal with male-pattern baldness, right? “Just don’t use up all the hot water.”

“Excuse me?” But Obito was grinning. “Who, exactly, hasn’t had access to hot running water in six months?”

I made a gagging noise. “Okay, no, you’re going first and I don’t care how long it takes. Just go.”

While Rin took over the other bathroom—turned out that the apartment had three bedrooms and two full baths and took up enough space to make my old house’s square footage look modest—Kakashi and I went scrounging for spare clothes and medical supplies. It wasn’t like I had anything else to do, since my toothbrush and other toiletries were all in my scrolls and I’d lost half of those over the course of the mission from hell.

I also noticed that Kakashi knew his way around, and said as much.

“I had to stay here before I got an apartment,” was all Kakashi said in response, before opening the door to what I assumed was the guest bedroom.

It wasn’t.

It was the nursery.

Maybe “nursery” was too charitable of a term. I could at least say it was certainly in the process of becoming one. The room was about four meters by five meters, and partially painted a very pale yellow over what had once been white walls, going by the blank parts. Some parts of the walls were marked off for murals, and I could see that Kushina had already gotten started on a painting of a giant white spiral. A large black bookshelf was sitting next to the window, with some well-loved children’s books already hiding in what slots weren’t taken up by scroll-work. A partly-assembled crib was shoved into one corner of the room, to make way for drop-cloths and a rug that was still rolled up. There were also a number of bins in the room, labeled things like “diapers,” “toys” and “baby clothes.”
…It seemed like Sensei and Kushina couldn’t quite decide what part of the nursery-assembling stage they were on.

Kakashi closed the door. “They changed guest bedrooms,” he said.

I didn’t have anything to say in reply, so I followed him down the hallway.

I didn’t have the space in my head to worry about yet more reminders of Kakashi’s horrible past. I would after, say, fifteen hours of sleep, but at that moment I could feel my brain slowing to a crawl.

The next room was smaller, and further away from the master bathroom (where Obito could be heard swearing at the knots in his hair). Kakashi opened the door anyway and went inside straight away, even though I wasn’t sure what he was even seeing.

The actual guest bedroom was about half-a-meter smaller in both length and width, and apparently had been the designated dumping ground for Kushina and Sensei’s baby-fueled remodeling rampage. There were, for some reason, two queen-sized beds crammed into it. They were both shoved together to make a sort of super-bed, with half of the resulting structure decked out with red comforters and one in blue with a shuriken pattern. The room also contained another bookshelf (almost inaccessible because of the beds), a desk with more ink stains than my house’s dining room table, and a gigantic oaken dresser.

Kakashi made a beeline for the top drawer of the latter.

While he dug around in it, I looked at the walls and wondered why the walls had needed to be plastered. The ceiling, too. The plaster didn’t even match.

Then Kakashi disturbed my contemplative moment by throwing a paper-wrapped package at my head. I caught it, but the thought counted.

“Take those to Obito,” Kakashi said, while I shifted the package in my hands. It felt like…yep, a pack of clothes. Wrapped in that weird water-resistant field paper, too. “They might fit him.”

“You have a spare set of clothes here?” I asked, and immediately felt stupid. Of course he did. The two most stable adult influences in Kakashi’s entire life lived here. Why the hell wouldn’t he?

“Yes, I do,” Kakashi said, in a tone that implied my mental self-flagellation was exactly the correct reaction.

“Fine, fine. I know when I’m not wanted,” I grumbled theatrically, stomping out of the room.

And it wasn’t like I could kill more time by going into the living room to bug Kushina and Mom. I could feel the electric buzz of privacy seals killing any sound that tried to escape the living room, which was so not the right place for that kind of discussion. But it wasn’t like there were really better options for privacy. I imagined that between Kushina and Sensei, their house was basically a sealing equivalent of Fort Knox. I wasn’t sure what that meant for the structural integrity of the building, but it had to mean good things for our chances of going undetected by Danzō or the Council. At least for the night.

It wasn’t like we were going to get out of here before then.

I made my way back to the bathroom Obito had colonized and pounded on the door. “Hey, Obito, I’m leaving a spare set of clothes out here!”

“That’s—ow—great, thanks,” Obito said. The hairbrush was apparently putting up a fight. “Um, you might not want to come in or anything.”

“No shit,” was my dry response.

I may have seen both Obito and Kakashi shirtless at some points during long missions, but I wasn’t his mother. If he was going to get into a fight with grooming equipment and lose, I was going to let him. I’d probably just tell him to cut that extra hair off anyway.

“Screw this,” I heard Obito mutter. Then the water started running. “Kei, if you’re still there, you should probably go check on Rin. Didn’t she get hurt?”

“Yeah,” and damn, I’d forgotten about that. I skedaddled. With my chakra bottled up inside me, I was only going be able to do the most basic examinations to make sure Rin wasn’t still a little concussed. I decided I’d better get started.

Anyway, that kept me busy for the next few minutes. Rin was fine, as it turned out.

“You worry too much. Fukasaku-sama and Shima-sama know what they’re doing.” Rin said when she emerged. She gave me a fondly exasperated look. “Try to relax, Kei-senpai.”

Easy for her to say.

I wish I had a pithy saying for the sheer amount of stress I was under and attempted to avoid with minimal success, but I don’t. Maybe that’s insensitive of me, but over the previous eight or nine hours I’d had enough emotional highs and lows for a month, was facing the possibility that my mom would never let me see my brother again and, oh, had been turned into a Tailed Beast Host.

I felt a brief flash of hatred for just about everything in existence.

Then I claimed the bathroom for myself, stripped, successfully resisted the urge to break the fucking bathroom mirror (since it showed me my reflection and that damned seal), and stepped under the showerhead in short order. I cranked the water as hot as I could make it and tried to boil my stress away.

Not literally, but I think I was the one who killed the water heater. Luckily, Kakashi was in and out of the other shower in a lot less time and probably didn’t notice anything amiss.

I emerged from the bathroom dressed in spare clothes from multiple donors, including my mother (who had apparently slipped out and back with a spare set apiece for me and for Rin). My clothes almost felt like they didn’t fit right anymore, even though I always wore a t-shirt and shorts to bed. That might have been just my imagination, though.

I didn’t break the mirror on the way out, either. Go me.

I found everyone in the guest bedroom, plus Kushina.

“Hey, Kei-chan. Come in!” Kushina said when I approached.

Somehow, the desk in that room had been covered in newspaper and a half-dozen little bottles of shinobi-grade nail enamel. Kakashi, Rin, and Obito sat on the shoved-together beds in their pajamas (nightdress for Rin, boxers and tank for Obito, and a no-sleeved version of Kakashi’s usual mask/shirt combo with sweatpants) and were eyeing the bottles and Kushina with varying levels of excitement, apprehension, or disdain. Pretty easy to guess who felt what, right?

“So, what are we doing now?” I asked.
“I’m going to make sure that none of your nails chip or split ever again,” Kushina said, in a tone the Great Toad Sage didn’t quite compare to.

Female arcane wisdom (or whatever it was that Kushina was advocating) being beyond me, I blinked stupidly at her.

Kushina promptly grabbed my wrist and dragged me onto the bed with the rest of my team.

Once I was seated cross-legged next to Obito on the comforter, Kushina unscrewed the top of one of the bottles of base coat and began to talk.

“So, this is your debriefing.” Kushina cocked her head to the side briefly, and then she gestured for Rin to look over at the bottles. “Pick a color.”

“Um…purple?” Rin said hesitantly.

“Sounds good,” Kushina said, and began applying a base coat to Rin’s nails. “Won’t be able to apply a reflective top coat, though. You know how it is.”

The rest of us were too apprehensive to say anything.

“Since you’re all being so quiet, I’ll start,” Kushina said, not missing a beat. “The short version is that you’re going to be here for at least until Minato gets back.”

“Makes sense,” I muttered, ducking my head when Kushina looked up at me. “I mean, with… everything.”

“Especially you, Kei-chan,” Kushina told me seriously, and I looked up again. She at least didn’t seem upset with me. “I’ve spoken to your mother and the Hokage, and we’ve agreed that it’s best for you to stay here until we can prepare your family’s house with some security seals. As interesting as being a jinchūriki is, it does make you a target.”

“We already were targets,” Obito said. He scratched the base of his still-damp ponytail. “I mean, what with being the Yellow Flash’s students.”

Kushina nodded. “Right. But you were legitimate combat targets. While being Minato’s students did make you more valuable, let me just tell you now that there was no way an enemy would sneak into the village to take you from us.” She finished with Rin’s right hand and held out her own hand to receive Rin’s left. “But if you’re carrying a Tailed Beast around, the game’s different.”

If Kushina had been kidnapped out of her own house like in the flashbacks I’d seen…well.

“Your mother agreed to the security upgrades,” Kushina said to me. “That’s good. It means she still wants you to stay in your family home.”

Just like that, I felt like a huge weight had been lifted from my shoulders. Provisionally. Provided I didn’t fuck up or Mom didn’t change her mind or Hayate didn’t develop a turtle allergy or…something.

I didn’t want to have to make Mom choose between my sanity and Hayate’s safety. I didn’t want to screw up. I didn’t want to lose control or lose my family or let anyone down. Of course, I wasn’t much of a threat with my chakra control shot to hell, but the thought lingered anyway.

I leaned against Obito. “Hey, Obito, if Mom kicks me out anyway, can I move in?”
“I don’t have an apartment anymore, so you’re asking the wrong guy,” Obito said, trying to be funny and failing. “I’m pretty sure the lease expires if the landlord has your death certificate.”

“Crap, you’re right.” I blinked.

“Obito’s staying with us until we can find him a new place,” Kushina interrupted smoothly. She finished Rin’s nails with a flourish. “There. Kakashi?”

“…Base coat only,” Kakashi said after a while.

“Furthermore, the Hokage’s taken your assessment of Shimura under advisement. Which would be why we need to wait on Minato,” Kushina went on. “We need to push his inauguration through as quickly as possible.”

“I’m surprised he believed me.”

“He did when Shima-sama was the one talking,” Kushina said. “The Great Toad Sage took you very seriously, even if it didn’t seem like it. He had Shima-sama tell the Hokage everything as though it was his own vision.”

That…made things easier. And harder, in a way.

Everything was going to change.

“Further, we’ve classified your status as a provisional S-class secret,” Kushina said casually, and I felt my blood turn to ice. “You can tell whoever you want, but everyone else here is sworn to silence. We’ll have an ironclad decision when Minato comes back, but it means that in the meantime you can’t tell your other friends or your brother about things.”

Not really a problem, when I thought about it. I didn’t know how Hayate would react anyway. If Mom was going to act like nothing had happened, I could deal.

For a while.

I guess it wasn’t the first time I’d kept a major secret from my brother. This time, though, the secret wasn’t just mine. And it had teeth.

“I kind of wonder what’d happen if it was public info that I was a host,” I mused aloud. “I mean, there’s Killer B of Kumogakure—”

“Who is at least in his twenties and the Third Raikage’s son,” Kushina countered. “I’d much rather wait until you’re an adult and strong enough to deal with all comers.”

“…Does anyone know about you?” I asked.

“Nope. I decided I didn’t want anyone to, other than the Hokage and his wife.” She smiled faintly. “Of course, that didn’t stop Minato from finding out anyway.”

I kinda wanted to hear that story, but maybe later. Like when I wasn’t caught up in my personal drama.

“Anyway, the mission itself is also S-ranked. However,” she paused, finishing up Kakashi’s right hand and then looking over at Obito, “Obito’s status is going to be A-ranked.”

“You’re kidding!” Obito said. “Why?”
“Well, we obviously have to cover up the months you spent with Madara, and then there’s the issue of the six months you spend legally dead.” She let go of Kakashi’s hand and gestured for him to hand over his left. “Too bad you’re too young to be in ANBU, and that ROOT is sort of persona-non-grata right now. That’d be an easy excuse, if a horrible one.”

Kakashi said, “So how are we going to explain how he’s not dead?”

“And why don’t we just bring the Madara thing up?” Rin asked.

Well, because the entire shinobi community would freak the fuck out, children. Not to mention that since the war was just winding down, Madara’s theoretical survival could be used as an excuse for rearmament and lo, we’d be in another war damn near instantaneously. And Sensei’s inaugural issue-solving (in this case, dragging Iwa and Kumo to the negotiation table) would be tanked.

Kushina paused. “I don’t think any of you really understand the reputation Madara Uchiha built.” Her chakra felt heavy, solemn. Even the Fox seemed to be a little more restrained than usual. “You’re too young. But when we talk about Madara as a historical bogeyman, the story doesn’t even compare to his reputation when he was active in the world. The possibility that that man could come back from fighting the First…doesn’t really bear thinking about.” She finished with Kakashi’s other hand. “My great-aunt was the First’s wife and fought the man himself. I think I understand better than most.”

“That isn’t the half of it,” I muttered.

“Kei, pick a color,” Kushina said.

“Uh, dark blue,” I said.

“Moving on,” Kushina said, with my right hand in a grip like a vice, “It makes more sense to play up the prisoner-of-war angle. People don’t tend to ask who grabbed you. They can assume it was Iwa—when you get down to it, they’re more likely to understand and less likely to treat you like an unexploded bomb.”

“That isn’t really a better pill for Intelligence to swallow,” I said.

“It is, but you can’t see the difference yet. If it’s Iwa at fault, or maybe Orochimaru, then Minato can hold the wolves off because they’re known factors. If it got out that it was Madara, no. Not even the Hokage would be able to keep you out of Interrogation’s hands. And from there, ROOT,” Kushina explained patiently.

“I’d think Orochimaru would explain the arm better,” Obito admitted, “But doesn’t he have a thing for the Sharingan?”

“…Yes. Damn. Iwa it is,” Kushina said, and finished my hand with a flourish. “There!”

So, now the nails on my right hand were blue. Kushina got started on my left.

“Leave them to dry for at least two hours,” Kushina said, which would have been too little, too late if she’d done Obito’s first. “Obito, what color do you want?”

“Eh, I don’t know,” Obito shrugged. “Something dull.”

“Steel gray it is,” Kushina said.

“Also, two hours?” I asked.
“More like three if you do multiple layers. Shinobi-grade enamel is one of those ‘you get what you pay for’ things. On the upside, the day it chips without your nail coming off is the first sign of the apocalypse,” Kushina said cheerfully.

This, I think, would be the point that sane people would pop Gone with the Wind or The Lord of the Rings: Extended Edition into the DVD player/Blue-ray thing/PS3/whatever. Since we lived in a world where VHS security tapes were still considered state-of-the-art, I wasn’t exactly jumping for joy at the idea of having three hours to do fuck-all.

…Wow, there were so many movies I wouldn’t get to see, now. Like the Hobbit sequels. No more Richard Armitage-as-Thorin. Or any more Marvel movies. No Sebastian Stan as the Winter Soldier. No Avengers sequels.

And Homestuck was never going to end.

“Oh, on the upside, if you want it to dry faster you can always stick your hands in the freezer,” Kushina went on, oblivious to my miniature existential crisis.

Kakashi got up and left the room immediately.

“…He walked right into that one, didn’t he?” Obito snickered.

“Maybe,” was Kushina’s response.

“So what are we supposed to do while Kakashi’s getting frostbite?” I asked.

Kushina shrugged. “No idea. I figured you kids would mostly want to sleep the day off. Now that the fate of the world is one of those things that gets tabled until Minato gets back, I imagine you’ve had an adrenaline crash coming for a while now.”

“Yeah. Guarantee we’re gonna screw up the polish things while we sleep, though,” Obito said, and then was overtaken by a jaw-cracking yawn.

Kushina waved her free hand vaguely. “It’s fine. I was just helping you all unwind, anyway.”

Right. Sure.

Personally, I was too keyed up by anxiety to do much other than fret. Sleep was a distant dream.

“I’m going to go make sure the nighttime security wards are all up, then I’ll take an early night myself. It’s what, eight? Nine on the outside, I think.” Kushina wandered out, after only finishing the polish on Obito’s human hand. The Zetsu arm had nails, but I don’t think anyone was especially interested in getting too close to it. I’d seen Obito punch people through threes with that arm. And punch people full of trees. Fucking weird shinobi genetic bullshit.

Well then.

“Today was just awkward as fuck and I’m glad it’s over,” I said, flopping onto my back and making Rin bounce on the mattress.

“Kei-chan…” Though I wondered if she was planning on admonishing me for use of rude language, she shook her head. “It’s been a long day.”

“And we’re under house arrest,” Obito added. He sighed. “Man, this sucks.

Kakashi reappeared, carrying a bucket of ice water. “This is faster than waiting.”
I eyed it suspiciously. “Well, if you say so.”

He sat down on the bed next to us, looking at me. “Kei.”

“What?” I asked, almost challengingly.

Oddly, Kakashi was calm in the face of my issues bubbling up from who-knew-where. He patted the mattress next to his thigh and I felt a flare of chakra, and then—

Oh, hey. Pakkun!

If it weren’t for my drying fingernails, I would have picked him up immediately to snuggle. As it was, he padded across the mattress to me and decided to lie down against my side.

“You are not being subtle,” I told Kakashi seriously.

He shrugged.

If he’d made a move toward lifting his headband again, I probably would have punched him in the face. I didn’t need another Sharingan sleeping pill substitute, I remembered the last time he’d pulled that trick, and I hated the idea of repeating the experience.

As it was, I was cool with the dog.

The rest of the evening was spent quietly. We didn’t talk much about what had happened that day—frankly, it’d been talked to death—but there were little things like birthday plans and missed gifts and other stuff to think about. Normal things. Civilian normal, even. Damned if I remember any of them. I was too busy thinking of what I’d have to do when I got up in the morning—probably writing up profiles for every single villain I could remember from the old TV series. Hopefully, it’d be a start to earning my way back into people’s good graces.

I was tired enough that I was the second one to fall asleep, after Rin. Kakashi and Obito might have kept going for a while, but I missed it.

The first thing I did once I woke up in the morning—before pretty much anyone else, sans Kakashi—was to grab the kitchen table for myself and start spreading paper and pens out on the surface. I had a lot of information to get down, coded or not, and I couldn’t afford to wait. As such, I conquered the table and then set myself to writing about everything I could remember on explosive flash paper.

If I had to destroy all of it, I would. I could start over again.

Kakashi sat down next to me with a mug of tea in each hand. Careful to avoid the piles of paper, with my progressively messier handwriting detailing at least half-dozen of the major players in the possible future, he pushed one of them in my direction.

I blinked at it stupidly, still bleary-eyed with my pen hovering over the entry about Kakuzu of Takigakure. Not exactly an essential figure, true, but after spending half an hour trying to remember all of Nagato’s Rinnegan bullshit and still feeling like I was forgetting something, I figured it’d be a nice break. After all, Kakashi had killed him in the nonexistent futureverse.

Then I looked out the window and realized that the sky was finally starting to change color. The sun was on its way.
“Crap, it’s five already?” I muttered.

Kakashi nodded. Then he looked over the profiles I’d already finished.

“You have Kakuzu listed twice,” Kakashi said after a moment.

“I—wait, I do? Dammit.” I scrambled for the extra sheet, scanning it for errors as soon as I had it clenched between my thumb and forefinger. “Crap. This one’s supposed to be about Kisame Hoshigaki.” I’d gotten halfway through writing just that, in fact, before it had devolved into a list of Kakuzu’s capabilities again. With a frustrated sigh, I sent my chakra surging into the paper—since my control was still terrible—and it puffed away into white smoke and sparks.

“Combining fatigue and reports isn’t the smartest thing I’ve seen you do,” Kakashi commented dryly.

“Well, I’m the only one who can. So I’m going to anyway,” I snapped.

Kakashi’s mug was abruptly half-full. How the hell did he drink that so fast without scalding himself or letting me see his face?

“…Oh, who am I kidding?” I grumbled, and the second Kakuzu profile flashed into smoke under my hand. I didn’t really intend to do that, but as long as it was something I could easily remember and I didn’t leave scorch marks on the table, I wasn’t going to get wound up over it. “I can barely think.”

Kakashi pushed the mug closer to me.

Finally, I gave up and grabbed the handle like a lifeline. “Thanks.”

Kakashi resumed reading profiles—apparently Zabuza Momochi, this time—while I buried my face in my folded arms. The calm quiet continued for a while, with the sun sliding unnoticed into the sky for…I don’t know, maybe half an hour. I dozed even with my mug of tea cooling beside me.

Then I sat up abruptly without really realizing why, at first.

Then I realized that Sensei’s chakra was at the door and leapt out of my seat in my haste to answer it, upending a chair and making Kakashi jolt in surprise at my antics. Jiraiya’s chakra was there too, but only for a heartbeat. He was gone by the time Sensei started messing with the front door lock and the dozens of layered security seals controlled by it.

“Did you get him?” I asked as soon as Sensei was inside the threshold.

Sensei, sitting down on the foyer’s step and having some trouble taking his sandals off, shook his head.

My heart sank.

Now that the initial disappointment had a chance to sink in, though, I realized that Sensei’s chakra was flagging badly. He was exhausted, after a day and a night of—I didn’t know, maybe chasing ghosts or arguing with the Hokage or something. What right did I really have to be disappointed that he hadn’t pulled off the damn near impossible?

I sat down next to him.

Now what?

“We have three Zetsu corpses in T and I now, the Hokage’s getting ready to issue a statement, and you’re all safe,” Sensei says, patting my head. “We may not have bagged Madara, but I think we did pretty well.”

“…You’re right.” I paused. “I’ve been working on combat profiles for every bad guy I could think of, but I think you might need to go to bed before you read them.” As I spoke, Kakashi appeared at Sensei’s other side, apparently without traversing the space between the foyer and the dining room table. Just there and then here.

“Sounds good, Kei.” Sensei ran a hand over his face, then stood up somewhat unsteadily.

Kakashi and I exchanged glances, communicating concern without words, and escorted Sensei to the master bedroom. Once he was sawing logs next to Kushina—who hadn’t woken up while we had a very quiet argument with him—Kakashi and I headed back to the table and resumed our struggle to find meaning in the wake of everything that’d happened recently.

Maybe we’d be able to put our heads together to make something coherent before the rest of the world woke up.
Obito stumbled out of the guest bedroom sometime around, oh, let’s say ten in the morning. I guessed that he missed having an actual bed enough that sleeping for fourteen solid hours was of no consequence. Since I seemed to be returning to the two-hour-chunks-of-sleep-at-a-time problem I’d had as a kid, when the not-quite-visions were still pretty overwhelming, I was briefly jealous. Being able to sleep a night through did not seem to be a thing for me anymore. The barrier that the Dreamer and I had been was gone. Which sucked and made me crabbier than usual for early mornings. Then Obito commandeered the rice cooker and got started on making breakfast, so I forgave him.

I put my head down on the table and listened to the sounds of the household. Obito pulled a bag of rice out of a cabinet and dropped it on his foot, swearing. Kakashi turned the tea kettle back on and read my somewhat spotty reports on random future threats. Rin was in the shower and dropped a shampoo bottle with a tremendous series of bangs, amplified by the acoustics of the bathroom. Even as far away as we were from the master bedroom, I was pretty sure I could hear Kushina snore.

“When did Sensei get back?” Obito asked, having eventually wrestled all the ingredients he needed into some kind of order. From the looks of it, that list included some of Kushina’s store of fresh herbs, chicken stock, eggs, and entirely too much tap water. After a second, I realized he was making okayu.

Well, if all of us were pretty damned tired and Sensei was also chakra-exhausted on top of that, maybe the rice porridge of the ill and toothless (whether because the subject was in infancy or had lost all of their teeth to age and cavities) wasn’t a bad idea. I could remember a different variation of the same basic dish—called congee then—but I figured the general rules still applied.

“Yes.” I said, sitting up. I yawned and then decided to stretch until I could feel my joints pop. Given shinobi flexibility, that took a while longer than it would have in my old life. Then I got up to go bug Obito. “Need help, Obito?”

“No, I’m good.” Obito said, and damned if he didn’t know his way around a kitchen for simple stuff. “I got a clan caretaker when I was little, and she made sure I knew how to make really basic stuff.” He paused. “…Oh, hell. What are we going to actually tell the clan when I stop pretending to be dead?”

We’d kind of talked about that last night, but it’s not like we’d really come up with a script. And anyway, the whole discussion had been vetoed until Sensei got back. Now that he had, he was apparently too tired to spend much time in the land of the living. Blar.
Though I hated how we couldn’t seem to make a decision without him, the fact that Sensei was going to be Hokage soon enough meant that we were a lot less likely to face political repercussions for pretty much anything. As long as he was around, anyway—after October tenth, I’m pretty sure the other Kakashi would have been pretty hard-up for political influence before he established his combat reputation. Hence why Danzō had been up for Hokage, too. Rin had been too dead to care and Obito had been dead inside.

“No idea, other than ‘hey, I’m not dead’ for a start.” I told him, shrugging. Then I grabbed the lid Obito had been searching for and plopped it onto the countertop.

“That’s not really helping, Kei.” Obito told me. He handed me a wooded spoon. “Here, your turn.”

“Fine.” I said, and Obito went over to the kitchen table to look at the glorified pamphlets with Kakashi. I prodded at the rice soup and put the lid on the pot after a moment’s thought—if I remembered right, okayu needed half an hour to cook down anyway. Congee would have demanded four hours or something.

“What in hell is the Jashin cult?” Obito asked, reading over Kakashi’s shoulder.

“I’m not really sure.” I admitted. “I mean, I know that the only cultist Konoha forces ever ran into was…kinda special. Hidan managed to kill Asuma, but then he went up against Shikamaru and Kakashi and Shikamaru dismembered him for killing his teacher.”

“Shikamaru…are we talking about a Nara?” Obito asked.

“Yeah. Shikaku’s son.” I paused. “Hm. He hasn’t been born yet.” But a lot of the Konoha Twelve had.

…Crap. I counted quickly in my head. Sakura was the oldest student on Team Kakashi, since she was born in March or April to fit with the spring theme she had going, Sasuke was a July baby, Naruto was of course born on that one really shitty day in October… Then there was Team Gai, and all of those kids ought to be turning one year old soon if they hadn’t already. Um, I think Kiba was born in the summer sometime, while Shino was born in mid-winter…

At least I knew for sure that Hinata and Naruto weren’t born yet, right? So sue me for not memorizing birthday charts for twenty different characters. I barely remembered my own team’s birthdays sometimes.

“Who’s gonna be on Kakashi’s team?” Obito asked.

“Huh?” Kakashi said.

“Well, if Asuma gets a genin team I don’t see why you don’t.” Obito said reasonably. “Obviously, I don’t count since Tobi is kind of batshit, but I think you should. Right, Kei?”

“More or less.” I shrugged. “Kakashi’s team consisted of Sensei’s kid, Sakura Haruno, and Sasuke Uchiha.”

“Who’s Sakura Haruno?” Obito asked. “I mean, obviously Sasuke is totally a distant cousin or something, but I’ve never heard of the Haruno family.”

“Sakura is the daughter of…uh, Kizashi and Mebuki Haruno.” I shrugged. “I think Sakura’s first-generation shinobi on both sides, but her parents might be genin or retired or something.”

“Huh. How’d she get on a team with Sensei’s kid?” Obito wondered.
“The Academy groups students by performance.” Kakashi remarked. “So, obviously Sensei and Kushina’s son would be at the top of the class, with the Uchiha boy in the middle and Haruno in the bottom rungs.”

Ahaha, no.

“Move stuff around a bit and you’ve got it.” I said, making swirling motions in the air as though to reorganize refrigerator magnets. Then I realized that was dumb and grabbed my pen and a spare sheet of flash-paper and wrote down my revised ranking. “Put Sasuke at the top, Sakura in more or less the middle, and Naruto in dead last.”

“How the hell does that happen?” Obito demanded, and Kakashi blinked in surprise. “Sensei and Kushina would never—!” Obito’s mouth closed with a snap.

“…Yeah, that.” I muttered.

“Tobi ruins everything, doesn’t he?” Obito grumbled. “Okay, fine, let’s talk about Sasuke. Whose kid is he?”

…Wow, not much of a happier topic. “Sasuke is the second son of Fugaku and Mikoto Uchiha.” I said. I scratched the back of my head, thinking. “I’m not actually sure if Itachi has his little brother yet. But anyway, he turned out pretty driven and more or less worked his way to the top of the class through sheer stubbornness. He felt that he had to, to live up to the expectations an Uchiha has.”

“But…didn’t the Great Toad Sage say something about having to save the clan?” Obito wondered aloud. I blinked, and he said, “Well, obviously I wouldn’t have to save the clan from anything if there wasn’t any kind of threat, right? Since Tobi would probably be more likely to set people on fire than help them in the other world, no one would have gotten that prophecy. So the threat would’ve happened anyway. What happened over there?”

“Uh.” Shiiiiiiit. “Remember when I said Tobi cracked?”

Obito gave me a “well, duh” sort of look.

“I’m not entirely sure why, but Tobi took the role of Madara at the time.” At Obito’s blank look, I could only shrug. I didn’t necessarily have all of the connective tissue between scenes sorted out. I probably would once the Dreamer fully reincorporated, but until then I was left with the feeling that Kishimoto hadn’t actually planned the Tobito plot twist that far ahead of time. “Between him and Danzō and the Elder Council and the rising feelings of discontent in the clan and a brewing coup, all the pressure fell on Itachi when he was about thirteen and an ANBU captain.” I drummed my fingers on the table. “And, when forced to choose between the welfare of the village and the welfare of his clan, Itachi chose the village.”

I understand why Itachi would choose to kill the clan, rather than risk civil war.

I understand, and yet I don't.

I'm...not precisely a cynic, not precisely a realist, and not an idealist, either. I want people to be kind and rational and to think better of their fellow humans. I want people to be safe, loved, and happy—mostly the people I care about, but that's just me. At the same time, I have to look at the world I've been born into and realize that, frankly, I can see the seams. Shinobi society is civilization plastered over a boiling pot of all of humanity's darker impulses. One cannot have something good and be devoid of jealous neighbors. Unless there are no neighbors at all. I want to say that humans can rise above that, could possibly form a society where people don't have to die every five goddamn minutes for money or hatred or sheer mindless idiocy. It wouldn't be home—home is different, stranger, more unknowable than this place where everything is the result of direct human effort—but it could be better.

Since the founding of the Five Elemental Nations, it's been about five generations. Less than a hundred years, all told, but it's amazing that we made it this far at all with as much horrible history as we have.

In that time, there have been three Shinobi World Wars. Tens of thousands of people—shinobi and civilian alike—are dead because of them, without even getting into the issues of border skirmishes and all the missions we shinobi take against other villages, against towns, against cities, and against single targets. And yet, it's nothing compared to the Clan Wars era.

Anytime civilization falls, due to infighting or civil war, the death toll mounts. Any era wherein the rulers are more interested in killing or subjugating each other than protecting their people, the world goes to hell. What the Warring States era of Japan was to the Japanese, the Clan Wars were to us. But we aren't samurai, and that made everything worse.

The Third Shinobi World War is, ultimately, the conflict that defines me and my generation.

As the Second defined my mother and father's generation—the White Fang, the Sannin, and Salamander Hanzō. The destruction of Uzushiogakure. The coup d'état where Akatsuki first came to power.

The First marked the end of peace as interpreted and dispensed by the First Hokage—Danzō, the Third Hokage, and a number of elders owe their defining moments to this war. It was the war that killed the Founders—Hashirama and Tobirama Senju—and the war that redefined the supremacy of any village in the face of overwhelming force. It was the war of the first jinchūriki deployed deliberately to a battlefield.

It's very hard to describe these conflicts to someone who didn't live and breathe battle during them. It's harder to admit how much the experiences scar us, even those whose wounds can't be seen. And once we were baptized in fire and blood, there was never any turning back.

Itachi, despite having been barely four years old at the climax of the Third Shinobi World War, remembered. He remembered losing cousins and aunts and uncles and friends and everyday faces, all to the front lines. He remembered the devastation in the aftermath. He remembered the terrible war-worn shocked state the village was stuck in for such a long time afterward, magnified by Sensei’s death during the Nine-Tailed Fox's attack. When our village seemed to snatch defeat from the arms of victory, and we were crippled enough that even Kumogakure, after three extra years of war and one bloodily-earned peace treaty, was too terrible to face.

And he would never allow Sasuke to grow up under that shadow.

“I’m not saying that Itachi made the right decision. But I’m not sure that, under the circumstances, he was even within spitting distance of realizing there was a better option.” I concluded after a long while.

Obito stared at the table. Kakashi stared out the window.

Rin came out of the bathroom, shedding steam everywhere. Into the awkward silence imposed by my thoughts once voiced, she said with her arms crossed over her chest, “Okay, what the heck is going on now?”
I considered that. I considered making the awkward turtle hand sign just to screw with everyone. But what I actually said was, “We’ve been waiting for our princess to hold court.”

“I don’t think we have one of those.” Rin said, not at all mollified. “Come on, what’s going on? And if you say ‘team meeting,’ I’m going to make a disappointed face.”

“Oh, we’re just trying to figure out what genin team Kakashi might get.” Obito said, recovering too quickly to be entirely real. “And then Tobi ruined everything.”

Rin looked at me.

“Uchiha clan, coup, retaliation, everyone died except Itachi’s little brother and then him.” I said. I paused. Wait, no. “Except after a while it got narrowed down to just Sasuke Uchiha and Tobi. And that isn’t a good combination. I think Itachi caught some kind of tuberculosis thing.”

“Why does the weird future universe suck so much?” Obito grumbled.

I decided not to say how it could have been worse. Because, frankly, there were worse things. While the fact that Naruto and his friends had managed to have a lot of fun between the life-or-death missions and things didn’t mean their world was peachy keen, it wasn’t the Clan Wars era. Most of us didn’t really need to worry about being killed by the guy next to us at the ramen stand if his last name happened to be different.

“Can I just point out that the fact that you’re not Tobi has already thrown a wrench in that stuff?” I asked.

“It might be a better idea just to concentrate on the good things for now, Kei-senpai.” Rin said, seeing that I wasn’t all that great at cheering people up.

“Well, Gai gets a team, too.” I said after a second or two. How could I forget about Lee? “One of his students is pretty much his biggest fan—has the same haircut, dresses the same, knows how to use most of the Eight Gates by the time he’s thirteen. They have very dramatic moments together, and if I recall correctly Lee managed to kick Madara in half during the Fourth Shinobi World War.”

“…What.” Kakashi said.

“The future is also the best time for silly things to happen.” I concluded. Perhaps not justifiably, given all the shit we’d have to wade through to get there, but it wasn’t like the future was all grimdarkness and pain. “We do get sixteen years of peace.”

Particularly since just having Obito here would cut down on a lot of the pointless deaths. Maybe we couldavert the main event, too.

“It’s kind of hard to talk about future good things when Kakashi’s the only one who gets that far.” Obito commented. He was inspecting the nails of his new hand, which were kinda…nebulous. “I need to start wearing gloves…”

…Well. A glove, maybe. Like Michael Jackson.

Kakashi got up about then and checked the okayu. The pot bubbled happily and smelled pretty good, even from where I was sitting. “Another ten minutes, I think.”

“What about Sensei and Kushina?” Rin asked.

“If they wake up, they wake up.” I said, feeling my stomach growl. Green tea hadn’t filled my stomach any, and the pear I’d taken from the fruit bowl hadn’t sufficed either.

It was more or less the same policy I’d followed with my parents in my old life. Unlike Mom the special jōnin, they’d been about retirement age when I’d dropped off the face of the universe. My mother here was thirty-eight to my fourteen.

…Damn, I needed to figure out why she’d retired. Thirty-seven really wasn’t that old for a shinobi. That was Jiraiya’s age for Pete’s sake.

“How are they?” Obito asked, since he hadn’t been awake when Sensei had stumbled in.

“Sensei’s tapped out, chakra-wise.” I said. I frowned. That had never happened before, as far as I knew. Sensei’s teleportation jutsu weren’t individually taxing, and his use of the Rasengan was super-efficient considering that it was an A-ranked jutsu. He’d have had to be really spamming those moves to be this worn out.

“Well, at the very least we’ll have breakfast ready for them.” Rin remarked. Then, “Wait, do we have enough food for six people?”

“I hope so,” Obito said, and went over to where Kakashi was apparently dissecting the burgeoning rice soup with his mind to judge how many servings we had. Both boys exchanged looks before Obito said, “Well, not if Sensei’s gonna eat like a horse.”

“So, like you?” Kakashi sniped.

“Hey, who here is the ramen-eating champion?” Obito snapped back.

Considering they were talking about Kushina, I wasn’t really following their argument.

“You two have the weirdest, stupidest fights.” I said.

“Yeah, well.” Obito shrugged. He clambered up onto the countertop and started exploring the cabinets for bowls and teacups. “We should be fine.” And then he started tossing his findings across the room.

Rin, showing that medic reflexes had more than one use, caught and placed each bowl, soup spoon, and cup as they arrived in her hands. Lightning-quick, the table was set. Not a single item chipped or cracked in the course of their flight, thank goodness.

I’d snatched my papers off the table and to safety before she got that far.

Six places at a table, when I was used to three…

I sighed. Not for the first time, I fought down that ache of homesickness. I was in the general radius of home and I knew my mom and brother were safe, but I still wasn’t sleeping in my bed or eating my mom’s cooking. So close, yet so far.

“Do we have anything to eat with this?” Kakashi asked.

“No. If you want extra stuff, make it yourself.” Obito said. “You were here the whole time.”

Kakashi made a grumbling noise.

There was a loud thump from the bedroom. Then a groan, then the sound of someone getting up and bumping into a doorframe.
Well, Kushina and Sensei’s chakra was awake now, though Kushina hadn’t moved and apparently Sensei was stumbling around like a drunk. He made it as far as the master bathroom before I felt his chakra flicker in frustration—probably with the cold of linoleum, or with the bright bathroom heating lamp. Then there was the rumble of the water heater getting back in gear and rushing hot water through the pipes.

Okay, that was one nominally responsible adult awake and up, out of two.

I didn’t have the Byakugan, but my chakra sense was one of the few things with chakra that I could do at the moment. I was reading it better than normal.

Then Kushina started stirring properly, too, and I turned back to my team to say, “So, that’s our adult backup awake.” I set my flash-paper profiles down on the coffee table. “You know, if we were worried about not preparing enough food.”

“It seems a little inconsiderate to make her cook as soon as she gets up.” Obito said.

Just then, though, Kushina came barreling down the hallway like Dr. Jones with a boulder on his tail, skidded on the turn, and came to a complete stop with her hands coming together in a loud clap.

“Morning, everyone!” she said cheerfully. Her hair was a mass of knots, there were bags under her eyes, and her clothes were rumpled from sleep, but hey. She was awake. And a better cook than any of us were. Salvation! “Move over, kids, we need side dishes!”

There was already tea from earlier, and I think that Kakashi had claimed the kettle as his personal territory. Still, Kushina had no problem wresting control of the kitchen away from us and moving most of our stuff aside. Obviously, she left the okayu alone, but any extraneous equipment went flying into the sink.

Rin and Obito sat down at the table with Kakashi and me, and my fingers itched for a pen. There was so much crap I had to write, still. I felt a little like I was supposed to be writing an essay that I’d forgotten the night before.

“So, how did you all sleep?” Kushina tossed over her shoulder.

There were two nearly identical grumbles from Kakashi and me, a “Fine!” from Rin and an “Okay,” from Obito.

Kushina made a noncommittal noise. “Well, I slept all right, too. Though I don’t think Minato’s going to be up for much today.”

“Did you kick him?” I asked.

“Yep.” Kushina said. She was gesticulating with a soup ladle. “But even before that, he felt pretty dead to the world. But he has a meeting with the Hokage in an hour, so he doesn’t get to lie around.”

Dead… What if…?

I felt my blood run cold.

Zetsu clones could mimic chakra signatures. They could pass basic security checks, like passwords or team composition questions. They weren’t skilled, necessarily, but their brute strength made them hugely dangerous to anyone they caught off guard. Which was pretty much everyone. They had enough guile to make an utter mess of the command structure that the Shinobi Alliance had relied on, at least until Naruto had popped out of nowhere and forcibly tilted the scales the other way.
I hadn’t made sure that the Minato Namikaze who walked in our door really was my teacher.

That was when Sensei exited the bathroom with tissue paper stuck to his face by little dots of blood. Apparently, sleep deprivation, chakra exhaustion, morning meetings, and disposable razors did not mix well.

Come to think of it, the fact that Sensei was always clean-shaven should have told me something.

And besides, Zetsu clones didn’t bleed red. They bled orange if they got cut or sliced, or they collapsed like someone put a fist through a tub of melting ice cream.

“Minato-sensei, you…don’t look good.” Rin said hesitantly. I wasn’t sure if she was talking about his very apparent exhaustion or the fact that he’d managed to nick himself half a dozen times. For someone whose primary weapon choice involved blades, it indicated a worrying lack of control.

But he wasn’t a Zetsu. There was no way.

A Zetsu clone would have killed all of us in our sleep. Or taken Obito back to Madara for reconditioning. Or maybe both if it was feeling ambitious. They didn’t sleep or require any basic chemical components (such as food or water or air) in order to survive. If our guard was down, the only warning the village would get would be a plague of broken necks among the members of this improvised, temporary household.

I swallowed my hammering heart back down. It wouldn’t do to have a heart attack before lunchtime. Lunch probably would involve enough sodium to finish the job, anyway.

Sensei shook his head. “I’m fine, Rin.” Then, rather than making his way over to the kitchen table, he dodged it entirely and flopped down on the couch. “Ow…”

“Sensei, what happened?” I asked.

Sensei sighed. “Where do I even start?”

Still, he did tell us.

For a start, they hadn’t found Madara at all. They hadn’t even found that gigantic fucking statue, which confirmed that it was basically a huge Diglett. They had found a hole the approximate size of the entire Konoha administrative center at the back of the cave, which quickly angled underground.

Said hole spat out Zetsu clones. And not just any Zetsu clones, even. These new clones had been more like putty than the rest, and fused into some kind of horrific hundred-Zetsu monstrosity that took over an hour to kill even with everyone using their strongest jutsu and barely avoiding being squashed.

And then Gamabunta had stomped on it, which had solved the issue but also left them with their original problem: That gigantic hole.

The longer I listened, the more I came to the conclusion that if the Statue wasn’t a Diglett, it was Vegnagun. A human-derived monster in some sense of the word, given that the Sage of Six Paths had been instrumental in turning it into a combination of the moon and the nine other Tailed Beasts, that’d need to be activated before it rampaged, but would otherwise do so basically unchecked. And if that made Madara a desperate wraith fueled by his long existence of cruelty and hatred…

Well, it was accurate enough. Pity there was no Lenne to talk him down before he tried to murder the entire planet.
Once Sensei finished his story, I crossed my arms and said, “So, now what do we do?”

By that point, Kushina was portioning out the okayu and the side dishes—something to do with duck and maybe more tea. Despite the siren’s call of food, though, Rin, Obito, Kakashi and I were all hovering around Sensei. Kushina would probably beat the crap out of all of us if she thought we were insulting her or her cooking, but she gave us a pass that time.

He gave me a tired smile. “I was hoping you’d have some insight here. I have an idea, of course, but a second, third, or thirteenth opinion never really hurts.”

I thought about it. I noticed Obito adopt a sort of parody of a thinking pose, knuckles to his lips and a frown twisting his face.

“I need my seal taken care of.” I said finally. I sighed. “I’m a late convert to this whole Tailed Beast business, but the longer I put off dealing with him, the less stable I’ll be. And besides, it’s not like I’m a stranger to having an extra voice in my head.”

“And I need to let the rest of the world know I’m not dead!” Obito said immediately afterward. “It’s harder to get disappeared by all the conspiracies if you’re super-visible, right?”

…True, but also kind of depressing to think about. “Rin, Kakashi, any ideas?” I asked.

“We need to hold Sensei’s coronation and consolidate power before anyone else can get in our way.” Kakashi said bluntly.

Rin nodded. For not actually being a member of Team Minato, she was definitely a team player. “Further, we also need to examine Obito’s arm and see what kind of information we can get. I remember seeing you use Wood Release, Obito. There are rumors that there’s another boy who can use the same kekkei genkai, and we shouldn’t pass up a chance to solidify your alibi.”

“Orochimaru again?” Obito whined, slumping in exaggerated defeat.

“You have to admit that it makes the most sense.” Rin pointed out.

“Or we could just hold off and claim amnesia.” I suggested, apropos of nothing. When the others looked at me, I added, “I’m sure there are ways to make Obito’s memories resistant to probing. Or, you know, the whole Sharingan thing takes care of that.”

“Mind-reading is a Yamanaka thing, not an Uchiha one.” Obito said, frowning a little like a thought wasn’t forming up right. “I mean, I think I heard something about other Uchiha being able to hypnotize people, but that’s a different thing. Yamanaka mind probes don’t joke around.”

“Sharingan bullshit is not to be underestimated.” I argued, because I’d seen some of the crazy shit the various levels were capable of. Kakashi’s and Obito’s Sharingan, in its non-Mangekyō form, could implant mental suggestions and knock people out for hours. Sasuke’s, though not yet at the level of hax it would later achieve, could make the Nine-Tailed Fox sit down and shut up. And that didn’t even cover the ability of all of said eyes to copy other people’s techniques.

Jeez, just talking about it was going to make me mad. So I stopped.

“Look, you don’t need to worry about that.” Sensei interrupted before I could (accidentally) start another argument. “That’s my job. Or it’s soon going to be.” He sat up slowly. “I mean more suggestions for yourselves.”

“…Well, I kinda need the back-pay from my monthly stipend.” Obito said after a bit. He scratched the side of his cheek. “I know I got tossed by my landlord after the whole dead-for-six-months thing, and most of my stuff probably went in the trash, too. So I need more clothes and stuff.”

“Do you even get money from the financial department after you become a genin?” I asked.

“No,” said Rin.

“Ah, no. It’s a clan thing, and it’s related to your mission income.” Obito said, looking a little embarrassed.

Inversely, I bet. Though I obviously didn’t have any first-hand experience, it made sense for large clans to keep track of their members and make sure that they all had enough money to survive.

“And I’m sure six months of inactivity accumulated with interest will make the Uchiha clan spit fire.” Sensei said, rubbing the bridge of his nose. “Figuratively. Maybe also literally.”

“Well, unless the clan’s accountants killed my account,” said Obito, but then he sighed. “They probably did.”

“At least you don’t need to worry about rent for a while.” Rin said, patting his shoulder sympathetically.

“Were you paid up before Kannabi?” Kakashi asked.

“Yeah, and through the next month. That doesn’t account for the other five.” Obito groaned.

I felt a little at sea during that discussion. You know, what with not actually having to pay rent or live in an apartment or anything. Not for the first time, I felt slightly guilty about actually, you know, having a family and a house.

“Obito, you can stay here until you get another apartment.” Sensei pointed out.

“Thanks, Sensei.” Obito said, with the air of someone being offered water in the Sahara. Or maybe a lifeline during a storm.

“Anyway, that’s enough of that heavy talk.” Sensei concluded. Though still tired, Sensei managed a smile and hopped over the back of the couch, scattering us. As he approached the table, he said, “Let’s eat!”

“Breakfast is courtesy of Obito, Kakashi, and yours truly.” Kushina said, gesturing with a wooden spoon. “Dig in, everyone. We have a long day ahead of us!”

That we did.
Ripple Arc: Fooling Mode

Chapter Summary

Kei: Go shopping. :D

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After team breakfast (which was one of the best I'd had in a while), we pretty much got to sit around for the next two hours and be bored as fuck.

By that, I mean that Sensei took off as soon as he was done eating and in his actual jōnin uniform, sparing time to give Kushina a kiss on the cheek and telling us, "Stay put until I get back, everyone." Then he was out the door and f\textit{wish}, gone.

Kushina, for her part, didn't seem to take that as the kind of command that applied to her. We helped her clean up the table on a station rotation (with me on washing, Kakashi on drying, Rin on sorting, and Obito on cleaning the actual table).

"I'm going to go grocery shopping." Kushina said, even as she was heading toward the master bedroom. "You kids can look at the seal theory books on the table or play cards. Just don't leave the house!"

Once she was gone, Kakashi went back to the guest bedroom for a late-morning nap. Obito, who hadn't seen the flash-paper profiles I'd written, starting reading them with commentary since that was the kind of person he was. Rin and I played War, which is one of those games that gets ungodly boring very, very quickly.

Then we played 52 Pickup with Obito, trying to see if he could collect them in order of suit and value.

He couldn't, as it turned out. Not yet.

"Even if we are under house arrest, it's kind of nice to have a chance to do things like this." Rin said, as Obito progressed to grabbing all fifty-two cards before they hit the ground.

It was fascinating seeing how quickly an Uchiha could learn. Obito had a mature Sharingan, yeah, but he also had had it for like twelve hours. And he only had the one. It was still a noticeable jump in reaction time.

"You mean play?" I asked.

"Yeah, that." Rin frowned. "I'm going to have to see Akihito-shishō right after this. I...I really want to go home."

"That's okay, Rin-chan." Obito said. He grinned sheepishly. "I still need to get actual clothes. But we can all hang out once all this stuff is figured out!"

"I'd like that." Rin said, and the frown eased off. She sat down on the couch, interlacing her fingers and resting her chin on them.

I sensed that she wanted to think for a bit and promptly distracted Obito.

"Hey, Obito. Do you want to come to my house first? I need to talk to my mom, but I should be free to help you shop this afternoon." I said.

"Sure!"

Well, that settled that.

Luckily, Sensei arrived back at the house before I could come up with a dumb idea to alleviate what remained of my boredom. Given time, I'd have either actually attempted to make some of the seals described in Sensei and Kushina's books, or maybe tried to wake Kakashi up without using a stick to keep out of arm's reach. The latter was probably slightly more dangerous.

Even better, Sensei came with more people: Jiraiya and Kushina, specifically.

Since Rin and I were back to playing Go Fish on the carpet and Obito was trying his hand (or eye) at card-counting, Kushina dumped her groceries in Obito's arms, and the weight of them nearly sent him stumbling into the couch. Overall, any entrance of a group including Kushina Uzumaki is going to be big, loud, and keep the room swept out of her way.

Kakashi emerged from the guest bedroom about then.

"Well, Kei-chan, now we can finally fix that rush-job seal of yours!" Kushina enthused, clapping her hands. "Clear out, Rin-chan! We're using the living room floor for this one."

Rin bolted.

"The shirt has to go, Kei-chan." Kushina said. "The seal's in a weird place, and I'd rather not have to saw through the fabric."

Rin had second thoughts. She came back, grabbed Obito's sleeve, dragged him toward the room where Kakashi was still peeking out past the doorframe, and shoved them both back inside. Then she sat down with her back to the door she had probably just locked on the boys.

"I'm wearing a training bra, Kushina-san." I said. I was already sitting down, at least. Rin would have already knocked me over in her haste, otherwise.

"Oh," said Rin, and her sheepishness increased when Obito thumped the door indignantly. There was the slightly muffled sound of Kakashi snapping at him for it.

Kushina flapped her hands. "Enough about that! Lie down, Kei-chan, and we'll get started!"

Jiraiya shrugged. "Should be simple enough. The beast is already sealed, technically, so it's just a matter of strengthening the seal without the side effects of the Five Elements Seal. I've got the unlocking seal if you have your reinforcement one, Minato."

"I'm good to go, Jiraiya-sensei." Sensei told him.

I pulled my T-shirt off over my head and complied, lying flat on my back with my arms at my sides to let the experts work.

"I'll be holding your existing seal steady while the other two work. My chakra chains are best suited for this sort of thing, don't you agree?" Kushina was still grinning.

…Eesh. Talk about disconcerting.

"And if you have any questions, speak now or hold it until we're done, okay?" Kushina went on, as though my internal cringe moment hadn't happened. "And just remember: Don't push!"

What the fuck.

"Okay, Kushina-san." I said quietly.

"Removing the seal…now." And Jiraiya brought his hand, flaming blue, down to my chest so that each of the seals slapped on top of my original was covered by the corresponding elemental key. He didn't hit me like he did to Naruto in canon, at least—I imagined that a hit like that to the rib cage instead of the gut wouldn't end well.

I didn't feel the chakra locks disengage. What I did feel was what had been hiding underneath it.

Isobu's chakra.

What did I ever do to you?

Hey, long time no see.

Or something like that.

Isobu's voice was actually a bit higher than I expected, given that it was coming from a creature with the sort of bulk I could compare to an aircraft carrier.

It's always the same. I haven't been free in over a hundred years, and things haven't changed at all since that human…

Hashirama Senju, probably. I remembered enough between the history lessons and my visions to know that he'd had the power to control the Tailed Beasts. And that he'd distributed them among the then-new Hidden Villages like they were pups from a new litter.

They were from the same litter, if you could consider the Ten-Tails's defeat and manual dismemberment a mother of sorts.

But they weren't dogs and not something he had had the right to hand off like that.

I'm sorry about this. I told him, wincing internally. But if you break out now, I'm going to die and you're just going to be sealed up again.

But I'm not sure if he heard me at all. I felt his chakra surge in rage and despair, and then my chest constricted horribly as I felt Kushina's chakra chains clamp down on that energy. Because Isobu and I were linked, I could feel his pain surge through our shared chakra. I might have screamed a bit. I don't really know.

But then Isobu's voice was gone, and I came back to reality.

"Kei-chan, blink twice if you can hear me." Sensei told me.

I blinked twice.

All three of the seal-masters sagged in relief.
Sensei said, on the exhale, "Oh, good. You had us worried there for a minute."

"What happened?" I asked in a rasp. Okay, whoa, maybe I had screamed.

"Well, it turns out the seal they used had degraded a bit." Kushina said, sitting back. "I suppose they only ever meant it to be temporary. Anyway, the Three-Tails tried to escape."

Yes, well. That was kind of the basic modus operandi of a Tailed Beast. Not that I could really blame him. Isobu was one of the nicest of the lot, too.

"I'm assuming he didn't, since I'm still alive." I said dryly.

"And you're right." Sensei said, sitting back. "The seal looks stable."

I sat up as the three seal-masters gave me space, and then I looked down.

For the first time, my seal was entirely invisible on my skin. I knew it was there, and so did everyone else here, but I didn't have to look at it anymore. After a moment or two, I pulled my T-shirt back on and got a chance to stand up.

"Okay, you can come out now." Rin was saying to Obito and Kakashi, finally letting them out of the guest room.

"Finally!" Obito said, waving his arms theatrically. Kakashi had to duck out of his way. Then Obito turned to me. "Kei, are you okay now?"

"I'm good." I told him. Wait… I turned to Sensei. "Right?"

"Right." Sensei said with a nod. He tilted his head to one side. "Though we're going to have to work on your control of the Beast later."

…Okay then. If Isobu started talking to me again, though, I owed him a conversation.

"Sensei, did you have a discussion with the Hokage?" Kakashi asked.

"I did." Sensei stood up, and adopted what I thought of as his lecturing stance.

Jiraiya sat on the couch to watch the show. He wouldn't have looked out of place with a bag of popcorn in hand, I thought.

"As of one minute after midnight, on the day after tomorrow, I'm officially the Hokage." Sensei told us, and received a smattering of applause in return. He grinned at us. "The war is also ending in about a week."

I felt my knees go wobbly. The Third Shinobi World War…almost over? I'd lived my entire second childhood with the shadow of that war—well, and the one before it—over my head.

"But you didn't hear that from me." Sensei said. "The Hokage has been working on negotiations for about a month now with Iwa, but he's finally got the leverage to pull it off."

And if I understood politics well enough, using Sensei's advance to push Iwa into a retreat would do the same thing to Kumo. Kumogakure, while the strongest of the various elemental villages, still couldn't sustain a war engine sans allies. Sensei's presence as a political mover and shaker could make Iwa's situation untenable. Sensei alone was worth an armed division in some ways, and the momentum from ending the war during his first month in office would give him the political clout to punch out some of his opposition. Danzō included, perhaps.
Though even if he wasn't Hokage yet, I didn't envy the people who got in his way.

Call me cynical, but popular opinion was a zero-sum game from my perspective. At least Sensei was already a powerhouse physically and politically. It made the rest of us a little less likely to get disappeared by secret factions within Konoha.

Kinda funny how I kept going back to Danzō as the ultimate roadblock. Logically, there were a lot of other problems in a hidden village, but he rose to prominence anyway because he was the guy who'd tried to hypnotize the Five Kage Summit attendees.

"And Obito, you're reinstated." Sensei went on. "Officially, the information is going to be distributed via ANBU to the Uchiha Military Police over the next hour or so, but I'll run over to the Uchiha administration building myself this afternoon. I owe Fugaku a more in-depth explanation than what nearly anyone else is going to get."

"So, uh…" Obito trailed off.

"So you're free to leave the house." Sensei concluded.

"So, does that mean I can leave, too?" I asked.

"Yes, you can. All of you can." Sensei held up one finger. "But keep out of trouble, will you? I got the Hokage to assign you all ANBU security for now. Two per each of you, in fact."

Well, well, well. I wondered who we were going to get.

"If you do manage to get in trouble even with ANBU guards, maybe you should join up and teach them a thing or two." Sensei continued in a sarcastic mutter.

"Also, you can come back for dinner if you want! It was kind of nice having so many people in the house for once." Kushina said, grinning.

"We'll keep that in mind, Kushina-san." Rin said, answering for all of us. Kakashi stood back from the rest of our group, arms crossed, while Obito seemed to be slowly building up to a hyperactive victory dance. Not for nothing was he originally written as a ripoff of Naruto, the real McCoy of sorts.

I looked at Jiraiya. "Jiraiya-sama, what will this do to the mission rosters?"

We weren't due for a break in patrol missions for another two weeks. Taking us off our patrol schedule entirely, even for a bit, could cost some other people vacation time. No one would be happy about that.

"Leave that to me." Jiraiya said. He rolled one shoulder until the joint popped. "After everything that's happened on that front recently, we need to reorder everything anyway. Or…" he trailed off for a moment, then, "but since your sensei is about to be Hokage, maybe it should be his job."

"I was already in charge of Sectors Nine and Ten anyway…" Sensei mumbled, thinking.

"And I bet no one was happy when you took off. So it's now your problem." Jiraiya concluded, with the kind of cheer I always associated with finding out it was a snow day. In college. Subtract some of the childish glee from the initial mental image conjured by "snow day" and then remember it's sort of like just not coming in to work.

"Well, if I move what's left of Ryusei's squad to Makoto's, then I reorganize Sasukibe's platoon…"
Sensei went on.

Kushina made furious shooing motions with the hand Sensei couldn't see, indicating that we should beat feet before Sensei remembered who else was in the room. Or worse, involved us somehow.

We fled.

Our team had a really quick meeting pretty much as soon as we were out of Sensei and Kushina's neighborhood. Kakashi seemed to be preoccupied with getting back to his apartment, and Rin lived in a totally different part of town compared to the rest of us. Since Obito didn't have a place to stay besides Sensei's place and that wasn't an option at the moment, he and I decided on my house instead. That decided, we bid each other fond farewells (by which I mean Rin actually said "see you later" and Kakashi just disappeared while we weren't looking), and went our separate ways.

We took the rooftops. I was feeling a little stir-crazy from all the time we'd been in Sensei's house and was rejoicing in being able to use my chakra again. And if I was feeling that way, Obito had to be feeling worse—he'd pretty much been stuck in the same cave, unable to see the sun, for six fucking months.

If he gave a gleeful whoop once we managed to get major air, I wasn't going to begrudge him that.

Unlike every other quick trip across the village I could remember, I was very aware of our assigned ANBU bodyguards following at a distance. Since I could only sense two chakra signatures blinking in and out of the edge of my range as we went, I had to wonder if the other two we were allotted were on break or something.

Or if I just couldn't sense them.

That was a disturbing thought. I'd been reading chakra signatures practically since I was born, and no one thus far had managed to outwit it entirely.

…Except for the times it freaked the hell out on me.

I probably needed to get that checked at some point, in fact.

Taking advantage of my distracted state, Obito beat me to the front door of my house. He skidded a bit, waving his arms wildly to avoid losing his balance and looking like an idiot, but it was still a win.

Outwardly, it looked exactly the same as I'd left it a month back. Maybe one or two of the flowerpots out front had been replaced—plants tended to look the same to me unless they had medicinal uses—and I guess somebody had left a couple of toy kunai next to the front step.

To my chakra sense, though, I could tell that a sealing array was keyed to each and every probable entrance to the building. The welcome mat had some kind of seal trap that only responded to certain chakra signatures or weights, the front door knob had a seal over the handle, there were lines of invisible ink running throughout the foundation, and someone had written all around the walls with strengthening seals and the sealing equivalents of at-will mood suppressors…

I whistled. Sensei had not cut any corners. Thankfully, most of them at least weren't armed. It wouldn't do to blow up houseguests.

At least not during daylight hours.

"What?" Obito asked.
"Oh, Sensei just put up all those seals. Quickly, too." After a second or so, I shrugged to myself. Then I knocked on the front door. "Mom? I'm home!"

Her chakra was in the house, as far as I could tell. Sensei didn't seem to have put up the chakra dampeners I'd expected, but—

The door opened and Mom grabbed Obito and me off the threshold and into a crushing hug.

It was several minutes later before any of us were super coherent. By that point, we'd relocated to the kitchen and Mom was bustling around as Obito and I had our third cups of tea of the day. In my case it was more like my fifth, actually, but I didn't tell Mom that. I wasn't about to throw off her domestic groove.

"I'm sorry, Kei-chan." Mom said, rubbing at her eyes with her sleeve. "I heard Uzumaki-san say she and Namikaze-san would correct your seal this morning, but I never…I was worried it would go wrong somehow and I would lose my only daughter."

I couldn't really think of anything to say to that.

"These kinds of things tend to work out, Miyako-san! Especially when Sensei really is around and not off on some other stupid mission or whatever." Obito said, apparently unaware that attaching so many qualifiers didn't actually help his cause.

"You're one to talk, Obito-kun." Mom said, shaking her head.

"I'm back, aren't I?" Obito looked a little sheepish under Mom's sharp stare. "Ah, sorry. Too soon?"

"Very much so," she replied. Mom looked at me, then, and said, "Kei-chan, were you planning on spending the afternoon with Obito-kun this afternoon?"

"Yeah, Sensei said we should get him some more clothes and stuff." I replied.

Obito slowly started to turn a bit red. It was as though he had only started to realize that maybe going shopping with a girl his age would be immensely awkward. On his part. I didn't really care about that kind of stuff.

Mom made a noncommittal noise.

I thought of something else, though, and turned to Obito. "Though…Obito, I know Sensei said your account's unfrozen or something, but we don't really have any money right now."

"Oh, man. I still need to talk to the financial department or something about that." Obito said, with a sort of dawning horror.

"I think you'll find that you do have some money." Mom said.

"I do?" Obito blinked.

"You will when I lend you some." Mom smiled, then went a little stern. "It is a loan, though. Pay me back when you get back on your feet, Obito-kun."

"But—!"

"Further, I'll be coming with you." Mom started for the front hall, where we'd all left our shoes. "The Academy is getting out early today, oddly." Probably because they were trying to plan Sensei's Hokagehood ceremony. "And Hayate-chan will want to see his big brother and big sister as soon as he can."

Was it just me, or was Obito tearing up a little? He was.

And, well, so was I, so I didn't say anything. Mom was okay with things! She would never have let me within spitting distance of Hayate if she didn't think he'd be safe. It was one of those things I wasn't super comfortable thinking about, but I think I'd agree. As a grown shinobi (...more or less), I didn't need as much looking-after as Hayate did. I'd survive on my own.

It'd kill her to do it, and it'd hurt me a lot, but I could see Mom choosing Hayate over me and me agreeing with her if she had to.

It hadn't come to that, though! Joy of joys.

I went to my room to see how much pocket change or how many mission paychecks I'd forgotten to cash, if any. And I could also pick out different clothes today if I wanted to! Maybe even find a spare headband…

"Kei-chan," Mom said when I came back with a spare hooded vest. I looked at her to show I was listening and she said, "Do you know how many people are aware of Obito-kun's return to the village? And what story have you been telling everyone?"

"We were gonna go with the truth." I said, "Or a modified version, maybe. But now I'm not sure if we're supposed to claim amnesia, Orochimaru, or extended medical leave. I suppose we could ask the ANBU following us."

"Let's get that sorted out before we leave." Mom said. "It'd be better than giving several people different stories because we didn't compare notes."

Obito and I nodded.

I went out to meet the nearest ANBU, who happened to be hanging out on the roof.

It was easier to find him than it could have been, given that I recognized his chakra and he wasn't really hiding. Otherwise, I was sure that even if I could sense him I would have trouble actually tracking him down. If an ANBU couldn't hide, they could generally run well enough that my sensing ability was rendered slightly moot.

Like Lee said to Sasuke, it doesn't matter what you can see (or sense) if you're not fast enough to do anything about it.

"ANBU-san," I called, waving.

Apparently nonplussed, the ANBU waved back for a second before remembering he wasn't supposed to be interacting with the subjects he was guarding. His hand disappeared back under his black cloak and he seemed to stare balefully at me through the holes in his mask for making him mess up.

I revised my opinion of what experience he brought to the table. No full ANBU member would have done that. I guessed that, instead, he was a recruit under observation by the second member of our security team.

And by his chakra, he was also Raidō Namiashi. I calculated really quickly and guessed that he was about twenty or so by now, ten years older than my brother and probably already a special jōnin.
"Could you tell me what we're supposed to tell people about Obito?" I asked blithely, because I could and he hadn't told me to run off.

The ANBU-who-totally-wasn't-Raidō shook his head.

"...Well. That doesn't mean anything good for security." I muttered. "Thanks anyway, ANBU-san."

I wasn't sure if Raidō had a strong opinion about me one way or another, since we'd never talked, but I was pretty sure I'd just tipped the scales slightly toward "weird." Regardless, I slipped back inside the house via my bedroom window, closing it behind me.

(For some reason, insect screens weren't a thing in Konoha.)

I announced to Mom and Obito, "Shopping trip is a go."

"Are you sure?" Obito asked, giving me a doubtful look.

"No, but the longer we wait the less likely we'll catch Hayate-chan getting out of school." I paused, thinking. Granted, my brother had spent the previous night at Iruka's house, but surely Mom would have told him to wait... And then another thought struck me, derailing things. "Wait, Mom, didn't Hayate say he didn't want to be '–chan' anymore?"

Mom smiled placidly, but I was pretty sure she was rolling her eyes inside. "That he did. But you can't expect me to stop, can you?"

Hayate, for a ten-year-old, seemed convinced that he needed to grow up fast. I sure had, but half the reason I'd jumped into shinobi work was because my maturity was outright bizarre by comparison to my civilian age-mates.

Well. At least it was one of the many, many reasons I'd decided to join up. It was hard to pick out just one that ruled all others, especially considering the future universe I hadn't wanted to get involved in at first.

But hey, whims of fate.

Mom activated all the security seals in the house before she finally locked the door. I imagined that the ANBU on the roof experienced a sudden need to run the hell away, and not just because he needed to follow us.

The Academy was still pretty crowded when we got there.

Granted, I think we'd actually left the house a little bit late, meaning we failed to beat the crowd, but Mom, Obito, and I weren't too worried about being at the head of the pack. Actually, Mom kept Obito by her side and Obito had his hood up and hair down—which had the effect of softening or hiding the edges of the pressure scar that made up the right side of his face. They weren't trying to attract attention, even from Hayate.

But I, on the other hand, made my way to the front of the crowd with all the subtlety being a chūnin had afforded me. That mostly meant I didn't step on toes or anything clumsy—instead, I think it would have qualified as a champion crowd-dodging run.

Hayate spotted me almost as soon as the Academy doors opened, sending what seemed like an endless tide of small children out into the yard. He was actually near the front of the pack and—"Sis!" Hayate shouted, and barreled right into me.

And there went all the air in my lungs.

I stumbled backward with Hayate's arms clamped around my ribs like a vice and his face buried only a little above Isobu's seal.

"Missed you." Hayate mumbled into my collar, before pulling back a little so I could actually see his face. His lower lip wobbled a little.

…So I ruffled his mop of dark brown hair hard enough that it was nearly a noogie. All because the idea of making Hayate cry was massively uncomfortable for me.

"Ow! Sis, stop!" Hayate yelped, quickly jumping back out of reach. He scowled at me in his childish way and complained, "My hair is fine without you doing that!"

I chuckled, saying, "I think you might need a haircut, Hayate-chan."

"I'm not little anymore, Sis." Hayate whined. "And don't call me that!"

"Okay, okay. Sheesh, you got pushy when you got bigger." I said, looping an arm around his shoulders to steer him through the crowd.

While it was possible that the rest of the crowd would give us trouble over starting a sibling argument routine in public, I could not give less of a crap. I noticed Iruka's parents and Yūgao's mother waiting in the general vicinity of Mom and Obito, based on chakra signature locations, but I couldn't tell if they'd started talking yet. I imagined there'd be some talk about Obito and maybe a bit of panic if they had, though.

"How was your mission?" Hayate asked. He bounced a little even in my grip, probably trying to see past the crowd and spot Mom. His attention was all over the place.

Just how honest could I be with a ten-year-old Academy student, anyway?

"I think it went all right." I said, after a moment's thought.

And, in a way, that was the honest truth. We'd all nearly died, but Sensei was going to be Hokage, Obito was back, Kakashi and Rin were both alive and more or less unscathed… I could accept becoming a Tailed Beast Host for a result like that. Maybe not again, but I didn't mind the result at all.

But there was no way that Hayate would let a vague statement like "fine" stand while still riding the high of getting me back. "Well, what did you do? Did you beat up the bad guys? Who was there with you?"

…Er.

"Well, Rin-chan and Kakashi were both there." I said as we emerged from the edge of the crowd. "We sure beat up a lot of bad guys," and killed them all with no major casualties aside from me, "and we're back with one extra person."

Hayate fixed me with a stare before starting in with questions, "Really? Who? Are they new to Konoha? Do we have to teach them to be ninjas?"

"Only one, Hayate-chan." I corrected gently.
"I know that. And don't call me '-chan!" Hayate said, puffing out his cheeks in a pout. "So, who is it?"

I looked up, realized that Mom was chatting with Iruka's parents and had yet to draw Obito into the conversation, and said to Hayate, "Look at the boy standing by Mom."

Hayate squinted in the bright sunlight, then said, "Who's he? Is he the boy who came home with you?"

"Yep. Let's go say hello." I said, leading the way.

"Is he your boyfriend?" Hayate asked suspiciously.

I gave him a flat look.

"Guess not." Hayate concluded. He broke free of my grip and rushed over to Obito, lunch bag swinging in the air as he ran. "Hey, weird boy! My sister says you came home with her! Did you?"

"Eh, kinda," said Obito, pushing his hair back from his face and leaning over so Hayate could look him in the remaining eye.

(We'd found a spare bandage to put over his empty left eye socket.)

Hayate stared, eyes wide. "But…"

"Sorry for making you cry, before." Obito said softly. "And I'm sorry I'm so late."

Hayate backed up a little and bumped into me as I walked up, then attached himself to my side like a limpet. "Y-You're a ghost, aren't you? Obito's dead."

Crap. Now Hayate was going to cry.

"We thought he was." I told him, rubbing his back. "But he's back now, and he saved my whole team."

"Really?" Hayate asked. Then he gave Obito an appraising look, as though Obito hadn't been a major part of my former genin team for years by that point. But then, I couldn't quite remember how I'd explained Obito's "death" months ago either. Maybe I'd been too depressed to make things less terrible.

"Yeah. We had a pretty close call while on patrol." I said.

Mom broke off her conversation with Iruka's mother to say, "Umino-san, you remember Obito-kun, don't you?"

Iruka's mom's eyes flew wide.

Considering that he'd been standing right there for a while, I was kind of surprised that Iruka's parents had missed him entirely. He didn't look that much like a random teenager, did he?

"I…how is this possible?" Iruka's mother said, hand over her mouth. Vaguely, I remembered her name had something to do with aquatic wildlife… Ashika, probably.

"Did you really save my sister?" Hayate pressed, ignoring her.

"Well, I think she saved us a bit, too." Obito said modestly. "There was a lot of saving going on, and then Sensei popped in and we stayed saved, you know?"

"Umino-san, Obito's survival is a super-long story that I don't fully understand." I said, cutting across her so Hayate didn't lose momentum in the conversation. And it was kind of true—what the hell was that about the Kamui activating in that weird flashback, anyway? I'd never asked about that… "But the Hokage reinstated him himself."

Or Sensei did. Same difference.

"I see." Iruka's mother said. She did, however, leave the conversation alone. Then she went to greet her son as he approached at top speed, throwing himself at his parents like a ballistic missile.

With the Umino family thus distracted, I also turned my attention back to my own family.

Hayate was tracing the whorls on the scarred half of Obito's face with his index finger. He said, "This is so weird." My brother, at least, seemed fascinated instead of disgusted. He seemed pretty cool with the entire situation, actually.

Obito seemed okay with Hayate being a highly curious ten-year-old, but I could also pick up some anxiety that didn't quite fit with my brother being, well, himself. There weren't many people who were really nervous about interacting with him.

I hadn’t been watching Obito's face closely, what with being concerned with Ashika Umino's reaction, but I could feel his chakra get a little agitated the more people started turning their attention to him. While the Obito I knew fought long and hard for acknowledgement from the entirety of the village, I had a feeling this wasn't the way he'd wanted to get it. Even if he had joked about being the Phantom before this.

Maybe I should have thought about the months of what was effectively social isolation before I dragged him out on a shopping trip.

"Hey, little brother of mine," I began, as Mom began broadcasting a not-super-subtle aura of "go away" with her chakra alone toward the rest of the crowd, "we're going shopping with Obito after this. You in?"

"Of course I am!" Hayate said instantly.

"Obito?" Yūgao wandered over, flanked by her mother and by Iruka on her other side. "I…"

"Thought I was dead?" Obito filled in. His smile was a little strained. "Yeah, I've been getting that a lot lately. It was one hell of a close call, you know."

"But where have you been?" Iruka asked.

And now the entire Obito fan club was back in force. Population: three pre-genin.

Both Obito and I looked at Mom. Then I looked up, to where Raidō was sitting in the tree as though uniformed ANBU trainees did that all the time. He twitched a bit when he realized I'd spotted him so easily.

"Classified, sorry to say. That's what happens with ninja missions sometimes." Obito said. "But hey, now that I'm back I can definitely spend more time in the village."

I agreed inwardly; there was no way Sensei would allow Obito out of sight of the village for a while.
Speaking of...hm.

I'd have to ask Sensei later if talking to him after that clusterfuck of a mission counted as a debriefing. And if we'd have to see Intelligence about any of it. Ever.

I sure hoped not.

"Are you two coming along on the shopping trip?" I asked them.

Iruka turned back to his mother with, "Mom, can I go?"

"Ask your father." Ashika said, but her eyes were glittering in amusement. Iruka immediately ran to his father, jumping up and down excitedly.

Yūgao only needed to turn puppy-dog eyes on her mother to get a reluctant "yes, you can go" out of her in half the time.

"And that's a party of seven, all ready to go." Obito said, once both of Hayate's friends had come back with their parents' permission. "Kei, mind if I lead this squad?"

"Go ahead." I told him. "I figure you haven't had time to lead much of anything in a while."

"All right then!" Obito's right arm was covered from shoulder to fingertip in bandages to disguise the Zetsu arm he'd picked up somehow, but he pumped it like his normal arm anyway. He was definitely channeling a bit of Gai or maybe Naruto in that moment, whether he knew it or not. "Let's go!"

Of course, while we all agreed to let Obito lead, it wasn't as easy as all that.

I thought of Obito's reaction to being back in society as being similar to that one boy from Hatchet. I mean, he hadn't been alone down in that hole in the ground and it wasn't like he'd been starving the whole time even if the other residents of said hole didn't eat, but Obito had lost a bit of his knack for crowd navigation. A lot of shinobi were used to using people as camouflage better than any terrain type, but Obito had lost a bit of that edge. With its departure, Obito had picked up a different habit—mostly, stopping all the time to stare at things.

It wasn't like he was staring at the shelves in a market. He just...sometimes needed to sit down and watch the crowds for a bit. Some of them would stare back, since his facial scar wasn't exactly subtle, but I'm not sure he really noticed that part.

He was a little overwhelmed.

With subtle nudging from Mom, though, we managed to keep moving at a pace that wasn't any slower than normal. Though Mom wasn't really tall, she could steer Obito from one storefront to another with the ease of someone who'd been doing it all her life.

...I mean, I knew I hated shopping on principle (and in both lifetimes), but I wasn't aware my issues had given her time to practice.

"You should get at least one formal outfit." Mom was saying as we walked past a very, very traditional-looking storefront. I got odd vibes from it—while there was little chance of the shopkeeper being a member of a major clan, since it was pretty far from the clan grounds, it looked like the kind of place where the Uchiha or Hyūga clan members would shop. Ergo, kimono everywhere.
For comparison's sake, I owned exactly one kimono. More specifically, it was my mother's old furisode, last worn at her coming-of-age ceremony however many years ago in another country and stuck in her luggage ever since. I was supposed to inherit it, I guess, but I was already getting too wide at the shoulders to fit it. Unless I had to go to a wedding ceremony or something in the next year, I probably wasn't ever going to wear it.

Hayate didn't have any really formal wear, probably because he was ten and because Dad hadn't owned kimono before he died. Konoha wasn't really big on kimono as a rule, anyway, and a shinobi uniform could suffice in most cases anyway.

But Obito would need to meet the head of the Uchiha clan properly, in a ceremony, if he wanted to really get his spot in the clan back. Being an orphan from a really minor branch of the clan, he hadn't bothered to get one before.

"I should probably get one from the clan grounds, though." Obito said. "Clan members get a discount, and clan sigils are hard to get otherwise."

"Wouldn't that be viewed as presumptuous?" Mom asked.

The kids were running on ahead of us, as an aside. I trusted Hayate and his friends not to smash into anybody, but Obito was distracted enough that that kind of thing might have actually been a problem.

Or walking through people in a literal sense, if he'd had his Mangekyō Sharingan. That would've been hell to explain.

"I don't think so." Obito told her, but then he frowned. "I don't know. Kei, what do you think?"

"I think we need to concentrate on getting you extra outfits that won't break our budget." I said, shrugging. "I'm sure Sensei has a plan for the other stuff."

Okay, so maybe that was a bit of a lie. I just hated the idea of having to sit in a tailor's shop for that long.

Obito tugged experimentally on his overgrown bangs. "And I think I need a haircut."

"Yeah, you probably do." I agreed.

"…While ordinarily I wouldn't mention it, I think you have more split ends than whole hairs, here." Mom said critically. "Fine. Haircut first."

Off we went to the salon.

More specifically, Mom and Obito went into the salon, while I herded kids. With a bit of my own money, I managed to steer Hayate, Iruka, and Yūgao toward a dango stand and buy them all an afternoon snack. It wasn't festival time, but I figured sweets were never inappropriate for children unless they were at the dentist's office. Once we were all settled on benches outside of the salon and listening to the hairstylist critiquing Obito's total lack of style, we ate.

"So," Hayate said around a sticky mouthful of sugar and rice flour, "is Obito staying at our house?"

"Nah, Sensei has him covered." I said, then popped the last mochi into my mouth. "Did you want another roommate, Hayate-chan?"

Hayate glared at me. "No. And stop calling me ‘-chan' already!"
I ruffled his hair again. Of course, since it'd happened so often to me, I'd picked up the same habit. Curse you, Sensei!

"Sis, where'd your headband go?" Hayate asked once he stopped being angry at me (which took about two seconds).

"I gave it back." I said, shrugging. "It was Obito's to start with."

There was something kind of sad about how Rin and I had clung to the two items I'd brought back from Kannabi. It felt weird to be going around sans headband in the village, but that was such a small price to pay for having Obito back that it didn't even count.

Isobu, less so, but I wasn't about to tell Hayate about that.

Hayate looked thoughtful for a moment. Then, "Does that mean you're going to get a new one? 'Cause I liked the one you had before that."

"Yeah, I think so." Not like my uniform would be complete without one. If I wore a uniform.

…And I needed a new jacket. Great.

"What kind of headband would all of you get?" I asked all three of my dining companions.

"I want a bandanna." Hayate said instantly. I wasn't sure if it was just because bandannas were awesome or if it was because I wore one.

"A normal one." Iruka said, before Hayate could go into more detail.

"I don't know." Yūgao said, kicking her legs out of apparent boredom. "I think I'll decide when we graduate."

Yeah, it wasn't the most scintillating conversation ever.

Luckily, a distraction followed shortly thereafter.

It was green and moving at about fifty kilometers per hour.

"KEISUKE-CHAN, YOU HAVE RETURNED FROM YOUR MISSION!" Gai said in true Youth mode, pumping my arm in a congratulatory handshake before I could get away via ducking behind my brother or something.

"That I did." I said, feeling my shoulder start to rattle in its socket from the force of Gai's enthusiasm. The kids—meaning the mini-ninjas who were too cowardly to attempt to distract the juvenile Green Beast—had already split for the hair salon in search of shelter. "How've you been, Gai?"

"I have been doing well! My last mission was a rousing success and there has been talk of an early promotion to jōnin if I continue to succeed!" Gai said, still not letting go of my hands.

"That's great!" I wasn't terribly surprised—Gai was one of the so-called "genius" generation of shinobi, and the hardest worker I'd ever met besides. He probably wasn't going to make full jōnin for a bit longer, but I'd bet he'd make it before twenty at the latest. The world was full of opportunities for someone with intense personal drive and the ability to kick things to death. "I'm glad you're doing so well. It's something I know you've worked hard to achieve."

"Yes, I have always given my full effort!" Gai paused, but it was only long enough for me to notice before he went off with, "And Keisuke-chan, is it true that your teammate Obito Uchiha has returned “...Well, it turns out he wasn't dead, but yeah. He's back. And in there.” I said that last bit while waving toward the salon with my free hand. I could feel the kids' chakra quail in despair since I pointed Gai in their general directions. "The details are classified, though."

"Oh, I am very much aware!” Gai said brightly, and finally let go of my hand. I could feel the bones try to head back into their proper positions and scream all the way. "I have been delivering the wonderful news all across Konoha, but I wanted to hear it from you yourself before I could celebrate properly!"

Gai, I realized belatedly, was crying tears of joy.

Uh.
I hadn't realized he cared that much.

"I have to go and say that I am overjoyed at his return!” Gai said, lip wobbling and big, glittering tears racing down his face. "Only then will I return to completing my mission!"

Gai promptly disappeared into the salon.

He and Obito promptly got into a shouting match, before being overridden by Mom and the hairdresser in about five seconds.

I was left with the dueling impressions of "holy hell, Gai should be hired as the God of Overacting" and "oh my god did I seriously make Maito Gai cry" and was still dealing with them when Genma showed up.

"Hey, Gekkō-san. Have you seen Gai?” Genma asked, strolling up the street toward me as though he had been chasing his errant teammate across the rooftops all over town. When his chakra and breathing told me he had.

Genma always did seem to put more stock into looking casual than most.

Wordlessly, I pointed at the salon.

Through the front window, I could see Mom with her arms crossed, standing over Gai as he bowed repeatedly in apology to the hairdresser. Hayate and Iruka had managed to take over the next two spinning chairs and were testing how much torque they could put it through, while Yūgao was helping a beleaguered-looking man with a broom sweep up Obito's former hairstyle. Obito himself, rather than being meek and looking chastised, was leaning over the back of his chair and snickering at Gai.

"...Should I be glad that he didn't decide to go with flowers this time?” Genma wondered aloud, shaking his head. "Sorry about this. We really are glad to have the Uchiha back, though.”

"Wait, Gai hands out flowers? Since when?” I asked, having gotten stuck on the previous statement.

"Sometimes. I think his dad got him into the idea that every celebration needs a bouquet." Genma said evenly. "I'll tell him to save it for the welcome back party."

Gai's dad…

Dai, I think his name was. And like a lot of other father figures in this universe, he was dead.
It fucking figured.

"Welcome back party, huh?" I mused, trying not to think about the tragedies everyone I knew seemed to accumulate. "Where are we going to hold it?"

"No idea." Genma shrugged. "We've heard that something big's happening in the next couple of days, so maybe we'll just hold a dinner party or something."

Yeah, like Sensei ascending to Hokage-hood. That would require a venue and a crowd and a lot of confetti pretty much by default. Probably the street in front of the Academy and the administrative center, like Tsunade's…

I'd have to ask Obito if he thought he'd be able to stand that.

"He likes street food more than restaurant stuff." I offered, after a bit. "I admit we haven't really thought about who'd attend this kinda party, either…"

"Leave that bit to us." Genma said. He looked through the salon window, a distant look on his face. "I don't know the whole story, but it can't've been easy for him. Whatever happened."

"…Yeah. Thanks, Shiranui-san." I said.

"Genma," he corrected, shifting the senbon in his mouth from side to side.

"Then call me Kei. Fair's fair." I said, offering a handshake.

He took it. "All right then, Kei-san. Tell Obito that the rest of us are rooting for him, all right?"

"Rest of who?" I ask before I think about it.

"Everyone, basically." Genma shrugged. "Mostly from your class, like Gai, but by now half the village is probably gonna be talking about the miracle survivor coming home. I know Kurenai and Asuma are in on things, and I heard them grabbing Aoba before we left the communications center for the eastern district. Not everyone's gonna be happy, given politics, but we're all hoping it's gonna work out."

"Sensei won't let it go any other way." I told him. "And you can count on that."

Genma's eyebrows rose a little; I wondered if he was making connections between us, Sensei's moniker, and maybe the "big news" brewing in the village. If he was still friends with Raidō—who was still following our group around—I didn't see why not.

"All right. Take care, Kei. Hope to see you 'round the training grounds again sometime soon." With that, Genma stuck his head into the salon and yelled for Gai, who trooped out after him like a chastised puppy.

Then they both took off.

"Is he gone?" Iruka asked from the doorway, eyes wide. I assumed he meant Gai, who could be kind of overwhelming in person. Or a lot overwhelming.

"For now." I shrugged. Steering Iruka back inside, I went into the salon, calling, "Obito, you'd better be done with getting your hair cut by now! We still have shopping to do!"

"Only a little longer," said the hairdresser, who was in the process of forcing Obito back into the spinning chair. "Finishing touches, you understand."
"Ugh," said Obito, but he obeyed anyway. "Kei, why do you want to see me suffer?"

"You're getting rid of mats and split ends and an extra kilo of insulation you don't need in July." I said. "You'll feel better afterward."

Obito grumbled, but knew better than to shift when a pair of scissors was that close to his remaining eye.

"Also, Genma says the rest of our year is planning a welcome back party for you." I said, and watched as Obito's reflection in the salon mirror gaped like a fish.

"I…you're serious?" Obito said, as the hairdresser snipped away at the last couple of chunks of spiky Uchiha hair.

"Yeah. The plans are a little vague right now, but if Genma says so, I'm willing to bet on it." I said. "Wow." Obito sounded genuinely awed, like he hadn't realized how many people would miss him if he was gone.

…That was kind of like Naruto's story, too. By the end of the first half of the manga, the rest of his friendships were solidified and his comrades looked forward to his eventual return even if he himself was still kinda insecure about everything ever. Sans Sasuke, anyway, but there were people waiting for him, too.

Funny how that worked out.

"I'll pass along any messages you want, about food and stuff." I offered.

"Ah, I'm sure whatever they'll come up with is fine." Obito said, turning a little red.

"Finished," said the hairdresser, and finally let Obito up.

"Oh, I gotta see the back." Obito said, and snatched up a mirror from the counter as the same janitor walked by and started sweeping up the hair on the floor.

For a short description on Obito's new-old hairstyle, I'd have probably said "Naruto's Shippūden haircut, but with a fringe that angled to the right," in black rather than bright yellow. It was honestly cute on him, though you'd never hear me say that aloud. Not as short as his old style, but nowhere near as long as Sensei's and still a fair bit shorter than Kakashi's. I was also pretty sure the hairstylist had used a tiny bit of gel for the sake of it, but it wasn't like shinobi needed it.

Kakashi was an excellent example, there.

"I like it!" Obito said, and bowed to the hairdresser. "Thank you very much!"

"It was no trouble," said the hairdresser, and moved to the cash register. "Shinobi-san?"

"I'll get it." Mom said, and headed over.

"I didn't realize how hot it was." Obito said. Then he ran his fingers through his newly-short hair extremely quickly, ruining the gel but also shaking any loose bits out. He grinned when he was done, examining his handiwork in the nearest mirror. "Better."

"Once again, Rin has the longest hair on this team." I nodded sagely. "As it should be."

"Can we go now?" Hayate asked, nearly whining.
It turned out that we were done and out the door in about a minute after that. And then, finally we were able to properly go shopping for replacement stuff for Obito.

That night, after a long day of making sure Obito was kitted out for the next week…well.

I stepped out into the perpetually-dripping glacial space of my mindscape and said, "Hello. I'm Keisuke. What's your name?"

Isobu roared.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title from the Naruto OST.

Also I found out about Gai's dad hella late and wasn't able to figure out how to reference him until now. Oops?
Ripple Arc: Must Be Dreaming

Chapter Summary

Kei: Run into a setback at full tilt.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Kushina's advice when dealing with Tailed Beasts was pretty simple: Don't.

The longer form of it went like this: Don't make deals with a Tailed Beast for power, because it only wants your body.

…Wow, that could have been put better.

Anyway, that wasn't the purpose of my visit to my mindscape.

I floated down onto the ice, looking around.

My mindscape had changed a lot in the last five years. What had originally been a calm, white void with the trappings of a coffee shop or a therapist's office, complete with fainting couch, had become a little more wild. In fact, all of the furniture was gone—probably either reabsorbed by the Dreamer or smashed into nothing by Madara's seal during its rampage. The ice around the glacier was cracking, as glaciers did, and pooling far below in a sort of bay that reached off into oblivion. I could see the ice fields stretching off into forever the other way, and the faintest outlines of mountains rose in the distance against a sky that was mostly white and gray.

Isobu swam in circles far below me, corralled by golden naval chains that looked thick enough to crush me under a single link. All three of his tails churned the water as he moved around, looking a little like a boat with three rear motors stuck in a glorified fish tank. About the only thing I could say was that it was marginally less depressing than the Nine-Tailed Fox's (current) seal.

Near him, encased in black ice and glowing red ink, was Madara's mind control seal. Its Rinnegan eye was closed, thanks to Sensei, and I shuddered to even look at it.

I stepped off the edge of the glacier and plummeted toward Isobu's kiddie pool.

I jerked to a stop about two meters above the top of the tallest ice floe, having reasserted control over my mental gravity.

Isobu's sole gold-on-ringed-red eye focused on me. His eye alone was taller than I was, and I felt a little like those kids in the Jurassic Park movie when they were confronted by the adult female T. rex. Only, you know, more so.

I was pretty sure Sue wasn't a hundred meters tall.

If Gamabunta was only the size of the Nine-Tails's torso…

Hoo, boy.
I swallowed hard, feeling my stomach sink to somewhere past my toes.

Isobu exhaled, shooting water off the edges of his facial spikes in a manner that reminded me of a whale. My hair flew back from my face with the force of it and I had to close my eyes.

When I opened them, Isobu was still looking at me.

"Uh." Great start, stupid, I thought to myself. "Hello. My name's Keisuke. What's your name?"

Isobu's huge eye narrowed, and he roared.

And through that roar, while I had my hands clamped over my ears, I heard a voice say, GO AWAY.

"It's pretty hard to go away while you're stuck in my chakra system!" I screamed back, even as the echo of Isobu's roar caused a collapse in the glacier that snatched all sound away.

Isobu settled back, still glaring. And whose fault is that?

"Madara Uchiha, if you wanna get specific." I snapped, then smacked myself in the forehead. "Okay, no, we're not starting this off like this. This is stupid." I rose a little in the freezing air, angrier at myself than I was at Isobu. "I'm sorry you're here. I'm sorry this seemed like a good idea at the time. Nothing would make me happier than if we were off in our own little worlds."

But we aren't. Isobu grumbled, sinking further into the water.

That was kind of a quick turnaround.

I said, "I know for certain that my death, one way or another, will set you free."

Why did I say that?

Because Isobu needed to be thrown a bone. He was in a worse position than I was, being unable to see, hear, feel, or smell the outside world or influence any of it, and guaranteed to stay that way as long as I was still alive. As long as I didn't use his chakra.

I know that, Isobu replied, unhappy. But your death, human, would only send more humans chasing after me. What is the point of being free if every spare moment will involve being hunted?

…Gah, I did not need to feel the urge to hug a kaijū.

"Look, that's not going to be all there is. Not forever." I drew my legs up and floated into a meditative position, hands on my knees. "If we can work together, we can change things."

Isobu glowered. He couldn't kill me and he knew that much, even if Kushina's chains weren't there. He'd be re-sealed in minutes with Sensei and Jiraiya in the village, and I could call up any number of memories to back that theory up. Isobu simply didn't have many options here. I would like to see you try.

Well, well, well. Wasn't that a challenge?

Then, Why did you ask me for my name?

"Because you have one and it's polite to ask." I said, floating upside-down now. It was such a strange thought, still, to think aloud in my own head. That was totally what I was doing, though. "If you can think and talk, you have a name. Three-Tails is a descriptor, not a name. It just makes you one of nine, and while you are one of the nine Tailed Beasts, that's not the whole story."

Hmph. Isobu turned away, sending water washing over the bay as his tails churned through saltwater and ice. Go away. I'm done talking to you, human.

"Right." I muttered. "Good talk. The name's Keisuke, if you ever feel like using it."

And then I opened my eyes for real.

"How was the second attempt, Kei-chan?" Kushina asked as I started to flex stiffness out of my legs.

What? Sitting still for half an hour would bug anyone. Meditation is annoying like that.

Much as I disliked the idea of having to rush right back into the thick of things, Sensei's orders had been absolute: Train with Kushina or go on leave for however long it takes to reconsider that decision. Fed up with being stuck inside, I'd gone with the easy way out. With Obito off with Sensei for the day—probably meeting up with the Uchiha clan or something—Kakashi disappeared to parts unknown and Rin back in her hospital rotations, that left me with the village's only other Host in an attempt to figure out how to wrangle a hundred-meter chakra monster.

Easier said than done, of course.

Regardless, that meant spending the afternoon at a training ground I'd never been to before. It was surrounded on all sides by massive Hashirama trees, which may or may not have contributed to why Kushina thought it'd be the best place to train. If Hashirama Senju could control the Tailed Beasts and Yamato could shut Naruto down when the kid was channeling Kurama, then maybe the trees had something going for them, too.

Or maybe it was all psychosomatic and I was being dumb.

"Better than last time. I got words out of that roar." I said, shrugging. I sat up fully, cracking every joint I could manage. Then I leaned against the tree at my back, a little relieved. "But he's probably still not happy with me."

"You don't need it to be happy with you." Kushina said. "You just need it to stop trying to steal your life."

…Eh. That was…one way to deal with a Tailed Beast. Probably just about the least effective, though.

I bit the inside of my cheek and didn't say anything, but Kushina caught it.

"You think I'm doing something wrong?" Kushina asked.

"…Yes?" I hastened to explain, "You've been carrying the Nine-Tails around longer than I've been alive and I respect your experience with him. But dealing with him like he's a common feral dog isn't a good tactic."

The seal she used, after all, hadn't been hers to start with. Nor her design. I wondered, briefly, if she'd ever seen how humiliating her seal really was to someone as prideful and angry as Kurama was.
Kushina tilted her head to the side and sat back, looking more curious than affronted. "What do you mean?"

"The Nine-Tails is kept chained up like a prisoner. In my seal, I can see the Three-Tails paddling around in the same fishbowl of a bay, but he can move." I said. "Aside from keeping the Tailed Beasts caged, our seals are nothing alike."

"I keep the Nine-Tails caged the way it is partially because Great-Aunt Mito had no other choice." Kushina told me, patient as she could be. "She pinned it down and sealed it into herself to keep Madara from using it against Konoha ever again."

Yeah, that'd worked out great.

"If I try to change the seal now, it might escape." Kushina continued, eyes dark. "And no one can afford to let that happen."

True. And untrue.

I weighed both options, thinking.

The Nine-Tails is ungodly powerful and sealing him had killed both Sensei and Kushina. Kurama's crappy mood could beat Pain into the ground even before fully manifesting, never mind most of the village. Sensei had contained him, but between Tobi and the village there was just too much going on to allow Kurama to go on his merry city-stomping way.

But Naruto had talked Kurama down in the future. He'd beaten his darkness, and eventually wrestled some modicum of respect out of the fox after years of mutual distrust. They'd fought in the Fourth Shinobi World War together as partners, at the end, even…

Even if I didn't know what happened after Tobi became something that looked like Jenova on a bad day.

Though the manga was more idealistic than made sense, sometimes, there was no real reason that people couldn't cooperate with Tailed Beasts given time and trust. Killer B had already proved that much.

"I think," I said carefully, "I need to think on it more. For now, we'll agree to disagree."

"Kei-chan." Kushina said sternly. "Is this another one of those dream things that is really, really important?"

"Yeah." I said.

"Well, out with it." Kushina said, leaning back on her palms. She looked a little annoyed, but not that much. Maybe she just wasn't used to me arguing with her?

"All of the Tailed Beasts have names." I said bluntly, since I was a little annoyed, too. "The Sage himself named them, and they've gotten nothing but crap from humans ever since."

"That doesn't—" Kushina stopped herself. "They'd destroy entire villages if we didn't seal them into humans, Kei-chan. They needed to be stopped."

"Yeah, but how did they get that way?" I asked bitterly. "Look, all nine of them can cooperate with humans and everyone involved gets stronger for it. I'm going to be working with the Three-Tails my way, and I'll earn his trust. It may take years, and for all I know I'll die trying. But this is something I have to try before I can just write it off."

Isobu was stuck with me until I died. As far as I was concerned, that was reason enough to try and make something out of the situation.

"I tried asking the Three-Tails’s name, but he doesn't trust me enough yet. That's okay. It makes sense." I went on, voice low and still upset. "But the Nine-Tails has been with you for ages. The least you can do is try to unscramble some of the mess we've made." Then I sighed. "It'd be better if we could manage it before your son is born, but that's probably cutting it too close to the wire. We don't have enough time."

"...Kei-chan, how old were you when you died in your dreams?" Kushina asked.

"Twenty-something." I said, shrugging.

Kushina shook her head. "Drat, you killed the joke." When I looked at her, she said, "I was about to say that you're the oldest teenager I've ever met, but that's not really accurate." She twisted a few strands of her long red hair between her fingers. "I can't promise to modify the Nine-Tails’s seal. I need to look into it. But I will think about what you've said."

"That's all I can ask." I told her.

"Don't you ever get tired of that kind of attitude?" Kushina asked incredulously. I blinked. "Don't you ever wish you could go out and just do things?"

Denying it would be a lie, so... "Yeah, but I'm a little worried about the crazy people who actually run this village."

Though it would be great to actually be able to start on some of the ideas for social reform I'd had on boil for...ages, by then.

"Well, Minato is going to be one of them in about three hours." Kushina remarked.

In unison, we shuddered.

Now that was a scary thought.

"Anyway, Kei-chan, you're dismissed. We both have a lot to think about, now." Kushina said. She smiled, though, and I reflexively smiled back. "Don't try to carry too many burdens by yourself, all right? Though we aren't all dealing with these secrets well, it's still better than having only one set of shoulders for this, isn't it?"

...Kinda?

I'd have to think on that one.

I ran home for lunch before anyone could call me back. I had a lot of thinking to do, indeed.

By noon, it seemed like the entire village had piled into the three streets nearest the village's administrative center. For reference, the core of Konoha—meaning the bit protected by the walls themselves—has the approximate population density of Seattle and more colorful characters than most places have stand-up comedy acts. Ours, you see, are free.

I'm getting off-topic, though. Basically, this was a big day and I hadn't seen a crowd this dense since my old life. This, of course, necessitated finding my group in the crush somewhere and trying to find a decent vantage point to see Sensei up on the roof.

And he was there, both hands on the railing and looking down on all of us with his chakra nearly fizzing with nervous excitement. I could tell that at least two of the Elders were up there with him, along with Jiraiya, Kushina, and Hiruzen Sarutobi. There might have been other people, but I was a little busy trying to find someone I knew with whom to enjoy the show.

With a bit of shoving, I managed to make my way over to the nearest familiar chakra signatures.

It just so happened that this crowd was mine.

"Hey, Keisuke-chan!" Kurenai called, flagging me down before I jumped toward the next pocket of people.

"Kurenai-san," I said, jogging over.

Actually, it looked like my entire year-group (and the ones immediately around it) had decided to form a crowd of our own. I could see Ibiki and Asuma hanging back a bit, with Genma apparently having a whispered argument with Raidō over something I was not going to investigate. Anko was sitting on Aoba's shoulders, apparently because she could and because she was too short to see over the crowd otherwise. There were a pair of goofballs messing around near the rear of the pack—Kotetsu and Izumo, if I had to guess.

And finally, up front—

"You made it!" Rin said, jumping up to hug me. I returned it and she said, after, "Wait, where's Obito?"

"Late as usual," muttered Kakashi, who had approached while I had a thirteen-year-old girl hanging off my neck and was thus distracted.

"I have no idea." I told Rin, ignoring Kakashi entirely. "Mom and Hayate and his friends should be around here somewhere, though."

"Pretty much everyone already is here." Asuma said, brow knitting. I couldn't tell if he was annoyed because he hadn't had a chance to strangle Obito for the whole "we thought you were dead" thing or just because it was that important of an event. Probably both. "Where the hell is that Uchiha?"

There, I thought almost before I realized what I was sensing. I looked up with eyes narrowed in a squint against the afternoon sunlight, and kind of wished I had binoculars or the Byakugan. His chakra was dwarfed by the signatures around him, but… "Obito's on the roof." I said.

"Eh?" Gai—and where the hell did he come from?—looked up too, raising one bandage-covered hand to shade his eyes. "Oh! OBITO-KUN, WE ARE DOWN HERE AND HAPPY FOR YOUR WONDROUS RETURN!" He waved enthusiastically.

Obito didn't wave back, but then, none of us could see him anyway. I wasn't sure if he would be able to hear a small explosion from the ground, given the noise of the crowd, and Gai wasn't quite that loud. Even besides that, Obito wasn't supposed to be visible from the ground—the only one who was, in fact, was Sensei.

Speaking of which, I felt Sensei's chakra shift a little, as though he was preparing a jutsu.

"I think it's starting soon." I said, craning my neck to see.
Behind me, Hayate latched onto my waist and I felt Mom and Hayate's friends gather around, pushing into the formerly all-shinobi crowd. No one seemed to have any problems with it, even though I was pretty sure he was attempting a badly-done Heimlich maneuver. I had a couple of seconds before I was going to have to twist his ear to get him off.

Anko, being their age and a girl, climbed off Aoba and started talking with Iruka about something I couldn't hear over the buzz of the crowd. After a second or two, Hayate let go of me and clustered with his friends and Anko. I exhaled with a sense of relief and vaguely thwarted vengeance. The ensuing snickers were worrying, but I decided to leave it for later.

Though there were four of them, I was still a chūnin and had other shinobi as nominal backup.

If they felt like it.

Then I felt Sensei's chakra flare in tandem with Sarutobi's and Jiraiya's, and everyone in the crowd older than the age of five went silent. The remaining group of spectators was shushed by their parents, and I wondered if the village would ever install a proper PA system.

Sensei was practically glowing because the moment would go to anyone's head. From this distance, though, I could feel flickers of nervous energy coming off of nearly everyone in range.

The silence held until Sensei broke it.

(I realized later that acceptance speeches in ninja-land were apparently supposed to be just as abrupt as the way we fought.)

Louder than seemingly possible, his voice rang out across the entire crowd, clear and confident. "From this day on, I shall protect Konohagakure as the Fourth Hokage!"

Cue the crowd.

It took a couple of minutes for things to settle down after that. Between Sensei warping to the front of the administration center because stairs were for squares and accepting congratulations from everyone from Kushina (who kissed him), to Fugaku of the Uchiha clan (who did not), for a while it seemed like the crowd was going to cut off whatever else he had to say. But the little black-clad shadow by his side, it seemed, wasn't meant to go unnoticed even if he was still adjusting to humanity again.

"And finally," Sensei was saying to Fugaku, "a war hero makes his return. Obito fought his way back from the brink of death and saved his comrades, Uchiha-dono." He had his political smile plastered on his face, the shell thick enough that only those who knew him extremely well would notice.

He squeezed Obito's shoulder for emphasis, and Obito started turning red in a sort of mortified embarrassment that came with being praised for things you weren't sure were actually your doing. Or, you know, were embarrassing.

I made my way closer, in case Obito needed some kind of moral support or something. Rin followed along in my wake.

Kakashi, somehow, was already at Sensei's other elbow like a second shadow.

"I hope you would be willing to accept his return, Uchiha-dono." Sensei concluded.
Fugaku briefly closed his eyes, and then said, "That was never in doubt, Hokage-sama."

Peeking out from behind another nearby Uchiha, oddly, were two familiar faces—a tiny Itachi and a slightly-less-tiny Shisui (and had his hair always been that curly?). If I was any judge, I'd have pegged Itachi at about age five and Shisui at maybe somewhere around seven or eight.

I felt a pang of sharp regret for what both boys' futures had been like before the timeline had been turned into an interesting pretzel by Obito's sudden grasp of common sense. Funny how the Uchiha clan's salvation and destruction always seemed to hinge on the cooperation (or not) of clan members with unique eyeball powers. Even if none of the boys near me had done the discovering part of the equation for ultimate in bullshit powers, we'd already taken the first step toward preventing that miserable vision from coming true.

I still had to tell Sensei about it. Soon.

It was also kind of funny to realize just how little all these major players were, in comparison to me and my friends and what we had all accomplished so early.

And Mikoto wasn't anywhere in sight. I guessed that if I was nine months pregnant, I wouldn't want to get out of the house for anything short of the end of the world, either.

"So I can come home?" Obito asked, wide-eyed.

"Of course." Fugaku said in a tone that didn't make it sound like he was contemplating paying unforeseen bills. It was a close thing, though. "Regardless of whether you have found allies in other places, the clan was always your home to return to."

I tilted my head to the side. That was…not what I was expecting. Good, of course, but I had only seen glimpses of the Uchiha clan since meeting Obito and his experiences had been pretty uniformly chilly. While Fugaku had not been precisely welcoming, I had kind of been expecting a flat "oh, you're back" kind of response. Sensei being in directly front of the Uchiha clan head and on Obito's side apparently changed everything.

Oh, and Sensei being Hokage. I wasn't sure about some of the stuff Obito and Sensei had discussed on their own time—people didn't tell me everything, even if I could guess a lot—but I had the feeling that this wasn't the first time Sensei had confronted the Uchiha clan about Obito somehow.

Kakashi tapped out a quick code on the back of my right shoulder once he was close enough for it to appear casual. I spared him a glance, because Sensei and Fugaku were having a stare-down over Obito's oblivious head, and then thought about his message.

Ally suspicious, teammate at risk Y/N?

I flicked his fingers off me, a lightning-fast rhythm on our nails. Hold.

It wasn't a denial.

Acknowledged.

I felt Rin's chakra flicker in response, too.

We'd side with Obito first, long before the Uchiha clan entered the picture. And he'd probably return the favor if it came down to it.

"I should get an apartment back in the district, then." Obito mused aloud. He paused. "…Though I kinda need to talk to you or to the administration center about that and not right now."

 Sensei nodded. "All right. Obito, Kei, Kakashi, you can run along now. Just remember that you have team training at two with Kushina."

 Glancing at Obito's outfit—basically a black variant of the Konoha dark blue standard, plus his long-unused flak jacket—I decided that the best option after that point would be to go home and change before I could ruin everything I owned again.

 So maybe the last mission had been a spectacular fluke. My point stands.

 "Yessir," I said, fast enough that the words got crammed together.

 Mom caught up to us before we were able to ditch the We-Have-A-New-Hokage party.

 "I'll stay here for a little longer," Mom said, holding Hayate by one ear.

 I didn't want to know what he'd gotten up to. At least not in public, with Kurenai having a whispered argument with both purple-haired girls he knew and with Iruka being scolded by his parents. I would totally needle him later.

 "Okay. I'm gonna have to head home to get changed," I told her, since my teammates had already disappeared for just that purpose and I had to tell people about things before I just took off.

 "We'll see you at dinner, then." Mom's eyes crinkled at the edges as she smiled. "I have been waiting for the proper moment to give you your birthday present, and I don't think there's any harm in handing it over early."

 Holy cow!

 "I'll be there!" I said, practically bouncing in place. "Thank you!"

 And then I was gone, too.

 So, training.

 Shinobi tended to use sparring as a sort of informal fitness assessment even among each other, with casual meetings. We were obviously terrible at this "mental health" thing and didn't see the problem with allowing an eight-year-old who'd seen his entire family slaughtered to live in the same house he'd lived in before the massacre, in an abandoned district. So, in the absence of a centralized system or any study of psychology beyond what was required to break people, most of the expertise we gleaned was haphazard.

 Hence the use of sparring (a deeply ingrained aspect of our culture's militant history) as a diagnostic tool for almost everything that wasn't death.

 I arrived at our team's usual training spot about ten minutes early and immediately walked to the bridge we usually used for meetings. There wasn't anything really special about it, but I was feeling nostalgic and twitchy and looking at the river tended to help soothe my nerves a bit.

 …This was going to be a long few months.

 I wasn't just thinking of the Uchiha thing. Whatever Obito did involving his clan was mostly his business unless it abruptly changed into a problem for the whole team, so I couldn't really worry about that as long as he was happy with how things were going.
Oh, no. My problem of the day was about Naruto's birth.

I didn't believe for a second that Madara and his legion of Z-Putties would just let us go on our merry non-murdered way.

The only question, then, would be what to do about it.

The obvious answer would just be to pawn the entire thing off to Sensei. I didn't have a way around that—when you got down to it, there just weren't a whole lot of ways to prep for a disaster on the scale of the Nine-Tailed Fox's escape without involving someone who could muster an awful lot of ninjas really quickly. Even then, it'd be close.

But that couldn't be everything I could do. Sure, I was just a random chūnin who happened to be well-connected to most people in the village, but I also knew a hell of a lot and could probably (eventually) draw on Isobu's chakra. Actually, I could definitely draw on Isobu's chakra. Controlling it was another story entirely.

I looked down into my reflection's eyes, vaguely expecting to see Isobu's strange gold-on-red eyes staring up at me.

Nope. Just me.

I mean, I was a few days short of fourteen and was starting to outgrow my mother in some ways. If I kept up the growth rate I'd been showing thus far during puberty, I'd be mistaken for a man pretty much for the rest of my life. The facial scar from Kannabi was also still pretty obvious, and if it'd lightened a little over time it sure hadn't gotten shorter. I looked like Squall Leonhart had had a run-in with Seifer a second time and gotten the same stupid scar lengthened at both ends.

Still. I wasn't exactly the thing people thought of when they thought "political powerhouse." Or any kind of powerhouse, really. I just looked like a slightly depressed tomboy/young man with a really obvious scar.

"Ah-HA!" Obito's voice called as he bounced into view with his chakra buzzing happily. "I'm not late, Kei!" He looked around the area quickly, Sharingan active, before declaring, "Take that, Kakashi!"

Obito was actually taller since the last time he'd been in Konoha, and he'd grown up a bit. Wearing black and his Konoha vest from ages ago made him look a lot older than he actually was, even if he only came up to about Sensei's neck, and the bandages running the entire length of his right arm seemed to add weight to that assessment. He'd also taken to wearing an eye-patch over the last couple of days, which looked less odd than Kakashi's perpetually-crooked headband.

All of that affected his behavior precisely not at all.

"So, feeling better about being back in Konoha?" I asked, smiling faintly.

"Hell yeah!" Obito looked kind of sheepish and said, "I just talked to Granny Sayako and she almost blew up at me for being gone for so long. It was great but also kinda terrifying. I mean, it's nice to know people care."

I gave him a long look.

"It still feels a bit weird to be back, but I'll get over that." Obito elaborated, shrugging. "It's more good-weird than bad-weird, you know?"
"I could guess.

"What are you going to do after this, Kei?" Obito asked suddenly, looking rather serious.

"After what?" I asked, blinking. That question didn't sound like it'd come out of nowhere.

"After we grow up, obviously," Obito said, hopping up onto the bridge's opposite railing so he could pace and practice his chakra control at the same time. At least, I thought so. "I didn't really think about it before, but Sensei's sending out runners to the border stations to announce stuff to Iwagakure and everything's, you know, winding down."

I gestured for him to go on.

"But like, I don't know… I noticed the Ino-Shika-Chō guys are all married and expecting kids now, and I think some of our age group's joined ANBU already." He continued to pace. "I think Rin-chan is going to stick to being a medic-nin, but she wasn't really ever officially assigned to Team Minato, and it seems like Gai wants to shoot for jōnin soon…" He paused again, thinking. "What are we gonna do when we aren't a team anymore?"

"Why would you think we're going to not be a team, Obito?" I asked. For the most part, the only major shinobi teams that failed to be best friends years after the fact were the ones where one or more members died or defected. As a result, Konoha shinobi could be a pretty tight-knit community. "As far as I'm concerned, just because we take separate missions sometimes doesn't mean that our genin team isn't special."

"Well, what about if—" Obito began, but I wasn't about to let him go off on a tangent about that. I grabbed the trailing edge of his leg bandages and yanked, forcing him to sit down probably more abruptly than he'd have liked.

While he was whining about rough handling, I took a deep breath and said, "Obito, you are my best friend."

Obito went very still.

"I absolutely promise you that this is the complete, unvarnished truth." I went on, meeting his eye directly. "I can't tell you to stop doubting how much everyone cares about you. That wouldn't be fair, because it's an order and there are some things you can't order someone to do. But even if we have to go on separate missions for a really long time, I promise that if we meet up at Ichiraku's, it'll be like no time passed at all. Understand?"

Tobi or not, shinobi or not, and reincarnation or not, I'd owed him for years. He'd always had my back, and the least I could do was have his.

Well, the absolute least I could do was haul his ass out of the fire every time he got in too deep, but I was more of an accomplice than a babysitter. That was Kakashi's thing.

Obito started wiping his eyes on his sleeves.

"Hey, hey, you don't need to cry." I said somewhat frantically. Ugh, what was it with me and making people cry that week?

And then the inevitable hug happened since I'd started the waterworks, was sympathetic, and was in range. We were still hugging—well, I was side-hugging Obito and we were sitting on the bridge railing and Obito was finally done crying—when Kushina showed up.
She waved off any explanations Obito was about to give—he'd never liked being called a crybaby—and said, "It's always all right to cry when you're happy. And Kei-chan is here, so it's not like you're risking anything by being emotional."

…I wasn't sure what to say to that.

Obito sniffled a bit more, then shook himself and stood up.

"So, what we're going to be doing for this training session is…actually, no. Wait."

"Okay, it's two in the afternoon and I can't see Kakashi anywhere."

A quick check with my chakra sense confirmed that.

Okay, that? That was weird.

"Where the hell is he?" Obito demanded, Sharingan active again because as soon as he had a new power he had to practice with it as much as possible. Even though the Sharingan wasn't meant to be used at range and Obito wasn't a sensor to compensate.

Somewhat luckily, Kakashi showed up before I had entirely thought through my plan to send Tsuruya on a scouting mission after him.

"You're late!" Kushina said gleefully.

Kakashi's chakra flickered strangely for a moment in a way I thought was highly concerning—what the hell was that emotion?—but he just lifted his chin and fixed Kushina with a distinctly annoyed glare. "I get a penalty for being the late one for the first time ever?" he asked.

"Eh…" Kushina thought about it. "I can let it slide this time. But I want to know why you were late!"

"I was talking to Sensei." Kakashi replied, calming down again.

I reminded myself that there was literally no reason this Kakashi would ever have to become the man who gave shit excuses for the time he lost staring at a memorial. Or I hoped that was the case.

Gah, who was I kidding? Kakashi grew guilt complexes like petri dishes grow bacteria.

"That's okay then." Kushina huffed, crossing her arms. "Now, get started!"

"So you're only supervising?" Obito asked her, even as we were making our way to the much-used field nearby. Destroying the bridge would be a dick move, and we'd probably have to replace it anyway.

"Well, yeah."

When she put it that way…

"I'd rather just try out a jutsu exhibition first." Obito said, lifting his right hand to about eye level. His chakra surged up his arm and…it's hard to describe what happened. I realized later that the sensation was Wood Release-aligned chakra, which had been effectively extinct in Konoha before Obito's return. There was nothing to compare it to.

As we watched, a woody vine snaked out of his sleeve and wove into a twig globe around his hand.
Kushina's jaw dropped. "Is that... Obito, is that Wood Release?"

"He was doing the same thing on that last mission." I offered.

"Only more violently," said Kakashi.

"That was mostly Guruguru, not me." Obito frowned, shaking his arm and dislodging the jutsu. The wood created from it just kind of withered, dropping to the ground as though as dry as tinder. He looked up and said, "It's based on the arm.

"Well, if you can still use it, it's a start." I said. "But does it tire you out faster?"

"Not really. Not the little things, like this." Obito looked at Kakashi, asking, "What about my Sharingan?"

"...It could be worse." Which, while accurate, did not seem to be the answer Obito had hoped for.

"Are you all seriously just going to stand there and talk?" Kushina demanded.

If saying "yes" gets me extra crappy missions, I'm just going to keep my mouth shut.

"I was just training with you this morning," I pointed out. Though that had been about Host powers and the accessing thereof and not about actually fighting anyone yet. And I didn't really want to do any sparring if there was a chance I'd start leaking Tailed Beast chakra everywhere.

"So?"

Okay, no sympathy there. Got it.

"Kei and Kakashi, you're up first." Kushina put her hands on her hips, glaring at our defiance (of...I don't know, denying her a show?). "If you're not going to manage a three-way fight yourselves, then I may as well call the shots. Go!"

Fighting dreamers—hah, no. Clearly, I needed to stay in the moment.

Then Kakashi aimed a kick at my head, and I ducked under that strike to go for his supporting leg's knee. Kakashi shot backwards, darting out of range for easy pummeling and more importantly avoiding my kick.

I threw shuriken in his way, leading him when he was going in a straight line. Which was almost never, because Kakashi wasn't stupid so much as unwilling to break out the big jutsu that might have killed me, but since I waited for those moments at least I wasn't wasting ammunition.

Never let it be said that I didn't know how to disable enemies. Especially now, after it seemed like all of our fights had become life-or-death and there was never any room for hesitation.

The weird thing about our match—well, aside from the fact that Obito was a spectator and I wasn't dead despite taking Rin's role in this stupid timeline—was that we were pretty equal.

Oh, Kakashi was faster. He didn't do fixed stances. But even his recent growth spurt only put him even with me in terms of taijutsu stopping power.

Granted, neither of us was using our actual specialties and we seemed to have come to a wordless agreement that big jutsu were out of the question, but I would have honestly expected him to outpace me easily. He did have the Sharingan, after all.
Even if he wasn't really using it.

"Put your back into it!" Kushina shouted. I wasn't sure who she was talking to.

Then Kakashi pushed his headband up.

Ooookay then. Clearly we were moving onto the part of the program where I got my ass kicked. Joy of joys.

"Oh, that is bullshit." I growled under my breath.

It was like a spark. Red light in Kakashi's eye and—

Chakra surged. And it didn't belong to either of us. It was red and angry and seemed to coat the inside of my lungs with the air I breathed and shut the fuck up, dammit!

Deep in the center of my chakra coils and the bottom ring of my mind, Isobu roared.

Oh fuck no.

I hit the ground, digging my fingers into the grass. "No, no, no, no, no! Kakashi, keep back!"

I kept forgetting—I wasn't truly stable.

Not if I'd apparently managed to give Isobu PTSD at the sight of a Sharingan. Not a bad instinct for a Tailed Beast to have, but it hadn't cropped up with Obito's remaining eye or with Uchiha clan members whose eyes weren't active, and I had only one guess as to the difference.

Kakashi had actually used the eye on me before.

I remembered it only as something to be pissed off at Kakashi for, but apparently Isobu didn't see it that way.

I could hear yelling and above the hubbub rose Obito's voice, saying, "Kei, hold still!"

Kushina's chakra chains wrapped around me just as Obito grabbed me in a hug and held on with his strange Wood Release arm flaring chakra all over the place.

Isobu's chakra receded, and then Kushina's chakra chains dissolved.

I blinked, pulling back once I was sure I was totally in control. I wobbled a bit and had to pinch the skin on the inside of my elbow to get completely back to reality.

I caught a glimpse of Kakashi looking at me in wide-eyed horror for just a second. Then he was gone.

Suffice to say that that training session was a total wash.

Not for the first time, I hate how slow I can be.

I'm not fast. Kakashi is fast. Kakashi is quick. I'm just really good at somehow not being totally outpaced and stabbed to death. Only Kakashi is weighed down and his chakra's flagging and I've got a stolen katana in each hand and all I can think is that we're dead.

"Fucking hell, they're gaining on us." I barely hiss the last word out as fire rips up my right arm; of course getting stabbed earlier hadn't helped our odds of survival any, but I hardly needed the reminder.

"I'm sorry, I'm so, so sorry—!" Rin says, panting and barely hanging on even in Kakashi's grip. They're hobbling along compared to our usual pace, and I cannot for the life of me think that this is going to end okay.

"Focus on just getting out of here." Kakashi snaps, and I can practically feel his nerves stretching and fraying.

We're dead. We just haven't stopped moving yet.

We break the tree line and all the warning klaxons are going off in my head even before I see where we are.

White-trunked, ashen trees and the faintest plinking of raindrops overhead. A cold moon and stars disappearing behind gray clouds. The buzz of enemy chakra behind us and the roar of Tailed Beast chakra in our midst.

This is the killing field.

Rin twists out of Kakashi's grip as my brain stutters in sheer horror, hitting the ground hard and failing to roll with the impact.

They'd cut her Achilles tendons. She can't run and the Beast won't need her to. Chakra hammers down on us like heat from all directions and I can feel my chest heave in half-induced panic. Madara's seal is bright and cold like an alien star, standing out in Rin's chakra system.

"Please, Kei-senpai. We can't keep going like this and I know what's going to happen if we try." Rin is crying. Big, ugly tears track down her face. She can't move on her own.

The right thing to do would...would be...

I don't know.

Kakashi tries to pick her up again, but she bites his hand and snaps, "No! You can't take me back to Konoha! I won't destroy the village!"

We won't get that far, I think.

Kakashi looks at me like he expects me to say something different. Like he expects me to pull Obito's speeches and spirit out of my sleeve and make them both believe things are going to be okay when they never fucking were.

I'm not him. But I can do one thing, I think, to make sure I can do somethong with this worthless life of mine.

"Kakashi, take Rin." I say, inspecting my stolen steel instead of looking at him. "I'll hold them off."

"Kei, no!" But Rin's voice is very small compared to the future I can almost help save and I can ignore her. I can.

"Kei, this is insane." Kakashi says, both eyes wide. His chakra lurches, but there's nothing he can really do, is there? He can't make me change my mind without using his Sharingan, and he doesn't have enough chakra for that and he barely knows how to really use it.
He promised Obito to keep me safe, yes, but he also promised the same thing for Rin and I wasn't the one with two useless legs.

There was a chance, however slim, that I would merely be captured instead of killed. Rin, though. Rin. Kakashi.

No.

I wasn't going to let them die here.

"My mind's made up." I say, smiling faintly and sadly because there was never another option. We're out of time and out of options and I'm not the first person to die to protect her friends. Sometimes, I think it takes a bit of blood to get things rolling.

And Kakashi runs.

It hurts him. It tears his heart out to do it. But between saving the helpless teammate and sticking around to get killed and lose Obito's eye and probably die horribly, I can't blame him.

It was what I wanted.

I watch them disappear, feeling like I want to cry but entirely unable to.

No time.

The first of the Kiri-nin appears out of the opposite tree-line, spots me, and moves in for the kill.

I cut him down even as I sidestep his strike, slicing his head from his shoulders and allowing his decapitated corpse to fall where it would.

Two more.

These are cleverer, and take longer to kill. Perhaps they're learning by example, and the impaled and split corpses I am left with bleed more profusely from more wounds.

How many can I face?

Four come next, and I have to dart from foe to foe at Body Flicker speeds just to keep them from moving around me. They're fast and coordinated, but I can keep them at bay as long as I keep my head on straight.

This isn't a true chokepoint. I need their eyes on me.

I sprint right and there's a fifth, bringing a hand reinforced by steel and chakra down on my left forearm.

I feel the bone crack and drop the first stolen sword and kill him with the other.

Pain. Lightning races to my brain from my leg as an enemy blade cuts into my calf and brings me to the ground hard.

I lash out on reflex and kill him, too. Even in the hands of a wounded opponent, a katana is nothing to scoff at. Even if I'm slowed down now, even if I'm bleeding out by inches, I plan to go down fighting as hard as I can.

Distantly, I can hear screaming. Maybe it's mine or maybe I'm hearing things. There's a rumble underfoot that makes me wobble worse than normal and I can't get to my feet.

I wonder if this is what it felt like to be on the receiving end of Order 66 as the blaster fire poured in.

The more that hit you, the more that will.

I am almost on my feet now, using the katana as a cane and realizing that wow, I'm dead. I'm so dead I can barely feel the agony of my chakra coils draining when there's so much I have to do before the Kiri-nin catch my friends.

The screaming gets louder and it's definitely not me. I can't get enough air for that.

And then, as the noise seems to translate to physical force, I can finally see beyond the fight and understand what's going on. There are enemy ninjas dying all over the place now and it's not my fault.

Obito.

As soon as I think that, two blades slide home. There are swords jammed between my ribs and I can almost feel my heart stutter. Opposite sides. Two through-and-throughs. I can't breathe. Everything hurts and I can't breathe and I can't let go of the sword.

I blink.

I fall.

And I don't hit the ground this time.

I look up, strangely aware of the blood trailing out of the corner of my mouth. I'm bleeding from everywhere, I'm sure. Everything is red on black and somehow I'm not dead yet.

Plink, plink. Rin's crying again. It doesn't hurt to cry and I can't feel anything anyway, so I look up at her with my lungs working at breathing and failing to do more than wheeze faintly.

I feel Rin's arms around my head and neck and I can hear her say, "Kei-senpai…oh, no…"

She's hurt, though. I remember that.

She shouldn't be here.

Her hands cast a green glow and the blood on her face might be mine. It's black in the light.

I'm bleeding into her dress, I think vaguely.

"Kei-senpai, please…” Healing chakra isn't worth it anymore. It doesn't feel like it's worth it.

Plink, plink.

I let go of the sword.

My vision's turning black at the edges but I can still move.

I raise my hand to one of Rin's. She grasps it with both her hers, and the healing chakra stops flowing. Silly. Should save it for yourself.

I stare at our joined hands.
Can’t let go yet. Still have something left to do.

_Evil Sealing Method._ My chakra lances up through her arm and over two different Gates before grabbing at the _thing_ clamped over her heart.

I won’t let _that man_ win. Not even now.

Rin screams.

Everything goes black and white and dim and then nothing as Rin falls and I thump limply to the wet ground.

It's probably my blood anyway.

Hands pull at me, pull up and pull at the swords but they don't matter.

Nothing matters.

The world turns red and gold and then I die.

And that was about when I sat up, blinking in the dark and wondering where the fuck that had all come from.

I turned over and checked my alarm clock.

3:46 am.

_GOD DAMMIT ISOBU._ I mashed a pillow onto my face to muffle a scream of frustration.

So, it turns out that the source of my recent nightmares is a chakra leak from Isobu. Also known as that one turtle with a pocket dimension in his stomach and a tendency to generate _horrible hallucinations_ as an automatic defense. The only worse option I could think of at that moment, while sleep-deprived and pissed off, would involve Shukaku and another substandard seal.

Trust a Tailed Beast to get the last word in. I wasn't even sure if he was doing in on purpose.

And the week had started _so well._

…No, it hadn't.

I sighed and ran my left hand over my face. I swear I could almost feel the phantom pain of my arm breaking.

At least the treaty with Iwa was valid now. Go Team Future. Here's to not dying in three months.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title is from a Frou Frou song.
Ripple Arc: Passing Notes in Class

Chapter Summary

Kei: Lose a month.

My birthday was quiet compared to everything that had happened before.

Turning fourteen was apparently a milestone in my mother's mind, so she presented me with a gift that she'd quietly let me forget during the events of the earlier part of the week. I hadn't been in a helpful or appreciative mood and had thrown myself into meditation, so opportunities for revelry had been scarce. I'm sure I would have been a total Debbie Downer during that phase, so in hindsight I was glad that she waited to shock me out of it.

Mom, in her wisdom, had me sit down at the kitchen table before she pulled an item storage scroll out of her sleeve and unveiled her gift in a burst of smoke.

It was a katana.

Hayate was sitting next to me, but I kept him from grabbing for it with a sharp look.

"As far as I'm concerned, you shouldn't get this for another year." Mom said after a moment, as I tested the weight of the blade and its scabbard. It was heavier than I was used to and would take some extra training to adjust to. "But with recent events, you're more an adult than I would have wanted for you this early. It isn't a bad thing. I just wish you had more time to be my little girl."

"I'm still smaller than you." I told her, putting the katana down on the table. Then I hugged her as hard as I could without being an attack. "And I'll always be your little girl, won't I?"

"In spirit," Mom agreed quietly, pressing a kiss to my forehead.

"When do I get one of these?" Hayate asked. He was slowly reaching out for the sword, sort of like a dog trying to sneak past its owners to grab an errant treat.

"When you're older." Mom and I said in unison.

Hayate huffed.

Other gifts were less emotionally significant, but still important. Kushina got me a new set of chakra-neutral sealing inks (and I sent Kushina that old book on Tailed Beasts and the Sage that Dad had once read to me when I was little) and Sensei got me the accompanying new calligraphy brushes. Obito got me a blue and orange birthday card with an IOU for steel-reinforced forearm guards tucked inside. Rin gave me what she called a deluxe medical kit (because "You keep getting into bigger trouble than these things are designed for!"). Yamaguchi-sensei gave me a set of wooden focus beads because apparently I needed help meditating.

And then, in an unmarked box, I got a set of adjustable training weights that could be activated or deactivated by a snap of chakra.

Considering that I didn't see Kakashi for about a month after that disastrous training session, I didn't really have to guess, in hindsight, who it was from.

That month (July to early August) tried to sneak by us, but we caught it by the coattails and made it work. What follows after this point is a summary, sort of.

I trained in speed.

With Gai.

Gai was, to be fair, a jōnin candidate. He pushed himself harder than anyone else in the entire village. He also expected the same kind of effort from those who trained with him, and could cheer the other person on if he didn't feel like things were working out on their own.

"KEISUKE-CHAN, YOU CAN FOLLOW ME TO THE TOP OF THIS PILLAR ONE-HANDED OR I WILL ACCOMPANY YOU ON TWO HUNDRED LAPS AROUND THE VILLAGE ON OUR HANDS!"

Well, he gave encouragement in his own Flames of Youth way.

I got a lot of use out of those weights, with the caveat that someone who didn't regenerate muscle mass probably should have thought twice about my methods. Gai didn't have a lot to say about the weight seals, though he used similar ones, but he waxed enthusiastic about his training methods and the amount of time he spent on it.

"Early to bed and early to rise makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise," right? I'm nearly certain Ben Franklin said that. And that he lived in an era before fluorescent lights.

"Buh." I'd said after my first training session with him, lying slumped on the ground in a slug-like state. I was face-down and couldn't make much more sound without having to move, so I didn't.

"Keisuke-chan, are you up for phase three of our training?" Gai had asked, walking over to me on his hands.

Yes, we really did the village laps. They sucked.

"No." I'd moaned, rolling onto my back with difficulty. Ow, ow, ow. "Gimme a sec."

Gai did a quick twist and ended up on his feet again, then sat back on his heels next to me. "What should you be doing right now?"

"Getting up." I'd grumbled, then lurched upward and nearly elbowed Gai in the face. "Fine, fine. Everything freaking hurts anyway; how much worse can it get?"

"Let's find out!" Gai had said cheerfully.

Joy.

If my limbs turned to jelly for as long as it took for Isobu's chakra's regenerative properties to kick in, I wasn't really complaining. The initial pain was of course horrible, but I didn't have to experience it for nearly as long as I would have if I wasn't a Host.

Speaking of Isobu, I changed up my nightly schedule.

Every single night before I went to bed and every morning before starting out for a new day of training, I sat on my bed with my worry beads in hand and meditated to talk to Isobu in my mindscape. This, of course, didn't actually stop Isobu's nightly punches in the brain from happening, but I tried. After all, I could hardly say that I had tried until he got so pissed off by my friendship assault that he tried to eat me.

My mindscape still looked like Hudson Bay in the winter, but Isobu seemed to have come to terms with his confinement and was doing laps in the water whenever I arrived.

It wasn't until attempt forty-nine that we got anywhere. Well, from my perspective, anyway.

You keep coming back here. Isobu said flatly, still swimming around while I floated along behind him and dodged the occasional swatting tail. Why?

"Probably because I need to." I replied, spinning slowly in midair. "And because I've always done it and because you haven't tried to eat me yet."

Should I have? Isobu asked.

"Nah." I did another loop-de-loop.

...Why do you spend so much time in this...space? There's no reason for you to talk to me when you know I hardly want to speak to you. Isobu told me, swatting at me with one scaled tail.

"You aren't the first roommate I've had in here." I told him, and I felt his huge eye focus on me. I raised two fingers. "I used to have two extra personalities. You might remember them."

Vaguely. Isobu's gigantic spiked head tilted as he followed my movements. I haven't seen them since the day I was sealed.

"Yeah, well, Id and the Dreamer got crammed back in here." I thumped my chest with the palm of my hand. "I think they knew they weren't going to win a fight for floor space with you."

Isobu gave a neutral rumble. They would not.

"Yeah, well." I paused. Actually...why the hell not? It wasn't like Isobu was going to tell anyone and, frankly, he deserved to know.

I floated out over his head, pulling on the structure of my mindscape and seeing what unraveled.

There was a noise like paper scattering crossed with the sound of a gigantic zipper sliding shut, and the air cracked. I saw double for an instant, seeing plain empty air out of one eye and out of my other one was a string of colored paper cranes extending outward from my sternum like a pull-string on a doll. When reality resolved the paradox, I was left with the line of cranes ran out in front of me and toward Isobu before detaching and fluttering off into the air.

When I looked closely, catching a crane in my hand and pulling it open.

It was a photograph. Of the kind that moved, like in Harry Potter.

It showed Team Seven stalking Kakashi in an attempt to figure out what he looked like under his mask. Particularly, the part where they were hovering around Ichiraku's.

While cute, it wasn't the memory I was going for.

When I let go of it, it folded itself back into a paper crane and flew off to join the flock of memories buzzing overhead.
What is that? Isobu demanded, looking up at the circling swarm.

"Those are my memories." I said, descending to his level. I took a deep breath. "What I'm about to tell you can be used for good or evil, but I'm telling you anyway if you want to hear. It's a heavy burden."

Heavier than being a jinchūriki? Isobu asked.

"I would have to bear it anyway." I told him. "Frankly, I walked into the thing with you with the understanding that if I didn't do something about you, I was dead. So, I accepted the risk."

Isobu seemed to frown. I don't understand.

I smiled. "I'm a lot older than I look."

I floated upward, wheeling around in the empty air above Isobu's head.

Isobu was not impressed. So what does that make you? The oldest brat in existence?

I laughed out loud, though it wasn't supposed to be a joke. "No. No, that'd be too easy. Let me try again." I spread my arms. "Starting from when I was born, I remembered my last lifetime."

Isobu stared. What.

I settled into a meditative stance, bobbing up and down in front of Isobu's nose. "My name is Keisuke Gekkō. But it didn't use to be." No one I'd talked to about my visions had actually asked if I'd been the same person last time. "Fourteen years ago, I died and reincarnated into the body you're sealed into right now. Before that, I was a civilian woman who watched the world burn."

Through the safety of a TV screen, granted, but it was certainly their world and it had certainly burned.

"After my death, I watched as a little boy grew up with the Nine-Tails sealed inside of him." I said.

Obligningy, an origami memory flew over to my hand and I unfolded it. The image on it was of an infant Naruto on the Reaper Death Seal ceremonial altar, screaming his lungs out with the Eight Trigrams seal on his stomach. It was not a happy occasion.

I flipped the photo over and it multiplied in size by a factor of ten so that Isobu could see it clearly.

"I watched as he fought his way to the top of the dog pile." I explained, sending another unfolded memory his way. "As he befriended the Tailed Beasts and learned your names. As he fought the Ten-Tails and united all of the disparate shinobi countries for one final war."

Who is this boy supposed to be?

"His name was Naruto Uzumaki. Or maybe I should say 'will be,' since he hasn't been born yet." I told Isobu, smiling faintly. "But it's my goal to make all of that as superfluous as I can."

…Damn, that sounded arrogant.

I thought that over. "Well, to be more accurate…I hope that if I intervene now, he'll never have to be the one to save the world. Because it won't need to be saved."

Isobu was giving me the blankest blank look I'd ever seen. Including those normal for actual turtles.

I blinked.

You—it's so human. Isobu sounded tired, even though his tails were whipping through the water and smashing ice floes to bits. Why do humans always try to tear into the threads of fate?

Prophecies exist for a reason.

"At the risk of invoking Greek tragedy…" I tapped my chin in thought. "Frankly, there's no reason that the prophecies I've heard can't come true. I just see no reason not to change up the details."

Like Naruto growing up with his family and not as an abandoned child. Or Kakashi having actual not-dead friends. And Obito not being psycho.

How much can a human's strength really change? Isobu wanted to know.

"I don't know, a lot?" I hummed, thinking. "Thus far, I seem to have saved a few lives, killed a few people, influenced others, and kept one person from going evil."

A memory crane flew by and a flash of its wings revealed Obito's face, transposed with Tobi's mask. Then it flickered and there was Yagura, framed by Isobu's afterimage from some flashback I couldn't remember.

Isobu's eye widened slightly. That boy…

I nodded. "Could have gone evil." Spectacularly so.

Then Isobu's eye went narrow. You can see the future.

Uh, yeah. I said as much before.

Well, kinda. Hedging, I explained, "In my old lifetime, I wasn't just a civilian. I was a civilian who saw this entire universe in the form of a TV show."

I don't know what a TV is.

"Ehhhh…think of it as a way to experience a story." I flicked my fingers and another memory crane flew by, showing me in my old life dressing up as a shinobi for fun. For someone like Isobu, the cracks in that image were obvious. For me, back then, it'd been a game.

It sure wasn't now.

"The story probably ends at some point after my death in that world." I said. "But I know enough about writing and about stories to know how much stays the same despite my abrupt insertion into a timeline I'd thought was fixed."

More memory cranes descended.

"My body didn't have enough capacity to contain my spiritual energy alone when I was younger, which caused feedback that I couldn't easily handle." Another crane flew by—and the odd thing about them was how I could always tell what they contained. It was like they were more holes in reality, peeking into some unmoving background, than they were solid images on their own. "Which is why my mind splintered when I was first approached with a mind jutsu—the Dreamer was a fragment of my identity for the purposes of siphoning off and storing chakra as it formed. Yin chakra was the easiest to form with a minimum of my physical energy, which I didn't have much of. It could easily be partitioned off and stored inside of my coils.

"It was a balance enforced until you appeared." I told him. "Since the Dreamer was the curator of these memories and I no longer needed her to keep my soul in balance, I'm still around and whole." I paused. "Though I'm a hell of a lot chattier than I remember. Reintegration is a messy process."

If it hadn't been for Isobu and for the Dreamer coming home to roost properly, I might never have told anyone about even a fraction of what I knew. At least, not without being forced to do so. And possibly after epically screwing up and/or doing something that literally couldn't be explained by what I should logically know how to do.

As for Id…

Well, I seemed to be a lot more touchy-feely lately.

Finally, I shrugged. "I've had a lot of interesting experiences. For a uniqueness factor, at least I know that other people do become Hosts and have for a while. Otherwise, though…I'm weird enough on my own that more weirdness is just icing."

You…are a very strange human. Isobu said. I wouldn't have expected any human to remember life after death. You do die permanently, don't you? The soul of a human should be expunged, not left to reform.

"How the hell do Tailed Beasts just rematerialize?" I asked. I frowned, realizing, "I was never clear on that."

We were created from the chakra of the Ten-Tails, though I don't remember the actual moment I was born. We're made of chakra made solid. Isobu's tails lashed. Our souls are our bodies, unlike with you humans.

Wait a minute. "…And souls themselves can be split or modified or stuck in a Reaper's belly, but they can't be destroyed." I made a face. "Ugh, now the Impure World Reincarnation thing is even worse than I thought."

I assume that refers to a technique that allows humans to do the same thing.

I wobbled a hand in midair. "Kinda. But it only works with dead people and the summoner has to trade one human life for every soul pulled back from the afterlife."

Hardly a surprise. Isobu sighed, blowing ice across the surface of the bay as though someone had loaded a cannon with it. Humans.

"Tobirama Senju was kind of a dumbass." I agreed.

But you don't seem anything like a Tailed Beast. Isobu shot upward then, churning water so that his eye was even with my floating form. You're too small. Too short-sighted.

It wasn't like I could really deny that last bit to a creature with an eyeball bigger than I was. "And I'm pretty sure the regeneration and coherency after death was a one-time thing."

…Interesting. Isobu sank back down, bobbing gently in the bay.

"The feeling's mutual!" I told him seriously.
...Human, you asked for my name the first time we spoke.

"Yeah." I said, floating in front of his nose. "And you said no."

I did not. His huge shell looked even bigger as I wove among the spikes while he talked and swam on in a figure-eight pattern.

"...Look, if you didn't say yes I was just gonna assume it was a no." I said. I'd had enough of "consent" to last a freaking lifetime and having people assume shit. I didn't have permission explicitly outlined and I wasn't going to risk being told I'd been in violation of some subsection of a Tailed Beast Host code of conduct thing.

...Hm. I wondered if Isobu was feeling any of the frustrated affront or whatever that I felt just then, but he didn't comment on it.

Then, Who was that boy?

"Obito or Kakashi?" I asked. Two memories flitted into view, one showing each of my teammates. They were just a bit behind Isobu's ear, which made them harder for him to see.

Which one used the Sharingan on us?

"Kakashi."

Isobu gave a terrible rumble that I realized later was him trembling. Given that for most people, Tailed Beasts were basically made of fear and primal terrors, it just looked strange to see Isobu afraid of anything at all. At any point he wanted, he could have swatted me like a bug hovering around a lamp. There were no cage bars keeping him from doing so, and I floated too close to the water to escape quickly.

But he was afraid and damned if I was just going to leave it at that. Or worse: gloat.

Teach me to resist it. Isobu demanded, but there was the slightest quaver in his voice.

Easier said than done, since I didn't know.

But...

I crossed my legs in midair and rested my hands on my knees. Memory cranes swarmed around me, calling up images of Killer B and other jinchūriki over the years.

"Well, I've heard that the Eight-Tailed Beast and his host are immune to genjutsu, which seems like a good place to start..."

Oh, and I still had missions. Small missions for once—courier missions that stayed within the borders of Konoha basically counted as light duty—and I ran half of them solo because there wasn't any combat requirement. A chūnin doing what were effectively D-ranked missions would have come across as a waste of resources, but I guess Sensei was pretty firm on his decision to keep my teammates and I out of trouble for a while. I couldn't stop taking missions, since I was still on call, but Sensei apparently wasn't above restricting my mission rankings to the bottom feasible rung on that ladder.

It got frustrating as soon as I felt I'd gained a bit of a rapport with Isobu. Ergo, week three. I held on for another week of kenjutsu re-learning with Mom, meditation with Kushina, and pain endurance with Gai before I lost patience.

On an early August day, when the sun was busy baking summer rain out of the village, I went to Sensei with the explicit goal of getting a mission to get me out of the village for a bit.

Because of a number of compounding factors—Hayate was testing out advanced kodachi techniques, I'd been missing Kakashi by a hair for nearly all of July, and my realization that if I was going to have any time at all to actually do things with Isobu's chakra, I couldn't be in the village—I walked into the office with my spine rigid and my head full of questions about what I could possibly be facing next.

I was also a bit stir-crazy, which contributed to the events to follow.

"Ah, Kei, you have good timing." Sensei said, looking up from the pile of paperwork on his desk. Behind him, two of his shadow clones were sorting through the mission scrolls that had flooded in since the end of the war. Weeks later, and he was still getting through the backlog. Of course more had rolled in, but the bulk was just because of the effects of a peace treaty on local economies.

"I do?" I asked, surprised. Generally speaking, walking in on Sensei during paperwork time was not "good timing."

"Yes. I actually have a mission you would be well-suited for," he said, and a paperwork chūnin appeared at his elbow to take the proffered scroll to me. It was obviously a C-rank, but the red band around both caps indicated a travel mission.

I held it in my right hand without opening it, still looking at Sensei curiously.

"What's with the suspicious look?" Sensei asked. "Open it."

I did, and noticed the Sorayama seal sitting right inside the slit. Then the ball dropped. "Oh! The Chinatsugumi want me to come back?"

"Yes. They specifically requested you." Sensei gave me a look over the top of his latest document/petition/whatever the hell it was. "For safety's sake, I want you to take at least one teammate along."

Well, my first choice would have been Obito, but I wasn't sure if he was still caught up in Uchiha administrative crap or in another mission. It could have been anything—it only took Obito about a day to get involved with (or caught up in) everything and then I wouldn't see him for days even if he never left the village.

Second choice: Kakashi. But I had no idea where he was. Every time I caught a whisper of his chakra, he was gone again before I could catch up. Even with Gai's…training…

…Wait a fucking minute.

I smacked myself in the forehead. "I'm a moron."

Sensei looked nonplussed at best. "What was that about?"

"I haven't seen Kakashi in a month and I was going to ask about that, but I should have asked Gai where he was two freaking weeks ago." I said, groaning.

"Kakashi isn't available for this mission," Sensei said apologetically. "Neither is Obito—I think he said he was trying to take an entrance exam for the Military Police."
"And Rin's back on hospital rotation." I paused, thinking. "Well, crap."

"Tell you what," Sensei began, looking over a sheet of paper that had appeared from somewhere in the avalanche of other ones. "I'll send someone to take you there on a way to another mission."

Another idea hit me between the eyes. ". . . Actually, Sensei? Tsuruya and I could just, er, fly there." Tsuruya had been the summon of one of the Chintatsugumi, maybe? I assumed she'd know where the hell she was going, since I wasn't going to be able to use ground-bound landmarks like distinctive trees to navigate.

And luckily, Tsuruya had proved that she could carry the weight of both Rin (who was my size, roughly) and two of Kakashi's dogs, which might account for one other person if we were lucky.

Sensei gave me a look. I . . . kind of missed whatever implication he was going for. "Given your unique circumstances, the list of people I'd allow on your missions is fairly short."

Well, until I managed to work with Isobu and become the first-ever Tailed Beast therapist.

"So, I'm sending Jiraiya-sensei with you." Sensei told me, scribbling something down on an empty sheet of paper. He handed it off to the slack-jawed chūnin assistant, who took off to deliver the presumed message after tripping on the threshold. "He'll be taking care of his own missions after you arrive."

I did a bit of mental arithmetic. Pakkun's weight plus Bull's weight didn't fully account for Jiraiya. He was one of the biggest guys both vertically and in terms of mass in the entire series, actually.

Hoo boy.

Tsuruya wasn't going to be happy with me.

"Understood, Hokage-sama." I said, bowing.

". . . Kei, you don't need to be that formal." Sensei jerked his head to indicate our utter lack of an audience, other than Sensei's clones. "And you already know Jiraiya-sensei, anyway. This should be a relatively straightforward request."

"I'm not nervous, Sensei." I said with a shrug. Actually, I was a bit apprehensive about my first true solo mission, for all that I'd probably spend entire trip with half-a-dozen bloodline-blessed powerhouses. But it didn't have much to do with the people involved. "And I need to remember to be formal for when there are witnesses."

Even if Tsunade had let Naruto get away with calling her Granny for ages on end.

Sensei shrugged, too. "If that's how you feel, that's your choice. Regardless, your mission starts as soon as Jiraiya-sensei arrives at the village gates tomorrow morning. Pack everything you need, because I expect this mission to take a maximum of three weeks."

. . . Okay, I had to re-read the Chinatsugumi mission parameters because wow, that didn't sound quite normal. The last mission had been a week, and that'd been a wartime escort mission...

"Sensei..." I began, as another thought came to mind. "I need to talk to you about something really quickly."

"Oh?" Sensei leaned forward a bit in his chair.
"...We need to increase the budget going toward village-run orphanages, now that we're not pouring all of our resources toward war." I said bluntly.

Sensei's eyes seemed to glint in the shadows cast by his hat. "I assume you had a particular orphanage in mind, then?"

"There should be one run by a former ROOT operative and ANBU captain named Nonō Yakushi." I sighed. "It's not that she's... argh. Look. I have a bunch of really selfish reasons to want that place taken care of regardless of what other people say has to happen."

If—and it was a big if—I could somehow keep Kabuto's mother from being sent into the field again, there was a chance he'd retain some semblance of sanity and not leap into Orochimaru's arms. And maybe that way, the Sand/Sound invasion would be off to a much shakier start. Maybe Kabuto would never become as twisted as he had through ROOT if there was someone calling him home.

...And maybe my brother wouldn't die.

It was stupid to think like that—there were any number of things that could kill Hayate before then—but Kabuto had been one of two instigators for Phase Two of the Fourth Shinobi World War. I didn't have direct influence on anything, but Sensei did and I at least knew who could grow up to be a time bomb. Hell, Hayate could break his neck falling off the Academy roof next week and I'd never really have any options to avert it.

But Kabuto was young—he couldn't be older than seven right at that moment—and there was a chance. As long as he hadn't killed Nonō yet.

As long as Danzō hadn't gotten to him first.

Anything past that was really up to him and the Lady, and everyone knew how she hated to be invoked on purpose.

"If something awful happens to families in Konoha," I told Sensei after a long moment, "I want to know that there are resources in place for everyone. Even the kids too little to decide anything on their own."

"And the selfish reason?" Sensei asked. I felt the security seals in the office snap into place, making the room the sealing equivalent to Fort Knox.

"Twofold—one, there's a chance a boy there will grow up to kill my brother," I explained flatly, watching Sensei's eyebrows climb toward his hairline, "and I'd just as soon not see that happen. Besides that... there's at least one timeline out there where your future son grows up in an orphanage, too. They'd better be better than they were, then."

Sensei didn't say anything for a while. Then, "I'll look into it. Don't forget to take your scroll, Kei."

I left Sensei's office with a lot to think about, but I didn't open the mission scroll all the way until I got home again and reactivated the security seals. I also headed to Mom's bedroom for security's sake—Hayate didn't have the clearance to requisition a toothbrush, much less see a mission scroll—and unrolled it.

A note fell out.

To: The kid who keeps getting stuck with us

From: Rikuto of the Chinatsugumi
…Sounded like Rikuto, all right. I continued reading.

_You are cordially invited—and here, it looked like he'd taken a couple of tries to decide on the right word—to Sorayama to celebrate a whole bunch of things. Like your sensei's inauguration, or maybe your birthday? When the hell even is your birthday, exactly? If not your birthday, I'm sure we've got a couple of those kicking around anyway and this is just an excuse._

Anyway, Chi-chan says we're supposed to be inviting you to check out of the shinobi lifestyle for like a week or whatever. I guess you have member access to our training grounds and gear now, since Chi-chan is apparently really, really sure you're the real deal when it comes to being a decent person. She wants to talk to you when you get here, too. She probably won't bite your head off—her mouth's not big enough.

_Huh. I'm kinda running out of things to say here. What to write…oh! For some reason, everyone's really anxious for you to meet the kiddies properly. They're all talking intelligibly now—well, except Tayu-chan, but you already knew that—and Shiro (for all that the guy's got about as much personality as a post) keeps saying that his kid'll be your favorite! What the hell, right? Everyone knows Kazu-chan and Miyu-chan have the best shot!_

The paper looked a bit wrinkled past that point, and spattered with ink as though someone had been fighting over it.

_We'll be proceeding with advanced combat training once you arrive. Something has changed, and we cannot risk being taken unprepared._

_Chinatsu Kasai_

…Okay, ominous.

And I was still going to visit them, because I was crazy.

I packed up the scroll and also grabbed the training ones I'd gotten years ago, when I was first promoted to chūnin. Even if I had no idea what I was really walking into, I could at least grab the scrolls they'd given me and thank them for sending them at all.

The sealing scroll's seals especially, in particular the Evil Sealing Method compacted design and the chakra-suppressing seals. If not for those designs, there was no way we would have gotten past the fateful mission alive. Guruguru might have been disabled using another method, but the seal had given Sensei precious time and there wasn't a shinobi out there who understood the value of timing better than he did. Tsuruya's summoning scroll came in a close second for protecting Rin and being the sanest member of the team.

"Mom, I've got a mission tomorrow!" I called as I left her room and headed down the hall. I needed to get my shoes and make my goodbyes before I flew off to the middle of the country.

"How long are you going to be gone?" Mom asked, leaning back against the sink and drying her hands with a dish towel.

…”Crap, I needed to remember to do the dishes myself when I got back. I should have remembered last night, and the quirk in Mom's eyebrows said she wasn't terribly pleased with my forgetfulness. She'd let it slide as long as I really did have a mission—saying something along the lines of national security risks was actually a common excuse among shinobi who still lived with their parents at higher ranks.

"Three weeks, more or less." I said, wobbling a hand in midair. "More on the 'less' side, I think."
"And the rank?" Mom asked.

"Eh…C, for the most part. I suppose there's a chance for a B-rank out of this, but I can handle things now." At Mom's sharp look, I hastened to add, "Mom, Jiraiya-sama is coming along with me to make sure I stay out of trouble. I'll be fine."

Mom looked skeptical.

…Actually, I felt a little dubious about it, too. But I guess that, ultimately, there really wasn't much trouble I could get into at this point that one of the Sannin wasn't going to be able to get me out of. Unless somehow we ended up fighting Orochimaru (unlikely in terms of geography, at least for a while) or Tsunade (unlikely unless Jiraiya deliberately pissed her off) or both (unlikely because none of them got along anyway).

Basically, I was going to be okay.

Maybe if I kept saying that enough, it'd become a sort of universal truth.

I smiled. "I have to get ready to go, but I'll definitely be home through breakfast tomorrow."

"I hope so." Mom said. "I was planning on having you help Hayate practice the Hunting Tiger technique before breakfast."

I ran the hell away before she could come up with anything else.

My problem with Hayate's kenjutsu training wasn't that he lacked in talent or motivation. Far from it. As far from it as Pluto, really. The real problem was—crap, how do I word this diplomatically?—actually the enthusiasm itself. Being excited about kenjutsu was great, but...

Frankly, Hayate seemed dead determined to use me as a way to measure his progress.

Which meant sparring.

And fighting.

And getting ambushed by a tiny murder machine (what felt like) every single time I was trying to do something that didn't involve swords.

Yes, that included my training sessions with Gai. Dodging a ten-year-old wielding a kodachi while walking on your hands after hours of various Gai-inspired exercises is a lot harder than it sounds.

It wasn't dangerous, at least not to me, but it was irritating. I happen to like the idea of having actual time to myself, and not the kind that required Hanzō-level paranoia to get.

Mom hadn't told him to stop, either, and I kind of wondered if she'd expected the same kind of overcompensating and highly reckless behavior from me back when I was that age. I hoped not.

I made sure to scribble a note to Hayate before I left the house, on the off chance it took me the whole afternoon to get things done, and then I ran.

Gonna be gone tomorrow, Hayate! I'll be back in September, I think, and I expect to see you master the Hunting Tiger Strike by the time I get back with Mom focusing on you!

AND STOP TRYING TO STAB ME.

Biggest, Baddest Sis
While I'd originally wanted to tell Obito about my mission, it turned out that when the Military Police say they're holding an exam, they really do mean it.

According to Chiharu Uchiha, whom I asked about it when I was barred from entering the police academy, prospective new recruits were put through a preliminary, formative, and summative examination in as many areas as the MPs could think of. That included village law, clan law, procedures for handling at least a dozen different scenarios, and a special two-day training camp that was about nonlethal takedowns and straight-up combat evaluations.

And Obito had started at about seven that morning, after being late for the six-thirty appointment, so I could expect to see very little of him for the next few days.

"If he's doing well, he should be moving on to weapon evaluation by one." Chiharu offered.

I replied, "I'd prefer not to distract him during his lunch break."

"Who said anything about lunch?"

Yeah, I kinda just left after that. I mean, I left a note (reading Sorry I'm gonna be gone for a month on a mission, but you're busy too and I didn't want to tell anyone to interrupt you. Tell me EVERYTHING when I get back! - Kei) with Chiharu in case he saw Obito before I did (likely), but I really couldn't spend that much time waiting around.

Next stop was the hospital, where Rin was on-shift and nearly ran me over with an empty gurney. She didn't have a lot of time to talk, either, and was polite but obviously rushed when I told her I'd be gone. With the head nurse glaring at me over the top of Rin's head, I left that place behind, too.

Last stop…

For the first time since I'd met him nearly five years previously, I headed to Kakashi's apartment.

He wasn't there, of course.

I honestly didn't know what I expected by that point.

I left him a note, too, and slipped it under the door past the security seals he apparently set before leaving home. I'd be gone for a while and, well, if he ever stopped avoiding me then maybe we'd be able to talk.

Hey, Kakashi!

If you were planning on talking with me, I'm gonna be outside of the village for a while. I'm sorry about whatever happened that made you stop talking to me, and don't even dare think it was your fault! This might be the only way I can talk to you, but I just need you to know that. What's going on with me is pretty much never your fault. Shit happens, and we both walked into it this time. Just stop avoiding me so we can get things straight between us!

I hope I'll see you when I get back!

Kei

Then I went home.
The next day found me and Jiraiya standing just outside of the main gates of Konoha at around nine in the morning, since there was no real reason not to get on the move as fast as we could. For one, I hoped that I hadn't somehow managed to gain airsickness as a biological failing since my reincarnation—even if we wouldn't be going nearly as high up as a commercial jet and I'd packed ginger candies just in case. Shinobi life wasn't conducive to keeping a motion-sick person alive for long periods, so I was probably safe barring a vertigo genjutsu or something.

Still, never hurt to be safe.

For that reason, I'd bought a set of goggles—not unlike Obito's—for the trip. My pack was full of adaptive equipment like that, really.

Gathering chakra in my right hand, I waited for the buildup to reach the optimal level before bringing my focus to a razor's edge. It was harder than it had been, since Isobu joined the team, but I could still call myself good at chakra control if I could just…

"Summoning Jutsu!"

Bam, a couple hundred pounds of giant waterfowl!

Tsuruya bowed deeply, folding her huge wings against her side with a clatter like a shaking cutlery drawer. "Keisuke-sama."

"So this is your personal summon?" Jiraiya asked, a note of approval in his voice.

"Yeah. Tsuruya, this is Jiraiya-sama—he's one of the Sannin." I said as Tsuruya lowered her head to about my height to get a better look at Sensei's sensei.

"I am honored to meet you, Jiraiya-sama." Tsuruya said.

"Nice to meet you, too. You're a very dignified partner." Jiraiya said. "I'm sure you keep Kei-chan here safe as you can."

"I do try." Tsuruya said. She focused back on me and said, "So, Keisuke-sama, what is my task?"

"Well, actually, we were planning on flying with you to Mount Soragami. Are you up for that kind of trip?" I hadn't actually cleared it with her ahead of time, because I was occasionally really, really dumb.

I think Tsuruya would have smiled if she'd had lips to smile with. "Of course. Let's be on our way!"

For the record?

Flying—and real flying, not just the type you get to experience from a plane—is pretty freaking awesome.
Kei: Experience shenanigans.

Luckily, Tsuruya knew where we were going. Shinobi were certainly trained to identify locations based on maps, on local landmarks, and on the general traces of other human activity in a given place, but not many people really got to see a topography map in full HD high definition. Frankly, flight was such a rare power that the people who could achieve it independent of summons could be counted on one hand. Identifying stuff from the air just wasn't a skill we needed to learn most of the time, since those of us who couldn't fly certainly couldn't jump high enough to make it count.

As such, Jiraiya was nearly as enthusiastic about flying with Tsuruya as I was.

"You know," he said to Tsuruya, as I hung onto his flak jacket with both hands, "I can see why you insisted we wear goggles."

We were too high up for most bugs, but not being able to hear each other's words clearly was a small price to pay for not having to deal with unseasonable high-altitude chill. Wind, for all that it was helpful in hot Konoha summers, was kind of a bitch to deal with constantly in thin air. Wind burn was definitely still a thing, too, which meant loading up on coats and scarves given the lack of a windscreen.

I felt more like I was attempting to walk into a snowstorm than doing anything in August.

"Humans often underestimate the power of wind so far from the ground, even after experiencing it through ninjutsu." Tsuruya replied, leaning slowly to the right as we started, however vaguely, to see Soragami in the distance. It kind of looked like a very foggy cone the approximate size of my little finger.

Her back wasn't big enough for me to maneuver much, so I sort of resigned myself to sticking to Jiraiya like a limpet for a couple of hours.

Apparently, the kind of trip that took us two and a half days on foot would take five hours with Tsuruya's wind-shaping chakra usage and bloody huge wings.

Briefly, I wondered how Tsuruya compared to Deidara's clay bird or Sasuke's possible future hawk summoned animal, or even someone like Konan. While obviously any races would be difficult to set up, it'd be interesting to find out.

"Or hurricanes!" I said, cheerful despite the biting chill and the way the wind snatched my words away.

"Indeed, Keisuke-sama. Have you ever been in one?" Tsuruya asked, which kind of implied that she had.

"Nope. I just know what happens when they hit a coastline." I unhooked my right hand from Jiraiya's vest and gestured, though it wasn't like Tsuruya could see me twirling my finger. "All the kinetic energy of hundreds of miles of wind and water, concentrated in the world's biggest spiral! It's exciting and completely terrifying."

Jiraiya glanced back over his shoulder at me. "Interested in weather, Kei-kun? Minato said something about volcanoes when he first got his team."

"Weather is all right, I guess," I told him. "But natural disasters were sort of my focus."

Well, at least they had been. Back when the only real disaster I could face was a seventeen-car pileup and the subsequent traffic jam, or maybe a freak windstorm taking out a power line and killing the wi-fi.

"I saw lightning fly back into the clouds, once." Tsuruya said. "Another time, a volcano caused a thunderstorm that burned down an entire forest."

Astoundingly, it turns out you can talk about bizarre and unfortunate natural phenomena for ages if you have enough examples to draw from. And if not, there's always the topic of how these patterns affected missions, followed by insane mission stunts as long as they weren't classified. Tsuruya in particular had a lot of stories of near-misses and near-death due to living on the wing, but Jiraiya had a plethora of "things going wrong" stories that were based on comedic mishaps. You know, instead of horrible war stories.

By the time we arrived, Jiraiya was talking about making his Ame apprentices dress up like frogs and I was sort of dozing with my arms locked into a strap around his flak jacket.

Then it started getting warm again and the wind got a little less intense, so I pulled one arm loose and pushed my flying goggles up on my head to test the wind speed.

Given that my eyes watered almost immediately, my verdict was "too fast." I pulled them down again.

Then my stomach seemed to do a loop-de-loop and oh hey, we were descending at bullet speed. Or at least it felt like it. It was a little like being on a roller coaster, only there were no safety belts and the only reason I was still on Tsuruya's back was because Jiraiya was really determined not to fly off and I was clinging by an arm.

Tsuruya snapped her wings out at the end, about a hundred meters from the ground to bleed off speed. I heard her feathers rattle a bit—what the hell did she even do with her feathers to make them like steel?—before they stopped. She beat her wings only a little at the end, to flutter to a stop in a manner that didn't suit such a large bird at all.

Then her legs hit the ground, rattling me and Jiraiya down to our bones, before saying, "We're here."

I have never been so glad to hit the ground since…I don't even know. While flying on an airplane is annoying as crap, mostly based on the presence of other people, flying via giant bird is a lot more like horseback riding sans saddles. It's really cool, yes, but by god I was saddle-sore and stiff by the end.

I hit the ground butt-first and the jolt up my spine was nearly pleasant given how numb the rest of me was.

And while Jiraiya was pulling my stuff out of Tsuruya's belly-netting, apparently unaffected by staying in the same position forever, I pulled my new headband out of my jacket pocket and pulled my goggles off entirely. Then I put the bandanna on.

If I had to deal with the Chinatsugumi, I wasn't gonna look like a boy who got caught in a wind tunnel. I was going to look like a boy who, despite being caught in a wind tunnel, still managed to suppress the inevitable horrible hairstyle under a hat.

"Hm..." said Jiraiya once we were mostly unloaded. He was looking up at Sorayama's gates, and the lone man standing by its open doors. For some reason, the guards were standing entirely aside, while the ponytailed guy looked down the path at us.

It took me a second, but I recognized his chakra—Shirozora.

I didn't remember his hair being green until Zakuro had flipped a genjutsu switch, but I couldn't sense her at all. I guessed that, instead, that actually was his hair color.

Huh. I guessed that I'd have to take notes on the color switches I'd see.

Tsuruya ducked her head and picked up my backpack in her beak, while I grabbed my largest sealing scroll and slung the strap over my back. I'd brought it along to store all of my other ones, which should have involved a bag-of-holding/portable hole paradox that caused a hole in space-time...but didn't. Much to my relief.

Jiraiya patted Tsuruya's wing. "Thank you."

Tsuruya bowed. "It was my pleasure to bring you this far, Jiraiya-sama, Keisuke-sama."

Then we headed up the hill.

"Keisuke Gekkō from Konohagakure," I said in one breath, "escorted by Jiraiya of the Sannin and Tsuruya of the crane clan, reporting for a C-ranked mission."

"Acknowledged." Shirozora gave Jiraiya a long look. Given the lack of visible pupils on gray, rather than white, irises and dark (green) hair, the Yuki clan member looked a bit like a very, very distant Hyūga cousin. "Jiraiya-san, are you going to be staying overnight?"

"If you'll have me," he replied, smiling though Shirozora's face was as blank and intractable as rock. I could feel metaphorical icicles forming.

I...may have told Jiraiya that Sorayama had hot springs.

Not sure if that was a mistake or not.

"Very well." Shirozora nodded at Tsuruya and told me, "Dismiss your summon and follow me."

"Tsuruya...?" I prompted.

Tsuruya dropped my pack into my waiting arms, then poofed back to wherever she'd come from.

Then we followed Shirozora as asked.

"Jiraiya-sama," I began as we walked, "have you spoken to Chinatsu-san?"

"Ever? Yes. Recently? Not especially. The Chinatsugumi seemed to be doing well enough that I was never asked to sort out their security problems during the war." Jiraiya shrugged. "Thanks for the lift, by the way. I don't have access to a flying summon animal."

No, but he did have stealth toads.

"I don't even know where you're going." I said. "But I'm happy to help even if Tsuruya did the "heavy lifting."

"...Was that a crack at my weight?" Jiraiya asked.

I opened my mouth to answer, but didn't get to. We'd reached the main longhouse's doors by then, and Shirozora kicked them open with a deafening bang, probably flattening the guards waiting on the inside of them.

"For crap's sake, stop doing that—!" said Rikuto's voice, since apparently he was one of the near-victims. Then his gaze fell on Jiraiya and he trailed off into dead silence.

"Rikuto Tetsuyama, right?" Jiraiya asked pleasantly.

"...Er. And you're Jiraiya of the Sannin." Rikuto paled even as he spoke. His chakra retreated entirely inside of his skin, pulling back into his core. It felt like the last thought left in Rikuto's head was "which direction should I run?"

"Jiraiya-sama..." I said warily, and he cut out the staring contest instantly. I continued in a totally level voice, saying, "Rikuto-san, I was going to ask Chinatsu-san about what I was supposed to be doing, exactly? There's a lot we have to talk about before Jiraiya-sama goes on to complete his mission. And this is actual talking, not the kind with knives."

"Are you sure you can trust a missing-nin?" Jiraiya asked lightly, as though it didn't really matter.

Well, it probably really didn't. He was just screwing with Rikuto.

"I don't know," I countered. "I've had clandestine meetings with him before and neither of us died."

Jiraiya gave me a flat look.

"It's fine, Jiraiya-sama. He's been in on the vision thing for a while now." I said, deeply sarcastic. When he looked at me for an explanation, I shrugged.

"Then why are you so close?" Jiraiya wondered.

I was about to say something to that—I kind of felt like explaining myself today—when we were interrupted by something else.

Only this time, it was Chinatsu herself. She nodded to both of us as the guards closed the longhouse doors behind us and she approached from a side room. I still couldn't sense her, but I was used to things by now.

"Jiraiya-san, Keisuke-kun," Chinatsu said, gold eyes seeming to cut through us both.

Well, at least I felt like that.
"Come to my office." Chinatsu said in a way that wasn't really a suggestion. "Apparently, we have a lot to discuss."

I had the rough impression of being asked to come to the principal's office after a prank war between two other kids and bopping them both with a ruler. Except I was a chūnin of Konoha and, when it came down to it, an adult. I shouldn't feel dread, since obviously Jiraiya was perfectly okay with any situation he could kill his way out of. I could do the same now, right?

I just didn't feel quite like that. Just no.

Once safely ensconced in Chinatsu's office—apparently mostly made of heavy teak wood, rice paper, and enough sealing ink to choke a horse—we sort of just gathered around her desk. It was a nice desk, but the other reason we did that is because her office only had one chair, and it was the kind that forced the person in it to sit ramrod straight in the chair and apparently both Jiraiya and I were habitual slouchers.

Chinatsu leaned back on the wood, crossing her arms, and said very bluntly, "What do you want, Jiraiya-san?"

"I want to hear what Tsunade's been up to for the past few years." Jiraiya said, nonchalantly enough that I almost didn't catch what he said. It hit me when I replayed the sentence in my head.

Tsunade? This early?

Getting Tsunade on anyone's side would be difficult, particularly if the person trying to do the persuading didn't have anything over her head. I liked to think that Naruto would be the only person who could win her over, but that sounded odd—obviously, he wasn't available and there certainly were more optimistic kids running around when you got down to it.

The question, though, was why Jiraiya was going after her now.

I probably had something to do with it, somehow.

"Gambling her way through her grandfather's inheritance, likely as not," was Chinatsu's response. "What do you want me to do about it?"

"Buy up her debt." Jiraiya said.

Chinatsu stared. "She is, at the least, hundreds of thousands of ryō in the hole. How exactly is this a feasible business strategy?"

"We can discuss that in private, Chinatsu-san." Jiraiya said, glancing at me. "Kei…"

Well, I knew when I wasn't wanted. "Got it, Jiraiya-sama. Leaving now."

"I'll catch up to you at dinner." Jiraiya said, waving me off. "Have fun."

What with?

Anyway, I left. I sort of explored a bit after that, though, since none of the aides came to collect me. By "explore," I mostly just wandered around and took a look at all the wall hangings and things in the longhouse for a while. Oddly, there were a lot of them.

I was reading the description of a silk-screen painting, which apparently depicted…someone's flight from Uzushiogakure, going by the whirlpools, when, well—
Who even are these people?

I jumped a bit, and maybe squeaked in surprise.

The seal isn't weakening. Don't even ask. Isobu grumbled. I could feel his chakra circulating, but none of it was heading into my coils. We're just more in tune.

Oh.

Which was totally believable coming from a gigantic demon turtle that was barely out of range of people who could shut down his rampages with extreme prejudice. That, of course, assumed that Jiraiya wouldn't be interested and I'd have to steer toward Konoha to find someone who was. If Jiraiya was willing, Isobu could be stopped here…

What was I worrying about, again? Aside from my life, anyway?

There were so many things to choose from that I gave up and tossed the whole lot out a mental window.

The Chinatsugumi are people who've reincarnated, too. I told him, figuring there was no real point in keeping it a secret. I didn't really realize that was how the afterlife literally worked here, so I made the mistake of assuming that I was unique up until I met them.

Should I be surprised? Isobu asked bluntly.

Well, maybe not. I walked down the hall, stopping next to a screen that showed Mount Soragami spitting lava in a manner not unlike that of Mt. Kilauea back on Earth. It didn't really make sense for a stratovolcano, but I supposed that a lot of things could change when shinobi started screwing around with the laws of nature. Maybe Soragami had been different back whenever Chinatsu's ancestors had started putting up anti-eruption seals? I get taken by surprise a lot, really.

So, these people…remember their previous lives? For a Tailed Beast, the concept was probably quaint—they never truly died, and of course the Beast that formed later was merely the old one after a long reassembly stage.

Yes and no. From what I understand, they only remember about as much as they need to identify each other on sight. And me. I explained. They view it as a sort of déjà vu, only with people. Apparently, Chinatsu-san has been able to use it as a sort of litmus test for people who want to join up.

And I suppose you knew them.

…Kinda? When I was a normal human civilian moron—which is a lot of modifiers—I used to dream about writing my own novel. I had characters and a plot and even a setting that had a lot of thought put into it. The current roster of the Chinatsugumi, or at least the ones in charge, happen to behave very similarly to characters I used to write about. They don't have anything to do with this world, normally. Er. Formerly—they obviously do now. I corrected. Going by the multiverse theory, it was always possible that they existed somewhere. And going by my existence, there is no actual ban on reincarnating from nominally disparate timelines and universes.

…What.

That was my reaction when I recognized Chinatsu-san. I paused. Well, there's certainly a possibility that I'm wrong and that they really have nothing to do with the novel I was writing at the time I died, but I can't imagine why the hell they'd recognize me as a probable doom-bringer otherwise. In this world, I wasn't even alive when they first started gathering strength.

After all, technically an author is responsible for everything that happens in a story, right? Good and bad. It's their fingers on the keyboard, after all.

"You've been staring at the wall for five minutes," said Shirozora's voice, dry as dust. "And I really doubt maple paneling can possibly be that interesting."

I jolted back to reality to find him standing about ten feet away, leaning against a giant urn of some kind. It was intricately patterned with red vines, but otherwise unremarkable aside from its size. Shirozora gave me a long look, arms crossed and expression blank.

Then he straightened up and said, "Misaki wants you to sit in on one of the children's lessons. They will be in the garden in ten minutes. Don't be late."

Then he walked away.

I facepalmed. Clearly, I needed to work on my situational awareness.

He didn't even ask what you were doing. Isobu made a snorting noise. Idiot.

I wasn't sure if he was talking about me or about Shirozora.

I nonetheless headed out the nearest door and took to the roofs—outsiders weren't allowed to stay inside of the longhouse or Chinatsugumi compound, but I was pretty sure there was a comped hotel room with my name on it at the nearest inn. I just had to go and find it and stash my stuff before Shirozora went all hall monitor on me.

"Ah, you've made it." Misaki said.

I made a noncommittal noise, surveying the room.

It was a large training hall, made of slightly yellowish wood worn down by lots of bare, calloused feet over time. There were waxed-over scuff marks almost the whole length of the room, and rice paper screens serving for inner doors. I looked around appreciatively—if Mom could have afforded a dojo like the big clans had, I think she would have liked this kind of building. And possibly more students—one didn't just find a well-worn dojo anywhere.

In the center of the room, there was a crowd of kids and two adult figures, spinning around seemingly aimlessly.

With Akira—red-haired today, apparently—thumping out a simple, straightforward beat on a set of drums, Nanami was apparently leading a dance class. Instead of playing the flute like I remembered, she was swaying along with the beat and showing the smaller kids how to keep their balance while moving. It was honestly rather cute to watch, though I figured it wasn't terribly well-organized since, frankly, organization came second when kids were involved.

Fun came first.

Speaking of kids, the crowd was pretty much made up of the usual suspects. Kaito, green-haired and sort of wobbly, was clinging to his mother's skirt and determinedly moving along with her instead of the other children. Miyu and Kazuki, at least four years old apiece and running literal circles around the smaller children, were bouncing around like pinballs with Aiko trapped between them. Roku, by contrast, was nearly asleep against Akira's thigh even if the rest of the group was being noisy. Little Tayuya was hanging onto Miyu's shirt and giggling like a hyena while she was mostly just being pulled along for the ride.

Misaki—who still freaked me out a bit, let's be clear—clapped her hands sharply.

Everyone stopped.

"Nanami, Akira." Misaki said tonelessly. "I'm sure you remember Keisuke-chan?"

Thank you, zombie lady, for that wonderful introduction. I waved awkwardly at everyone else.

The kids, I noticed, had hidden behind Nanami and Akira as soon as Misaki made her presence known. Well, except for Aiko—as Misaki's daughter, she was probably immune to the blonde woman's glare of death.

If she wasn't, well, that wasn't terribly surprising. Misaki's glare could strip paint.

"Have fun." Misaki said, and swept out of the room imperiously.

Once she was gone and probably out of earshot, I held up a hand to wave and said, "Hi, everyone!"

Brilliant.

Shut up.

Nanami approached first—Akira was trying to get Roku off his leg—and smiled at me, "Hello, Keisuke-chan. You've met these children, haven't you?"

"Of course I have." While they were extremely distracted, true, but I had. I also recalled losing a cheap pocket keychain to their toy chest, somehow. I nonetheless got down on my knees so I could look them in the eye. "Do any of you remember me?"

"No." Kazuki said bluntly. "You look funny!"

Well, he was four and neither of his parents were around.

"I do." I said cheerfully.

"Could you read to them while I get dinner?" Nanami asked, and I noticed her start to wring her hands a bit. At the same time, Kaito was scrunching her skirt between his tiny fingers and hid his face against her leg.

She'd only get a break from them for a few minutes, but I could handle small children for that long. Like it or not, I'd taken babysitting missions before and I had done all right. Better than my team's mini-jōnin, at least, back when he'd been a kid.

Most five-year-olds, as it turns out, don't really respond to military command procedures or structures. Kakashi had indeed been a very bizarre kid.

"I wanna read." Roku mumbled, rubbing his eyes. He blinked up at me curiously. "Are you shinobi?"

"I have a shinobi book!" Miyu said instantly. "It has real shinobi!"

"In that case, let's go get that book. Akira-san, if you could lend a hand…?" I trailed off. I didn't know where their toy chest was, or if they had some kind of collective library.

"It's no trouble, Keisuke-san." Akira said. "I think I know which book—"

"Why?" Kaito asked after a long moment, while his mother was busy trying to extract her leg from his grip. His green eyes were locked on my flak jacket, which made me glad I'd decided to leave my stuff in my room. As early as I'd been introduced to kunai and shuriken, I knew how to handle them instinctively. I was aware that this was not normally the case.

"Why what?" I asked.

"Why here?" Tayuya's high-pitched voice asked from about knee height. She'd gotten close and was in the process of wrapping her arm around my leg. "Why?"

"I don't know." I told her. To Kaito, who was about three and had successfully been detached from his mother, who made her escape, I said, "Chinatsu-san hasn't told me yet."

Akira, meanwhile, ran off in search of the book. That left me with six small children to deal with on my own. If I'd been a real fourteen-year-old (as opposed to a very strange counterfeit), there would have been a very real risk to the kids in some way, shape, or form. The collective troublemaking abilities of a bunch of pre-K kids often outpaced adult caretakers, much less a teenager.

Let's see…

I sat down properly and crossed my legs in front of me, yoga-style. Tayuya immediately scrambled onto one thigh—apparently, she was used to being picked up—and I looped my left arm around her back to keep her steady. "I'm going to bring someone else here. Is that okay?"

"Guess so." Roku said, looking around for this mysterious extra person.

Summoning Jutsu!

With a burst of smoke, Tsuruya appeared in a crouch next to me before sitting down with her long legs tucked neatly underneath her. "You called, Keisuke-sama?"

"I did." Flourishing as well as I could while pinned by gawking children, I said, "Kids, this is Tsuruya. Tsuruya, these kids are Aiko, Kaito, Roku, Tayuya, Miyu, and Kazuki."

"Charmed." She even punctuated it with a little bob of her head.

"Anyone have any questions?" I asked, grinning.

Six little voices piped up at once.

Half an hour later, after I'd gotten the book on shinobi (which was The Tale of the Utterly Gutsy Shinobi, to my pleasant surprise) and read through it, Rikuto and Zakuro finally showed up to pick up their kids from Kei's Improvised Small Child Caretaking Service. They were in the process of eating their dinner at the time, though so perhaps I should have appended "plus catering" to that description. And Nanami and Akira were finally around to help me herd children, so I'd have to change that too.

All right, maybe it needed some work. Since German didn't exist here, it'd be tough to explain the term "pre-kindergarten" anyway. And I didn't have the supplies for a full daycare.

"Hey, kid." Rikuto said, sitting down next to Kazuki as his wife went to go play with Miyu. "How's it been?"
"Fine."

Rikuto raised an eyebrow.

"Okay, not fine. But the bad part's mostly behind me by now." I amended in an undertone.

"If you say so." Rikuto said. "So, which kid is the cutest?"

I paused at that. "...You were serious?"

"Yep." Rikuto said cheerfully.

The last thing—okay, maybe one of the last things—I needed was for Rikuto to decide to channel Maes Hughes. I shrugged. "...Dunno, ask me again in a few hours."

There really wasn't a better term for it—Rikuto pouted.

"I see you've gotten over the thing with Jiraiya." I commented, unimpressed.

Rikuto blanched just at the name. "Not really." Rallying, he went on, "I have to ask, though—what possessed your Hokage to send one of the Sannin here?"

"I don't know." When Rikuto gave me a look of pure skepticism, I told him, "Believe it or not, I don't always know what Sensei's thinking. I was going to ask Jiraiya myself later, but then I got interrupted by just about everything."

"Daddy, come ooooooon!" Kazuki, it should be noted, had been tugging on his father's collar for at least fifteen seconds.

"All right, all right," Rikuto said, finally deciding that interrogating me wasn't worth ignoring his kid. "We'll talk later, Half-Pint. Okay, Kazu-chan, what did you want to show me?"

I managed to escape the improvised playroom a little after that.

"Jiraiya-sama, why were you really sent with me?" I asked much later, once I finally got back to the inn.

Jiraiya looked up from the table, where he was apparently working on his next dime-store novel—sorry, masterpiece—while his dinner went stone cold by his left hand. It'd been a long, long time since I brought a notebook along for a mission, even to take actual notes about things (because it was a lot easier to just pick the thing up in a specimen storage scroll and take it home), but I supposed that Jiraiya of all people could complete a mission while still giving his writing all the attention it deserved.

...Maybe that was backwards.

Up until I'd asked the question, the room hadn't felt too secure by shinobi standards. From the futon I was sitting on, I couldn't sense any more than the basic security seals I'd expected from a public building with shinobi (or shinobi-like) patrons. They mostly just kept noise from one suite from bothering the next one over.

In a flash, Jiraiya's hand was flat on the table and powerful noise- and chakra-cancelling seals spiraled out like living ink from his fingertips. I watched with interest as they wove around the room and under the fixtures in it, until we were both contained in a cage that reminded me of my house after Sensei got done with it—a panic room, in fact.

God damn I wished I knew how to do that.

Since I'd been cleaning my katana up until then and abruptly realized that maybe asking that question with a weapon in hand hadn't been the best idea, I slid it back into its sheath and left it on my futon. Then I went to sit across from Jiraiya.

"I probably shouldn't have asked, right?" I muttered, annoyed with myself.

Jiraiya shrugged. "Probably not. But you did."

"Is this supposed to be beyond my clearance level?" I asked.

"It's an S-ranked mission, so I assume it would be if you were normal." Jiraiya crossed his arm, pen tapping against his bicep. "S-ranks are eyes-only, and only the Hokage's eyes at that."

Welp.

"That said, Minato reshuffled your clearance level in light of recent events." Jiraiya told me. "Operative Crane from ANBU has much greater access to information, and the Hokage's implicit trust."

I blinked. "Wait. So you mean…"

"Congratulations, you're an honorary ANBU operative." Jiraiya said, going back to his book. "Don't get the tattoo, though. It'll ruin your cover."

"...It'd be nice if Sensei had told me that before I left." I sighed, pinching the bridge of my nose. Then, "Any other perks? Or is this just one of those formality things?"

"It's a formality. It also keeps you from becoming a target." Jiraiya said. He was apparently finishing up a paragraph even as I was trying to interrogate him. "We tried to think of something for your Uchiha teammate, but we couldn't think of an animal. Therefore, the two of you share the cover and no one is ever going to see Crane reporting to the Hokage."

"Well, what about Kakashi and Rin?" I asked.

Jiraiya shrugged. "I'm told that their situations are going to work themselves out. Believe it or not, even I don't need to know everything."

If he didn't, it was a given that I didn't either. At least by Sensei's standards.

"So, anyway. The reason you're here?" I pressed.

Jiraiya glanced at the security seals again—luckily, the "ink" they were made out of would disappear when Jiraiya wanted it to, or else we'd be faced with a very angry innkeeper come morning—before leaning back a little from the table. Then he said, "Minato thought I could use your future-seeing power to recruit Tsunade again, and maybe defuse the situation in Ame."

...Sensei was fucking nuts.

"I'm pretty sure my mission doesn't put me anywhere near Amegakure." I pointed out, suddenly very worried indeed.
"Which is why I'm picking up Tsunade as soon as possible. As far as I'm concerned, once she's with me and I can leave you to do whatever you need to here, the mission has a much higher chance of success. Hanzō was strong during the Second Shinobi World War, but he's not strong enough to face an angry Rinnegan user and two of the Sannin. Not now." Jiraiya said. "I've got a few contacts here and there to confirm which buttons I should push, but it's hard to be sure after so long out of the game."

"...She also has Shizune with her." I said. My mind immediately reoriented toward finding what I could remember about Tsunade's return to Konoha and the people involved in making sure she actually did do so. "You have to consider the chance that she won't go on a mission even if we do have all the cards from last time that worked to make her choose to be the Fifth Hokage. The situation now is a lot different than it might be ten years from now."

"I'll have to take that risk." Jiraiya said, deadly serious. "Minato agreed that letting Nagato go on his apparent destined path was a gigantic waste of lives. I have to try and steer him clear."

And with Sensei on the "peace" platform and this early in his Hokage career, it wasn't like he could just redeploy everyone to some backwater to punt Hanzō off his throne. Though the man himself was dangerous, Amegakure wasn't important enough on a worldwide scale to justify intervention in its civil war by an outside power—especially one that needed its internal resources to combat internal threats like ROOT and (possibly) the Uchiha clan. It just so happened that, in fact, the results of Ame's "backwater skirmish" would come back to haunt the entire world.

Hence, using Jiraiya.

"What do you need me to do, Jiraiya-sama?" I asked.

"Tell me everything you can."

Where to start?

"First thing's first—Nagato's Rinnegan isn't his." I shrugged when Jiraiya looked like he was going to ask a question. "Don't ask me how—that's just what Madara told Obito, only Obito didn't know enough to tell anyone what it meant. Thing is, I've seen stuff from a different perspective than he has and Nagato was the only person with the Rinnegan I'd seen up until that point." I looked up at the ceiling, trying to piece together a sequence of events. "From what I know, Tobi would have come into contact with Akatsuki sometime within the next year or so and killed most of the non-core members to help Hanzō's forces corner Yahiko, Nagato, and Konan. He'd only know about Nagato because Madara told him—Obito was too young to know about them and you'd never tell anyone who the Akatsuki were.

"Danzō's ROOT agents will be there if things run the same, trying to corral everyone. I don't know if it was because he's got more irons in the fire than a blacksmith, or if he'd heard of Nagato's Rinnegan and wanted it, or whatever." It was hard to assume anything but malice aforesight when it came to ROOT, really. "If...shit. I can't remember much of the detail around the situation if you want to talk logistics. I know Akatsuki were the main rebel faction in Ame at the time and that Hanzō wasn't originally hostile toward them. But if you want to ask me how they got cornered, I can't tell you much besides what I've extrapolated."

Actually...wait.

"Jiraiya-sama, is..." Cutting myself off just felt awkward, but words wouldn't easily describe what he needed to know. Further, he was a veteran shinobi of thirty years in the field and more. He'd be able to get more out of my visions than I could, if I could only just get the information into his head. I continued hesitantly, "Uh, is it all right if you can teach me a low-level visual genjutsu so I can show you?"

"...You're telling me that Minato let you get promoted, go on A-ranks, and become a Tailed Beast Host without teaching you how to project basic genjutsu?" Jiraiya asked, deadpan.

"...Yes?" And I was reworking my genjutsu resistance, too. What? It'd been a busy couple of years.

Jiraiya muttered something under his breath, then said, "Fine. Have you heard of the Demonic Illusion series?"

"Yeah. I was thinking about learning it for my first Exam, but I forgot to ask Sensei." Story of my life, I swear. "So I used advanced dispelling instead."

"I'm not sure how those two connect, but I'll get that story later. So, to use the genjutsu you just need to understand how the Rat seal gathers chakra and have an image in your mind..." Jiraiya went on to explain a bit about seal modifications—apparently the one-seal version was less detailed or expansive, and in fact easily cancelled in comparison—while I looked on with a sort of starry-eyed wonder.

Sure, this wasn't exactly rocket science and I'd trained with him before, but it was nice to actually finally get a goddamn breakthrough with a jutsu. Even if it was as simple and easy as the world's most basic genjutsu.

"When you get serious, go to Horse after Rat." Jiraiya told me. "That should mitigate the worse effects. I don't actually plan to spend five minutes drooling into the floor if I can help it."

"Why would it be that strong?" I asked blankly. "You could just dismiss it since you know it's coming anyway."

"If you use any of the Three-Tails's chakra, it's not going to be quite that easy. Be careful. We're only doing this once, and it's all one-way." Jiraiya said, resting his hands on his lap. "Go ahead."

...Well, okay. I forced Isobu's chakra threads back, while he was still griping about things like not getting to have any fun. Then I formed the Rat seal, followed by Horse. "Demonic Illusion: Vision Quest!"

I made a point on concentrating on the most pertinent memories I could find, even if they were still in animation format. To Jiraiya, they'd probably look like nothing so much as moving paintings, but if it worked now I'd at least have a way of conveying my suspicions to people like Sensei in an easy, simple way.

A minute seconds later, Jiraiya's eyes opened again and he seemed laser-focused, looking at me as though expecting me to come apart at the seams or something.

"That was...interesting." Jiraiya said after a long, awkward staring contest.

"Yeah." I said lamely. "So, uh, that's what I've been going off of."

"I can hear an apology in there—don't worry about it." At my surprised look, Jiraiya shrugged. "I'd have liked to hear all of this earlier, or see it, but at this point there's still time to fix some of what could go wrong." He actually smiled. "A chance is better than nothing."

"...True. But I should have told you earlier." I could have done a lot of things earlier, come to that.
"Then keep on top of things with Minato and don't let yourself slip now that you've built better habits." Jiraiya went back to writing in his book after a moment's thought. "I'll be leaving tomorrow, but I expect you to stay on the straight and narrow while you're here and be a good kunoichi. Learn more jutsu so you stop yourself from falling behind."

He had a point. If a disaster could be avoided with such a small amount of fuss, I really ought to have kept abreast of events a lot better than I had. And picked up genjutsu, since apparently it only took me about a minute to learn the simple ones. "Understood, Jiraiya-sama." Pause. "Can I ask Shirozora for help, then?"

"The white-haired guy, right? I guess he'll make a decent substitute if I'm not around." Jiraiya said.

Uh. "...Shirozora's hair is green."

"...What?"

"I don't see him much, but the first time we met Rikuto's wife Zakuro hit me with like three different genjutsu. I didn't feel anything this time and he didn't flicker at all." I explained.

"Hm." Jiraiya rubbed his chin. "Well, either your resistance to genjutsu is a little higher than mine or that's not what's going on here. I'll have to take a look when I have time."

Bizarrely, even a backhanded compliment—which was still probably more than I deserved—made me feel a bit better about my chances of not dying in the next few years.

I fell asleep that night wondering about potential. Mostly mine, since I was selfish, but also about what Jiraiya and Sensei would do once they had all the information they needed to succeed.

The future was out of my hands and I couldn't have been happier to see it go.

Of course, I had cause to regret that idea a little later.

Learning elemental manipulation is a little harder than it looks, Tailed Beast Host or not. Even with an Ice Release user yelling encouragement from the riverbank (as thanks for referring to his son as the "cutest" of the kids, apparently winning some kind of bet), I wasn't necessarily making the most progress.

I stood on the riverbank just outside of the walled-in Sorayama, sweat pouring down my face as I tried and repeatedly failed to meet my own expectations.

I could make a really tiny water dragon if I pushed myself, in pursuit of the Water Dragon Bullet Jutsu, but my control would fall apart a bit when I tried to scale up because Isobu's chakra would bleed into mine. When sculpting huge water constructs, control needed to keep that power back. I just...hadn't quite learned how to do that yet.

And I wasn't used to pulling on huge amounts of chakra, either. Even my seals or the Rasengan didn't really require me to hold something in a shape for very long—though the Rasengan had a windup time that I hadn't cut down on yet, either. Maybe it was easier because I'd learned to use it before Isobu had come into the picture?

I swear I spent a week on what, for another person with Water Release chakra and more actual experience, would have been really simple progression from D- to C- to B-ranked elemental jutsu. By day seven at Sorayama, I had hit a brick wall at B and wasn't looking forward to attempting A-ranked jutsu.

I dropped the water jutsu. I sat down on the riverbank, on a rock the approximate size of a minivan, and started thinking on it. After a second, I rolled onto my back and decided to look at the early afternoon clouds rolling overhead.

Also, I'd found out why I was there in the first place.

"I don't know what's been happening in Konoha, but I thought you could use a break and have time to learn from some of us." Chinatsu had said, when I'd asked. "Further, I think it's best if you're where I can keep an eye on you. Keisuke-san, you're a force of something at this point, but I'd like to be sure you stay away from your darker potential."

Despite what I said to Isobu earlier, I didn't necessarily think that Chinatsu was going to get any kind of priority when it came to managing my theoretical batshit episodes. I'd been told by Jiraiya to play nice. I liked most of the people I'd been hanging out with lately. I hadn't had to worry about an alarm clock since getting to Sorayama. I'd spent nearly five years as a shinobi.

I. Was. Fine.

And Chinatsu was late to the watchdog party if she thought she could get in on managing my instability this late in the game.

Even if I knew them from another lifetime, the fact was that I just didn't really trust them as well as I did my friends back in Konoha. I could share doomsday prophecies with Chinatsu and Rikuto because they accepted that kind of thing. But I couldn't, say, talk to them about a crappy mission I'd had. We just weren't that close.

Obviously, Water Dragon Bullet wasn't going to just come to me if I kept getting distracted by literally everything.

A hawk passed overhead, heading either for Mount Soragami or Sorayama. Happy hunting, tiny brown cousin of Tsuruya. Clear out those goddamn pigeons.

"Done for today?" Shirozora called from the opposite bank. "So early?"

"Probably!" I responded. As much as I was interested in learning, my chakra was flagging. And I wasn't sure if I could entirely trust Isobu's.

That was hardly called for.

Which was not the same as "uncalled for," mind.

Shirozora bounded over the river's surface coming to a stop next to my rock. "In that case, look after the children for the afternoon."

Frankly, I gave him the stink-eye.

After a week, I was a lot less impressed with his lack of respect than I might have been if he aimed it at people who weren't me. I got the impression that, rather than not being afraid of Jiraiya because he was strong, Shirozora was actually just kind of dumb.

"While the kids are adorable, I'm not—" But I didn't say anything else. Shirozora wasn't paying attention.
Because I'd been cut off by a loud explosive noise and the way he was focusing on a green-smoke flare sailing far overhead.

"You have mail," he said.

…So, green meant Konoha? Okay then.

Within two minutes, I'd packed up all the stuff I needed for my next mission and was on my way to Chinatsu's office, since apparently all the mail got rerouted through there. I passed Misaki's desk on the way, which was occupied by both the usual death-glare-packing blonde woman and her daughter, who was trying to figure out how to juggle stamps and failing.

(…You know, I never actually asked who Aiko's father was. Probably wasn't important.)

When I arrived, Chinatsu handed off my letter to me immediately. Then she walked out of the office and closed the door behind her without a word.

…Weird.

Then I examined the letter more closely, and the hawk on the perch by Chinatsu's desk. The hawk wore a red band on its leg—priority order from the Hokage. The letter itself had the Hokage's seal stamped firmly on the paper, clamping it shut.

I opened it, of course.

Kei—

You'll be joining Team Honoka at the village gates of Tanigakure, in the Land of Rivers, for their mission. Be there by the 14th of August. Mission is A-ranked, details to be provided by Honoka Uchiha upon arrival. Ears only.

Minato Namikaze, Fourth Hokage of Konohagakure

The entire last line was stamped on, with Sensei's craptastic signature underneath it and taking up half of the remaining space on the page.

I grabbed a sheet of paper off of Chinatsu's desk and scribbled a reply—Orders received and acknowledged—and tied it to the hawk's leg before letting it out the office window.

So much for a three-week C-ranked mission.

I went to go say my goodbyes and pack for a new trip.
Fun fact: I had no idea where Tanigakure was. It's one thing to say "go here" and quite another to provide a GPS or Mercator projection absolute location. If I was going to go poking through every valley in the entire country for the Hidden Village and asking passers-by for directions, I would miss my deadline by a mile. Most shinobi villages weren't truly hidden—Taki was, if I remembered right, but most others were just annoying to get to—but the only things I knew about the Land of Rivers involved half-remembered geography lessons and the Rescue Kazekage arc.

Not a great place to start.

Pulling Tsuruya aside after the kids were done climbing all over her, I asked, "Do you know how to get to Tanigakure?"

"No, Keisuke-sama." Tsuruya told me. She tilted her head to the side. "Perhaps you should ask Rikuto-san. He was originally deployed against Sunagakure, wasn't he? He may have a map."

I tried to visualize the Land of Rivers, which sat between the Lands of Fire and Wind. Sorayama wasn't located in the dead center of the Land of Fire. It was actually west (and south, but mostly west) of Konoha by a fair margin. If I kept going that way, I would hit the borders of someone else's country eventually. Sane people would need to cross the Land of Rivers to hit up Suna for a cup of sugar, but I could fly.

Flying was awesome. The only problem was the idea that, somehow, I would make a mistake with directions and end up too close to Amegakure.

"I'll do that." I said. My mental image, for all of its glorious speculation, frankly just wasn't detailed enough to go off of. I ordered Tsuruya to wait for me at Sorayama's front gates, while I got our gear and packed my bags properly.

Then I went looking.

I found Rikuto at the bottom of a dog pile four kids deep, in the dojo. It wasn't until the other parents retrieved their children that I had a chance to talk to him properly—though he still didn't stand up. I sat back on my heels and leaned over him, with Miyu trying to climb up my flight jacket.

Rikuto, as it happened, didn't have a map. On him or in general. "Misaki probably will. I've never been to the Land of Rivers, actually. My missions put me through the Land of Stone instead."

"Well, rats." I muttered. I pried Miyu off my vest and placed her on Rikuto's stomach, making him exhale with a "whuff" noise.

Once he got his breath back, Rikuto shrugged. "Ask Misaki. That woman collects paper like a pet
"I will. Thanks anyway." I said, turning to leave.

Then Rikuto's voice said, "Wait."

"Wait for what?" I asked, looking back over my shoulder.

"When you go see Misaki, try to make sure you're still getting paid for the babysitting mission." Rikuto told me, "Since technically it's being cut short by a priority order, but you still flew out here as asked."

"Will Misaki have a problem with cutting things off?" I asked.

Rikuto shrugged. Then Miyu accidentally rolled off his chest and landed on his face, cutting off any response he might have made.

I left after that.

At least Misaki did have a map. It was a topographical map with a political map on the next page, which gave me a better idea of the terrain I would be expected to recognize as we flew over it. It wasn't perfect—sometimes the political one only showed a pretty pictographic representation of places like the Valley of the End—but the topo map had a scale. I showed it to Tsuruya once I was back outside of the city gates and we spent a while trying to make heads or tails of it.

"I think we should expect his journey to take two days of eight-hour flights." Tsuruya said after calculating the distance in her head. "But I believe we can cut that down to one if the weather holds and if I am able to use Wind Release manipulation for the duration."

"Were Jiraiya and I cutting down on your flight range? It makes sense, based on weight." I guessed, folding the map.

"Less than one would think." Tsuruya said. "While it is true that weight does make a difference, my primary concern is wind-shaping and how having two passengers would affect my aerodynamic profile. My range is mostly determined by my chakra usage when it comes to transportation." She bowed her head to pull at the cargo netting still on her belly. "I can easily fly ten hours per day unburdened, but I worry about you freezing if I do, Keisuke-sama."

Touched, I lifted my hand to her beak. "Thank you. But since today's the twelfth, I don't think we have a whole hell of a lot of time to waste."

Tsuruya's huge dark eyes shone with determination. "True. Please complete your final preparations, Keisuke-sama."

I pulled my flight goggles on over my eyes and tugged my shirt collar up over my face. Even if I could heal wind burn easily enough, I'd still rather not get it in the first place.

Then I climbed onto her back and secured my legs to the saddle. Even if it would suck, we were going to try to make the trip in one day.
Man, oh, man, it was gonna suck.

"Good to go, Tsuruya." I told her.

"We will stop in three hours, then. Hang on, please." Tsuruya said. I felt all of her muscles bunch up underneath me and the jolt as she jumped to catch the wind. Her wings flared, then began to beat powerfully downward.

As soon as she straightened out, we were already ten meters up and climbing. By then, we were on our way.

It took us the full ten hours to get to Tanigakure. That included breaks for lunch for the both of us (a bento for me and four large fish for Tsuruya), two bathroom breaks (for me), and the final twenty minutes I spent on Tsuruya's back in the dying light with a flashlight, trying to figure out where the bleeding fuck the actual village was supposed to be. The evening lights hadn't been turned on yet, you see—most villages didn't bother with street lamps given how fragile our power grids were even in the big ones. Konoha was an exception—I could probably see the lights from the Hokage tower from miles straight up if I ever tried.

The thing about the Land of Rivers was that it also included a truly irritating number of essentially-identical valleys that could have all held a Hidden Village. It was in the name, really. And I didn't feel like searching from source to mouth on every single river to find the one I was looking for. We ended up flying over roads and trying to track them as they got thicker—hopefully, that'd help us find the right path.

It wasn't until dusk was nearly over that we found it. By that point, both of us were tired and it was getting really hard for Tsuruya to see anything, what with being a diurnal bird—and then my chakra sense finally started to catch the signs of active shinobi in the area, even from our cruising altitude.

Then, as we approached the village itself, my chakra sense seemed to light up like a pinball machine.

"Found it, Tsuruya! Think we can land in this gloom?" I called, unzipping my collar a little so I could be heard. I immediately regretted it—even if we didn't have as much forward momentum as before, the wind up here was cold.

"Just aim for the gate lights, yes? I can do that." Tsuruya sounded tired—most summons couldn't be kept on the battlefield for thirty minutes, much less ten whole hours—and I could feel her flagging as we descended.

I patted her back. "Thank you so much for getting me here in time, Tsuruya. You deserve a break from all this after we land."

"It was my pleasure, Keisuke-sama." Tsuruya replied.

Before I knew it, we were on the ground. Once again, as soon as the jolting stopped I slid off her back and landed on my butt like a champ, then flopped over on the ground.

I could not feel my legs.

"You are being very dramatic, Keisuke-sama." Tsuruya informed me as the gate guards rushed over to us. They didn't feel hostile, at least.

"Knew that." I raised a hand and waved vaguely. "Go ahead and dismiss yourself. I can take it from here."
"Very well. Do not hesitate to call on me tomorrow if I am needed."

With that, Tsuruya disappeared into a big white cloud of chakra smoke and I sat up just as the guards arrived to help me up.

"I gotta ask—this is Tanigakure, right?" I looked up at both guards hopefully.

There had better not be more than one Hidden Village in this blasted river country.

"You're in the right place," said the guard on the left with the impressive handlebar mustache. He helped me to his feet before his partner, a much smaller and skinnier man with a strangely mousy look to him, got the chance. "Name and origin?"

"Keisuke Gekkō of Konohagakure. I'm meeting with Team Honoka, of the same," I told him easily. Luckily, I'd decided to wear my headband prominently in its proper place, so they could check the sigil.

"I see," said Handlebars. "Check the Akabeko. I've heard that a shinobi team set up there."

"Gotcha." I said. "Thanks for the help!"

I ran off pretty quickly after that. "Akabeko" put the image of beef hot-pot in mind, so I decided to zero in on some dinner. Then I could find the inn Team Honoka holed up in. I wasn't technically due 'til tomorrow anyway.

…Though that would be irresponsible of me.

I went into the Akabeko after stripping off my outer layer of flight gear and sealing it away—there was no reason for a shinobi mock-up of a bomber jacket to be worn at ground level, when it was warm enough at night for no sleeves at all. I checked and re-checked my stuff, making sure that my katana was secure at my waist and that I had my scroll on my back.

Then I went in, because I was a nervous moron and knew there was some kind of privacy barrier thingummy that kept me from sensing anything inside and that was driving me crazy in a bad way.

Oh, yeah. Privacy seals.

Suffice to say that any place with a significant number of shinobi patrons knows to invest in those. Most of them also had the side effect of suppressing chakra signatures a bit. Made the clients hard to identify from outside, and since restaurants nearly always meant witnesses, it actually cut down on the cleanup costs.

So, yeah. In.

The Akabeko was pretty crowded and pretty warm, too. While I couldn't make out words because the privacy seals had an inverted maximum range (meaning that nothing inside of a certain radius got out), once I was inside the front door I could sense chakra signatures easily enough. Most of the people inside were shinobi of varying skill levels, from genin to jōnin. Tanigakure seemed a bit small for their own version of ANBU, since larger villages tended to get the bulk of the missions requiring that kind of expertise, so I wasn't able to say for sure if there was anyone inside matching that profile.

From Tani, anyway. I could spot two exceptional jōnin-level shinobi hanging out at the back of the restaurant, and a third who was special for different reasons.

Kakashi.
I could only guess that there was enough scent and sound interference from the hustle and bustle of a restaurant to foil his split-second recognition of me. I hadn't actually laid eyes on my genin teammate for a month, to my oft-stated aggravation, and wasn't passing up this chance.

I headed over.

I could see the moment Kakashi realized I was there, even without my chakra sense confirming the jolt of shock. He made to get up and probably exit the building post-haste, all without looking at me, but the person sitting next to him at the table merely reached out and snagged his flak jacket. I didn't hear what she said, but he sat back down and stared at the tabletop for a bit like I was his executioner.

"Hey," I said once I was finally within the privacy seal's range. "Keisuke Gekkō, reporting for Team Honoka."

"Hey yourself," said the woman who'd caught Kakashi. "Honoka Uchiha. That guy's Ensui Nara. And I'm assuming you know Kakashi-kun, here."

I gave both of my actual new teammates a long, close look.

Ensui Nara was, well, pretty typical-looking for a Nara man. If I had to guess, he was about Sensei's age or a bit older. He was pretty well-tanned, since most clan members didn't bother getting out of the sun during their designated naptimes, with his stiff black hair pulled back into a ponytail that made his head look like a pineapple. He had a very thin, scratchy-looking goatee, too. He had what seemed to be shadows under his eyes, but on second thought they looked more like eyeliner or tattoos since they were green. He was wearing the standard Konoha flak jacket and uniform, and his beady eyes were assessing me even as I was trying to get a handle on him.

Honoka Uchiha, by contrast, was a woman who reminded me more of Tsume Inuzuka than of the polite if distant Mikoto Uchiha. Her black hair was done up in long, gel-reinforced spikes, with her hitai-ate front and center on her forehead. She also had a short ponytail, but only out of the hair caught below her headband. She wore the Uchiha high-collared shirt, but had cut a V-shaped section out of it that ran down to her collarbone. It was also sleeveless, but she had some kind of pressure-applying material covering her arms. She apparently used a shinobi mesh instead of bandages to secure her forearms and calves from bladed attack, too.

Kakashi was smaller than Honoka or Ensui, but he'd hit the start of his adult growth spurt with a vengeance, if I was any judge. Bafflingly, it looked like he was taller than I was already. He was actually wearing his flak jacket and uniform for once, too, with the straps for a tanto’s sheath crossing his chest. I thought, idly, that he needed a haircut after however long he'd been in the field. He was also determinedly not looking at me, even as I sat down across the table from him.

All in all, an interesting team.

"Specialization?" Honoka prompted.

"Kenjutsu, fūjinjutsu, and sensing." I said, snapping my attention back to the team's leader. She had to be a jōnin if she was leading over Kakashi's head. "I got here via summon, so that's another option, but she's exhausted after today. I also know a few healing jutsu, if we need them."

Honoka nodded. "Still sounds like plenty to work with." She tapped her own chest. "Ninjutsu and genjutsu specialist. Might have been able to peg me as soon as you heard the name for all I know." She gave me a shrewd look. "Sent in a request for you specifically, so we'll see if you live up to the hype."
"Hype?" I said blankly.

"You'll hear more as you go. Ensui?" Honoka turned to address our last teammate.

"Tactics and traps." Ensui said, crossing his arms.

Which, as a Nara and a shinobi trained for it, he undoubtedly excelled in. Possibly to hilarious levels. I would have either a lot to learn from him or a lot of seals to make for him, when it came to traps. Probably both, since it was cheaper than buying exploding tags out of pocket.

Kakashi, meanwhile, was a kenjutsu expert with summoning options, Obito's eye for genjutsu and for copying everything Honoka did, and also kind of a tactical genius in his own right when he wasn't being a jerk. Our team would have been overloaded on combat options if not for Ensui, who was probably a better supporter than a fighter if he followed his clan's patterns.

Still, I was the only chūnin on a team of jōnin, and I was not looking forward to being the gofer.

"Now that that's over with, let's eat." Honoka said.

While the waitresses brought out the ingredients for shabu-shabu-style hot-pot, I ran through a few hypothetical scenarios in my head.

What possible mission would require all three of the jōnin at the table and me?

We were in Tani, but if I had to guess I'd say that my teammates had been in the country a lot longer than I had. Whatever mission they'd been running before had put them out here, and maybe Honoka had requested my presence because there had been an unexpected follow-up. Perhaps they'd simply picked up another mission from Tani's head ninja because they were in the area and Tani wasn't known for powerhouses.

What were we planning on doing, breaking into a fortress? Killing a missing-nin?

"Save the questions for after we eat." Honoka told me. She had already broken her chopsticks apart and was tapping them impatiently, waiting for the pot of stock.

"Can I even ask what you why you need me here?" I asked anyway.

"Nope. Shop talk can wait until dessert." Honoka said.

Somewhat unsurprisingly, everyone checked the broth (and all of the other ingredients) for poison as soon as it was all on the table. I checked the rice myself, using a series of paper seals I'd written up for waterborne illness that could do double duty in a pinch. I tested the broth again, too, since broth was technically water. Ish.

We were still in the field, after all.

"Well, if we're not dead in six hours I'll call that a success." Honoka said. She snagged a long strip of beef from the serving plate and dunked it in the broth.

Even if the food in question was good, I was still sometimes surprised by how much most shinobi could eat if given the chance. I was hungry, sure, but Honoka attacked food like she had a grudge against hunger and was going to begin her vengeance by defeating her own. Ensui was a lot quieter, even if bits of rice occasionally flew across the table at him (only to be swatted out of the air by his chopsticks). Kakashi, well, he was doing his food-teleportation thing. One second the bowl of rice he had was full, and the second it wasn't.
I ate at a much more sedate pace because I didn't want to get a massive stomachache later.

By the time we were finally done eating, Ensui was practically falling asleep where he was sitting out of sheer boredom and it was pitch black outside. Kakashi, Honoka, and I finished the broth between us. Honoka paid the bill, commenting that it was one of the better takes on hot-pot she'd had even in Konoha and making the waitress blush.

Kakashi hadn't spoken a single word to me the entire time.

Then we piled out of the Akabeko and headed for whatever inn Honoka had paid for. I had to wonder what her expense report for this mission would look like. Like, "sorry, mission-desk-nin, but I just couldn't pass up a chance for hot-pot!"

I could barely make out the words "Aoiya" on the front sign. It seemed like a shinobi-friendly inn for some reason. Maybe the way the gutters and roofing tiles seemed reinforced from here.

"The inn has pretty good shaved ice." Honoka said when we approached.

"Nope." I said. "I'm not eating anything else tonight. I'll explode."

Ensui looked at Kakashi.

"I'm not interested." Kakashi said.

"Outvoted." Ensui concluded.

"Fine, fine." Honoka said. "Let's just get our rooms. Share or split?"

"Split." I said. "As long as they're adjacent." If something happened at night, we needed to be able to reach each other fast enough to avoid getting confused about friendly and unfriendly fire. If I attacked, say, Kakashi, I'd want it to at least be on purpose.

"Three to a room would be difficult." Honoka commented. She was still waiting for the hotel's receptionist to come back with a report on the rooms. Ergo, how many were available and where. "Kakashi with you and Ensui with me should work."

"I thought you'd want to split along gender lines, Honoka." Ensui said.

Honoka paused for a moment, then her eyes went Sharingan red as she looked at me. Then, "Ah. Whoops, my mistake. Are you comfortable with that arrangement?"

I had the feeling that Honoka had only just realized I was female. So much for the solidarity of another androgynous kunoichi, if even she couldn't tell. I'd need to check in with people like Fū and Kurotsuchi someday and see if the same thing happened to them.

"Yeah, it'll work." I said.

Kakashi might have had a problem with it, though, if the way his chakra was twitching was saying anything.

"Again, sorry. Bit of a coin flip since most teams only have one kunoichi and that's not guaranteed. Already knew Obito and Kakashi here, so you were the only one left." Honoka said. Her Sharingan had gone inactive again by the time the receptionist came back.

"It's fine. It happens a lot." I said.
As it turned out, we did get adjacent rooms. Kakashi and I were assigned to the one on the end of one of the inn's second-floor hallways, giving us two windows to trap instead of just one. Ensui and Honoka were in the one next to ours, and had set up the expectation that if anything did happen at night that they would come straight through the wall to help. Apparently, it was a common arrangement for shinobi.

I dumped my stuff on the first futon, which was closest to the door and the bathroom. Kakashi silently claimed the one closest to the two windows, dropping his flak jacket and tantō sheath straps next to it.

You could cut the atmosphere in that room with a knife.

Can you do this? I asked Isobu.

I think so.

If Kakashi and I started talking, there was a non-zero chance we could start arguing. This could mean, frankly, anything from a permanent team breakup to an Isobu incident.

I wanted to be careful, but pussyfooting around hadn't gotten me anywhere. In fact, between Kushina's due date and other issues, it had in fact cost me a whole month I could have used an extra head in the game. Kakashi was a planner, sometimes, but what he really offered was perspective.

"Why have you been avoiding me?" I asked, because by that point going for the throat looked like a good idea.

Kakashi shot me a brief glance, but all he said was, "I've been on missions."

The hell he had. I was willing to give him this week, and maybe last week, but I had felt him in the village before that and I wasn't about to let him get away with it.

"Try again." I told him.

For a long moment, Kakashi and I were caught in a staring contest with our chakra levels steadily rising in challenge. He hadn't pushed his headband up, meaning he didn't think a fight was going to break out, and I was peripherally glad that he hadn't. The last thing we needed was Isobu joining in.

There was a thump from the other side of the wall, making us jump.

"Save it for tomorrow!" was Honoka's muffled order through the drywall.

Kakashi used my moment of distraction to slip out of reach and into the bathroom. I heard the lock click behind him.

Dammit.

I could pounce on him the second he came out, but that reminded me a bit too much of Gai's usual tactics. Instead, I searched around in my things for my clothing scroll, which had a set of pajamas in it somewhere.

If he wanted to put things off, I wasn't gonna wait on him forever. I was, however, going to get to the bottom of things by the time the mission kicked off properly. If, you know, I knew what the hell I'd been called out here for. Honoka still hadn't explained that.

I ignored Kakashi when he got out, except to head past him into the bathroom.
See if he liked being avoided.

When I got out, he was pretending to be asleep. I decided to let him.

After we had breakfast the next morning, Honoka finally decided to explain what the mission was.

Tanigakure, in the Land of Rivers, was actually a pretty small village as far as shinobi villages went. It was smaller than Kusa, Taki, or Ame, though marginally larger than Yugakure. As such, they had a much smaller number of missing-nin than any of the other militaries in their immediate area. They didn't really have ANBU, or at least not the same way that we did, and they didn't have Kiri-style hunter-nin either.

And unless they sent the head ninja himself into battle, they couldn't handle missing-nin from other countries.

"We're looking for someone who seems to be a missing-nin from Shimogakure, though the rumors are spotty." Honoka explained as we headed out from the main gates on foot. "From the description we were given, our target is an effeminate blond man with green eyes, standing about one-point-eight meters tall and weighing about sixty-eight kilograms. Tani forces think he has some kind of mind-control jutsu, since they've been attacked by their own shinobi on two occasions so far."

"That sounds like a Yamanaka." I commented, and Ensui frowned.

"A Yamanaka wouldn't have allowed Tani to take their shinobi back." Ensui corrected.

"Soooo…dead or alive?" I asked.

"Dead." Kakashi said, still not looking at me. When I glared at him, Honoka waved me off.

"Specifically, Tanigakure asked us to make an example out of him." Honoka said to my sudden look of blank incomprehension. We…we didn't do that. Konoha didn't employ terror tactics openly, not like Iwagakure. ANBU, sure, but…

"Stop being dramatic." Ensui said. He had his hands shoved in his pockets and still looked tired, even after a full night's sleep.

"All right, fine. Really, we don't need to go overboard." Honoka said. "The problem with this particular guy is that he's got a hardened fortress out here somewhere, layered in powerful genjutsu. There won't be anyone near it—apparently he's been letting loose by killing villagers in the area."

"I'm still not seeing why Tani shinobi couldn't take this guy out." I said.

"I think they would if they could find it." Honoka said. She pointed to Kakashi, then me, then Ensui. "Tracker, sensor, and a Nara. Tanigakure doesn't have this level of specialized skill in the entire village."

…That explained a lot.

Even if they had, sort of like how Ame had produced Salamander Hanzō, it didn't mean much if they couldn't maintain their strength over time. And wars cut down on a lot of that.

"That's kind of disappointing." I said. I sighed. "So, what's this mystery guy's name? How are we planning on taking him out?"

"Frontal assault's probably out." Honoka mused. "Too many traps. Hm…"
"We were planning on reconnaissance for the first two days." Ensui said, explaining where the hell that thought had been going.

"What do we know about enemy reinforcements?" I asked, glancing at Kakashi. He still hadn't spoken directly to me in front of Honoka or Ensui, which I imagined had to be raising red flags for them. What if we couldn't work together?

"We have unsubstantiated reports of at least two minions." Honoka said. "One of them uses fire jutsu and the other one uses wind and genjutsu, but there may be more. Tani really didn't get a good look at them before calling for help."

Well, at least having an Uchiha on the team would neutralize some of that. Isobu could (probably) take care of my issues with genjutsu, but I wasn't sure of that just yet.

And as a side note, my opinion of Tanigakure was in freefall. I supposed there must have been a reason that Akatsuki ran roughshod over them and established a base in the country in the future, even aside from the fact that Amegakure was so close.

"Can't crack the place like an egg—no Sannin around." Honoka went on. Most teams, to be honest, didn't have the resources for the powerhouse domination method of combat. Hell, most of the time even Tailed Beast Hosts weren't used that way—we were a lot more effective while in the open and steamrolling people outside of their fortifications.

"And we have nowhere near the resources for a siege." I said, thinking of how little shinobi cared for staying in one place for too long. Fortresses were meant to be infiltrated or exploded, depending on the skills of the attacking force. Alternately, shinobi could simply wait out the defenders, but it went against our penchant for garroting people in the dark.

I'd go with "exploded"—I was pretty sure I could draw a seal on nearly any door to blow it right off its hinges.

Though obviously I would have to get well clear of the site if I was going to be blowing apart a castle's gates, I was still curious about what, exactly, I was expected to do on this mission.

"Ensui and Kakashi will work together to make a plan." Honoka said, winking. "Consider it a test."

Kakashi straightened a little.

What the heck.

"With help, of course." Honoka said.

What the heck, again.

Much like most people, I didn't like it when people had entire conversations in subtext right in front of me without cluing me in.

"Are you deliberately messing with me, and does this mission have some kind of hidden purpose everyone except me is in on?" I asked bluntly.

Honoka grinned. "Good, you're catching on."

I gave her a flat look.

"Oh, don't worry about it."
Of course, her saying that only made me worry more.

I let it drop, though. I still remembered Sensei's impromptu lesson about not punching out annoying senior officers, after all. Even if the lack of information could get everyone (okay, me) horribly killed. We continued walking in pairs—Honoka boisterously talking my ear off, Ensui and Kakashi exchanging significant looks—for most of the morning and into the afternoon after lunch.

Summary: Find this guy named Sho, kill his minions, and then kill him, whereby the entire region around his hidey-hole shall breathe a deep sigh of relief and we will get paid.

It'll do.

Chapter End Notes

Song title pulled from A Great Big World.
Chapter Summary

Kei: Clarify some things.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

So, uh. Fun facts about fears.

Everyone has them. Ghost stories prey on them. Boggarts feed on them.

I swear this is relevant, just hang on.

As we headed into the lowlands, traveling at shinobi speed once we were off-road, I started getting pings off of the surrounding environment.

Genjutsu traps were rare when compared to snares, pitfalls, and mines. I didn’t generally think about them much, since Kurenai was one of the few people I knew who had any inclination to make them. I mean, shinobi could make them using seals and I’d toyed with the idea, but self-sustained genjutsu trap seemed more trouble than it was worth. I had a thing for just killing people if the other option was snaring them in a genjutsu. There were other ways to catch a mouse.

Part of the problem existed only because I’d had no idea how to produce proper genjutsu until about a week ago.

The point is that we suddenly started running into a minefield of them. And that, even if I hadn’t been somewhat on edge from the thing with Kakashi and the many unknowns of this mission, made me jumpy. I alerted Honoka as soon as I realized what I was feeling, but she just had us press onward.

I know Konoha can play a little fast and loose with individual lives, but really?

Out of all my myriad fears, uncertainty was the one that came to mind then. It’s in my nature to doubt—more so now than ever, when the future seemed to be up in the air. It was out of my hands (not that it had ever been in them), which opened a Pandora’s box of possibilities.

And if you give a genjutsu an opening, you’re dead.

Well, if the caster knows.

Since it’s a lot harder to hit targets of multiple species, we went through our search with all eight of Kakashi’s summon dogs patrolling around us and Tsuruya flying high overhead—well out of range of most genjutsu. Animal brains are wired differently than human ones, obviously, and chakra interacts with their senses to a different degree. Illusions with no scent components weren’t going to fool shinobi on most days, but it got about a thousand times harder to fool a dog if one was around. Same thing for birds, but with sight and air currents.

Basically we had enough anti-genjutsu tactics on our team to make Kurenai scream with frustration.
And I still got that weird itch between my shoulder blades that told me I was being watched by unfriendly eyes. That sensation was followed very shortly by Tsuruya’s chakra dropping from cruising altitude toward us, and Pakkun bounding back towards our group.

Oh, and the distant sensation of hostile human chakra.

Here it goes, here it goes again, I hummed mentally, as Pakkun barked and Kakashi signaled that enemies were inbound. In another few seconds, I confirmed that there were two attackers total at the same time Honoka’s hand signs indicated just that.

Since my katana was at my waist, I preemptively wrapped my left hand around the steel scabbard, thumb against the guard. I was itching to try out my mother’s style with a full-sized sword in real combat.

I know they tell people not to go looking for a fight, but a fight was about to find us. That made it all right, in a layman’s karma sort of way.

How fast? Kakashi asked with his hands, shooting a glance at me even as his other seven dogs converged on our position.

I thought about it. ETA 45 seconds. That gave us enough time for a rudimentary trap.

All eight of Kakashi’s dogs vanished into the underbrush at their master’s soft whistle, suppressing their chakra signatures better than most humans ever could. Kakashi made a darting motion with his hand that I didn’t understand, but Honoka and Ensui took off as soon as they saw it.

So much for knowing him. I didn’t run off mostly because Kakashi motioned stay, follow in quick succession.

Strategically, it made sense to get the Nara out of the line of fire. Kakashi and I generally fought at a range of less than three meters if we wanted to remain effective, while Ensui’s shadow techniques needed space and shadows to really be dangerous. As our group’s strategist, he also needed to be outside of the main brawl to see what the hell was going on.

As for Honoka, well, I kind of assumed she would have the knowledge and the chops to set the entire area on fire if I didn’t do it first. All to give us a chance to bug out if things got too metaphorically hot.

I settled my stance, weight mostly on my back leg.

Our pursuers were not really making any effort to approach stealthily. That could be hilarious or really bad, depending on…

Tsuruya blew into the break in the canopy, wind-shaping chakra whipping air everywhere, just as a massive fireball came roaring down on us from above. The fireball hit her wind-wall and exploded like a tomato on concrete.

Kakashi and I both shot toward the left-hand trees as Tsuruya launched a brace of knife-like feathers into the woods ahead of her. Then she rocketed into the air again, leaving us to our devices.

I caught the underside of a branch and spun on it like a gymnast, thanking the stars for my thick flying gloves. While upside-down, I caught a glimpse of the fireball-thrower and made a face at him even as flaming leaves cascaded everywhere.

I could be childish sometimes.
First glance: Average red-haired yellow-eyed muscle-bound tattooed jackass. His partner was similar, only smaller because apparently they cut down on steroid use for kunoichi, and with white hair and a spectacular tan.

Second glance: Wait a fucking minute.

The thing about déjà vu and combat is that one doesn’t have to affect the other if you don’t let it. I’d gotten used to fighting the Chinatsugumi over the last week, even if it was just in sparring. It wasn’t a big deal—they didn’t remember things, thank god, and frankly I was starting to forget the specifics of their stories. It was more like fighting neighbors than anything.

And just because I’d run into more ghosts didn’t mean I had to stop and give them the time of day. If they were trying to kill us, they got exactly as much sympathy as they deserved—ergo, none.

Third glance: If these idiots are who I think they are, I’m not going to regret that decision.

I let go of the branch and took off like a shot after Kakashi, making sure to whip it back into my pursuers’ faces.

The branch exploded as soon as I was out of range.

It was followed by nearly everything I’d touched in the last fifteen seconds. The ground, drifting leaves, the tree…

Kakashi gave me a what the hell was that look when I caught up to him via copious use of explosives.

Funny how I hadn’t remembered how to do that until a full month after getting Isobu. I never had done it before, had I? The Dreamer had pushed me further than I had expected she would be able to, only to drop the information in our collective consciousness with everything else. I’d had to go digging through the accumulated pile of random stuff we’d thought together before I could even get close to finding it. Sort of like finding that toy you forgot about years ago under your bed, really.

Touch explosives were a pretty cool perk to get out of all of that mental trauma, I have to say.

In the background, the Terrible Twosome routine was screaming their heads off at us.

…Hm. In hindsight, maybe baiting them to us via attempted murder wasn’t the best way to make sure they followed. Sure, it worked, but there was a pretty good chance they would have come after us just for running. Shinobi had a chase instinct that put a hound’s to shame, sometimes.

It was another thing to add to my mental notes for the after-mission debrief.

As for Kakashi, I shrugged by way of explanation.

He rolled his visible eye.

I felt Honoka and Ensui rushing ahead on our left flank, faster than I would have thought possible for ordinary shinobi. If I had to guess, Honoka was probably carrying Ensui or somehow augmenting his speed or something. Either way, our new friends were going to get an unpleasant surprise when we let them catch up.

Speaking of new friends, they were moving relatively slowly for shinobi.

After a certain point in the speed game—with the obvious exceptions of Sensei, A, and Nine-Tails
Chakra Mode Naruto—everyone at a certain level fought at effectively the same pace. Faster than anyone who didn’t deserve to be in their weight class, of course, but if you put the adult Yamato up against Kakashi you wouldn’t really be able to say either of them got the edge in reaction time or anything, as long as you didn’t let Kakashi use Obito’s eye.

And these two were either an order of magnitude slower than we were, or they were toying with us.

In the heavily forested valley walls common to the Land of Rivers, there were always places where the canopy threw the shadows on the ground into sharp relief.

Ensui’s shadows slunk around us as we made it home free and crossed the kill-zone unscathed. In our mad dash, we passed Honoka crouched in a tree, her hands locked into the final seal for what felt like a killer genjutsu and leapt over Ensui in the underbrush, lying flat with his hands in the Rat seal.

We ran on like we hadn’t seen anything, of course, but our pursuers weren’t so lucky. Just as we broke off—left for me and right for Kakashi, with Tsuruya making a long, slow turn overhead toward my new position—and started the process of flanking our targets, Team Rocket plowed into the trap.

The kunoichi stumbled first, momentarily, but that was all it ever took. When her muscle-headed partner pulled up short on his approach, Ensui got them both.

If I was a betting sort of person, I’d have made money on him saying, “Shadow Possession complete.”

It seemed to be a thing with field-operating Nara clan members.

“Nice catch.” Honoka didn’t bother to emerge from the trees. Following her lead, neither did anyone else.

From the way that the pair’s eyes were roaming around, Honoka had done something involving auditory input—they looked a little like people trying to find out where a sound came from in an echo chamber. Neither of them seemed to have keyed into the fact that their reactions didn’t match. If the man twitched right, the woman twitched left.

I narrowed my eyes. Some skills carried over, didn’t they?

If so, well, I was going to get a chance to see what my foreknowledge meant in this spotty not-future I’d made by accident. Kakkō had been a trial run in comparison. I’d known, yes, but Obito had gotten a convenient power boost and we’d run headlong into him before we got around to putting him in the ground. There hadn’t been time for events to shift and change his reactions, not really.

These two…these two would be a sort of test of their own. How much could someone change within the same basic parameters? The more time passed, the less I’d really know.

Well, in my head, anyway. In my gut, things were a little spottier.

Rikuto still used bows.

Shirozora froze things.

And this kunoichi…

Her eyes snapped back into focus. Before I could do anything, her chakra boomed and Ensui swore and all of us immediately scrambled to our fallback position as fast as we could. I felt the instant that her partner also got loose—turned out he had more chakra than she did.

Not more than I did with Isobu, of course, but going on the whole S-rank secret thing meant I wasn’t exactly willing or able to bust his chakra out of storage. For one, I’d probably die. For another, everyone around me would probably die and then our mission would also fail and I’d never be able to get Kakashi to actually talk to me again.

Yeah, not happening.

Kakashi signaled with his off hand, Engage, even as he drew a kunai with his right. His dogs were running around again, crashing through the brush to mask the sounds of our approach. Tsuruya soared over all of our heads, and I could feel her eyes on us.

Honoka dropped from the canopy next to me and landed in a crouch practically on top of me.

I glanced up, waiting for the Uchiha’s input.

She mouthed, Go. Profound, that.

Well, if both of the Sharingan-users on this team wanted us to beat the Gruesome Twosome into submission, I wasn’t really in a position to argue. Even if neither of them necessarily knew that. I certainly wasn’t going to fill them in. Kakashi already had enough to go on.

All right, up and at ‘em. Five meters off, I could feel Kakashi do the same thing. Ensui and Honoka were apparently staying out of the thick of things, again.

And then I rushed in, because apparently I’d been voted “best tank” at the last cosmic game of D&D and Kakashi wanted to let me trip over the first part of the fight and be the best distraction ever. Which was bullshit. But anyway…

Launching directly into shinobi speed and using Mom’s advanced draw techniques at a run was one of those things that should have made mincemeat out of most opponents. Using chakra scalpel shaping to add an edge? Should have done more.

Only all of that means jack shit when you miss. Like I did.

Well, I missed the guy, anyway. The kunoichi blocked instead, with solid steel tonfa, and throwing all of my weight behind the blow only sent both of us skidding toward the trees.

I recovered first and made sure to step back out of her range.

Tonfa are cool, yes, but they have really short range in comparison.

While all that was going on, Kakashi and one of his dogs—Bisuke, going by the voice—were keeping the guy from smashing into my back. Going by the noise, and by the fact that Kakashi’s chakra didn’t seem exceptionally strained, he was handling himself just fine.

“Who are you supposed to be?” my opponent sneered—and it was a really good one, as sneers went. A-plus for sheer disdain, body language and all. C-minus for getting knocked around by a fourteen-year-old.

I sheathed my katana in preparation for a second draw. I didn’t say anything and my face stayed blank. I wasn’t on a team with Kakashi for nothing, after all.

“The strong, silent type, huh? Typical.” My opponent tossed her head, sounding more irritated than anything. “Why can’t I ever get the pretty ones?”

A split second later, her second tonfa slammed against my scabbard when I blocked her “surprise” attack. I felt the ground slide under me a little—she could hit pretty hard—but just digging my toes in kept me from losing balance.

“Stop taunting the little bitch and help me!” snapped her partner, who—from what I could sense—was getting a giant bird, several dogs, and one teenaged jōnin to the face all at once.

“Oh, and just because you’re outnumbered suddenly you start screaming for Mommy?” she made a scoffing noise. “All right, fine.” To me, she said, “Hate to cut and run—”

I caught her thrown kunai one-handed, without waiting for her to finish such a corny one-liner.

“Buzzkill,” she grumbled. Then the woman in front of me melted away into so much mud.

…I hate Earth Clones.

Meanwhile, the fight between Kakashi and Thing One and Thing Two was a little more even than Thing One versus everyone. Even as I rushed to join the resulting fight and make it a four-on-two rather than a three-on-two match, the guy lashed out and kicked Pakkun into the undergrowth. Bull’s jaws got caught on the woman’s tonfa, unable to bring their full crushing power to bear, and then the guy focused on Kakashi properly.

Initial assessments were off—I hadn’t realized it before, but he was easily twice Kakashi’s size and about as tall as Jiraiya. He was also inked up from both sets of fingertips to the base of his neck, in patterns that looked a lot like seals to me. My chakra sense wasn’t getting an accurate bead on him, since there was so much flaring off the seal patterns on his arms and just kind of in general.

As for the woman, she was only a little taller or broader than I was, and had a oddly skinny frame that made her look like she was stretched out on a skeleton a little too big for her. Both of her tanned shoulders had additional sealing work that looked like it was the same as the man’s, but it was a lot less intricate and spat out less chakra.

Together, they were actually comically unbalanced as a duo (and put me in mind of Bulk and Skull, for what it was worth) and I was still pretty sure they were gonna take a shot at killing us.

Kakashi and I exchanged looks. We might not have known our enemies’ capabilities or even their names, but we did know each other and our fighting styles. We’d figure it out.

I went high; he went low. It was a well-thought-out strategy that took us moments to execute that had absolutely nothing to do with the relative positions of our summoned animals.

A couple of Kakashi’s dogs remained resolutely out of the fight while Guruko was our ground-bound backup and Tsuruya rained steel feathers down around us. I slashed and caught nothing but empty air as Bulk jerked backwards like he was attached to some kind of chain. Skull looked like she was about to bat me out of the air, since being in midair meant being vulnerable, but Kakashi grabbed her trailing leg and pulled it into a joint lock and knocked them both to the ground.

I rolled when I landed and was almost immediately on the defensive—Guruko had taken a punch to the face that had exploded and I didn’t know what the heck had happened.

“Guruko!” Kakashi yelled, but two of his other dogs had already started steering their stunned brother toward the woods, even as Tsuruya came crashing down through the canopy to keep our enemies from finishing what they started. Fifteen meters of wingspan and who-even-knew how many kilos of gigantic bird made an effective roadblock.

Don’t let my casual caustic critique of this situation fool you—I was fucking pissed off.

No one hurts a dog on my watch.

Exploding punches? Isobu asked in a bored tone.

Probably.

Yes, I could see where the seal lines would conveniently converge on the man’s knuckles…

Right, then.

I opened my kunai holster and pulled out a pre-prepared, sealed kunai. Assuming his seals were contact-based, I was probably going to test the explosion-resistance of those hands by stacking explosions and seeing what gave out first.

I’d put my bet on bone rather than steel.

While Kakashi popped off two lightning-enhanced kunai and both missed, I threw my own and hit one of his in midair, making it bounce back toward the right target. Mine, on the other hand, went toward the kunoichi and exploded in midair.

“What the hell kind of kids are these?” the man snarled, since he was suddenly missing a chunk of his shoulder. Go, Kakashi.

“Who cares? Kill them!” the kunoichi snapped back, and blurred out of sight. Body Flicker, probably, and I leapt back to figure out where she went.

Then I got a length of steel to the back of my left leg.

I went down hard on my back, but I didn’t really get the wind knocked out of me. Practically one of the first things you learn in the Academy is how to fall without hurting yourself, so that wasn’t a big deal. No, there wasn’t a problem with the impact or with pain or anything.

But then my brain froze up because, as I theorized later, turtles and being flipped over didn’t really mix well.

It took me a bit longer than normal to get back to my feet, mostly because I was having trouble breathing and Isobu’s chakra was running through my coils with enough force and intensity to imply it was trying to set my blood on fire. You know, the usual stuff. Funny how being a jinchūriki didn’t actually mean I was immune to the new chakra signature in my coils.

Isobu must have been afraid of everything.

By the time I was up again, if shaky, there was a bone-rattling explosion. And it wasn’t one of mine, since I knew better than to target Kakashi. Speaking of whom, he went rolling across the clearing—slightly on fire—half a second later.

From what I pieced together later, Kakashi made the mistake of trying to block Tall, Dark, and Punchy rather than just dodging. Probably because the kunoichi was boxing him in. I didn’t see that part, but it was kind of implied since I was on the ground being useless instead of a target.

He stopped rolling once he’d reached my feet and beaten the flames on his sleeve out. Overall, Kakashi was a bit singed while I was a little bit on the bonkers side (yay, Isobu), which was certainly not how I’d have wanted the fight to go. I was also a bit confused—at the beginning of all this, Punch and Judy hadn’t been this strong. Or maybe they’d been going easy on us?

Fear hadn’t settled in, though. Not since Isobu’s outburst.

“Shadow Clone Jutsu!” yelled the shinobi, and then suddenly we were surrounded on all sides by weaker copies of the guy in question.

For fuck’s sake.

Kakashi and I stood back-to-back and got ready for the crowd fight.

Spamming clones wasn’t a viable tactic for anyone not named Naruto, so I had to wonder what their plan actually was.

The kunoichi started giggling.

…double fuck. That was never a good sign. Nor was the fact that the clone to my left had started to glow a bit.

“Clone Great Explosion!”

Triple fuck.

Kakashi and I linked hands as soon as the second clone lit up, with my reaction time marginally outpacing both the impending doom and Kakashi’s split-second twitch/retreat impulses. That…was a question for another time, preferably when we both weren’t about to die.

Replacement Jutsu!

And, to make a long story short, I learned right after that why they generally don’t encourage Side-Along Apparition ninja-style. For reference, it feels a little like being punched in the teeth. Even for as short a distance as I was traveling, even if Kakashi was also using the exact same technique but with a destination about half a meter away, and even if Honoka and Ensui stood guard over our endpoint…ow.

For the second time in five minutes, it took me a bit to get reoriented. And to stop feeling terrible.

But hey, it was still better than being exploded.

“Disappointing,” Honoka’s voice said as I sat up.

Kakashi was already up by then, but he wasn’t looking at any of us. I could only guess at what he was feeling in that moment. I was certainly ashamed, but my feelings were a jumble at that moment and picking just one out of the mess was tough going.

Honoka shook her head. “Ensui.”

Ensui nodded.

And with that, both of them waded into the battlefield we’d just vacated.

I sighed internally, even as Honoka set the entire clearing on fire with ninja wire and all of our summoned animals had to flee the immediate area.

“Care to explain why you didn’t use Obito’s eye at all back there?” I asked, because it had been bothering me. With the Sharingan, Kakashi could make me look like a rank amateur in sheer speed and probably run rings around me while making it look easy. Without…well, we were nearly on par. Maybe I had the edge while Isobu was freaking out and the dice fell my way, but that worked on the assumption that I wouldn’t just freeze up in pain or induced fear.

“No.” Kakashi said bluntly. He got up and set off into the trees, probably to circle around the fight.

Well, that was another opportunity wasted.

I was about to continue in that vein for a while—probably should mention that mental self-flagellation was a hobby of mine—when I felt a surge of chakra that was, for once, not an explosion. All the exploding things were the other way, and most of that had to do with Honoka and Uchiha fire jutsu and overcompensation for something. The chakra I’d felt was more likely genjutsu than ninjutsu.

And like the idiot I was, I went off in search of the source the sensation.

So, back to the connection with genjutsu traps and fears and all the wonderful/awful things you can run into as a shinobi.

Kakashi was standing stock-still in the shade of one of the big broad-leafed trees in the area, apparently either super-focused on something or possibly frozen in place. As I approached, I watched him shake off whatever it was—felt like a genjutsu—just as the last flares of wild chakra finally died down. Then both of us looked toward where Ensui crashed through the woods a moment later, accompanied by two of Kakashi’s dogs.

I could only assume that the others had de-summoned themselves by that point.

“Both of you need to learn how to interrogate a prisoner.” Ensui said flatly.

“Really?” I asked reflexively. Because, as everyone knew, field interrogations were by necessity often…messier…than what Torture and Interrogation could do. Mostly because field teams often didn’t have Yamanakas handy, like we didn’t.

Well, to be more precise: We got less out of them. Obviously in an actual torture chamber, Konoha would get everything.

Kakashi rolled his eyes at me. “Come on.”

“Ordinarily, you would be able to take a prisoner back to Konoha for information extraction.” Ensui said as we walked. “Other times, it’s not an option.”

I was getting a very bad feeling about the entire situation.

Ensui either didn’t pick up on my discomfort or didn’t care. Bit of a coin toss, there. “When you’re in the field, compensate using your team’s abilities.”

The battlefield, such as it was, had been almost entirely leveled since Kakashi and I had made our daring escape. Tsuruya stood to one side, wings neatly folded and another dog—Bisuke again—on her back. Across the torn earth and occasional flaming bush tableau, Honoka was standing over our former opponents. Both of them seemed to have taken Tsuruya’s projectile feathers and Honoka’s kunai to the legs, and had other holes in them courtesy of what looked like Shadow Sewing and more than a few ninja-wired shuriken.

“Just in time.” Honoka said to us. Or to me. It was never really clear. “Help keep them from bleeding
Oh. I hopped to it when she added a glare for emphasis.

“Save your chakra.” Honoka told me sharply. “Use bandages instead this time.”

I pulled a roll of bandages out of my hip med-kit and got to work. Mostly it was going to be tourniquets. If Honoka didn’t want these two alive…well, I didn’t have a lot of pity for them. Not if they’d stayed consistent across reincarnations like the others.

…I still didn’t know their names, here.

“You don’t want to take them back to the village?” Ensui asked.

“Nah. No point—their boss is in the area if they’re both here.” She loomed over both of her prone captives. “Isn’t he?”

Dead silence. Defiant silence, possibly, but the longer they kept it up the more likely it was going to make the transition to “dead.”

I mean, it would anyway. But there was no real reason to speed it along.

“Not gonna talk, huh? No problem.” And with that, Honoka stood over the man, jerked his chin up, and activated her Sharingan. Eye contact was probably going to prove fatal. “Kid, get the other one.”

“No, don’t you dare”—the kunoichi began, but Honoka caught her flailing arm and broke it in one swift motion that made me wince in sympathy even if she had been trying to kill us earlier.

For a long second, nothing happened. You know, aside from the muffled screaming.

Honoka blinked and the red-haired guy collapsed like his strings had been cut. I…didn’t really want to see what a fully mature Sharingan could do to someone without any mental defenses. Hell, they made mincemeat out of people who did have them, as Future-Itachi was so fond of proving.

“And…?” Ensui prompted.

Honoka shrugged. “Their names are Hidari and Migi. Pseudonyms, but who cares? They work for Sho, like I suspected, and we’re about ten kilometers away from his stronghold.”

“Left” and “Right”? Really? Even for stage names or whatever, it just contrived to sound stupid. Neither of them had addressed each other in the fight, though, so I didn’t know who was who anyway.

Kakashi, meanwhile, stood like a statue over the kunoichi. At no point had he even lifted his hand to his headband.

Kakashi still didn’t move.

Honoka sighed. “This’s clearly been building up for a while.” She turned to Ensui. “Survey the area. There might be more flunkies in the area, or genjutsu traps, or something.”

I felt Ensui’s hand come down on my shoulder even as he was nodding assent. With zero subtlety, the Nara steered me away from the former battlefield and from the two prisoners. Or one. Depended if the other one recovered before bleeding to death.
“What was that about?” I asked, though bits of what I was pretty sure was the answer were starting to assemble in my head. Like jigsaw puzzle pieces.

“Honoka needs a minute to speak to your teammate.” Ensui said. Which was fucking obvious, thank you.

“That’s not what I meant.” I said.

No, what I meant was that Kakashi was acting oddly enough that I would have recommended him for a psych eval if he had been literally anyone else. It wasn’t like he was in a downward spiral like we’d both been stuck in after Kannabi. It seemed more like the situation with that one training accident and his constant avoidance of me were starting to affect his performance in the field. Which, from what I remembered of his canonical character arc, was usually a major warning sign for a mental breakdown if it went unnoticed. Kakashi was uncannily strong in terms of resistance to physical and/or mental torture, but he had limits when it came to his frankly overwhelming guilt complex.

I was pretty sure that, out of the events of Kannabi that could have been immensely traumatizing to anyone, Kakashi blaming himself for Obito’s “death” did the most damage to his mental state. It was the same way for me, but I hadn’t been tortured.

“I know. But that’s not your business right now.” Ensui said.

It would be, if this pattern held up and something stupid happened.

“Fine, then. What do you need to talk to me about while Kakashi’s getting yelled at?” I asked, crossing my arms defensively.

Ensui raised one eyebrow pointedly.

“From what I’ve heard, you and Kakashi both have access to powerful A-ranked ninjutsu.” Ensui remarked. “I didn’t see even one in that last fight.”

“I’ve been having issues with chakra control lately.” I admitted, a little annoyed. I couldn’t tell him about Isobu—well, technically I could—but chakra control was a major reason not to use upper-level combat ninjutsu. A shinobi wasn’t worth much in a fight if he got ‘sploded by his own techniques.”I can’t tell you what Kakashi was doing, other than not using his Sharingan. It’s a major contributor to the whole ‘this kid has A-ranked ninjutsu’ thing.”

Unless he was Deidara, I guess.

Basically all of it came down to technical difficulties. In every sense of the phrase.

Ensui paused. “What kinds of issues?”

“Turns out the upper-ranked mission I took did funny things to my chakra coils. I’m not allowed to say more than that.” I replied. Technicalities everywhere!

“I’d advise you not to say that to Honoka while she’s still upset.” Ensui said with a sigh. “This may be a light mission for us, but taking along a walking liability was not what we planned on.”

“It’s not like I knew what would make it worse.” I said. At his surprised look, I added, “I was on leave when Honoka called me up, and kind of in physical therapy. The Hokage’s letter made it clear that I was supposed to report in despite whatever else was going on.”
Ensui wordlessly pinched the bridge of his nose.

“Sorry.” I added with a wince. “I thought you knew.”

“No, don’t apologize.” Ensui sighed. “I’ll see what we can do to get you back on track, even if this was a failure. As an apology from me, if nothing else.”

Uh…okay?

“This whole thing is really about Kakashi, isn’t it?” I asked.

Ensui gave me a “what do you think?” look.

Point taken. I honestly should have figured that out yesterday, but that wasn’t relevant anymore.

Well, time to get to the part that was still important. “I pegged you and Honoka as ANBU-level in skill the minute I walked into the Akabeko. You’re scouting Kakashi.”

“And if we were?” Ensui asked. Genin-level redirection. Obviously, he just didn’t give a shit that I’d figured it out.

“Then I’d ask what I could do to help.” Well, kinda. Kakashi in ANBU had been devastatingly effective and still could be. A lot of series badasses were former ANBU, too. ANBU missions were a crapton more dangerous than normal ones, but frankly Team Minato had weathered worse than the standard mission-load just because of who our sensei was. At peak performance, I wasn’t too shabby myself. But Kakashi’s mental state at the moment was best described as “liability,” possibly more than mine was. I, for one, wasn’t up for possible recruitment.

Er, I think.

Kakashi in ANBU. I knew what I thought about that—what I felt was more ambiguous.

If this last month was any indicator, the idea of Kakashi avoiding me—or simply being unavailable for shenanigans—was not going to be any more fun than it had been. Even if he’d be on missions rather than simply trying to put as much space between us as the village could physically allow. After spending a significant chunk of our careers together, not running missions with the full Team Minato was going to be an uncomfortable transition.

One I’d already been unwillingly making, yes, but still not fun.

“At the moment, nothing.” Ensui said. At my skeptical look, he said, “Honoka is handling the situation.”

Riiiiight. This entire thing was going to explode in our faces sooner or later. I just knew it.

“At this point, I wouldn’t trust Sensei to handle him.” I said flatly.

Ensui raised an eyebrow. Impertinent, yes, but I think it got the point across.

“Well, maybe him.” I admitted after a second. “But not anyone else, and definitely not in the field. So what are you really going to be testing him on out here?”

Pffft, yeah right.

“You don’t need to know that. Just follow the mission and it’ll become clear.”
I didn’t have the clout to overrule that order, though. The best I could do would be to confront Kakashi on my own and figure out what was going on myself. Regardless of the other circumstances, it all hinged on him.

…Shit.

At about that point, Honoka and Kakashi trudged through the now-destroyed woods to meet us. Kakashi was staring resolutely at a point somewhere over my right shoulder, while Honoka put a hand on her hip and said flatly, “We’ve got a location. We’ll hit them tomorrow, understood?”

Yes, ma’am. Of course, knowing how soul-searching tended to go in Team Minato’s experience, I imagined that there was no way Kakashi or I were going to get out of this mess (even before it became a mess) before we’d accumulated a crapton of injuries or maybe an epiphany or two.

Knowing our enemy specialized in genjutsu, I would also make a bet involving the confrontation of our deepest fears, or maybe moral failings or something. Illusion arcs tended to do that.

I sighed inwardly. Maybe I could try to convince myself that my greatest fear actually was being flipped on my back like a turtle. Hopefully any genjutsu would jump on that instead of what actually mattered.

Chapter End Notes

Communication Breakdance is probably a song title somewhere.
Chapter Summary

Kei: Be very, very frustrated.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After we disposed of the bodies, we spent the rest of the day setting up for the assault. By which I mean that Kakashi and I buried what was left after Honoka torched them both, Honoka ate four ration bars while reading a map over Ensui’s shoulder, and Ensui actually figured out what the blinking hell we were going to be doing later. Tsuruya and the dogs all de-summoned themselves, except for Pakkun, and we swept the area for any observers or interesting chakra signatures well into the late afternoon. By the time Honoka called it off for dinner, I was up to my elbows in tree sap and Pakkun had eventually decided my shoulder was more comfortable than the forest floor.

Kakashi, well, he still wasn’t talking to me. I think he went off in the opposite direction most of the time, even if Pakkun stayed with me.

Anyway, we were having a really light (and really tasteless) dinner of ration bars while Honoka and Ensui hemmed and hawed over the map. Then apparently a metaphorical light bulb went on. The two adults in the group looked at each other with an air of triumph, while Kakashi and I sat back and concentrated on eating.

That didn’t last.

“All right, listen up.” Honoka said with her arms crossed.

Kakashi, Pakkun, and I all looked at her. Ensui looked like he was about to fall asleep.

“You two,” and by this she apparently meant us teenagers, “are going to infiltrate the fortress.”

Riiiiight. Because we hadn’t almost died earlier due to carelessness. Our own carelessness, mind, not someone else’s. I managed an expression of deep skepticism.

“Stop doing the thing with your eyebrows; it’s rude.” Honoka said instantly. When I didn’t, she rolled her eyes. “Ensui and I will be running distraction duty with as many summons and exploding tags as you can spare. With any luck, you’ll have a relatively open pathway through the castle he’s holed up in. He has no other guards besides the idiots we killed earlier. Whatever you face in there will be all Sho, and he’s made of paper in comparison. Simple.”

And he was a noted genjutsu expert, which meant that not only did we have to contend with the idea of the bloody walls coming alive in the middle of the mission (for real or not), we also had to deal with Honoka’s careless invocation of Murphy’s Law of Combat. Ergo, if that was a plan, it would not only fail to survive contact with the enemy; it would probably fall apart before we got anywhere near the guy.

I put my head in my hands.
If only this wasn’t a mission about Kakashi, I could have been on distraction duty. I could have been great at that, with my exploding tags and the other fun things I could probably come up with. You know, without the pressure of being in an enclosed space with someone who set up genjutsu traps all over the bleeding countryside.

“…On second thought, no, Ensui goes with you two.” Honoka said after a second or two of theatrics. “Meanwhile, I get all of the summons. Except the pug.”

“You don’t like Pakkun?” I blurted.

“I like him fine. But he’s portable, so he goes with you.” Honoka replied, looking amused at my outburst. “If something goes wrong, I need to know. And my summon won’t work.”

“What summon do you have?” All of a sudden, it seemed like we were running into tons of people with summon contracts. Technically, future-past-Obito had had a summon contract too… to the Nine-Tailed Fox…

Yeah, getting off that thought.

“A short-haired badger about the size of a small building,” Honoka said with a shrug. “Big, strong, but slow and prone to berserk fury. I’d need Kakashi’s dogs just to keep him pointed the right way, and we’d all have to get out of his line of sight right after that.”

“Ah.” So…

“Knock a hole in his walls with one of these,” and here, Honoka produced one solid explosive sphere (which gave me the heebie-jeebies even though I hadn’t seen one in months) and handed it to Ensui, “and give me all of your explosive tags so I can make the distraction count. If nothing else works, well…” She tapped the side of her head, next to the outside corner of her left eye. “I have a few tricks up my sleeve.”

…No. “You can use the Mangekyō Sharingan?” I asked blankly.

Honoka’s face froze up for a moment before she slowly nodded. “Right. Your Uchiha teammate must have told you.”

…Kinda. Like, he’d known and I’d known but the sources of said knowledge had not had a damn thing in common between us.

Anyway, agreeing to follow Honoka’s plan meant that our respective load-outs looked something like this:

I had Kakashi, Pakkun, Ensui, whatever explosives I could plant with my bare hands and remaining chakra control, solid explosives, and my katana.

Honoka had Kakashi’s seven other dogs, Tsuruya, a giant badger, all of my pre-prepped paper exploding tags, and apparently her very own Mangekyō Sharingan.

Tomorrow, anyway.

I sighed inwardly. This wasn’t gonna be fun.

“Take the rest of the night off and think about how today could have gone better.” Honoka suggested. Then she thought better of it and added, “Never mind, it’s an order. Think things through.”
With that, I was dismissed to bug Kakashi (or something) and Kakashi was dismissed to go AWOL as far as I was concerned. Again.

I was going to talk to him somehow, even if I had to booby-trap his bedroll.

…Actually, that was a good idea.

Long story short: I found out that Kakashi wasn’t afraid of stag beetles in his bedroll. Pity.

---

How do you even get started on breaching a hardened target?

Well, if you’re a shinobi with access to explosives and the commanding officer’s permission, the options are a lot broader than one would think.

At about four that morning, just as the sky was beginning to look like it might consider lightening up, Honoka took off with a jaunty wave and enough summon animals to kill a platoon. Tsuruya gave me a backwards glance before launching herself skyward, clearly reluctant despite her body language. I hoped, vaguely, that Honoka would still be able to command the lot of them for however long we were gone.

And all seven of the dogs Kakashi was leaving for the mission? Whined. In unison. Quietly, of course—they were still intelligent summon animals, but I probably would have given in to their demands to stay with their master, since I was a dog person and a soft touch besides. Honoka, who was apparently not a dog person, just shooed them on with encouragement from her badger.

Apparently, his name was Mamijo, and being the size of a house did nothing to deter that typical badger spirit. Ergo, he would not only dig holes, but he didn’t apparently give much of a fuck about what he had to tear through to get underground.

I figured he was at least half honey badger in nature, while the other half was European badger. Pretty sure honey badgers didn’t accept chin-rubs…but I was also pretty sure that European badgers didn’t have tempers quite that bad or hides that thick.

(I saw a landmine get in his way. Whatever way you looked at it, the explosives lost.)

Honoka flounced off into the sunrise with enough animal power to make me genuinely worry for the surrounding environment, if it hadn’t already been overrun with genjutsu and littered with corpses.

Yeah, turns out that Sho had been busy while reports were still wandering in from the outskirts of Tani’s territory.

Even in the wee hours of the morning, we’d come across more than one destroyed village. They were intact, disturbingly—apparently a combination of the powerful self-sustaining genjutsu, mild sedatives, and perhaps a spot-check by Sho’s few underlings meant that half of the countryside in the area had been depopulated. Possibly over the course of a week or a month, and mostly from dehydration from the looks of the bodies.

It looked like everyone had just…fallen asleep and not gotten up again.

Kakashi breathed pretty shallowly through most of our scouting attempts. Dead was dead once enough time had passed, even if swords and jutsu hadn’t been the causes that time. The smell was still the kind of thing that burned into your brain.
I picked up Bisuke after one of those mini-missions, after we reported to Honoka. I just held him until I stopped feeling sick.

Even if our mission parameters required us to kill Sho and all his asshole minions, I had just been going along with things until then. After the villages, though…well. What is it they say about villains and reasons to hate them? Because I wanted to kick him up and down the stairs of his precious fortress after that. It was one thing to do enough to make a Hidden Village decide to off you (and often it didn’t take much more than stepping on the wrong toes). It was quite another to…well.

Even most missing-nin wouldn’t attack villages with the intent to kill everyone inside. Extort? Sure. Rule? Yeah. But usually not kill them down to the last little kid.

(Unless your name was Hidan, apparently. But that hadn’t happened yet.)

Sho’s fortress, from the looks of it, was a repurposed castle from the Clan Wars era. Sitting out in the middle of a split in the largest river around, its exposed foundation bristled with massive wooden spikes that had clearly been made out of whole tree trunks and hacked into shape to discourage climbers. The walls were smooth stone from what I could tell, but they also sat on top of gigantic sloping stone walls that would have made a proper climbing attempt impossible. Even if, you know, the attackers didn’t get taken to pieces by the arrows coming out from slits in the walls and boiling oil or hot sand coming down on top of them. There was only one entrance—a wooden bridge that extended to land and seemed to be rigged with the ninja equivalent of det-cord. The fortress also featured two major towers—one watchtower opposite the gate’s observer box, and one central tower that would have once been used as the resident lord/clan leader’s home. From the looks of it, the island also held its own ironworks, its own supply caches, longhouses, stables…it’s own town, really.

That would have been the extent of the defenses back in the day, if you didn’t count on shinobi occupying the place. Humans who went untrained in shinobi arts were cheaper and more common than shinobi were, but by god we could break a hardened target like an egg. If it took three thousand ordinary men to crack this fortress, two teams of four shinobi each could do the job several times faster. We didn’t need to be able to outfight everyone—we would just outmaneuver them and kill the entire chain of command until someone finally surrendered.

“What do you sense out there?” Ensui asked me, and I shook myself to bring the world back into focus. Binoculars could be awesome, but I had the attention span of a gnat and the eyestrain of a lifetime night owl.

Sensing, sensing…bluh, the only thing I could sense was also the biggest thing in the area. So what if I could sense things next to me? Fucking hell, I was supposed to be an alert system, not a thermometer. “Every inch of that outer wall is covered in genjutsu and defensive seals. Getting a grip on it is going to be nearly impossible.” Maybe not for someone like Tsunade, who could make her own handholds by punching stone into submission, but most of us didn’t have options other than the usual wall-walking techniques we were taught as genin. We generally didn’t need them.

“Which is what the explosives are for.” Ensui said, nodding. Then, “Kakashi, you’re in control once Honoka gives her signal.”

“Understood.” Kakashi said immediately.

“Do I have to ask what the signal is?” I asked anyway.

Ensui made a face. I stared at him for a good ten seconds before he said with a sigh, “Honoka…is not subtle. Watch for the explosion. Or explosions.”
I had the sudden impression that Ensui was the Pepper Potts to Honoka’s Iron Man or something. Grade-A enabler, or perhaps the one managing the paperwork end of things. And I had forked over all of my explosives to her.

Uh-oh.

About five seconds later, the entire front half of the fortress lit up in a series of retina-searing explosions. The sound hit us after, the bang-bang-bang-DOOM noise that said the biggest tag had gone off last and taken out anyone with functioning ear drums much closer than we were. I hoped that Honoka and her badger had dug out some kind of hole or other shelter to keep from being flattened. Maybe earplugs. By definition, they were a lot closer than we were.

“Go.” Ensui mouthed as branches, dirt, and the occasional rock rained around us.

We moved in single file—Kakashi led, with Pakkun carried under one arm and my hand on his opposite shoulder to keep from losing track of him. Ensui trailed us, with me caught in his shadow so he could follow along just as easily.

We kept that up until we broke through the trees and had a chance to dash out onto the lake. Explosions were still going off, disrupting the wall’s defensive seals and occasionally blasting chunks of mortar and plaster hundreds of feet into the air.

I had a feeling Honoka hadn’t given me all of the solid explosives.

Kakashi reached the island first and paused, looking contemplatively up at the barrier of spiky wooden death just above our heads. He put Pakkun down, letting the pug scout on his own for a bit.

We were in the shade, under the wooden hell-structure, and Honoka was making the very air explode on the other side of the island. That was probably enough to give us time to think.

It didn’t end up taking that long.

“Climbing?” I suggested.

Kakashi nodded. “Everyone, up.”

Pakkun leapt onto my back and clung to my sword straps with his teeth almost immediately. That left my hands free just in case I really needed to think my way through my path. I doubted it would be necessary—anti-cavalry/infantry fortifications didn’t tend to do much against single determined intruders like us—but the thought counted.

Sapping this stupid fortress was probably still easier said than done.

I was also sure that there was a name for the spiky tree barrier we climbed up just then, but damned if I could remember the term. The pitfalls of not using English for fourteen years, I guess.

Ensui ended up standing on top of the last row of logs before Kakashi or me, peering up at the main castle. After a second or two, he shrugged and left things to Kakashi’s judgment.

The younger jōnin stared up at the remaining earth-and-rock foundation—still rippling with chakra to interfere with attempts to scale it—and signaled for Ensui and me to wait for a signal. What, I wasn’t sure, but it would have to happen soon.

Pakkun repositioned himself on my shoulder and put his paws over his ears. While that would have been a hint, I wasn’t looking the right way.
I did, however, sense the buildup to the biggest explosion yet just as it went off and shook the entire castle down to the wooden anti-siege fortifications. I stuck my hand to the wall with chakra to stabilize myself, and then realized what it all meant when the chakra defending the walls started to come apart at the seams.

“And there goes the structural integrity of the anti-us seals,” I muttered. Who knew? Not me, though maybe I should have. Structural integrity of buildings had an upper limit. The destructive potential of shinobi…kinda didn’t. In the long run, anyway.

“Kei.” Kakashi said sharply.

I pulled the solid explosives from my equipment scroll after only a moment of fiddling around. I hadn’t been willing to carry them like kunai and risk a premature detonation from chakra contamination, given that big jutsu seemed to just happen around me, but I definitely had them close at hand. I only had three, so I had to make them count.

Looking at the wall…hm.

After a second, I took the first sphere, climbed as high as I could on the foundation, and started to shape the charges.

Aside from being activated by chakra, solid explosives behaved rather similarly to C4 while inert. They could be pulled apart and shaped, to direct the mayhem in a specific direction, and could still be activated at a distance with shinobi-grade wire in the same manner as tags. I pulled a large rock—about the size of my torso—out of the loosened mortar of the foundation and commenced digging out a large enough gap to start compromising everything.

I mean, in ordinary military parlance I was pretty sure that the method I was using would best be termed “excessive” given that mouseholing almost never needed more than two chunks of comparatively-mild C4 or other plastic explosives and a lot of planning.

If two solid spheres could destroy the entire Kannabi bridge, and one could flatten an entire forward base if you used it right (or wrong, or very wrong), suffice to say that I was dealing with something that could make the difference in this fight. Easily.

Aaaand then I started to have second thoughts.

It was four-thirty in the morning. The sky was a sort of dawn/pre-dawn haze of gray and bluish bullshit that I’d never fully gotten used to. I certainly couldn’t see very well with this kind of lighting. I’d always give props to people like Obito (and I guess the Hyūga clan), who could, but I didn’t have that trick to play with. With Honoka blowing up the entire front of the fortress, we ought to be able to just sneak in over the walls and save the explosives for a different target. Preferably one that we couldn’t scale.

I resealed the hesitantly-shaped charges into the scroll they’d come from. I gave the other two to Kakashi and to Ensui with only the slightest reluctance, born from an intense interest in things that could split rock.

Kakashi gave me a long look. I stared back, shaking my head ever-so-slightly.

Despite whatever difficulties we’d been having lately, Kakashi still seemed to trust my judgment.

Some days, I really didn’t know why he would—it wasn’t like I really made better decisions than he did. Unless the theme of the day was “emotional competence” or “being a semi-functional human being.” In the wild jungle of mystery that comprised Kakashi’s idea of such, he couldn’t find his ass with both hands and a map.

Regardless of my musings, we still had a mission to complete.

“Up and over.” Kakashi corrected himself, returning his attention to the wall.

With Pakkun still clinging to my jacket by nearly the literal skin of his teeth, all of us did so. Even if the chakra in the wall hadn’t been fully dispersed, there were enough “cracks” in it to allow us to get a foothold and then handholds and then just slip over the wall like burglars.

I’m really not sure, in hindsight, why Pakkun couldn’t just go over the wall himself. I mean, ninken. Really?

Anyway, we ended up landing just behind an ancient, unused storehouse that had gone unmaintained for so long that there were trees growing on the roof. We were entirely hidden from the view of the main tower, at least—I was pretty sure that Sho should have been there. My view on the inside of the castle was mostly green, in fact—sort of the way that Chernobyl was mostly green after being abandoned for thirty years, only I was pretty sure radioactivity wasn’t the problem here.

Er. Yeah, getting off that topic now.

What is radioactivity?

You don’t wanna know.

“Central tower?” I asked, as Pakkun dropped from my back and started sniffing around for signs of any other living human. “Living” because we were 0 for about 100 in terms of finding anything human with a pulse around here.

Dark, I know, but it had been a shitty few hours.

Kakashi shook his head. “We’re downwind.”

Meaning that if Sho—or anyone else still alive—was in the tower, Kakashi and Pakkun would have known almost instantly. For a second I was jealous that he and his dog could both pick up something so quickly, while my chakra sense was still apparently too short-range to be of any help, but then I remembered the whole issue with oversensitivity and stopped that train of thought dead. Corpses plus a canine sense of smell…yeah, no.

Looking around, I noticed that the impression of abandonment in the area also pertained to the number of bodies around—ergo, none. There were certainly cups, clothes, bowls, and various other objects pertaining to daily life just sitting around, if in a state of decay. But I couldn’t find any of the people. Not even when I reached out with my still-on-the-blink chakra sense.

The place was fucking creepy.

Kakashi gave a short whistle, calling Pakkun back to him. Then he gestured with his off hand and the pug made and abrupt detour to sit at Ensui’s feet. Then he signaled to me that our group was going to be dividing up.

Why the fuck—

This was going to turn into a fucking Scooby Doo episode. I was about to actually say something along those lines, scrubbing stupid references as necessary from my impending rant, but that was when the explosions from the front of the fortress abruptly trailed off into silence.
Silence on a battlefield, while you’re the team not doing the distraction bit, has a way of killing the very idea of conversations. Team Honoka was in charge of explosions. There were supposed to be explosions. So why weren’t we hearing any?

I shut my mouth with a click of teeth.

Okay. So. I could feel chakra practically dissolved into the castle’s foundation. It was creepy—chakra was not radiation, not really, or magic—and reminded me that particle physics was something I had never really studied much. It was as ubiquitous as air or water or face-mauling jackasses on a battlefield, seeming to drift upward from the ground and right through my sandals.

And then I felt it move.

Really, genuinely move with intent. It’s the difference between a harmless log and a crocodile. Purpose made the difference, and today’s goal seemed to be “fuck with the Konoha-nin."

“Everyone off the ground!” I half-shrieked, leaping toward the roof of the abandoned ironworks.

Kakashi and Ensui, having watched my whole body go rigid and felt the shifting rock deep underground perhaps more accurately than I did, were already moving. Pakkun darted out of sight, silent aside from his claws on dirt, and I was briefly very relieved at that.

And then the ground—shit, half of the entire island—gave an almighty whomph and seemed to implode all at once.

And not a single member of our team was clear.

We fell like leaves—every one of us ended up down in the damp dark, passing debris and plants and dust and still utterly failing to get out of gravity’s grasp.

We fell, and fell.

And then I wake up with a jerk, curled on my side with a comforter up to my nose and wondering why I still feel cold.

I roll over, burrowing into my blankets and scrunching my eyes shut against what little sunlight makes it through my blinds. Ugh. Ugh. If it’s already nine I’m going to kill someone with a fork. I don’t have class until noon on…what day is it?

I roll over again, worming up out of the blanket burrito I’ve somehow created. Fumbling for my glasses, I make a great show of looking exactly like Velma and sucking at life, because it’s not like glasses are colored differently in real life to reflect how much they stand out on an animated canvas.

I manage to put my glasses on and peer at my alarm—a first-edition iHome, because if it isn’t broke (or an alarm clock from hell), I’m sure not gonna replace it.

8:46, July 11, 2013.

…Eh?

Something about that doesn’t sound right. But at that moment, I’m too busy stifling a groan at the fact that not only have I panicked for no freaking reason, because it’s summer, I’ve also woken up before noon on a day when I have jack shit going on.
Another minute’s ceiling contemplation gives me time to think, Welp, no helping it now. Then I roll out of bed and promptly step on a shoebox.

My room is in kind of terrible condition all the time anyway. Whatever.

I amble out of the room, straightening my black t-shirt and pajama shorts, and then make a beeline for the coffeemaker. No morning starts without caffeine. Or at least it hasn’t since spring. God, fuck college courses and workloads that go with them. They can all just get bent, especially since the trauma lasts for an extra couple of months. Ugh.

I tie my hair up in a thick ponytail even as I turn the coffeemaker on, since it’s gonna get too hot to leave it down soon enough. If there’s one thing you can trust about summer, it’s the fact that the sun hates me and the house’s idea of climate control.

Then I head to my laptop. It’s an ancient piece of crap I’ve had since high school, but it’s mine and come hell or high water this thing is lasting until I get my undergrad degree. The summer weather hates it, too. I’ll probably have to migrate into the basement by midday to keep it from overheating horribly.

I live on my computer. I’m sure no one’s surprised.

Bluuuuugh summer coma.

I live on my computer but I hibernate in bed. Summers are great for sleeping in, but my house’s lack of air conditioning makes that difficult. Blankets are the best, but blankets also mean overheating if I try to sleep past noon. Dilemma.

I try to boot up the old Toshiba.

Nothing happens.

So much for wishing this thing would work. “Dad, I think my computer died!”

—why would he know that—

“What?” Dad calls back, and I wince preemptively at his tone even though I know he’s not mad at me.

“I think it’s the hard drive again!” I have to get up and yell down the stairs, since he’s old and a bit deaf when it comes to things he doesn’t want to hear. Typical dad things.

Blar, another hundred bucks down on this stupid thing.

“Hang on, I’m coming to take a look.” Dad says as he trudges up the stairs. He moves slowly, methodically. Another tumble down the stairs would probably break his back again.

I scramble over and we fuss over the dead machine, which boots to a black screen. Obviously the battery works, but anything else is a gamble that neither of us have the expertise for. Sadface.

We’re pulling our hair out over that for a while.

Then Dad sighs. “I don’t know what to tell you. It might be time to get a new one.”

Yeah, and me without my backups. Shit.

“I was planning on going to the beach with Mom today.” I say.
“Well, then you’re just going to have to leave this thing behind. Not that you should’ve wanted to take it anyway.” Dad shrugs. “It’s not a one-day problem.”

“Ugh.” I groan theatrically. “Yeah, I’ll get started on looking for replacements and maybe parts. The warranty shouldn’t be totally finished…” Oh, who am I kidding? The thing’s a fossil in computer terms. The nebulous “they” probably don’t even sell aftermarket parts for it.

“Go find your brother and tell him to get moving.” Dad suggests. “I’m sure he wanted to go with you and your mom. Unless he’s planning on disappearing into a gym for eight hours again.”

“He might have work, but I’ll ask.” I say. I take my laptop with me—glorified doorstop though it is—and detour to my brother’s door with an obnoxious four-knock sequence that was guaranteed to piss off any teenagers in the household.

Joke’s on him. He’s the only one.

By the time I dump my laptop on my bed, I can hear him stirring through the four-inch dividing wall between our rooms. Dad’s going back downstairs, so he won’t care (or pretend not to hear) if I decide to be really annoying.

“Hey, you up yet?” I call.

“Whaddaya think?” he grumbles, sounding like he was about to begin a doomsday plan to prevent me from ever waking him up again.

—that is/isn’t my brother’s voice—

—I shake my head to clear it.

“Whatever, Mom’s probably either running or watering the garden. You have until she gets in!” I call, and run to the shower.

Thirty minutes later, I tie my wet ponytail back and wander out of the bathroom in search of breakfast. Croissants, croissants…

“Anyone ever told you that you are hella slow?” my brother asks, drawing out the words for maximum sarcasm.

“Just you.” I say offhandedly as he grumbles and lays claim to the vacated shower.

Yeah, my family doesn’t go anywhere fast. Dad just plain old doesn’t go anywhere. Especially not the beach. He’d turn into a lobster.

I wasn’t even sure why I was preparing for the beach, in the back of my mind. It isn’t like I can swim worth a damn, and it’s early besides.

“Are you kids ready for clam-digging?” Mom’s voice floats in from the front garden.

Right, that’s why.

One two-hour car drive away into the future, and there exists an opportunity to sneak up on clams, crabs, and probably get our feet cut open by said monstrous would-be seafood.

But hey, at least it’s sunny out.
My dogs assemble in the kitchen as I rip into my croissant with the gusto learned from a lifetime of public education, hoping to catch crumbs as they fall to the floor. The oldest one is brown and skinny and bossy enough to earn the dual literal/metaphorical title of “bitch,” but she’s getting on in years and keeps getting knocked out of prime begging position by the other two. The sole boy is fat and fluffy and the approximate color of a marshmallow, and has the squeakiest voice by a huge margin. The last girl is black and white and oblivious all over, and bowls the other two over and out of her begging space almost without thinking about it.

—what are their names—

I try to walk over to the kitchen table and the black-and-white one hits me in the back of my knee, making me stumble. I catch myself no problem, even if I step on one dog’s foot because by god do these little furry piranhas swarm if they sense weakness. Particularly sensitivity to the dreaded puppy-dog eyes.

Getting ready takes at least one more circuit of the house, trailing furballs all the while. My brother drops a shampoo bottle and it thumps on his foot from the sound of things, but by that point I’m pulling my shoes on and obviously not going to help. Or comment.

The black dog jumps onto the couch because it gives her more opportunities to either harass me for treats I don’t have or because she likes to prop her butt up against me. It’s hard to tell sometimes.

Once I’m done with my shoes, I start scratching behind her ears. “That’s a good girl. Good Oreo dog.”

She leans into my hand and gives me a soulful look, like “you could be doing more for me than that.” Possibly even “Your dad’s head-scratches are superior” or “I enjoy making sad faces.”

My brother finally emerges from the bathroom, fully dressed and shedding steam everywhere.

—that is/is not my brother—

And I shake my head again.

“Where’s Mom?” he asks.

“Outside.” I say, standing. “Probably waiting.”

“Are you kidding? She always takes way longer—” my brother pauses and looks out the window to be sure, “—and right now she’s still coiling up the hose.”

—what is his name—

I pinch the bridge of my nose. Crap, I need coffee for this headache or my whole day’s shot.

“Mom! Are we ready to go or what?” my brother shouts.

Somehow, the drive to the beach passes in a blur that looks a lot like the back seat of the family Hyundai. All the whole, I can feel myself fading a bit. Headaches fucking suck—I bet my period’s just around the corner. Thank the relevant authority for pain pills, hot tea, and pads.

I blink and I must have dreamed—my brother’s not that small. Hasn’t been since I was five.

 Fucking hell, dream-brain. The drive isn’t that long!

Bluuugh, this is already looking like a miserable day and I’m not even sunburned yet.
“Get on your ugly shoes.” Mom says, and my brother and I obediently slip on old tennis shoes for the actual sandy bit. There’s gotta be a way for us not to end up with sand in our socks, but frankly I don’t think I’ll find it before my shoes hit the beach.

We’re unpacking from the car when the ground starts to shake, rattling a crappy plastic bucket right off the asphalt and down toward the dune-grass.

“What the fuck.” I mutter, looking around at the nearby dunes. There’s no way…

“Earthquake,” my brother says, shrugging.

I’m looking past the dunes. Toward the beach. Toward the water.

Why the fuck is the water retreating.

WHAT ARE YOU DOING? Who do you think you are?

Without even realizing, I fall to my knees. There’s something out there on the water and it’s huge and spiky and green and Jesus Christ that thing cannot even pretend to be an oil tanker. It’s…it’s not…

“Hey, what’s wrong?!” Is that my brother or my mom? The voices…they aren’t clear anymore. There’s a feedback, there’s an echo…

My eyes are still on the horizon. The thing is getting closer and I can’t run, I can’t move my legs and I can’t feel anything around me anymore. The car. Where’s the car? What is a car? “Shit, shit, shit…”

The voice in my head is like falling drumbeats, in a language I shouldn’t be able to understand. I don’t know Japanese. The language I speak and have always spoken is English. So why do I want to answer?

“Boku wa…boku wa…”

How dare you forget? The beast in the bay seems to be roaring at me. Very distinctly at me. How dare you forget your promise to me, human?

The world is gray and falling. Pieces of it break and fall and my family shatters with them like a cracked mirror. The waves and the wind and sun have all gone still.

This place…it isn’t real.

Tears well up.

This world isn’t real. It had been—it had to have been—but now it effectively wasn’t and I wasn’t letting go of the dream because I was a coward.

Wasn’t. Weren’t. Shit.

I screamed, feeling my chakra move with my anger like a forgotten, familiar friend.

My mother was Miyako Gekkō.

My brother was Hayate Gekkō.

And I’d nearly forgotten them. And for what? A dream I’d lost before I ever met them, really. Before I ever had a chance to learn what I should have given more time. I lost things, yes, but I gained them too and my family was still here in a way.

And yet a part of me still wanted that carefree, civilian life.

I’d just have to put it away, wouldn’t I? Until I could make a new one, here. If I had any idea what “here” was, until I gave up this fake world.

I brought my hands together into a seal. “Kai.”

The beast in the sea seemed to sigh.

I woke up face-down on a dusty hallway floor, every bone in my body seemed to scream at me at once. Ow.

_Fucking ow, what, did I land on my face?

Then my stomach caught up with events, slightly before my brain, and I had to scramble to get up and empty the contents of my stomach to the side instead of directly where I was lying. I felt like compacted dirt and possibly bile that I’d just heaved up, after drying in the sun and possibly being scraped up to go for a spin in a washing machine.

I knew that made no sense, but anything sounded like a valid comparison after a trip like that. Genjutsu or not.

How could I underestimate Sho?! Shit, we hadn’t even seen the guy yet and I was already more on the receiving than giving end of a thorough ass-kicking.

After another second of feeling either very sorry for myself or else attempting self-castigation in my head, I gave up and got to my feet in the wobbliest manner of any sober person I had yet met. Genjutsu had a wonderful way of messing with mental _and_ physical equilibrium, which was already at a bit of a premium in my case to start with. Any balance I had was hard-won, and I’d just lost a real chunk of it to a guy using genjutsu. Which was, according to my paperwork, supposed to be one of my strengths.

Yeah, right.

Not since the Dreamer. Not since my chakra sense started going kaput. Not since Isobu.

I wiped my mouth with the back of my gloved hand. Ugh, ugh, ugh.

After a second of curling my nose at the smell left behind, I stretched my right hand and wrist experimentally. Then I made a fist.

No pops, whether from long-abused joints or carpal tunnel syndrome.

Not a genjutsu this time, then.

_No, it isn’t._

_Yeah, and thanks for that._ I remarked to my guardian turtle. Isobu was still more trouble than he was worth, most days. But he’d helped here. _...Also, what promise?_

_You told the host of the Nine-Tails that you would befriend me?_

...Yes?
I'm waiting.

Uh...tabling that for now.

Okay, panic over. Now what?

I looked around, trying to get an idea of where I was. I confirmed that I was, in fact, in an abandoned hallway that looked either like it’d been forgotten by the servants or perhaps halfway converted into a mine, given the dust content of the air. Looking up, I could see little flickers of what might have been daylight, making me wonder if I was either trapped underground or perhaps the roof had just fallen in. If there was a roof. And some of the sparkles weren’t just light.

Blinking rapidly, I could almost see seal lines running off into the distance—the ink was fading rapidly even as I peered at it through the darkness—that may have been involved in whatever genjutsu I’d sat through. Or maybe it was the result of spending...however much time...in the genjutsu and having some experience with the root cause of it. Still, what a wonderful time to develop synesthesia. Or hallucinations.

Of course, it seemed like half of everything that used chakra also glowed for stupid reasons, so maybe I just shouldn’t think about it at all.

I leaned heavily on the nearest wall, trying to think. The wood was as cold as the grave, but I was more comforted than disturbed at that moment. If there was any time when I’d be okay with seeing ghosts, it was at that moment.

None appeared, though.

Obviously, I needed to find my teammates. Ensui was probably fine if he got hit with a similar mind-whammy, given that he was smart enough to catch the first thread and just unravel the lie instantly, without being blinded by emotional attachments. Pakkun was a dog—not a lot affected them, genjutsu-wise.

But Kakashi...

I frowned internally.

Maybe I was being paranoid. Maybe I was just worried because he was a kid like me (though thankfully there weren’t really any kids like me) and because he had a lot more gaping holes in his heart and head. Maybe I was just emotionally compromised myself. It was, after all, astonishing that I could still function given what had just happened.

Or maybe I’d made my peace with everything ages ago, mostly. I had to wonder what would have happened if I hadn’t.

I still needed to get back to the group and make sure everyone was okay.

One foot in front of the other, come on...

I walked into the dark.

Several minutes later, my main thought pattern was along the lines of “where the hell was I?”

Obviously, I was still underground. I had no real sense of time without the sun as reference, but I was pretty sure it was still morning. If I’d been mind-whammied for more than seven hours, then I probably would have been reduced to a drooling vegetable. Remembering how to walk would have been challenge enough.

I kept one hand on the wall, trying to track lingering seal lines through my fingertips and what chakra I could feel in the dank wood. At some point, the dust had converted itself into some kind of mold I couldn’t identify, but I had to admit that a respiratory infection would probably kill me later than whatever my teammates were dealing with. Even if it was black mold, I’d still put “thing that could blow up islands” on a higher point on my internal threat meter than “inert, though toxic, organisms.”

Speaking of, I still didn’t know what exactly had done the exploding. It didn’t feel like Honoka had the power for it—even with the Mangekyō Sharingan, most Uchiha went for fiery death in precise doses rather than one gigantic bang. Madara being an exception, I guess.

About then, I hit my first patch of water.

I’m pretty sure if I was, say, Lara Croft, I would probably end up having to wade through some kind of underwater cesspit or something and get gunk everywhere, because the vanilla human beings of most dimensions could not walk on water.

I decided to skip the mess part. I popped a seal scroll out of my sleeve and retrieved a glow stick. I cracked it with one hand, spinning the scroll back into place with the other. As I stepped cautiously out onto the water’s surface, it was dead still aside from me.

Gah, I did not want to know what was under my feet even as I walked.

It didn’t take me that long to find dry (-ish) land again. I guess this place’s glorified cellar wasn’t really that big, even if I kept my pace slow to compensate for not being able to see much of anything.

(I know shinobi are supposed to be able to navigate and fight in pitch darkness with earplugs in or something, but there was combat and then there was “I have no earthly idea where the crap I am, or any convenient reference points.”)

Then another glow stick—this one blue—crackled to life in the hand of the figure up ahead, making him look a little like a ghost. “Hello?”

Honestly, at this point I was about immune to ghosts. Zombies, though… “Right here, Ensui-san,” I said, rushing toward him.

Ensui was covered in dust, dirt, and splinters that even got into his hair, but otherwise seemed unharmed. Tired and kind of pissed off, but he didn’t have a limp or anything. Of course, the lighting was terrible, but that was my initial impression regardless.

“I’m fine.” I said before he could ask, even though it was kind of a lie. Genjutsu were not fun. “Have you seen Pakkun or Kakashi.”

Ensui shook his head. “Not yet.”

Yeah, that didn’t do much for my stomach’s stability. At least this time it was nerves rather than vertigo. “Oh.” I shook myself. “So, we fell through some kind of hole in the foundation and now everyone’s been scattered and maybe mind-whammied.”

“Pretty much,” he said, dryly.

“Hang on, what’s that?” I asked, having spotted something on his shoulder.

Ensui blinked and picked up the little specks, then held his hand out to me.
In his hand were what looked like a pair of crushed butterflies, though their wings had fallen off and the bodies had been a little bit pulped by Ensui’s vest. One had a wing pattern that looked like a combination of dirt and maybe lawn trimmings, while the other was black-on-white in a way that looked kind of familiar.

He dropped the black-and-white butterfly into my hand. “Take a guess.”

“I don’t…” I held the severed wing up to the glow stick, trying to see more clearly. Oh. Oh shit. “Since when are there seal butterflies? I mean, wow, the Aburame clan would love them, but oh crap. It seems like something that can’t even happen naturally.”

Ensui shrugged. “Flip it over and it does something different.” He indicated the mossy, innocuous-looking bug still in his palm.

I flipped the wing over and it seemed to shift, almost vanishing against my fingers. I could still see the shape of the wing, but it was imitating my skin tone pretty well. If I didn’t know to look… “What the fuck.”

Ensui said, rather than commenting on my choice of words, “Did you happen to run into a genjutsu before this?”

“Yeah.” At least he didn’t ask for details.

“So did I.” Ensui reached back and batted at his ponytail, upon which another black-and-white butterfly fell out, dead. “These things were probably involved.”

Hm… “They probably drain chakra, maybe to perpetuate the genjutsu.” I guessed. Kikai insects plus self-perpetuating genjutsu. Maybe.

Even for a non-scientific theory, it felt…well, plausible? I would have to ask an Aburame if it was possible, but there wasn’t one available at that moment.

“They also swarm.” Ensui said. He was frowning.

Yeah, and so did kikai insects. It was just that you at least knew that an Aburame was around if your chakra was getting leeched away by a beetle with a couple hundred friends. Butterflies generally didn’t swarm like, say, locusts, but I did remember something about monarch butterfly migration. Not much specifically, other than that butterfly season in Mexico was a lot more interesting than it was in my old home.

“I didn’t see any of them back that way.” I murmured. “If they swarm half as bad as kikai insects, I would have expected to wake up dead.”

“Maybe they didn’t like how you tasted.” Ensui suggested.

That was certainly a possibility, and kind of a worrying one. I decided to ask Kushina about that when I got back to Konoha.

“Let’s hurry up and find Kakashi and Pakkun.” I said, dismissing my worries.

“Agreed.” Ensui said, flicking bug bits away.

Here’s to hoping that Kakashi doesn’t wake up covered in these stupid things. Not because he was afraid of bugs, but…well, Kakashi didn’t have the biggest reserves. And apparently I was like a natural butterfly-repellant. I was hoping that we still had enough time. That he had enough time.
Argh, I didn’t know.

Speaking of not knowing, I didn’t know where all these stupid tunnels went or who they’d been made for. While the wood in the last area had indicated a maintained tunnel (until it either collapsed or flooded), Ensui’s section of the tunnels was mostly mud and gravel with the occasional support beams.

By mutual silent agreement, Ensui and I headed into a third tunnel in the hopes that it would at least lead us somewhere new. The only thing worse than trudging through mud and much was trudging through old mud, particularly when the exit could be nearly anywhere. I didn’t have a clue where the way out could be, barring application of explosives in a confined, dusty/damp place. Which was not a good recipe for survival.

Theoretically, I could also blow up a tunnel wall using the Rasengan, but I’d been having enough trouble with big jutsu to make it worrisome. Plus, I couldn’t tell if the walls were keeping back, say, a deluge of suffocating mud.

On one hand, I wished we were in an active mine, because water wouldn’t be a problem (to the same extent). On the other, no mine gases as far as I knew of.

“We’re going up.” Ensui commented, holding out his hand for my glow stick.

“And I can’t sense anything.” I shook my head at myself even as I handed the light over, keeping my other hand on the wall. Maybe when we got closer.

Ensui made a noncommittal noise and let me lead.

What is your name? Isobu interrupted.

Keisuke, I answered without thinking, then paused because I did have another name, even if no one had used it recently.

Isobu, however, didn’t care. He had other things on his mind. Then why isn’t he using it?

I felt hairs rise on the back of my neck.

I hadn’t acted on imposter protocols. Neither had he. Even though our team had been split up and my chakra sense was on the fritz, I hadn’t listened to my training. And now I didn’t know if Ensui was really who he said—perhaps hadn’t said, given that he hadn’t even said his name—he was. I’d only gotten simple sentences and obvious observations out of him since about five minutes ago.

Oh, boy.

I considered my options.

I channeled Isobu’s chakra down through my legs and into the ground, creeping toward Ensui until it touched the bottom of his food. For a long moment, Ensui didn’t do anything to indicate that he had felt it.

Then the wave hit, when Isobu’s chakra went a little bit crazier.

Turning, I saw his face flicker black-white-scribble like a sketch. The effect ran from the top of his head to the foot that Isobu’s chakra had hit first, then up again. I watched him ripple like water or a drawing halfway animated by someone with zero attention span, watched the seams come apart.
Then Ensui burst into a cloud of butterflies that had mimicked a man far better than a hive mind of horrible little monsters should have been able to.

The swarm danced around me, just out of reach, and I looked around at the flapping, fluttering storm.

My eyes narrowed. A little more help here. Just a little.

And when Isobu’s chakra seeped into my coils just a bit more, channeled toward my eyes and making them itch, every single one of the camouflage butterflies fled up the length of the tunnel.

Isobu’s chakra retreated, and I sighed into the void. It was dark, I’d spooked a bug-clone, and I still didn’t know where anyone was. They might or might not have been spiders somewhere, because there were spiders everywhere and unpleasant thoughts were really easy in the dark.

After a moment of moping more, I decided to do what Ron Weasley never got to do: follow the (hell) butterflies.

Chapter End Notes

Title taken from the Prototype OST.
Scouting Arc: Superstition

Chapter Summary

Kei: Be useful!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Butterflies are an abomination. They have weird stringy proboscis mouths, they fly unpredictably, and they may or may not taste like trying to eat milkweed. They also piss me off on a personal level that seems to be spreading to my perception of butterflies in general.

Well, these ones do.

I walked through the lonely darkness and mostly thought about what I was gonna do to Sho once I found him. The majority of what I was thinking ran along the lines of "kick him in the balls and proceed from there" at first. Obviously I would have to either beat him into submission or get someone else to do so, but that was going to require me to start finding people soon. Whether Sho or my teammates didn't matter.

It really did matter, but I wasn't being terribly productive if I just worried the whole way through the tunnels.

I sighed. Okay. I need to have some kind of idea what the crap I am going to do when I find someone, regardless of whether or not the butterflies are eating them.

Obviously, Kakashi already knew about my turtle-shaped problem. He wouldn't be surprised to the same degree if I started using Isobu to chase butterflies. I couldn't necessarily say the same thing about Honoka and Ensui, and the fact that it was the S-ranked secret of the day made me a little nervous about letting them know. Even if they were the ranking officers here.

...Whatever. I'd burn that bridge when I came to it.

Eventually, I came to a dead end made of rock and mud and assorted rubble, and wondered if the butterflies had conspired against me and come up with a fake obstacle. It wouldn't be the first time they tried tricking me—though the only successful problem had been the genjutsu mine that I'd apparently just landed on, meaning less work on their part. I probably needed to think on that more, and confirm with Isobu how long I was in dreamland.

I put my hand against it and it flew apart—literally, and complete with a rather testy swarm of butterflies orbiting me before rushing up the tunnel again. Another round of insects trying to fake me out before fleeing in terror.

...This was easier than I thought it would be, and that worried me.

I ran after them.

You were unresponsive for two to three minutes. Isobu provided after a moment, sounding a bit grudging. I fixed the skull fracture you gave yourself.
...For that kind of injury, I'd have expected to be helpless for longer than that. I guess that explains why it felt like such a long time in there. I commented, But dreams and time aren't really on speaking terms, so I suppose it makes sense regardless. Leonardo DiCaprio had...er, explored as much. Kinda. Thank you for helping me.

...What is "Inception"? I know what the word means, but that is not what you're thinking of.

Long story. I'll explain that later. Way later, probably.

Surprisingly, Isobu seemed to accept that. His chakra subsided a bit, and in my mind's eye he went back to circling the bay in my mindscape. Apparently the novelty hadn't run out yet.

A little after that, I caught up to the tail end of the butterfly swarm before they could make a new illusory wall and ended up just kind of running through it. While they had put up a good front, Isobu's chakra was apparently anathema to their taste and perhaps like citronella candles on steroids. Regardless, I was able to run through the center of the swarm and into the hallway they'd been trying to hide.

And it was a hall—apparently I'd left the abandoned mining sector behind. There was just as much dust, since there wasn't anyone in the entire castle town that was cleaning this place, but it was kind of nice to be in an area where there were (sadly unlit) torches lining the walls properly and where I was walking on wood instead of on glorified gravel.

(Though I was also now aware of how many rocks I needed to remove from the bottoms of my sandals.)

Okay. Castle. I was in the castle. Now the question was where everyone else was.

I put my left hand on the wall again, trying to trace the movement of that monstrous chakra I'd felt before, that had shifted and then dropped half of the structure on us. It was still there, though the butterflies had been a part of it and probably also been the part that had exploded, going by the seals they could make from their wings.

I frowned. Judging by the vague signs of maintenance past, I was probably running around underneath where the walls had been or in an extensive cellar. Which meant that, if I felt like it, I could probably blow the ceiling out and end up someplace that wasn't underground. Or I could squish myself under structurally compromised rock.

Or I was on the set of a reproduction of The Cask of Amontillado and I needed to find everyone before they were incorporated into the walls.

...At least butterflies didn't have thumbs.

Let me try. Isobu said, rousing again. You don't have enough energy to explore the entire structure.

That, at least, was true. With the barest second of hesitation, I agreed. Mostly, I was banking on Isobu's goodwill lasting until I could find someone with a Sharingan to make sure nothing else happened. It would probably mean traumatizing Isobu again.

...ugh.

I channeled the thinnest possible filament of Isobu's chakra down my arm and into the wall, cutting through the native chakra like razor wire to establish our hold. Once I had a root, I sent our combined power spiraling up through the castle and went on the hunt for anyone whose chakra I could actually recognize. In a fond way, not via deep-seated terror or "argh, fuck, not that guy again."

The chakra I found belong to a small body that didn't have opposable thumbs about twenty meters off on a z-axis, but I was happy to have found him anyway. As I tried to find a way up to his floor, I could hear Pakkun bark both with Isobu's and my chakra and with my actual ears. Clearly, there was a stairwell or something pretty close by.

Hell yeah! Progress was being made.

As soon as I found a staircase with Isobu's chakra, I let go of the wall, Isobu's chakra pulled back into the seal, and I ran the hell toward there.

The stairwell was clear, so I took the steps up about ten at a time (since shinobi leaping skills were awesome in enclosed spaces) and landed in a roll on the next floor up. The new hall was one that had rooms I wasn't about to go into, the occasional forgotten trinket, and a pug that shot across the wood and threw himself at my face.

I caught him on the way there and hugged him as fiercely as I dared, letting him rub his face against mine. He licked me, too, and I have never felt a rough dog tongue almost go up my nose with more fondness than that moment. Yeah, weird, but Pakkun was awesome and holy shit I had not seen a single thing I could trust in nearly fifteen minutes and the nothingness was almost worse than actually knowing the stupid butterflies were out to get me.

"I've been looking for you, Pakkun," I said, once we'd both calmed down a bit. "But I didn't see anyone else. I'm sorry."

"Well, you're human too, Kei-chan." Pakkun said, "Nothing else I've run into has been."

"Wait, you've been seeing those hell-butterflies, too?" I hadn't expected them to go for Pakkun, not when he probably hadn't been trapped by a genjutsu like I was. But then, I was probably the only one who tasted like the equivalent of ghost chilies.

"They've been coming after me a lot." Pakkun admitted. "But then your weird chakra showed up in the walls and they flew away." He sneezed into my jacket. "They make it hard to track things."

...Hm. Butterfly wings were made of overlapping, powdery scales... "Yeah, I get that. But if I scare them off, does it help you find Kakashi and Ensui?" I asked.

"Maybe." Pakkun said. Then he leapt out of my arms and sniffed experimentally at the floor. He sneezed again, but said, "I think I have Ensui now. Kakashi is...fainter. Closer, but…"

Right, Pakkun could smell chakra. Since my senses apparently depended on a giant turtle, I was willing to let him take the lead.

"Let's find Kakashi first." I concluded. "I…" Fuck, what did I want to say? Kakashi was Pakkun's master, and I was obviously more worried about him than Ensui. For more than one reason. Pakkun probably shared my anxiety, even if he was hiding it well. "I think we need to make sure he's all right. Ensui is stronger, right?"

Pakkun nodded.

"Okay. In that case we're going to find Kakashi, find the bugs, and do what we can to get this mission back on track." I said. "When we find him, are you okay with going after Ensui after that? I can give you some tags or something that might help you chase the bugs away." ...I wondered what would happen if I used Isobu's chakra to build a disruption tag? Not that I had time for it, but still.
We had to find Kakashi before there wasn't anything left to find. I was starting to build a really horrible picture of what had happened to the villagers, but I wasn't going to be voicing that in case I jinxed myself.

My hands shook.

"Follow me, Kei-chan." Pakkun said, and he trotted ahead.

I in no way had anything better to do or any better plan, so I did.

Pakkun's nose led us down the new hall, then up the staircase at the other end. It was dark as all heck and made me annoyed when my glow stick died, but Pakkun wasn't that hard to follow. His little claws clicked against the wood as we ran through the building.

At the top of the staircase was a door, which I promptly smashed open. I then spent the next couple seconds blinking in the early dawn, while wondering how the sun had gotten so high in the sky in the missing moments I'd spent in the catacombs.

The courtyard of the fortress was nearly large enough to contain its own fields. We'd emerged from what seemed to be the underside of the wall, such as it was. The collapsed section was entirely on the opposite side of the island, and had turned into a kind of depressed bowl of water and rubble. Between that and us, I saw at least ten buildings of various sizes, including the central tower and the ironworks. Aside from the massive dust cloud that still hadn't dispersed from Honoka's earlier bombing, I could see most of what was going on. That was a change from earlier, much as I was annoyed by it.

I blinked again as Pakkun pressed on, realizing that it was probably still only about five in the morning, then followed the dog.

Pakkun ran about halfway across the grounds before he stopped and barked back at me, "He's this way, Kei-chan."

Apparently, I wasn't following him quite fast enough. I rushed to catch up.

...He was heading to the tower.

My hand shot to my katana. I could...probably break a door, even as thick as the average keep door, wide open if I channeled my chakra correctly and increased its cutting power. I didn't really want to test things like that, but desperate times and desperate measures. I didn't have the Rasengan on call or anything at the moment, since I was a bit worried I'd blow my own arm off.

And seals could probably be messed with if this stupid place was infested with seal butterflies. Which it was. Stupid castle.

We reached the door, which was more of a gate and made of heavy wooden planks besides, and Pakkun had to stop because he didn't have the strength to just tear through solid objects.

I did. With one smooth motion, I gripped the hilt of my katana and the mouth of the scabbard, sweeping outward with the cutting edge even as I channeled my chakra down the entire length of the blade. Before, I would have been able to extend chakra scalpels through the steel and enhance cutting power that way. Today, I spun another filament of Isobu's chakra and decided to brute-force the issue. CURVE OF THE MOON.

The door didn't quite slice under my strike. It was more that it splintered along fault lines that I had put there a fraction of a second before. It shattered, more than anything.
"Kakashi!" Pakkun said, rushing through even as wood fragments still cascaded down from the wreck of the foyer doors. I returned my katana to its sheath before I followed him.

The chakra in that room was huge. Maybe a quarter of it seemed to belong to the seal butterflies—it felt like them, at least—while the rest was a horrific abomination of what felt like a concentrated aura of despair. It pressed down on me—help me save us no no no no how could this happen let us go mother father no not the children—with enough force that I stalled out in the middle of that hallway, my brain caught between the chakra and Isobu rearing up in my head, roaring defiance. It was too much, too soon, and I couldn’t—

"Pakkun, wait—!" But I was cut off by Pakkun's wordless snarl of rage.

Then Isobu snarled. This will not defeat us!

I blinked rapidly, eyes readjusting to the gloom. I couldn't stop here. Pakkun was further in and I couldn't stop before I found who we were both looking for and then Ensuï and then Sho and then kicked the shit out of him. The anger, as much Isobu's as mine, cleared my head enough for me to realize what else I could feel.

It took me a second to overlay what I saw—about a million more of those stupid bugs—and what I was feeling. They lined the walls like moss or ivy, making the entire foyer look like the walls were alive and flickering. A group of them seemed to slink down from the walls and reach out toward a heavy-duty genjutsu trap in the middle of the floor. Chakra swelled in that room, from the seal and the bugs and from the mass of them in the middle that seemed to be the most active.

And underneath the swollen, bloated chakra of the monster I couldn't see, was Kakashi's weakly flickering spark.

Pakkun leapt for the mass on the floor. But a second later he yelped and skittered backward, trailing butterflies from his nose and eyes because they could be aggressive little shitheads. I told Isobu, Get them out of our way.

The burning sensation started in my chest, making my breath catch in my throat from surprise. Then it angled outward, crawling over my sternum and over my collarbones, creeping around my shoulders and spreading from there. Chakra surged down my arms and back and torso and legs and then it started to detach from my skin. Slowly at first, but then—

WHOMPH.

Turned out that Tailed Beast hosts had some control over local air pressure. The butterflies scattered like leaves in an October windstorm, and the pressure wave smashed them back against the walls with enough force that their severed wings rained from the ceiling.

I had never empathized so much with the inventor of the flyswatter before.

Isobu's chakra remained, making my eyes itch a bit even when he played nice with my chakra coils. Checking on Pakkun briefly (and discovering that he was angry, but otherwise okay), I rushed across the room to where Kakashi was still lying on the floor.

Rolling him onto his back, I found Kakashi's eyes closed and his headband still in place. He didn't so much as twitch even as I checked his pulse and then pulled up the lid to his normal eye to make sure his pupils were still dilating. His pulse was fine and he wasn't concussed, but that wasn't nearly enough to reassure me. I checked his breathing by bringing my ear close to his nose—normal sleep pace, I thought. But there was nothing natural about this.
Then I changed tactics with my mainstay when things ended up stumping me: the diagnostic jutsu. It was rougher than normal—Isobu did power, not control (yet)—but I could still make out two major issues. One, his chakra levels were dangerously low. Two, he was trapped in a genjutsu.

I sat back.

If Kakashi was trapped in a genjutsu anything like mine had been, then I had to wonder what he was seeing and if I could get him out of it without having to stab him. The seal on the floor also seemed, well, hungry. It had its fangs in him and it looked like I'd been suddenly appointed animal control officer of the day.

Pakkun arrived at my side about then. He nudged Kakashi's limp right hand, whining quietly. After a moment, he bit Kakashi's hand with his mostly-outgrown puppy teeth hard enough to draw blood.

...Okay, so stabbing him wouldn't work. Shit. And I'd hoped to be able to get things over with quickly.

I ran my hand over my face. An Isobu-powered chakra pulse hadn't worked. Pakkun biting him hadn't worked. The only thing I hadn't tried was breaking the seal powering the genjutsu, but that would take time and we could be attacked by bloody near anything while I tried to think my way through the problem. I wasn't familiar with this seal and there wasn't any real opportunity for practice.

"Pakkun, go get Ensui." I said through my fingers.

"Kei-chan..." Pakkun trailed off, probably at the sight of my gold-on-red eyes and the stink of Isobu's chakra still pouring off me.

"I'll do my best to help Kakashi, but I need someone to watch my back and we need someone else to help. Please, Pakkun." But how was I going to keep the butterflies off Pakkun? Argh.

Pakkun gave me a long look. Behind him, the survivors of Isobu's chakra wave were starting to try and fly away.

I pulled a kunai out of my pouch and channeled chakra into it. My low-grade explosive seal would make the surviving butterflies regret having done so if they came within four meters of me.

I looked at Pakkun. "Run."

Rather than running, Pakkun exploded into a cloud of white smoke.

...Well, that was one way to do it.

I tossed the kunai into the corner of the room, where it exploded and took out about a quarter of the remaining butterflies in a shower of metal shards and falling wings. Then I picked Kakashi up with only minor difficulty (which was standard with unconscious passengers) and carried him out of the seal array so I could see what the hell I was doing.

Unfortunately, simply removing him from the array didn't seem to change anything.

I sighed inwardly—of course, nothing that happened to Team Minato could be easy—and unrolled a scroll from my right hip pouch. With a poof of chakra, the scroll coughed up my sealing kit and a reference book so I could try to interpret what the fuck the array was doing and how to make it stop. Preferably without exploding it.
Okay…

…Somehow, it seemed less complicated than I'd have thought before standing over it with a primed ink brush. With a few deft strokes, I severed several important support lines for the array's chakra storage and redirected everything toward the floorboards instead of whoever tripped over it. Once the chakra built there, I siphoned off the resulting mess with a long, roundabout edition of a chakra neutralizing seal that utilized its own energy in a positive feedback loop.

By the time I completed the seal ring around the array, it just about melted away into the air.

Hah! Score one for Sensei's teaching methodology and adrenaline rushes.

At that moment, Kakashi sighed. Given the sheer silence in the area, it still made me jump and quickly rush over to him.

He sat up about a second later, seeming a little unsteady and with his visible eye squeezed tightly shut against…I dunno. Sunlight? Horrible, horrible reality? Sudden nausea associated with the first two factors?

"Kakashi, are you—?" I was about to ask him if he was all right. This, it became clear, was probably not the smartest remark I could have made and thus the universe was spared extra stupidity when I stopped myself. I kinda had to.

Kakashi had his hands clamped around his upper arms so hard that his knuckles were turning white. He was shaking a little, in the barely-noticeable way of a person trying way too hard to hold things together when they were really going to pieces in painfully slow motion. Even through the fabric of his mask, I could see the muscles in his jaw and neck straining as he clamped his teeth resolutely together.

Of course, he wasn't okay. I didn't know what he'd seen, but it was obvious that whatever it was had screwed him up. I was afraid to touch him in case he punched me in the face or dissolved into a complete wreck right in front of me, and I couldn't say if I was going to make it better or worse.

"Hey," I tried again, softer. I sat down with my legs folded underneath me, hands a little above my lap in case he needed me to go the fuck away or maybe catch him before he dropped.

"…Kei. Just stop." Kakashi said in a strained voice.

I nodded and pulled back, and that was when Pakkun came dashing back into view.

"Kakashi, Kei-chan!" Pakkun called, dashing right up to us and stopping at Kakashi's knee. He putted his head against his master's arms. "Kakashi?"

Right after that, Honoka and Ensui appeared as well, trailing the seven other dogs as well as Tsuruya, but not Mamijo. I guess there wasn't much call for a giant killer badger when everything that needed to be killed was about an inch long and awful hard to dislodge from fur. But what did I know?

"Everything all right out there?" I asked quickly, before Honoka could say anything about Kakashi.

"Could be worse." Honoka rubbed the back of her neck. "Area's lousy with genjutsu traps. All triggered and useless now, though."

"I ended up outside of the castle." Ensui said. He shook his head. "Took a wrong turn after waking myself up and landed in the lake. I decided to meet up with Honoka and describe what we'd found.
What about you?"

"...Eh, more traps. They're taken care of." I said, as Kakashi got to his feet with Pakkun in his arms and the other seven dogs clamoring around him. Every single one of them could sense that something was wrong with him, but we didn't have any time to actually address it. "Did anyone else see those hell-butterflies besides me and Pakkun?"

"What?" Honoka looked blank.

On the other hand, Ensui's frown deepened. "Yes, I did. If I'd been any slower, they probably would have drained me completely dry."

Tsuruya flapped her wings and landed practically on top of me, even if she had to duck to get through the door. She leaned in to whisper, "Keisuke-sama, are you all right? Your eye..."

"Am I bleeding?" I asked.

"Er, only from one eye. I think you may have burst a blood vessel somehow." Tsuruya bonked my head with her beak, in what was half a reprimand and half relief. "Keisuke-sama, you should be more careful!"

Probably happened while channeling Isobu. Welp.

"I'll heal up when I have a chance, Tsuruya." I said.

"So, has anyone found Sho yet?" Honoka asked, viewing the reactions of Kakashi's and my summoned animals with a slightly critical eye.

"No, I got knocked into the sub-basements and just found sunlight again." I said, pointing toward the tunnel I'd first emerged from. "Pakkun, Bisuke? Anyone smell anything?"

"Not anything alive, besides those butterflies," said Pakkun. He promptly sneezed again, this time into Kakashi's face. To his credit, Kakashi didn't really react other than having preemptively closed his eye.

...Though that might also have been a bad sign.

I tried to ignore that. I also changed the subject rather ungracefully, but I think they'd forgive me. "There weren't any corpses on the ground when we got in here."

"Plenty of those outside, but..." Honoka trailed off significantly. "Hard to tell if Sho kept servants. Migi and Hidari didn't know of any."

"I don't think he did." I had a shell of an idea. I didn't want to jinx myself, though—it was hard to say what was real and what was just pants-on-head crazy in this place. In tone and terms of the shit of we kept running into, I got Matrix and Scooby Doo vibes, plus a dash of Inception or maybe The Thing. I wasn't about to discount the idea that the mastermind, in fact, had no earthly idea what we were doing.

"We need to get to the top of the tower." Kakashi said bluntly. He looked pointedly up at the ceiling. "Our answers are up there."

"Oh?" Honoka said. Her eyes went red, and then twisted along the ring of her irises—her Mangekyō was apparently based on the number four rather than the more common three—and I got the very distinct impression that she was giving Kakashi a once-over because his behavior was off. Which made sense. It was just kind of horrible, knowing that she could pretty much stick a person's brain in a metaphorical blender by staring at them really hard.

"It's the hub of the only human scent in the entire area." Kakashi said, his normal eye narrowed right back at her. "Everything else is too old to possibly be him. By weeks, if not months."

"Well done, then." Honoka blinked and the Sharingan disappeared. The veins in her eyes stood out a bit, sort of like what happens to normal people after getting out of a swimming pool, but at least it wasn't the Sharingan. Having not detected any creepy swirling chakra around her eyes, I made the hesitant conclusion that she hadn't actually done anything despite the intimidation factor.

"Stick together and just bull-rush things?" I said, since apparently no one was thinking of how we'd actually do this.

"No." Honoka started walking back out of the building. "This way."

Oh, goody. We were going to run up the walls and assume that hitting a vertically-aligned genjutsu trap wouldn't probably kill us. "I hope you're going to be preemptive about this." I muttered, even as the menagerie followed her. Me included.

Honoka either didn't hear or pretended she didn't. Either way, she didn't respond.

"Out here, you can actually see the seals before tripping over them." Ensui explained. "I noticed it in the fields as well—while the arrays can be different shapes and sizes, they're almost always visible if you have a sharp eye."

I looked at Kakashi, who looked back and didn't raise his headband. Riiiiight, the Sharingan thing and wow, we hadn't even dealt with that yet.

_Are you still having issues with the Sharingan?_ I asked Isobu.

...Perhaps, he said, somewhat grudgingly. The woman's was more dangerous to me, from what I've heard. She hasn't acted, though. He has. I do not want him using that eye on me.

_Is that what happened when we were training with him?_ Because wow, talk about an overreaction. Valid, but Kakashi hadn't been trying to knock us out at the time. Not in front of Kushina.

...Yes. We hadn't spoken yet.

Yeah, because we'd been stuck together for less than a month at that point. Roommates tiptoed around each other in the first couple weeks, a lot of the time, but in this case one of them was a giant turtle monster and the other was a squishy human. If Isobu was in a supremely shitty mood, our burgeoning partnership could quickly devolve into a game of cat and mouse.

I looked speculatively up in toward the tower's top room. I mean, I couldn't see it from the the ground, since Japanese-style castles had prominent curved eaves that made seeing much of anything kind of difficult. There could be seals literally everywhere.

Still, seven stories was nothing.

"Tsuruya." I said, "Get ready to start blasting Wind jutsu."

"Of course, Keisuke-sama." Tsuruya said. Then she bonked me in the head with her beak again.

"On my mark." Honoka almost snapped, making me wince a little. This mission had become a clusterfuck somewhere along the way and I guess that made her temper shorter than usual. I could sympathize, since, well, I was one of the casualties thereof. But not that much.

I looked back at Kakashi, who was still swamped in canines. Pakkun was sitting on his shoulder, while the others formed an apparent honor guard around him. It would be surprising if he could make the climb unhindered.

I nodded at Pakkun. Good dog.

Then I hopped onto Tsuruya's back, retrieving my flight goggles from a pocket. As I slid them on, I honestly felt a little better. I'd be in the air. If nothing else, I could act as backup if someone got caught.

Ensui tilted his head, looking between Kakashi and me with an unreadable expression. "Honoka…"

"Go." Honoka said, ignoring him.

As Tsuruya and I started to circle the tower, the rest of our team practically teleported to the top of the tower. As I watched, Ensui and Kakashi blew out the wall with the solid explosives I hadn't used, spewing wood and plaster debris out across the courtyard. As the dust started to clear a bit, Tsuruya stooped as best a crane could and shot into the newly opened gap in the wall.

As soon as we were inside, she flared her massive wings and, on the final downbeat, smashed the entire top floor with a massive gust of wind. I slid off her back in her wake, landing on all fours and trying to pinpoint any problems before someone with a butterfly vulnerability entered the room.

...Well, that's a rare sentence.

Anyway, butterflies were indeed a factor—the raining wings and the sound of Pakkun sneezing confirmed that once. Yay.

Tsuruya beat her wings again and the dust was blasted out of hole in the room. I think I heard Honoka swear, but I was a little more focused on what was in front of my eyes.

I pushed my goggles up on my forehead and just kinda stood there and blinked for a moment.

Standing right in the middle of the room, relaxed as you please, was a willowy blond man who could only be Sho. He was very pretty, in a kind of ethereal way that made me want to hold up a mirror and see if he had a reflection. His hair was bound in a braid that probably ran all the way to the floor, and had green eyes that seemed to stare vacantly into the air. He wore a green formal kimono with enough embroidery to bankrupt a small town, with a heavy silk fan that was probably also a weapon somehow.

But something still wasn't right here.

Probably-Sho was entirely unruffled by Tsuruya's room-clearing jutsu or the blast of bridge-destroying explosives that should have basically leveled the top floor of the building. He didn't have so much as a splinter on him.

"He isn't human." Honoka said from behind me, and I looked back over my right shoulder to see her Sharingan active and spinning slowly. She frowned. "These are those butterflies, right? It moves like a bug clone."

"You're referring to its chakra." Ensui murmured.
Kakashi sidled up to my left, silent, but I nonetheless reached out and tapped his shoulder gently with the back of my hand.

He glanced at me.

I gave his headband a pointed look.

He shook his head.

Well, that was a productive exchange.

"It smells like a corpse." Kakashi said, turning his attention back to Probably-Not-Sho. I guess the mask had some benefits, given that Bisuke sneezed a second later.

All of us looked at Sho, who continued serenely fanning himself.

...He was not blinking.

"If I may." Tsuruya said, leaning over my head and toward Sho with her long beak. And then, as I put my hand against her chest, I felt a sub-vocal thrummmmm that traveled up my arm and made my teeth feel funny.

"Oh, another summon contract?" Sho said. Since I was looking closely, I saw how his mouth movements didn't quite match up to what he said. It was a little like looking at a bad dub.

...Maybe this was why Aburame clan members wore high coat collars.

"So you're a summoned creature." Ensui said quietly.

"We are, yes." Sho said, seeming pleased that we'd figured it out.

"Who was your master?" Ensui asked, raising his chin so he could look Sho in the eye.

Sho seemed to tilt his head to the side, coyly, before he briefly flew apart at the seams down to his belt and we got a good look at the butterflies that made up his ghostly appearance. Underneath it was something small and dark and withered, and topped sparingly with wispy blond hairs barely clinging to a dry, patchy skull. There was a stained, red-ribboned scroll clutched in his gnarled claws. Distantly, I noted that Had-Been-Sho had at least had good teeth before he'd been turned into a mummy.

Then the butterflies came back together in a whirl of color and Definitely-Not-Sho stood exactly where he'd been, smiling placidly.

"His name was Sho Kobayashi," murmured the bug-clone. "He still holds our contract."

...Yes, in his skeletal hands.

"...What happened here?" I asked after a moment. Tsuruya could blast the clone and the corpse apart in seconds if it was necessary, which didn't even get into the possibilities that Honoka could bring to the table. There wasn't really any harm in asking.

"...We can show you." Sho said, and gestured with the probably-nonexistent fan in his left hand.

From a formerly-closed hall, a stream of butterflies swept into the room and started orbiting us. Their wings flashed black and white, and then the room seemed to dissolve into an ink painting. As we watched, the butterflies started to melt together as their illusions worked in concert. It was a little like looking at an old-timey film reel, too.

Kakashi’s back bumped against my shoulder as he retreated, and I indicated to Tsuruya that she might want to keep an eye on him with a quick head-bob.

Tsuruya bonked her beak against Kakashi’s shoulder. He nodded absently and ran a fingertip along the underside of her beak to reassure her that he was all right.

I looked around.

Slowly, the butterflies and their seal-lined wings began to make a story. It went...well, kind of like this:

Once upon a time, there was a man with long yellow hair who fell in love with a girl he could not have. He wished with all of his heart that he could become a noble, so they could marry and live happily ever after. But because he was lowborn, he could only wish and wish. Typical fairy-tale stuff.

One day, the young man tried to gain power through a summoning contract, though he hadn't formed a partnership before. I think. The jutsu teleported him to a deep, beautiful jungle where he appeared at the feet of a rainbow-winged butterfly about the size of a kaiju. Going by the pictographic representation, anyway. The butterfly and her children entered into a contract with the man, because they were touched by his plea.

(I'm still not sure how you can touch the heart of a giant bug by ranting like a stalker, but apparently time had blurred the details.)

So, anyway, he reappeared in the castle town with a cloak of the butterflies and the power to sway anyone to his cause through their illusions, changing into a powerful lord almost before their eyes.

But before he and his bride could wed, tragedy struck.

Not understanding his bargain or his contracted creatures, the man failed to realize they fed not on flowers but on energy, which the townspeople were to provide. As the summons devoured the energy they could find to sustain the man's dream, eventually even his bride's family was caught in the swarm.

Everyone but Sho himself died.

But the butterfly queen regretted the death and destruction they had created, and so they cloaked Sho in a world made of his finest dreams. Eventually, though, he faded away as all of the humans brought close to them ever had.

I raised my hand. "When did he actually die?"

Tsuruya hummed again. The butterflies, now settled on the wall or on Not-Sho and made a part of the bug clone, flapped their wings back in concert.

"...About a month ago, going by the moon." Tsuruya said. Right, right. Moths and butterflies used the moon to navigate, right? I guess a month or two would be pretty long in an insect's abbreviated lifespan.

Honoka made a disgusted noise. "So the culprit for all the deaths has been a bunch of bugs."

Ensui looked more intrigued than unnerved. Also bored. "I'm sure the Aburame clan would be interested in seeing your contract. An interview, perhaps. If nothing else, we could run comparisons to the kikai insects we already have."

"Then there's the seals. They seemed effective." Honoka said after a while, though grudgingly.

"Yes, we can form most images we remember." Not-Sho said. The butterflies on the walls tittered.

"How do Hidari and Migi fit into this?" I asked.

"The mercenaries." Not-Sho looked blank. This was not as much of a change from his normal look as that comment might have suggested. "We needed to keep humans away. We can eat the energy of trees and animals, but humans…" He made a "what can you do" motion. "We cannot help the urge."

_They're bugs. They don't have the capacity to think clearly solo. Still, what the fucking fuck?_

They were also apparently vampires. Shit.

"Here's an idea," Honoka said brusquely. "How about we take your contract back to our village so you can find a new contractor?"

"...Would that be acceptable?" Not-Sho asked, hesitant.

"Probably, since I'm the one saying it." Honoka shrugged. "As long as you can dismiss yourselves, we can get you a new contractor. And one that knows what to do for insects that eat chakra."

Not-Sho smiled, or something similar. Then he, along with all of his butterfly friends, promptly exploded into smoke.

The corpse of the actual Sho dropped to the floor and smashed into pieces, though the summon scroll was still clutched in its bony hand.

Honoka reached down, grabbed the scroll, and shook it until the hand fell off. She blew the dust off of it, and then tucked it into her kunai holster. "It's over."

What an anticlimax.

Still, with the scroll in hand, we could probably contain the butterflies and keep anyone else from being hurt by them.

I sighed. _Job well done, I guess._

Let's get this over with.

We left. Honoka burned the tower to the ground along the way, and then we got started on body disposal for the rest of the surrounding area. It was the least we could do for not getting here sooner.
With Mamijo, we at least spent only the rest of the day digging graves, with me occasionally dismantling down the remaining genjutsu traps. It could have been so much worse.

That still didn't mean things would be okay for a good, long while.

Chapter End Notes

Remember that Stevie Wonder song? Yeah.
And then we were on the road again, heading toward Konoha. Apparently, the fact that we'd started this stupid mission in Tani didn't mean we had to report back, since Honoka didn't seem to really care. I supposed that since Tani hadn't specified what to do with the troublemakers other than to kill them all, to the victor went the spoils. Yay, us.

I got first watch for the night. Not because there was any particular danger—I was hardly the one with the best reaction time—but everyone else seemed a lot more worn out than I did. Even Honoka, who hadn't been exposed to the chakra-eating butterflies, had used a lot of big jutsu during the mission and seemed to not be interested in doing much more than just eating three ration bars and going to sleep. Since I wasn't particularly tired, I volunteered.

Our campsite was thirty meters from the nearest road, with thickly overgrown trees and brambles serving as our camouflage as much as it was an animal deterrent. I climbed up into one of the trees and sat back against the trunk as comfortably as I could without having to remove branches. At least nothing this far away smelled like rot and death.

If I pretended the events of the last week hadn't happened, then it could have seemed fairly peaceful.

I ran my hand over my face. Peaceful. Hah.

I looked down at our group.

Honoka and Ensui were sleeping peacefully enough, in bedrolls on opposite ends of camp from each other. Thinking about it, it made sense to have the two veteran shinobi spread out to increase their combined coverage of the area. Ensui fought at range (ish) while Honoka could pretty much kill everything just using her eyes creatively.

Kakashi, meanwhile, was lying in the middle of a puppy pile. Using Bull as a pillow and with Pakkun sleeping on his chest as a portable heater, Kakashi was bracketed on both sides by dogs. Urushi, Shiba, and Akino slept on one side, all of their noses aligned toward Kakashi's arm. Ūhei, Bisuke, and Guruko were on his other side, though Guruko was upside-down and more lying on top of the other two than anything.

...I sighed soundlessly and shifted around on my tree branch until I was lounging like a particularly lazy leopard. Today had not been fun.

I guess that until the butterfly vision, I hadn't really thought about how much I'd changed since dying and reincarnating into this world instead of as, I dunno, a cat in my old one. I'd ignored the signs of an active genjutsu even as I was in it, while either my subconscious or Isobu's echoes had been picking it apart. Those details hadn't fit Keisuke, as opposed to the old me.
And then Isobu happened. Way to be a Trespasser rip-off, turtle dude. Wasn't like my world had Jaegers, either.

All in a good cause, though. I hadn't been under long and Isobu's chakra kept the butterflies off me, so I could find Kakashi when I did and not, say, ten minutes later.

That...would have been bad.

It only had a little bit to do with the "nebulous not-future," as I was pretty sure Sensei had put it at some point. Kakashi was a cornerstone in a lot of that story, whether as an ANBU or as a mentor to a pack of hellions. He was an adult who had done more before hitting thirty than most people did in a lifetime.

But he was also the kid who snuck into my hospital room to give me an apple, knowing that the hospital's idea of food was as tasteless as the walls were white. He'd helped Obito and I perfect our tactics for the second stage of the Exam the first time, though it didn't necessarily benefit him to do so. He trained with us all the time. I'd known him for five years and while we hadn't necessarily gotten along, he'd somehow managed to become as much a cornerstone in my life as Obito and Rin and Hayate and Mom and Sensei.

It'd taken him longer to act the part, and me longer still to admit it.

And I knew about how well I'd react if I lost him, since I had Kannabi and losing Obito for reference. That was when I'd known (or at least strongly suspected) that we'd be reunited again later. If in horrible circumstances.

I sighed again.

The more I thought about near-misses, the more upset I got. Therefore, the logical thing to do would be to stop. Or else I'd turn into Kakashi and never have a night's peace ever again.

...Speaking of which, I had successfully managed to jinx myself. Because of either karma or perhaps a malevolent deity yet unnamed, I heard Kakashi's breathing start to hitch even from my perch. I leaned over the edge of the branch, peering warily down into the gloom in case he suddenly got up, noticed me, and possibly decided to stomp off in an affronted huff.

He didn't do any of that, though.

Pakkun shifted on his chest, moving slowly enough that it was apparent how exhausted the pug was, and tried to dig his nose into Kakashi's collar in hopes of soothing him. He hadn't yet progressed to the point of getting up and walking over to lick Kakashi's face, and ended up not doing so when Kakashi abruptly jerked awake. Pakkun went rolling off his master's chest with a surprised squeak, and I was pretty sure Kakashi accidentally hit Akino in the side.

Kakashi stumbled more-or-less vertical after a moment, on his knees and a little wobbly besides. Then, shaking himself out of whatever nightmare-induced rut he'd been caught in, he got to his feet and set off in the opposite direction of my tree.

By that point, the other dogs had started to move and stretch as they were rudely jostled awake. I saw Akino try to grab Kakashi's pant leg before he could get out of the circle of fur, only to miss and watch as Kakashi disappeared into the woods.

Akino turned to Shiba, who looked at Ūhei and then suddenly the whole pack was just kind of exchanging confused and worried glances.
Then Pakkun looked up at me. After a second or two of more staring at each other, all seven other dogs followed suit.

...Well, that was one way to say "not It."

"All right." I said in little more than a whisper. I knew when I was outvoted. I slid over the side of the branch and silently dropped to the forest floor, with maybe a crunch of a leaf underfoot to give me away if someone was actually listening. To the dogs, I pointed at my eyes and then at theirs.

If they wanted me to take over their duty as therapists, then they had to be my eyes out here.

Pakkun nodded for all of them.

Well, okay then.

Then I set off after Kakashi.

I didn't really make any attempt at real stealth. Kakashi either knew I was heading his way or he didn't, and if he didn't want to see me, then that was just too bad. From long and arduous experience, I knew that getting actual feelings talk out of Kakashi was a lot like trying to move the metaphorical immovable object.

I guess frustration was slowly turning me into the unstoppable force in that equation. I hoped it didn't result in a world-annihilating explosion, but that would just be our luck.

...Honestly, I wasn't feeling the whole "humorous ramble" at that moment. More like a downward spiral. The forest was dark and eerily silent without the Konoha-based cicada background buzz. Kakashi wanting to be out here to stew in his thoughts wasn't a good sign.

At about that point, I found Kakashi.

He was on top of a giant white rock, which was half-engulfed in the roots of a second-generation tree. An older tree had collapsed at some point, and the new one had a cage of roots suspending it partially in the air. Somehow, Kakashi had found the only patch of stone that was relatively flat and shelf-like, giving him a chance to sit down and just stop for a while without losing feeling in his butt.

He looked up when I approached, looking down with his sole visible eye. It was difficult to read Kakashi's expressions at the best of time, but all I saw in that eye was a weary sort of darkness. Like he couldn't even see why I'd bothered coming after him, whether for good or bad.

I had never seen Kakashi look so small and defeated since Kannabi, and hope never to see it again.

I could feel myself try to smile reassuringly and fall short, because there were some times when smiles hurt more than they helped. A sad smile, then. Probably didn't reach my eyes. Or it did and there was a traffic accident because some jackass was going the wrong way on a two-lane road at a hundred kilometers per hour. Ten car pileup, clogs the roads for hours.

And I was being stupid and trying to distract myself with terrible extended metaphors, because filling the tense silence was almost too much.

I held out my hand, palm up. I took a deep breath and said, "Hey, Kakashi. Talk to me?"

Silence and stillness reigned for just long enough to make me wonder if I was making a totally hopeless gesture. If Kakashi didn't want to talk, then there wasn't really anything I could do to make him. I'd already run in circles with him months ago after Kannabi, for all that I'd been the one on the defensive back then. Should I have pushed at all?

Then he took my hand. He slid down off the rock without letting go and, once on the ground, nodded once.

He let me lead up into the branches of a nearby monster of a tree, with lower branches so large that each one of them could be turned into a park bench with little modification. I cut excess branches off the main one so that we could have a private place to talk, sound masked by the other branches and leaves around us.

I would have gone for a riverbank, but there weren't really many of those and, despite the dramatic element, sound carried over water pretty easily.

Anyway, once we were safely set up, I asked, "Do you want to talk about what happened today?"

Kakashi gave me a weary look.

Right. Probably could have picked a different question to start off with. Er… "Kakashi, I'm not going to make fun of you or anything. But I'm worried about you and I'm not really sure what to say to make things better."

Kakashi blew out a frustrated breath. "Why should I, when you haven't said what happened to you?"

"…Huh?" I blinked.

"You were using the Three-Tailed Beast's power. It's why your eye is like that." Kakashi said flatly.
"What made you do it?"

Making allowances for the circumstances, it was about as scathing of an indictment as he seemed able to manage. I'd almost forgotten that people tended to be afraid of the roommate taking up space in my chakra coils. Or soul. Depended on how you looked at it, really.

"…I couldn't get out of the genjutsu trap on my own." I said, sighing. I drummed my fingers on my knee, trying to think of what to say. "I saw a peaceful life, with Dad still alive"—well, one of them —and my brother and I all grown up. The worst thing I had to worry about was whether I'd get sunburned on a given day, or if I was going to land a job as a civilian teacher." I laughed, sudden and faintly bitter. "We even had enough time to have dogs. It was pretty hard to leave behind, even knowing that my life really isn't like that."

It wasn't now, anyway.

"So, he saved me. I mean, he did it in about the worst way I could think of short of eating my dream-family, but I'm here." I tried playing it off, shrugging. "Then I ran around finding out what those butterflies were capable of. No big deal."

Kakashi was silent for long enough to make me nervous. Then, "I saw my parents, too."

"…What were they like? I never asked." I regretted that, but how many opportunities did I honestly have to talk about the subject of families in a team full of orphans? (Sensei almost being a father notwithstanding.)

Kakashi sighed. "My father was Konoha's White Fang. I'm sure you knew that. He was…strong.
Stronger than the Sannin were, back then, and loyal to a fault." He took a deep breath. "He trained me. He was always patient, steady. Like I couldn't make him angry if I tried."
And look how the village had repaid him.

"In the genjutsu world, he was still alive." Kakashi rested his chin on the heel of his hand. "Mother, too."

…I had to admit, I knew precisely fuck-all about Kakashi's mother. As far as the manga's narrative went, she might as well have not existed, which was worrying on several levels.

"What was her name?" I asked quietly.

"Satomi. She was a member of the Inuzuka clan." He shook his head. "She died when I was three, so I don't remember her very well. She had a partner named Asagi, who died in the field with her. The woman I saw in the genjutsu…she was very kind. My life was different with her there. I was…happier."

I said, "She sounds like a great mother."

"I wouldn't know." Kakashi said tonelessly. "…How did yours end?"

"The genjutsu?" I sighed and stared into the middle distance. "My family was at the beach, and the Three-Tails came charging out of the surf. I realized the world wasn't real, and it came apart. It started collapsing even before I dispelled it." I picked absently at my fingernails. "I should have known better. But it felt like a good dream, you know; the kind you wish would last longer."

Kakashi made a neutral noise.

I reached over and offered my hand again. After looking at it as though not sure why I'd bother, he took it.

"You were the one who broke the genjutsu, right?" Kakashi asked. It seemed like he already knew the answer, but had to ask anyway just to confirm.

"Yeah. You didn't wake up when Pakkun bit you or when I moved you off the seal, so I had to dismantle it the long way." I explained.

Kakashi blinked, slowly. "…I see."

"Did it cause some kind of backlash?" I asked, worried.

"Yes."

Crap.

"Genjutsu often have secondary effects, if they're powerful. Try to think your way out without canceling it, and sometimes it tears into you to keep you." Kakashi murmured. He wasn't looking at me. He was kind of just staring at nothing out ahead of him.

I bit my lip. "I'm sorry, Kakashi. I didn't know."

As though he couldn't help himself, he said, "It showed me Kannabi." His eyes were dark and strangely blank. "Or at least, Kannabi if you and Obito had just let me die and moved on with the mission."

Oh, no.

I imagined it almost automatically. Stupid overactive brain.
Kakashi, kept under genjutsu torture until he broke or died or his captors got tired of his resistance and just killed him. Not-Obito and not-me coming back with Sensei in tow and pulling his mangled body out of that cave, slashed throat and empty eye sockets bleeding all down his front long after his heart stopped.

Kakashi, bleeding out in the dark because no one in Iwa gave a shit about medical care or POWs and definitely not both together. Dying alone and by inches, knowing that rescue, if on its way, would get there too late. Feeling his heart slow, beat by beat.

Kakashi, being brought back to Iwa and kept like some kind of sick trophy because of whose son he was, or whose student, or just because he was a captive jōnin and would probably break free if they didn't break him to heel. Screaming and struggling against new tormentors and new tortures every day, until something gave.

Kakashi being picked up by Madara and either twisted into a monster or being eaten by a Zetsu for not listening to a geriatric lunatic's dreams for vengeance. Disappearing under a swarm of hungry, fanged mouths, until nothing was left but a bloodstain and a memory.

I felt my stomach turn over.

"Kakashi—" I began, but he didn't want to hear it.

"If I'd died there—really died—you would have been able to go home. There was nothing keeping you from leaving me behind and just completing the mission." Kakashi pressed on. "I probably…if it'd been Obito instead of me, I would have left."

No, he wouldn't have. Not when I charged in or Obito had his heart-to-fist-to-face conversation with Kakashi and changed his mind. Kakashi was a lot of things, including occasionally a jackass, but he wasn't cruel.

"Well, I don't think you would have." I said firmly. "Whether it was me or Obito or Rin, it's not something you're capable of."

"But—" Kakashi began, but I talked right over him in a vehement whisper.

"Kakashi, there was no way Obito and I would leave you, either. You didn't see our end of things, when you were taken and we were left with a mission objective and a missing captain and we both realized we couldn't function like that." I blinked rapidly, trying to figure out when I'd started feeling like I was going to cry. "We just wouldn't do that."

"You did in the genjutsu." Kakashi squeezed my hand. "I didn't mean it like that, Kei. I know you'd never…"

"Yeah, well." I rubbed my eyes with the back of my free hand. "Good."

Kakashi gave me a long look. "…You were worried about me."

"Well, of course I was." I frowned. Was that unusual in Kakashi's world? "I've never seen you shaky like that before. And knowing what my genjutsu was like, I wasn't gonna take any chances."

Kakashi was silent. Then, swallowing thickly, he added, "That…wasn't everything."

I nudged him with my shoulder, wordlessly encouraging.

"The worst one—two—images came up at the end." Kakashi said, with some difficulty. "One of them was what would've happened if, back then, you'd been a bit faster. Or slower."

"Faster" would have meant he kept his original eye, or at least I thought so. I didn't say as much, though—Obito's Sharingan activating had been a stroke of luck that it didn't pay to jinx even long after the fact.

"Even if I'd lived, I…I don't think I would've been able to live with the idea that,"—and here, Kakashi paused again, squeezing my hand a little tighter—"that my stupidity would get the whole team killed. Or captured, which is close enough…”

...Funny how that had been my own thought process before Kannabi even happened. Instead, it had played out in a way that broke us both without actually taking us out of the picture. Not funny "ha-ha," but more funny "are you fucking kidding me, RNG."

We sat there in the tree for a while without saying anything, killing time by stewing in our own thoughts. At least, until a thought hit me and I had to voice it. Tact, thy name is not Kei.

"…Can I ask you about something else, while we're here?"

Kakashi nodded.

Okay, time for the slightly older nagging worry. "Why haven't you been using the Sharingan on this mission?"

Kakashi blinked. "Sorry?"

Perhaps out of newly-renewed concern for his feelings, I added, "I mean, yeah, it might have helped, but I'm mostly just curious at this point. You don't need to apologize."

"No, I mean…” Kakashi trailed off, but not out of distress. If anything, he just seemed confused. "I thought you were afraid of it."

…Huh? "What do you mean?"

"After that training session, when you pulled on the Three-Tailed Beast's power, I thought it was because you were afraid or angry because of me. It felt like that was how it worked before." Kakashi explained, still confused. "And then you used its chakra again on this mission, and you said you were worried… So, I thought you only pulled on its chakra when you were afraid of something. Or for someone."

"Oh! Oh, no, that wasn't because of me." Well, not completely. "Remember when you used the Sharingan to put me to sleep when I was being stubborn, after we got Obito back?"

"Yes." He looked like he didn't know where I was going with things. Sort of a failing of geniuses—either assuming everyone thought the same way, or assuming they didn't.

"Well, the Three-Tails was the one who was afraid, not me. And it was ugly—he's afraid of being controlled, since he's seen in my head that it's possible." I gave Kakashi a lopsided smile. "We've been trying to work through it since, and it's not like he's reacted like that to Obito or Honoka. It's, well, just been you because of that time."

"I didn't realize that Tailed Beasts were smart enough to be afraid of anything." Kakashi admitted.

Only because humans seem to assume we're beasts of burden. Or natural disasters. Isobu paused. Odd how you never did, even considering your…eccentricities, human.
Different upbringing, I guess.

I turned my attention back to Kakashi. "They are. It's just that people don't assume there's anything to them. And when I told you how to shut him down, I admit that I wasn't being fair to him. Or you. I didn't mean to hurt you."

"It's fine." Kakashi looked at me curiously. "Can you…talk to it—uh, him?"

I nodded.

"...Well, tell him I'm sorry. I thought it was for a good cause, but using the Sharingan on you—both of you—wasn't really called for." Kakashi said, dead serious.

Well?

...I'll think on it. Isobu grumbled, wary. Just don't do it again. Ever.

"He says he'll forgive you if you promise to never do it again." I told him. I shrugged. "I don't really expect him to let go of his hatred for humans all at once, but it's still progress."

Kakashi inclined his head. "I'll keep that in mind."

More silence.

I was definitely learning to hate silence.

"Is it all right if I ask what the other nightmare was?" I asked hesitantly, because there was such a thing as pushing too far and I never learned where the line was.

"Same as the last image," Kakashi said, a little bitterly. "And related to the Sharingan thing, since we weren't talking about it."

And a problem ignored in perpetuity got along with "mental stability" about as well as a broken foot got along with "triathlon."

I nudged him again.

Kakashi sighed, as though to say "Really, Kei?" But instead of just ignoring me, which he had managed to do quite well with Obito in years past (barring special circumstances), "...I dreamed that the Sharingan burned the you out of your body and the Tailed Beast just went berserk. I wouldn't...I couldn't kill you when I'd done that, and Obito..."

I could guess. Obito, soft-hearted as Kakashi thought he was, probably wouldn't have gone through with that either. Not even in Kakashi's head.

"Sensei had to put you down, but by then..." Kakashi shook his head. "There wasn't anything left of our team."

"...No offense to your subconscious meant, but between the promise you just made and the fact that the Three-Tails and I get along okay, I think we'll be all right." I said mildly. "Not that it's bad to worry—I've heard the stories before, and without the Sharingan involved—but I'll do my absolute best to not let that happen."

Kakashi looked at me for a long moment before sighing and rolling his visible eye.

...Well, that was settled remarkably painlessly. I had fully expected a shouting match. Still, I said, "I can believe you were avoiding me for a month over that. We really need to talk things out more."

Kakashi made a noncommittal noise. It could have been "sure," "eh," or even "whatever" said without syllables. Then he looked down at our joined hands, as though wondering why I was still holding his.

Well, if he was back to his usual closemouthed jackass self, then I really didn't have anything to complain about. Other than the jackass-ness.

I shifted my grip on his hand so, instead of just holding on, our fingers were interlaced. "Oh, one last thing." Because why the hell not?

Kakashi had about enough time to wonder what the fuck I was doing before I reached over and enveloped him in a quick hug. Just for good measure, I kissed his cheek—granted, over the mask. Mom would kiss me and my brother on the cheek when we were little, as much for reassurance as to remind us that she was the one who looked after us when we inevitably got into scrapes. In both lives. Guess I learned something from that fucking genjutsu after all.

Kakashi let go of my hand and brought his up to his cheek with a poleaxed look, but I was already sliding down off the tree. "Promise me we'll talk if something comes up, all right?"

Kakashi nodded, looking a little like he'd been thrown off-kilter, and I headed back to camp. He'd find his own way, probably.

Jackass he might be, but Kakashi was Team Minato's jackass and we wouldn't trade him for anything.

Anyway, the rest of the night passed without major incident.

Kakashi wandered back into camp about five minutes after I did, and went right back to the puppy pile of dogs, who clamored (silently) for his return. Within another fifteen minutes or so, he was asleep, and I was able to resume my watch shift in piece.

An hour after that, I woke Ensui for his shift and bedded down myself. While it hadn't been the kind of night where we had to get up in the middle and fight off attacks of hungry midges or something, I was still exhausted emotionally through the power of sheer relief at getting all of that emotional stuff out of the way.

Hopefully, tomorrow would be a better day.

In the morning, I woke up with Bisuke treating my stomach like a bed and Shiba's mohawk poking me in the nose. When I sat up a little, I realized I'd been incorporated into the puppy pile rather thoroughly—perhaps for a job well-done?

I guess things worked out after all. At least, for a bit.

---

We got home within the next week mostly because we ran most of the way. Not a lot happened on our way back, really. The weather was fine and we didn't get stopped by the Land of Rivers' border patrol or anything, beyond a cursory check from thirty meters off. If I wanted, I could sum it all up in a single sentence, like so: we hoofed it the whole way, rescued a little girl (without getting paid for it), and also had another round of hot-pot at some border town barely sixty kilometers outside of Konoha.
The cause of that last one was Honoka getting "incredibly hungry" in the middle of the day, and apparently ration bars by the handful didn't fill her stomach that well.

It probably wasn't worth it to question the commanding officer's quirks while she was still in charge, so I didn't.

By the time we got to the village, it was the twenty-second of August and summer was apparently not only in full force but also taking its vengeance upon the Land of Fire. Konoha specifically, of course.

"Identification?" asked the gate guard as we signed back in.

"Team Honoka plus one, reporting from Tanigakure." Honoka said, glancing at me.

"Keisuke Gekkō, returning from Mount Soragami via Tanigakure." I added.

"Reporting to the Hokage?" the guard asked, scribbling rapidly on his spreadsheet.

"Of course." Honoka said.

About twenty seconds later, the reply we got was, "All right, head on through."

And then we were on our way to Sensei's office. Honoka and Ensui took off on ahead, pouring on the speed for some reason Kakashi and I weren't let in on. Instead, the two of us took a more sedate route and didn't have to dodge quite so many bugs to the face.

What, you think moving super-fast through the market district doesn't mean bug splatter? Most shinobi didn't have goggles either, for some reason I was finding stranger and stranger the longer I thought about it.

Regardless, we got to Sensei's office more-or-less on time. In fact, we were just in time to see Honoka and Ensui enter the room a hair's breadth before us. When we tried to follow, though—

"Kei, Kakashi, I'm going to have to ask you to wait to give your report." Sensei said, blocking the door. He wasn't wearing the official Hokage hat and robe, but Tsunade basically never had while she'd been in her office, either. Apparently the Third's insistence on doing so hadn't actually been a requirement of the post.

"This is another one of those security things, isn't it?" I asked.

"Exactly. I'll take your reports separately, so please wait outside for a bit." And with that, he shut the door in our faces. I felt the office's security seals go active a second later.

Okay then.

The Hokage's office didn't really have a waiting room—just a hallway—so Kakashi and I took up positions on the opposite sides of the door like we were guards ourselves. Theoretically speaking, every world leader did have guards, but shinobi tended to find out that usually the VIP was the most dangerous person in the immediate area, at least when it came to the various whatever-Kage. It made me feel a little less awkward about being made to sit outside of the room like a disobedient school-kid, so I did it anyway. Kakashi was probably mostly showing solidarity.

Besides, I liked to think that Kakashi and I could manage a pretty intimidating image between the two of us. I was a kunoichi with a huge scar across my face that I had obviously survived, and Kakashi stood out in a crowd thanks to his mask and slanted headband and the fact that he grew like a weed.

Heh.

Regardless of our (my) posturing, Sensei opened the door again about ten minutes later.

"I'll get their written report later. Kakashi, if you would," he said, letting Kakashi enter the room first. But before I could enter, he said, "No, Kei, not yet."

Kakashi looked back at me, expressionless, before the door closed in my face again.

For fuck's sake.

Another round of waiting ensued.

"Kei-senpai!"

Or not. Just as I was about to see how bored I could get before starting to pace, Rin appeared around the corner. Almost immediately, Obito's head appeared right after her, along with the rest of him.

I was immediately hugged by both parties, and hugged them both back hard enough to make Rin squeak.

Rin had apparently taken to wearing purple hairclips since the last time I'd seen her, and was wearing a V-necked black shirt with a silver vine pattern running up the side seam. She still wore thigh-length black socks, but today was apparently dark blue pencil-skirt day. Around her arm, pinned to her sleeve, was an armband with the Konoha General logo stitched onto it in black. And while she was wearing her headband as usual, Obito's goggles also retained their resting place over it.

Obito, meanwhile, had mostly decided to just dress like an ordinary chūnin would—flak jacket, dark blue uniform pants and shirt with sleeves rolled up—with the minor addition of a proper medical patch over his missing eye. He was more tanned than he had been, had apparently bought a new pair of goggles with white rims and orange plastic lenses, and had a pressure glove visible on his right arm that covered it from fingertip to elbow. The other detail I noticed, when I had a moment, was that the red spiral of Uzushiogakure—common to all Konoha uniforms—had been replaced by the Uchiha fan on a four-pointed black star.

"So, you,"—here I addressed Rin—"got promoted to lead field medic on mission rosters while you"—and here, Obito—"got into the Military Police? I was only gone for couple of weeks."

"Well, technically I—" Rin began.

"Actually—" Obito started, at the same time.

Then they stopped, looked at each other, and burst into giggles.

...Something had obviously changed.

I crossed my arms and shifted all my weight to my back leg, like I was some kind of disapproving schoolteacher. "I'm waiting, you two."

"I'm sort of in the, uh, probation period?" Obito gave me an "I dunno" look. I kind of agreed—but then, maybe Obito had done something during the test that he didn't want to tell me about. "I asked, but I'm not gonna be allowed to do more than shadowing and assisting with arrests and patrol until I'm fifteen."
"And I have been working with Akihito-sensei. He says he's thinking about retiring from being an active practitioner since the war is over, so the hospital is putting all of the field-qualified medics through as many examinations as we can. I was promoted during the last round." Rin looked almost like she was going to burst from happiness. "I'm working on a restorative jutsu to help with Uchiha eye strain for right now."

And if she succeeded—if it was the particular eye strain I was thinking about—then the Uchiha clan would just about demand that she married into the clan to keep her. Or perhaps pay her an entire mountain of gold. Depending, of course, on whether or not it worked.

"Compared to all that, I don't feel like I'm exactly doing much." I admitted after a second or two to absorb all the new info.

"Didn't Sensei tell you yet?" Obito asked, sounding surprised.

"Tell me what?" I raised an eyebrow. "He's asked everyone on his last mission to report separately. I haven't even talked to me yet."

Obito seemed like he was about to say something, but Rin put her hand over his mouth and said, "Then we won't spoil the surprise."

"But what happened on your mission, Kei?" Obito said from behind Rin's hand, before pushing her arm away. "Sensei only said you'd been reassigned, but he didn't say why or anything."

"Tanigakure." I shrugged—wasn't like that particular detail was classified or anything—and went on, "Things got weird, and Kakashi's in there giving his report."

"He is?" Rin shot a glance at the door. "Were there any injuries?"

"Nothing I couldn't handle." And nothing a therapist didn't deserve first shot at.

"Kei-senpai." Rin said disapprovingly, like she knew I was hiding something. A lot of somethings, perhaps. Which, because of who I was and how I'd chosen to behave, I always had. The "what" varied by person.

"Why would Sensei make everyone give separate reports?" Obito asked instead.

I shrugged again. "Dunno."

I had theories, of course. It may have had to do with Kakashi's ANBU candidacy. It may have had something to do with how Honoka and Ensui were likely members of ANBU and had different clearance levels. It may have had to do with the fact that I carried Isobu with me, or with the events of the mission when we brought Obito back. Because of all that, each of us would probably end up with enough loose ends in our respective stories for Sensei to knit a sweater.

 Basically, it was easier on Sensei if we just kept to ourselves about those things and let him (or his backup paperwork ninja squad) figure out the real meaning behind everything.

"Well, it sucks that they're keeping you waiting." Obito huffed. "How long do you think it'll take?"

"It might take a while." Meeting Rin's eyes, I said, "It's complicated and probably halfway classified."

Rin frowned. "But Kei-senpai, the Hokage already—"
At that point the door opened again and Sensei poked his head out. He looked a little surprised to find all three of us standing in the hall and chatting, to be perfectly honest.

But the expression was wiped away by a smile almost as soon as it appeared, and he said, "Your turn, Kei."

I sighed inwardly. I wasn't exactly looking forward to a potential feelings-biopsy. "Rin-chan, Obito? Track down Kakashi and invite him for lunch or something. I'll pay you back later."

Both of them looked really concerned when I said that. What could have possibly happened to make me ask, they probably wondered.

I'd tell them if I got permission. Not before.

"All right, Sensei." I said, and stepped into his office.

Looking around, I had to admit that the Hokage's office was neater than it'd been since the Third had been the one wearing the hat. Sensei had a stack of paperwork to one side of his desk, upon which the official hat sat, and a lunch tray (mostly untouched) on the other. One of the windows was open, and even at that moment Sensei crossed the room to close it.

Since privacy seals didn't work when locations weren't mostly sealed shut, I had to conclude that when shinobi didn't feel like using the stairs, the windows of even the Hokage's office became viable options.

Sensei sat down at his desk, picked up a pen, and met my eyes evenly. "Report."

"Did Kakashi tell you what happened?" I asked, though it was against protocol.

"...Yes." His blank expression softened a bit. "I sent him to Kushina, and I think that Rin and Obito will be good for him, too. Don't worry about him right now, Kei."

I bit the inside of my cheek to keep from responding to that out loud. Kakashi was far enough from "okay" that he couldn't see it with a telescope. I wasn't going to just stop worrying.

I looked at the ceiling, trying to think…and promptly let out a bark of startled laughter.

There, on the overhead fluorescent light, was a piece of paper that had been thoroughly taped to said light. It read, "Your answers aren't up here."

"Like the addition?" Sensei asked knowingly. "Kushina thought of it."

"Yeah, I"—had seen the same sign in my old life, somewhere—"think it works." I shook myself, then settled in place with my hands in my pockets. I really did feel better, even if I'd only laughed a bit. "Thanks, Sensei. I'm ready to start."

"Begin wherever makes sense." Sensei suggested.

I did.

"I spent a week in Sorayama, as a part of my mission for the Chinatsugumi." I began. I had technically been on a different mission than Team Honoka until we got to Tani, after all. "Jiraiya-sama informed me of his mission's parameters and consulted with me, as well as telling me about, uh, Operative Crane."

Sensei nodded. So it apparently was a thing, and not just because Jiraiya felt like reassuring me about
"I spent most of that time trying to relax, and to train." I sighed. "I discovered that the more powerful jutsu I have are, uh, mostly uncontrollable now. I could train myself up to B-rank in Water Release if I pushed myself, but the further I went the more likely it was that the Three-Tailed Beast's chakra would try to push through the seal or something. I'm pretty sure I've lost the use of the Rasengan, and I was performing at half-capacity through most of the mission with Team Honoka, by my estimation."

Of course, without Isobu I wouldn't exactly have been able to survive using too many high-end jutsu very often. Even as he increased my effective (and personal) chakra capacity, he punched reckless holes through my control apparently by accident.

I held out my hand to Sensei, showing him my palm. "I also discovered that I can lay instant seals, as long as it's just the explosive type. I'm sure if I asked Kakashi about the last mission we were on before this—and he wanted to talk about my blackouts—then I'd know more. But it was like I just woke up and could pull it off."

Sensei's brows knit together worriedly. "While I'm glad you've found a new talent, how long has this trouble with your chakra been happening?"

"Since…a little before I left." I bit my lip. "My chakra sense has also been spotty lately, but I don't know why. I mean, I'm used to not being able to think past the feedback I get if a jutsu is too strong, but…"

Sensei hid his alarmed look rather well, except for the bit where his eyes went a bit wider than normal. "Continue, please."

"Then I got your letter, telling me to meet up with Team Honoka by the fourteenth. I did, with Tsuruya's help, and was told that our mission was to investigate the countryside around Tanigakure for some kind of bandits, I think.

"Obviously, I wasn't told everything that was going on." I bit my lip for just a second. "But what I heard was that we were going to be stomping on a local warlord and his lackeys until he died, and clearing up the genjutsu minefield around his territory. It seemed straightforward, given the genjutsu resistances we all had. We should have been fine."

"But you weren't." Sensei filled in.

"No, we weren't. Honoka and Ensui assured us ahead of time that the mission would be nothing we couldn't handle, but there must have been false information in the chain somewhere." I shook my head. "We killed both of the enemy's enforcers, and we got a location out of them. But when we got there, everything was dead. The villagers, the supposed bad guy…and we decided to assault the fortress anyway."

Funny how I could have flashbacks to something that had happened barely a week ago. "Turned out that the entire territory was overrun with chakra-eating butterfly summons, who had devastated the area. There were only about fifty genjutsu mines—the rest were exploding seals, and we found out later that the butterflies had the ability to mimic seals, complete with effect. The originals, though, were what Kakashi and I were hit with."

"Are you all right?" Sensei asked.

"…It hurt, I guess, but the Three-Tails managed to get me out of mine inside of five minutes. I found out that the Three-Tailed Beast's chakra made me repel the butterflies as soon as I got too close, so I had plenty of chakra." I rubbed the back of my neck awkwardly. "I ran around inside the castle trying to find everyone after that, and I found Pakkun. Pakkun led me to Kakashi, and..." I swallowed. "I think he might have found out where the supposed mastermind was, but he got caught along the way. The butterflies were trying to eat all of his chakra, and once I got them off him I found out why he hadn't chased them off."

"Caught in a genjutsu." Sensei guessed, though it didn't really sound like a question. "He told me."

"...Right." Not sure if he'd told Sensei what he saw. From Sensei's expression, though, it looked like he had. "I disrupted the seal lines to break the genjutsu trap, but it may have made the effects worse."

...Because, honestly? The more I talked about it, the more the genjutsu sounded like a starter version of the Eternal Tsukuyomi. And felt like how that technique was described, up until Isobu had crashed the party.

"Anyway," I continued, "we found the supposed mastermind a little after that. That was when we found the butterfly summon contract, which Honoka thought the Aburame would like to experiment with. Turned out they weren't malicious." I shrugged. "We took the scroll, did our best to clear the surrounding area of bodies and various trap seals, and came back home."

Sensei raised an eyebrow.

"On the way back home," I went on obligingly, "we found and rescued a little girl who was probably from Jōmae and likely a spy in the making." I shrugged. "I don't know, it was just something we did an extra twenty minutes."

"Kei." Sensei said flatly.

So much for keeping private conversations private.

"Okay, okay." I sighed. "A little after we recovered the summon contract, I noticed Kakashi was having nightmares. His dogs volunteered to take over my watch shift so I could go talk to him outside of camp." I looked at the ceiling again, but it wasn't as funny the second time. "We ended up talking a lot about what he'd seen in the genjutsu. I...I didn't know his mother's name. I knew about his father, but..." I was wringing my hands by that point. Noticing that, I stopped. "Kakashi grows guilt complexes like weeds. He doesn't talk about his feelings much, but..." Agh, dammit. Sensei might as well have been Kakashi's second father.

"Kakashi believes that Obito and I—and maybe others—would have been happier if he'd died at Kannabi. If we'd left him behind." I closed my eyes briefly, swallowing hard. "And he blames himself whenever the Three-Tailed Beast's chakra acts up while he's around, to the point of not using his Sharingan around me even when it would have helped us. I did my best to set him straight on that, since the Three-Tails and I have been working together without too many problems recently."

Sensei said nothing for a while, apparently turning that over in his head. "You've been working with the Three-Tails."

"...Was I not supposed to?" I asked blankly. "Because there's a giant three-tailed turtle in my chakra coils and working without him is pretty difficult."

"I'd hesitate to say 'no' in this case." Sensei replied carefully. "But just in case, report to my house at noon tomorrow. Kushina and I need to take a look at your seal and see what we can do about your chakra control. In the meantime, meditate and try not to use your chakra too much."
Great.

Sensei glanced at the clock on the wall, frowned for a split second, and then said, "You're dismissed for now, Kei. I expect a written report on the Land of Rivers mission by the twenty-fourth."

With that, Sensei stood up from his desk and walked around it so that he was standing directly in front of me. Then, very slowly and carefully, like he was afraid I might object, Sensei enveloped me in a hug.

"As your sensei and not your Hokage," Sensei told me, "thank you for looking after your teammates, even when they make it difficult. I'm just asking you to be careful with yourself, too."

I hugged him back, fiercely. "I will, Sensei."

And after that, I went home.

Chapter End Notes

"Rather Be" by Clean Bandit was the song on loop this time.
Here's an easy example of how time flies: Naruto was due in less than two months.

How's that for a timeline stepping up its game?

I prodded disinterestedly at my bowl of somen noodles, not feeling all that hungry. Birds were singing in the trees, the sun was shining, and I'd just gotten back from a mission that had cost a good chunk of chakra to survive. By all rights, I should have been devouring anything food-like with the same enthusiasm an Akimichi did. Somehow, my appetite remained nonexistent in the face of that one fact.

August twenty-third, and there was still so much to do to prepare.

"Kei-chan, are you going to be able to watch your brother this afternoon?" Mom asked from the front hallway, where she was putting on a pair of non-shinobi sandals.

"Only until about noon." I told her, finally getting up from the table and deciding to dump the noodles back into the pot on the stove. I hadn't touched them except with chopsticks, so they were probably fine. "Then I have a meeting with the Hokage."

"Oh, that won't work." Mom said, halfway under her breath. She poked her head into the kitchen a moment later. "I'm going to be running errands all day. Akane Shiranui also invited me for lunch."

I wasn't aware that…wait, no, I'd just forgotten that Mom knew Genna's mother. Must have been infantile amnesia kicking in, entirely too many years too late.

"You can't take Hayate with you?" I asked.

"Not if he's going to be off with his class at four." Mom said.

I frowned. My brother was almost eleven years old, and about to embark on the only field trip of his school year, which would take place in the forests inside of the village's walls. It was more like a survival mission for children than anything, since they'd be able to hunt their own food and have to set up watch rotations. It was a new program, so I hadn't been on the trip, but apparently it was still a big deal for the mini-ninjas.

At least, that was what the release form had said.

"I'll keep track of him until noon. After that," I said evenly, "he's going to be spending the day with Iruka."

Mom didn't say anything for a while. Then, "You haven't been spending very much time with your brother lately."

...Um.

This was one of those conversations that could easily turn out to be a trap. If I said I was busy with shinobi things (which I was), Mom could argue that I had a responsibility to make sure that my brother was as prepared as I had been to enter that strange and chaotic world. If I said I was too caught up in the whole "Sensei is Hokage" thing, Mom could say that I was abandoning my family a bit for the sake of politics. Either way, the results would be less than ideal.

Now, there was no guarantee that Mom would be upset at my lack of time spent with Hayate. She hadn't sounded like it. She knew I had a busy life and that it had changed a lot in the last two months. But I felt my stomach twist anyway.

As much "fun" as I made of Kakashi for his guilt complex, I was the only one on our team for whom "being guilt-tripped into things by Mom" was actually a problem. Mainly because I was the only one with a living mother.

That was about when I gave myself a mental punch to the face and then focused on how to respond.

"Is there something you need me to teach him?" I asked hesitantly. I rinsed my bowl in the sink before turning back to face her.

"No." Mom was giving me a quizzical look. "I just want you to spend time with him."

...My shinobi paranoia did not have an off button, apparently.

"Okay." I said.

Mom sighed. After a moment, she crossed the kitchen and give me a quick hug. "I'm not upset, Kei-chan."

Well, I was.

If I got so caught up in trying to change the future that I forgot about the present, what the hell kind of person was I supposed to be? Naruto was coming, yeah, but I'd been neglecting Hayate while waiting for Fate's other shoe to drop onto my head.

Mom left, after making sure that Hayate would have a packed lunch for the afternoon and being sure that I'd look after him until he had to leave. Or I had to leave. Whichever.

Hayate finally got out of bed at around nine, at which point I let him eat breakfast before going into our family's plan for the day. I ended up eating a bunch of strawberries just while waiting for him to finish, which probably wasn't the healthiest option available. I just didn't care much.

Hayate said something around a mouthful of noodles that I didn't catch.

"Huh?"

Hayate swallowed and said, "You're usually gone in the morning, Sis."

"Oh, yeah." I shrugged. "No team training this morning. I'm not meeting up with anyone until later."

He looked around. "When did Mom leave?"

"Half an hour ago, maybe." I replied. "Finish your breakfast and we'll see what we can do this morning."

Hayate's eyes went wide. "Really?"

…What the hell kind of sister was I? Because from the looks of things, I was starting to get Sasuke vibes from my own brother, and not in the "vengeance" sense. Pre-Massacre Sasuke had been a devoted younger brother with enthusiasm for his older brother for so much as existing. I was suddenly more than a little worried that I'd been neglecting Hayate enough to look like the Itachi in this relationship.

"What are we going to do?" Hayate asked.

…Good question, little brother.

"My first suggestion would be to go out and eat something, but I think my timing's off." I shrugged. "What do you want to do?"

Hayate seemed to think about it, even as he started to eat faster and faster. He looked like he was eating quickly so that he could have more time with me, which was kind of cheering. If he was willing to risk throwing up later, I guess that counted as enthusiasm.

"Don't go too fast. I'm not going anywhere for another three hours, little brother." I told him.

Hayate finished a moment later, breathing a little harder than normal. As I snatched his bowl and chopsticks and started to wash them in the sink, he said, "Can you please show me how to walk on water?"

"Why water-walking?" I asked, glancing at Hayate curiously.

"It's cool!" He tilted his head to the side as he thought further about the topic before saying, "And none of the kids in my class can do it, besides maybe Tokuma, and he doesn't count."

Tokuma…Tokuma… "Who's that again?" I asked.

"He's a member of the Hyūga clan." Hayate said. "Everyone says his chakra control is really good, and he has a lot of it."

I hadn't learned water-walking until his age, for all that I'd had effectively perfect chakra control back then, mostly because I didn't have anyone to teach me or the reserves to pull it off for long. While my chakra control had obviously suffered since then, I was still happy enough that Hayate wanted to learn.

There was a pond somewhere in this district…

"All right. Get dressed and"—and here I had to pause, because Hayate rushed out of the kitchen with all the shinobi speed he could muster. To the figurative dust cloud he left behind, I said, "Sheesh."

"I'm almost read—ow!" Hayate shouted, probably tripping on a discarded shirt or something. His room was a bit of a mess. "I'm okay!"

I finished with the utensils and with cleaning up the kitchen table just as my brother ran back into the kitchen, appearing around the corner before skidding to a stop. At least he didn't break anything when he stopped.

My brother was dressed in an old, paint-smeared t-shirt and swim trunks, and had a towel slung around his neck.

"You're being slow!" Hayate told me, even as he fought to get his sandals on.

"Sure thing, Hayate." I replied easily. I put everything away, then headed to my room to get ready for my own sake.

Granted, I didn't need to worry about getting dunked in a pond, but Hayate tended to splash a lot when there was more than a centimeter of water in any one place. I still grabbed some old pants with the knees practically worn through, a faded black t-shirt with both sleeves ripped off, and both of our lunches. And a duffel bag, which had spare clothes, towels, and a very small medical kit.

We ended up heading to training ground three, mostly because it was convenient and because I didn't feel like facing the crowds around the other major rivers today. Mostly because of the presence of the memorial stone, most teams didn't rent out Team Minato's usual training grounds much.

I threw the duffel onto the riverbank, and Hayate tossed his towel on top. We managed to get set up quickly, since there were only two of us and there was no special equipment to fish out of summoning scrolls or anything.

"What do I do first?" Hayate asked, practically bouncing in place.

"The first thing you're going to do is warm up." I told him, crossing my arms over my chest.

"But that's the boring part," he grumbled.

"If I have to run you through all of Mom's drills because the Academy teachers aren't being mean enough…" I trailed off ominously.

"Fine, fine!" Hayate jogged off, mostly traveling the edge of training ground three's signature clearing.

Trained shinobi could fight from a cold start, but we were kind of weird as far as human physiology went. While I certainly wasn't the greatest shinobi ever, I didn't require warm-ups so much as warning—usually from my chakra sense. A jolt of enemy chakra was like a shot of adrenaline for me, and when combined with the frankly superhuman levels of skill, speed and strength that shinobi could reach…well.

…I had to admit that I viewed Hayate's future as a chakra-powered soldier as a double-edged sword, but there wasn't much I could do about it when he was within a year of being there.

And even if he was just a kid at the moment, he was still a shinobi in training. That meant that he looped the training field a lot faster than his ten-year-old legs would have otherwise been capable of, in a universe where humanity had to obey mundane physics.

"I'm—hah—back." Hayate only panted a bit, which was to his credit.

"Try using more chakra next time. Otherwise, well done." I said, watching my brother's face light up.

I obviously had a guilty conscience, since just seeing how happy he seemed from that made me feel like I'd been a terrible sister.

"What now? Is it like the leaf exercise?" Hayate had learned the leaf-sticking exercise, but it was a lot easier to stick a leaf to your forehead than it was to suspend yourself on water through chakra alone.

"Eh, kinda. Sit down over here." I said, and led my brother over to the riverbank. I let my feet dangle out onto the water concentrating chakra carefully.

"Okay. Now what?" Hayate said. His feet, though, were sinking into the water.

I thought about it.

I took my sandals off and dropped them on the grass. "First thing's first—it's easier to practice if you're not wearing shoes, at least when you're starting out."

Hayate was already copying me.

"All right. Now, just hang on a second." I got up and stepped out onto the river, with perhaps a little more hesitation than usual. My control held, though. A good sign, given that I'd thought my condition was getting worse exponentially.

Then I turned back and faced Hayate, who'd stood up when I had. He seemed a little hesitant to try the walking part yet.

"Now try concentrating chakra into your feet." I said, watching him carefully.

Hayate brought his hands together into a seal—Bird—to concentrate. Even without my chakra sense at its best, I could tell that he was using too much and it wasn't going toward his feet at all. I remembered vaguely that people said chakra was hardest to mold with the bottoms of one's feet, but it'd been a while since I'd seen a concrete example thereof. Whoops.

"Try it now," I said anyway.

Hayate did, and promptly jerked in surprise when he fell through the water's surface anyway. At least we were only on the riverbank—he only got wet up to the tops of his feet.

"It didn't work!" Hayate frowned. "Why didn't it work?"

"Well, what did you do?" I asked, rather than answering.

"I used chakra like you said!" Hayate said, but he sounded more confused than angry. "...But I'm not sure it went to my feet."

"Channeling chakra to the bottom of your feet is supposed to be the hardest of the common chakra exercises." I said, tapping my big toe against the surface of the river. It was one of those basic skills that became second nature, like wall-walking and stabbing people. "It takes a long time to get right, but you should still perfect it while on your genin team."

"I don't see why I can't get it right now." Hayate said, hopping back onto the bank. "I'm going to try again."

"Go slower this time." I suggested. "I'll see what I can do to help."

"Okay." Hayate started concentrating his chakra again, gathering it in his core. That kind of thing was standard, as far as early education went—keep building pressure in your hara until you could finally feel it. I hadn't needed the practice, but it worked as a focusing technique.

"Stop and hold it there." I ordered, putting my hand against my brother's stomach, right above the pool of chakra I could feel. As soon as I felt his chakra stabilize where it was, I said, "Now, follow my finger down with your chakra. Push it down your leg, slowly."

Sweat broke out on Hayate's nose. I had to wonder how hard this was for him. Still, he said, "Got it."

I traced a very slow line down from my brother's stomach, down to his hip, down to his knee, and then down toward his foot. Along the way, his chakra sputtered and flickered hesitantly and often tried to vent out of a tenketsu in his leg—I wasn't quite sure where the tenketsu were, but I could guess.

Still, it got there in the end.

"Think you can do the other one on your own?" I asked.

"Uh-huh." Hayate said. He straightened up and shook out his leg, since chakra could leave a funny tingling feeling if you were doing something wrong.

"All right. When you're ready."

I don't know how long I spent with Hayate on the riverbank, just getting his chakra to listen and then taking a few hesitant steps out onto the river. I didn't correct him much, unless something was really wrong, and just kept him on task.

However long I spent, though, was probably too long.

Just as Hayate started wobbling on the water's surface, partly because he had made progress and partially because his chakra was getting pretty low, I felt a puff of chakra from a ways off. I automatically looked in that direction, though not out of alarm. More like curiosity.

"Kei, where have you been?" Obito called, jogging over to us.

"Where ha—ah, shit." I bit off the curse, though a bit too late. "Is Sensei mad?"

"I don't know, since I left like ten minutes ago." Obito said, shrugging. "So, ready for the meeting?"

I looked down at myself. A little waterlogged, dressed like a hobo, and definitely not in uniform. Glancing at Hayate—smaller hobo, or perhaps enterprising house-painter—I had to sigh. Fine. Whatever.

"Can you take Hayate to Iruka's house?" I asked. "Somehow I don't think anyone's going to be happy if I took the long way around Konoha."

Obito blinked. Then, "Well, sure. As long as you take this."

A kunai appeared in his hand, and he tossed it end-over-end to me. When I caught it, I immediately noticed that it was one of Sensei's three-pronged Flying Thunder God ones, which made me stifle a groan.

Of course he'd waste chakra like this.

"See you in ten, Kei!" Obito said cheerfully.

Just as Obito picked Hayate up like a sack of rice, grabbing our stuff as an afterthought, my world disappeared into whirling colors and a squeezing sensation.

Sensei was nowhere near above abusing the benefits of his signature technique, even if it effectively meant that everything he touched had some bizarre two-way summon contract with him.

A while later, I was lying on the floor of Sensei and Kushina's living room, with all the furniture pushed mostly out of the way. It probably should have been more intimidating than it was, given that I was shirtless except for a backwards hospital gown, and because I was undergoing a pretty thorough medical examination, but it somehow wasn't.

Kakashi was sitting on the upended couch, pretending not to pay attention to anything other than the spiral painted on the ceiling, while Obito had disappeared (from my perspective) into the kitchen for ice cream. Rin knelt by my left knee, peering at me anxiously, while Kushina bustled around on the floor with her sealing kit. Sensei sat by my head, chewing on the wooden end of his brush as he thought.

"Can I just point out how awkward this is?" I asked plaintively. The ceiling had gotten boring after five minutes.

"You said that a minute ago, Kei-senpai." Rin said distractedly. "And the minute before that. You're lucky this examination doesn't hurt."

"…True." I sighed. "Any conclusions yet, Rin-chan?"

"A few, but the tests aren't complete." Rin sat back for a moment, readjusting her hairclips so her hair didn't fall into her eyes. Then she said, "Kushina-san, could you please hand me another of those readout seals? I need to confirm something."

"Sure, Rin-chan." Kushina said, another of the seals appearing in her hand. I guess if I hadn't had one of those stuck to my forehead for a full minute, I would have appreciated their craftsmanship more.

Readout seals were sort of like the paper version of the diagnostic jutsu that Rin and I favored, only they could be read and copied like any other piece of paper instead of being limited to the user. The hospital used them for record-keeping, mostly, and apparently my particular problems had pinged enough of Sensei's CLASSIFIED warnings to make him decide that an in-(a)-home examination was the best idea. Hence Kushina creating her own.

Rin stuck the paper to my right wrist, activating it. I felt a bit of a drain as the tag latched onto my chakra, but not much else.

This is humiliating. Isobu grumbled, turning this way and that in my mindscape.

"At least it's probably only going to take another few minutes." I replied.

"I just got another spike in the Three-Tailed Beast's chakra." Rin said, frowning in concern at the seal.

"He and I talk a lot." I replied.

Sensei just made a noncommittal noise, showing that he'd understood the reply but hadn't come up with a response yet. Or maybe that there wasn't an appropriate response.

I was getting the impression that no one here approved of my survival strategies, as far as the whole "using demonic energy" thing went.

"How long have you been talking to the Three-Tails?" Obito asked, more curious than concerned.
"Because, well, I remember the whole panic thing a month ago, and it wasn't really something I thought you'd be okay with risking again."

"You'd be amazed how many problems can be solved by talking instead of stabbing." I muttered, shooting Kakashi a quick glare. So much for the apology to Isobu, if he was just gonna run to Sensei behind my back.

…Though, when I felt like being honest instead of irritated, I had to admit that he had a point.

From his perspective, I might as well have been preforming satanic rituals or feeding my brain to some kind of abomination. So much for convincing him that Tailed Beast rights were a valid thing to fight for.

"You're taking this remarkably well." Sensei commented, re-checking the seal on my chest for about the eighth time. "I expected you to be much more upset about the ambush examination, Kei."

"What, because you think I'm doing something stupid and I don't?" I sighed, looking at the ceiling. "I'm okay with people occasionally doing things for what they think is my own good. I mean, obviously I'd be a lot angrier if we were having this conversation in the hospital's basement or in ANBU headquarters, but we're not."

"That's, um, one way to look at it." Rin said, sounding both reassured and a little confused. She glanced down at the seal still stuck to my arm, before saying, "Also, I have the damage report for your chakra coils."

"Is it bad?" I asked from the floor.

"...Surprisingly, no." Rin said, sounding surprised. "I mean, obviously there is something weird going on with your chakra and you should be careful, but I can't find anything that shows you've been badly hurt by the Three-Tails."

Huh.

"What? Let me see that!" Kushina said, and snatched the seal off my wrist. I felt her chakra flare as she reset it, then a flash of annoyance as she put the stupid thing on my forehead.

"Which Gate are you—?" I started to ask.

"Shush! I'm trying to concentrate." Kushina cut me off.

For a bit, no one said anything.

Then, Obito said, "So, Sensei? Did you ever tell Kei about the thing?"

"The thing?" I asked blankly.

Sensei paused and then smacked himself in the forehead with his free hand. "I completely forgot."

"Stop talking!" Kushina told me sharply, casting annoyed looks at everyone.

Then Rin said hesitantly, "Hokage-sama, if I could…?"

"Hey, Kakashi, did you know about the thing?" Obito asked.

"No." Kakashi said, without looking up from a magazine he'd procured somewhere.
"You didn't even ask for a hint! Do you even know what I'm talking about? It's a big deal!" Obito protested.

"Hence the 'no.'" Kakashi said.

Kushina looked like she was about to just randomly start slapping people to get them all to shut up.

"Well, I don't see why not." Sensei was telling Rin.

Meanwhile, apparently Kakashi and Obito were going to have their first knock-down, drag-out brawl in months because they had too much energy for a small space. And maybe because they were both bored as heck.

"Will you all be quiet before I have to resort to random violence?" Kushina demanded. "You," by which she apparently meant me, "are up for consideration for a promotion to special jōnin, and as a member of the Hokage Guard Platoon. He," and here, Kushina indicated Kakashi while gesticulating with a calligraphy brush, "is going to be in ANBU by the end of September, if not sooner. Meanwhile he," this time, Obito, "is probably going to be jōnin by seventeen if he keeps breaking course records willy-nilly and Rin-chan is going to succeed that prick Yamaguchi by age twenty if she lives that long."

With that, Kushina pulled the seal off my forehead and concluded, "And your chakra is unbalanced by an overload of spiritual energy that makes absolutely no sense!"

I looked up at everyone. With the exception of Kushina, they all looked a little sheepish.

Huh. What would it be like to be a special jōnin? Hell, I hadn't really planned on being promoted at all. For a while, it seemed like my skills would level off at chūnin level and I'd be able to say that I was qualified for teaching small children how not to kill themselves with knives. Being a part of the Hokage Guard Platoon also sounded interesting if hilariously unlikely until a minute ago, since Sensei didn't need a guard. He'd never needed a guard. There was literally nothing a guard could do—other than be there—that Sensei couldn't do by himself with more force and more style.

...Also, spiritual energy? That had been a recurring problem, if I remembered my childhood all that well. I mean, I'd been reincarnated and obviously my mind wasn't exactly a perfect fit for my body, but that part of things had...oh.

Hard to say that part was the Dreamer's responsibility when she wasn't around anymore. Funny how, as a teenager, my spiritual energy was just fucking with my chakra control. What once had meant uncontrollable visions now meant collapsing control. Which, given the consequences for lousy chakra control, seemed worse.

...It still didn't explain why Isobu's chakra acted up anytime I tried to use a technique above B-rank, though.

"Oh, and my baby is going to be here in October and I fully expect all of you to babysit when I feel like pulling my hair out." Kushina added, "So be prepared for that."

"Can I talk now? Or sit up?" I asked. Not that the floor was dirty or anything, but lying on it for half an hour and talking to my examiners like I was getting brain surgery was not my idea of fun. Not that it probably mattered, but I still felt like I had to at least make my feelings known.

"You can obviously talk." Kushina said. She stuck the readout seal over my heart chakra, though, and said, "But don't get up right now, because I need to check on a few more things."
"So, you didn't seem surprised by the spiritual energy imbalance." Sensei commented, as Kushina muttered something inaudible to herself.

"I've kind of always had that problem." I said. "But I think that I've gotten lazy about managing it."

"Does this have anything to do with the whole vision thing?" Obito asked.

"It did." I replied. "Until I was eight and got my personality splintered by accident. Then the Dreamer managed it."

"...I still don't understand how that worked." Obito said after a moment.

"Wait, since when has Kei had a split personality?" Sensei looked a little like someone had pulled the rug out from under his feet.

I gave him a weird look. "Didn't I tell you about this yesterday, Sensei? Or even before that?"

Because, frankly, I was almost certain that I'd mentioned the voices a while ago, even if I hadn't framed it in terms of alternate personalities...

"No, I think I would have remembered that," was his reply, and his voice was a little sharper than usual. Oops. "Kei, I thought you meant you'd lost consciousness because the Three-Tails was stealing parts of your memory! Blackouts are one of the first signs of a Tailed Beast seal breaking down into uselessness."

I said, in a very small voice, "Oh."

Kushina burst out laughing.

Sensei sighed, pinching the bridge of his nose. "...How do you even...?"

"She told us the story before you got there, Hokage-sama." Rin said. "And after what happened, I guess we all forgot that none of you had been there. Jiraiya-sama didn't know either."

"And I obviously didn't." Kushina added, still grinning. "Well, Kei-chan, looks like you have some work ahead of you."

"...So, wait, this entire thing was pointless?" Obito asked.

"Well, no. I also found another thing." Kushina said. She held up the readout seal again. "Remember that black seal you both got from the creepiest old man ever?"

"Um, yeah." Obito said.

Kushina stood up, looming over the room despite actually being pretty short overall. "Both of you need to meditate to maintain the Evil Sealing Method variant that we used on it!"

"Meditate?" Obito looked blank. "But I thought that it was, I dunno, a one-and-done kind of deal. Like Kei's other seal."

Kushina took a deep breath, Lecture Mode engaged. "Not if you don't maintain it! The thing is, the Evil Sealing Method and seals like it are maintained by willpower! Madara's seal represents a constant struggle against the power of an evil jerk, even if you can't feel it all the time. It's only in stasis as long as both of you make sure you can fight the compulsion with your own chakra!"
I thought back, trying to remember how that had worked out for Sasuke and the Curse Seal of Heaven. Something, something, two Chidori in a row and then suddenly an effect like having tadpoles wiggle around under the skin like living tattoos…

"So, what does that mean when he has a Zetsu-cloned arm and I have a Tailed Beast problem?" I asked.

"Basically? You need to meditate anyway, since you're unbalanced in at least two senses of the word." Kushina said blithely, making me grin. "Obito, you always need to work on your chakra control, even if you can just copy jutsu off people now. Don't get lazy!"

Why was it that Kushina could always sum up the solution in five seconds when it would take anyone else five hours and a PowerPoint presentation?

"You heard her." Sensei said, and clapped his hands to snap us all out of our stupor. "Everyone up. Kei, get your shirt back on. I'm going to talk to you in a minute, but we need to clean up here so it looks a little less like a cult set up shop." He paused, probably for effect. "Well, get moving!"

We spent the next few minutes cleaning (after I'd put my shirt back on and taken the hospital gown off) before we were able to do much of anything. Rin also remembered that she had an afternoon meeting of some kind to get to, which meant she took off. Obito said something about patrol, which meant he escorted her out. Kakashi hid in one of the bedrooms, though I didn't really know why. Maybe he still felt raw after the mission.

"Am I gonna get a lecture?" I asked, once I'd noticed that basically everyone had vacated the premises except for Kushina and Sensei.

"…I was certainly thinking about it." Sensei sighed, cleaning his sealing kit's brushes in the sink. "I hope you aren't planning to make a habit of scaring me every time you turn around, Kei."

"I wasn't planning anything, which was kind of the problem." I said, scratching the back of my neck. "Sorry."

"If you expect to be a special jōnin, you're going to need to think things through more thoroughly." Sensei shook his head. "I can't believe you never told me about your blackouts."

"I didn't have any until that mission." I protested. "I've always had a voice in my head, though. For a while, it seemed like I was just getting a chance to control my weird circumstances and I could literally devote part of my mind to managing it. The Three-Tails is just less friendly." Then my train of thought looped back around, so I said, "Until that mission, I'd never been incapacitated on a mission without being rendered unconscious, so I guess things just happened."

"I meant more that you've apparently had the personality split since before I ever met you, Kei." Sensei told me.

"Same here. I have to admit, I didn't really think you'd have needed one." Kushina put in. "Most people who have splits usually, I don't know, have some kind of weird technique that goes with it. Like the Kurama clan."

"…I would be terrified to find out that I was a Kurama clan member, even if I did get an edge in genjutsu." I said. "I barely remember scraps about them from the anime and from my history class. Most of what I did remember—truly violent and often dominant alternate personalities plus Uchiha-level genjutsu hax—wasn't exactly flattering."

Sensei started drying his supplies. "Are you sure?"
"I think someone else would have noticed." I said, shrugging.

"Kei." Sensei snapped.

I gulped so hard I felt like I almost swallowed my tongue. Sensei didn't exactly use that tone often. "Yes, Sensei."

Sensei sighed again, deeply. "I expect you to hold to that."

"Yes, Sensei."

"And to keep me informed of new information that might help the village."

"Yes, Sensei."

"And to keep yourself safe and healthy, since you haven't been doing the best job recently." Sensei paused, thinking about what point he wanted to make next. "So, I have to ask—where did you get your sensor ability? Everyone I know had to train to become proficient."

How did I even begin to explain that?

"I think I was born chakra-sensitive. Or oversensitive." I bit the inside of my cheek, trying to come up with something other than "oh look, squishy non-shinobi human born into alien universe has an allergic reaction." "Though I guess that must have been a part of the energy imbalance, since it wasn't until losing that edge that I started seeing a real problem."

Sensei led me to the kitchen table, and we both sat down. Kushina took over the sink and the stove and started making tea, I think.

"If you were truly oversensitive, you would never have been able to use chakra in the first place." Sensei said. "Ever felt a horrible burning sensation, followed by hospitalization or death? Because that's what that means."

Oh, so chakra allergies actually were a thing? And about as dangerous as peanut allergies in a JIF factory, apparently.

…Eek.

"My sensor capability is based on what Sage training I have." Sensei continued, looking at me curiously. "You're sure you've never been trained for this?"

"Even when I went to Inoshi Yamanaka to get my head put on straight, I didn't get any help." I said. "It's just something I do, I guess."

And the impending loss of my chakra sense might have something to do with acclimatization kicking in hella late. Maybe Isobu had prompted the backsliding.

"That's just the weirdest thing. Like how you seem okay with being a Tailed Beast Host!" Kushina interrupted.

"That was because of the visions." I said firmly. I looked at Kushina and asked, "So, is there a chance that the Three-Tails has something to do with my loss of control or my chakra sense going kind of dead?"

"Yes, though I would imagine that part of it is just laziness." Kushina held up a hand before I could say anything. "Hear me out. The Three-Tails is a massive boost to your total chakra capacity. You're used to working with a lot less, and of course your control is shot. Not just control—your perception of how much chakra 'works' is probably off, too, since most shinobi judge jutsu by how much they cost and Tailed Beast Hosts don't. I tend to use what chakra I do based on, um, how much relief it gives me." She looked rather embarrassed for a moment. "I mean, my chakra isn't infinite, but I sometimes feel like I have literally too much for anyone and I just overcharge some of the usual ninjutsu. And, well, you have to adjust your usage accordingly."

Sensei had been nodding along and added, "It's also not uncommon for shinobi to take a while to train back up after an injury or severe shift in capability. None of us saw Obito power through physical therapy—something I guess we can thank Madara for—but I don't think he learned to use that arm in a day."

"Where was all this friendly advice while I was lying on the floor like a pancake?" I asked, surprised.

Kushina put three teacups down in front of us. One, presumably, was hers. "We had to make sure you weren't being taken over by the Three-Tails."

I'm kind of hoping that that ends up being nothing to worry about.

You knew the risks better than most when you faced me the first time.

"So, what else did you want to ask about, before I have to go back to work?" Sensei asked.

Well…

"Is there any news about the orphanage?" I asked.

"Yes, actually." Sensei looked surprised that I'd remembered. I didn't really blame him—I hadn't exactly been the model of cognitive function over the last…well, ever. Memory, maybe, but more Epimetheus than Prometheus in terms of action. "Nonō Yakushi was surprised that I bothered to visit or pull funding out of the village coffers, but I hope it made her life a little easier."

But the way that Sensei spoke made me wonder if we'd been too late.

Kabuto…well, he'd been a snake. But there were ways to head that kind of thing off at the pass. I just might have been born too late to do it.

"Kabuto is well-remembered there, but apparently he disappeared some time ago." Sensei's expression seemed a little closed-off, like he was wondering what he could have done, even if he hadn't known that it was important. "I'll do what I can to keep Nonō from dying, but she's former ROOT, if there is such a thing. There may not be a way."

I nodded, staring at the tabletop for what felt like an uncomfortably long time because there wasn't much to say. ROOT needed to be ferreted out in order to secure the village's future. But damn were there people who deserved better.

I hid my face in my hands. There was no guarantee of anything, this late in the game.

"Kei-chan." Kushina said, concerned.

"I keep feeling like I should be able to do something, but I either don't know enough or I'm too weak or I'm too late." I said dully, not looking up. "You don't—we were so lucky when Obito came back, after everything that happened. I-I can't expect to ever be that lucky again."

"…On another note," Sensei said cautiously, "Jiraiya-sensei went chasing after Nagato and his friends. I stopped short of ordering him to stay here—not like he'd listen, after what happened to my team—but Kei? You can't control what other people do."

Sadly true. I bit my lip for a moment, then looked up.

There was tea on the table, so I drank some.

"...And besides, I can." Sensei said. "Not perfectly, of course, but being Hokage gives me a few more options than a soon-to-be guard. Speaking of which, Kei, do you actually want the position?"

Did I want to be tied to the village and the Hokage forever? Did I want to be the first line of defense if something happened around Naruto, or if Kushina wanted a babysitter? Did I want the promotion? Did I want to be the one people came to if Konohamaru or one of the other high-born kids eventually became a teenage pain-in-the-ass?

Hell yeah, sign me up!

"Actually? Yeah, I do." I said seriously. I paused, chin on the heel of my right hand. "I was a bit worried, I guess, that I didn't really have plans for the future like everyone else. This is a great idea."

Not what I thought I'd be interested in on Career Day, but then again I'd never attended one around here. Shinobi had continual aptitude testing through combat, so I guess the career evaluation options around here were usually more immediate. Accurate evaluation at a higher risk of death. Sounded promising!

"That's good, since I was planning on introducing you to your teammates later this week." Sensei told me.

"What would you have done if I said no?" I asked him.

Sensei shrugged. "Found a plan B. Since the team is partially assembled anyway, I'd have expected to have the last person trained up regardless of who joined. I hoped that you would, though, since you're already familiar with my sealing methodology and Kushina knows and likes you."

"Don't say that like you'll never need a guard." Kushina countered. "Or that I'll need security forever."

Before Sensei could respond to that in a way that probably meant Kushina wouldn't talk to him for a while, I said, "Sensei, Kushina-san, would it be all right if I tried to show you some of what I saw?"

Sensei looked blank for a while before the figurative lightbulb went on. "Wait, did you learn a genjutsu while I wasn't around?"

"Yeah, and Jiraiya-sama taught me." I gave both of them a quizzical look. "So, uh...?"

"If you could include anything I've been missing recently, it'd be appreciated." Sensei said dryly.

The thing about me and spilling the beans was that I was a miser with them. I spilled literally one metaphorical bean at a time, and I think I'd gotten away with spilling maybe twelve even during the big revelation a month ago.

Some people had no fucks to give. I, though, kept secrets like squirrels hoarded nuts. Including the Big One—that I was currently living in a universe I had thought of as a TV show. Somehow, I'd been very successful with hiding that one fact.
Still, I could probably come up with something that Sensei would be able to use.

I leaned forward and made the appropriate hand signs (since I still didn't trust my chakra enough to try a seal-less variant), and tried to see if I could exposit clearly through a repurposed genjutsu.

The room seemed to melt a bit at the edges, like that Salvador Dali painting with the squishy clocks. Except for us, the world went gray and still, and the floor lit up like an Apple commercial. While Sensei and Kushina looked around with mild interest, I visualized a series of hovering images, arranged into a glowing circle of head-sized sections. After a second or two, I brought up a series of screens more like the startup menu of a tablet than anything, cramming memories behind each "icon" for easy organization.

And apparently my brain organized by character rather than by timeline order.

"Um, do you want to look at something in particular?" I asked.

"Hm." Kushina looked curious. In front of her was a picture of Naruto's face as created by the official animation team, though obviously a little exaggerated given the difference between 2D and 3D. "Is this our son in the future? He has Minato's hair and eyes."

"With your facial structure and your smile." Sensei put in. He frowned a little. "Which is the most relevant part, Kei?"

"This one." I swiped my hand across the empty space in front of me, though I probably didn't actually need to. It was my genjutsu, after all. "Here we go."

Four icons came up—one with Tobi's spiral mask, and three more with Sensei, Kushina, and Naruto's faces. "These ones represent the trouble we might have on the tenth of October this year. Granted"—and here, I drew an X over Tobi's icon—"I don't think Obito will have anything to do with it. But this is the version I saw."

"Can you just activate it?" Sensei asked. "I think this is something I'll need to see for myself."

"Ourselves, Minato." Kushina corrected, crossing her arms over her chest. "I think I kind of have to be there when my son is born. This is definitely also my problem."

I cut off their possible impending argument by hitting the not-quite-existent "play" button. Then I dropped out of the genjutsu and let the ball get rolling.

As though I'd queued up a DVD playlist, I presented several events tied into that quartet of characters—people.

First, the events of the tenth of October, up to Sensei and Kushina's death. Probably fragmented, given that there had been multiple cuts during both the manga and anime editions of the scenes involved, but better than nothing. At least they'd probably understand why I hadn't been too sure of much of anything.

Second, glimpses of the lead-up to the Uchiha Massacre as I understood it. I admitted to mentally footnoting the heck out of that section, because there were parts I had only read about and others that were based on my observation of social patterns around major clans. And about the Sharingan, which was probably classified unless you had an Uchiha on your team.

Third, a flash forward to Naruto talking with the assembled Tailed Beasts and Hosts in the bizarre pocket dimension during the Fourth Shinobi World War. All of them were named and characterized during that scene, or at least until Tobi had ruined everything again.
Fourth, Madara's plan as far as I understood it. Complete with cloned Zetsu armies, the Moon's Eye Plan, the Eternal Tsukuyomi, the existence of Black Zetsu, and everything else I could think of that seemed halfway important. Oh, and the fact that the guy died somewhere in the middle.

About a minute later—by which point I had finished my tea and was washing out my cup—Kushina finally blinked and stopped staring into space as my genjutsu finally fizzled out. Sensei followed, shooting a glance at me that I couldn't read.

"...That was interesting." Sensei commented after a moment. He drained his tea a moment later. "It's a lot to take in."

I nodded.

"And you can't visit, say, Inoichi Yamanaka for a full mind-scan?" Sensei asked.

"Probably not. I'm not sure how the Three-Tails would react." I hedged. At the same time, though...

Does that mean I can eat everyone who tries to get into your mind?

Absolutely.

Transparency was one thing. Casually causing existential crises seemed beyond the pale. And, well, I frankly hated the idea of losing that last secret and thus all of my credibility. And I had a right to a certain territoriality for my own mind.

…Kind of hypocritical of me, but there were some things I didn't care to share.

"I thought you were getting along with him." Kushina said. "Don't you already know his name?"

"So?" At Kushina's look of surprise, I explained, "The Three-Tails hasn't actually told me his name. Just because I already know it doesn't mean I can just use it without permission."

…It's Isobu, by the way. Isobu-san if you really care, though I don't expect you will.

Yeah. Sorry about screwing up the sequence of events there. I told him, wincing internally.

It could have been much worse. I'll forgive you this time.

"But back to your other point—I don't have control over him. I have a working relationship. Anyone else who tries to get into my head isn't a part of the agreement, and you saw how mad he was after Kakashi," I struggled for a proper metaphor for a moment, then decided on, "essentially flipped a switch in my head and turned me off."

Kushina frowned. "And you think you've got it under control after that?"

"We're talking now. It's a start." I argued. "He didn't need to save me from the genjutsu trap last week. But he got me out soon enough that I could still do something to salvage the mission."

It didn't occur to me that I could ignore it. We'd gone over genjutsu resistance before that. Isobu commented. I just didn't expect you to be caught first.

And again, thanks for the save there. I didn't expect it either—though saying I thought Madara would show up in the flesh just makes me sound paranoid. I sighed inwardly. But let me just say I'm perfectly willing to repay the favor.
I would hope so.

"I suppose that's something." She still sounded skeptical, but frankly I didn't expect anyone to actually approve of my plan to befriend the biggest turtle I could find.

...

I swear we went about three minutes without anyone talking.

"You know what, Kei? Take the rest of the week off." Sensei said finally, after the pause had transcended the word "awkward" and become "profoundly uncomfortable." "I still expect that report, and for you to show up on Monday to meet your new team lineup."

"Where and when?" I asked.

"Seven, at Training Ground Forty-Four." Sensei stood up and added, "Dismissed."

I took off as fast as my feet could carry me.

Summary of the remainder of August:

Hayate's field trip was a success, even when he tromped home covered in mud and telling stories about catching a squirrel and eating it with his friends. Apparently, Yūgao had actually skinned it (along with her rabbit) while Iruka looked a little green the entire time. I got to hear three solid days of stories about maybe twenty hours of real time, and I was pretty sure he'd made up a bit of it by the end. I didn't call him out on that kind of thing, though.

I meditated more deeply than I ever had before. Obviously, I couldn't make up for a month of laziness in a week, but I did manage to find something weird at the bottom of my mindscape. Put bluntly, it was a dead zone where Isobu and I could speak face-to-face with zero interference from the outside world.

(This is weird.

You're the first human who's been down here in a while.

Do you ever get visitors or see your siblings down here?

Not often. They all seem busy in their own corners of the world.

Shame.)

After that incident, I found that Isobu's chakra had pulled back and that my own felt a bit tingly. At least I could sense things again, though keeping Isobu's chakra out of my human supply while using large quantities remained an issue.

(If you wanted me to stay out of your business, you could've just said.)

I wrote my edition of the report. Since my writing style could vary between bullet points and a terrible mockery of Tolkien, I eventually decided on writing out my feelings as I experienced the events of my mission. There were footnotes and asides almost everywhere, linking different moments of my narrative together via commentary about future events and people I hadn't met in the flesh just yet. And since every event needed to be explained, I also ended up writing out what some of those references meant. Mostly if they had to do with techniques, or kekkei genkai, or bizarre leaps of logic.
that only made sense to me.

It kind of looked like a Wikipedia article on paper, with color-coded extra pages instead of blue hyperlinks. I even attached a write-up about the various possible members of Akatsuki or Otogakure, and theories about how the Aburame clan might be able to use the summon contract we'd received. And other things. I was good at generating paperwork, apparently.

Once done with all of that, I turned in my multi-page report and got a pay slip back from the mission desk—Sensei wasn't in—and brought the resultant financial statement back to Mom so we could start budgeting for next month. Given that I had somehow gotten full mission pay for both, we actually came out ahead by a fair margin once we got to the bottom of the spreadsheet. As in, we had actual spending money even after all of our expenses were taken care of.

With Mom's permission, I went out and bought a new set of steel-ceramic-what-the-heck forearm guards with Obito's IOU (by dragging him along), and then got an accompanying new set of clothes to go along with them. They weren't particularly fancy—jacket with hood, new mesh shirt, different-colored pants, etc.—but were made of sturdier, shinobi-grade material in the hopes that I'd stop shredding my stuff. I also got a new uniform from the requisition depot, since my last one had been too small.

Regardless, I went to the meeting at the Forest of Death in full Konoha uniform, plus my new armguards and a special belt designed to act as a scroll holster. I brought along my explosive and weapon storage scrolls in a doubled holster on my right hip, with a larger utility scroll across the back of my flak jacket. My sword was on my left hip, since I drew right-handed, but I could have easily worn it on my back if it became necessary.

I hadn't exactly been told where I was meeting anyone, but I could track familiar signatures easily enough through the dense wood. Most of the stuff in there with chakra was obviously non-human.

As it was, though, I found a human one and just headed in that direction around the ten-meter-high perimeter fence. They weren't they for keeping animals in as much as they were for keeping humans out. The huge tigers and things in there wouldn't normally be stopped by fences, but jutsu could shut them down quickly.

Since the meeting place was so potentially hazardous, I mentally crossed everyone under the rank of chūnin off the list of potential teammates. That idea had been tentative at best, but it was nice to be validated even a little bit.

Before long, I found my target outside the thirty-fifth gate into the forest, where he was leaning against the concrete and looking bored by everything.

I waved and called out, "Hi, Genma!"

"Hey, Kei-san." Genma said as I approached, the ever-present senbon doing a quick circuit of his mouth as soon as he stopped talking. Then, "So, you're joining up?"

"Yeah. Unless you're here on some kind of wildlife conservation mission, in which case my answer will be to shove you in there so you can get on with it." I said, jabbing a thumb at the forest.

"Very funny." Genma snarked back. He glanced at the trees anyway, though. "Any idea how many members we're expecting?"

"Nope." I started methodically cracking each knuckle on my hands. Better to be maneuverable than stiff. I could make up for any loss of strength through chakra usage. And besides, most shinobi could crack all of their joints with a noise that chiropractors probably heard in Hell, so it wasn't like I was annoying Genma that much.

Genma's question ended up being answered by a noise not unlike a firecracker going off, about three meters away from both of us, complete with giant plume of smoke. As the smoke cleared and I felt another familiar chakra signature.

"Hey, I know you." I said, giving our new arrival a sidelong look. "We've even talked."

"Don't remind me." Raidō said. I hadn't explicitly identified him as my team's rookie ANBU stalker, but he clearly knew when the game was up. "Sensor, right?"

"Yep."

Raidō sighed. "Figured."

Genma looked between the two of us for a moment, mulling something over, before clearly deciding that whatever it was didn't concern him. Instead, he said, "You're telling me you just got called out by someone you didn't even know?"

"Anyway, I'm Raidō Namiashi. Nice to be formally introduced." Raido said finally, though he was busy giving his friend a quelling look.

Genma sniggered.

"This can't be everyone." I said, apropos of nothing.

BOMPH. And then we had another smoke-filled intro, right on cue. I knew who it was almost before I felt the actual live wire sensation of his chakra.

Kakashi landed on top of the gate and dropped down to the rest of us without a word.

In the last week, he'd apparently decided that yet another outfit change was in order. Frankly, he looked like an ANBU trainee given that he was wearing a version of their white armor and heavy-duty fore- and upper-arm guards that made mine look cheap. He carried a relatively short, straight-edged sword—a chokutō?—with an exaggerated hilt that might have been concealing a second, smaller blade. At least he didn't bring the cloak or mask along.

And that made three out of four members of this team male. Leaving me on my lonesome. …Jeez, talk about a sausage fest.

"And four." I said, nodding to Kakashi.

Kakashi nodded back, but apparently didn't think there was anything important to say. If he did, he didn't care to share. Either way, he just readjusted his position and braced his shoulders against the concrete of the gate and contrived to look immensely uninterested in anything.

Typical Kakashi, then.

Raidō muttered something about Kakashi making him feel underdressed for the occasion somehow, even though I was pretty sure Sensei hadn't said anything about a dress code.

Anyway, it was about a minute after that that there was a huge—though collective—chakra signature that appeared in the middle of the field outside of the Forest of Death, more or less directly in front of us. Since it was accompanied by another huge burst of smoke due to the Body Flicker used concert, I at least didn't have to tell anyone about it ahead of time.

I felt everyone's figurative hackles rise at once, mine and Isobu's included.

Once the smoke cleared, I started picking individuals out of the crowd more by chakra than by appearance (though there was a bit of that).

The group of people who appeared out of the smoke was, to be honest, kind of ragtag if you went by appearance alone. Missing-nin tended toward wearing whatever they could afford to maintain and thus tended toward heavy fabrics that were not armor but could pull double duty in a pinch. Their weapons were simple, for the most part, and often cheap due to a lack of logistical support in any sense.

That said, the group was being masked by a mass genjutsu. At least on the visible spectrum.

It's that woman from before. The Uchiha. Isobu stirred from his constant laps inside my mindscape, sounding interested.

A man stepped out of the crowd and the genjutsu faded around him so I could actually see what he looked like.

He was of average height, with straight black hair that fell to his waist and a blindfold over his eyes. Based on his build and his chakra, my gut said "Hyūga" almost before my brain caught up. The blindfold, therefore, meant exactly jack shit. I would have pegged him at about age thirty, given the lines around his mouth and air of experience.

He said, "My name is Yatsu Inuzuka. Welcome to our war game."

Oooh boy.

"We are representatives of the surviving members of the previous Hokage Guard Platoon." Yatsu said clearly, even as the group behind him began to approach us. "As prospective members, you will face us in a scenario that will test your skill as bodyguards against the level of opposition you will face on a regular basis. While Minato Namikaze may be the Fourth Hokage and Konoha's Yellow Flash, all shinobi have blind spots and weaknesses. We exist to cover them."

I got the impression that I was joining a cult. Maybe.

Behind Yatsu, I began to pick out the individual shapes and signatures of the presumed veterans of the Hokage Guard Platoon. It didn't matter if they didn't drop the genjutsu. I was already gathering information.

An Ino-Shika-Chō trio, though I imagined they were part-timers.

An Inuzuka besides Yatsu, plus eight dogs.

Honoka Uchiha.

An Aburame, likely jōnin-level.

And a couple other people I couldn't peg based on their chakra quirks.

My eyes narrowed. This would be very interesting.

Told you.
"You are going to be acting as guards facing a superior force, while your client will not act in his own defense." Yatsu put a hand on his chest. "If I am forced to act in order to defend myself, you will lose."

Obviously.

An escort mission. Ugh. Not uncommon for lower-ranking shinobi, but the likelihood of being attacked by overpowered assholes was a lot lower than in most other mission types. Generally speaking.

Then again, Suna had lost a Kazekage to ambush and Orochimaru had flounced off with the guy's face, so obviously we were important even if we didn't necessarily have to win. Surprise could carry the day, someday.

I crossed my arms over my chest and waited for the end of the exposition flood.

The gist of it: Let's see how you screwballs do against a group that probably knows all your tricks before you can even use them. Or think of them. Because we're the freaking SAS and this is Selection. Or Hell Week. Nice knowing you (not)!

Just, you know, for the Secret Service. Yay for mixing metaphors.

"You will have twenty-four hours." Yatsu said.

Just then, there was a fwhish noise as air was displaced and then suddenly Sensei was there, one hand on Obito's shoulder as they popped into existence just next to Kakashi.

Kakashi somehow managed not to even twitch in surprise.

"Sorry we're late! I had to track down the errant fifth member of the rookie team." Sensei said, grinning sheepishly.

"You didn't even tell me there was a meeting." Obito argued, though quietly. He at least noticed that we had an audience. "You just said 'oh don't you have somewhere to be' and poofed us both here."

"You're ruining the moment, Hokage-sama." Yatsu said in a long-suffering tone.

"Oh, it's fine. I'm sure you can scare the new blood just as easily without the fancy genjutsu or dramatic speech." Sensei waved it off. "Anyway, see you tomorrow!"

And then he teleported right out again.

"Kakashi, what the hell is going on?" Obito asked in a manner he probably thought was subtle.

Kakashi muttered something back.

Yatsu put his head in his hands. "Let's…just get started before something else happens."

On cue, the entirety of the enemy team vanished into the woods. Ahead of us. When they had more experienced hunters and at least two team members whose whole job was to set up ambushes and…

Fuck.

"You must escort me to the other edge of the forest. This is the twenty-third gate, and I will consider the exercise a success if I leave through the first gate."

…That was still only ten kilometers. Even with that many enemy combatants with that level of experience, any shinobi worth a damn could cross the entire area in less than an hour at a dead run, despite the terrible terrain.

It was probably going to be one of those tests where they changed the rules halfway through.

"—seriously?" Obito was whispering furiously with Kakashi, but I could still catch snatches of what was being said. "—just bought these—"

"Is anyone here taking bets on whether or not he"—Genma indicated the placid man who was standing in our midst—"is going to completely screw us over while we're in there?"

"Sucker's bet." Raido muttered back.

Yatsu said, while apparently waiting for all of us to make up our minds, "You now have twenty-three hours and fifty-five minutes. Or fifty-four, now."

I sighed inwardly. Clapping my hands to get everyone's attention—clap, clap, clapclapclap—and feeling like a schoolteacher all the while, I said, "All right, everyone. You heard the man."

We headed into the forest.

Chapter End Notes

Song by Florence + the Machine.
Also, this chapter brought to you by a malfunctioning mouse that likes moving text around to random other places and shorting out in the middle of a sentence.
The Forest of Death hadn't changed much. Maybe there were fewer giant tigers roaring in the distance, or maybe the local centipede population had exploded sometime in the two-and-a-half years since I'd said hello. Those differences were negligible, at least when compared to the certainty that the forest had not become any more welcoming. It was still dark, dank, full of spiders, and about as hostile to human life as it had ever been. There was a reason that most of Konoha didn't stray into this forest, and dealt with anything that crept out of it with extreme prejudice.

Of course, I say that as someone who had managed to avoid most of said dangers at the age of nine. Most Konoha shinobi could. The trick, instead, was facing off against other teams. Or the overgrown wildlife. Or, worst of all, the enemy teams joining forces with the wildlife and making everyone's life very difficult.

I glanced at Yatsu.

"So, I don't get why you can't just fly him to the other edge." Obito said in a whisper, leaning over my shoulder. He probably knew he wasn't being subtle, but most civilians were worried more about bandits than what their shinobi bodyguards could be talking about.

Obito's solution would, I think, count as cutting the Gordian knot.

"Too simple." I muttered back.

"Kei-san, do you have a summon animal?" Genma asked, looking curious.

"Yeah," I said, "a crane, big enough to carry two or three people."

Genma, Obito, and I looked over at Yatsu, who was pretending to be a hapless civilian. Which, in his world, apparently meant needing Kakashi and Raidō's help to cross a stream that was less than a foot deep.

There was a tree root that extended over the river about ten meters away, but Yatsu was exercising his right to be a complete pain in the ass. Clients could be useless.

It went on until Raidō got impatient, grabbed Yatsu by the back of his jacket, and hauled him over the river with one quick leap. Barely a hop by shinobi standards.

Genma went over mostly for the purposes of pointing and laughing, but I could see intent in every line of his body. He was going to talk to Raidō as soon as there was a spare moment and the "client" wasn't listening in.

Kakashi rolled his visible eye and came over to talk to Obito and me, radiating agitated lightning chakra just at the edge of my senses. It stopped before he got close, thankfully, and he visibly relaxed a bit.

"I'll take charge on this mission." Kakashi said quietly—softer, in fact, than he'd ever said those words. He didn't expect anyone to argue on this count. It was simply a statement of what was going to be.

Obito nodded, though only after a short delay. Kakashi hadn't raised Obito's hackles yet, at least.

"We don't know enough about Shiranui and Namiashi yet to establish who will command if something happens." Kakashi explained quietly. "So we'll discuss it when we need to take a 'break.'"

"But for now…?" I prompted.

"Right now, I trust both of you more than I trust them." He appeared to flip a mental coin, looking back and forth between us. Said mental coin must have landed on its edge, since Kakashi just closed his eye and said, "We'll deal with it in a few minutes."

"Can we even talk around him?" Obito gave the Hyūga/Inuzuka a dubious look. "Playing at being an idiot doesn't mean he can't talk to other members of his team. Somehow."

"That might be outside of his role as observer, though." I said quietly. I flexed one hand while gripping my wrist with the other. There was a trick here, but I wasn't sure what it was.

"Well, I can ask." Obito suggested, since neither of us were coming up with brilliant ideas. But Kakashi immediately shook his head.

"Most shinobi don't have experience fighting an aerial opponent." Kakashi remarked. He had both hands in his pockets, and he was looking in the direction of the forest's heart. The Tower, too, for all that it mattered. "We'll see where the idea takes us. Kei, you had a point about Tsuruya…"

Cutting the Gordian knot sounded appealing. But leaving my team in hostile territory—particularly when outnumbered and effectively outgunned—did not strike me as a good plan.

Sure, ten kilometers was nothing in terms of distance when in the air.

Sure, half an hour wasn't really that long.

But ten kilometers on the ground in this fucking forest was like trying to work through a maze that also had a very high probability of being strewn with landmines.

And half an hour in a shinobi battle could mean the difference between life and as many hilarious deaths as there were team members. Hell, fifteen seconds was the difference between "oh shit we're all fucked" and "oh Sensei killed everyone."

Sensei might have been such an outlier that any sane statistician would have chucked his numbers, but the point remained.

"I can hear everything you are saying." Yatsu informed us tartly. "I am blind, not deaf."

Welp.

"Further, clients who do have large numbers of trained shinobi out for their blood, generally speaking, have large entourages." He held his arms out, as though to say, "I literally cannot make this more obvious for you," and went on, "How well do you think they or their mundane guardsmen would react to being thrown astride a bird summon?"

Then, into the silence as we considered that, he added, "Also? I am slightly acrophobic."

I winced internally. "All right, no flying."

"Having thoroughly broken character," Yatsu continued, "I'm going to have to ask you to forget the last thirty seconds."

While the tongue-lashing was at least a bit called-for, Obito didn't seem to think so, "So are you going to actually stay in-character this time or are you going to be feeding info to the other team?"

Yatsu's jaw clenched, briefly, and I saw him tense up. "That would completely invalidate the test!"

…Seriously? That was what he was going to get upset over?

"Well, we can't have that." Genma muttered, but not very quietly.

Raidō tilted his head curiously. "Assuming you're telling the truth, then you can't inform on us to the other team. Or vice-versa." After a moment, he rubbed at the scar stretching across his nose, apparently without realizing it. "Except in ways that clients do, unintentionally."

Like being jumpier than average, or maybe just by existing. Only so many shinobi could land missions involving guarding really rich clients. Who were, generally, also the most useless of the lot.

"Of course." Yatsu said, frowning.

Kakashi glanced at Obito and me again, then shrugged to himself. "Kei, Obito, guard the client. You can trail by fifteen meters at most, so be ready to move." Then he turned his attention to the two oldest members of our team. "Namiashi, Shiranui. Come with me."

I watched the lightbulb of understanding flick on, just behind both teens' eyes. Kakashi was probably going to needle them about their specialties, but didn't want to take the risk that Yatsu would break his word and somehow inform the opposing force about what we were capable of. Then again, regardless of our confidence in Yatsu's honor, there were some things that we just didn't talk about when civilians were around.

Kakashi, Genma, and Raidō leapt up toward the nearest tree trunk and started climbing basically by running right up the bark.

Figuring that "fifteen meters" meant straight up as well as lateral distance, I took point for the ground team. Such that it was.

"Moving in two teams?" Obito looked speculatively up at the canopy, and then gave Yatsu an appraising look.

"Don't even think about it." Yatsu replied.

Obito shot me a sidelong glance, eyebrows waggling.

I hid a smile. Then, as a thought occurred to me, I said, "So, Obito, you never did tell me what made you decide to join the Military Police."

He blinked. "I didn't?"

"No, you didn't."
"Heh, whoops!" Obito rubbed the back of his neck, going a little red at the tips of his ears. "Wow, that's embarrassing. I should've remembered…"

"We were both busy." I said, even as I took the entirely unnecessary step of helping Yatsu around a pit full of punji sticks. Honestly, people just left their trap trash everywhere…

"Yeah, but I still should've remembered to tell you." Obito argued. Somehow, he ended up walking in front of me. Probably because of the pit. "I mean, from your perspective it probably looked like I was in the test just because I got bored, and then suddenly I'm on the force. No gory details or anything!"

"…True."

Obito shrugged. "Thing is, this forest has like a million ears. I don't feel like I should say anything until we get out."

"Also true." I could feel my lips curving upward, but I stopped myself because I could feel chakra buzzing at the very edge of my range.

Obito went still as soon as I did, flinging one arm out to stall Yatsu where he stood.

"Thirty-five meters, ten o'clock. Obito!" I immediately shoved the irrelevant bits of banter aside and started calling shots.

Obito shot me a quick grin, turning to meet the enemy as they arrived. "Got it! Get down, Yatsu-san!"

Even as Obito was lining up a shot of what would probably be a Fire Release jutsu, I caught the taller shinobi and knocked us both prone.

Just in time. A Fūma shuriken—the big, foldable quad-blade monsters that only saw real use in the Land of Rice Fields—spun down out of the trees at a ludicrous speed. It curved in the air as it flew, swinging to my left so that its shot was lined up with where my head would've been about ten seconds ago.

Obito stopped it dead in a single smooth motion that was too perfect to be spontaneous. Even as he was sliding under its arc, his Zetsu arm cut through the air at the exact moment that the central ring of the shuriken flew over his head.

The sudden stop, contrary to what I would have expected, left the shuriken spinning ominously around Obito's wrist. With a quick flick, he had it in his hand and neatly folded up.

_How the crap did Obito do that._

Obviously, he practiced. Isobu rumbled. Though I don't understand what you mean by it. Clearly, this is a physical feat that can be learned by humans. What's so surprising?

It's Obito we're talking about here!

So? From what I've seen, the Obito in your memories and the one you actually interact with are different people.

_Never mind._

I cleared my head with what might've seemed like a random burst of chakra. Then I cupped my hands around my mouth and shouted, "Kakashi, we've got hostiles inbound!"

Obito turned to look at me with his Sharingan still spinning rapidly, though he didn't focus my way for long. No, it turned out that his actual focus was on where Raidō landed a second later, rolling with the impact and clearing the way for Genma and Kakashi.

Kakashi landed closest to me and got back to his feet almost instantly, headband up and Sharingan almost glowing in the forest gloom. He had Raidō at his left—generally speaking, not a disadvantage for a kenjutsu expert who could draw from either side. It'd mess with my groove, but Kakashi's blade was on his back.

Genma, meanwhile, helped Yatsu and me to our feet again. Totally unnecessary, but nonetheless polite.

Kakashi turned that laser-focused eye on me for a moment, but nothing happened on Isobu's end. Good. And Kakashi, while generating enough lightning-aligned chakra beneath his skin to power a small house, said, "Kei, Obito, take point." He glanced up—Genma and Raidō were taller than he was—and added, "Genma, take the client to Point Gamma. Raidō, with me!"

With a flick of his wrist, Obito brought his new Fūma shuriken to bear. The blasted thing was nearly a meter across and as sharp as a razor, painted nearly solid black and apparently sturdy enough not to fly apart under its own momentum. I had no idea what Obito expected to be able to do with such a weapon that he couldn't do with his bare hands and complimentary ninjutsu.

Served me right for not keeping up with his training.

Raidō removed a single seal tag from his pocket and channeled chakra into it. In a brief burst of gray smoke, the seal spat out a sheathed katana with a belt clip that Raidō quickly attached. He drew the blade itself immediately, and I just sort of stared for a moment. It was jet-black with chakra channels inscribed into the blade somehow, meaning that the blade would be much stronger than any normal one. Including mine.

I let my left hand drift to the hilt of my own katana, almost unconsciously. As always, my first resort.

Genma merely reached over and grabbed Yatsu's elbow, saying around the senbon in his mouth, "Get ready."

Why relegate Genma to escort duty?

I ended up not having a lot of time to worry about that, because the tree at ten o'clock crashed to the ground a moment later. Between the falling branches and scattered leaves and everyone's chakra exploding everywhere, I spotted our first opponent.

Think Sonic the Hedgehog. Then scale it up by a factor of ten and remember that Akimichi clan members do nothing small-scale.

As big as an SUV and about as fast, the Human Bullet Tank jutsu, true to form, proceeded to almost-literally steamroll the clearing with brutal efficiency even without a Nara using it as a yo-yo. It was inspiring, if in the "if only it wasn't trying to kill us" kind of way.

We scattered, of course. Kakashi and Raidō shot up the side of the same tree, coming to a stop on the underside of different branches. Genma stayed on the ground, merely sidling backwards out of immediate murder range with Yatsu in tow. After all, Obito and I were point-men in this scenario.

I shot left and Obito, from my right, skidded backward as the Akimichi rotated slowly on the spot to track me instead.

Exposing his or her flank to Obito.

I spotted his crazy grin just before he shouted, "Hey, jerkoff! Eat this!"

And then the Fūma shuriken shot across the battlefield again, swerving around the fallen tree and toward the Akimichi's side thanks to some clever throwing.

I hit a tree with my back foot and immediately scrambled up the bark in a movement best described as a gravity-defying backwards somersault, letting the Human Bullet Tank hit the trunk just shy of me and killing momentum just as the shuriken hit home.

—Or not.

Black lines seemed to peel off the forest floor, reaching up and snatching the shuriken out of the air mere centimeters before it hit the Akimichi. The shadows stretched, angling over the still-spinning Akimichi, and then the shuriken was suddenly going back the way it came, double time.

Before the shadows disappeared, I tracked their movements both with my eyes and my chakra sense and called out, "Nara at three o'clock!"

"Well, that was cheap." Obito caught the shuriken again, one-handed, and folded it so he could clip it onto his belt and pull a scroll out of another pocket with his free hand. "On it, Kei!"

And then there was suddenly a storm of metal heading the Nara's way, entirely too many to stop with Shadow Gathering alone. Obito had clearly learned from the last few times I'd screwed with weapon scroll designs. I was just surprised that he kept one of them.

I felt the Nara run away for a bit, then start to circle around us. Score one for Team Noob, at least for a minute.

Come to think of it, did I ever tell my team what I learned about the opponents in here?

No.

...Oops.

The Human Bullet Tank reversed momentum and decided that today was the day for an Obito pancake, since he was the only one on the ground and was yelling something like "Neener-neener-neener" at the giant pinball from hell.

Kakashi, Raidō, and I dropped back to the forest floor to help Obito keep from being run over. It turned the fight from an open reenactment of an Indiana Jones movie to something more like a giant game of Whack-A-Mole. Genma, meanwhile, retreated to the trees.

While the Human Bullet Tank was often pretty fast, maneuverability was something that all incarnations had somehow failed to account for. It was yet another reason that the Akimichi generally worked with the Nara and the Yamanaka clans, in addition to the Sarutobi. It sucked to be turned into the slowest guy on the battlefield, just because everyone else knew the meaning of the word "dodge."

From his place on a tree branch on the opposite end of the battlefield, Genma idly unpacked a box from his kunai holster, made a hand-sign, and chucked it into the Akimichi's path. The box exploded, disgorging caltrops as big as a man's head.
And the Nara, who had been stuck maneuvering around the fight within my range, finally came to a stop. Upwind.

Too bad.

"If they've got a Nara, you know what that means..." Genma called down.

"Raidō, deploy smoke bombs." Kakashi said sharply.

Thanks to the Nara techniques running on a combination of shadow and light, fully removing one or the other could make them considerably more difficult to use. A smoke grenade would make the Nara clan member's job a lot more difficult than it had to be.

"On it." Raidō pulled a pair of gray spheres out of a sleeve and tossed one at the Human Bullet Tank and the other one right at his feet.

And he must have brought the good kind, because all I saw after that was matte gray.

I closed my eyes and ducked toward the nearest tree, even as I felt the Akimichi stop rolling in confusion and my teammates likewise scattered.

I felt Obito shoot upward, running around a tree branch twice and helping Genma keep Yatsu from dropping into the smoke and giving our opponents an unfair edge. At the same time, Raidō booted the idling Akimichi from the battlefield with a series of localized explosions that must have come from explosive tags.

And then Kakashi went after the Nara, shooting enough lightning everywhere that I could see it behind my closed eyelids.

Yeesh.

Then the lightning popped out of existence—a clone?—and Kakashi reappeared at my right shoulder. Since I hadn't drawn my sword, it was riskier than it could have been. Mom would've had him gutted on reflex.

"Kei," Kakashi whispered into my ear, "light it up."

"Gotcha." Music to my ears! Taking a deep breath, I placed my palm flat against the tree bark and started channeling my touch-based explosive seal down through the entire area.

Charges set!

"Get lost or get splattered, jerks!" Obito called down to the enemy, a laugh in his voice. At that exact moment, a fireball streaked down from the canopy, as a sort of chaser to the fiery death in everyone's imminent future if we didn't skedaddle.

And then everyone voted for Obito's first option and ran the fuck away, including us.

I didn't know where, exactly, we ended up after that. A quick check from the forest's canopy confirmed that we were closer to the tower than before the fight, and I couldn't sense anyone immediately around us. Since the Forest of Death wasn't exactly known for its scenic landmarks, I decided to just leave it at that.

I dropped back down to ground level, where Yatsu was sitting on a log and being stubborn. Something about being hauled around like a sack of potatoes, even if the world had been about to explode around him at the time.

"Maybe this would be a good time to go over what we've learned." I said as I reached my team. I still felt a bit guilty over my brain-fart earlier. Might as well rectify that as soon as was practical.

"You figured some stuff out?" Obito asked. He had the Fūma shuriken in his left hand and was idly flicking it open and shut with a noise that sounded like knives being sharpened.

I tried to ignore it. "Yeah. Obviously, they have a full Ino-Shika-Chō team—"

Kakashi interrupted with, "—Along with at least one or two Inuzuka clan members. I could smell several dogs. Eight, I think." He had long since pulled his headband back down over his Sharingan, but he seemed a little worn around the edges despite that. "Plus an Uchiha woman that Kei and I have met before."

And I had to wonder how long he'd spent with any Inuzuka clan members. Eight for only two of them was...well, it was insane. Absolutely dead-on, but no one familiar with Inuzuka soldiers would assume that any one of them had more than one dog. It just didn't happen.

(Though Hana would...eventually.)

"This is surprising." Yatsu said. He sounded a little impressed. Just a little. "You figured out that much from just the initial meeting?"

"Uh, and the last two minutes, unless those didn't count." Obito said. He stopped playing with his new projectile just for a moment as a thought occurred to him. "Speaking of, we should probably assume they're going to put up a better fight next time. I didn't see anyone get knocked out in that—and it took five of us to stall them out."

Raidō, silent up until now, said, "And Yatsu-san? If the Yamanaka tries contacting you or something, say we're not open for business."

Yamanaka... Oh, right. I'd forgotten that their mind jutsu combined with their sensor tendencies basically translated to "living radio." At least, it did if they were really, really good.

I weighed my options silently. Was there a chance that this Yamanaka was as good as Inoichi? Well, if he was a part of the Hokage Guard Platoon and had survived...

"We might just have to assume the Yamanaka is good enough to get around that." I said with a sigh. "But I think we need to clarify a couple of things before we get jumped again."

Kakashi nodded. "Genma, Raidō, stay with Yatsu-san. Kei, Obito, come with me." He headed for the understory, ricocheting off a tree trunk to gain height. Not that he probably really needed it.

"You two gonna be okay here?" Obito asked, looking between our remaining two teammates with probably unwarranted concern.

"We'll be fine, Obito." Raidō replied easily, even as he was inspecting his sword for scratches. "It's not like we've never pulled guard duty before."

"Well, all right." Obito said dubiously. At Genma's faintly annoyed look, though, he headed after Kakashi.

"See you both in a bit." I said, and followed.
We ended up stopping in a tree with a trunk that had apparently been twisted around by something massive. I couldn't say for sure by what, but the bark spiraled and seemed to have split to do so. Somehow, the tree's crown had also grown into a cage of branches and leaves, isolating the little alcove from everything else.

Kakashi was waiting on one edge of the resulting bowl of branches, sitting sideways along the outermost branch with his left leg braced on the wood and right leg dangling over the edge. He had his arms crossed over his chest, looking for all the world like this was just some casual secret meeting between friends.

Obito sat cross-legged on one of the other branches, one arm on the branch behind him and the other relaxed over the top of his thigh. Sort of like he was relaxing on a couch.

I too my place across from the two of them, folding one leg under me and leaving the other out in front. I braced my hands and leaned forward. "So, what did you tell Raidō and Genma before this?" I asked.

"I've informed them about everything that was relevant." Kakashi said.

"That's not all that specific." Obito complained. "Did you tell them about, uh, Kei's pet turtle or this thing?" He flexed his right hand and a dozen tiny pink buds started to grow up and out of his sleeve.

"Well, then what did you say about my arm?" Obito asked, accepting that my turtle problem was really not something we should talk about casually.

"I told them to expect you to be able to stop an Akimichi Human Bullet Tank jutsu dead if you put your mind to it. And to stay out of your way in case you decided to try it." Kakashi said.

"I've never done that before. Why would you think I could?" Obito asked blankly. "I mean, there was that thing with Guruguru, but I wasn't—"

"I looked up your records in the Konoha MP's initiation challenge." Kakashi said. He was looking at the nails on his left hand. "They never noticed the break-in."

"While I'm pretty sure that wasn't just because you were curious…" I began, before grinning suddenly. "Spill it! What did you find out?"

The tips of Obito's ears were going a bit red, and he sat up straight. "Aw, come on…"

"Obito," Kakashi said, "made such good use of his arm and the knowledge gained by using his Sharingan that some of the higher-ranking officers thought he was a plant. I believe the most impressive feat involved literally punching one of the examiners' earth clones into the next block, straight through the observation box."

Obito was really red now. "I still wouldn't have been able to do it back when we first met up again…"

"Right, because it hadn't set yet." I nodded. I recalled something about the alternate Obito accidentally punching his brand new arm right off, and had concluded that the transplant needed time to settle and harden. Like cement. "But now that you're really ready for combat…"

"Well, I could do that kind of thing. If I had to." Obito scratched the side of his cheek. "But I don't really want to when this is just an exam. I mean, even the thing with the earth clone was an accident,
"The MP committee didn't believe it was just a fluke." Kakashi pointed out. "Which is why you're the youngest member of the Military Police since its founding, even if you're on probation right now. Some of them were especially adamant about keeping you—they said something about ANBU not getting all the good ones?"

"Yeah, well, I could never see myself in ANBU." Obito shrugged, still a little embarrassed. "Not really my style." He paused. "Kei, how did you know about the, uh, set time?"

"Same way I know pretty much everything else to do with it." I said. Like I was gonna mention that when the enemy was still out here somewhere with a Yamanaka.

"...Oh. Well, then what did you tell them about Kei?" Obito asked, changing the topic with no grace whatsoever.

Thankfully for him, Kakashi was willing to go with it. "Kei is a kenjutsu specialist who can heal to some degree. She also specialized in fūinjutsu, and has a number of powerful ninjutsu that I decided not to be specific on."

"...They'd probably still sense it if I busted out any really weird attacks, though." I said. Like using Isobu's chakra at all. Most people could sense that whether they were trained or not. And Honoka probably already knew or suspected what I could do, given that she was ANBU and pretty sharp besides.

"Probably. But until we've completed this test, they don't have the security clearance to know about it." Kakashi tilted his head to the side, as though a thought had just occurred to him. "Unless you want to tell them?"

"Uh, no. Not yet." I said, shaking my head.

"You might want to think about it, though." Obito said.

I blinked. "What for?"

"Well, the two of us are going to have other jobs within the next year. We can't be Hokage guards all the time. But you will be, and Gemma and Raidō are going to be on your team." Obito explained. He looked a little surprised that I hadn't thought of all of that before he did.

Truth was that I had thought about it. Just. Um. Not very hard. "Well, yeah…" My eyes narrowed. "When you get down to it, I will, but not right now. Not when we're still being tested."

Obito and Kakashi exchanged a look. Then Obito said, "It's your choice. Just let me know if you need someone's teeth punched in."

Kakashi nodded, too.

It was touching. In a Team Minato kind of way. "So, what do we need to know about Gemma and Raidō?"

"Raidō is an assassination specialist, from what I can tell. Better on offense than defense as a rule. Kenjutsu seems to be his specialty, same as you and me." Kakashi explained. "Also, that sword of his is poisoned, and probably nearly impossible to break. I heard meteoric iron was used to make it."

Of course. Damn, I wished we could compare notes! It sounded like such a cool weapon…
"And Genma?" Obito asked.

"Utility ninjutsu, unorthodox weapons, traps, and occasionally sealing. Different branch than Kei, though." Kakashi glanced down at the forest floor again, like he expected the rest of our team to get attacked while they were alone. "I think he's better at barrier fūinjutsu than creating unique seals or explosives, but he can use them nearly spontaneously. Also, he's learned to use Wind and Earth Release jutsu, and seems like he's working on Fire."

"Sheesh." Obito muttered. But then he said, "You know, this actually seems like a pretty strong team. Makes me wonder what the enemy has in store."

"At least two Inuzuka, like Kakashi said." I said. "Honoka-san, too, and there was also an Aburame in there somewhere."

"Who's Honoka again?" Obito asked.

"An Uchiha." Kakashi said, eyebrows knitting together. "One with the Mangekyō Sharingan."

"Holy shit." Obito stared at us both for a long moment, then said flatly, "You're serious."

"Yep." I said. "We're gonna have to plan around everyone."

Obito looked grim, but he nodded. "Right. Well, let's get back to the others. We've got a lot to think about."

We got back to the others pretty quickly. Not much had changed, thankfully, and I gave everyone a quick look-over.

Kakashi's chakra was lower than I would've liked, though he wasn't hurt. Genma had barely expended any chakra (or indeed, any effort whatsoever) in the last fight, so he was fine. Obito, despite letting off a massive fireball and played the world's deadliest game of Frisbee, was also in top shape. Raidō was also just fine.

And as for me, I had Isobu's chakra reserves backing me up in case I needed them.

I'd say we were still up for going a few more bouts. Lucky for us, that was exactly what was lying in wait for us.

"Pressing on?" Genma asked Kakashi as we got ready to change tactics.

"Yes. Raidō, carry Yatsu-san. We're going faster." Kakashi ordered, tone brooking no argument at all.

Raidō nodded. "All right, captain."

Genma shot Raidō a quick smirk.

"Shut up," said Raidō.

"How far do you want to get?" I asked Kakashi.

"Within a kilometer of the tower in the middle." Kakashi replied, looking out ahead of us and into the forest. "It's loaded with traps from previous Chūnin Exams and combat trials, and even the enemy team is unlikely to be interested in staying in the kill-zone there. We'd only have to guard one side if we went that way and circled the tower."
"What about just running around the circumference of the forest?" I suggested. "I mean, I'm pretty sure that the trip might be half again as long, but there's less time for the enemy team to set up. Also, we'd be able to see them coming, and they'd only be able to attack us from one side."

Kakashi paused.

"I feel like I should remind you that you're disqualified if you do leave the examination area." Yatsu said crossly.

Of course. New rules as the DM demands. Railroading jackass.

"And it'd be all too easy to be shoved out of bounds at the edge." Genma sighed. "Really?"

Yatsu crossed his arms and stayed silent this time.

"Somehow, I bet that it's exactly what they plan on doing." Obito said with a groan. "Okay, question. Who here has any kind of long-range sensing ability?"

Kakashi and I raised our hands, but so did Genma.

"Seriously, Genma?" Obito said with some surprise.

"I have decent hearing." Genma replied. That, apparently, was all the explanation we'd get. ...I hoped he hadn't heard our conversation, because that'd be what experts in the field of social sciences would call "awkward."

What the heck.

I think the Nine-Tails has a similar power, if more advanced. And you can do it, too. Is this ability supposed to be unusual among humans? Isobu asked.

...I'm getting the impression that the answer is "no," regardless of what I've been taught.

"And I'm sure Yatsu-san has something similar." Obito commented. "Though, um, I'm not sure how that interacts with the Byakugan."

"I'm a blind former member of the Hyūga clan. Further, I am not on your team." Yatsu reminded us.

Obito frowned. "At some point, I'd like to hear that story."

Kakashi shook his head, pinching the bridge of his nose. "Where are we headed, captain?"

Raidō answered for us all, probably a while after Kakashi expected us to focus. "We're splitting the difference. Kei, Obito, you have point and rear guard. Genma, last line of defense for the client. Raidō, stick with me." Kakashi ordered. "Kei and I can charge straight in if needed, but I'd prefer that we get some warning. Obito, range or melee?"

"Up close and personal sounds like it's just my style." But then Obito paused. "Actually...I was about to say something about dogs, but I think I can deal with them, too..."

"If we run into the Inuzuka, I'm going to hold you to that." Kakashi said.

"Hey, no problem. Just, uh, try to keep out of range. It probably won't be any more fun for you to get caught in it."
I would've loved to know what "it" was before we had to use it in combat, but that just wasn't the way the dice were falling that day.

"Are we running along the perimeter?" Raidō asked.

"Maybe a quarter-kilometer inside of it. I'd prefer if no one could see us coming." Kakashi glanced at Yatsu. "I'll be disregarding your rule about high speed transportation. If your nonexistent baggage train can't keep up with a running shinobi, that's their problem."

"But no flying." Yatsu argued back.

"That'd make it too easy." Obito said, grinning. "Let's do this!"

I have to admit, we probably weren't as cautious as we needed to be.

The thing about traveling at tops speeds through the trees is that a significant fraction of the time spent traveling is spent in the air, meaning that there wasn't any way to dodge or alter direction in midair if someone decided to take a shot at us. Even moving in a sort of pyramid formation—me in front, with Genma and Yatsu directly behind me and the other three fanned out at the rear—we were trading speed for vulnerabilities to direct attack.

As we ran, we mostly had the benefit of a cross-breeze knocking our scent away from the central areas of the forest. Kakashi ended up directing from the rear with Obito, and he called out headings as we moved so that we always got either a crosswind or tailwind, making it a lot harder to sneak up on us from the side or rear.

I mean, as point-woman I obviously didn't get to reap the benefits of this arrangement, but Kakashi was banking on my sensing ability being of most use out in front. And, uh, the whole "killer turtle" thing.

Probably.

The forest didn't get too much worse, thankfully—the worst of the insect nests and various other endangered monstrosities tended to stay near the tower, since that was the traditional killing ground and featured older trees than the outer forest.

We still killed giant centipedes. Just fewer of them than perhaps we otherwise would've.

I think we managed maybe half an hour and five kilometers of rough terrain and Yatsu passive-aggressively complaining about being lugged around like an invalid. At that point, the wind shifted and I felt Kakashi's chakra jolt abruptly in surprise.

He stopped, and Raidō followed suit, looking back in the direction we'd just come from and (in Raidō's case) dropping Yatsu on the branch. Genma landed on a tree midway between Kakashi and me, scrambling up onto a higher branch and signaling for dead silence.

I placed my left hand on my katana's hilt and closed my eyes. Come on, come on…

Would you say that's about two hundred meters and closing? Isobu asked.

Actually, yes, but I'm pretty sure they'll figure out that you're extending my range.

I'm not. That's all you. Isobu informed me tartly.
Oops. That's, um, a little surprising.

You're overcharging the technique because my chakra has changed your body's limitations. Something odd was bound to happen, Isobu said. At least you still have control over it. But we should probably wait to try anything else.

Right. I have a fight to win.

"Kakashi, hostiles at"—quick calculation based on the fact that we were nominally being attacked from the rear (except that everyone had turned that way already), and the fact that one hostile had morphed into ten—"two o'clock. Ten of them at one hundred and fifty meters and closing rapidly!"

"Acknowledged," Kakashi said, and our team geared up again.

Surreptitiously, Genma pulled Yatsu out of the line of fire. As he moved out of immediate targeting range, he called, "It's the Inuzuka."

"It is?" Obito yelled back.

"I can hear the dogs! They're pretty hard to miss!" Genma replied, and was gone.

Ping. PingpingpingpingpingPING.

And we now have seven more problems, somehow. Isobu said.

For fuck's sake.

At least most of the new chakra signatures were small—uh-oh.

"Kakashi, we've got at least one more person and six summons incoming!" I shouted, and that's when something small, gray, and very fast shot past my head.

I felt my cheek sting and didn't have to touch it to know that I was bleeding.

Obito's right arm lashed out and picked another one out of the air, smacking it into a tree trunk in an explosion of feathers and then smoke as it de-summoned itself. Or maybe died.

"Was that a swallow?" Raidō asked.

"Yep." Obito almost growled. "Kakashi, keep your eyes peeled!"

No sooner had Obito said that then, well—

"FANG OVER FANG!"

Oh, shit.

Ten—ten—tornadoes of screaming furry death came shooting across the forest, enough for each of them to double-team all of us and reduce us all to paste. A pinkish streak and a greenish one shot in my direction, sending me literally running for the forest floor while they smashed into the trees where I'd been. As bark rained down and I landed on all fours in a pile of shed leaves, I got a look at what everyone else was dealing with.

Three of the dogs went after Kakashi, apparently, since the tree he and Genma had been standing in was all but demolished. Raidō was sent running, carrying Yatsu over one shoulder and trying to fight one-handed.
Speaking of running, Obito and Genma were not doing just that and were in fact playing a really dangerous game of Tag with four separate Inuzuka blurs. And only one of them could see the enemy clearly, given the speed levels in play.

Who let the dogs out? What is supposed to be so mysterious about that?

Oh god, don't make me laugh right now. We'll both die.

Okay, so. Inuzuka clan jutsu. Strong, yes, but based on the ability to fling oneself headlong into nominal certain death while shielded only by spinning chakra. Also, I had no idea how the heck they were doing that without getting our scents first.

One of the dogs chasing me had stopped upon smashing through a tree and hitting the ground, and the other spun to a stop right next to it.

One dog looked like a Japanese Spitz—kind of small, but incredibly fluffy. This one seemed pink, but it was an optical illusion because the little terror wore a pink scarf. The other dog was a Pointer with a green scarf, with long narrow legs and a squared-off head.

"Catch me if you can, furball!" I heard Obito yell from on high, and he was still being chased by two angry, furry tornadoes of death. I could at least tell that one was reddish and the other was kind of blue.

The Spitz shot at me again, teeth bared.

I clubbed it in the nose with my sheathed sword, forcing it to back off with a horrible yelp of pain. The pointer surged in right after that and grabbed the sheath in his jaws.

Shit.

Well, now or never.

I charged the Rasengan in my free hand, even as I kicked the Pointer away and pulled my katana loose from its sheath. Bloody dog could have the sheath.

The Pointer's jaws crunched the thin steel and lacquer between long white teeth.

…Oh boy.

The Spitz came at me again immediately, and I ducked under its leap before smashing the half-formed Rasengan into its stomach. The dog was blown nearly straight up, bouncing off a tree trunk before hitting the ground.

And then the Pointer, again.

At that point, Raidō dashed between us at top speed while being chased by one Fang Over Fang-using dog and one pissed-off Inuzuka man. The Pointer had to stop before it hit either of its teammates, killing its momentum.

He didn't look nearly as old as Yatsu. I caught a glimpse of jet-black hair, red tattoos, and oversized canines before he slowed to a stop. Okay, Konoha uniform, bigger than I was, more chakra than I had (that didn't belong to Isobu)…

Upon seeing the unconscious Spitz, said man immediately turned his attention to me. So did the dog as soon as it released the jutsu—and it turned out to be a Rough Collie wearing a purple scarf.
I decided that this was as good a time as any and channeled chakra down my legs. Black seal lines spread all over the visible patches of forest floor, making both dogs and owner leap backwards in sudden fear. Raidō, I noted distantly, had skittered around the kill-zone and back toward the rest of the fight.

"Later, Fido." I said, and Replaced myself with a tree branch before I'd even finished talking. And then the clearing exploded.

In hindsight, it was kind of amazing that this enemy team had fallen for the same trick twice in a row. Were they not sharing information?

I popped back into the battle right next to Kakashi, who had punched another dog—a red-wearing Shiba Inu—in the head with a lightning-charged fist immediately before I landed. He had his dogs' summon scroll in his other hand, but stuck it back into his kunai holster on second thought. I thought I saw him stuff something else into a pocket, but it was hard to track Kakashi's slight-of-hand tricks on a good day, and this was not a good day.

"How many dogs?" Genma asked out of apparently nowhere, scaring the heck out of me. Turned out that he was just behind me. Somehow. "At this point it's basically all just noise."

I extended my chakra sense outward and forward, scanning for anyone who had tried to get past me before.

Ah-hah!

"Eight dogs, four shinobi." I said, eyes closed. "One of the shinobi is about three hundred meters that way, and has summoned swallows to monitor the battle. The other is about the same distance away, but directly below the first."

"Raidō, take them both out with whatever you have." Kakashi ordered.

"Whoa, wait"—actually, better idea—"let me send Tsuruya with you!"

"That won't wear you out?" Raidō asked sharply.

I gave him a faint smile. "Nothing much does." I swiped a thumb across my cheek and channeled chakra into my hand before slamming it into the tree.

Tsuruya popped into existence in the air right next to us, already hovering in place. "Keisuke-sama?"

I said quickly, "Go with Raidō and take out the other bird-summoner."

Tsuruya gave Raidō an appraising look. Then as she descended slightly, she said, "If you could come with me, Raidō-san?"

As soon as Raidō climbed onto Tsuruya's back, she took off in a spinning arc that led her right over the canopy with enough speed to knock both Kakashi and me out of the tree from the displaced air alone. We managed to catch the branch below that, at least.

"So, how do we stop them dead?" Genma asked. "Because Obito is down there and…wait, he can't be…"

Down below us, Obito had somehow managed to be cornered by all six of the remaining dogs and both of the Inuzuka clan members. He was down on one knee in the center of the clearing, right hand down on the ground and breathing heavily enough that I could tell even from this far up.

…Though given what was happening, perhaps he was the one doing the cornering.
To my chakra sense, the entire forest had come alive in the way that spelled disaster for the Inuzuka force. Obito's Wood Release chakra had attached itself to all of the trees, and I could feel him piggybacking off the energy of the local Hashirama trees. The result was a near-literal minefield of Wood Release growth that reached upward from the ground and ensnared every foot on it except for Obito’s.

"Holy shit." Genma said in a voice numb with shock.

"That's impossible!" Yatsu said, though hell if I knew how he knew what was going on.

Kakashi stepped off the branch and dropped to ground level, both hands sparking with white lightning.

"Obito?" I heard him ask once he landed.

"You're good to go, Kakashi." Obito said, grinning.

Kakashi nodded. And then the clearing, for lack of a better term, went kind of crazy. My chakra sense did the equivalent of going flash-blind—sending me to my knees from the feedback alone—before I managed to pick out the key sensations. Namely: Chidori, screaming, and ow.

You'd think I'd get used to that sensation after the sheer number of times Kakashi had used Lightning Release near me, but apparently this new jutsu was something special.

"—Right? Are you all right, Kei-san?" Genma asked, even as he thumped my back once or twice to make sure I was still responsive.

"...Yeah, I am." I got back to my feet again, and then spent a moment trying to figure out what had happened.

I hadn't missed much, time-wise. Maybe four seconds at most.

And yet in that scant timeframe, the tag-team of Kakashi and Obito had somehow knocked out every single person at ground level aside from themselves. With Obito holding everything hostile down with his bizarrely non-stabby Wood Release move, Kakashi had the perfect setup for a devastating Lightning Release jutsu that I hadn't seen before.

The dust from the discharge was still settling.

Kakashi wobbled on his feet a bit, but Obito hardly seemed any better. The main difference, from where I was standing, was the fact that Obito was visibly grinning so hard that it probably hurt.

I dropped down to the ground and managed to catch up to both of them quickly enough to catch Obito’s left arm. Kakashi managed to stay standing, but I had a knack for predicting when Obito would do something dumb.

"That was even more awesome than I thought it'd be!" Obito laughed, even as he finally flopped over and just descended into adrenaline-fueled giggles. "I can't believe it; all that practice was worth it!"

"You doubted me?" Kakashi scoffed. "Idiot."

And then, out of nowhere, a gale-force wind slashed through the forest. Obito, Kakashi and I threw ourselves flat on the ground, and Genma and Yatsu joined us a moment later as the wind knocked both of them out of the tree—though less gracefully than they probably would have preferred.
Once the sudden windstorm was over, at least a minute later, we had a chance to get up and take stock of what had happened.

And then Raidō and Tsuruya landed in the middle of the clearing, complete with two passengers. Raidō slid off of Tsuruya's back, and then she reared up and dumped the other two unceremoniously on the ground.

Two women, both wearing the village uniform.

One was purple-haired and wearing a Konoha bandanna the same way I did, with two huge hoop earrings in each ear. She was pretty in a classic way, but had apparently been hit in the face with something small that traveled very, very fast. Like maybe a flying swallow chucked back into her face at high speeds.

The other was mousy and brown-haired with thick black-rimmed glasses and a Konoha headband around her thigh, and for some reason was coated head to toe in animal hair. Was there another summon I hadn't been keeping track of?

"What'd I miss?" Raidō asked, looking around at the carnage. He had something in his left hand…

I did, too. Unconscious dogs everywhere, two Inuzuka clan members shocked literally senseless, scorch marks up and down the scenery… Heh. We'd made a bit of a mess.

"Who've you got there?" I asked, since no one else seemed to be focusing much.

"These two? Both of them are special jōnin I've seen around the village. Mitsuru Jishin is the one with the glasses. The other one is Sora Hayabusa. One summoned swallows and the other had a giant mole. I'll let you guess which one had which."

"Was it a difficult fight?" I asked. Tsuruya had lowered her beak to about shoulder height, so I smoothed down her head feathers while I had the chance.

"No. Actually, Tsuruya-san here took care of almost all of it." Raidō thumped Tsuruya's shoulder affectionately with one hand. "I only had to deal with the mole, and that didn't take long."

I let Tsuruya poke me in the side of the head, grinning. "I can't believe Sensei called you a 'minor' crane summon. Looks like we proved that wrong."

"Of course we did, Keisuke-sama." Tsuruya said. "But now, what do we do with them?"

"Gekkō-san, could you please check on everyone?" Yatsu asked. His voice was tight with tension.

I blinked, looking around at the casualties. "Um, sure! Er…they're not going to just get up and attack in a minute, are they?"

"No," Yatsu said flatly. "I am the sole judge on affairs relating to this mission, and they've been defeated." His mouth twisted. "But, on a more personal note, I'd like to see if my family is still alive."

"On it." I said.

On just a surface scan, everyone was still alive. Just unconscious, since we hadn't exactly been aiming for headshots here. But because my chakra sense had limits when it came to being used as a medical device, I broke out the Diagnostic jutsu twelve separate times. I also made some use of the Mystical Palm jutsu for the more bruised and battered cases.
After the first four, Genma and Raidō at least started moving patients to me instead of just waiting for me to come to every single one of them. What else were teammates for?

The Inuzuka woman was actually awake by the time I got to her. Since she didn't seem interested in receiving any assistance, I had to go over and figure out what was going on.

She was sitting up when I arrived, with the Boxer's head cradled in her lap. The big gray dog whined as I got closer, though I didn't remember anything about hitting him. Two other dogs, yeah, but not him.

"Are you this team's medic?" the Inuzuka woman asked.

She was probably in her late thirties, with long black hair that was wild and loose and ran halfway down her back and also formed little triangular tufts right above her ears because of the erratic cut. Her eyebrows were more narrow black dots than anything, in the style that some noblewomen wore in the Land of Fire. Her eyes were also as dark as mine were, but somehow less feral-looking than was common to Inuzuka clan members. She had the signature triangular tattoos that most Inuzuka clan members shared, too.

"I am. My name is Keisuke Gekkō." I said as I knelt next to her and the Boxer and called up my medical ninjutsu. "What's yours?"

"Fuse Inuzuka." She smiled, despite the fact that we'd beaten her team pretty much senseless, and said, "You've already met my husband and my brother."

Yatsu, by that point, had come back with the unconscious Shiba Inu and was holding her very carefully in his arms. "The brother-in-law would be over there, just so you know. His name is Shippō Inuzuka."

"We fought your whole family?" Obito asked, surprised.

"Yes." Yatsu replied.

I sat back, having been using my Diagnostic jutsu all the while. "Well, I think you're going to be just fine. In fact, I'd expect—"

It was at about that point that every single one of the dogs, as well as the just-identified Shippo Inuzuka, started to wake up. One or two of the dogs also started whining. And the two special jōnin also started to wobble upright.

"And they were unconscious for what, a minute?" Genma mused aloud.

"They should still be able to get out of this forest." Kakashi said, looking speculatively out at the sudden crowd. "Fuse-san, can you lead them out safely?"

"Yes." Fuse said. She whistled sharply as she got to her feet, making eight separate pairs of ears stand up.

"We've already lost?" Mitsuru asked faintly, still looking a little dazed.

"We did." Fuse said, with the Boxer leaning on her leg quite a bit. "Thank you, everyone, for trying your best."

I felt Genma's hand on my shoulder, but didn't turn to look and figure out what that was about. Not yet. I did stand up, though, and his hand didn't move.
"You did pretty well." Shippō said grudgingly as he got to his feet. "If you can make mincemeat out of the veterans like this, I don't think you'll have much trouble with most enemies. But watch out—the rest of the team is no joke, either."

Fuse nodded. "Be careful, children. And try to keep my husband out of trouble."

Yatsu pinched the bridge of his nose in exasperation.

The dogs and their handlers (or humans and their handlers) disappeared in a whirl of fur and comments like "I think I broke my glasses..." Not the most dignified exit in history, really. But maybe it didn't matter.

"Kei-san, are you sure you shouldn't be taking a break?" Genma asked finally, drawing my attention back to him.

"Why?" I asked.

Genma frowned. "You just used two huge explosive seals, one of the Hokage's signature jutsu, you summoned a giant crane, you used twelve different charges of that diagnostic technique, and you healed some of them enough that they don't have horrible concussions. But I'm not sure how you're still standing."

"Genma, I know my limits." I said, brushing his arm away. I turned to face him fully, arms folded across my chest.

"The Keisuke Gekkō I know would be sleeping on her feet right now." Genma insisted.

I remembered belatedly that Genma had actually seen me fight in a Chūnin Exam before, as a member of the audience (since he'd been busy in the hospital wing during the time we actually fought in the same one). The matches I'd fought hadn't been perfect indicators of chakra levels, but I wasn't exactly known for being an endurance powerhouse. Not like Gai or even Asuma.

"The Kei you knew was nine." I said.

I felt Obito walk up next to me, and then he broke into the conversation with, "But wait, didn't you have questions about the thing I pulled off?"

"I do, but that's secondary to the bigger issue here." Genma said. He turned to Kakashi. "How much didn't you tell us, before?"

"A lot." Kakashi said flatly. He had both hands in his pockets and appeared unconcerned by Genma's frustration. "And you still don't have the security clearance to hear the answers." And then he gave Yatsu a pointed look.

"I missed whatever happened." Raidō said. "Care to fill me in?"

"Long story short, I have more chakra than Genma expected and Obito can use Wood Release." I explained quickly. "But we don't really have time for this."

Yatsu interrupted just then. "You have twenty-one hours and fifteen minutes. You also have another team of opponents to get through, and I do not expect you to succeed."

Thanks for the vote of confidence, jerk.

You didn't use any of my chakra today. That should be something, right?
...True. Thanks, Isobu-san.

Obito stuck his tongue out at Yatsu.

Genma facepalmed.

Finally, Raidō sighed. "You're sure about this, Kakashi?"

Kakashi's gaze cut like a laser. "Absolutely. I know exactly where each of them got their powers. And they know where I got this eye."

"Speaking of, Kakashi, you should probably lay off the more powerful jutsu for now." I told him, half of my attention on his chakra levels. "Actually, most of us should…"

"I feel fine, Kei!" Obito protested.

"And your chakra is down to half capacity." I told him bluntly. "Be careful." I paused. "And that goes double for you, Kakashi." Because of that eye, you won't be standing if you use the Chidori again. Even if I don't know what the hell that electric explosion actually was.

Genma bit the inside of his cheek, obviously barely keeping himself from saying anything.

"I'll be fine." Kakashi said. He pulled his right hand out of his pocket and there was a brief blur—and then, somehow, he was holding a small medicine bottle.

"…Don't tell me you ripped off the Inuzuka clan." Genma said flatly. "Can you even use soldier pills?"

"Most people can." Kakashi said, spinning the bottle between his fingers. "But this is an emergency option if my chakra fails me. I'll be sure to pay Shippō-san back later."

Obito immediately looked worried. "Are you sure those are even soldier pills?"

Kakashi responded by tossing the bottle to me. "Kei?"

Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Yatsu sigh. Apparently, Kakashi couldn't be bothered to read the freaking label. Oi…

"I'm pretty sure if I take one of these, the results will be horrible." I said, prying it open. Inside were a number of little brown pills that, for now, I could probably identify as soldier pills. Though I'd prefer to have Rin look over them and then disassemble one for testing, they probably weren't dangerous. To Kakashi, at least. I'd probably explode.

"Too much chakra?" Obito asked.

"Yeah." Mostly because of Isobu and not because of chemical stimulants, but the sensation had been pretty memorable. "Been there, done that. got the T-shirt. I'm not doing that again."

"If we're all calm now," Raidō said evenly, "then maybe we should think about leaving?"

All right, all right. Point friggin' taken.

We hadn't used much in the way of actual supplies in this fight, except in the case of weapons. Genma gathered up some of his senbon, while Kakashi and Obito started retrieving kunai that littered the battlefield. Raidō hadn't lost anything, so he was keeping track of Yatsu, but I managed to find the splintered remains of my katana's sheath.
I sighed. There was no way I was getting much use out of it now. I took the top half of what was left and secured it to my belt again.

"Kei, are you ready to leave?" Kakashi asked.

"Yeah." I brushed the dirt and splinters from my clothes before standing up straight again, tucking my sword very carefully into the remainder of the sheath. Nothing like getting stabbed by twenty-five centimeters of exposed blade to ruin my day…

"Knowing that Honoka is on the team…" Kakashi murmured, "I'd say our best bet would be to stick close to a river. Kei, do you have any Water jutsu?"

"Yeah, though they stop at B-rank and I'm not sure how useful they'll be." I said.

"Doesn't matter. Obito and I can copy the jutsu. Three users is better than one." Kakashi said.

Oh, goodie. Training in the middle of a mission.

"Kakashi, I wasn't kidding when I said you need to watch your chakra levels." While my control was still spotty with the upper-level Water Release techniques, I could basically keep using the ones I had mastered all day. Isobu was water-aligned, too.

Kakashi gave me a long look. I stared back, undaunted.

I didn't know how to easily convey how worried I was, especially in front of witnesses. Kakashi as an adult had never been an endurance fighter when it came to ninjutsu, but he had the know-how to make it work. But he'd still collapsed after a combination of using moderately powerful Water jutsu and keeping his Sharingan uncovered for what was probably about fifteen minutes in real time. At age twenty-six. Against an opponent he could have otherwise dismantled in four moves. I didn't have an easy baseline comparison for Kakashi at age thirteen.

"I promise I'll be careful." Kakashi said finally. "But for now, we move out."

I was probably going to have to live with that. At least until I could get Rin's help. For now, though, I fell in with the rest and we headed ever onward.

Chapter End Notes

Today's song is...Beatdown, from the Homestuck soundtrack. :D

The dogs' names are as follows:
Reikō (Pointer), Shinkō (Boxer), Chikō (Japanese Spitz, female), Kōkō (Rough Collie), Teikō (Tosa-Ken), Gikō (Sakhalin Husky), Jinkō (Shiba Inu), and Chukō (Kai Ken).
Kei isn't familiar with all of these breeds, so she named the ones she did know.
And yes, this is a deliberate reference to Okami.
Forty-four hand-seals is entirely too much to deal with. Ever. Even for a B-ranked technique that was, in fact, pretty cool. At the same time, the boys needed to see the biggest Water Release jutsu I could manage, which was the cool one. Somewhat unsurprisingly, it was also the one that had stalled me out two weeks ago: “Water Release: Water Dragon Bullet!”

The river water spiraled up and out of the current, forming a thin twister of water capped with a tiny set of jaws and glowing yellow eyes in a misshapen face. The longer I held the technique, the thicker the dragon’s body became. The edges of its face and eyes became more distinct, too.

And then the blasted thing imploded.

I wasn’t really any better, when you got down to it. My water construct fell apart the instant I tried to push more chakra into it so was actually an attack, but by that point the two Sharingan users who were focused on me had gotten what they needed.

“I think I’ve got it.” Obito said, Sharingan fading back into its passive state. He rubbed the back of his neck. “We’re not going to have a lot of time to practice this.”

“It’ll have to be enough. Just get it right on the first shot.” Kakashi said, pausing a moment to pull his headband back down. He hadn’t actually tried the technique, but did he have to? This Sharingan bullshit was so contrived, I had no idea what to expect when I actually got to see the copying part in action.

Stupid time-skips.

Raidō, sitting on the riverbank next to Yatsu, asked, “So, what do we expect to see?”

“From who?” Obito headed over to him, while I was trying to shake water out of my sandals. Kakashi was likewise packing up some of his equipment, but with more poise. “Because I can guess for like, half of the team.”

“Everyone.” Raidō replied, frowning a bit. “And maybe a half-arsed explanation so Genma stops sulking.”

Even from across the river, I could feel Genma’s quick glare. Sound carried across water pretty well, and my chakra sense had pretty good range nowadays.

I walked across the water’s surface to where Obito was trying to have some kind of whispered conversation with Raidō, Kakashi following along in my wake apparently out of a lack of better things to do.
I thought about the situation and Raidō’s request. For a bit.

Then I rolled my eyes. This was getting out of hand and had to be sorted out now. Sure, I didn’t know Genma as well as I did Kakashi, but leaving things to fester right before a huge fight? Genin-level pointlessly dramatic bullshit: Exhibit A. Which I wasn’t going to allow to happen for the second time in a month, especially since the previous run-in with said situation involved almost getting killed.

“All right, all right,” I waved Genma over. “Team huddle time, now."

“You’re sure about this?” Kakashi asked.

I shot him a disgruntled look. “Yes. Kakashi, take Yatsu over there. You’ve heard this part before, and I need Obito here to explain his part.”

He shrugged one shoulder, doing as I asked. I had about a quarter of a second to be surprised, but had to shove it away.

I sat down on the riverbank with Obito, Genma, and Raidō, and tried to think of what to say.

I was mostly eloquent in my own head. When I tried talking, I usually realized that other people couldn’t follow my insane thought processes about five minutes too late to take it back. I was the queen of exposition and somehow traumatizing people second-hand.

With the boys looking at me like I had an actual plan, though, I had to come up with something.

“All right, so you want to know why Obito and I are weird now.” I asked, probably sharper than strictly necessary. “Ask.”

Genma wasn’t an Inuzuka, but it was pretty easy to tell when his figurative hackles rose defensively. His chakra is strangely solid—feels like walking around barefoot in the summer, but now the ground’s dried up and cracked. Snappish when stressed, sarcastic, but well-intentioned and meticulously polite to comrades most of the time.

Raidō was calmer—his chakra trends toward Earth, too, but with no heat behind it—and I got a different series of impressions from him. Patience, restrained anxiety, and waiting for the cue to trust. He wanted to trust Obito and me, but we hadn’t exactly given him a lot of opportunities.

“How did you use so much chakra in one shot?” Genma asked, sitting back a little. His voice came out calmer than his chakra felt—a good sign, maybe?

“I’ve been training a lot since I was eleven, Genma.” I said, trying not to be snippy and failing by the thinnest of margins. I took a breath and tried again, “Okay, no, that’s a bullshit answer.” I started picking at my nails. “Look, I’ve faced some freaky things since the last time we fought. Sensei—Hokage-sama—helped me work on a way to store chakra so I could use it in one huge burst. But I have to be careful, and the buildup takes months to be worth it.”

Technically true. Isobu’s seal was a massive vessel of chakra I couldn’t afford to use much, which Sensei had helped me stabilize. And the Dreamer’s storage of spiritual energy had been used after a significant charge time, at least on a few occasions. It’s just that the former was why my chakra reserves had expanded and the latter was the one I’d been building for most of my life. And the change-over had indeed been because of “freaky things” of a nondescript and thoroughly classified nature.

Jedi truths in a nutshell.
I could practically feel Kakashi side-eyeing me, and he was (supposedly) too far away to hear what I was saying.

Genma just gave me a flat stare. “You’re seriously going with that?”

“I’ve heard better.” Raidō looked very, very slightly annoyed.

Obito eyed the two of them and said quickly, “Kei, you’re sure you don’t want me to—?”

Fuck this. Fuck the entire idea of a nice, compact answer for these two. I could feel my teeth grind—not all of my temper was due to Isobu, but his chakra made me tetchy and rude if I leaned on it too much.

And…well, I was just tired of having to beat around the bush. My own mother didn’t know the extent of what I had been through, and I had never been Catholic. Confessions only happened when it was a matter of closing the barn doors after the horses got loose.

I wasn’t even pissed off at Genma and Raidō. I was just pissed off in general.

(Which was probably another sign that, despite acclimating to Isobu pretty well, I had plenty of issues sticking around for the long haul.)

“I. Am. Fine.” I bit out, which was of course not an indicator of being “fine.”

Obito didn’t seem to agree. To be fair, I wouldn’t have believed me either.

“Kei.” Obito said quietly.

I exhaled loudly and slowly. Stupid hammering heart. “No, Obito, don’t worry about it.”

I leaned forward. Genma, looking a little uncomfortable, leaned back. Raidō, at least, was dead calm. Must have been the ANBU thing.

“You want the truth?” I asked, voice surprisingly calm. Well, not “calm.” More “steady,” because I was still upset and any idiot could hear it.

Genma nodded, jaw set.

“I am the host for the Three-Tailed Beast.” I spat. And then I stood up with my spine ramrod straight with tension, still fuming, and walked over to where Kakashi was still babysitting Yatsu.

I sat down on that side of the river and ground my teeth, trying to control the sudden surge of Isobu’s chakra deep inside my coils. He was being defensive—I was being defensive, and Isobu wanted to see if he could act on it—and nothing was helping.

Kakashi put his hand on my shoulder. “Do I need to pull rank to get them back in line?”

“Don’t know. Ask when Obito’s done.” I growled, glaring daggers into the forest. Fuck if I was going to look at any of them.

I put my hands over my face, fingertips together and pressing into the bridge of my nose with both index fingers. If I gave it a second, either I’d stop feeling like I was going to cry or I’d progress to digging my fingernails into my face.

“Kei.” Kakashi said it carefully, like he kind of expected me to jump up and either bite his face off or start bawling. Ugh. “Sensei wouldn’t have chosen Raidō and Genma if he didn’t think they could handle this.”

That…what? “What are you talking about?” I demanded, tilting my head back so I could look up at him. At least I didn’t feel all wobbly anymore.

“Not everyone is suited to bodyguard the Hokage and his family,” Kakashi explained. “You are, since you’re probably going to be hard to kill and Sensei knows you’re not the type to be bribed or threatened into turning. He trusts you.” Kakashi sighed. “But because you don’t trust most other people completely, he had to make sure that the team you’re working with will be able to handle the caginess and the stuff you actually tell them.”

…Okay, yeah, I was an overly defensive idiot.

I’d never really thought about why Raidō and Genma would be on the Hokage Guard Squad, considering everything. There was no reason for them to be a part of the team again unless something had stayed consistent between universes—and Sensei had trusted them enough to show them how to use a version of the Flying Thunder God technique, hadn’t he? I doubted they knew about Kushina’s condition, exactly, but I couldn’t remember Genma being snippy toward Naruto during the boy’s run at the Chūnin Exams either…

Great. I’d rage-quit a conversation with two people who might have otherwise been unbiased about Tailed Beast Hosts, and was otherwise being irrational.

I pinched the bridge of my nose. “Hopefully they’ll accept an apology.”

Kakashi didn’t say anything. And I couldn’t hear what Obito was whispering to them across the water. At least someone knew what information security was. I apparently didn’t.

And then Obito gave a shout that sounded like, “Hah!” and then burst out laughing. Going by the sudden lack of tension in both Genma and Raidō’s frames, I guessed that Obito had managed to say something that turned it all around.

Thank all the merciful higher powers that he was on our side. That kind of power, turned to evil, would be horrific. And it had been.

Kakashi braced his foot right between my shoulder blades and pushed, so I ended up staggering to my feet a moment later. “Get over there and find out what happened.” Kakashi ordered.

“All right, fine.” I said, somehow not snapping at him. Maybe I did need a figurative kick in the ass.

Kakashi left me to it.

And I am proud to say that I didn’t completely chicken out like the gigantic ninny I actually was.

I had both hands in my pockets to keep from wringing my hands together as I approached the other three members of my team. I probably looked like the picture of embarrassed, formerly-angry contriteness—I might have a pretty dull face, but body language is pretty obvious when you have the training to read it.

Genma and Raidō probably both did. So I was definitely an idiot.

Genma got up and crossed the remaining distance to me as I shifted my weight from foot to foot awkwardly. I…wasn’t good at apologies.

We stared at each other for a long moment.
Then Genma sighed, shook his head, and held out his hand. His middle and index fingers were extended, in the Seal of Reconciliation. Which, due to circumstances, I hadn’t seen in what felt like months.

I stared blankly at him.

“You could’ve just told us, Kei-san.” Genma said, by way of explanation. “I don’t know if I should be offended that you thought we were that shallow, or maybe just mad at myself for giving you that impression.”

“Six of one, half-dozen of the other?” I suggested. I gave his hand another speculative look before saying, “Well, I’m sorry for getting so angry over nothing.”

“Not sure how much of that was ‘nothing’.” Genma said. “But I accept your apology as long as you accept mine. Agreed?”

“Agreed,” I said, and clasped fingers with him.

With that settled, we had a chance to discuss things without the potential danger of a rage-based explosion. Or a panic attack. Or anything similar.

While Kakashi was dragging Yatsu back across the river to join us, with Genma’s belatedly offered help, I asked Raidō, “No reaction?”

“I already knew.” Raidō replied. Must have had something to do with his ANBU membership. Maybe. “After you’ve run into the Four-Tails Host and been nearly killed by him, then we can talk about keeping secrets.”

Or not.

“Um.” I said.

Raidō shrugged. “Somehow, I’m a lot less afraid of a Konoha-nin with demon powers than I am of an Iwa-nin with the same tricks.”

…Still, um.

“And you and I both know who was assigned as your bodyguard for a week.” Raidō said, quieter.

Obito looked between us and sighed. “And I thought we were all getting along without the vague threats…”

Kakashi interrupted, thankfully, before we could all talk ourselves in circles. “Does anyone have any suggestions about how to defeat the remaining members of the enemy team?”

What was that strange spinning jutsu? Isobu demanded from his corner of my mind, apparently sitting up and paying attention for the first time in at least an hour.

The Akimichi Human Bullet Tank jutsu. It’s pretty devastating, but it’s often the slowest attack available. I told him.

It looked familiar. Isobu grumbled. Apparently your Hokage isn’t the only person who has been stealing power from the Tailed Beasts.

What the heck?
The Rasengan is not exactly on the same scale as the Tailed Beast Ball. I said.

Doesn’t really matter.

After a second or two, I finally made the connection Isobu had suggested.

“The first thing we need to do is neutralize the Ino-Shika-Chō team.” I announced, startling Obito a bit. “We can shut down the Akimichi by redirecting him at the right time. That would give us more time to work on the rest of them.”

“And not Honoka?” Obito asked. “She sounds pretty tough.”

“Honoka can’t be everywhere at once.” I said, getting a proper feel for the idea. “The thing is, the Yamanaka effectively can be, if we don’t keep out of the way of things like the Mind-Body Disturbance jutsu. There aren’t enough of us that we can afford to fight each other. And then there’s that stupid Human Bullet Tank.”

Raidō rubbed his scar thoughtfully. “Genma, do you know the Earth-Style Wall jutsu?”

“Yeah. It’s not going to stop a Human Bullet Tank at full speed, though.” Genma replied, eyeing Raidō curiously.

“We might not need it to.” Raidō looked back up at Kakashi and said, “Leave the Akimichi to us. The Nara, too.”

“Honoka should be down to me and Obito.” Kakashi suggested, arms crossed. “We should be able to keep up with her.”

“And she’s never fought me before, either.” Obito said. He grinned, “It’ll be fun!”

Yeah, it probably wouldn’t, but that wasn’t my call.

“I’ll take the Aburame and whoever else I can manage.” I said after a second. “I…think that my weirdness may make me harder to tag with kikai than the rest of you.”

Yatsu stayed silent during all of this, as though giving us rookies some breathing room.

“And who’s going to guard Yatsu-san?” Obito asked.

“Tsuruya, hopefully.” I said, pretty much just on the spot. Screw Yatsu’s acrophobia—if he wanted to be in the middle of a jutsu death-match, it was going to be the last mistake he ever made. Especially if Obito’s grin meant anything—he had entirely too much chakra for the kekkei genkai-based damage he could do. “Otherwise we’ll have to take turns as best we can.”

“I am still not interested in flying.” Yatsu replied peevishly.

“Too bad!” Obito said, cheerfully sadistic about it. “It’s that or dying or getting kidnapped or something.”

“Pakkun will stay with you.” Kakashi added. Looked like he wasn’t a lot more sympathetic than Obito was.

Yatsu subsided, but grudgingly.

Kakashi looked around at all of us. “Are we ready?”
“…Maybe.” I pulled both of my right-side scrolls out of their holster and held them up for Genma and Raidō. “Explosives or weapons? Last one’s got medical supplies, but those probably won’t be immediately useful.”

Genma selected the weapon scroll after a brief internal struggle that I could just barely sense. “Raidō?”

I flipped the explosive-storage scroll into Raidō’s waiting hand. “They’re pull-and-set. You can also destroy the entire scroll at once, but I don’t recommend it.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.” Raidō said, pocketing it.

“Now we’re ready, Kakashi.” Obito said.

I should hope so.

Getting Yatsu onto Tsuruya had required a bit of extra incentive. I had to use my utility scroll and break a seal on a bird-adapted saddle I’d used not too long ago, and then set up all of the straps so a supposed civilian could stay on-board in case of combat maneuvers. Pakkun had declined any special accommodations, citing that he was a skilled shinobi in his own right and had no intention of dying via falling.

“Are you sure?” I asked, just in case the pug changed his mind.

“I’ll be all right, Kei-chan. Worry about the client instead.” Pakkun replied. That was the last thing he said before hopping onto Tsuruya’s back alongside Yatsu, fixing his teeth into the leather.

Once Tsuruya and her passengers were flying higher overhead than most jutsu could reach, I breathed a sigh of relief. Former shinobi Yatsu might have been, but it was a lot easier to think about enacting a strategy when the sole “civilian” member of our party was out of immediate danger.

And then I guess it was time to face the music.

As a result of careful scouting and not a little dumb luck, the actual site of our battle would be a riverbank. Specifically, it would take place on the opposite side of the tower than we had started on, about nine-tenths of the way to the first gate. The river on this side of the tower flowed southward, where our goal was in the north, and did so slowly—for some reason, the river was half a kilometer across and rather shallow at this part of its path. Our battlefield would stretch the entire visible area and into the trees around us. There was no cover, really, but plenty of water and earth to use to stifle Honoka. Also, very few shadows.

We could have picked better, probably, but it was also the area where the Aburame bugs would be least effective—it was hard to trap open water with underground kikai, since they generally drowned as easily as every other insect.

Honoka stood upriver from us as we left the forest, dressed in Uchiha blue that was visible from even that far away. From her stance—hands on hips, chest out—she not only expected us to challenge her, but also expected to make utter mincemeat out of us. You don’t stand like Superman unless you think you really can take your enemy’s best shot.

(People like that are usually proved wrong.)

She was the only opponent in sight, but none of us believed for a minute that she was the only person around. That would have made it too easy—she’d be free to spam AOE attacks, while we’d be free to target her if we could. I wasn’t banking on it. Sensei had to have told her to play nice.

“Been a while, kiddos!” Honoka shouted, though she probably didn’t need to. It wasn’t like she had much competition from anyone else.

“Honoka-san.” Kakashi said, when no one else wanted to give it a shot. “Your team is the last obstacle in our path.”

“Always were a smart one, weren’t you, Kakashi?” Honoka replied, wearing what could only be called a smirk. She pulled a katana from a scabbard strapped across her back, in traditional Uchiha style. I wondered briefly why she was acting so close to the clan’s party line. Maybe it was because she was in the village? “Ready to face me?”

“You bet, Cousin.” Obito said, stepping forward to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with Kakashi. Because of course he would.

Honoka’s eyes flickered to Obito, gleaming red in the light reflecting off the river.

I didn’t have to see Obito’s eye to know that he was trying for a Sharingan staring contest.

Honoka burst out laughing a moment later, free hand belatedly covering her forehead. Obito’s chakra buzzed in sheer agitation as she went through laughter, and into guffaws, and then wheezing. The rest of us just stared at the jōnin for a while, as she laughed until she cried.

Then Obito, figurative steam shooting out his ears, threw a kunai at her.

The world flipped over and it got crazy for a bit.

Honoka exploded into flame that instantly burned out and left the kunai red-hot—a Fire Release clone. Then, over the crest of the nearest hill, a gigantic Human Bullet Tank—with kunai spikes everywhere for grip and maneuverability and also pain—bounced over the riverbank toward us. So much for a jutsu that was easy to dodge. At the exact same time, both riverbanks burst into flames as though coated in some kind of oil, bracketing us on both sides.

Kikai insect buzzing started about then, from far enough away that I realized they’d been hiding in the trees on the far side of the river in a concentration of…let’s call it one per meter. If that. I wondered if they were supposed to be some kind of detection system—one that I wasn’t equipped to smoke out.

Haha, smoke. While we were at a risk of being burned to death if we didn’t get pancaked.

“Oops.” Obito mumbled.

I mostly ignored that. I was more worried about the fact that I could feel both the Yamanaka and the Nara setting up on us, just beyond the wall of flames. Technically speaking, fire was only an obstacle to one of those two clans. With no bodies between us and them, chances for possessions or various mind-vooodoo were high if we didn’t move.

Most of those thoughts occurred only in hindsight, but the planning undercurrent of my subconscious was running double time and spat out an answer.

Too bad we hadn’t discussed this particular strategy for dealing with the problem. Oh well!

“Obito, up!” I barked as the Human Bullet Tank bore down on us, bending my knees and cupping my hands one over the other.
Obito probably figured out what I was doing after he ran to comply.

Once Obito’s lead foot was in my hands, I tapped into Isobu’s chakra and, as the Tailed Beast chakra dyed my eyes red and slammed into my coils, threw Obito more or less straight up. Between Isobu’s strength, Obito’s training, and a not-insignificant panic boost, he gained enough air to clear the top of the Human Bullet Tank by a massive margin.

After he hit about ten meters and kept going up, shouting something along the lines of “waaaaaaaagh” all the way, I turned my attention to the Akimichi again. I let Isobu’s chakra slip out of my reach and lowered my head mulishly, acting like I was simply going to stand there and take the hit.

Genma and Raidō both bolted in front of me, their bodies nearly parallel with the ground. As the tank approached and both of them completed their hand seal sequences, I ducked. I had lost track of Kakashi almost immediately, but I didn’t feel like I had to worry that he had forgotten the plan.

This one would be one for the books, assuming we did it right.

I heard Raidō’s voice shout, “RAMP!”

Overhead, two massive earth walls came together at an angle, creating a funnel of sorts. Going by the chunks Raidō and Genma had torn out of the ground, they had also had the foresight to create a forty-five degree angle.

The ground shook as the Bullet Tank thundered overhead, shaking the improvised defense and making me immediately worry if I was about to be pancaked along with three-fifths of my team.

But apparently someone had forgotten to tell the Akimichi when to stop. The Human Bullet Tank shot off the end of the ramp and into the air.

Straight at Obito.

“Obito, SPIKE HIM!” I roared, Isobu’s chakra curling around my lungs and ribs. I was louder than expected and Genma and Raidō both jumped a bit, but hey. Could’ve been worse.

“Okay!” Obito, having hit the apex of his jump a bit ago and commenced with the falling part of the program, made some quick hand signs I didn’t see him complete before the Human Bullet Tank eclipsed him. For a moment, I was frozen with sudden fear—what if this didn’t go as planned? What if we messed up?—before I decided that Obito’s fate was up to him.

Just as I was about to head out from cover and perhaps punch the Yamanaka in the mouth, the Human Bullet Tank came speeding back at twice its original rate and smashed into the right-hand wall of flames. As the flames guttered out, I saw Kakashi dart past—beyond the former (literal) firewall—and disappear. I also felt the Nara and the Yamanaka run off as their teammate crashed into their previous location.

Okay, time for a counterattack.

I stalked under the cover of the rocky barricade, keeping low, and flipped my utility scroll into my hand. Target acquired—the Aburame. The man’s bugs were literally everywhere, but I had a few countermeasures.

The Aburame was tall and wore a long white coat with large pockets, his dark hair almost perfectly vertical through the power of hair gel. Like many Aburame clan members, he wore dark, goggle-like sunglasses, but his hands were covered by loose bandages instead of gloves. If he hadn’t been wearing a green silk scarf, with a yellow butterfly pattern, I would have written him off entirely on the basis of appearance. Typical Aburame, blah-blah-blah, nothing to see here…

I popped the catch on my scroll and reached for a storage seal. One that contained an aerosolized can of bug spray.

As the kikai approached, I unsealed two of the cans and threw them directly at their host’s head.

Then Genma threw two explosive-prepped kunai at them and hit his mark squarely. The cans popped under the pressure of their own contents, spraying poisonous chemical mist everywhere. While the Aburame tried to steer his insects around the cloud of death, the aforementioned kunai detonated.

…Next time, I’d probably tell Genma to use a slightly weaker set of seals. As it was, I’m sure the insects and their master felt like the air had caught fire.

Meanwhile, the Akimichi finally rolled to a complete stop and shrunk down to normal with a loud crack, flopping to the ground with ropes and kunai falling all around him. I could only wonder what Obito had hit him with.

“How many do you think that was?” Raidō wanted to know, though I wasn’t sure if he’d stay for an answer. He was already halfway upright, barely poking his head over the bizarre earthen barricade we’d made, eyeing the newly-clear riverbank with an expression that suggested imminent attempted murder. Probably a mutual feeling.

I spared him a brief shrug. “We saw the Aburame and the Uchiha. Anything else is up in the air.” I didn’t know for sure where the Yamanaka and the Nara had gone. A thick cloud of smoke, punctuated with massive chakra discharges, obscured half of the battlefield. The chakra explosions made it harder for me to get a bead on what I was trying to find.

But Kakashi was in there and fighting.

Obito shot past me. As he went, his right arm was still shedding bits of what looked like it’d been a gigantic Wood Release mallet. Apparently, when I’d told him to pick something that could take a hit from a Human Bullet Tank, he’d interpreted the statement with the addendum of “and hit back.”

I was moving to go help him, already thinking of what kind of explosive I’d like to use, when Raidō suddenly gave a shout.

At this point, I’d suggest paying attention. Isobu snapped.

Okay, okay… My chakra, tinged faintly with Isobu’s, flashed outward as I tried to figure out what the heck was happening.

Kakashi was in two places at once. One of the two Kakashis was more lightning-y than the other, which made me wonder if there was a Lightning Release clone running around.

Genma had finally broken off from my position and was going after the Aburame for the knockout blow. Given the fact that the Aburame seemed to still be reeling from the attack earlier, I decided I could safely cross him off the list.

Obito was screwing around with the Nara, punctuated occasionally by explosions and loud thuds that might have been the Wood Release hammer coming down.

The Akimichi was unconscious already, due to genjutsu. I’d had no idea Obito had any, but there may have been something else going on there.

Raidō was the only one still near me. He was waiting on my cue.

I could work with that.

I drew my katana. “The Yamanaka’s at thirty meters, ten o’clock. Come with me?”

Raidō nodded, drawing his own sword. “Left or right flank?”

“I’m right-handed.” This apparently earned another nod, and Raidō stood up so that he was positioned to my left and about two meters behind me. He needed the space to react in case I started growing chakra tails or something, which I wasn’t about to begrudge him.

And then we, under the cover of one of Raidō’s weaker genjutsu, skirted the edge of the battlefield.

I’d never really thought about what it would mean to fight alongside another kenjutsu specialist. I mean, Kakashi could use swords as well or better than I could if he wanted to, despite preferring wakizashi-length blades most of the time. Obito had probably copied more kenjutsu from me than he’d ever actually think about using, what with his apparent fondness for straight ninjutsu. Fighting around someone else who used full-length katana like I did was a new experience.

(Keeping in mind that “specialist” wasn’t really a term that applied to me much anymore.)

And Raidō’s sword was cool, which was a neat bonus.

Anyway, Raidō and I managed to maneuver around the battlefield and finally get a good look at what was going on.

The difference between jōnin and chūnin is supposedly vast.

Honoka isn’t seeing it.

Her little cousin and little recruit, quick and bright and agile. Maybe alone she could smash them to pieces, but together they leave no gaps in their defenses. Kakashi may be jōnin but Obito is only chūnin. This should be easier than it is.

Clenched teeth, Sharingan spinning, redirecting artificial wood and screaming lightning with strategic blasts of wind jutsu and fire. Hands blurring, chakra burning, lungs expelling flame.

Honestly, what are they feeding the kids these days?

Honoka feints right and stabs left, point of her blade glancing off the side of a kunai. Kakashi is quick on the draw, trying to tear into her exposed bicep.

Not fast enough. Bend the elbow and there’s a gap, not enough for Kakashi to pull back and slice, armor rolling into position, blow redirected to armguards. Reach down length of blade, grab for the collar inside the guard position.

She barely has her fingers in the smaller jōnin’s collar, yanking with intent to drive her knee into his nose when she spots trouble coming the other way. Her little cousin again, Fūma shuriken bearing down on her arm.

Teeth grind. Nothing is easy.
Letting Kakashi stagger backwards, darting out of the way.

Setting an explosive tag under the other Uchiha’s feet, forcing him out of immediate melee range. Might have caught fire. Not sure.

Lunge forward, plant one foot immediately in front of smaller jōnin. Twist and reach, grabbing shoulder straps and hauling him forward into a punch with the katana hand.

“Yes.” Body language relaxed despite circumstances. How? What is Kakashi planning?

Drop sword, twist arm around, grab his forearm and pull. Smash younger jōnin into dirt via wrenching arm caught in lock.

“Was this?” Can’t be. Must be a bluff.

“Yes.” No, no, no no no no! Tricky little rat—

Little jōnin explodes into lightning, little bolts running up and over metal armguards and a scream in her throat.

Honoka hates smart opponents.

Snatch up sword, block incoming Wood Release strike—

When we arrived, which couldn’t have been more than five seconds later, Obito and Kakashi were trying to contain Honoka’s immense Fire Release talents between them and not doing the best job—which was why the non-liquid parts of the river and surrounding area were on fire.

The Yamanaka was apparently trying to line up a shot on one of my teammates while not getting Honoka caught in the mess somehow. He was probably about thirty-five or so, with long blond hair in a ponytail and a scar that puckered one side of his mouth. He looked like someone I did not want to mess with. But the Mind-Body Transfer and Disturbance jutsu had certain limitations in a close combat scenario and couldn’t be used beyond a certain range either. He had to stay close enough to act and far enough away to not get instantaneously gibbed by the random attacks coming off the figurative dust cloud of violence that the three Sharingan-users were caught in.

The Nara was waiting in front of him, the ground lined with black from her shadow jutsu. She was a woman about the same age as Honoka, with cartilage clasps as well as the usual Ino-Shika-Chō earrings and a triangular chunk missing out of her beaklike nose. Dark-eyed and dark-haired with very sharp features, she focused on the fight between kekkei genkai users with intensity that I didn’t trust.

I didn’t believe it would be that easy to get past them.

That was about when an explosion—Genma really needed to be reminded to play nice, especially with weapons he hadn’t prepped—and the Aburame actually went flying despite the Earth Release shield he’d apparently managed to put up at the last second.

Though the most I got to see of all that was when said shinobi crashed right in front of me, totally out cold.
And then the genjutsu died. Which meant that the Yamanaka looked directly at us.

Raidō and I decided (by mutual, silent consent) to cut our losses and just deal with the (relatively) long-range fighters as quickly as we could.

I went high, Isobu’s chakra thrumming in my coils, and then barely avoided the explosives-laden log that the Yamanaka Replaced himself with. Kicking it away took time and I’m sure my mother would have been disappointed in me for falling for that trick.

Going by Raidō’s grunt of frustration and the sudden lack of a Nara woman a few meters away, I could only conclude that our opponents had thought of the exact same trick.

Fighting teams with high teamwork ratings? Hard. Very, very hard.

“Twenty-six meters, seven o’clock. Next to the willow.” I muttered under my breath, hoping that Raidō was listening closely.

“Not going that way.” Raidō said. I could see why—too many shadows among the trees. There was such a thing as tempting fate.

We ended up not having to worry about that. Well, not immediately.

At that point, Kakashi, Obito, and Honoka’s fight had finally drifted over in our direction. And it was the kind of fight I would never have voluntarily wandered into.

I hadn’t been paying too much attention, because the chakra expenditure in that fight made me feel like someone had replaced my mind’s eye with a kaleidoscope and my head with a drum, but I had to when a kunai flew by and nearly gave me a nose to match the Nara’s.

Then Raibo and I both retreated to a safe distance and tried to stay out of the way.

Obito’s Wood Release jutsu was slower than Honoka’s Wind or Fire, but Kakashi could force his way through Honoka’s guard if he just followed the paths Obito’s tree branches made for him. Every miss, from Obito, sounded like boulders tumbling down a mountain as the artificial trees smashed through mundane rock, earth, and water below him. Kakashi’s Lightning Release screamed loud and high, following paths made by the river water being kicked up and following Obito’s branches. Honoka moved like a snake, weaving through the attacks with terrifying precision and a quick blast of Wind here and there to scrape just enough leeway out of the attacks and get away.

All the while, it seemed like a dance. Obito and Kakashi weaved perfectly around each other and had no qualms about tearing into Honoka’s back if one of them distracted her or in using each other as platforms. The slashed, stabbed, kicked, wheeled, attacked again, in a clash of blades and bodies so fast that it sounded like a solid, single din.

Shadows lashed out, almost hidden underneath all of that noise, and Raidō’s hand landed between my shoulders and shoved me a few stumbling steps forward. He hadn’t been distracted by a screaming chakra sense and the fight itself.

Which was why he was the one with two-dimensional hands crawling up his legs like ink. And I wasn’t when I turned to look.

The Nara had line-of-sight and Shadow Strangulation jutsu. Off in the trees to my right, I could feel the Yamanaka lining up a shot.
Raidō’s face told me to run and leave him for later. Genma and I could come back and pull him loose, but not fast enough that the Yamanaka couldn’t possess him. I might’ve had the power if I tapped into Isobu, but there was also a chance I would tear something of his (like, I don’t know, a limb) off in the removal attempt. Nara weren’t known for giving up their prey.

And the thing with the Yamanaka clan was that they really had no compunction against hijacking a body for five minutes and going for a spin that led to a tumble off a cliff.

I wasn’t going to lose one of my teammates. Never again.

Fuck that.

When I felt the Yamanaka’s spirit make a hasty exit through the jutsu and beeline right for Raidō, I threw myself right into it.

Iso—

—I WILL DEVOUR YOU!
—I—

—bu?

And then I was climbing to my feet again, hearing the Yamanaka give a scream of primal terror. I missed a step and stumbled, but that was nothing compared to the time I got from letting the Yamanaka be a giant, screaming distraction as he scrambled away from me.

The Yamanaka was pale and shaking, clutching at his eyes and curled into the fetal position. He’d stopped screaming, but that was about all I could say.

I didn’t have much time two dwell on that. Before the Yamanaka could recover or the Nara could take advantage of the distraction, I threw a kunai straight at the Nara’s head.

When she ducked backwards, Raidō mirrored her movements and would have taken my leg off at the knee if I hadn’t dodged sharply—turned out that the awesome black sword was pretty sharp! Who knew?

And then the kunai exploded, because I’d had a bit too much fun and had not given Raidō all of my explosives. Especially when it came to stuff I could actually touch and focus on.

Then Genma finally rushed over with a smoke bomb, finally breaking the shadow the now-dazed Nara woman had been using to try and choke Raidō unconscious. That, along with the Yamanaka’s freak-out and the various other shenanigans our team had gotten up to, left the enemy team with only Honoka upright and kicking.

And boy, was she kicking.

Even as I turned away from Raidō punching the Yamanaka man’s lights out (which was as much a mercy as a security precaution), I felt a familiar swell of chakra from Honoka’s location and threw my arm over my eyes just before the cloud of smoke appeared.

Then I was scrambling backward, snagging Raidō’s collar along the way and dragging him behind me, as Mamijo’s huge, clawed paw came down right where we’d been standing. Genma, fortunately, ran the other way as soon as he realized what Honoka was doing, and thus avoided an embarrassing death by house-sized badger.
His face—which was, in fact, taller than I was—was barely a meter from mine. His breath was disgusting and came out hot enough to form a cloud of steam even in the August sunshine. Raidō and Genma at least had the good judgment to get out of the way—instead, I had Isobu’s chakra pounding through my coils in affronted anger, pushing me to punch Mamijo’s nose out through the back of his skull.

On occasion, Tailed Beast instincts weren’t terribly productive.

From behind Mamijo, I heard Honoka shout, “Earth Release: Rock Blast!”

And then the ground underneath me did the exact opposite of giving way. As though the immediate area was on some kind of fulcrum and I was on the far end of the lever, the ground heaved with Mamijo’s weight and shot up like a rocket. With me on top.

Thanks to the wonders of chakra-assisted physics, I flew, screaming louder than Obito had. At least half screaming of that was because of more affronted rage—what was this, a cartoon? And my katana even flew out of my hand, to add insult to likely-forthcoming injury.

“Wind Release: Overpressure!” And apparently, out of all the wonders today had in store for me, the last of them was that Honoka had the skill and the chakra to create a localized tornado. Which headed right for me even as I righted myself in midair and tried to figure out how to land safely without abusing Isobu’s chakra.

I must have taken too long, or else forgotten the basic physics behind tornadoes, because I was sucked in and helpless before I hit the ground.

I clapped my hands over my nose and mouth as soon as I felt myself change direction in midair. Tornadoes could suck the air right out of your lungs, impale you with interesting objects ranging from hay to steel girders, or otherwise ruin anyone’s day. But at least Isobu’s chakra, running fast and thick and hot along my coils until it manifested as something nearly solid, could protect me a little. Given that he was a turtle crossed with a crustacean, I felt like I could at least rely on his shell of chakra for a while before I had to panic for real. I probably wouldn’t be punctured by pebbles while he was still interested in protecting me.

I couldn’t hear much of anything while caught in the swirling vortex, but I could at least sense things other than the jutsu. Like feeling my inner ear go bananas.

I hadn’t ever been prone to motion sickness, but this was definitely pushing any known limitations of the human body.

Even while being swirled around like a sock in a washing machine, though, I could still feel chakra outside of the funnel cloud. And a pretty large chunk of it, which was awfully familiar, was heading my way with intent.

And then the funnel cloud, with a sound like sheet metal tearing, exploded into nothing more than a mid-air bust of leaves, dirt, random other crap, and me.

I didn’t manage to fall that far—between Isobu’s massive chakra tails manifesting through my panicked oh shit I can’t fly moment and shooting toward the ground to keep me from free-falling, and Tsuruya appearing just below me at precisely the right time to catch my flight-impaired ass, I ended up being okay!

Though I had to wrestle Isobu back into some kind of order to keep from burning Tsuruya, even as she hovered below me patiently. Once Isobu’s chakra was less volatile and more confined to my chakra coils again, I plopped unceremoniously onto Tsuruya’s back just in front of Yatsu and Pakkun.

“What,” Yatsu began in his precise, irritated way, “was that?”

“Long story!” I informed him, manic cheer in my voice. Holy shit. I was neither dead nor non-lethally perforated. This was a good day.

Thank the merciful gods that it’d just been a jutsu.

I looked down. Well below us, the former slow-moving river had turned into what looked a lot like a scene out of, I don’t know, some huge war movie or something. Huge chunks of the riverbed had been smashed into so much mud, by either massive twisted tree roots or the results of a lightning jutsu going off and killing half the fish. What was exposed to the air was either on fire, flammable, or scorched and quickly extinguished. Someone had ripped up a whole tree and apparently tossed the stupid thing across the river. Mamijo’s work, probably, but I wouldn’t put it past Obito to pull it off somehow. And then there were the places where a still-active Water Dragon Bullet had obviously stirred up the riverbanks.

My eyes were still a near-perfect copy of Isobu’s when we finally got close enough to the ground that I could safely slide off Tsuruya’s back and rejoin the fight. Tsuruya handed my sword back to me—apparently she’d caught it by the handle in one foot, even after all that maneuvering—as I did so.

As for the Tailed Beast chakra and the detection thereof, I could tell by how twitchy Yatsu looked; and anyway, using almost any amount of Isobu’s chakra resulted in an eye color change. And more importantly, using any of Isobu’s chakra at all would make every sensor-type ninja (and many who were not) immediately hone in on me.

…In hindsight, maybe I’d been too blasé about the whole Tailed Beast Host thing.

It also took me an additional fraction of a second to realize that everyone was staring at me like I’d grown an extra limb—which I had, as a matter of fact. The temporary nature of said limbs was a secondary concern.

Honoka, Obito’s ankle still caught in her right hand and Kakashi’s sword against hers, just sighed.

“Do you surrender?” Kakashi demanded anyway.

“Think I have to, at this rate.” Honoka said, shaking her head. She let go of Obito, who had since started to wave his arms in fear of losing his balance, and spun her blade free of Kakashi’s before sheathing it across her back again. “Honestly, kids these days…”

Honoka crossed her arms as our team, however temporarily, decided to stand down. And Genma and Raidō and Tsuruya and Yatsu all came back to join us. Honoka’s badger summon was nowhere to be seen, though I suspected the house-sized mound of tangled thorns (which had appeared out of nowhere) was partially to blame for that.

I gave it a closer look. Mamijo was…probably under that. I shuddered in sympathy.

Honoka snapped her fingers and the lump trapped under said thorns proceeded to disappear, leaving the mound to look like a deflated balloon once Mamijo’s mass was removed.

“Explain.” Honoka ordered, apparently directing the question toward me.
Kakashi not-so-subtly moved so that he was standing between me and Honoka. So did Obito, though he wobbled a little, and I was reminded just how much chakra both boys had used today. Maybe Kakashi had surreptitiously swallowed one of the Inuzuka food pills he’d swiped, but even so…

I looked directly at Honoka, whose eyes were once again a plain, flat black, and said, “This is something for the after-mission debrief, Honoka-san. And here and now, you are not my superior officer. Kakashi is.”

Honoka pursed her lips, apparently weighing her options, and then gave a slow nod. “Acceptable. Yatsu?”

“I’ll record this as a victory, Honoka.” Yatsu said, sliding down from Tsuruya’s back stepping forward. His hair was still in complete disarray thanks to Tsuruya’s aerial hijinks, and he fused over it as he talked, but he was otherwise unharmed. “Any enemy force put up against, er, what youwere”—unsubtle Tailed Beast reference, yay—“would likely have broken at this point.”

I scratched the back of my neck awkwardly. There wasn’t really any chance that Yatsu wouldn’t be referring to the members of Team Minato in this case. Genma and Raido were competent, but there was competent and then there was hilarious overkill.

Honoka nodded again. “Retreat, then.” To us, she said, “Continue the mission.” Muttering under her breath a bit, I watched her create several Shadow Clones—ordinarily a massive chakra expenditure in combat, but hey—and then she and her clones started collecting her unconscious teammates.

I sat down on a rock and swiped a hand under my left eye to check for—oh, yep. Bleeding from the eyes again, and this time more severe than the last. Drat. I went looking for bandages inside my remaining scroll, figuring that I could staunch what bleeding there was.

Once Honoka and her team were finally limping off into the distance, I heard Obito say uncertainly, “Hah, we sure showed…them…”

He trailed off in mid-sentence and promptly collapsed on his face from chakra exhaustion. Genma managed to catch him before he hit the ground.

“Out cold.” Genma reported, even as he pulled Obito’s eyelid back to check for a concussion. I assumed that what he found was reassuring, because he said, “Otherwise, he’s fine.”

“Idiot.” Kakashi muttered, but that was the last I heard out of him for a bit. Mainly because he fell over right after that.

Raidō managed to catch him by his ANBU-styled flak jacket before he face-planted in the river—what there was of it, anyway—and drowned in less than five centimeters of water.

“Does this happen a lot?” Raidō asked, sheathing his sword one-handed before pulling Kakashi over his shoulders like a killed deer.

“This is the second time I’ve ever seen it happen to Kakashi.” I said. The mission with the butterflies hadn’t counted. “And I don’t remember Obito ever doing this before.” Not since he was a lot smaller and a lot less skilled, anyway.

Despite two teammates collapsing, we had actually done astonishingly well.

I mean, Honoka was still conscious to haul her teammates out of the former battlefield with shadow clone assistance, Obito and Kakashi fell over in synchronized dead f opps right after she left, and I was bleeding from both eyes by the time I dismissed Isobu’s chakra entirely…but we won! A bunch of kids with less than a decade of shinobi field experience between us, and we’d still beaten out the parameters of the test through excessive firepower even against a team with an Uchiha.

I was feeling pretty good about that, honestly. Even after having to hold bandages against my eyes for a few minutes until I could heal them.

Eventually, we got up and kind of limped our way out of the forest. After the show we’d put on, none of the wildlife wanted to be anywhere near us, which saved us the trouble of having to kill them. Even if Raidō and Genma were weighed down by my teammates and Tsuruya was staying on the ground to accompany us, we made good time. Especially since Tsuruya had allowed Yatsu to ride again and was handling his security concerns on her own.

And we left through the first gate just before noon.

Once we dropped Yatsu off with his somewhat scuffed-up wife and their eight (eight?) dogs, who’d been waiting outside the gate for him, I de-summoned Tsuruya and offered to carry one of the boys for either Raidō or Genma. It probably wasn’t quite fair to make them carry my teammates to the hospital, after everything that’d happened. And besides, I had chakra to spare (in a certain sense).

Genma declined. “Don’t worry about it, Kei-san.”

“I’m not exactly made of glass.” I retorted. And besides, I’d been my team’s medic for a while. While I didn’t think that Kakashi or Obito would go into chakra shock or anything, it still made sense for me to stick close in case things got worse suddenly.

“I don’t think that’s what he meant.” Raidō said. Since it took two arms to carry anyone unless the style involved was “sack of potatoes,” Raidō couldn’t gesture to emphasize his point as he said, “They’re our teammates too, now.”

And when we got to the hospital, Rin was around and on her lunch break.

“What happened to you, Kei-senpai?” Rin exclaimed, getting to her feet and flinging her bento box onto the ground.

I looked down at myself. On a lot of my exposed skin—face included—I felt a little like I’d gotten sunburned. I also knew I’d gotten a little scraped up in the tornado, and I had bruises pretty much everywhere as a result. But really, I wasn’t that badly hurt even if I looked like it.

Rin caught my face between her fingers and pulled one of my eyelids back without so much as a how-you-do. But given the recent state of my eyes, her concern was probably justified.

Not that I was going to let her prioritize that. I pulled out of her grasp and said, while gesturing quickly, “Kakashi and Obito need a chance to rest, Rin-chan.”

Rin frowned slightly. “Between all five of you, I would’ve expected the other side to need all the medical care.”

Rin effectively had one of the highest security clearances in the village for her rank. I mean, medics saw a lot even if they weren’t generally allowed to make a big deal out of it. Further, Rin had to know about Isobu given what we’d been through, and sometimes tougher or more dangerous cases got forwarded to her. The only thing she generally wasn’t allowed to know was the identity of an ANBU patient. But then, no one was.
Anyway, she was in deep enough to make both of my new teammates give her odd looks.

“To be fair, they do,” I interjected. “But after we won, they both fainted.”

“Obito pretty much carried the team until then, though.” Genma remarked. Obito was drooling onto Genma’s shoulder pad, though, which somewhat ruined the gravitas of the moment.

Rin gave Obito a fond look. “I believe you, Genma-san.”

“Kakashi’s also earned a long rest at this point.” Raidō added, “But we really need to head to the Hokage to report in at this point. Are there any spare beds available?”

There were always extra beds in the hospital.

Active shinobi had free healthcare, too, so we were able to hand my unconscious teammates off to the much-maligned Konoha General hospital (and to Rin). But because, technically, we’d been up for a mission and a promotion and weren’t wounded, the remaining trio consisting of Raidō, Genma, and me were all bound for the Hokage’s office. Again.

Honestly, I was getting a little sick of getting called up—and yet my ideal job required it. I really did want to be a Hokage guard, even if it would be inconvenient sometimes. Funny how that worked out.

Anyway, we entered Sensei’s office maybe three minutes later, ushered in by a harried-looking secretary. When we got in, it became apparent why.

Honoka was red-faced, Sharingan spinning, and arguing with Sensei in the middle of his office.

“—could you even say that?” Sensei’s voice rose into something like a snap, but that was impossible. Sensei hardly ever even got annoyed, much less started yelling at people.

Honoka growled. “A known Tailed Beast Host, Hokage-sama! If the girl lost control—when, even —everyone would have died.”

I pinched the bridge of my nose and mumbled under my breath, “We’re doing this again, aren’t we?”

“Honoka-san,” Raidō began, but lost momentum when she whirled on him in a rage.

“Did you know about it?” Honoka practically screamed in his face.

Oookay, delayed reaction there. I’d have expected the freak-out to take place in the field, where punching people was a valid response to being startled. But it sure wasn’t once you got in front of the Hokage and the punch-ee worked for him.

Just to be safe and discourage Uchiha rage, I got in front of Raidō.

Honoka flinched so hard she actually took a step back.

“You and Kei worked together for almost a week before this,” said Sensei, before the Uchiha could get her balance back. He walked out from behind his desk, his own eyes a little narrower than they would be if he’d been calm. “I wasn’t aware it was an issue.”

“I didn’t know.” Honoka snapped over her shoulder at him. Lower, she said, “I suspected that someone had experimented with Tailed Beast chakra, but to have the entire monster…”

“Kei-san isn’t a monster.” Genma said flatly. “Or else I’m sure we’d all be dead by now.”
“Then what the hell did you do to Inosuke?” Honoka snarled, and this time she definitely directed it right at me.

Oh. So all of that rage was because her teammates got hurt and…well. Not like I could blame her for that one.

What did you do?

Forced him to leave.

Not very informative.

“Inosuke Yamanaka, right?” Honoka nodded stiffly. I explained in as even a tone as I could manage, “Inosuke tried to use the Mind-Transfer jutsu on Raidō while one of your other teammates had Raidō trapped. I…was pretty sure that I could take that kind of hit better than Raidō could, so I jumped in the way.”

“And then the monster tried to kill his soul.” Honoka snapped.

“If he did, it’s because no one and nothing should be inside my head except me and him.” I retorted. “We’ve been on the wrong end of that type of attack before and I am not going through that again.”

“You actually think that thing is smart enough to distinguish the difference between a spar and a mission?” Honoka sneered—and wow, I could definitely see why people would think the Uchiha clan had a congenital predisposition for being arrogant. “Because I don’t believe that you can, given your performance lately.”

What the hell? “How about you pick just one of us as a target for personal attacks?” I growled. “Either insult me or insult the Three-Tails, but pick one.”

“The report you gave me indicated that Kei acquitted herself well on the last mission you were on, Honoka-san.” Sensei pointed out. “You said that she was vital to the mission’s success.”

Honoka’s jaw clenched.

(Also, what? That mission could have been handled by someone else, right?)

“But it’s not that simple, is it?” Raidō frowned, crossing his arms. Distantly, I was a little surprised that he was sticking up for me. Honoka was probably one of his superior officers. “Because Kei hurt one of yours, you have to hurt her back or it’s not ‘even.’ Even if it was justified under the circumstances, the new information colors everything you think about Kei-san, whether past or present.”

I swallowed whatever I’d been about to say before Raidō jumped in. It probably would’ve been more yelling. Instead, I said in a tight voice, “Look, I’m sorry about what happened to Inosuke and I’m willing to do whatever I can to get him on his feet again. I didn’t mean for him to get hurt—I was just trying to keep Raidō safe.”

After a long, tense wait, Honoka’s eyes went flat black again. She ground her teeth for a moment or two and said, “I don’t like that you kept secrets, Gekkō.”

“That goes above your head, Honoka-san.” Sensei said flatly.

“Does it really?” Honoka crossed her arms over her chest, still obviously pissed off. “Who do you expect to be on the front lines when Kirigakure figures out where their weapon wandered off to?”
Kirigakure had been given the Three- and Six-Tailed Beasts—Isobu and Saiken—as a sort of bribe for peace, back when the First Hokage was still running things and his ability to control them was unique. By choosing to distribute them across several villages (with the occasional observation that some villages had captured their own first), the First thought that he'd found a way to guarantee a balance of power between each of the five Elemental Nations. But if anyone found out that Kirigakure had lost their weaker Tailed Beast, or that we had him...

It would mean war. And there was no way we could afford to fight again so soon.

My thoughts must have become visible in my expression somehow, because Honoka said, “You didn’t think of that. You didn’t think.”

It was kind of hard to think of that at the time, dammit!

Do you regret it? Isobu asked.

No…but I do worry about the consequences. Especially right now.

“Honoka-san.” Sensei said, in a voice that was almost pleasant, “At this point, I’d like to remind you that S-ranked secrecy exists for a reason.”

Sensei, like most politicians and every person who worked a retail job, had an expression reserved solely for difficult people and things that ought to die but couldn’t be forced to do so in the next five minutes. Sensei’s looked completely pleasant—he was a dork and had an honest face, relatively speaking—but that had no effect on the miniscule amounts of killing intent that leaked out of him when he used it. He might’ve looked obliviously happy, but the smile was the kind that didn’t show teeth because otherwise the owner would be tempted to bite someone’s face off.

Honoka seemed to shrink in on herself a little. “But…”

“Inform your team that they will tell no one what they learned.” Sensei went on as though she hadn’t said anything. “I’ll discuss the issue with you when you resume normal duty. In the meantime, concentrate on resting and seeing to your team. I’ll send Kei along when or if she can be of any help.”

Honoka shot me a glare, but left the room at the clear dismissal.

For a moment, none of us said anything.

Then Genma said, past the senbon in his mouth, “So, execution order? I had no idea you were this popular, Kei-san.”

Raidō whacked him in the back of the head.

“Just saying.” Genma muttered, chastised.

“Actually, the gag order doesn’t apply to Kei herself.” Sensei said, reshuffling some papers that had been knocked askew by Honoka’s minor rampage. “I assume she told you.”

“Didn’t have much choice.” Genma muttered. At Sensei’s raised eyebrow, he added, “I was a bit insistent on hearing the truth after what she did.”
Sensei frowned. “Only good things, I hope?”

“Kei-san did well,” Raidō said. “The original problem was that we didn’t understand the source of her increased endurance.”

“But they’re both cool with it.” I said before anyone could go around digging themselves into deeper holes. “Right?”

Raidō shrugged just one shoulder. “I already knew. And it makes sense.”

“Yeah, well, I didn’t and I didn’t necessarily maintain total cool.” Genma admitted. He sighed. “Water under the bridge now, though.”

Sensei looked up at the ceiling, as though mulling over his answer over. Then, “Two out of three isn’t bad, right?”

Losing Honoka’s respect bothered me, but I still nodded. “I can’t always please everyone.” Still… “I’m still going to do what I can to help Inosuke when I can, though. Is that okay?”

“You’ll have to ask his clan. And his teammates, probably.” Sensei pulled a manila folder loose from a pile. “By the way, did you want to see the names of your opponents? It might be interesting.”

“…Uh, two questions before we get off-topic.” Genma said with a cough. “First, did we pass?”

“Yes.” Sensei replied, looking amused.

Genma’s senbon made a quick circuit of his mouth again. “Second, then; did we get promoted?”

“Also yes.” Sensei said, and he was definitely amused. Then he tossed the folder to me so I could see what treasure trove of data hid inside.

_Inosuke Yamanaka_

_Shikane Nara_

_Chōku Akimichi_

_Honoka Uchiha_

_Fuse Inuzuka_

_Yatsu Hyūga-Inuzuka_

_Shippō Inuzuka_

_Shimika Aburame_

_Mitsuru Jishin_

_Sora Hayabusa_

The rest of the names were canine ones, or at least I guessed as much. And that was it.

"Bit of an anticlimax, Sensei." I informed him.

"At this point, I think that all of you need to unwind." He paused, as though something had just occurred to him. "Actually…where are Obito and Kakashi?"
If I had been sufficiently animated, I would have face-faulted. Instead, I resumed pinching the bridge of my nose, waved Raidō and Genma off with my free hand, and began with, "It's a long story…"

Something like two hours later, I tracked both Raidō and Genma down at Ichiraku's and gave them a hug each.

"Thanks for believing in me." Even if I hadn't been giving them the best reasons for it.

"You're our teammate now, Kei-san." Raidō said once I let him go, as though it was just that simple. "And our friend, I think. Unless you object."

Genma grinned, spinning his senbon between his fingers. "So, what do you say?"

I held out a fist each, which got me two fistbumps. "Definitely friends."

After I left them to their late lunch, I swung by a local (non-Yamanaka) flower shop and commenced the self-appointed task of visiting everyone in the hospital. I owed my boys in particular and everyone else in general.

Life was (mostly) looking up. Just one month and spare change until showtime. And then I'd know for sure if I was gonna crash and burn.

See you soon, Naruto.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter brought to you by a 30 Seconds to Mars song.
Intermission: What Does the Fox Say?

Chapter Summary

Kei: Hand the story to someone else.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

==> Be the foxy lady.

You are now KUSHINA UZUMAKI, the village's FOXIEST LADY BAR NONE. Not just because you're a CHAMPION PRANKSTER and SMOKING HOT, but also because you have the Nine-Tailed Fox SEALED IN YOUR GUT. This makes you own that title, literally and figuratively. Though some parts of your life have sucked, you've managed to keep afloat with your CAN-DO ATTITUDE and your propensity for KICKING ASS SANS NAME-TAKING. When would you need to remember those losers' names? Never, that's when!

That said, you have pretty much been suffering forever because you are TEN MONTHS PREGNANT and the baby is TAKING HIS SWEET TIME. You're pretty sure you're having a son, anyway. To go through all the prep and then be proven wrong would be TRAGICALLY HILARIOUS.

You have just woken up from ACTUAL HONEST TO SOMEBODY'S GOD SLEEP. You are amazed this is a thing that can still happen. With that part out of the way, you feel the urge to DO SOMETHING DIFFERENT TODAY. Like climb a mountain or get into a fight with a bear or maybe write in your diary.

What will you do?

==> Kushina: Expound upon shenanigans.

January 30

Minato tells me not to worry, and then he goes and…and…

Fuck.

I'm crying all over this STUPID page and I just…

[mass of scribbles]

Minato lost one of his students two days ago, on a mission to the Land of Grass. We all knew there were risks on a mission that far from home, but from the way Minato told me what happened, it was all because of some stupid mistakes.

Or maybe that's the guilt talking. No one else is.

I haven't seen Kakashi sleep or eat since he got home. I know he must have—Minato wouldn't let him just wither away—but it hurts to see him like this. After what happened to his father, I kept hoping that he wouldn't lose anyone else close to him. That we wouldn't lose him to himself. It barely makes sense but it's true. He's still here by force of will and that promise he made to Obito, but I wonder if it wasn't a closer thing than Minato thinks.

I've been looking after this boy for years. I should know him, right? I'm just worried that I'm not doing enough to help him. Maybe it's just callous of me to worry about my reactions...

I don't…it's been a long time since Uzushio. A very long time. I'd hoped that I wouldn't have to draw on it again...

Kei isn't really doing much better. Since the inquiry, I expected Minato to check in on her a couple of times, but he keeps getting stuck at the door—

February 8

We had the funeral.

February 23

Training, training, and training! So much paperwork, too. Some days, I think Minato takes all this stuff home because he actually likes it, not because he's just an idiot at delegating.

I've officially been banned from the mission roster entirely. I'm only seven weeks pregnant and I won't show for months, and apparently…

Oh, who am I kidding?

Not being allowed to train or take missions sucks, but I'm PREGNANT! Me! Oh, sure, Biwako-sama says I need to "be careful" and "avoid stress" but honestly, who the heck keeps track of that stuff?! Minato and I are going to be PARENTS.

I'm never going to forget the look on his face after I got home from the doctor! I wish I had a camera and could've taken a picture and everything!

...Also, we need to figure out if we're going to get some kind of ceremony sorted out or wait until after the baby's born to do it. Because according to Biwako-sama, by the time any wedding thing gets done I'll probably be too fat to fit in my dress.

Maybe just a private ceremony? I definitely want a big wedding bash, but I'm not sure how we'd pull it off in time...

Argh, maybe I should just ask Minato to step up the schedule? But when would we even have time?

...And I need to go to the memorial. Maybe Obito will forgive me for being a little late myself. I'll be sure to tell him the good news.

March 6

It snowed today. Not much, but what the HELL is up with this weather?

May 2
Kei came up with some kind of strange seal today, though I'm not sure where she got the idea. She said it had something to do with barrier ninjutsu, but I've never seen this design before. Maybe Akira-chan had something to do with it?

I need to get out a new sealing notebook. I know I'm not supposed to be using chakra while I'm carrying a baby around, but I'm sure there's no harm in just checking someone's work...

---

June 10

I think the baby kicked my kidney. I woke up in the middle of the night and nearly punched Minato in the back of the head, so I think that's a sign, right?

---

July 7

HOLY SHIT. It seems impossible, but our little lost lamb is BACK. I have like half an idea of where he's been this whole time and it's not pleasant and I'm sorry about that BUT HE'S BACK. I am SO throwing a welcome-back party as soon as I can get my hands on enough people to move shit for me since my ankles are all swollen now. Stupid third trimester.

Oh, and Kei turned out to be some kind of seer. I think we have those—Gamamaru-sama, right?—but I didn't really understand her explanation any better than anyone else did! I think she has prophetic dreams or something and then she doesn't anymore? I would've talked this over with Minato, but he's been gone all night and who even knows when he'll be back.

---

July 8

MINATO IS GOING TO BE HOKAGE!

---

August 10

I didn't realize Minato was planning on calling Tsunade-sama back to the village. She's probably the queen of medics, ever, but I remember when she ran off and it WASN'T pretty. What in the world could Minato say to get her back?

"I'm only asking you to come back to Konoha once. For a month. Either you do it and leave at the end, free to go wherever, or I have you listed as a missing-nin. Sarutobi's lenience ends now."

Yeah, I'm not sure that'll work. Tsunade-sama doesn't respect people who threaten her, but I get that Minato's desperate. Between the stuff Kei said and the thing with the weird clay-men, we're running out of time.

So I pulled Jiraiya-sama aside and told him to try something else.

"Tell Tsunade-sama that this is a request from her cousin—I want her to be there when Naruto-chan is born."

Might be a low blow—Mito-sama married into the Senju clan, but she was still Tsunade-sama's grandmother and my clanswoman. Tsunade-sama respects those family ties, though. And that way she'll resist the temptation to kill Minato.

Somehow.
September 1

I'm not much for writing, normally. There just never seems like there's that much to say—life happens, I react to life's happenings and then it just goes on from there. Time moves only in one direction.

I think.

Look, if there's a physics lecture in here somewhere, it's going to have to wait until I have another pen and maybe a cup of coffee. Or might have, but I can't have coffee since that might hurt Naruto. Personally, I'm not sure anything can hurt the baby after ten months of percolating in my belly with the Nine-Tailed Fox's chakra in my seal and my chakra coils, but Biwako-sama insisted. No caffeine for me!

...Okay, no, that's not what I wanted to write about. I mean, I guess I've been super stressed about Naruto lately. These last few months of carrying him would've been bad enough if I just had to worry about not being able to see my feet or sleep on my face or any of those normal things that pregnant women worry about. But now, on top of all that, I have to worry that someone is going to come after my baby!

That's also not what I wanted to write about. Ugh.

I was GOING to talk about seal theory but I'm not feeling it. Without breakthroughs, it's less fun!

September 15

FINALLY. We've had a real breakthrough with the Reaper Death Seal—or rather, NOT using it. I think we really have a shot here! Combining this weird Red Strength Blood Seal that Kei found in one of her scrolls with the Eight Trigrams longhand—

...Wait. Yeah, not writing this here.

At the very least, we should be able to do something a lot less dangerous than what Kei showed us. Honestly! If there's time to prepare then I don't see any reason why I can't get all the grunt work of a Tailed Beast seal out of the way BEFORE I have to die to do it!

Oh, and we had a party for Kakashi today! I mean, we didn't do anything TOO insane because Kakashi isn't a party animal. But he and Kei and Obito and Rin all got a home-cooked dinner and we handed gifts out too. I made sure to give him a blank storage scroll—meaning he can store anything in it with a minimum of fuss, not that I gave him a lot of paper with nothing on it. That'd be rude.

I don't remember what anyone else got him except for Minato—some kind of customized sealing inks? I'm not sure when I'll have time to teach him properly—it's one thing to have Kei working with Minato, but I'm going to be in the village and Kakashi isn't really going to be unless his missions slack off.

I don't think I have enough time to give him a crash course in sealing. I might with Obito, but his handwriting is kind of iffy and that would take forever to correct! ARGH! I want an apprentice too!

Well, maybe after this. If I'm still alive. I still have a few things left to do, after all!

The world is a soft shade of yellow.
Actually, that's not quite true. I cast a long, thoughtful look up at the stone and faux-steel structure ahead of me, past a winding granite staircase suspended in the open air. The air is thick with the sound of labored breathing to a pair of lungs larger than I am by orders of magnitude, of giant diamond-hard chains creaking as their captive twitched.

I walked up the stairs.

The Nine-Tailed Fox—Kurama—is suspended overhead like a massive, furry, furious scarecrow, nailed to the sealing stone with giant chakra-cancelling rods and secured with adamantine chakra chains. One chakra-cancelling spike through its hand-like paws and its rear feet, one through each of its tails, and the chains wind around everything with brutal efficiency.

I never thought of it as brutal or inhumane before. But given what happened with Kei and her Three-Tails, maybe I should. I need a chance to find out for myself if that kind of—of trust, I guess—is even possible now. I'm not sure if it's possible at all. But I have to try.

I reach Kurama's stomach in just a moment, my hair flying back in my face with the force of his breath as he starts to growl. I can feel him getting angrier and angrier the longer I stick around.

"You little insect." Kurama snarls in the bottom register of even his sonorous voice, teeth showing from behind his black, doglike lips. "Why are you here?"

"I'm here to talk with you, Nine-Tails." I say, putting my fists on my hips. "And we're going to talk, this time!"

"Why should I talk to something like you?" Kurama snaps, twisting his head toward me as far as he can. With the chain around his throat and two loops through his long ears, it's less than adequate.

Why do I want to talk to him?

I have a lot of reasons. Not all of them are good reasons, but they're mine.

I don't want Minato and Naruto to have to fend for themselves just because I'm damn near dying of chakra drain and the strain of containing Kurama while giving birth. I don't want to be helpless in the face of danger when my son will be the only one who has any reason for it.

I want access to Kurama's chakra as soon as I can, and not just because I need that power boost. I only caught scraps of Kei's explanation of Kurama's powers, but his Evil Detecting Aura seems like the best ability I could use without time to practice. If something happens in the village, I'll need as many ways of finding trouble as I can get my hands on.

"You don't have to talk to me, really." I backpedal after a moment, because all that justification isn't what Kurama wants to hear anyway. My fists clench. "But there's someone else you should talk to, and you need to see him right now and I'm going to help you."

Kurama makes a terrible rumbling noise—it takes me a second to realize he's laughing, darkly. "There is no one. No one and nothing that I want to see. Leave me!"

Yeah, I'm not taking that for an answer. I need him to move, not to sit there like a lump.

Which would be made easier by, say, changing the seal parameters. I might suck at hand seals and ninjutsu, but I know fūinjutsu inside and out. And I know that I have something Kurama wants, even if he doesn't think he'll get it.
It only takes me a moment to construct chains out of my chakra, the links spinning outward from my abdomen and twining with the chains keeping Kurama in place and the stakes through his spiritual form, anchoring themselves like the lines on massive cargo ships.

"What are you doing?" Kurama jerks his head against his restraints, huge white fangs bared. "I will kill you, you wretched hairless monkey!"

"How about you shut up and let me work?" I snap back, grabbing my chains in both hands and checking their grip on the chakra-canceling stakes with an experimental tug.

Kurama's chains and stakes all groan at the strain, and the fox himself gives a sudden jolt of surprise that runs up the chains and into my whole body. The sealing stone quakes under the strain of both of our movements and our accidental tug-of-war.

I send more chakra surging down my chains and they thicken until the most distant links are almost the size of Kurama's eyes. I swing my arms around the chains, securing them to both my hands and forearms.

I look up and stare directly into Kurama's huge, red, slit-pupiled eyes. "Ready?"

"For what? For some novel torture method dreamed up in your miniscule brain? Don't make me laugh." Kurama growls, but the raw hatred and malevolence in his chakra seems somehow smaller. My chains work better on him than perhaps anyone's power has a right to. Or maybe that's just Kei's weirdness rubbing off on me.

"You'll find out." I say under my breath, and heave on the chains.

The chains groan, cutting into the chakra-canceling stake through Kurama's abdomen. Shards of it crumble loose from the main body, showering Kurama's fur with black fragments. There is a second thunderous crack as the stone starts to give way to the force of my will alone. Then a noise like grinding stone, as the rod is painstakingly pulling free and Kurama thrashes against his remaining chains and freaky body piercings.

"Give me a second and I'll have this out!" I shout over the sound of a titanic monster shrieking in pain. "Hold on, Kurama!"

Additional chains shoot from my stomach to the chakra-canceling stake, anchoring themselves with hooklike points. Come on, dammit!

Sweat breaks out on my forehead. Kurama shrieks again, pulling his chains taught. I feel my feet start to slide underneath me, but it's coming out. Slowly. Painfully. But I'm making progress and it's only going to be a little longer—

Come on, come on, come on—

When the stake finally pulls loose, the dozen other stakes disintegrate and so do the chains anchored by them. Which means Kurama falls.

Kurama hits the ground at the same time my knees do, panting heavily and landing mostly on his left side. He makes a much bigger thud, sounding more like the top had come off a mountain and gone rolling downhill to squash the countryside. The "ground"—what there is of it—buckles and rocks under Kurama's weight and stays that way, leaving a gigantic crater than I barely avoid.

And then the force of Kurama hitting the ground makes me bounce hard enough to eventually land on his head with a thump.

Luckily or unluckily, I'm barely any taller than Kurama's gigantic red eyes, so my impact doesn't hurt him at all. When I get my feet back under me, instead of landing and rolling ass over teakettle until I hit the ground, I slide down Kurama's bright orange fur until I reach the ground. All via sliding down the side of his face.

I'm standing next to Kurama's head and I reach up so I can touch his heavy fur. His breath is hot and disgusting, but I can tell that he's as much in shock as I was, say, a few months ago. I hadn't thought then about what could happen if I undid part of Kurama's binding—but then, I hadn't thought of him as having a name. Or a will of his own that didn't involve killing things.

His massive chest heaves. I pat the underside of his jaw, trying to be comforting and mostly failing because he's a giant fox monster and I'm not. It was probably like being treated with great sympathy by a baby mouse or something. I'm not sure that he would have appreciated it if he could even feel me doing anything at all.

"Come on, Kurama," I mutter, wondering what I'm supposed to do next. I don't really have a plan, as such, and it's taking longer for Kurama to recover than I would've thought.

What would Kei do? What did she do? I'm pretty sure she tamed—or at least de-fanged—the Three-Tails and there must be some way to be able to get my feelings across to him. Even if those feelings involve a lot of kind of frustrated apologizing.

Both of us have too much pride, I think. Kurama and I.

Kurama's huge red eyes open and he twists his neck so he can see me, in the way that dogs do when they're lying on the floor and too lazy to get up and give humans funny looks. His tongue is still hanging out of his mouth, and his breath is still coming faster than it should, but at least he's not hanging in midair by stakes.

I pull my hand back.

His ears stand up, twitching a little in my direction.

"Don't touch me again." Kurama growls, but he doesn't get up.

"You aren't even going to ask what I just did? Or why?" I ask, putting my hands on my hips. "Really?"

"I thought it was obvious." Kurama's eye—the only one I can see all that well from this side—closes. "You broke part of the seal."

"And you don't ask why?" I demand.

Looking at him critically, I have to admit that I can understand why he isn't. Even though I removed the more obstructive seals, heavy ink lines show that my chakra chains—no, Mito's chakra chains—have practically burned themselves into Kurama's body. Though I pulled him loose from the part that left him hanging from the "wall," suspended by chains and stakes through his body, he's not really much more capable of acting out against me than he ever has been. Some of the seals even indicate that I can shove him into a sort of seal cage…which I haven't seen yet.

And in the meantime, they seem to be making him a hell of a lot more sluggish than an un-caged Tailed Beast should be.
I frown. Aunt Mito was more thorough than I thought. I need to show this kind of seal progression to Minato.

Kurama gives a sub-vocal thrum that might grow into a snarl if he put more effort into it. "Why should I care about what a little hairless monkey does to its chakra? Since you are so insistent in loosening my chains, you should not expect my gratitude. This is your doing and yours alone, rat.""

He has to know about the secondary seal.

And what Minato's doing in the outside world.

My temper flares, because of course it does, and I bellow, "Dammit, Kurama, I'm trying to apologize here!"

Kurama's eyes open again. "Do you know why?"

"I do, actually!" I snap. I can feel my hair starting to stand on end—literally—as my chakra rises in response. Before I know it, I'm practically waving my arms in frustration. "I'm sorry you've been stuck up there for nearly sixty years, and I'm sorry I didn't see anything wrong with it before! I'm sorry for only ever calling you 'Nine-Tails' and using your chakra without asking! I mean, you've made a lot of this kind of really difficult, but I'm apologizing anyway!"

I pause, trying to think of something else to say.

"Human sentiment." Kurama grumbles, turning away. He acts like an old man—too stiff or too cautious to move quickly.

"…I also don't get why you haven't tried to eat me." I admit, letting my arms fall to my sides.

Kurama rolls over. Not toward me, but so that his back is facing me. Sort of like when Minato gets mad at me, but I never let him stay that way for too long.

It's a little like staring down a gigantic furry wall.

Dammit.

"Where did you hear that name?" Kurama asks, his voice making the ground shake.

"Eh?" I shrug. "I got some insight a little while ago. I...didn't realize you had a name, before. So I'll use it."

"And you just knew it was mine?" Kurama scoffs.

I wave my hands vaguely, mostly because I have no idea what to say. "No? I...uh." Wait. "I know someone—the host for the Three-Tails."

Kurama snorts in obvious disdain.

"And I got to see the moment when you were all named by the Sage of Six Paths." I add.

I see all nine of Kurama's tails go perfectly still. He sits up, like someone trying to haul themselves up from a bed, and locks his supporting elbow even as he looks over his shoulder at me. Then he heaves himself to his paws, towering over me more than even the Hokage Mountain. Or at least it feels like that.
"What," Kurama growls, "are you talking about?"

I stood up straight, crossing my arms over my chest. "You heard me."

"The Three-Tails...he's gone soft." Kurama spits, teeth huge and white and disturbingly close to my face in short order. "How dare he?"

"He didn't tell me." I correct immediately. "I didn't explain properly." As Kurama's eyes focus on me again, I say, "Come on, I want to show you something so it'll make more sense."

"I am going nowhere with you." Kurama snarls, lowering his head and assuming a fighting stance.

I concentrate on my chakra. "Actually, yeah, you are."

A chakra chain shoots out, looping around Kurama's wrist, and then the "ground" drops away below us both.

For a long moment—maybe not just a moment—we're falling together.

And then we hit the bottom of wherever-this-is, with Kurama landing on all fours first and with me bouncing down his fur like it was some kind of hill and I was a five-year-old rolling down into the river. Only I think a river would be more fun and less grumpy.

I land on his back. And then the ground, eventually.

Once I manage to remember which direction is up and which is down, and I find the floor with my feet, I release the chain around Kurama's wrist and let it dissolve into the empty air.

I get up and dust myself off, even as Kurama lurches back to his feet and starts growling all over again.

Honestly, I wonder if he doesn't get a sore throat with all that aggression.

Across the way, where I didn't look before, was a mountain-like creature with a pale blue-green shell and a craggy face with no visible mouth. Its single visible eye was a ringed, red-and-gold series of loops instead of Kurama's animalistic eyes, and its arms were as human-like as Kurama's, but stubbier and covered in both spikes and heavy hide. Its belly was striped and folded, like a whale's, and three shrimplike tails curled off into the distance, barely visible behind the spiky shell.

And on its hand, sitting with her legs folded meditatively and a pair of thick glasses on her nose, is Kei.

"Uh, hi, Kushina-san." Kei says, looking sort of stunned as she looks up at Kurama's crouching form. "Uh...I think you've got a guest?"

"Obviously!" I say, and I hold out a hand toward Kurama. "This is Kurama."

"We know." Isobu replies, closing his functional left eye with a sigh. "I see you are every bit as proud as I remember."

Kei looks between Isobu and Kurama once, then twice. Then she sighs. "Great."

I jog over to her while the Tailed Beasts are still squaring off. Hopefully, they won't try to kill the crap out of each other while I'm busy. I mean, I can probably keep Kurama from beating Isobu up, what with the chakra chains and all. But I don't want to test myself against two Tailed Beasts at once
"And find out on the spot that I'll lose."

"So, what have you been doing in here?" I ask, while Kei pulls the glasses off her nose by the arm and pinches the bridge of her nose.

"I've been showing Isobu-san some future events." Kei replies carefully. Any evidence she's actually been doing just that? Gone, if it ever existed. Good girl. "Kushina-san, did you do the thing?"

"Of course I did. He doesn't have holes in him anymore, for one." I wave vaguely at Kurama, who plants his forepaw on Isobu's head and commences roughhousing because he's a jerk. I mean, Isobu's shell will probably protect him from a lot of things, but Kurama has more tails and is stronger pretty much by default. I think.

"Get off, Kurama!"

"Make me, Three-Tails!"

"It's Isobu, you—!

And then there's a lot of roaring and the ground rolls like in an earthquake.

"Don't make me come over there!" I holler over at the tussling Tailed Beasts, then slap my hand over my mouth to keep from laughing.

I'm a babysitter to world-ending monsters. How isn't that funny?

Kei doesn't seem to agree. "Kurama-san! Did you want an explanation for what Kushina-san did?"

"It's Kurama-sama to you, bug!" Kurama roars at Kei, as Isobu's tails wrap around his throat and start to choke him. He reaches up with both forepaws and claws at Isobu's tails while the turtle tries to force him into a triangle choke.

"…Yeeeah, no." Kei mutters under her breath. "Anyway, Kushina-san…"

"It's interesting, Kei-chan," I interrupt, "how the Tailed Beasts act more like people after you show up. He's not exactly the living embodiment of malevolence…"

"Neither is Isobu-san." Kei replies. "But I wasn't talking about that…"

I frown again. Kei isn't paying any attention to me—rather justifiably, she's got her eye on the tussling Tailed Beasts.

And, oddly, the fact that they're both slowing down.

"What's going on?" I ask, but there turns out to be no time for an answer.

Kurama stumbles to a stop, panting like he's just run a marathon and with black lines spreading out from the chakra chains linked into his fur. As we watch, he gets slower and the lines get thicker, dripping down from his fur like they're still made of ink and leaving a huge pool of blackness directly underneath him, high enough to reach his ankles.

Isobu scrambles out from under his sibling, three tails thrashing free from the seal.

(I don't want to imagine what would've happened if he got stuck.)

The darkness reaches upward, simultaneously stretching and twisting into something with a hundred upward-facing bars. Some of the lines curl around Kurama's long limbs and wrench him off his feet, pinning him to the ground on his side as he snarls defiance. Others continue climbing, pooling above his head like the roof of some kind of structure.

"Kushina-san!" Kei shouts in protest.

It's a cage. Or it's going to be a cage.

A freaking birdcage.

How about no.

If this is my seal—and it is—I should be able to control it. With or without Aunt Mito.

Chains shoot out of me again, this time pulling on the bars of the new cage. This stupid fox will be the death of me. And probably everyone else, after.

"Isobu, please—!" Kei is waving her arms and the Three-Tails slides toward Kurama on his stomach, charging a pitch-black ball of Tailed Beast Chakra in his suddenly-very-visible mouth, lined with spike-like teeth.

"Sorry, Kei-chan, but it looks like we can't play today." I murmur, looking over what seals I can see and reading them as much through my chakra chains as with my eyes.

Under the current seal parameters, I can't bring Kurama too far out of the seal without risking a security measure or two. Some seals—and the Mangekyō Sharingan, apparently—can modify a Tailed Beast's behavior against their will. Whether that means knocking their stamina down to nothing, almost removing their agitated temperaments, or enacting some kind of Tailed Beast catnip, anything is possible.

And it looked like Aunt Mito had found a way to do it.

I feel my stomach turn over. Kurama...isn't nice, to say the least, but that isn't him. And I'm sure he knew it, too. Even while high on what must have been the sealing equivalent of a moderate dose of opiates. I can't leave him like that.

As Kurama roars and smashes against the cage, reaching out toward me with claws larger than I am, I bring my own chakra to bear against the seal, against this strange shadow-plane, and against everything else I can think of. If the seal won't let us out, fine. We can always try again later.

And then, I open my eyes to see the ceiling of my bedroom, and feel Minato's hand in mine.

I ended up more falling out of meditation than drifting out, the way I was supposed to. I mean, I hadn't known if the thing Kushina and I were trying would work, and I didn't know if it had in spite of that.

But hey, one attempted Tailed-Beast-to-Tailed-Beast conversation was nonetheless attempted. For Konoha, that was a first.

I sat up on my bed, kicking the covers off, and peeked out the window at the early September sky. The weather is nice enough, the leaves won't turn colors for another month or more, and I didn't spar with Gai yesterday (and thus don't feel like secondhand roadkill). I didn't have a mission for at least two days, I liked both of my teammates, and the only chore on hand for the day involved getting my brother to work on the next few kenjutsu techniques he had to learn before Mom would consider him
Sooner or later, I'd need to get some kind of day planner just to keep track of it all.

The bedroom door was open, somewhat unusually. I kind of expected to wake up automatically whenever someone so much as touched a doorknob in my presence, but maybe being at home put me at ease in a way that my mission self would never tolerate.

"Sis, are you done medi—me… Meditating?" Hayate asked from around the corner somewhere.

Or maybe it was because my brother was in the kitchen (and not ambushing me), and thus I had nothing of importance to worry about. Besides, meditation didn't count as sleep even if you hopped into a pocket dimension to say hi to the residents.

I heard that.

Was Kurama too rough? I asked.

He was more or less the same as I remember. If exhausted. Isobu said, giving the impression of shaking his head in disapproval. Back then, there was no way Kurama would ever be caught in a human's ninshū trap.

What is—or was, I guess?—ninshū?

The art of using chakra, back before humans corrupted the Sage's teachings. A spiritual path.

And if there was one thing I knew about enlightenment, humans, and the interactions of both in this particular world… So, of course people fucked that up.

Yes. Isobu paused, though I didn't really know if he was going for effect or just because he didn't quite know what to say next.

...The Sage probably wasn't human, was he? I asked after a long mental silence. You said that we corrupted the Sage's teachings, but it doesn't seem like he could be lumped in with the rest of us. Of course, he was the Sage and apparently the pinnacle of everyone ever...

I don't know if you would consider him more or less human than you. Isobu replied. There are very strange people in this world, and we consider them all human anyway. That shark-man in your memories, for example.

Kisame...is a standout example of something. Genetic diversity, maybe. I shrugged mentally. I couldn't really tell you. But I suppose that after all the weird shit running around in this world, one more weird mystery doesn't really make any difference. I mean, I talk to giant animals and chakra monsters and so on and so forth all the time. And Kumo is allied with an island turtle, I think, and... well, this world is strange.

Isobu huffed. Regardless. Do you think that woman will continue to attempt to win Kurama's favor?

I don't think I can stop her at this point. I told him bluntly. And neither can Kurama. Between Kushina and Minato, and maybe Naruto someday, Kurama is just going to have to get used to being out-stubborned by idiots.

Isobu made a noise that might've been a laugh.
At that point, Hayate appeared in the doorway and finally seemed to have come to the conclusion that I was asleep sitting up. I mean, I tend to meditate with my eyes closed and it wasn't like there was anything of Isobu to see if I decided to open them.

So Hayate hit me in the face with a pillow.

Later, Mom came home from early-morning grocery shopping to see me whacking my brother over the head with the pillow from the couch.

Needless to say, she wasn't happy with me.

Sparring kinda sucked that day.

Chapter End Notes

Any and all romance in this story will take place in the distant future of the in-universe timeline. Much like the original Naruto series, romantic relationships are tertiary to the plot except where they inform characters' interactions. At least for now.

And as a digression: Sorry about the delay, everyone. But this is finals week (month) for my degree program. I barely got enough free time to write this much, honestly.

NEXT TIME ON CATCH YOUR BREATH:

===> Be the other half of the hand-holding business.

You are now MINATO NAMIKAZE, and you are GETTING YOUR HAND BROKEN.

Okay, maybe this particular transition didn't work so well. You probably need to be somewhen else.

===> Be the other half of the hand-holding business, but SEVERAL DAYS AGO.

Well, at least you're not getting bones crunched.

You are now MINATO NAMIKAZE, by this point known variously as the ONLY BLOND HOKAGE, KONOHA'S YELLOW FLASH, and KUSHINA UZUMAKI'S BOYTOY. Honestly, you're pretty happy about all of those things, because you're easy to please like that. You are an EXPECTANT FATHER, though the baby moves at no one's pace but his own, and anyway most people aren't supposed to know that.

There are times when you COULDN'T BE HAPPIER and then there are times when you just want to CHOKE SOMEONE OUT.

Like right now.
Minato: Plot like your life depends on it (because it does).

Minato: Be the other half of the hand-holding business.

You are now MINATO NAMIKAZE, and you are GETTING YOUR HAND BROKEN.

Okay, maybe this particular transition didn’t work so well. You probably need to be somewhen else.

Minato: Be the other half of the hand-holding business, but SEVERAL DAYS AGO.

Well, at least you’re not getting bones crunched.

You are now MINATO NAMIKAZE, by this point known variously as the ONLY BLOND HOKAGE, KONOHA’S YELLOW FLASH, and KUSHINA UZUMAKI’S BOYTOY. Honestly, you’re pretty happy about all of those things, because you’re easy to please like that. You are an EXPECTANT FATHER, though the baby moves at no one’s pace but his own, and anyway most people aren’t supposed to know that.

There are times when you COULDN’T BE HAPPIER and then there are times when you just want to CHOKE SOMEONE OUT.

Like right now.

Unless someone is coming in to announce the end of the world right now, I don’t really want to hear it.

Normally, paperwork is soothing—there’s a reason that Sarutobi-sama commissioned an official stamp for the office—and easier to sort with Shadow Clones than it would be otherwise. I tend to get headaches after leaving the office for the day, no matter how late or how early it is, but at least I know that the majority of that is due to feedback from the clones dispersing and not because I hate my job enough to grind my teeth at work.

But today, not so much. It’s been months, but the full autopsy results from the “Zetsu” organism are finally back. And I need to create a plan for every shinobi in Konoha to deal with them. The sheer volume of the main sample, along with the particular way I first presented the initial corpse to Sarutobi-sama—which involved dumping a corpse scroll out on his office floor in a fit of frustration—had something to do with the delay. Pulling the merged “Zetsu” beast apart had taken quite a while on its own, too, even if the blasted thing didn’t rot and had to be carved into pieces with bone saws.

Not that I’m admitting anything.

I should be using my fancy official pen to sign off on more of the endless reams of paperwork that clutter my office on bad days, but today is a slow day and I’m busy trying to balance it on my upper lip. If the Hokage’s chair spun, I’d probably be spinning around until I get dizzy.
Today isn’t really a day for concentrating, and it gets back to the Zetsu thing I mentioned before.

I close my eyes and can almost feel the words marching across the insides of my eyelids.

Subject: “Zetsu”/“Guruguru”

Species: Genetically human

Gender: Unknown

Acquisition Details: Acquired July 7—

What am I going to do?

From what Kei’s shown me and what Obito and Rin have said, each Zetsu is capable of moderate to powerful Wood Release techniques that don’t appear on the autopsy report. They don’t have bones or organs, they can be smashed into a putty-like substance but get up again later if they know the attack is coming, they can mimic chakra signatures of people they attack, and they apparently operate in massive groups. I don’t know for sure if the Zetsu army of the future exists now, but there’s a possibility that they are.

If so, no one is entirely safe. I need to talk to the barrier team and get them to arrange for underground scans or a double work rotation for the next two weeks. Or train more people.

I lean back in my chair, looking up at the ceiling, and put my feet on the table.

Plotting, counter-plotting, counter-counter plotting…

I sigh.

I have plans in place to deal with Madara if he makes an attempt on the Nine-Tails, even if I don’t know exactly what he’ll do. If Kei’s visions stayed accurate, I would be trying to out-think both Madara and a version of Obito with uncanny skill in space-time ninjutsu. But with the events changing, I expect something else entirely—maybe a Zetsu attack, given what I know about them and how it felt to fight them. There’s also no way for Madara to know that Kushina’s seal will be weaker, unless Obito told him and hasn’t informed me yet.

Somehow, I thought that I’d be doing less campaign planning once the war ended.

Not the first time I’ve been wrong, but it’s still difficult.

There’s a knock at my office door. “Hokage-sama?”

I snatch the pen off my face and sit up straight before I call, “Yes?”

“The Council has arrived.”

Fucking perfect.

I deliberately do not sigh again, because they’d be able to hear me, and hear myself say, “Send them in.”

My secretary—Sora Hayabusa, special jōnin but probably still sore over the beating my then-future Hokage Guards gave her team—is the one to open the door.

I grab the report on the Zetsu entities and tuck it into a filing cabinet before the door opens. This particular flock of vultures will receive the information through official channels, not by stealing my paperwork. I’m sure Danzō will find out whatever he needs to know through his spies, but I don’t have to make things too easy for him. The cabinets in the office have heavy-duty security seals that can take the fingers off of anyone who doesn’t have the key—a function that’s mostly occurred at night, when the office itself should have been sealed.

He probably wouldn’t take me seriously if I did. Not that he does now…

I sit patiently behind my desk as the Council file in. While thinking of candidates to replace each of them with people more inclined to think like me—in the grand tradition of politicians everywhere—I paste on a smile and try to stay very still.

It’s difficult to channel natural energy on the move or while enraged, which is more or less the way I think I’ll be by the end of the meeting.

Homura Mitokado, Koharu Utatane, and Danzō Shimura. Two of them are Sarutobi-sama’s former genin teammates, and the last is a childhood friend, and I can definitely see why he trusted them on the Konoha Council. It’s just that I don’t, for reasons that I can’t explain in public or even outside of a secure location, and I probably never will.

Danzō is to the left, Koharu to the right, and Homura in the middle.

“Hokage-sama,” Homura speaks first, apparently elected spokesman for this meeting. “You have prepared for our meeting?”

I incline my head to acknowledge his role. Though it’s hard to have avoided prepping for dealing with the Konoha Council—there are entirely too many years of experience behind them for me to underestimate their guile. “To the meeting room, then.”

Inside the Konoha administration center, there are several secure meeting rooms that I’ve personally improved to the point that their seals are almost as dangerous as the ones in my office, my house, or on Kei’s house. If the seals are active, nothing gets in or out without demolishing the entire building to get through the anchor points for the seals.

Sarutobi-sama preferred the Blue Room, which is fairly sedate as meeting rooms go, unless someone has a deep phobia of blue government carpeting.

I prefer the Red Room, mostly because I dislike the Hokage’s chair in the Blue Room (due to a certain broken spring) and haven’t managed to get someone to replace it yet. And besides that, I’m not Sarutobi and I don’t think I should give the Council too much ground to think that my will is just an extension of his. Sarutobi had his own goals—and mine have changed in the months since I took office.

I may be nearly young enough to be their collective grandson or nearly so, but it won’t benefit anyone if they don’t respect me.

Well, it might benefit Danzō. But I would make him regret it.

“I see you’re settling in well, Hokage-sama.” Koharu says, surveying the room carefully for any kind of untoward seals, surveillance methods, or maybe even cameras.

Like I’d leave them in plain sight.

“I am,” I allow, finally choosing the chair I want to use and settling into it. The others follow suit—one advisor to each couch. At least they can’t whisper to each other. It’d be beneath them. “So.
What’s on the agenda for today?”

Homura sits back, clasping his hands in front of him. “It’s about the jinchūriki.”

My eyes narrow. “Which one, Mitokado-san? Killer B of Kumogakure? Han and Rōshi from Iwagakure? Anyone else I’m forgetting?”

“I meant your student, Namikaze-sama.” Homura corrects me, without sounding too hostile. I could have been facing down the full force of his arrogance if I pushed it.

“What about Keisuke, Mitokado-san?” I ask instead.

“What are you planning to do while Kushina-san gives birth? Two active jinchūriki with weak seals will be more than this village can take.” Homura explains. “You should—”

“I’m not taking suggestions on this matter, Mitokado-san.” I interrupt. “The issue is already being taken care of.”

“You weren’t going to inform us?” Koharu asks, already-narrow eyes turning into near-invisible slits.

“No.” I reply evenly. “I have my own plans in place. Keeping Keisuke away from Kushina is just a precaution, but I have more efficient ways of doing so than would be feasible for ANBU or the Military Police.” I pause for effect. “However, my method is most effective when as few people know about it as possible. So while I thank you for your concern, it’s unnecessary.”

And…now I’m going to have to explain that part to her. I make a mental note to do so as soon as I can before focusing on the conversation again.

“Furthermore, I’m expecting your backing when it comes time to backing the Barrier Team.” I continue without allowing anyone to respond. “I expect them to pull double or triple shifts until the thirteenth to ensure that nothing gets close to interfering with Konoha. Councilman Shimura…”

About two hours of rapid-fire negotiations that oughtn’t have been quite so tedious, I head back to my office alone. I cross the room and sit back down in my chair, retrieve my pen, and commence the very serious responsibilities of my role.

I lean back in my chair, put my feet on the desk, and look up at the ceiling in thought. Then, I say, “Kei, report.”

Kei drops from her vantage point in the ceiling, landing in a crouch in front of my desk. She glances at me, curious, before standing up and to attention. “Sensei.”

“Did you get everything?” I ask.

“Yes.” She reaches into one of her weapon pouches and retrieves a black video cassette—or half of one, given that the attachment for actually viewing the tape wasn’t a part of the recording process. “I’ve also managed to confirm times and dates with the ANBU liaison, as requested.”

“Good.” I take the tape and tuck it into my desk. A little tighter, and my net would close around Danzō.

Working against a conspiracy within one’s own village requires more subtlety than most people can manage. I needed data to make any kind of accusation, or to force him and ROOT to back off completely via blackmail and strong-arming. I don’t have that kind of clout, yet, but I was finding very suspicious gaps in ANBU mission records that were starting to make a very incriminating picture.

Missions into Iwagakure’s territory, reaching back years before I was born. Intelligence reports that were uncannily thin, even given that we had agents in nearly every shinobi village (and they did in ours). ANBU-run border incursions around Amegakure and Kusagakure that didn’t look sanctioned by any Hokage’s seal.

I just need a little more time to confirm what I know.

“…Also, why do I need to stay away from Kushina when Naruto is born?” Kei asks, presumably after watching me balance a pen on my nose for a while.

“There’s a chance that being anywhere near Kushina will mean that the Nine-Tails’s seal destabilizes faster than normal. I’m just not willing to risk it.” I admit, staring up at the ceiling. Then I sit up, sighing. “I’m sorry, Kei. I know you wanted to—”

“To be there when Naruto’s born? Actually, Sensei, I think that’s something I can miss.” Kei says wryly. She scratches the back of her head, just below the knot in her hitai-ate. “I mean, I look forward to meeting Naruto-chan when he’s finally here, but I’ll just have to live with not seeing the actual screaming birth part.”

“Oh, really?” I ask, amused.

“Yeah.” Kei shrugs. “But hey, you can tell me all about how Kushina breaks your hand after it’s over.”

“How generous of you.” I give a brief huff of a laugh, then focus properly. “You haven’t asked where I’m going to put you.”

“I figured you’d know, and I’d find out on the big day, like I do with all of my missions nowadays.” Kei replies, smiling somewhat sheepishly. “Not that it’s a slight against you, Sensei, but…”

“A Hokage guard must always be prepared for the silly whims of their employer.” I chide gently.

Kei sighs. “So, where are you sticking me?”

I drum my fingers on my desk, eying her carefully. I watch as Kei starts to lose her nerve a bit under my persistent stare—need to work on that, for intimidation purposes. “How does ‘Mount Myōboku’ sound?”

“…You’re serious?” Kei’s voice is almost totally flat barring the barely-audible questioning tone, and her face is slack with surprise.

“Yes.” I respond.

Kei rallies after a heartbeat, mind obviously working double-time in the face of this new information. “Tell me what’s going on and I’ll have more of an idea of what to say.”

“Doesn’t that count?” I ask.

“No! I need to actually know what I’m talking about to have an opinion and it doesn’t count at all.” Kei argues, distractedly. “You sent Jiraiya-sama off to Ame, which means you’re planning on sending me to Mount Myōboku with one of your toads? If you do, I can’t get back to Konoha on my own and if something happens here and you can’t summon me back, then it’ll take months to get back here if I get a guide.” Kei’s voice picks up speed again, impossibly. “But if Jiraiya-sama recruited Tsunade-sama like he said he would, then maybe there’s a few more options, here… And anyway, how likely is it that even Madara can get to the summon countries with any level of reliability? He doesn’t have a contract except with the Nine-Tails, I think.”

Is this what goes on in her head all the time? I feel, suddenly, like I should have made certain that she had her head examined for cracks sometime before promoting her. And then the feeling passes, because Kei is Kei. This girl would have had tremendous potential for evil if she’d been born in the wrong place at the wrong time, or maybe if she’d just decided to go all Orochimaru. She’s mine. And Obito’s and Kakashi’s and her mother’s and her brother’s. It’s worked out.

“Slow down, Kei. You’re veering off into speculation.” I remind her, and she looks back at me with a sort of startled surprise.

“But—” Kei shuts her mouth with a click of teeth when I shake my head.

“I can tell you that Jiraiya-sensei and Tsunade-hime are off on a specific mission to Amegakure. I expected them back yesterday, for better or for worse, but I haven’t seen them yet.” I rest my chin on the heel of my hand. “I’ll be honest here, Tsunade-hime’s cooperation is a big part of my plan mostly because of the trouble we could face without powerful summon contracts. Anything—anyone—who comes back from Ame will just be helping add layers to my plans.”

Kei gives me a shrewd look. “You’re planning on keeping me out of the village during the critical time, but I’m not the only one, am I? You’re going to scatter us.”

And once again I’m glad Kei is my student and not someone else’s. Kei’s brain would be terrifying in other hands.

“It just makes sense.” Kei goes on, quietly. “On top of being a Tailed Beast Host, I have Madara’s seal in me. I can’t be trusted completely.” She smiles grimly. “Isn’t that right, Sensei?”

“Unfortunately, yes.” I admit unhappily. I hold my hands up helplessly. “I can’t know for certain, when it comes to you or Obito. I’m sorry, Kei.”

“Don’t be.” Kei’s smile is downright crooked. “I’m not sorry for getting caught, not in hindsight. So I guess this is just something I’ll have to live with, you know?”

“Sometimes, I wished I shared your optimism.” I laugh, quietly. “If everything goes according to plan, you’ll only have to spend one night in a place where there’s only bugs for dinner.”

Kei makes a face. “Seriously, Sensei?” she groans.

I laugh outright.

“I bet Obito’s going to get someplace cushy, too.” Kei mutters, rubbing her forehead. “Ugh. I mean, I love the toads, but ugh.”

“It’ll work out, Kei.” I say, standing up and walking around my desk to her. I put my hand on her shoulder and squeeze reassuringly, and hope she can feel it even through the flak jacket’s thick padding. “We’ll be fine.”

“You have no idea how much I hope that’ll be true.” Kei mumbles. She sighs and straightens up, meeting my eyes. “What do you need me to do, Sensei?”
“I’d like you to leave Tsuruya here, in Konoha, on that night.” I tell her seriously. As Kei nods again, confirming that she understands the order even if she doesn’t understand the purpose behind it, I add, “Genma and Raido are going to be in the village, and so is Kakashi. I’m hoping that he can act as your replacement if I need something or someone teleported elsewhere, understood? But if the situation changes, I will need Tsuruya to reverse-summon you back to Konoha for backup.”

“I can scarcely imagine the kind of situation that would call me back if you’re still upright and breathing, Sensei.” Kei replies skeptically. “I’m pretty sure you can take most idiots on with one hand tied behind your back and blindfolded.”

“Maybe.” I allow. “But just in case.”

“All right.” Kei nods firmly, mostly to herself. “All right. So, uh, I think that Tsunade-sama and Jiraiya-sama are back in the village. Even if they haven’t headed over here straight away.”

My eyebrows rise. Hm.

“Can you go get them, Kei? Or get someone else to do it?” I ask, amused again at her sudden return to scatterbrained normalcy.

“Sure, Sensei.”

With that, Kei heads out the office window, because of course she does.

…One more off the list, I guess.

I go back to my paperwork with less enthusiasm than normal. There has to be something more I can do…

It’s about then that I feel a new chakra signature approach and—judging by the sudden raised voices outside of my office—get into a fight with my “secretary.” Fifteen seconds later, said chakra signature stomps up the stairs and approaches my door.

It is kicked open, because of course it is.

“Minato, why didn’t you tell me Jiraiya-sama and Tsunade-sama were back?!” Kushina yells.

Yep. That’s Kushina all right. For all that she complains about not being able to see her own feet nowadays, she can still browbeat any special jōnin in the village into submission.

I put my pen down. “I actually didn’t know they were in the village until just now. Did you see them?”

“In fact, I did—but if they were out drinking and not seeing you and you didn’t know, I guess I can cut you some slack.” Kushina huffs. “But who’s that young man with them?”

…I think?

“I already sent Kei to go get them,” I say instead of letting my confusion show, “but could you describe their friend to me?”

“Hm? Oh, he’s about my height.” Kushina began, successfully distracted from her ire, “He hid his face when I ran by—I guess he’s shy?—but he had… red… hair. Wait a minute.”

Kushina and I exchange looks of startled understanding. There had been a redhead in Kei’s visions.
Kushina's cousin.

…While I don’t think that most people—if there are even enough people involved for there to be a “most” category—who’ve seen or heard about Kei’s visions have been the type to admit weakness, I don’t mind saying that her bizarre ability to dream the future is the single most disturbing skill I’ve ever heard of. Not because of the prophetic part—the Great Toad Sage can pull off something similar—but because of the sheer amount of detail that went into the version I saw. Kei remembers fighting styles, battlefield tactics, major political plots, and interpersonal interactions with the kind of clarity I’d have expected from someone eavesdropping on every relevant conversation, which is impossible. Even the Third Hokage, with his crystal ball, didn’t have nearly the degree of inborn insight into the events he saw—for one, he was just a mortal man with mortal reasoning.

Whatever gave Kei visions? Not human. Probably not bound to this reality either—there were implications, like a vibe or a feeling—because I didn’t get the impression that the visions treated us as people. Point A led to Point B with no consideration for what the people involved actually wanted out of the situation. Or respect for what they could do.

No, whatever was behind the visions thought of us all as puppets. And unless we found a way to break the mold, then I couldn’t even say we were proving it wrong.

If that thing could see the future and mock us all for it as easily as a person could turn to the last page of a book and see the ending written right in front of them, then we’d have to change the middle to change anything at all. And maybe find a way to keep it from influencing Kei any more than it had.

Kushina’s cousin could—might?—be a part of the first full step to changing our “future” entirely.

“Kushina, please don’t run back out there.” I interrupt before she can do just that, catching her arm.

Maybe she remembers those sleepless nights spent thinking about that power as well as I do, because she doesn’t just push me away. “You’re not supposed to be using chakra right now.”

“You never let me have any fun.” Kushina grumbles, before sticking her tongue out at me to show that she doesn’t mean it. We’re okay. “So, how long until they get here?”

“A few minutes at most. Jiraiya-sensei can be timely when he wants to be.” I reassure her.

Now all we have to do is wait.

In the back of my mind, I kind of knew that when Tsunade and Jiraiya came back, things would be kicking up a notch one way or another. Maybe someone (Jiraiya) would get punted through a building (by Tsunade) or there would be a solar eclipse. It was hard to say what would happen when the Sannin—well, two of them—were in town. And not because someone had died.

I tracked the two Sannin—who weren’t even bothering to hide their chakra signatures—to a soba stand somewhere in the market district. I slowed down as I approached, hopping down from a nearby set of rooftops, and made sure my own chakra was about as nonthreatening as I could manage without slipping sideways into full suppression. Jōnin could be paranoid about being approached by people they didn’t know, and I figured the Sannin retained that instinct even if neither of them were really jōnin anymore.

Since they were sitting with their backs to the street, and had even allowed someone else to sit with them, I might have been considered overly paranoid myself. Or just prone to overthinking things.

I still made it a point to identify myself long before I would be considered intruding on their space, though. “Jiraiya-sama?”
Jiraiya turned around on his stool, still holding his bowl of noodles in one hand and chopsticks in the other. He smiled as I approached and said, “Well, if it isn’t little Kei-kun. All grown up and promoted now?”

“Just recently, Jiraiya-sama.” I said, nodding. I snuck a glance at Tsunade and the redhead sitting between them. “Your mission was successful?”

Jiraiya’s grin widened. “If it was a wild goose chase to start, it was the best one I’ve ever been on. Tsunade-hime, don’t you agree?” This last was addressed to the other Sannin at the bench, who was nursing a whole bottle of sake in addition to her bowl of soba for whatever reason.

The red-haired young man sitting between them was starting to get rather nervous.

I approached him first, because apparently my survival instinct was at a ninety-degree angle from everyone else’s. A young man with red hair, dressed in foreign shinobi clothes with a black robe on top? My curiosity wouldn’t let me go forward without confirming my suspicions.

“Cram it, Jiraiya.” Tsunade grumbled. When she lifted her head off the counter, it was only to pour out another measure of sake into a cup and then down it in one shot.

She had a hangover? And was attempting the good old “hair of the dog” trick. Oi.

“You’ve heard of Nagato-kun before, right?” Jiraiya went on, as though the threat of being punched into the stratosphere didn’t faze him anymore. It was certainly a possibility with Tsunade around. “Hey, you can introduce yourself properly.”

I bowed, though it was unnecessary. “Ah, Nagato-san, Tsunade-sama? Keisuke Gekkō, bodyguard to the Fourth Hokage.”

“And his student.” Jiraiya said before anyone else could. He put his noodles back down and waved a hand vaguely. “Kakashi and Obito are around somewhere in Konoha, I think.”

“Well, you already know who I am. Jiraiya-sensei must have talked about me, I suppose?” Nagato sounded a little hopeful, actually. Rather than meeting my eye directly, which would have made sense because he was a fair bit taller than I was, he sort of looked up at me from behind his long bangs and under his slashed Ame hitai-ate. Regardless, I got a good look at those grey-violet eyes, and all of the concentric rings around his pupil that reminded me of Isobu’s single eye. Without the deterioration caused by using the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path, he was actually fairly cute in a boyish sort of way, even though I knew he had to be about Sensei’s age. “It’s nice to meet you, Gekkō-san.”

…I hadn’t really expected the only living person with the Rinnegan to be so, well, shy. I managed a nervous sort of half-smile, myself. “You don’t need to be so formal, Nagato-san. Everyone around here calls me Kei-kun or something. If you used my family name like that, I’d have to stop myself from looking around for my brother every time.”

“Very well, Kei-san.” Nagato nodded slowly, committing it to memory. I probably should have told him that it wasn’t so important, but I didn’t.

“What brings you here anyway, Kei-kun?” Jiraiya asked.

“Well, Sensei wanted to know what was taking you so long.” I scratched my cheek, idly. I was still freaking nervous about everything at the moment. I mean, all three of the people at this soba stand could flatten Konoha if they really wanted to, and that kind of fact wasn’t the kind that was easily dismissed. “He and I could both sense you in the village, so we knew you were okay, but you’re kind of supposed to report in before you go off and get lunch most of the time.”

Jiraiya laughed. “You just wrapped up what he actually said in diplomacy, didn’t you? I remember the first message he gave me about Tsunade-hime.”

“I don’t know what you’re talking about.” I said blankly.

“Jiraiya-sensei, if the Hokage is the one asking…” Nagato trailed off.

“Stop being a bad example for Nagato-kun.” Tsunade growled from her corner, making everyone a little nervous.

Jiraiya muttered something I didn’t catch—but Nagato did, judging by the way his pasty face suddenly flushed—before saying, “Fine, fine. You coming or what, Tsunade-hime?”

“Just let me finish this.” And apparently Naruto’s speed-eating technique with noodles was hereditary or something, because Tsunade downed the bowl of noodles in front of her and the sake in an instant.

By the time I looked back at Jiraiya, turning away from the Uzumaki clan’s inherited appetite, his and Nagato’s bowls were also empty.

Suddenly, I was glad that I wasn’t a clan shinobi. I couldn’t imagine what it would be like to see these kinds of bizarre quirks every single day.

(Jiraiya didn’t count. As the “Naruto” of his team, a massive appetite just seemed to be something he had picked up.)

Tsunade and Nagato went on a bit ahead of us, but Jiraiya hung back to talk to me as we walked toward the administration center.

“So, what happened in Konoha while I was gone?” Jiraiya asked, curious.

“Well, you already know that I got promoted.” I said, shrugging. “So did Obito, though he’s in the Military Police now.”

“No kidding? I never thought that boy would be interested in that kind of thing.” Jiraiya mused, “He always struck me as a bit of a glory-hog. Pushing through to full jōnin in the main corps would have made more sense.”

“Just because jōnin are the public faces of the village doesn’t always mean that everyone wants to be one.” I pointed out. “Obito said he wanted to make a lasting impact...but I don’t think there’s anything that says he has to remain a career officer if he doesn’t want to.”

“I can’t see that boy retiring.”

“Well, neither can I. It was just a thought.” I steered the conversation back toward Nagato with a quiet, “Nagato-san... Is he related to Kushina-san somehow?”

Jiraiya shrugged. “It’s hard to say. Not all redheads are Uzumaki clan members, you know.”

I raised one eyebrow.

“But I do know that Tsunade-hime likes him, which is a point in his favor.” Jiraiya sighed. “But it sure didn’t seem like she did, back in the day.”
I didn’t have to ask to know that Jiraiya was thinking about the first time he’d met the trio that canon called the Ame Orphans. I mean, the start of their story had been sad—a tiny gang of children, living in a war-torn country on the losing side of the Second Shinobi World War—but it didn’t have to end the way that the Plot seemed to want them to go. With Nagato here and obviously still capable of walking, things seems to have gone better for them this time around. Maybe Yahiko and Konan had even gotten around to working through their unresolved sexual tension.

“Are Yahiko-san and Konan-san okay?” I asked anyway.

“They were the last time I saw them. Up to their necks in toads and slugs, but they were fine otherwise.” Jiraiya patted my shoulder. “You worry too much, Kei-kun.”

I pursed my lips and said nothing.

Was I a chronic worrywart? Yes. Did it have a purpose? Generally. Were there benefits? Also yes. Since I was going to keep biting my nails over everything until I died of a stress-induced heart attack anyway, then I decided to just deal with it.

---

Sometime after Kushina gives gigantic bear-hugs to both of her not-quite-long-lost cousins and two more to Kei and Jiraiya for helping bring them back, and after we all have a chance to settle down a bit, I activate the security seals in my office. While I’m sure everyone from Konoha to Kumogakure could hear the shouts of joy coming from the room, I certainly wasn’t going to let anyone else hear the details. Some things are just for family (and not just the blood kind).

“Two more Uzumaki clan members!” Kushina repeats, beside herself with joy. “Two! Minato, I never thought I’d see Tsunade-sama again, never mind finding another cousin!”

“I think we’re a little more distantly related than that, Kushina-san.” Nagato says, still hesitant to call Kushina family. I can’t be completely sure if it’s because she’s my wife, her exuberant personality, or the fact that she’s the only person in this room who really remembers what it is to be an Uzumaki. And the only one who’s been to Uzushio.

Tsunade is Konoha through and through. Aside from her grandmother, she grew up in the arms of the Senju clan.

“If she says you’re family, you are.” Tsunade replies. “She’s the current head of the clan.”

“Huh?” Kei says, looking blank.

“My grandmother married the First Hokage, but she kept her family name while allowing all of her children to be fully Senju. I’m the head of the Senju clan,” Tsunade explains, with the faintest trace of bitterness in her voice, “because I’m only Uzumaki by blood. Kushina-chan is both.”

Kushina’s smile is a little sad. “But now I’m not just clan head by default. I do have a clan!”

“How does that work when you’re married to Namikaze-sama, Kushina-san?” Nagato asks.

“Same way it did with my grandmother,” Tsunade says. “Or so I assume. You two are going to be married, right?”

“We already are.” Kushina says, annoyed by the perceived threat in Tsunade’s tone. “But there was just never time for a real party! Once Naruto is born, then we’ll have the biggest bash this village has ever seen!”
“Is everyone invited?” Kei asks, sounding amused and yet still glancing sidelong at Nagato. I can just imagine what Danzō would have to say about him, and most of it involves kekkei genkai and the acquisition thereof “for the sake of the village.”

“Everyone we care about.” Kushina says firmly. She tilts her head, scrutinizing Nagato to the point that he starts to shrink in on himself a bit. “You’re too old to be my baby cousin, Nagato-kun, but you’re family and I definitely want to have some way of acknowledging you formally… How about you try being my honorary brother?”

“I would be honored, Kushina-san, but—” Nagato begins, hesitant.

“But nothing! You’re my little brother now and that’s final!” Kushina claps her hands gleefully. “Oh, I can finally update the clan records. And with two names!”

“I didn’t say anything about joining up, Kushina-chan.” Tsunade puts in.

“Well, no, but Naruto-chan is coming along sooner or later and he’s going to be next!” Kushina grins. “Hear that, Nagato? You’re going to be an uncle!”

Nagato, to be perfectly honest, looks like he’s gotten whiplash from Kushina’s boundless energy. I had a chance to acclimate to Kushina’s enthusiasm over the course of our entire childhood, but Nagato’s getting a full broadside all at once.

“I-Isn’t it a little fast? To go from clansman to brother and then uncle all in one day?” Nagato sounds more uncertain about the whole idea of being an Uzumaki by the second.

Kei pats Nagato’s arm sympathetically. “You get used to it, Nagato-san.”

“I… All right. I’ll try.” Nagato stands up a little straighter, blinks twice, and then focuses his attention on me. “Hokage-sama, why did you send Jiraiya-sensei and Tsunade-sama to Amegakure?”

“He didn’t tell you?” I glance at Jiraiya, who shrugs. “I suppose it would be difficult to explain…” I glance at the ceiling, and in particular at the note that says “Your answers aren’t up here.” “The short version? I need someone to help me keep my wife—your new sister—safe from Konoha’s enemies during the remainder of her pregnancy.”

“And you thought of me?” Nagato asks blankly.

“No. Actually, I thought of Jiraiya-sensei and Tsunade-sama.” I explain, keeping Kei in my peripheral vision. She doesn’t seem like she wants to bolt just yet, so I must be doing something right. “But a few months ago, your name came up while we were discussing something else, and it struck me that making certain you and your friends were alive would kill about five birds with a single stone.

“One, Jiraiya-sensei obviously missed you and wanted a chance to reconnect, so I gave him an official reason to go.” I go on, though normally explaining my plots is anathema to me. It seems important to let this man know, though, when he has no other reason to trust Konoha. Particularly me. “It was also on the way to recruit Tsunade-sama, who I needed to see returning to Konoha for different reasons. The two of them, plus you and your friends, would be able to draw Salamander Hanzō into a battle he couldn’t win and force him to call on an ally.” The room is quiet. “That ally, Danzō Shimura, has been a thorn in my side since before I became Hokage, even if I didn’t realize it. Did you kill all of his agents, Jiraiya-sensei?”

“Most.” Jiraiya corrects. “The ones that survived the fight wouldn’t—or couldn’t—give up information during interrogation. The survivors are for Konan-chan to deal with, now.”
Meaning that the agents sent had not been carrying any prominent clan markers. If they had, any burgeoning rebellion like Akatsuki could easily have ransomed them back to their village of origin or used them to implicate said village in any number of illicit activities. No clan markers meant deniability for the village.

“Danzō runs a covert operation that supposedly works for the good of Konoha, but is also known for being ruthless to the point of abject stupidity among certain circles.” I sweep my hand around the room, indicating the number of people “in the know” quite well. “ROOT wanted Akatsuki destroyed for its own reasons, not just Hanzō’s. I sent Jiraiya-sama and Tsunade-sama partially because I hoped we would find more evidence to nail them to the figurative wall, but that hasn’t happened yet.

“For the next reason, I personally hate the idea that Kushina is the only known Uzumaki left in the Elemental Countries.” I say, allowing some of my old anger to leech into my voice. “War tears apart far too many families, in every nation.”

“And then there’s mine.” Kei pipes up, arms crossed over her chest nervously. “Which is kind of petty in comparison to everything Sensei said, I think.”

“Kei-san?” Nagato looks more and more confused by the second.

“You seemed like a good person.” Kei says, shrugging but failing to make it seem casual. “I mean, even after everything that happened to you because of Konoha or because of the constant civil war in Ame, you still agreed to come and see us. And, as more selfish aside, I really didn’t want to get the only Rinnegan user in the entire world mad at us somehow.”

“…What.” Ah, yes, the standard response to Kei’s more off-the-wall thought processes. Good to know it doesn’t just affect her friends.

“Kei has prophetic dreams,” I tell Nagato, who still looks like someone hit him over the head with a club. “Kei was dead-certain that not reinforcing Akatsuki against Hanzō would lead, sooner or later, to a new world war.”

“And, well, a single Rinnegan-user in a snit can flatten a Hidden Village.” Kei mutters, knuckles whitening against her arms. “But I don’t know if you’ve found out how to do that yet.”

“No, I…” Nagato shakes his head. “I’m sorry. Let me see if I have this straight. You’re saying that you sent two of the Sannin to Amegakure, to save my friends and me, because one of your students claims he can see the future?”

“Yes and no. The real reason? Because of all the factors mentioned before, I approved the idea when it came up.” I continue in absolute seriousness, “The only thing Kei gave us was a name to work from. The rest was up to us. And can you really say it hasn’t worked out so far?”

“…No.” Nagato sighs. “So, let me sum up what’s happened in about an hour—the new Amegakure is now allied with Konohagakure, I have a new sister and a brother-in-law and a nephew on the way, Jiraiya-sensei is back in my life and I’ve found out that someone can see the future.”

“Add in a bit about paperwork to make it all official.” I put in, smiling.

Nagato puts his hand over his eyes. “I think I need to lie down…”

“No problem, little brother! Tsunade-sama and I also need to bring you up to speed on what it means to be an Uzumaki clan member…” And Kushina escorts the two out of my office entirely, leaving Jiraiya, Kei and I as its only occupants.
“That went better than I thought it would.” Kei admits as soon as the office door slams shut.

“You probably thought Nagato would kill me or something.” Jiraiya says, “Don’t you have any faith in me?”

“I’m not sure if the most important part is a lack of faith in you, Jiraiya-sama, or an appreciation for how Danzō’s plots tend to go.” Kei replies, sighing and forcing herself to relax. “I half-expected Yahiko-san to already be dead before you ever got to Ame. The best case scenario in that case would be if Nagato-san didn’t kill you and Tsunade-sama. Because if he trains, he’ll definitely be capable of it someday.”

“Someday isn’t now, Kei.” I pick up my pen again and return to reviewing the latest paperwork to cross my desk. “Do you really think he’ll be able to help fight whoever comes after Kushina?”

“I think so.” Kei glances at the ceiling. “Nagato has access to all of the Six Paths abilities without using the corpse puppetry part, but the only one he really needs to use is the jutsu called Almighty Push. Most people, even if they’re Mangekyō Sharingan users, don’t really know how to counter someone who can beat them to death with gravity itself.”

“Is that the jutsu that his future counterpart used on Konoha?” I ask, more curious than concerned. While I don’t doubt that the version of Nagato Kei was actually used to had been a monster in combat, I also don’t think that this version of Nagato is much of a threat. Not because of a lack of potential, but more because of a lack of interest or malice.

“Among others.” Kei frowns thoughtfully. “The Paths of Pain had pretty sharply-delineated powers. The Animal Path was a summoning master, the Human Path could rip souls out of people’s bodies to absorb their knowledge, the Deva Path could manage the Almighty Push every five seconds, the Asura Path was like a Cursed Seal transformation, the Preta Path could absorb chakra, and the Naraka Path could revive any of the others.” She pauses. “Though there’s the possibility that Nagato hasn’t actually figured out how to do any of that yet. The Rinnegan gives him too many other abilities to play with.”

“I have to ask, how do you keep all of this straight in your head?” Jiraiya asks, concerned.

“I’ve had certain information burned into my brain thanks to the dream-vision-things.” Kei huffs. “But somehow I can’t always remember what day of the week it is…”

…I’m actually pretty sure that Kei is drastically overestimating Nagato. While he does have the Rinnegan, the fact that Jiraiya and Tsunade did have to rescue him and his friends from a ROOT/Ame ambush implies that he’s actually still learning what he can do. It’s not uncommon with young-but-talented shinobi to run into that problem if they don’t have proper teachers to help them discover the full extent of their powers. The teachers don’t have to be human—which was how Jiraiya managed to become a Sage—but people with potential need to have some kind of guidance.

“Are you certain that Nagato-san knows all of this?” I ask, half-curious and half just wondering if Kei realizes the implications of her own information.

“…Huh?” Guess not. Kei visibly thinks the question over, chewing on the inside of her cheek. “Well…I guess I’m not. If Tsunade-sama and Jiraiya-sama prevented Yahiko-san from being killed and Nagato-san from being crippled…” A figurative lightbulb goes on, “It mitigates the original trauma that turned Nagato into Pain. And, while I’m not sure that the Rinnegan follows the same rules as the Sharingan, I think that might keep Nagato from realizing how much power he could achieve. Sort of like Obito, right?”
“You tell me,” I prompt rather than answering directly.

“I don’t know.” Kei seems rather worried by this thought. “My best guess is that Nagato-san is still very strong, and has immense potential, but might not be able to use it fast enough. It’s the sixth today, isn’t it?”

Jiraiya shrugs. Of course he wouldn’t know.

I nod.

Kei sighs again, deflating entirely. She brings a hand to her face and pinches the bridge of her nose as though to stave off a headache. “Well, then I have no idea what’s going to happen.”

“Now you know how I feel.” Jiraiya-sensei says. “Minato, does this count as a setback?”

Well, not exactly. There are enough contingencies in place, Nagato or no Nagato, to give most people a run for their money even if a rogue Uchiha is involved. It’s just that Kei doesn’t know about most of them. And, for the same reason that I can’t have her or Obito anywhere near Kushina at the critical moment, I won’t be able to tell her before the plan is in motion.

“No, I think we’ll be able to work through this. I hadn’t planned on Nagato being here, to be honest, so his presence doesn’t affect much one way or another.” I spin my pen in my fingers. “Kei, you can take a break. Jiraiya-sensei and I need to discuss a few things.”

“All right, Sensei.” Kei leaves without any further fanfare, which is more than I could say for the Uzumaki clan’s collective exit.

Well, something has to be quiet today.

“Are you still willing to take over for a day?” I ask Jiraiya, who leans against the office wall with his arms crossed.

“I am. Just don’t get any ideas.” Jiraiya replies. He says with some exasperation, “There was a reason I didn’t want to take the hat years ago, Minato.”

“It’s not just about that, Minato!” Jiraiya blusters. “My spy network, the paperwork…” He pauses. “You’re doing that thing again where you act like your head’s full of sawdust. Stop it.”

“All right, Sensei.” I say dryly. I shake my head again, pushing the sarcasm aside. “Well. Between you and Sarutobi-sama, we should have something like leadership in place while I’m gone.”

“Just make sure to come back. Fukasaku-sama and Shima-sama both want you to introduce Naruto to them properly, even if he can’t get a summon contract until later. They can’t do it if you’re dead.” Jiraiya warns me, half-seriously.

I frown slightly. “If it’s me or the village…”

“You know better than that, Minato.” Jiraiya interrupts. “With the number of safeties you have in place, it’s going to be you and the village. And probably everyone else, too.”

All right, all right. Fine.

“In that case, could you help me look over this seal one last time?” I ask, scooting back from my desk and reaching into a sealed drawer for a design I’d worked with and tested with Kushina’s expertise. “If this is our last resort…”

Seal in hand, Jiraiya studies it for what feels like a long time. It’s probably not more than a minute in reality. “No, the Dead Demon Consuming Seal is your last resort. This is something better.”

I exhale slowly, feeling relief flood my brain. Thank the merciful higher powers.

We have a chance. Even if I don’t know everything heading our way, we have a chance.
October tenth dawned bright and early, seeming pretty much like any other autumn day we’d had that year. Ergo, sunny and warm if you ignored the vague suggestions of chill in the shade. Living in the Land of Fire meant warm autumns and mild winters, and warm springs, too. It was just the summer that sucked.

I wasn't actually on duty on the tenth, and was instead called up for a meeting at the same time that my mother had just been about to ask me to pick Hayate up from the Academy. Call it a gut instinct or something.

"Kei-san, the Hokage wants to see you now." Raidō said—and why the hell was he the one running messages if he was supposed to be on duty all day?

I looked between Raidō, who was peeking through the front window while upside-down, and my mother, who was washing dishes and looking back over her shoulder with an expression that was mild even while her annoyance bled into the room in the form of killing intent. I did a quick mental inventory check, confirming that all of my relevant scrolls and assorted weaponry was indeed stored safely on my person and not within snatching (and throwing) distance of my mother.

I heard Raidō swallow hard.

"Run?" I suggested out of the corner of my mouth.

He shook his head minutely, because he was apparently profoundly stupid.

"Mom, sorry, I've got to go to work!" I said quickly. "You know how it is."

Mom sighed and the murderous vibes in the room died down. "I understand, Kei-chan. Are you going to be home for dinner?"

"...Eh, probably not. Sorry!"

I threw myself out the window shortly thereafter.

Somehow, things were easier in Sensei's office. Even though there were eight of us crammed into the space and hardly any room for the egos involved, anything was better than being the sole target of my mother's wrath. Even though we were preparing for what could possibly amount to a doomsday scenario for the village, I almost didn't feel the pressure.

Nagato, Sensei, Kushina, Tsunade, and Jiraiya were all in on the plan, and I at least had the bare bones of what would be my role in it. And Kakashi and Obito were about to join us.
That did require us to explain who Nagato was, though.

"Who's the new guy? Is he some kind of secret weapon?" Obito asked me in a rather loud whisper. He even leaned over to speak directly into my ear, which of course meant that everyone within about ten feet could hear him.

"Are you talking about me?" Nagato looked over at us, head tilted curiously.

"He is." I said, pushing Obito away with my elbow.

Nagato bowed a little, though Obito certainly hadn't done anything to deserve that kind of respect. Judging by the way that Obito's visible eyebrow crept toward his hairline, he either agreed or had just noticed how bright Nagato's red hair was. It was a bit of a toss-up.

"Uh…" Obito mumbled, looking at Sensei as though waiting for the blond to toss him a lifeline.

"Who are you?" Kakashi asked blandly. Like he didn't know. "Konoha records don't list anyone other than Sensei as Jiraiya's student, at least in Konoha. Mostly because the rest of them are dead."

Sensei and Jiraiya winced a little.

Kushina reached over and thumped Nagato's shoulder. "Well, then it's a good thing that Nagato is from Amegakure instead, isn't it?"

"Not Amegakure, exactly…" Nagato shrugged, even as Kushina slung her arm over his shoulders. "But close enough. Nagato Uzumaki, of Akatsuki. I…I think we might have taken over Amegakure, after what happened with Hanzō."

"Nagato's only been an Uzumaki for like three days, so go easy on him!" Kushina added, grinning.

Kakashi gave Nagato a very slow once-over. From the top of his Uzumaki-red hair to his Akatsuki cloak to his sandals. I think he stopped to take a second look at Nagato's Rinnegan, just for the sheer WTF-factor involved in seeing one of those ever, but otherwise Kakashi didn't really do or say much for a good thirteen seconds. Then, "Why were we called here?"

Sensei leaned forward on his desk, his hands folded in front of his mouth as though he'd suddenly decided to become a James Bond villain. His bangs drooped over his eyes, so I could see about a third of his face aside from his jawline, which didn't necessarily tell me anything. But his chakra? Sensei was playing for keeps. Whatever he was going to say was deadly serious.

Everyone in the room not named Tsunade immediately straightened up a bit, even if we weren't really thinking about it. And in Tsunade's case, she had to be the cool one. I think. But even her chakra buzzed in agitation.

"Kakashi, you will take Kei's place on the Hokage Guard Platoon and stick by Kushina tonight."

"I do," Kakashi said, nodding.

"Wait, why's he taking Kei's place?" Obito asked blankly.

Sensei ignored the question. "Kei, you're going to Mount Myōboku with Fukasaku-sama as soon as the sun sets. The Great Toad Sage has a viewing crystal that's stronger than the one Sarutobi-sama used, and he can help you keep an eye on what's going on in the village."

"Right, Sensei. I'll leave Tsuruya here in case I need to be reverse-summoned back." I bowed my head.

"Jiraiya-sensei…" Sensei began, only to be waved off.

"The Third and I will stay here to coordinate the village's efforts. And you, Tsunade-hime?" Jiraiya glanced sidelong at his teammate and crossed his arms.

"I'll be taking Kushina-chan, Minato-kun, and whatever guards he feels like including to Shikkotsu Forest." Tsunade's eyes narrowed. "But I hope you don't expect me to be the midwife."

"No, Biwako-sama agreed to fill in." Sensei replied, sitting up straighter so he could look at all of us. "And what about your apprentice, Shizune?"

"She'll be stationed at Konoha General in case something happens." Tsunade looked pensively out the window. "I don't want her involved in this."

Obito set his jaw. "So what am I gonna do?"

"I'd like you to stay in one of my safe-houses." Sensei told him, glancing at Jiraiya. "If we could leave a toad with him…"

"It'd be better just to have Obito-kun stay with the toads, to be honest." Jiraiya advised. "I know you're worried about Madara's seal, but he'd be safer further away from Konoha."

Sensei seemed to bite the inside of his cheek in thought.

"Wait, all of this is about Madara's seal? I mean, I can't help that unless you can give me a new heart and pull out the old one with the seal on it and I don't think that'll work." Obito babbled, "But Sensei, I want to—I'm on shift tonight and everything! I won't let Madara anywhere near Kushina-san."

"You and what army, kid?" Tsunade demanded. "He might be an old man as you remember him, but he apparently fought my grandfather and lived to harass a new generation. Do you think he'd slow down at all just because a one-eyed Uchiha boy gets in his way?"

"I'm stronger now than I was!" Obito argued.

"But not strong enough." Nagato said very quietly.

Everyone looked at him.

"I'm sorry, Obito-kun. But I don't think we can afford to take any risks at all, here." Nagato continued in his boyish voice. "If there's even a chance that the Nine-Tails—"

"—and his name is Kurama—" Kushina interrupted bluntly.

"—Kurama could escape and be used to kill people…” Nagato shrugged helplessly.

Obito, by that point, was staring a hole in the carpet. Not that I blamed him—despite having provided the information that led to Obito and me being excluded from the proceedings, I had at least known that I wouldn't be allowed within a hundred meters of Kushina while she was in labor. For more than one reason, even!
"I'm in the same boat." I said, clasping Obito's shoulder. "At least you'll be coming with me?"

"Yeah, I guess. You already knew about this, huh?" Obito mumbled, sighing.

I said sheepishly, "Kinda had to, given that this security upgrade was half my idea…"

"It's about the thing with the alternate me." Obito crossed his arms, staring off into the middle distance in thought. Then he nodded, as though coming to a decision of his own. "Right, then. Kakashi?"

"What?" Kakashi glanced over, looking as bored as ever.

Obito walked right up to our teammate and planted his hands on Kakashi's shoulders. Our sole ANBU teammate started feeling a little worried, or at least bewildered.

"Kakashi, I expect you to guard Kushina-san with everything short of your life, because it'd be a pain in the ass to train up another teammate," Obito grinned. "Got it? Come back alive or I'll track you down in the afterlife just to yell at you!"

I wondered if Kakashi knew exactly what conversation that Obito was referencing. Or how significant it had been.

Kakashi scoffed. "I'll be fine, so you can save your breath."

"Well, good." Obito spun Kakashi around and pounded him on the back with an open palm—with his Zetsu arm, which sent Kakashi stumbling. "Make sure to keep that promise!"

"Is your team always so dramatic?" Nagato asked me in a whisper.

"It could be worse." I replied at the same volume. "If we weren't in for some actual trouble, the boys would be punching each other by now."

Nagato gave me a funny look.

"What?" I asked.

"Nothing. Jiraiya-sensei, Hokage-sama, when are we going to the summon territories?" Nagato asked instead of answering my question.

"As soon as Biwako-sama gets here, we can go." Sensei replied. "But Kei, Obito? You can leave now, if you want."

"That might be best for me." I suggested, "Mom knows I have some things to take care of. As long as someone tells her I'm on a training mission or something, then it should be fine. Otherwise, she'll be ready to bite my head off when I come back."

"And we can't have that, now can we?" Jiraiya quipped, amused.

"I wouldn't try to get on her bad side on purpose, Jiraiya-sensei." Sensei said dryly. "It's not exactly the safest pastime."

"You're talking to a man who peeped on Tsunade-sama." Kushina said with a grin. "Danger is probably his best friend."

I waved my hands to try and cut some of the extraneous chatter. It helped relieve stress, sure, but the fact remained that we didn't have that much time. Time, as ever, was the chief enemy. (Well, aside from Madara. And the Plot. And maybe the requisite legion of Zetsu clones.) It would be better to get all of the fun stuff out of the way and get down to the serious things immediately. Then, once we were done with all of the Plot bullshit, we could have a super-late baby shower for Kushina and welcome Naruto into the world. I was sure that my family would love to attend.

I refused to consider the possibility that none of us would see each other alive again. That went for everyone, from Hayate and Mom to Gai and the other classmates I barely got to know in the Academy. We would make this work, dammit!

Jiraiya concentrated his chakra into his left hand, then bit his thumb. With a poof of smoke, one of the Sage toads—the purple-and-yellow Shima—appeared in the palm of his hand.

"Hello, everyone!" Shima said, waving. "So, how many children am I taking home with me?"

"Two, Shima-sama." Sensei told her. "Obito, Kei…"

"It's all right, Sensei. See you in a few hours." I tried to be reassuring, but somehow it seemed to come out flatter and duller than I had intended. I decided that I'd really been putting things off for long enough. "Just let me set Tsuruya up in here."

While I worked on getting a giant crane into a relatively small office, Obito tried to assuage everyone's fears, too. He really did. "We'll be fine, everyone! We'll be back and the village will be safe and sound in like twelve hours or something!"

Tsuruya was very quiet after being summoned, eying everyone carefully before sitting down on the floor to preen her long steel-edged feathers. She could read the atmosphere of a room better than most, it seemed, and was making use of that skill.

Sensei's smile was still strained, even with all the cards falling into place. "Be safe, you two."

Obito and I nodded.

Then we reached out and grasped Shima's offered hands.

And poof: we were gone.

The general rule of thumb, at least when it comes to the topic of teenagers and boredom and bored teenagers, is to avoid said situation and adolescents at all costs. Humans, when deprived of stimulus, tend to go insane if left in such a state for too long. The sheer existential terror of being entirely alone in the world does a number on one's psyche, even if the situation in question is a padded room and not a post-apocalyptic setting. While the exact timing for the onset of trauma would probably vary by individual, I could take a look at my prospects with a critical eye and conclude that face-gnawing madness was imminent if I didn't have something to do in the next five minutes.

But instead of following up on the latest of my inactivity-fueled impulses—which were born of idleness without purpose and not solitary confinement—I rolled over onto my belly, stretched like a cat, and clambered back to my feet to go find something to do.

Basically, I was bored as fuck and not gonna take it anymore.

I know that guarding takes a certain kind of mindset—the kind that can essentially stand still and stare at nothing for hours on end without losing all higher brain function—but I had turned that part of my identity off for a few hours. What, exactly, I would have been able to use said impulses on while at Mount Myōboku, I couldn't tell you. Half of the named residents (because not all tadpoles got names until later) could literally eat me if they so chose. Therefore, saying that I doubted my skills would be of use was a massive understatement.

Mount Myōboku, with its overgrown plant life and colossal amphibian population and giant goddamn bugs, was nothing like Konoha. I liked the waterfalls that streamed downward from what seemed like every open cliff face, and that the air was cooler and somehow much more humid than Konoha at this time of year, but I couldn't help but look up at the setting sun and wonder what the hell time it was back in the Land of Fire.

I was pretty sure that the ninja world wouldn't know what time zones were and wouldn't bother to assign them if they did know, but it was weird to realize that I had no idea when the party would start back where the Plot happened.

The sky had looked a little too blue for morning, which gave maybe half a clue. Damned if I knew what to do with it, because the toads didn't have timepieces that weren't sundials and I had only an inkling of when shit was going to go down in Konoha. Even after wasting what must have been a few hours napping in the shade of a giant three-leafed clover, I couldn't say for sure how much time was left for certain. Bloody mountains.

Wandering aimlessly, as I rarely got to do at home anymore, I eventually found a small clearing that was unusual not because of the Alice in Wonderland-like size of the flora and fauna, but because it seemed entirely normal.

Well, if you ignored the Uchiha in an MP uniform dangling from one tree's branches.

"Hey! Are you bored yet, Kei?" was Obito's greeting. The Uchiha butt-cape thing was flopping over in response to gravity, meaning that it made him look a bit like he had a tiny and very sad superhero cape dangling off his shoulders. Like, Supergirl-sized. But blue, and with triangle patterns.

As I watched, he walked around the branch until he was upright, sat down on the branch with a faint huff, and crossed his arms over his chest. "'Cause man am I bored."

"You've been bored since we got here." I quipped half-heartedly. I just wasn't feeling it.

Mount Myōboku was great and safe and populated by giant friendly amphibians, but it wasn't home.

Home was probably going to be on fire in a few hours.

Watching the sun set from Mount Myōboku's slopes was some bizarre cross between seeing sand slip down through an hourglass and feeling like steel bands were being tightened around my chest one micrometer at a time.

"We haven't done much lately. I...I don't know, normally I'm on patrol right now and I don't know what to do with myself." Obito admitted after a long, shared silence. The fact that I'd decided to sleep through the afternoon in preparation for a possible midnight battle had left him without too many options to amuse himself. "Want to try sparring?"

"Not especially. What if we get called up?" I asked. And that was the crux of my anxiety, right there. If something happened in Konoha, I needed to be ready to rush to the village's defense. I needed to be rested, stable, and prepared for anything except crippling boredom. Because if there was any word that could be used to describe Naruto's grand entrance, "sedate" was not it.

Obito kicked his legs, restless. "That won't happen until at least, oh, ten or something. Right? Not like the toads keep time, but..."
"I don't know. I just know the sun has to be down and the moon is up. And that was just one version of things." I had to shrug. Not knowing would be the death of me, someday.

"Well, then will you please spar with me?" Obito whined. His voice actually rose by an octave and about ten decibels.

"...Do you do this while on patrol?" I asked blandly.

"No. But I'm not on patrol, am I?" He grinned.

I was unmoved. "Well, no. But I'm still not feeling it."

"Come on, Kei!" Obito implored with absolutely no dignity. It was, on reflection, occasionally difficult to remember that he was supposed to be a member of a law enforcement agency. At all."

"I would probably prefer playing poker, and I don't even know half of the rules." I muttered under my breath.

"What's poker?" Obito asked. He said it like "pokaa," which mostly reminded me that I was supposed to stop using random English words.

"Future stuff." I lied.

"I don't know if I believe you." Obito said flatly.

I stuck my tongue out at him, just a little. "All right, just give me a second—"

"Yay!" Obito celebrated, somewhat prematurely.

"—to get something out of my storage scrolls. I have a game we can try."

Obito groaned theatrically.

"Shut up." I said. I still pulled my largest storage scroll out of its back-mounted holster anyway and unrolled it, searching for the appropriate seal. My scrolls weren't enchanted or anything, so I couldn't just pick any random seal and hope that I would get what I wanted. The first eight seals were all camping gear; not exactly the most relevant of objects.

On the twelfth seal in the scroll, I found what I was looking for. The thirteenth was also good, so I activated both seals simultaneously and, with a pop and a puff of smoke, I had my materials.

The twelfth seal contained a field sewing kit, complete with an array of dully gray steel needles, and the thirteenth seal had disgorged a pair of bento boxes.

"You packed dinner?" Obito asked, surprised. "I thought you left before you got to have breakfast."

"I did. This is actually stuff from yesterday. Luckily, storage scrolls are better than refrigerators as long as you don't set them on fire." I handed him one of the lacquered wooden boxes. "Salmon and rice and umeboshi, if you're wondering."

"Awesome!" Obito produced a pair of chopsticks using Wood Release (which drew a raised eyebrow from me because, well, what). "But what's the sewing kit for?"

"You'll see." I replied, and opened it.

Technically speaking, every member of Konoha's military was supposed to carry their own uniform repair kit while out in the field. If there was some kind of gear failure in our travels, we were expected to be able to patch what we had and make it home sometime before the legs fell off our pants. It was as much an image thing as anything—kinda hard to be taken seriously as an elite military force when your clothes were falling apart on your body.

That said, most of the teams I knew of tended to just stuff the tiny field kit into a medical supply bundle or something, where they would never see the light of day again. I had sealed mine away almost as soon as Mom had taught me how to pull off a pad stitch. That way, the set stayed sanitary for the times when I wasn't caught up in the middle of a fight and could use an easily-sanitized method for poking myself in the thumb and getting blood for Tsuruya's summoning. Outside of the occasions when someone was trying to make me eat my own elbow, biting myself for the blood sacrifice seemed kind of dumb.

I pulled out a packet of dark blue thread and started trying to eyeball it for length—I needed maybe half a meter.

The noise coming from Obito sounded a lot like "omnomnom." I didn't look over to see what progress he was making. Instead, I took the pair of tiny fabric shears from my sewing set and cut the amount of thread that I needed.

"Cat's cradle? Really, Kei?" Obito eventually said in an incredulous tone, once he caught on to what I was doing. "That's for kids."

"Again, shut up." I said, tying the necessary knots.

"Are you sure you want to spar?"

"Yes." I finished my knots and started tangling my fingers in the loose string. Did I even remember how to do this?

I managed to complete two solo rounds after one failed attempt to rely on muscle memory, mostly while Obito was still eating. Then I set the string aside so I could eat my own dinner, no matter how cold it was.

I didn't get to do much other than just eat my dinner, though. Just as I was about to go back to the game and see if I couldn't outsmart myself (out of a sense of abject boredom colored by I am not wasting chakra before it's showtime) there was a noise like a firecracker. Obito and I both jumped at the sound.

A red toad with blue accents around its face, about the size of a small dog, looked up at us and said, "The Great Toad Sage invites both of you to watch his viewing crystal with him."

Obito and I exchanged a look that spoke volumes. Volumes of what, I didn't know.

"Sure thing," he said for the both of us. "Just let us pack up, please."

Packing up was as simple as sealing everything away again, so it didn't take all that long. Then I re-rolled my scroll into its proper shape, tucked it back into its holster, and stood up to leave.

"What's your name, anyway?" Obito asked the toad, even as it was hopping away from us.

"Kōsuke," the toad replied. "Now, come on!"

…Was it just me, or did something smell like popcorn?
"All operatives are in place, Hokage-sama."

Almost against my will, I feel my spine straighten in response to that voice. Every recruit quickly learns that if an ANBU captain says jump—particularly one of the senior Assassination, Security, or Medical officers—then one had better already be in the air.

"Thank you, Badger," the Hokage replies to the ANBU captain's report. The Hokage is looking out of his office window, pensively watching the sun set.

I'm in the ceiling as usual, waiting to be called upon. If Falcon doesn't get the assignment first. He's older. He might.

"Badger, you and your team should focus on the Uchiha district if possible," the Hokage says mildly, like it's not the ironclad order that everyone knows it is. "We have reason to believe that the Uchiha clan may be targeted directly if the first phase of our plan is successful. Reduce casualties at all costs. Do whatever you feel is necessary."

I feel a chill run down my spine.

Do whatever you feel is necessary. No one ever got that order outside of ANBU, not when missions could quickly turn into desperate last stands or complete failures. Even with ANBU, the Hokage almost never gave the direct order to break mission protocol—stealth and security included—to accomplish an objective. It was anathema to ANBU itself.

Konoha shinobi may have appreciated initiative in the field, but there was initiative and then there was this.

I watch Badger freeze up at the same time.

"Understood, Hokage-sama." Badger says slowly, her voice steady despite the shock she has to be feeling.

As Badger walks out of the room after a stiff bow, the Hokage looks up and sighs.

"I wish I never had to give that order," he says, mostly to himself. Mumbling now, he continues, "Sarutobi-sama will be here within the hour. Jiraiya-sensei should be finishing preparations now. Kushina's already where she needs to be…" Another sigh. "All right. As soon as Sarutobi-sama gets here, we're leaving."

"Understood, Hokage-sama," says Falcon, who shimmers back into sight from behind his habitual camouflage genjutsu. His black katana bounces against the flowerpot in the corner of the room, making a tink sound and chipping the pottery, and I come up with new insults for him in my head. For being my senior in the Assassination specialty, he has his moments. "Should I gather the others?"

"Just Shiranui. Pull him off whatever the mission roster runners think he ought to be doing. The others should be positioned around the village already," the Hokage replies, glancing at the clock on the wall.

Falcon nods and vanishes a moment later.

"Kakashi, you've been very quiet since this morning," the Hokage comments after a while.

"I haven't had much to say, Sensei." I reply, slipping down from the hollows in the ceiling. The Hokage looks back at me, nodding. "Are you ready for tonight?"
"I haven't been using much chakra." I say, dodging the question. "I should be combat-ready."

Whatever else the Hokage wants to say ends up being cut off, because he turns to face the door all of a sudden and his mouth shuts with a click of teeth. A moment later, there's a knock at the door, and I smell smoke as it opens.

"Sarutobi-sama," the Hokage says, bowing his head slightly. "Thank you for agreeing to this."

"I can afford to give up one night of retirement for the safety of the village, Minato-kun." The Third Hokage tells his successor candidly. "Jiraiya should be here soon."

The Hokage relaxes somewhat. "Good. Then it's almost time."

"Yes."

It's been "almost time" for about forty-eight hours at this point.

I glance out the window—the sun is finally slipping past the outer wall and leaving Konoha proper in deep shadow—and mentally add another few hours. I have no idea how long it takes for Falcon to find Shiranui when he's supposedly patrolling the walls like usual, but I can't help but feel that it's too long. Regardless of the actual time involved.

"Minato-kun, it may be best that you join Kushina-chan now. I think that Tsunade left one of Katsuyu's clones in the foyer." The Third Hokage says to the Fourth, but gently and without any sign of rebuke.

At about that moment, a black-gloved hand knocks at the window.

The Hokage snaps his fingers and the window flares orange and I can see the chakra in its defensive seals as brightly as the sun even with my normal eye. It's hardly the most subtle security seal in the world, but it doesn't have to be. It just has to violently mutilate anyone who tries to break in through the window.

Then he opens the window, finally, and both the ANBU-uniformed Falcon and Genma Shiranui slip through and into the office.

"Set up, please. We need at least one last trial run," the Hokage says, nodding at Falcon and at Genma. "Aim for the house."

Genma, Falcon, and I get into formation around the Hokage, forming a triangle around him. And then we link hands, synchronize our chakra and—

—and then we're suddenly standing in front of the Hokage's house. All the range of the original Flying Thunder God Jutsu and about half the chakra expenditure with twice the complexity. Solely because he couldn't be bothered rewriting the seals for anyone else to use.

The three-person version, for one, was damn near impossible to aim. At least, without someone in the middle. It could only be used when we were supposed to be transporting someone. Including the one person in the entire world who didn't need it.

There was a dog-sized frog—-toad?—sitting on the Hokage's front step, looking up at us with something that could have been amphibian impatience in its expression. There was a blue-backed white slug, probably about the same size, sitting about halfway up the wall from it. It twisted its… head…to look at us.
"Are you finally leaving, Minato-sama?" it asked.

"Yes." The Hokage turns back to us. "Remember, if Kushina says jump—"

"We should already be in the air, yes." I say bluntly.

Falcon nudges me for backtalk, which I ignore.

"Good. Let's go." With that, the Hokage offers me his hand, which I take. Genma and Falcon put their hands on my shoulders, and the Hokage's other arm lifts the slug from the wall.

And then we're gone again, only this time it feels more like being put in a jam jar and shaken vigorously.

Somewhat predictably, we're greeted by a woman's voice. Less predictably, the person "welcoming" us to the Shikkotsu Forest is not a slug or another ANBU member. Instead, it's the sound of a woman screaming her head off while also…um.

"MINATO IF YOU ARE NOT HERE RIGHT THIS FUCKING SECOND I AM GOING TO KILL YOU! YOU PUT THIS BABY IN ME AND YOU HAD BETTER BE HERE TO HELP ME KEEP THE FURBALL IN WHILE I PUSH OUR KID OUT!"

…Yep, definitely Kushina. I can almost hear the demonic chakra and voice overlaying her own. Everyone cringes at once, myself included, because there is something spine-chilling about both the chakra in the air and the particular tones in Kushina's screaming.

Oh, and the anger. There is plenty of that, too. Enough to make most guys flinch in reflexive sympathy for whoever or whatever had earned Kushina's wrath, because Kushina was the kind of person who could threaten bodily harm (in many different ways) just by being angry in the same five-kilometer radius as her target.

The Hokage—now completely in the role of Minato Namikaze, expectant father—turns white with something between outright panic and nervous excitement writ large over his face. In between one blink and the next, he winks out of existence with another fwish of displaced air and leaves the three of us to stand around in the Shikkotsu Forest like idiots.

I take in the scenery for a moment.

The Shikkotsu Forest is the sort of place with a disturbingly apt name. Sort of like Mount Myōboku, the area was dominated by gigantic versions of ordinary foliage and wildlife. Every single tree in the area was the about the size of the trees in the Forest of Death, but about half again as high as far as I could tell. The land slopes up and off into the distance in a way that implies we are running around on the side of a mountain, but I had never seen a mountain large enough for these trees to look totally normal in comparison. And, further contrasting the Shikkotsu Forest trees from anything in Konoha is their color.

Every single tree trunk is dead, bone white.

I approached one of them, more curious about the new location than intimidated. The thing that worries me is the faint, distant sound of something moving through the trees. And it's a lot bigger than any summon or other monster I've ever heard before—it sounds like a distant landslide.

At that moment, the tree trunk at two o'clock ripples like water and another black-clad ANBU operative materializes out of an otherwise-unseen hollow in the tree, with a blue-striped white slug slung over his shoulders like a slimy shawl.
Genma steps forward, hands at his sides instead of raising one as a greeting. "I'm assuming you saw the Hokage?"

The ANBU operative nodded. He looked at me, though. "'No one travels along this way but I'—"

"—'This autumn evening'." I say without thinking about it.

The other ANBU—Otter—nods his approval before fading back out and into the depths of the hollowed-out tree.

"Pass-phrases?" Genma asks.

I take it as a rhetorical question from his expression and move on without comment. He grumbles something as Falcon and I lead the way through the forest. More accurately, I lead—mostly because I can follow the slime-trails the slugs are using and because I can smell blood, Kushina, and Sensei from a kilometer away regardless of camouflage genjutsu or other tricks.

I don't want to think about some of the crazy enemies we're going to be facing could be capable of, if I can tell that there's something wrong with the security methodology out here.

Genma and Falcon move to shadow me, as I launch into a run and head straight up into the understory of the bone-white trees. As much as the idea of shuffling through the forest in silence appeals, we don't have time for acting like gawping tourists.

We have places to be.

It's around dinner now! After really late dinner, actually, since Mom said it doesn't matter when I go to bed on weekends as long as I eat something before the sun goes down. I mean, I forgot, but everyone does! That's probably okay. I'll still get to bed all right, thought Kei keeps saying that I shouldn't have candy after nine.

Not sure why, really? I mean, I've heard of the thing Kei calls a sugar rush and she doesn't really care but I guess Mom might?

…Anyway!

I'm Hayate. I'm ten years old and live in Konoha with my mom and my sister, Keisuke. Everyone calls her Kei, though. I like playing ninja with my friends, and practicing ninjutsu with my sister, and sparring with my family! I like dango and I think that the best food ever is probably rice candy but no one I know agrees with me.

Enough about me, though!

I had sōmen noodles since Mom decided we didn't need to cook with Kei in mind and there's a lot of the dressing food stuff still on the table. It's too hot to eat the noodles in hot soup so I got to eat as much as I wanted without having to drink all the other stuff! It's weird to think that Kei doesn't like them! Or at least not the shrimp…

"Hayate, have you finished your homework?" Mom asks, looking up from where she's repairing one of Kei's sparring shirts, on the couch. It's white, like most of the training gi we own, and I guess Kei must have snagged it on a branch and then forgot about it since she's not exactly been keeping up with her kenjutsu as far as I've seen. Usually, Mom has her fix her own stuff. Or turn it into the supply depot.
"Uh, yeah! Sure!" I…plan on doing it! Eventually. Just, um, not while I'm still trying to design my super-cool ninjutsu that I'm gonna invent as soon as I can. I hide the colored pencil sketches under my arm.

"Hayate."

"Mom, it's Saturday! Can I please just do it tomorrow?" Kei might be back from her super-secret mission by then and then maybe she'll be able to show me how to walk up trees! I know some genin who can do that but they can't walk on water, so if I can do one then I should be fine.

"If you put it off, you aren't going to do it. Didn't Junko-sensei ask for a page of writing about the difference between ninjutsu and genjutsu?" Mom asks. Ugh. Why do parents talk to teachers about homework anyway?

"Yyes. Yeah, she did." I admit, reluctantly. "But it's boring and I can't see when I'll need it ever!"

"Hayate." Mom sighs and I feel kind of lousy. Mom uses guilt like a club sometimes. "It's one page. I'll even help you as long as you get started on your own." She puts her sewing down. "Besides, it's probably time that I point out our family jutsu a little more."

"…So if I start my homework I get a cool jutsu?" I ask, sitting up.

"I think that would be a fair trade. I always meant to get you started with it…" Mom trails off, but I'm already on my way to the kitchen for paper!

This is going to be so cool!

Mom hasn't moved except to resume sewing again. She lets me sit back down on the floor and put my homework on the table before really paying any attention.

"Mom, I'm ready!" I say, maybe a little louder than I have to.

"I see that." She had better not be laughing at me! Half the kids in my class have family jutsu of some kind, and since I'm not allowed to use kenjutsu on other students during spars, I need something!

"Hm. Can you feel your chakra?"

Well, duh. It's not like Kei hasn't been working with me on ninja tricks, or that I haven't been learning kenjutsu practically since I could walk. I know more about chakra and how it feels than anyone except clan kids, and they're cheating anyway. I can walk on water, you know! (For a little bit, anyway.)

"I definitely can." I say with confidence. "Better than some of the other kids, too!"

Mom nods to herself. "I can see that. Hayate, this technique is called Blade Reading. But it has nothing to do with swords." Mom leans forward. "It is an ability that lets you focus your chakra so you can sense others."

"…Chakra sensing? Right now, I can only feel mine. And even then only when I think about it." I reply, frowning a bit. "Am I supposed to be able to feel anyone else's?"

"No. Sensing chakra is something that people have to be taught to do." Mom goes on, "Try focusing your chakra near your heart. I know your sister has already showed you how to channel chakra toward your feet—"

"Yeah, and I could walk on water!" While she was with me anyway.

"Hayate."

Oh, right.

Focusing my chakra near my heart is easy, because I've done this before and I know what I'm doing! It's nice to be able to prove that I know how to do something and maybe even more when it's something other kids can't do. I close my eyes because it's easier to do it that way though.

"Now... gently release it from your tenketsu. Starting from the one over your heart. Then let it spread outward, slowly. Like you're watching steam flow from a hot cup."

How do I... oh! I get it. I have my chakra all balled up in my chest like a fist, but it doesn't have to be really tied up and I let go of a little bit, sort of pushing outward? It's really hard to describe. It feels like letting off steam. But not in the way that means I'm mad about something.

And even with my eyes shut, I know mom is there, which I kinda already knew? Of course Mom's there. But I can tell that she just started on her sewing again and she does that too quietly to hear. I can tell how big she is and how she's moving her fingers to work and that is really weird.

"This technique was devised by samurai, who don't use hand seals." Mom explains. "It's easiest to use at close range, which is where most kenjutsu specialists fight, and with practice it helps predict your opponent's movements."

"Okay." I say, still not opening my eyes. I wonder, can I reach out any more with my chakra? It's... it's not really attached to me anymore like it used to be but...

Around Mom's left hand, my chakra suddenly shifts a little. I get a better impression of her right hand.

"Learning to look already?" Mom says, sounding like she's smiling.

"Yeah!"

That might've been it, for a while. Since I totally knew what I was doing and I had a handle on things and all that cool stuff.

But then there was a knock at the door.

"I'll get it!" I say, shooting up from my spot on the floor before Mom could stop me. Hey, maybe I could use my new chakra-thingy on whoever was there!

I swing the door open and... stop.

Because while the face is right, and the clothes and maybe the height and stuff, the person at the door?

That is not my sister.

Chapter End Notes
So, that's part of the setup for this arc.
There are now two more fanart links on my profile, for anyone who wants to look!
Many thanks to Mikotsuki and Owls-of-Starlight!
(Also, there is now a TVTropes page. Anyone can edit it as needed. Have fun!)
Commencement Arc: In the Web

Chapter Summary

Everyone: Panic.

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
Because their words had forked no lightning they
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

Minato

What might be an hour in real time, for perhaps anyone outside of that hidden room, feels like eternity to me and everyone in it.

"Room" is the wrong word, really. Proving that Tsunade's sealing genius hadn't just been derived from her own designs, Katsuyu had crafted a sealing chamber through some kind of slime that solidified into rock and many tiny slug-trails that leave acidic pockmarks in the walls and ceilings. The result is a nearly-white cavern that has such powerful anti-space-time security seals that I wouldn't be able to get in and out without her say-so. Nothing gets in and nothing ever gets out.

Maybe once, I would have been impressed by that. I'd had the ANBU move into the room and the perimeter outside it, though there was no way we were getting out unless Tsunade gives the all-clear. As it is, with Tsunade in the corner of the room, meditating to keep herself calm, with Biwako acting as lead midwife and the current, viper-masked lieutenant of the ANBU medical corps assisting… well, the only thing I had to worry about was the Nine-Tails.

I can also say with absolute certainty the impression of eternity isn't just because I'm the one clamping down on Kushina's seal with my chakra, feeling it drain from my reserves like water through a sieve, even though that part is strenuous at best. It isn't even the persistent smell of blood and sweat, or the steady stream of chatter coming from Biwako-sama as she talks Kushina through the worst of it. It isn't the constant burn of the Nine-Tails's chakra under my hands, trying to force its way out and into the world like some kind of monstrous parody of my son's impending birth.

It's really…well, all of these things at once.

And yet time drags, because there's nothing for me to do but hold the seal in place until Kushina successfully pushes our child out.

And the whole time, unless trying to breathe, she's screaming. And crying, and swearing up and down that all kinds of things had gone wrong in my family tree. Everywhere.

I have to laugh at the one about baby elephants, though. Naruto, it seems, is not going to come quietly.

From what Kei said, nothing about him is going to be quiet.

I wouldn't have it any other way.

"DAMMIT, IT HURTS!" Kushina shrieks.

Though maybe he could hurry it up a little…

"I can see the head now!" Biwako says, from underneath the shroud. "Kushina-san, push!"

Under my hands, the Fox's chakra rears up and nearly forms a facsimile of its own disproportionate head, orange and glowing and trying to take my fingers off. I pour more chakra into Kushina's seal, reinforcing her strength with mine.

Kushina screams again. I want to put my hand in hers, to let her know it's going to be all right and that it's almost over. But I kind of need my hands, so I settle for leaning a little to the side so that my arm brushes hers as best I can manage. "Just a little longer, Kushina-chan. Please. You're almost there."

"I know that, you jerk." Kushina says between pants. Then she screws up her face and I feel her entire chakra system jolt, sending a nasty shock up through my wrists where the Fox's insubstantial fangs are trying to dig in—I'm going to need those later!—and there's a sensation like…like…

It feels like my ears just popped. Only not really. What the hell?

And then I can finally hear something dripping onto the floor, and the ANBU medic's sudden triumphant shout rings loud in the sudden silence. I feel my shoulders sag in sheer relief, just as the Fox finally quiets down and Kushina goes limp like a puppet with cut strings. As it is, I lean on Kushina's shoulder a bit and try to massage feeling back into my hands—too much chakra for too long. Pins and needles everywhere, even as Kushina reaches up to hold my wrist. It's…it's over.

Mostly.

There's a bit of a minor commotion as the medics clean up. Maybe the placenta was taken care of. My brain's too full of fuzz to spare much thought for the practical aspects of childbirth other than the part I'd been dealing with. Which was hardly standard practice.

"Congratulations, Hokage-sama." Biwako says as she swaddles the tiny, bloody form I can barely see past Kushina's raised knees. "It's a boy."

"Gimme." Kushina says, hauling herself halfway upright with a sudden burst of strength, wincing all the way and using me as a handhold.

Can't say I blame her at all. I loop my right arm around her back so she doesn't have to try as hard, and Biwako deposits the squirming newborn in her arms.

He's tiny. Tiny and red, thanks to the recent pressure he's been facing, and maybe a bit of that has to do with blood. On top of his head, nearly invisible, is a dusting of faintly blond hairs. What might be blond someday, anyway. And along each cheek, as clear as day, are three faint dark lines. Birthmarks, yes, but also the legacy of having a host of the Nine-Tails for a mother.

Kushina and I exchange an exhausted look. I'm...yes, okay, so maybe both of us are crying.

I bring my left hand up and trace the middlemost of our son's birthmarks, toward his mouth. He's so tiny I could hold him in both hands...

He latches on and immediately starts sucking.

"He's actually big for a newborn." Biwako says, to my unasked question. Or maybe I'd said it aloud and not noticed? "He might seem small, but he's...probably around fifty-three centimeters and four kilos."

"...Doesn't seem big." I ask, only half paying attention.

Kushina, though our son is still lying on her chest and supported by her right arm, reaches up and cuffs me with her left fist anyway.

"Ow!"

"You weren't carrying him for most of a year! I'm..." Kushina pauses, thinking of a suitable retort. I preemptively wince. "I can't think of anything right now." Her head drops back to my shoulder. "Too tired."

I kiss her sweat-soaked temple. "There's always later."

She pokes me this time. "Shut up. You have work to do, remember?"

I grimace, just a bit. Right. Giving Kushina and Naruto one kiss each, I step back and let the medics swoop in with intent to patch up Kushina's immense-but-now-flagging stamina. Her chakra levels are lower than anyone would like, and I can just eat a food pill to cover my losses. Kushina, though? Not after childbirth. Any internal bleeding might be amplified, and she hasn't had a proper checkup yet.

Tsunade eases her way out of her corner and makes her way over to me, deliberately casual. If not for the slug and toad she carries on opposite shoulders, I might've bought it.

"You don't need me here, do you?" Tsunade asks stiffly.

"No." I say, "But Kushina does. Can you stay here? I need to check in as soon as possible."

Tsunade gives me a long, narrow look. Then her gaze slowly drifts over to Kushina, who's tiredly chatting to the medics about how amazing her son is. (Not mine, of course—I might've accidentally disqualified myself for father privileges for a bit.Oops.)

She shrugs. "I can do that." She hands the green toad, who is about the size of a housecat, to me without any further comment.

I flash a quick thumbs up before Tsunade also drops the slug onto my shoulder, clearly washing her hands of dealing with me for the immediate future. Oh well. Can't please everyone all the time.

"Any messages?" I ask the toad. I'm pretty sure his name is Keroro, but am not really interested in guessing and turning out to be wrong.

"I'll check, Boss," says the presumed-Keroro. He un-summons himself in a puff of smoke, back to "Do you have any requests, Minato-sama?" Katsuyu's tiny clone asks from my shoulder. "Tiny" is a relative term—she's still about the size of a large loaf of bread. Just small compared to the original, who I've never seen in the flesh.

"...Get Kakashi in here, then help heal Kushina." I say after a long pause, looking back to where Kushina has cheerfully offered to let Tsunade hold our son.

Tsunade might be afraid of blood, standoffish, and occasionally a hair shy of outright bitchy…but I'm pretty sure Kushina's got her choice for godparent picked out. I hide a tired, relieved smile behind my hand, even as Katsuyu poofs away to follow my suggestion.

We'll be okay, I think.

---

Kei

From a physics standpoint, the giant crystal ball that the Great Toad Sage used to spy on the rest of creation was a marvelous achievement even if it made no goddamned sense. I could vaguely remember something about subatomic particles and how they could be in two places at once, and maybe a little about how radio signals could fly through the air, but personally? I had no ideas how crystal balls worked aside from "it's magic, don't question it." And since I lived in a world of bullshit ninja magic, I probably would.

"What are we even looking at, Kei?" Obito asked in an undertone, leaning over toward me like we were two kids trying to whisper in the middle of class.

Except for the fact that we were in a giant reception hall, our only company was amphibian in nature, and I was pretty sure everyone besides us was somewhat hard of hearing.

Obito was standing next to me, peering up at the crystal ball on its gigantic cushion. On the seat of honor—an even bigger cushion, really—the Great Toad Sage sat looking down at us with eerily blank eyes and frankly he was creeping me out a bit. Shima, however, had her eyes on the ball and was mostly ignoring us, and I guessed that she was mostly interested in seeing whenever her husband popped up. Gerotora, the scroll toad, made a face at all of us because apparently he just didn't want us on this chunk of the planet.

"A crystal ball." I said blandly, after looking around at everyone. Again. Bored. So fucking bored.

...Okay, so that was a lie. I was too anxious to really be concerned with boredom, mostly because I was thinking ahead and tired and wanted to know if/when I would need to fight for the lives of everyone I cared about.

Gotta say, it was still less horrible than exam stress in my old life. I guess my scale of stress had needed to be re-pegged a couple of times since I was born again—while an exam was barely a blip now, it'd been all-consuming then.

And, well, knowing that I wasn't the only one responsible for this whole thing helped a bit.

I crossed my arms and bit the inside of my cheek. Fuck.

At that point, the Great Toad Sage lifted his huge webbed hand and placed it on top of the crystal ball with a sound that, at best, sounded...damp. Eh.
"Hey. Are you all right?" Obito asked, nudging me.

"No." I snapped. "I'm not." I caught myself, biting off a further sarcastic snarl. "Don't...don't talk to me right now. I can barely think."

"Okay."

Good old Obito.

The Great Toad Sage said, in his ponderously slow voice, "Show us...uh...Konohagakure."

After a moment or two, the crystal ball went from semitransparent white-blue and seemed to shudder in place. After a second, the glass turned bright blue, then dark blue, and then resolved itself into about fifty shades of bluish gray. Then pinpricks of light pierced the blue like needles through thread, which might have...yep, those are human-made lights.

If I squinted really hard, I could pick out the Hokage tower and its bizarre windows.

...and the gigantic bulk of Gamabunta sitting next to the aforementioned building, smoking his gigantic pipe.

Oh dear.

"Well, at least everything's quiet." Obito said under his breath.

"As far as you know." Gerotora snapped.

Shima, before the rest of us could respond, said, "Shut up and watch!"

"This is like hearing people blow up the comms with side-chatter." Obito muttered.

Oh for god's sake.

The popcorn hadn't been worth it.

Luckily, when the bickering started getting louder, I had been staring at the screen the whole time like an owl or something, trying to pick out minute details. And apparently, so had the Great Toad Sage. And I saw the thing in the bottommost section of the crystal ball's image, showing up stark white in the darkness.

"What was that?" the Great Toad sage rumbled gently, sitting up a little straighter even with his long legs still crossed.

The blood drained from my face.

"Kei?" Obito asked.

In a very small voice, behind my clasped hands, I said, "Shit."

"What was that thing?" Obito pressed, "Kei. You know what that was?"

Very carefully, one of the large webbed fingers of the Great Toad Sage's hand tapped the crystal ball. The image of Konoha flickered, reversed, and went back far enough that the white thing scooted across the screen backwards.

I saw a vaguely-defined set of chalk-white shoulders, and a head half-topped by mossy green hair even if the image was otherwise dim to the point of seeming unhelpfully vague. But the look was very distinctive, and I knew it.

"A White Zetsu." I mumbled, shaking. "I fucking knew it. That wasn't the original, but it's definitely a White Zetsu and I called it and oh my god."

"Konoha's prepared for those guys, though. Right?" Obito asked.

"I..." I knew this, right? Sensei talked about barriers and sensors and...and...

"Kei?"

"Shit." Whatever I knew flew right out of my head. Fight or flight had been quite thoroughly triggered and I was not thinking clearly at all. I took a very, very deep breath and clamped down on my brain with my chakra sense, swearing even more internally than I was doing aloud. Shit. Okay. What did I remember? "Sensei ordered Jiraiya-sama and Sarutobi-sama to take over for him as temporary joint Hokages. He and Kushina-san are nowhere near the village, which keeps the likelihood of White Zetsu infiltration low. Barrier teams are supposedly running double shifts today and tomorrow in case something happens to the village..." I bit the inside of my lip again. What else, what else...? "And Sensei made me leave Tsuruya in the village in case we need to be called back. Gamabunta's in the village right now, and I think there was a slug in the Hokage's office earlier..."

"So everyone's within a minute of the village if things go bad." Obito frowned.

"Pretty much." I said, sighing. "Except that I don't know when Sensei will even be available to make the call." In my previous life, I think my mom was in labor for a really long time. Kushina's water might not have even broken before we left.

Obito scratched the side of his face, chewing on the inside of his lip. "Jiraiya should be able to, though. I mean, he taught Sensei. He should know when to call us back in."

I hoped so.

Because while knowing that the village could be in danger was driving me up the walls inside my head, Sensei would kill me if I put everyone at risk when it was so obvious that Madara's cronies were in town. And I don't think I'd forgive myself either if I was somehow coerced or forced into being a part of whatever plan that shithead had planned.

You know. Assuming anyone lived to tell the tale, there.

I chewed on a hangnail on my thumb, trying to clear my head and failing.

Would going to Konoha really be so dangerous? Isobu asked.

It wouldn't be, I replied, if I had the slightest idea how to defend against the time bomb I have sitting in my chest. Sure, it's sealed now, but Madara could probably punch through Sensei's work if I was stupid enough to give him a chance. And I can't afford to.

There would still be me.

And if my mind gets hijacked, I'm not going to be any help in keeping Madara out of your head, either. If I would ever be.

"Kei, you spaced out there for a second." Obito said, looking concerned. "Are you all right?"
"No." I said flatly. I crossed my arms tightly and "But I can't do anything about that right now."

I was not going to freak out. Not until...until I was holding Naruto and being formally introduced to him with Kushina and Sensei still alive to celebrate. Then I'd probably cry out of sheer relief.

I exhaled.

Time to find a new mental gear.

"Honored Sages, is there any way we can see what is happening around Sensei and Kushina-san?" I asked, a little louder than usual so they could easily hear me.

"No. This crystal ball is blocked by the power used by Katsuyu of Shikkotsu Forest." The Great Toad Sage seemed just the slightest bit miffed.

Oi.

Of course, it would be too easy if I could have access to any method of keeping track of the entire situation. That would break the game.

And at that moment, when I was busy freaking the hell out and trying very hard not to do exactly that, another toad popped into existence by my left foot and made me reflexively scoot toward Obito. Not because I was afraid of toads, but more because Obito was the best bet to calm me down when I was about ready to start shooting Isobu's chakra everywhere. Random surprises were likely to get people (and toads, and others) killed.

"Keroro," said Shima, looking at the new arrival with something like alarm.

Keroro was a fairly small toad, all things considered. Green, unlike the toads descended from Gamabunta, with a white belly and skinny limbs...and a tan helmet. The toad saluted, lifting up on his hind legs and exposing a large star marking on his chest. "Reporting for duty, Honored Sages!"

...Uh.

I'd been kind of led to believe that the toads tended more toward yakuza than military...? Then again, what did I know?

Shima clapped her hands, and a red-and-blue toad hopped into the temple complex, heading directly for her. "Kōsuke!"

"I'm here, Honored Sages!" Kōsuke the toad replied, pulling up short when he realized that Keroro was right there. I've never seen two toads glare at each other before, puffing up like pissed-off bullfrogs.

"Hey, hey! Knock it off right now!" Obito snapped, stepping between the two toads before they could play their miniature gang war out.

Kōsuke and Keroro settle back on their hindquarters, chastised. It might have had something to do with the way Obito's Sharingan was active and spinning, just because he was on edge too. He wasn't about to hypnotize anyone, but...well, angry Uchiha can get pretty hard to ignore at a distance of less than ten meters.

"Where did you even come from? Is Sensei trying to send a message?" Obito demanded of Keroro, since Kōsuke had obviously been on the mountain.

"Boss just wanted me to make sure nothing happened here!" Keroro responded in a high-pitched croak.

"Something has happened." Shima said. "But not here." She pointed at the crystal ball, still and silent with a Zetsu's image frozen in it. "Konoha needs to be warned that they may be facing infiltrators—or that they already are and this is the first we've seen. Kosuke, warn Jiraiya-chan. Keroro, I can send you back to Minato-chan…"

I tuned out of the remainder of that conversation so I could go after Obito instead. He was striding out of the temple with his temper obviously frayed to hell and back—not that I'd noticed while he was trying to keep me from freaking out in turn.

I tried not to be obvious about it, but the Great Toad Sage's, "Be ready to be sent back!" was loud enough to make me want to cover my ears, even when said to my retreating back. In the distance, I could hear some of the other monster-sized toads—Gamaken?—getting ready, too. The rumbling was a hint.

"Obito, wait up!" I called after him.

Obito exhaled loudly, turning back to look at me. "Sorry about that."

"Don't be sorry about getting pissed off when there's a reason for it." I told him, clasping his shoulder like he had for me, not too long ago. "We're both pretty raw right now."

Obito nodded, but his face was still twisted up thanks to some internal conflict. "Kei, are you sure… are you sure that something's going to happen?"

"Well, something, yeah. Zetsu being above ground and in plain sight can't mean much else." I said, trying and failing to keep my tone light. I gave up on that. "Look, Obito? The original vision called for Tobi bringing the Nine-Tails to town and trying to flatten it. I…honestly, I don't see how Madara could do much worse without showing up personally. We've seen his troops and I've heard a bit about what they can do”—and maybe seen some of it, from half-remembered manga panels—"but I get the feeling that this is more a token effort than the real shebang at the moment."

Obito still seemed troubled. "So what might the real thing be? We already know he can't get to Kushina-san, not when Sensei and Tsunade-sama and everyone else keeping guard. She's not even in the same country."

I nodded. "So she's as safe as possible. Which means no fox, and maybe no huge attack." But even as I said it, I was half-listening to faint sounds of argument coming from the temple. Shima and Kōsuke? Or had a new toad joined in?

Something was happening.

"We're probably going to be called back." I admitted, edgy. "But I don't know when. Or for what job."

"Somehow, I don't think it's going to be dog-walking." Obito muttered. He crossed his arms. "I trust you about this kind of thing, Kei, but I'm still…"

Afraid? "I am too." I said. And it didn't even gall me to admit that—I was probably the scariest cat of them all at the moment. But I was also really, really determined to turn this impending clusterfuck of a night into a solid win for the good guys, whatever it would take.
"Think we're going to need to bring, uh, the turtle into it?" Obito asked.

I have a name. Isobu grumbled.

"Maybe." I hedged. "And you might need to be on hand to point me at an actual target and not just something that twitches in the wrong direction."

No, he won't. I can tell who I should smash like a bug just fine.

You really want to test our control, when Madara could have any number of lackeys and the entire village is full of soft targets? The hell we will. I wouldn't trust me on a power high, much less both of us when you have just one eye and we're going to be trying to search for infiltrators like Zetsu at the same time.

That still doesn't mean that we need another Sharingan following us around. Just because Kurama can be controlled by one and pointed at the correct enemy won't mean that we will. This boy—and maybe Isobu meant Kakashi too, in an offhand sort of way—does not fully understand his power. We do. Can we trust him to know what to look for? Where we should go? Madara could point Kurama wherever and still achieve his goals—we have to be more careful than even an extra eye would allow.

He had a point. And I wasn't sure that Obito had the same kind of experience with finding shape-changing opponents as, say, the Animorphs post-David. Or maybe…uh…

Frankly, the existence of the Transformation Jutsu gave us a baseline to work with simply because of how widespread the technique was, as much as I wanted to make it into some kind of joke. Obito was an MP. He was as good as I was, if not better. For one thing, he knew more people.

Sure, Zetsu could mimic chakra signatures. But they couldn't, to my knowledge, strip-mine people's memories.

That would have to work.

"Keisuke-chan, Obito-chan, Jiraiya-chan is waiting for your insight!" Shima's voice rang out, calling us back.

Obito shrugged when I looked at him curiously. "They don't need mine, Kei."

"Says the guy who lived with Uncle Creepy for six months. And my insight's gonna be worth jack in a bit." And I couldn't be happier about that. Or at least I would, once this was over.

It would be different, to have that weight off my shoulders.

"Kei." Obito sighed. "All right, I guess they need both of us. Let's go see what's wrong."

Everything. But hopefully, in time, we'd turn that around.

___

Kakashi

I'm…not really sure how I ended up being the one left holding the infant.

I'm sure there's a reason, but I'm just not seeing it at the moment.

"May I hold him?" Nagato asks, sitting down next to me while the Hokage and Biwako and Tsunade and Kushina all argue about what to do next.

I nod. I don’t need to tell him to be careful of the baby's head and neck—given how loudly Kushina was talking, I’d be surprised if the main body of Katsuyu had felt her ears burning from the tirade. If slugs had ears, anyway.

I don’t think they do.

Nagato, with the blond Uzumaki child in his hands, looks stunned by the whole sequence of events.

The guy went from penniless orphan to rebel to Rinnegan-wielding joint-ruler of Amegakure, to kinda-heir to the Uzumaki clan and possible godfather of Kushina's son. Maybe not all of that had happened in a short time period, but I knew that the last few had. That would be enough for anyone to deal with. Even if a lot of it wouldn’t be pushed through the Konoha bureaucracy for another few weeks.

And if Kushina still thinks she can trust him, with this, then I probably can.

Kushina's son—Naruto, per one offhand remark by his parents and per Kei's bizarre precognitive dreams—is pretty much as squashed-looking as any other baby. Babies tend to be weird-looking at first, until they have time to turn into three-month-olds. Aside from the whisker birthmarks, though, he seems normal. Big, but normal.

I guess the ten-month pregnancy thing worked out all right. Maybe even in his favor.

"Hello, little cousin." Nagato murmurs softly, balancing Naruto more in his lap than in his arms. Maybe he's afraid of dropping the kid? "Tired, aren't you? You've had a long night."

I shrug, not that Nagato's paying much attention to me. The night's just going to get longer, if the argument's anything to go by. I just know when something is so far over my head—command-wise, not in conceptual complexity—that I should barely bother listening in. Orders would come, and they'd be the right ones.

It was just going to take a while to get any.

"—fine, Minato!" Kushina was saying. "Almost better than fine, actually, since I don't have to worry about not being able to use chakra!"

"The seal is still weak enough that I’d be happier if you stayed on bed rest, Kushina."

"The Hokage doesn't sound happy at all.

"Yeah, and that puts Kurama on the backburner when we need those powers the most!" Kushina argues.

"What powers?" Tsunade demands. "If you use the Fox's power now, all you'll do is leave your son motherless and the Hokage a widower! The seal will not survive any Tailed Beast rampages, no matter how well-intentioned you try to be."

"I'm not going to be using all of his chakra, and you know it!" Kushina countered. "Just enough to get that power Mito-sama had! There's no other way to be sure that Konoha is safe!"

Mito-sama?

…Could this have something to do with her legendary ability to always know when danger was coming, no matter what form it took or disguise it wore?
Nagato looks up, too. His attention is mostly on Naruto, and the baby has his pinkie finger in a death-grip, but he's listening in as much as I am. When he looks back down at Naruto, who is industriously attempting to stuff two of Nagato's fingers into his mouth, he just sighs.

I signal for Genma to get the hell over here.

He does.

"What is it?" Genma asks, wandering over from where he'd been leaning against a nearby wall.

"Be ready to move out." I say carefully, watching the argument devolve.

The Hokage wants Naruto and Kushina to stay safe. Tsunade wants her cousins to be alive at the end of everything. Kushina's pretty sure she can help coordinate the defense forces and enact anti-infiltration protocols in Konoha by commandeering the barrier team and using the Nine-Tails's chakra. Everyone wants to save Konoha but no one's certain how to do it without stomping on each other's toes.

Any idiot can see what's going to happen next.

That's when the frog—which the Hokage must have sent out before calling me in—came back in a burst of white smoke.

"Boss, we've got trouble at home!" the toad says immediately, and everyone's hackles rise in response to the idea that, somewhere, there's a threat to Konoha.

"What kind of trouble?" The Hokage's voice is sharp.

"Keisuke-san says that the problem is a thing called a 'Zetsu,' Boss. He said that there are potentially thousands of them. Does that mean anything to you?" the toad asked.

The Hokage pales, briefly, before his eyes narrow and it becomes clear that the surge of adrenaline wasn't fear alone—he is furious. And he still hasn't given his marching orders yet.

"Yes." The Hokage says, low and deadly. He turns to his wife. "Yes, it does. Kushina—?"

"You won't be able to convince me not to help the barrier team." Kushina says flatly. "Don't even try."

The Hokage blows out a frustrated breath. "I'm not asking as your husband, Kushina, but—!"

"No."

"I'll go with her, if that would help." Nagato suggests, getting to his feet at the same time I do and brushing past Genma with unusual calm. "I…I don't have the power Kei-kun thinks I might, but I could be of some help, right?"

The Hokage gives him a long, considering look. Then he looks at me. "Get Falcon. You're escorting Kushina and Nagato-san to the barrier team building. Guard them. Give them an out no matter what."

"What about Naruto?" Tsunade asks. "You can't run a barrier and bodyguard and babysit. And I'm going into the hospital after this, because damned if I'm going to let that bastard hurt Shizune."

"Naruto…" The Hokage swallows.
"We can stay here with him, Hokage-sama." Biwako offers, still seeming as serene as ever. I can practically feel her chakra moving in agitation at the mere thought of an infant being deliberately endangered.

And Naruto should be far enough out of it, here, that guard duties could be relaxed. A skeleton crew of ANBU could coordinate with the local Katsuyu splits and maintain security…

"Thank you. I'll...I'll leave Keroro here so you can get back, once the coast is clear." The Hokage says. He sighs again. "Not how I wanted to spend Naruto's birthday…"

"Can't be helped, Hokage-sama." Genma says with a shrug.

"I suppose not." Sensei looks at Tsunade. "Can you get us all back there at once?"

"Easily," she says. "As soon as everyone is ready, I can set up a relay in case we need to get back under Katsuyu's eyestalks for protection. But we need to be here."

She and the Hokage are giving me a pair of withering glares. And Falcon's supposed to be senior officer?

"Hop to it," the Hokage snaps at everyone, and we do.

---

Hayate

"Hayate." Mom says, her voice awful and cold and totally different from anything I've ever heard. I'm already backing up even before she says anything, with the white monster sliding down off her sword. "Please, stay inside the house."

I nod, shakily.

Between me seeing the fake-Kei and trying not to do anything that'd set her off and maybe run away anyway, Mom had gotten off the couch, torn her katana from the wall, rushed into the hallway, and stabbed the not-Kei in the face hard enough to push the sword all the way through its head. It was all over before the fake-Kai could so much as raise her hand to reach through the doorway.

Mom makes a snapping motion with her right arm, flicking weird white stuff off the blade. Then she turns back to me and steers me away from the door, closing it behind her.

"Mom?" I ask in a whisper.

"I think it's time for you to go to bed, Hayate." Mom says, side-hugging me since she can't use both hands with her katana. After a second or two, she drops the sword on the floor and kneels in front of me, holding my hands in hers. "Please. No matter what, do not open the door for anyone."

"Why?" I ask, but I almost don't want to know.

"The defensive seals should keep out anything that tries to hurt you. Only your sister, the Hokage, or I should be able to get through." Mom says, quickly and seriously. She cups my cheek with her hand. "Please, Hayate. Stay safe for me."

I nod, jerkily, still shaking a bit from the whole...thing. I'm not sure what's going on. "Mom? I'm...I'm going to go to bed, okay?" I don't know what else to do.

"Good." Mom says, and she makes sure to kiss me goodnight before she gets up and picks her katana off the floor.
I go back to my bed and try really, really hard not to think about what's happening. I pull my blanket over my head, hide under my pillow, and try covering my ears.

I can still hear the front door open and close again.
Commencement Arc: Minefields

Chapter Summary

Everyone: Adapt.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Minato

I use the Flying Thunder God jutsu only after I’m sure that everyone else is loaded up and ready to go, or otherwise secure in the Shikkotsu Forest. While Katsuyu won’t keep her own watchful eyes on everything, she had enough smaller, hive-minded clones that there isn’t any real difference. Biwako and Naruto and everyone else who elected to stay behind will stay safe.

Now if only I could make sure that statement worked for everyone else.

Because just as I pop back into my office with the usual fwind of displaced air, it seems like everything gets into a fight for my attention at once.

I’m accompanied by two full squads of ANBU, not counting Kakashi’s micro-team and their Kushina-escorting duty that puts all four of them elsewhere. Since that’s ten shinobi plus myself, I immediately go to my office windows to let most of them out before the group starts to evacuate via the air vents. While having this many people in the office is more troublesome than dangerous, I don’t actually need most of the guards and they can accomplish individualized objectives once they’re out in Konoha.

Once the mass exodus is complete and I know that some people are doing their damned jobs, I turn back to those who haven’t left my office behind. Mainly because there isn’t much else for them to do.

Okay, no, that’s a lie. I just need to figure out where they should be.

Hiruzen Sarutobi. Third Hokage. Immensely powerful even in his relative old age, but I wouldn’t risk his safety before I know where he’d be of the most use.

Jiraiya-sensei. S-ranked shinobi of some note and my teacher in pretty much everything short of how to date.

How do I use that when we’re up against an army of shape-changing chakra-copying monsters?

“Sarutobi-sama, Jiraiya-sensei, what’s been going on here? I received reports of strange activity.” Before Jiraiya can jump in, I add, “I’ve confirmed that our opponents are Zetsu clones, Jiraiya-sensei. But I don’t know where they are or how many of them are active, or what they’ve been doing in Konoha. And I don’t think we will know until Kushina has the Barrier Team under her thumb.”

“She went through labor less than an hour ago, Minato.” Jiraiya says, with a kind of stunned surprise. “What in the world is she going to be doing there?”
This isn’t going to go over well. Calling it now.

I don’t let any uncertainty slip into my tone as I say, “With any luck? Setting the Nine-Tails up to interface with a Sensing Water Sphere so we can pick our targets.”

That gets a reaction.

Sarutobi jerks back in shock as though my idea—Kushina’s idea—had tried to lunge for his throat. “The Nine-Tailed Fox? Are you insane, Minato-kun?”

Jiraiya-sensei gives me a very skeptical look. “You don’t look like you’re concussed or high, so… what the hell, Minato?”

“How can you think of trusting the village’s safety to that?” Sarutobi demands.

“I’m not.” I cross my arms and hold my ground. “I trust Kushina when she says she can keep our village from being beaten into submission by an army of shape-changing monsters. I trust Kei when she says that the Nine-Tails has the ability to find anything hostile in the area and mark it, just like Mito-sama. And I trusted the two of you to keep the village out of danger while I was gone, but it seems like that part didn’t work.” My eyes narrow and I lean on the front of my desk. “So, what’s been happening?”

“There have been reports of mysterious attacks on local homes and the Military Police outposts on the outskirts of the village.” Jiraiya says after giving me a nonverbal version of the “we’ll talk about this later” look. “And the seals around the Gekkō household lit up about ten minutes ago. A squad went out to assess the damage.”

I can feel my eyebrows try to crawl toward my hairline. Kei’s house? “I thought you said the attacks were on the outskirts of the village.”

“Until that one, they were. We’re still waiting on a report.” Sarutobi tells me flatly.

…Could Madara know where Kei lives?

Before I have a chance to dwell on that horrifying thought, something knocks on the office window. I turn around and it takes me a second to understand what I’m seeing.

“Gekkō-san.” I say once I get a proper feel for that chakra again. I deactivate the window seals with a thought and slide the panels open so she can come inside. Somehow, I doubt this is a casual visit.

Miyako Gekkō is a small woman who resembles Kei—black hair, dark eyes, and a complexion best described as “ghostly”—in a superficial way that doesn’t encompass the world of differences between mother and daughter. Kei is my student and, barring some remarkable secrets, I can read her moods and expressions easily. She is her own person, but I’ve seen her grow up and that makes her somewhat predictable.

Her mother…isn’t. I didn’t understand until more than a month into office just why she was so eerie. That was the first time I’d gotten access to the redacted parts of her official file, which had been conspicuously absent from the version I had seen back when I first snapped Kei up for my genin team.

“Or is it Uesugi-san, tonight?” I go on, watching her expression carefully.

I can see the exact moment when the role of Kei’s caring mother slides away to reveal the demon underneath.
It’s like looking at a ROOT agent or a veteran member of ANBU’s more screwed-up squads. Her eyes are already black, but the sudden lack of any kind of emotional depth leaves them looking more like pits directly into hell. Her face is abruptly more angular, thrown into sharp relief by the office lights that gives a ghoulish cast to her features. And that doesn’t quite cover the murderous intent that seeps out into the air, almost unconsciously.

I stare straight back at her.

Once you know what’s hiding under there, it’s a lot less threatening. Especially given what she had needed to confess to Intelligence before she could emigrate here officially.

The Ghoul of the Three Wolves is past her prime.

In a deliberately level voice, I say, “Uesugi-san, I have no intention of outing you to anyone outside of this room.”

Watching Miyako Gekkō slowly reassert herself is a study in nonverbal communication. Under three sets of scrutinizing eyes, I see the pieces click back into place. The personality tics she’s accumulated over the course of nearly twenty years of living in Konoha, the hard-earned respect for the shinobi chain of command…

And then Miyako Gekkō is back. Reserved and stern, yes, but the murderer is back under wraps behind those dead eyes. Tomoe Uesugi goes back to sleep and, to be perfectly honest, I’m not in a hurry to meet her again even if she doesn’t do blistering rants or lectures.

Hah. Ironic that she even earned that title. The three men in this room, myself included, have higher body counts than she could have if her rampage had gone on for a decade.

“So Hayate-kun all right?” Sarutobi asks, now that she doesn’t look like she wants to murder someone. Strictly speaking, it’d be assassination if her target is anyone in this room.

“Yes,” Miyako says, the first thing she’s said since arriving. She crosses her arms. “Barely.”

“What happened?” Sarutobi asks.

“A creature took my daughter’s appearance and attempted to enter the house.” Miyako says in that terribly level voice. “I killed it and it returned to its true form. I’ve been recruiting others who have encountered them and have been trying to kill them back.”

“How many, Gekkō-san?” Sarutobi’s voice is suddenly heavy. Old, even. He’s in his fifties and actually seems to look it for the first time I can remember.

Miyako tilts her head, a sardonic look crossing her face and bleeding into her voice, “Creatures? Seven thus far. Many more bodies.”

Tomoe isn’t too far under the surface.

“Jiraiya-sensei, if you…” Fuck, no, that’s not the best plan. The Third Hokage can’t be used as a member of a mobile suppression unit either. It wouldn’t work.

“Gekkō-san, can you identify Zetsu clones?” I ask sharply, drawing everyone’s attention back to me. Certainly, Miyako is paying attention as soon as I open my mouth, but everyone in this room is used to commanding when necessary. This doesn’t always mean listening to the blond guy who has fewer years of combat experience than any of the others.
(Lived that one. Only once.)

Miyako hesitates. “Only at point-blank range, Hokage-sama. The creatures’ chakra doesn’t quite flow correctly under close examination.”

I don’t even ask how she could do that. I turn back to Jiraiya. “If there’s even a chance that Gekkō-san can identify Zetsu clones ahead of time, please, get people to follow her lead. Kushina won’t have the Barrier Team working like she wants for at least a few minutes, and we can’t spare that time.”

“What do you say, Gekkō-san?” Jiraiya asks with a grin.

Miyako gives me a long look, rather than acknowledging Jiraiya’s comment. “I’ll do it.”

“Great. Now we have half a plan.” I close my eyes briefly, trying to think of something productive for the Third to do. “Sarutobi-sama, if you could mobilize the reserves? I would prefer everyone to be on alert rather than being caught flat-footed. Even if paranoia will be the enemy, complacency will be worse.”

Sarutobi nods. He leaves immediately, probably to go change into full battle gear and summon Enma.

“Gamabunta’s ready to go whenever we find a decent target.” Jiraiya-sensei reminds me.

I nod. “Thank you.”

Jiraiya-sensei grimaces. “Don’t thank me yet. I don’t think the enemy’s gotten serious yet.”

“If they do,” Miyako cuts in, “will you bring my daughter back?”

“Back? Kei’s on a mission.” I try to lie.

Miyako fixes me with a completely unimpressed look. Is it just a mother thing?

Okay, fine. “Kei needs to remain outside of the village for as long as we can manage, Gekkō-san. There may be reason to believe that shinobi of her age are being deliberately targeted.”

“This has to do with the Three-Tails, doesn’t it?” Miyako says flatly.

“…Partially. Regardless. You have your orders, Gekko-san.”

Miyako nods and leaves the office alongside Jiraiya-sensei. I swear I can feel her glaring all the way down the outside stairs.

And that’s when an explosion sounds in the middle of the village and I don’t have time to worry about it.

---

Rin

Working in the hospital has really been something I’ve had for… I don’t know, forever? I’m old enough now that the comments about how young I am have stopped being quite so common, at least compared to when I was eight. At thirteen, I think most of the nurses and medic-nin around me have started to realize that I know my stuff perfectly well. It’s hard not to—between Kei-senpai and Akihito-shishō and all the other doctors and nurses and volunteers I’ve worked with, it’d be pretty weird if I didn’t know what I was doing after five straight years.
Still, there’s the occasional new person who doesn’t really understand that.

“Shizune-san, really, I don’t need any help here.” I say without looking up, adjusting the IV drip leading to a thirty-year-old appendicitis patient’s arm. I know what I’m doing.

“Are you sure, Rin-chan?” Shizune asks anyway. Just to be safe. To be sure.

Shizune is fifteen, which makes her older than me by just enough to matter in her eyes. She’s tall and pretty, with dark hair and eyes and maybe a bit of makeup to match her mentor, but let’s be honest here. Shizune, while a medic-nin in her own right and a full chūnin, has not worked in this hospital long enough to tell me how to do my job.

Tsunade-sama is, but she’s not here.

I sigh. “Shizune-san, maybe you should check for anyone coming in with battle injuries? I’m only going to check what else is required on his chart.” Given that my patient will probably be unconscious for another fifteen minutes thanks to surgical anesthesia, there isn’t much that a second pair of hands can help with. I just have to check his response times when he wakes up.

“Oh. Well…meet you in the lobby in five?” Shizune seems nervous…it can’t be that she isn’t comfortable in hospitals, right? I’ve been working here since forever, though, so maybe I just don’t understand other people’s apprehension. Maybe she just hasn’t worked in this environment before?

“Okay, Shizune-senpai.”

True to my word, even if I don’t necessarily understand why Shizune has been shadowing me all evening, I head down to the main lobby after handing my patient—Ayato Kirito—off to the first night shift nurse whose schedule overlapped with mine. “Just for ten minutes!” I said, with every intention of keeping that bargain.

Of course, I make sure to remove my gloves and dump them in the nearest waste bin. I carry whole boxes of latex gloves when I can’t get to a storage closet, and dump them when I’m done because the idea of carrying contagions from patient to patient on my gloves sets my teeth on edge. The hospital can be hazardous enough—negligence should be the least of my patients’ worries.

And as soon as I’m in the lobby, I end up with a front-row seat to…something.

Aside from me, Ayako the receptionist, and Shizune, there are two people in the lobby this late.

One: Akihito-shishō. He’s taller than most people, with a reedy sort of build and graying black hair, cold blue eyes and a scowl to match all of the above. His hands are bony in a way that suggests repeated injury or arthritis, with burn marks between his index and middle fingers of both hands from holding cigarettes for too long. He has his arms crossed over his chest and a cigarette between his teeth, nearly bitten in half.

Two: A tall blonde woman with light brown eyes and muscled shoulders underneath her red haori. She has a large forehead with a purple rhombus in the middle, small eyebrows and a severe look in her eye. Her clothes are of an older style than expected—no mesh or bandages. Aside from the heels and long painted nails, she looks a little like a retired kunoichi, sans injuries. The thing is, everyone in the entire village would know her face—me included.

My teacher is staring down Tsunade of the Legendary Sannin.

“I’m not the one you should talk to about anti-infiltration procedures, Tsunade-sama.” Akihito-shishō says carefully, and yet still managing to sound irritable. “Is there anything we need to know about these…agents?”

Tsunade huffs and says, “You’re going to have to work on security, the same as the rest of us.”

“Are we expecting some kind of attack?” I blurt out, alarmed.

Tsunade looks down her nose at me, one eyebrow raised. “Yes. And you are…?”

“Rin Nohara, my student.” Akihito-shishō replies, nodding at me. “Rin, Kei-kun seems to be involved somehow. Did you know anything about this?”

“I just know that…Kei-senpai…” Wait. I pale immediately. “The…the infiltrators? Are they those same things that attacked us on that mission?” Oriko died that day, and had been replaced by a monster that took Kei away. We got her back and things were confused, and Kei became a Tailed Beast Host, but…I. I thought the Hokage had taken care of things!

“Probably.” Tsunade says, giving me a concerned look. “You’ve encountered them before, then.”

“Yes. It…it was the last, uh, major mission I went on.” I say, trying to keep my voice steady. “One of them pretended to be Oriko-san and kidnapped Kei-senpai.”

Shizune covers her mouth with her hands. “And you couldn’t tell?”

“Not until I went back and found Oriko-san dead on the ground.” I tell them. “Kei would know more than I do. So would Obito.”

Tsunade seems to chew on the inside of her cheek. “Damn.” She glances up at the nearest wall clock, which says that it’s 12:07 am. “It’s going to be nearly impossible to completely lock down, but we can certainly try.”

“A hospital lockdown.” Akihito-shishō says flatly. “Do you have any idea how many people have access to this building on a daily basis? We’re down to half our staff for the night shift, but there are still patients in here.”

“Do you have a better idea?” Tsunade snaps back.

“There’s no way to know if they’ve already made it inside.” Shizune says, her voice rising by an octave. “Oh god.”

I’m biting at a hangnail, trying to think.

There are just too many people in the hospital to account for any and all possible identities for a Zetsu to take. Too many access points, too—though the Hokage had sealed most of the windows from any kind of external breach, he couldn’t do the same for internal modifications because otherwise our nurses would lose hands every time someone wanted to open a window. The ground floor entrance has two chūnin posted as guards, but the shift change means they’re not any more familiar with the people in the building than anyone else is.

“I…think the enemy uses chakra samples to change their shape.” I theorize aloud, trying to remember more fragments of that mission gone wrong. Kei talked a lot about the Zetsu thing the morning after, but I can’t recall everything. “I’m sorry I can’t be more help.”

“Don’t apologize unless it gets someone killed.” Tsunade replies. “And if that person is you, you’re excused.”
“Tsunade-sama…” Shizune tries to reprimand, but she doesn’t have the confidence to do it.

Akihito-shishō opens his mouth to say something, which is probably going to be caustic, and that’s when the left-hand wall explodes inward.

---

Kushina

The Barrier Team, despite the name, doesn’t actually maintain a chakra barrier around Konoha all the live-long day. While they step up security during big events like Minato’s coronation and pretty much the entire Third Shinobi World War, no one can stay on duty all the time. Furthermore, working on a large technique collaboratively means that all members of the team have to be perfectly in sync at all times. While there are medical-nin who are trained for just that, the Barrier Team can’t poach from the hospital while a war’s on and medic-nin don’t have quite the same kind of knack that the Barrier Team looks for.

But of those who can work together on such a grand scale, everyone is present.

I only stumble a bit when Kakashi and his teammates help me land a Flying Thunder God jutsu right outside the Barrier Team’s bunker, with Nagato trailing silently behind us. Must’ve been overloaded, the poor kid. As for me, my hips hurt and my chakra is flagging and I think I would faint if I could, but there are things that need doing.

The Barrier Team has two major functions: detection and interception.

If I have the slightest clue what’s going on, then either the interception team’s not doing their job or the detection team isn’t or one of the teams is dead. Because something was going wrong in the street and even if Minato’s bodyguards don’t let me slow down to see it I know it has to do with the barrier problems. It has to do with security issues, with the nature of the enemy, or maybe the fact that underground infiltration security may not account for creepy clay men who’ve been under the village since Madara got his ass kicked.

Bit of a coin toss, really.

Kakashi kicks the door down before I have to. Polite of him, even if it gets a bunch of kunai pointed at us before we even get through the door.

It doesn’t last.

Mainly because I’m glaring at everyone. I’m soaked in sweat and I smell like blood and probably look like someone who’s been through hell because I have, and the first person to get in my way is getting their head bitten off. I am also not wearing any pants under my hospital gown hybrid of an outfit, which bizarrely makes me angrier at this whole situation. Like the universe can’t even spare me a minute to find pants before throwing more shit at me.

With Falcon and Genma helping me stand up straight—barely—I manage to growl, “Get me Kakoi right now.” On second thought… “And water. And a chair or something. I don’t care who you kill to get it.”

Kakashi breaks off to enforce the order because, between him, Shiranui and Falcon, he’s the shortest and thus makes a crappy crutch. I can limp around with assistance, but I guess it’s better to employ all of the prodigies Minato assigned to me in the most efficient way I can. And Nagato wouldn’t be comfortable giving orders to Konoha shinobi at all, so I let him off the hook.

About thirty seconds later, I’m lying down on a pair of mats that were unceremoniously shoved together to give the recently-pregnant lady a place to relax. There’s a glass of water, too—now empty—and then another.

After more water, another half-minute, and a very careful stretch, I feel almost human again.

“Kushina-sama?” Kakoi is about my age or so, but he doesn’t dress like anyone in town. When on duty, the dark-haired, severe-faced shinobi dresses like someone who walked right out of one of the Fire Temple ceremonies and acts the part. While there’s no real reason to dress up like a shaman or priest while in Konoha—particularly when working for a department that most people never had anything to do with—it does make him easy to pick out of a crowd.

I snarl, pointing accusingly with my right hand. My index finger is going to go up his nose if he leans in any closer. “Why aren’t you maintaining the Sensing Water Sphere right now, you lazy ass?”

“It’s a shift-change, Kushina-sama.” Kakoi assures me as fast as he can. “The sphere will be up and active in just a moment—!”

“It shouldn’t have gone down in the first place!” I snap, and I can practically feel Kakashi tense from across the room. Did Madara know that Konoha’s Barrier Team was cutting corners? How the hell would he?

“Kushina-sama,” says Falcon in a warning tone as I get ready to launch into a tirade. Honestly, this was just negligence!

But I bite back the first eight or so things I want to say and focus instead on what has to be said. “Kakoi, call in whoever you need to make a village-wide surveillance net and get them ready to use my chakra to maintain it. Inoshi Yamanaka, Suzaku Nara— whoever the hell will be useful. I need them yesterday.”

What in hell had the Barrier Team been doing if they weren’t monitoring the entire village? I know Minato called up just about everyone with an office to get them on board. Kei told him what she knew about tonight, via her weird prophetic dreams, and he acted on it. Someone, somewhere, drops the ball anyway, and then I have to deal with it?

I am so done.

“Wolf, make sure it happens.” I say to Kakashi, who nods behind his ANBU mask and immediately disappears. Maybe he’s going to frog-march everyone else into position. Whatever he does, it had better be fast.

I lie there on the floor for a while, trying to recover my strength as the Barrier Team whips itself into shape around me. I’m careful enough not to use too much of Kurama’s chakra, since the seal is still unstable, but if there aren’t any soldier pills available…

I decide to try something a little…unusual. I mean, I think Kei does it a lot, but I never have and maybe this won’t work the way it should.

Still gonna try.

Kurama?

Fuck. If he doesn’t want to listen, then this isn’t going to be easy. I don’t have enough chakra to confront him the way that Mito did.

Kurama. Please.
I wait for a couple of seconds before letting my little mental balloon of hope deflate itself.

What do you want?

Oh thank god.

I need your help.

I get a sense of Kurama sitting up in his seal—the birdcage is as big as I could make it without mangling the structure—to glare at whatever mental avatar was supposed to represent me in the mindscape. I was half-in and half-out and mostly too tired to bring together all the focus I needed to have a big old argument with him.

Can you feel the emotions of people around you? I ask, mentally praying that if he does then he’s willing to make a deal. Please say yes. Please say you can find the Zetsu clones no matter where they’re hiding.

And if I can, human? Kurama growls. Why would I want to help you, of all human pests?

I think I have an answer. Kei’s answer. Because the Zetsu clones work for Madara.

For a long moment, Kurama stays silent.

Then, I could lie.

The metaphorical bottom drops out of my stomach. It doesn’t have that far to go—it’s been a shitty night.

If I marked every single human in this village as the enemy, you would have no choice but to act on my directions. Kurama laughs, low and hateful. You would have no way of knowing if your precious village was already gone until they started dying. Or isn’t that what the Three-Tails host told you?

NNNnot in so many words. I hedge.

You wouldn’t ask me at all if there were other options. Kurama muses. So, what did the little rat tell you that made you think this was a good idea?

I glare up at the ceiling. Honestly? She was probably betting that you hate Madara Uchiha more than you hate me.

Kurama hisses and his chakra rumbles through my coils like an earthquake. At least I’m pretty sure I haven’t started glowing yet. Him.

The growl goes on for a while longer before Kurama falls silent. Then, while I’m contemplating the ceiling, Kurama says, And if I did cooperate, what would I get out of it?

I wonder if he’s thinking that at least I’m willing to let him haggle. With any luck? Something closer to freedom than you already have. I listen to shinobi bustle around me, getting ready to set up the Sensing Water Sphere next to me so I don’t have to walk anywhere. I’ll have to get Minato to help, but we may be able to loosen the seal a little and give you more ways to change what it looks and feels like. You wouldn’t be able to get out any more than normal, but I’ve seen Isobu and Kei interact and he doesn’t seem bored all the time.
Kurama grumbles. I’ll ask him before I give you an answer, human. I don’t trust you. I will never trust you.

Never’s a long time. Thing is, Kurama is just the type who’d be able to hold to that.

Kurama doesn’t say anything else for a while. It’s long enough that, by that time, I can look around and see Suzaku and Inoshi setting up. Suzaku sits next to me, trying to talk me through the process of linking my mind with the Sensing Water Sphere and with Inoshi so that we can make this all work. I sort of nod along, half-listening.

Then…

I’ll do it. He sounds grudging at best. Just this once.

I reach down through my chakra, as though extending my hand to pull someone up from the ground.

Not like that. Try again.

I frown inwardly.

And this time Kurama reaches first. I can sort of see my chakra-arm reaching out again, my chakra-fingers catching the very tip of one of his long white claws and curling around it.

And then I can see everything. But the “everything” I focus on is a load of chakra specks across the village that seem to be highlighted in Kurama’s bright red chakra. He hadn’t needed to point out literally every problem in the entire area, down to rocks in the village’s foundation, but I appreciated the grudging effort.

One of them was in the room.

Which is why Kurama’s chakra, wrapped around my Adamantine Chakra Chains, shoots out of my stomach and snatches a member of the Barrier Team off his feet and dangles him from the ceiling.

Genma manages to choke out, “Kushina-sama, what—?”

I don’t recognize the shinobi that Kurama’s caught—blue hair, blue eyes, face still with a bit of baby fat and big ears—but that doesn’t mean anything. But as Kurama’s chakra burns into him, destabilizing his fake chakra coils, his appearance destabilizes. His body goes white and monochrome like some kind of person made of putty or clay.

That’s about when Kakashi cuts its head off with the regulation ANBU katana.

As the body seeps into the floorboards, I sit up and take a very close look at the Sensing Water Sphere that’s floating in the air next to me. “Now that that’s over with, Inoshi, we’d better get started.”

I see him hesitate. Inoshi is a sensor, the same as many Yamanaka clan members, and his day job is in therapy and not combat. Hell, neither is mine—at least not for the last year or so—but I still have that edge.

Then Inoshi nods, extending a hand. “When you’re ready, Kushina-sama.”

I let him put his hand on my head and then the transmission begins.
“Do you think that everything’s okay? Like with Sensei getting all those Zetsu clones rounded up?” Obito asked, chin in hand as he sat next to me. He looked pensive, for him, and his jaw set as soon as he finished talking.

I was about to answer that, yes, that was what first responders and sensors and the Barrier Team were for, when I was interrupted by Isobu’s chakra. I blinked, shutting my mouth with a click of teeth and immediately reaching down into my mind to find him. He didn’t try to get my attention deliberately most of the time—there was a difference between providing color commentary and giving me a metaphysical poke in the side of the head. Most of the time, I channeled his chakra when too pissed off to think about not doing it.

Kurama just sent me a message. Isobu growled, sounding like a slow-moving chainsaw. Or a really, really big one.

All of my attention immediately zeroed in on him, excluding all other stimuli. What did he say?

He wanted to know if the man behind the attack on Konoha really is Madara Uchiha.

_Barring yet another successor with a kekkei genkai that gives him access to the Demonic Statue of the Outer Path, and thus an army of goddamn Zetsu clones, I’m gonna have to say that it’s him._ I said coldly. _And if there’s another guy out there with the same powers, we need to put him down before he tries topping his predecessor._

Isobu gave me a brief impression of nodding, then I felt his chakra move again even as he stayed silent. Probably communicating on that other plane of existence, but leaving me out of the loop. Well. As long as the two of them were talking and not brawling…

Kurama will lend his power to the village. Isobu’s tails lashed the ice as he clambered out of the bay and into the glacial shelf inside my mind. _And soon, so will we._

And that was when I blinked and the trance ended, which means I came back to reality and got to see Obito waving his hand in front of my face. “Kei? Hello? Seriously, stop zoning out on me!”

I batted his hand away. “Maybe you should pick a different topic, then. I don’t need help freaking out.”

I needed to be sure the Zetsu clones were being taken out in an orderly and efficient manner. With Kurama on the job and cooperating with Kushina, then there was every chance that the response teams would be able to pick the enemy out from a crowd as long as Kushina and Kurama could sustain their working relationship. Naruto had been able to pick out White Zetsu clones like they were the most overt operatives on the planet, for hundreds of kilometers in all directions across the battlefield. Mito had been a key part of the village’s early defensive measures, back when we’d still been on the first two Hokage (supposedly because of a prophetic gift but…eh, semantics).

I didn’t think Kushina and Kurama would be able to be that effective after less than three months of work together, but miracles did happen when the Uzumaki name was invoked.

“Kei? Obito?”

Both of us looked up, startled, and ended up seeing Sensei’s face in the gigantic crystal ball. Okay, to be perfectly honest? He should not have been holding the thing that close to his face. I did not need to have the image of Sensei’s eye, magnified a hundredfold or more because he couldn’t figure out
At least it wasn’t his nose or something. (Though he did need to get some of that sleep-sand out of his eye.)

“Uh,” was Obito’s immediate, rational response. Right. “Hi, Sensei?”

“Kei, Obito, I’m calling you back to the village in four minutes exactly. Kushina’s helped us flag every enemy inside of the village, but there’s trouble with some specific targets and we don’t have enough heavy-hitters to get the big ones. Kei, your mother’s suppression team has made contact with the hospital’s Zetsu clone monster, but we’re getting reports of other creatures in the Uchiha district as well as outside of the walls. Kushina won’t be able to move, but…” Sensei hesitated. “How stable is that suppression seal? Both of you.”

Isobu?

I haven’t felt anything.

Obito wobbled a hand in midair. “It hasn’t been giving me any trouble, I guess? We might just be out of range, though.”

Sensei pulled back from the scrying crystal, giving us a chance to finally see that he was sitting at his desk. I could also see that he was the only one in the office, which explained the extreme close-up. How often had he even used that thing?

“How many Zetsu clones are there?” I asked. It had better not be—

“At least five thousand from what Suzaku Nara’s been telling me and everyone else with clearance.” Sensei’s expression went flat and grim. His fingers laced together in front of his face, reminding me of a somewhat younger and considerably more stab-happy David Xanatos. Or Gendo Ikari, theoretically. “Fewer, if you count the monsters as one big target. I don’t consider that much of a consolation prize.”

“What do you expect us to be able to do?” Obito asked, sounding more concerned than offended. “I mean, I can do Wood Release but so can they, and Kakashi’s not here. We need him for a full formation, but you have Genma and Raidō off doing other stuff too. Unless…”

Well, look at that. Obito and I winced together, but I was the one to voice the thought, “You want him to try keeping an eye out for me while I go for a chakra cloak? Sensei, that’s…”

Ill-advised? Wantonly destructive? Probably going to result in a berserk or unconscious or dead me? …Depending on Isobu’s mood and the combat rating of the first-responder team. There were degrees of badness.

Sensei shook his head. “Not immediately. See what you can do on ground level, working together. Jiraiya-sensei and Miyako-san will be heading north from the hospital with a posse as soon as they finish. Join up with them and then commence street-clearing. ANBU and more experienced teams will be cleaning up whatever and whoever you miss.”

Mostly “what,” I gathered. It was…difficult to consider the Zetsu clones people when I knew that, aside from the original, they didn’t tend toward intelligence that didn’t revolve around murder. And even that one was highly suspicious. In a “Hannibal Lector has a backwater cousin” kind of way.

“And if we run into something really bad?” Obito asked, hesitant. He elaborated with, “Because I don’t know if I can fight over Kei with someone who’s got a Mangekyō Sharingan. At all. And I really, really don’t want to find out if I can get one.”

“Kushina hasn’t reported seeing Madara in the field. Or anyone with a Sharingan, actually.” Sensei seemed to calculate something, slotting in variables that we couldn’t see into some kind of grand math equation in his head. Maybe his genius was kicking into high gear and we were being left behind?

I was going to regret being born again, wasn’t I?

“You’re going to bait the mastermind into the field.” Fuckin’ called it. Dammit. “I’ll have seals ready for you when you arrive—spot him, and I’ll be there in a flash.”

My eyebrows rose. “Please tell me that was an intentional pun.”

---

Hayate

I don’t open the door. I don’t even leave the bed. I stay as far out of trouble as I can, because there’s no way I want to get caught up in whatever is going on outside and making all that awful noise.

The noise gets closer.

Poking my head out from under the covers, I see a shadow move across the window, because of the light hitting the opposite wall.

“Something smells good…” says a voice that seems to come from just by my ear.

I freeze up under the blankets. After maybe half a second, I watch the shadow on the window move away and immediately skitter to the floor, snatching my kodachi from under my bed. I watch the shadows, eyes wide and breathing quiet only by force of will.

A man’s voice laughs and a hand’s shadow appears on the wall. “Let’s get it!”

Oh no, no, no—

The hand clenches, reaching for me, and then there’s a massive burst of light that ends in screams and hurts my eyes so much I can see stars.

“Defensive seals!” says someone, but I’m already out of my room entirely. “Search for a weakness!”

I skid down the hall on bare feet, trying to make as little noise as I can. Need to get away from the windows—

It’s not enough. The house rocks, throwing me off my feet and making me slide painfully across the kitchen floor.

The floorboards start to creak, in the middle of the living room. Something is pounding on the front door. My heart pounds against my ribs like a drum and I can feel my hands shake. The Hokage said we’d be safe—

The floorboards split with a horrible cracking noise, throwing dirt up into the air.

A white hand emerges from the dark space underneath the house, followed by an arm, a shoulder, a head—
It looks human. Kind of. But where the skin should be normal, it’s paste-white and jet-black, splitting the—the thing down the middle. It has green hair and it’s only got one real eye, with the one on the black half of its body being a flat yellowy disk.

It’s looking right at me.

“Found you!” The white half is singing, like this is some kind of game. Like he—it—didn’t just rip into the house like the security seals weren’t there and—

I draw my kodachi and slash the fingers off the hand that tries reaching for me.

The monochrome man blinks with his only real eye, pulling his hand back and finding four fingers missing.

“Stay away from me.” I snarl, but it sounds almost like a squeak. Suddenly, stupidly, I almost wish that my voice would crack like Obito’s because it doesn’t sound threatening at all.

The black half says, “Naughty, naughty brat.” still in that weirdly amused way. His voice sounds wrong, in a way I’ve never heard before.

His chakra feels like that weird white thing from before, the thing that tried to be Kei and failed. But at the same time there’s something weird, even weirder than weird, that makes the black thing creepy all on its own. There are two different types of chakra.

“W-what are you?” I hear myself ask, in a whisper. I don’t mean to say it—it just slips out!

The white half of his face grins. “I’m Zetsu, and this is Zetsu!”

The black half doesn’t. “And you’re coming with me.”

I scramble to my feet but the Zetsu pair are faster than I am, so I can’t use all my strength to bring the kodachi into a defensive position before he’s on me. He must weigh twice what Mom does, because even a half-meter of steel doesn’t push him back much at all.

The black half’s hand reaches out and wrenches the kodachi out of my hands without pulling it out of his chest first, making the blade groan and bend in the middle. The white half’s hand, even without fingers, takes a swipe at my head.

I duck, pivot on my supporting leg, and smash my foot into his black knee with a chakra-charged kick.

At least, that’s what I aimed for. Mom said to go for the knees, eyes, or crotch in a fight with someone I didn’t know how to beat otherwise. Kei used it back during her Chūnin Exam, so that made it real, made it a move that could really work. Even if she hadn’t been really outmatched by that Maito boy.

But the black arm is faster than I am again, grabbing my ankle off the ground and—

PAIN!

I’m screaming almost before he drops me and my broken leg to the kitchen floor. It’s broken. It has to be broken. I’ve broken a finger before and it was like this but this is worse, so much worse, I can’t breathe.

The black hand reaches down, grabs the collar of my shirt and pins me to the floor.
“I said you’re coming with me.” The white and black halves growl together.

The hand switches positions and the white hand comes down too, and both of them are on my throat and I can’t breathe no no no no—

Then nothing.

Chapter End Notes

Chapter title taken from the Matrix OST.
Commencement Arc: Signum Malum

Chapter Summary

Kei: Do a headless chicken impression.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Kurama says the enemy will be so easy to spot that only an idiot could get it wrong. Isobu gave the impression of a shrug, which was impressive for a creature without moveable shoulders. He's using the other humans to send information across the village, so no one gets it wrong. Even the idiots. Or if they do, they can't blame him.

That's very kind of him.

I think he honestly wants to see us fail, but refuses to have it be his fault. Isobu said. He's so two-faced about it.

...True. But I'm willing to go with his goodwill for now. We don't exactly have any other way to locate the enemy troops once they've transformed, or at least I don't know of another method.

True. I'll tell you if he changes his mind. Again.

With Obito's wrist in a death-grip, I gave the signal.

There was that sensation again, like with Sensei's Flying Thunder God teleportation hax. It felt like someone stuck a hook in my gut and yanked, just for a second. Like going into free-fall or riding a rollercoaster and feeling my stomach and blood fail to keep up with the descent. I mean, better than being squished by more pounds per square centimeter than a human body could take, but I nonetheless wished that space-time ninjutsu could play nicer with passengers.

And then Obito and I popped back into reality at Tsuruya's feet.

I sat up immediately despite the sudden air-pressure-induced headache—fucking altitude differentials—and looked around.

Aside from Tsuruya's steel-sheened wings, I couldn't actually see that much at that exact moment. But I could hear things—people screaming, fire crackling, structures being wrecked—that made me sick to my stomach at the same time I kind of just wanted to get up and fly into a screaming rage directed at the nearest valid target.

Obito helped me up and I was about to get caught up in searching the burning skyline for something or other, but was interrupted by all of Tsuruya's primary feathers rattling like clashing swords.

"Keisuke-sama!" Tsuruya snapped, forcing me to look up. "You need to avoid running off until I've explained the situation."

Right, right. Tsuruya had terrible night vision, but it didn't take an owl to see what was going on in Konoha at the moment. With Obito crouched next to me like an indecisive gargoyle, trying to figure out if I needed to be guarded or maybe fled from, I let Tsuruya's report wash over me. She settled down in front of us with her wings folded at her sides so she presented less of a target to anyone who might see us from the ground.

"Konohagakure is currently under attack by copies of the same creature encountered near the Mountain's Graveyard." Tsuruya said in a professional, yet clipped tone. "Hokage-sama has reported that they have merged into five separate plant-monsters that are tearing into neighborhoods across the village. The first of them is there"—and here, Tsuruya punctuated the statement with a jab of her beak that pointed at the hospital's barely-visible rooftop—"and is the first we will attack. None of the defenders have the high-powered jutsu necessary to take it down without losing members of their own team, so we will be reinforcing them together. No one runs away early to chase secondary objectives, Keisuke-sama."

I nodded, feeling pretty stupid. "...So. Where's Mom?"

"Miyako-san is...perhaps taking longer than expected." Tsuruya hedged. She looked at the hospital again. "If we could go and reinforce her division?"

How the fuck had Mom managed to finagle a division out of Sensei? "If she has Jiraiya with her... Actually, yeah, let's just go and start punching stupid faces in."

"I hope you aren't including me in that." Obito half-snarked, backpedaling once I shot a glare at him. "Joking, joking..."

I hurled myself over the edge of the rooftop before anyone could object. I felt Obito follow a moment later, with Tsuruya throwing herself into the night air above us.

"Hospital?" Obito asked, eyeing the distant, slightly-torched street in front of us with the kind of expression that reminded me that he was an Uchiha, and therefore really concerned about fire safety. In a specialized kind of way.

And as much as it pained me to say it, I had to turn that plan down flat. "No. Hokage's tower. Sensei had seals he had to get to us."

"Actually, Keisuke-sama..." Tsuruya trailed off, dropping to street level in front of us. She lowered her wings somewhat and I got a good look at the barely-visible bulge in her flight equipment. Technically, all of the saddle-stuff was mine, but apparently Tsuruya had decided that she needed the storage space even without me. "I have two scrolls in this pouch. Are they what you are looking for?"

Snatching them out of the saddlebag, I examined them quickly in the orange firelight. Two full sealing scrolls, with one painted gold—Sensei's color—next to the cap and the other bound with blue thread. A storage scroll? For water?

I passed the gold scroll to Obito and gave the blue-threaded one a more thorough inspection. While the lighting wasn't great, I could make out the words Dual-use. Stores up to 250,000 liters. Catch me a bad guy, Kei!

Oh what the shit, Sensei.

"I think this one's...yeah, it's all kunai." Obito's expression went flat, nonplussed. "All kunai. I think this says 'velocity' but it's all in Sensei's handwriting..."

...Flying Thunder God kunai launcher scroll. Why didn't he use this thing in the field?
"One of these days, Sensei's tendency to fight old wars will come back to bite him." I muttered under my breath. Surreptitiously, I checked under the collar of my shirt. Did...nope, Sensei's Flying Thunder God seal was still there.

"Little late for that, Kei." Obito tucked the scroll away into one of his flak jacket pockets. "All right. Do you want me in the lead?"

"...No, I probably need to be the ball-buster here. Back me up?" I straightened, putting Sensei's overkill storage scroll into one of my right-hip scroll holsters. Wouldn't need that for a bit. On the other hand, I did need my hands free.

Isobu-san?

Take whatever you need. And I think you can just call me "Isobu" from now on.

Thank you.

Isobu's chakra swirled slowly outward from the seal on my chest, spinning delicate filaments of red chakra inside my coils. Intermingling that energy with my human chakra deliberately—as opposed to in the heat of the moment—let me feel the nanosecond that my eyes changed from plain ultra-dark brown to Isobu's gold-on-red.

I'll keep an eye on things. Go.

I glanced at Obito, who gave me a thumbs up and whose Sharingan remained still, before running right for the towering white monster I could see poking past the rooftops.

Zetsu-stomping time.

I dashed through the streets with Obito trailing behind, drawing my katana with my right hand and forming a chakra scalpel projection around the blade. I found the first target—glowing red in a way I wasn't, trimmed with gold—putting a chūnin in a triangle choke and whipped around him in a quick circle before looking for the next enemy.

I heard the oddly squishy squelch as his head fell off, but didn't spend much time dwelling on it. There wasn't any blood on my sword, so I took that as a win.

"Okay, yep, that's a Zetsu clone." Obito said from behind me. "And they still bleed orange gunk. Good to know."

"Eyes on me, Obito." I reminded him, before tearing off after a fused pair of Zetsu clones and immediately separating them horizontally instead of vertically—which they might have recovered from. But no. They didn't get to have legs or lower internal organs tonight.

Obito laughed, almost hysterical, and then two kunai appeared in the foreheads of two more Zetsu clones off to my left. A second later, and another five Zetsu clones in front of me were consumed in a massive conflagration that I only escaped because Isobu was helping me.

I retreated maybe five meters, ducked under a flying corpse that neither Obito nor I had had a hand in making, and shot through the flames.

I kinda had to stab another Zetsu to death before landing properly, but I made it! Judging by the thump behind me and the lack of a burning need to kill a target on the backswing, so did Obito.

Rin's voice cut through all the noise, somehow. "Kei-senpai, over here!"
I would have gone to her immediately, but...well, shit was going down.

The area in front of the hospital was a wreck that would have made total sense as a set-piece in The Avengers. The ground was torn up and massive Poison Ivy-esque woody vines were writhing skyward through the remains of the hard-packed dirt and gravel that we used as pavement. Somehow, one of them was doing so even while on fire and with a Zetsu impaled on one of the branches. Two nearby buildings had been crushed flat and were piled high with Zetsu corpses, and an Uchiha flame suppression squad was trying frantically to douse the blazing food stands before it spread to other parts of the village.

And there, taking up space right smack in the middle of everything, was a towering monstrosity that could only have been created by Madara's crazed imagination.

It was easily fifteen meters high, shaped approximately like the Stay-Puft Marshmallow Man if he had comic-book cancer, sans legs. It was a multi-ton wall of pulsating, vein-free and colorless flesh that had entirely too many eyes holy fuck—at least half of which were focused on me. Fifty beady yellow eyes searched all around the city, occasionally being blocked off by the rivulets of orange gunk spreading from its wounds. Eight vicious, oversized Venus flytrap mouths snapped sporadically at the air, trying to eat something that probably wasn't in range.

Speaking of wounds, Tsuruya flapped her wings overhead and suddenly eight more sword-sized feathers embedded themselves into the top of the creature.

I glanced at my sword. Gonna probably need a bigger blade. And the standard Rasengan wasn't big enough to cause any noticeable damage either...

"Holy shit." Obito muttered, pulling up short beside me. He stared up at the abomination in front of us, which was moving like gelatin in the vague direction of the Hokage Tower, wobbling the whole way. "Kei?"

I sheathed my katana and glared up at the monster. Well, there was more than one way to pull a weed...

Isobu's chakra welled up within my coils, properly, and I watched as my vision was steadily overtaken by a literal red haze.

"Well, if that's what you have to say..." Obito darted forward and then veered left into a leap, shooting off the ground. He ended up on a rooftop with decent lines of sight, and half of the Zetsu monster was engulfed in an orange fireball before I had time to do or say much else.

Before I could head directly into the fray and make up for lost time, though, I heard Rin's voice again. "She's over there, Miyako-san!"

I blinked, immediately looking over to my right. There, beyond the haze of dust and smoke stirred up by the Zetsu monster, were two forms—Rin, waving at me, and Mom, who wasn't.

"Mom?" I said blankly. "You...uh. You look different."

My mother nodded.

I...wasn't quite sure what I was looking at. Oh, she was pretty much the same visually—aside from the fact that her long hair was tied up in a full samurai topknot for the first time I could remember, and that she was carrying two full-length katana. She looked a little angrier than I would have expected, with her expression pinched and guarded like a soldier going to war. Which I guess both of us were, at that moment. If the flames threw light across her face, I could see angles and a harshness to her features that I'd never noticed before.

But I could read her chakra. And Mom's chakra had always been calm, or even sedate. She didn't do things in a rush or a rage. That just wasn't her.

But in that moment, my mother's chakra blazed from the strength of the Second Gate. If I closed my eyes, I could almost visualize the faint bluish-green glow of her chakra seeping out of her skin and flowing toward both of her swords.

"Kei-chan, we could use your help." Mom said brusquely. "Jiraiya-sama's major summons are occupied, so we will have to stop this creature here and now."

Unbidden, a grin crossed my face. Isobu wanted to fight, sure, and his chakra always pushed me to be more aggressive, but this? This was the first time I'd ever fought alongside my mother in a real battle. "Ready when you are, Mom."

I stepped forward so I was standing even with Mom, once she turned back to face the Thing That Ought Not Be.

Without looking at me, Mom whispered, "Left, Kei-chan. Don't miss."

Given how big our enemy was, I had a hard time imagining that.

I let Isobu's chakra surge, channeling a major portion of it down my arm and into the edge of my katana. I felt Mom do the same, but with her First Gate shenanigans-derived energy instead.

Then Mom went to the right, I shot to the left, and we had the Zetsu creature between us. Isobu's chakra flared bright red, cloaking my entire right arm and my katana in what amounted to an aura of ridiculous cutting power.

(And since I was short one sword compared to Mom, I undid the ties on my sheath with my left hand and tried out the same chakra boost. It worked.)

Gekko-style Leaf Kenjutsu: Mountain Cutter.

That particular chakra-enhanced kenjutsu technique...kinda did exactly what it said it did. I mean, not on the same scale as even a small Tailed Beast Bomb, but using the cutting power in elemental chakra allowed the users to extend the reach of a blade. How much? Hell if I knew.

I just knew that Mom and I, spamming that technique together, could hack the Zetsu monster to pieces in a way that other attacks on it had utterly failed to achieve beforehand.

It took eight strikes—four from each of us, so two per "blade" of chakra—to hack the Zetsu fusion into manageably-sized chunks that were almost immediately obliterated in two massive bursts of orange flame.

Looking away from the light to keep from being flash-blinded, I was able to spot Obito still on the roof, breathing hard, and another figure to his right.

Asuma?

I waved, as soon as I cut myself off from Isobu's chakra and stopped glowing ominously. I mean, what the hell else should I have done?

With the Zetsu monster down, it seemed like everyone was coming out of the woodwork. I hadn't realized there were so many chakra signatures in the area, since the Zetsu thing had been blotting them out. Like stars compared to the moon—they were there, but if you looked at the bright spot for too long, you lost track of the smaller stuff.

Besides Mom, Obito, Asuma and Rin, I could easily pick out half a dozen other people I recognized in the crowd. Tsunade, a dark-haired girl who might've been Shizune, Yamaguchi-sensei, one of Katsuyu's smaller clones, Jiraiya, and that mid-sized battle toad Gama were all there. Kurenai appeared a moment later, her red eyes nearly luminescent with reflected firelight.

…Well, at least I only had to worry about S-ranked security clearance for some of them.

"WELCOME TO OUR GLORIOUS ARMY OF RE-CONQUERING KONOHA FROM THE ARMY OF UNYOUTHFUL PUPPET-MEN!" And then I jumped, because how the fishsticks did Gai manage to sneak up on me? I whirled on the spot, but not quite fast enough to avoid the friendly arm over my shoulders and subsequent one-armed hug.

While I was being half-strangled, the crowd of army irregulars finally had a chance to approach. Given that the average age of most of them was around fourteen, I had to wonder what the hell the rest of the standing shinobi forces were doing at a time like this. The whole freaking village was under attack!

"Haven't"—ack, Gai, let go!—"seen most of you in a while!" I managed, elbowing Gai in the ribs. He ignored it. "Class reunion?"

Asuma, having hopped down to street level with Obito, said, "Actually, we're here for the evil pudding-people." He pointed at the remains of the Zetsu fusion, which was slowly losing coherency and morphing into pretty much exactly what he'd said.

"Could've sworn that most of our age group wasn't supposed to be on the streets." Obito said, looking at everyone with a speculative expression. "Asuma, what happened?"

"Before or after these things showed up?" Asuma made a show of seeming unconcerned, but I caught a hint of shakiness in his voice. His jaw clenched.

"Popped by the kiddie corner to find out half the barrier team in that area was dead. The other half was getting eaten." Jiraiya said, coming up behind Asuma and giving him a gentle thump on the shoulder with his loosely curled fist. "You did what you could."

"Tch." Asuma shrugged off the contact and went back to brooding, but at least I knew to sympathize.

"So we have created a small army of volunteers to clear the infestation while the rest of the village defeats the masses of them!" Gai finished explaining, finally letting go of me and spinning me around in place so that he could grasp both of my shoulders and say, quite seriously, "Your mother has explained that she will lead one team, while Tsunade-sama and Jiraiya-sama will lead others. Which one will you join, Keisuke-chan?" He glances up. "Obito-kun?"

"I'm going with Mom." I said, glancing at her to confirm and getting a nod in return. "Obito's coming with me."

Obito shrugged. "I was just gonna say that. How's everyone else split up? Jiraiya-sama?"
"Raise your hands if you're with me." Jiraiya ordered, instead of letting everyone do a full roll-call.

Yamaguchi-sensei, Asuma, Kurenai, Gama and one of Katsuyu's clones (since the first one had split in the last ten seconds to form two smaller slugs) raised various appendages.

"And Tsunade-hime?" Jiraiya prompted.

Rin, Shizune, and a new figure—Aoba? —all raised their hands. Sort of an overconcentration of medics, there, but we could deal with that and Tsunade wasn't much for bleeding wounds at this stage.

"The rest"—Gai, Obito, and a third Katsuyu clone (since the second one split again) all indicated compliance there—"are with Miyako-san. We're splitting into a bunch of smaller teams since now everyone's got a heavy-hitter."

Presumably, he meant Tsunade, himself, and me.

"So, what, we're just gonna hit the nearest Zetsu until it cries?" Obito asked.

"More like until it turns into white paste." Jiraiya corrected. "No quarter."

Not like we needed to be told that.

"Each Katsuyu clone is your portable medical assistant." Tsunade informed us, once we were all quiet. "Don't lose her."

After a second's thought, I picked up the nearest Katsuyu clone, who was about the size of a loaf of bread, and put her on my flak jacket's left shoulder pad. Slugs were slimy in all worlds, but Katsuyu wasn't unpleasantly so. Just sort of cool, and maybe a bit squishy. I could put up with it in exchange for instant healing.

"Might wanna give her to someone else, Kei-kun." Jiraiya suggested. "Preferably someone who does fewer flips."

Oooooor maybe someone whose main contribution to a fight didn't involve the use of corrosive chakra. I could probably regenerate to some extent anyway, right? And since the "flip" comment disqualified Gai… "Okay. Here, Obito."

In short order, the Katsuyu clones were hanging out on Kurenai, Rin, and Obito respectively. Good enough. I had to dismiss Tsuruya, though—her eyesight was shit in the dark, and anyway she'd been using her powers all day.

We didn't do the football thing, like yelling "break!" to signal that we were all ready to go, but we split into three groups to get to business anyway. First stop for my group: the Uchiha District.

Thanks to the fact that most of the Uchiha clan and the nearby families tended to favor Fire Release techniques, the district was slightly smoldering by the time we got there. The buildings were fine, but any White Zetsu that had been found had also been torched, meaning that the streets were covered in burning, melting mayonnaise-men. While there were a few people who had tried cleaning up, melted shovels seemed to turn public opinion against the idea.

I didn't even want to ask what the burn ward was going to have to say about casualties around here.

Mom led the way into the district via rooftops, which meant that the first person we encountered was a shinobi.

Specifically, her chakra said "Honoka Uchiha" in bright neon letters, so I was a little hesitant to say anything to draw attention to myself. She was in full ANBU uniform, complete with the black cloak that captains tended to wear, and her mask was marked with long vertical strokes of red paint, indicating that her call-sign was "Badger," exactly like her summon.

I wasn't sure if that was something that ANBU did deliberately, or if she'd gone out and found a summoning contract to match her mask.

"ANBU-san, we're here under orders from the Hokage." Mom said in her command voice, which was in a lower register than I could pull off. "Point out the enemy and we'll reinforce your attack on it."

Honoka seemed to give me a long look, ignoring Mom entirely. Then she looked at Mom, whose chakra was steadily creeping upward from "battle-ready" to "killer ready to pounce," which had everyone else looking at her as well.

"We're waiting." Mom said in a flat tone, devoid of patience.

Behind me, I could feel Gai and Obito close ranks with me even if they didn't know what was going on. Gai hadn't been involved in that mission and Obito had been resting in the hospital, so it might've seemed like unexplained hostility to them.

Honoka had a reason to be pissed off at me, but not enough to fly with Mom.

Honoka nodded, turning away from us and leaping to the next rooftop. Without much else to do—though I could sense the Zetsu fusion easily enough, I wasn't supposed to go stepping on anyone's toes—we followed her all the way to the Military Police outpost that was closest to the northern gate into Konoha. There, a twelve-meter Zetsu combination monster was being alternately set on fire by the remaining MPs or having its ankles hacked at by Uchiha clan members of various other affiliations.

I heard Obito inhale sharply—these people were his coworkers. I had no idea how to gauge how many had died, since I didn't know any of them, but Obito clearly had an inkling.

"Can you seal fire?" Honoka asked me in a sharp tone, looking down at the scroll holsters on my belt all of a sudden.

Without specific allowances for Amaterasu's ever-burning flames that consumed normal fire? "Not if you're gonna do what I think you're gonna do."

Down at street level, someone using an unusual weapon—is than an axe?—had hacked one of the Zetsu fusion's legs off and was trying to get at the body's vital organs while the creature hopped around on one leg for a while. Little did he know that the Zetsu clones, as a rule, didn't have any, meaning that big techniques and decapitation were the way to go.

"It looks like you have the situation under control." Mom said, her voice dry as dust. "It must be much easier to find the enemy when they're so obvious."

Mom? Might not want to pick a fight with the ANBU captain, even if she really doesn't like me.

"I think we should leave you two to figure out jurisdiction." Obito piped up, still looking down at the wreck that had once been the MPs' northern outpost. "Kei, Gai? Let's finish that one off. He's not getting anywhere."
The axe-wielding shinobi had progressed to playing whack-a-mole with the Zetsu fusion's heads, though he wasn't making any headway.

I nodded at Obito and dropped down to street level, while Gai darted to and fro to get a better look at the downed Zetsu monster.

While he did that, I took stock of our new set of allies.

In the street behind the axe-wielding lunatic with zero risk-assessing skills and an epic red mustache, there was a small posse of shinobi I hadn't really noticed before. They weren't glowing red, which meant they were probably free of any Zetsu infiltrators.

I drew my katana anyway, but held it loosely at my side. The Zetsu combo-monster wasn't going anywhere, not once Obito opened up and set the entire creature on fire. Honoka hopped off the roof and added her reddish-white flame to the pyre after a moment's pause, and Mom joined us after that.

Was it really that unusual to have someone who could torch the whole monster at once? Apparently so.

I went back to assessing the "crowd." Off the top of my head, I could pick out two Uchiha clan members who looked kind of familiar, but the rest were new to me. Too old to be in my age group, but too young to be in Mom's for the most part. Maybe they were MPs?

Gai wandered over, since it wasn't advisable to kick flaming monstrosities (no matter that he'd probably do so as an adult), and said brightly, "Enomoto-san, Maekawa-san! How glorious to see you again in our time of need!"

The guy whose mustache probably had knives in it turned around and saluted Gai, grinning with the axe slung over his shoulder. "Gai-kun! I was worried you wouldn't be able to join in the fun."

Maekawa was apparently the teal-haired kunoichi near the front of the group, who adjusted her glasses before saying, "I'd have expected that you'd be considered underage, Gai-kun."

"So...who're your friends?" I asked, since it wasn't like I had anything else to do.

"Ah, these two are Natsuki Maekawa and Nori Enomoto!" Gai said cheerfully, indicating each of them in turn.

Natsuki looked vaguely familiar, but I wasn't quite sure where I'd seen her before. I would have probably have remembered the war-hammer she used as a weapon—most weapons, as far as I could tell, didn't tend to have a decal forged into the metal. Hers looked like a sideways colon with a capital D under it—a rather worryingly happy symbol, given that it was also weeping whitish gunk that probably used to be inside a Zetsu clone. She was shorter than I was, and probably shorter than the haft of her weapon, though it didn't seem to bother her.

Nori was equally short—unusual for adult men—and had the aforementioned epic mustache with some serious metal-work woven into it. It was like Cousin It had decided to shave everything but the hair on his head, and as a result I couldn't tell what eye color he had under the ginger mane. The axe he used was about the size of Gai's whole torso, which was another one of those things that seemed kind of impossible until you saw it in real life.

"That doesn't tell me how you know them." I said blankly.

"We are neighbors, Keisuke-chan! We have trained for great strength and endurance on many occasions!" Gai enthused. "It is good to see that many villagers have nonetheless escaped the enemy and are fighting back!"

I was about to say something, possibly to congratulate the newly-identified fellow fitness enthusiasts who somehow survived Gai’s training regimen, but I lost momentum before I even started. Obito had walked up next to me and, instead of the Gai-like happiness at finding clan members alive and well that I expected from him, just gave an irritated grunt upon spotting the two Uchiha men in the group.

"Obito?" I said blankly, but he shook his head. Katsuyu slid up his shoulder and peered at us with her stalk-eyes, trying to figure out what was going on and failing.

So I gave the Uchiha men a second look.

Where…?

Obito sighed. "It's Yoshi and Matsumaru, Kei."

I did a sharp double-take, while the two of them snickered.

I hadn't actually seen Obito's childhood bullies in years, though the repercussions of their existence had pretty much made up the first year of our acquaintance outside of school. I mean, Matsumaru and Yoshi had stopped being relevant at about the time that Obito and I became Minato’s students for realsies. After the Sorayama C-rank and the Chūnin Exams, but before we actually got promoted.

I never really considered that these two would consider still bothering Obito after his "death."

Yoshi was the shorter of the two, with a large, round nose that was somewhat unusual among Konoha citizens and short-trimmed black hair. He had dark eyes, like pretty much every Uchiha in existence, but I wasn't sure if he had activated his Sharingan. I mean, I could have checked in with Sensei about it—theoretically—but the inability to muster a single damn to give had kind of made me forget.

The taller, lankier one was Matsumaru. In the years since I'd cared if he existed, he'd let his hair grow out and tied a braid off with a white ribbon at the bottom. He had the Sasuke/Izuna-like pale complexion and an unlined face, along with a wide, full mouth that seemed to be built for sneering (like he was doing at that moment). He was also a fair bit prettier than I was, in a way that I generally expected more from the Hyūga clan.

I tilted my head to one side, trying to decide if I wanted to retroactively punch their teeth in or not. Or, more importantly, if Obito wanted me to try it.

Obito shook his head. "It's all right"—more laughter from Yoshi and Birdo here—"really."

Then what was with the continual creepy laughter?

…Waaaaaait a minute. Wait a goddamn minute. This was straight out of the childhood bully playbook. I couldn't really remember why I got that feeling, but I did know that I'd seen it used before and had thought it was petty a long time ago.

No.

Establish dominance!

I was about to follow through on that, which probably would have resulted in a suspension because Yoshi and Matsumaru were likely a rank lower than I was and we were in public. It probably would have taken the edge off the bad mood I was in, though.
And then a clear contralto voice cut through it all and snapped, "Yoshi, Matsu, shut the fuck up."

Though I couldn't see her face, Honoka felt annoyed. "Take the juvenile pissing match somewhere else." She jerked her chin. "Chiharu, get over here and be useful. Enomoto, Maekawa, calm down."

"ANBU-san—!" And that was as far as Yoshi got.

Honoka ignored him and gestured to Mom, who was doing the thing where her chakra was nearly strong enough to be visible thanks to the Second Gate. "Chiharu, you're with Gekkō. Enomoto, Maekawa, you too. Track down Kiyotaka on your way to the Inuzuka clan area."

I looked at Mom, who nodded.

That brought our roster up from me, Gai, Obito, Katsuyu, and Mom to all of the above plus Gai's sparring partners and a random Uchiha who looked a little out of his depth at best. I assumed that Honoka could rally enough other members of her clan and random neighbors, in addition to any other ANBU members she might have had waiting in the wings (whom I had not seen), and finally get the Uchiha district extinguished properly and root out all the goddamned Zetsu clones. If not… well, that was what the full counteroffensive was for.

I spared the ANBU captain a backward glance before we were off to fight the next Zetsu monster in the village.

She didn't look back.

---

Something's wrong. Isobu said, when we were about halfway to the fourth giant marshmallow distraction.

I killed my forward momentum by landing on a water tower for somebody's apartment. It had been maybe an hour since the mission started, and two more Zetsu monsters had been violently disassembled by both my team and by others, with the occasional death roars being audible from across the village as they occurred.

What is? I asked him, as my team—new team, whatever—slowed down and then hopped a few rooftops to get back to me.

While Isobu prodded experimentally at his link to Kurama, I sat down on the top of the water tower and peered through the night at the cityscape. We were making progress, occasionally in spite of ourselves, and the glowing Zetsu clones weren't presenting much of a challenge when you could pick them out like a bunch of white whales on a black backdrop. Well, the monster Zetsu was over…yep, over by the Nara clan. It was probably getting dismembered while we were just heading that way.

I let my thoughts drift a bit, more away from Isobu and toward my team.

Gotta say, Chiharu Uchiha didn't really have anything to recommend him. Typical Uchiha build, typical Uchiha skill-set, and no outstanding skills—aside from the Sharingan, which apparently didn't get much use since he was a bureaucrat. Who the hell was this Kiyotaka person that Honoka wanted him to find, anyway?

Isobu rumbled, in something like a warning. Kurama stopped responding to me.

Oh, not good.
"Mom, I think we're gonna have a problem”—because something going wrong with the Nine-Tailed Fox was a recipe for disaster—"if we don't already."

"How so?" Mom asked, hopping up onto the water tower with me. But she was facing the wrong way.

I, however, was looking down toward the city. And I saw all the red lights—Kushina highlighting where the White Zetsu clones were positioned—wink out. Even the gold-flecked red of the Zetsu monsters off in the distance.

…Fuck. I slid down off the water tower and peered out into the dark. Isobu, the Zetsu-warning system we had just cut out.

The two things are related. Isobu concluded.

Well, there's correlation and causation, and this is both. "Katsuyu, get in contact with Tsunade-sama. Something's happened to Kushina-san. Mom?"

Mom didn't say anything.

"Mom?"

Mom wasn't standing next to me anymore. She had descended to street level while I had been talking to Isobu, leaving me talking to empty air. What would…?

This was my neighborhood. I could even…see my house…

"Kei?" Obito's voice sounded like it was coming from above water.

He—he might have gone to the shelters, right? I-it's supposed to work like that. The kids hide behind major defensive seals inside bunkers and wait this kind of thing out. It happened during the Chunin Exam invasion!

The house's front door has been smashed open from the inside. I could see that much, once Mom disappeared inside.

But—but Jiraiya had said the seals were compromised by Zetsu clones. That was the only reason half my damned age group was out on the streets and rounding up the invaders as best we could. There couldn't have—where the hell was he?

I didn't really notice when I reached street level, but I found myself stumbling over something in the entranceway and stopping to pick it up.

Hayate hadn't gotten a katana yet. I mean, I'd taken until I was fourteen to get one, and I was probably in the middle of a growth spurt. Hayate wasn't—he wasn't even twelve—but he did have a sword.

Which was bent into an L-shape in my hands, right above the guard.

"Do your best to contact the Hokage, Katsuyu-chan." Obito said to the slug on his shoulder. He followed me through the front door a second later. His voice dropped when he surveyed the damage, and he put his hand against my back as though to hold me upright. "Kei, where is he?"

I wordlessly held the kodachi out to him. Or what was left of it. The ten centimeters closest to the tip of the blade were coated in orange-flecked white Zetsu gunk.
"Another team's just arrived—Tsunade-sama—!"

I didn't hear any of whatever else Chiharu was trying to say.

I pushed past Obito and headed back out to the street. There were more people than there should have been, but I didn't care. Mom was in the house, but she wouldn't find Hayate. I couldn't feel him. And if she did find him in there, I didn't want to look. There was no way—and I bit down on the nascent scream of rage before it could start.

I was going to find my brother, and I was going to track down whoever had taken him away. And then I was going to kill the everliving fuck out of everything that tried to get into my way for the rest of the night.

All that escaped my throat was a monstrous growl that owed its depth and resonance to Isobu. The rage, though? That was all me.

"Kei, we can't leave everyone right now." Obito reminded me, with a healthy dose of hesitation.

I couldn't even begin to articulate how little I cared about that in the moment.

"Kei, don't make me do this." Obito's eye was wide and blazing red, his Sharingan spinning.

I didn't give him a second glance after that. It would have cut everything short.

I had already bitten my nails to the quick several hours ago, making them bleed just slightly. Maybe a drop of blood had been lost between then and the moment I decided that Sensei's order could go hang. Obito might've been my handler, or maybe my leash, but he wasn't really the boss of me.

Holding my brother's bent kodachi limply in my left hand, I felt Isobu's chakra spread throughout my body in a flood. In another few seconds, that chakra leaked out from my chest at first before coating me in a foot-thick combat aura that might've started trying to dissolve me. With a thought, I drew on Isobu's chakra and gave it a twist, solidifying the energy into a projected shape.

Obito backed away. I stood up straight and examined my upper arms with a sort of detached curiosity. They were guarded by solid chakra manifestations—fragments of Isobu's spiky shell—that attached to my shoulders like old samurai armor. As I watched, the armor spread downward and covered my forearms as well, without restricting my movements.

Heh. My first partial transformation and no tails were involved at all! I'd honestly expected to go all V2 chakra cloak and immediately murder the nearest thing with a pulse.

"Kei, don't do this." Obito pleaded, his voice cracking in the middle.

I turned to look at him.

Rin was next to him, her brown eyes wide and dark with fear. She refused to cry or panic, but tension was writ large in every line of her body and her jaw was clenched tightly. Her hand was clasped in Obito's normal one, and she didn't back away as I looked at her like she was some kind of bug. I didn't even know when she'd arrived, but there wasn't a single scrap of her that could take me in a fight and I knew it.

Obito seemed somehow older, with a set to his jaw and body that made his own fear obvious. His eye remained its normal plain black instead of the Sharingan's red I expected, and he seemed to be crying in spite of himself. He was afraid, so terribly afraid, and in the grip of Isobu's chakra and my own pain it didn't matter.
Distantly, I noticed that everyone aside from Obito and Rin had elected to keep their distance.

And...and the only reason everyone was acting like this was because of me. Me and my stupid lack of self-control. Me and my anger.

Me and my fear.

I didn't do or say anything for a long moment, frozen by their scrutiny and their bravery in spite of the danger I represented to everyone around me.

"I'm not going on a rampage." I told them, before stopping and blinking in startled surprise at how deep my voice had become with Isobu's influence. I tried to start again, wondering how I could have come so close to losing my shit entirely. Hayate was missing—and I could still feel my blood boil at the thought—but I could still do something. I could still rely on other people to do something.

Then something very odd happened.

Mom emerged from the house. Mom spotted everyone else.

