Summary

Immediately following the events of The Last Jedi, the battle for the galaxy continues between the First Order and the last of the Resistance. As the new Supreme Leader takes the throne, the First Order is focused on finding and destroying all who oppose them. The Resistance had disappeared into hiding and desperation has forced them to explore the gray areas of war. Meanwhile, on opposite sides of the war, Rey and Kylo Ren are forced to face the realities of their bond, their complicated relationship, their loyalty to their causes, and their understanding of the Force. Could their star-crossed connection be tied to the fate of the galaxy?

Notes

This is the slowest slow burn to ever slow burn! Enemies to friends to lovers. This story continues the arcs and themes beautifully woven through the Last Jedi, as well as continues... the narrative from the previous two trilogies. All plot elements are intended to be canon-compliant in the Star Wars universe through TLJ. This is 100% completed. I want to thank my betas Meauxwalk and ReadingAlltheBest, who have gone above and beyond to help. I also want to thank the readers who took the time to read this and leave such beautiful comments. I appreciate you all.

For questions regarding ratings, triggers, spoilers, or just to stop in and say hello, email me at EdenWoodsParker@protonmail.com.

Update 17/2/20 - This is the (original) E rated version. There is a T rated version I'm uploading (about six chapters per day). Find it here: https://archiveofourown.org/works/22766263/chapters/54401605.

Update 18/3/20 - Thank you to my sister Wren for the picture collages for each chapter.

Update 24/3/20 - Para mis lectores españoles, por favor vean esta increíble traducción de Force Destiny por Girlfantasia en Wattpad -https://www.wattpad.com/story/216205978
Hi, making your way through the dusty corners of the internet, you've stumbled upon Force Destiny! I started this shortly after TLJ, and it definitely took longer than expected to finish. I tried to adhere as closely to the themes and arcs I noticed in TLJ, as well as the OT and PT. I just needed to get this all out as it dealt with some very personal topics for me. I'm sorry about the format, I am unenlightened to the ways of social media and barely figured out how to post this. Thank you to the talented Meauxwalk and ReadingAlltheBest for their brilliant help as betas. I appreciate you so much! Thank you to my readers, especially the ones that have stuck with me as I slowly posted this. Enjoy!

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
A long time ago in a galaxy far, far away…

The FIRST ORDER had been weakened with the recent command acquisition by Kylo Ren, resulting in the unlikely escape of the RESISTANCE from what should have been a certain victory for the FIRST ORDER in their mission to seize military control of the galaxy.

Despite the victory, Leia Organa’s RESISTANCE was in shambles. After suffering extensive losses at the Battle of Crait, the remaining members narrowly escaped with the aid of Rey’s growing Force powers. Fleeing through hyperspace aboard the Millennium Falcon, they were in search of a new base, safe from the reaches of the FIRST ORDER.
Following the loss of Jedi Master Luke Skywalker and Supreme Leader Snoke, the fate of the galaxy was left in the hands of two young Force-users who shared a vital secret. Rey, the last hope for the RESISTANCE, and Kylo Ren, the dark lord of the FIRST ORDER, both sought to recover and rally their fracturing causes before they clashed in the final battle for the fate of the galaxy...
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
I'll destroy her.

Kylo Ren stormed down the dark corridor of the Finalizer, returning to his private chambers after their failure – his failure – to decimate the Resistance on Crait. Five hundred and seventy-two more steps until he reached the refuge of the small space in the galaxy that was truly his. He could finally be alone. Ironic, that he held the entire galaxy in his grasp, yet a few walls and a bed were somehow the only part left that felt his own. That sentiment disgusted him, but it was a weakness he could train out of himself easily enough.

As Supreme Leader, he had a choice of any quarters in the ship, of course. The general's quarters were more spacious and centralized in location; he could demand that Hux relinquish them to him, and he would feel no remorse in vacating the old ones. There were far more significant disputes, however, to engage in with his general. It had nothing to do with his sentiment; it was practical. His quarters suited him fine and provided him an advantage. Hidden away, they added an extra obstacle to Hux's constant tabs on him. Four hundred and two more steps – closer to his place to shut out the galaxy and farther from his failures on Crait.

At first, he had been consumed with short-sighted, foolish despair when she had shut him out. Then his father's dice had disappeared, reminding him that he was alone again. No, not again; he had always been alone. It should have been painful, but all he felt was... relief. As the light inside him flickered out, he was hit with a liberating realization; the light he had felt inside himself had been hers, not his. When she shut out the bond, she had shut out the light.

Kneeling in supplication – and defeat – in that base on Crait and alone in the passenger compartment of his Upsilon-class command shuttle, he had accepted that she was gone. She didn't want him, and he didn't need her. He was better off without her. With the agony of her betrayal and finality of their broken bond, he found the comfort of darkness. The whispers of the darkness – words in his own voice that sounded decidedly too much like his fallen master – reminded him of his path. He had failed, but he hadn't strayed from his purpose. The fate of the galaxy rested on his shoulders. As with every obstacle he had overcome, this loss had to befall him for his destiny to be realized.

His destiny was within his grasp, but the war was far from over. Skywalker's stunt had made him appear weak. The Resistance would undoubtedly seek to rebuild quickly to best exploit his weaknesses, and the First Order was hesitant to accept him as their leader after his failure, but he would prove his worthiness to them all. Crait had only pushed him to become stronger, shaping him in his grandfather's image. He would destroy her. The Resistance had been in his grasp, but she had helped them all escape—in Han Solo's ship, no less. She had shut him out as if he had wronged her; as if betraying him and leaving him for dead, after he spared her life, wasn't enough. Snoke was wrong. Killing her wouldn't complete his path to the dark side. No, he should thank her. What she did for him was far greater. If Skywalker started him on this path that fateful night, then she finished it in the throne room.

I offered her everything, still, she betrayed me. Just like Han Solo. And Leia. Skywalker. Snoke. She was wrong. I am alone. No one can stand in my way. No one can take this away... this hatred. I will not stop until I destroy her. All of it. This is my destiny.

The resolution was empowering. Kylo had never felt more certain of anything in his life. The more he contemplated it, the calmer he felt. This conviction was new and... satisfying. He felt, dare he believe it, no conflict. This was the closest he had come to peace in as long as he could remember. There were no voices in his head, no opposing emotions. There was only cold, powerful darkness.

Resolute nothingness.

Kylo hesitated on his course to his quarters as a sharp pain spread through his chest. It was concerning because it was not a physical pain. He sensed profound despair with a bitter aftertaste of failure – a condition he had become well acquainted with throughout his life. It was oppressive and desperate in nature, curious only in its divergence from his current contradictory resolution. His eyes narrowed as he held his breath, waiting... for what, he wasn't certain. A fleeting sensation in the Force passed through his consciousness. The source echoed with eerie, dreadful familiarity. Before he could probe into this disturbance, it disappeared, and the emptiness returned. He continued walking slowly, stubbornly determined to maintain his current emotional state, rather than analyze the possibilities of the abnormal disruption in the Force. As he focused on his emotions, his conviction returned.

"Ren!"

The peaceful feeling was short-lived. It always was. He dropped his head and sighed quietly as annoyance crept up his spine. "General Hux," he acknowledged, without turning to face him. "There are thousands of others to irritate on this ship. Find one willing to tolerate you."

"I warned you, Ren!" the general sputtered, stomping down the corridor toward him. "Luke Skywalker, the most wanted man in the Galaxy, was within our grasp! And you..."

"Skywalker is dead," Kylo sneered, his patience with the other man veil thin. He was all too aware that the edges of his emotional wounds were far more loathingly raw – exposed and fragile – than he was willing to admit. And if anyone could elicit a sharp physical reaction from him, it was his vexing subordinate. He could not afford another embarrassment in front of the First Order; his weakness and instability were all too evident in his lapse of judgment and focus on Crait. If he did not render a strong, intimidating presence, a mutiny would strike at the first drop of blood, the first sign of vulnerability. “I have felt the change in the Force. You should be with your officers celebrating this victory,” he continued flatly. “Preferably as far away from me as physically possible.”

"Your personal interests have cost the First Order victory. The Resistance escaped. They were cornered. Defeated. Your emotions clouded your better judgment. Again! Your allegiance to the First Order is questionable at – "

“Is it?” Kylo's resolve to maintain a composed, dispassionate front lasted mere seconds. Hux was quite skilled at provoking his reactive nature. Kylo didn't bother turning to face his general, instead, he stared down at his clenched fist, reveling in the quiet choking sounds emanating from behind him.

“Careful, Hux; your assertions could be... misinterpreted as treason. I am your Supreme Leader; be mindful not to forget that.” His hand shook as he mercilessly manipulated the Force to constrict tighter around the man’s windpipe. Kylo's own breath hissed through gritted teeth as a sadistic thrill pulsed through his veins. When he felt the general's consciousness slipping away, he released him from his grasp. Kylo continued to his quarters – one hundred and thirty-five more steps – in apathetic disinterest, leaving the general in a coughing fit on the floor.

"Careful Ren," Hux whispered between gasps, staring daggers into the Supreme Leader's back as he walked away. Bracing himself on his elbows, he swallowed another cough, his ordinarily immaculately groomed hair falling loosely into his burning eyes. "Snoke is no longer here to protect you."
Chapter End Notes

Physical violence

Kylo Force-chokes Hux
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
The hum of the sublight engines of the Millennium Falcon as it navigated hyperspace was a constant reminder of what the Resistance was escaping from. The remaining survivors celebrated their narrow victory, choosing to temporarily overlook the desolate circumstances that held them all prisoner. Escape would only ever be temporary as the First Order’s grasp twisted perpetually farther into the galaxy.

Rey sat quietly in self-imposed isolation, reanalyzing each detail of the events aboard the Supremacy in aching litany. The two broken halves of Luke’s lightsaber lay cold and lifeless in her trembling hands. Upon her return to the Millennium Falcon, Chewbacca's wise words – advice she imagined had once been uttered by her hero Han Solo – helped her focus on the dire situation on Crait. Now her friends were safe, however, and she had nothing but time to agonize over her failure in the throne room.

Snoke had created a bridge between their minds; that was her only certainty. Had he manipulated their joint visions? Had the vile creature manipulated it to draw her into a trap? Or was that a lie? Had Kylo had created it himself? Had he been manipulating her through the bond since the moment it first opened? You’ll bring Luke Skywalker to me, he had said in their first connection. After he realized his Force trickery wouldn’t produce the desired results, had he employed another method? Either way, she had been foolish enough to fall for it.

Rey had unwisely believed Kylo had turned when he killed Snoke. She had felt the connection between them when they fought the guard together. Her mistake was trusting him. She had begged him not to turn back to the darkness – not to turn his back on her – but he wouldn't listen, because he didn't care. She had been naïve, believing in the vision, that the light she had felt in him was enough. It was all a lie.

Kylo’s singular mission from the moment she first met him was to find Luke. The touch of his hands, the words he knew she longed to hear, the softness of his voice – it was a trap to gain access to her knowledge of the map. And by crossing the galaxy in hope of saving him, she had given him exactly what he needed. If Luke hadn’t given his life confronting his nephew to save the Resistance, then Kylo would have found him. He would never have chosen her, because she was nothing to him.

In the throne room, she had believed as he lay unconscious that her failure stemmed from not anticipating the strength of the hold the darkness had over him. His actions on Crait proved her wrong. Not only had he stood by as their ships were destroyed, but he actively chose to kill them all. If her vision had been real, he would have turned; he would have helped them end the war. He chose to double down on his evil instead.

Shutting that door – on him, their bond, and her hope in him – had been more difficult than she had ever anticipated, but it changed nothing. There was no saving him. The more the day’s events replayed in her mind, the more she felt certain of it. Even if she could turn him, she didn't want to try anymore. The misery she felt in her failure wasn’t worth it. She had never needed anyone; she certainly didn't need him, and the Resistance didn’t need him to win the war. Leia had said that they had everything they needed to win, and Rey believed her because she had hope. Rey didn’t hate him for behaving like the monster he had become. She wasn’t angry at him, but with herself for believing him. Ben or Kylo, she had to forget him. All that mattered was that the good side prevailed. The fate of the galaxy hung in the balance; the Resistance had to win the war.

If we have to go through him to do it, so be it. He chose this path.

Rey tried her best to suppress the conflict tearing her insides to shreds as she watched Leia address the remaining survivors. The woman had survived the loss of her parents, her entire planet, her husband and her twin brother. Her son had betrayed her in the worst imaginable way, and he was all but lost to her. Yet Leia stayed strong; she smiled, her eyes were filled with hope.

Rey was in no mood to celebrate, however. While the others were distracted by reliving their harrowing escape, she silently slipped away before the tears in her eyes would betray her. The others were ignorant of the secrets behind those tears, and she intended to keep it that way. She wandered the rounded halls of Han’s ship, the echoes of memories still imprinted on the walls. If she listened hard enough, she could almost hear the ghosts of happier times. Kylo had wandered those same steps as a young boy before he threw it all away.

*Why? Why would you turn your back on everything I have ever wanted? I saw you on the floor on Crait. I saw the remorse in your eyes. Have you finally realized – too late – what you have done?
Or do you only regret that we escaped? Who are you, truly?*

As she rounded a corridor, she jerked to a stop as the galaxy dropped away from under her. The peripheral sound faded away, and there was a sharp tug at the base of her neck. She felt that stomach-churning rippling of his presence in the Force.

No, please don't do this, she begged the universe. This was supposed to be over! You can't do this to me again! The Force did not answer, save for the buzzing of energy around her, like electricity in the air. Rey stared at the floor of the corridor, noticing that it gave way to a smooth black surface that didn’t belong on the Millennium Falcon. She couldn’t bring herself to meet the eyes of the man she knew would be there; she couldn’t confirm her worst fears.

“I am Kylo Ren,” a voice said in the space between them. It sounded nothing like the one that had promised she wasn’t alone. “I am the Supreme Leader. I will destroy the Jedi and the Resistance. I will bring order to the galaxy.”
Reluctantly, Rey raised her eyes from the floor.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You’ve been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo stormed into his quarters, tossing his cape across the room. Red salt still clung to the underside of the fabric where he had dropped it, a tangible reminder of defeat. He wished the dust was permanent, to remind himself of his past failures whenever he wore it. The scars would do.

Rey had bested him on Starkiller; Luke had on Crait – both wielding his emotional weaknesses against him. Never again. His rage would suffocate every last emotion inside him until there was nothing left; the darkness would free him.
Kylo stopped short at the foot of his bed. There were nondescript boxes piled neatly on the floor. Removing a top, he recognized the items as personal belongings he had with him aboard the Supremacy. The droids had been quick to gather them from the wreckage and deliver them to his chambers, the only proof that he had not dreamed it all. His mind had been so fixated on the events on Crait, he had forgotten that the Supremacy had been damaged.

He hadn't thought to question why he was back aboard the Finalizer. It was almost as if he hadn't killed Snoke, as if his master was merely on the Supremacy, waiting to train the weaknesses out of him. He had known Snoke was gone, of course. There was no denying the freedom he felt at becoming the only voice in his own head, but in that moment, reality finally sank its teeth deep into his flesh. A chill shuddered down his spine.

Snoke was dead. Forever. He was not aboard the Supremacy, waiting for Kylo. He would not hold his once-apprentice accountable for his failures again. Kylo was the master now. He was the Supreme Leader of the First Order. This kingdom was his... and his alone. Darkness swirled through him at the thought of the insurmountable power. A weight lifted off his chest. Forget Rey, the bond, Luke, his mother, the Resistance – he finally had everything he had ever wanted. He had done it; this was real. The boxes before him proved that.

Striding to the boxes against the far wall, he opened the lid to discover that the droids had left him Snoke's belongings as well. Scrolls, ancient texts, a holoprojector, a ring, and... and Kylo's broken helmet. He kept it? A sickening disgust rolled through him at the sight of it.

You're just a child in a mask, his fallen master had said, knowing how profoundly it would wound him, how weak it would make him. It was with those words that he had realized that he was Snoke's rabid cur.

“I'll show them a child in a mask,” he promised to the empty room. “Just as I showed him.”

The helmet had crumpled under the force of his blows, twisted and split into pieces. Now, without the bond, he was stronger. Unstoppable. He would make this mask stronger too. As broken as he had once been, it would show the galaxy exactly who he was now. The mask would also grant him an escape from the shadow of legends. Once the Resistance was gone, his identity would be unknown. Ben Solo would be dead. Kylo Ren would be the ruler the galaxy remembered, his actions speaking louder in his anonymity. He was anyone... and no one... exactly what the galaxy needed—exactly what he had always wanted to be.

Kylo didn't need this helmet, of course. He could have another one created from the finest materials in the galaxy. But this one... rebuilding this one would show the Resistance that Kylo
Ren had been tempted by the light of a nothing scavenger, but he had been made stronger. The helmet would show her that she had failed to turn him… or destroy him. He had been a fool, believing…

It doesn't matter anymore, he reminded himself. What mattered was that she had betrayed him, and he had finally found his place in the darkness. Now he was greater than even his master had imagined. He would show them all the monster that they had created, and this time he would destroy them all.

Kylo brought the mask into the receiving hall of his antechambers. A black, stone throne commanded the center of the vast room. It was simple in its design compared to the ornate ostentatiousness of the one located in Snoke's throne room on the Supremacy, but it served its purpose. Before he died, Snoke had used the room to keep his apprentice under his thumb from across the galaxy. It was a constant reminder that he was never too far out of reach. Kylo had been required to attend to his master's projection in that receiving hall whenever Snoke deigned to appear. During the periods of punishment for a weakness, Snoke had often been the only contact he had for days or weeks.

His failure on Starkiller had prompted a more severe punishment, earning him a stay on the Supremacy instead, but it was the same method. Locked away in his chambers, his Knights purposely sent away on missions across the galaxy, he had been isolated from everyone. That was how Rey had the opportunity to tempt him in the first place, though he supposed that had been his master's intention all along.

Kylo climbed the dais and released a slow exhale as he stared at the throne. It's mine. His fingers trailed over the smooth surface; the stone was cold under his touch. Steeling his nerves, he lowered himself with a tentative stiffness onto the throne he had sacrificed everything to possess.

He sat rigidly, waiting. For what? He wasn't sure. A change, perhaps? An electric sensation in the Force? Something open, honest, and true that left him feeling as if he were exactly where he was meant to be, as he had felt in that hut when he touched... it didn't matter when he had felt it before. He craved to feel it again, in this place, where he knew he was destined to be. This was everything he believed he had ever wanted.

Only, he didn’t feel what he had expected. He was Supreme Leader. This was his throne. Yet, it felt wrong. It was like shoving a circular object into a square hole. Certainly, it fit, but there was an emptiness, a glaring incompatibility that could not be ignored.

What is wrong with me?
Shoving those thoughts away, he turned the broken pieces of the helmet over in his hand. It was barely recognizable; the metal had been twisted and crushed under the wrath of his profound rage. Still, it wasn't as damaged as his past. At least this was repairable.

Kylo manipulated the Force to unbend the metal first, working to smooth the gouges and depressions as best he could with the energy at his disposal. Then he ignited his lightsaber to haphazardly fuse the pieces back together, one fragment at a time. The plasma liquified the metal along the cracks, forming a fortified bond where the pieces fit together. Where the fractures had once shown weakness, the welds reinforced the mask, making it stronger than it had ever been before. The helmet itself was even more deformed; the edges binding the pieces were jagged and raised, the clean arcs of the silver embellishments were splintered and asymmetrical – unbalanced.

Kylo didn't care; the helmet had seen its fair share of damage in combat, and its battered resilience reflected his own. More importantly, it did nothing to detract from its anonymity or intimidating appearance. He was a creature of darkness after all. Kylo placed the helmet over his head, pressing the hinged mechanism to secure it. The servomotors sparked, creating small plumes of smoke from the damage he had wrought upon it. The voice modulator crackled and hissed as he spoke into it.

“I am Kylo Ren. I am the Supreme Leader. I will destroy the Jedi and the Resistance. I will bring order to the galaxy.”

A tingle of energy down his spine was his only warning before he heard a sharp gasp. His head snapped up to see her standing before his throne. Every muscle was paralyzed in shock. He blinked, as if she would disappear when he reopened his eyes, but she still stood before him in all her ferocity. His mind stalled, as it had the first time their bond had opened.

It's impossible... the bond was severed...

Time was frozen. Neither moved, nor broke their fierce stare. The only sound in the room was the echo of their heavy breaths – hers, shallow and quick, and his, hissing through the malfunctioning voice modulator of his crudely repaired helmet. He wouldn't be the first one to break and show weakness by giving voice to the thoughts in his mind. The air was heavy enough with their warring emotions that words were unnecessary; none were consequential enough to be spoken at that moment anyway.

After her initial shock faded, Rey's eyes narrowed, and she held his stare defiantly. It was as if their connection on Crait had resumed where it left off, but he would not yearn for answers to her betrayal as he had done then. He'd had time to step back and see the situation clearly – to see her for the liar, manipulator, and traitor that she was. He was a fool for trusting her and believing that she was different than anyone else he let in.
She had been convincing; he’d give her that. The most convincing one yet. Regardless, she had helped him in the long run, she had killed the last bit of light inside him. The darkness had hardened his weak, pathetic heart. He didn’t care anymore; he was better off alone. She was as good as dead to him. Judging by the fire in her eyes, the feeling was mutual.

Her entire body was tense, apoplectic, and he did not doubt that if she had access to a weapon, she would have chanced a futile attempt at firing at him again. Perhaps she would be more creative this time. She did have his lightsaber. From the very first time they met, she had never feared him, but he would change that. Her fearlessness was something he had once admired about her, but now he recognized it as the path to her downfall. After her betrayal, he saw through her lies, knew the true reason she didn't fear him; it was not her belief in her own strength, but her mistaken confidence in his weakness, his “conflict.”

Kylo would show them all the consequences of underestimating him. He would finish what his grandfather started. Nothing... nothing would stand in his way, especially not the aspiring Jedi standing in his path rather than by his side, currently staring boldly into the visor of his mask. She couldn't see the resolution in his eyes. He found both irritation and relief in that.

Kylo Ren.

The fear found him easily in the darkness. Her words... were in his thoughts. Kylo was quite familiar with voices in his head, but not hers. There was no mistaking it, however, the voice he heard was Rey's, he was certain of it. The bond – not only is it not broken, he realized; it's stronger. She hadn't shut out the bond, only closed the connection. Even if Snoke had created it, it superseded his death, therefore it had become the will of the Force. Kylo didn't know much about Force bonds, but he knew enough about the will of the Force to understand the significance of their connection, and the implications of its escalation.

With a jolt, she was gone, safe somewhere across the galaxy. She was never actually in the room with him, of course, but that was her choice. In denying him, she had fled back to them. He recognized exactly what ship she was still aboard, knowing the corridor she was standing in better than anyone. Desperate for air, he ripped off his helmet. Relief flooded his veins that their bond was still intact, but with its return came the ache in his chest that he had felt on Crait.

He tamped that down quickly, channeling the anger from her betrayal. I hate this bond, he reminded himself. I hate her. I will destroy her.

Had he not called that lightsaber when she ripped it away from him, she would have succeeded in killing him. She should have finished it when she awoke first, because he wouldn’t hesitate to kill her. The ache in his chest – it meant nothing. He would use it to become stronger. And the relief he felt at the return of the bond, that was only due to the gift the Force had presented him. She had used him to save the Resistance, now he would use her and their cursed bond to find them and destroy them all.

The split second before the darkness found him in his anger, he swore he could hear the gravelly chuckle of a man he hoped he would never hear again, taunting him with another proclamation of, amazing, every word of what you just said was wrong.

Kylo jumped to his feet, holding his breath in all-consuming fear. His eyes darted around the room, searching for another apparition. The room, the Force, his mind... was quiet. Shaking his head, he tried to convince himself it was a fearful hallucination. It's not real. It's impossible. He's dead. I felt it. Still, he found himself struggling to swallow. He couldn't shake the trepidation tightening in his throat.

See you around, kid, echoed tauntingly in his memory.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
The moment the connection closed, the tears began to fall. Rey had cried when she left the Supremacy, certainly. The wait in the escape shuttle for Chewbacca and the Millennium Falcon were the loneliest moments she had felt since she left Jakku. She had sobbed in fear for her friends who were losing their lives and for the man she had left unconscious on the floor of a broken ship.

That was before Crait, when Kylo revealed how evil he could be. Though it had been difficult to hate him in that last connection on that base, with his sorrowful eyes staring back at her, everything else had been lost in the urgency. It had been easier then – when her friends were in immediate danger – to push aside what had happened between them. She had never considered how painful it would be to see him again without that distraction. She most certainly had not considered seeing him again so soon.
Emotions she had successfully buried since she had left the Supremacy suddenly overwhelmed her the moment she saw his face—no, not face—mask. Not just any mask, but the mask she hadn’t seen him wear since the skyway when he killed his father on Starkiller. The longer he had gone without it, the more he seemed to transform back into Ben Solo. After all that transpired in the hut, she had every reason to have hope that he would turn. He had understood her, promised she would never be alone. She had been so certain he would turn.

The mask had left her with little doubt that he was any closer to Ben Solo now than when she first met him on Takodana, perhaps even further down the path of darkness. As painful as it had been to see him again, the mask made it easier to hate him. It made it easier to pretend it was only her enemy, Kylo Ren, not the short glimpse of the man she had thought was Ben Solo. Rey dreaded the day she would have to meet his burning stare again.

Kylo may have been lost to darkness, but she knew that whatever had happened to them on Ahch-To wasn’t over. It changed nothing. She had to let him go, so she could save the galaxy from his wrath. She had to let him go. If she ignored him long enough, perhaps whatever it was between them would fade. That meant she would have to ignore the aching pain that was tearing at her heart, making it difficult to breathe. It was worse now—the loneliness—but she would survive. She was good at it.

Rey was wandering aimlessly when she stumbled upon the cot containing the unconscious woman she had only glimpsed briefly after escaping Crait. Rey didn’t even know her name, how she had come to the Resistance, or why she was unconscious. The only thing that mattered was there was hope; she was alive. Finn had spent most of his time checking on her or sitting with her. She was clearly important to him.

Anyone important to him was important to Rey. Straightening the blanket over the woman, as she had watched Finn do, Rey wondered if moments like that were what having a family was like. She imagined that was how parents comforted their children when they were sick or had nightmares. She wondered if this young woman had parents, if they were missing her, or if she was missing them. She wondered who the woman was. Could she find family in her too?

Rey was so singularly focused on the unconscious woman that she hadn’t heard or felt anyone approach. “Her name is Rose,” the familiar, comforting voice said.

She dried her tears before turning around to face her friend. “Hey, Finn, I didn’t see you.”

“You okay?” he asked, wrapping her in a tight embrace. Finn gave the best hugs. It was everything she imagined she would feel if she’d had a family. It was soothing, centering, and warm, like the first meal in days. She released a long, slow exhale, and the tension drained from her body.

She smiled.

“I will be, I think. You?”

He released her from his embrace, but his arm remained around her back in support as he turned to stare down at Rose. “I will be when she wakes up, when I know you’re both safe.”

Rey studied the concern on his face before turning back to the woman. She knew that fear well; being across the galaxy from her friend when he was injured, without word from the Resistance about his condition, had been excruciating. Her apprehension hadn’t eased until she had found him alive and well on Crait. “What happened to her?”

Finn reached forward to straighten the perfectly arranged blanket. “She crashed her speeder into my speeder. It was my fault. She stopped me from flying my speeder into a battering-ram cannon on Crait. She saved my life.” Rey couldn’t hide her gasp as she turned to stare at him in disbelief. The news had blindsided her, viscerally terrified her; goosebumps crawled over her skin, and bile rose in her throat. Finn, her friend, – more than a friend, family – had almost... sacrificed himself. She was proud of him for finding his place in the Resistance, but she had almost lost the most important person in her life. He was her rock in this terrifying new place. What would she have done without him?

Rey turned back toward Rose, viewing the woman in a new light. Not only did she want the woman to live for her friend’s sake, but hers as well. She owed this stranger everything; she had saved her only family. “Then I am forever in her debt,” she said softly. “I can’t do this without you, my friend.”

Rey hugged him again, tighter, as if she could squeeze him strongly enough to erase the visions of losing him from her mind. On Ahch-To, she had been so concerned about him healing from what Kylo had done that she hadn’t thought about how it might have changed him. She could feel it now – how he had changed. He was braver and had found a purpose and belonging, but he was still the kind, caring man she had met on Jakku. “I’m sorry, I didn’t tell you until now,” he whispered.

“No, thank you for being honest with me,” she replied. It didn’t make her feel any better. Finn was nothing but honest with her, and she was hiding a secret that would break his heart. Kylo had almost killed him, and she had gone to him on the Supremacy. Tell him you’ll explain later, Chewie had suggested when she had tried to decide what to tell her best friend before putting her life in the hands of their enemy. But she couldn’t explain. Not only had she gone to the man who had tried to kill them all, she had failed, putting them all at risk, and Finn had nearly sacrificed himself because of it. Even worse, the danger hadn’t passed. Rey was still connected to their enemy.

Finn stepped out of her arms, grasping her shoulders tightly. “Rey, I need to tell you something else.”

“What’s wrong?” Rey studied his eyes for a clue, fearful of what she would find. His tone had sounded apprehensive. Whatever it was, it wasn’t good. After her confrontation with Kylo, she wasn’t certain how much more she could manage. What if something terrible had happened? What if they didn’t want her at the Resistance? What if they knew?

He exhaled slowly. “It’s just, you and Rose are both important to me, and I hope you can –“ “Anyone important to you, is important to me, Finn,” she said, hoping that was all it was. Perhaps Finn believed she would think Rose was replacing her as his friend. There couldn’t be anything further from the truth. She didn’t know Rose, but she trusted Finn. They could expand their family with more friends, it wasn’t a competition. There was nothing that could come between them.

Finn smiled, visibly relaxing.

“Good, good. I have a lot to tell you.”

I have so much to tell you too, she wanted to tell him. She couldn’t do it; she wasn’t strong enough, yet. One day, one day soon, he would know. “And I have all the time in the galaxy now,” she said instead.

Finn grabbed her hand, dragging her away from Rose. Rey happily allowed him to guide her to a nearby game table. Sitting down across from him, she was reminded of their trip from Jakku to Takodana. So much had changed, too much. Finn activated a switch on the table and holographic creatures popped up on the board. Finn was excited in a way that made her giggle. It didn’t require much to make him happy and Rey loved that about him. “I missed you,” he said, as he began a new game, “after everything that’s happened.”

“You have no idea,” she replied.
Rey smiled as Chewbacca passed by with a friendly growl on his way back to the cockpit. “Where are we going?”

“I don’t know,” he shrugged. “Far from here, I guess.”

I don’t care, as long as it’s as far from the First Order as possible.

As far from him as possible.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
"General Hux!"

The general's face appeared from the holovid projector. He cleared his throat nervously as he waited for Kylo to issue his command.

"Yes...Supreme Leader."

"Have your troops had success locating the Resistance?" Kylo knew he shouldn’t attempt to undermine the general. He knew he needed him as an ally, but he more desperately needed a distraction. The reemergence of the bond had created a nagging curiosity in the back of his mind,
"We believe they have fled to a planet on the outer rim. They are of little consequence now. Our flotillas have seized control over more systems as we speak. My army will..."

"Your army?"

"Your army of traitors and incompetent slaves?" Kylo sneered through gritted teeth. His disdain was evident, as was his general's. He knew it was a sore point of contention between them, but he continued to prod it.

“I will have you know, my father...” Hux began, but Kylo promptly interrupted him.

“Your father recruited the top of the class at the academy on Arkanis. They were strong, capable and loyal, as much as men of free will can be. But what you have done... you have enslaved children. You have indoctrinated them with propaganda, but that does not make them an impermeable unit. You are more foolish than I had previously assumed if you believe that servility prevents betrayal. We need to begin developments of a clone army; a clone army would be more efficient.”

Kylo suppressed a smirk as Hux's face pinched in contempt. “You are impossible to underestimate, Ren.”

“And you’re wasting my oxygen, General.”

“Open a holobook for once and read imperial history, before presenting your illogical desires for another clone army as some homage to your grandfather,” Hux spat. “The clone armies failed due to their genetic weakness. Biological weapons can easily destroy an army that shares the same DNA.”

Kylo’s anger seethed. He knew he was losing control over his volatile emotions and would likely regret it later, but he wouldn't stand for Hux's insubordination. “You want a historical holobook? Which one?” he began summoning thin, crystalline boards from an archive shelf in his quarters. “Pre-Republic Era?” The cerulean glowing holobook crashed into the wall, shattering as he threw it at Hux’s image. “Expansionist Era? Great Manifest Period?” He shoved them at the projection with aggressive force. The general sighed. “No? Indecta Era? Kymoodon Era? Pius Dea Era?

Irritation fractured through Hux’s haughty and calm facial expression. “Old Sith Wars? Inter Sith Wars? Draggulch period? Fall of the Republic era? Ah, here is your favorite: Imperial period,” Kylo mused, examining them for a moment, before throwing them at the projection as well. “Or what about this one, Hux? This one is a bit more specific. The Clone Wars. Years 22 to 19 BBY. Why don’t you take a look at that!” The general rolled his eyes at the shattering sound of more destruction at the hands of the Supreme Leader. “If you had bothered to read any of them, you would know that there have always been armies, because there have always been wars. There will always be wars! Enslavement and indoctrination of armies is no new concept, Hux; let there be no mistake about that. I would rather have an army whose sole weakness is a genetic susceptibility to biological weapons than an army with the weakness of potentially overthrowing the very leadership that commands it. An infallible army is what the First Order needs…”

As the rage simmered, Kylo remembered himself. He straightened, tempering his breathing.

"I know what the First Order needs... Supreme Leader," Hux growled.

Kylo slowly paced the floor, his hands behind his back, restraining himself from lashing out at the general again. He knew he had to maintain the upper hand with Hux, so he struggled to regain control. "Then you agree that the First Order and the civilizations we rule over require stability to progress. The army is the First Order's fist, used to crush anarchy. We need a strong hand of law. Clones obey the commands of the law. They are impartial. They ensure order. Anarchy, created by traitors like FN-2187, breeds disorder. If we wanted disorder, we could have remained under the stagnant, unstable, weak Republic. They were easily overtaken by their enemies because they could not maintain law. Without order and stability, you have no law. Your army is an infection on the underbelly of the First Order. Treason and mutiny breed in their ranks. That is not what the First Order needs."

The general was silent, his face reddened in anger. He swallowed his immediate reaction. "My army has its grasp in every star system in the galaxy. We will find them. And don't underestimate me, Ren. I have taken precautionary measures to protect the First Order from mutiny and betrayal."

"Ah, and what are those, Hux?"

"I will not bore you with the intricacies of forming an impermeable military unit, Ren, as you know little of how a dominant military is actually operated. Though I will have you know, I have taken great care to install certain redundancies. A mutiny inside my destroyer is impossible. The stormtroopers cannot access any of our systems. I have security cams everywhere. Someone is always watching your every move.” His tone insinuated that his statement was a warning...or a threat directed at Kylo.

Perhaps I should create my own redundancies.

“The possibility of a mutiny from another ship has also been eliminated. The Finalizer has master control over the computer systems of our entire fleet. If one of our destroyers attempts to commit mutiny, I can lower their shields and disable their internal weapons and defense systems. They would be defenseless against our counterattack. Do not underestimate me, Ren. I cannot be betrayed!”

Careful, Hux, those were Snoke's last words before I cut him in half.

“And my army is everything that a clone army could not be. We have outgrown the capabilities of the Empire. Their clone army was outdated and weak. My army will fight for our cause because they believe in it. They will search every star system until that ship is found; I promise you that, and then they will destroy them all, because they are the real power behind the First Order!” Kylo was pleased that they were not having this conversation in person, as he was positive spit was flying out of the other man's mouth in his frenzied state. Ignorant fool. He chose to drop the subject with him; the general was too blinded by pride in the army he created to appreciate their weaknesses. Having lost interest in arguing with his subordinate, Kylo extended an overture of truce.

"There is an easier way,” he said. “You can track them, General."

"Ren – Supreme Leader – We do not have the capability of tracking them through hyperspace! In the aftermath of Crait, we were unable to track their trajectory, and their ship does not have –" Kylo’s composure had been worn down by his condescending tone. Who do you think you're talking to! He slammed his hand on his desk, the Kriin-wood fracturing under his palm from the Force released.

"We do not need your technology, General! They escaped on the Mil... on a Corellian YT 1300F Light Freighter...Han Solo's ship. The Girodyne SRB42 sublight engines were modified, yielding multiple transponder codes. That makes it almost impossible to identify and track."

The general was quick to interrupt. “Exactly, which is why –”

“Unless,” Kylo said, staring at his subordinate conspiratorially as he walked around his desk, “you’ve worked on that piece of garbage, and you can recite every single one of those codes by memory.”

Hux grinned in understanding.
Mild violence.

Kylo is, well, Kylo and throws some things at Hux's projection.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey hadn’t consciously decided to isolate herself from her friends, but as she wandered the corridors, she was drawn to the comfort of the few empty spaces left aboard. It was odd – this dichotomy that Rey suffered. There was no privacy, no seclusion, no place of her own to think. Being in close quarters with so many different energies crowding the Force around her was new and exhausting. No matter where she went on the ship, there was someone else there, too. It was suffocating how trapped and overwhelmed she felt by the constant presence of others.

And yet, she felt achingly alone. The burdens she carried were heavy, but no one could ease them with acceptance. No one would understand – no one in the Resistance, at any rate. Those dangerous thoughts that she couldn’t share were proof of how alone she truly was. This cursed perdition of torment had no end in sight. She finally found solace in a vacant turret and curled up in a corner, watching the open space flash past through the viewports.
They will never understand me. How can I ever explain what happened? How can I explain that I went there to try to turn our enemy? How can I explain that he saved me, but I still failed? How do I explain to them that we’re connected? How do I explain this when I don’t understand it myself? They will think of me as a fool. A traitor. They will never trust me. This is a path I have to walk alone.

Closing her eyes, she could almost feel the dark, cold stream of overwhelming hatred surrounding him like a Force field. She could almost see him, stalking down a dark corridor. A calm but determined expression had settled on his features. His eyes, the windows to his ever-evolving emotions, were empty pools of darkness. Devoid of humanity. Evil.

It shook her to the core. Malice suffocated her, squeezing the breath from her lungs as it constricted her chest. She gasped as she struggled under the gravity of it. Darkness like venom pierced her heart, streaming steadily through her, devouring the light. These emotions were raw, sharp, and all-consuming. The most terrifying realization was that they did not belong to her. She didn’t know how, but she knew this was him. She could feel his hatred. Instead of pushing it away, she let it in, finding the darkness to hate him in return. There was a dark chuckle as she did, and that snapped her from her thoughts.

Her eyes opened to the familiar sight of the ventral turret on the Falcon. She felt like a cloud had passed in front of the sun, and, as quickly as it had appeared, it was gone. Her senses returned. The electric frequency of the Force, his frequency, was gone.

As she had spent countless hours before, she distracted herself by trying to reattach the two halves of her broken lightsaber. She released the broken crystals from the internal mechanism and rolled them over in her fingers dejectedly. A warm feeling radiated through her body as she caught a blue glow in the corner of her vision. She turned to see smiling, peaceful Luke, bathed in blue light.

"Luke?"

He chuckled. "I thought you might need a little more guidance."

She held out the two halves of his broken lightsaber to him. “Kylo and I did this,” she whispered. “I thought I could save him. I thought I could bring him back to the light. But all I caused was more destruction.”

“In my defense, I told you it wouldn’t turn out the way you hoped.” His voice was light and peaceful, a tone she had never heard from him before. As grateful as she was to see him, there was still a part of her that was still disappointed in him. He should have been there to teach her and guide her through this connection to her enemy. He should have taken his lightsaber and come back with her. She needed him now more than ever.

“I know you died with peace and purpose, but why?” she demanded, her anger was simmering just below the surface. “Why didn’t you help the Resistance escape? Why did you have to face him?

“I think you did just fine,” he said. There was a softness in his eyes she had never seen before. “Ben needed me more. He needed to face me.” It didn’t escape her that he still referred to his nephew by his given name. “It was only intended to give you time to help them. I knew I couldn’t save him, and I wasn’t foolish enough to believe I could turn him, but he needed to release the resentment he’s been carrying with him without the weight of taking my life on his conscience. That’s why I projected myself as I had looked that night. Only, I might have projected myself with my father’s lightsaber instead of mine.” He shrugged, chuckling to himself.

“But the last time he saw it I had it, so he must have thought…”

Luke continued, unaffected. “He needed to understand that he aligned himself with the wrong side. The Emporer… Supreme Leader – whatever he was – is dead. Nothing Ben wants is there. He needed to see that.”

Rey had thought she had known what he wanted, but she had been wrong. “When I went to him on the Supremacy, I tried to save him… you were right. It didn’t go the way I hoped. I failed. He’s gone.”

“I’ll tell you what I told my sister on that base,” he said, blue eyes kind and sympathetic. “No one’s ever really gone. I’m proof of that. But the most important lesson I ever learned was that failure is our greatest teacher. Look around you, Rey. Everyone failed. It is what you do in the wake of failure that is important. And besides, kid, it wasn’t up to you to save him.”

The anger only escalated as she thought of all of the ways she let him down, "But you were right. I should have listened. I was so sure of everything. But he chose power. And now it’s just getting worse. I’m so sorry."

Luke was watching her more closely, as if he could feel her anger and it concerned him. "No, I should have told you the truth from the beginning. I should have done a lot of things from the beginning, like confront you on your lies.”

“I didn’t –”

Luke raised his eyebrows, glaring at her knowingly. “Blasters don’t go off from cleaning them.”

“Oh.” Rey lowered her eyes, fidgeting with the hem of her gray tunic. Her only concern at the time was convincing him to go back to the Resistance with her. She had feared that the strange Force connection with his nephew would interfere with that. She had no idea it would become a permanent source of suffering. Most importantly, she hadn’t kept the secret for nefarious reasons; she only hoped Luke understood that.

“I’m not blameless, either,” he said, interrupting her thoughts. “I shouldn’t have allowed you to believe the island was under attack. It wasn’t about you, Rey; I was so consumed by my own failures that I let my emotions cloud my judgment. I hadn’t seen my nephew since he collapsed his hut on us, so when I saw him in that hut, with you… I reacted poorly. All I could see was how dangerous this Force bond was for you, but I reacted in anger rather than helping you through this.”

"Force bond?"

"Yes, your… energies in the Force are bonded together. It’s why you could see him, touch him, like he was in the room with you,” he explained, but the softness in his eyes had disappeared. There was something he was searching for in her stare. “You are both extremely Force-sensitive, and somehow that bond was created through the Force. I had a bond with my sister and my father, but not even those were as strong as what is developing between you two. I have never seen or read of anything like this, especially between two equals on opposite sides of the Force,"

Her voice was urgent, pleading. “Can I break this bond? Can you?”

“Do you want to, Rey?” Her anger flared. Of course, I do? Or do you still believe I have too much darkness in me? He paused to study her, his piercing blue eyes bore through her defenses to read her like a book. It reminded her of… a man that was dead to her more than the ghost before her. She supposed the proficiency in analyzing people was a Skywalker trait. Whatever he saw there, it didn’t seem favorable for a clean break. After a moment, he continued, “I have never heard of breaking a bond, it would take a strength more powerful than the Force itself. You can shut yourself off from it permanently, but it would require shutting yourself off from the Force. You could ignore him or block your mind from his. Maybe it would close the bond temporarily, but he would still be there. The only way to end it for good is death, but even if you survive it, there will always be a wound where his energy had been." The blue aura danced around him as he spoke, and, as consequential as his words were, part of her was relieved to have an answer to something. There were so many unanswered questions that she feared would never be explained, because the only person left to ask was her mortal enemy.

"But this has to end!" she cried. "I should have said something sooner; maybe you could have helped me stop it. I was just so scared. And something in me was curious. I wanted to understand him because he understood me. Or, at least, I thought he did. But everything was a lie. Snoke said he created it. It should have ended with his death, but the bond is getting stronger, Luke. It started with only seeing him. But then today, I saw his surroundings, I heard his thoughts, felt his feelings. I saw him without seeing him. What is this?"

"Interesting..." Luke replied. He sat quietly for a few moments, deep in thought. She didn't know if he was unsure what to tell her or was just as confused as she was, but she sat next to him until he spoke again.

"If he or Snoke isn’t controlling it, it seems that the bond is growing stronger as you both interact. I would not try to use this to your advantage, Rey. This is playing with fire. My only advice is to resist it. I am concerned about how strong – and dangerous – this bond could become for you. Snoke may have intensified this bond, but a Force bond is created by the Force. I think we must question why the Force connected you two in the first place. I wish I had more answers for you, but the ways of the Force are just as mysterious to me as anyone else.”

“Please, you’re the only one I can look to for answers. There must be something you can tell me,” she begged.

“I can try to help you gain answers while I’m here with you. It would be too dangerous to do alone. Close your eyes and reach out with your feelings," he told her, placing his hand over hers as he guided her through the Force. She could not feel his touch as she had on Ahch-To, but she could sense his energy. "Think of him, think of this Force bond you share. What do you see?"

Rey closed her eyes and opened herself up to the Force around her. Luke guided her deeper, and she could feel the objects around her, as if they were alive. She could feel Luke's bright blue aura, and she could sense Leia in another part of the ship. She could feel everything in the universe all at once. She thought of Kylo. She thought of the moment their fingers touched.

Where are you?

She was catapulted through the stars, following a glowing, moving band of coils stretching across the galaxy. Living tendrils branched out from the band like a spiraling infestation of light. It ended in a dark, thick, storming shadow of evolving viscosity. She reached out and touched this shadow ever so gently and instantly recognized his familiar Force signature. The shadow sent black, sticky webs snaking around her fingers like thin, slimy serpents. She ripped her hand away, but the black remnants disappeared inside her. She sensed from this touch that the shadow was the hurricane of emotions, thoughts, and memories that she knew as Ben Solo… or Kylo Ren. She did not know how, but somehow, she knew that if she followed the glowing band into this shadow, she would have access to everything.

What would I see? How could I use it to my advantage, to the advantage of the Resistance? What if he caught me? Could he do the same to me? Luke is right; whatever this is, it feels dangerous. I don’t want to go in there. I don’t want to see him.

Backing away, Rey followed her glowing band back through the stars. She shook feverishly as she entered her own consciousness again. As she opened her eyes, she was aware of the same presence she had just touched. A shadow. That dark, viscous cloud she had felt was no longer across the galaxy, it was lingering in the back of her mind. She could feel their bond now.

Can he feel me? Will this go away?

"Luke, I saw him. I found him. And now I can feel his energy as if he is a part of me. What does this all mean?" She asked Luke, desperate for more answers. When she turned to him, however, she found an empty turret.

Even though I know you're with me, Luke, why do I feel...so alone?
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo sat on the edge of his bed, his broad shoulders slumped, his head in his hands. The more he thought about the brief variation in the Force, as fleeting as it was, the more it intrigued him. The pain in his chest was not his own. That torment... What was it? How could he feel it? It didn't make sense. This was no longer just a bridge across the galaxy, which was intriguing enough.

_I felt her. I know it._

The voices in his head were quiet. For the first time since he could remember, there was silence on the other end. At first, it was a relief. He had control over his own thoughts. He was his own master. But in this a moment of uncertainty, when he was clearly over his head, he had no one to look to for guidance. He felt utterly and completely alone.

Snoke had told him that the bond was _his_ creation. It was the greatest betrayal of his life, worse than what Luke, his family, or his so-called ‘brother’ had done. He forced the thoughts away before he allowed those memories to consume him again. Perhaps it wasn’t the worst betrayal; perhaps that title belonged to _the last Jedi_, but that would require he acknowledge that she meant anything to him in the first place, which would only cause painful emotions to resurface again.

It didn’t matter. The point was if Snoke created the bond, it should have died with him. It wasn’t out of the realm of possibility that what he thought he saw… and heard… and felt was the result of sleep-deprivation-induced hallucinations. It would explain why he had thought he heard his uncle. But the part inside him he couldn’t silence with denial – the Force-sensitive part – knew this was something else.

As he searched his memories of training for answers, a tingling feeling crept into thoughts. His body went rigid in full alert. His head snapped up as his eyes searched the room for the cause. He tried to steady his breathing, but all he could hear was the vigorous staccato of his own heartbeat. The Force rippled. There was no mistaking it this time, he could sense _her_.

It was not her physical presence in the room, as before, but her presence in the Force...in his mind. He felt her press into his consciousness. Kylo focused intently, creating a barrier inside his mind against her search. If she succeeded in penetrating it, she would have access to everything; his thoughts, his emotions, his memories. He shuddered. The thought of his very soul in the hands of the enemy left him terrified. Such an intimate vulnerability was his worst nightmare. He refused to imagine the consequences if he failed to keep her out. Despair... confusion... curiosity... trepidation... loneliness flowed through him. Though he knew these were the same emotions in his own heart, he also knew these emotions were not his own.
This is impossible... How is she doing this? She can’t possibly be doing this on her own. What does she want? What is she looking for?

The more he thought of her, the more he could almost see her in his mind’s eye, sitting in the ventral turret on that ship. He could see her. Somehow...this was real. His blood boiled beneath his skin, burning feverishly through his veins as he understood what was happening in front of him. The energy of Luke Skywalker sat next to her, his hand over hers guiding her through the Force...guiding her to him.

Luke was helping her use their connection to her advantage, he was certain of it. Which meant Luke had chosen her over his own nephew, again. Kylo had feared that Luke’s energy would haunt him like the many ghosts in his nightmares, but this was somehow worse. His uncle would not ‘always be with him’ as he had convinced him on Crait; he already had his perfect student. Even in death, Luke still believed he wasn't worth it. Instead, he had poisoned her mind to believe in the myth of a possibility of a new Jedi Order, as he'd tried to do with Kylo. It was unfortunate Luke was dead; he could have solved Kylo's problem for him when he invariably discovered she had darkness in her, too. But that would be too easy.

Kylo understood the truth; he had only ever been a mission to her. That was why they had sent her in search of his uncle. Luke poisoned her mind against him and sent her to him to seduce him from the dark side. Unfortunately for her, Kylo saw through it all when she immediately begged him to save the others. Foolishly, Kylo had pleaded with her to stay, but he knew as he said that last desperate word that she would betray him. She had failed then, but so had he when he had attempted to show her what he did to those who betrayed him. This time he would show no mercy, but, evidently, neither would she.

With Luke's help, she sought to use the bond against him, undoubtedly in an attempt to gain information to help the Resistance. If Luke believed helping her would break Kylo's will, he would prove him wrong. His will would not be undone. He would destroy the Jedi Order and the Resistance. He would destroy it all. If that meant destroying himself in the process, then so be it.

You should have killed me when you had the chance, Skywalker.

The blue apparition opened his eyes and turned his head in Kylo's direction. Kylo tensed to minimize the shudder of fear that passed through him as their eyes met. The older man's face looked grave.

Can you see me, Luke? What do you see when you look upon the monster you created?
In an instant, Luke disappeared, and the nudging sensation in his mind was gone. He blinked, and he could no longer see the turret. The sound and energy in the room returned to normal. He was alone again. Only, he wasn’t. Her presence may have disappeared, but now he could feel her presence, their bond, lingering in the back of his mind. He was left with an echo through his thoughts.

Where are you?

He held his breath, waiting for more to happen. His muscles twitched in anticipation, prepared to defend himself against the attack he was convinced would come. The minutes ticked by, but nothing more happened. Her presence in his mind did not fade. It was the bond – he was certain of it. Just as her pushing into his mind during the interrogation had opened this, and whatever she had just done had intensified it. If he pushed through the energy he sensed in his mind, he knew he would find her consciousness. If her light didn’t terrify him, he would have.

Kylo was left with a terrifying – and an irritatingly comforting – awareness; this bond could not have been Snoke, or at least not solely Snoke. His body had long since cooled, but the bond only grew stronger. Kylo had assumed the bond was fading after his death. He believed she had severed it on Crait when she had shut him out, but it was clear now the bond was as strong as ever. If her actions strengthened it, it meant the inverse could be true.

They could be capable of controlling it; he could shut her out by his will, or he could force her to shut him out. If she meant to use their connection against him, however, then perhaps he would waste a perfectly presented opportunity if he shut her out. He could use the bond against her, instead. He was strong enough that he didn't require the help of a Force ghost, and the information he could gain would be exponentially more critical to her safety than anything she gained about him. He could think of no better way to end the bond for good than using her to destroy the Resistance.

This torture will never end as long as she is alive.

Kylo had to destroy her, especially now that he felt her energy fill an emptiness in his mind that had always been there, filling it so completely it was as if it was meant for her. No, this bond was not a shared fate created by the Cosmic Force. It was an infestation, a parasite draining him of his determination and strength. He would have everything he'd ever wanted if she would just die. His mind – in its infinite helpfulness – provided him an image of her on a skyway, falling into his arms as she grasped at a fatal lightsaber wound to her abdomen.

There was not a word in Basic for the bloodcurdling revulsion that passed through him at the sight.
of her unseeing eyes. He howled in a tumultuous fusion of anger, fear, and agony. Kylo had spent years training emotions away, but ever since he had heard the mere mention of her, he had lost his hard-won control. His emotions were spiraling; he was losing control again. Years of battling against them left him resigned to the inevitable result. In his fury, he snapped. Launching himself at his desk, he flipped it as far as his anger would carry it. Then he closed his eyes and surrendered himself to the overwhelming power of the darkness.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey sat contentedly next to Finn, their fingers intertwined as she and a few of the younger Resistance members watched Poe animatedly reenact war stories. They all held cups of alcohol in their hands. She had one to match, though she had poured out the vile liquid, replacing it with water. Rey craved desperately to belong, but she wouldn't touch the poison that she had seen seize control over too many people on Jakku, including her own parents.

The alcohol only served to liven Poe's retelling of his story; his body was relaxed but his hands more spirited as he performed for the crowd. He had seen worlds Rey could only imagine and had adventures far more exciting than she could dream of. The other members of the Resistance seemed to gravitate around him, and it was evident why. She found herself admiring him – the strength of his optimism after all he had endured, his intelligence, and his easy smile. Rey found that it was difficult not to mirror that smile, especially when he aimed it at her, which he did often. Poe was nice to her, and she found herself enjoying his company. He seemed so confident and hopeful, he knew who he was and what he was fighting for. He was everything the Resistance stood for and he made her feel like she had value there. He made her feel like somebody. His eyes found hers as he spoke, and her heart skipped a beat as he winked at her.

Maybe I have found my place.

At the moment, Poe was retelling his account of Kylo Ren's interrogation. “…blood is dripping into my eyes, and I’m still not sure that this guy is actually there, but I said, ‘You might want to rethink your technique.’” His story earned him scattered laughs from the other Resistance members. It was a brief moment of peace, but, like everything else in her life, Kylo had to ruin it. A chill shuddered through her as the Force vibrated around her. Poe's warm voice faded away until all she could hear was the steady inhuman breaths and mechanical hiss of his helmet. She found herself releasing Finn's hand in preparation for a fight.

Kylo was there, in the room with her friends, and the fear only served to increase the pounding of her pulse in her ears. Could they see him? There were no terrified cries, no hands at their blasters; no one else looked like their world had been upended. All their lives continued as normal, listening to Poe's recount of being tortured at the hands of the man sitting a few meters away from them. She could feel the intensity of his fixed glare, but she refused to look at him. There was nothing to see anyway, she convinced herself; every detail and expression was hidden behind a mask.

“Everyone out,” Kylo hissed, “Now.” Though she couldn't see most of his surroundings, she could vaguely see a table in her peripherals. She supposed he had been in one of his meetings, focused on galactic domination, no doubt conjuring up horrifying methods to kill her and her friends. The connection would close on its own soon enough. Until then she did her best to pretend that he didn’t exist.

Kylo, however, had no intention of making it simple. “Let me guess, you still want to kill me.”

Rey bit her tongue. Everything in her wanted to turn and scream at him. He had tried to pull the lightsaber from her, he had tried to kill her and her friends on Crait. He had no right to make himself out to be the victim. She wanted to tell him those things, but she knew it was better for everyone if she ignored him.

“Or are you just disappointed I’m not dead where you left me?” he continued. “Sorry, you should have known after the last time you left me to die, I’m difficult to get rid of.”

As far as she was concerned, he was dead to her. Though if he were truly dead, it would have been easier. She could have enjoyed her time with the others without testing her limited control over her tongue. The galaxy would have been better off if he was dead, but she didn’t leave him to die.

“I know you can see me. I know you can feel me.”

She could. She could feel his anger permeating the Force around them. It was just another reason why she had to ignore him; the bond had grown strong enough. He could be angry all he wanted. It was his fault; he had nothing to be angry at her for. She had gone to the Supremacy to save him, she had helped him kill the guards, she had thrown him her lightsaber. He had chosen the darkness. Speaking of darkness, it was building in the Force around her as well. He was too predictable.

“Afraid what the other anarchists will say?”

Rey was grateful enough that, as far as she could tell, he was not visible to them. Rey wondered if it was only a capability of Force-users. If Leia walked by, would she see him? Or feel him? Rey wasn’t certain how it worked. Luke had been able to see him, but they had been touching hands. Rey never planned on touching him again, unless she was using her hands to drain the life from him. If that was the only way he was visible, then her secret was safe. She refused to consider what would happen if the Resistance discovered that a Jedi had a bond with the Supreme Leader of the First Order.

“Ah, you’re going to pretend I’m not here? That I don’t exist?” he said, his voice light with levity, but she could feel his resentment. “You’ll make the perfect Skywalker, then.”
Rey couldn’t bite her lip, she couldn’t clench her fist, she couldn’t do anything, or he would know he incited a reaction from her. Then he would win. She couldn’t allow him to have that. This was a battle with him just like any other, and she would win just as she always had before.

“Are you too important as the last Jedi to speak to me?”

Rey could see him in her periphery. He was seated, wearing his full regalia, gloved hands splayed on the long table. She could feel the tension in him; the turmoil. If she turned to look at him, she was certain he would look terrifying, but underneath, she recognized his fear and anger – his conflict – well.

“Or has Leia taught you how to pretend I don't exist?” he continued, though by the rasp of the vocoder, she could tell he had stood up. “She does have thirty years of practice.”

Rey’s jaw hurt with how tightly she clamped it shut. The Force was screaming inside – she was screaming inside – but she couldn’t allow herself the pleasure of releasing it. It would be too easy to give in to her anger, but she knew it was a path to the dark side. The last thing she wanted was to become anything like him.

“Did you forget your lightsaber? Blaster?”

He had circled the table, he was closer now. It was unsettling. She thought she had known the man on Ahch-To, but she didn’t know this man. What would he do?

“The traitor’s blaster is right next to you, why don't you see if it works this time?”

Her fingers itched to grab it, to test if the Force would still prevent her from harming him. If she didn’t fear where the bolt would land if it missed him, it would have been worth the risk. Poe winked again in her direction, and she smiled politely. The warm feeling she had felt before had turned cold with the arrival of Kylo.

“What has your attention so... ah, not what, but who?”

Rey knew he noticed her heavy gulp as she remembered that the connection had changed between them. Not only could he see her and part of her environment, but he could see the others as well. It was more dangerous than she had thought.
“Poe Dameron,” he spat, the vocoder incapable of disguising his disdain. “The best pilot in the Resistance.”

As Poe retold the gut-wrenching story of his torture, Kylo sounded as if he would be happy to do it again. Could he? Could his powers reach across the galaxy and rip apart Poe’s mind again? He would have to go through her first.

“What else is he to you?”

His voice was low. She could nearly feel the venom of his words. It distracted her from the insinuation of his comment.

“Does the traitor see how you look at the pilot? How does your ‘knight’ feel about that?”

The thud of his boots echoing off the floor matched the thrum of her heart as he drew closer. Her stare flashed to her friends and all that she could lose.

“I should have killed them when I had the chance,” he whispered, too close for comfort. She shuddered. His predator-like eyes had seen it, she knew they had. When he spoke next, it almost sounded as if he were smiling, or whatever the evil version of it was called.

“But you're probably thinking the same about me.” His voice was closer to her level, as if he had knelt beside her. Rey feared he would circle in front of her in demand for her attention. She shut her eyes in hope it would shut him out.

His tone was soft when he spoke again, too soft for the harshness of his words. “Look at me, Jedi – tell me how much you hate me.”

She didn't flinch when he cried out in frustration and threw something against the far wall. “Look at me!” She refused, silently begging the Force to take him far away, to let this be the last connection and end her suffering. After his outburst, he collapsed back into his chair, panting in agitation.

“I was wrong about you. You're no different than the others.”
His words hurt more than she had expected. If she hated him, why did she care that he believed she wasn’t different? Shouldn’t that have been a good thing?

“Fine. Let the bond burn for all I care.”

The words were whispered, perhaps that was why they were so difficult to ignore. He stood and disappeared from view. She thought he was gone, but he had to make one more inciting comment before he left. It infuriated her more than any of the others had.

“Though, after what you did, I should be the one ignoring you.”

Rey rolled her eyes, tilting her head askance. She waited to raise her stare until the last second, and was grateful she did when she met his piercing gaze. His last few comments, she realized too late, had hurt her so profoundly because they had been whispered in his voice. The loud crash must have been the mask. She wasn’t prepared to look into the eyes of this man. It was so easy to differentiate the two – Ben Solo and Kylo Ren – to pretend that the connections on Ahch-To hadn’t happened, when he wore his helmet. She had hoped she would never see his face again.

Rey refused to focus on his eyes, lest she found herself lost within them. Instead, she pinned him with a withering glare that conveyed every last disappointment she held for the man she had believed to be Ben Solo; the man who was suddenly at a loss for words. Rey broke the glare after she had sufficiently conveyed her rebuttal to his nonsense, and stood to leave. If he reacted violently again, she planned to be as far away from the others as possible.

Evidently, Kylo didn’t take too kindly to being ignored. He had saved the fatal blow for last. “Go ahead, Rey,” he murmured. “Leave without telling me why. Run away again. You’re good at it… just like your parents.”

With her back to him, Rey covered her mouth to suppress a sob. How dare he compare her to them. They both knew she ran away because he left her no choice. Rey didn’t say that, however. She couldn’t find the strength to say anything at all. Kylo didn’t say another word. The only sound was his shuddering breath until the connection snapped shut. Rey flinched when it did.
Chapter End Notes

Mild Violence

Jealousy

Kylo is Kylo and throws some things at a wall

Kylo shows jealousy toward other male characters
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

---CHAPTER 10---

Rey was searching for Finn when she interrupted what seemed to be a Resistance meeting. Leia was there, standing before the entirety of the Resistance: Poe, Finn, Chewie and most of the other few dozen remaining members. With her cane in hand – though she refused to lean upon it – the strong woman addressed them all. Rey hadn't been invited, but she supposed it made sense. She may have assisted them on Crait, but she hadn't involved herself with the cause. She supported the Resistance, of course, but in a way that resembled this moment – standing on the periphery, not quite an outsider, but not quite a member either. The purpose of the meeting appeared to be naming different planets. After only seeing the deserts of Jakku for most of her life, it wasn't as if Rey could help much anyway.

“What about the Tak-Beam Complex on Durkteel?” a woman offered in the small crowd. “The base was destroyed, but we could rebuild.”

“It's mid-rim,” Poe argued. “The First Order will find us within days.”

An Abednedo male spoke up, “We can't discount our bases on Yavin IV or Hoth.”

Leia shook her head. “We must assume that their high command has intimate knowledge of the bases used in the Galactic Civil War by the rebellion, even the secret ones.” Only then did Leia seem to notice her. “Rey, well aren't you a sight for sore eyes. Let me get you up to speed. I've called this meeting to discuss prospects for a new, temporary base as we strengthen our forces. The good news is – the First Order is not tracking us. The multiple transponders on this ship make it nearly impossible to track. The bad news is, for now, we're looking for somewhere uninhabited or secluded, as we suspect the First Order's reach is far beyond what we first expected. We will have our day to confront Snoke and his army –”

No, you won't, Rey thought. He's as dead as the First Order should be.

“No, you won't, Rey thought. He's as dead as the First Order should be.

“– but first we must rebuild our own army, and we need a base to do that – a base the First Order will not easily find. As you can see, we're running out of options.”

Poe leaned against the wall, arms crossed, “So, we'll have to pick one that is less well-known. Maybe one you've never been stationed at, General.” Rey understood the implications of his words. One your son is not knowledgeable of.

“How about Primtara or Horox III?” Lieutenant Connix suggested.

“How about Primtara or Horox III?” Lieutenant Connix suggested.

“Horox III is outer rim, but the base was destroyed years ago,” Leia said.
Chewie added his suggestion in a series of growls and grunts; most of the other members seemed oblivious to their meaning. Rey wasn't certain Leia understood particular words or used the Force, but her expression demonstrated understanding. Leia's voice was barely above a whisper when she answered him. “He knows about the hidden base on Corellia.”

“What about Generis?” Poe said, his calm voice reassured Rey that maybe there was still hope. If he wasn't worried, then their situation couldn't be too dire.

“It's outer rim, it's warm, jungle terrain for cover, but it was captured by the Empire in the Civil war. Its location would be in the archives of the Empire, which the First Order have accessed,” Leia reminded him.

“Your hi- General,” See-Threepio corrected, “Artoo suggests Lubang Minor. It is an unsettled planet located in the Illisurevimurasi sector of the Outer Rim Territories. Primary terrain is indicated as jungle, and the climate is tropical.

“Thank you, Threepio,” the general sighed. “That might be too –”

“What about Barkhesh?” Finn interjected. “It's outer rim, it has warm, jungle terrain for cover and a base.” Finn had definitely changed, Rey realized. The ease with which he assimilated into the ranks was heartwarming. It was difficult to reconcile the kind, caring man with the trained warrior of the First Order, but she was beginning to see the tactical side of him – the side that had crossed enemy lines to rescue her on Starkiller. He had found his calling.

“I've never heard of it,” Poe said brightly, his voice betraying his excitement as he slapped his friend on the back.

“Neither have I,” Leia admitted. “It'll have to do for now.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo vibrated with energy, and nothing he did was enough to release it. He had trained until he couldn't lift his lightsaber, scoured the scrolls – the surprisingly Sith scrolls – that had been with Snoke's effects, had created tactical strategies to address several disobedient systems, had run the length of the Finalizer nine times, but he couldn't tire himself enough to sleep.

His skin crawled, his heart pounded, his mind wandered, his entire body was restless from the moment he laid down until he resigned himself to the fact that his time was better utilized on something productive. That, paired with the relentless nightmares of late, left him perpetually struggling to rest for more than an hour or two a night. He discovered he had more success if he forced himself into wakefulness for twenty-four to seventy-two hours before attempting to sleep. It had been more than ninety-six hours in this stretch, and there was no end in sight.

That was how he found himself in an officers’ empty break room at three-thirty Galactic Standard Time, overlooking the manufacturing floor as he paced erratically with a plate of food in his hands. He couldn't remember the last time he had eaten; he did remember he had refused dinner from the service droids for the last few nights. Drawing energy from the Force to maintain his strength left him with little appetite. As did … recent events.

The food he did eat tasted like nothing. It made him nauseous every time he tried to find the will to swallow. Forcing food down his throat seemed like a spectacular waste of time – something he had endless amounts of in his current state – so he finished a flavorless Jogan fruit, then abandoned the plate with the other uneaten fruit on a nearby table. He resumed his pacing to channel the energy sparking through him like lightning.

Everything felt as hollow as his stomach. Life around him was colorless and dull, meaningless. He couldn't find it in himself to care about anything. He had become accustomed to this emptiness the better part of a decade he had spent under Snoke's guidance, but without the fear and purpose, he just.... existed. He did revel in the quiet of the night cycle, though.

Where he had once suffered in isolation, he was now overwhelmed with subordinates invariably pestering him about every last decision. There was always a report to read or meeting to attend. There was still the pervasive ache of loneliness that pulsed just behind his ribs, but now he felt it in the constant presence of others. Being Supreme Leader was not quite what he had imagined; he would do it, however, because the galaxy required order. This was what his grandfather had wanted to achieve, and he had done it. Just as he knew his fate was intertwined with hers, he knew this was his destiny.
That fleeting thought was all it took to span the bridge of their minds. Somewhere across the galaxy, Luke’s new protégé was lying in her bunk, peaceful in slumber, still fully clothed as if she hadn't planned on succumbing to sleep. Her arms were covered with wraps again. Kylo knew it was to hide the scar underneath. She was ashamed of it, ashamed of her connection to him.

The feeling was mutual; he hated seeing her as well. Everything about her was a reminder of how foolish he had been to believe he could have impossible things. He hated himself for not hating her as completely as he wanted. As conflicted as he was about her, however, he would still do what he needed to do. Not here, not like this, but he would kill her.

Her arms were wrapped around herself as she shivered, likely in response to hyperspace. The Falcon wasn’t as fortified against the freezing temperatures of space as a Star Destroyer. Though he knew she had plenty of people to keep her warm – like Poe Dameron – it bothered him more than he liked to admit that she didn't even have a blanket. His mind replayed her bleak and harrowing memories – shivering in her make-shift bed in the AT-AT, starving and lonely. An unanticipated rage pricked under his skin, directed toward his mother.

How could she allow her to suffer like this? She's killing her own people. Is her rebellion worth this?

In his anger, he upended the nearest table, sending the plate of food crashing to the floor. The darkness surged through his veins. He was furious at her, his mother, himself, and the Force for good measure. Before he had considered the consequences, his weapon was ignited, and the blade carved and slashed through every piece of furniture in the room. His muscles screamed in protest from his earlier training sessions, but the ache was familiar and centering. He forced his body to continue the assault until the lightsaber dropped from his hand in exhaustion.

“Are you quite finished?”

It was her voice. He whipped around to face her. She sat up in her bunk, arms wrapped around her long, slender legs. The golden flecks in her eyes reflected in the orange light radiating through the viewport. Her stare was what it had been in every interaction since Crait – closed off and emotionless. “You’ve wasted perfectly good food.” Her face was hardened in contempt, but her words were irritatingly calm.

Kylo clenched his fist to control his visceral reaction. All he could focus on was her betrayal. It was an emotion that ran deeper than any other. She was no different than Luke or his parents. He could have pretended he was apathetic to her if she hadn’t spoken, but with the sound of her voice, he felt the renewed pain of her rejection. The only problem was he saw a matching pain on her face, which was absurd, because she was the one who had tried to kill him and left him for dead on the Supremacy.
“Oh, now I’m worth acknowledging?” Kylo grit his teeth before he said more. He was the Supreme Leader. He had all the power, not her. If he allowed her to provoke him, he would only give her that power over him. Never again.

“For Snoke’s supposed golden boy, you certainly are predictable, heir apparent to Lord Vader. All you care about is worth.” The way she said it was like a curse. Why did it feel like one, too?

Kylo did the only thing he could when knocked off-balance by her words, again: he dragged the conversation back to safer territory. “I doubt he thinks so now,” he said flippantly. It was a reminder, of what he had done for her, and what she had done to him.

She shrugged it off as if she hadn’t torn him apart and left him in pieces on the floor of that throne room. “You have all the power now; what do you care what he thinks?”

The words flew from his mouth before he considered them: “He was more my father than my own father was!”

The look that twisted on her face could only be described as pure hatred. She had no idea what Snoke had been to him, did she? He waited for her to pull a blaster on him again as she had in their first connection. As it turned out, she didn’t need a weapon to wound him.

“No wonder you killed him,” she said, holding his glare. His anger returned as he thought about all that had happened since then, tearing at the raw wound of her betrayal. He opened his mouth to respond with an equally venomous retort, when he heard a low growl.

It was her stomach, he realized; she was hungry. Her words had hurt him more than he had ever imagined, and yet, what ached the most was the knowledge that she could be going hungry. Again. The anger toward his mother grew. Was her desire to destroy him and everything he believed in worth this? Before he could control himself, he had called another Jogan fruit to his hand. He studied its white stripes long enough to adjust his grip. With a flick of his wrist, he tossed it on her bunk. Rey reached for it as if she could touch it.

It had been instinctive – throwing the fruit to her – but only after her fingers closed around its purple flesh did he realize the implication. She was not on the Finalizer with him. He had essentially thrown the fruit across the galaxy, it had landed on her bunk, and she could touch it. If fruit could pass across the distance between them, could a weapon?
The same realization must have passed through her own mind, because her eyes darted from the fruit to the lightsaber that lay abandoned on the floor. Her fingers tightened around the fruit before she met his stare. There was a question in her eyes, the same one that the darkness called to his attention. He refused to answer it, not that night. Kylo lifted his chin imperiously instead. “Take it, you need it more than I do,” he said with contempt, but her eyes softened slightly at his words.

Without a care that he was watching, she bit into the fruit. Kylo watched her eyelashes flutter as a drop of juice dribbled down her chin like a philistine. A strange feeling passed through him. It felt like... like reaching the fourth level of the Force, combined with facing an entire army with only a lightsaber and piloting the Falcon through the Maw. It was a feeling of unmitigated happiness. And it didn’t belong to him. One bite of a fruit he’d had countless times in his life did that to her. It sickened him, and he didn’t know what to do with the rage that curled through his fingers. So he lashed out. “I doubt the Resistance is feeding you well.”

“And whose fault is that!” The softness in her eyes had disappeared. They were burning with desire to hurt him, as if she hadn’t gutted him thoroughly enough already. Nevertheless, it was easier to see her that way.

It was ironic, he thought, that she would blame him for her circumstances. He had offered her the galaxy; she could have had access to everything he did. She chose to walk away. “You had your chance.” To join the First Order, he wanted to say, but he feared the words that would tumble out instead, to join me. “I remember what happened in that throne room, even if you pretend you don’t.” Kylo internally groaned that he had let such a vulnerable statement slip past his defenses. He wasn’t supposed to care, but now she knew the truth.

She hadn’t seen the opportunity for what it was, however. Instead, she resorted to the comfort of denial; crossing her arms, she shut herself off further from him. “I don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“No? I think you do,” he said, gesturing to her arm wraps. “Are you hiding it from them or hiding it from yourself? Say it – you hate seeing a reminder of me.”

“Is that why you wear your mask?” she mocked derisively with an infuriating grin on her lips. “Do you hate seeing the reminder of me in the mirror?”

He ignored her attempt to incite him. “You can cover your scar, you can pretend Ahch-To was a nightmare, you can hide the bond in shame –”
“That’s not–”

“But I won’t let you forget if it’s the last thing I do.”

“I know,” she sighed, “I can’t stop hearing your heartbeat in my head no matter what I do. It’s like a ticking chrono. Because your cold heart still beats, people I care for continue to die. The reminder of what I should have done in the throne room haunts me every day. So don’t worry, I won’t forget, your heart won’t let me.” Everything in him wanted to stop. He wished she had reacted with anger rather than... this. When she was cruel, it was easier for him to pretend that she meant nothing to him. It hurt to see her and attempt to forget. “Can you just… go?”

“I would if I could. I liked it better when you weren’t talking to me.”

“It was a mistake,” she said as her fingers curled tighter around the fruit until its juice bled between her fingers. “But it's difficult to sleep when you're making such a … commotion. If we both agree to – ”

“It's difficult to sleep when you're in the same galaxy,” he spat back impulsively. He ground his teeth in disgust at himself for allowing her to incite him. She was needling away at the restraints on his darkness expertly, as if she knew the exact words to say to set him off. For the first time since Crait, he could feel her observing him, undoubtedly taking in the exhaustion in his eyes and the dark circles underneath. Her eyes guaranteed him she would show him no pity.

Good.

“Afraid?” she challenged. “That I will defeat you again?”

The darkness surged around him. His restraint snapped. “I’ll show you afraid.”

He moved toward her with fire in his blood, drawing the darkness in as his arm reached forward. He clenched his fingers as the fury pulsed through them, manipulating the Force to his will. She didn't flinch as the Force wrapped around her throat, threatening to starve her of air; not to harm, but to prove his power. Only, it hadn’t wrapped around her throat, because the Force didn’t work across the galaxy. She stared him down fearlessly, but it was the acceptance in her eyes that gave him pause. Knowing what he intended to do, she stared at him as if she expected it. The darkness in him itched to will the Force to touch her, to drain the life from her, to prove that his destiny was within his reach, but he released his grip with a start.
Weak. Foolish. Failure, the whispers in his head reminded him. Snoke may have been gone, but his influence was not. Kylo may have become the Supreme Leader, but he was no stronger than when they were in the interrogation room.

She snorted derisively when he lowered his hand. “Still as unstable as your lightsaber, I see.”

His brow twitched in challenge. He called the weapon to his palm and tossed the hilt back and forth between his hands, flicking his wrists to rotate it through the air. The weight of it was solid, familiar. “It gets the job done,” he said cruelly.

“Go away. I thought I’d at least be free of you in my sleep.” He bit back the sting he shouldn’t have felt. It proved her words in the hut, her assurances that he wasn’t alone, were more lies. He didn’t care to know why anymore. After what his family had done, he shouldn’t have been surprised that she would follow in their footsteps. She was their last hope, the only one who could stand between him and the rebels. He was under no delusion; she wouldn’t hesitate to kill him any less now than when they had first met. Only this time, she knew who he was; she just didn’t care. Neither would he.

Kylo tossed the lightsaber in his hand and returned her cold stare. He ignited his weapon and pointed it toward her bunk. “If you want to be free of me, you probably shouldn’t sleep there.”

“Why not?”

He pivoted on his heels and smiled to himself. “That bunk – it was mine.” There was a shifting sound behind him. He expected her to jump out of the bunk as if it had burned her, to prove that she would rather sleep on the refresher floor than sleep on something he had touched, but when he tilted his head to check, he was curious to find she remained in the bunk, only shifting to turn away from him.

Her arms were still wrapped around her torso, but he would rather walk through lava than bring her a blanket. His darkness was still suffocating the Force around him, and he decided the fragments of furniture weren’t nearly unrecognizable enough. It wasn’t as if he would sleep anytime soon anyway. With a lazy flourish, he began the onslaught again.
Violence

Kylo destroys things

Kylo threatens to Force choke Rey, though he ultimately does not
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey needed an escape from her thoughts. When the conflicting emotions inside her made it impossible to sleep after her confrontation with Kylo, she sought her friends for comfort. She couldn't be alone with his presence in her mind, taunting her... tempting her... any longer. She quietly sat at the dejarik table next to Finn and Poe. They had raided the cabinets for supply bars and ration cubes. It looked lightyears more appetizing than portions.

"Rey, are you feeling...okay?" Finn asked carefully. She could blame her lack of sleep solely on the foreign sensation of hyperspace travel. After crying into her bunk all night, she imagined she looked a bit worse for wear. It hadn't helped that she was already wide awake before she interrupted the giant man-child she was connected with through the Force.

"I'm okay. I've just been processing a lot, you know? This has all been...eventful. I'm just grateful we'll be on solid ground soon." She smiled her best fake smile, and the trusting man that Finn was – despite his harrowing upbringing – took it at face value. Rey knew she had to tell him the truth eventually – he had been honest with her – but she didn't know what to say that wouldn't risk losing the closest thing she had to family since escaping Jakku.

How could she explain her bond with Kylo? The last time she saw him awake before Crait was during their fight with Kylo on Starkiller, when her eventual bondmate nearly killed Finn. Even though that fateful night had only occurred a few weeks ago, it felt like an eternity. Without her tally marks scratched into the hull of her AT-AT, she was losing track of time. Since leaving Jakku, so much had happened – so much she couldn't explain.

"Are you sleeping? Is it nightmares?" he asked softly. "About him?"

"Something like that," she replied, a tender grin lifting her cheeks. Finn cared; there weren’t many in her life that did. It thawed her cold heart. "Thank you, my friend, for caring."

"I woke up terrified for you," he admitted, "That monster had just killed Han. I saw the evil in his eyes. He was strong... and fast. I don't know how you did it, Rey."

"And I heard she gave him a giant scar down his face to remember her by!" Poe added, "I wish I could have returned the favor after he tortured me… Well, “torture” isn't a strong enough word for it. What am I saying? You were taken prisoner," he said, gesturing to Rey. "You know that mind-splitting agony too."

Rey blushed. "Yes... I remember."

"What did he do to you?" Finn demanded. Her friend had always been protective of her, but there was an edge to his voice that warned of danger. "I swear to you if he..."
"Don't worry; he didn't really hurt me, Finn," she insisted. “It was uncomfortable and humiliating when he searched through my private dreams and memories, but I was able to force him out of my mind. Then I searched his instead and scared him off. He never even looked for the map before I escaped."

"And there I was, thinking you needed to be rescued," Finn laughed. Rey smiled. Perhaps she hadn’t needed rescuing in the classic sense, but she was grateful he had cared enough to come back for her. Her spirits were temporarily lightened, but there was… something… something inside her… a silent voice that had always there, and it was demanding her attention. What it wanted her to know – it felt wrong, like a… warning. She had felt it before; in the forest of Takodana, overlooking the skyway on Starkiller, in the throne room on the Supremacy. Now it was warning her again, danger, but it wasn’t until she heard Poe’s foreboding words that she understood why.

“Wait, you’re telling me you had seen the one thing he was willing to kill and torture anyone for… and all he did was search through your dreams?”

Poe’s countenance had changed in an instant; his smile had disappeared, and the warmth had faded from his eyes. He stared at her suspiciously, but it was his voice that left her the most uneasy. He had never spoken to her with such distrust before.

Her heartbeat quickened under his interrogative tone. Rey was still new to meaningful social interactions that weren't centered around quid-pro-quo. She found herself relaxing in the presence of her new friends, but she had clearly said too much. A tingling panic twisted up her spine. She chose her reply warily, careful not to reveal any more incriminating information.

“Yes, that’s what I said.”

“And then you nearly killed the man who could freeze blaster bolts and carry on a conversation like it’s nothing? A man who has destroyed worlds. You. A scavenger from Jakku who had never been trained with a lightsaber? Had never even held one?” She swallowed her offense at the demeaning air to his words. Why had his disposition changed over a simple recount of her interrogation? Why was he being so cruel over nothing? Didn’t he trust her? She was confused, Poe had always been kind to her.

That sounds like something Kylo would say. Will you call me “nothing” next?

“Well, he was injured,” Finn interjected, coming to her defense. She smiled at him in gratitude.
Poe, however, would not be so easily convinced. “And yet he easily bested you, a trained killer of the First Order, and left you for dead like it was nothing.” Though he was speaking to Finn, Poe’s eyes never strayed from hers. She felt naked, exposed, just as she had in that interrogation room. Even though this man did not have the Force to confirm his suspicions, it was as if he looked right through her defenses anyway.

What does he think he knows?

Rey did not have a satisfactory answer for why the events had turned in her favor. She fidgeted uncomfortably under his accusatory gaze. She knew she should tell them that more had happened between Kylo and herself than they knew. They deserved to know, but his demeanor frightened her. If he became angry over the trivial events of the interrogation, what would he do when he discovered the truth?

How could she explain to them that the man in the hut was the same man who had tortured one of them and nearly killed the other? How could she make them understand when she didn’t understand it herself? How could she explain that she risked everything – their lives – to go to him on the Supremacy? How could she tell them that she agonized over a bond that she still shared with him? What would they think of her? What would they do?

“I think he’s scared of her,” Finn joked, breaking the heaviness in the air.

“Yes, that must be it,” Poe agreed, though his tone was less jovial. His charming demeanor had returned, but his voice was deeper, more... wary. “You are a force to be reckoned with, Rey, no pun intended.” He smiled and winked in a way that made her pulse quicken. He returned to his food, but she could almost see the wheels turning in his head. The abrupt change between suspicious and charismatic disconcerted her. Her intuition – that voice inside her – told her not to trust him, and that terrified her. If she couldn’t trust a member of the Resistance, who could she trust?

"How is Rose doing?” she asked Finn, changing the subject. She knew Finn had been preoccupied lately with sitting vigil at her bedside, and though she hadn’t sat with him as much as she had wanted, Rey still wanted him to know she cared.

"Good, I think,” he said, his smile fading. “As good as she can be.” He glanced away, and Rey realized Finn was clearly not comfortable yet discussing this new woman with her. She would make friends with her, too, proving to him that he had no reason to be concerned.
"They had quite the adventure sneaking on the Supremacy," Poe said conspiratorially, though his smile dropped for a second, and she could sense the regret in his voice. “They were so close to preventing this disaster.”

"You were on the Supremacy?" Rey choked on her food. "When it was hit?" A slew of new fears rattled around her mind. Could they have seen her or known that she was there? If they asked, how would she explain why she had gone there, or why she hadn't told them?

"Yeah, it was nice to get a little payback. Too bad we couldn't take out Snoke...or Kylo Ren...while we there," Finn replied dryly before tilting his head back and tossing a bite of food into his mouth. Poe mimicked the action, tossing it higher. Based upon the cheers of the others, catching food in their mouths was a game. There was so much about social interactions Rey had yet to understand.

"At least Snoke is dead..." Rey said around her own mouthful. She took several more bites of food with her fingers before she felt the weight of the silence around her. She glanced up slowly. They stared at her in shock, utensils abandoned mid-bite, and she wondered if she was doing it again – acting out of the societal norm. She reached for a utensil in shame.

"What?" Poe finally rasped. Only then were the consequences of her words made apparent. She had hoped they knew; Leia was Force-sensitive, after all. Considering how high profile that monster was, she had presumed the entire Resistance had learned of Snoke's death by the time they reached Crait. Someone else would have had to step up as Supreme Leader. Certainly, the holonet must have mentioned something. At the very least, wouldn't they question whether Snoke survived the destruction?

"Yes...I... well, I... felt it...in the Force," she stammered. She hoped her lie was convincing enough, though, realistically, she knew it wasn’t. After growing up on the unscrupulous planet of Jakku, Rey had learned to lie to survive. Those practices carried over to her time with the Resistance. It had been natural to lie to Luke on the island and now to her friends to protect herself, to survive. Her lies had gone unquestioned until she met Kylo, and he saw through every single one of them.

It had destabilized her, having another person see through everything to who she truly was. When he had exposed her lies, she hated the vile, slimy feeling that clawed inside her. She didn’t want to feel it again, not with these people – not when the truth and its consequences actually mattered. Her fear overwhelmed her. Her breaths became short and fast, her body trembled. No, it wasn’t her body, she realized as the others stared down at the table. It quaked violently under her clenched fists.

What is happening to me? How am I doing this?
Rey stood abruptly, excusing herself from her friends. "I have to go. I forgot I have to check on something."

She smiled, but the skepticism on their faces was evident. Finn tried to call after her, and she felt Poe’s eyes burn holes into her back as she stood up. It was all too much, and she felt something building inside her, demanding release. In her haste to escape, she crashed into Chewbacca. The Wookiee caught her before she fell, stilling her in his large, furry arms. Though he had distracted her from her meltdown, her entire body began shivering in a new fear and... something else.

That smell. She couldn’t remember a single detail about her parents, but she knew exactly why that smell was familiar.

“Chewie, what is that? Why do you smell like...”

Ben.

Rey caught herself before she said something she couldn't explain to her friends. He cocked his head and responded in Shyriiwook, which, thankfully, none of her friends were able to understand.

Trillium Soap? They use the same soap?

He patted her knowingly. He knew what she was asking, who she was thinking about, because he knew who else used that soap in his thick and unruly hair. She remembered that before he had been her confusing bondmate, before Chewie had wounded him on Starkiller after he killed his best friend, Kylo had been a boy the Wookiee had once known well. Chewie also knew where she had gone before Crait. He had been the one to dry her tears, after all, when he had rescued her from Snoke's escape pod. And he was the one to tell her there was still hope to turn Kylo after they saved their friends. There was a time and a place to grieve, he had told her, and a time and a place to fight. It had reminded her very much of Han. Chewbacca had been nothing but supportive of her – more than she could say for Luke – and she liked to imagine Han would have been the same.

She was most thankful that Chewbacca mentioned none of that as he took her space next to her friends, allowing her the grace to tell them in her own time. Her friends were curious about their strange exchange, but none of them said another word. Rey left before the tears began to fall or she began moving objects unwittingly again.
Why does everything remind me of him? Why can't I escape him?

Rey felt her thoughts flow into the space his consciousness held in her mind. No sooner had she screamed those words than she felt the Force around her begin to buzz. The sound around her became muted. She could feel a tightening sensation in her mind before the familiar silence in the Force. Another connection was impending; she could feel it. She ducked into the nearest cargo hold and fell against the door as it closed behind her.

There he stood in front of her at the viewport of the Command Bridge, as if she had been instantly transported to the Finalizer. She was falling apart remembering the smell of him, but this man was not the remorseful man she had seen on his knees on Crait nor the capricious one she had seen since. His shoulders were squared, his voice as steady as the dysfunctional mask would allow, his gloved hands casually gesturing. His physicality exuded sovereignty and confidence. His restrained demeanor and poise reminded her of the interrogation room on Starkiller, but this version was stable ...yet intimidating. His commanding energy drew all eyes to him.

Her heart skipped a beat.

Without a doubt, Rey knew that this... this was what Kylo Ren looked like. This was not the gentle man from the hut on Ahch-To; this was the enemy that everyone else saw. It should have made it easier to hate him. He chose the First Order instead of the light, instead of her. He had killed his father, tried to kill Finn, tortured Poe, caused Luke's death, tried to kill his own mother – and Rose and everyone else in the Resistance, for that matter. He tried to kill them all. She wished she had her quarterstaff to beat him over the head with it until he bled light. Every second she watched the man should have solidified her belief that there was no hope for him, but with his smell still tormenting her senses, she couldn't forget the memories of the man she believed would turn.

His back was turned to her, but she could see that he was speaking with another member of the First Order with neatly combed red hair. That man stared around the room, and the movement of his stare was fluid as it passed over her, almost as if he were looking through her. There was no reaction to her presence at all. Her friends had been equally ignorant, so she knew it was unlikely that she was visible for him. There was someone she was visible for, however. Rey held her breath, hoping Kylo wouldn't notice her, while also finding she wished he would. She listened to his conversation intently, trying to find the answers to what had happened to him in the throne room.

"Excellent, Hux. When your troops narrow down which of those planets is harboring the last of the Resistance, you know my orders." Kylo pressed the release on his helmet and removed it. The red-haired man eyed him suspiciously, but he did not comment. She almost turned away so she wouldn't have to see him when he looked upon her with Ben Solo's eyes. The other officer spoke next, and, although it sounded as if he was underwater, she was able to hear him clearly.
"We will execute on sight. No prisoners. But what of the girl?" She held her breath, knowing what "girl" the officer meant.

"The orders are clear, are they not?" Kylo said. It was his voice, but it sent a chill down her spine. Even under his mask, she had never heard him sound so... inhuman. Burning betrayal twisted through her chest as Kylo turned and glared directly into her eyes. His pupils were blown, his eyes black and emotionless. They were not the eyes of the man who saved her from Snoke. These were the eyes of a monster. She tried to suppress her tears, the agony squeezing the air from her lungs until it hurt to breathe. He had known she was standing there the entire time.

Don't say anything, don't you dare give him the satisfaction.

"Should she not be held on trial for her assassination of the Supreme Leader?" the other man replied. Kylo hesitated, never taking his cruel eyes off her.

"Leave her to me. I can feel her through the Force; there is nowhere she can hide that I can't find her. I'll hunt down every last rebel. I'll force her to watch me kill them all. Once I've destroyed everything she loves, then I'll destroy her, too." He said it so calmly, so apathetically, it sounded as if he was talking about nothing of consequence. She clenched her jaw so the sob wouldn't escape her throat.

“Are you sure that’s wise? She has defeated you twice...” the other man sniveled, and it was clear to Rey that these two men were not on the best of terms.

Kylo interrupted him. “And she was foolish enough to not finish it. It will be her own destruction.”

"Yes, Supreme Leader," the other man said in a tone far from reverent.

Supreme Leader? Those words stung more than the others. Certainly, she should have realized. He had killed the previous Supreme Leader, after all. He had asked her to join him there. Why wouldn't he be the one to ascend the throne? The events of the throne room made better sense now. She swore she wouldn't say a word, but she felt so exposed, so betrayed.

"You killed Snoke, you coward!" her voice trembled. "You call Finn a traitor, but the traitor is you! Why don't you tell them all what really happened? You didn't kill Snoke to save me; you killed him to become more powerful. You used me to help kill your guards, because you weren't strong enough to kill them on your own! And then you blamed it all on me! Luke was right. I was so foolish. I fell for it all. The bond, the vision, the whispers in the elevator...everything...it was all an illusion by you. You didn't want me to join you. You just wanted someone to blame your mess on. There is no light left in you. I will not shed a tear for a monster.”

He walked past her slowly and deliberately, as if she were nothing. His words from the throne room echoed in her head. You’re nothing to this story...You’re nothing.

“You just used me, because I'm nothing, right?” she whispered.

Relief flooded her body as he suddenly disappeared, back to his ship across the galaxy. She could feel the cold trickle of darkness slithering against her consciousness, and, in a moment of weakness, she allowed it in. It had found her in battle, but she never realized its other benefits – it fed on her fear, anger, and despair, minimizing the nagging thoughts of loneliness, abandonment and betrayal and easing her emotional pain.

Rey… a voice warned. Luke.

She pushed his warning aside. Luke didn’t understand, he hadn’t even wanted to teach her, because she went "straight to the dark.” He was jaded by what happened to his father and his nephew, but they had chosen the dark side. Rey wouldn’t. Nothing terrible had happened in the cave Luke had warned her about; she had used the darkness on Starkiller and not fallen to its temptations. She was stronger than Kylo; she could control it. She supposed this once she could allow a little more in, and then a little more, until she felt nothing. Only for a moment of peace.

She was startled when foreign voices whispered in her head. It sounded like the whispers of the Force she had heard on Takodana and Ahch-To. The others echoed the sentiment, but one dominant voice was familiar. This wasn’t the vague calls of the other whispers of the Force; this was the one from Starkiller. Kill him, it had commanded her back then. She hadn’t listened, but she bemoaned the heartache it would have saved if she had.

The whisper continued to guide her as it had then. He only killed his master for power...You mean nothing to him...That is why he so willingly brought you to be tortured by his master...He never cared for you...He chose the power and the darkness over you...He ordered for you to be shot down on Crait...He told Luke he would destroy you...He will kill you and your friends...You must kill him first... The voice disappeared into the Force as a cold wave flowed over her, calming her.
"Come find me, Kylo. I dare you. I'll be ready. And this time, I won't spare your life."
"You just used me, because I'm nothing, right?"

Kylo managed to make it around the corner before he sensed the bond close behind him. The second he knew she was gone, he let his body slump against the wall. He was trembling, his breath uneven, his eyes filled with tears. "Not to me," he whispered.
By the grace of the Force, he had remained rigid and poised for his performance. Kylo had foolishly removed his mask, because he had yearned for her to see that he didn't care any more than she did. He wanted her to know that he was better off without her. Every word he had spoken, every twitch of emotion in her eyes, however, chiseled at his resolve, the act too taxing to continue in the storm of emotions crashing through him. It was all he could do – escaping her – before he allowed her to see the truth.

Swallowing his misery, he clenched his fists in an attempt to maintain control until he reached the refuge of his quarters. There was no room for denial; her mere presence had brought forth the conflict again. After she finally spoke to him the night before, he realized that his resolve to kill her would be tested every time he heard her voice or looked into those expressive eyes. After hours of torment following their last connection, he decided that severing the bond was the only method he could employ to ensure his focus remained on his true and only purpose. He could only hope that his actions had indeed severed it, ending the emotional torture. It had always been his weakness – emotional pain. It would fade with time, he convinced himself, delving deep into the darkness, using the torment to acquire strength.

Kylo hastened through the dark corridors, hoping someone would look at him wrong. He yearned to unleash the emotions threatening to rupture through the last restraints of self-control. A droid crossed his path, and he sent it rocketing down a corridor. Stormtroopers altered course when they noticed him. “That’s right, fear me!” he sneered through gritted teeth. His knees were shaking by the time he reached his quarters. It wasn’t until the door slid shut behind him that the pretense fell away, exposing the truth. His legs couldn’t support the weight of his burdens.

What have I done?

The betrayed look in her eyes brought him to his knees, but it was the agony that she felt...that he felt through her...that evoked the animalistic moan from deep inside his soul.

No! She betrayed me! She refused me! She only used me to save her friends. She left me for dead! How can she feel so betrayed over something she wanted! How can she believe everything she said? When I offered everything to her? I offered her the galaxy!

He tried to catch his breath, but his entire chest twisted in anguish. The emotional torment was overwhelming. He considered driving his fist through the mirror so he could find focus and relief in the physical pain, but his legs were too weak to stand. When they were in the throne room, he didn't care about the light, the dark, the Jedi, the Sith, Resistance, the First Order...he didn't care about himself... that woman had suddenly become his reason to breathe. With the death of Snoke, he finally had the power to become someone worthy, he finally had someone to share it with, but then she had betrayed him.
By leaving him alone on that floor, what had she expected him to do? Kylo had to take control, he had to fulfill the destiny bestowed upon him. After she did the one thing he could never forgive, all he wanted was to get down to the base on Crait to finish it. So he became the monster. He did what he had been born to do... destroy. He wanted her to hurt, as deeply as she had hurt him. She had seen him, truly seen him. She was supposed to be different than the others he had been foolish enough to care about before, but she wasn’t. She had tried to kill him, as if everything that happened between them meant nothing. Perhaps – to her – it did.

The current condition of their bond was her doing; she deserved everything that he had said on the bridge. She deserved to suffer. He knew that, still he found witnessing the pain he caused her the worst torture he had ever known. It made no sense. If she was suffering, too, there were only a few conclusions he could deduce. The most obvious conclusion was that he was wrong; she did care, but that was impossible. If she cared, why would she betray him when he offered her everything he had? There must have been another cause for her pain – a darker, ulterior motive.

The worst part was he still obsessed over what she wanted from him, as if anything he did would ever be enough. Despite his profound desire for the contrary, it meant Snoke was right. He did have undeniable compassion for her. He was weak; but just like every other weakness he possessed, it could be trained out of him with time. Until then, he could only invest his confidence in her hatred of him. He had to believe that she had the strength that he didn't to end the bond for good. They would both be better off. They could return to their opposing sides in peace. His conflict would fade without her presence, and then they would meet again on the battlefield. There was not a doubt in his mind that the finality of their bond, the war, everything rested in their intertwined destinies. The Force had made that abundantly clear.

That realization provided him little consolation in his current state, however. Opposing, turbulent emotions twisted through the Force around him. He knew he needed to calm them before they became uncontrollable and destructive. He needed a distraction. Forcing himself to stand, he calmly removed his gloves. His boots echoed on the floor as he stepped closer to the mirror in front of him, determined to destroy it. He never avoided eye contact unless he was standing in front of his own reflection. Slowly raising his gaze, he met the eyes in the mirror.

The eyes of a monster.

Self-loathing burned the other emotions away. The mask by his door was quickly becoming an enticing alternative to staring into his own eyes. It provided him a sense of power and freedom in its intimidating anonymity, even if he had mastered disguising his emotions through years of hiding the darkest – or lightest – recesses of his mind. Practice gained him moments of expressionless neutrality, but his face always betrayed his emotions in the end. Even now, as he stood alone in his chambers, he could see the twitch of emotions in his scowl, and his eyes revealed even more. He hated everything about the man in the mirror.
Ben?

He froze and listened intently. He swore he heard a voice call his name, but it wasn’t Rey. If he didn’t know any better, he would say the voice belonged to Leia. But it had been years since he’d heard her speak that name. The thought of her drained him of strength. He must have imagined it, he convinced himself. Ever since he killed his father, he was fracturing, barely holding himself together. Now he was imagining voices.

Kylo absently combed his trembling fingers through his hair, making his appearance more orderly, but the distraction had stolen his thoughts and engrossed them. He thought of his youth when Leia played with his dark wavy hair, teaching him her world’s customs and telling him how he would have been revered as the Prince of Alderaan.

What are you doing right now, Leia? Have you found happiness in your surrogate son who doesn’t disappoint you? Are you pretending I don’t exist? Or are you planning my assassination? Was this what you feared when I was a boy?

When you pulled my hair into Alderaanian braids – against Han’s constant objections – and taught me royal customs of an obliterated world, did you find it ironic that the man you feared I was becoming was the very man who destroyed Alderaan? You tried to make me the prince you always wished I could be, while lying to my face about who I truly was. Fantastic memories.

You denied the Skywalker and Solo in my blood. You denied your father. You held onto ghosts. You couldn’t let go of your past, the good or the bad. But you couldn’t escape it, either. Forever the princess, even if not by name. An Organa. And I was to follow in your footsteps.

You filled my head with your visions of me rising high in the political arena of the New Republic. But dragging me with you was what led to my rise in the First Order. I bet you didn’t imagine that, did you? No, you were too blinded by your work in the Senate to see any of it. I watched you fight the Senate. They never took your fears seriously. You sacrificed time with your family, gave everything to them, you left me alone with the voices in my head – and what did it get you?

They did nothing.

Nothing ever progressed. Thousands died in civil wars and famine, and even as the First Order rose from the ashes of the Empire, no one would heed your warnings, because you were the daughter of Darth Vader. And I was the grandson. That was all I was ever going to be to them. It finally made sense why everyone I loved feared what made me unique. In the New Republic, it would have held me back. You should understand that more than anyone.

But here, I am the Supreme Leader of the known galaxy. I never had an interest in joining the military command. I was here to destroy your brother for what he did. But Snoke left me no choice. How could I deny this opportunity of being somebody in my own right? Not Princess Leia’s or Captain Solo’s son, or Master Jedi Luke Skywalker’s nephew. Not even Darth Vader’s grandson. Here I am, Kylo Ren. And the galaxy fears me.

I wonder if somewhere deep down you are proud of what I have become. I did what you never could, what none of you, not even my grandfather, could do. What would you say if you were here? Or would you say nothing? Would you walk away again or would you try to kill me, too?

As if he was no longer in control over his own mind, his thoughts supplied what Leia would do if she were there. She would tuck his hair, the unruly hair like Han’s that she loved so much, behind his ear. She always did that. Her smile would be weary, but familiar, though now her head would be tilted remarkably higher in order for her tired, jaded eyes to meet his. The image sickened him, and he clenched his jaw in anger, allowing the darkness to numb the pain and deepen it.

You wouldn’t stare at me with love. Not anymore, not after I killed Han. Or maybe you would. I felt things I shouldn’t have felt from you on the Raddus. Would you look at me like he did, now that it’s too late? When I was a boy, Han would stare at me like he wished I was someone else...anyone else. There were moments on the Falcon when Han almost acted like a father. When he pretended to be impressed with my skills as a pilot. I wanted nothing more than to become a pilot like him and make him proud. I could see brief moments where Han was proud, but it would always fade.

Han never knew the hours I spent when he was away on his trips, practicing and practicing from dawn until dusk to find ways to impress him, so he wouldn’t leave again. But you did – you saw it all, even if you pretended you didn’t. And you still defended him. I even tried to shut myself off from the Force for Han, but the moment it came surging back again, I felt the distance grow. I was never going to be the son Han wanted. Ever.

I wish I had taken after Han’s side - no Force powers, no emotions, no ambition to change the galaxy. I wish I had never been born. I was a burden to you both. I heard your whispers behind closed doors. How could I not with the Force heightening my senses every waking moment? You sent me away because you didn’t want me, because you feared what, no, who you saw in me. You abandoned me when I needed you the most. You let me find out about Grandfather on my own. You left me to that monster – not Snoke – your own brother.

When I was growing up, I heard the fantastic adventures of Luke, Han, and Leia saving the galaxy - mostly from others, of course; you were all too busy for me. They risked their lives infiltrating an imperial base to save you. Han braved the temperatures on Hoth to save Luke. You put yourself in danger to save Han — trapped in Carbonite — from that Hutt, Jabba. You fought for each other on Endor. Luke even risked his life to fight to turn your father from the Emperor.

But none of you loved me enough to come for me. You would fight for the New Republic and for the Resistance, but not for me. I wasn’t worth it. I was your son! Your brother forced my fall to darkness, but you left me with him, and you left me to be destroyed by Snoke, even after I saved you. I was gone six years, Leia! Do you have any idea what he did? Ben is dead. It was years too late when Han came for me. But he didn’t even come for me, did he? He came for her.
He came for the Resistance. And then with his dying breath, he had the nerve to tell me he missed me, begging me to come home. Come home to what?

He didn’t want me, I couldn’t be any less like him. He thought I was weak because I couldn’t control my emotions...the Force...my passions. Han tried to distance himself from me any chance he could. The thought of any similarities between us was just too uncomfortable for him. Instead, every time he came back from his long trips away, he’d tell me with that condescending exasperation that was so Han, “Don’t look at me like that, kid. You have your mother’s eyes.” I don’t see your eyes. I see what Rey sees - the eyes of a monster. Has Rey told you about what happened between us? I am a monster. Now I look like one.

He admired the long scar down his cheek. It split the right side of his face in two. It began above his right eyebrow and continued under his eye down his cheek and neck and onto his shoulder. This is her scar. Has Rey told you how she gave me this one? I earned it that night in the snow on Starkiller. After I killed your Han. Do you hate me even more for what I did to him? I do. Do you wish I had died instead? Me, too. She had her chance, but she gave me this scar. If only you could see the scar she gave me in the throne room. She was the perfect little acolyte, unfortunately for you, I saw through it all. Were you disappointed that she didn’t finish the job then, too?

Or were you disappointed that I didn’t turn as you all naïvely believed I would. How did you know
I wouldn’t kill her when you sent her to me? Or was she only as important to you as her use for you? That’s how I was, to both you and her. That’s all I’ve been to anyone. That is how I know with certainty that you’ll fail her, too. She has darkness in her, Leia; she needs a teacher. Do you even care? Or will you throw her away, too?

I see the truth now; there will always be that pull to light until I can destroy my past. But destroying my past includes destroying her now, thanks to you and Luke. Why did you have to take her from me, too? You’ve made her my enemy; I have to kill her. It didn’t have to be this way. You didn’t have to turn her against me.

The next time Rey and I meet, one or both of us will have to die. I don’t know if I have the strength to kill her, but the First Order does. I set all this in motion, and there is nothing you can do about it. What you and Han stubbornly refused to realize was that my fate has been sealed since you left me with Luke.

It’s too late for me, but it’s not for her. Not yet. Don’t send her for me again unless she plans to kill me. My choices will inevitably lead to her death, because I am the monster you all feared I would become. The Resistance is not worth her life. I promise I won’t touch your precious rebels if you give her the means to escape from your pathetic group of anarchists. I know it makes no sense. I should want her dead. But the thought of losing her... destroys me in places I thought no longer existed. I want to hate her, but no matter what I do, I can’t. I thought it was impossible, but I think it’s her, Leia. The girl.

With those words, the reflection in the mirror changed. He imagined his mother standing before him inside the mirror, tears streaming down her pallid face as she placed her hand against the glass. Without contemplating the madness of his actions, he lifted his own hand, dwarfing hers as he pressed it against the mirror. Tears blurred his vision as his anger ebbed, only for a moment, as he studied his mother’s aging face.

“My Ben, my sweet Ben… I should have… I’m sorry,” she whispered, her eyes welling with the lifetime of love she would never have the chance to give him.

Kylo collapsed forward onto the table in front of the mirror, his weight on his hands. He dropped his head as he attempted to control his breathing. His broad back shook violently as he battled the anxiety intensifying with every passing thought. His hands curled into fists as the wounds of his past were reopened.

When he glanced again, his mother was gone. He slowly straightened, glaring at his reflection in the mirror. The man in front of him looked less like a monster and more like a frightened boy. It disgusted him. Screaming into the empty room, he thrust his fist into the mirror as hard as the Force would carry him, the shattered pieces falling around him like rain.
Chapter End Notes

Mild violence

Kylo breaks things
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Sunlight reflected off the rain like glass as it fell through the canopy of trees above them. The canopy obscured the sun, casting the trees in shadow, except for small beams of light that penetrated the darkness. The atmosphere around them was heavy and... suffocating. They were surrounded by a dense, green jungle in every direction she turned. Rey noticed the rain was warmer on this planet than on Ahch-To. She stuck her hand out to feel the droplets on her palm but withdrew it quickly at an unexpectedly sharp sting. Examining her hand, there were red, round marks on her palm.

"Where are we?" Rey asked, backing farther up the Millennium Falcon's open cargo door. She watched other Resistance members unload their limited, but vital, supplies onto the planet. They were wrapped in coats... blankets... any material they could find to brave the weather.

"The Outer Rim," Poe replied, "Barkhesh."

"There used to be a Rebel Base here, but we hit a bit of a setback. The droid scouts just returned, and the base has been destroyed. There seems to have been a battle here at some point. The Empire left behind some old AT-ATs and supply crafts. It has temples similar in architecture to the ones used by the Rebellion on Yavin 4. We will set up a temporary base in a temple until we can find supplies."

"The planet is scarcely inhabited, but they were allied with the rebellion under the Empire. Leia believes they will help us again, if there are any tribes left. We are desperately in need of supplies. The First Order has no business here, but the surrounding rainforest gives our ships excellent cover if they come searching. Oh, and you may want to find something to wrap around yourself; that’s acid rain."

"At least it’s not sand, right?" Finn teased, hoping to lighten the mood, as he put his arm around her. They stared out at the vast expanse of trees. He sighed. "Rey, I... There’s something I need to tell you."

"What’s bothering you, my friend?" Her smile hid the fear shivering up her back, wondering if he knew the secret she had been keeping.

"I don’t know why this was so hard for me to tell you – maybe because you haven’t been the same since you came back from Ahch-To," he hesitated, "But something happened when I went on that mission with Rose, and I don’t know how to feel about it, and I’m... scared, I guess, that it will change things between us."

Rey sighed in relief. He didn’t know anything about Kylo; he was simply nervous to tell her about a woman he met. "Finn, why would that change anything between us?"

"Because I don’t know if my feelings toward her are ‘friendship’ feelings," he said softly, rubbing the back of his neck with his hand. He jolted in surprise when she jumped into his arms.
“Finn!” she squealed. “Don’t be nervous! I’m so happy for you!”

“But you know it doesn’t change anything between us, right?” he said, his brows still furrowed in concern. “You were the first person to see more in me than what I was; you’re my best friend, no, my family. You mean everything to me… but so does she, in a different way. I don’t know if I’m explaining this right…”

“I do, I understand,” she said. Though her smile remained, the brightness behind it did not. Rey did understand what it was like to care for two people in profoundly different ways, one no more important than the other. Finn would always be her family, her first friend, and she knew from his concern that she would always be his. Friendship to her was natural; effortless and uncomplicated, soul-healing and unconditional. It felt like the warmth of the sun on her face on a breezy day.

What she had felt toward Kylo had been nothing like that. It was impassioned and intense, but also intimate and profound. It felt like a live wire, but also like … like touching hands by a fire in the rain. Though, her feelings toward Kylo were more akin to her feelings regarding the acid rain on Barkhesh than the pleasant rains on Ahch-To. Kylo wasn’t the man she had believed him to be. None of it was real, but she remembered what she felt like when she believed it was. Rey could only hope that what Finn had found was real. It hurt; not because Finn had hopefully found something beautiful, but because she wished she had found that, too.

They were distracted by a commotion behind them. General Leia collapsed as she walked down the boarding ramp. Rey learned she had been weak since Kylo damaged the bridge of the Raddus, but Rey wondered if what was truly destroying this strong woman was the toll of death and war. Every hour seemed to drain more life from her. Poe tried to carry her to the temple, but she refused, being the stubborn and proud woman that she was. He helped her walk on her own instead. Poe held a blanket over her head to protect her from the rain. Finn carried Rose in his arms, a tarp protecting them both.

Rey trailed behind them quietly, a heavy grey blanket wrapped tightly around her. The light that penetrated the canopy cast dancing shadows around them. Stalks of massive blue and purple flowers veined with yellow towered over their heads, the caustic rain gently drummed off the petals harmlessly. Thunder rolled through the valley as they headed deeper into the rainforest and Rey did everything in her power to not think about the last time she had heard it.

The jungle around them was otherwise quiet, giving off the illusion of tranquility – and it would have been – if not for the veiled danger. The rain, the flowers, the quiet all seemed innocuous, but Rey grew up on a harsh, unforgiving world. She knew better. The rain was burning, the flowers were poisonous, the quiet meant predators were near. They were in perpetual danger from every direction. Would they ever find a place where they were truly safe?
Rey followed the trail of boot prints imprinted in the fine crimson soil in front of her. The soil stained the puddles collecting from the rainfall, leaving small rivulets that flowed like blood across the rainforest floor. Rey shivered, fearing that it was an omen for their precarious circumstances. How long could they hide until Kylo and his evil legions found them? What would they do? Luke Skywalker was no longer there to save them.

All at once, the forest around them disappeared as they entered a clearing, and an immense stone temple loomed before them. It was polyhedral in nature, stone steps carved into its steeply sloping lateral faces, the entrance carved into the apex.

Leia insisted on climbing, supported by her cane, up every single stair to the entrance of the temple. As they entered the archway, Rey noticed a beautiful flower growing out of a crack in the stone, partially trampled by the other Resistance members. It was ivory with purple and teal threading through the thin trumpet-like petals. She knelt and gently extracted the roots through the cracks, carefully wrapping the delicate flower in the folds of her blanket. Leia insisted on walking every stair down to the private chambers, so Rey swiftly caught up to them again. As Rey walked behind them, she noticed the burn marks on Poe’s hand. It had been the one that had held the blanket over Leia in the forest. He had suffered acid burns to ensure Leia didn’t.

He loves her more than her own son does.

"Let’s set up everything in the main ceremony hall," Poe shouted to the others as he walked Leia into one of the lower level rooms. Finn set up bedding on a sleep mat that he laid on a stone altar for Leia. Poe helped Leia onto the makeshift bed. Finn and Poe seemed caught between preparing their new temporary base and remaining by Leia’s side.

"I'll sit with her," Rey offered. Leia grasped her hand and smiled. Poe and Finn left to finish unpacking the ship.

"Thank you," she whispered.

"Of course," Rey replied. She looks so... pale. The Force was strong around the woman. It almost felt as if it drew itself away from Rey to surround Leia.

"No... thank you," Leia said again, looking in Rey's eyes, insinuating more than Rey had originally perceived. Her heart pounded in her chest.
"For what?" Rey asked carefully.

"For bringing Luke back to us," she said. Rey inhaled sharply. The name stung. "And saving us all."

Tears of shame rolled down her face. "Because of me, Luke is dead, and we are all in peril. I wouldn't be thanking me."

"Luke died with purpose, remember?" Leia reminded her. "And because of you, we made it off Crait. Don't be so hard on yourself, Rey. We love you." Her voice was barely above a whisper, but it was kind and gentle. She didn't deserve to be loved by people like them, not when she carried the secrets she did.

Rey stared down at her hands. "Have you felt Luke's presence?"

"I feel it even now," Leia replied, "He's waiting for me." Rey nodded and stifled a sob. The thought of the galaxy without Leia was terrifying. They needed her to win this war.

"And Han?"

"I don't know. Han was never strong with the Force. When he died, I didn't sense his passing as I did with Luke. I only sensed my son's grief and remorse over what he had done. I don't know if he is waiting in the Force. I truly hope so. Han... didn't understand the Force. He didn't want to understand it. But that's what made me fall in love with him in the first place," Leia said with a smile.

Rey was desperate to know more about this family she was inexorably drawn to. "How so?"

"When I first met Han, I hated him," Leia replied with a huff. "He was selfish, stubborn, arrogant and always right, at least in his head. All he cared about was money, and I was an annoyance to him. And according to him, when we first met, he wasn't sure whether he wanted to kill me or kiss me." She paused for a moment, lost somewhere in the past. "He was everything that a princess should have hated. But there was something else there, underneath that rough and hardened exterior. He was witty, worldly and spontaneous, especially when it came down to decision-making. He was brave, honest and rougishly handsome..." Leia smiled as Rey blushed. "And when we needed him the most, he came back and helped save us all."
"Then...what happened?" Rey asked, realizing belatedly that she had likely been too forward.

"Life, as it does," she said with a sigh. "I put my heart into helping govern the New Republic. That wasn't Han, as much as I tried to make it be. He never wanted to be in one place for too long. He missed the old days on the Falcon and the freedom of open space. And then with Ben... He didn't understand the Force, especially with Ben's intensity, so it was hard for them to connect.

"Ben was more like me. He was sensitive, emotional, and passionate about changing the world. Han loved him, so very much, more than anything. He just didn't understand him. The only understanding they shared was Ben's natural skill as a pilot. On the rare occasion Han brought him on his travels, they both came home... happy. But the Force growing in Ben conflicted with what I think Han had always hoped for in a son. He had hoped for a life for his son without the complexity of the Force. It destroyed Han to watch Ben suffer, knowing he could do nothing to help him. He felt like a failure when we sent Ben away to Luke's temple. All we wanted was our son back from the darkness that tormented him.

"When Ben... when we lost him, we both felt guilty. Han was never great about talking about his feelings," she huffed a broken chuckle. "We let a galaxy grow between us with everything we didn't say. I wish I had tried harder when he was here; I just never thought he wouldn't be." Leia paused to catch her breath, though Rey wondered if she was trying to swallow the same sorrow she was. "That's not true; I think part of me knew he wouldn't be here. He was holding Ben when he was just a baby, and I told him that one day he would be a grandfather. Do you know what he told me? 'Speak for yourself, sweetheart. Me, I ain't ever getting that old.' I felt something in the Force then – call it intuition – and I knew he was telling me the truth, even if he didn't know it then. I also felt that 'intuition' when I told him once, long before Ben was even born, 'someday you're going to be wrong, and I just hope I'm there to see it.' I wish I hadn't been.

"Han had his faults, but he was always there when we needed him most. We never stopped loving each other or holding out hope that one day Ben would come home." She smiled through tears. Her eyes were sullen...hopeless. "I know now that will never happen."

Guilt tightened in Rey's throat. She had been so close to bringing Kylo back to his family, and Leia had no idea. She had failed, just like Han. What was the point of telling her that she had seen the light in him if he had chosen evil in the end? Rey wanted to never speak or hear of Kylo again. Let the past die, he had told her, and she wished she could. Unfortunately, her bond with Kylo could put them all at risk. Leia needed to know.

"Leia. It's about Kylo... Ben…"
“Like I said about his father,” Leia murmured drowsily, “He’s got to follow his own path. No one can choose it for him. His father came back for us when we needed him most, but Ben is not coming back. I held out hope for so long, but he made his choice.”

“But you don’t understand —”

Leia interrupted her. "I'm sorry, Rey. After Crait, I just don't have the strength for any more heartache right now. Whatever it is, it can wait. You look exhausted. I'm sure you could use a few hours of rest too." Leia smiled and squeezed her hand, her eyes fluttering shut.

Rey nodded and began humming softly – a song inspiring sorrow yet hope – the only soothing tune she could remember. Her thumb caressed soft circles over the hand of the woman who would be the closest figure she would ever have to a mother as she slowly drifted to sleep.

On the edge of unconsciousness, Leia asked softly, “Where did hear that lullaby?”

“I don't remember,” Rey answered, leaving her hand in Leia’s grasp, sobbing softly, as the broken woman fell asleep. Rey sat with her as she slept, wondering how the legendary story of the Skywalker family would end with the ultimate betrayal by a deeply loved son. How could you do this to them, Kylo? If you could only see what you have done to your own mother. I know you’ll never tell me. Or you'll lie. Your family loved you. Luke made a mistake, but at least you had a family. How did it all end up like this?

Rey felt the gut-churning sensation of his presence in the Force. As their connection grew taut, his energy enveloped the room around her. She held her breath, awaiting the inevitable. Her eyes scanned the room, but he never appeared. A different presence entered the room.

"Hi," a soft voice said behind her. Rey turned. A woman with smiling eyes and raven hair had joined her at Leia’s side. Though she had only seen her unconscious, she knew who she was. Rose.

"Hi, I'm Rey," she smiled.

"Oh, I know who you are. Everyone knows who you are! You helped destroy Starkiller, you fought Kylo Ren and won, you brought Luke back and rescued us all! You're a hero!" The woman giggled awkwardly. “I didn’t know what you looked like, but I saw you sitting here, and I knew it just had to be the last Jedi they’ve all been talking about. I said to myself ‘Rose, this is someone special.’"
"Nice to meet you, Rose," Rey beamed, "Finn has told me so much about you. I'm glad to see you are finally awake. You had us all worried."

The woman blushed and quickly sat down next to Rey. "Yeah, nothing like kissing a guy and professing your love for him, then finding out you were in a coma for days. Talk about awkward."

"You love Finn?" Rey asked. Did Finn feel the same? He had told her he felt romantic feelings toward the woman; was it love? The word caused something dark and slimy to build in her chest. Rey forced it away as best as she could.

Rose’s smile wavered. "Yes...I do...I know you two are close, and I hope that's not..."

Rey interrupted her, realizing what her tone likely implied. "No, I'm happy for you!" she smiled genuinely. "And him. Finn deserves to be happy. I'm sorry if I sounded upset." Rose expression looked skeptical, so Rey continued without considering the consequences. "I just... had a guy break my own heart, and I guess I let the envy get the best of me."

"You seemed like you were really deep in thought when I walked in. Was that about this guy?" Rose shifted closer and placed her hand over the Rey’s in a gesture that was kind and sincere, but it reminded her too much of another hand.

Rey didn't know this woman, but something in the Force told Rey she could trust her. She was surrounded by people but no one she could truly talk to, not about this. "Yes. Can I trust you?"

"You’re in luck,” Rose said. “My sister Paige was much better at giving advice, but I’m excellent at keeping secrets.”

Was. Rose had lost people too. The way Rose was looking at her was not as a member of the Resistance, but as a friend. Rey believed she would keep her secret. Releasing a slow breath, she made her decision. “I can't explain it, but there’s this guy that I can’t stop thinking about. It’s... complicated. Really, really complicated. But he can find me through the Force, and that means he can find me here. I don't know if I should go. Leia is too weak to talk about it, and I’m not ready for everyone to know the truth," she confessed to this woman she had known five minutes. Despite the implications of her words, Rose did not appear frightened or angry at all.

"We are family here, Rey. I don't know much about the Force or this guy, but I do know that we are here for each other, no matter what, because we are all we have. Please stay." Rose smiled and surprised Rey by hugging her. Rey wrapped one arm around her awkwardly, her other hand still grasped in Leia’s. She smiled in the woman’s embrace, the loneliness ebbing if only for a moment.

“Ben, I’m sorry,” Leia whispered quietly next to them. Rey swallowed a sob as they turned and stared somberly at the sleeping mother.

Chapter End Notes

Mild Injury

Rey receives an injury on her hand
The Machine

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
General Hux smiled through the Holovid. It was a diagram of a complex machine comprised of a deep, round, electrified chamber. There was a circular platform in the center of the chamber, hovering off the floor by powerful magnets. Affixed to the platform was a large, vertical glowing Kyber crystal partially submerged in a pool of liquid. Two circular revolving bars surrounded the platform. Smaller, glowing kyber crystals were attached to the inside of the bars. The diagram illustrated how extendable walkways connected to the platform for easy access.

The machine was labeled FORCE DESTINY.

The general closed the Holovid, handed it to an officer and nodded, dismissing him. "The pieces have fallen into place perfectly."

"What pieces, General?" The vocoder of Kylo’s helmet hissed and spat as he spoke, but he held his head high as the Supreme Leader should. Kylo waited for Hux's smile to fade, as it usually did when he entered the bridge, but it only grew wider. The general's eyes resembled a predator’s, and Kylo was only familiar with them looking more like prey. Kylo’s pace slowed as he sensed he was walking into an ambush. His eyes narrowed. He had the impulse to choke Hux, to regain control over him again, but he was too curious about what he was going to reveal.

"Force Destiny, of course...Supreme Leader," he chuckled. Kylo was grateful for the emotionless expression the mask provided as he searched the general's expression for the meaning behind his words.

"Force Destiny?" He managed an unconvincing chuckle. "This better not be your next Starkiller base, Hux. Its design flaws were too extensive; I will not risk creating another one." Kylo had wanted nothing to do with the first one. He would never allow Hux to create another. The control he had felt over the situation was fading. The dread started to crawl under his skin, as the Force clawed at his intuition. Something was coming. Something big. The general had a different air about him. He did not seem as careful to choose his words. His fear of a physical reaction was missing from his relaxed demeanor.

Hux smiled. His words were derisive and mocking. “Are you telling me that the mighty Kylo Ren, Snoke's very own apprentice, was not made aware of Force Destiny?”
“Should I have been?”

Hux stared at his gloves, adjusting them with casual inconsequence although his words were anything but. “I suppose not; it’s just the detailed plan put in place to be carried out at the event of his untimely death.”

_The what?_

He hadn’t realized he had said the two words aloud until Hux’s eyes flashed up to his visor. His General began laughing, but Kylo couldn’t find it in him to be angry as his mind reeled. Snoke’s plan. Snoke had a plan. Of course, he had a plan. Why didn’t I see it before? “This is just too good,” Hux continued in a fit of laughter. “You’re telling me you have no knowledge of the most powerful machine the Dark Side has ever created.”

His patience was wearing thin. The general continued to laugh at him, and Kylo couldn’t allow him that advantage. “Do I have to _pry_ it out of you? I don’t think either of us wants me inside your mind.”

His threat had the intended effect. Hux’s face pinched in disgust. “This machine manipulates the Force and individuals like yourself and Snoke who are sensitive to it. It can take life… and _restore_ it.” He eyed Kylo, waiting for him to make the connection, waiting for fear or panic to tighten or shudder through him. Kylo hid behind his mask, but, internally, he was terrified.

_No. It’s impossible._

“Certainly, you’ve studied it in all of your _extensive_ training sessions,” Hux continued. “Why wouldn’t you; Snoke had first-hand knowledge of the machine, after all. But surely _you_ know better than anyone that Snoke lived before. How did you think he was reincarnated last time?”

Kylo was thankful for the mask. “Snoke was… reincarnated before,” he said, more to himself than his subordinate, attempting to wrap his mind around something straight out of a nightmare. He briefly considered whether he was suffering hallucinations from sleep deprivation. His spiraling thoughts were drawn back to focus when Hux spoke again.

“He was betrayed by his own apprentice.”
He could barely conceal the shuddering fear in his voice. “What did you say?”

“That was why he had to be reincarnated before – he was betrayed by his own apprentice. You were his apprentice for all those years, surely he told you that your own grandfather once knelt before him as you did?” Hux paused, watching him for a reaction. The implication of his words shuddered down Kylo's spine. He knew Hux noticed. “Or did he have reasons not to trust you, Ren?” The general stressed every word as if he was giving one of his inciting, demagogue speeches.

If Vader knelt before him, then he was... Sidious.

It was impossible, yet his intuition screamed that it was true. Kylo could not find his voice to answer. The general's smile was wide and malicious, his eyes wild with excitement. The gravity in the room felt heavy, crushing the breath from Kylo’s chest. His stomach churned. In an instant, everything had changed. Whatever the consequences, he decided in that moment that he could not allow them to succeed in building that machine. He cleared his throat. “When will construction begin?”

“It already has,” the general replied clandestinely. “The machine will be mobile. It should be constructed in time for the repairs to be finished on the Supremacy....”

“The Supremacy is salvageable?”

“Yes, thankfully the anarchists did not damage any vital components with their little stunt. Kuat-Entralla maintains that the severed starboard wing will be a labor-intensive but relatively uncomplicated, fix.” Kylo hated surprises. He was the Supreme Leader. How had he not known any of this? Once the general realized Kylo would remain in agitated silence, he continued. “Once the Finalizer docks on the finished Supremacy, Force Destiny will be transferred to its permanent location. Perhaps the throne room?”

“Any other news you care to share?” Kylo managed to rasp.

“That is all,” the general grinned derisively. “For now.”

"Carry on, then,” he replied as flatly as the hurricane of emotions raging inside him would allow. “And contact Bazine Netal. Inform her to send for the Knights of Ren.”
If I'm going to do this, I'll need all the help I can get.

He turned and walked slowly yet deliberately off the bridge, refusing to make eye contact with any of the officers.

"It was an ingenious plan if you think about it, Ren," Hux called after him, "Even you should know that darkness can not be destroyed. And when you're at the top, everyone else wants your power. There's only one place to go. Someone is bound to betray you eventually."

Kylo swallowed his fear as reality crashed through him. He manipulated the Force to remain upright as Hux continued shouting after him. "Soon, Force Destiny will be finished, and Snoke will return to lead the First Order to domination over the entire galaxy!"

When Kylo was out of sight, Hux turned around to contemplate the vast expanse of space through the large viewports of the bridge. "Who are the Knights of Ren?" he wondered aloud. "Did Snoke have an army of Force users he kept secret? A week ago, this news would have been unnerving, but that was before my little discovery. This will be easier than anticipated. Snoke’s secret weapons will play into my hand perfectly."
Chapter End Notes

Vague description of death

Force Destiny is a machine that takes lives and this briefly describes that
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Kylo stood, his hands clasped behind his back, as a Kyber crystal taller than him was lowered into a chamber in the floor. Force Destiny. At least, it would be, soon enough. It was in a well-guarded room, behind three code-secured blast doors, in the highest classified section of Weapons Development. A quick skim of a Bothan contractor’s mind—an expendable liability who would likely “go missing” after he finished his top-secret assignment—revealed that Hux outdid himself with redundancies. The largest obstacle Kylo discovered was that the majority of the controls for the machine were housed on the Command Bridge rather than in the room itself. Kylo screwed his eyes shut as a wave of fear crashed through him. Even as the most powerful man in the galaxy, he still had no command over what happened. There were too many redundancies, even with the assistance of the Force. With Hux’s distrust, he would be executed for treason long before he was able to destroy the machine.

I can’t stop it.

As his emotions began to spiral, Kylo had enough sense to download the schematics of the machine onto his holopad before he was lost to the control of his fear or the darkness, whichever one consumed him first. Would there ever be a moment when his emotions didn’t control him? Would there ever be a moment when he had control over anything? All he wanted was peace; freedom from the fetters that bound him, that dragged him down into an ever-constant state of emotional drowning. Other Force-sensitives possessed the Force. Whether it was the light or the darkness, the Force possessed him.

Approaching the end of the corridor, he should have turned right to make his way back to his quarters. As the fear inside him escalated, he found himself turning left. He had no plan of where he wanted to go, he simply felt drawn to follow that path. It wasn’t often that he allowed himself to surrender to the will of the Force; instead, he would fight it for the sake of fighting. Not this time. The nightmares kept him awake, food was repulsive, a permanent ache had taken up residence in his chest, the fear and anger that fed the darkness were slowly consuming him alive, and his master would return. Nothing had changed since he had come into power; nothing was better. He couldn’t find it in himself to care, so he let the Force guide him to wherever it pushed him to go, even if it was down a maintenance shaft.

I can’t do this anymore.

Kylo hated ships. He had always wanted to be a pilot, but with the Force, he found it impossible. On world, if his emotions unraveled, he could find a secluded place to “discharge” them; but on a ship? His only option was controlled destruction, or he’d blast a hole in the ship with the Force. His father had been too nervous to fly with him as he grew older, and for that—and that alone—he didn’t blame him. It was simple physics to understand what a hole in a ship would do in the vacuum of space.
Kylo's emotions were always volatile, but right now they were at their worst. A violent reaction was inevitable. An ever-strengthening voice in his head made the argument for allowing the Force to blow a hole in the ship. If it was a strategic enough placement, the entire destroyer could implode, bringing Force Destiny down with it. His master could never return, and Kylo would be at peace.

He had never considered the option of taking his own life before. Granted, he never valued his life – why would he when no one else did – nor was he particularly fearful of his inevitable fate, but he hadn’t considered it. He'd fought too hard to survive Luke's attack to waste the opportunity for revenge. Even as a boy, he had trouble believing he would live to see his thirtieth standard year. It was a milestone that was swiftly approaching, and even now he hadn’t considered that he would reach it. He often found himself complacent toward his own mortality, or even invincible, due to a litany of close calls that had desensitized him.

Still, he’d never considered taking fate into his own hands, that is, not until he killed his father. Then Luke died, and his strongest reason to survive died with him. That seemed like a good enough reason as any to end it all. No one would know the evil he prevented from being unleashed upon the galaxy, but Kylo never cared much for fame anyway. He found himself walking toward the stern of the ship, approaching the power and propulsion center.

The reactor. He could blow them all to Hell. Good enough.

Would it be, though? Would it be good enough? He had only just learned of Hux’s plan. What if there were contingencies? What if there were others? Would he be stopping anything at all? If he removed this ship with its high command, it could leave the First Order weak. Who would bring order to the galaxy, if not them?

Kylo was passing the garbage compactors when he heard the shrill shrieks of a droid in trouble. Kylo had learned binary and droidspeak before he’d learned Basic from his family's many droids. He had no doubt the droid was begging for help. The First Order droids were programmed to be cold and ruthless, nothing like the droids he had grown up with. This one sounded more childlike, lost and afraid. His own spiraling fears subsided as he focused his search for the droid. Opening a garbage shoot, he found the droid lodged halfway down, grasping the walls with its compressed liquid cable tethered by its launchers.

“Don't be afraid,” he assured it. “I'll help you.”

With a swift manipulation of the Force, the droid began to lift effortlessly toward him until it had reached the farthest extension of its tethers. “Trust me; let go,” he murmured. The droid surprisingly did trust him, and he was able to drag it out of the hole it had fallen through. Kylo learned quickly that the droid – a young, male personality, black and silver BB series astromech referred to as BB-10XZ—hadn't fallen.

The droid told Kylo a story of being treated like an object, property, as many droids were still subjected to throughout the galaxy. He was told he was a failure, broken, inferior, and worthless until he believed it. They called him BB-10XZ, but all he wanted was a real name. The others laughed. Quality tests marked him as defective because he was too much like the 'lesser' BB-8 units. Finally, he was thrown away with the garbage, told he was "not useful enough" to live anymore. He sustained damage to his occipital sensors when he had fallen, effectively making him as worthless as they had insisted all along. Kylo swallowed past the tightness in his throat, blinking back his emotions. He wished he didn't understand how the droid felt.

His previous mission temporarily abandoned, Kylo guided the droid to his side. Using the Force as a tether, he helped guide the BB unit with the slightest adjustments of the energy around him. Not a single officer noticed the odd pair, or, if they did, they had enough sense not to glance his way. He guided the droid back to Weapons Development, finding a droid development room. The astromech enjoyed tumbling his way through the room as Kylo search for spare BB units, or sensor parts. His search was unsuccessful, but he was able to find a manual for that series.

As he left the room with the droid in tow, he noticed a blonde-haired contractor exiting the room adjacent to Force Destiny. It also contained a large, vacant chamber, and he was curious about what else Hux had up his sleeve. “What weapon is being developed in that room?”

The contractor stared at him in an odd mixture of reverence and fear. “Whatever you would like to be developed, sir.”

_I am the Supreme Leader. I am the Supreme Leader. I can make whatever I want, it’s my ship, these are my weapons, I can stop the Force Destiny without blowing this place. But what can I make to stop...“Can we create a rapid-freezing carbon chamber?”_

“Sir?”

His mind was already a thousand steps ahead. If the other man said anything else, he couldn’t hear him over his frantic thoughts. He turned on his heel, nearly forgetting the droid as he took off toward his chambers. After the astromech whined in sadness, he stopped and guided it with the Force until it caught up to him. He had the manual; he could fix the droid and then he could drop the droid off on the next on-world trip he made.

Once inside his chambers, he used the Master Comm to demand one of the officers to find schematics for the freezing chamber from the Empire archives. Then he collapsed into his chair, throwing the manual on the desk and opening the schematics for Force Destiny on his holopad. The droid asked warily what Kylo wanted the manual for; what he would try to fix.

“I'll fix your sensor,” he promised the droid as he scoured the holo. “You don't need to fix anything else.” The droid continued to stare at him, but Kylo didn’t notice. He was analyzing the holovid that explained how the machine functioned. The more he watched, the more terrified he became of the implications.

The Holovid demonstrated the three different applications for the machine; the first explained how to remove the lifeforce of an individual, the second explained how to save a dying individual, and the third explained how to reincarnate an already deceased individual whose lifeforce had previously been imbued upon an object.

The first application was simple. The machine could be used to drain the lifeforce from a living Force-sensitive subject. It operated by strapping the subject onto the vertical Kyber crystal. When the control lever on the panel was dragged into the “up” position, the machine rotated the revolving bars forward until they were moving at high enough speeds that they created a spherical bubble of Force. Once the Force sphere was created, energy – quintessence dark energy – was pulled from the electrified chamber into the Force sphere. It reacted with the energy from the Kyber crystals, and that energy traveled into the subject standing in the liquid on the platform. That energy was absorbed into the larger crystal, removing the lifeforce from the subject and transferring that essence into the Kyber liquid. The liquid containing that lifeforce was removed and saved for later use or discarded to be replaced by another Force-sensitive’s lifeforce.

The second application was more complicated. It detailed how the machine was used to contain the lifeforce of a dying subject, then transfer that lifeforce into an inanimate, previously Force-sensitive body. The control lever on the panel was moved into the “up” position, as it was done in the first application, and the lifeforce was removed from the subject and transferred into the Kyber liquid. The body was then discarded. Another viable body – typically drained of life by the first application – was strapped onto the vertical Kyber. The control lever was pulled into the "down" position. The machine rotated the revolving bars backward, and the energy was pulled from the large Kyber outward, removing the lifeforce essence from the liquid and into the inanimate body, reanimating it.

The third application required freshly melted Kyber liquid containing no lifeforce. The liquid was created as a byproduct of the machine when the Kyber melted in the reaction between the crystals and energy, but it could be flash frozen and stored in large containment vats. An imbued object was placed in the fresh Kyber liquid. The machine was started with the lever dragged into the "up" position, removing the essence from the object and absorbing it into the Kyber liquid. As in the second application, an inanimate Force-sensitive body was strapped onto the vertical Kyber, and the control level was dragged into the "down" position. The lifeforce from Kyber liquid then transferred into the inanimate body, reanimating the soul in the new body.
I’ll destroy it all – the entire galaxy – before I allow him to return.

Chapter End Notes

Vague death description

Force Destiny is a machine that takes lives and this describes the process

Suicidal contemplation
Kylo considers blowing up the ship to prevent the future he sees as inevitable from occurring. These will be reoccurring thoughts for Kylo. Please message me for more information about clarification on his future thoughts/actions if this is your trigger.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Rey moved her few belongings into one of the quiet underground chambers of the temple. The chambers were aligned in a spiral, connected by elaborate corridors decorated with stunning wall paintings by an ancient civilization. She had chosen a room on the farthest edge of the spiral, isolating herself from the rest of the Resistance.

The rooms were crafted entirely from stone, leaving a cold, damp feel to the air around her. The most depressing aspect of the rooms was the heavy, impenetrable darkness. No light from the outside world could reach the shadows there. The only light in her room was artificial, created by the disposable glowrods she had affixed to the torch sconces on the wall. Despite the artificial light, the vaulted ceiling was eternally cast in darkness, a constant reminder of the presence hovering tormentingly close in the back of her mind.

She set up her makeshift bed on a stone slab at the center of the room. It was more comfortable than what she had on Jakku, so she didn’t mind. She rummaged through a box of droid parts by her bed, finding a concave piece to set the flower in. She scooped some dirt from the floor, burying the roots in a bed of crimson. Then she gently poured some water over the delicate, bruised pedals from her canteen.

“Don’t worry, I can fix this; I can save you.” She set her pack onto her bed and sighed, glancing around the empty room. Her best friend had saved them all by bringing them to this world. She was grateful he had found his place. The Resistance would thrive there until the First Order inevitably found them and they had to run again. Though Rose had assured her she could stay, the woman had no idea the danger lurking in Rey’s own mind. She was the greatest threat to them all.

Rey knew she couldn’t stay there. If she loved them – which she did – then she knew what she had to do. She didn’t have a choice. Her connection could lead him straight to them. Either she left the new base, or they all died. After what she witnessed on Crait, she knew without a doubt that he would kill them all. They would stand no chance against him. I have to leave before he sees this place.

The Force stole the choice from her, actualizing the very fear she had tried to prevent. Her breath caught in her throat as she felt a tightening in their bond. No, no, no, no, no, please, no. The Force vibrated around her, drawing them together. She was immediately surrounded by his darkness.

Not again.

Rey was overtaken by fear. That is, until she saw him. Kylo was seated at a desk. She could see his profile; his back slightly turned toward her. He was scouring over strategical plans on his screen with an intense desperation she could feel. It must have been important, because he closed them when he sensed her.

It’s probably plans for how to destroy the Resistance. No, what am I thinking? He doesn’t plan; he just makes up his evil as he goes along.

“Can we not do this now?” he sighed. He made no other move to acknowledge her existence. It was agonizing to see him again. It was easy when he was gone to force herself to forget, but the moment she saw him, everything came flooding back, like removing a fallen boulder from a river. There was anger and disappointment, yes, but there was also a part of her that yearned for the man in the hut. Without his mask, it was not difficult to see that man in him. She hated it, because he wasn’t that man White-hot anger shot through her like electricity as she stared at him, and the darkness found her to soothe it. She allowed it in.
"Get out," she growled. He did not turn to look at her, instead fixating on clenching and unclenching his hands on the desk. Her chest heaved as she stared at him, her body shaking in anticipation.

He doesn’t care… He thinks you’re nothing to this war, but you can show him… Kill him…
Save Leia, Finn, Rose, Poe, your family. Do the entire galaxy a favor… No one will miss a monster… You will be the Jedi that the galaxy needed… You will be important and wanted…
Show him that you’re not nothing, a voice in the Force whispered.

Rey had been unsure what it was when she had first heard it. She assumed they were whispers from the Force similar to the ones that had called to her on Takodana and Ahch-To. These whispers different; they were less of a shepherd and more of a mentor, though they were decidedly more partial than she had expected from the Force. Perhaps she had been chosen because the Force knew she would be its vessel.

"Where do you want me to go? I won’t ‘get out’ of my own chambers," he responded, "I have no more control over this than you do."

How can you be so calm! Like nothing ever happened between us! Why must I be connected to a monster! It sickens me to even look at you –

She had almost said it — his chosen name — but it felt wrong. She could call him that name to the others, why not to him? It was the name attached to the man he had chosen to be, was it not? Yet, Rey couldn’t bring herself to utter those seven letters to the man in front of her. She refused to let him win and call him "Kylo Ren." He didn't deserve to be called "Ben," either. Not anymore. There was a war inside her; a battle between the truth whispered in the darkness and her own deeply entrenched hope that he was more than the monster he had become. The darkness won.

“This isn’t fair!” she shouted. It was directed less at him and more at the Force. “I don’t want to be here! I didn’t choose this! I didn’t ask for this stupid bond! I don’t want it! Why do I have to be bonded to you?"

Kylo clenched his jaw, turning away to stare off at the opposite side of the room.

Oh, is the Supreme Leader too good to look at a nothing scavenger? I should kill you right now and do my friends, the Resistance, Leia, the entire galaxy a favor! As she said the words, a part of her begged her to realize that they weren’t her own, but she refused to listen. Her hands were clenched in tight, shaking fists. She wanted to hurt him like he had hurt her. He smugly kept his back to her, disinterested enough not to bother to look at her.
"You still want to kill me? You should have taken the chance on the Supremacy. Or was I not 'sporting' enough while unconscious?" he whispered, barely audible. Her body jerked with fear.

Could he hear me? How could he hear my thoughts? Can he hear these thoughts? Can he hear any thoughts I have ever had? No, no I can't think like that. I would go crazy. Luke was right, every time we see each other, the Force bond grows stronger. Why? What have I done to deserve this? How do I stop this? Why do I have to be the one who sits here figuring it out? And he gets to sit there as if nothing happened. Despite her fear spilling into the bond, he remained turned from her in ambivalence. No, you don't get to just sit there.

Instinctively, she seized a droid part from the box by her bed and threw it in his direction with a cry of anger. He didn't flinch as it passed right through him. The fruit had passed across the galaxy between them, but not the droid part. What was the difference between the two instances? The intention? Or the wielder?

Resenting that the Force had responded to him and not her, she picked up another and another and propelled them at him with ferocity, watching them sail through him and strike the wall. It only served to further incense her.

“If you’re going to throw droid scraps at me, could you at least throw sensors for BB units?” he asked quietly.

If he wanted astromech sensors, she would throw every single one she had at him. "You are the worst thing that has ever happened to me!” she screamed, throwing the part at him, willing it to hurt him. It missed him but crashed into the objects on his desk sending them flying. His head followed its path of destruction before he laid his palms flat on the surface of his desk, exhaling slowly as he understood the implications – just as they had dawned on her.

The bond is getting stronger. I can affect his surroundings. That means I can hurt him. That means... I can kill him... right now.

He turned haltingly and his eyes finally met hers. She had spent the connection demanding he look at her, but she wished she hadn’t. His eyes were drowning in misery he didn’t deserve to feel. He opened his mouth to say something, but pressed his quivering lips together and swallowed it instead.

No, you don't get to look at me this way. You're the monster!
Remember Rey, every moment you are connected – every moment he is alive – your friends are at risk.

"I want the past to die!" she screamed. "I want you to die. I want all this pain to end! I want your mother to have peace so she can stop suffering! The thought of you is literally killing her!" He winced and inhaled sharply. The agony constricted through her chest again, so she searched deep for the anger that felt so much more... empowering. She struggled to breathe against the pressure, grasping more spare parts in her fury and forcing them at him. She was well aware of his extensive knowledge of manipulating objects with the force; he could easily stop the attack. It was merely comforting to imagine hurting him. The thought had never crossed her mind, however, that he wouldn’t block them.

Inexplicably, he didn’t. With his eyes fixed on hers, he allowed them to crash into him without as much as a flinch. She recoiled as a sharp pain radiated from her shoulder, the same area a droid part had just hit Kylo. She threw another, striking him in the ribs and cried out as she felt the pain, too. The realization shuddered through her.

I can feel what he feels.

Kylo stared at her with those intense, piercing eyes. The cruel words that had formed like venom in the darkness died on her lips. The world melted away. His stare was captivating her, enchanting her. The Force was an unnecessary weapon in those moments when their eyes connected; he could paralyze her with the deep ferocity of his gaze. Kylo did not have to speak; there was a fire burning behind his eyes that communicated more than his words ever could. It ignited a warmth within her that she dared not contemplate, a sense of feeling alive in ways she never had before.

He’d had that effect on her from the moment their eyes first met. Rey hated when he used those deep, captivating eyes to manipulate her; when he spoke without words, when his emotions said more than Basic ever could. It was too intimate. It made it difficult for her to react, and that was dangerous. It forced her to consider the thoughts behind the emotions that smoldered within his all-consuming stare. It forced her to consider her own as well.

Rey longed for the impenetrable wall that was Kylo's cold, cruel eyes – the eyes that shut out the galaxy with a hardened darkness that had lost all humanity. Those were the eyes of a man she could fight. Those eyes were rare in her presence, however, and never directed at her. The eyes before her were tormented and pained. Staring into them twisted a nerve deep inside her, fracturing her resolve. These were the eyes she had seen on Crait – the eyes of a broken, pleading man.

They were not the eyes of a monster, nor of a lying, manipulative creature like his master. There was nothing evil about them. It was what had surprised her the most when he had first removed his helmet in her presence. He was just a man.

A man who crushed your heart without a care in the galaxy.

That thought ignited the rage that was simmering inside her. She grabbed more parts out of the box and wildly threw them at him, screaming at him, but he made no attempt to defend himself.

"Do something! You coward!" She could feel the heat radiating from her body, drawing strength from the energy around her. The anger strengthened her as it had that night on Starkiller. If she had a working lightsaber, there would be nothing he could do to stop her. She would defeat him again. But this time, she would make sure she killed him.

But you do not have a lightsaber… because of him.

Rey grabbed half of the broken lightsaber and threw that at him instead. "Look at what you did! Destroyed! Just like everything else you touch!" He caught it in his hand, without breaking eye contact, his eyes searching hers for something. His fierce stare penetrated through to her soul.

“Stop.”

Rey shook her head vehemently. He could tell his evil underlings what to do, but not her. “I wish I never left Jakku! I wish I never met Han and convinced him to help us bring Beebee-Ate to the Resistance! I wish I never met Maz! Or went into that room! I wish I never touched this!” She shouted, holding up her half of the lightsaber. “Then I would have never run into that forest and never met you!” The darkness surged inside her. It was almost… pleased with what she had said.

"Stop, Rey." His voice betrayed his calm exterior. The memory of what happened in the throne room replayed in her head at the softness of her name on his lips.

Don't you dare call me that. You don’t deserve to say my name like that.

The anger spread deeply, the burning fire giving way to cold. The cold numbed and suppressed the agonizing pain. It felt...satisfying, as if she had fed an insatiable hunger that she never knew she had. She felt… powerful.
Yes... the Force voice was pleased. You can end this now... Let the Force guide you... Show him how much the galaxy hates him... Free the galaxy of Kylo Ren... Prove to him that you are not weak, that you could not be seduced into compassion for a creature like him... No, you are strong, you have bested him... He is only alive because you showed him mercy... But you will not make that mistake again... He should fear you... It is the Force’s will... It is your destiny...

Rey watched his eyes widen as he sensed the transformation in her. She hoped it scared him to see her at her most powerful. The darkness pulsed through her, enveloping her senses, becoming the very oxygen she breathed. It called to her, howling against her like tempest winds, urging her to bend to its will. She closed her eyes and let it guide her.

Kill him, the voice whispered.

Her eyes snapped open and fell upon his lightsaber, foolishly abandoned on the desk. It called to her as if it were her own. Unseen forces were drawing her in, luring her, tempting her. To fight against them would be to rend the fibers of her very existence. Without contemplating the consequences, she reached out and summoned it to her hand. With quick reflexes, he slammed his hand down over it before it moved off the desk. She pounced for it, but his hand was swifter. Kylo jumped to his feet in a seething rage. With sharp, adept movements he lunged toward her like a thundering hurricane of raw power. The fiery red plasma of his blade was pointed at her throat before the vents had ignited in their fixed delay.

"Enough!" he shouted, his breathing ragged.

“Do it!” she screamed, unafraid in the face of the deadly weapon. It was a danger she had intimate knowledge of. Her chin was lifted in defiance, every muscle in her body rigid with the will to fight. Perhaps naïvely, she trusted the belief in her heart that he wouldn't dare hurt her. She had once hoped it was because he cared, but his rejection of her had proved otherwise. He just wanted her for her power; to teach her so she could join him to rule the galaxy. The reminder of the events in the throne room left an ache in her chest she wished the darkness could fill.

“I could never care about a man like you! No one could! You're impossible to love! So do it!”

His eyes were hard and black, his entire body vibrated in anticipation. Rey had seen a volatile Kylo on Starkiller, yet she had never seen his wrath quite like this. His emotions were tightly coiled springs that would snap if they were breathed on wrong. She had seen his propensity for violence, but she continued to provoke him. To prove what, she hadn't considered.
“If you won't do it, I will!” she screamed, “I will free the galaxy of a monster, and they will thank me, because everyone hates you! The galaxy hates you! Your mother hates you! I hate you!” His body was motionless, but the bond jerked as if her words physically impacted him. The emotions churning in his eyes flickered out with his lightsaber. The weapon was abandoned at his side before it slipped from his fingers to the floor.

Kylo blinked rapidly, and his stare dropped from her face. His expression was broken and wounded; his demeanor similar to the throne room when he bowed before Snoke. It wasn’t enough, however, to pierce through the thick veil of darkness.

“I don't know what terrible thing I’ve done to the Force to deserve this,” she continued, “but this bond is the deepest circle of Hell! No, I’d rather be surrounded by the fires of Chaos than this. I would let those fires reduce me to ash if I knew you'd burn with me! I would rather face death than suffer with this bond for the rest of my life! Nobody would mourn my death, but everyone would celebrate yours! So just do me and the galaxy a favor and die!”

The darkness abated as a barrier that he had carefully built around his emotions suddenly dropped and flooded the bond. He turned from her then – likely to hide the torment on his face from her – as if she couldn't feel everything through the bond. Perhaps, he didn’t know she could. Searing anguish and torment stole her breath and clawed her insides to shreds. It would have hurt less if she had been shot in the chest by a blaster.

This is the path to darkness, his voice echoed through her mind. To becoming a monster. To becoming...me.

The cadence of her heart pounded in her ears like war drums. She could hear him. The bond was growing stronger.

What happens, child, when the bond grows even stronger? It wasn’t her bondmate this time, but the voice of the Force. It was right.

The bond had become strong enough. Forcing away the torturous wave of emotions that possessed her, she searched for the anger, and resulting darkness, that gave her strength. She welcomed that fire as she tried to burn away everything else. The cold was fading, the pain was causing her body to shake.

The blaster was in her hands before she finished the thought of summoning it. She raised the weapon with a mercilessness she never knew she possessed. It terrified her. Her arms were fatigued with emotions, she could barely lift it to aim it at his chest, but she was nothing if not determined. She ignored the trembling in her fingers while she battled her intuition. He turned his head slightly, as if to confirm something he already knew, and raised his hands in surrender. There was no fear in his eyes when he turned. Only disappointment. Or perhaps sorrow. He didn't deserve to feel sorrow, not after all he had done. She wished he had remained with his back to her; it would have been easier. "I will destroy you."

You can kill me, but you can't destroy me any more than you already have, his voice whispered in her mind. The anguish in his thoughts was evident. She wondered how broken he would have sounded if he had spoken those words aloud.

If you want to be a prisoner to darkness, then do it. I won't stop you. He didn't beg or plead with her. His eyes were daring her to pull the trigger as he waited with his arms open in invitation. It was her chance, she could end it all if she so chose, but the blaster became as heavy in her hands as her heart in her chest. Her hand faltered, dropping slightly, as she lost her resolve. She stared at his open palms and remembered their tender warmth in the hut. She remembered what he had told her, and she remembered what she had told him. Could she take his life after making that promise?

The darkness, however, wasn't finished with her.

Kill him or he will kill them.

The Force would not be satisfied until the blood of her enemy was spilled. Memories of the cruel words he had said on the Supremacy, his actions on Crait, and the Force's words of warning flowed unbidden through her mind, drowning out the pleas of her heart. The darkness wrapped her tightly in its cloak, convincing her this was her only choice. She aimed the blaster and shut her eyes.

"Rey!" She jumped, turning toward the source of the voice, which sounded as if it was shouted from kilometers away. Finn was standing in the doorway screaming. Without a moment's hesitation, he charged into the room at their enemy. Kylo made no move to challenge him and disappeared as Finn reached him. The sound and normal energy of the Force returned to the room as Finn fell through him onto the floor.

The commotion had jolted her from the dark, tearing open a floodgate to the light within her soul that was straining to escape its confines. The darkness dissipated, and in its place dawned the realization of what she had said to him. What she had almost done. The remorse twisted and constricted through her as her anger faded. Rey wasn’t certain if she felt worse that she had said those things to him, or that he had believed her. She was hurt. She wanted to hurt him. He deserved everything she had said and done, but the agony she had witnessed in his eyes cut deeper than the words he had said to her.

Rey stood frozen, holding her blaster, tears rolling down her face. Her heart was beating wildly in her chest, and her knees trembled underneath the weight of her actions as she stared at the empty space where Kylo had been.

What would I have done if Finn –

“Finn!”

Her eyes were wide in fear when he turned to face her. "What...was that, Rey!” He demanded between breaths. "I heard... voices and I saw... Kylo Ren... standing... right here... I saw him, Rey...I saw him... and I ran in here to help you and... fell right through him... What was that!"

Rey dropped her blaster and collapsed down onto her bed quietly. “I don’t...” she hesitated, searching for a viable explanation for what he saw.

Tell him the truth... the voice convinced her.

"Tell me I’m going crazy."

Rey closed her eyes so she wouldn’t have to witness the disappointment in his. “You’re not crazy, Finn. He was here, but he wasn’t. It’s hard to explain.”

“Try me,” he said, his voice was still tremulous in fear. “After what I just saw, I’d believe a lot, Rey.”

“I didn’t want you to find out like this,” she whispered, dropping her head to her hands. “Luke says it's a Force bond. I can see him across the galaxy like he’s here, but he isn’t. It’s like a Force holoprojection – like what Luke did on Crait – only neither of us control it. This is the first time anyone else was able to see it, except for Luke. The connections started when I was with Luke on Ahch-To. It started off by just being able to see Ben from across the galaxy, but eventually I was able to touch his hand, and we shared a vision, and I thought I could turn him so I left Luke on Ahch-To, and went to Ben on the Supremacy and told him he would not bow before Snoke, and I was right! He killed Snoke, and we killed all his guards together, but then instead of helping me save you all, he asked me to join him to rule the galaxy, so I tried to grab my lightsaber, and it exploded, and then the Supremacy was hit, and I was able to escape, and the rest you know. Well, now I can see him, and hear what he's thinking, and even feel what he's feeling, and see his surroundings, and hurt him! The bond is getting stronger, and I don't know what to do, because the only other person I can ask who knows anything about the Force... is Ben!” She exhaled slowly, predominantly in exhaustion, but also in fear of her friend’s response and relief that she had finally shared the burden. It felt cathartic to finally say it all aloud to her friend; still, she refused to look up at him as she awaited his answer. “Say something?”

When it finally came, it wasn’t the answer she expected. It wasn’t an answer at all. "Ben?"

"That’s… that’s all you got out of this? Yes, his real name is Ben Solo.” When she had first considered the words in her head, they hadn’t sounded so… defensive. It was a perfectly reasonable question, as no one in the Resistance called him Ben. Rey refused to contemplate why she was so adamant with him when she had been so uncertain herself.

"I know his real name!” he barked. “I was there when he told Han that ‘Ben’ is dead, and I believe him. His name is Kylo Ren now.”

“Trust me, I know,” she said, more sharply than she had intended. She knew Finn wasn’t the person she was angry with, and Finn seemed to come to the same conclusion about her. When he spoke again, there was a restraint that hadn’t been there before.

“You have,” he paused, brow pinched, as if the words hurt to say, “a Force connection... with the one man that wants to kill us all?”

She nodded slowly, eyes downcast.

“You were on the Supremacy when it was hit?”

Rey nodded again.

Movement caught her attention, and Rey watched him drag his hand down his face, pausing to clasp his jaw. “You went to him?”

"Yes," she whispered. More tears betrayed her attempts at restraint as she steeled herself for his reaction.
Finn's voice was low, heavy with emotion, but there was no trace of the anger she believed she would find there. "Why didn’t you tell me?"

"I was afraid, Finn."

He knelt down in front of her and lifted her chin, bringing her teary eyes to meet his. "Afraid of what?" He did his best to smile through tears. She didn’t deserve to have such a loyal friend like him.

"I feared that you would think differently of me. You're my best friend Finn; you're more important to me than you know. I feared what the Resistance would do; I don’t want to lose you all. And I feared what he would do..." she sniffed, wiping her tears with the back of her hand.

"I'm here for you, no matter what. You shouldn’t have faced him alone. Okay?" She knew she should tell him everything – she would tell him everything when she was ready. Just not yet. She had hardly come to terms with the reality and the capability of the bond herself.

“Thank you,” she said. “I’m so sorry, Finn.”

“I’m not mad,” he replied. “I know it’s not the same at all, but I was afraid to tell you that I wasn’t Resistance, and I was afraid to tell you about, Rose, too. I can’t blame you for feeling the same way. What if we promise – right now – no more secrets?” Unfortunately, it was more similar than Finn realized. Only, Rose wasn’t their enemy, and the woman cared for Finn in return. The other problem was she couldn’t promise that there would be no more secrets, In fact, she needed him to promise there would be.

“I need a favor, Finn, and it involves more secrets.”

He studied her pained expression for a moment before nodding. She sighed in relief before she continued. “You can’t tell anyone what you know about the bond. I want to find a way to control it first.”

“Of course,” he assured her.
She smiled. “You promise?”

“I promise.” She threw her arms around his broad shoulders and whispered, "I don’t deserve you," in his ear. He embraced her tightly and then shifted his weight back onto his heels.

“Rey, you said that these 'moments' are getting stronger. Let's use it to our advantage. You said that you can hurt him; that means you can kill him, right?” A cold chill shivered through her body.
Violence

Rey throws droid parts at Kylo to hurt him, she threatens to kill him with a blaster and he raises a lightsaber threateningly.

Some people may find this 'abusive' (though I don't know why you would if you're reading Reylo). These two are still enemies at this point of the story and they will behave like enemies. They are both trying to be the people their causes need them to be and are struggling with feelings of resentment and betrayal. Kylo is still very much entrenched in the dark side and Rey is experimenting with darkness, so this will be a theme that comes into play in later chapters. Take this into consideration before continuing.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo collapsed into his chair with a shuddering exhale. He leaned his head back and stared blankly at the ceiling. The bond was getting stronger. They could hear each other's thoughts, feel each other's emotions and sense each other's pain. They could see each other's environment, affect it, and now the people in that environment could see them, too. They could hurt each other. If the Force had not split them apart, would the traitor have been able to hurt him? If not, it wouldn't have been for a lack of trying - the valiant hero come to protect the helpless girl from the monster. His only mistake was that Rey didn't need protecting.

Kylo tried to settle the churning in his stomach, the nausea he felt whenever he saw the traitor. He had made the mistake of sparing his life twice, and all it had brought him was misery. The next time, Kylo would end that distraction permanently. Rey would hate him for it, but what did it matter? Rey hated him no matter what he did, and he shouldn’t care if she hated him.

He didn't fear losing Rey to the traitor – at least, not from the thoughts he had seen regarding their friendship. She had regarded the young man much as she had regarded Han Solo. They were the first people in her life that had been kind to her. The traitor had done terrible things for the First Order, had lied to her, had almost abandoned her, yet she forgave him. Her friendship with the traitor had given Kylo the foolish hope that maybe she could see beyond what he had done as well.

He still carried a deep hatred for the traitor, but it had little to do with Rey. It never had. He was everything Kylo was and yet everything Kylo could never be. Kylo had witnessed moments of FN-2187's follies and victories during his years in cadet training and missions for the Order. Kylo found himself irritated with the trooper more often than not. “Eight-Seven” was the one to interrupt an important meeting with Hux by releasing a creature from the surface of the planet GUHL-J03870 on the Finalizer. Though Kylo had to admit that, at the time, he found the trooper's hijinks entertaining, if only because it irritated Hux. Kylo even played along with Eight-Seven's charade of impersonating Phasma to remove that creature from the ship. He forgave the young man for forgetting he was Force-sensitive. Though he easily recognized in the Force that he was not the third member of their triumvirate command, Kylo was intrigued to see how far the trooper would continue. It was his mistake for not understanding the insubordination for what it was.

There was something about him that reminded Kylo of himself, perhaps before the Order, when he was wide-eyed and naïve to the truth of the galaxy. Regardless of his reasoning, he wasn't one to remember stormtrooper's names, but he remembered FN-2187.

Kylo was surprised to see the trooper on Taunul, struggling to complete his mission. The boy was lost, and Kylo sensed the depth of his conflict when he skimmed the thoughts in his mind. His friend had been killed in front of him, and he was questioning whether his ideals aligned with the Order's. It was enough to have the younger man held for treason; hell, he could have redirected the beam of plasma at the trooper, and they'd have been none the wiser – but something gave Kylo pause.

Eight-Seven's thoughts centered on his abandonment by his parents, whom he was too young even to remember when was sent away. Though his parents had not abandoned him, he had been taken; Finn had been told they had willingly handed him to the First Order. Kylo knew from his file that his family had been killed, but he also knew it was the habit of the officers in charge of the stormtrooper programs to lie to the children about the circumstances of their arrival. It would not have engendered much trust if the Order told the children the truth – the Order abducted them from their parents, often murdering the families to cut any loose ends. Kylo never agreed with the program, but that had been Hux’s responsibility, not his.

Perhaps that was why – when he sensed the trooper's thoughts of neglect and abandonment by his parents as he questioned the propaganda of the Order that had been thrust upon him despite his own beliefs – Kylo understood him, as he knew that struggle all too well before he had found the Order. He sensed how the death of his friend had derailed the young man, and Kylo remembered the day he had promised himself he would forget.

Just as Kylo had struggled, Eight-Seven was at war with himself over who he was and who he was expected to be. Kylo sensed the young man's disillusionment, as he remembered his own, but he also felt the trooper's loyalty. He believed FN-2187 would make the decision Kylo hadn't had the chance to make at the Jedi temple. Kylo believed he would stay. Perhaps it was for Eight-Seven, or perhaps more for himself, but he let him go.

The traitor, however, betrayed them all. FN-2187 escaped shortly after returning from Jakku and set off a chain of events that Kylo could never have anticipated. He helped Poe escape. He found Rey and the map; the one thing Kylo needed to end his suffering. He stole the Millennium Falcon. He brought Han Solo to Starkiller. He helped Rey escape. And then, as if he hadn't done enough damage, he tried to kill Kylo with his own grandfather's lightsaber.

He had betrayed everyone, yet he had everything Kylo had ever wanted. He had been raised by the dark side, but Kylo no longer sensed conflict in him on Starkiller. He had chosen the light as if it was the easiest decision in the galaxy. No one saw him as the monster from the First Order, as they would have with Kylo. No, he had the compassion of both Kylo's mother and father, though Kylo wasn't surprised. He didn’t struggle with darkness. Why wouldn’t they prefer someone else's child over their own?

The traitor had earned the loyalty of Rey and enough trust to somehow wield the saber of the Skywalker legacy. Yes, Kylo should have killed him then. It would have been easy, even in his weakness. The trooper was trained, but not in lightsaber combat; he did not have the assistance of the Force. But like the fool that Kylo was that day, he spared his life for a second time. He could have ended it quickly, but he left him dying in the snow to pursue his grandfather’s weapon. If the traitor died eventually of his injuries, well, then Kylo rationalized that it was his own destiny. He knew he would come to regret it, and when he saw how concerned Rey was for the traitor, he did. Kylo did not fear that his fate might lie in the young man's hands; that was Rey's place, after all, but he could further complicate the bond with Rey.

Rey.

“I have to find a way to sever this bond, for both of our sakes,” he told the droid sitting loyally next to him. The droid studied his face, then beeped curiously. “A bond is a…” How did he explain it to a droid with the mentality of a child? “A bond is when two people are tied together with an invisible string.” That didn’t satisfy the droid’s curiosity, as it questioned him with another series of tones.

“No, it doesn’t hurt,” he said. “We are not actually tied together, just our… souls.”

He thought that would be the end of it, but the droid found more questions rather than answers, asking him for definitions he had never considered. “A soul is a… it’s who you are, inside. It’s what makes you different from other BB units.”

The droid found that answer particularly interesting, its beeps louder and more enthusiastic than before.

“Of course, you have a soul,” he said, focusing on the Force Destiny schematics. “If you didn’t, you wouldn’t be afraid to die.” The response was another series of whirs and twitters.

“Well, they’re wrong.” The comment was off-hand, said in distraction as he enlarged certain aspects of the machine on his screen. There was no question in his mind that droids felt just as humans did. He’d spent enough of his life being raised by them; he knew better than anyone that there was more to droids than circuits and drives. The droid rolled forward, nearly crashing into his knee if it wasn’t for his swift reflexes. The Force stalled the droid’s progress a few centimeters away. The droid tilted his head down to rest his domed head on Kylo’s knee instead. He nudged the droid away in irritation when he responded with a ridiculous assertion.

No droid, I am not good.

It was the droid’s next question that drew his eyes away from the screen. The droid made it seem like such a simple question; if it doesn’t hurt, then why did he want to end the bond? The answer was impossibly more complicated. He’d always been terrible at talking to children, even when he was a child. How was he supposed to explain circumstances he had purposefully chosen not to contemplate himself? “Because it does hurt, but not pain that can make me bleed. It’s on the inside, in my soul.”

_Ah, so the droid is an optimist_, he thought as the astromech continued down its path of naïve questioning. “No, it can’t be fixed like a real wound; she hates me.”

Kylo chewed his lip he felt the irritating sensation of tears prickling in his eyes. He was disgusted with himself. Slamming down his holopad, he pushed away from his desk and busied himself picking up the broken holobooks by the wall instead. He may have been weak, but he couldn’t allow the droid to sense that. The droid, however, was not keen to abandon his line of questioning. “Hate is… it’s when you feel many different emotions, bad emotions, toward something. It’s like being sad and mad and scared at the same time. So much that it consumes you.” He snorted when the droid expressed his hatred toward the people who threw him away. “Me, too.”

The droid was clearly naïve, but his desire to learn and understand spoke to the same nature in Kylo. He had always been curious to learn all the knowledge the universe had to offer, and much of his childhood had been spent with his nose in a book. His favorite subject, much like the droid, had always been people and their emotions, although most were more proficient at hiding them than he was. Han Solo liked to take machines apart; Kylo liked to dissect minds. He liked to pull away layers until he found the truth – until he knew exactly who that person was. He had convinced himself that if he knew a person and understood their true intentions, he would never be betrayed. He had been wrong.

It was almost as if the astromech had been following his thoughts when he chirped curiously. “No, hate is not the opposite of love,” he answered. “I think most of the hate I’ve ever felt started as love. I’d say the opposite of love is apathy.” Preemptively anticipating the droid’s next question, he continued, “Apathy is… feeling… _nothing._”

His words from the throne room echoed tortuously in his mind. _You come from nothing. You’re nothing. But not to me._

The droid beeped another question, clearly not understanding in his innocence how much the subject unbalanced Kylo. He wanted to be angry with him, but how could he be angry with what was essentially a child?

“No,” he sighed. “I want to, but I don’t feel apathy toward her. I even thought I hated her, but I don’t.”
Kylo knew what the droid’s last question would be before he asked. He was only trying to understand, after all, and if he didn’t hate her, then he knew what the droid would presume. Love. “It’s complicated – what I feel toward her. I should kill her; it would be easier if I did, but I don’t want to, and I don’t know why. She betrayed me, but I would give my life for hers if I had to choose. You tell me what that is, because your guess is as good as mine, droid.”

Her words bounced through his head as if they hadn't done enough damage the first time.

_I want the past to die! I want you to die. I want all this pain to end! I want your mother to have peace so she can stop suffering! The thought of you is literally killing her!_

_Look at what you did! Destroyed! Just like everything else you touch!_

_I could never care about a man like you! No one could! You're impossible to love!_

_I will free the galaxy of a monster, and they will thank me, because everyone hates you! The galaxy hates you! Your mother hates you! I hate you! I don’t know what terrible thing I've done to the Force to deserve this, but this bond is the deepest circle of Hell! No, I'd rather be surrounded by the fires of Chaos than this. I would let those fires reduce me to ash if I knew you'd burn with me! I would rather face death than suffer with this bond for the rest of my life! Nobody would mourn my death, but everyone would celebrate yours! So just do me and the galaxy a favor and die!_

The words were just that, words; but they tore through him like plasma. He didn’t know why he was so weak that he allowed the cruel words of everyone he ever cared about to hurt him like this, but every time they broke him down, the darkness fed off his pain, numbing him, and the monster returned.

Her words were not the part that concerned him the most. It was the cold hate in her eyes. He had seen it before, but not in her. The hate reflected back at him every time he stared in the mirror. He had felt the darkness flow through her, and it terrified him. He had known that daily torture of the darkness. It wasn’t until he had seen it in her that he realized how profoundly he did not want her to fall. She was too good. It would consume her and strip away all that was different about her.

“If I knew how to sever this bond, I would. The only one who knew how is dead... and might be back inside my head soon enough,” he said, though he wasn’t certain he was speaking to the droid.
anymore. The droid nudged his knee in reassurance, promising that no matter what happened, he would "help" Kylo. Unfortunately, if his former master returned, he would kill the apprentice that failed him. There wasn’t much the droid could do to help when he was dead. Only, what if there was?

“Can you… download everything on this datapad?” The droid seemed enthusiastic to be able to help as it set to the task. As the astromech sat next to him, whirring while it downloaded the information from the device, he reopened the schematic plans on his holopad. FORCE DESTINY, it read.

It would require the body of a Force-sensitive and an object imbued with Snoke’s… Sidious’ life force to reincarnate him through the machine. Kylo knew his master wore a ring, made from obsidian from Vader’s castle. It was engraved with the Four Sages of Dwartii. Palpatine kept bronze statues of the four in his office and chambers. It only made sense that he would have also had a ring made in their honor as Snoke. Why hadn’t Kylo seen the connection before?

Snoke had spoken so highly of his grandfather, but it was Vader who had succumbed to sentiment, it was Vader who had betrayed him. That was why Snoke had found him so young, he realized, to turn him before he could build strong bonds with his own family – not that it would have made much difference; his family had no interest in forming any kind of bond with him. Either way, Snoke had gotten what he wanted. Until Rey, that is.

His master had been the most formidable force in the galaxy, but the compassion for Rey he sensed in Kylo on Starkiller and his understanding of her loneliness, terrified him. Snoke knew after Han’s death that he questioned his loyalty to the Supreme Leader, enough that he purposefully created the bond with the intent to use Kylo’s weakness against him. Snoke’s betrayal of Kylo’s trust was less about his apprentice failing to become the new Vader and more fear that he would be. He must have implanted those visions to draw her to the Supremacy, he reasoned, so his master could order Kylo to kill her, and, ironically, forced him to follow the same path as his grandfather.

What he couldn't quite understand was that he had seen holographs of the Emperor, and the creature he cut in half was not Sidious’s body. That left him with one terribly concerning question – who was Snoke before Sidious stole his life? Was it a body Sidious had found, or was the creature who once was Snoke a creature with a story of his own, alive when he went into that machine? Had he known Sidious? Had he given his life willingly? Or had he been a rival?

The Emperor had died nearly two decades before Kylo had joined Snoke, but the creature had been in his head his entire life, and Kylo had met him as a child. That begged the question of exactly when Sidious had taken his new form. Who had helped him? Someone else had to operate that machine; that meant someone else knew of its power. Other than Hux, of course. How did Hux, of all people, know of this machine? His father Brendol? Or did Sidious's distrust in Kylo run deeper than he knew? Would Sidious trust Hux with his life? Most disturbing of all, it suggested that another machine had been created and was, in all likelihood, still out there.

Kylo shuddered at the thought.

It was beyond his knowledge of the dark side, it was far beyond his knowledge of the Sith. He was no Sith and never aspired to be one, having no desire to pledge loyalty to another ancient hypocritically indoctrinated religion. Neither was Snoke, or so he had been led to believe, but Sidious had been. Why had he shied away from those teachings when he trained the knights? Did it have anything to do with what happened to his grandfather? Was that why the equal propensity toward the darkness and light inside him had originally appealed to Snoke?

No, Snoke would have told him; he was his apprentice, his second-in-command. Hux had to be wrong. Snoke couldn't have been Sidious. At the very least, Luke would have known. He was there when the Emperor died. He had to have known his energy in the Force. He would have told his own nephew, wouldn't he? Kylo couldn't quiet the suspicion that he wouldn't have, just as he never told him about his own grandfather. Perhaps, it did make sense. Snoke did have an obsession with Luke that he never understood, a past he wouldn't speak of. Perhaps his desire for the Skywalkers to die, his need for a descendant of Skywalker to do it, originated not from a fear of a new Jedi Order, but of Luke Skywalker himself. His obsession was more personal than strategical, since it was Luke Skywalker who had turned his own apprentice against him.

Darth Plagueis wrote The Science of Creating Life, the only book in the galaxy that could have been used to create this machine, and Sidious was his apprentice. Sidious could have taken the book when he killed his master. It was all beginning to make sense. He should have made the connection sooner. Luke was in possession of that book, hidden away with his father's possessions. There was only one likely way he came into possession of that book: Luke or Vader must have recovered it after killing the Emperor. Kylo had seen it at Luke's Jedi temple. He had read every word of that journal... Luke had grown angry when he had discovered it, warned him of its dark powers, claimed no one should ever lay eyes on it. He wouldn't have willingly given the information to the First Order. Of course, how could he have been so blind? If that machine was recreated without the assistance of that book, then it required the knowledge of the person who wrote it, or the apprentice he had shared it with.

How could he have been so foolish? Snoke was once Palpatine, who had become Darth Sidious. That only left one question – What would he do now?

The droid chirped that he had finished, ejecting the datacard from his drive. Kylo could only focus on the blurring screen.
If he comes back, he will kill me. Or worse. He will kill her and keep me prisoner in my own mind forever. I can’t. I’m not strong enough. I would rather die than let Snoke...Sidious invade my mind again. I can’t destroy it, but I’ll find a way to stop it if it’s the last thing I do.

Another thought surfaced through the dark thoughts. What if I can use it? If it can bring back Sidious...
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“Maz!” Poe smiled as her distorted, flickering image materialized on the dated portable holo.

“Young Dameron,” she intoned warmly, adjusting the lenses on her goggles. “I trust you all are making yourselves scarce.”

“That bad, huh?” He smiled confidently, though he suspected she could see right through the pretense.

“I might as well not sugar coat it,” she sighed, manipulating the datapad in her hand. “The bounties read as follows...”

“There is still a five hundred thousand credit bounty on your head for various crimes against the First Order, including holding high command in a radical insurgency, concealing critical government intel, destruction of First Order property, escape from imprisonment, theft of First Order property and murder of First Order personnel. Considered armed and dangerous. Kill on sight....”

Poe chuckled as she read the list, reminiscing over each "crime" he had committed to earn each charge.

“There is a new bounty of five hundred thousand credits,” she continued, “on Rose Tico’s head for various crimes against the First Order including trespassing aboard a Mega-class Star Dreadnought, impersonating an officer, assault on an officer, escape from imprisonment, theft of First Order property and murder of First Order personnel. Considered armed and dangerous. Kill on sight.”

Poe was not surprised after their infiltration of the Supremacy.

“There is a new bounty of one and a half million credits on Finn’s head,” Poe whistled in admiration at the price of the bounty on his friend, “for various crimes against the First Order including trespassing aboard a Mega-class Star Dreadnought, impersonating an officer, assault on an officer, escape from imprisonment, theft of First Order property, desertion from First Order ranks, treason, and murder of First Order personnel. Considered armed and dangerous. Kill on sight.”

“The price of Leia’s bounty has remained unchanged at two and a half million credits for various crimes against the First Order, including holding high command in a radical insurgency, instrumenting destruction and disorder against First Order property and associates, and unreported crimes against the Supreme Leader. Considered armed and dangerous. The curious addition is that her bounty has been changed to ‘Capture only...’”

It made no sense to Poe that her bounty would be changed. Kylo Ren had done everything in his power to murder his mother; why would he change her bounty to ‘capture only’ unless... unless he wanted to kill her himself.

“And this is the most interesting one,” Maz continued, adjusting her goggles. “A new bounty of a whopping five million credits on your future Jedi for various crimes against the First Order, including trespassing aboard a Mega-class Star Dreadnought, escape from imprisonment, theft of First Order property, murder of First Order personnel, assault on Supreme Leader Kylo Ren, and the assassination of former Supreme Leader Snoke. Considered armed, dangerous and Force-sensitive. She is also ‘Capture only,’ which I find quite intriguing considering her crimes.”

“Did you say assassination of Supreme Leader Snoke?” Poe asked confoundedly. As far as anyone knew, Rey joined the Resistance on Crait straight from Ahch-To. The claims by the First Order must have been wrong, only his intuition told him otherwise. Maz added to his suspicion with a smirk. “Let me get this straight,” he said. “She found a way to sneak onto a dreadnought, which we could only accomplish with a code breaker. Then she avoided encountering Finn and Rose, killed the most powerful and protected creature in the galaxy, and escaped from Kylo Ren a second time, completely unscathed?”

“Those, my dear boy, are questions I do not have adequate answers for,” she answered. “They are best saved for young Rey, though you must prepare yourself for answers you may not want to hear.”

“Any other news?” he asked hoarsely. His mind was still reeling over the revelation about Rey. Something didn’t sit quite right with him about what had happened between Kylo Ren and Rey in the interrogation room. Why hadn’t Kylo immediately tortured her for the map? His intuition told him that whatever it was, it was worth further investigation.

“There is one more bounty. Ten million credits for the delivery or whereabouts of the Millennium Falcon,” she said delicately, anticipating a discouraged reaction. “I hope you’re comfortable; as long as the highest-paid bounty in the galaxy is on that ship, you can’t leave whatever planet you’re on.”
“Maz, we’ll have to take our chances; we need supplies,” he argued.

“No, that may not be necessary.” A wry smile grew on Maz’s face, which in turn elicited a smirk on his. “I have an idea that may provide you the supplies you need and arouse less attention than the Falcon.”

“I’m listening.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Kylo had the droid hoisted onto a metal bench in one of the seemingly infinite maintenance rooms on the destroyer, with a BB series astromech droid manual open on his holopad so he could fix the droid's sensor. He had plenty of practice tinkering on his parent's droids – more often disabling them so he could sneak away – but the astromech series was an enigma to him. He hadn't worked on one in years, and the memories of the last time he had were not welcome. The droid was busy chatting away, clearly not disquieted by his mask as the others were. The astromech probably thought his voice sounded more like a droid through his modulator, or he didn’t understand the intimidation tactics of humans. Either way, he never looked at Kylo like a monster. Kylo had forgotten how greatly he preferred droids to the human variety.

Kylo was thankful the droid couldn’t sense his emotions. He had witnessed his earlier outburst, when Kylo broke yet another holopad, and had said nothing. He took the droid for a walk and found himself in the maintenance room. It was better than thinking about what he had discovered about Force Destiny. The machine could not simply reanimate a person; it would require sacrifice and their lifeforce. It wasn’t that he would have to exchange his own life that concerned him. The transfer would require a lifeforce or an object imbued with one’s dark essence, which was something he didn’t have.

I was foolish to hope the machine could bring him back. It’s too late.

His spiraling thoughts were broken by the hiss of the blast door as Hux stormed into the room. “Supreme Leader.”

“Every time you walk into a room, I get an immediate desire to be… anywhere else.”

“Ah, yes,” Hux said, swallowing his displeasure. “And yet, here I am.”

“How did you find me?”

Hux’s face pinched in disgust for daring to ask such a preposterous question. “Your belt has a tracking beacon. You do remember how you were rescued from Starkiller, don’t you? And we have cameras everywhere on this ship, as well as logs for your code cylinders. That is how I know, for instance, that you’ve paid a visit to the construction of the Force Destiny twice in as many days. You would think with all of those wizard powers you would –”

Kylo turned to face the general. “Do you have an objection to my oversight of this project?”

“Why would I?” Hux smiled, but his eyes were narrowed in distrust. “Despite your propensity to destroy important pieces of equipment, I’m not concerned. There is another functional machine if something… unfortunate were to happen. And, according to the instructions, the location of that machine is in the hands of your second-in-command. Curious it wasn’t entrusted to you, isn’t it?”

Kylo ignored the slight, hoping Hux would quickly tire of irritating him.
“How thorough, General.” It was just as he feared; destroying the machine would not be simple. He was grateful his knights knew the location of the other machine, though he found it odd that none of them had mentioned it. Hux leaned sideways to stare around Kylo, clearly suspicious of what he had been up to. When he noticed the droid, Kylo shifted, blocking his line of sight. “Is that all?” The general rolled his eyes but adjusted his focus back to his superior.

“Of course not, Supreme Leader,” Hux said, the glint in his eyes revealing that Kylo would likely not be enthusiastic about the words that followed. “We have collected a group of rebels who responded to the plea from the Resistance we intercepted on Crait. Sympathizers, it seems. What is your order?”

Why does this feel like a trap?

“Execution, of course.” Kylo was thankful for the mask obscuring his face as he grimaced in response. The astromech droid beeped in confusion, and Kylo couldn't bring himself to explain his actions. The droid was naïve; what could he understand of the unfortunate necessities of war?

Hux’s smile widened. “It would fortify the respect of the troops for our new Supreme Leader if you were to complete the execution yourself, especially after your disappointment on Crait.”

It was an act Kylo would never have hesitated to fulfill when it had been an order, when there was someone else who held the key to his destiny – or so he once believed. When all he wanted was to become his grandfather. He had vanquished entire armies, killed the "unkillable," stared death in the face and laughed. Now, the thought of terminating a life that wasn't an immediate threat to his own felt abhorrent, like struggling against a strong current when everything inside him was screaming to turn around. He knew whose face he would see as he took their lives.

Kylo was overwhelmed with a feeling of being out of place, a wrongness that vibrated with every echo of the order in his head. Even the scars on his own hands were foreign to him, as if he had been transported into a body in someone else's life. Hux was waiting for an answer expectantly, but Kylo suddenly couldn't breathe, the mask his only protection as his mind unraveled. If he had everything he had ever wanted, why did he feel so lost?

“Supreme Leader?”

Kylo was faced with a terrifying truth – he didn't know what he wanted anymore. He didn't know who he was anymore. It was the same terror he had faced on his knees on Crait, but this time he had no one to blame for it. Despite the mask, he refused to meet Hux's impatient glare. "Give me an hour."

Satisfied, Hux exited back through the blast door, screaming orders and castigation to passing personnel, leaving Kylo alone with the droid. The droid beeped at him cautiously, and Kylo hated that after what he had overheard, he still expressed concern for him, still called him his master.

“I'll fix you,” Kylo said softly, “But then you should find someone else to be your master. I'm not...” He hesitated, fumbling to adequately explain it to the childlike droid. “I'm not a good man.”
Chapter End Notes

Mention of violence

Hux mentions execution
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Finn was hopelessly lost in thought, chewing his lip anxiously as he studied the intricate carvings on the ceiling of the ancient temple. Rose had warned him that Rey would come back different from Jedi training. And she had, but when she embraced him as if no time had passed, it seemed like a good different. She had appeared hopeful, confident, and lighthearted; everything a new Jedi should be.

Every moment spent observing her since, however, convinced him otherwise. There was a... shadow eclipsing her personality, something sinister tormenting her. It tormented him in turn. At first, he had believed his new relationship with Rose – which he hadn’t had time to explore since she’d awoken– had been affecting Rey. He had seen the truth, however, when he came face to face with the Force apparition of the monster himself, Kylo Ren, in her room with her. The thought of that creature anywhere near Rey sickened him. The creature was changing her, draining the brightness right out of her, and she seemed oblivious to it. He only hoped that now that he knew, he could help her.

“Finn!” The voice echoed off the wall of the vast underground hall. His stomach fluttered as he pivoted in search of the owner of that voice, knowing exactly whose eyes would meet his.

“Rose...” He said breathlessly, taking in how refreshed and alive she looked. Her wounds were healing well, and there was color to her cheeks again. Guilt rose like bile in his throat. He had stood vigil by her bed until she had awoken just before they landed on Barkhesh, but he had been actively avoiding her ever since. He scrambled to her side and guided her to a nearby altar. “You shouldn't be walking around like this. Do you feel dizzy?”

“I'm perfectly fine, thanks to you.” Finn helped her down onto the stone altar. He couldn’t help the thrill that shot through him when she grasped his hand for leverage. She smiled warmly up at him, making the whole galaxy disappear around them. Something reassuring in her eyes and smile made his fears melt away, which made him feel like wherever he was, as long as he was with her, he was right where he was supposed to be. They may not have understood each other right away, but once they did, there was an easiness – an intimacy – that he had never felt before. He almost forgot the war and the consequences they faced. Then he noticed the wound on her forehead. The galaxy might have seemed like it disappeared when he looked into her eyes, but it didn’t, and that was the problem. Her smile faltered as she stared at him. Maybe it was the way he stiffened, or the fear that crossed his face, or the hesitant step he took away from her. He knew they had to have a conversation, but he wasn’t ready for it. “Finn?”

“I'm sorry; I'm just... tired.” It was a lie, but how could he explain the truth? Shrugging out of his jacket, he sank onto the stone altar next to her and wrapped the jacket around her. It was just a jacket and just the gentlemanly thing to do, but the hair on his arms bristled with pride in seeing her wear it.

“Thank you, for everything you did to me... for me,” she huffed, smiling in chagrin. It was almost enough to thaw the cold hopelessness in his heart. He leaned forward, resting his elbows stiffly on his knees. His eyes were downcast as he stared at his clasped hands, trying to find the words to say. Han had told him that women always discovered the truth, but it never made it any easier to say. He refused to meet her gaze, terrified of what he would see in her eyes – and what she would see in return.

“It was... of course... I should be the one thanking you,” he muttered.

“Well, I couldn't let you die.” The words were spoken casually, but the near consequences of Crait were heavy in his mind. If he had died a martyr for a cause finally worth fighting for, then so be it, but he could not accept that she almost died. For him. How would he have lived with that?

“I don't know why you did that... for someone like me.” His voice exposed more of his inner conflict than he had hoped. He craved to see the emotions in her eyes, the softness of her expression, the reassurance of her smile that would prove to him that everything would be okay. He needed her to vow that his fears were unfounded, that it would be different next time. The others had let him go; they had allowed him to make the sacrifice to save them all. He needed her to promise that she wouldn’t die – especially not for him – but he knew it would be a comforting lie. They were at war.

“I told you why I saved you,” she replied quietly. Rose had watched her sister die for the Resistance. For a dreadnaught. Though Rose had followed unquestioningly to join the cause, she hadn’t joined the fight, not until him. If they had never met, she wouldn’t have gone on that mission, and she wouldn’t have nearly died. It was his fault, and he didn’t know what he would have done if she hadn’t been strong enough to survive. Maybe she believed she had found someone worth dying for in him, but that was what terrified him the most. He refused to lose someone he... cared for. Never again. Clearing his throat, he searched for the right words. He knew what she wanted him to say, but he knew what that would do to them both.

With another quick glimpse into her hopeful eyes, his resolve dwindled to a thread. “You look better,” he said as he cracked his knuckles restlessly. It was a change of subject, but he wasn’t ready to tell her the truth, and he hoped she would follow without objection.

“I feel good. Much better,” she answered brightly, but he could hear the disappointment in her voice. “Though my ego is a little bruised.”
“Is it the hair? You couldn’t do it, obviously, so I wanted to help. In my defense, I never did anyone’s hair before, but Rey said it looked okay,” he joked, chancing another glance at her face. He knew it would be a mistake. His chest tightened at the sweet smile that brightened her trusting eyes.

“No, no, no, the hair looks great,” she assured him as she ran her fingers through the crooked ponytail. “I was talking about the part where I confessed my love for you, kissed you, then never got an answer. In your defense, I was in a coma.”

“Oh, that,” he huffed nervously, rubbing his hand over the back of his neck. Rose wanted an answer – an affirmation of his reciprocated feelings or a rejection. Unfortunately, it wasn’t that simple. It didn’t matter what he felt, only what was best. Finn wouldn’t lie to her, but he couldn’t tell her the truth, either, so he attempted in vain to think of something, anything, to say to her. By the dejection stealing the brightness from her face, he knew everything he didn’t say spoke volumes. There was a heaviness in the air between them as the silence stretched uncomfortably, the sound of their uneasy breathing was deafening. He cringed when a single tear parted her cheek. This wasn’t what he wanted; he was just trying to protect her.

“This wasn’t how I imagined this going,” she chuckled, though there was no mirth behind her words. He shut his eyes tightly, chastising himself for hurting her.

“I’m sor –”

“No, no don’t apologize, Finn,” she said quickly. “Not about how you feel.”

But he did need to say something, because he couldn’t let her leave believing that he felt nothing. “Rose...”

“Yes?” she asked, a sliver of hope still shining in her eyes.

He sighed, trying to find the strength, but knowing he couldn’t bring himself to finish his thought. It just felt wrong. Everything in him wanted to hold her and never let her go. His heart screamed for him to tell her the truth. Part of him knew he was running away again, but this wasn’t to protect himself. It was to protect her.

“Rose, what do you think of Barkhesh?” he asked instead, cursing himself for allowing his fear to control him. How did protecting her make him feel more cowardice than when he almost left Rey on Takodana? Rose could have walked away from him; he would have deserved it. Being the beautiful woman, inside and out, that he had fallen for, however, Rose smiled instead. It was wan, he could nearly feel her disappointment, but it was a smile, nonetheless.

“I haven’t seen much of it, yet.” She looked away from him, finding that inner strength that he admired so much about her. He thought maybe it would be easier to lie, to break her heart. She would overcome it quickly, because she was strong. If it wouldn’t break his own heart, he might have had the strength to do it. Finn had never felt like this about anyone before; it would hurt to lose her completely from his life. Not as profoundly as if he confessed his feelings and lost her, but enough to hold his tongue. His traitorous lips spoke before his rational brain could stop him.

“Tomorrow, let’s go for a walk through the jungle. I’ll show you Barkesh. I’ve been here before.”

“Really? I’d like that.” She yawned, pulling her legs into her chest so she could rest her head on her knees. They sat that way in companionable silence for a while, staring at the intricate artwork of the hall. Finn’s thoughts were everything but silent, however. There was a war inside him that rivaled the one raging outside those walls. He wished the consequences were as simple as his feelings for her, but he knew there would be no easy answers in that complicated place they found themselves. Everything about the First Order had been wrong, but the galaxy outside its structure and rules was terrifying. Consequential decisions made from necessity and survival were simple, but everything else he had to learn on his own.

Finn had become so comfortable with her presence, he had almost forgotten she was still there with him until she whispered into the space between them, “Tomorrow, just you and me.” Before he could answer, Finn felt her weight shift as her breathing grew deep and steady, and her head fell to his shoulder. As she leaned against him, he found there was no place he would rather be.

“Just you and me,” he breathed.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“General?” Poe asked as he stood respectfully in the archway of her room, pushing aside the blanket they had fashioned into a makeshift door.

“Tell me good news, Colonel,” she answered, beckoning him into the room and patting the space next to her on her makeshift bed. Leia knew she should be lying down, resting to regain her strength, but she also knew the Resistance did not have time for that. She would be what the Resistance needed for as long as she could, health be damned.

“Well, I have some good news and some bad news,” he sighed, laying his hand over hers. She liked Poe Dameron; no matter what he did, his heart was in the right place. His parents were Resistance heroes; he was born to fight for what was right and good in the galaxy. His mother would be proud of who he had become.

“Go ahead, get on with it,” she said, both for the subject at hand and her own preservation, before her thoughts wandered into thoughts of her own family. He smiled appreciatively. She knew the young man had as much patience for pleasantries and equivocating as she did. He would make a fine leader one day.

“The base was destroyed,” he said categorically, slipping into his military persona with ease, “along with any supplies or rations. We were able to locate the command center and remove only the portable equipment as instructed. We set up a temporary command center in the main hall. The comm systems were enabled, and I contacted Maz Kanata for information on the bounties. It is as you feared, General; the Millennium Falcon is currently the highest-paid bounty available from the First Order. Until there are more targets other than that ship on every bounty hunter’s radar in the galaxy, or our allies decide to finally help us, we can’t leave this planet. We won’t make it out of the Seitia sector. We are trapped here without reinforcements. But Maz has a plan. I’ll explain it to everyone if you can make it to the command center at thirteen hundred standard hours.”

Leia smiled privately to herself. Maz had a plan for everything, as if she saw things no one could. Leia suspected she did. She would be a fool to underestimate a plan contrived by the Pirate Queen. There was hope. “Any new bounties?” she asked, knowing the answer.

“There are still active bounties for you and me. Mine is five hundred thousand credits, and yours is two and a half million credits. Your...” he paused, his stare falling to the floor. “Kylo Ren is confirmed the new Supreme Leader, and he has ensured we cannot show our faces on a single core planet, or any populated one for that matter. There is a new bounty of five hundred thousand credits on Rose for her escape from the Supremacy. Finn has a bounty of one and a half million credits for a long list of crimes including ‘defection’ and ‘high treason.’ And the last Jedi has a new bounty of her own. Her bounty, a whopping five million credits for – get this General – ‘the assassination of Supreme Leader Snoke’.” There was more information in his eyes, a suspicion perhaps, but he swallowed it.

“Rey?” Leia wondered aloud. “Was on the Supremacy? How could that be?” There was something inside her, however, that knew it made more sense than she let on. She had been intrigued by what had happened to Rey on that island. She had seen the broken lightsaber in her hand and listened to the young woman’s fears of "Kylo Ren,” not Snoke, seizing control over the galaxy. It was a strange fear for a woman who hadn’t seen him since she cut him down on Starkiller.

Then there was the disappointment and jilted betrayal that clouded Rey’s energy in the Force, and a grief that was difficult to place. Leia had believed that her brother was to blame. What had aroused her curiosity the most, however, was that she felt those same emotions in the Force from her son. He had chosen not to kill her on the Raddus, but she had felt his intent on Crait. Luke had stopped her boy from murdering them all. Perhaps, Rey had been disappointed by Luke, and her son had felt disappointed by Snoke, or his uncle, or his failure to kill his own mother on Crait as the new Supreme Leader, but what if it wasn’t a coincidence? What if it what he had told her wasn’t a dream? If Rey had been on the Supremacy, why did she go there, what had happened to Snoke, but more importantly, what had happened between Rey and her son?

“That... is the five million credit question,” Poe said quietly, interrupting her thoughts. “I think there’s much more to Rey than any of us anticipated.” Leia nodded. The youngest Dameron had no idea how right he was. Leia only hoped it unfolded the way she imagined it could.

“I’ll talk to her,” she promised. “And any news from our 'friend'?”

Hands on his hips, Poe scuffed his shoes on the temple floor petulantly, making his disdain known. Leia was as averse to the idea as he was, but the Resistance was in desperate need of an ally, even an untrustworthy one. “I had planned to pay him a visit, but with the bounties, it looks like I'll be making that holocall.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo marched rigidly past the rows of stormtroopers who stood at attention in deference to him. It was unnerving, sensing all the eyes watching him, judging him. Did they notice the tremor in his knees? The quickness of his breath? Were his shoulders too hunched? Were his robes disorderly in his haste to leave his quarters? Did his gait exude power… or fear?

_You're just a child in a mask…_ echoed mockingly in his head.

He coiled the energy tightly around himself, so he wouldn’t be tempted to reach out and hear the thousands of thoughts polluting the Force at once. He knew what they were thinking about him. He knew they found him wanting. No matter what side he sacrificed for, he was never strong enough. They could see all his weaknesses; he knew they could. Kylo reminded himself that he had faced _Luke Skywalker_ and survived; he could do this. He could do _anything._

His general was standing beside the prisoners, who had been thrown to their knees in preparation for the execution. Kylo swallowed thickly under the weight of the emotions colliding inside him like a thunderstorm. His lightsaber hilt burned his back with intention; the Force was heavy with anticipation. The prisoners bowed their heads in resignation. His boots swiftly drew him nearer, though everything inside him was screaming to run away. _It's not too late_, the Force suggested in moments of weakness, _this could be the choice that changes it all._ He shut the light out as best he could, refusing to listen to its _lies._

His reluctant steps reminded him of those he’d taken a long time ago, at a burning temple. The splash of boots through muddy puddles in his memories were just as ominous as the echoes across the onyx floor of the hangar. The prisoners did not look up as he approached, but they undoubtedly noticed his boots as he stood before them – the harbinger of death. If Hux obtained the right information, Kylo would be on his knees in front of the Order facing an identical deliverance as those prisoners. He imagined it then – kneeling beside them. It was less agonizing imagining himself facing his own fate than being the executor of theirs. When the time came, Hux would undoubtedly ask him for his last words, but Kylo would never provide him the satisfaction of a single sound.

The prisoners were not begging him for amnesty, either. He respected that. They likely understood it was an exercise in futility – the disciplinary methods of the First Order were well-known – and they decided to preserve what dignity they had left. As Hux spouted his propaganda to the troops, Kylo finally let his eyes study the prisoners whose lives he would end with his weapon. Unlike what he had done in his own moments of reckoning, when he had fought monsters and the Force to control his own destiny, they each refused to stare in the face of death. Perhaps that was why he was still breathing. They wouldn’t be so lucky.

There were three; a large human male, a Duros male, and a human female. Her head was bowed so all he could see was her shoulder-length brown hair, and though Kylo had only seen Rey’s hair down in the hut and in the throne room, he remembered the soft waves and the way it bounced when she moved. As this woman before him turned her head to the side to look at another prisoner, her chestnut waves bounced around her shoulders, and his breath caught in his throat. The similarities she shared with _Rey_ were undeniable… and unnerving.
Slim framed, muscular, tall, skin tanned from the sun – it could have been her. Logically, he knew it wasn’t. He would have felt her the second she was in the same system as the Finalizer. That knowledge didn’t deter the nausea rising to his throat, however, because it easily could have been her. And if it had been her, he would have been forced to do the same to her. Ben! He forced the thought of Rey on her knees in the throne room – eyes pleading with him to save her – from his mind.

The Force was screaming inside him, and it hurt. He considered attempting to kill everyone in that place until it was silenced, either by every single one of their deaths… or his own. Realistically, he figured a division or two would fall before they killed him. Considering it with the same indifference as he weighed what to eat at mess, he decided there were undoubtedly less satisfying ways to die, but the droid back in his chambers depended on him. Kylo couldn’t leave him alone with the very people who had tried to murder him.

Let’s get this over with.

“General… the charges,” he said curtly. The mask removed all the conflicted emotions from his voice.

Kylo was a hurricane of emotions, but Hux was the picture of poise and detachment as he read their charges. “For the charge of inciting, assisting, or engaging in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the First Order or the laws thereof, you are hereby found guilty.”

“For the charge of conspiracy to defeat, destroy by force, or overthrow the First Order, you are hereby found guilty.

“For the charge of levying war against the First Order, opposing by force the authority thereof, or otherwise preventing, hindering, or delaying the execution of any law of the First Order, you are hereby found guilty.

“For the charge of seizing, stealing, or otherwise possessing any property of the First Order contrary to the authority thereof, you are hereby found guilty.

“For the charge of recruiting soldiers to engage in armed hostility against the First Order, or enlisting and engaging against the First Order military, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, with intent to serve in armed hostility against the First Order, you are hereby found guilty.
“For the above charges of treason and sedition as defined in totality or partiality as levying war against the First Order, adhering to our enemies, providing aid and comfort, or otherwise participating in a rebellion, it is judgment of this court in the manner prescribed by law that the defendants are hereby sentenced to the penalty of death.”

The prisoners had not reacted to the charges, the judgment, or the sentence; they knew why the general had gathered them all there. The First Order, by law, did not imprison or provide quarter to anarchists. The orders had and always would be "kill on sight." Only those who could be tortured for information or used for morale purposes in public execution would be taken prisoner. If Kylo had found these anarchists, he would have killed them immediately. Imprisonment aboard a First Order destroyer was worse than death.

“In place of the customary firing squad, it has been determined by the court to perform this execution by lightsaber. It is the intention of this court to carry out the mandatory sentence forthwith,” Hux announced, placing his hands behind his back. He nodded once at Kylo.

Kylo closed his eyes, desperate for the strength of the darkness. Releasing himself to its control, he felt the cold spread from his fingertips inward, until he was numb to the twisting guilt in his gut and the incessant call from the light. Removing the hilt from its fastening, Kylo shifted the weight of the weapon in his fingers. Though he was still loath to follow through with what he knew must be done, he did not hesitate to ignite it. With a flash, the crimson hue of his blade flared over the prisoners.

The woman was crying softly, her head turned toward the human next to her. His head was likewise turned toward her, and Kylo didn’t have to skim their minds to feel the love between them in the Force. Everything in him screamed to comfort her, to hold her, to assure her that it would be alright. It wouldn’t be, however. There was no hope for her; her last breath would be taken with the shadow of a monster looming over her. Her only comfort was that the image of her lover would be her last. She would die. The pain of mortality would end, and she would become another ghost to haunt him in his dreams.

He would make it swift, cutting in a downward arc to sever the spinal column first. It was an even swifter method than through the heart; and less painful. The small kindness would mean little to them in the face of what he would take from them, but they had left him no choice. They had chosen a path of recalcitrance. Treason and sedition carried the penalty of death the galaxy over. If the Order discovered what he did to Snoke, or he was captured by the Resistance, he would assuredly face the same fate. What kind of order could he bring to civilizations if he did not follow the letter of the law?

His rationalizations gave him little comfort as his eyes fixated on the freckles dappled on the woman’s shoulders. He could remind himself that she wasn’t Rey all he wanted, but his mind wouldn’t let it go. He had no doubt it would be her face he saw in his nightmares. If she were there, this was what he would be forced to do to her. If she didn’t kill him first, this was the moment he would one day face. He reminded himself that he had endured the delusion of taking her life before and persevered, and he could do it again. Grasping tightly to that thought, he readied his blade.

I’m sorry.

Kylo executed her first, so she wouldn’t feel the fear of anticipation or bear witness to the death of her lover. With a quick flourish of his blade, her cries were silenced. It was swift enough that she didn’t have time to know it was coming.

Her lover, who had been quiet until then, began openly sobbing as her body hit the floor. No, it wasn’t sobbing; it was something primal and inhuman – or was perhaps devastatingly human – something borne from a fractured soul. It was a sound that was felt in the soul of anyone who heard it, connecting them all in a unique moment of humanity. Kylo understood; his own cries of despair haunted his nightmares, reminding him of the night that changed everything, the night that inevitably led to this very moment. Kylo clenched his jaw as he withheld the sob building in his own throat.

He drew in more darkness to give him the strength to continue, and within two strides he had reached the woman’s lover. Without hesitation, he brought the lightsaber down in a clean arc, ending the man’s suffering quickly. The Doros male looked up at him as he approached. A smile spread over his face as the blade cut through the air and into him. Kylo knew he would always remember that smile.

In an instant, Kylo felt heavier, as if he had taken upon his shoulders the weight of their souls. Some souls weighed more heavily on him than others, but these would bear great weight because they had not fought back. It was a necessity, but it was one that would come at a cost to him as well.

Two hundred and eighty-seven.

That was not the number of lives he was responsible for, but the lives that had fallen by his hand. Most of the lives were taken in battles in the Unknown Regions, many other were taken at Snoke’s command. It was the number of lives that he carried every day with him. There were seven that would haunt him the most. Six were from the Jedi academy, one of whom had been taken by his choices, not his hands, but which haunted him every night all the same. None haunted him as profoundly as the one from a skyway on Starkiller. These lives would join the ranks of the fallen he had delivered to their own peace while sacrificing his own.
“Shall I add their ashes to your collection, my lord?” Hux said as he walked past, speaking of the hollow pillar containing the ashes of his enemies that he placed his grandfather’s helmet upon like a sacrificial altar.

Kylo nodded, refusing to watch when the troopers began gathering the heads and dragging the bodies away. As he glanced up to the corridor that held his escape to his quarters – to a droid who would be fiercely disappointed in him – he saw her. Rey. Standing in the shadows of the dimly lit corridor, she was watching him. It was at first a relief to be able to separate her from the dead woman, to see her alive, but then the fear overshadowed any comfort he felt. Instinctively, he glanced around to determine who else had seen her. Either she was not visible to the others, or none of them had noticed her yet, but he stormed toward her as if they could.

With swift strides he reached her, grasping her arm roughly, and dragging her deeper into the corridor. She ripped her arm away from him but otherwise continued to walk next to him in silence. When they reached an empty storage room, he grabbed her arm again and guided her inside. “Don’t touch me!” she spat when the door shut.

“Damn it, Rey! Do you have a death wish? They could have seen you!” His fear only added to the energy inside him spiraling out of control. Kylo ripped off his helmet as he gasped for breath. Staring at her through the damp hair that pressed against his forehead, he tried to gauge her expression. Had she seen it? Did she know what he had done?

He knew she could feel his tumultuous emotions in the Force; it was thick like a heavy cloak around them. If she hadn’t witnessed the execution, she would likely discover the reason for his emotional upheaval soon enough. Kylo wasn’t certain it was possible for her to hate him more than she already did, but if it was, she would after she discovered what he had done. The prisoners had answered the Resistance signal for help on Crait. Rey hadn’t known them, but he knew her well enough to understand that would hardly matter. It hardly mattered to him, either, and he already hated himself enough for both of them.

“What did you…” he rasped. “What did you see?”

She stared at him for a moment, her eyes weary. “Just murder,” she said cavalierly with a shrug of her shoulders, “nothing out of the ordinary for you, Supreme Leader.”

Her words destroyed him more than he cared to admit. Kylo wanted her to scream at him, call him a monster, tell him how much she hated him, care. He wouldn’t have blamed her if she tried to kill him, it was everything he deserved. He hadn’t expected her indifferent acceptance, however, as if it was all she expected from him. It hurt worse than any other reaction she could have had, and he didn’t know why.

His breath was ragged, his body trembled, but there was no outlet to subdue the torrent of emotions… save for violence. He could only wait until she disappeared across the galaxy again and hope that the Force stole her away in time. Collapsing against the wall, Kylo slid down to the cool floor. It was too late for him to concern himself with her witnessing his vulnerability. She had already seen him at his worst, what did it matter?

It had been many years since he’d had a meltdown of this magnitude; even after… the bridge on Starkiller, he’d had an outlet for his emotions. Physical violence had become his escape, but, realistically, he knew there was no escaping this; not with her there, not like this. He was a child again, slumped against the wall of the refresher as his parents argued about him outside. Kylo knew what was coming, and it terrified him.

The darkness had faded, and the light was battling for power. It hurt – the two conflicting energies screamed inside him as they crashed and clawed for dominance over him, further fracturing his broken soul. Kylo wanted to run, but he diverted all his strength to his failing attempt to suppress the Force building inside him. He needed to destroy something before it exploded out from within him. The problem was, he had chosen an ammunition storage room containing dedlandite, battery cells, and spare blasters. In other words, he was sitting inside a bomb, and he was the ignition switch.

“Get out,” he panted as he felt the emotions inside him build to a level beyond his control. “Run!” There was no time to argue with her; destruction was imminent. Shutting his eyes tight, he shoved his hands over his ears in an attempt to shut out the noise in his head; the whispers of the light and the darkness that had grown in volume until he couldn’t discern what they were shouting anymore. He was screaming. Rationally, he knew that. Though he couldn’t hear it, he could feel it tearing at his throat. He clenched his fists as a last resort to prevent the Force from escaping through his fingertips.

Kylo could feel the objects in the room as they vibrated around him. He was well-aware of the danger. The blasters rattled uncontrollably on the shelves, boxes of dedlandite crashed to the floor. He tried desperately to pull the Force back within himself, but it only served to further destroy the room around him. Instead of an explosion, he was collapsing the walls into the room. Durasteel creaked and groaned as it bent inward, threatening to crush him under its weight. Finally, the Force snapped. All he could do was hold out his hands and brace for impact.

When he opened his eyes, his first instinct was to cough, but he instantly regretted it when he inhaled the thick cloud of dedlandite around him. The screaming pain in his throat and chest was enough to drive him to his feet. Pushing away durasteel debris, he stood to find the room in tatters… or what once had been a room. The four walls had been reduced to rubble, the ceiling straight through to the floor above had collapsed. A conference table from the upper level lay in pieces on the broken shelves, boxes and weapons had been thrown haphazardly around the room in the impact. None of that mattered.

“Rey?” he called out hoarsely into the room between coughs, but he could only feel her energy in his mind. He released a shuddering exhale. The Force had taken her away from his destruction. A sigh from the doorway had him spinning on his heels.

“This is why the Supreme Leader kept you locked in a cage like a beast.” Hux stood on the rubble, in what had once been the doorway, his brows pinched in annoyance. “What… happened?”

“The Force.” Kylo knew how Hux hated both the Force and his propensity toward ambiguity. He stepped over blasters and debris to reach his general in the corridor. Dusting himself off, he turned away from the general – who was glaring holes through him – to the gaping crater that had been the storage room.

“It wasn’t lightsaber this time,” he volunteered.

Hux did not find it as humorous as he did. For a moment, Kylo thought the general would break his relatively controlled countenance, but the man – while slightly red and apoplectic – held his tongue until he could speak evenly. Kylo was envious. It must be easy when you don’t have the Force. Hux straightened his uniform and nodded in acceptance.

“Well, if you’ll excuse me, Supreme Leader, as you have delegated all diplomatic missions and on-world negotiations to me, I have an important meeting with the council on Kamino to discuss financial support for our cause. If you could not destroy anything while –”

The general’s lip curled as he stared at the ruined storage room. “Are you quite certain?”

Kylo bit back the anger rising in his throat. *Am I certain? I’m certain you’re the reason why that room is destroyed, why Rey had to see it. You were certain I had to take the lives of those prisoners. You were certain the "Supreme Leader" was needed then. “I think I can handle the Kaminoans,” “I’ve done my research on those…” Hux’s face pinched in disgust, “creatures, have you?” Rather than answering, Kylo turned from the general and left his destruction behind. “Mark my words, Ren, if you pull a stunt like this with our allies, they will not be so forgiving,” Hux called after him.

Mark my words, Hux, the stunt I’ll pull won’t be on the Kaminoans.

“Consider them marked,” he replied instead. Kylo could feel the heated stare on his back as he retreated to his quarters.
Violence

As the title of the chapter suggests, Kylo executes prisoners
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo Ren stood over her. It was a dream. She knew it was a dream, but she couldn’t wake up. Turning away from the dark, imposing figure, Rey began running through a vast, shadowed forest. The cold of the snow leached through her boots. She shivered as she sprinted through the trees. She recognized this forest. It was the same one in her vision; it was Starkiller. Remembering the man in the mask in her vision, she only then realized it had predicted her future.

Rey stopped, pivoting in search of the masked wraith. When she turned, however, she no longer stood in a forest; a vast, barren landscape of ice stretched away as far as she could see. Kylo Ren stood in the snow next to a downed TIE fighter, his cloak coalesced with the black smoke billowing in the wind.

Rey turned and sprinted in the opposite direction. She found herself again contained in a dense forest. As she observed the snow blanketing the ground and tree limbs, she realized this place wasn’t Starkiller. The trees were too red, the snow too deep, the dark between the trees too black; this place was somewhere else. Yet it was the same place she remembered from her vision. This was an extended sequence of her original vision, only it was playing in reverse. The thought was unnerving.

The sounds of battle echoed around her. Invisible lightsabers clashed, explosions vibrated through her body, the wounded cried out in pain, the smell of smoke invaded her senses. She looked down at her hands, and they were covered in blood. Somehow, she knew it wasn’t her blood. Then she heard that voice. It was frighteningly familiar—the voice from her dreams. Barely more than a whisper, it was strained, but calm and kind. She heard it as clearly as if it whispered into her ear.

“Stay here. I’ll come back for you.” She turned, desperately searching in vain for the owner of that voice, but the forest remained empty.

“Where are you?” she called out to him. Her search became more frantic, her fear for him sending her pulse into overdrive. Coming back wasn’t good enough; she wanted him to stay.

“I’ll come back, sweetheart. I promise.” She stopped running. She knew it was too late; he had left her. But where did he go? Her eyes shifted up to the dark sky above her as she searched the stars.
“Come back!” It was a child’s voice. It was her voice, from a lifetime ago. A shadow stepped out in front of her, and she fell back.

She awoke with a start. Her heart was pounding in her chest, her hair drenched in sweat. She sighed. It was that dream again. Why did she still have that dream? She knew the voice was not her father’s voice, as she had once believed. She realized now that they had never cared. They disposed of her like garbage, as Kylo had once said. They never would have told her that. They probably didn’t even say goodbye.

She’d had a dream of that voice for as long as she could remember, so if her parents had not said those words to her, then she must have created that voice in denial—just as she had held onto the belief that they would come back. The denial she had once held onto, however, had been broken. If that voice she had dreamed of for all of those years was one that she created, then why was she still haunted by this dream?

She blinked as the room came into focus and startled when she noticed the shadow sitting in front of her. She reached out into the Force to sense the energy. Of course, it’s you. The room was dark, but she could feel it. Kylo sat, hunched forward, his elbows on his knees, in a chair she had never seen.

She gasped despite herself. Sitting up, she moved on the makeshift bed as far away from him as she could. Murderer! “Why are you here?”

“You’re – the one who did this,” he said, gesturing to his scar. “You’re afraid of me?” But she didn't sense a mocking or derisive tone. She sensed anger, but what was more unsettling was the voice in her head that shouldn’t have been there. His voice. Not you, too.

“Shouldn’t I be?” She retorted. “You have no idea what it's like; to open your eyes and find a monster staring at you, contemplating Force knows what!”

He hummed, pursing his lips.

“You're right; I have no idea at all,” he said, his eyes betraying sarcasm. “No need to fear; I am still on the Finalizer. You’re safe from this monster.” His words were sharp as he glanced away from her, clearly agitated by her reaction.

The memory of awakening to him watching her in a similarly vulnerable situation echoed in her mind. Part of her missed that mask. It was easier to forget he had hurt her – that she had been foolish enough to let him hurt her. Her entire life on Jakku, she had been so careful not to allow anyone close enough. Then she had fallen for his tricks and allowed the enemy – the one man she knew she should not trust – to hurt her. And she was forced to see him again and again, at her most vulnerable, as he sat there and watched her with those piercing eyes.

She scanned the room for a weapon but paused when her searching eyes met his reproachful stare. “Why are you still sitting there watching me?”

“These are my quarters,” he answered with unraveling restraint. “You’re... in my bed.”

No, I’m in mine. You’re in my room.

“Get out!” she demanded. How could I have been stupid enough to believe in you? You almost killed my friends! You killed those prisoners like they were nothing!

He sighed dramatically. “We’ve gone over this... I can’t. I’m waiting for you to leave.” He sounded defeated and broken – for what, she didn’t care to guess. “It’s been... an eventful day.”

Rey remembered the moment they were last connected. She saw him standing before the prisoners, the perfect picture of intimidation. She felt the conflict raging inside him, and, for one moment, she thought he wouldn’t do it. It was her own foolish belief that there was still light in him, but she was wrong; whatever light still existed inside him would never be enough. The young woman, not much older than Rey, cried as he raised the lightsaber. He didn’t care. He didn’t care that they were defenseless. He didn’t care that two of them were obviously in love. He killed them all. Not a spark of remorse crossed the bond, even when he noticed she had watched it all. Monster.

When he did see her, he dared to touch her with the hands that had taken those lives. She had wanted to scream at him, to ask him why, but she felt his instability in the Force. He might as well have been screaming into the room and destroying everything in sight by the emotions that drowned them in the Force. It had been disquieting to watch the most powerful man in the galaxy fall to the floor, nails digging into the side of his head as he screamed. She had seen Kylo unraveled, but that was different.

Without thinking, she had picked up his broken helmet and brought it to him in the hope it would help calm him. She had felt the Force building to a crescendo inside him, and part of her wanted to see what would happen. She ignored his cries for her to run, but the Force dragged her away anyway. He was fine; she had felt his strong energy immediately. He was free to murder people another day and refer to it as “eventful.”
“I didn’t think murder would be considered eventful for someone like you.”

His eyes lowered to the floor. He worked his jaw as he suppressed the emotions that threatened to betray his calm exterior, but she could feel it across the connection. She had hurt him, but she reminded herself that she had nothing to feel guilty for – he deserved much worse. He glanced at something she could not see and stood.

“I was anticipating departure after a few hours of rest, but that is becoming increasingly less likely,” he sighed in resignation. “I can sleep… later.”

Something told her that “later” wouldn’t be for several days, just as something told her that it had been days since he last slept. She remembered seeing him the night in her bunk, destroying a room while he believed her to be asleep. She had assumed he was on a different day cycle across the galaxy somewhere, but she also remembered the exhaustion in his eyes and the constant draw on the Force. He was intentionally keeping himself awake. For days. Why? His next words interrupted her thoughts. “Droid, let’s go.”

An astromech droid similar in design to Beebee-Ate, save for the black and silver exterior shell and squarer shape of its domed head, rolled in from an antechamber. From what Finn had told her of their mission to the Supremacy, the First Order BB units were supposed to have malicious personalities built into their programming. It was a droid just like this one that had exposed them and nearly gotten them killed, after all.

But this one seemed different, its vocalizations portraying a very childlike personality as it expressed its fears of traveling in open space – and fears for its “master” as well. The photoreceptor and sensor seemed to be broken, as it used Kylo's leg to help navigate the room. And the Supreme Leader... allowed it. Perhaps it was his interaction with the droid, or perhaps it was remorse for her harsh words, perhaps it was her own loneliness, perhaps it was her fear of what he was planning, but she suddenly and inexplicably did not want him to leave.

“Where are you going?” She hadn’t intended to sound fearful, but his disparaging glower was proof enough that he had interpreted it that way.

He crossed the room, slumped down onto something she couldn’t see, and began sliding on his boots. She could feel the resentment rolling off him in waves. “Nowhere near your precious Resistance,” he said, exasperated.
“Look, I wish I wasn’t here, too. I can move out of your bed,” she said. “Don’t... leave. You should sleep.” There was a moment when he paused, taken aback by her request. He waited for her to continue as if her words were a momentary lapse in judgment. A weakness. Or a cruel prank.

“I don’t sleep – not quite,” he said distractedly as he laced up one boot. He shook his head as he huffed humorlessly to himself. “Not quite, nearly, almost – that should be my epitaph.” He said it with a scoff, but she could hear the resentment underneath.

“What is that supposed to mean?”

“Nothing,” he answered, shaking his head. “Just the way my life has gone. A compilation of ‘almost.’”

She couldn’t help but feel that whatever he was talking about, it involved her. It wasn’t her fault that he had chosen darkness over his family... and her. “I don’t think Supreme Leader is ‘almost,’” she said, her voice low in warning.

He hesitated in his efforts, and his eyes grew distant. Wherever his mind was, it wasn’t there with her. “No, you wouldn’t think so,” he said. There was something in his voice; something that gave her pause, something that reminded her that there was more to Kylo than what the rest of the galaxy saw. The problem was, she didn’t know who he was underneath. She thought she had, but she’d been wrong, very wrong. That voice deep inside her was calling for her to find out as she watched him stare blankly at his boots with a look that distinctly resembled something rueful.

Perhaps it was that look that inspired her to extend him a modicum of compassion. “When was the last time you slept?”

“I don’t remember,” he said bluntly. Her question seemed to jolt him out of his pensive trance, and he began fastening his boots again.

“When will you sleep, if not now?” She cringed at the softness in her voice. He was a murderer. She wasn’t supposed to care what happened to him. She didn’t.

As he hooked his lightsaber onto his belt, he sighed. Again, his answer was brusque, as if she were irritating him. “I don’t know.”
“Why don’t you sleep?”

“I have control when I’m awake,” he said, and there was something in his eyes, something beyond the irritation. Fear. Rey knew what she feared when she slept, but what did he have to fear? Nightmares? What could a monster fear? His next words were so soft, they were barely audible over her heartbeat. “I will just meditate instead.”

Rey let out a snort of disbelief. “You? Meditate? Everything about you is the opposite of peaceful.”

His eyes met hers as she tried to contain her laughter. She could feel the slightest tinge of mirth in him as well. The bond settled, and Rey could almost feel the tendrils binding their souls together thickening and strengthening. Their bond was temporarily amicable, but his face was conflicted. Why?

He knows that if you allow the bond to strengthen through compassion and sentiment, there will come a point when you cannot keep the other out... He will be able to read your thoughts... Manipulate you with his emotions... And find you wherever you hide...You will be weakened... Bound to a monster for eternity... But the bond is destructible... through animosity... Shut him out; protect your friends... If the monster has nightmares, do not feel sorry for him... He brought the nightmares upon himself...

Fear tipped the balance of the bond, allowing darkness to empower her. An icy breath escaped her lips on her next exhale. I will die before I let our bond grow stronger. A quiver of chagrin over the connection jerked her attention back to him. She studied his fiery eyes. Tell me, Supreme Leader, what do monsters have to fear in their nightmares?

The exasperation that pinched his brows convinced Rey of two truths. One, he had heard her private thought. Two, he likely heard the first thought as well. She swallowed her shame. He had waited for her cruelty after she had offered him the bed to sleep, and he had not been disappointed. She had no compassion left for the man; he was a murderer, but she didn’t have to be cruel. That wasn’t who she was. Why did their connections make her forget that?

Kylo turned back toward his wardrobe, clearly intent upon leaving. “Don’t,” she said. “I’ll move out of my... your bed, and I won’t say anything more while I’m here. I’ll let you sleep.”

When he turned to her, his face was twisted in disgust. “I’m not leaving because I have nowhere to sleep. Do you honestly believe me too entitled or pretentious to sleep on the floor? You can view my life as ‘privileged,’ ‘spoiled’ and ‘blessed,’ and I won’t fault you, but clearly you are mistaken about the luxuries provided in Jedi or Knight training,” he said. “No, I’m leaving because I can’t do...this. I can’t be around you.” The only sound in the room was Rey’s sharp intake of breath.
How dare he act as if she were the one who destroyed everything in that throne room, as if she were murdering people between her evil warlord meetings.

“I’m sure I’ll fade away soon, so you won’t have to suffer being around me much longer,” she snapped, making the choice to add fuel to their growing animosity.

He ignored her comment, focusing instead on wrapping a heavy, yet elegantly crafted cloak around his broad shoulders. It swooped in a cowl across his neck, fastened by a black and red broach displaying the First Order insignia at his left shoulder. It had originally caught her eye, because the entire underside of the black, hooded cloak was lined in a shiny, blood-red material. She had thought nothing could look more menacing than his monochromatic uniform, but she had been wrong.

He looked fierce and formidable, yes, but he also radiated an air of superiority and importance.
Perhaps his strong stature was to blame for his intimidating appearance – her reaction to him shirtless had been evidence enough for that hypothesis – but there was no mistaking that she was in the presence of royalty. She had no doubt she would look anything but regal in such ostentatious attire, yet he looked the part in every way. Perhaps he had his mother to thank for that. As regally as he portrayed himself, however, the lowly scavenger turned Jedi knight refused to be intimidated.

_The Supreme Leader already has a new cloak to match his status. Pretentious indeed._

The droid followed obediently along next to him, and she wondered if he would abandon it like everything else he had abandoned in his life. “Is that your droid?”

Kylo stared down at the droid, considering her question. “Yes.”

Hearing her speak about him, the droid attempted to find her. She slid from the bed into a crouch on the floor, examining him. “Does he have a name?”

Kylo watched her examine the astromech intently. His expression softened incrementally. “He was called BB-10XZ, but he doesn’t like it. I call him ‘droid.’”

“How original,” Rey replied as she examined the droid thoroughly. “He has broken sensors.”
“And you were a scavenger.”

Rey’s eyes dragged from the droid up to his face. She hoped her stare was positively withering. Kylo swallowed his next words, shuffling uncomfortably on his feet. “When we first met, I asked you about the droid that held the map to Skywalker.”

Her scowl deepened. “I remember.”

“Of course,” he said, hesitating as he pressed his lips together in thought. “You sounded familiar with the astromech series when you said it was a ‘BB unit with a selenium drive and a thermal hyperscan vindicator, internal self-correcting gyroscope propulsion system and optics corrected to… something I did not learn, because I told you I was familiar with general droid technological specifications – which I am to a degree– but I don’t know how to fix this, not without a reset to bring the optics back online, which could alter his central programming.”

Rey knew her face betrayed her surprise, first, by his memory and then his offer. I understand him remembering ‘monster,’ but does he remember everything I’ve ever said to him? She stared at him in awe. It was as if he had spoken an unknown language. In a way, he had, because he was the Supreme Leader. He believed she was nothing. He had access to the most skilled workers in the galaxy. He couldn’t mean it. “You're asking me to fix him.” Confusion bled through into her words. She cleared her throat. “Are you asking me to fix him?”

Kylo huffed, staring down at the droid. His next words came out as barely a whisper. “I could pay you.” It was strange, how Kylo looked at the droid as if he cared for him. That wasn’t possible, of course; Kylo didn’t care for anyone but himself. If he had asked her anything else, she would have told him where to shove it, but she wouldn’t allow the droid to suffer.

“Do you have the spare parts?”

He cocked his head to the side, studying her, almost as if he were taunting her. “Do you mean the ones you threw at me?”

Contempt and something that felt oddly like guilt heated her cheeks as he retrieved them from his desk and handed them to her. She dragged the tool kit she had scavenged from the supplies to where the droid waited patiently on the floor. “Hi, my name is Rey; I’m here to help you,” she told the droid, hoping to settle his fears.
The droid ignored her, chirping his fearful questions to Kylo instead. “Don’t be afraid,” Kylo murmured tenderly, soothingly. “She’ll help you.”

His voice was too gentle, too kind. It was nothing like the emotionless man hidden behind a mask. It reminded her too closely of the man in the hut. The wound he had left behind in the throne room was still raw, and she felt tears blur her vision. She wiped them away as if she were wiping her brow. “What are you doing here with him?”

Rey hadn’t expected the tale the droid wove – being treated like worthless property by the officers of the First Order, being teased ruthlessly by the other droids for having "errors" in his programming, being dropped down the garbage shoot because he was broken and different, then waiting to die until Kylo rescued him. He told her of how Kylo had tried to fix him, and when he couldn't, how he helped navigate until he could. Kylo had told him that he wasn't a good person, the droid told her. But he believed Kylo was wrong, even if the man thought he had to kill those people. The droid was speaking of someone she thought she had known once, but she had been wrong. The droid would understand that one day, too.

As Rey worked, Kylo's acute gaze became irritating. After he asked for the third time, in an obnoxiously nervous tone, “If you do that, will he still keep his programming?” she grabbed the nearest hydrospanner and pointed the business end toward him.

“Don't you have something else to do like... practice your scowl or contemplate galactic domination or figure out how many black layers you can wear before you die of heat exhaustion?” Kylo had the sense to harden his face into a mask somewhat resembling contrition. “Oh, that reminds me…” Rey jumped up and moved to the box where she knew she had stored his helmet.

“I...” Kylo hadn’t noticed her distraction. He stared down at himself, scowling, as if he only just noticed his dark choice in attire.

“Here, the connection snapped shut after I picked it up,” she shoved the helmet into his hands and resumed her work, hoping he wouldn’t press the issue. She could feel the heat of his stare and knew she wouldn’t be that lucky. When she glanced up, he was examining the mask in his gloved hands. “Weren't you about to sleep?” she asked, hoping to change the subject. “Do you always wear gloves to bed?” If she hadn't seen him after training once, she wouldn't have been surprised to discover he'd found a way to attach his clothes permanently. She was convinced he hated the sun. It made sense; he hated everything else good in the galaxy. It was probably another reason why he liked Star Destroyers.

Kylo narrowed his eyes and tilted his head, observing her slightly askance, but he allowed the question on his tongue to die, for which Rey was thankful. Instead of prying as to why she had asked him what he wore to bed, he placed the helmet over his head. She returned to her work with a derisive snort.

“I didn’t know how long you would be here. I thought you would be less... uncomfortable this way,” he said, the deep electronic hiss of the servomotors in his mask sending chills down her spine. He glanced away in frustration... or shame; she hated how difficult he was to read with the helmet hiding his features. He huffed a breath, his fist clenching and unclenching at his side.

She wrapped the darkness around herself like a shawl, protecting herself from his attempts at coaxing her into complacency. “Oh, you’re right. The mask and gloves remind me of everything horrible you have ever done to me, and then it’s easier to remember the murderous creature you are, so thank you,” she said.

He surprised her by raising his hands to press the release on his helmet, removing it slowly, though he had only just put it on, his eyes downcast. His attention shifted to the helmet for a moment before speaking. “You fixed it.” When his eyes did return to hers, it was difficult to reconcile their softness with the genocidal megalomaniac he was known to be. He may have looked the part of Supreme Leader, Emperor of the galaxy, but he suddenly seemed more like a boy playing dress-up than the monster of nightmares.

“I could have made it good as new if you hadn’t welded it back together with a lightsaber. I’m not sure what you did to it, but –”

“I destroyed it,” he whispered as his fingers traced over the ridges created by his inexperienced hands. “After Snoke told me I would never be as powerful as my grandfather because I had ‘too much of my father’s heart in me.’”

“Why?” She had spoken the one word before she had considered whether she wanted to know.

“Because I hadn’t been capable enough to retrieve the map from you, and I had never lost in combat, but then I failed against ‘a girl who never held a lightsaber before.’ He said it wasn’t your strength,” he scoffed as if the idea was absurd, “but my weakness. Weak and foolish, like my father. Too sentimental like my grandfather.”

“I don’t understand. Did he think you were you too much like your grandfather or not enough?” Kylo didn’t answer her, and she refused to look up to see the expression on his face. The gentleness in his voice was disarming enough on its own.
What happened to him? What happened to the cruel, confident man who threatened to kill me only days ago? The man who killed innocents?

The worst part was – as fervently as she denied it – she still cared what had happened to him. It disgusted her. She would never fit in with the Resistance if felt concern for the enemy.

The droid beeped in excitement and gratitude as she finished repairing the sensor – the obviously not red sensor – of the BB units of the First Order. “All fixed…programming intact,” she said, glaring at Kylo in annoyance, but his stare was fixed on the droid.

“It's blue,” Kylo said as he studied the new sensor, but he didn't sound disappointed. There was a brightness to it, almost a childlike wonder. She must have been imagining it. It was easier to believe him to be either violent or brooding than the complex man before her. The droid chirped nervously, fearing this new difference.

“You’re different,” she told the little astromech, reexamining her repair. “Good different.” Something crossed Kylo’s face at her response, but it faded into something unreadable as swiftly as it had appeared. The droid answered in binary. Rey scrunched her nose. “Blue isn’t really a droid name, but what about ‘Ex’ or ‘Zee’ or ‘Tenex?’” she offered.

“You can have whatever name you want.” There was something in Kylo’s tone that told her the comment applied to more than just the droid. He was adamant to the point of straddling the line of anger. Rey turned to the droid and nodded in agreement. Kylo moved to step closer to Rey but hesitated, then increased the distance between them instead. “How much do I owe you? I have credit chips or ingots in the safe. Do you have a preference?”

Rey stood, dusting off her trousers. Though she had been kneeling next to a droid on his Star Destroyer, there were red patches of dirt on her pants from the temple. “Of course, you have a private safe. You probably have more currency in there than I’ve seen in my entire life.”

Kylo stared at her, expression unreadable. The only indication of his contrition was the slight shift of the apple in his throat. He wasn't foolish enough to argue with her, which only served to anger her more. “I'll give you everything that's in there if you want it.” His own eyes seemed to widen slightly at his offer.

She remembered a time she stood next to another BB unit, starving, when she was offered enough portions to change her life. She hadn't taken the offer then, at her most desperate, and she wouldn't take the offer now. She wouldn’t owe him anything.
“I don't want anything from you or the First Order.”

He nodded once, either not offended by her rebuke or concealing it well. “Will you accept my gratitude, then?” She rolled her eyes at his pretentious speech. He must have assumed her silence was acceptance, or he didn’t care either way, because he continued, “Well… thank you for helping him, Rey.”

It was only after he said it that she realized how rarely he had spoken her name aloud since the Supremacy, especially with such tenderness. She hadn't anticipated how painful it would be to hear that one syllable, only three letters, formed by his lips. “I didn't do it for you,” she assured him. “I did it for Blue.”

The astromech chirped brightly at the name. Kylo knelt on the other side of the droid, his hands carefully inspecting her work. “Hey Blue, can you see me? Can you scan the room?” She hadn’t expected Kylo to use the name, and a strange churning in her stomach followed the thought.

Rey had expected the droid to take off rolling now that he could navigate with ease, but he nudged into Kylo's knee, head lowered, the BB unit's closest approximation of an embrace. His beeps and whirrs were quiet, but she understood enough. He was calling Kylo “master,” thanking the man for not giving up on him and begging him not to be sent away. Kylo dipped his own head and whispered something back, but it was too soft for her ears. This man was incongruous to the image of Kylo Ren she had formulated in her head. It hurt to see glimpses of the man she thought he was.

But he is Kylo Ren, the voice reminded her. Just ask him… Remember what he did to kill Ben Solo.

She searched for anything she could to push him away, to protect herself from further heartache. Kylo was not a good person; what he had done to her was testament to that. “Good, now that you have a droid, you can find better use of your time than watching me sleep.”

Giving the droid a soft pat, he stood from his kneeling position, looming a few paces away, fidgeting with his gloves. They both knew he was lingering, delaying the inevitable, finding any excuse not to leave. Something deep inside her begged to give him an excuse, but the darkness silenced that swiftly. “I wasn’t watching you, not like that… I was... concerned. You sounded upset,” he replied, softer than she preferred. “Nightmares – do you have them often?” He raised his eyes to search hers.
Had he seen her dream?

“You, Supreme Leader? Concerned? For anyone other than yourself?” she laughed coldly, sidestepping his prying question. “My dreams are of no consequence to you.”

“I suppose not...” There was something in his eyes, however. It was that same look he had when they first met, the one that suggested he knew more about her than she did herself. It made her uncomfortable in a feverish way.

“You know all about my dreams and nightmares, though, don’t you, since you’ve forced yourself into my mind?” she asked resentfully, veiling her other emotions under the superficial darkness scavenging on her anger.

_I wish you would just disappear already. It's easier when I don't have to look at you._

His body stiffened, his fists clenched, and he stepped forward to leave. Then he paused. He lowered his eyes again and was quiet, his emotions teetering on the edge of an unknown chasm. Had she known what the consequences would be if she pushed him, she would have.

_If it is truly me who is breaking this man down, then what happens if I continue? Will he turn? Fall to pieces? Or repeat his wrath on Crait?_

She shuddered. He was tormentingly unpredictable.

Kylo also had the tactical advantage in their bond. He appeared to have the ability to insulate his thoughts and emotions from her at will. She had no knowledge of Force Bonds or the intricacies of this predicament they were enslaved within. Fear of the unknown tore at her every waking moment.

_Can he hear all my thoughts? Can he see where I am? Can he find us? Can he use the bond to hurt my friends? How much does he know, because of me? Can he show up whenever he wants? Can I find a way to end the connection like I accidentally did on Crait? How do I block myself off from him? Can I ever end this permanently?_

“I only hear your mind when... this... happens,” he sighed. “Your thoughts are loud; I don’t search for them. I do not desire any more voices in my head. Trust me. And I have no intent to use you, Rey – to find your friends or otherwise. I said those things out of... it doesn’t matter. Just know that I didn’t mean them. I can’t show up whenever I want... at least I don’t know how to yet. I do think we are somehow responsible for establishing each connection, though.”

“I know that it is possible to sever the connection temporarily as you did on Crait, it only requires a resolve devoid of conflict. I have the same control over this as you do, which is not enough. And if you want to block your mind from me, find my energy in your consciousness and actively block that energy with the Force. It won’t stop this,” he gestured with his hand, “I’ve tried, but it does block thoughts and emotions from bleeding through.” She blushed, focusing in her mind at blocking his energy. Why would he tell her this? How did it benefit him?

“How do you think the connection is established then, if it isn’t the Force’s will? And if you know that all it takes is determination to sever the connection, then why don’t you do it?” she asked skeptically. She barely noticed that the man determined to leave her only moments before had reassumed his position in the chair across from her.

“This is all conjecture, without your help, but I presume either you or I consciously open the connection by thinking of the bond. Our first ever connection occurred when I was in the medbay receiving treatment for this,” he pointed to the scar bisecting his face.

“I was focused on how I received that scar. The second time, I was considering our new connection. The others... I’m not certain. Some of them, perhaps, but the connection after training, I know it wasn’t me. My thoughts had been in a dark place. Tonight, I’m positive I did this. I was thinking about what you saw today. So if those other moments you were thinking of me... of our bond – even in hatred – then we know it is not random. If not, then it could be moments of vulnerability,” he murmured, staring down at his clasped hands. “And, yes, I said determination could sever the connection, but I also said it had to be a decision devoid of conflict. I think you know why I haven’t been very successful in closing the connection. But now that you know how, you can do it. Perhaps if you do it enough, the bond will weaken, and fade entirely.”

To say she was surprised by his answer was an understatement. Their usual banter was completely under his control. He would stonewall or counter-question to direct the discussion to his will. But this answer seemed less calculated, and the most he had ever spoken to her. Her immediate reaction was to reward his honesty with her own.

After her experience in the cave, she had desperately wanted to speak to him. The other instances she had been thinking of him, whether it was positive or negative was irrelevant. But she didn’t want to admit it, to give him the satisfaction of solving it. He was doing it again – becoming that contemplative student seeking a partner to help analyze an interesting problem – and it terrified her. Instead, she searched deep within herself for the resolve to close the connection. She shut her eyes, imagining her room without him in it. An empty, quiet... lonely room. A room where she would never have to hear his voice or feel his knowing eyes on her again.
Is that what I want?

It was… complicated. When they were apart, she hated him, but there was still a deeper yearning for answers that she couldn’t erase. She needed to understand the contradiction between Kylo Ren and the glimpses of the man she thought she had seen on that island – the man she had thought was Ben Solo. As unequivocally as the Resistance needed her to end the bond with him, Rey wavered. To no one’s surprise, he was still sitting there when she opened her eyes again. He raised an eyebrow in intrigue.

Don’t. Say. Anything.

Rey lowered her stare to her hands in chagrin. Evidently, his stare followed. “What happened to your hand?” he asked quietly. His sudden change in topic would have been welcome if his prying question hadn’t suggested an ulterior motive that was likely sinister in nature. Her eyes inspected the red circular burns dappling her palm.

The acid rain.

He is searching for information on the Resistance… He is still the enemy… Don’t allow him to seduce you into complacency… You will pay for it with your lives… the whisper warned.

“Those are… bruises from training,” she lied. When she met his stare again, his eyes were guarded. They did not flicker with a hint of either acceptance or doubt. She feared he could see straight through her lie, but he said nothing that suggested he rejected her explanation. She was confident he would not knowingly allow her to answer an inquiry of his with anything but the truth. When he did not challenge her, she concluded he had accepted her answer. “What else do you know about the bond?” she asked hastily, refocusing their discussion.

“Not enough,” he answered. “I know it’s a Force Bond. I’ve never seen this before, save for my… save for Leia and Luke. But they couldn’t see each other. Or touch. No, this is something else. Something… unique. And it is growing stronger. At first, all I could see was you. But now… I see some of your surroundings. I hear your thoughts.”

“We can hurt each other now,” she reminded him, “and I can feel what you feel.”
There was a flash of distrust in his eyes, but it faded the longer he stared at her. The intensity returned with something terrifyingly knowing. “I think you’ve always been able to feel what I feel, Rey.”

No. He was wrong. She hadn’t been able to feel anything from him before Snoke had bridged their minds. It was a simpler time when all she knew about her enemy was his desire to be as powerful as his evil grandfather. It was simpler when all he was to her was a murderer. “I guarantee when I cut your face open, I felt nothing.”

“Maybe not physically,” he said, releasing her from his all-consuming to glance down at his clasped hands. “But maybe you were still influenced by the bond. You barely knew my family, but you were drawn to them. Do you ever wonder why? Why did you think of Luke as a hero? Why were you so disappointed when he failed you? Why do you think of Leia as a mother? Why do you fear that you’ll never be good enough for her? Why did you see Han as a father? Why were you disappointed when he was dismissive toward you? And then, when he praised you, why did it mean everything? Why were you devastated when I killed him? You knew him for a day. Maybe… maybe you were experiencing more than just your own emotions toward them.”

Rey stepped closer, lowering her voice to a growl. “No, no, that had nothing to do with you. I don’t care what you think you’ve seen in my mind; you have no idea what I feel toward them. Luke was a hero, Leia is everything I always wished for in a mother, and a general, and I was devastated because Han was a good man! He and Finn came back for me. He didn’t deserve to die. I didn’t get that from the bond. What I felt… you’ll never understand. You weren’t devastated because you murdered him.”

“Ah, yes, I forgot, you know everything you need to know about me,” he said in a tone that suggested she still didn’t. But she did. He had revealed exactly who he was in that throne room, on Crait, and in that execution hall. “Have you ever wondered why you hate me so deeply? Why – from the very second you met me – before you even knew me, you have wished for my death?”

“If you expect me to believe my hatred toward you is influenced by the bond, then I would be happy to…” put you out of all our misery. The darkness in her implored her to finish her thought, but she couldn’t bring herself to say it. She had shouted similar words as you threw droid parts at him, but she had regretted it later. As shameful as it was to admit – and for reasons she didn’t care to contemplate – she didn’t want him to die. “Look, that stuff doesn’t matter anyway. Let’s focus on what’s important, okay? This is getting stronger. I think we can both agree that is the opposite of what we want.”

“Right,” he said, tone clipped as he straightened.

“Luke…” She watched his expression harden further as she dared to utter his uncles’ name. “Or his Force energy anyway, told me he had never seen a Force Bond so strong. He said he had never seen one between a dark and a light user before, either.”

She sensed resentment, of course, but also... jealousy... in his voice. “Luke. He came to you again?”

“Again?”

“Other than the time when he helped you find me in the Force,” he replied bitterly. “You remember, when you attempted to infiltrate my consciousness to gain information for the Resistance?”

What is he talking about?

“I only saw him once. And he helped me find our bond. I wasn’t trying to ‘gain information for the Resistance,’ nor did I think about doing that, honestly, but I had so many questions about our connection, and he was trying to help me answer them,” she assured him, immediately annoyed by the indulgent gesture.

His eyes narrowed as he keenly searched hers for something. Whatever it was, he must have found it, because his features softened. Those eyes. They lured her in. At first, she had thought his eyes were as sable as the hair that fell haphazardly over his forehead. But just as there was to Kylo himself, there was so much more to those venerable eyes. The centers were warm, a deep amber, enveloped in an almost golden halo that flickered celestially in the light. He could hide an entire galaxy behind them, but even that would not reach their depths.

And yet, when his eyes focused on her, she was – if just for a moment – the only person in the entire universe. There was a piercing, penetrating ferocity to his eyes, but in those intimate moments between just the two of them, there was also a vulnerable softness to them. And the knowledge behind them... had she been told the millennia old, collective wisdom of the Cosmic Force had been stored within those eyes, she would have believed it. She had seen her fair share of evil eyes in her life – Niima Outpost was no stranger to unsavory characters – but his pained eyes... they were haunting because they were not meant for an enemy.

Rey shuddered. Her eyes danced to his lips as they parted, his breathing quiet but uneven. Realizing the inappropriateness of her glance, she focused on his strong nose instead. But she could feel the fervid heat of his stare, and her eyes unwittingly darted back up to meet his. Something flashed across his eyes, too swiftly for her to interpret, but the change stirred her conflicted emotions. There was a heaviness to the air around them, a polarity that drew her to him. It was maddening... and dangerous.

He is a monster... Do not forget what you learned on the Supremacy... He is trying to use your bond to kill you and your friends... He is manipulating you, by seducing you... Do not trust him, the Force's voice reminded her.

She searched for anything to say to cut through the gravity in the room. She hoped sharp words would disguise the weakness in her voice, which was heavy with emotion.

“I wanted to learn everything I could from Luke, because I wanted to know how to end this.” Her attempt was successful. His eyes dropped to his hands as he pressed his lips together firmly. His brow furrowed, and he shifted weight back into his chair. She could nearly feel the shield he had hastily constructed between them. The darkness numbed her, but it still stung.

“I killed the only one strong enough to show me how to end it. Apparently, the same one who created it,” he whispered. “So I am as ‘in the dark,’ so to speak, with this as you are. If I knew how to end this, I promise, I would.”

He looks so...alone. But who does he have left, other than a droid? Maybe he is alone. Maybe I was the only other person who understood that loneliness. He was the only one who understood that loneliness in me.

She shivered as she thought about their intimate moment together in the hut on Ahch-To. It was difficult not to see the same vulnerable man in front of her as the one that touched her hand that night.

It was his decision. He could have turned. We are both alone because that was the choice he made in the throne room.

“Do you regret killing Snoke?” she asked. The mention of his name sent a visible shudder through Kylo.

“Are you asking if I would do it again?” his voice was quiet but sincere. “Save you?”

Save me? We both know that's not why you did it.
“Yes,” she heard herself answer instead. Her stomach twisted in anticipation. Despite her desire for his feelings to be worthless to her, she knew his response had the potential to further break her heart. Was she nothing to him? Knowing her answer in the throne room, would he throw her away like garbage this time, as her parents did? Or would he still save her?

“I would.” There was not an ounce of conflict in his voice, but it was the thought she heard in her mind, words spoken in his deep voice that she knew she should not be privy to, that intrigued her the most. I would save you every time, his voice whispered in her mind. Her chest swelled with warmth at his admission, but the frigid darkness quickly tempered it. He pressed his lips together tightly and swallowed. She sensed he had wanted to say more, but thought better of it.

Of course, he would... He enjoys the power you helped him acquire... And he still believes that you will join him after he destroys the Resistance... The voice from the Force whispered. But don’t be mistaken... He would have killed you if you stood in his way... Just like he killed his father, Han Solo.

“Do you regret killing your father?” she asked. He stared at her quietly for a moment, his expression pained. “If you would kill your own father, then I have no reason to believe that you would not kill me, too.” Rey could sense the turmoil raging inside him. His breath was uneven. The expression in his eyes was the same as the first time they met on Starkiller when she forced her way into his mind. He slammed them shut like a door, forcing her out. His head tipped forward, his shoulders slumped, heaving under the weight of his thoughts.

“I’m going to try to end this, okay?” His voice cracked with emotion. His eyes flickered up to hers, glossy with tears. She had pushed him off the edge, and he was falling to pieces. She nodded slowly. “It will hurt, more than you can even imagine, but I’ll feel it too. I’ll stop if you ask. This is the only way to be free.” She nodded again, hesitantly, but he must have presumed the pause was due to fear of pain rather than reluctance to leave him. He sucked in a breath and closed his eyes, his hand outstretched toward her temple. He focused intently on something in the Force. The emotions flooding the bond disappeared on both sides. His presence pulled away from her consciousness.

He's not trying to just close the connection. she realized. He is trying to shut me out completely. He’s trying to sever the bond forever.

A searing pain split through her mind and a rolling nausea crashed through her body, as he tried to force their linked connection to separate. Crying out into the room, she grasped her head in her hands. Every molecule inside her vibrated, tearing her apart, and forcing her to collide back into him. His memories and hers were jumbled together – conversations, emotions, preferences, knowledge. There were too many sensations at once as she carried the light, darkness, pain of two people and then lost it all again. She felt the tendrils snap through her soul as he attempted to divide the glowing cord of their bond. He was physically rending their souls apart. He was powerful, strong and determined, and he was giving it everything he had, but the bond was fighting back.

Sweat poured from his forehead. His face twisted into an agonized grimace as he groaned under the pressure, but it wasn’t enough. She knew he was suffering just as much as she was. She had felt true psychological torture only once before when Snoke pried into her mind, but that paled in comparison. This wasn’t just tearing her mind apart, but tearing her soul. This pain was unbearable, but she fought to suffer through it as long as she could.

Be strong and help him end this. Think of the Resistance. You want this to go away.

At least that is what she told herself. It was true; the conflict was tormenting and the last few days had only made it worse. She wanted that suffering to end. But that didn’t stop the panic from erupting from somewhere deep inside at the thought that they would be separated forever. She knew he would be lost to the darkness. If he severed the bond, she would lose any chance she had of saving Ben Solo. Why was it only then, when he was tearing them apart, that she believed he could still be saved? She would be abandoned again... alone forever. When the intense pain finally became too overwhelming, as she was on the border of unconsciousness, she heard herself scream.

“Stop!”

The second he heard her cry, his eyes snapped open. The pain was instantly gone. The realization hit her like a blast to the stomach. The bond had wrapped its grasp possessively around her soul and would not budge. His voice echoed in her mind.

This only ends with death.

He jumped to his feet and threw something heavy on his side of the bond. She startled when it crashed and shut her eyes as he howled in helplessness behind her. He left the room without another word, the Force Bond closing with the blast door in his chambers. Did he do that? Did he close the connection on his own? She noticed her hand was extended. Without realizing it, she had reached for him as he left. She glanced up from her fingers to see a shadow standing in the archway to her room.

“Ben?” she whispered apprehensively.
“Poe,” he growled, stepping into the light.

Panic shuddered down her spine. “Poe, I… I had a nightmare, I thought I was still asleep.” Rey stumbled over her words in her fearful desperation to convince him of a lie, but she hoped it had been enough. She couldn’t explain the truth, not yet. “What are you doing here?”

He studied her for a moment, his gaze distrustful. “I heard shouting and crashing, I was concerned.”

She shrugged. “Force nightmares.” He studied her for another long moment, nodded his head and walked back down the corridor. She sighed and collapsed back into her makeshift bed.

Why was she relieved that Kylo had been unable to break the connection? Why was she left feeling the same guilt and regret that she had felt every single time she had seen him? She felt caught between fighting against him because he was her enemy and being drawn to him by forces she couldn’t explain. She knew she should hate him – that everything he had ever done to her was wrong, so why did she regret the words she said and the things she did when it was everything that he deserved? What was it about him that made that voice inside her refuse to listen to logic?

When she turned her head to switch off the glowrod on her wall, she noticed something on the crate at her bedside. It was purple with white stripes. A fruit. It hadn’t been there before.

Ben.
Chapter End Notes

Violence

They try to sever the bond which causes them both psychological duress
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“I don’t know what to do,” Finn admitted. “You’re the only one I can talk to about this. It’s Rey. I’m worried about her. She is playing with fire, and I don’t know if she is too naïve to realize it. She has some sort of Force Bond... I don’t like that word; it’s too personal... Force tether to the most evil man in the galaxy. She can hurt him, which means he can hurt her. She is strong and brave and has defeated him before, but he’s a killing machine. If she had only seen what I’ve seen…”

He shuddered as he remembered the moment that the monster pinned him against the tree. “I know what this man is capable of. I’ve witnessed his savagery. He is not only cruel and merciless, but behind that mask is an incredibly intelligent and manipulative mind. I fear that she underestimates him. There is no telling the lengths he will go to find us through her. And the way she speaks about him like she almost has... no, it couldn’t be compassion. She just has hope he will turn, and it’s frightening. I made her a promise not to tell anyone. But if she would put us all in danger, is it better to think of the survival of Resistance or to keep the promise I made to my friend? She will always have my loyalty, but I fear that being the friend she wants and being the friend she needs might become two different paths.”

He sighed, adjusting his jacket over the woman sleeping next to him. “Thanks for listening, Rose,” he whispered as a single tear escaped down his cheek. He leaned down and gently brushed a stray lock of hair from her cheek.

“I wish I could tell you this. I wish I could tell you all about it. And I desperately wish I could share my feelings for you. I’m just...scared. Everything I have ever loved or cared about has been taken away from me. I found a cause worth fighting for, but you and Rey will always be the most important people in my life. You almost died because of your feelings for me. If I let myself love you, if I tell you how much you mean to me, then what will happen if...”

“Finn, buddy!” he heard his friend call from behind him.

“Hey, I didn’t hear you standing there.” Finn smiled, quickly wiping his tear-stained cheeks on his shoulder. “Rose fell asleep on the altar while we were talking, so I thought I would sit here with her for a while. You’re up late. It’s the middle of the night cycle.”

“Oh, I haven’t been standing here long. I can’t sleep. I was visiting Leia. How are you holding up?” Poe asked, throwing an arm around Finn’s shoulders.

“As well as I can, I guess,” he answered, “How’s Leia?”

Poe’s eyes darkened. “I don’t think she is going to make it, Finn,” he admitted. “Kylo Ren has singlehandedly destroyed everything that she loves. Han Solo...Luke Skywalker...now the Resistance... Her body was weak after he tried to kill her on the Raddus, and maybe it was only a matter of time. But I just don’t think she can survive without that Force connection to Luke. It’s like their fates are interconnected. She is weakening more every hour. I think she is going to die because of their severed bond...because of Kylo Ren. What is worse, is she will die with a broken heart, and there is nothing I can do to change that. I love her like a second mother, but I will never be able to do enough to make up for what he has done to her. All the pain she carries is because of him. She is the strongest person I know, but I don’t think even she can pull through this.”

“Do you think that is how it is for all Force connections? If one of them dies, the other dies, too?” Finn asked anxiously. Poe examined his face very carefully.
“Why?” He spoke the word slowly and deliberately. Finn nervously stammered as he searched for a reasonable answer. But Poe just watched him curiously as he squirmed, like a predator luring its prey into a trap. His eyes searched for answers that Finn feared he would find. “No, I don’t,” Poe answered abruptly, “Leia and Luke were twins. What they had was unique.” Finn sighed in relief. “I do have a question for you, though, since you’re here.”

“Sure,” Finn smiled, “Anything.”

“Do you think…” Poe hesitated, “That Rey is committed to the Resistance?”

“Of course!” But it was Finn’s turn to ask suspiciously, “Why?”

“Don’t get me wrong, I know she saved us all. There are just some strange things she has said. And there is a bounty on her head, for killing Snoke. She was on the Supremacy and never told us. Why was she there, and why didn’t she tell anyone? I can’t shake the feeling that she is lying to us… about Kylo Ren.

“I was in the corridor a couple of minutes ago. You’re here, everyone else is asleep, but I swear I heard voices coming from her room. I swear I heard a man’s voice. When I was walking down the corridor, I swear I saw a shadow walk out of her room, and I would recognize that violent stride anywhere. I had to be imagining it, because there is no way the Supreme Leader was here. But, then again, when I walked into her room, she called me ‘Ben.’ She said it was a nightmare, but she said ‘Ben,’ not ‘Ren.’ I know what I heard.”

Poe paced for a moment in agitation. He mumbled to himself as he fussled with his hair before shifting his eyes back to Finn. “I don’t know much about the Force, but I do know this. If Leia... is gone, they will be the only two Force users left in this war. I can’t help but worry that, without Luke, Rey will search out the only person who can teach her about her new powers. She just seems so secretive. But maybe that is my own fear of how dangerous Kylo Ren can be that is making me paranoid. I mean, if he finds us we’re all dead, right?” he laughed, which made Finn uncomfortable, the emotion out of place with the consequence of his words. “But you know her best; she isn’t hiding anything, is she?

Finn was quiet as he contemplated Poe’s argument. Rey hated Kylo, didn’t she? She would never betray the Resistance. She just needed time. “I’ll talk to her,” he assured him.

“And if there is something going on,” Poe said, studying him. “You’ll tell me, right?”
Finn nodded vehemently. “Yes, I will. I promise.” Poe nodded in return and began walking down the corridor but stopped himself in the archway. He rapped his knuckles on the wall and pivoted his head enough for Finn to hear him.

“Tell her how you feel, Finn.” he smiled, nodding at Rose. “I know it’s not the same, but the last time I saw my mother, I refused to say ‘goodbye’ because I thought if I didn’t, then it wouldn’t be. It was. You’re in love either way. Trust me, if something terrible were to happen, you’ll regret the words you didn’t say more than the ones you did.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo tentatively closed his eyes, his gloved fingertips pressed gently onto the cold surface of the controls in the interior of his command shuttle. Blue quietly busied himself with exploring the hidden secrets of the ship's computer. They had made the jump to lightspeed to enter hyperspace, and though Kylo wasn't irresponsible enough to sleep between jump points, he could at least rest. He desperately sought the peace of meditation.

Eyes closed, he pushed deeper into the Force. The first level was senses and perception, the second was emotions – which were thankfully limited on a ship with only a droid in the vastness of space – the third was the visible energy that made up the galaxy around him, and the fourth was the whispers of the Cosmic Force. The fifth was rumored to be the Cosmic Force itself. Luke had said the fourth level was the closest one could come to the fifth. It was where one could purportedly commune with Force ghosts.

It had been years since Kylo had allowed himself to fall into the fourth level of meditation. Snoke… Sidious had forbidden it, and Luke had been overly interested and critical of what he had perceived. Without the guiding, controlling, voices of Luke or Sidious in his head, he allowed himself to sink deeper into the Force. Rey may have believed meditation was antithetical to the war within him, but if he could spend his entire life in meditation, he would. It was a way to ascend beyond the conflict of his mind. It was the closest he had ever come to peace.

Distantly, he heard Blue express his displeasure at being levitated off the floor. Kylo felt himself lose contact with the seat as he sank deeper into the Force. Sound disappeared, then his physical connection to the ship, followed by the chaotic thoughts that crashed through his mind, and, finally, his emotions. It would take several minutes to quiet his thoughts, but he knew it was within his grasp. It felt slightly unnerving, but he craved the peace it promised.

There were no voices there, except his own. He routinely used meditation as an escape from the voices in his head, though it was different now that a certain voice was missing permanently.

At first, the silence was the most peaceful sound he had ever heard. He knew the choices he made were the ones he desired; he was free. But now the silence was lonely and terrifying and... dementing. Kylo was accustomed to loneliness. His entire life consisted of trading one loneliness for another, but from his first memory as a toddler, there were the whispering voices in his head. For as long as he could remember, it was all he had ever known. When the voices disappeared, it was as if he lost a part of himself, as if he had become numb to one of his senses.

Even when he sought the foolish comfort of a voice, there was only silence... and that was a new, more profound type of loneliness. It was the worst loneliness he had ever known. He hated Sidious and himself for allowing the creature to control him for so long. The scars buried underneath his skin from Sidious's “training” were nothing compared to the damage he had done psychologically. There were parts of him that understood that he would never be free of the aftermath of Sidious's pervasive destruction of his mind.

As detrimental as Sidious had been, however, it was all he had ever known. Without him, Kylo had no one to defer to for guidance, no one to keep him focused on his path, no one to give him purpose. It was sickening to realize; he didn't know what to do without him. Even when the voices whispered how worthless he was, the anger...the fear...the hatred was something to hold on to. The only voice in his head now was his own, and that was more tormenting than Sidious could ever be.

Then again, Kylo wondered if his own thoughts were truly his own. He was accustomed to Sidious’s voice in his head, so much so that he didn't know which thoughts were his own, and which were just echoes of his former master's words. Sidious’s whispers were lies and manipulations to use him for his power. Deep down he knew that, but he didn’t know who he was without it. Sidious had convinced him that his thoughts were Kylo’s own thoughts, much as he persuaded weaker-minded individuals that his "suggestions" were their own desires. He was weakness, properly manipulated into a sharp tool. He was the rabid cur.

Sidious was gone – at least in the form of Snoke – but his influence was forever fragmented in his mind, like tiny pieces of glass mixed in sand. How could he start over with such deeply ingrained, pervasive damage? How could he live with the silence? How would he ever know his thoughts were his own? Was there even a point anymore? As long as he was alive, Hux would do everything in his power to bring Sidious back, and he definitely wouldn't be lonely in his own head anymore.

Then again, the voices weren’t truly gone. Her voice was in his head – not all the time, not in a way that drowned out his own, but it was still there. Though their agendas were vastly different, she still tried to manipulate him as much as Sidious did. Her voice terrorized him, but not in the way Sidious’s had. He was drowning; he’d always been drowning, and she... was a lifeline. Or at least she had been, but even she had left him to face the waves himself. At least she’s honest about using me, he mused. His mind was chaos. Disorder. Damaged and broken. Adding her to the mix would only further his conflict, but he willfully didn’t shut her out. He equally craved and feared the silence, but he felt an even stronger pull to her. Perhaps, it would not be so terrible if his master returned through Force Destiny. At least he would know his path...

His stomach churned at the thought.

No!

Every nerve ending crackled with the echo of a pain that the creature had inflicted upon him. He had deserved it all, naturally, but Rey... Rey deserved none of the Hell she had suffered because of him. He wouldn't do it; he wouldn't allow his darkness to bring that kind of evil upon them. If Sidious returned, Kylo knew he wouldn’t be strong enough to resist his control. Sidious would kill Rey; he was no fool, he knew how powerful she was becoming. She was strong, she would never join him. And Kylo would be powerless to protect her.

Kylo knew this wasn’t the path to reaching the fourth level in the Force. He couldn’t find answers to stop his former master if he didn’t allow his thoughts and fears to die. He couldn’t let Rey be right, not about this. His mind may have been chaotic with thoughts, but he’d had plenty of practice. It may have been the only scenario in which he could find peace, but he could find it. With one last, deep exhale, he let it go, until he thought of nothing at all. Only then did he descend further into the Force.

It had been years since he felt the absence of everything; he had forgotten its touch, but the familiarity of it was immediately soothing. If this was what it was like to die, to join the Force – no thoughts or emotion – then perhaps death would not be something worth fighting any longer. Sliding into the complete nothingness, for a split second, he had peace. Then he heard the familiar voice. Ben, please…

Kylo jolted at the sound of his uncle’s voice. As his eyes snapped open in fear, both he, the droid and everything else levitating in the ship crashed to the floor. Before Kylo could gain his bearings, there was a vibration of energy buzzing around him. He could sense the slight pull of her consciousness at the back of his mind as he scrambled back into the Captain’s seat. He impulsively removed his gloves. It occurred to him that she viewed him as less of a monster that way.

Why did he care?

He steadied his breathing as his eyes darted anxiously around the dark room illuminated solely by hyperspace. When he raised his eyes to the viewport, he could see the reflection of trees behind him. If he concentrated intently enough, he could almost hear the wind whispering through the leaves. He could almost smell the damp, rich soil. He couldn’t see her, but he felt her.

Somewhere across the galaxy, Rey sat in the jungle, presumably reclining peacefully against a tree only seconds before. For the moment, at any rate, she leaned against him instead, her back expanding and contracting with each breath. He listened quietly, reluctant to use the Force and alert her to his presence. But it was inevitable.

Her breathing quickened.

She knows.
Kylo remained perfectly still, wary of her reaction. He couldn’t take any more of her spiteful words, couldn’t stand to see the hatred in her eyes. Or disappointment. Or fear. He wished he was strong enough to end the bond like she wanted. Releasing the breath he’d been holding, he was confounded that she hadn’t reacted at all. She was reading from an actual book; he heard the physical pages turning beneath her fingertips. She was clearly ignoring him, and he remained reticent.

Whispers in the Force around him jolted him in his seat. He hadn't heard the voices of the light in nearly a decade. “First comes the day, then comes the night. After the darkness shines through the light. The difference, they say, is only made right by the resolving of gray, through refined Jedi sight.”

He immediately recognized it. It was an excerpt from the Journal of the Whills. Rey must have more of the Jedi texts, he surmised. She was quiet, not nearly as disturbed as he was by the voices. He was unsure if she was reading to herself, so he remained quiet as well, listening to her breathe. He waited in anticipation of the inevitable...the fear... the fight...but nothing happened.

They were seated back to back, completely aware of the other’s presence, yet neither whispered a word. The heaviness of the silence spoke volumes. It was madness wondering what she was thinking. He drowned in the words he yearned to say to her, yet knew he could never voice. He didn't want to ruin their current... reprieve...with more words that would come out wrong.

It wasn’t her next movement that surprised him; he could feel the shift of her energy in the Force long before he felt the jump of the muscles in her back as she moved her arms. No, it wasn’t the movement that caused him to flinch, but the realization that she had casually placed her hand next to his.

Her hand was close enough that he could move his pinky and touch her. He suppressed the overwhelming urge to feel the warmth of her skin, knowing she would be revolted by his touch. That knowledge made her following movement perplexing. Her hand brushed closer to his, alighting his fingers in a vibrating energy as the distance between their hands closed. He could feel her heartbeat increase as she leaned against his back, and his own heart likewise threatened to escape from the cage that served as its prison. Time and sound paused in the eternity he spent waiting in anticipation for her next move. A gasp escaped his parted lips as her hand moved again, resting gently on top of his bare hand.

A shiver vibrated down his spine, the bond swelling and pulsing. Her fingers were soft and cool against the heat of his hand, but they did nothing to temper the fire roaring through his veins. The energy radiating off her fingers intoxicated him, but he wasn’t the only one affected. Her breathing against his back was as unsteady as his, though likely not for the same reason. She couldn’t feel the yearning he felt. The mental shields she had constructed around her side of the bond collapsed, a rush of emotions cascaded through their connection, and they were not at all what he had expected.
There was no anger or fear. No hatred. He felt...warmth from her. He felt...regret...forgiveness...compassion...affection.

No...impossible. He rejected the thought from his mind, protecting the delicate emotions stirring inside him. There was a plea, a beseeching tremor in the Force, something begging him to let go of his fear, to let her in. Her warmth enveloped him. It was the light. Was it her light? His light? Their light together? The fear, the darkness, that had gripped him at the thought of letting it in, was eerily silent. He was exhausted from fighting for the sake of fighting, destroying himself in the process. He surrendered to the Force’s will. He let go.

Kylo closed his eyes and savored the sensation of her touch, as the energy from her palm pulsed through him. A halcyon calm settled over his features, his body relaxed as the weight of their hostility lifted, his breathing almost meditative as he reveled in their temporary truce. He could vaguely sense the carefully constructed barriers around his emotions falling away. It left him vulnerable and exposed in truth, a terrifying concept when it concerned a woman he had so much to hide from, but he was unapologetically lost in her touch. The last restraints of his side of the connection opened unconditionally, flooding the bond with every emotion he held toward her. He had anticipated her to recoil from his honesty, but he was jerked with a shock of energy instead.

Kylo instinctively opened his eyes, and the cockpit around him had changed. He knew immediately what it was. He stood to find himself in his training room on the Finalizer, lightsaber ignited. “Mother,” he whispered, sensing her presence. He turned frantically, searching for her, finding a hallway behind him. He knew whatever he sought was down that hallway. He sprinted through the corridor, the light from his weapon illuminating the way. There was nothing in the darkness until he turned a corner and saw a silhouette in the shadows in front of him. His path was suddenly blocked by a crowd, darting chaotically around him. “First Order!” they screamed.

In a break in the crowd, he could see the silhouette in a corner. As he approached, he realized it was Rey. She turned to confront him. “Let us go! You don’t have to do this!” she shouted. She stood before him, tears streaming down her face as she stared at the crackling crimson blade between them. “Goodbye, Rey,” he whispered. He was jolted by the sound of a blaster behind him. He turned to see Poe Dameron, holding a blaster aimed in their direction. “I’ll shoot!” he yelled. Kylo pivoted back toward Rey, but she was gone, and General Hux stood before him instead. “Fire,” he whispered. Kylo glanced down to see shackles gripping his wrists. The room collapsed in upon itself.

He found himself standing on a walkway, a masked Knight standing at the other end with Rey. The Knight extended his hand to her and she accepted it, placing her hand in his. “Stop!” Kylo begged. He moved down the walkway toward them, lightsaber raised. As he stepped between them, forcing her behind him, he heard the crackling hum of an activated lightsaber over his shoulder. He pivoted carefully.
Rey smiled victoriously, wielding a red plasma blade matching his. The blade missed him twice as she thrust it at his abdomen, but his luck was exhausted when it grazed his side. She gasped as he summoned the lightsaber from her, fear and confusion flickering through her eyes. He turned back toward the Knight, and, without hesitation, plunged his lightsaber through the man’s chest. The Knight was still standing before him, staggering backward as he removed the man’s helmet to reveal the face of his father, Han Solo. Kylo stared down at the lightsaber to remove it from where it impaled his father, but as he withdrew it, there was another in its place. When his eyes flickered up again, it was no longer his father’s face staring back at him. It was his own. “You know what you have to do,” he said. “Do it.” Kylo fell back in surprise onto the walkway.

As he sat up, he realized he was in a long corridor on a ship. There was high-pitched electrical screeching around him. He recognized it immediately. It was his ship. Weapons Development. He could hear voices from the room in front of him. “Do it, and I promise, I’ll help you,” Rey murmured.

“You are my greatest disappointment,” a familiar voice, his voice, whispered. A dark figure appeared in the doorway before him, wielding an indigo saberstaff. A blast crashed into his chest, and he reached down instinctively to hold the wound. Luke stepped up from behind him and knelt down next to him. He whispered in Rey’s voice, “Why didn’t you tell me, Ben.” Kylo staggered back in fear, and the floor disappeared underneath him.

He was falling in darkness, he couldn’t see anything, couldn’t hear anything over the wind, couldn’t feel anything until a hand grasped his and pulled him backward. He landed on the top of a sand dune. Darth Vader stood there, overlooking a pit containing a shrieking creature. “I let the entire galaxy suffer,” he rasped, but his voice carried none of the mechanical inhumanity of the helmet’s modulator. Kylo had a lifetime of questions to ask the man, but he was distracted by a young boy’s laugh behind him.

He knew that voice, but when he turned in search, the bright light of the sun blinded him. He shut his eyes, attempting to adjust to the light, but when he opened them, the sand dune and his grandfather were gone. He was standing in a dark room, facing a mirror. Only it was not his own reflection in the mirror, it was his former master’s.

The reflection flickered in the mirror, and the face changed to one he only vaguely recognized – Sidious. “Kill him,” the creature commanded. Rey moved between them, only it wasn’t Rey. At least, not the Rey he knew. She wore his black cowl, her rage permeated the Force around them, and her eyes were black with darkness. In a moment of clarity, he understood that her darkness – her fall – was entirely his fault.

Perhaps it was the shock of the realization that caused him to ignore the warnings in the Force. For the first time in his life, he was surprised by the press of the hilt of a lightsaber to his chest. Trembling with rage, she whispered, “My place will always be right here.” His hand wrapped around the weapon, struggling for control. With a bright flash of indigo light, Rey disappeared. The high-pitch screeching of the ship returned, and Kylo was left alone with the monster.

Sidious stepped out of the mirror, but the man standing there was Kylo’s near-perfect reflection. The familiar face was only missing a scar. The other man moved his hand, and Kylo looked down at his own as he mimicked the movement. He was holding a familiar pair of dice. His fingers unfurled to drop them, and a spark of blue lightning arced across his palm. There was branching blackness that consumed his hand, but he wasn’t afraid, not anymore.

With a swift manipulation of the Force, his lightsaber leapt into his hand, mirroring the movement of the man facing him. The man turned the hilt in his palm, and Kylo repeated the movement with his own weapon. Kylo knew he wasn’t in control, but he could be. Overriding the desire to ignite the weapon as his reflection had, he flipped the emitter chamber to face himself instead.

“What have you done?” the other man hissed.

“It is my nature,” he answered and ignited the lightsaber.

Kylo jolted violently and grasped at his tunic. Pain radiated across his abdomen. As the scrambling search of his fingers found no wound, he registered the sizzle of electricity to his left. Judging by the concern from the droid, Blue had shocked him out of his vision. The high pitch screeching had not been the ship, but the fearful droid. His eyes darted around frantically as he checked his surroundings. He was on the floor, back in the cockpit of his command shuttle again. And she was gone. He slumped back down to ease his hyperventilating, staring out at the flashes of hyperspace as he contemplated what had just happened.

It was everything he had feared. Kylo had felt her darkness over the bond, at the time he had thought it was in response to him. But what if his darkness was steadily corrupting her over the bond? It was something he had never thoroughly considered before; what if Rey fell to darkness? What if Sidious returned and took Rey as an apprentice? No. He knew that torture. He couldn’t sentence Rey to that life. If the vision was true, then he knew what he had to do to stop him.
Chapter End Notes

Violence

Various acts of threatened violence in a vision

Suicidal ideation

Brief suicidal thoughts from Kylo after he experiences a vision that he wants to prevent Rey's Vision

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey gasped as she felt his energy ripped from the Force around her.

What was that!

She had been sitting quietly, leaning against a tree while attempting to read one of Luke’s ancient Jedi texts when she had felt him. She had expected to see him in front of her. She had prepared herself for his reaction to what had happened between them the last time, but she only felt his warmth against her back. He never spoke a word. He never moved. She had been too exhausted to fight him, deciding that if he was going to ignore her again, then it was better than the alternative.

It had been as if she were still alone, almost, until she had absently put her hand down beside his. Only when she sensed his pulse quicken did she realize how close her fingers were to his. The heat radiated off his hand, and she noticed that he wasn’t wearing his gloves. She wasn’t sure whether it was because of curiosity, loneliness, or longing – or the same compelling magnetism that continued to draw her toward him every moment she was in his presence – but she had made the irrational decision to touch him.

The Force had created a vacuum between them, the tension had eased as her fingers neared his. There was something inside her that felt right, like the last piece of a puzzle clicking into place. It occurred to her then that their connection craved their touch as much as they did. It was part desire and part curiosity when she gently placed her hand over his. She remembered what had happened the last time they had touched, and part of her hoped for more.

She wasn’t disappointed.

His hand was much larger than she remembered but was invitingly warm and calming. Even if there was constant contention between them, she could not deny the comfort of his presence. It was usually infuriating, but she didn’t want to fight him. She knew she could at least block her emotions from him – he had taught her how, after all – but she had chosen not to. She was wary of the conflict, wary of the words she spoke in the comfort of darkness.

He had responded with surprise and confusion to the emotions he had sensed through the bond opened by her touch. The light that she had felt within him in the hut returned, and his radiating warmth overwhelmed her. She originally felt nothing else from him, but then his emotions suddenly flooded into the bond as well. There was no conflict, or the default anger and fear he usually hid behind. She felt an honest devotion and deep loyalty pass briefly through the bond in the seconds before she was snapped into another vision.

She stood to find herself in a destroyed building, surrounded by stormtroopers. “It’s the girl,” one said. A blaster bolt shot past her head, and she turned abruptly. She found herself with a blaster pointed between her eyes. The aim of the blaster shifted to something behind her. Pivoting back she found her bondmate, his eyes cruel. “Ben...please, don’t do this,” she begged. Another electric snap of a blaster bolt cut through the air in the room, and Kylo tumbled forward into a heap on the ground. Where he had stood, a red-headed man smiled wickedly, holding his own blaster.

She dropped to her knees and rolled Kylo over, igniting his discarded lightsaber and holding it over his face to check for signs of life. “What have I done?” she cried. Kylo’s eyes snapped open, reflecting the crimson light. He grabbed the hilt and jerked the blade closer to himself, burning himself with the quillon of his crossguard saber in the process.

Blood began flowing from his chest. As she grasped his wound, his clothes transformed from his black tunic into a deep red shirt. Desperately trying to stem the bleeding, her efforts were abandoned when he grabbed her hand. Then as quickly as it had come, the blood staining the floor around them was absorbed into his body, and the stains disappeared. He stared at her as if she was a stranger. “Let me go.” When he repeated the sentiment, it was the voice of a child.

Rey was determined to tell him she would never give up on him, on Ben Solo, when two strong arms grabbed her from behind and began dragging her. “I’m going to kill your boyfriend,” the voice whispered. She wrenched herself free, twisting to view her attacker. She fell backward in surprise, onto the floor of the Millennium Falcon. The Zabrak before her wore all black and had tattoos etched into his face. She used the Force to slam him against the wall. But when she lowered her hands, the man crumpled on the ground wore a stormtrooper’s suit. She removed the helmet to reveal Finn’s face. She stood up and noticed the emptiness of the Falcon. “Ben, where are you?” she cried.

She turned in her desperate search, the Falcon fading into a long corridor on a destroyer. Kylo stood before her. He didn’t look quite like Kylo, however. He wasn’t wearing his usual dark clothes and his eyes were... different. Brighter. Kinder. Less angry but still fearful. “Kill him,” a strange voice whispered. She stepped forward with her lightsaber to obey the voice. She surged forward, and so did Kylo. But instead of a blade, she met the soft touch of Kylo’s lips. Her eyes opened as he gasped, and she noticed the blood vessels on his face darkening to black.

She pushed him away and fell onto her back, the destroyer fading away as it began to rain. Kylo had turned away, now standing at the edge of a cliff, staring down at something she couldn’t see. “You should go,” he said. She stood, stepping toward him instead. He pivoted slightly, rain dripping down his profile as a gust of wind blew the damp hair around his face. “Things will get better now, you’ll see.” She reached for him, and their fingers touched, but the ground fell out from underneath her.

She tumbled through a vast cavern and collapsed into the snow at the bottom. An overwhelming pressure in her chest left her gasping for breath. She struggled against the pressure until she could stand. She found herself in snow, wind whipping the snowflakes falling around her. Masked Knights stood in front of her, their red lightsabers crackling in the darkness. A Knight stepped forward. He offered his hand to her, and she hesitantly reached for him, opening her hand to release two black gems into his palm. They tumbled through his fingers and disappeared.

The unmistakable sound of Kylo’s lightsaber hissed behind her. In the darkness, she saw Finn, Rose, and Chewbacca with blasters raised in his direction. They fired, but the bolts froze mid-air. “Ben!” she screamed. Turning, she found Kylo standing with his lightsaber ignited at his side, illuminated by an orange glow beneath the walkway he was standing upon. His eyes were black and burning with darkness. He took a threatening step toward her, and she lowered her eyes to an unfamiliar lightsaber in her palm.

As she raised her eyes, she realized she was back aboard the Millennium Falcon, staring at a body, covered by a light grey blanket. Her blanket. The edges of the blanket were tucked in reverently, she knew it was someone important to her. She could hear her own apprehensive breathing. “Come back,” she whispered. She slowly walked closer to the body. She reached for the blanket, to reveal the face hidden underneath. She paused as she noticed Finn’s jacket folded next to the body. Gasping for breath, she fell forward and collapsed onto the ground in front of her.

Her lungs sucked in the dirt, and she coughed, pushing herself up off the ground. She realized she was back in the jungle on Barkhesh, and he was gone, the Force ripping his presence back across the galaxy. Her palm burned where she had touched him. A shiver trembled down her back as she gasped for breath.

What was that!
Chapter End Notes

Violence
Threats of ambiguous violence in a vision
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Kylo closed his eyes and breathed in the cool, fresh oxygen from a real planet’s atmosphere. A strong wind whipped his cape and refreshed his senses. There was no artificial gravity, no recycled air, no confining corridors. There were real day and night cycles, weather to encounter, beautiful scenery to witness. The Force was alight with life and energy. There was something unfurling inside him – something that he had believed long dead – that made him feel almost… weightless. Kylo had forgotten how different he felt when he was on-world. He figured it was the most like coming home he would ever feel, if he’d actually had a home in the first place.

The only disappointment, the most significant in his opinion, was this planet was missing the warmth of a sun. Clouds consumed its light, keeping its warmth prisoner. That, and the endless durasteel platforms that suspended the entire civilization above the planet’s aquatic surface. He could never escape durasteel, it seemed. Terrain under his boots was an unnecessary distraction in battle, but in the rare moment where he could appreciate a world for what it was, he craved it. He wished he had been able to feel it again.

Kylo opened his eyes to stare out at what the world had to offer as Blue chirped brightly next to him. The last time he had been on world –unless Starkiller counted as a planet – he had been sharply focused on retrieving the map. He had never had the chance to feel grounded – if only for a moment. And in the great complexity of the universe, as his destiny swiftly advanced upon him, a moment standing on durasteel under the clouds was all he had. It wasn’t perfect, not quite, but it was all he had.

With Sidious in his head, he would never have bothered to partake in the trivial pleasures that being on world had to offer. Monsters didn’t enjoy the beauty of worlds like this; they destroyed them. But he allowed himself, if just for one moment, to pretend there was something more for him out there other than the emptiness of the inside of a destroyer. He had become part of that ship, merely a cog in the war machine he helped create. He had become the mimicking reflection that was under Sidious’ control. He always had been, he always would be, but he refused to live out the rest of his short life in a self-imposed prison of durasteel. With a moment away from the gravity of the war, he contemplated his role in the galaxy, his role in the bond, his vision, and his own existence.

He had only been on world for a few hours, but his mission was complete. The command shuttle loomed before him, mockingly, ready to whisk him back to his responsibilities aboard the Finalizer. The weakness inside him begged not to go back. It begged him to see that there was nothing for him there. Maybe it was right.
If he returned, Hux would continue with his plan for Force Destiny, and though he doubted his general could find the Resistance, Sidious could. He couldn't sit by and let them bring his former master back, he couldn't allow him in his head again. Sidious would destroy everything worth living for until he begged for the mercy death. Rey would fall.

Unless... you’re no longer there, he thought. Was it his thought? Perhaps it was the darkness or remnants of Sidious’ influence. Perhaps it was the Cosmic Force.

Whatever it was, it was right. If there was no one stopping Hux's ascension to the Throne, then he would never allow Sidious to return. Rey would be safe. Kylo could disappear, fly with Blue to the Unknown Regions, find an inhabitable planet, live in solitude as his uncle had done, let the galaxy live in peace, until he died in insignificance.

Why wait that long?

Kylo couldn’t think of a single rebuttal.

“Go get her fired up, Blue,” he said, nudging the droid toward the command shuttle. His voice broke on the droid’s name, and it wasn’t until that moment that he realized how the obnoxious astromech had grown on him. It was more difficult to say goodbye than he expected, so he didn’t. Blue hesitated for a moment, almost as if he could understand the change in his emotions, but he ultimately left, beeping joyfully to himself as he went. The ghosts in his mind were loud, screaming for penance; they demanded a worthless life in exchange for the costly ones he’d taken.

If you can’t bring your father back, then you don’t deserve to live.

He walked to the edge of the towering platform he had set his ship down upon, staring out into the vast ocean. The water looked black, mirroring the darkened skies, which chose that moment to open up and empty a heavy downpour upon him. He smirked to himself, wondering if even this world hated him. The entire galaxy hated him, after all.

Of course, it would be rain. He despised the rain. His life almost ended the night his perception of the rain had changed forever. It didn’t, however, and the torrent around him was a reminder – just as it was nearly every time he experienced the skies open above him – that it should have ended. There was a time when he had forgotten his revulsion to the rain, a night he had found himself in a hut by a fire, but even that memory brought him sorrow now. The rain was a reminder of every reason he had made the right decision.
It’s over. Skywalker is dead.

What was the point of fighting? Kylo felt empty, lost, like an integral part of himself was missing, and no matter what he did, nothing could replace it. He was tired of drowning in emotions, struggling against the conflict, fighting against everyone who wanted to kill him. Now that the voices were gone, he didn’t know what was real and what was in his head. Sidious had removed every last part of Ben Solo to create the warrior-puppet of Kylo Ren. Without his master, he was nothing, Sidious had ensured it. The vision had been clear enough of his destiny; he would die, by the hands of a bondmate who had been lost to darkness. Because of him. Sidious would return. What was the point of causing more pain and destruction?

You could end it all, he convinced himself. You could take one more step, that’s all it would take... you can be free. You’ll be free of Sidious forever... The seas will swallow you whole, and the suffering will finally end... You’ll be free of the conflict... and nightmares... and loneliness... and the foolish hope... free of everything...

It will take one second of strength for once in your worthless life... and it could all be over... You will finally sleep... Find peace... There's no reason to fight anymore... You can control your own destiny... your father's murder will be avenged... and Rey will be free of the bond... and safe from you... Maybe she’ll sense it when you’re gone, maybe you’ll finally make her smile.

With his decision made, he felt closer to peace than he had ever felt. It only solidified his determination. The ghosts would have their spiritual compensation. Last words were meaningless when there was no one around to hear them, so he took a steadying breath and stepped off the platform...

Ben! No!

...and felt a hard shove in his chest, forcing him back. His breath was stolen as his back hit the solid platform. He coughed, searching through the rain for that familiar form. He recognized the ethereal voice all too well.

“You can't take this from me too, Luke!” He shouted as he drew in the Force to push himself to his feet, “this is what you wanted!” Staring into the dark abyss, he waited for a response, but the only sound over the crashing waves and pounding rain was his own echo.

As the thrashing of his heart against his ribs eased, part of him felt the overwhelming desire to stagger as far away from the edge as possible, to run back to the command shuttle and tell the droid what he had nearly done. Blue had a way of forcing him to rethink even his most confidently made decisions. Another, significant part of him craved to choose the fate his uncle had just tried to take from him. It was hypocritical of Luke to stop him, especially after the man had nearly delivered Kylo to that fate himself.

He teetered on the edge in conflict.

It was then that the Force chose to connect them, a gentle tug in his mind and a fading of sound all that preempted her arrival. He was not surprised; the Force always provided someone strong enough to shove him down a path when he was too weak to take the first step himself, or, in this case, the only step. He could hear her steady breathing, but he did not pivot to face her. He maintained his position, precariously straddling the edge of existence. He waited, hoping she would go as he struggled with weakness, yet hoping she would stay so the last images in his head would be of beauty.

He turned his head slightly so she could hear him, but kept his eyes downcast so she couldn’t see the pain in them. A gust of wind swept up from the waves below, tangling through the hair around his face. “You should go.” There must have been something different about his voice, because she stopped short, and he could hear the sharp intake of her breath over the soft patter of rain on the durasteel. “Things will get better now, you’ll see.”

Rey whispered something, but the revelation was clearly not meant for his ears. The only word he could discern over the crashing waves was "real." The darkness was not as heavy as he had felt in her before, but it only reminded him of the future his vision had predicted.

“Where are you?” Rey asked quietly.

He sighed, shaking his head. He had no will left to fight. The edge of the durasteel groaned beneath his boots. The red salt from Crait that was still clumped in the tread – the salt he had refused to scrub clean after his failure against the Resistance – crumbled free in the rain. His eyes followed their fall until the waves devoured them in darkness. “Nowhere near the Resistance,” he assured her distantly, as he closed his eyes to regain the strength. “Please, go.”

“That’s not what I meant.” She was closer, her voice cutting through the muffled patter of rain behind him, and he wondered if she knew the opportunity before her. He wondered if she would do it – push him. “I wouldn’t tell them where you are.”

“Why?”
“Because I still hope you’ll turn,” she whispered, barely audible, but he heard it as though her lips hovered centimeters from his ear.

He hummed. “I’m on Kamino.”

“What business does the First Order have with Kamino?” Her voice was further away, and he realized she had chosen to circle him, as she had on Starkiller, giving him a wide berth.

“Don’t worry, I’m not killing anyone,” he said, tilting his head to hide a weary smirk. He found humor in her conflicting presumptions that he was relentlessly paving a path of death and destruction yet simultaneously capable of turning back to the light. “My general presumes I am here in a political capacity.”

“What are you there for?”

“The Kaminoans have invested considerably in the First Order and, according to my subordinate, preserving their favor requires trivial, superficial discourse and sycophant flattery. I do not have much of a stomach for this dance of predators masquerading as prey. Thankfully, and unbeknownst to my general, that was not the purpose of my brief visit here. I was intrigued by the Kaminoans’ self-described ‘most prodigious achievement’: Clone armies.” He hadn’t realized he had slipped into his carefully articulated political persona, yet another mask he hid behind, until he sensed Rey’s bemusement.

“Sycophant flattery? There’s the pretentious son of a senator I’ve heard so much about.” She bit her lip, bridling the mirth that threatened to reveal itself through a smile. He could feel her smile through the bond, though, and he thought he could die content if it was the last thing he saw. He was graced with a scrunch of her nose instead. He wanted to ask her what she had heard about him but didn’t dare shatter her momentary contentment.

“Leia is a master at such servile pretense; I suppose I am indebted to her that I derived one appropriate application from her extensive time devoted to her ‘illustrious’ career as a Senator, disregarding our family for a legacy of failure and disgrace. I wonder if she’s proud of facilitating the political aptitude of the Supreme Leader. You should be so lucky you were not forced to absorb years of gilded words by the opulent and elitist members of the Senate.” There was a flash of heartbreak in her eyes, and he cursed himself, remembering that Rey never had a choice to be dragged along anywhere with a family. There was no sense in apologizing; apologies were meaningless, the damage was already done.
“Why clones?” she asked, not unkindly. He could sense her in his peripherals, advancing upon the edge of the platform. He nearly reached out for her, until he remembered himself. She was not there with him. Not truly.

“I don’t care for the idea of children growing up without their parents, or my army not having a choice over becoming indoctrinated assassins.” When he sensed her thoughts focus on why he held those convictions, he continued. “Additionally, they’re not prone to breeding dissent and betrayal among their ranks.” His general disagreed vigorously, but that was hardly surprising. He wondered how many troopers would leave if he decreed that they could. He doubted they would. They were Hux’s precious army, after all, not his. Kylo invoked fear, with the Force, but Hux inspired respect. If it came down to Hux or Kylo, they would stand behind Hux.

“And without this clone army, I can’t defeat Hux’s army,” he said, only realizing after he finished that he’d said them aloud. “At least... that was the plan. But perhaps, I don’t care anymore. Perhaps it’s all an exercise in futility.” Rey had continued her arc until she came to rest a few meters in front of him. From his perspective, she was levitating over oblivion. The silence blanketed them like the rain that was soaking him to the bone, weighing him down, dragging him toward the edge.

“What does that mean?” she asked. “That you ‘don’t care anymore.’” Kylo could hear the hope in her voice. It was the one truth she refused to learn; he wouldn’t turn. Still, she did have reason to be hopeful.

“It means... I’ve found a way to end this.” He stared into the abyss below. The wind nipped at the hair around his face, guiding him to its embrace. The rain dripped down his cheeks and into the darkness of oblivion, beckoning him to follow. Perhaps the Force wanted his death. Perhaps it was his destiny to destroy both Luke and Sidious, and the galaxy would only come to balance if he was gone. Their fates were tied. He refused to believe that his destiny was to kill her. He wouldn't do it. Therefore, his destiny must be to die. And if that was his fate, what was the point of delaying the inevitable? Every moment he was alive, since the second he was born, all he had ever done was cause pain.

“End what?” The hope in her voice was gone.

“Talk to me. End what?” He could hear her fear as she spoke, but he felt the profound strength of it in the bond. Could she sense the shadows in his thoughts? “What’s wrong? What are you staring at? Why won’t you look at me?” He refused to raise his eyes from the waves crashing below his feet, knowing that whatever emotion was flickering in her eyes, it would pain him to see it. He was broken, a burden – he only brought pain to everyone he’d ever cared about; the galaxy was better off without him. She'd said it herself.

His indecision was broken by her soft whisper. “What's going on? Did something happen? Where's Blue?"

“He’s safe, in the command shuttle,” he said, biting back tears. “He'll be fine here. The Kaminoans have the utmost respect for droids.”

“You're scaring me. Where are you going?” she begged as if she cared. Perhaps she did, perhaps she feared what further destruction he would deliver the galaxy.

“Nowhere worth your fear,” he said emotionlessly. “I won’t hurt you, your friends, anyone… not anymore.”

“Please, tell me!” Her fear was still evident enough over the bond, but hadn’t she been listening? She didn’t have to be afraid; it was over. There was no reason to fear him when he was dead. Her fear of him only further convinced him of his inevitable choice. “Please.”

“I’m on the edge of a platform, ninety meters separating me from the water below. I am deciding whether or not to step off this ledge, again. Hopefully this time, Luke won’t stop me. Then I can end both of our suffering, give in to the will of the darkness,” he answered, his voice quiet but strained. He couldn’t decide how he desired for her to react to his words, only that it mattered that she heard the truth. “Now's your chance.”

“That is not funny,” she said, her brows pinched in anger as she stepped closer, but he held his ground. He allowed her eyes to find his, which he was certain – when she startled at the sight of them – were as red-rimmed and lifeless as they felt.

“I’m not joking,” he murmured, his voice breaking under the weight of his words. He swallowed apprehensively, holding her gaze, wondering what she would do next – wondering what he wanted her to do next. “Tell me to fall, I'll fall.”

“You don’t mean that.” The words were hollow; she knew the choice he'd made before Luke intervened, he saw it in her eyes. Her face contorted, and he realized she was crying. No matter what he did, he hurt her.

His eyes fell back upon the waves below him, the depths churning with violent power, like the darkness that was swallowing him in conflict. “My entire life has been standing at the edge of a cliff and deciding whether or not to fall, Rey,” he sighed in resignation. “I do mean it.”

“Why? You’re a survivor, like me.”
It was her thoughts of Luke standing over him, lightsaber in hand, that flashed across his mind. “I'm tired of surviving,” he answered. It was honest and vulnerable, not meant for the sharp, bruising tongue of an enemy. But if her wrath pushed him to complete his mission, then so be it.

I'm tired of the thoughts that I'm not positive are my own. I'm tired of reliving everything I've done over and over again in my nightmares. I'm tired of defending myself from...everyone. I'm tired of betrayal. I'm tired of regret. I'm tired of hate...and anger...and fear. I'm tired of being broken. I'm tired of the darkness, and I'm tired of the light. I'm tired of the conflict. I'm tired of never being able to be what I am and never being able to have the one thing I want. I'm tired of being alone. I'm tired of the war and the voices in my head, and I want to be free – of all of it. It would be so easy to end it.

Rey sobbed, and it only deepened his self-hatred. It only strengthened his resolve that removing himself from the bond, the only way he knew how, was the right thing to do. “I understand, I do,” she said, her voice wavering. “I was tired of the life I had on Jakku, but it got better. It could get better for you, too, but not if you take your own life. What do you think that would do to the people who love you?”

His chest rumbled with dark humor. “There's no reason to be concerned with that, Rey. You said it yourself - I'm unlovable, I'm a burden. I have been my entire life. Everyone hates me. My mother hates me. You hate me. I would be doing you and the galaxy a favor if I died, remember? You want this, why does it matter how it happens?”

Her voice was an odd mixture of anger and fear. “I... I didn't mean what I said. I was hurt and angry. I still am, but I don't want you to die, okay? I'm sorry!”

“But you do, that's all you've ever wanted from the moment we first met when you tried to kill me. I don't blame you. If it makes you feel better, this is something I should have considered years ago. I was driven by the mission I had to complete, but that’s… finished. I only now have the strength to do it.” There was a flash of a memory, of her open palm by fire in a hut, and then his in the throne room. His hand still burned in the places on his palm where her hand touched his; it was only strengthened by her rejection. He clenched his fist, resolved.

“I still have hope for you,” she whispered. “What I said before, that wasn't me. You have to believe me. I can't explain it, but those thoughts, they were the darkness.”

As if in response, the dark cast a deeper shadow upon him, calling him, convincing him how easy it would be to take that step. It reminded him of the peace he so desperately sought. “So is this.”
“Please, look at me,” she whispered, closer still. There was a desperation in her words that stoked the conflict in his heart. A new emotion rose above his terminal acceptance. Yearning. Even in the cold rain, he could feel her warmth. His fingers itched to touch her, to feel her skin against his. He needed her, if only for one moment before he accepted his fate.

I will ruin her. I will drag her down with me. I will make the vision come true.

“Ben,” she repeated. His eyes met hers obediently. They were wide with fear, but he recognized the difference of this fear. As she stepped closer, he realized that it was not fear of him, it was fear for him, and that concerned him more.

“Did you just call me, ‘Ben?’” He realized it then, how profoundly he missed her saying it.

“That is your real name.”

“It's the name of a dead boy,” he said, but the words were hollow and meaningless.

Rey shook her head as her tears danced with the raindrops. When he continued, his voice was softer. “You haven’t called me by that name since the Supremacy. I thought I would never hear you say it again.” The darkness called him from below, beckoning him to a cruel but just fate, and she gasped sharply. He glanced up to find her face blanched as if she could hear it, or maybe she could sense the raging storm within him subside as the black tendrils of darkness called him.

“Ben?” Her voice trembled as his eyes flickered back to the certain death below him.

You don’t understand, Rey. This is for you.

He closed his eyes, memories of her face in that hut by the fire burned into the back of his eyelids. He thought he could do it. He thought his name on her lips would give him the courage to surrender to his darkness, but the warmth that filled him when he heard her voice calling to him was every reason he wanted to remain there with her, if only for a moment longer.

“Ben, please, stay,” she begged, snapping his eyes back to hers in an instant. “Don’t give up hope.” His right eye twitched as he studied her, waiting for her to change her mind, waiting for the cruelty he knew he deserved. She raised her hand slowly, facing him, hesitantly unfurling her fingers as she reached out. Her fingers were splayed, open toward him in invitation, hovering upright just within reach. His throat bobbed in vulnerability. He was thankful for the rain as he blinked back tears. “You’re not alone, remember?”

_But I am!_ He wanted to scream. _You left me!_ His chest ached with the familiarity of it. He did not remove his glove as he had before, too fearful of the false promises of a vision. His hand dwarfed hers as they pressed together, palm to palm, reflecting each other like opposite sides of a mirror. There was a slow shift in the Force around them, and then the fragile moment shattered.

Her eyes widened as fear spiked through the bond. Reflexively, he grasped onto her hand as she fell away from him. The ground she was standing upon had suddenly disappeared underneath her feet. He lurched forward with the momentum, nearly falling into oblivion over the edge, but he had enough sense to use the Force to propel them both backward. His back hit the wet durasteel, and she fell forward on top of him.

His ankles and feet dangled off the edge, and it had not escaped him that a split-second reaction was the difference between her in his arms and her lost to the waves below, but as she grasped onto him, he realized she was focused on _him_. “Ben!” she cried, burying her face into his shoulder as she clenched her fists into his tunic. Her body trembled as she repeated his name like a chant. Kylo was certain her name escaped his lips with equal relief between uneven breaths. His mind wouldn’t abandon the thought that her hand could have slipped through his fingers, or if he hadn’t pushed backward, she would have joined him in his fate. The worst thought was, what if it was his _touch_ that would have sealed their fate?

He couldn’t see her face, couldn’t think of a word to say to her, but his arms wrapped around her before he could consider the consequences. “You could have died,” she cried. “I was so scared. Don’t you _ever_ do that to me again, okay? Promise me!”

Her words were… confusing… and backward… and everything he was thinking about _her_. In his entire life, in the handful of instances he had felt the gut-wrenching panic over the mortality of another – even that moment in the rain at the temple – he had never been as terrified as he had been in that moment with her. He didn’t matter, but _she_ had almost died. He couldn’t accept that.

His arm spanned across her shoulders as he held her against him… and she allowed it. He closed his eyes and counted _her_ breaths – her proof of life – to center his own breathing. The rain poured in torrents from above, but he didn’t care. Kylo would find a rainforest planet and endure daily rain for the rest of his life if he could feel the warmth of her for one more moment. He was still shaking in terror, but he had never felt so alive. When she spoke again, he felt the words more than heard them. “You didn’t let me fall,” she whispered.
“You won’t fall, that I promise you, Rey,” he replied. “It won’t happen, I won’t let it.” She couldn’t have known that he meant far more than the cliff, but she grasped him tighter as if she had.

“Then you can’t fall,” she reasoned.

He found himself nodding against her without argument, whatever would keep her safe in his arms, he would contemplate the consequences of his promise later. His throat formed the words on its own volition, “I promise.”

Droplets of rain beaded in her hair and trickled onto his cheek. Their chests heaved in unison, perhaps from the near-fall, perhaps from the promises that were made. In that moment, he would promise her anything, and it terrified him. He found himself standing upon an equally precarious cliff, and he was terrified to fall. A bolt of lightning streaked through the clouds and snapped him back to reality.

Panic flooded through the warmth of her embrace. He sat up abruptly, and she quietly slid down next to him. Kylo stared up at the clouds as he wondered how she could so easily make him want to derail everything he had worked for. What was it about her that he couldn’t let go?

“What...happened?” she asked breathlessly, trembling, perhaps from the near fall, or perhaps the chill of the rain. He didn’t dare touch her again. Instead, he slid his knees forward to the edge of the platform and allowed his lower legs to dangle over the waves below. There was a tingle of irritation that traveled up his spine when she shifted forward to sit next to him. He couldn’t find it in him to maintain it, however, as she swung her legs playfully.

“You could fully interact with my environment,” he answered, his eyes focused on the horizon. “The bond is growing stronger, when we touched it was as if you were actually here.” He had expected her to react with hostility at the mention of the bond, but she seemed more disappointed by something else, something she protected tightly behind her barriers. If she was as concerned as he was – or concerned at all for that matter – she did not show it.

“Is that why I could feel the rain?” Her head tilted up to the heavens she could not see.

“What?”

Their bond was stronger, she had nearly fallen to her death. She had been holding onto him. He was sitting there, wondering what had changed, trying to remember why they were enemies, and she was wondering about rain? His face must have betrayed his flustered confusion, because her tone lightened in amusement.

“Is it still raining?” she asked wistfully. “I love the rain.” Kylo didn’t bother disagreeing with her. If he told her of his resentment toward the rain, he would have to tell her why. Even if it weren’t for the reminder, there was something about the rain that made him hear things that weren’t there. Even now, he could still hear wheezing, dying breaths, the crackle of the fire and his soft cries over the soft ping it made on the durasteel. He remembered the splash sound it made as his boots stepped through each puddle, he remembered the sound of it falling around him as his lightsaber ignited between breaths to take a life. More than that, he remembered the sound of another lightsaber, awakening him from his dreams. The rain had been his witness that night, and it had never let him forget what he’d done. His misery was interrupted as she continued, “You know, the second time we were connected through the Force was the first time I had ever enjoyed the rain.”

“And I ruined it.”

She showed no interest in addressing his self-loathing. “Do you remember?”

He turned to meet her stare. “I asked you why the Force was connecting us,” he answered. He knew the answer to that question was not a simple one. And he knew the answer was a significant piece of his destiny.

“And I called you a monster,” she added. There was something else he felt from her, something achingly similar to regret.

“Yes, you did.”

There was a softness in her gaze that he never thought he would see again. “But then you agreed, and I realized you weren’t the monster I expected.” Until the Supremacy, when you realized I was.

He hummed. Her eyes were less kind those few short weeks ago. He would have given anything back then for her to look at him the way she was presently. But he had not understood the consequences before that were so readily apparent presently. He was wrong; he was a fool to wish for this. If he could take it back, he would make it so she never viewed him as more than a monster, at least then he would have been certain of who he was and what he truly desired. Regardless of his desires, he had to remind himself that she was only being kind because she wanted to turn him. She said so herself.
“I realized your environment could affect me after that connection. You were gone, but the rain on my face was not,” he remembered. He had hated the sight of it then, but now he ached to share her world. Monsters, however, didn't belong in her world, they dwelt in the shadows, where creatures of darkness belong.

“I can feel some droplets, I can sense the rain around me, but not like before. I felt and saw everything in your world for a moment, it’s because we touched, isn’t it?” Kylo knew Rey’s attitude toward him had been different since the connection opened, but it was her sudden interest in the dynamics of the bond that intrigued him the most. She was usually disgusted by the bond, showing no interest in contemplating its complexities with him. It was almost too good to be true.

“This world – do you want to see it again? All of it?” He asked, only just bridling his excitement as he gestured to the scenery around him.

“Yes…”

“Take my hand, and I’ll show you,” he said, not quite a demand as much as a plea. “I promise, I won’t hurt you.” His gloved hand opened on his thigh, palm upward. It was tentative and fearful, the pain of her last rejection of him still fresh. He continued to stare out at the rolling waves, but for the first time since he laid eyes upon them, he wasn’t considering joining their depths.

She gently laid her hand in his, but didn’t take it. “I know you won’t hurt me.” The rain and wind bit at his face and ears, but the warmth that enveloped him when she touched his hand drove the chill from his body. He immediately regretted not removing his glove. Rey looked out upon the water in wonder. “I can see it all – the platform, the rain, the waves – how are we doing this?”

“I told you, the bond is growing stronger,” he said distantly, struggling with concentrating on anything other than the flutter in his chest as her hand rested in his. The heavy downpour had lightened, he realized, in the last few moments, and the call to the darkness below had faded. He wondered if the two were coincidental. “When we make physical contact, I can bring you physically into my environment and you can bring me into yours, as you did in the hut.”

“So what happens next?” Her eyes searched his for the answer, trusting in his knowledge. Kylo was the Supreme Leader of the First Order; he gave orders daily to several of the thousands of the personnel on his destroyer daily, yet he couldn’t remember the last time someone looked at him like his opinion mattered, like he mattered.
“I don’t know,” he answered honestly. “We will be able to affect one another’s environment more and more with every connection, I presume. It will become far more difficult to hide this.” The consequence would be death for him, and what would the Resistance do to her? They wouldn’t try to kill her, would they, as they had tried to do to him?

“Do you still wish you could sever the bond?” she asked gently. Kylo wondered why she thought he had stood on the edge, prepared to fall; the only way he could save her from himself was his own death. The bond would destroy her, one way or another. Did it matter whether he lost her to darkness, imprisonment, or death?

He finally settled on, “Yes, for your sake.” He chose not to counter her question. He knew the horrors she had suffered, yet he believed this bond was the worst thing that ever happened to her. He didn’t need to hear her confirm it.

“What about for your sake?” she pressed. He was uncertain how she would react to his honesty, but in that moment, as her hand rested in his, he was less careful of protecting his vulnerability.

“No, I don’t.”

“Me, neither,” she whispered. He glanced at her, to judge the sincerity of her assertion, and she immediately turned his entire galaxy upside down. Kylo had spent his entire life training to become a pilot and then a senator and then a Jedi and then his grandfather. It had prepared him to become a weapon of war, both on the battlefield and in the political arena. Nothing, however, had prepared him to contend with her smile.

It gutted him, more efficiently than if she had taken his lightsaber and run him through with it. How could something so simple be so instantly destabilizing? So destructive? It was captivating and genuine... and meant only for him. His heart surged in his chest, and his breath caught in his throat. He could feel the pull to the light, the pull to her. He knew he would never be the same after seeing it, after he had been the cause of it. Kylo had seen hundreds of beautiful worlds, with fauna and flora most had only dreamed of, but he had never seen anything as beautiful as her smile.

Rey bit her lips when she noticed him studying her, and his eyes were drawn to them with a magnetism stronger than the most pervasive darkness. She said something, but he was too focused on suppressing his jealousy of the raindrops lucky enough to feel the softness of her lips. Had he ever noticed anyone’s lips like that before? His eyes danced from her lips to her eyes and back again. His clothes felt itchy and too tight, and he could feel every minute movement of her hand. He forgot how to swallow, and he was becoming painfully aware that no amount of training would be capable of contending with the ridiculous flutter in his chest. Realistically, he knew what he wanted, but he knew he shouldn’t. This was Rey. She deserved better than that.
He chewed his words, swallowing them anxiously. He couldn’t tell her the treasonous thoughts that demanded to be spoken, but he knew for the second time since they had developed this connection, something inside him had been irrevocably changed. The darkness inside him screamed for him to run, to destroy, but, not for the first time, those screams were silenced by the part drawn to her. She seemed to sense his inner conflict and turned away to stare at the endless ocean, so he studied her profile instead. “Kamino, huh?”

“Yes, Kamino,” he answered hoarsely. “Do you like it?”

“I do like it,” she said, turning to him with an odd flash of surprise in her eyes. Three things happened simultaneously – her smile widened, her fingers wrapped around his, and Kylo decided he had died when he stepped off that ledge and this was the afterlife. He would have believed it if he thought he deserved an afterlife remotely close to the euphoria he was experiencing presently. “It reminds me of Ahch-To,” she continued. “Takodana was probably my favorite, but I like the water.”

Returning his gaze to the storming skyline, his thoughts returned to the heavy downpour that had lightened since she had taken his hand. It was impossible for their bond to affect the weather, wasn’t it? Part of him couldn’t imagine the power required to create that, but the other part wondered if energy affecting other energy was that fantastical of a concept. “I like that it’s real, here,” he murmured. She turned to him then, and he felt the heat of her stare. There was a puzzlement that bloomed in the bond, but she never gave life to her question. Rey turned her face to the sky before speaking again, and he wondered if she noticed the change in the weather as well.

“What are the Kamino people like?”

“The Kaminoans intrigue me,” he mused, recalling the slender alien species that towered over him. It was a disconcerting experience. With his own height approaching two meters, he was accustomed to towering over others. It reminded him of Snoke, and he hated being reminded of Snoke. If Sidious did reincarnate himself again, Kylo hoped he chose someone less… fear-inducing. “They’re very tall, quiet, and refined. I respect them. The society is efficient, orderly and practical. They have no desire for sentiment or weakness. They have mastered the ability to clone, mass-produce, and train an army – and now they have learned how to accelerate the process. They believe themselves to be superior to humans, and maybe they are. They are more civilized. They do not collapse into anarchy. They do not lower themselves to civil war or slavery. They do not fear the culling of their weak…” Rey turned to him then, horror in her widened eyes. They would have fleeting moments of peace between them, but it was as if she forgot for a time who he truly was. Part of him hated himself for saying too much, for being too truthful again, but another part of him yearned for her to see him for who he was, even if that meant she saw the monster within.
“My contact, Ruan Te, respected me but did not fear me. In fact, none of them were afraid of me. They were even gracious enough to show me their great library. It almost rivals the ones I’ve seen on Coruscant. They gifted me a historical text I was interested in on Force Bonds. Whether or not you agree with their practices, you would like them, I think.”

“Force bonds?”

There was both a warning and a plea from inside him to share the information he had learned. Kylo held his tongue, obeying the warning. He settled on the ambiguous response, “well, one Force Bond anyway, but it interested me because it was not the typical master and apprentice bond.”

Rey glared at him. “And…”

“And?”

“What were their names? Were they Jedi?” she breathed. He could hear the barely concealed excitement in her tone. The problem was, their bond would regress if she heard the story. She would only be disappointed when she realized he couldn’t be what she wanted him to be.

“Their names were Revan and Bastila Shan.” He studied her as carefully as she studied him. It was likely she had found confirmation over the bond that he was hiding something, just as he found confirmation of the hope he had feared would flourish there.

“Were they Jedi?” she repeated.

“It’s not that simple,” he said, knowing that she hoped it was the light within them that had created the bond. “Before I answer, I need you to understand that I’m not like Revan.”

Her smile brightened.

“Rey…”

“Okay, you’re nothing like Revan,” she agreed with a trivial wave of her hand. “Were they Jedi?”
He sighed, cursing himself for digging his own grave. “When they bonded… Bastila was a Jedi and Revan was a Sith.”

Rey bit her lip to temper her exhilaration, but he could hear the laughter bubbling in her throat. He knew if he studied her eyes, he would find blind hope there. There wasn’t a doubt in his mind that it would end poorly. “How did they form their bond?”

“Bastila was sent to capture him, but Revan’s apprentice turned on him during the mission, nearly killing him. She saved his life through Force healing, forging the bond.”

He watched Rey’s eyes bounce back and forth as she trailed the connections she was making in her mind – connections he had hoped she wouldn’t. Kylo couldn’t fault her for her intelligence, something he respected about her. “You said when they formed the bond he was Sith; does that mean…”

Kylo shut his eyes and cursed himself. The rain may have lightened, but the droplets still fell from his drenched hair onto his face, reminding him with their steady beat that he had long ago given himself to the darkness. It didn’t matter the strength of her sudden hope in him. With a long exhale, his stare fell to her hand in his. “Revan was originally a Jedi.”

Please, don’t get this idea in your head. Please don’t make this more complicated than it has to be. Please, don’t try to make me into someone I can’t be.

“Tell me more.”

Kylo hesitated, wondering when she would ask of him the impossible, as his masters and family had. He waited for the moment you can be greater than your grandfather, became you can be greater than Revan. When she said nothing more, he acquiesced, if only to hasten inevitability. “Revan was trained as a Jedi but fell to darkness because he had compassion for the Republic. He disagreed with the lack of intervention by the Jedi Council in the Mandalorian Wars and left with an apprentice to the Unknown Regions. He returned as a Sith and began a Jedi Civil War. After Bastila saved him, his memories were wiped by the Jedi Council…”

“…and he turned back to the light, he became a Jedi again,” she finished.
“Rey –”

“I would never do that to you,” she assured him earnestly. When he did not immediately respond, she tightened her grip on his hand and pulled his hand onto her thigh so he couldn’t turn away. “Ben.” He tilted his head slightly, hesitating a moment before glancing at her. “I would never make you believe you’re someone you’re not. I want you to choose to come home, not force you into it. I would never ask you to sacrifice your memories; that’s cruel. Your memories don’t make you Kylo Ren, they make you Ben Solo. I know you can make the right choice because of who you are.”

“Because of who I am? Maybe you should hear the rest of the story.” Kylo swallowed in apprehension. This was the part of their story that he feared the most. He pulled his hand away from hers as the shadow of darkness passed over his heart. “Bastila was pure light, but she fell to darkness at the hands of Revan’s old apprentice. Ask me why.”

“Ben…”

“Her connection with Revan was an open channel for his darkness to corrupt her. Their bond was responsible for the ease with which it consumed her. Revan was responsible.”

When Rey's eyes finally met his, he saw the understanding finally flicker across them. “What happened to her?” Her voice was abnormally calm, but he sensed her fear. They both knew the darkness she suffered because of him.

His fists clenched at his side. When he imagined Bastila – Jedi warrior, saberstaff in hand – it was Rey’s face that flashed in his mind. His vision warned of her fall, because of him. “She found the light again, but that’s not point.”

“How did she do it?”

Kylo shook his head. “It doesn’t matter.”

Her eyes insisted that it did matter, tremendously. “Revan saved her,” she said confidently as if she had plucked the truth from his mind. “He brought her back to the light.” She blinked, and renewed hope appeared in her eyes. As if she conjured it from the overwhelming warmth of her light. It was the light he recognized in her, the light he craved. There was little trace of the darkness that surrounded her as of late, but it would be back.
“Revan was lucky,” he stressed as his vision replayed on repeat, taunting him with the consequences of the bond. If he were stronger, he would end it. Why was he such a coward? “Revan had enough light in himself to save her. He was never truly a Sith, or a Jedi, light or dark. He was both all and nothing. He was able to command both sides of the Force because he found a balance between them, something I have failed to find my entire life. He fought with the Jedi, and against them. He saved Bastila from a Sith, but the Sith became what they were because of Revan.”

“Jedi, or not, I think he sounds like he made the right choices when it was important,” Rey replied, holding his glare with a smirk. If it was anyone else, he would have said something sharp and derisive to prove his point. But he just wanted her to understand.

“Ah, but Revan and Bastila’s story ended when he left her and their unborn child for the Unknown Regions to keep them safe. She never saw him again, and she never knew why. Do you still feel he made the right choice when it was important? No matter what he was, Jedi or Sith, he still hurt her.”

And no matter what I do, I will always hurt you.

His thoughts grew dark, and the call returned. “You’re not like Revan,” she reminded him as if she heard his thought or felt the change in him. His eyes flickered to the darkness calling him; he could barely hear her over the roar of the waves in his head. The darkness was strong as it reached up and wrapped its claws around him again. He could feel her light fading away. This was what she didn't understand – the constant struggle that would never end.

Rey could have made all the assurances in the world, and they would have been lost in the swells of his dark thoughts. Her question was so unexpected, however, that it shattered through the darkness, if only for a moment. “If Revan saved her from darkness, if he left to protect her, does that mean he loved her?”

“Does it matter?” he asked.

“Yes, it does. Even with his darkness, he learned to love her, didn’t he?” Rey rested her hand on his arm. Her energy vibrated through him, and the warmth of her touch centered him. He could barely feel the chill of darkness trickling down his back. It was as if she were the sun itself, driving the darkness to the shadows – not gone, but out of reach. He welcomed the momentary reprieve.

Somehow, he felt he was answering a question of far greater consequence. I wouldn’t know what love is. “I don’t know.”
“And if it hurt her when he abandoned her,” she reasoned, “does that mean she loved him too, darkness and all?”

Kylo pulled a thin text and a Jogan fruit from a pocket inside his cloak. “Here, take it, I’ve read enough.” Rey reached for the text first, and it transferred to her hand as if she had actually been there, sitting next to him. Rey traced over the tangible evidence of their bond with her fingers, understanding the consequences as he did. He dropped the fruit on top of the text, hoping she wouldn’t mention it. Her eyes raised to his face and she smiled again. As fear grew in the pit of his stomach, her light burned across the bond.

Does that mean she loved him too, darkness and all?

Her words chiseled away at the fortress he had built around himself. Revan was a monster, like Kylo. No one could love a monster. He should have allowed the conversation to die, but he couldn’t escape the tormenting thoughts. “I think... she loved who she thought he was. Or who he was when their ideals aligned.”

“I think she loved him, the good and the bad,” she replied, thumbing through the pages. “Maybe she loved him before they ever met. That’s why, even when he was her enemy, she wouldn’t let him die.”

“Destiny then?” Tilting his head slightly, he waited for her stare to find his as the skies darkened above them. “You believe the Force condemned their love to a tragic fate?”

“I believe any love is a better fate than no love at all.”

Rey refused to yield, but neither would he. “You? The girl abandoned by her parents for drinking money, believes the Force was just in taking away everything he… everything she had ever loved?” Kylo pushed away the thoughts revolving around his mistake, because that was all it was – a mistake, an error, a meaningless slip. What wasn’t meaningless was the tear that she blinked away. It made it undeniably clear that his words had been cruel, but it was the truth. She stared at him with the same pained eyes as when he had explained – at least in part – what had happened to her parents. He knew his penchant for the truth could be hurtful, but what did she want from him, a lie?

“They still love you, Ben; they want you to come home.” She could have walked away from him, slapped him, or said something as equally cruel, and he would have deserved it. But nothing was as painful as the words she had chosen. They both were quiet as they battled the ghosts of their past. When she spoke again, she took mercy on him. “Was Revan able to break it? The bond? Is that why they never saw each other again?”

“I wish I knew.”

“...so that you could do it to our bond too,” she realized. “That is what all of this is about. You’re not afraid I’ll mistakenly find similarities between you and Revan. You’re afraid of becoming him. But don’t you understand? Abandoning our bond is how you become him, Ben.”

“A few days ago, you wanted to kill me,” he snapped. “I am trying to protect you, Rey. You don’t understand, I will destroy you.”

“No, you won’t,” she said with a naïve certainty.

“You’re so sure.”

“I have hope,” she said. He was certain she was smiling, but he refused to confirm it, not when he knew it would erode his resolve. “What do we have without hope?”

“Hope is the absence of reason, Rey.” He knew all about hope and the disappointment when he saw life for what it was. “We are connected by destiny – I will destroy you, or you will destroy me.”

“I will destroy Kylo Ren, not you, Ben.”

Kylo couldn’t remember his retort when she grasped his gloved hand again. His eyes searched hers for intention, as he struggled internally for a strength he knew he did not possess. Every sense of self-preservation inside him, which admittedly was quite lacking at the moment, screamed danger. His intuition beseeched him to run away from her before he lost himself.

“Ben, can you promise me something?”

“It depends, I don’t make or take promises lightly,” he murmured distractedly, his eyes focused on her hand in his.

“Promise me you won’t die.”

Kylo bit back something close to a laugh and turned away so she wouldn’t see his smirk. “I can’t do that. I am mortal, Rey. With the relatively short lifespan of a human,” his voice was carried by the rain, but he knew she heard him. “It is the only certainty in this life.” Except, death wasn’t as certain as he had once believed. At least, not the permanence of it. Death was only a temporary inconvenience to someone like Sidious. Kylo didn’t understand the draw of immortality. Why would someone willingly subject themselves to more than one lifetime of torture? Nearly thirty years had been long enough to understand that one’s legacy was all that mattered. His destiny had already been decided for him, and with it, his legacy. What was the point?

“Fine, promise me you won’t die... soon.” Even through the downpour, he could hear her voice heavy with tears. It pained him. She was worming her way into a place deep inside him that he protected over everything else. He refused to allow the devastation of rejection by anyone ever again. But there she was, threatening to break through with little resistance. If he allowed her in, she would destroy him, in much more devastating ways than a scratch across the face. And that he could not allow.

“We’re in a war, where your friends – including my own mother – are actively trying to kill me. It is a very real possibility. An inevitability, really,” he reasoned, knowing it was not the answer she was hoping for, but it was a far better answer than he could have given her. He dreamed only of peace for as long as he could remember, and after killing his father and Sidious, he realized death was the lone way he would ever find it. “Regardless,” he continued. “I have little if any control over the Force’s will. You can’t ask me to promise that.”

“Ben, please! Five minutes ago, you were…” she jerked her hand from his to cover a broken sob. He pressed his hand into the durasteel platform to ground himself instead. “You were going to jump into that ocean and leave me!” Kylo could have argued that he wouldn’t have been leaving her, because she had refused to join him, but he let it die. Her fear for his life was as raw and tangible as if he had felt it himself. And he had felt that before. It didn’t end the way he had hoped. He wouldn’t knowingly do that to her, even if he didn’t understand why she felt that way. “Give me an honest answer.”

“Then ask me an honest question.”

“Will you promise me that you will fight to stay alive? That you won’t take fate into your own hands?” Her bright hazel eyes implored him, and he wished he could promise her everything she ever wanted. The rain was drumming off the durasteel around them, overwhelming them with vibrations in the Force. He may not have heard the next words themselves, but he felt them through the bond. “Please, Ben.”

“I promise I won’t step off that ledge today. If you understood the darkness inside me, you would know that is the best I can do,” he answered honestly. His eyes wandered to the violence of the crashing waves below them. He wondered why he was born this way. Too much light, too much darkness. No matter what it was he wanted, his weakness always held him back.

“I don’t want to lose you, Ben. I refuse to give up hope,” she said, resting her hand on his to draw his attention. “You can come back, it’s not too late.”

He exhaled a shuddered breath as she stared up at him with something in her eyes that he couldn’t name. “I –”

“Supreme Leader.” Kylo jolted when his comlink snapped him back to reality. Rey let her hand fall away as he moved to stand. They both felt it then – a deviation in the Force. He had felt it first on Starkiller. He understood it the moment he had been thrown backward by the Force in the throne room. It felt like alternate futures diverged from one fixed point. He knew then, he had missed something important, only he didn’t understand what it was.

“General,” he replied hoarsely, pivoting away from her so he did not have to further witness the disappointment falling on her face.

“I trust your visit to Kamino was a success?” Hux’s voice sounded almost mocking. As if he knew the consequence of what he had just interrupted.

“It was uneventful.” Rey looked away as the words left his tongue. He sensed a spike of sharpness to her side of the bond. He hadn’t meant it like that.

“Yes, well, there are urgent matters that require your attention.”

“One moment, General.” He knew Rey was pulling away from him; he was losing her again. His path before him was clear. He would return to the First Order and do everything in his power to fulfill his destiny and prevent the vision from being realized. If that failed–when that failed–he would enact the insurances he had created. Then he would let the pieces fall where they may. But he needed help, and there was no one he trusted other than his supposed enemy. Crouching down next to her, he unclipped a small, clear container from his belt and held it out to her.
“Rey, I need you to take this.”

“What is it?” Her hand hesitated over his open palm as she narrowed her eyes with suspicion. He wished for once she would trust him.

“The Blue Shadow Virus – modified with the clone’s DNA,” he said, dipping his head to better read her expression. “It will kill them all.”

Judging by the concern in her eyes, she understood the gravity of his request. It was significant because, if she chose to betray him to the Resistance, he would have nothing to stop Hux’s army. He was trusting her with his life. “Why?”

“Insurance.” Turning his hand over, he placed the vial in her palm when she did not take it. He wrapped his hand around hers and physically enclosed her fingers around the vial. “When – If the Resistance, or the First Order,” he paused, selecting his words carefully, “dethrones me, then you can destroy it all.”

“Ben...”

“Promise me,” he said. It more of a plea than a demand. He knew there was more she wanted to say; he knew that she was deeply conflicted, because the reality of the victory she was committing to would only be realized upon his death. He knew it would be a struggle for her to keep the secret that would end a war. All he could do was trust that she would.

“I promise,” she whispered. “Now promise me you’ll turn.”

“Rey...”

“You want to leave, that’s why you gave this to me,” she said, lifting the vial, “This is your first step, Ben, but I can’t do this for you. I can’t save you, no one can, you have to choose to leave.”

“No one can save me,’ that’s funny, because they sure as hell were the ones destroy me in the first place.” Kylo sighed when her stare dropped from his. “You’re right,” he said as he stood from where he had crouched. “You can’t save me. I haven’t left, because I don’t want to leave.” Rey didn’t respond, which was likely for the best.
Turning from her again, he focused his attention on the comlink. “Go ahead, Hux,”

“There is civil unrest on Mandalore. Transmissions suggest the attacks originated from its moon Concordia. The Mandalorians and their allies have pledged allegiance to the First Order if our armies quell the insurgency, sir. We also received communications from our troops on Felucia, there has been an uprising at the Nysillin factory there. Furthermore, we have lost comms with one of our supply freighters, intel believes it was attacked by pirates just off Taris. And bounty hunters on Lehon have suggested there may be a Resistance base out there.” He turned to Rey; her face had hardened at the reality that was war.

“I suppose it’s time to go bring order to the galaxy,” he told her. He could see the pensive sadness in her eyes. Her lips parted in response, but she swallowed her words. He was grateful. He nodded a goodbye and walked back to the shuttle.

“Send full ground support to Felucia,” he ordered his general. He knew it was unwise to divulge sensitive information around his bondmate, but he already trusted her with what could be could be the Resistance’s greatest weapon, as well as his life. He might as well trust that she would not share the whereabouts of the First Order with the rebellion. If they wanted to emerge from the rock they had crawled under, then so be it. It would make it easier to eliminate them.

“A company would suffice, but send a battalion with riot control troopers. Make a statement. The uprising must be crushed swiftly before the commodity is destroyed. Send air support to Taris. If you have failed to raise the freighter on comms, it is likely lost. You know what to do, there will be no pursuit or negotiation. If there is a Resistance stronghold on Lehon, the bounty hunters will tend to it. No sense spreading the fleet too thin. I will rendezvous with the Finalizer off Concordia.”

“Yes, Supreme Leader.” He paused as he reached the boarding ramp for his command shuttle, turning to glance at the woman he was leaving behind. With the rain pouring around her, he would have never known she was crying, but the rueful vibrations in the bond convinced him otherwise. He almost went back to her, almost pulled her into his arms, almost promised to find her – promised to be everything she wanted him to be. Almost. Instead, he disappeared up the ramp without a second glance, severing the connection.
Suicidal ideation and attempt

Kylo battles with his own darkness and nearly loses that fight without intervention from the Force. If this is a trigger, it would be better to message me for an overview as it's prevalent throughout the chapter.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey looked down through tears at the text and vial in her hands. When she glanced back up, Kylo and his shuttle had disappeared, the last remnants of the connection dissipating into the Force. Her entire body trembled from the myriad of emotions that raged inside her. Standing from where she sat on her makeshift bed, she considered her next choice carefully.

“What... just... happened?” she asked the room. When the Force had connected them, she had been immediately overwhelmed by his misery and self-loathing. The whispers urged her to trust her initial desire to further his pain; hurt him the way he had hurt her. Revenge, the whispers persuaded her. He deserved it all for making her believe their experience in the hut was real. But as he stood in front of her, something deep inside her warned her that he was in danger; it begged her to investigate the alarm her intuition raised. Rey would be forever thankful she had. As she agonized over the unanticipated, no, fate-altering moments that transpired between them, she found herself distrusting the whispers for the first time.

If she had said the horrible things she had originally considered, he would have jumped. Why would the Force connect them when he had already planned to... die? If they weren’t connected, the whispers would have gotten what they wanted. The only reason he lived long enough for her to intervene was because of Luke. Rey was brought to him to stop him; she trusted that.

If he had died, the Resistance would have had no weapon against the First Order. He had given her the secret to defeating them. How was she supposed to reconcile that with the whispers? Was it not the Force’s will to save the Resistance? To save him? In the short span she had known him, the Force had saved him more times than she could count. There had to be reason for that. She believed with everything in her that the Force wanted him to live. She felt his light. He wanted to do the right thing, even if he didn’t know it yet. The whispers, however, clearly wanted them enemies. They wanted him dead. It didn’t make sense.

But then, what did make sense anymore? Kylo was her enemy; she should have had no compassion left for him. When they were first connected, she had no idea he held the key to saving the galaxy. She should have wanted him dead, not been terrified at the thought of losing him. Yet she had never been more terrified in her life. She shouldn’t have cared that he returned to the First Order. Yet she was heartbroken all over again. She should have immediately handed the vial over to the Resistance without question. Yet she hadn’t. Why? Why did she care?

Not only had she not taken the opportunity to kill him as anyone else would have – as Finn had discussed with her – but she had held his hand. She had had felt a warmth toward him that she had never felt with anyone else. Kylo Ren. Their enemy. Why did she feel so differently when they were together? It must have been the darkness tempting her, because she couldn’t.... she wouldn’t... make the mistake again of believing he cared for her, even if everything in her was begging her to pay attention to his actions, not his words.
It didn’t matter, because even if he did care, he was still her enemy. Would he turn? Could he save himself? She believed that if there was a Cosmic Force – a hope – then he had to; it was the only thing that made sense. He gave her the vial to destroy the clones – to end the First Order. Why else would he do that, unless he wanted to leave? She saw his face when she told him his family still wanted him. He yearned to come home. But until then, what would she do?

Kylo trusted her to keep the most important secret there could possibly be from the Resistance. If she gave them that vial, it could end the war. But it would mean betraying him and sealing his fate. Was it wrong to have hope that he would do the right thing? Or was it wrong to continue to let thousands die to save the life of one man? Even if – as deeply as she didn’t want it to – his life meant more to her than she could ever explain? In war, was there ever any right choice?
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Blue beeped and whirred with questions from his position next to him as Kylo focused on the controls of the command shuttle. There was a succession of warning beeps from the "Congratulations, General; only you can make that title sound so repulsive," Kylo sneered, "I thought I made it clear I had set course to Concordia. Could this not wait until then? You’re disturbing an otherwise peaceful jump."

"Be that as it may," Hux drawled, trying to control his own caviling tone, “the First Order has pressing matters that require your attention. I was informed that you wanted immediate knowledge of any new information on the Resistance, and, considering your ridiculous refusal to be accompanied by any other crew members on your mission, you are the only one to whom I can relay this information." He glared at Kylo. He knew he had him. Kylo sighed and leaned back in his chair with splayed hands.

"What is so important?"

"Intelligence has narrowed down the location to several likely planets on the outer rim. Each contains bases that could potentially harbor the Resistance. As you Force users have some...connection... can you wave your hand or meditate or something equally non-violent and see if she is located on one of these planets?"

Kylo searched his subordinate's face for the twitch of a mocking expression to no avail. Unfortunately, the general was serious. Does he have any idea how the Force works? This was all an exercise in futility, of course, because he already knew which planet the Resistance had found as a temporary base. Kylo opened his own holopad, locating the document from the general. With the modicum of feigned interest he could muster, Kylo sifted through the projected planets.

"Tatooine...is Vader and Skywalker's home planet, but it's an inhospitable desert with no hideout, little resources, and unfriendly inhabitants who would turn them over to us if they didn't kill them first."

“Kashyyyk...” he continued, “is even less likely. The Wookiee would not be foolish enough to bring them there. It's directly on a major navigational route, and the Millennium Falcon would undoubtedly be recognized around those parts, as it was instrumental in their liberation.”

“Arbra would be an excellent hideout, but the Rebel Alliance was unable to make the planet a base due to the invasive, energy-consuming behaviors of the native species. I won't step foot on that forsaken planet, General; I highly doubt Leia Organa would risk the lives of her few remaining members on such a formidable place."
“Barkhesh... ” His pulse quickened. He had figured the planet they selected was a relatively good choice. It was sparsely inhabited, and the rainforests provided excellent cover. He considered his options hastily. He had to direct them away from that world... away from Rey. But if he lied, to help the Resistance, no less, it was treason.

"Barkhesh has a native insectoid species that colonized the planet. One bite contains enough venom to kill their entire group. They are not foolish enough to step foot on that planet, and, if they were, they're long gone by now."

“And Hoth... Hoth was a Rebel stronghold during the Imperial war. Their general was based there with the Rebellion. Without supplies, they would not last long in those temperatures, but if I had to choose, I would focus efforts there, as it is the most likely of the possibilities you provided me.” Hux stared at him expectantly, and he sighed. He waved his hand over the Holo mystically, pressing his lips together to suppress a smirk. “I can't sense a variance in the Force from her presence on any of these planets. The intel your troops have gathered is disappointing, General.” He closed the holopad with disinterest, hoping his performance had been believable enough. It was clear they were closing in on Barkhesh. When he returned, he would have to use Force persuasion to implement a fail-safe at the bridge.

He could leave a suggestion with Peavey to divert from any course to the Seitia sector, but Hux would immediately become suspicious by the change of course. He could leave a suggestion instead for Peavey to respond to any order of change of course to Barkhesh with the assertion that they were already on course to Barkhesh. It would give him deniability with Hux. If he left a suggestion with Peavey to contact him with every order for a change, of course, it would give him time – something that had become increasingly more pressing.

It was inevitable that their hideout – or the members themselves – would be discovered, but with enough warning, he could ensure Rey’s safety before the First Order was within range. She could hate him, but he wouldn't be the reason for her death. It was the only move he had. Until then, he would do everything in his power to buy more time. “Find me another planet – the right one. I assume your troops have not found the Corellian light freighter?”

"No... Supreme Leader, but they will," the general intoned.

The general was right. He needed to buy time. If there was a distraction – a significant one – then perhaps it would give him enough time to access the central computers. After his mission on Kamino, Kylo thought of the perfect distraction. He raised a Commander Halden in Weapon Controls on the hypertranceiver.
“Yes, my lord?” the man said hesitantly.

“Run a weapon’s test on the abandoned base on Arkanis.”

A grin grew on the commander’s face. “Yes, sir. And the weapon?”

“Impress me.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Leia handed Lieutenant Connix a sheet of paper on which she had personally written a list of eleventh-hour contacts that had been sympathetic to the Rebellion. The Resistance was depleted in every sense of the word. Leia knew if the First Order found them, they would not be so lucky again. Her son had been distracted by his anger toward Luke. She had never known her son to make the same mistake twice. Without the New Republic, the powerful and influential names on that list were their only hope, in their most desperate hour, of forming an alliance large enough to defeat the First Order. Connix smiled at the ailing general, but it didn’t reach her eyes. She left the room without another word. Poe nodded as he passed her on his way into the room. He noticed the tears in her eyes.

“Good morning General,” he said. “You asked to see me?”

“Yes, Colonel, please sit,” she replied, grasping his hand between her trembling fingers. She may have appeared strong to everyone else, but he could see the small signs that everyone else missed. Perhaps watching his own mother slowly die had left him more perceptive to it. “There’s no need for nonsense; I’ll just come out and say it. I’ve seen the look in your eyes the last few days, so I’m not going to pretend you do not suspect what I am about to say.” Poe ran his hand through his hair and released a long exhale in preparation. As difficult as it was to hear, he admired that, even in failing health, Leia was still no pretense, no quibble, no nonsense.

“I’m dying –”

Poe nodded, blinking rapidly as emotions swelled in his eyes. He knew it was coming – had suspected it since she ended her treatment early on the Raddus against the recommendation of every medical professional onboard – but it didn’t make receiving the news any easier. “Leia… General, I –”

“Save your sorrow for after the fight,” she said, patting his hand. “There are more important matters to attend to.”

“I can’t just sit here pretend –”

“I have thought long and hard – after what happened aboard the Raddus and on Crait – about who could best carry on the legacy of the Resistance. I think you’re ready.”

“General?”

“Dameron, you have heart. You don’t always make the wisest choices, but you learn from your mistakes, and that’s an important quality to have. The decisions you make, good or bad, are always with the best interests of the Resistance in mind. You are a natural leader; these people will follow you. You give them hope, even when there is none. The time is nearing to make a stand against the First Order, and your propensity to blow things up might be exactly what the Resistance needs. You were the one who made the deal with – unsavory characters – to find Lor San Tekka and retrieve the map to my brother before the First Order. These people trust you. They’ll need you in the darkness to come. I have thought long and hard, and I believe you’re ready to carry on the legacy of the Resistance.”

“I... don’t know what to say,” he answered hoarsely. It was something he had always wanted, something he had worked his entire life to achieve, but not like this. The others wouldn’t see a single tear, of course, but it would be all he thought about as the terrible nightmares of his interrogation kept him awake at night.

“Well, now is not the time to be humble,” she chuckled. “There’s no time for sentimentality. The war won’t wait for grief. We need to start the transition immediately.” With that she moved to stand, as if she had been delivering any other news. The woman weathered insurmountable grief with a practiced ease to the lay observer, but Poe knew she was a fortress of secrets. He wondered if this moment was as insignificant as she made it appear, or if she had just become an expert at hiding it.

“I promise,” he squeezed her hand firmly, stopping her from leaving in hope to share her burden, if only for a moment. “I will never give up hope. We will never give up your fight against tyranny. I will carry on your legacy –”

“Save the grandstanding until you address the others,” she said with a wry smirk.

Poe huffed something between a chuckle and a sob. “And I will try to make you proud in everything that I do. You are like a second mother to me.” He cleared his throat to suppress the tears that were threatening to break free. Leia patted his hand gently before pulling away.

“I know you’ll make me proud, just as you’ve made Shara and Kes proud,” she said. There was a softness in her eyes for a brief moment before she straightened and became the general once more. “Now, for our first order of business, you know who we need to contact for help. He will want something in return, but you have established a rapport with him. Let him name his price. If he helps destroy the First Order, he can have whatever he wants, as long as it does not further endanger this galaxy. I wouldn't be suggesting this if we had any other options. But he helped us before, and he could be persuaded to help us again.”

“General...” Poe began, but she raised a hand in anticipation of his argument. He bit his tongue in deference.

“And, please, do not risk the safety of the Resistance with a funeral. You know how I feel about making a fuss,” she grumbled.

“Yes, ma’am,” he teased. “Any other... requests?” Her lips edged in a smile, but sorrow passed over her eyes.

“Watch out for our resident Jedi for me,” she said, and there was something there. Something... clandestine and almost fearful. “She is struggling with things even I can’t understand, and I am sensitive to the Force. I fear the toll that war will take on her.”

Poe nodded, choosing not to address his suspicions without evidence. Leia didn’t need more concerns to weather, especially not ones involving her son and the "last hope" of the Resistance. “Did you get answers from Rey about the bounty?” he asked instead.

Leia shook her head, stifling a coughing fit as best she could. “Give her time. She is scared. This is all new to her. I know she has had a difficult time with everything that has happened with Ben...”

Poe knew the monster was her child, but the name added fuel to the rage already burning inside him. He knew she still had hope for saving him, but the war wouldn’t be over for him until he put a blaster bolt between Kylo Ren’s eyes. “Leia, about your son...”

She interrupted him with another wave of her hand. “I believe there is still light left in Ben,” she said wistfully. “But I also know now that the only person who can save Ben, is Ben, and he has made it clear that he doesn’t want to be saved. I trust that you will do what’s best for the galaxy, no matter what fate is dealt to my son. And, realistically, I know that my son will never come home, but if he does find his way, if my dying wish is granted, please tell him I never stopped loving him and I am sorry I failed him.”

Poe didn’t think it was possible to hate Kylo Ren more than he already did, but he was wrong. That sullen, antisocial, goofy-looking boy had had everything. He could have become anything he wanted to be, but he betrayed them all. His mother – after he murdered her friends, her husband, and her brother – forgave him and still wanted him to come home. She was dying because of what he had done, but he wouldn’t shed a single tear for her. Poe hated him; more than Snoke, or the Emporer, or the pasty general responsible for Hosnian Prime. They were all monsters, but Kylo hadn’t been born one. Leia was a daily reminder that he had chosen his path. Tears formed in the corners of Poe’s eyes, which he quickly wiped away with a pinch of his fingers.

“Of course,” he promised, knowing he owed the woman that much. “Of course.”

“Alright, no more tears; we have a busy day of transitioning ahead of us. And you have holocall to make,” she said dryly. He squeezed her hand, composed himself and stood to leave. When he reached the entryway, he paused.

“Can I ask you a question about the Force?” he asked, doing his best to sound more casual than curious. She nodded. “What Luke did, projecting his image across the galaxy, is that a common Force power? Have you ever seen – I don’t know – your son do that?”

“No, that would require an effort too great for even Ben,” she sighed. “Ben is many things, but he’s not foolish. You know what sacrifices my brother made to do that. Ben’s training as a Jedi was extensive. He knows the consequences. Luke had little energy to spare, using his strength to project him across lightyears. Even if it were possible for Ben to achieve, he would be of little danger to you with the power it requires to sustain. I wouldn’t worry too much about it.”

“What about the connection between you and Luke? I know you could talk to each other,” he asked, staring at his boot as he scuffed it in the red soil. “Why didn't Luke use that?”

Exhaustion drained the strength in her voice, but he refused to look up. He feared the suspicion she would see in his eyes. “We could hear each other, sense each other, but I could never see him projected into the room with me, not like what you observed on Crait.”

“But do you think it’s possible, between two very powerful Force users?”

“I suppose anything is possible, though I have never heard of it. It would have to be strong if even the bond between twins was not strong enough to be capable of such feats,” she replied, hesitating for a moment as she considered the source of his questions. “Why?”
“Excuse me, Princess... General,” the protocol droid interrupted. “Miss Rey is here to see you.”

“Yes, one moment, Threepio,” she said, turning back to her colonel.

“I was only curious; don’t worry about it,” Poe said casually and stepped out into the corridor.

She sighed. “Whenever you say ‘don’t worry about it,’ I know it’s something I most definitely need to worry about.”
Chapter End Notes

Mention of Leia's impending death
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Kylo waited just outside Mandalore airspace for his general to update him on the hypertransceiver. He closed his eyes as he tried to focus on the mission. These were the moments that made him feel alive, but, for the first time, he didn't want to be there.

Battle was what he had been trained for; it was what he did best. Bloodlust drove his strength and power in the darkness. He felt at home on a battlefield. The whispers, the memories, the ever-present ache in his chest faded away to the images, sounds and smells of battle. It grounded him; the ghosts faded, and his mind was forced to remain in the present. When he threw himself into battle, it became his sole purpose. What happened before and what would happen after meant nothing.

All that mattered was that one battle, that one opponent, that one strike. In the absence of deeper meditation, it was the closest imitation of peace he had experienced. The battlefield was the only place where the galaxy made sense. It was a simple dichotomy; the battle was either won or lost, they were either with him or against him, it was either kill or be killed. Simple. Emotions were simple, people's intentions were simple, consequences were simple. There had never been a moment he hesitated to step out onto the battlefield, until that very moment. It had little to do with the battle itself. His mind wasn't in it – it was thousands of lightyears away. It was further proof of his weakness.

“Supreme Leader.”

Kylo was grateful for the distraction. The man may have irritated him to no end on a regular basis, but in strategical preparations, Hux was an asset. “General, I’ve been awaiting your update.”

“Intelligence on-world indicates that the troops have sufficiently quelled the battle on Mandalore and do not require assistance. I will oversee the completion of that end from the bridge,” Hux said in a commanding way that would have irritated him to an aggressive reaction if it had been any other day. He didn’t have it in him to care. “Your… expertise is required to assist with the prisoners on Concordia.”

Kylo could feel Blue studying him. He was a curious little droid, and Kylo knew there would be questions following the conversation with his general. Unfortunately, those questions didn’t have an easy answer. He knew he wouldn’t have wanted to answer Rey’s questions either if she had been there. His eyes never left the hologram of his general to avoid that entire line of thinking.
“What’s to assist? You know what to do.”

“Not yet,” Hux drawled, clearing his throat. “Several key prisoners require your – alternative methods – of gathering the intel we need.”

He knew the answer to his question before he asked. It was an inevitability. For all its vastness, the galaxy was well-populated, and the First Order had friends throughout. Someone was bound to know something. He had only hoped it would take longer. “What intel?”

“The location of the Resistance,” Hux said, his eyes alight with brutal promise.

Kylo looked away, fearing what his own eyes would reveal as he stared out at the barren landscape of the grey moon. “And why should we believe them?”

“The tribe broke decades of silence on the Concordia – a silence so extensive they were believed to be extinct – to attack Mandalore in an attempt to gain access to their lightspeed-capable ships. They were planning to collect the bounties themselves.” Hux’s voice was calm and collected. He was being patient with him. Too patient.

What does he want? What does he know?

Kylo pinched the bridge of his nose in frustration. “Is the uprising suppressed on Concordia?”

“Yes, the prisoners are in custody, however, they are refusing to cooperate.”

Blue began fidgeting next to him, and Kylo knew he was listening intently. He glanced at the little droid, selecting his next words carefully. “Then I will assist in gaining their cooperation.”

“Yes, Supreme Leader.” Hux’s hologram faded from the hypertransciever. Blue had been silent as he listened to the conversation until the general was gone. He beeped hesitantly at Kylo as he prepared the command shuttle for landing on Concordia. Kylo sighed in response, but the droid only asked his question again.

“Assisting in their cooperation? You know what it means,” he deflected, but the droid was insistent, echoing its question for a third time. “It means... I'll make them tell me what I want them to tell me.” Kylo knew the droid wouldn't let it go; he was smart, inquisitive and interested in how the universe worked. He knew Blue would ask him how. It shouldn't have made him cringe when he did. Yet, there was something about explaining it, as he would to a small child, that made the truth sound worse than when he justified it to himself.

“I'm going to... hurt them... to make them tell me what they know. If they know the location of the Resistance, then I... I can’t let them live with that knowledge. Do you understand?”

The droid's next series of beeps were low and mournful. “I don't know,” he whispered. “Because I have to.” The droid did not accept his answer, however, continuing his barrage of questions instead. “I don't have a reason for why I hurt people that you would understand, Blue. It’s war. I told you I'm not a good person. I must do this.”

Blue's response was juvenile and sarcastic. Kylo never imagined he would tolerate anyone speaking to him like that, but, then again, he had done a lot lately that he had never imagined doing before. It pained him more than he was willing to admit that even the droid was disappointed in him. He exhaled a long-suffering breath to control his irritation. “No, it's not for the First Order.” It was the truth. This time, these prisoners, were worth more to the Order alive than dead. And he would kill them.

What Blue said next surprised him, and he turned in his seat to stare at the little droid – who was clearly more perceptive than he’d thought. Kylo had every reason not to tell the droid the truth, but he found himself telling him anyway. “Yes, Blue, it's to protect the girl.” As the command shuttle set down on the surface of the moon, he quickly powered it off and left the crew cabin before the droid could ask him more questions he didn't want to answer.

“What are you doing?!” he shouted over his shoulder before sliding on his helmet.

Kylo stepped off the command shuttle onto the fine gray silt of Concordia and was met by several commanding stormtroopers in their red, white, and black pauldrons. Even after ascending to Supreme Leader, he retained the same division his former master had assigned him. These men were his men – and women – more than they were the general’s. Technically, they were Captain Phasma’s men, but that wasn't the point. They loyally fought by his side; he trusted them because they had proven themselves in battle – the troopers that had survived Tuanul, Takodana, and Starkiller, that is. FN-1138, JY-834, FN-1044, FN-3156, FN-2198, HX-1072, FN-2000, FN-3181, TK-338 and FN-1824 had been with him since Jakku and had all been promoted to commanding ranks. He trusted they would keep their new recruits in line.

He had lost most of his division on Starkiller. Then there was FN-417, whom Rey had killed in the forest on Takodana. FN-2003, whom the traitor referred to as Slip, was killed on Tuanul. Kylo enjoyed imagining Poe Dameron as his murderer, because wouldn't that be the sick sense of humor of the Force for the traitor to rescue the very man that had killed his best friend? FN-2003 was the weakest of the group. Kylo knew he wouldn't survive combat, but he couldn't help wondering if he was the catalyst to FN-2187's betrayal.

FN-2199, known as “nines,” had also been the traitor's brother-in-arms, but reports suggested either he or Han Solo had been the one to kill him. Kylo had lost more, it was the consequence of war – but these men were taken by Rey and her closest “friends.” Yet Rey acted as if he was the only murderer taking lives in war. What made the trooper they killed different? Why didn’t their lives matter?

His attention returned to battle at the sound of blaster fire and explosions. There must have been a secondary uprising. During his months spent invading planets in the Unknown Regions, Kylo had come to understand that if the prisoners who had originally surrendered were released, there was often a secondary uprising. It was much easier to kill everyone that had engaged them.

“Sir,” the captain stepped forward. “The prisoners are secured in a building at the north end of the village, but the villagers are blocking our troops’ return to the shuttles. The prisoners claim they could assist with the villagers’ surrender but are refusing to cooperate until they have personally spoken with you. They are expecting full compensation on the bounties for providing the location of the Resistance.”

“Have they provided anyone the location?”

“Negative, sir,” she said. Good. He didn't want to face killing his own men to make certain Rey’s location died on that frigid moon. From what he had researched about Concordia mid-jump, it was supposed to be a forest moon, but the landscape was barren save for the small settlement on the outskirts of a frozen lake. It was shrouded in darkness, which he found peculiar for a firefight. The quickest strategy to subdue an uprising was to use the flametroopers, forcing the villagers from their dwellings. The commanders should have anticipated that.

The stormtroopers led the procession as they made their way past primitive speeders and mining equipment. Mandalore illuminated the moon's dark sky. As they neared the village, the percussion of the explosions shuddered through the Force, stirring his pre-battle anticipation that drew in the darkness. Within seconds, his lightsaber was in his hands, ignited and sparking. He followed the others into the village and learned quickly that Hux’s intel was terribly wrong. The uprising was not under control; it had clearly never been under control. Every villager that was capable, was armed. They used the elevated terrain of rooftops and large mining vehicles to their advantage. They had the upper hand over Hux's trained assassins.

The new recruits had apparently never faced real-life adversaries before – they had broken formation, scattered throughout the village, leaderless and frenzied. The villagers were hidden from view, save for the instances they popped up to fire at his troopers, all chanting the same string of words in their native Mando'a tongue, “pirunir sur'haaise!” Based upon the aggressive reaction to his troops, he was guessing it was closer to “kill them all” than “let's surrender.” It might as well have been a friendly greeting, considering the lack of response by his men. The commanders at least had the sense to lay down suppressive fire until they reached the building.

For his part, Kylo redirected the bolts with his weapon or the Force if they were fired from further away. It only served to spike his anger, which was consumed by more darkness. He wanted the uprising quelled by the time he finished with the prisoners. As he stepped into the building, he turned to the nearest trooper. The vocoder of his helmet hissed with his command. “Burn the village.”

Kylo eyed the structure as he followed the others deeper down a corridor. Fine sand fell from the cracks in the ceiling as the explosions continued to shudder around them. The squad of troopers crammed into the largest room, blasters trained on the five Concordians on their knees. “Who is the leader?” His electronic voice crackled through the silence of the room as he gestured to the prisoners with his lightsaber, illuminating the others in the darkness. No one spoke. The prisoner furthest to the right was shaking, refusing to meet his eyes. That one was clearly not the leader. He stood behind the fearful prisoner, flipping his lightsaber in his grip before running the man through with its blade. The others gasped as he kicked the body forward onto the floor.

“Who…. is…. the leader?”

“Gedet'ye. Nayc or'atu. Bic cuyr ni,” the man in the middle said. Kylo stalked with a deliberate, measured stride to stand in front of the man, who stared up at him defiantly. The man's hair was short, and his eyes were dark. He had the body of a warrior. Clad in armour, he was prepared for battle. Kylo had seen it more often than he could count. They defended their homes, their villages, their worlds honorably, but they always fell to his blade. Information would not be given willingly.

“Kill the others,” he commanded. Kylo held the prisoner’s glare as the sound of blasters exploded into the room, followed by the sickening wet thud of the bodies collapsing to the ground. The man barely flinched.

“Do you speak Basic?”

“For Force sake… you,” he said, gesturing to the nearest stormtrooper, “get me a translating vocoder.”

His eyes never left the man as he watched him intently. “Do you understand Basic? What is your name?”

“It seems my reputation precedes me,” Kylo huffed darkly, accepting the black vocoder a stormtrooper offered tentatively with an outstretched palm. “Though it should be no surprise, I suppose. You have discovered the bounty and the location to the Resistance. Now, you will give it to me.”

“Nu draar. Mhi draar cetar par demagolka.” Kylo knelt and placed the mask over Aber Kai's jaw. The silver accented contraption stretched over the lower half of the man's face, leaving his eyes uncovered to bore into Kylo's mask. “I said 'never.' We will never kneel in submission to you.”

“You're already kneeling,” Kylo said as the power of darkness surged in his veins. “It would be wise not to forget that.”

“And we found their location on our scanners, it would be wise not to forget that,” Aber Kai spat. “You will provide us with hyperspace capable ships, and we will capture the Resistance. Only when we receive our bounty, will you receive your captives.”

Kylo slowly stepped closer to the prisoner, his boots echoing on the stone floor. “You are mistaken in believing this is a negotiation.” The man jolted forward at Kylo, but the stormtrooper behind him grabbed his shoulder and used his momentum to slam him face-first into the ground. The man coughed through the vocoder as he sat back on his knees.

“I am not afraid,” Aber Kai said, staring unwaveringly into Kylo’s mask. There was nothing different or special about this man; Kylo had seen defiant prisoners before. Their blood spilled the same. With a twist of his wrist, Kylo's crackling blade traced the line of the man's jaw, pricking his skin from mere centimeters away. “You will not kill me as long as I know the location and you do not.”

Kylo smirked behind his mask. “You're right –”
“Then give us the ships.”

“–But you assume I cannot take it from you.” Aber Kai stared into the visor of his mask, daring him to try. “You will receive your payment and your glory, but the Resistance is mine.”

Aber Kai pushed off the vocoder and spat blood on Kylo's boots. “Kote lo'shebs'ul narit!” The blood from a wound to his lip stained the man’s teeth as he bared them like a feral creature. Kylo knelt to the man’s level and stared at him, silently waiting in challenge with his head cocked until the man slid the mask back over his mouth. “I said 'you can keep your glory.' We want the credits. We do not trust outsiders to keep their promise. We deliver the prisoners, or the location dies with us.”

“You do not trust me, but you will sell out my enemies to face my wrath?”

“We were born to desire two things, Kylo Ren,” Aber Kai informed him as blood dripped from underneath his mask onto the floor. “Credits and death to outsiders. Credits for us to live, and death to outsiders for us to live in peace. I do not care what you do to those I collect for your bounty. Nor should you care what I do to them.”

Kylo stood, pointing the weapon at the man's face. “You will not touch the prisoners. Give me the location or give me the one who can.”

“We will not yield to your demands,” he replied, and Poe Dameron's voice echoed in Kylo's head. The Resistance will not be intimidated by you. Kylo had taken what he wanted then, and he would do it again.

“Do you know who I am?” It was not a question. “What I can do?”

“Demagolka.”

Kylo hesitated. The mask was still in place. It was not the answer, nor the language, he was expecting. “Demagolka?”

Aber Kai stared at him with a look in his eyes that Kylo knew all too well. He had seen it in many people's eyes when they looked upon him, for as long as he had memories. He remembered the first time he had seen it in Rey's eyes. “Someone who commits unspeakable atrocities. A real-life monster, like the Empire's Darth Vader.”

Kylo stood over the man, forcing him to incline his head to look up at him, and murmured. “Ah, the same blood flows in my veins. Do not underestimate my power.” Aber Kai lunged for Kylo, dislodging his mask in the struggle, but this time, the Force held him in place. Kylo tutted in disapproval.

“Gar taldin ni jaonyc; gar sa buir, ori'wadaas'la.” Kylo stepped back, releasing the man, who fell forward onto his hands.

His patience was growing thin. “I trust that babble was the location of the Resistance?”

Aber Kai breathed heavily for a moment before a stormtrooper struck him with his weapon and forced the vocoder back on his face. “It's an old Mando saying. 'No one cares who your father was, only the father you'll be.' Bloodline is not important. Lineage does not make the man,” he paused, lifting his head. “You are no Darth Vader, and I do not fear you.”

“Not yet.” Kylo extended his hand, breathing in the darkness before he manipulated the Force with his fingers, ripping into the man's consciousness. He could make the extraction quick and relatively painless; the mind barely resisted the intrusion, but he wanted it to hurt. Aber Kai screamed, gripping his temples as he fell over onto his side. He writhed on the ground as Kylo tore his memories apart.

The worst element of entering someone's mind was that he felt everything they felt. The pain was tolerable, and necessary; he used it for more strength in the darkness to complete the grueling mission. The emotions were more difficult to ignore – the people they thought about when they believed they were dying, the memories they grasped onto that interfered with his task. The memories Kylo witnessed in this Aber Kai’s mind made one thing clear; the Concordians wanted to watch the galaxy burn. The children were trained from infancy to become warriors, to destroy all others in the galaxy who threatened their way of life. There had been generations that existed solely in seclusion. They were all brainwashed to their radicalized propaganda.

Kylo pushed through the indoctrination to the truth. This man was not their leader; their leader had led the invasion on Mandalore. Aber Kai had told one truth, however, he did know the location of the Resistance. They all did. The men, the women, the children... they all knew where Rey was. They would not stop until they completed the mission and brought the bounty back to Concordia. There would be no surrender, no eliminating the select few in high command who knew the secret.

They had forced his hand.
Kylo withdrew from Aber Kai's mind with a jolt. Collapsed on his side, the man gasped for breath through the obstruction of the mask. “You have what you want,” he said weakly, “Just go.”

He had never given much thought to the mindset of the person he was tasked to kill, it was easier that way, but his second-in-command did. The Knight enjoyed watching the life drain from the eyes of those unlucky to meet their fate at the end of his blade. After the death of his father, Kylo thought about that now. It wasn’t the moment of death in a person’s eyes that interested him, but the moment of acceptance when a person understood they would die. He held the man’s stare as he said his next words. “You know what I saw. You know I can’t do that.”

“You have the location! We're no longer a threat to...” Kylo watched the realization bloom in Aber Kai’s eyes. He watched them widen in horror. Despite the darkness crashing inside him, it wasn’t as satisfying as he had hoped. The man pushed himself up to his knees to face Kylo. “It was all a lie. You only wanted to know what we knew. You never wanted –” Kylo reached forward and ripped the vocoder from his face so the other stormtroopers would not be wise to what Aber Kai now understood. “Gar draar copaanir mar'eyir ashi. Gar copaanir uur mhi. Me'copaani? Me'vaabir? Kyr'amur mhi an? Te dalyc? Te ade? Tion'ad cuyir te Jetii at gar?”

“You're right,” Kylo said, voice low, as apathetic as he could muster. “Do you fear me now?”

“Gedet'ye.” The man knelt before him, his hands pressed together in supplication. No matter the language or culture, the plea for life was always the same. “Gedet'ye.

Kylo raised his lightsaber to the side of his throat. “There will be no mercy. Any last words?”

“Ret'urcye mhi, cyare'se, ganar vercopaanir. Pirunir sur'haaise.” He recognized the last part as the same words as those chanted by the villagers outside. At least the man was loyal to his cause until the end. His death was swift, Kylo ensured it. The saber had sliced through Aber Kai's throat before he could take his next breath.

“We have what we need,” he told the others, then left the building without another word. As he stepped outside, the Force was suddenly alight with warning. Turning, he quickly halted the projectile, a charge, before it reached them. He shoved it back the way it had come. The uprising outside had not been managed. It was a free-for-all. The village was ablaze, smoke was blocking the view of the sky, but the villagers still maintained the upper hand. The troopers were cornered into alleyways, huts burning around them. The villagers were still chanting “pirunir sur'haaise” and “ash'amur aruetii.” Men, women, and children were running through the village, taking up weapons to fight.
He pressed forward into the battle, easily felling his adversaries with a quick slash of his blade or a strategically placed blaster bolt ricochet. Several of the villagers caught on and attempted to swarm him at once. It was carnage; he could feel their blood soaking through his clothes, branding his skin with their deaths, but it was easier to aim for unprotected arteries rather than masses in the chaos of limbs in a mob assault.

This... this was where he had spent years of his life… on the battlefield. The orange glow from the fire, dedlandite mixed with the sharp smell of iron, the sticky warmth of the blood of his enemies, it was all familiar and oddly soothing. After each battle, he had collected the bodies and burned them. He had kept their ashes as a reminder of the cost that had been paid for him to exact revenge. This was all muscle memory, but he took no pleasure in it as he once had. He was sick of war. The idea of falling to his enemy wasn’t a necessarily unwelcome one, but he would fight to survive, because he promised her.

Kylo's attention was drawn to his right, where a woman had been thrown from a rooftop into their ranks. What had first seemed like an attempt to save her life from the fire by a group of villagers transformed quickly as Kylo realized she had something strapped around her midsection. An infant? No, the tremor in the Force indicated something far more alarming. He was barely able to contain the blast as the thermal detonators exploded. The woman was dead, as were two of his men, but the damage could have been significantly worse. Just as the debris settled, another tremor in the Force afforded him just enough warning to raise his hands to block the majority of the explosion before it sent them all sprawling onto their backs.

The fine dust cloud created by the blast obscured his vision as he pushed himself to his feet. His ears were ringing, and it became necessary to draw on the Force to remain standing until sound returned. It wasn't until the ashes in the air burned his lungs that he realized how pervasively he had damaged the filter in his helmet. The smoke poured through the filter, but there was no point in removing it; he needed it for protection if the villagers continued using themselves as living bombs.

“Pull the division back!” he shouted into the dust cloud. Somewhere to his right, he heard a commanding trooper echo his orders. As his faculties returned, he realized his lightsaber was no longer in his hands. He scanned the ground around him before reaching into the Force and calling it to his hand. Igniting it swiftly, he used the crimson glow to find an alleyway. It was thick with smoke, but it was better than attempting to traverse blindly in the open. Several stormtroopers followed his lead. Their masks were better equipped to filter the heavy smoke of the alley. If he hadn't already been struggling to fit his broad frame through the narrow passageway, he would have stepped aside for them to lead.

He should have.
As they neared the exit, he almost tripped on someone crouched down by his boots. He would have, had he not heard a cough as he was nearly upon him. The troopers slammed into Kylo as he stopped short, but he couldn’t find it in himself to be annoyed. Illuminating the small form with his blade, he saw that it was a Concordian child, no more than four or five standard years of age. His eyes were wide with fear, but they looked evil as they reflected the red of his lightsaber, and Kylo instinctively disengaged his weapon.

“Gaa'tayl,” the child whimpered. He couldn't very well leave the child in the middle of the alley, so he offered him his open palm. The boy was turned away from him, clearly frightened. Kylo was positive his mask was not helping with his intimidating presence. The alleyway was heavy with smoke, however, and they were still in danger. The Force was alight in warning with the surrounding explosions, so he couldn't remove it. After a brief hesitation, the child placed a hand in his, and Kylo pulled him to a stand. “Ash'amur.” In one second, the boy was smiling and turning toward him. In the next, green light filled his vision.

The alarm bells of Kylo's intuition did not start ringing until he jerked from the echo of blaster fire down the passageway. When his eyes adjusted from the first green flash, he looked for the small boy who had been holding his hand a mere second ago. He expected that he would find the child crumpled in death at his feet. Finding the boy standing before him was not what made his blood run cold.

It was what was in that young boy's hands – a blaster. Kylo found it odd that the pain did not set in until he saw the weapon. By the time his brain caught up to what had happened, there was another flash of green light between them. His knee gave out when the second bolt hit. The left side of his abdomen was on fire. The child gasped as the crimson light of the blade once again illuminated his face, as well as the distance between them. This time he had something to fear. The child crumpled at Kylo’s feet. With a sudden devastating clarity, Kylo realized what he had done and dropped the weapon. There were distant shouts and white blurs consuming his vision as the world spun around him. The alley returned to darkness as the Supreme Leader fell.
Chapter End Notes

Major violence

It is a battle, Kylo kills people. This includes a child, but it is technically self-defense. He also executes several prisoners. There is other graphic violence of war, including Kylo suffering an injury.
New Understanding

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
“You wanted to see me?” Rey asked as she entered the room. The Force was stronger there than anywhere else in the temple. It felt as if Leia was blanketed in it. Rey feared what Leia could sense in her through its energy. As if she had not been conflicted enough, how could she look her bondmate’s mother in the eyes and lie about secrets significant to the Resistance? Rey wondered what Leia would do if she found out about their bond. Or the vial? Would she force her to leave the Resistance? How could Rey call herself a member of the Resistance when she carried those secrets?

“Yes, Rey, I wanted to inform you about the disturbing news myself,” the older woman said gently. Rey swallowed in dread. Since their last connection, Rey had an uneasy feeling growing in the pit of her stomach. When she was summoned by the protocol droid, Rey assumed the conversation likely revolved around Kylo in some capacity. She hadn’t considered that, as leader of the Resistance and Kylo’s mother, Leia would likely find out first if something terrible had happened to him.

Rey wrung her fingers anxiously. “Yes, General?”

“Please, call me Leia.” If not for her failing voice and her fading presence in the Force, Rey would not have realized how dire Leia’s health situation had become. The woman exuded strength, poise, and hard-earned wisdom, but her body was failing her. Could she die? Would her last days be spent grieving her son as well?

“Yes, Leia?” she asked as steadily as the panic inside her would allow.

“Rey, we received news that the First Order has issued a bounty for the Millennium Falcon,” the general said carefully. “For the time being, we are stuck on this planet until we receive help from our allies.”

Rey’s first reaction was to release the breath she was holding in relief. Kylo was okay. He was issuing bounties, but he was okay. Then the implications began to set in. With the secrets she had been keeping from the Resistance, the decision to leave to protect them only strengthened. That choice, however, had been taken away from her in an instant, and she shuddered to think of the choice she would be forced to make. “No one can leave?”

“I’m sorry, but not right now.” Leia sighed, and a flash of pain crossed her eyes. It was strong enough that Rey could feel it in the Force around her. Instead of crumbling from her pain, the woman seemed to gain more strength from it. “And there’s more. A bounty has been issued by... the Supreme Leader for you as well.”

Rey shook her head, refusing to believe that the man that held her hand so she could see the rain and saved her from falling to her death had issued a bounty on her. “Ben? Ben issued a bounty on me?”

Leia seemed taken aback by the use of her son’s given name, but Rey was too distracted to focus on the implications. How could he do this, after what happened between us on Kamino? I thought he was changing. I thought he was just scared. After everything, how could he care so little to want me dead?

“The man that did this is not Ben anymore,” Leia said. She wasn’t angry, but rueful. “As he demonstrated on Crait, he will kill us all if he gets the chance. We must not forget that.”

“He wants me dead? Why?” Her voice was quiet, the words spoken more to herself than the woman studying her carefully.

You know the answer, the voice whispered. He never cared. You are nothing to him... Just a means to an end.

“That is a good question.” Her perceptive eyes studied Rey, and she wondered what exactly the woman knew. “What we do know is he issued a five million credit bounty for you. That is as much as the rest of us combined.” Rey felt small under Leia’s searching stare. What could she say? She couldn’t tell her the truth, though she wondered what her advice would have been. Would she expect Rey to give up on her son?

“It must be for what I did to him on Starkiller,” she lied. She felt pinned under those dark, venerable eyes. Rey knew them well, but in someone else. The eyes pierced right through her to the truth. Perhaps Rey shouldn’t have been surprised that the moment the words left her tongue, the older woman wouldn’t believe them. Guilt tightened in Rey’s chest at the thought of deceiving the woman in front of her - a woman who had done nothing but show her kindness and acceptance.

“Perhaps,” Leia said politely, but her eyes didn’t abandon their search. “Could there be any other reason for him to react this way?”
Rey knew she didn’t believe her. She knew she suspected that something had happened between her and her son. Rey didn’t have it in her heart to continue lying to the only mother figure she ever had, but something in her refused to betray her bondmate. “Well, I am his equal in the light,” she equivocated, hoping that it would be an acceptable answer.

“That is true.” Leia’s voice was soft but disappointed. Her eyes lowered to her hands, and Rey knew that, unlike her son, she would allow Rey to maintain her deceit. “I wish I had a better answer for you. Ben wasn’t born a monster. I knew he had darkness, but I never thought he was this lost. Now he is the face of the First Order – and actively trying to kill everyone else I love. I’m so sorry, Rey.”

“Leia, can I ask you a question?” Leia’s glassy eyes met hers as she nodded. “How did he fall to darkness?” She hoped there was an easy solution that Kylo had ignored. She was terrified that one day she wouldn’t have control over the darkness anymore.

Leia may have been sitting in the room with her, but her eyes – and her mind – traveled far away. “That is a question that has haunted me since he left. There are no simple answers.”

“I know Luke’s betrayal was the catalyst for him to join Snoke, but that still requires darkness, doesn’t it? Did he always have darkness in him, or did he nurture it somehow? How did it become this?” Rey’s words brought Leia’s eyes back to hers, and the woman was suddenly very interested in the present.

“What betrayal?” Leia asked slowly, her intense stare penetrating straight through to Rey’s soul again, searching for answers. Her eyes were so similar to her son’s, but there was still something missing, a wild magnetism that was uniquely Kylo. Though they were different, the ferocity was the same. At the mention of betrayal, Rey could see the fire burning within her stare. It must have been a Skywalker gene.

“Luke never told you?”

“Told me what, exactly?” Leia was the embodiment of emotional control, but Rey sensed a protective agitation. Her voice was low, her words were clipped. Rey knew the anger was not directed at her. She thought Leia knew. She thought Luke would have told Ben’s own mother what happened. The implications were devastating.

Ben has been gone for years, and all that time, no one knew why he turned?
Leia, he pulled his lightsaber on Ben when he was sleeping.” When Leia’s eyes widened in shock, Rey wished it had been anyone else who had been there to tell her. Rey barely knew how to function normally around the others, let alone deliver consequential news. Her own heart was breaking, and it wasn’t her family that had been torn apart. “It’s not what you think; it was a fleeting moment of fear, because he looked into Ben’s mind and saw darkness. But Ben woke up, thought Luke was trying to kill him, and panicked. That was why he destroyed the temple.”

“And Luke told you this?” Leia asked, denial and suspicion warring for influence over her eyes. Rey feared she wouldn’t believe her. Luke was her brother; what reason did she have to believe Rey? The only reason she continued was for Kylo.

“No, Ben told me.” Realizing the implication, she continued. “Before, when we were face to face. Obviously. It’s not like he can tell me things when we are across the galaxy from each other. That would be crazy.” Her eyes avoided Leia. “But Luke confirmed it when I confronted him on Ahch-To.”

“I wish Ben had told me. I wish he had run back to us instead of Snoke,” Leia lamented, a single tear trailing down her cheek. “I would have protected him, even from my own brother. But he blamed us, too, for not telling him about his grandfather.”

“Darth Vader,” Rey realized.

“That is what he called himself.” There was a darkness to her voice that Rey had not heard before. An almost... hatred.

“I don’t understand,” Rey whispered. “Why would Ben want to be like Darth Vader?”

“Do you have anywhere to be?” Rey shook her head. Leia patted the space next to her on the makeshift bed, inviting Rey to join her. Rey was more than happy to avoid the galaxy outside that room for a few minutes. “I guess, to answer that question, we have to start at the beginning. This was all told to me by my mother Breha and Luke, who learned it from a ghost in the Force, as it were. His name was Obi-wan Kenobi – ‘Ben’ for short, my son’s namesake.

“I suppose it all began with a little boy named Anakin Skywalker, the product of a mortal mother and the Force itself, if legends are to be believed. He was a slave on a desert planet, much like you were, Rey. Two Jedi - a Master, and Padawan - happened upon him, noticed his strength in the Force, and freed him from slavery. They believed him to be the Chosen One prophesied to bring balance to the Force, so they took him from his mother to train him. The Master Jedi died before he could train the very powerful boy, leaving his padawan Obi-Wan to train him alone.
“Anakin fell in love with the Queen of Naboo, Padmé Amidala Naberrie, though attachments of any kind were forbidden for a Jedi. He married her in secret, caught between his duty as a Jedi and his forbidden love for Padmé. Eventually, Padmé became pregnant with Luke and me - it was an inevitability that their relationship would become public.” Rey sympathized with Anakin. She knew the conflict he faced all too well, being caught between two worlds. Only he had everything he could have ever wanted, and he gave all that up, just as Kylo had. Why?

“I don’t understand,” Rey whispered. “Why would he turn?”

Leia smiled in sorrow. “Anakin had a premonition of his mother’s death in a dream. He tried to rescue her after she had been taken prisoner, but he was too late. He allowed darkness into his heart when he slaughtered an entire village in revenge for her death. She may have died a prisoner, but sometimes I envy her fate.”

Rey was aghast that the strong woman in front of her would say something so terrible. “How?”

“Everyone dies, Rey, but she died in the loving arms of her son. She had made the choice to send her son away so he could be a Jedi. And she was able to see the incredible Jedi and man he had become before she died. I believe she died content, never witnessing his heartbreaking fall to darkness. She never endured the loss of the people she loved at her own boy’s hands. If I could have only been so lucky,” Leia murmured wistfully. Her eyes clouded for a moment in pensive reflection before she continued with her story. The first tear escaped down Rey’s cheek.

“Then Anakin had a difference of opinion when it came to the Jedi Council, and he began to question his loyalty to them. He was also influenced by Chancellor Palpatine, who would become Darth Sidious, the Emperor. He began to turn Anakin’s heart even further against the council and his master, Obi-Wan. Palpatine convinced him that they were the true evil in the galaxy. According to Obi-Wan, his heart was in the right place, but fear and a culmination of choices by everyone involved led to his fall.”

“But how could he turn his back on Padmé?” Rey knew how heartbroken Kylo had left her in the throne room, a man she had barely known a week, when he had already chosen darkness long before he had ever met her. She wondered the despair Padmé suffered to lose the man she loved to the dark side. It would have destroyed her to fall in love with Ben Solo and watch him become Kylo Ren, to watch him abandon her like her parents had.

“He had another dream premonition that Padmé would die during childbirth,” Leia explained. “Palpatine told Anakin that the darkness could prevent her death if Anakin surrendered himself to the dark side and Palpatine’s guidance.”
“Is it true? Does the dark side have that ability?”

“There have been legends of a Sith machine that could save those who were mortally wounded from dying…or even bring someone back from the dead. But I have never heard of anyone who has actually seen such a machine,” Leia explained in a tone that wasn’t entirely disbelieving. “Even if Palpatine had such a machine, he never had the chance to use it. The Jedi Council discovered Palpatine’s plans for the Empire and confronted him. Anakin was forced to choose between the two sides. Unfortunately, Mace Windu, one of the Masters, had a moment of weakness and decided to kill Palpatine rather than just detain him. Windu feared that the Republic would fall if the Chancellor survived. What is one life compared to the threat of losing millions? I suppose it was a moment of weakness similar to the one my brother faced with my son. And it had similar consequences. It was enough for Anakin to question if Palpatine was right about the Jedi Council. He fought Windu for Palpatine’s life and accidentally killed the Jedi Master in the process. After killing a Jedi, he believed that his only choice was the dark side.”

Rey shook her head. She didn’t care about the Jedi council; he had a family. “But what about Padmé?”

“Under the Emperor’s orders, Anakin began killing all the Jedi. He even killed the younglings. Padmé confronted him. She begged him to come back to the light as he begged her to join him.” Rey understood that confrontation all too well. She empathized with Padmé’s desperation, because she knew what it felt to compete and lose against the power of the darkness. Kylo was right; he was just like his grandfather. Her thoughts were drawn back to Leia when she continued, “but they were interrupted by Obi-Wan, who was the closest person Anakin had to a brother. In his darkness, he believed Obi-Wan had turned her against him. Anakin reacted violently… he choked Padmé with the Force; he nearly killed her, accidentally prompting her labor. Obi-Wan and Anakin fought. It ended when Obi-Wan mortally wounded Anakin on a planet called Mustafar. Anakin survived due to the power of Darth Sidious and a special suit that kept him alive. That was how he ultimately became Darth Vader. If Darth Sidious did have that machine, he didn’t use it on Anakin; he left him in a constant state of suffering. Padmé died during childbirth as Anakin had foreseen, and Darth Sidious led him to believe that he had killed her instantly in his violent reaction. Anakin believed we didn’t survive. Luke was sent to Tatooine with our uncle, protected by Obi-Wan, who became Ben Kenobi in hiding. I was adopted by Senator Organa and his wife from Alderaan.”

“Becoming royalty like your mother – a princess,” Rey supplied.

“Yes.” Leia sighed before continuing. “The Empire grew, Vader terrorized the galaxy under the command of the Emperor, and fate in the shape of a droid brought us all together. The droid had a map of the Death Star, and Vader wanted it before it found its way into the hands of the Rebellion. I hid it with Artoo and sent him to Ben Kenobi on Tatooine in a plea for help before Vader captured me. Luke was no one to the war, he just happened upon the droid and helped bring Artoo to Ben. Fate dragged him into the war. He found passage aboard the Millennium Falcon with Han.
He was a smuggler and was only involved for the money they promised. They intended to bring the plans to Alderaan to my father. But the Empire had already destroyed Alderaan in front of me, and the Falcon was captured by the Death Star. They found me where I was being held prisoner and rescued me. To help us escape, Ben Kenobi confronted his former padawan and brother. Vader killed him as Luke watched. I think that moment was when Luke joined the war. He was the one who eventually destroyed the Death Star at the Battle of Yavin.”

A droid with a map? A fallen Jedi controlled by an evil Emperor? A Force-sensitive desert child who found a droid and was drawn into a war? An escape on the Millennium Falcon? A destroyed planet? A giant superweapon? A sacrifice of the master to save the others from the apprentice...
“This sounds awfully familiar,” Rey quipped. She didn’t know the ending of the story, but it wasn’t difficult to guess. Luke would have had to face his father. They defeated the Empire, Darth Vader was dead, Rey knew it was likely that Luke delivered that fate.

“Well, at least you are not bonded by blood to a monster,” Leia smirked wanly. Rey didn’t smile back. She may not have had a bond of blood to a monster, but she did have one in the Force.

She couldn’t imagine the strength it must have taken to do it.

Leia shook her head. “Luke didn’t kill Darth Vader.”

“But I thought…”

“Luke refused to join him, but he also refused to kill our father. He believed in the light he felt inside him,” Leia said, restoring hope in Rey’s aching heart. “The Emperor tried to kill Luke, and Vader killed the Emperor instead, mortally wounding himself in the process. He died for Luke.”
Rey wondered if Kylo had been mortally wounded in the throne room, would she have believed that he had turned, too?

“Do you think he died in the light?”

“In his dying moments, yes. But does death truly redeem him, if he didn’t have to live with the consequences of his actions?” Leia asked, giving voice to Rey’s fears. “If he had lived, could he have turned his back on the Empire? Given up all that power? It depends upon whom you ask. I do not hold the same hope for the redemption of my father as Luke did.” As quickly as her hope appeared, it faded again. Rey didn’t believe Anakin had turned, not after what she had witnessed in the throne room. If his grandfather couldn’t be saved, what hope was there for Kylo?
“But to answer your question,” Leia said with exhaustion bleeding into her words. “Anakin’s story is a complicated one, and one I didn’t care to know until I lost my son. Luke forgave our father; I didn’t try until after Ben left. Perhaps if I had come to terms with the legacy of my father sooner, I would still have my son. I think only Ben could tell you what part of that man’s life he identified with. He never heard the story from us, so I can only imagine what idealized story Snoke told him.”

“Do you think...” Rey began, but a sharp pain in her side caused her to cry out into the room. She could almost hear the blaster fire, could almost feel the crippling impact, could almost smell the blood and cauterized flesh. She could have explained it all away until she felt his fear. The Force around her was screaming in warning. The dread and unease that she had felt entering that room returned in full force, sinking in her stomach to an all-consuming terror. As she clutched at the phantom wound, she understood the implications.

Ben.

She didn’t know how, but she had to find him. In her panic, her eyes met Leia’s. She was leaning forward on her hands, her own chest was heaving in panic. An awareness flashed across the mother’s eyes as Rey jumped to her feet. “I have to go!” she shouted over her shoulder as she sprinted down the corridor.
Chapter End Notes

Violence

Some retelling of death in a story
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo collapsed into the empty passenger compartment of his Upsilon-class command shuttle, too. weak to continue to pull strength from the Force. The only other crew on board were controlling the shuttle from the crew cabin. They would not be bothering him after he had adamantly denied their support, despite their insistence of displaying concern for his well-being. The thought of trusting anyone around him in his weakness was terrifying. Though he could have programmed the shuttle to return to the Finalizer, the officers and troopers who had carried him on board were useful at the controls. It was satisfying to hear the release of the proton torpedos that leveled the entire village on his orders, erasing the Concordians – and their threat to Rey – from existence.

Blue refused to leave his side, the panicked beeps oddly comforting as he finally felt safe enough to remove his mask, the servomotors hissing as they released the hinged mechanism. The metallic thud it created as it slipped from his hand was muted by his labored breaths as he breathed fresh air.

He slumped heavily to the cool floor, resting his back against a seat as he took advantage of a moment of silence. The battle had not gone as anticipated – battles rarely did– but he had hesitated, and it was costly. The wounds to his left side ached sharply as his blood leaked onto the floor. He studied the steady crimson stream for a moment, fascinated by which path it would take across the floor, but his sight was fading in and out of focus. A hiss escaped his lips as he adjusted to rest more of his weight on the seat behind him.

The blaster wound was more painful than he remembered, but if he clamped his jaw down tight even, it was tolerable. The droid was panicked, pacing back and forth. With his internal gyros, he would swing his head around pointedly on every turn. It was overly dramatic; clearly the droid was naïve to the realities and consequences of war. Kylo gave everything he had in battle and had sustained his fair share of injuries because of it. If Blue stayed by his side – such a foreign concept that he refused to consider its implications – then the droid would likely witness more.

He closed his eyes and retrieved the cache of memories that he had accessed more times than he could count, an instantaneous connection to the anger he sought, streamlining him to the comfort of darkness. The cold that accompanied the dark was overwhelming, or had he been cold before?
He couldn't remember.

The dark soothed the wound, weakening the tremors that rolled through his body, and he felt his consciousness drifting. Kylo had been wounded in battle before, and he knew the danger of succumbing to exhaustion, but the dark was calling him, assuring him that he could sleep. He was convinced the wound was not fatal – primarily because he had been blasted there before with a much deadlier weapon – and he planned to seek Bacta treatment from the medbay when the shuttle returned to the Finalizer. A moment of rest sounded peaceful; he couldn't remember the last time he had slept. The warnings of intuition and past experiences weakened as his body grew too heavy to support on his own. His connection to the physical world slipped, and he was more than happy to let go. His ears still rang from the explosions; he barely registered her presence until she was upon him.
“Ben!” Rey cried. Her nearing footfalls snagged the last thread of his fading consciousness. He winced in pain as she tumbled to his side. He wasn't certain how long she shook him before he realized what was happening. There was panic in her tearing eyes as he raised his head slowly, his eyelids heavy with fatigue. His own fear escalated as he sensed hers.

“What’s wrong?” he demanded hoarsely, though she paid little attention to his words, or did he forget to say them aloud? He was going to repeat himself, but he was distracted by movement. She pulled at his shoulder roughly, dragging him onto his back. The last he remembered, he had been in a seated position. When had he fallen over? He tried to ask her, but she seemed to be moving and speaking impossibly fast. She leaned over him, grasping his tunic in her hands, and the warmth was comforting. He watched the motion of her lips as she articulated words, but it was as if she was speaking an alien language – probably Mando’a. He should have learned Mando’a. Where was the vocoder?

“Ben!” He opened his eyes. When had he closed them? It wasn't the fear overwhelming the bond that snapped him back to awareness, or the tears in her eyes as she searched him for injuries. It was when he noticed the pain was fading. If there was one truth Kylo never forgot in battle, it was this – pain was good. Pain meant life. Perhaps the blaster had done more damage than he had first thought. Blue was asking a rapid-fire succession of questions that seemed to incite her panic further. The color drained from her face, and Blue released a terrifying screech as she lifted Kylo’s tunic and found the source of the blood.

“No...” she whispered. Tears cut lines down her face as her hands came away with a dark crimson stain. “Ben, there’s so much blood. I don’t know what to do. Tell me what to do! I can’t...”

“I’m fine.” His attempt at a steady response became more of a groan than he had intended. “Here,” he said when he remembered what he had to give her. He reached for the pocket in his cloak. Evidently, he was failing miserably, because her desperate, shaking fingers were fumbling through the folds in the cloak in search of what he needed. She reached her hand in the pocket and pulled out the remnants of the unrecognizable fruit. He groaned petulantly, “I destroyed it, just like everything else I –”

“Damn it, Ben!” She tossed the purple remains on the floor and wiped the juice on her thigh as if it offended her. “I have to stop the bleeding!” Before he could brush off her concern, Rey grabbed his arm, her hand trembling as her eyes scanned the room. His surroundings began to transform to a corridor in the temple but snapped back to his shuttle just as swiftly when she released his arm with a curse.

“How does this work? How do I see where you are...”

I'm fine. I've survived worse.
It was cold then, too, when he collapsed back into the snow to await his fate. Starkiller was a giant ball of plasma now – a star – not destroyed as the rebels had intended, but it would never again be what it once was. Then again, neither would he. Kylo had lain in that very compartment as they escaped its explosion. Hux had stood over him as the med droids worked diligently, cursing Snoke for demanding he save his life. Kylo had been certain to remind the general that the Resistance had destroyed his superweapon before he let himself drift away to more worthwhile thoughts. Kylo had never expected to survive. Hux certainly did the bare minimum to keep him alive, and he would have content to fall by her hand. Rey had been less concerned with his well-being back then, but she had been on his mind all the same. She was fierce and strong and a force to be reckoned with…

The ship shuddered from the explosion of the weaponized planet. No, that already happened, that was the past. That meant... he was shaking. “Ben, open your eyes!” She continued to shake his shoulder long after his eyelids fluttered open. The expression on her face was grim. “You're not fine, okay? There's blood everywhere, your lips are blue, you can't even stay awake. How do I see where you are? I need a medpac.”

“Black box. Next to the weapons cache,” he heard himself say, though his voice sounded strange to his own ears, winded and gravelly. I am fine, he wanted to argue, but he couldn't find the energy to express it. He wrapped his fingers around her wrist, and she gasped as his surroundings became clear to her. He was grateful for his long limbs for once as she dragged his hand with her in search of the medpac.

His arm was extended above his head in an uncomfortable position, but at least she had found the box based on the metallic clanking sounds. He hadn't realized how tightly he was grasping her until she pried her arm away. There was no reason to touch him anymore, of course, now that she had what she wanted, but the warmth of her skin had granted him a brief respite from the cold. She and Blue were talking to each other; he could hear the panic in their voices, but he couldn't understand their words. Their voices sounded tinny and far away.

The lights were extremely bright, and he had to force himself to keep his eyes open. She knelt next to his injured side, fiddling with the objects in the pack, before crying out in frustration. “When was the last time you used this thing? The medisensor isn't working, Ben!”

“Starkiller. Some of the blood from my face might have gotten into the internal mechanism,” he attempted to smile, to add levity to the situation, to assure her that everything would be okay. He grit his teeth instead, bracing against a wave of tremors. Rey was in no mood for his humor, her expression panicked even before noticing the shuddering.

“You have to tell me what to do! I don't know what to do!” The fear in her voice and the pleading desperation in her eyes was more concerning to him than his wound. She placed her hand over his heart, which was still pounding strong enough against his rib cage for her to feel through his tunic. Her hand rested there for longer than necessary as if she was trying to soothe him, or herself. He realized how sweaty he was when her other hand touched the damp skin on his arm. He couldn't feel much at all, which should have terrified him, but he found the loss of sensation comforting. Everything inside him was warning him to listen, to heed the warnings of his intuition, to show her how to help him. But his eyes were heavy, and he could feel the pull of exhaustion. What did she want again? Whatever it was, it could wait. She would understand if he rested his eyes, only for a moment. He hadn't slept in so long…

A sharp pain spread across his cheek. “Ben!” He opened his eyes to Rey's sobs. “I'm sorry I slapped you... nothing else worked. You weren't waking up!” How long had he been unconscious? Kylo felt grounded to the physical world by the slight sting to his cheek. If Rey was that terrified, he should have realized sooner that the situation was dire. He could feel the warnings vibrating in the Force, could feel his own energy fading. This was it? This was what would end Kylo Ren? A blaster bolt from a child on an insignificant moon in a battle that didn't matter? He tried to laugh, but the delivery was more quivering gasp than anything else.

Kylo knew he should have been terrified, but he wasn't. He was tired and the thought of sleep was... comforting. His fear, his anger, his reasons to hate all seemed insignificant now. He wasn't even regretful his life was over. It was almost a relief to end the constant conflict. This was always how it was going to end, wasn't it? What did it matter? He wanted this. What was there to keep fighting for?

“Let me go, Rey,” he whispered.

He let his eyes close, allowed his mind to drift away. There was a light in the darkness, a warmth he hadn't felt in years. He felt drawn to it. There were voices, so many voices around him. Voices he recognized from dreams he couldn't remember. There was something... someone in the glowing light.

“Ben!” Han shouted across the distance between them on the skyway. His back was illuminated in the light, blocking his passage. Kylo knew how this ended; it haunted him in his sleep. He backed away. He wouldn't allow it to happen again. Han moved forward, however, determined to help him. “Not yet, son,” he said. Han's hand reached for Kylo, but he didn't have to touch his cheek for Kylo to remember what it felt like. The weight of it was forever branded into his skin like the scar. It was different this time. Instead of tenderly touching Kylo's cheek, he pounded his fists into his son's chest. Kylo stood there and allowed the older man to hit him; he deserved it after all he had done, but Han was not finished. He grasped his son by the tunic. Before Kylo could twist himself from his grasp, Han shoved him backward off the skyway. “Go back!” Han shouted.

“Come back!” No, that wasn't Han's voice.
“Ben!”

He gasped at the force of the electric shock to his chest. Blinking rapidly in the light of the passenger compartment, Blue was by his side, his tool arm extended, prepared to shock him again. There was another face, next to him, a halo of light behind her head. “Rey?” His voice was foreign to his own ears.

“You came back,” she sobbed, hands clenched in his tunic. He didn’t understand what had changed from a few days before when she had almost killed him with a blaster herself.

_I always come back_, he said across the bond, too weak to speak the words aloud. _But you should have let me go._

“No!” The sound that tore from her throat pained him more than a wound ever could. “Never. You understand me? I will never give up on you. And you can’t... you can’t leave me. You _promised_.” He found the misery in her eyes that he had seen that night when he reached across the universe to touch her hand. _You're not alone_. He knew at that moment he would fight the inevitable for her, even if he had no other reason to stay. “But you're dying right here in front of me, and I can't even drag you to your own mother for help. I'm losing you, and I don't know what to do. Tell me what to do, please,” she begged, her eyes red-rimmed and swollen.

“Okay, okay.” He knew the treatment well; he'd had too much pride to seek the medbay after his former master's training sessions, so he had learned to treat himself. He preferred it when no one else touched him anyway. Certainly, this wound was slightly more dangerous than those wounds, but it was better than nothing.

“Antiseptic, coagulant, bacta gel, laser cauterizer, bacta patch,” he recalled from well-practiced experience. Either he was speaking an alien language or slurring his words, because she shook her head as if she couldn't understand the terms he had rattled off. It required him repeating the words over the bond before she jumped to action with trembling fingers. Blue attempted to assist, though Kylo didn't know how much help the young droid truly provided.

Rey worked with clinical precision, no doubt treating him as another broken thing in need of repair. Though Rey's hands weren't gentle, and though the treatment wasn't painless, he found himself enjoying her attentions, nonetheless. He focused on her hands as she methodically completed each task, trying desperately to fight the heaviness of his eyelids.
She must have noticed his struggle in her frequent monitoring, because she smiled through tears to distract him. It was a fake smile – he could tell because the smile didn't reach her eyes. “Stay with me, Ben.”

“I’m trying,” he groaned as she squeezed something into his wound that instantly burned. She removed a hypo-injector from the medpac, and his hand bolted out to wrap around her wrist. “No, no stim shot.”

Rey scowled. “It’s for the pain…”

“I can handle the pain.”

“Ben, you were shot,” she said, removing the tip of the injector.

“And I refuse to return to the Finalizer drugged!” Kylo didn’t intend to snap at her, but he wouldn’t allow those stimulants in his system. They altered his connection to the Force. He couldn’t show weakness, not for a moment. Kylo was relieved when she replaced the cap to the stim-shot. He exhaled slowly, laying his head down and closing his eyes to rest in the safety he felt in her presence.

“What happened?”

Her question was a transparent attempt to keep him talking. He remembered the chaos. The villagers were primitive; it should have been a simple battle, but what they had lacked in technology, they had made up for in strategy. He shouldn’t have become complacent. War was war. Still, the boy was only a child...

“Close proximity blaster.” He was not going to volunteer any more information than required. Even in his weakened state, he knew how she would react. And what was he to tell her? That the tribe had weaponized children, turned them into war machines? He knew what she would say. And she’d be right, it wasn't any different than the First Order…or the Rebellion. Except the Order or Rebellion did not send the children they brainwashed into battle.

Of course, she wouldn’t be satisfied that easily by his explanation; there was an edge of anger to her tone when she spoke again. “Who did this to you?”
“The Concordians,” he replied through clenched teeth as she cauterized the exposed wound. The burning smell of flesh was something he never quite became accustomed to. “How did you know I was injured?”

“I felt your pain through the bond.”

Could the bond be strong enough to drag them together whenever one needed the other? Or had he thought of her as he was losing consciousness? He couldn't remember. The sharp pain in his side was returning, which he figured was a good sign. Rey had saved his life. But why?

With a poorly concealed grimace, he met her eyes, “You have the vial; you could have won the war.”

“We’ll win the war when you turn.”

“And if I don’t?” he challenged. “The Resistance won't take too kindly to their heroic Jedi saving the life of their enemy.” He didn't know why he said those things, why whenever he felt vulnerable, he chose to instigate conflict instead. Perhaps it was the glaring lack of darkness surrounding her, or perhaps Rey knew him better than anyone, but she didn't take the bait.

“You best be quiet then,” she murmured, lifting his head and sliding her legs under him, replacing the cool floor with the warmth of her lap. “I'm in a corridor by my room; anyone could come along at any moment.”

“Tell them you did it,” he said, wincing as he tried – and failed – to assist her in moving him. “They'll believe that.”

She hummed. Her fingers were gentle as she tentatively wound her fingers through the wavy ends of his hair. It was a simple action, but she had never touched him like that before. “I suppose they would.”

A calming warmth blanketed him as she continued to stroke his hair. Even though it reminded him of childhood memories, he felt safe and content, and it was difficult not to succumb to the pull of sleep. As his eyes fluttered, her fearful voice pulled him back to the present. “Will you be okay?”

He nodded and cleared his throat in vulnerability, then chanced a glance at her face. The fear still welled in her eyes. “I'll seek treatment as soon as we dock with the Finalizer. I promise.” She let out a relieved sigh. The fear was fading and, in its place, a smile. So simple. So destabilizing.

Kylo stared up at her, studying her face, as she stared down at him. The smile that lifted her cheeks was genuine, and it made her eyes seem impossibly brighter. The freckles on her cheeks were like stars, the gold flecks in her eyes shimmered brightly like rays of the sun. Her nose scrunched under his attention, which only served to make his heart stutter. He felt light-headed and warm, and he doubted it had anything to do with his injury. It wasn’t his fault, he had never seen anyone so…

“Beautiful.” Perhaps it was the fogginess of his blood-starved brain that gave him the foolish idea to speak without censoring his thoughts. He knew she heard his admission by the look of wonderment that crossed her face. Her smile didn't fade, so he counted it as a success. His mind battled between sparking into a frenzy over his reckless sentiment and the calming sensation of her fingers in his hair. The moment was broken by Blue's excited whirs and squeals that his master was on the mend. He didn't want the moment between them to end, but he was exhausted. With her temporary distraction with the droid, the exhaustion won.

“Ben?” he heard her ask quietly, her voice hesitant. That name – he used to hate that name. It was everything he couldn’t be. But the sweet sound that it formed on her lips was hopeful, almost reverent. She spoke his name as if he were worthy of it, and he found it made him want to be. He closed his eyes to the image of her enchanting smile and let the weightless sensation blooming in his chest carry him away.
Physical Trauma

Kylo suffered an injury and is struggling to survive that injury. There is mention of blood and fear of death
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
“Ben?”

Kylo's eyes fluttered closed, and she felt his weight grow heavier in her lap. His eyes were by far her favorite feature, but he was still striking in sleep. His breathing was deep and even, slowing as he sank further into unconsciousness. “Ben, stay with me.” The droid next to her echoed her sentiment. She looked up at Blue and smiled to ease his fear. She knew Kylo was more stable now than he had been before the treatment – her best attempt with the limited experience she had – but his condition still concerned her. He promised he would seek further treatment when he returned to the Finalizer, but how long would that be? She noticed his color looked better as she studied his reposed face.

His lips were no longer the alarmingly blue hue. They looked soft, and she desired to touch them. It was a strange warmth she felt, thinking about his lips. It felt like the first time she had seen more than she had expected of him that night on Ahch-To. It was uncomfortable, a powerful shiver, but from the inside. Bodies had always been just vessels in her mind, used to gain nourishment and work to survive. Her entire life had centered around survival. She had seen enough in Niima not to be completely naïve to the primal interactions between people, but it had never held much interest for her when she feared where her next meal would come from.

She had never noticed anyone's body as she noticed his. At first, she believed it merely an appreciation of his strength and training. He had the body of a warrior. It was admirable. But when she felt the desire to touch, she knew it was something more, something terrifying to consider. He was a murderer, her enemy; she should be ashamed of the desires she held for the Supreme Leader. At least, that was what the darkness told her. She had ignored it on Kamino when she had felt drawn to him in his vulnerability. She ignored it then, as he lay unconscious in her lap.

In a gesture she hoped conveyed to the sleeping man what his life meant to her, she kissed her thumb and pressed it to his lips. They were softer than she imagined and achingly warm. If he had only been awake, she wondered what she would have done in that moment. The thought excited her that there was more to try with him. She knew she was supposed to hate him, but she couldn't find it in herself to do it. There was no room for hate when the light was bubbling up from inside her. There was something about him that she couldn't explain – something more connecting him to her than she understood. What she did know was he was changing, restoring a cautious hope in him. “Wake up, Ben,” she whispered as she trailed her thumb over his lips, a fire awakening inside her, drawing her to him.

Instead of his awakening, the Force crackled and vibrated around her. She knew he would be taken back across the galaxy within seconds. She turned to the droid. “Blue, promise me you’ll get him help on the –”

And as quickly as he appeared – she would be forever grateful the Force had brought her to his side in that moment of desperation – he was gone. The corridor was empty. Her heart hammered against her rib cage as she jumped to her feet. What am I supposed to do?

She had been concerned about his condition when he had been safe in her lap. Without him, she was terrified. What if he needed further treatment before they reached the Finalizer? What if he stopped breathing? What if they didn't get him to the medbay? The more she examined the possibilities and considered the unknowns, the more she panicked.

In his absence, the moment that she had rounded the corner toward her room and found him crumpled on the floor replayed in agonizing detail. His unnatural position had been confirmation of her fears. She remembered her gasp, her halted steps, and the terror that had sunk deep in her stomach. For a split-second, she had feared he was dead. Watching his eyes blink open, even if they were unfocused and heavy, made her believe in the miracles of the Cosmic Force.

She had known it was dire before she felt his pain fade, before she saw the pool of blood chasing the cracks in the temple floor. His skin had lost its color, his body was convulsing. She had seen him unconscious before, but that... that was different. Kylo was a fighter, but his injuries dragged him from the conscious plain with ease. The minutes stretched longer each time she had tried to revive him, and she feared the next time she lost him, she would lose him for good. It was undoubtedly clear that he was quickly succumbing to his injuries; she'd seen enough death to last a lifetime in the harsh sands of Jakku. Acquaintances and strangers, good people and plenty of morally corrupt, she had witnessed enough of the living gasping their last breaths to know what death looked like.

Rey was certain; Kylo had nearly died across the galaxy from her. Alone. If she hadn't found the medpac, she would have watched him slowly succumb to his injuries, and she would have been helpless to stop it. As deeply as she wished to forget, he was the Supreme Leader. There were worlds of people who wanted him dead, and there was nothing she could do to stop it. What would happen if she wasn't there the next time? What if his injuries were instantly fatal? What if there was no medpac? They had been lucky, but they weren't out of danger yet.

He was unconscious, somewhere across the galaxy, and she wasn't there to help him. Normal people didn't pass out. She hated it. Hated it. If he had just turned, come back to the Resistance with her, he would be there in the corridor with her instead of the bloodstains drying on the stone floor. With a shout of anger, she kicked the crimson dirt over the stains. The darkness pressed insistently at her energy, and in her fear and anger and exhaustion, she allowed it in. The darkness would numb her. She couldn't live with the fear, the tightness in her chest at the thought that one day he wouldn't be there anymore. Not when Ben Solo was so close to coming back to her.

Rey paced up and down the corridor, waiting for the Force to reconnect them. She was grateful that most of the other members had left for a mission led by Finn to the base for supplies. The corridors were empty, and her secret was safe for another day. But perhaps, there wouldn't have to be many more days she had to wait. The man who nearly died in her arms was not the one who chose power over her in the throne room. If he woke, when he woke, he would find a way to bring them together, she believed that. But the wait until then would be excruciating. She walked past an empty alcove of rooms, hesitating when she heard a strange voice. She thought she had been alone on that side of the temple. She listened closer, and the voice was speaking in an even stranger language.

“Hopa?” The voice chuckled. It was a deep, terrible thing. “Tee-tocky sa creeda. Oto doe choba, Colonel Dameron.”

Rey edged closer, the Force drawing her toward the conversation. She couldn't put a finger on what, but something was off. She trusted the Force, and she trusted her intuition even more. She startled when she heard Poe's voice echo into the corridor.

“I don't recall me wasting your time before,” Poe said, his voice much louder than the first voice. He must be on a holocall. But who would he risk contacting when the First Order could trace our transmissions? “Name your price, the Resistance is at your mercy.” A burrowing dread settled in her stomach.

Rey knew that Leia was sending communications across the galaxy in search of allies. If Leia was the brains of the Resistance, then he was the heart. Everything he did was for the good of the Resistance. So why did this conversation concern her? Was she projecting her own fears of being caught with Kylo? Poe could be talking to anyone. Nothing he said was cause for the unsettled feeling that became increasingly more difficult to ignore. But something inside told her to pay attention, that this conversation was important. And that intuition meant more to her than her rationalizations. It had saved her life countless times in the unforgiving conditions on Jakku; she had no reason to stop listening to it now.

She was nearly upon the room when she heard chipper beeps of an astromech droid. Breathing a sigh of relief, she turned, expecting Blue. She couldn't find it in her heart to be disappointed, however, as Beebee-Ate rolled around the corner. He issued a series of whistles in binary as a friendly greeting to Rey. She knelt next to him and used her smokey grey shirt to wipe dust from around his sensor. Hearing the astromech droid conversing with someone, Poe stepped out of the room, startled when he noticed her.

“Rey,” he breathed, running his hand through his dark, curly hair. “What are you doing here?” He looked nervous. Why is he nervous? She looked past him toward the room, and he leaned his arm against the temple wall, effectively blocking her view of the room.

“I thought I heard talking,” she answered. There was something about his smile that earned another warning from her intuition. She had spent enough time around sly and deceitful characters on Jakku. Those experiences implored her not to trust him. This isn't Kylo, she chided herself, you're "Talking?" he paused, scratching the back of his head. "It's only me and Beebee-Ate back here. But, speaking of talking, I thought I heard you talking with someone earlier in the corridor?" Rey glared at him. She knew the game he was playing; her bondmate was an expert in equivocation and counter-questioning. It caught her off guard that this man would use the same tactic, but he was leading them down a troubling path, so she deflected.

"Nope, just me. Okay, well, enjoy your... alone time." She patted Beebee-Ate goodbye and loudly stepped around the corner of the alcove and down the corridor. She had no intention of allowing the clandestine meeting to occur in privacy, however. After a safe distance, she quietly tip-toed back to the alcove, stepping close enough to overhear more of the conversation.

Poe spoke again, his words flowing fast and smooth as he worked to gain the other man's favor. "Yes, it was her, but it's fine; she knows nothing." They are. They're talking about me. Why would Poe want me to know nothing? Who exactly are we begging for help?

"Jeeka doe Jedai hotshuh neechu. Mo nobata bargon," the voice growled in return. Whatever he was saying, it was clear it was a warning.

"She won't be a problem. You have my word," Poe said. Rey's stomach dropped. Who was this man, and why did it sound as if he hated the Jedi? What was happening? The Resistance was the good side. What was Poe keeping from her? Was Leia part of the secret too? Whom could she trust? It terrified her that the face that came to mind after that thought was Kylo.

"E chu ta," the voice chuckled again. "Cheekta mo gootu nopa, Colonel Dameron. Cheekta mo gootu nopa."

There was a noise from the alcove, perhaps Beebee-Ate rolling around, but she took off running. When she had reached the dead-end of a long corridor, she backed herself against the dirt-covered walls. "E chu ta..." she whispered. Where had she heard that before?

"E chu ta?" A hoarse voice groaned from the empty room to the left.
“Ben!” She sprinted into the room, still panting from running earlier, and skidded into his side. There were two armed guards standing by the door, but he wasn’t noticeably panicked that they saw her. Blue sat loyally next to him, chirping to himself as he practiced shocking the medical droid.

She wanted to embrace him and tell him how profoundly she feared for his life, but there would be an abundance of time for that. He had given her the vial on Kamino, he had told her how he was tired of the path he had chosen, he had changed, and now – as he recovered from almost losing his life – she knew he had realized what he wanted, she knew in her heart he would turn. They would no longer be forced to be enemies; they could figure it out together.

His deep voice interrupted her thoughts. “I didn't know you were one to curse.”

“What?”

“Don't look so scandalized,” he winced as he sat on a medbay gurney somewhere on the Finalizer. “You said, 'E chu ta,' did you not? I don't know much in Huttese, but I do know the curse words.”

The cold dread in her stomach reemerged with his words. “Huttese? As in, the Hutts?”

“Yes...” His mood was the brightest she had ever seen, but it darkened as he sensed her own tumultuous emotions. “Rey, is something wrong?”

_The Hutts...who hate the Jedi. No, it’s impossible. Poe wouldn’t. Leia wouldn’t._

Rey had heard the notorious stories from off-worlders on Jakku. The Hutts had committed atrocious crimes. Murder, slavery, unspeakable cruelties in the form of entertainment— they were concerned with one thing and one thing only; wealth. They were no better than the First Order. Worse, perhaps.

The Resistance, the good side, would never form an alliance with them. Would they? Was winning a war worth aligning themselves with an organization as evil as the very people they fought against? No, Leia would never allow it. The Hutts enslaved her, nearly killed Luke, froze her husband in Carbonite. No, it couldn't be. That was not the cause she was fighting for. Rey must have heard wrong. Or, if Kylo knew the term, then so must many others. Perhaps the unknown ally had only used the term because it was something Poe would recognize. Rey had already opened the floodgates to the darkness. It found her easily then, in her distrustful fear, allowing it to suppress the something deep inside that begged her to hold it at bay.

Chapter End Notes

Mild fear of death

Rey touches Kylo with ambiguous consent in today's standards
Concordia Fallout

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

---CHAPTER 36---
“Rey?”

“Yes? Sorry, I was... how are you?” She offered him a smile, but her eyes didn't follow. His stomach clenched at her pretense. What had happened? What had he done? His words may have broken her from whatever inner conflict she struggled with, but this wasn't the Rey he had seen only moments ago. Only moments ago, to him, he supposed. He had awoken in the medbay, having no idea how he had gotten there or how long he had been unconscious. It could have been hours. Could she be upset with him for that?

Don’t confuse her saving your life for caring for you.

Still, there was something more, something darker clouding her energy. Her light had been nearly untainted earlier, but now he could feel the weight of her darkness. Had he done that to her? Was that the effect he had on her?

“I'm fine,” he whispered. “I... uh... Thank you... for your medical assistance.” It sounded pathetic to his own ears, but words of gratitude were not well-practiced. Ostensibly, neither was she well-practiced in accepting gratitude, if the blush spreading across her cheeks was any indication. A true smile blessed her face, for only a fleeting moment, before faltering under the shadow of darkness.

She surprised him by stepping forward and tugging at his blood-soaked tunic, searching for his wounds. “How does it look? Have they treated you yet?”

“There wasn't much left for them to do, but I'm fine,” he assured her. There was a tightness in her shoulders and a pinch in her brow. She didn't look very reassured. She was running her hands over the tunic, blood dripping from her hands as she pulled them away.

She stared up into his eyes, searching them for something important. The emotions in her own eyes were disquieting. “Ben, how do I know you’re real?” He thought he had misheard her, or perhaps his brain was still recovering from blood loss, he was so taken aback by her question.

“I... what?”

“How do I know you didn't die? You could be an apparition in the Force, like Luke. He appeared no different to me than you are right now. You could have died when you disappeared, and now you're lying to me because you know how much your death would hurt me. You can't be okay, there must have been a wound we missed. There's blood on your shoulders, Ben! There's too much blood for you to be okay. How did I not see it before... ”

His lips twitched at her concern. “It’s okay. It’s not all my blood.” Her entire body was trembling; he could sense her thoughts on overdrive through the bond. She was panicking. The darkness was overwhelming her in her fear; he was nearly choking on its density. He watched as she stilled, almost as if she were listening to something... or someone.

It was a ridiculous notion, because he was the only one with voices in his head, and those voices were dead. He turned, wondering if she was listening to someone else, but there was no one else in the room save the two mandatory stormtroopers he would deal with later. He had already commanded them into silence. His gloved hand grasped hers, stilling them. Her eyes snapped back to his instead of the soiled tunic, but they were darker than he had ever seen, the golden flecks dimmed into empty pools; it was as if someone else was looking back at him.

“I’m not dead, Rey. Not yet, at least. Close your eyes,” he murmured, moving her hand to the wound on his side. He manipulated the Force through her, dragging her into the deeper levels, focusing on the damage done by the blaster bolt. The plasma had torn through tissue and muscle, but he was otherwise lucky it missed internal organs. Blood was no longer streaming from the wound, and the cells around the injury were bright in the Force as the Bacta repaired him. He showed her the rest of his functioning circulatory system through the Force, focusing on his steady heartbeat. He allowed her to see this vulnerable side; the blood pumped evenly from his heart and his lungs expanded and contracting with ease. When he looked up at her, it wasn’t relief that twisted across her face, so he released her.

“See? The wound is on the mend. My vitals are elevated but normal, and, more importantly, proof of life. I’m alive, and I’ll survive this.” She still seemed skeptical as she ran her hand over the tunic. “Rey, that’s not my blood,” he assured her again. Her demeanor changed, though her fear hadn’t subsided. She stepped back, her eyes boring into his. The darkness flooded into their connection, forcing him to secure barriers in his mind, so he wouldn’t be overwhelmed by its strength. It was something he hadn’t felt in her since before he left for Kamino.

“What did you do? You controlled my mind!” she shouted. He watched her side of the bond fall deeper into the cloud of darkness, he could feel the transition in her. He was losing her to the darkness again.

Control your mind? I couldn’t even if I wanted. Do you have any idea how strong you are?

He searched her eyes, but he couldn’t find the source of her sudden darkness. “What just happened to you?”
“You tell me, Supreme Leader,” she snapped back. It was as if Rey was gone and the woman before Kamino stood in her place. He couldn’t understand what had changed in her from a moment prior. How could the darkness consume her so quickly?

“I guided you deeper into the Force,” he explained in exasperation. “To prove I’m not dead. You were rambling about Force ghosts.”

“Don’t ever do that again.” Her voice wavered in agitation, weakening the strength of her demand. “I don’t need your darkness guiding my mind to do anything.”

“Clearly,” he sighed, eying her pointedly. He just wanted her to return to the woman with the powerful light that he had only seen glimpses of in recent days. He should want the darkness. He should encourage it. But he couldn’t bring himself to want it. “Look, I can teach you, if you –”

“I don’t want you to teach me anything!”

His anger spiked, matching hers in the bond. “You were panicking over the blood, all I did was… show you… it wasn’t… mine!”

Luke is dead. How do you expect to learn about the Force if you won’t allow me to teach you! You fear my darkness, but you are the one suffocating the bond with yours.

Her eyes flashed with renewed fear. “Then, whose blood is it?”

“Does it matter?” he studied her carefully, buying himself time to figure out just where the darkness was coming from. And why she seemed so distracted, why her eyes would become distant as if she were listening. He knew it was likely due to his own experiences, but he couldn’t shake the feeling that there was someone else talking to her. Was it Luke?

“I know you're avoiding the answer,” her tone was as cutting as her stare. “I'm no fool.”

He gently skimmed the surface of her mind for the source of the darkness, but the fear and anger that fed it was not strong enough for the darkness he felt. This was something else. “I never said you were.”
“You implied it.”

Rey would not let it go that easily; he knew that, but he let the dice fall where they may. “Did I?”

Blue, who had been watching the exchange with about as much confusion as he had felt, finally spoke up. Kylo sighed; he doubted that the droid informing her that Kylo did it to protect her would deescalate the situation for her.

“Whose...blood...is it?” Her voice was nearly unrecognizable with the weight of the darkness. He paused before answering, closing his eyes with a long-suffering sigh. If she had become unreasonably angry about him guiding her with the Force, he knew this would not end well.

“The Concordians.”

“What did you do?” Her voice trembled as she searched his eyes for an answer. He knew she wouldn't like what she found. How foolish he had been to believe the animosity had changed at all between them.

“What did I do? The last time I checked, I was the one lying in the medbay.”

She was quiet for a moment, lost to her own thoughts. She closed her eyes as if she were trying to shut out everything from the room. He recognized it in himself when he was a boy. Was he doing this to her? Was it his darkness? Or his bleak thoughts? Could she hear them all? What was their bond doing to her? The power of the darkness in her was beautiful in its ferocity, but that was exactly why he should learn to shut her out. He would only destroy what she was. He destroyed everything else.

“Who are the Concordians, and why is their blood all over you?” she finally managed.

“They were a small tribe on Mandalore’s moon.” He attempted to keep his tone calm and even, to give her no extra fuel for her overwhelming darkness. “A radical faction of Mandalorians who had been exiled there and were presumed dead. Their warriors attacked the Mandalorians, to gain access to long-range transportation. Rey, they left me no choice.”
The embers of her anger were reignited with every reply. “You couldn’t have forced them back into exile?”

In a perfect universe, maybe, but it’s not. You know how uncivilized worlds operate. On a planet where their moral compass is for sale to the highest bidder, when loyalty and sanctity of life are considered weaknesses, there can be no negotiation. They would betray the sanctions the moment our ships broke atmo. The only choice was which lives would be lost, and I can live with them over the alternative. I have no remorse for what I had to do.

“No,” he replied instead, holding her glare. “Before we landed, I was made aware that they claimed to have information regarding the location of the Resistance. The transportation they needed would be used to intercept you on whatever planet you’re hiding. I had to kill them all.”

“All?”

He knew with that one word that the fragile cordiality that had miraculously developed between them on Kamino would be irrevocably shattered. Her eyes hardened as she stared at him as if he were... a creature in a mask, a murderous snake, a monster.

“I couldn’t let them find you,” he whispered. His eyes begged her for understanding, but her eyes flared with enmity.

“Then you shouldn’t have put a five million credit bounty on my head!” He winced as she screamed at him, the darkness suffocating the Force around them. He braced himself for the fight it would inevitably devolve into. He rolled his shoulder on his wounded side, assessing his strength in anticipation.

“Please, Rey, I had no choice,” his voice broke as he pleaded with the mask of darkness on her face.

“Stop saying that,” she growled. “You did have a choice. You could have not put a bounty on me or my friends... on your own mother. You could have chosen not to ‘kill them all.’ What does that mean? How many of them?”

He closed his eyes so he wouldn't have to witness the emotions in hers. “I think I was clear enough the first time.”
Her uneasiness and disappointment shuddered through the bond. Part of him wished she had never healed him. He could have died content, believing that she didn't hate him. “What about the ones that didn’t go to Mandalore?”

“I did not go to Mandalore. Hux had intel that the situation on Concordia was under control. It was supposed to be an information-seeking mission while his troops quelled the rebellion on Mandalore as necessary,” he replied, working his jaw in agitation. “His intel was wrong. It was not under control. I was forced to eliminate the problem on Concordia. I meant it when I said all of them.”

“What about the women and the children?” Her voice pleaded with him to deny what she knew to be true. He ran his hands upward over his face and clenched them in his hair in frustration.

_I had to. They used them against us. Some lured the troopers into an ambush by feigning surrender. Some were strapped with thermal detonators and thrown into our ranks like garbage. Children barely old enough to stand took up blaster rifles against us. Why do you think I was injured? I let my guard down, I never thought a child..._

_This wasn’t how war was supposed to be. They screamed their propaganda like the little brainwashed soldiers they had become. They had all become soldiers. They had to be eliminated like soldiers. The Concordians were raised to desire two things: credits and watching the galaxy burn. There was no saving them. If I left anyone alive, they would have killed the Mandalorians, the Resistance, anyone who stood in their way. They all knew your whereabouts. I had to kill them all._

“What do you think Luke would have done?” he asked bitterly. “Killing children for the sake of the galaxy? Certainly, he would have approved; he did try to kill his own nephew. Unfortunately for you, he wasn’t as thorough as I am. I did what I had to do. I would do whatever was necessary to protect you.”

“No, you don't get to bring Luke into this – ”

“– Don't I? He is your master, after all –”

“– And don’t you dare put a massacre on my hands, Supreme Leader!”

“Rey, they would have killed your friends,” he reasoned in desperation to drive away the darkness.
“If I let them go, they would have found you all or traded information of your whereabouts to the highest bidder. Believe it or not, there are much worse organizations than the First Order in the galaxy.”

She was quiet a moment, and he thought she understood, but the wave of darkness that crashed over the bond convinced him otherwise. “Did you kill them?”

“No all.”

“A child?” She stumbled on her words as she forced them from her lips. She cringed as she spoke, and he knew she was reluctant to hear the answer. Not nearly as reluctant as he was to tell her. He puffed out his cheeks, refusing to meet her pleading stare. The best he could do was nod. Her voice broke as she asked, “Why?”

“I told you –”

“Your brainwashed stormtroopers could have done it,” her tone sharpened as she spoke. “Or the red-headed general. Or some superweapon on the Finalizer. Why did you kill them?”

He leveled a bitter stare into her fierce eyes. “Why wouldn’t I?” I’m a monster.

“That’s not an answer!” she shot back. Neither had a lightsaber, but they were dueling, injuring each other all the same. Kylo could feel the darkness flooding his own veins. He didn’t care to fight it any longer.

“What do you want me to say? That is what I am, all I know how to be. It’s all I’m good at,” he growled harshly, his resentment getting the better of him. She hated him, what did he care if she hated him more? He would give her a good reason to hate him. “It is the only thing that makes sense anymore. It makes me feel alive.” First, he felt the overwhelming darkness. Her darkness. Then he felt the Force spike as Rey’s quarterstaff landed in her hand. Before he could react, the staff connected with his upper abdomen. He hissed as a sharp pain radiated from his ribs. She cried out, and he realized with a slight satisfaction that an identical pain must be spreading across her own abdomen.

“What is wrong with you!” she screamed.
He tried to appeal to her logic. “What would you have done?”

She ignored his question. “I can't believe I almost….” she caught herself before she finished. He could sense her preparing to strike again. His hand shot out and he summoned the z6 riot control baton from one of the armed troopers in the room. Her staff connected with the baton as it sparked to life.

He held his hand out to the two stormtroopers as he held off her assault with the other. “You will leave this room and forget about this woman and our conversation.” In his distraction, she thrust the staff through his defenses and hit him in his wounded side. He grit his teeth through the pain, closing his eyes to suppress the nausea. He ducked as he sensed a warning in the Force.

The staff barely missed his head. He shoved her back roughly with the Force, enough to give him the opportunity to stand. The woman truly was a walking contradiction as much as he was. She called him a liar one moment then offered him her hand the next. She tossed him his grandfather's lightsaber to save himself from the guard, then summoned it to kill him after he had bared his soul to her. She had screamed at him that she wanted him to die in her temple room, then begged him not to jump on Kamino. Now she was driving her weapon into the very wound she had been desperate to treat herself.

“No! You killed innocents! Children! You did it because you enjoyed it! You're just like your grandfather!” My grandfather? She swung the staff low and nearly knocked him off his feet. “I thought you had changed! You created the clones! You gave me the vial to end it all! You said you wanted to leave the First Order! Why is it every time you start finding your way back to the light, you do the most evil thing you can think of to prove everyone wrong!”

Her well-practiced strikes came in quick succession; his exhausted muscles could barely maneuver the baton to block each swipe. Not that he was incapable of drawing enough strength from the darkness to give himself a better chance at fighting her, but he was more concerned with concentrating on the growing darkness he sensed inside her. His intuition blared alarms that whatever he sensed in her was dangerous, but he couldn’t determine why.

He found that it took little mental effort to block each strike, but it was more than guidance from the Force. This was the bond. It reminded him of the throne room. Every move he made was countered perfectly by her, and then his weapon landed in the precise location in the precise movement to match her thrust. There had been a time when he could anticipate the moves of the two other students he was closest to in the Jedi academy – it was still painful, still too real, to give life to their names – but it had been nothing like this. In those days, he learned quickly from their fighting style and overpowered them. Rey, however, would always be his equal.

The fluidity and efficiency of their moves was not anticipation after years of practice, it was almost… precognition. Somehow, he knew exactly where her blade would be. It was a well-practiced dance that was new to them both. Though he barely had the strength to physically wield the baton, he had little fear that she would find him wanting. He was there to meet every strike as if he were a part of her, and she met his every parry as if she were a part of him. It wasn’t a perfect stalemate, however, the weapons were mismatched and he was less limber on his injured side. When a well-timed thrust of the end of her staff connected with his chest, she winced in pain and he decided he’d had enough. He threw the baton to the side, manipulating the Force to freeze her arm mid-swing.

“Stop!” He held his hands up, palms out, as on offer of truce. “Please!”

Her eyes burned with contempt as she struggled against his oppressive hold. The depth of the darkness he sensed intensifying inside her startled him. She was nearly pure light; that level of darkness in her was impossible, yet he could feel its cold grasp twist through the bond, overpowering her. There was something oddly terrifying in his awareness. The longer they were connected, the more darkness he felt. It had to be their bond.

Why can’t you see, I did this for you? If I didn’t issue the bounty, Hux would have, and he would not have specified them as “capture only.” And I had to eliminate the Concordians. They had no desire for order or peace. They only want to destroy, and they had their sights set on you. What did you expect me to do? Sit by as leader of the Known Galaxy and allow them to take you?

Before he could find the words to express his thoughts, Rey summoned the strength to break through his hold. Instead of manipulating the Force again, he threw the weapon to the floor. He stood open and defenseless to her attack. He closed himself off from their bond, testing whether it would affect their shared pain. The only sound in the room was their heavy breaths and the steady drip of blood leaking from his reopened wound.

“Pick it up,” she demanded, gesturing to the baton. “Fight me!” It was an echo of their first argument after Crait.

“No.” He turned, searching through a cabinet for more Bacta pads to re-dress his wound. He knew how it incited her when he turned his back on her, but he did it anyway. He dared her to summon her blaster again. Instead, he sensed the movement of her staff as she swung it down upon him. It connected with the back of his shoulders, but it did little to incapacitate him, not with the adrenaline still hurtling through his veins. On her next swing, he pivoted and easily caught it. He grasped it tightly as she tried to wrench it away. Towering over her, intimidating only in his stature. He knew his face was twisted in misery, his weakness evident as his body trembled fiercely.

"Let go!" she growled through gritted teeth. “Let me end this.” As profoundly as he wanted to rip it away, dare her to raise a blaster on him again, he’d had enough of that hell for one day. Kylo had no doubt she could kill him with a well-placed strike to the head – she was proficient enough with the weapon – but that sounded like a more peaceful way to die than another blaster wound. He released his grasp on the staff and stepped back, still within the staff’s range but far enough for her to easily see his face.

“Do it. The traitor isn't here to fight for your honor this time.” Was it foolish to further incite her? Likely. But he had been backed into a corner, defending himself, his entire life. If this was what she wanted, then he would make it worth it.

Without hesitation, she thrust the staff into his abdomen. He doubled over as the impact forced the air from his lungs. The world around him whited-out for a moment as the blinding pain overshadowed all else. When he regained awareness, he was collapsing to the floor. She stood over him, unfazed. As he had predicted, the closed-off connection had prevented not only emotional feeling from traveling across the bond, but physical as well.

Kylo remained on his knees, head bowed, focused on centering his breathing rather than responding with the impulsive aggression that bubbled just below the surface. He could hurt her; the darkness called him to end the fight quickly with violence. It would be so easy. Instead, he did what he had done from the moment they met: he weathered the pain she had inflicted upon him.

Her eyes were fixed upon his stilled form; he could feel them burning into him, but he refused to return her glare: “You see me for what I am. Is this it, then? Is this when you’ve finally lost hope in me?” he asked through rasped breaths. It was everything he had convinced himself he wanted. From the moment he met her, he wanted her – the physical embodiment of hope – to see exactly who he was. He wanted her to see why he had become the monster she hated. If she still held contempt for him then, perhaps it would have been easier to let go of the dream that had haunted him his entire life. There were moments when he thought she might have seen him for what he had become, and still understood him. He thought maybe the dream was real. He was wrong.

To believe she finally lost hope in him – knowing him, yet deeming him broken beyond repair – ripped him apart in ways he had never imagined. The façade of the Supreme Leader fell away momentarily as tears stung his tired eyes – born of a lifetime of suffering and delivering suffering onto others. Kneeling at her feet, he lifted his head to meet her glare as the bond rippled with hatred. No, not hatred, he realized as he searched her eyes. Disappointment.
It immediately reminded him of their brief connection on Crait. He had been on his knees before her then as well, but he had been lost – weak and defeated – as he had stared up her, begging her to explain why she had betrayed him like the others. In those moments of hollow brokenness after finding his father’s dice, he supposed he would have gone with her if she had asked him. But she didn’t want him like he wanted her; she had shut him out instead. He had been unbalanced then, after nearly killing her and his mother in his anger. He had been shattering under the weight of what he had done.

But not this time. This time he would not beg; he would feel no remorse for doing what was necessary to save her life. She had no qualms over him killing his own master for her – his only father figure for the last six years, someone he was loyal to and sacrificed everything for, someone whom he had thought actually believed in him – but evidently a village of militant terrorists was too far for her when it came to saving her life. Clearly, she had no idea what he had done before.

Standing above him, her eyes may have reminded him of the ones on Crait, but he sensed the same conflict in her as he had on Starkiller as he lay supine, blood staining the surrounding snow. She was contemplating whether to strike him down. He held her stare. He would not make it easy for her. She searched for something in his eyes – something redeeming, he supposed – but he knew she wouldn’t find it.

It was too late. The boy he was before died long ago at a burning temple. All that was left was the monster they all feared. He had gone too far to turn back and not far enough to let go. As long as he was bonded to her, the anchor from her light dragged him away from the darkness, but as long as she was bonded to him, the anchor from his darkness dragged him toward it. The peace Snoke promised did not exist.

“Do it,” he said. “This will never end. Peace is a lie, there will be no peace. Not for me, and as long as you’re bonded to me, not for you either.”

Blue – who had been quiet in the wake of their fight – rolled forward between Rey and Kylo. The droid begged her not to hurt him, as if Kylo was someone worth saving. Her eyes flashed down to the droid, but the pleas fell on deaf ears. He could feel her darkness and the warnings in the Force. Rey shut her eyes and shook her head, and it could have been in response to what he said. But he felt that odd awareness again as if she was fighting against something he couldn’t see. When she reopened her eyes, he recognized the conflict within them well.

“You should have just let me go,” he whispered. Kylo awaited another strike of her staff, the energized beam of a blaster, a wave of Force crashing upon him – the judgment he deserved for his crimes – but it never came. The darkness in her eyes faded enough for the golden flecks to return; there was still a fire in them, a ferocity, but it wasn’t the cruelty of the darkness. A lone tear was hastily swiped away, and she tossed her staff aside. His throat tightened. He wouldn’t feel remorse. She could hate him, but he wouldn’t regret saving her from their wrath.
“Why!” she screamed, turning from him to cry out into the room. “Why can’t I be what they want me to be! Why can’t I kill you!” He bowed his head as the Force vibrated around them, choosing not to further witness the disappointment in her eyes as she faded away across the galaxy. The tightness in his throat only intensified. He refused to feel remorse. Refused.

Chapter End Notes

Violence

Rey and Kylo fight. Rey is not nice in her darkness. This will be a common theme in the next few chapters. Don't listen to the darkness, kids.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo closed his eyes as he sat alone in the medbay, floating in a state between consciousnesses and oblivion. There was a med-droid hovered beside him, silent as she stabbed another injector into his wounded side. At least the droid didn't question how he had reopened the wound. There was another flash of pain as the droid cauterized the wound, but he was too distracted by reanalyzing the fight with Rey to focus on it.

It didn’t make sense. He wasn’t angry with her for what she had done, but he was more concerned with the darkness he had sensed in her. Was it him? Was it their bond? Had he done this to her? Or, was it something else? Was it Luke twisting her thoughts? He had sensed the height of her darkness on Starkiller, but that was nothing like he felt in her as she contemplated killing him moments prior. How was that possible? How could someone so good have a darkness that rivaled even Sidious? It shouldn’t have surprised him, he conceded. Luke had always said, "powerful light, powerful darkness." She was strong and powerful in ways he had never witnessed before, her light purer than anything he had ever felt. Certainly, her darkness would be as well.

This darkness was what he had wanted from the moment they had first met, when she immediately tried to kill him. Wasn’t it? Her strength of light and moments of darkness intrigued him, and he only wished for her to stop lying to herself and embrace it. She was in every way his equal, she could challenge him in ways no one else could. But this? This was different, and he couldn’t determine why – not until he read that text and witnessed that vision. The Force had warned him, and the historical text had shown him what would happen if she fell. It wasn’t the fantasy he’d had of her joining him.

Kylo saw the truth of it already; she was not Rey like that. Since Crait, he had seen brief moments of Rey, of her forgiveness, compassion, and hope, but then the darkness dragged her under its control again. She could fall; could become him. He found he didn’t want that. No matter how far he had fallen, no matter how profoundly he still wished she had joined him, he knew what the darkness would do to her. With the threat of Sidious’s return, it only bolstered his resolve. It was too late for him, but he couldn’t allow what he had endured at the hands of Sidious to happen to her as well.

“Ren!” his general's harsh voice sliced through the silence. The clicking of boots echoed down the corridor toward him. Blue shuddered in fear at the anger in his voice, rolling away to hide in the corner. Kylo groaned, pinching the bridge of his nose. He reluctantly opened his eyes, forcing himself back to reality as Hux burst into the room in his typical melodramatic style. Kylo's hand shifted to his belt instinctively as he noticed the bright red hue of his general's face. “What have you done!”
“Isn’t that the question of the day,” he answered dryly, too exhausted to be offended by Hux’s boldness. The general vibrated in fury, his bright blue eyes alight with an intensity that bordered on homicidal. If Hux was Force-sensitive, Kylo had no doubt the Force would be tightening around his throat. “I am assuming this is concerning your failure on Concordia? They lied about the location.”

“Concor... What? Yes...No,” he spat. “Arkanis!”

_Ah, yes. The weapons test has been successful, then._

Kylo had gone into battle on no sleep, fought in said battle, probed a man’s mind, been shot, survived, and endured a fight with Rey. Kylo didn’t know if he had the strength to weather anything else, especially from a man that made him consider murder every time he entered the same room.

Who cares about your useless planet when Rey...

No, he wouldn't allow her to dominate his thoughts, even as the agitation grew. Nothing made sense anymore. He wanted to unleash the anger built inside him, scream, destroy, tear the room apart. Perhaps a game of wills with Hux _was_ the perfect distraction. “Did it fail?”

Hux could only stutter and huff in response. “What!”

“Did... it... fail,” he sighed. “Pay attention, General. I can repeat the words, but I can’t understand them for you.”

“The entire planet has been reduced to ash!”

“I don't understand,” he said with feigned ignorance. “It was merely a very, very thorough weapons test on an abandoned Imperial Academy. If it was a success, then why are you here?” He lit the fuse and waited, curious about what would happen when Hux exploded. To his general's credit, he had much greater restraint than Kylo. The next few words were mostly incoherent sputters and curse words in several languages, some of which were surprisingly creative. Kylo cleared his throat to suppress a chuckle. His general interpreted it as disapproval and composed himself, his disciplined calm quickly returning, before he noticed the flash of amusement in Kylo's eyes. The redness returned as his temper flared.
“Are you an idiot or just insane?” his general screamed, regaining his ability to articulate words. Hux vibrated with rage, hands clenched tightly in fists at his side. Kylo felt a slight twitch of a smirk on the corner of his lips as the other man realized what he had asked him. Hux rolled his eyes and scoffed. “Don't answer that; it would be an insult to both idiots and the insane.”

“Young hostility is unbecoming, General,” Kylo warned, his voice wavering with a laugh that threatened to break through his defenses. “It was abandoned, correct? You wouldn’t have begun operations again against my orders, would you?” He attempted to harden his increasingly amused expression into impassivity – a task more difficult than he was accustomed to without the aid of his mask. The mask, however, was across the room, any access was blocked by his general.

The man before him desperately struggled to temper his fury, shaking furiously. Kylo hummed thoughtfully. He appreciated the unusual role reversal. “We had to relocate the training facilities from the Supremacy until the reconstruction was finished!”

“Did you? Fascinating. As Supreme Leader, I presumed –wrongly– that I would have been made aware of such decisions. If only I had known...” He spoke slowly, channeling his best imitation of Snoke while holding Hux's glare imperiously. The Force pulsed around him in power and control. “I must be going insane,” he chuckled darkly. “Because I was under the impression I had made it clear that the stormtrooper training program was to be terminated.” His stomach rolled, bile creeping up his throat as he realized just how much he sounded like his former master. He hated it.

The general snorted derisively. “In favor of what? Clones?”

“If it was?”

His general was, if nothing else, perceptive. “I knew you agreed to that diplomatic Kamino trip too readily. You solicited their Clone technologies.” It was not a question.

“If I did?”

“Pray tell, Supreme Leader, who would you clone to create an entire army? Yourself? Me?” Kylo shuddered at the thought of millions of Hux clones terrorizing him. It would be his own personal Hell. “Sidious? Or maybe the Jedi girl; she’s powerful enough to defeat you, after all.”

“Enough.”
“What do you plan to do for the next ten years while the clones are developed?” Hux had reassumed his haughty and condescending tone, stepping closer to Kylo in confidence. With only a little more than a meter between the two men, Kylo stood. When he was seated for the droid's medical treatment, the closer proximity would have forced him to tilt his head up to meet the general's stare. He would have none of that.

“Technology has advanced greatly since the Clone Wars, General. They have developed the ability to splice DNA of non-human species into the clone DNA, resulting in non-human life cycles. These clones reach adult size and mental capacity within weeks rather than years. And clones no longer require extensive training. Due to new clone development procedures, they can be 'programmed', if you will, subconsciously with all the propaganda and training you waste years on with your recruits. It only takes weeks for them to develop muscle memory with physical training. It is more efficient in every way.”

“You destroyed my father's legacy. For clones...”

“If his legacy was that important to you, perhaps you shouldn't have killed him,” Kylo replied flatly.

Hux’s eyes grew wide before he stammered. “How did you...”

“You may be resistant to persuasion, but your thoughts are loud,” Kylo said, allowing Hux to insinuate what he would. “Regardless, I did you a favor. If it wasn't us, it would have been the Resistance. This is why Snoke believed in a mega-class dreadnought instead of a planet as our headquarters. The moment we take permanent residence on a planet, we open the First Order to attack. The Resistance does not need the morale boost this bombing would have provided them. It had to be done.”

With that, he pushed past his general, grabbed his helmet and stepped out into the corridor. “Blue!” he shouted, and the droid skidded around the corner to follow him.

He felt... more stable after his discussion with Hux. After what he witnessed on Concordia and the resulting fight with Rey, it was a relief to have some control again.

“Ren, this conversation is not over,” Hux began but Kylo would have none of his insubordination.
“Isn’t it?” His tone was curt as he turned to stare down the general until he lowered his eyes submissively. Both men knew Kylo would use the Force if necessary, so the general reluctantly surrendered. “Your stormtrooper program has been terminated in favor of a clone army. End of discussion. Have your men prepare my ship.”

“Where are you going, now?” Hux shouted as he stormed down the corridor.

“Taris.”

Hux apparently lacked self-preservation instincts, because he was stomping after him. “What is on Taris?”

Kylo sighed, disappointed to hear his general still on his heels. “Did you not specify that we lost contact with a freighter outside Taris?”

“We haven’t even talked about Concordia; are you certain they had the wrong location?” he panted breathlessly, falling into stride next to him. Kylo cursed that Hux was also tall; it made it easier for the irritating man to keep pace with him. When Kylo ignored him, he continued, “I have men who will handle the issue on Taris, Supreme Leader, as they did on Mandalore and Felucia.”

He focused on his breathing to avoid Force-shoving Hux into a wall. “And I told you I will handle Taris.”

“You are the Supreme Leader!”

“You have a remarkable grasp of the obvious, General.”

“It is not your role to fight,” Hux seethed. “You are needed here. As the head of the First Order, it is your duty to – ”

Kylo stepped in front of him, turning to block the general with his solid frame. He gradually increased pressure through the Force around Hux's throat as a threat. “Are you allergic to common sense, General?”
“Curious assertion, coming from you,” he rasped.

“Compliance, then?” Kylo placed the helmet over his head as Hux’s nose wrinkled with disgust. “Let me make this clear. I say when the discussion is over. I do not appreciate insubordination.” The weight of the helmet and the medication made him lightheaded for a moment, but he refused to show such weakness before his general. Grasping onto the Force, he used the power of the darkness to regain his strength. “Prepare my ship. End of discussion.”

Still Hux persisted. “If the rebels of the galaxy discovered the Supreme Leader was fighting without the protection of a Star Destroyer, it would be the perfect opportunity to ambush you. It is the opportunity the Resistance has no doubt been waiting for. And what would the First Order do in the wake of your death in an unnecessary battle?”

“If I am killed,” Kylo said, his tone leaving no room for argument. “The throne will be bequeathed to the next highest-ranking official.”

“You have no admiral! You refuse to promote...” Hux paused, sputtering as he realized what Kylo had insinuated. “But that would be – ”

He pushed past him toward the hangar. “– you,” Kylo finished for him, taking full advantage of the general's shock.

“I would like to go on record stating that the Supreme Leader engaging in an irrelevant battle is a foolish decision!” Hux shouted after him.

“Noted,” Kylo growled back without breaking his stride.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
---CHAPTER 38---
Rey stormed down the corridor, not particularly concerned with where she was going, as much as what she was fleeing from. She had sat in her room for far too long, the vial he had trusted to her in hand, debating whether she would continue to hide it, destroy its contents, or bring it to Leia. In her pathetic weakness, she had hidden it again. She was keeping secrets from the Resistance, just as she had with Luke.

_And that turned out great, didn’t it?_

She still had half a mind to stomp back to her room, grab the vial and hand it over. She could wash her hands of Kylo and his evil. Because it was becoming clear that, for whatever reason, she couldn't kill him herself. She could almost feel the Force stay her hand as she raised her weapon against him. He complicated their interactions further by refusing to fight her. What was she supposed to do with an enemy who refused to behave like an enemy?

Neither was he an ally, however, or any other naïve label she would find herself considering in moments of weakness. She _agonized_ over their connection, but she doubted he even thought of her when they were apart. He claimed everything from a massacre to signing her own death warrant was necessary, but she did not foolishly accept his excuses. She believed the truth was much more self-serving. Kylo had proven to her that he only cared about one thing: power. And, as her enemy, he had every reason to lie to her. Those things he said to her in vulnerable moments, they were all part of his plans to seduce her to darkness. She had felt him entering her mind, attempting to control her before the voice in the Force warned her.

_And it almost worked. What was I thinking?_ There was a small voice inside her, begging her to see the truth, but Rey knew the truth. _He’s a murderer!_

It was simple. Rey wouldn’t turn over the vial, because it would cause more problems between her and the Resistance. She would focus her energy on ending the bond and stopping Kylo Ren and the First Order. It was what she should have done from the beginning, but instead, she had distanced herself from her friends. She had kept them at arm’s length, only allowing them to know her superficially. Rey had always wanted a family, but allowing people in to see the _real_ her was more terrifying than she had imagined. What if they abandoned her? Finn was her rock, the closest person she had ever had to family, yet he only knew the Rey that she showed the rest of the galaxy. They knew the strong-willed, resourceful fighter that defeated Kylo Ren, the stubborn but also forgiving and hopeful woman.

There was another woman underneath, however. She was lonely, uncertain, and quick to temper. She didn't trust anyone, and was so afraid that her friends would leave her if they could see inside her mind. Deep down, she still longed for the love of her family. She was still the same little girl from Jakku. She knew that. Because of the knowledge the bond afforded him, Kylo had never let her forget it, had never allowed her to be the front she presented to everyone else. And when he didn't condemn her for it, but acted like he understood, she found herself trusting him to know her on a deeper level than anyone had ever known her before. The only person she found she could be herself with, truly be herself, was her enemy. It would only end terribly. She was waiting for a man who would never come back to the light.

It wasn’t the first time she had been a fool, she supposed, for she also waited nearly fifteen years for a family who would never return to her. She had trusted people who never wanted her. And just like them, Kylo had done it too. He had thrown her away in the throne room. He chose galactic domination over her, he continued to choose it. Not that she blamed him; she was nothing. Who could ever love someone like her?

Her feet led her up the temple steps and out into the warm Barkhesh air before she considered her destination. She threw herself down onto the stone in a huff; she was angry at him and the Force and herself. She craved him like she craved her parents, and no matter how hard she tried, she couldn't let go. It would have been easy if her only draw to him was in denial. Though the longing for both was the same, there was something more profound drawing her to him. The call within her had tried to show her the truth about her parents, but she had refused it. The truth the call inside tried to show her about Kylo was the opposite. It called for her to see the light within him, but that call inside her was wrong. She would have been lost to his lies if it weren’t for the whispers of the Force.

As Rey sat on the temple steps, the darkness of Barkhesh surrounded her. The nightmares would be relentless if she tried to sleep, but she found comfort in the darkness. The predictable invariability of the dark sky was soothing. She wished she had kept track of the number of sleepless nights on Jakku she spent gazing up at the endless expanse of stars. These stars were not the same old friends that she had known on Jakku, but they were beginning to become familiar. The nights on Barkhesh were still spent troubled and desperate for sleep. The cold emptiness of the long dark was still as lonely as ever. The confinement of one planet was traded for another. At least here, she had her friends.

Her mind wandered to Kylo, again. She was still angry with him, but the darkness was fading, leaving only her actions in its wake. The moment she found him crumpled in the corridor replayed like an echo in her mind. She had been terrified; she remembered the agony she felt at almost losing him, the relief she felt when she saved him. How had that devolved into nearly killing him? Because he killed villagers? He had done it before. Was the disappointment she felt that he hadn’t changed as she had hoped enough to consider something she knew in her heart she didn’t want? Did she want it? She didn’t know anymore. She didn’t know who she was; she didn’t know which thoughts were own. Who should she listen to? The voice inside her? The voice in the Force? Him? He told her himself that the whispers in the Force were right, that it was too late for him, that she should let him go.

Rey swiped at her exhausted eyes to erase the evidence of her tears; she’d cried enough over that stupid man to last a lifetime. She stared up at the stars and wondered where he was, what he was doing, if he was thinking of her, too. The lost boy who was lost somewhere in the great vastness of the galaxy. It seemed fitting. She wondered if he was gazing up at the stars on his side of the Why would he ever care for a girl like you? The Force whispered around her. He is the Supreme Leader, son of Han Solo and Leia Organa, grandson of the Chosen One... And you are a nobody... He doesn’t care... He will continue to kill and destroy because he is evil... He wants to be evil... He will never let you stand in his way... You must destroy him.

Rey wrapped herself in darkness until it numbed away the pain. A mechanical whirring disrupted the silence of the night. She turned to see the joyful astromech droid emerging from the shadows. He never failed to put a smile on her face, as did his master. For once, she was happy for the company.

“Hey!” Rey laughed, running her hands spherical surface of the astromech droid as he bumped into her side. “How’s the antenna holding up?” The droid responded in chipper beeps of binary. Rey loved Beebee-Ate. He was sweet, honest, and uncomplicated, like Blue. She wondered if Blue hated her for what she had almost done, or if he would forgive her the way he forgave Kylo for everything evil he had done. She wondered if Blue and Beebee would care that they were on opposite sides of a war. Could the droids see past the lines drawn in the sand, even if their masters couldn’t?

“He likes you,” a warm, friendly voice said behind her.

“Hey... Poe,” she said. He sat down next to her, smiling in his cocky, charismatic way. He was easy to talk to, but she supposed everyone thought of him that way; it was just who he was. There was a reason he was second-in-command. He was quick with a story, or a joke, or a game of sabacc to lift anyone’s spirits, but tonight was different. He was far more friendly than usual. Rey had been around enough lowlifes at Niima Outpost to recognize alcohol on someone’s breath. Poe Dameron was most definitely inebriated.

Celebration or sorrow? she wondered.

“I’m serious, Beebee-Ate likes you,” he admired. She knew how close he was to the astromech droid. For Poe to offer such kind words stirred a joy inside her that brightened her mood. He smiled at her again, and it earned him a genuine smile in return. His eyes were burning embers as he stared into hers. He had a way of making her feel special that made her feel anxious – a good anxious.

“I like him, too,” she said brightly, patting the droid fondly. “He’s the reason I left Jakku.” She was grateful to no longer be under the control of Plutt, but some days she wished she had run away on Takodana and never been found by Kylo. She would never have been involved in a war that had nothing to do with her in the first place.

“Well, Beebee-Ate is very particular about the people he likes, so that says a lot about you.”

Rey scrunched her nose. The droid was the friendliest droid she had ever met, he loved everyone. “Is that so?” she asked the droid, who responded in more cheerful, affirmative beeps. Poe smiled warmly at their interaction. When his eye caught hers, a new emotion flashed across them. There was a hunger in his eyes that she had seen in men before.

It made her feel… wanted. Instead of further pondering the reason behind the thunderous beat of her heart in her chest, her mind unhelpfully supplied the strange conversation she had overheard earlier that day, and the lie Poe had told her about being alone in the room, but the fire in his eyes made her worries seem foolish and insignificant. The fine hairs on the back of her neck stood on end. Rey wanted to stand, to put space between them, but she convinced herself the strange feeling was due to the foreign nature of it all. She hadn’t grown up as they had; everything was new to her. She forced herself not to flinch when his hand rested on hers.

Has he been sitting this close the whole time?

His hand twitched as if he didn't know what to do with it now that he touched her skin. He seemed as nervous as she was, but that was silly; Poe was never nervous. “How are you?” he asked quietly.

_The truth? Kylo is my bondmate. I saw a vision of a future with him that I can't let go. He almost died. I saved him. I thought he would turn, but then I found out he had committed a massacre. I was angry, obviously, and I almost killed him. Now I can't stop thinking about it. About him. Did I fail by listening to the whispers? Or did I fail by not killing him? Either way, it would make me a terrible person, wouldn't it? So not great. But other than that..._*

“I’m fine.”

His eyes studied her as she was lost to her thoughts about someone she shouldn’t have been thinking of, not when there was someone there – someone who wanted to be there – to ease her loneliness. She wanted to belong; it shouldn’t matter with whom. Poe was a good guy. With resolution, she met his questioning stare. Poe's eyes were not haunted and conflicted as Kylo’s, but they were just as predatory. Her stomach tightened involuntarily, and she glanced away.

“No, I mean it,” he said seriously. “How are you? The rest of us have been jaded by the stress of war, but you were just thrown into it. After everything that happened – and as the last remaining Force user in this war – it must be difficult.” She couldn't help but find his comment silly. Of course, she wasn't the last Force user; she was reminded of that every day. There was Leia, of course, but she had all but forsaken the Force. And Luke wasn’t really gone. But even if there were no more Jedi, there was still a very strong Force user who she was convinced could change the tide of this war if he would just turn like she believed he would.

“Well, I’m not the last one,” she joked. He smiled, but his eyes didn’t.

“Well, I’m not the last one,” she joked. He smiled, but his eyes didn’t.

“Soon,” he whispered, “you will be.” If she was uncertain of her feelings about Kylo’s death before, she couldn't ignore the way his comment sickened her. She would swear up and down that she wanted him dead, but hearing it from someone else felt desperately wrong. There was no denying the nausea that tightened in her throat.

Why?

A defiant tear fell down her cheek. He studied her quizzically, and fear shivered down her spine.
“I’m sorry; you’re right. I’m just so lonely. With no other Force users left, I feel like an outsider,” she prevaricated, hoping it was a believable explanation for her tears. Though it wasn’t the reason for her tears, it wasn’t a lie. Poe had already reacted strangely to her admission that Kylo hadn't hurt her when he invaded her mind; she didn't need to provide him with more reasons to suspect her dishonesty.

“You’re not an outsider,” he said gently, tightening his grip on her hand and wrapping his other arm around her shoulder. His touch did not ignite a warmth within her, but it didn't terrify her, either. Despite his inebriation, his kindness made her feel special for a moment, like she meant more to people than her power. Perhaps he thought of her as more than a friend, or perhaps he was just drunk. Offworlders had often tried to be “kind” to Rey after they had imbibed. But Poe had made her feel special since the moment they first met.

If Poe continued to touch her, maybe she wouldn't pull away. Maybe she would let him show her what shared loneliness was like. He wouldn't become attached, and neither would she. If he left her, it would be okay. Maybe he was the perfect man for her – someone she could trust with physical intimacy, but also someone she would never have to worry about falling for. Maybe it would break the treasonous spell her enemy seemed to hold her under that wouldn’t allow her to let him go. His eyes traveled over her, and she shivered, though not from the cool night air around them.

In a moment of weakness, she decided to let him in. “Thank you, Poe, but some days, I just don’t feel like I belong here.” It was a sentiment that had been true every day since she joined the Resistance. She wondered if she would ever find her belonging there. She loved them dearly, but she was not one of them.

“Where else would you belong?” he asked casually, though his eyes were more concentrated on lewdly roving over her body than her confession. If it were possible to remove clothes with his eyes, he would have done it. She felt breathtakingly out of her depth when it came to physical affection, but she wanted to be wanted, and she wanted to forget about him, if only for a moment.

“I don’t know,” she replied.

His arm wrapped around her tighter and he pulled her closer to him. “Look, when you were on world with Luke, Finn had the same concerns as you. But he found Rose, and, with her, a reason to fight. Maybe you need to find... your reason to fight.” His fingers slipped from her hand and slid under her chin. He lifted her face, and her eyes met his. She swallowed anxiously, her heart hammering in her throat. It was all so new and confusing. All the conflicting thoughts in her head weren’t helping.

I want a reason not to fight. I want Ben to end all of this.

Poe leaned closer, tightening the grip of his arm around her shoulder, so she couldn't move if she wanted to. Did she? He licked his lips, his breath, his eyes wild and dangerous. She closed her eyes. Panic tightened in her chest as she realized she felt none of the emotions she had expected to feel - that she had felt before in the hut, on Kamino, in that empty corridor, running her fingers through different dark, silky hair.

Poe was handsome, exceptionally skilled, and charming... in a roguish way. The best part was he wasn’t her sworn enemy. He was everything she should want. Yet she felt nothing she imagined she would feel, no matter how much sense it made. Poe was not the one she wanted, and the man she wanted, she couldn’t have. She could feel the heat from his lips as he drew closer. It wasn’t his lips she was imagining, however.

Ben.

Her eyes snapped open. “Poe...Poe...wait,” she whispered on his lips.

I don’t want this. I don’t want him.
It felt wrong. Rey could kiss Poe, but it would mean nothing. She wanted it to mean something. It was nice that he made her feel wanted, but she wanted to want him too. She wanted to feel a fraction of what Kylo made her feel. It was complicated and forbidden, but it was real. She prepared to voice the words aloud – the less treacherous ones, at least – but they died on her lips as she noticed the crackling in the Force.

No...no...no... please... not now.

Finn had seen Kylo during a connection; she had to assume Poe would too. What would he do? What could he do? Finn couldn’t hurt him, but the bond had grown stronger. Even if neither man could hurt the other, Kylo would undoubtedly be angry for what she had done; he could expose everything between them in spite. And Poe... he would never forgive her. If they could hurt each other, however, the outcome would be devastatingly worse. Kylo hadn’t tried to kill Finn, but he might try with Poe. And her bondmate was still wounded. Her mind immediately flashed to the blaster at Poe’s hip. Dread sank in her stomach.

I have to do something! But what?

Kiss him... the whisper echoed in the Force.

Poe was pulling away, heeding her reservations. She imagined what would happen if he turned around to discover the man appearing behind him. She grasped the front of his shirt. “Wait,” she said again. He smiled and his hand slid tenderly along her skin to cup her jaw.

“Let go,” he breathed, and she closed her eyes, perhaps if she concentrated intensely enough she could close the connection. His lips touched hers and she felt... nothing. The kiss was rough and passionless and did nothing to subdue the fear that spiraled through her. Poe must have felt the same, because he pulled away from her, confusion spreading across his face. She refused to break eye contact with Poe, lest he follow her gaze, but she didn’t need to look to know Kylo was there. The dark shape moving in the corner over Poe’s shoulder could have been none other than her bondmate.

Poe, meanwhile, was desperately searching her eyes. He must have found the unwillingness in her, because he withdrew the arm around her shoulder immediately.

“I’m sorry, Rey; I thought...” She didn’t sense hurt in his tempting brown eyes, but rather puzzlement, as if he couldn’t comprehend why she wouldn’t enjoy kissing him. The thought crossed her mind that he had never been denied before. She was relieved when he smiled reassuringly. She did not have the resolve for another confrontation.
“I’m sorry, it was a mistake...” she replied quickly. “Can you... I just need to be alone.” His brow furrowed, but he nodded once and stood. “Poe,” she said as he turned, forcing his eyes back to her. She froze, trying to think of something to say as he waited. “Thank you, for understanding.” She held eye contact with him, hoping he wouldn’t notice their enemy in the shadows, as he left in a huff of stumbling, drunk bewilderment. Rey followed him to the steps of the temple, watching him descend until he disappeared inside its belly. She sighed when he was gone. Rey was alone with her bondmate, and she had so much to tell him.

When she turned back toward him, she could sense an unbridled rage and misery that corrupted the Force around them. It was oppressive and nauseating. He was seated before some type of control panel, his eyes downcast as he busied himself flipping switches. As she stepped closer, she noticed his face was illuminated in a white glow. The room vibrated around him, and she suspected that he wasn’t in a room at all. Her fears were confirmed when he pulled sharply on a yoke in front of him. Kylo was in the cockpit of his fighter. He wasn’t wearing the cumbersome emergency atmospheric units or life-support mask used by most TIE fighters pilots. He wasn’t wearing any mask, for that matter. She noticed his eyes were glossy and his lips were quivering, and she doubted it was because of the danger he was facing.

Realistically, Rey knew he would still be angry with her for what she had done; she was still angry for what he had done. Part of her wanted to explain the contradiction between the voice inside and the voices in the Force, but could she trust his advice? Her thoughts were shaping into words on her tongue, but he spoke first.

“Poe Dameron? I wouldn’t take you for one of the women who would fawn over a man like him, but I suppose I shouldn’t be surprised.” He had attempted to sound blithe and neutral to what he had witnessed, but the underlying resentment was evident. He had fallen back on the comfortable familiarity of derisive apathy, or at least feigned apathy. Rey immediate felt hot as the rage surged from his presumptuous words.

“You know nothing of him. Or me,” she snapped. She sat down on the steps, staring up at the heavens, willing him to leave. Why did she feel so guilty? She did what was necessary to protect him, to protect them both. They had to find a better way to conceal it. There was no end to the bond in sight, and they had to learn how to control it... together. She would have told him as much if he hadn’t reacted so cruelly. A distant explosion vibrated through the bond, and she determined quickly that he must be engaged in a dog fight.

“I think you’ve forgotten that I’ve searched both of your minds.” His voice was strained, but it was that tone again, from Starkiller. Haughty and superior. You know I can take whatever I want, the echo of a memory replayed in her mind.
“And I’d appreciate if you were never in my mind... ever... again,” she spat, turning to stare at him. He would not meet her eyes, intently concentrating instead on destroying whatever obstacle to victory that lay in his path.

“Why? Afraid of what I would find? Or afraid you can't force me out when you're too preoccupied with imagining his tongue down your throat?” he sneered. His brazen animosity astonished her. He had never spoken like that to her before. She sensed an equal measure of shock from his side of the connection. Another explosion rocked the bond, and she sensed his maniacal thrill at the destruction in his wake. His emotions raged around him; profound, mercurial and unhinged. This was the man she had seen on Crait. This was Kylo betrayed.

That kiss meant more to him than it did to me.

Yes... now you see how you can truly hurt him... Tell him you enjoyed it... Lie... Crush him as he crushed you in the throne room... He will leave... the voice whispered.

Lie?

Why would the Force guide her to lie?

“You have no right to dictate my life. Go back to your side of the galaxy!” After she spoke, she knew she should deescalate the situation, before he unraveled into something dangerous, because he was clearly on an unstable and unpredictable path of certain destruction. She should talk some sense into him, but every time he opened his infuriating mouth, he reignited the fire that burned in her chest. The darkness found her in her anger, shivering through her.

In recent weeks, as she sought the comfort and strength of darkness, his side of the connection had been surprisingly lacking, but not today. He was drawing in the darkness as if it was the very oxygen he breathed. “I’m so sorry I interrupted your intimate moment together... with this Force-forsaken bond that I have absolutely no control over,” he said distractedly, his words stinging with sarcasm. His hands were calm and sure on the controls, but his voice betrayed his intrepid exterior. Several alarms blared in his cockpit. He was going to get himself killed arguing about something that meant nothing.

“I know you know how to leave. Just go! Go back across the galaxy to your throne on your giant ship and your riches and expensive food and beautiful women and everything you could ever want. Leave me here to die alone with an empty kiss on this awful planet as we quickly run out of rations while you burn down the galaxy.” Both were quiet as her words settled in the void between them. Their waves of opposing anger that had been crashing steadily into the bond slowly relented. For a moment, all that remained was the raw edges of emotional wounds. Had they searched the bond, they could have found the reflection of their own vulnerable pain in their bondmate, but instead, she grasped the familiar comfort of self-righteous indignation, and he grasped at the gratification of self-loathing misery.

“I can’t go anywhere; I’m in the Silencer, addressing a disturbance. Pirates. If you want me gone, do it yourself. You’ve done it before on Crait. While you’re at it, find a way to end this permanently.” He spoke as if he truly hated her. She studied his face. It was strange to be in his near vicinity and have his eyes focused anywhere but hers. His enigmatic stare haunted her even when they were apart. But at that moment, his attention was focused elsewhere...everywhere but on her.

Rey remembered his general telling him about a supply freight lost outside Taris. Pirates. At the time, he had instructed his general to assume it was lost. What had changed? The battle seemed complicated; his eyes steadily darted over a large field, and his gloved hands manipulated the controls in a practiced haste that suggested he was perpetually in danger. He pursed his lips as he executed a tricky maneuver, and Rey was reminded of her thoughts as Poe leaned in to kiss her. Her thoughts were of Kylo... and those expressive lips.

She was angry and disappointed beyond words with him. In her heart she had believed he was changing, then he had done something evil to prove she was wrong about him. Again. She knew she would never accept his terrible actions, she had no interest in pretending what he did was acceptable. Anyone else would have given up on him, but as deeply as she yearned to, his cruelty caused an ache in her chest that made it difficult to breathe. This was his darkness. Only then did she realize how different he had been with her. Had he given up on her/ Had he ever cared? Why couldn’t she be as apathetic to his fall as everyone else?

“You know I can’t control it like you can. Why do you do this? Why do you torture me with this bond? You ruin everything, you know that?” Her voice trembled as she tried desperately to suppress the dangerous emotions lurking just below the superficial anger she maintained as a safety net against emotional complication.

“Why do I torture you? No!” he shouted in rage. “You brought me here to torment me. You knew there would be no greater torture to me than seeing you... with him. He’s everything you want, and everything I can never be, I know that. The greatest pilot in your precious Resistance. The son my mother has always wanted. A more respected leader than I will ever be. And now, your...” lover. He refused to finish the sentence, but she heard it loud and clear in her mind. His jealousy dripped like venom from his words. He had no reason to be jealous; he didn’t want her, he only wanted to turn her. Maybe that was why he hated Poe, because it complicated his plans. She refused to look him in the eyes; she knew the misery she would find there. “This wasn’t me, Rey. You know it. Say it. Say it!”

“No! I won’t say it, because it’s not true!” She tried to find the part of her that resented him for Concordia, the part that would enjoy his suffering, but all she could find was the pain from his cold indifference toward her. He acted wounded, as if she were the one to hurt him, but he had shown her how insignificant she was to him on the Supremacy. He had killed Snoke and his guard, only to turn his back on her as if she was... nothing. He was jealous of the things Poe had, but he had thrown them away for power. “You could have had all of that, but you made your choice in the throne room!” she cried defensively. “I hope it was worth it.”

“I didn’t make a choice,” he growled through his teeth, his words seeping with betrayal. “You did.”

“There was no decision to make! I would never join you! If I end up in his arms, it is because you drove me there!”

“So you lied. It was more than an empty kiss,” he said, his voice impossibly low, trembling with emotion. His energy withdrew from the bond as distantly as possible.

“What it was is none of your concern. Just end this. Before anyone else sees you. Please!”

He still refused to look at her as he recovered from a series of banking maneuvers. “Why does it matter if they see me, Rey? I can’t hurt them.”

“Because they don’t know, and I want to keep it that way! Why do you think I kissed Poe in the first place? He would have seen you! He could have...” killed you. She nearly sobbed, nearly allowing him to see how pathetically significant he still was to her. Darkness soothed the anger overwhelming her senses.

“Who in the Resistance knows about us – you and I?” It was astonishing how swiftly Kylo could vacillate between responses of anger, misery, contemplation, and derision. The fluctuation was as unpredictable as Kylo himself.

“There is no ‘you and I,’” she snapped. “Only Finn knows about the bond, because he saw you. And Chewie because he brought me to the Supremacy. And Luke, if that counts.”

His tone was pensive, and she sensed grief and regret in his spiraling emotions. “Chewie willingly brought you to me... to the *Supremacy? Why?”

Because he believed in you, as I did. Even after the evil you’ve done. But we were wrong.
Her voice was sharp and derisive. “Why don't you come home and ask him?”

“What about General Organa?” He asked casually as if she were not the woman who had given birth to him. “You haven’t told her?”

“Your mother?” She smiled mockingly as he worked his jaw in agitation. “No.”

“No?”

“I haven’t mentioned it.” She turned away, so he wouldn't see the insecurity in her eyes. He knew what Rey feared – if she told Leia, and she turned her back on her, then it was just more proof that she would never be good enough. “But we still talk,” she said defensively. “She has told me about you and her relationship with your father, and even told me the history of your grandfather and the Skywalkers. The true history. She has done everything to make me feel welcomed here. She is the strongest, wisest, kindest person I know; she is too good to me to burden her with knowledge of this awful bond. She doesn’t need more heartbreak in her life; she doesn’t need to know.” Rey didn't know why she had revealed that to him. He didn't deserve it. Perhaps he would even use it against them, but she wanted him to know what he had left behind. “She is the most selfless person I have ever met, and she doesn’t deserve any more heartache.”

“Of course, she is,” he said petulantly. “I'll have to take your word for it; I wouldn't know. That woman is a stranger to me.”

Rey narrowed her eyes in disgust. “Whose fault is that?”

“Ah, yes. You ‘know everything you need to know about me.’”

“Oh, for Force sake, she's your mother! She is a stranger because you left her!” She had told herself she wouldn't shout at him again; it drew too much attention. Yet her voice once again echoed across the valley. She had to give him credit – he knew exactly how to set her off.

“I suppose you're right; I am to blame, because I was not the son she wanted. But, make no mistake, that woman and I were strangers long before I burned down Luke's temple.” Rey didn't know what to say. What could she say? She would level accusations at him, and he would agree. It was infuriating...and confusing...and, in an odd way, heartbreaking, but she figured it was his intention to confuse her. Conversations were often one complicated holochess game to him.
“But I do know one thing. You are naïve if you believe Leia doesn’t know,” he snorted. “You can't hide anything from her, trust me. And, eventually, the rest of the Resistance will discover your secret as well. You understand the gravity of this bond, do you not? This is tantamount to treason. And if you’re caught, I cannot help you.”

“I don’t need you or your help.” She regretted the cruel tone to her words as she felt their effect in the bond, but she was too furious with him to stop. He deserved to suffer for the suffering he had caused.

“No, you don't.” he said through clenched teeth. “But you need to stop lying to everyone. Tell them the truth. Explain the Force Bond; it’s for your own protection. They won’t trust you if they discover it themselves. You’re already different than them, Rey. You don’t want to give them a reason to doubt you. They’ll try to kill you, too.”

I’m sure you told the entire First Order about us, hypocrite.

“I will never tell them, especially not Poe.”

“Why?” he asked with a slight tilt to his head. “Ashamed?”

“Why?” she shouted incredulously. “Because you’re the enemy, and our bond puts the entire Resistance at risk, that’s why!”

Another explosion shuddered through the bond. “Even if I left the First Order right now, you still wouldn’t tell them, would you? You don’t want your friends knowing you’re bonded to someone like me.”

Hurt him... It is the only way he will close the bond before you’re discovered... the whispers advised.

The voice was right. He was being cruel and unreasonable, he was making her feel guilty when she had done nothing wrong; he was risking both of their safety by refusing to close the bond, so she would make him pay. It was easy for the darkness to find her in her anger.
“I would never tell them, because you’re a monster!”

She knew how deeply that word affected him. He displayed no outward reaction other than his shoulders curling in slightly. His side of the bond was sealed tight so she couldn’t read his emotions, but she heard the heaviness in his voice when he rasped, “Yes…”

It wasn’t enough to make him shut her out, however. Rey wouldn’t yield due to one failure, despite the call inside her to stop. She was his bondmate, she knew how to hurt him. The images of Han Solo’s final moments burned through her mind. “And a murderer!”

His hand clenched on the controls. “Yes…”

“You are weak with lust for power!”

“I am weak with lust for much more unattainable things than power, sweetheart,” he retorted sarcastically. His eyes were alight with a feral ferocity, but he seemed just as surprised – and agitated – by the endearing term as she was.

_Sweetheart?

She had waited her entire life for her parents to return, to refer to her in that term of love and belonging that haunted her dreams. That word meant the galaxy to her. And he had single-handedly defiled it as if it meant nothing, as if she meant nothing. She refused to consider the implication of the rest of his words; she would not follow him down that dangerous path. Instead, she grasped onto the fury in the darkness.

“Did you just…. oh, you’re insufferable!”

“Am I?” he sighed flippantly. A bright orange light illuminated his face for a split-second, and his eyes looked more red-rimmed and glassy than she had observed in the darkness. “You’re one to talk.”

“Yes, _Supreme Leader... you are,_” she challenged. “You’re unpredictable. One day you hate me, the next you... don’t. You say whatever pops into your mind, awful things that hurt people, without considering the consequences.”
“Again. You're one to talk... sweetheart.” He didn’t bother to glance in her direction as he reached up to toggle switches above his head. “At least I’m not constantly wavering between killing or saving you.” His response only added kindling to the fire burning in her chest.

Look at him... He has the entire galaxy searching to kill you... It's only a joke to him... He is evil... Don’t let him forget that... the voice whispered.

“No, your highness, you are firmly set on killing me!” she argued furiously. “You issued a five million credit bounty on me! How could you send those people after me?”

His eyes met hers for a moment, and his contempt faded to something contemplative. He studied her as if he couldn't understand why she would be angry. “What did you expect me to do?”

Is he serious?

He's serious.

Is he insane?

“I don't know.” she snorted derisively. “How about... not put a bounty on my life? Was that too much to ask?”

“I didn’t issue a bounty for your life.”

“Liar! I saw it!”

Kylo hummed. “Well, you know everything, right?” There was something in his eyes that told her she didn’t, that he knew more than he chose to reveal. It was preposterous; if he had proof he wasn’t lying, why wouldn’t he tell her? She couldn’t search for the truth in the bond, because it was still fortified against her. And she couldn’t search for it in his eyes, because he refused to look at her.
“Even if I did… you left me little choice,” he said. “You didn’t sneak onto the Supremacy with the rest of the anarchists; you delivered yourself in front of an entire hangar of Sid… Snoke’s officers and troopers, forcing me to detain you. Then you left me, unconscious, as the only survivor in that room. I awoke to my general standing over me, prepared to kill me. Not that I’m not used to that, but if you wanted me dead, you could have at least had the decency to do it yourself. So I ask again, what did you expect? I did what I did to survive. It benefitted you as well; if he executed me for treason, your precious Resistance would have fallen.”

“‘It’s not like you helped us!’ she shouted, but his eyes were focused on his controls. She searched the surrounding steps for something to throw at him so he would meet her fiery gaze, so he would care. “You tried to kill us, including your own mother!”

He may not have spared her a glance, but she watched his eyes darken with fury. His voice was rough and dry, resentment twisting through every word when he finally spoke. “That may be true, but you both betrayed me. My mother never gave up on anyone, but I felt her give up on me. And you… you knew what Luke did to me, but you sent him to face me. He looked exactly as he did that night, but not his weapon, right Rey? I didn’t know my grandfather’s lightsaber was broken, but you did. You sent him out there projecting the lightsaber you had just tried to use against me, after I saved you and asked you to join me. You wouldn’t even face me after what you had done. When my blade passed through him, I have never felt so relieved in my life. But the plan worked. I failed; he distracted me from my mission to destroy the Resistance. Hux would have pushed through. He would have destroyed you all.”

“What do you want? Sympathy for not killing me and your mother?” her tone was sarcastic and juvenile, but it was his fault for drawing it of her. Again. “You poor, innocent thing, you had no choice at all. You were coerced into becoming the most powerful man in the galaxy and forced to massacre thousands of people with your bare hands. It’s not like you chose power instead of me.”

“I begged you to join me,” he reminded her sharply, his voice wavering with a rage that would have been terrifying if they were not across the galaxy. The bond was like hot embers, sparking with betrayal.

“Why would I? You're evil!” The darkness did little to consume the rage that vibrated in her voice. She allowed more darkness inside in the hope that it would numb her to the pain of what he had done and continued to do. “You use the Force to commit indefensible horrors! You will never find forgiveness for the suffering you have caused.”

His face hardened. “Have I ever said otherwise?”

“Why would you? It’s clear you care about no one but yourself.”
“And I am the last person in the galaxy you would ever want to be bonded with. Your enemy. Trust me, you have made it abundantly clear.” Blinking rapidly, he chewed his lips as he swallowed the remainder of his comment. His shoulders slumped as his broad frame hunched in an almost protective posture. The barriers around his mind were similarly protective; they were unyielding and impenetrable as stone when she tried to sense his emotions. It was almost as if he was shielding himself from her words, as if what she said actually meant anything to him. Which it clearly didn't. She meant nothing to him, and neither did her words. But the man before her was everything that Kylo Ren was not. There was a voice inside her, piercing through the darkness, begging her to stop, but she refused to listen.

She hoped her words would return the fire to his eyes. “Well, do you blame me?”

“No, not at all. It just took you longer than I expected to give up on me, too.” The bond was changing, fraying, withering. It was sobering in the darkness, but not quite enough. Another explosion reverberated around him.

“It took you longer than expected to show me who you truly are,” she replied. When he was gone, it was easier to think clearly. His presence brought too many emotions to the surface that she tried desperately to repress. It was difficult enough fighting against him, but she had to fight her naïve hope as well.

“No, I've only ever been honest with you.”

“You’re a liar!” She shouted, hiccuping a sob, not caring who heard her anymore. The tears welled in her eyes, but she would not let him see them. Not again. She would not let him see the deep wounds she still carried with her.

Another explosion reflected on his hardened features. “Am I, Rey? Or do you just prefer to live in ignorance like you've done your entire life?”

No, it was all a lie that you naively believed... He manipulated you because he wanted the map to Luke to please his master... He killed Snoke in anger for creating the bond and then blamed it on you... He never cared about you... It was all a lie... He is a monster... He means nothing to you... If he was dead, you would be free... the whisper reminded her.

“Liar! You made me believe in those Force bonds on Ahch-To and Kamino that you cared about me! You made me believe in that vision! But it was all a lie!”
“Not for me!” he growled in an escalating rage she could feel burn through the bond. “I believed in it, too.”

No. you chose the power. You tried to kill us all. You told the First Order lies about me. You killed women and children for them. You’re not the victim here.

“It doesn’t matter what you say, I don’t believe you. Your words mean nothing to me. You mean nothing to me,” she said, her voice trembling. He flinched. Rey would have walked away in that moment if she could. She didn’t want to fight anymore, but the darkness that soothed her heartache also dragged the words from her throat. “I could never love someone like you.”

“I never asked you to love me!” he shouted. There was an aching vulnerability to his tone that belied his volatility. Still, she was thankful he was confined to his cockpit. “I never asked for this Force-forsaken bond! I never asked for any of this! I am master of the Knights of Ren, Supreme Leader of the First Order. Skywalker is dead, Leia’s Resistance is dwindling, the galaxy is within my grasp. I have everything I’ve ever wanted! But it’s not…” He paused, lowering his voice to a snarl. “You say I have ruined everything, but no, Rey, it is you who has ruined everything. You have ruined me!” She shuddered as he cried out into the cockpit, slamming his fist into the frame.

“I never asked for this, either,” she whispered, grasping for the darkness that would ease the despair. The raw wound was ripped open like a scab every moment he was near, but the cruel words, anger, darkness... none of it would soothe the pain.

“What do you want from me, Rey?”

“Nothing.”

“No. What do you want from me?” he demanded. “We have this bond – you know I won’t turn, I know you won’t join me, and we can’t break it. One day you beg for my life and touch me in ways not meant for an enemy. The next you try to kill me and kiss drunk pilots to torture me. What do you want? To manipulate me? Seduce me to the light? Save me? Destroy me? Fight me like this until one of us dies? Do you even know? Or is this a game? Where does this end, Rey? What is your hope here?”

Yes, one of you must die... It is your destiny to destroy him... You hate him... You hope he will die and bring you peace... That is the truth... With the whispers came the comforting tendrils of darkness.
“I hope your fighter explodes with you in it, that’s what I hope, Supreme Leader,” she snapped. He didn’t move, but his side of the bond recoiled from her words.

If you want me dead, at least have the decency to do it yourself, his voice echoed through the bond.

He grimaced as another alarm sounded in his cockpit. Refusing to look up at her, he asked his droid for a read-out as he continued to flip switches at the controls. He looked completely unfazed by her words, his attention devoted entirely to a different fight, a more important fight. She wondered why the Supreme Leader was drawn into an inconsequential battle like recovering a stolen freighter from pirates. He had the entire First Order at his disposal. It seemed likely that he could find enough trained pilots to fight while he watched from the safety of his throne.

But then again, he enjoys murder. What else would do with his time?

“I hate you,” the darkness twisted through her, delivering her words calmly and coldly from her lips.

“I know,” he whispered. His eyes finally connected with hers. She inhaled sharply as the anger fell away at the look in his eyes. The darkness faded with the anger, lifting the fog in her mind. There was no anger or resentment blazing in his eyes. Only a pain that ached in her own soul. He glanced away, swallowing his misery as he focused on his mission. Guilt tightened in her throat as she looked down at her hands.

Why did she say those things? He justified his own cruel words, but that wasn’t who she was. She was so angry, and hurt, and confused, and the whispers of the Force made sense. But this seemed wrong. This felt like walking against the sands in a windstorm. The darkness was soothing, the darkness eased her pain, but it ignored the calls inside her. Even if she hated him, which deep inside she knew she didn’t, when had she become the person who would intentionally try to hurt someone like that? Why did their bond have to be so complicated?

A new alarm blared in his cockpit. It caught her attention because she noticed the soft cinch of his breath and the slight tremble of his gloved fingers. He was all at once scrambling at the controls. His entire demeanor had changed, his panic feeding hers, breaking through the remaining layers of darkness as if it were nothing. Their fight suddenly lost all significance. She could feel it in the Force, something was terribly wrong.
He ignored her, which she supposed she deserved. “General,” he said calmly into his comlink. His voice may have betrayed nothing of his current emotional state, but she could see the fear in his eyes. “There has been a malfunction in the Silencer. My deflector shield generator is down.” Rey may have never flown a TIE, but she had been around enough ships to know what a deflector shield generator was as well as the implications of losing the deflector shield.

“No, Hux. I’m staring at it now,” he argued into his comlink. “It’s offline. No, no, no, this can’t... now all weapons systems are offline as well. All defensive systems are down. I'm...”

“Ben?” Rey said shakily, stepping toward him. The whispers were gone, and the conflicting emotions, leaving only fear. For him.

“I know it’s impossible!” he shouted at the other man. The words she had said to him replayed in her mind as she stepped closer. She wanted to apologize, tell him she didn’t hate him or want him dead – that she had been confused in the darkness. But she never had the chance.

Kylo’s head snapped to something that had caught his attention to the right. He cried out in surprise as his hands came up to protect himself. Rey felt an intense wave of Force crash through their bond, followed by a deafening explosion that jolted her senses. The vibrations shuddered through her bones, the heat prickled her skin. A bright orange fireball flashed across the cockpit as she reached him, and the bond snapped shut before her fingertips. The sounds of the rainforest returned to the cool night around her, but it was achingly quiet. She shivered. Everything was still, but the bond was hollow.

“Ben?”
Chapter End Notes

Jealousy

There is a kiss, though it is not out of affection. It is not between Kylo and Rey. Kylo is jealous and reacts poorly.

Threat of violence
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rose walked next to Finn as they made their way through the winding corridors to escape the confines of the temple. They were nearly to the steps when they encountered Poe, who was staggering from Leia’s room, grumbling, “I know that’s not what you meant, Leia.” Rose noticed the agitated expression on Poe’s face as Finn did.

“Are you okay?” Finn asked, grabbing their commander by the arm.

“Yes...” he sighed, “Actually no... you need to talk to Rey. I don’t know what happened. I was talking to Rey, and I thought maybe she wanted… more. She gave off all the signs, then told me to stop, fine, but then she kissed me, even though it seemed forced, and then she told me to leave like I was the one who kissed her! I don’t know what’s going on with her, but there was a lot more going on than her changing her mind. She never wanted to kiss me, but I don’t know why she did or why she wanted me to leave so badly. If you don’t confront her, I will.” He ripped his arm away and stormed back into the temple. Rose eyed Finn curiously, and they made their way up the steps.

Neither were Force-sensitive, but even they could sense a disturbance around them. The air felt heavier and unusually cold for the temperate rainforest planet. The fine hair on their arms stood on end, and they could feel an electric tingling across their skin. Though both had always assumed only Jedi and Sith felt the Force, there was no mistaking both the physiological and emotional upheaval taking place around them. It quickly became apparent why.

Rey was hysterical. She was on her knees, her hands over her eyes as she screamed. The sound was buffered by...something; a whirlwind of something strong, powerful and alive. The thrashing winds – of what they could only assume was the Force – spiraled around her, carrying her voice as well as any object in its path. The magnetism and polarity of it made them instantly nauseous. Both had been lighthearted when climbing the steps, but remorse and sorrow settled over their senses. Rose wondered if Rey was projecting her own emotions somehow. Finn wondered why anyone would want to be exposed to the Force on a regular basis.

“Rey!” Finn shouted and stepped forward into the whirlwind.

Rey’s eyes snapped open as she sensed her friends. She panicked. Losing control over her emotions was problematic enough, the last thing she wanted was to endanger her friend’s lives. They couldn’t help her, no one could. She had feared her presence at the base because of her connection to their enemy, but she had never considered if her powers would just as dangerous.

“Leave!” she screamed, but the spike of fear was all it took for the emotions to reach a breaking point. As she braced against them, they exploded out into the Force. Finn and Rose were surprised by the blast that was strong enough to send them sprawling onto their backs.

Rey jumped to her feet. “I’m so sorry!” she cried, reaching for them. She took a step closer, but thought better of it and backed away slowly. “You shouldn’t be here.” Her friends cautiously stood, and she awaited their wrath. Their abandonment. Their eyes flickered with fear, but they did not run as she had anticipated.

“Rey, what was that?” Finn gasped.

“I don’t know,” she replied. She clenched her fists to control the shaking in her hands. “That has never happened to me before.”

Rose’s voice was more soothing in tone than Finn’s, but just as concerned. “What is going on?”

“Nothing,” Rey said as she wiped her tears. She knew she had said it too quickly, too vehemently, for it to have been nothing. They wouldn’t have believed her anyway, after that display. As the agitation faded from her overwhelming emotions, Rey was left feeling… nothing. It was as if all her emotions had left her body, and all that was left was an empty shell. Maybe it was. Maybe they would never come back.

She wouldn’t raise her eyes to meet Finn’s, even when he grasped her shoulders. She couldn’t stand to see the fear and disappointment in his eyes. “Nothing? You’re crying! And creating emotional Force storms. That’s not nothing. And we ran into Poe, he’s blabbering about you kissing him? What is going on?”

I can’t feel him. He’s gone. But he can’t be gone. I didn’t feel it in the Force. Does that happen for darksiders? Did I feel Snoke’s death? I don’t remember.

“Finn, can you start the walk without me?” Rose asked him. Rey finally glanced up at that. The fear and disappointment she expected were nonexistent in their eyes. Finn’s face only showed concern. Rose smiled knowingly. The woman nodded at Finn, eyebrows raised in insinuation, and he seemed to catch on rather quickly.

He nodded reluctantly. “I’ll be waiting at the bottom if you need me.”

Rey knew he was reluctant to leave her after what had happened, but he acknowledged that conversation was one of the two women would need to have alone. Before he began his descent down the steps, he pivoted back to embrace her. “I’m always here for you if you need me,” he said softly. He sighed, nodded again at Rose, and slowly disappeared into the darkness of the night.
Rose turned toward her friend, both concern and understanding reflecting on her features. Rey let the heaviness in her legs bring her to her knees. Rey didn’t realize Rose had stepped closer until she knelt next to her. “Did he hurt you, Rey?”

Rey could barely hear her friend over her inner screaming. “What?”

Where are you, Ben? Why can’t I feel anything from you?

“Poe... did he do something...”

“What? No,” Rey said distantly, “This isn’t about him at all.” She wondered if her words sounded as hollow and emotionless as they did in her head.

“But you kissed him?”

This isn’t about some silly kiss that meant nothing!

“Not really, and this isn’t about that,” she replied. She knew she sounded distracted, but she was. Searching their bond, she hoped to feel the tumultuous emotions or physical pain that one would expect from someone who survived that blast. She felt nothing. Rey wished for once that she didn’t have extensive knowledge of ships from her scavenging days. Though she had never worked on the type of ship Kylo had piloted, she had disassembled TIE fighters. The shield generator or defense systems had been compromised, Kylo’s ship would have been exposed and vulnerable to attack. Without the life-support mask, what chance would he have had once the cockpit was breached by the explosion? Her mechanic brain told her it wasn’t survivable, but her hopeful heart couldn’t accept that.

Ben?

Confusion replaced the concern on Rose’s face. “You kissed him, but... not really?”

“Kissed who?”

Please answer Ben, just tell me you’re okay.
“Poe,” Rose huffed. “You said ‘not really’ when I asked you if you kissed him.”

Rey interrupted her unpracticed search of the Force to focus on her friend. “I didn’t mean to, is all. It meant nothing.”

Why don’t you understand that I don’t care about the kiss!

Rey felt the emotions returning full force like opening the floodgates. The first emotion she felt was frustration at answering useless questions about Poe Dameron. With the anger and frustration came the despair, however. She could feel them building in the Force again.

Rose, however, was still focused on trivial matters. “You didn’t mean to kiss him...”

“No, I was trying to protect Ben!”

Rey gasped. She hadn’t meant to say it. She hadn’t meant to tell Rose anything. If Rose knew about him, she’d know about the bond; if she knew about the bond, she would tell the others, and they would all find out that she had gone to him on the Supremacy, failed, kept it secret from them, and kept secrets for him, including the key to ending the war. Rey panicked.

“Wait...” Rose’s eyes narrowed as she studied her face. “Who is Ben?”

Rey dropped her face to her hands as she battled to suppress her emotions. “Rose, please promise me you’ll never tell anyone I said that.”

Ben, I don’t know what to do. Please. Please, be okay.

“Rey, you need to tell me what’s going on here, because it is obviously not ‘nothing,’” Rose had the leverage to force her confession, and Rey couldn’t think of an adequate excuse for her slip up. It would have to be the truth. They could imprison her or force to leave for what she had done. She would deserve it. But she had to admit the truth.
At least, part of the truth.

“Remember the guy I told you about?” she said, biting back tears. “He appears to me through the Force?”

Rose’s expression softened. “The one who broke your heart?”

“That’s the one,” Rey answered. She exhaled slowly as she steeled herself for the reaction. “Well, Poe was here when Ben appeared. And Poe heard him, and I panicked so I kissed Poe so that he wouldn’t discover Ben and...”

“And now this ‘Ben’ is upset with you over the kiss?” Rose guessed. Rey was going to correct her. She wanted to scream, no, he could be dead because I told him I hated him and hoped he would die, because I... because I don’t know who I am anymore! But she decided, at that moment, Rose’s version was easier to explain, and it wasn’t entirely false.

She sniffled, drying her eyes. “Yes.”

“Did you explain what happened?”

“No! He never gave me the chance,” Rey shouted in anger, and she knew she wasn’t angry at her friend. She was angry at the Force for connecting them, at him for being so difficult, and at herself for how she had reacted. Rose, for her part, took it in stride.

“He left?”

“No, not right away,” she said, swiping at her eyes again. “He was cruel, and I was still so angry with him, so I said horrible things that I didn’t mean. It doesn’t even feel like me when I’m saying them. The Force guides my thoughts, and the words I say feel right when I say them, but after... I know this isn’t me. I don’t want it to be me. But it doesn’t matter, because then he was gone and now I’m terrified I will never see him again.”

Ben, please! Answer me.
“Can you trust the Force’s guidance?” It was a simple question, but it was one Rey had never contemplated before. What could she trust, if not the Force? When she answered her friend, however, it did not sound as certain as it had in her head.

“Of course!”

Rose nodded, smiling in reassurance, but she continued to press. “I just thought, with the Force storm that seemed to be hurting you, that perhaps –”

“No, it didn’t do that to me, that was my own inability to control my emotions in the Force.”

Ben!

“If you can trust the Force – and it actually is the Force – then either you misunderstood its guidance, or he deserved what you said to him.” Rose shrugged. It made perfect sense. But there was something about what she said that felt terrifyingly correct, something that voice inside desperately called for her to see.

“I don’t know, Rose,” she whispered. “I just know something inside me is screaming that all of this is wrong.”

Rose sat down on the top step of the temple and beckoned for Rey to join her. “Can you find him? In the Force?” she offered. “I’m sorry, I don’t know how this works.”

Rey shook her head, slumping down next to her friend. “No, he’s gone.”

“Well, he’s real, right? Could you go to him?” Rose asked, before adding, “After Maz creates a distraction for the First Order, of course.”

“I don’t know if I should.” Rey stared out into the darkness of the Barkhesh night. Somewhere above them in the vast blanket of stars was Kylo. Her mind helpfully supplied different scenarios of what he was enduring while they were apart. He could be dead, floating in space amongst the twisted remains of his fighter. He could be alive but mortally wounded; slowly dying after he crash-landed on Taris, and there would be nothing she could do to save him. He could have saved himself, as his mother had, and could be unconscious in a medbay. It could have all been a mistake, and he could be standing at the viewport of the Finalizer, contemplating the same stars, waiting for her to come find him. That was how she had imagined him when she left Ahch-To to cross the galaxy for him, and that was how she wanted to imagine him now. “The last time I went to him, I wanted him to come back with me, but he didn’t.”

“Then let him go.”

Rey could feel the swell of sorrow again and tried to blink back the emotions. She had cried enough tears over him. “I don’t want to let him go, I just want him to be the man I know he can be. I can’t stop thinking about him. I want to hate him, Rose, I tried. But I can’t.”

“Okay, I know we don’t know each other that well yet, but can I say something?” Rey met her friend’s eyes and nodded. “It sounds to me like you love him, but you don’t want to love him.”

There was a strange mix of emotions that fluttered to life inside her, but she shut them away to dissect later… or never. “No, I can’t love him!” Rey was vehement in her denial of both the capability and practicality of such an outrageous claim. “I have never loved anyone like that, and I won’t start now, not with him.”

Especially not with him.

“You can love anybody,” her friend reminded her as she picked the dirt from underneath in fingernails. “Forbidden or complicated love is still love. I’m just saying, it’s difficult to be heartbroken if you don’t love someone.”

Rey wondered if she would feel the same if she knew it was their enemy. “You don’t understand, I can’t.”

“Okay,” Rose shrugged as if she hadn’t nearly destabilized Rey’s entire existence with one question. “But does he love you?”

“I told you, he wouldn’t come with me.”

“Just because he wasn’t ready yet, doesn’t mean he doesn’t love you,” Rose said, and Rey wished it was that simple. It wasn’t that he wasn’t ready to turn, it was that he didn’t want to. And he didn’t love her, he hated her, he had tried to kill her on Crait. “I could be wrong; I don’t know the guy, but I know you. Who wouldn’t love you?” Rey wanted to explain how her parents had abandoned her, how no one had ever loved her until Finn, and that was only because she was his first friend. The more involved he became with the Resistance, the less she would matter to him. That’s how it would always be. People abandoned her. Kylo promised her she was not alone, but where was he? “And if he doesn’t love you, why was he so upset you kissed Poe?”

Rey didn’t have an answer for that, but she refused to consider it when their bond was still dark. If he died while hating her, then that was something she could weather. If he died and he cared about her at all, even as a friend, she didn’t know how her heart would survive it. “It doesn’t matter. He’s gone, maybe forever.”

“Nothing is forever,” Rose said, tilting her head for a better view of the stars. “Maybe time apart could be good for you. I think what you want to feel and what you truly feel are two different things. And maybe this time, when you go to him, it’ll be different. Love is a powerful motivator.”

Love. Her heart was conflicted enough. It was impossible to explain to Rose how at odds she was with herself without that complicated and terrifying emotion. How could she rationalize any of it? It should have been easy. Kylo was their enemy; he should have been treated as such. Something inside her wouldn’t allow it, however. She didn’t want to forgive him, not after what he had done to break her heart. She wanted to hate him, to protect herself from further pain, but she couldn’t. She wanted guidance in the Force, but she didn’t know which whisper to trust. She wanted to feel at home with the Resistance, but she didn’t. She should want him dead, should celebrate the thought that her trouble with the bond was over, but no amount of convincing could make her accept his death as a good thing.

Rey was beginning to believe the hope inside her was a curse. What had it ever gotten her besides misery? She refused to even believe he was dead. If Kylo Ren was meant to die, it wouldn’t be inconsequential like that. It was the only hope she could hold onto. As the light drifted back into her heart with that thought, she felt a moment of calming warmth. That warmth shattered, however, with her friend’s next words. “Rey, why does the name ‘Ben’ sound so familiar?”

This was it. This was the moment she feared. This was when the truth would tear down everything she had fought to protect. “I… he’s… who?” she stammered.

“The whisper!” Rose realized. “That was the name Leia whispered in her sleep!”

Rey closed her eyes, accepting that lying at this point was futile. “Yes.”

“Who is he?”
“Ben Solo, her son.” Rey braced herself, awaiting the anger, fear, disgust, disappointment... but it never came.

Her heart soared at her friend’s next question. “Leia has a son?”

She doesn’t know any of it, she understood in relief. She has no idea that Leia has a son, which means she has no idea that Ben Solo is Kylo Ren.

“Yes, but they had a ... falling out,” Rey equivocated. “She has no idea that this is going on. Please, promise me you won’t tell anyone.”

“I promise, Rey. It’s not my place to get involved,” she assured her. “But let me get this straight: You have a relationship with General Leia’s son, and you think she doesn’t know about it? She seems like the kind of mother who knows exactly where her son is and what he’s doing.”

Yeah, that’s what he said, too, but if she knew where he was and what he was doing, then she would know about the bond, because she’s... She shivered with realization. Leia’s Force-sensitive! If something happened to him, then she would feel it! She would know! She would tell me!

“Rose, you’re so right!” She embraced the startled woman. “I have to go see Leia!” She jumped to her feet and sprinted down the steps into the temple without looking back at her incredulous friend.
Chapter End Notes

Mild violence

Rey knocks her friends down with the Force.
One Question

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey sprinted down the corridor toward Leia’s room. If something had happened to him, Leia would know. Though they had been strangers for years, Leia could feel her son in the Force. She would have felt it if something changed, she would have told someone. There would be alarms sounding, Resistance members running through the halls, coordinating whatever people coordinate when they know the Supreme Leader is…

Dead.

Rey refused to believe he was gone. As long as she had hope, she would continue to believe it. It strengthened the closer her feet brought her to his mother. There were no cries of sorrow, not even hushed whispers of half-hearted condolences. It was silent. Disturbingly silent. No, peacefully silent. Rey tried to shut his angry, needy, betrayed eyes from her thoughts. She tried to drown out the miserable words by focusing on the roar of her blood through her veins. Everything will be okay.

She rounded the corner to Leia’s room, nearly colliding with Threepio. “Miss Rey, General Leia has been expecting you.”

With those eight words, Rey’s hope was shaken. Dread pooled in her stomach. The adrenaline rush of hope that carried her to the general dissipated quickly. Had she been expecting her because she had bad news to break to her? Had she felt what happened to Ben? The protocol droid accompanied her to the room entrance, announcing her. If Leia spoke, Rey didn’t hear a word of it. She was too focused on remaining standing as her knees shook violently.

Her voice didn’t fare much better. Each word was quivering with anticipation. “You’ve been expecting me?”

There were dark circles under Leia’s eyes, and her skin was sickeningly pale, yet the Force was stronger around her than Rey had ever felt before. There were no tears staining the woman’s cheeks, but Rey wasn’t certain that was enough to reinforce her hope. The Resistance would kill him if they were given the chance. Would she cry for her son after the evil he’d done? Or would she sigh in relief that it was finally over? When Leia spoke, her voice was soft but strained. “Is everything… okay with you, Rey?”

“Me?” she asked quietly, trying to acquaint herself with the notion that these people actually cared how she felt. It was easier to answer with a dismissive “fine,” but she wasn’t okay, and she wouldn’t be until Leia gave her the information she needed. Her stare dropped to her feet.
“Well...no.”

“Now, I know you can take care of yourself and it’s none of my business,” Leia said in her no-nonsense, yet motherly way. “However, as another Force-sensitive woman, I can’t help but feel protective of you here. Is there something you want to talk about? Just between us?” Rey realized with an exasperated sigh that Leia wasn’t talking about her son at all. It should have made her hopeful, but Rey wasn’t certain that Leia even felt him anymore. Rumor had spread quickly through the Resistance.

“Poe talked to you.”

“Well, yes...”

“Leia, I’m so sorry.” Her eyes remained downcast as her cheeks and ears flushed. The woman was trying to lead a rebellion, and she had to resolve a stupid misunderstanding. “You shouldn’t be worrying about silly things like that. It was a mistake, and it won’t happen again. You have my word.”

Leia cleared her throat. She could feel the heat of her stare. Rey slowly dragged her eyes to the woman’s face. Perhaps the general had called Rey to her room under the pretense of investigating the kiss, but there was a deeper concern in her eyes. Rey felt a renewed panic tighten in her throat as she awaited the fateful words. Leia only extended her suffering longer. “Is there anything else you want to talk about?”

Of course, there was one question Rey had been desperate to ask only seconds before. But when Leia asked her, Rey wasn’t certain she wanted to know the answer anymore. If it would change everything, what was the harm in waiting one more moment? Perhaps Leia would just tell her and take the choice from her. “Is there something you want me to talk about?”

“No, not at all,” Leia smiled, and Rey tried her best to return the gesture through the anxiety tightening in her chest. “If you have any questions about the Force, I’m no Luke, but I can help you the best way I can. I know that it can get lonely when you are different, even if your difference is a gift. Anytime you need to talk, no matter what, I’m here. No questions asked, no judgment.”

“I have one question,” she said, speaking before her mind could convince her otherwise. It was with such haste that her words tumbled together. “Can you feel Ben in the Force?”
Judging by the confusion that flashed across her expression, it was a question that the general had not been expecting. If he was gone, the woman had no idea. That restored some hope to her aching heart. The general studied her quietly. Only this wasn’t the decorous gaze of a rebellion hero, it was the gaze of a mother. “Of course,” Leia replied with measured restraint, her curiosity toward the probing question evident in her heartbroken eyes. “I can’t pinpoint his location or speak to him in the Force – it is not as strong as my connection with Luke is…was – but he’s still my son.”

“Can you feel him right now?” Rey blurted out impulsively. She tried to mask the panic and hope in her voice. If she could feel him, then he was alive. If he was alive, then there was still hope she could bring him back to his mother.

“Not like I can when he’s close. Don’t worry, he’s somewhere across the galaxy.” Leia’s tone was reassuring, but her eyes glazed with sorrow. Rey’s stomach twisted as she realized what Leia was saying. She was a mother grieving for the lost son she might one day be forced to approve orders to kill, and she was reassuring Rey. It was evident that Leia believed she was only asking about him because she was afraid he would find her again. If only Rey could explain she was afraid he wouldn’t find her.

She wrung her fingers anxiously to control their shaking. “But you would know if something... terrible had happened to him?”

Leia’s eyes darkened, her lips pulled into a firm line. “As in death?”

Rey nodded.

The ailing woman sighed something broken and agonized, and the strong projection she maintained dropped long enough for Rey to witness long-suffering pain underneath. Rey wished her bondmate had been there, to prove he was alive, but also to witness the torment his mother endured at imagining his death. “Yes, I’ll know the moment he’s gone, just as we did with Luke. Even after everything he has done, and what I know we must do to save the galaxy, I fear it every day.”

Rey gasped, her energy brightened in hope. Relief bubbled up in her throat and spilled over into her words. “So he’s alive? You can feel him right now?”

There was something different that crossed Leia’s features, something cautious and guarded, but hopeful. “Yes...”
“He’s okay,” she breathed, wiping the tears that had swelled in her eyes. “He’s okay. Thank you, Leia. Thank you so much.” She threw her arms around the woman and nearly knocked her over with the strength of it. Rey released her, apologizing, as she remembered herself. “I’m sorry. I’m just... thank you.” She stood, prepared to excuse herself before she embarrassed herself further. Kylo was alive, there was still hope. As the dread faded, her mind reeled with questions. Why couldn’t she feel him? Was he hurt? Was their bond broken? Did he break it?

As she brushed off her grey pants and turned toward the makeshift door, Leia’s voice behind her recaptured her attention. “Rey?” Leia’s voice trembled. She sounded like she was on the verge of tears. Rey spun on her heels to face her general and her pooling eyes. “I know I said no questions asked, but I don’t remember the last time anyone sounded relieved to hear that my son is alive. Is there anything you want to tell me, Rey?”

If I told you the truth, what would you do?

“General,” a voice interrupted them, “I need to speak with you.” Lieutenant Connix walked into the temple room, and Rey stepped backward toward the door.

“Rey?” Leia repeated, more cautious this time.

“I have to go,” Rey said, backing from the room. Before Leia could call her again and make her witness the hope in her eyes again, Rey sprinted down the corridor to the safety of her room. Leia watched her flee and wondered what her idiot son and that impulsive girl had gotten themselves into. Something had happened on Snoke’s flagship. It had seemed like Rey was only angry and disappointed in him at first, but there was more there now. That intuition inside her guided her to wait. As long as it didn’t endanger the Resistance, she would be patient and allow it to play out to the will of the Force. There was no denying, however, that something significant was looming just beyond the darkness on the horizon.

“General?”

Leia directed her attention to the other woman. “Yes, Lieutenant?”

Connix bit her lip anxiously. “We’ve contacted every last one of the sympathizers to the Rebellion from the list you gave us, and they’re not coming. They all don’t want to get involved, but they want me to pass along that they ‘have hope your rebellion will save the galaxy.’”
Leia sighed.

“That has always been the problem, Connix,” she said. “Everyone wants to be saved, but most are too afraid to do what’s necessary to save themselves.”

“Afraid of what? The First Order will kill us all!”

“They’re afraid for their lives, of course,” Leia replied with a low chuckle. “But they’re also afraid of breaking the status quo, of risking something worse in its place, of being the only voice in a silent crowd. They’ll take up the fight when death is on their doorstep, but by then, it’s usually too late.”

The Lieutenant turned away to hide her sorrow. “Then what do we do now?”

“We do it ourselves, as we’ve always done, and seek help in some unlikely places. It seems our friends are now limited to the enemies of our enemy.” As Connix nodded in discouragement, Leia grasped the young woman’s hand, forcing her to meet her gaze. “It is far from over, dear. Have hope.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rose found Finn right where he told her he would be. He was wringing his hands and pacing. She knew his thoughts were on Rey, but she couldn’t help admiring how handsome he looked in the moonlight. He was conventionally attractive – a smile that lit up the room, perfect hair she yearned to touch, and a strong body that would make any woman swoon. Her treacherous mind had even found him dashing in a First Order uniform, not that she would ever tell him that.

His gentle eyes reflected the stars, and even if his thoughts were elsewhere, she felt like the only woman in the galaxy when he stared up at her. He licked his lips in anticipation of the details she would provide him, but she could only think about how much she desired to kiss those soft lips again. She had thought she was dying, she thought she would never have another chance to show him how wrong she had been about him. She had hoped that the concern in his eyes had meant that he had felt something, too. But she had woken up alone, and though she had been told that Finn had visited her, it was likely more out of guilt than anything else.

Since she had awoken, Finn had been keeping his distance. When they were reunited, it was clear that her feelings were very one-sided. She envied the problem Rey had. The Jedi clearly loved Leia’s estranged son. And judging by his reaction to Rey’s kiss with their commander, he loved her too. Force-users always seemed more in tune with their emotions, and while she didn’t want Rey to suffer, it was helpful to know that even those who were one with the Force didn’t have all the answers with love.

Rey was… a little rough around the edges because of her upbringing; she was secretive, solitary, and always lost to her thoughts. Rose had wondered if there was more behind the last Jedi’s distant stare; maybe it was this “Ben”-- maybe her heart was calling for someone across the stars. Rey had some soul-searching to do. She was so focused on what she didn’t want – what she was afraid of – that she refused to see the truth of her desires. Once Rey better understood herself and what she wanted from him, Rose had hope that heartbreak with the younger Solo would resolve.

From what Rose was able to ascertain – from the limited information she was able to drag from Rey – they loved each other, but he refused to repair his relationship with his mother, so he didn’t go back to the Resistance with Rey, which she took personally. Their problems were focused on the estrangement, and their fights – and poor treatment of each other – arose from that. If they fixed the estrangement, then the rest would come with time and patience.

Love was difficult and complicated, especially when it was new and foreign. They made mistakes, but Rose was a firm believer in forgiveness. No matter what happened, another member of that legendary family could help the Resistance. Perhaps Rey could eventually help mend the relationship between mother and son. Then he would join the Resistance, and Rey would have time to go slow and learn how to properly communicate with him. Rose only wished it could be that simple for her.

Rose never had much time for love in her life, but Finn had changed that. When she first met him, she thought he was selfish, arrogant and a coward. But once she had given him a chance – seen his loyalty, compassion, and selfless bravery – she had fallen in love with him. And it wasn’t his smile, his eyes or his lips that caused Rose to fall in love with him. It was his big, kind heart. And presently that big, kind heart was worried about Rey. There was a tinge of regret inside her that she would never earn that devotion from him too.

Even if his heart belonged to someone else, she was grateful that he had been taking her on nightly walks around the temple. Listening to his warm voice regale her with stories of his life as a stormtrooper and the planets he had visited – all safe subjects absent of what had happened between them – were moments that she wouldn’t have wanted to spend anywhere else in the galaxy. She could learn to be content as his friend if only to know such a brave and kind soul. Her sister would have adored him. When she descended the last step, she smiled. He didn’t return it. “That took long enough!” he sighed dramatically. “What’s going on?”

“She’s fine,” she assured him. “She just needed some ‘girl talk.’ She’s going right now to talk to Leia about it, which is probably for the best.” It would have been simpler to tell Finn about Leia’s son – if he even knew she had a son – but she had made a promise to Rey. She could have told him it was another man, but she wanted to avoid hurting him too. He and Rey were close, but she couldn’t be certain he even knew there was another man in Rey’s life. She hoped he would accept her vague and cautious explanation.

“What was the ‘girl talk’ about?” he demanded. “What’s going on?”

She smiled, it was sweet how deeply he cared, even if it was directed toward someone else, someone who didn’t love him in return. “If you want to know, ask her tomorrow after she’s had some time to think about it,” she offered. It was Rey’s choice whether she told him, and it was something he needed to hear from her.

Finn stepped back, and the concern faded to something that closely resembled betrayal. He seemed genuinely hurt. “You’re keeping secrets from me now?”

“No, I keep my promises,” she said softly. She wished she could tell him that it hurt her, too – that if she could, she would tell him everything. But that wouldn’t be fair to anyone. “And I made a promise to Rey. But trust me, she’ll be okay.”
“She kissed Poe!” he shouted. Rose realized that perhaps she had been thinking about it all wrong. Finn was struggling with the revelation that Rey was involved with another man, but it wasn’t the general’s son, it was her commander. He was focused on the kiss and the prospect of love between the girl he loved and his best friend. It was a crisis Rose likely wasn’t qualified to help him through, given the circumstances, but she wanted to be there for him. That was what people did for the ones they loved. She would carry his burden for him if he let her.

If Rey would go to great lengths to protect the man she cared for – including attempting to keep the secret from his own mother – the least Rose could do was have an honest conversation with Finn. “I’m sorry, Finn, I know you love her –”

“Of course, I do!”

Rose had known he did. He was a good man, he had made it clear from the very beginning. It shouldn’t have hurt to hear him voice something she already knew, but it did. She bit back tears. “She’s like the younger sister I never had,” he continued, “She’s my family! She’s my first friend, the first person to see me as more than a First Order soldier, and she’s crying after kissing one of my best friends! And I want to know why!”

Realization must have settled on Rose’s face as it settled in the cracks of her broken heart, because the urgency faded from his eyes and was replaced by the confusion. “Wait, what did you think I was freaking out about?”

“I thought… you were upset about the kiss because you wanted that… with her.”

It was Finn’s turn to have that final piece of understanding click into place. “You thought… I wanted… Rey and I… Oh, Rose… I thought you knew… I never thought you would think…” He wrapped his strong arms around her, and she melted into him. He was dirty from a supply mission to the dilapidated base, but there was nowhere she would rather be. “I guess I am a dummy, huh?”

“No, I’m the dummy. I’m sorry, Finn, I completely misread the situation. I just… well you know how I feel about you.” Rose said softly as he wrapped her tighter in the embrace.

Finn gave the best hugs. She could practically feel the stress of war evaporate away, replaced by his scent as she breathed him in. She was the perfect height to rest her head on his impressively toned chest. If she could thank the stormtrooper program for one thing, it would be giving this man a noticeably muscular physique. She could feel his biceps ripple as he tightened his grip again.
How could one person be so beautiful on the inside and the outside? It truly wasn’t fair to everyone else. She knew that every man she met for the rest of her life would be compared to Finn.

“Do you still feel the same way you did on Crait? About us?” he whispered as if he could read her thoughts. Rose knew she could lie, save face in the acceptance of her unrequited love, but she nodded, knowing it could drive him away. “Look, I’ve never had a … I’m not good at any of this, I don’t know what I’m doing. There’s so much to think about with the war and what’s happening with Rey and where I fit with all of this. You have been so, so patient with me when you deserve an answer. And I want to explain everything to you, I do. That scares me even more, if that makes sense. I’m sorry to keep you waiting so long, but I’m just not ready –”

“Then I’ll wait,” she said, smiling brightly with a glimmer of hope. “However you feel, you’re worth waiting for.”

“I don’t deserve that,” he said, “But it means a lot to me if I know you’ll be by my side at the end.” He pressed his nose to the top of her head, and she shuddered from the warmth that spread through her from that spot all the way down to the tip of her toes. He sighed in her embrace. “Holding you is relaxing. I somehow forget about everything I’ve been freaking out about when you’re right here.”

Rose wished Rey could be honest with Finn, perhaps then he wouldn’t have as many reasons to be stressed as he had been over the last few days. “Would it help,” she asked, “if I say that the kiss meant nothing to Rey, and she is not crying over Poe? I can’t go into specifics, but I hope that helps.”

“Thank you,” he said. His warm breath danced with the stray hair on her forehead as she tilted her head to look up at him. “I’m sure you hate being caught in the middle, but I’m just worried. I can’t ask Rey, because I know she won’t tell me. She has changed to someone I don’t know lately.”

“Rey’s trying to figure out exactly who she is and become the last hope for the Resistance at the same time, I’m sure that’s a lot of pressure.” Rose could feel the tension in his body still. As relaxed as he may have felt, she knew there was something still bothering him. “Finn, is there something else wrong?”

Finn was quiet for a moment; she could practically hear his thoughts debating whether to tell her. Finally, he relented. “There’s one thing. It might be crazy, but I have to know the truth, or I’ll lose it.” She nodded against his warm chest to encourage him further. With a final sigh, he forced himself to ask her. “Does this have anything to do with Kylo Ren?”
“What?” Rose gasped, pushing out of his embrace to study his face. “No! Why would this involve that creature!”

He sighed in relief, running his hand over the back of his neck. “I wish I could tell you,” he sighed. “But it seems that Rey has many secrets with people she trusts will keep them.”

Rose accepted his answer, but her mind was whirling with possibilities of how Rey’s stress could be related to the new Supreme Leader. Did she fear facing him? Was there more to the story than his defeat at her hands on Starkiller? Or did it involve Ben Solo? Was he in danger? “Well, this isn’t a bitter enemy type of secret, so I think we’re safe,” she said, though her stomach churned with dread. Kylo Ren was a monster, and she was terrified of the possibility that his evil could have had an impact on a beautiful soul like Rey. “Why would you think this involved him? Did he... do something to her?”

There was misery and fear darkening Finn’s usually luminous eyes, and she wondered if her concern was right and Rey had suffered at the hands of that creature. Finn did nothing confirm or quell her fears, however, choosing to ignore her question to focus back on the secret she kept instead. “If Rey made you promise something, but it put the entire Resistance in danger if you kept that secret, what would you do?”

Rose shrugged. Rey would never do anything like that. The secret she was keeping was about a lover, not treason. There was no danger to the Resistance other than Kylo Ren and the First Order. To alleviate his fears, she answered the question anyway. “I’d give her a chance to come clean to everyone first and do the right thing. But this isn’t one of those secrets. Don’t worry.”

Finn was quiet for a moment, then nodded. “Ready for that walk?” he smiled, pulling off his jacket and wrapping it around her shoulders. It wasn’t cold, but at that moment, she would have worn it in the hottest desert.

“With you? Always.”

They followed a path further into the valley and away from the tree-line. Rose wouldn’t have been scared to walk through the trees, but Finn warned her of creatures in the jungle that hunted at night. He knew his way around the area, so she trusted him. It didn’t much matter where they walked anyway.

The temple they had chosen for a base had the best cover, but further into the valley, there were several more. Most had crumbled into ruins, but the impressive architecture was still noticeable. Rose wondered what those people were like. She wondered if their villages were war-torn, or if they had lived in peace. She wondered what had happened to them. Rose cleared her throat and broke the silence as they approached a set of ruins. “So do you… remember anything about your homeworld or family?”

“No, nothing,” he said finally as he busied himself with climbing over a boulder toward the entrance. “But I want to, I think, I haven’t decided yet.”

He pivoted around and grabbed her hand to pull her the rest of the way up. His hand was warm and comforting, and she waited for the moment of disappointment when he would release her. They climbed over the top, but his fingers remained interlaced with hers. He lifted his glowrod to illuminate the entrance, and she followed him into the darkness. “Maybe after this war, you can find them,” she said. Her voice bounced across the stone walls.

“Maybe. I don’t know if there’s anyone left to find,” he said, distracted by his moving the glowrod to the entrance of each room. Though they had clearly been made by the same hands, this temple was different than their temporary base. The rooms were larger and more opulent, the carving in the stone was more intricate. As they entered a high-arching room, he turned to her. “I feel like all we ever talk about is me. Tell me about your family.”

Rose shrugged before following him inside. She enjoyed learning about him. He was interesting – worldly and funny. What was she supposed to say about her quiet life on a mining world with the family he’d never had? “There’s not much to me,” she said, running her free hand over the carving in the stone wall. Something in the air around her caused her to lower her voice in deference to the energy around her, as if she were entering a library… or mausoleum. “I’m from Hays Minor. My father’s name was Hue, and my mother’s name was Thanya. She flew OreDiggers for the Central Ridge Mining company. They had Paige and then me, and… we were happy. We didn’t have much, but we had each other. When our parents were working, we spent time with our grandparents Etta and Storm, and when they were home we watched holodramas – my favorites were the ones about Fathiers – and we played hologames and went on expeditions catching and releasing quad-hoppers from the mines.”

“I would have never guessed about the Fathiers,” he chuckled. He led her farther into the ruins, down a long, winding stairwell. It was damp and cold and reminded her of the mines on Hayes Minor. A chill threaded its way down her spine, but she wasn’t scared, especially not with him by her side. She could barely make out his silhouette in the darkness. “Where’d you learn how to fly?” his voice echoed against the stone.

“My grandmother’s Z-95 Headhunter Simulator. I was always – ” As they entered a section of steps that had crumbled under the test of weapons or time, Rose released his hand to turn around and climb backward down the debris. She slipped as a piece of stone disintegrated under feet. Her balance tipped her backward. With incredibly quick reflexes, his hand shot out and wrapped around her wrist. He pulled her into him, saving her from a certain fall. His heart thundered in panic, but she stared up at him in awe.

There was something changing between them, she could feel it. It was electric, magnetizing; it felt almost palpable in the air around them. That powerful yearning to kiss him overwhelmed her again, but Rose wasn’t the type to make the same mistake twice. That didn’t stop the flutter in her chest.

She was nearly distracted from the words when his voice vibrated through her chest. “You were always, what?”

“Clumsy and awkward,” she whispered as he huffed a soft chuckle. “I was quite talented at crashing that ship, though.”

“So… nothing’s changed then?” he said with a smug half-smirk. She shoved him playfully in the arm and turned to quickly finish the descent down the stairwell. She giggled as he scrambled down the steps after her. He caught her at the bottom, lifting her off her feet with one arm. “Let’s see you escape me now!” His laugh was infectious, but if she’d had the breath to spare, she would have told him that she would never dream of escaping him. The laughter died, however, and her feet touched the floor again as they both noticed the two stone sarcophagi pushed back against the far wall.

Rose crossed the distance in wonder, sliding her fingers over the smooth stone. The people buried there must have been important; great craftsmanship and time had been dedicated to carving them. They had mattered to someone, but they were all but forgotten to history. Their names, their stories, everyone that remembered them were gone. Even their bones encased in that stone could have become nothing more than dust centuries ago. All that was left as proof that they lived was carvings on a slab of stone.

At first, it was depressing, but her opinion changed the longer she considered it. Of all the billions of beings that had existed in the galaxy – who had lived, died, and were forever lost to the stars – at least there was proof that these people had lived. Their stories may have been forgotten, but they still mattered to the two young people that happened upon them, if only for a moment. It was macabre but oddly beautiful. “How did you join the Resistance?” Finn asked from the darkness on the other side of the sarcophagus.

“The First Order stole our mines and forced the others to work as slaves in miserable conditions to power their murder machines. My sister came to me one night and told me that we had to stop the First Order, or our world would be destroyed by the pollution and our people would continue dying until there was no one left. So we did. We blew up a dozen OreDiggers, and they had to shut down production for a few days. That gave us time to escape to the Resistance to join the fight against the First Order. I thought my parents begged us to go because the Resistance was the best chance to defeat the evil, but I think they did it to save us. I found out once we joined that the First Order used our world in a weapons test. Everyone was gone in an instant.”

“I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have—”

Rose smiled, though she knew he couldn’t see it. “It’s okay, I like talking about them. It keeps their memory alive, you know?” Finn rapped his knuckles across the stone as if he was contemplating the significance of those buried there as well. When his hand met hers on the stone, he grasped her fingers gently. They kept their hands clasped as they met at the base of the sarcophagus. Finn led her away, and Rose felt a clench of sorrow in her chest. How long would it be until the two people buried there were found again? Decades? Centuries?

“I wish I could’ve done that, for Slip,” Finn said softly as they walked aimlessly through the darkness. “Buried him.” Rose’s steps faltered at his admission, but she corrected it swiftly. It was the first time Finn had opened up to her about his past. Certainly, he had told her stories, but never how he felt about it. Finn had made the choice not to fight for the First Order, and, eventually, he found his reason to fight for the Resistance, but she never knew anything deeper. He didn’t regret defecting, she could tell that much, but his stories of the other stormtroopers sounded surprisingly fond. Those were men they would have to actively fight against in the inevitable war.

Rose was cautious with her words. She knew this was significant to him. “Your friend in the stormtrooper program? You didn’t tell me he died.”

“It was on Tuanul, our first battle. I knew he wasn’t ready, but I thought I could protect him. War was different than the simulations.” In the corridor before them, there was a ghostly ray of light. A crack through the stone in the ceiling was large enough to allow moonlight through from the Barkhesh sky. As they passed through the light, Rose saw tears illuminated on his face. With a soft jerk of his hand, she stopped him, and he turned to her with a profound sorrow in his eyes she would never have expected.

“I only realized after Poe told his version of the battle, but I think… I think he killed Slip. I wasn’t fast enough, and Slip was shot. I held his hand as he died. And no one in the First Order cared. He was nothing to them; they left him where he fell. So I chose not to fight, because I realized I didn’t have a reason to fight anymore. But Kylo Ren noticed; he stopped in the middle of battle and stared at me. He had every reason to kill me, but he didn’t, and I’ll never know why. When we got back to the Finalizer, Phasma asked me to submit my weapon for evaluation. She would have seen that I didn’t fire it.”

“I was scared, so I ran. I didn’t rescue Poe. I needed him to pilot. I’m here now because I couldn’t save my best friend from the man who became my best friend.” Rose was taken aback by the admission. Finn had lost Slip. He had tried, and thought he failed, to save Poe on Jakku. When Rey was captured, he refused to allow it to happen again. He flew onto an enemy base to save her. What had happened to Slip had clearly shaped him. Had there been others toward whom Finn felt that loyalty? Finn’s relationship with their enemy was more complicated than she had first assumed.
“Slip is the reason why I’m not fighting for the First Order, and I left him out in that desert.”

“Hey.” She curled the fabric of her long, green shirt around her fingers to wipe the tears from his face. “You didn’t leave him; you stayed by his side as he died. You did what you could, Finn, they left him.” Finn nodded in response. His shoulders shuddered as he quietly sobbed. Finn had spoken of his past many times to her since she had awoken, but she had never seen Finn like this.
She wondered distantly if Poe knew the struggles Finn faced. She wondered if anyone did. “And Finn,” she said, cupping his face in her palms so that she could hold his stare, “he might have been the motivator, but you made that choice because you wanted to be more than that.”

Finn brought his hand to his cheek and grasped her hand. His thumb drifted soothingly over her skin. “Thank you,” he said, “for listening. And not… judging me. I’m surrounded by all these strong people with stories worse than mine, and I’m crying over a stormtrooper—”

“It’s not a competition.” She smiled tenderly, and he squeezed her hand tighter. “You’ve suffered tremendous loss, and you have every right to feel what you do. I think we all have these moments, and I’m grateful you included me in yours. Slip wasn’t just a stormtrooper, Finn. I heard the way you talk about him. He was your only family before the Resistance. I would never judge you for that.”

“He was,” Finn replied, voice cracking with emotion. “I lost my family and then him and almost Poe and Rey, and I don’t know if I could do that again. I don’t know if I’m strong enough.” With that admission, Rose understood. Finn wasn’t pushing her away because he didn’t care for her, but because he did. He was afraid of losing the ones he cared about most, and he thought keeping her at a safe distance would protect him from more pain. It wouldn’t. She knew Finn loved with all his heart, whether he admitted it to himself or not. He couldn’t run from it.

Rose chose to be brave. She stepped closer and placed her other hand on his solid chest. “I understand. I lost everyone, too, and I know that fear. It’s hard to open your heart when the people you love could be taken from you. That’s the reality of war; that is what I knew I was signing up for.
Wherever she is, my sister doesn’t regret it, and neither will I, even if I lose my life or the people I care for. We are fighting for the future of the galaxy, and that means sacrificing our own promise of tomorrow. I could die tomorrow, you could die tomorrow – all we have is this day. This moment. I would rather love and lose, than spend all my ‘todays’ safe, but alone. When I die, whenever the Force decides it to be, I couldn’t think of a better death than leaving with those I love by my side. Otherwise, what’s the point of living? Do you know what I mean?”

Rose had barely finished before his lips crashed into hers. Rose gasped into his mouth as his other hand pulled her into his embrace. He held her tightly against him, and she had never felt so safe.
Her hands slid back into his hair as she lost herself in the warmth and weightlessness of his kiss.
When she finally dragged her lips away from his, they were both panting and out of breath. In the moonlight that enveloped them, there was a hopeful peace in his eyes that had been missing for days. He smiled, something soft and tender. “I think I’m beginning to.”

Chapter End Notes

Brief mention of death

Rose and Finn encounter a tomb
Jealousy

Rose misunderstands Finn and feels brief jealousy
Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Kylo forcefully opened the hatch and climbed out of the cockpit into the vast hangar. After checking Blue over for damage, he stumbled in a daze around the right side of the fighter to survey the extent of the destruction. He paused as a wave of nausea rolled through him. His knees buckled under his trembling weight, and he used the Force to remain upright. He pinched the bridge his nose, clearing the tears forming in the corners of his eyes in the process.

He was a naïve, weak-minded fool. He believed it was real. Again. As if he would ever be wanted for more than power. He had only ever been an enemy to her. She hated him, wanted nothing to do with him, just like everyone else. He wasn’t surprised to find her with another man – why wouldn’t they gravitate toward her light – but of all the anarchists she could have chosen, she kissed Dameron. And she did it when she knew he was there. She probably dragged him there for that sole purpose, because he knew he hadn’t been thinking of her while engaged in a dog-fight with pirates.

Why did she choose Dameron? Did she know their history? Had she chosen Leia’s surrogate son because she knew it would torment him? Kylo had been inside the pilot’s mind. Dameron would never appreciate her strength in the Force, he would never understand her. Not like Kylo did. He would fear her as they all feared Ben Solo. He would never understand how special she was. Poe Dameron hadn’t allowed himself to be close to anyone but a droid since his mother died. His only interest in her was superficial. Carnal

Another wave of nausea crashed over him.

The usual anger burned underneath his skin, pumping forcefully through his veins. Hatred was there too. And, of course, the sharp, cold claws of the darkness dragging him into the shadows where creatures like him belonged. He had always lived in the shadows; first in the shadows of legends and then in the shadows of darkness. And that was the worst part – why he hated seeing her with the traitor and the pilot. Or his mother. They were everything he was not. He and Rey had a connection that no one else had, but she didn’t see the bond as anything but a curse. Why wouldn’t she, he would never be anything but a monster. He had thought he could be enough for Rey, that she understood him, that she wanted him. She wanted him all right – wanted him as a power piece like a Mantellian Savrip in her galactic wargame. He had never been good enough, he would never be good enough; not for Sidious or the First Order or the Knights, not for his parents or his uncle or his grandfather.

Not for Rey.

Or himself.

His stomach twisted as something darker possessed his senses. It was at once burning, tearing and crushing him into nothing. He wasn't certain whether his difficulty breathing or the overwhelming desire to empty his stomach was more pressing. His body was shaking, and if there hadn't been stormtroopers watching his every move, he would have dropped to his knees, screamed until his voice was hoarse and pounded the floor with his fists until they were bloody and raw to match the wounded ache in his chest.

The despair escalated until every last thought was directed at stabilizing his emotions. He knew it wouldn't work; he had become an expert in his own violent outbursts, and he knew this would not end without destruction. The power of the Force was drawn to his fingers. He clenched them to contain it, but they itched with the need for release. His mind replayed her lips pressed against those of the treacherous drunkard, her hateful words echoing in his ears. He closed his eyes, picturing the softness in her eyes in the hut, her promise, but nothing could neutralize the piercing ache that threatened to overwhelm him.

When the rapidly expanding energy had become uncontrollable, he turned in desperation for a source to unleash the emotions suffocating the Force around him. His eyes settled on an unoccupied TIE fighter. He clenched and unclenched his fists in one last effort for control, but it was useless. As his fingers curled, the frame of the fighter began to buckle, caving in upon itself. Each crunch of metal that further rendered the ship unrecognizable tempered the storm inside him. When his body shuddered, finally exhausted by the uninhibited release of power, the ship was a sparkling heap of twisted metal in the hangar. Part of him felt awe; he’d never destroyed an entire ship before. Despite the violent display, the nauseating ache quickly returned. The images of Rey with Leia’s surrogate son replayed relentlessly in his mind.

_I told you, the echo of a dead voice whispered in his mind. You’re a monster... Something to be feared...They all hate you...They never loved you....No one will ever love you...They lie to you...They will always betray you...You’re nothing to them...But power... Power never lies... Power never leaves...You could have been more powerful than Vader...But you have your father’s heart, young Solo...You are weak and foolish...Unwise and unbalanced... Because you have compassion for her._

His master may have been gone, but the creature’s persuasive words were forever entrenched in the darkness of his mind. He suppressed a wave of sorrow that threatened to release the tears crashing against the floodgates of his eyes.

_There are troopers here, resist these childish emotions. It meant nothing. She means nothing. Get yourself together, you weak, unbalanced fool. Complete the mission._

A familiar voice echoed over his comlink.

“Supreme Leader.”
“General Hux,” Kylo sighed into the comlink. “I have just made contact with the cargo freighter.” Much to your disappointment, I’m sure. He swept his hair from his forehead and straightened his clothes, making his appearance more orderly out of habit.

“I’m looking at the data reports as we speak. The Silencer’s deflector shield generator and weapons systems are all online and functioning within normal parameters,” his general informed him. His insinuating tone immediately irritated Kylo.

“They weren’t when I had to explode a proton torpedo outside my fighter,” he said sharply, clenching his fist to suppress his anger.

I should have created a Force shield... or halted it. But I wasn’t thinking clearly with her around. Again.

“Is there damage?”

“No, I used the Force to explode a torpedo meters from my cockpit, but there’s no damage at all,” he whispered sarcastically to himself.

“I can complete the mission,” he replied in the comlink.

Hux’s tone was haughty and condescending. “I’ll have my men look at it upon your return. It’s curious, Ren, because the generator does not switch off and on at will, and multiple systems failure is practically unheard of.”

We’ll see what Sienar-Jaemus has to say about Blue’s data. I know what I experienced.“It’s curious indeed, Hux.”

“Perhaps it is time to admit that the Supreme Leader does not belong in the front lines battle?”

“Duly noted, General.” He switched the comlink off.
A dozen pirates who were successful in breaking through the cargo freighter’s defenses had been hunted down and assembled in the hangar by a squad of stormtroopers. They awaited his orders on the fate of the prisoners. Though it was all semblance, they knew the order that would be given. There was only one fate for terrorists against the First Order. There are no prisoners; the only reprieve is a delayed execution. And these pirates have no useful information to necessitate a delay.

As he lumbered toward the group, a lone starship casually entered the hangar. The stormtroopers raised their blasters, but he dismissed them with a wave of his hand. He was intrigued. Who would be bold or foolish enough to land a starship on a First Order cargo freighter at the feet of the Supreme Leader without a single offensive strike? He felt inexplicably drawn to the ship as if destiny itself awaited him on board.

The boarding ramp lowered, and he stopped at the bottom, waiting in apprehensive anticipation. A short, orange humanoid alien approached him, supporting her weight on a cane. The creature did not appear threatening – dressed in a gray cap, sweater, and pants with a darker gray vest. The only articles of clothing that weren’t gray were the creature’s brightly colored socks. His instinct fettered his nerves. Nothing about this creature read “dangerous,” but he knew better than anyone that appearances were deceiving. His intuition further cautioned against a false sense of security the moment he recognized her energy as one of a Force-sensitive.

Kylo was grateful his mental shields had been secured fully in an attempt to block Rey from the explosion. He left them in place to mask his emotional turmoil from the bond, refusing to allow her to know how deeply she had affected him. Those concerns were abandoned in the face of a more formidable opponent. This humanoid was strong in the Force; he had to assume she had the skills of his former master. In an attempt to better conceal his vulnerable emotions, he focused the majority of his energy toward the shields, as he would if he were standing before Sidious himself.

There was something about her that captivated him, however, that immediately lulled him into complacency. Before he could contemplate his impetuous actions, he had knelt before her. How powerful was she in the Force to command his deference without the familiar blanket of mind control? It was terrifying.

“Supreme Leader, I presume,” she said, adjusting her large, corrective goggles over her venerable brown irises. Her magnified eyes intently studied his, her stare penetrating straight through any shield he had fortified against her. For a man prone to concealing his expressive features with a mask, this type of vulnerability was a threat he actively fought to avoid. But the moment was almost dreamlike – trancelike – and the fear, mistrust, and defensiveness that should have overwhelmed him was bizarrely missing. He knew she could read his soul like a book, but he did not attempt to withdraw from her knowing stare. Instead, he found himself craving to know her judgment, holding her gaze expectantly as if she was the embodiment of the Cosmic Force.
He accepted her extended hand respectfully. “To what do I owe the pleasure?”

“I am Maz, dear, and I have come to request the release of those men,” she smiled, indicating the pirates behind him. Who was she to demand that of him?

“Maz Kanata,” he said. “And what makes you believe you are in a position to negotiate?” His voice was hesitant. He may have had the galaxy in the palm of his hand, but instinctively he understood that he was far out of his depth with her. She was unsettlingly quiet as she leaned closer and readjusted her goggles. After a moment, she nodded to herself and smiled.

Kylo knew he should swallow his question, turn around and get back in his ship. He should go back to the First Order and pretend none of it had happened. He should focus on his treasonous general and severing the bond. But he found the words tumbling out anyway. “What do you think you see?”

“I see the conflict in your eyes, dear child,” she said...kindly. There was not a flicker of fear in her eyes, only the same kindness he had heard it in her words. He had burned down her temple; she had every reason not to treat him kindly.

“You’re Force-sensitive, I am sure you can feel it in the Force as well,” he said categorically, attempting to gain control of the discussion. “My conflict is not some great secret. Those stormtroopers behind me could likely fill holobooks with their stories about my ‘conflict.’ Is that why you don’t fear me? Do you, unwisely, believe you can get what you want by stoking my inner conflict? Or trying to turn me? Save me? I do not need more blood of the good-intentioned on my hands. I have inspired enough people to make foolish decisions in the name of the conflict they thought they saw in me.”

“I agree that it would be unwise to try to save you,” she said, narrowing her eyes as she studied his response, “as only you have the capability to do that. I can only speak the truth as I see it, but your last statement is curious. Do you truly believe those who acted out of love for you were foolish?”

_They never loved me. I was only ever _worth my power in the Force_.

That was not a box he would open with her. Her presence held him in an almost trance-like state, the truth spilling from his lips unrestricted, but her last question unmuted the screams of self-preservation from his intuition. She couldn’t be trusted. That lightsaber was supposed to be _his_ when he had become a Jedi Knight. Lando had hidden his grandfather’s lightsaber from him, he knew that much. And Rey had said she touched the lightsaber on Takodana. Why Kylo had never considered Lando – and Han’s – ‘friend the “Pirate Queen” was anyone’s guess. She had kept it hidden away in her temple. Until Han had brought Rey, the traitor, and the droid to her. Maz couldn’t be trusted, because she had given away his lightsaber to her, and then she had given it the traitor! If the lightsaber had remained hidden away, then perhaps the Force would have never connected them, and he would have been content with her hating him. “I believe giving away my grandfather’s saber is foolish.”

Maz, to her credit, didn’t miss a beat. “The lightsaber called to her.”

“It belonged to me.”

“Not anymore,” she said firmly, but not unkindly. “You chose a destiny that betrayed that legacy.”

He shook his head. No, she was wrong. He had done everything to fulfill the legacy of the monster everyone feared he would become. What did Maz know of that legacy? What did anyone, other than the man destined to become him? “This is the legacy of my grandfather.”

“The truth is inside you, it always has been. The legacy of your grandfather was not this.”

“His legacy was to bring balance to the Force through darkness,” he challenged. Kylo knew the legacy well, better than anyone. Vader was unrivaled in his power in the Force. He would have brought order and law to the galaxy. He did. The New Republic destroyed the progress that had been made, but that was the legacy. Kylo was fulfilling it.

“That is not shocking conviction for a boy who calls himself ‘Kylo Ren,’” she smiled, patting him gently. “You have much to learn.”

“I am Kylo Ren,” he insisted.

“I have been alive for centuries, dear boy. I have seen the rise and fall of empires in many different forms. The battle has always been the same: the light versus the dark. That has been the only fight... and I see that fight now – in you. You see, if you live long enough, you recognize the same eyes in different people, and I have seen evil in many different eyes. The eyes in front of me now, however, do not belong to an evil man. They do not belong to a man named Kylo Ren. You know who you are; I would recognize your eyes anywhere, young Solo.”

“How can you not see evil in my eyes? You know what I’ve done.”
“Evil actions do not necessarily make an evil man, evil intentions do,” she said. Her lips flickered into a regretful smile. “If you wish to know evil, remember the eyes of the man who created Kylo Ren. You have been led astray, but these are your first steps in correcting your wayward path. You have ancient eyes, dear child, eyes of a soul meant for destinies more important this.”

“Led astray?” he scoffed. “No. You cannot possibly know what I’ve done – who I’ve done it to – there is nothing that can change what I did. It’s too late for regret. I stood by and said nothing as they obliterated an entire system, not all of them government officials, and I still stand behind the justification of their reasoning. I have murdered entire villages. I have tortured and killed hundreds in the name of the Order. Children. I murdered my own father. I intended to do all of that. It doesn’t matter what you see in my eyes, or what you think you see. I am as evil as my master was.”

“Your defense only serves to prove my point. You know your actions were wrong, and you desire to change. Your only hindrance is your misguided belief that you no longer have a choice. Your intentions have always been guided by another. You do not have a master plan to control and enslave the galaxy; you want revenge for what you’ve suffered and the power that gives you the control to do it. You want a destiny that you have been misled into believing is your only choice. Your eyes are those of a boy who is haunted by his past, who is choosing to run away rather than face it. I see exhaustion from sleepless nights. And loneliness. You fear to stay, but also, fear to leave –”

“Stop.”

“You know in your heart what I see in your eyes. You know who you truly are, what you have to do. You may very well have to atone for your crimes. Choosing the right path will not absolve you of your sins. But..you are not evil, child. You have chosen a wayward path, but you are not lost. You can still make the right choice, for yourself, and the galaxy. But first, you must let go of the past.”

He dragged his eyes from her piercing stare to watch the stormtroopers talking and joking with one another. When they noticed his stare, they stopped. He sighed. “I don’t know how.”

“If you choose salvation, you don’t have to walk the path alone.” His stare returned to hers, and she winked. He wondered exactly what she could discover through only his eyes.

“I can’t,” he whispered.
“No one said it would be easy,” she said with a shrug. “If it was, then salvation and atonement would mean nothing. You know the truth. You search for peace, but the peace you seek will not be found in punishing the sins of the past. Eliminating those who have wronged you and crushing your own identity will not ease the pain you suffered. Nor will tearing yourself apart. You will only find peace in forgiveness, for others and for yourself. I do not envy your path – forgiveness is the most difficult life lesson to learn. But forgiveness is not for them, it’s for you. Remember, your past helped shape you, but it does not define the decisions you make here.... right now. What happens now is your choice and your choice alone.”

“What if I don’t want to be saved?” He expected her to grow frustrated or give up, as anyone else would, but the kindness in her eyes never faltered. “Right or wrong, I chose the path I did. I am broken, the scars will not disappear. I was lost to darkness long ago, and that darkness will only hurt the ones who try to save me. It’s too late.”

“They can keep you pointed in the right direction, but you’re right, no one can save you. This is your course to follow, and your choice to make.” She hummed. “Though, I wonder, how many other creatures of darkness worried about hurting the ones they loved? I believe you are not as far gone as you may think.”

Kylo broke her stare again, searching for his droid in the hangar. Blue was arguing with a sentry droid. “As deep as your emotional scars run,” Maz said, attempting to regain his focus. “I see your yearning for love and belonging, which led you down this path in the first place. And I fear that for you, life would be meaningless without love, because you have a great propensity for it.”

“I don’t know how to love,” he said distractedly as he watched the droids. Evidently, the sentry droid did something Blue didn’t like, and he shocked the white droid. Kylo suppressed a smirk.

“You don’t know how to be loved,” she corrected.

That’s because no one ever loved me. Not that he expected them to, there wasn’t much about him to love. “Love is a weakness. It’s foolish. It hurts…”

“The essence of love is forgiveness, young Solo.” She said it as if she knew anything about his life. He had tried, and he had failed. He turned back to face her as the old wounds of betrayal and abandonment were reopened.

“And what about me? Who’ll forgive me? I’m a monster, a burden. They hate me. They never wanted me. They never loved me. They will never love –”
Maz’s voice was the coldest he had heard it yet. “Are those your lies or his?”

“They’re not lies. No one has ever loved me. They said it, but they didn’t mean it. I know it.” It didn’t matter where the words had come from, it was the truth. She could say what she wanted, but he’d lived it. His own family didn’t want him. They lied to him, they left him, and they tried to kill him. He didn’t know much about love, but he knew that wasn’t it. “Love always has conditions. The problem is no one tells me what they are.”

“They failed you, yes, but they loved you,” she said. “I was dear friends with your father; I know his heart well. It is the same heart beating inside you. It is the same heart that will save you if you just listen to it.”

“My father’s heart led to his death at my hands. It was foolish and... meaningless.”

“Was it?” she smiled knowingly, placing her hand on his cheek as his father had when he drew his last breath. Kylo winced at the contact, but controlled the violent reaction that bubbled up inside him. The memory broke through his defenses, and the words left his lips before he had a chance to catch himself.

“What does it matter? I can’t change the past, and I can’t be who I once was. It’s too late.”

Maz raised her cane until it was pressed against his wounded side. He watched as she pressed it forward and a sharp pain radiated up his side. When his mind had broken through the shock, he backed away with a hiss.

“What did you do that for!”

Maz smiled. “What does it matter? It can’t be changed. It's in the past.”

“Still hurts,” he grumbled.

“Of course, the past hurts, child. Life leaves us with scars as reminders of what we have overcome. They are reminders of how they have shaped us into who we are. That doesn’t make the wounds that formed them any less painful. The past will always be behind you no matter how much time and energy you waste in trying to pretend it isn’t there. Erasing the past and the pain we endured would be easy, but that would require erasing who we are. Good or bad, the past is part of you. There are only two options. Stay the course, run from your past….” Kylo sensed movement in the Force. She lifted the cane again, quicker this time, but he was ready for it. He manipulated the Force to freeze the cane before it contacted his wounded side.

“Ah, see?” she smiled. “The other option. You learned from it.”

“You know this isn’t that simple.”

“No, but that doesn’t make it any less true. When I look into your eyes, I see the eyes of a boy resigned to his fate, but your father was right. And so was that girl. It’s not too late.”

His heart surged, and he became increasingly aware of its steady beat. It was as if it had been dead and the mention of her had awoken it again. “What girl?” Maz stared directly through his pretense.

“Your heart knows what girl, kiddo. And I will tell you the same thing I told her moments before your paths collided. ‘The belonging you seek is not behind you, it is ahead.’ And to your father, I told him, ‘Go home.’ You and your father are more similar than you’d like to think,” she chuckled. “On that note, I’m going to go collect my men and bring them home. Or, whatever is left of the castle you destroyed.” She began to walk away, and only then – when her knowing stare was fixated somewhere else – did the trance-like state shatter.

“What does all of this matter?” He called after her. “The peace, the salvation, the belonging – what does it matter if it ends in my death? That is the only way this can end.”

“Yes, it is,” she agreed, “But isn’t that how it ends for us all? It’s only important what we do before we get there.”

“Wait.” She had begun to walk away, but his hesitant voice halted her her steps. When he didn’t continue, she turned to face him. He extended his right arm toward her, palm outward, with his fingers splayed. Any of the other sentients in the hangar who had the unfortunate experience of a run-in with Kylo Ren would presume he was preparing to physically assault or psychologically torture her with the Force. Not even a glimmer of fear crossed Maz Kanata’s eyes, however, as she returned his stare. After a moment, he lowered his arm.

“What are they?” she asked, referring to the memory of numbers she had willingly allowed him to force into her mind.

“Coordinates.”

She smiled perceptively, her eyes alight in the secret the two shared. “But she stays away from the Falcon.” Maz nodded once and then chuckled to herself. With that, she made her way to the other pirates. The troopers turned toward him, and he nodded half-heartedly in acknowledgment. Kylo stood in silence as she escorted the pirates onto her ship. He watched the ship take off and disappear into the stars. Only when he could no longer sense her presence did the calm blanket over his emotions fade away. The anger, fear and self-loathing returned. He stalked to the other end of the hangar and stopped before the stormtroopers.

“There were no survivors,” he dictated, waving his hand as he manipulated their minds with the Force. Then he turned on his heels and made his way to his damaged fighter without looking back.
Chapter End Notes

Jealousy

Kylo is still reacting poorly to that kiss

Mild violence

Kylo crushes a TIE fighter
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey was surrounded by her makeshift family, at a makeshift table, in the large temple hall that had been transformed into a makeshift mess hall, inside their makeshift base. Her neck was sore from her makeshift bed, and she was hopelessly lost in the foreign language of the Jedi text that would help her become a makeshift Jedi for a makeshift rebellion in a war she wanted nothing to do with. Rey had always been able to make something out of nothing – that wasn’t the problem. It was that she had been given a glimpse of something real – a home, a belonging – it was the one thing she could never have, and the only thing she wanted. It darkened the joy of everything else.

It was night, the moon high over Barkesh, and the others were… drunk. Rey tried to understand when they told her they did it to forget, but she couldn’t help the resentment she felt when she remembered what her parents had done to her for the vile liquid. She sat quietly, an outsider, as they shared animated stories of their travels, of how they met, of how they survived their missions against the First Order. The people of the Resistance were kind to her, offered her friendship, yet she still felt as if she were alone. She was different; they didn’t understand her. There was only one person who did, but he was their enemy. She wondered whether he had ever felt lonely in a crowded room. Growing irritated with herself for allowing her thoughts to wander again, she tried harder to fit in with people who offered her everything she should want.

Poe spoke of his harrowing escapes from the First Order in the early days of the Resistance. Finn told stories of his and Rose’s rough start and their adventures on Canto Bight. Rose told stories of her sister and her bravery in the face of evil. Rey half-listened quietly, enjoying their tales of love and failure, and, ultimately, hope. They all had their defining moments that brought them to the Resistance, their reason to fight. But she couldn’t share; what could she say?

She had never intended to join the Resistance. She knew it was the right thing to do to help Finn return Beebee-Ate and the map to the Resistance, but her plan was always to go back to Jakku. Finn had asked her to run away with him, but she didn’t. When faced with the Force vision from Luke’s lightsaber, she wanted nothing to do with it. She ran. Right into Kylo. She had no plans for when she escaped, but she had never considered finding the Resistance, not until Finn and Han risked their lives to rescue her.

If Kylo hadn’t killed Han, if Finn’s life hadn’t hung in the balance, if she hadn’t become some sort of hero to them for defeating him – then she wouldn’t have gone to Luke in search of answers. She thought Luke would help her. Maz had told her she would find her belonging if she brought him back. But he wouldn’t teach her, he wouldn’t help her find her belonging – he only came back long enough to save them.

Someone had been there for her, however – someone who didn't fight for the Resistance. How could she find belonging with them when she couldn’t tell them the truth? How could she share her hopes when they’d call her insane, or worse, treasonous? How could she share her failures when they wouldn’t mourn them with her? For better or worse, she was connected eternally with another person, and she couldn’t share her feelings about it with any of them. She couldn’t sleep, couldn’t eat, couldn’t think since he disappeared, because she was sick with worry, but she couldn’t explain it. They wouldn’t understand if she told them what was tearing her apart. She was an outsider, as she always had been. She loved them, but they had no idea who she was.

Artoo interrupted her focus as he beeped in binary across the table at Poe. She had been lost in her own thoughts, but she caught the words 'holocall' and 'Nal Hutta.' Poe eyed her carefully before turning to Artoo. Thankfully Beebee-Ate created a distraction when he came careening out from under the table and bumped into Artoo. That set off a droid argument in binary that carried on out into the hall. With the distraction, she could have let the matter drop entirely.

The words left her lips before she considered them. “Nal Hutta? Isn't that the Hutts? Why would you have a holocall from there?”

“You misheard; he said 'Nakadia,” Poe said, his voice even, though slightly slurred. He hid his lie well, his face was open and honest, but she knew what she heard. She knew what she felt in the Force. “It's a mid-rim agricultural world; it was the location of the New Republic Senate when I was young.” It might have been enough for her friends, but for her, it confirmed everything she needed to know. Poe was not to be trusted. He was hiding something.

She should have dropped it, or at least attempted to hide her accusatory tone. She had her own secrets, after all. “I guess I need to brush up on my binary.”

“I guess I need a hearing enhancer since, I swear, when I walked by your room the other night, I heard –”

“Rey, how are you?” Finn asked suddenly, knocking over his cup of liquor in his enthusiasm. The alcohol sloshed over the table, red like blood. She closed her eyes in her desperate attempt not to imagine that it looked just like the blood she had spilled on Starkiller – Kylo’s blood – on the night he nearly died by her hand. Now the bond was silent, and she feared the worst. If he was… if he was gone, then it would be all her fault. She had distracted him from his mission. She had said cruel, unnecessary things… again. “Sorry,” he apologized, wiping up the liquid he had spilled. He must have noticed she was near tears, because his face was shadowed with concern. “Rey?”

“I’m fine,” she replied. She could feel Poe’s eyes on her, but she refused to meet his challenging stare.
Finn either didn’t understand that her blunt tone was a deliberate attempt to change the subject, or he was too drunk to notice. “I’m worried about you. I think we all are. You seem distant lately, especially after whatever happened to you the other night between you and –”

“We’re not talking about that,” Poe interrupted him, eyes suddenly downcast at the food he was pushing around his plate. The food he was wasting.

“Well, you know what I mean,” Finn murmured with a lazy wave of his hand. “You barely ever come out of your room, which you keep in a constant state of darkness. You never smile anymore. We miss the old Rey.”

The old Rey was weak... a fool... what does a stormtrooper know of the complexities of the Force... can he not see your strength... your power? I told you... they don’t understand you... when they see how powerful you are... your friends will fear you... they will not trust you... when they see you can’t be the Jedi they want you to be... they will abandon you... the voice reminded her.

Her eyes snapped to his as darkness surged through her veins. “The old Rey... that you knew for, what, a day before I went to train with Luke?” she replied spitefully. Part of her knew it was the darkness talking, that he was just drunk, that she should walk away before she said something she regretted to him as well. But the darkness spurred her on.

“Maybe this is Rey. Or maybe I’m tired of everyone looking to me to be someone I’m not. I’ve never had to rely on anyone, and I’ve never had anyone rely on me. And I liked it that way! I understand we all have responsibilities, but because I am the only Force user here – something I only realized I had a few weeks ago – I have been pushed into the center of this war that I never wanted to be a part of, to begin with. Now I’m stuck training myself, because the only Jedi left refused, even though he was the uncle of my bitter enemy and the one who pushed him to the dark side in the first place. And now I have no one to help me. All I have to learn from now – to be this heroic Jedi you all think I am – is Luke’s Jedi texts. What if I don’t want to be what everyone expects me to be? I have no way to read them, no way to train, no way to learn if this is even something I believe in. So I’m sorry if I don’t smile enough for you, Finn.”

Finn looked properly chastened, even in his drunken state. “Rey, I’m sorr–”

“You could always ask Kylo Ren for help,” Poe suggested dryly. The entire table grew quiet as if the thought was on all their minds. Was that it? Was that why she felt like an outsider? They were all thinking the same thing; they didn’t trust her either. They feared her power. No one else would give voice to what Poe was bold enough – or his lips loose enough from intoxication – to say. Their silence in defending her, however, was telling. Rey stood up from her seat in a fury, slamming the book on the table. “No, don’t bother. I’ll go,” he sneered, “I’ve got a holocall to Nakadia to make.” He grabbed his drink from the table, abandoning his food, and walked away with Beebee-Ate in tow. Rey continued hurriedly collecting her things.

“You don’t have to go, Rey,” Finn said softly, placing his hand over her things.

This was her chance. Hadn’t she been looking for a reason to leave all along? “I do; I can’t be around that stuff,” she said, gesturing to the alcohol. “It reminds me too much that my parents sold me for drinking money.”

She could see the pity in their eyes, and it only added fuel to her anger. They didn’t understand. If they said anything else, she ignored them as she gathered her things. She didn’t want to hear their apologies or empty platitudes. She didn’t want to be told about how it had made her into this delusion of a Jedi they all believed in. There was no point trying to explain anything to them. They wouldn’t believe her, because they didn’t trust her. Poe was lying to them all; why couldn’t they see it? Why didn’t they care about that? He was the one who shouldn’t be trusted. And she wouldn’t let it go. He would pay for what he was doing to the Resistance.

Maybe she would go to Leia and explain what she’d overheard. That would require not doing everything in her power to avoid Leia – which she had done since she asked the woman if Kylo was alive. She knew Leia suspected something. Worse, ever since the night when he walked into her room as she whispered Kylo’s name, Poe suspected something. What he suspected, she wasn’t certain, but he wasn’t stupid. If she revealed her suspicions about Poe, would he reveal his about her and Kylo?

A small shift of energy interrupted her thoughts. She stilled, her hand hovering over her book. “I can feel him.”

“Rey?” Rose asked hesitantly.

“I can feel him again,” she whispered, so quietly it was barely audible. “I have to go.” She moved in a daze, absently gathering the remainder of her belongings and wandering back toward her temple room without another word to her friends.

“Finn, what just happened between Rey and Poe? What is all of this about Kylo Ren?” Rose said in a baffled, hushed tone. Finn knew that he needed help. Despite her assertions, Rey was changing, for the worse. He had no doubt who was doing it to her. She wanted time to gain control over the bond, but, clearly, the bond was gaining control over her. The only thing standing in his way was her trust in him. He stood there – at war with himself – as Rose waited patiently for him to reveal what she was already suspected.

He ran his hand down his face as his shoulders slumped in defeat. “Promise to tell no one?”

“Of course.”

The words cascaded from his mouth in quick, nervous succession. “Then you’re stronger than I am,” he said. “Poe thinks something happened between Rey and the Supreme Leader, which sounds crazy because it’s Rey, but he’s right. Rey has a Force Bond with Kylo Ren.”

“She has a what?” Rose shouted, drawing the attention of the others. She waited for them to go back to their conversations before repeating her question. “She has a what?”

Finn refused to look at her as he continued. He pushed the food around on the tray in front of him, agitated that he had to speak the treacherous words aloud. “A bond. I don’t know much about the Force, but I saw Kylo Ren in her room even though he was physically across the galaxy. They can talk to each other like they’re in the same room. I guess it’s like a holocall, except they can… touch each other. She could kill him. She swore me to secrecy, but it has been long enough; I think she’s losing control.”

Rose was more confused than angry. The First Order had turned everyone in their mining colony into slaves, eventually killing her family and friends. She had joined the Resistance to fight them, and they had eventually killed her sister. Kylo Ren had almost killed the man she loved and the rest of her family at the Resistance. She had plenty of reasons to hate him and anyone connected to him, but her chest immediately ached in sympathy for her friend. A bond sounded serious. She couldn’t imagine a worse torture than having to be in the same room as her enemy.

“That’s terrible,” Rose whispered. “Poor Rey. No wonder she’s so stressed.”

“She was on the Supremacy with us, trying to turn him. She said he killed Snoke for her, to manipulate her to the dark side. Poe thinks there is more there than Rey is telling us. He thinks she enjoys his company and that he’s trying to turn her against us.”

Rose gasped. “She was on the Supremacy?”

“With him,” he sneered. “She willingly went to him, Rosie. After everything he did! Maybe…”
he is manipulating her. She seems like she’s hiding something. Whoever she’s been thinking about since the other night, she doesn’t hate him, that’s for sure.”

“No, no, no, I think you’ve got it all wrong,” she insisted. “Okay, I don’t want to betray her trust, but the alternative seems worse. Here it goes. She has very strong feelings for a different guy, someone she met in the Force. I can’t tell you whom, but he is most definitely not Kylo Ren. She had a fight with him the other night, and that was why she was so upset. I think that is what she has been hiding.”

Hope bloomed in his eyes again. “You’re sure?”

“Yes!” Rose assured him. “I know his name. He has ties to the Resistance, that’s all I can say. This bond might play a part in her stress, but I think most of her sadness is about him. As far as I know, he left and hasn’t come back.”

“They got in a fight?” His eyes darkened, his tone was protective. “Did he hurt her?”

“No, I think she hurt him,” Rose said carefully. “Their relationship is... complicated. I think she is afraid of the obviously strong feelings she has for him and has been pushing him away.”

“Thank you!” He swept Rose into his arms. “I mean, I still have to threaten her boyfriend with death to make sure he never hurts her, but I thought... this is... this is such a relief.” He kissed Rose’s forehead in relief, and she softened into his strong embrace. She wondered if Ben Solo knew about Rey’s bond with Kylo Ren. Leia’s son was the only other Force-user she was aware of, could he be the key to helping Rey?

Rose considered talking to Leia, asking her about her son. She wouldn’t betray Rey, but she could ask if anyone else on the base was in contact with him. Rose could contact him through a holocall to understand where Ben Solo stood when it came to Rey. Perhaps she could convince him to return to help her friend. If Rey had a bond with the enemy in the Force, she needed help, and he could be the only one strong enough in the Force to help her. If he loved her, she knew he would return to the Resistance to protect her.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey stumbled into her temple room, dropping most of her belongings directly inside the threshold. She felt as if a tension, like a breath she had never exhaled, was finally released when she had physical proof of her bondmate being alive. Ben is okay. He really is okay. She clutched Luke’s text to her chest, collapsing onto the stone slab that was her bed. With a sigh, she dropped her head and released the tears she was withholding.

Much to her dismay, but not to her surprise, the Force chose that vulnerable moment to connect her to the man on her mind. The buzzing in her ears faded as a solid form materialized beside her on the bed. She desperately tried to dry her eyes with the heels of her hands, but the tears were unrelenting. Her attempts to suppress her tears only proved to further deteriorate her state into hiccuppying sobs. She was too weary to scramble away from his warmth, too exhausted to fight. She placed her face in her hands in shame, waiting for his cruel comments. She was at her weakest; he could have broken her down. If their positions were reversed, she would have seized the opportunity.

He did not utter any of the cruel words she knew he was capable of. He recognized her vulnerability and stayed with her in silent support. Rey found herself inconsolable in her sobbing, because, in that moment, he was exactly what she needed him to be. This was the man from the hut, the man she wished he could be.

I’m sorry I’m here. Just pretend I’m someone else, someone who could actually bring you comfort, his strained, deep voice echoed in her mind.

At his miserable words, she found herself leaning against him, crying into the dark, thick material on his arm. He tensed at the contact but didn’t pull away. Rey didn’t know how long he sat there with her. It could have been two minutes, two hours, two days... stars could have been born and died and their energy reborn in the time she spent lost in his comforting warmth.

His presence, not any of the other people who wanted her to let them in, was what she needed in that moment. It terrified her, because she knew without warning he would be snapped back across the galaxy, too soon. The only residual testament to the events that unfolded between them would be a phantom sensation where his touch had been. Later, when she sat alone in her cold, lonely room, she knew their time together would seem like merely a flicker of a flame in the expanse of their existence. Would its significance be as inconsequential as well? Maybe it would be for him, but she felt more alive in one innocent touch of their fingers on Ahch-To than she had her entire life.
on Jakku. She could tell herself later it meant nothing, and perhaps she would to assuage her guilt, but as she did, she would know it was a lie.

Eventually, the sobs faded, the tears dried, and the only sound was the quiet inhale and exhale of their slow, deep breaths. The warmth she felt was not the pooling heat that she had felt recently at his touch. This was a beaming inside her, like sunlight within. The irony was not lost on her that Kylo Ren, Supreme Leader, master of the Knights of Ren, was – in that moment – offering her only his sympathy and companionship; no manipulation, deceit or malice. Just... Ben. The ever-changing vacillation between this man and the one who broke her heart was draining and confusing. But sitting there with him felt right after days of worry.

“Who hurt you?” His voice was gruff with sleep or disuse. It startled her; his baritone voice rumbling through their converged bodies just as her eyelids began to flutter with the heaviness of sleep.

“Why?” she quipped half-heartedly. “Would you kill him?”

“Would you want me to?” His voice was tinged with cynicism as he dropped his head to study his hands.

Rey knew she should separate herself from him; they were enemies after all, but he was warm and smelled like thermite, and she decided she had a newfound love for that smell. He was safe. She wasn't going to consider too deeply why that mattered to her. “No, Ben,” she sighed “But since when do you care what I want?” He hummed, and she had the distinct feeling she was wrong, that he cared to know exactly what she thought. When she realized he had no intention of answering, she continued. “If I wanted him dead, I’d kill him myself.”

“Of that... I have no doubt,” he replied in amusement, shaking his head as he huffed a near chuckle.

She had to stifle her own grin. “Is that almost... humor, Ben?”

“Perhaps.”

She wanted to turn and search his face, see the softness in his features that she knew would be there, but the peace between them was fragile. She didn’t want to break it. “That is the least brooding tone I have ever heard you use.”
He snorted softly in response. “I doubt I sounded brooding when I told you how beautiful you are.”

Those words did something funny to her insides. She couldn’t breathe, couldn’t swallow, couldn’t blink for a moment, as if she were a malfunctioning droid, but there was a fluttering inside her like dozens of winged beasts attempting to escape. It was both grounding and destabilizing.

You remember that.

There was not a single chance she would ever say those words aloud or acknowledge his statement, for that matter. Their bond was generally a sparking tangle of fervent energy between them. Whether positive or negative, the comforting consistency was the intensity. Something had changed. In that moment, their words were irrelevant. The bond hummed with a content and relaxed familiarity – a recognition of naked honesty and empathetic understanding. It felt domestic and intimate. It terrified her because it felt right to be there with him, as she questioned her place at the Resistance. Speaking of the Resistance...

“Ben, would the Resistance have any reason to form an alliance with the Hutts?” She hoped he would let their earlier conversation die. He had never been one to do that, and he had zero reason to ignore her attempt at avoidance, but she hoped he would allow her to exchange that vulnerability for another.

He did.

His head lifted from where it had been bowed, and she knew he was studying her. She could feel the heat of his stare. “Why?”

Rey couldn’t see the expression on his face, but she could imagine the confusion based on the higher tone of his voice. “That's what I'm asking you. Hypothetically, if the Resistance formed an alliance with them, why would they?”

Kylo was quiet for a moment, thoroughly considering her question. For the first time, Rey appreciated that about him; he was ever the student, always thinking, analyzing and challenging her viewpoint. If he wasn’t focused on galactic domination, she would have appreciated it more. To ignore the brief reminder of who exactly he had chosen to be, she burrowed into his warmth further. After a moment, Kylo spoke, “Because they already have before.” She couldn’t discern whether he sounded amused or bitter. Maybe both.
It was her turn to navigate her confusion. “When? Why?”

“Your… pilot.” It took everything in her not to turn to him when she heard the resentment bleed into his words, “Under the orders of the general, he assisted Grakkus the Hutt in escaping from the prison Megalox Beta in exchange for information on Lor San Tekka's location, inevitably leading them to Tuanul where I intercepted them…and you know the rest of the story.”

_No, he’s wrong. Why would they make a deal with a criminal? With a Hutt? “Why was Grakkus at the prison?”_

“He'd been there for decades,” he said. “I never had reason to know much about him; I was busy conquering worlds for my… for Snoke in the Unknown Regions. I only know that Snoke sought to find him first. I've heard Grakkus was obsessed with the Jedi. All Hutts hated them, yet he collected Jedi artifacts and holocrons. But why was he imprisoned? He's a crime lord, so take your pick – slavery, kidnapping, trafficking, extortion, murder… it could be for kidnapping and auctioning a Jedi padawan. Snoke insisted it was for imprisoning and forcing Luke Skywalker to fight in his personal arena. Apparently watching slaves and prisoners fight to the death was one of his favorite past times.”

“And Leia, the Resistance, know what he's done? To her own brother?” It made no sense. Why would she help the creature that nearly killed her brother escape imprisonment… so she could find her brother? If he had the location to the man with the map, once he escaped he could have found Luke first, or sold his location to Snoke. Why would they do something so… wrong?

There was something unreadable in Kylo's words, something that scared her. “That's a question for your general, isn't it?”

Leia was not only her general but _his_ mother. He had left his family behind, but did he honestly think so little of them? Did his resentment toward them cloud his thoughts? “What do you think, Ben?”

“I think the general knows exactly what that creature has done,” he said. “It’s war. Desperate times, Rey…” There was no hiding the satisfaction in his voice. _Why?_

“She couldn't...”
He was quiet, but it wasn’t contemplative. She could feel his eagerness in the bond. He was waiting. She had revealed consequential secrets about the Resistance, or at least, she thought she had. Yet he had adopted that master and apprentice tone again; he had given her the relevant information, and now he wanted her to come to the same conclusion on her own. He was perfectly content with not discovering anything else, such as why she was asking about an alliance with the Hutts, even if it would benefit the First Order. There was no deception over the bond, he believed the truth that was settling in her gut. The truth that sounded too impossible to be truth at all. She had heard the stories of what the Hutts had done to his family. Leia couldn't have known, or she wouldn't have ordered that Hutt's release. Kylo had to be wrong, even though her intuition told her he wasn’t.

All she could think to say was, “Why?” It was rhetorical. She knew why, but she didn’t want to know.

“Is this Hutt issue what's bothering you?” he said, after a moment of silence. “Is that why your energy feels so... coarse?”

“Coarse?”

“In the Force,” he clarified. “Your energy usually feels like a windstorm or a hurricane, strong and powerful, but smooth. Now, though, you feel denser, abrasive and coarse, like rocks or –”

“Sand?” she finished for him. Begrudgingly, she supposed it fit. She wondered if he knew what he felt like in the Force, because he was no picnic, either. Luke was cold but steady, like a river. Leia was warm and bright like a star. Kylo's energy was intense, often overwhelming. It was a raging storm that warred between a burning fire and sharp, cold ice. It was unwelcoming, to say the least. She presumed sand didn't feel too welcoming, either. “No, that wasn’t what hurt me.”

His voice deepened, his tone threatening. “Who hurt you?”

“Do you truly want to know?” she asked, trying to avoid any lingering thoughts on why she felt compelled to tell him.

“Yes.”

“You,” she whispered. “I thought you were dead. There was the explosion...and then I couldn’t feel you anymore.”
He was quiet for a moment. She expected "why do you care" or something equally contentious. "Rey, as anyone who has tried to kill me will tell you – which is admittedly the majority of the people either you or I know – I am nearly impossible to kill. I’ve been cheating death my entire life. Or fighting it. Fate has favored me in that respect. I inherited that trait from my fath...” He released a slow breath, and she could almost feel the remorse he was hiding from her. He was quiet, reflective for a moment before continuing. “They’ve been trying to kill me since I was two years old, but I even survived then. If I can escape the wrath of both of my masters and the most powerful woman in the galaxy, then I can handle a poor attempt at sabotage by my own men.”

“Sabotage?” His answer intensified a fear she hadn't realized was growing in the pit of her stomach. “Why would your own men want to kill you, Ben?”

“Power, Rey,” his voice was low but gentle. He spoke as if it were obvious. Simple. “The ambition for more power. That is all war is, no matter what side you’re on. A fight over power. I have it, and they want it. Simple as that.”

For the First Order, just add in evil and greed.

“Simple as that?” she asked, his perverse view of the galaxy immediately vexing her. “They want to kill you for power. Is that why you killed Snoke and wanted me to join you? The ambition for more power?”

He breathed heatedly through his nose, but his voice was little more than a murmur. “You know that was different.”

“Do I?”

“Well, it was,” he said. He was tense against her, and she decided to let it go to avoid another fight.

When she spoke again, her voice was soft. “Are you still in danger?”

He sighed, dropping his head. “Always.” She was uncertain what she had expected as a response, only that it hadn’t been that. “I knew how this would inevitably end when I took the throne.”
A chasm of silence grew between them. Rey realized she had not once glanced at his face as they sat there, her body wilted into his side. He easily supported her weight with his large frame, his elbows braced by his knees, his gloved hands clenching and unclenching in front of him. She could feel the muscles of his arms tense under the movement, the heat radiating off his body, and it struck her how real he felt. She wondered if she felt the same to him. If he was uncomfortable with their proximity, he disguised it well. They both stared forward, as if they were not enemies as long as they never made eye contact. Perhaps it was her exhaustion, the late hour, or that he wasn’t looking at her, but she found herself saying things she knew she shouldn’t.

“I’m alone here.”

He was quiet for a moment. For once, he was uncertain how to respond. “Where is your family?” She could hear the bitterness in his tone; she could feel the resentment over the bond. Rey huffed humorlessly. “Drinking.”

“Then why are you here with me?” he asked, but she knew there was more to what he was asking. Why are you not with them? Why are you not celebrating? Why are you telling me this? Why haven’t you left? Rey chose to answer the simplest form of his question.

“I don’t drink,” she said softly. Kylo didn’t ask her why, he didn’t whisper useless platitudes, he didn’t tell her he was sorry. There was no pity trickling through the bond, only understanding.

“Neither do I.”

Kylo hadn’t asked her why, and she wanted to give him the same courtesy, but after everything he had done, she couldn’t understand it. “Why not?”

Rey didn’t expect him to answer. It would have been easier for him to deflect or counter-question, especially when the answer could have left him vulnerable. She knew Kylo rarely allowed himself to be vulnerable; he had no reason to be with her. “The same reason I didn’t allow you to inject that stim-shot,” he said. “I don’t trust it.” Kylo knew Concordia was a sensitive subject for her, but that was something she appreciated about him; though he gained control over conversations, he never tip-toed around difficult subjects. He was honest, even when it angered her. She didn’t have any desire to be angry with him this time. In fact, she found herself battling a giggle bubbling in her throat. Rey couldn’t help the humor that tinted her words.
“What worse could you possibly do drunk?”

When he answered, she regretted them – her insensitive words – but he didn’t punish her for them, at least not directly. “It’s not what I would do,” he said, “it’s what everyone else would. I can never let my guard down. I can never show weakness. That’s when they’ll strike.”

Rey swallowed her shame. The darkness implored her entry, but she found herself pushing it away. The darkness helped soothe the pain of heartache and loneliness, but she felt no need for it as she curled into his warmth. After spending days fearing his death, only his presence could soothe her. With the absence of darkness, she allowed herself to view him through the lens of compassion. “What about friends?”

It was his turn to huff humorlessly. “What friends?” he asked, and his voice was sincere. “I’m alone.” Her heart yearned to remind him of what she had promised in the hut, but it was a lie, wasn’t it? They were both alone. Kylo continued to make certain of that by remaining with the First Order. “It’s probably better this way; at least I won’t be betrayed.”

“Yes, of course you will,” she nearly laughed at the preposterousness of his statement, “you’re surrounded by enemies!”

“No, Rey, your enemies are exactly what you expect them to be. I expect them to kill me; there’s not a soul here who could betray me,” he answered through clenched teeth. “That’s the worst part of betrayal. There has to be a level of trust or loyalty to be betrayed.”

“But you said I betrayed you.”

“I know,” he murmured. “That’s why it’s better this way.”

She knew what his words meant – it was better that they were alone, even though he promised they wouldn’t be. The weight of that moment grew in the chasm between them. “Everyone in my life has disappointed me, Ben. You told me I wasn’t alone, but we are. Why did you have to disappoint me, too?”

Kylo was quiet for a long moment, so long she believed he wouldn’t answer her. Finally, with a long-suffering sigh, he said, “You think you’d be different than anyone else? All I’ve ever been was a disappointment.”
Rey knew to whom he was referring. “That’s not true; they love you.”

“They didn’t,” he spat, the anger that had been missing through their entire conversation now evident. Of course, his breaking point was his family. “They didn’t care about me; they feared me. So I became someone worth fearing. Now they care.”

It was a loaded statement, packed with more than Rey could unravel in that moment. AT first, she assumed he was talking about Luke and what happened that night at the temple. It was true, Luke had feared what he had seen in Kylo, though Kylo had yet to make the wrong choice. She understood that part; becoming what everyone feared him to be. Those fears mirrored her own. But what didn’t make sense was that he had said "they." He meant more than Luke. Was there more to the fall of Ben Solo than the night at the temple? She refused to ask, she didn’t want him to leave. It hurt to admit to herself how profoundly she yearned for him to stay.

As the silence stretched on, she absently traced her fingers over the symbols on the cover of the Jedi text in her lap. The sharp blade of Kylo’s words were the first to cut through the heavy silence.

“The Rammahgon?”

“I’m sorry?” she asked in confusion. Without turning, he rapped his knuckles on the text in her hands.

“That is ‘The Rammahgon’ - a gift from Luke, I presume?” She sensed the strained resentment in his voice at the mention of his uncle.

“No, not a gift. I stole it,” she corrected casually. Kylo made a choking sound that thrust him into a coughing attack. She let out a mocking snort of at his dramatic display.

“You stole it. You...”

“Scavenger?” she finished for him.

He sighed at her retort. “Not quite my line of thinking.”
“Yes, I stole it. Right after I fought Luke, ignored his warning about you, and left him on that island to go bring you home.” She wished in that moment she could have studied his face. There was confusion, surprise, and incredulity bouncing through the bond – all emotions she had expected. But also pride... and reverence.

His voice was ethereal in wonder; he sounded… younger. “You fought Luke?”

She recalled her duel in the rain when Luke had told her to leave and she had refused to accept that he was not the hero she believed he was. She had eventually accepted the truth, or perhaps she learned that when people become legends, their inevitable humanity would always be disappointing. Luke was the hero they all needed in the end, but that didn’t mean he wasn’t flawed. She wasn’t sorry about how she left him, especially when it was in defense of the man sitting next to her. “Well, he deserved it.”

“Spoken like a true Jedi.” His voice wavered in an obvious attempt to suppress his antipathy for his uncle’s beliefs.

“Some Jedi I am,” she sighed. “I can’t even read it.” He tensed under the understanding – there was another unwanted, lonely, castaway – desperate for belonging – whom Luke had failed. She was regretfully forced to sit up when he twisted his body to face her. She expected a mocking or derisive expression, she had chosen Luke over him as a teacher, after all, but his eyes were pained.

“Luke never taught you?” he whispered ruefully. Even, the lost boy, fallen Jedi, who was let down the most by Luke, expected better of him. That realization sparked fury that tensed across her shoulders, her fingers curling in upon themselves.

“No,” she tried to contain the resentment in her voice. “I don't even know what they stand for. How can I be the Jedi the Resistance needs when I don't even know the Jedi Code?”

She expected him to explain to her every reason why she couldn’t be the Jedi the Resistance needed, and perhaps he did in his way, but she didn’t expect him to answer her. “There is no emotion, there is peace. There is no ignorance, there is knowledge. There is no passion, there is serenity. There is no chaos, there is harmony. There is no death, there is the Force.” The words flowed from his lips with a robotic familiarity that shouldn’t have surprised her. “That is the Jedi Mantra.”

And they wondered why they failed, his voice whispered across the bond.
Rey was well-aware of the dark and twisted morals that Kylo followed. Logically, Rey knew he had studied under his uncle, obviously he would have learned from him. Still, there was something disquieting that the "Son of Darkness" knew more about the Jedi than she did. Her skin began to prickle with fear... and resentment toward the man who was supposed to have guided her. This man – this morally corrupt man of darkness – had given her more insight into the Jedi mentality than the Last Jedi. If Luke wanted her to believe the Jedi religion needed to die, he should have just led with that. “But none of that is true! How am I supposed to suppress my emotions? How am I not supposed to feel fear or anger or passion, everything that makes me human?”

“Why do you think I am not a Jedi?” he asked quietly. “They forbade all emotion, not just fear and anger, but love and attachment as well. You are supposed to be a vessel of the Force, only intended to serve the galaxy.”

The meaning of Luke’s final lesson fell like a weight in her stomach. It wasn’t some cruel joke he had played; he was trying to teach her something. The Jedi were formed on ancient beliefs, and though they fought for the good in the galaxy, that didn’t necessarily mean that they were successful. In a scenario where they had to account for the good of the many versus the good of the few, the very scenario Luke laid out for her was a likely result. Helping those villagers wouldn’t have been for the greater good, but occasionally decisions can’t be made for the greater good, occasionally they are made because it’s the right thing to do.

There was a reason they were born with emotion. If she hadn’t been, she would have killed Kylo. Without emotion, people like Kylo – or his grandfather – would stay lost, because the galaxy at large would benefit more from his death. The Jedi would have always failed him – and Luke and his grandfather. The worst part was, if the Jedi were forced to subjugate emotion, then there was never hope for someone like her. Maybe she could help him because she didn't abide by their code. Maybe there was hope – not for the Jedi, but for her – and that was what Luke was trying to show her. She didn’t need an ancient religion. “Maybe that was why Luke said the Jedi Order must die.”

It was a moment of clarity she hadn’t felt in weeks. There was nothing clouding her thoughts, no whispers, no darkness. She felt peaceful. Kylo was quiet for a moment, ruminating on the new information that clearly surprised him. “I suppose it is inevitable that he and I agree would agree on something.” The words themselves sounded sarcastic, but there was a softness to his voice, a tone she had never heard from him when he spoke about his family. Maybe it was an absence of something. Her intuition told her, however, that whatever it was, it was something he needed to work through alone. Whatever was occurring behind those haunted eyes was far more important than anything she could say aloud.

“What does your Sith Code mantra say?” she asked carefully, knowing that their conflicting viewpoints was a fuse for them both. She hated his ideals, but in that moment, she wanted to understand him. If she could see why he was holding onto the darkness, maybe she could find the key to helping him let it go.
He shook his head with a huff. “Peace is a lie. There is only passion. Through passion, I gain strength. Through strength, I gain power. Through power, I gain victory. Through victory, my chains are broken. The Force shall free me,” he recalled from memory. “It’s not my code though. I don’t completely disagree with their mantra – it makes more sense than the Jedi Code – but I am no Sith.”

“But you use the dark side of the Force...”.

“I hate them both. Jedi ignore and stifle their emotions; Sith use them as weapons. I may use the darkness, but that doesn’t mean I align myself with them. There were many who accessed the darkness in the Force who were not Sith. Snoke was not Sith – at least he wasn’t when he instructed me. There were Dark Jedi, who were either fallen –like myself – or rogue. Or there was Revan, who could access both the darkness and the light,” he answered. “I can use both to an extent, as can you.”

Balance. Luke had talked of balance. She had thought he meant that for someone lost in darkness like Kylo, the Force would create someone strong in the light like Rey who could destroy him. What if there could have been another type of balance? “So... if we’re the last Force-users left, then there are no light side or dark side users? There is no light or darkness. There is just the Force.”

“We are not the last; there are other Force-sensitives out there, just not Jedi or Sith. Even if we were the last, or the strongest, there may not be light or dark side users, but that’s different than the light or dark of the Force. There were many before us that believed that there is no darkness or light, only users who manipulate it differently. But, having used both, it's not true. You don’t have to align with the dark side to manipulate the darkness. I know you’ve felt it. Darkness is more powerful, but it has consequences. I heard it described once as ‘the light is a stream, the dark roaring rapids, but beware, wide is the gate that leads into temptation.’”

“Is it truly good versus evil?”

Kylo, who she swore inherited his propensity for not directly answering questions from his uncle, asked her a question instead. “What do you feel when you use them?”

She closed her eyes, allowing the Force to flow through her as it had on Ahch-To. “The light is comforting, smooth, and healing. It is warmth and life. Like love. It’s calm, like sleep. When I use the light, it feels constant, even and endless,” she smiled, but it faded as she found its opposite in the Force. “And the dark is powerful, strong, and destructive. It brings change and death. It is cold, but burning like passion too. It is chaotic like emotions. The dark comes to me in powerful bursts. It’s strengthening for a little while, yet exhausting in the long run...” It had only been a few minutes since she had pushed away the darkness, but her mind craved the peace of the cold, soothing flow.
When she opened her eyes, there was something new in his eyes. Not hope, at least not yet, but it was bright and fervent. He was pleased with her understanding. “Exactly, it is more than good or evil. There is a definite place for both, there is a call to both inside us, just as there is a place for love or passion.”

“Balance,” she said, trying to wrap her mind around Luke’s lesson. Something inside was calling to her, pleading with her to understand the implications of that one simple word.

With that word, however, Kylo’s enthusiasm faded. “There have been some who have found a balance with both. I, however, am not one of them. Not that I was given much of a choice. Luke asked me to forsake my darkness. I couldn’t find balance in the light, there was always darkness.”

”And Snoke asked you to forsake the light,” she reminded him. “You thought you had to sacrifice the light to find darkness instead. That’s the conflict inside of you now.” It struck her then, how lost they both were without a teacher. Certainly, Kylo was better off without that creature standing over him, manipulating him and spinning his evil lies, but he would have benefitted from someone like Luke to explain the Force to him, too. She wondered when she would see Luke again, and if he would ever show himself to his nephew. Kylo may have known more than her, but he needed to see the truth, too.

The truth – the Force was breathtakingly complex, more than she ever realized, and it was impossible as she stood before its vastness to understand what the truth was. “I thought I understood the Force, but I was wrong,” she sighed. The darkness fed on her doubt, hiding away the momentous realization that was just within her grasp. Her thoughts of the Jedi, Luke’s final lesson, and balance faded away to the insecurities that the darkness had found.

“No one understands the Force,” he assured her.

“Well, hopefully, the Force does.”

He hummed. “That depends on if you see events as consequences of choices and luck, or as a predetermined destiny. If there is destiny, then there must be some reason for… all of this.”

“I can't find my place in all of this. I thought Luke could show me, but do you want to know what happened when I found him?” she said, less angry as she understood his intentions better now, but frustrated all the same. “He refused to teach me. He didn’t want anything to do with the war or his family and friends. He blamed your fall on his ‘hubris and failure as a master’ and believed the Jedi should die with him. When he did teach me, it was with the intention to prove that belief. At the time, it seemed like he didn’t teach me anything at all. He did teach me about balance in the Force, but then he lied to me about what happened to you at his temple. He tricked me into believing the caretakers of the island were under attack, but I think I better understand the failures of the Jedi Order now. I asked him to be the last hope of the Resistance, and he refused, so I left to find you.”

“Luke was a hero in the end. He gave his life to save us, he taught me the lessons I needed to understand the Jedi, but not the ones to become one. I had no choice but to steal these books and hope one day I could read them. If he refused to teach me, then I was just going to teach myself, as I’ve done my entire life. I asked for help from Threepio, but he’s been busy helping Leia, and what he did decipher for me made no sense. Luke returned, and I thought he would help me, but I haven’t seen him after that first time. I don’t know if I’ll ever see him again. And you can see how well it’s going with teaching myself. The entire Resistance is counting on me as their hope; they want me to be another Luke, but I’m no closer to reading it than I was when I first took it.” She closed her eyes, angry at Luke for not helping her, at Kylo for not being the one who could teach her, and at herself for having hope.

Kylo’s low timber broke the silence of the room. “Do you want to?”

“Do I want to what?” she sighed. “Be a Jedi?”

“No, I know you want that.”

She bit back the tears that threatened to fall, the darkness feasting hungrily on her insecurities. “I don’t know anymore.”

“You wouldn’t be afraid to fail if you didn’t,” he said. “What I meant was – do you want to have the ability to read it?”

Her eyes fluttered open at his words, sensing his sympathetic tone. His eyes, always honest, revealed the unequivocal sincerity of his question, but all it did was remind her of when he had tried to manipulate her on Starkiller into becoming his student of darkness.

You need a teacher.

“You think I need you to teach me?” It was almost instinct, how she reacted. She didn’t intend for the darkness-tainted agitation to bleed through into her voice, though she was keenly aware that he noticed. Part of her knew she wasn’t angry at him for offering as much as she was angry at herself for needing it.

“No, but what other choice do you have?” he said, his intense eyes studying hers to gauge her reaction. “I’m not trying to turn you, and this has no benefit for me. I know you’ll use what you learn against me, to help him destroy me; I don’t care anymore.” Rey knew to which “him” he was referring, but she didn’t understand why. They had talked about the kiss; it meant nothing. Why wouldn’t he let it go? He reached his hand toward her face, the same way he knocked her unconscious in the forest on Takodana, and she recoiled instinctively.

“I’m trying to help you!” he barked, and she glared at him, condemning him in his outburst. She expected him to throw something and leave again, but he matched her glare instead. He was physically shaking in his anger, the muscles in his jaw jumping as he clenched his teeth, a storm of emotions raging in his eyes. They stared at each other in silence; daring the other to break it. She watched as the fire in his eyes slowly faded into embers. They both seemed surprised that he had calmed himself without any further outbursts. After a moment he exhaled sharply, sweeping hair from his forehead. “Trust me, please.”

She shook her head. “No, not as long as you fight for the First Order.”

He turned away in frustration, and she waited quietly for his reaction. When it became clear he had no intention of arguing with her, she took the chance to study his profile. His long, dark hair cast shadows on his face as he hung his head, his lips pursed as he was lost to his own thoughts. Everything about him in that moment was endearing, and she loathed it. She had fallen victim to his charms before. He was interesting to study and understand, but that didn’t change who he had proven repeatedly that he had become. She wanted to hate him for what he had done to her. She didn’t, but she could pretend. Though it was easier to pretend to hate him when he wasn’t in the same room as her. The second they were together, she felt drawn to him again like gravity. She had never felt so drawn and repelled by the same person.

“How do you think you have suddenly developed your new Force skills and abilities?” It was a simple question. It should have a simple explanation, yet before she even answered, she knew that what she had previously believed was incorrect.

“The Force?” He shook his head, his eyes knowing. A grin twitched on the corner of his mouth, as if they were playing a game of Dejarik, and he had strategized the winning move.

“Our bond,” his deep voice murmured.
No.

She would have known, she decided. She would have never taken anything that was used in darkness. Either her revulsion to the idea was evident on her face, or he had heard her, because his eyes sparked with a burning vehement fire, penetrating through her denial. “The Mind Trick in the interrogation room? The lightsaber skills on Starkiller? The rocks on Crait? I felt you accessing my memories, my skills, my training, but what I didn’t know at first was you were using the bond. Our bond.”

What is the Force if it is not providing these abilities?

A shiver trembled through her. Everything she had believed, everything she thought she had understood about the Force. It was as if the world had turned on its axis, and nothing made sense anymore. Except… it did make sense; how she “knew” to use the Force to escape, how she was suddenly able to turn the fight against him. It was why Luke had been so distant after watching her practice with the lightsaber, because she knew forms that she had never been taught. Having trained her bondmate, his fears likely stemmed from a recognition of a familiar fighting style as well. “All of it. I learned it all from you?”

“Yes.”

Everything she knew, she learned from a man drowning in darkness. Could she trust it? Was he slowly changing her, molding her after his own image? She had become someone she didn’t recognize; hateful, angry, cold. Was he to blame for this darkness she felt around her? The bond? She was overwhelmed by her own shackling fear. Another thought, a less terrifying thought slithered through the darkness of her mind. If she had accessed the other skills, then she could access all of it. She could be as powerful as him in the Force – more powerful, because she understood the darkness. “And I can just... steal all these skills from you? Any that I want?” She bit her lip to suppress a grin. Her mind swarmed with all the possibilities of having his knowledge at her fingertips. The power.

“It’s not stealing as much as downloading, because I don’t lose the skills you take from me. I can teach you, as I’d prefer you not use our bond or the Force that way,” he replied warily, “but I’m offering this one.”

It was a startling realization. If he wanted to teach her, why wouldn’t he give her access to everything he knew? Who was he protecting? Her? Or himself? What she did know was she needed this skill.
“How do I do it?”

He cocked his head slightly, his voice warm with curiosity. “How did you do it before?”

She shrugged. “I just searched for the knowledge in the Force.” Ever the student, his eyes lost focus for a moment, his brows drawn in thought. His stare centered slightly over her shoulder as he contemplated the mechanics of their Force Bond. He pressed his lips together absently as he thought, and Rey found her eyes flickering to them.

When he was awake, his lips were as expressive as his eyes. Drawn into a soft pout, they were at odds with everything harsh about him. She felt that strange pulsing inside her again, this ache that she knew could be fulfilled if she just touched her lips to his. If she hadn’t witnessed the act at the outpost on Niima, she would have found the desire absurd. It still seemed mildly nonsensical, considering her kiss with Poe had felt like, well, she supposed touching two lips together would feel like. She had felt more when she had touched Kylo’s hands in the hut. She laid awake at night remembering that tingling heat.

Perhaps it was that experience that afforded her the certainty that whatever made kissing enjoyable, she would feel it all if she made the choice to kiss him. Unfortunately, it was a choice she couldn’t allow herself to make. Not when he’s so… lost. The shiver down her spine brought her back to her senses. Her eyes snapped hastily back to his. His head was tilted, his eyes narrowed as he silently watched her. Her cheeks and ears warmed in guilt. She glanced away.

“Can I?” he finally whispered, his gloved hand hovering over hers. She nodded distantly, wide-eyed and flushed. He tenderly grasped her wrist and guided her hand to his temple. “Take it.” She searched his eyes for a moment. What was she supposed to take? What had they been arguing about? She felt positively off-kilter. “Take it,” he directed, his voice as hoarse as she assumed hers would sound. Her eyes fell to the book in her hands, and she remembered.

She closed her eyes and thought of the skill she needed that he possessed, searching the Force until she grasped onto it. His memories of learning the ancient language flashed before her eyes, too quickly to make sense of them. The light of the Force radiated upon her, as it had done before. She reveled in the warmth that surrounded her, feeling at home in a way she never thought possible. A jolt in the Force brought her back to the present. When she opened her eyes, he was gone.

“Ben?” An emptiness ached in her chest as her hand reached out to the empty space that he had occupied. Even when she was her most furious with him, his leaving never became any easier. That hollow yearning – which she first felt when her parents abandoned her – consumed her until she saw him again. She knew he would come back, unlike her parents, but for how long? The explosion reminded her that the man was mortal, and losing him was a real possibility.
Then he will abandon me forever, just like they did.

As her hand fell in acceptance of his disappearance, she glanced down at the text in her lap.

“The Rammahgon,” she read.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo relaxed at his desk in his quarters, typing up another detailed report on his datapad to send to Sienar-Jaemus Fleet Systems for further modifications to his TIE Silencer. The dogfight against the squadron of pirates attempting to commandeer a First Order supply vessel had been a simple and uncomplicated victory. At least, that is what he told his general. His only complaint was the deflector shield generator along with the rest of his defense systems had powered off independently during the mission. It was a curious failure in an otherwise competent system, a failure he did not believe was accidental.

His typing was interrupting by the ding of an incoming encrypted message. It was from a source outside the First Order. It should have been impossible – anyone having access to his personal account information. He opened the message to find three words: why those coordinates? Growling in irritation, he closed the message and resumed his account of the massive systems failure on his Silencer. His typing became more aggressive and his droid whirred somewhere across the room.

“The distraction was most definitely welcomed.” His resonant voice reverted off the walls of his chambers, dulling the sharp pang of loneliness. The mission had been foolish, but it was better than discovering new methods to isolate himself. It would have been more satisfying, however, without the lecture from his contemptuous general about what were and were not appropriate battles for the Supreme Leader to engage in.

“Hux demands that I sit idle and do nothing. I am the Supreme Leader; I can engage in whatever battle I choose, without insolent remarks from my subordinate.” The disagreement was only settled when he assured Hux that he could assume the throne should the reigning Supreme Leader be killed in battle. Hux found the prospect much too enjoyable, in his opinion. Kylo had the Force, but his general was ambitious and conniving. “We are on colliding paths; I can sense it.”

Something had changed while he was gone. He could have attended the battle debriefing following his return, but he hadn’t, because he knew what he did was treason. “What I have done ever since you crashed into my life is against everything I’ve fought for. I am everything I once despised. I don’t know what I am doing anymore.” As he sat in his quarters, confirming his fears about sabotage, he should be attending the Weapons Development meeting with the other top-ranking officials. That was where he was supposed to be, but that wasn’t where he wanted to be. He didn’t know where he wanted to be anymore. “All I know is I would rather be right here… with you.”
“I have never been so… lost.” The ambition, the anger, the drive to fight died with Luke. And without that bloodlust, he was beginning to see the First Order in a new light. A different light. He thought he could change it – create a new order, but they contended with him over every change he made. Had their principles truly aligned as he had always assumed? Or did he have such a myopic focus that as long as he was furthering his own personal agenda, he had not hesitated to consider theirs? “Yes, the galaxy needs order. But why does this feel more like chaos?”

The daily briefings had become the largest point of contention, as he found more objections to the ideology of the other officers, and, in return, they struggled to accept his “radical dogma.” He believed Hux viewed the Force as fictional, as his father had. The discourse was fueled by frustration on both sides. They equivocated like senators and belayed his orders in favor of their own initiatives. Every new weapon, every new destroyer was required to be more intimidating... more formidable, but at the cost of practicality. They chose complexity, size, and raw power over capability and efficiency.

“I find myself doubting the intentions of the others.” They convinced him they created the Starkiller base with the purpose of controlling systems, not destroying them. But all they had done was destroy, and he didn’t think they would stop with the Resistance. Starkiller was a formidable grandiosity, and all it required was a couple of explosives and an x-wing to destabilize the core. Then they had created the ability to track ships through hyperspace – no small feat – but still failed to achieve their ultimate goal of capturing the struggling fleet. “They are lost to the same obsessive, power-flaunting stagnation that plagued the Empire. It has become me against them. And they are set on their path to failure.”

“But I have nothing else to fight for. The First Order may be deviating from stability and progress, but the loathsome Resistance is the epitome of chaos. I will never support another Republic. My ambition has not changed, nor have my convictions. And both sides want my head. I am not naïve, I know how this will end. I am living on borrowed time,” he murmured, glancing across the room.

Not that it mattered. He was never meant to survive this. It was only a means to an end. But the motivation – no, the obsession – that had compelled him for so long – the desire to kill his past before it killed him – had faded. He promised himself the pain would end when he fulfilled his destiny, but he didn’t know if he wanted that destiny anymore. “I’m tired; I just want it all to end.”

But the bond prevented him from that finality. He could not find eternal peace and freedom from those mortal chains until he had achieved his purpose. He was not resentful or disappointed as he thought he would be. “I feel the pull to the light, the desire to leave all this behind like I never have before. Maybe because I have never had a reason to live before. If only it was that simple, then maybe I would allow myself to imagine what could be. But Maz is wrong; it is too late. I can’t take back what I’ve done, and part of me doesn’t want to.”

His primary purpose had been to destroy Luke and the Jedi Order. Luke was dead, regrettably not by his hand. The Jedi Order was nearly eliminated, save for his equal in the light. His second objective had been to destroy his father and the most important thing to him. He had... killed his father, but his death brought him anything but the promised peace. And that piece of garbage ship was in the hands of the Resistance. His final mission was to destroy his mother and everything she loved. He failed to kill her. He knew he would fail again. The New Republic was gone. And his mother’s last political legacy, the Resistance, couldn’t be destroyed without endangering...

“You...” he spoke gently to the sleeping form across the room from him, “There is no escape from you.” By his calculations, her world must be 19 hours into its 20-hour day cycle. At least she was sleeping. He wondered if he terrorized her thoughts as often as she captivated his. He spent his days in this conflicted purgatory between begging for the bond to end and longing for moments like this. She had created an unbearable conflict in his soul. “You are my greatest weakness. And I am your greatest... enemy.”

“You should never have touched my hand. You should never have come to me. You should never have spared my life.” There were moments when she looked at him the way she did in that elevator, but they were fleeting, yet tormenting. Then the darkness in her that he didn’t yet understand returned, and they continued the endless war with each other that he never wanted to begin with. “There are questions I wish I could ask you. What do you see when you study me? Why do you have hope in me? Why didn’t you kill me? Why don’t you remember? You look at me with hatred, but all I can think about is wishing I could just touch your hand again. I want impossible things. You will never see me as more than a monster. But you... have created this weakness... no, this madness inside me that is more powerful than any resolution I claim to have. My will to fight is gone. There is no hope. Rey, you will be the death of me.”

“Please, Ben.” she breathed, distracting him from his thoughts. Her face twisted into a grimace. Her breathing was shallow. He recognized the signs; it was another nightmare. Abandoning his datapad, he stood and swiftly moved to her side. He knew how she reacted the last time she awoke to his presence, but she beguiled him. She was bundled up in a ball, embracing Luke’s text. Her teeth chattered. The nights were warm on Barkhesh; why was she cold? Instinctively, he knelt and reached for a grey thermosensitive blanket on the floor. He was only slightly surprised when he felt the soft material against his fingertips. He lifted the blanket and compelled the Force to gently lower it over her.

He stole a glance at her face. He was rarely privy to this side of her. Most of their interactions involved venomous words, hateful stares and something being blasted, thrown, or otherwise forced in his general direction. There was usually a fierceness in her fiery eyes, her eyebrows creased, her lips pressed firmly in a scowl – except for the moments she wanted something from him, of course. But now, softness rested on her features. It wasn’t her beauty in that softness that surprised him – she was beautiful on the battlefield – it was her peace.

She looked impossibly young asleep; her eyelids masked the burdens and suffering held within her irises, producing an innocent, tranquil effect. The hardships of a stolen childhood were absent from her usually heated eyes. He supposed it was he that made her look that way. He imagined she looked upon the pilot or the traitor with the compassion he had seen in her once; something he hadn’t deserved in the first place and most certainly wouldn’t deserve again. Regardless, she looked different, almost unrecognizable this way. He wondered if he looked different when he slept as well. Not likely, since he was usually only awoken by his own screams.

Her eyelashes fluttered, caressing the sprinkling of freckles on her tanned cheeks. His eyes trailed down to her lips. They looked soft both in composition and expression. Her hair was free of its bindings, errant strands falling sweetly across her cheek. He longed to brush the hair behind her ear, so he could better look upon her face, but he was not imprudent enough to risk her wrath. She shifted, wrapping the blanket tighter around her shoulders, smiling. His pulse quickened. He wished he could give her a reason to smile at him like that again. Revulsion immediately tightened in his chest.

_This sentimentality is sickening._

It was his voice, though in the back of his mind he knew the thought was merely an echo of a voice no longer capable of speaking. He nearly ripped the blanket away from her as he grappled with the darkness. It wasn’t often that he struggled with the darkness around her, every moment she was there was almost a reprieve. This darkness was stronger than he had felt in days. The part he didn’t understand, was that it was directed toward her.

_She would kill me if our positions were reversed yet, I behave like a foolish child. No, I have no compassion for her. This means nothing, the blanket – it was practical. Her whimpering was distracting. I won’t allow myself to be distracted again. But it would be so easy, though, wouldn’t it? End all my conflict now, and kill her –_

_No!_

Kylo staggered away from her in fear. The farther he moved from her, the more his mind cleared.

_What was that?_

He was tired, he convinced himself. He just needed to sleep. Once she was gone, he would try for an hour or two. Forcing himself back to his desk and away from her, he collapsed into his seat in a huff as the darkness abated. The terrifying thoughts disappeared with the darkness. Clearing his throat as he cleared his mind, he forced himself to concentrate on the report at his datapad. He studied the screen carefully, struggling to remember where he had left off. He read the same sentence nine times before he accepted that his concentration was hopelessly lost. Closing his eyes, he hoped meditation would focus his mind instead. She stirred, and his eyes snapped open.
“No, Ben,” she whimpered. He jumped to his feet and rushed to her bedside. But as he knelt beside her, he realized she was still asleep. He was wary of waking her, but he was undeniably drawn to her. Just being in her presence caused a warm swell in his chest, which he fettered by clenching his jaw. The shadow of darkness passed over him again, and he realized she was its source. He would have been more concerned if the darkness didn’t help convince him it was nothing.

She was dreaming about... him, in a nightmare. He presumed she was reliving the events of the throne room. Don’t go this way, she had pleaded. But what she had asked of him was impossible. How did she not see that he couldn’t go back to the light as she had hoped? How could she have expected him to go back with her to the Resistance? Was she truly that naïve? He was certain she could see the truth now. There was no hope for him. He was nothing but a monster to her. And she was nothing but a distraction to him.

She slept, albeit fitfully, as he sat there... trapped. He couldn’t focus on his reports, he couldn’t meditate, he certainly couldn’t use the sonic shower... he couldn’t go to bed because she was in it, suffering nightmares. He sighed ruefully as he remembered the source of those nightmares.

Not that he blamed her for suffering nightmares. When he first searched her mind on Starkiller - and every time she searched the Force for his knowledge since - more of her memories from Jakku were revealed to him, inevitably culminating in what he had seen in that hut. The memories were horrifying. Kylo would never understand how she had become such a good, honest person after the perpetual Hell she had endured.

For fourteen years, she had no one. She was a slave. She was never safe, not one day. She had nothing. Every day was a struggle to survive. Whether it was the beasts, the other scavengers, the harsh conditions, or the hunger – there was always something trying to kill her. He understood that fight better than any of her “family” ever could. They both hungered for the people who failed them. But Rey faced another hunger. She was tormented by the emptiness that dominated every moment of every day. It was an all-consuming monster that screamed and clawed and ached until it was satiated again.

Basic comforts were such an easy thing to take for granted, but to watch how she suffered made it impossible for him to ever forget. She shivered in the remnants of an old AT-AT, counting her days by scratching marks in a wall like a prisoner. It was something he had taken to imitating on the wall in his quarters. Kylo hadn’t decided what his marks were for yet. Was it counting the day since he had become Supreme Leader? Was it counting the days since the last day he had seen her in person? Or was it counting down the days until his death? Nothing seemed as depressing as counting the days until she was reunited with her parents, whose bodies were rotting in those sands the whole time.
When he had learned about scavengers growing up, he’d heard about liquor addicts and users who traded junk to make money for their habit. Like her dirty, junkie parents who threw her away like garbage, left her for dead, for nothing. She was different, she didn’t choose that life. She was forced into a lifetime of slavery because her parents decided to abandon her on the most backwater planet in the galaxy. If they weren’t dead, he’d kill them himself. He wondered now how many of them were like her, stuck there due to circumstance rather than choice. It was why the galaxy needed the Order. He didn’t know how she survived without it. Not only survived, but continued to have hope.

He remembered the Ghtroc 690 light freighter that she salvaged from that ship graveyard. She spent a month repairing it, using the parts she could have traded for food to restore it. She starved herself to the point of exhaustion in the hope that trading the ship to Plutt would earn her enough portions to not have to feel hunger for once in her life. She could have taken that ship and escaped off-world, but all she wanted was not to be hungry anymore.

And once she finally finished the repairs, it was all stolen from her the moment she brought it to Niima Outpost. All her hope was taken from her in one moment as other scavengers took off on her ship. Yet all she did was break the lenses out of an old stormtrooper helmet. She didn’t even crack them in her anger, because she later reused the lenses for goggles. That was all she did. He had leveled villages for less. Yet she persisted and endured, struggling to survive, with hope. For someone whose life revolved around collecting parts, losing the material things never bothered her... only the people.

How old was she when her parents died? Five? She cried herself to sleep every night, convincing herself they would come back for her. She waited for them for over a decade. She suffered daily, she almost died, waiting for them. But they abandoned her, sold her into slavery! They didn’t deserve the sand they were buried in. Yet she never held a thread of contempt for them. Why?

Kylo had witnessed in those memories how the others beat her, treated her as their property, stole the parts she scavenged, and left her for starving. She had every reason to become a monster like him. How could the torment she suffered create someone who understood him like no other, but was also everything he could never be? She was not who she was because of her upbringing, but rather in spite of it.

She was kind. She saved the likes of Plutt and that Teedo from certain death. She found the body of a TIE pilot, the enemy, still strapped in his ejector seat and yet she showed him the kindness of a proper burial. The kindness she had shown toward the enemy was more than she had experienced in her entire life. That was who Rey always had been. It was how he justified speaking with her in the early bond connections. If he could just show her the “error” in her thinking, then she would understand what his family never could.

It was his understanding of her, however, that had changed everything. Despite her strength, she had shown him what she suffered underneath. It was that moment of vulnerability that led him to say those three fateful words in the hut, which altered his course irrevocably. He wondered if the other anarchists had seen through the powerful warrior to the suffering underneath. She hid it well. The only reason he knew that she still agonized over that torture was the nightmares that kept her up at night.

When he had searched her mind in the interrogation room, he had focused on her dreams. In his search, he had also found her nightmares. He knew of one nightmare about the scavenger she called Teng, who was ripped to shreds in front of her eyes by steelpeckers. She threw up the meal she had just eaten and hated herself for weeks for being upset about the wasted food when he had lost his life.

He had seen the nightmare when she was very small and trapped in a sandstorm. She hadn’t eaten in almost a week, and she quickly became dehydrated. She fell to her knees and curled in upon herself, waiting for the inevitable. She called out for anyone to help her, but no one did, and it was then that she realized how lonely she truly was. Kylo understood that moment of understanding all too well.

The other nightmare he had witnessed was what he referred to as “the incident.” It was, coincidentally, the only way he could refer to what had happened without exploding into a murderous rage. That nightmare he had witnessed the night before they were connected again after Taris, when she was sleeping. He’d destroyed forty-seven training droids that night, only stopping when Hux threw another fit in which he demanded to know if he was “insane,” which truly was anyone’s guess. His arms had ached so profoundly when she had leaned against him as she cried that first connection after, and it was the only thing that centered him from exploding again at the thought of what she had suffered. Kylo did not have long in his life, but he would die content if he had the chance to kill those two thugs.

They were ordered by Plutt to protect her, and they may have saved her from the others, but they didn’t protect her from themselves. Rey, so innocent, had believed they cornered her to steal the parts she salvaged. She was so young, she had no idea why they wanted to hold her down. She had no idea the ways they could... hurt her. He swallowed the instant rage that swelled inside him again, releasing a long breath as he tried to remind himself that it wasn’t his fight. Rey had fought with an unparalleled ferocity, even blinding the one with the red tattoos in one eye – something he wished he could claim he had done when facing his own demons. He knew he would never look at that quarterstaff the same, or her reason for carrying it. Though she suffered nightmares, he was thankful it was not those monsters that haunted her that night.

He would never tell her how her suffering affected him, how he admired her, how he wished he had the strength to shoulder her burdens as well. They were hollow words, useless platitudes when the damage had already been done.
But if he had a time machine, he would use it to take him back to two places. The first was the day she was abandoned. He would take her away before her family flew off, and he would bring her to his parents. They would have found someone – a Force-sensitive who understood her – to give her the life she deserved. After she was safe, he would go back to that night at the temple. He would sneak into his own hut where the younger version of himself slept. He once imagined he would lie in wait for Luke, but not anymore. If he had the chance now, he would sneak in long before Luke did and kill Ben Solo himself.

Three hundred and eight.

It would have saved three hundred and eight lives taken by his own hand. It would have saved hundreds, maybe thousands more that had fallen by his orders. How could he trust in a Force that would allow him to survive so others would suffer? How was that fair? How could the Jedi believe in its benevolence? The Cosmic Force had created the Skywalkers, who had done nothing but bring the galaxy pain. Their only destiny was to deliver death through its will. He had become exactly what it had wanted him to become since the day he was born.

Kylo was so deeply focused on the past that he didn’t recognize another presence in the room.
“Oh,” a soft, feminine voice said, snapping his attention to the doorway. “I wasn’t expecting you here.” She gasped, slapping her hand over her mouth, but it wasn’t in terror. He didn’t have a chance to consider her reaction further. When she removed her hand, her words tumbled out quickly and awkwardly. “That came out wrong… why wouldn’t you be here… not that you’re really here.
Wait, are you?”

Kylo held her questioning gaze in shock. Every muscle in his body had simultaneously lost its ability to move. “You must be Ben,” she continued. You’re Leia’s son.” The young woman stared at him… kindly, as if she were happy to see him. Why would a member of the Resistance be happy to see her enemy, the Supreme Leader? Kylo stared down at himself. Clad in a sleeveless undershirt and trousers, he certainly didn’t look like the Supreme Leader. And had she called him Ben? “What am I saying? Of course, you know you’re Leia’s son,” the woman continued nervously. “I just meant… I know you… I don’t know you; I know who you are… I’m Rey... well, obviously I’m not Rey, I’m Rey’s friend.” She exhaled slowly before clearing her throat. “Hi, I’m Rose.”

Kylo was stunned into silence. What did this woman want? What would she do? From what he could discern, she carried no weapon. Still, Kylo was paralyzed under her gaze. He didn’t know what to do. Or say. Should he awaken Rey? Should he call his weapon from his desk? Would it make it worse? Thankfully, she filled the silence with further explanation. “I’m sure you’re wondering how I know who you are and Rey will probably be angry with me telling you, since I promised her I wouldn’t tell anyone about her relationship with you, but technically I’m not telling you, because you already know.” Rose gasped in a breath as he tried to make sense of her breathless rambling. He wondered when she would turn on him, when she would condemn him for who he was.
Curiously, the anger never came. “The other night – when she kissed… well, you know… she was very upset after your fight. She created this Force whirlwind and knocked us over when it exploded out of her like a thermal detonator… without the fire, of course. And I made her tell me what happened. Don’t be angry at Rey, but she told me who you are. I didn’t even know Leia had a son. I swear, all she told me was that you had a falling out with your mother and you broke her heart when you wouldn’t come back with her to the Resistance. I know you’re angry, and I don’t know what happened, and this probably isn’t my place, but Rey needs you. I shouldn’t be telling you this, but I think you’re the only one who could help her. She has a Force bond with Kylo Ren.” With those words, Kylo finally understood. Rose had no idea that Ben Solo and Kylo Ren were one and the same. He could have feigned surprise, asked her all she knew about their bond, but for some inexplicable reason, he didn’t want to lie to the young woman.

“I know,” he murmured, breaking his silence. “I wish it were different, for her sake.”

Rose took that as invitation to join him at Rey’s side. She lowered herself onto the stone floor by the sacrificial altar and stared up at him. Her bright, bubbly, awkward personality reminded him of a young Jedi at the temple. He refused to remember the other student’s name; he didn’t deserve it. This young woman should run before he hurt her too. But she didn’t leave. She stared at him as if he wasn’t the monster the Resistance knew him to be. But why wouldn’t she – she had no idea she was staring into the eyes of a monster. “What can we do?” she asked.

“There is nothing we can do. A Force bond is not easily broken.” He had tried. It had been impossible to imagine a life without the bond – how had he survived before – but he had tried with everything he had to give her a life free of him. He wasn’t strong enough. There was only one way to break the bond. “To end her suffering, Kylo Ren would have to die.”

Rose nodded slowly, understand the gravity of the situation Rey faced. “You’re the only other Force-user I know who can help her. Rey hasn’t told Leia. Can you come back? Can you kill him?”

Kylo sighed as he studied his sleeping bondmate. “Trust me, I’ve tried, but it’s complicated.” I don’t know why, but she won’t let me. Most days the darkness in her wants to kill me, but other days the light in her fears it. If I knew it would make her happy, if I knew she would be safe, I would end it all.

“So you know him, then?”

“I do,” he rasped. I am the monster you fear. I have taken three hundred and eight lives. He was suddenly overcome with weight of his greatest sins. “Kylo Ren killed my father.”
Rose gasped. The sympathetic tears swelling her eyes twisted the dagger of guilt in his gut. “This is dangerous for her. If you came back to the Resistance…”

“I’m sorry, but I can’t.” Kylo didn’t know why he didn’t just tell her who he was. It would soothe the ache in his chest when the pity in her eyes transformed into fear… disgust… hatred. But for some reason, he couldn’t bring himself to do it. “Kylo Ren is the reason I can never come back to the Resistance,” he said instead. He hated himself for his weakness.

She leaned forward, reaching for his hand. “If you love her…”

“I said I can’t!” he shouted, tearing his hand away before she could touch him. Could she touch him? His skin crawled at the thought.

There was a soft sound and Kylo remembered that there was another person in that room. They both froze and turned to where Rey rested on the sacrificial altar in sleep. Her eyes were still closed to the galaxy, but she was trembling and mumbling in her dreams. “Please, Ben…” It was his name, his face, that tormented her nightmares.

“See,” Rose said, gesturing to her friend. “All she wants is–”

“Don’t.”

Rose must have sensed the strength of the emotions threatening to rip him to shreds, because she offered him a half-smile and nodded. “Okay, well, I should go before she wakes up. It was… nice to meet you, Ben.” She wiped her hands on her dusty trousers and stood. It was a position of vulnerability – her standing as he remained seated – but he allowed it. She was his enemy, and yet, he allowed something he would have never granted to a member of the First Order. Perhaps it was due to the fact he barely had to incline his head to meet her gaze, or perhaps it was something else. Perhaps it was trust that had wormed its way across the bond. “Even if you can’t come back,” she said. “I’m glad she has someone who she trusts watching out for her.”

With those heart wrenching words, she turned to leave. Without considering the consequences, he allowed the word past his lips. “Wait.” Even though she didn’t answer, he knew she was hesitating just inside the doorway. He couldn’t bring himself to look up at her. “I know you have no reason to trust me, but if you could not tell Rey or my mother about this…”
“I won’t,” she replied softly. “It isn’t my story to tell. But I hope you’ll tell them. You may not be ready to come back, but I believe you can. So does Rey. If I know anything about your mother, she believes in you too.” With that, she was gone. Kylo couldn’t help the shuddering breath as he struggled to keep his emotions at bay. It was nothing he had expected when facing a member of the Resistance. Though, to be fair, she didn’t know who he truly was. If she had, he doubted she would have spared him such kindness.

“Where are you, Ben?” Rey whimpered again in her sleep. “Come back.” He sighed, watching the familiar struggle of drowning in a sea of memories.

“You might hate me for this, but I can’t stand to hear you suffer.” He knew how she hated “mind control.” Placing his hand next to her temple, he projected the first peaceful image he thought of. It was the image of a familiar lake. The calm, sparkling water lulled her with tranquility as he fought back the ache of resurfacing memories. It was useless; once the childhood memories broke through his defenses, the darkest ones found their way inside. He was reminded of a night by a burning temple, and a whisper barely perceptible over the pouring rain. Close your eyes. Think of someplace beautiful.

The whimpers faded as they had that night, and Rey fell into a restful sleep. “I’m sorry,” he said, his voice heavy with emotion. “I did what I had to do.”

Her eyes blinked open at his words, but they were still clouded with the haze of sleep. “Ben?” He was silent, hoping her drowsiness would drag her back to the unconscious world. She smiled softly and closed her eyes again. “Was it worth it?” she asked.

Burning the temple? Joining the First Order? Killing my father? Becoming Supreme Leader? Asking you to join me? Nearly killing you on Crait?

“Was what worth it?”

She didn’t say, but he found his answer to every single one of those questions was, no.

With a huff, he moved to his desk and reopened his messages. Those three words stared back at him, taunting him.

Why those coordinates?
His fingers typed the words and sent the reply before he could reconsider. Kylo stared at the screen as the truth stared back at him. He nearly threw the datapad across the room, but he hesitated. Panic set in as he realized what he had done - what he had done through his personal messages tied to First Order servers. With trembling fingers, he deleted the evidence of the exchange. Those three words in response – three consequential words – were burned into his vision long after they disappeared.

You know why.
Suicidal ideation

Kylo briefly talks about contemplating suicide

Starvation, suffering and implication of sexual assault

It does not go into detail, or suggest exactly what happened, but Kylo speaks briefly of what he saw in Rey's mind
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Rey awoke with a dread she could not place and a longing she did not want to. The blanket she swore she had kicked off in the night was wrapped snugly around her. She had no idea how to determine the time; the light of the sun did not penetrate to the lower levels of the temple, and she did not have a chronometer. She found that she had either been oversleeping lately, or not sleeping at all, because of the perpetual darkness.

She didn’t know what to do with herself except lie there, but the longer she did, the more her thoughts began to mirror the darkness around her. It was lonely, but the others all had their places in the Resistance; she didn’t fit in anywhere. The longer she stayed in that room, the more she found herself anticipating the next connection. He had been… comforting the last time she saw him. At the very least, he would understand how the loneliness was eating her alive. Forcing herself to sit up, she decided to take a walk outside before she contemplated more treasonous thoughts about her enemy.

The light blinded her when she stepped through the archway of the temple. After her upbringing on a desert planet, she never thought her eyes would have difficulty adjusting to the sun, especially because this star did not shine nearly as bright as the one on Jakku. The darkness of the temple was taking more of a toll on her than she had thought. When her eyes did adjust, she noticed a disturbance near the edge of the forest. It was a creature in distress, she realized, its cries echoing up the temple steps. She skipped down the steps to its rescue without a moment’s thought.

A small, grey-brown winged creature had been caught in the snare of a carnivorous plant. The meter-long stalk was orange with large, shimmering purple petals. It was captivating, and, had she not witnessed its lethality, she would never have guessed such danger was hidden in its beauty.

“It’s okay, little one,” she cooed, “I’ll help you.” She grasped the flower carefully and dislodged the creature from its clutches. The creature fluttered frantically in her hands, covered in a warm slime. She used her tunic to gently wipe it clean.

It was an ugly beast, to put it mildly. Its forearms had been evolutionarily converted to wings with thin, soft membranes that attached at its backbone. Dorsal spikes were also connected by a similar membrane. In addition to the spikes, the creature had claws that tore through flesh like blades. It had long fangs that protruded from its snarling jaws. It snapped at her gentle caresses as she attempted to console it.

The dark, crazed eyes were glazed over in fear of her touch. She did nothing to harm it, but it lashed out at her all the same. It gasped for breath, struggling wildly, trembling in her arms. Its sharp fangs and claws tore into her palm, but she ignored its destruction in favor of saving it. Eventually, her stubbornness won out, as she knew it would, and it settled into the comfort of her gentle hands, nestling against her. It still did not trust her; its wide eyes – endless pools of fear and pain – followed her every move. She couldn’t help but think of different pained eyes.

“I’ll name you... Ben,” she cooed, imagining her bond mate’s face when she showed him the creature, complete with a designation in homage to his given name rather than his chosen moniker.

“What creature are you trying to save now?” a voice asked behind her. She turned to him and smiled. Her only concern was whether he had overheard her.

“This hideous little thing,” she opened her hands enough for him to study it.

“Well, that looks similar to a Borgle bat – maybe a young one, because they get huge,” Finn replied as he fidgeted with his jacket. She could sense the blanket of anxiety that enveloped him. It was something unfamiliar when it came to her happy-go-lucky friend. “They’re dangerous, Rey. The bigger ones will drain you of your blood in a heartbeat.”

“Oh, you don’t look so dangerous,” she whispered to the creature, as blood trickled down her arms from the wounds on her palms. “You’ll be okay; I’ll take care of you.”

“Rey,” Finn sighed, “that’s not a pet. You can’t save everything.”

“But I can save him,” she caressed its trembling wings with her fingers. “I can’t just leave him in the forest. He will die. I have to help him.”

Finn stared out into the forest for a moment, then returned his attention to her. His eyes caught hers, and they were dark with insinuation. “Sometimes it’s better if these creatures just die. Let fate run its course before they turn on you.”

“You’re not being fair, Finn. He trusts me. You don’t know he will turn on me.” Her sharp tone betrayed forbidden thoughts she shouldn’t have revealed to Finn. They both knew that the conversation had morphed into more than an injured Borgle bat.

Finn nodded toward her bleeding palms. “It looks like he already has.”
“He thought I would hurt him before, like everything else in this forest, but I helped him. See? He’s different now.”

Please just see him as I see him.

“He’s a feral beast, Rey,” he replied, his tone uncharacteristically acerbic. “You know nothing about this creature; you know nothing of what he’s capable of. You’ve seen his eyes; they still belong to a beast. You may have him cornered, suffering, and trapped, but that doesn’t mean you’ve tamed him. You pity his pain and whatever restraint you have mistaken for gentleness. The first thing I learned in training on-world is that a suffering beast is the most dangerous, because they are desperate... and unpredictable. But helping a creature doesn’t change its instincts, its nature. You think you can tame him, but a beast will never make a suitable... companion. He will never be more than the murderous monster he is, no matter what you think you see in him.”

“Are we still talking about this bat, Finn?” she contended. She was more determined than ever to help rehabilitate the creature to prove it wouldn’t turn on her.

“Are we, Rey?” he countered. He glared at her knowingly for a moment, before patting her on the shoulder. “I’m late; I have to go meet Rose. We’ll talk about your naïve compassion for creatures of murder later, but this is... important.” He scratched his arm anxiously and set off down the path into the trees.

“It’s okay, don’t mind him,” she whispered to the creature. “I’ll take you back to the temple and get you all fixed up. You’re safe now.” She slid her finger across its trembling head, trying to soothe it, but ripped her hand away as she sensed its suffering through the Force. “No...”

Rey opened her hands as the creature’s trembling became worse. Its body tensed, the pain evident in its shrill cries, and all at once she realized the creature’s condition was bleaker than she had previously thought. She held it close to her chest, willing its convulsing to end.

Please, she begged the Force. Her answer was the fading of its energy in the Force. It was dying. She knew from the moment she touched it that there was no hope to save it. She was resolved to embrace it until it was reclaimed by the Force. “I won’t leave you,” she promised. “I’m so sorry. I can’t save you.” But the Force had other plans. A quick and painless death would have been too easy for Rey to witness. Its convulsing grew worse, as its cries became gurgling, labored breaths, and a black fluid flowed from its mouth. She shuddered every time it seized in agony, but the poor creature continued to struggle in futility, refusing to surrender to inevitable peace. It was clear the Force would take it, but she couldn’t stand by and watch it suffer.
Tears streamed down her face as she whispered soothing platitudes. Before she had a chance to reconsider, she placed her fingers around the struggling creature’s head and quickly snapped its neck, instantly ending its suffering. Her stomach rolled with nausea as she collapsed to the ground, softly stroking the lifeless creature. The forest had become silent in the absence of the unmistakable sounds of the throes of death. She became all too aware that she was alone.

What had she done?

No, no, no, please, come back.

This was not the will of the Force, she had killed him! As the creature lay limp in her hands, she wondered if she had been wrong. What if she could still have saved him? Why had she given up on him? She had never given up on anyone, even when it had seemed hopeless. How could she have taken a life that was not hers to take? Was this the darkness? Can she no longer trust her own thoughts? What would have been the right thing to do? Who had she become?

She was broken from her mourning by the sound of voices in the trees. She stood, nearly trance-like, grasping the lifeless creature to her chest. Her feet willed her forward through the forest, almost hypnotized the lure of the voices. The desire to find anyone to talk to in that moment of languishing loneliness became a driving need. Still holding the perished bat in her arms, she walked deeper into the rainforest. Two forms strolled down the path in front of her. Finn and Rose.

Neither of her friends had noticed her following them as they turned down another path. She almost called out to them, but chose instead not to intrude on their private moment. She could sense Finn’s anxious energy as he pulled Rose along the path. Using the Force for deception would be frowned upon by Luke, she was sure of it. But she wanted to know what would happen between them, what was so important to tell her, without ruining the moment.

Follow them, the voice whispered. Listen.

Were they talking about her? Kylo? Plans to attack the First Order? They were not Force-sensitive, and it would be too easy to use a simple trick, but would it work if she knew them? Would it work on two people at the same time? She knew she could find the knowledge from him, just as she had apparently done while on Starkiller. His energy was simple to find over the bond and simpler to tap into.

He doesn’t have to know.
The ability to persuade more than one person was surprisingly simple. She wondered briefly if he would notice, but brushed away the concern, maintaining that it was worth the risk. Certainly, she could explain the necessity for the knowledge later. She could feel his darkness – or was it her own – flow through her as she waved her hand.

“You will not notice me,” she said in a calm, but commanding tone. Both Finn and Rose stopped in their tracks, repeating her. “Or hear me!” she added. Guilt pricked at the tiny hairs on the back of her neck. If it's anything too private, I will just leave, she rationalized. She wondered if the persuasion had worked, but she could feel the Force vibrating around her. As long as she could feel it vibrating, as it did when she was connected to Kylo, then she presumed it was protecting her from being discovered.

Finn pulled Rose to a rock that overlooked a beautiful, smooth flowing river. The plants that grew along the river were beautiful shades of orange, yellow and purple. They opened and closed like twinkling stars, and Rey wondered if those were dangerous too. Why was everything beautiful in the galaxy so dangerous?

Finn guided Rose to the rock and knelt on the soft ground in front of her. He grabbed her hands and stared nervously in her eyes. His body was visibly shaking. “What is this all about Finn?”

“I want to thank you...for waiting for me. I told you I needed time to think, and you were more understanding than I could ever hope for. You never gave up on me. Rose, you are wise and smart and brave and kind and determined and strong and honest, and, for some reason, you chose to love me like no one ever has. Sure, we argue and drive each other crazy sometimes, but that is because we are honest with each other. And you know there is nothing more important than trust. I know, until now, this has seemed like an ‘unrequited love’ as you said the other night. And I’m sorry.” he sighed. “Here it goes.”

“Rose, I am passionately, devotedly, deeply in love with you. I am sorry it took your near-death for me to get that through my head, and I am sorry that I ran away from it until now. I was scared. I have had very few people in my life that I love. My parents were taken away from me...Slip died in my arms... I let Rey in, and I almost lost her. I was just so scared to let you in my heart, too.

“You have the ability to break it, Rose, and you almost did. The thought of losing you forced me to face my feelings for you, but it also opened my eyes to how broken I would be if you were taken from me, too. I was scared that if I allowed myself to love you, I was opening my heart up to be destroyed, because this whole love thing is terrifying. But Poe helped me realize that running away doesn’t stop me from loving you with everything in me. It only stops you from knowing the truth. And if I were to lose you, the only difference would have been my regret in never telling you how much you mean to me. I love you, Rose—more than I thought I was capable of loving anyone. I don’t want to run away anymore. And I know that our love is new, but I have never been so sure of anything my entire life.

“I want us to have a hope to look forward to. I want a light at the end of this darkness. I want a reason for us to fight to live through this, even when the outcome looks bleak. So... I know this is sudden, and crazy, but the war has made me realize exactly what I want,” he gulped, shifting uncomfortably, “Rose Tico, the moment we have won and this miserable war ends, will join my little family; will you marry me?”

Rose’s eyes grew wide, and her hands clasped over her mouth. He offered his hand to her, the only thing in the galaxy that he had. Rose stared at his hand and back up at him. Rey’s heart beat wildly in her chest as she waited for the answer.

“I love you, Finn. Nothing would make me happier than join your family and spend the rest of my life with you,” Rose smiled as tears fell softly down her cheeks. She accepted his hand, and he pulled her to him, passionately kissing her.

Rey smiled.
Death

An animal dies graphically
Beasts

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey stared down in silence upon the two figures playing by the river. And he stood in the shadows, watching her. Kylo had reports, briefings, important orders to approve... but he stood, leaning against the wall in his quarters – or a tree on her planet – waiting patiently for her to disappear again. She had brought him here; he was certain of it. He had sensed her attempting to sift through his consciousness again. Then she had appeared in front of him, as she followed her friends through the trees. The most confusing aspect was that she had never once seemed to notice he was there.

After interrupting her kiss with Dameron, Kylo was pressed to consider what he could witness when the Force dragged them together. Of all the scenes he had imagined, and feared, the one he had disrupted was not at the top of the list. It was baffling to watch her perform a Jedi mind trick on her own friends. Perhaps, she was not as loyal to them as he had previously thought. She betrayed their trust so she could spy on... a marriage proposition.

She may have been capable of hiding it from them, but he could sense her emotions. At first, it was happiness. But then her emotions grew darker, and he could feel her jealousy. Why? Had the traitor seen her darkness or her interest in the pilot? Had he rejected her? Did she wish that proposal was for her? Kylo would have been more than happy to kill him to avenge her jealous heart.

Rey sat with her arms wrapped around her raised knees, staring up into the dark canopy above her. “Why can’t I just be happy for them?” she cried to herself. “I am a horrible friend. The worst. I should be congratulating them, but instead, I’m watching them like some creature in the shadows, like... like... him!”

The ironic accuracy of her words was not lost on him, but it wasn’t his fault she had dragged him across the galaxy to scavenge his training.

“There is nothing about their love that should upset me. They are perfect for each other. Anyone else would be happy, and that’s it. I mean, I am happy for them.”

You sound thrilled.
“I just don’t understand it.”

I do... you love him.

Kylo had believed the traitor loved her in return when he so nobly defended her on Starkiller. Though Kylo knew better than anyone that she did not need defending. When he was young, Kylo read stories of beautiful princesses who needed rescuing by brave men. He was told it was intended to be romantic. It never made sense to him, however. In his family, the women didn’t need a brave man to rescue them, they had no trouble rescuing themselves. He had always admired how strong his mother was. He had never expected anything less from his female Knights, officers, or stormtroopers than their male counterparts. When he had faced Rey, he feared her strength. He had never found anyone particularly attractive, before his bondmate, but if there one quality he would have searched for, strength would have topped the list. Along with honesty and loyalty, of course, two traits his mother didn’t possess.

“Why can’t I have that? Why can’t I have one person who sees me for me? Who wants me?” she whispered. She didn’t love the traitor, he realized, she was jealous of what he had. She wanted that belonging, that respite toloneliness. He understood it all too well. After the life she lived, she deserved that. Han should have dropped her off at the nearest ecumenopolis and given her a chance at a normal life; she would never find it with a group of anarchists who put the cause above all else.

“Why can’t he look at me the way Finn looks at her?”

Kylo could guess to whom she was referring – the pilot. Rey didn’t understand like he did that Poe Dameron would never admire her power and strength. All the pilot saw was physical beauty. Rey was beautiful; there was no doubt about that. Her skin looked smooth to touch, her shiny hair looked soft, her lips looked warm; he could stare into her eyes until the end of time… stop thinking of such perversions.

She was beautiful, but there were qualities Poe Dameron would never appreciate about Rey. Her forgiveness and compassion, yes, but also her ferocity. Rey was a warrior, and a man like Poe Dameron wouldn’t admire her. Kylo had been inside his mind. He would fear her if he saw her darkness, because he did not understand her. Not like Kylo did.

“Why can’t he look after me while I sleep? Or be overwhelmed by his love for me? Why can’t he care for my safety, be my belonging, stand by me? Why? Why wouldn’t he be destroyed by my death? Why couldn’t he offer me what Finn offered her?”
Kylo bit his tongue before he responded sharply and caused more turmoil between them. If you wanted those things, you shouldn’t have left me. I offered you everything! I offered you the entire galaxy! He felt the bitterness of her rejection resurface. Every time he saw her, that betrayal would fade away just being in her presence. It was pathetic. He had offered himself to her… and she had tried to kill him in return. She wanted a connection, but she had destroyed theirs. He knew why. Rey wanted those things from someone like Poe Dameron, not a monster like him; that was the difference.

“This is all your fault, Ben!” she shouted into the trees. “I can’t even enjoy my best friend’s proposal because of you!”

Kylo froze. Had she finally realized he was there?

“I am nothing to you!” she continued, rolling from her seated position onto her back. She covered her eyes with her hands. “And I am forced to see what could have been every time I see your face! In the hut, in the elevator, and especially at Kamino there was a moment when I ... well, I thought it was different, that you were different. But then I realized that you don’t care at all. Every time I see you, I can see the man I thought you were. But you are not the man who told me I’m not alone. I just want to hate you, Ben."

It took everything inside him not to respond to her; not to scream every last word that was left unsaid, to tear at his skin until it bled like his heart, to bare his soul to her so she could see the wound she had left behind. He had been foolish enough to believe she was different. But she only cared for her friends and what he could do to help them.

“Maybe I was stupid to believe you, Ben. Maybe I expected too much from my enemy. Maybe I only thought you understood me. I am surrounded by good people who care, but they don’t understand me. I can’t talk about the Force, our bond, and the darkness with them. I can’t find my belonging with them. I thought I had that with you. But you chose the First Order over me. Then you tried to kill us, and you massacred thousands of others. And now the Force torments me by connecting us.”

She thought... she thought she had belonging me? I don’t understand, I offered that to her! Did she regret the choice she made? Will she join me now?

His thoughts were interrupted by a movement to his left. He felt into the Force, but could only sense energy signatures in the corridor passing in front of his own chambers. The movement was on her side of the bond. Something was hunched low, stalking Rey. It emerged from its cover, only ten yards from her.
Jaggalor, or at least, it looked identical to one. He had seen a Jaggalor in a zoo on a trip to his father’s home planet as a child. It was a panther-like species with a pale, yellow hide and large black rosette spots. Its underbelly was rust-colored, hairless, and wrinkled. Two long, nerve-lined tentacle appendages grew from under its shoulder blades, used as sensory organs to detect approaching predators.

She was still lying on her back, though her hands had dropped to her side. If she sensed it, she hadn’t made a move to defend herself. The beast was closing in on its prey, and he was lightyears away. He reached out his hand and attempted to wound the creature. Unfortunately, the wave of Force crashed into the wall in his chambers on his side of the bond. His pulse intensified as he realized his Force powers were useless across the galaxy. Panic seized his senses, and he summoned his lightsaber from his desk. It was entirely possible that the lightsaber would not be capable of crossing the galaxy, but he was running out of time and options. He made his decision and lowered the barriers in his mind that he had built up against her.

Rey! Behind you!

Kylo forced the thoughts into her mind, throwing his lightsaber – willing it to her – as she jolted upright. She caught the weapon, triggered it and turned. The motion triggered a response from the predator. It launched in Rey’s direction. She swung at it but only grazed it. The creature roared, and its massive paws scratched her across her back as she completed her turn. Rey cried out and pulled the lightsaber up defensively as the creature swatted at her again. The blade cut a wound into one paw, which only served to antagonize it further. The claws of the other paw sliced down her arm in retribution. Rey stumbled back, attempting to put distance between herself and the creature.

Kylo knew he was powerless to do anything against the panther, but he was never one to stand idle. With the Force crashing through his veins, he stepped forward into the fight. Battle – this place where thoughts and emotions disappeared, where there was no right or fair, where all that mattered was survival – this was where everything made sense. His thoughts screamed of how profoundly he hated facing large, unpredictable beasts. The fear for her safety quieted as the calm certainty of battle returned. It was the only time everything melted away except the guidance of the Force. His intention was to distract the panther, giving her the opportunity to expose its weaknesses. He kicked at the creature, surprised to find that his boot connected with its hinds, but its attention remained on the lightsaber.

“My blaster!” Rey shouted, and he belatedly realized she had directed her words toward him. The panther mounted another attack against her, and he split his attention between watching the battle and searching the undergrowth of the forest for the blaster. Her lightsaber – his lightsaber – wounded it, but not enough to deter it. Her teeth were bared, mirroring its feral energy, but the beast was not deterred. The panther waited for her to strike out and caught her weak side with one of its paws. Rey was skillfully fending off its strikes with the crimson blade, but it was learning. Turning away from the fight, Kylo searched the forest floor with frantic haste. He found the weapon resting on her pack against the tree.
“Ben! Watch out!”

Calling the weapon to his hand, he barely turned before the creature was upon him. He got one shot off at its gut as it launched itself at him, but it barely seemed fazed. They both tumbled to the forest floor, and Kylo wished he had paid more attention on that trip to the zoo. Evidently, the beasts had thick hides that were impervious to most weapons. Its powerful jaws clamped down on the arm that held the blaster, and the entire world whitened out for a moment as the pain set in. When his senses returned, he kicked and hit the creature, but that only encouraged its aggressive reaction. Its paw came up to pin his chest, and its claws pierced through his tunic and skin with little resistance. He punched again, only this time he hit it in the soft spot of its throat. It released a roar in his face, its hot saliva dripping onto his cheek from its rotten-smelling jaws.

The creature released a more furious howl as Rey slashed the blade into its side. It turned on her, and with one long swipe of its paw, she was thrown to the ground as well. The lightsaber clattered from her hand across the forest floor.

“Go for the throat!” he yelled as he pushed himself off the ground.

Kylo lifted the blaster with his left arm and attempted to aim it with assistance from the Force. He fired, grazing it in the left shoulder, and the panther turned momentarily to snarl at him. Rey tried to call the lightsaber to her hand in its distraction, but when it noticed the movement, it pounced.

“Rey!”

The momentum of the creature knocked her back, pinning her underneath its massive body. It was no longer snarling, and he feared it was too late. From his vantage point, it looked as though the beast had her neck in its jaws. Kylo pushed himself up and sprinted to help his bondmate. He abandoned the blaster; if he shot the beast, he could shoot her too. His only option was to tackle the creature and face it weaponless. With a strength unassisted by the Force, he crashed into the creature and tackled it away from her. Kylo prepared himself for close-quarter combat with razor-sharp claws, but the beast slumped to the side with a smoking hole in the soft tissue of its neck. He had enough experience with lightsaber wounds to recognize one and know this one had been instantly fatal.

When he turned on his side in panic, he found Rey staring back at him with the hilt of his lightsaber raised where the creature’s throat had been. He pushed himself to a stand, kicking the beast with his boot in petulant retribution. He stepped closer, but she didn’t push herself to her feet. Her chest was heaving as the adrenaline coursed through her veins. He wasn’t faring much better. “Are you hurt?” he asked, inspecting her wounds the best he could from a distance.
“Just some scratches, on my back and my arms,” she said breathlessly, her eyes fixed on his stare rather than the wounds. There was something in them that destabilized him. “You?”

He shook his head. Rey finally stood and brushed the red dirt from her grey trousers and tunic. His eyes were drawn to the movement of her hands, then focused on the bloodied wounds on her palms. The scratches were too small to have come from the Juggalor and too deep to have come from a fall. She followed his gaze and hid her hands from view beneath her crossed arms.

His voice was sharper and more accusatory than he had intended. “What… happened?”

“I tried to save a dying creature,” she said, refusing to look at him. He could see the reflection of tears in the corner of her eyes, and he guessed that those tears were not born of envy of her friends’ engagement. She was fierce and strong and capable, but it was her almost child-like innocence, her desire to see and be the good in the galaxy – after all the evil she had experienced – that truly intrigued him.

“I presume it did not go as you had hoped?”

She walked over to a nearby tree, and Kylo found himself following her. She was kneeling next to a young Borgle bat, reposed in death upon a shrine of rocks and flowers. He knelt beside her. “I saved him from suffering a slow death all alone, but he still died in my arms.”

“You can’t save everything, Rey,” he said softly, watching her caress the dead creature. There were likely thousands of Borgles in the forest; why did this one matter? Another thought crossed Kylo’s mind. If this was how she reacted to the death of a beast of the forest, what would she do if she lost one of her friends? They were just anarchists to him, but could he knowingly do this to her?

Rey gingerly lifted the body of the creature into her lap. Curling in on herself, she sheltered it from the world around them. It was incongruous to the Rey he’d seen in her mind. She had witnessed her fair share of death, she had been the cause of it, why was this creature any different? There was no emotional investment; it hadn’t been her pet. As far as he could tell, she had happened upon it when it was already dying. “Thanks, but I’ve already heard enough of it from Finn.”

“Maybe you should listen to him, since his opinion matters to you.” His comment was rewarded with a withering glare. He wasn’t helping. He knew he wasn’t, but he wanted her to see.
“No, I won’t. I don’t regret trying to save him. I still believe he could have been saved if I had only helped him. But I just... gave up on him.” Her voice broke and tears welled up in her eyes. “I killed Ben.”

“Ben?” he murmured. Were they still talking about the bat? The inflection in his voice betrayed his piquing curiosity. He wasn’t certain whether he should have been proud she named a treacherous beast after his old name or offended.

“Yes!”

Kylo sighed. “Maybe letting him die ended his suffering. Maybe it was the most compassionate thing you could have done for him.” It was the best he could do to comfort her. He couldn’t understand why she cared so much about the creature, or perhaps he didn’t want to. It was nature; eat or be eaten. If it died, it would have become a meal to ensure another creature's survival. Or, if it survived, it would have made a meal of another creature. What was the life of one bat in the complexity of the Cosmic Force?

What is the life of one man?

“Maybe, maybe not. But now I’ll never know.”

“He was just a creature of the darkness, Rey,” he said softly. “He wasn’t worth saving.”

She turned to glower at him. It was clear that this conversation had gone beyond the actual beast for her as much as it had for him. “Even a creature of darkness is worth saving, Ben,” she said, voice low in warning. It was also clear she did not appreciate his brand of logic. If he kept pushing, this would escalate quickly. Still, he persisted, for both their sakes.

“What about the Juggalor, was he not worthy?”

“That monster had every intention of killing me,” she argued, her eyes conveying more than her words expressed. “But the bat, he was just scared and fighting to survive. He didn’t want to hurt me.”

It irritated Kylo that he continued to push the issue obstinately when he knew she had no interest in the truth. An enemy would find arguing with her a waste of time; Rey was as deeply entrenched in denial as he was in darkness. It irritated him further that his voice had softened in response. “Your hands suggest otherwise. He hurt you, whether he wanted to or not, because that is what beasts do.”

“He’s not a beast,” she sniffled. Her stare softened as she looked down at the lifeless animal, which wasn’t unusual when she looked upon anyone or anything other than him. “When he realized I wouldn’t hurt him, he was gentle and sweet. He wanted to live, I know it.”

“And if you saved him?” he reasoned, pushing harder to prove his point. This was not about the bat to him. This was about making her understand that she had been foolish in believing he would turn. If she just saw him for what he was, then maybe the constant tension back and forth between them could die. “He would still be a creature of darkness. You were spared the moment when his impulses inevitably returned, and he hurt you again.”

“You’re wrong.” Her voice trembled. He couldn’t decide if it was in anger, because she still believed she was right, or fear, because deep down she knew he was.

“Does it matter?” he sighed. “He’s dead either way.”

“He’s dead because I failed him. I took his life when it wasn’t mine to take.” Rey lifted the bat and reverently placed him back on the makeshift grave. Remorse trickled into the bond as he regretted his words. He hadn’t meant for them to sound that way.

“No, Rey, you didn’t fail him. You just believed you could save something that couldn’t be saved. He was never meant to survive,” he said quietly. Sorrow cut down her cheeks. He stilled his hand to prevent his fingers from wiping her tears away. “You can’t change what happened to him before you found him. You made his last moments.... peaceful.”

“I could have given him so much more. I could have shown him happiness. We could have been lonely together,” she whispered.

He sighed, the ache in his chest was new, unfamiliar. He would do anything to take her pain from her and he wanted to hate himself for it, but he didn’t. “Do you want me to find you another one?” he offered. It was a gentleness he was not accustomed to, and he had to override the impulse to say something flippant, to protect the raw wound that ached in his chest when she stared at him with such sorrow.
She shook her head through tears. “No, I want Ben back.” He worked his jaw to control his expression. “I don't want a different one, I wanted to save him,” she whispered, eyes downcast. If her eyes were not pooling with grief, he would have asked why she chose that name.

“I know, but at least Ben didn’t die alone,” was all that he could manage. Kylo was entirely unpracticed with comforting anyone, but the words had slipped out with ease. Rey turned to him, likely as surprised as he was. He could feel her light again. Softness broke through the sorrow in her eyes. Her penetrating gaze left him feeling exposed...vulnerable. It reminded him of how effortlessly Maz stared through his outer pretense as if she could read his soul. Her eyes did not seethe with hatred as he had come to expect during their interactions. There seemed to be a momentary truce, as thin as a thread stretching tautly between them, but still there, nonetheless.

He recognized the look in her eyes from that moment between them in the hut. Curiosity, trepidation, and longing flashed across her expression. The upward movement of her hand diverted his attention. As her fingers reached for his face, he realized her intention was to touch him. Fear shuddered through him, eclipsing his intrigue to know what had caused the temperance between them. She knew what she was doing, his face was the only skin he allowed to be exposed. He had taken countless precautions to ensure that no one could ever touch him, but those protections did little against Rey. He had always been powerless against her. Though he yearned for her touch, he no longer held the curiosity he did in the hut; this time he knew the consequences. They could share another vision, or worse, the bond could grow stronger. Knowing this, he did nothing to stop her. He longed for anything she would give him.

A pulsating energy sparked between them as her fingertips touched his skin. They both gasped, but neither pulled away. Her fingers softly trailed down the length of his cheek, caressing the path of the scar. Her scar. The energy between them hummed in anticipation. His eyes searched hers for a meaning behind this change, his question frozen on his lips. A consuming warmth radiated inside him, spilling into the bond. The storm crashing inside him momentarily subsided, and, for an instant, he felt as if all was right in the galaxy. He felt weightless, lightheaded, and euphoric. He felt like he was home. It was peaceful and calming, a feeling he had almost forgotten. Almost.

The light!

He jerked away defensively, breaking the connection between their touch. Her hand snapped back, but he caught her wrist between his gloved fingers. If she was frightened, he had not noticed. His attention was drawn to her palm. Her uninjured palm. His eyes trailed up from her hand to her arm, then to his own arm. There was not a single scratch. She must have observed the look of horror flash across his face, because she ripped her hand from his grasp to study it.

“The wounds... are gone,” she said in stunned confusion.
“What have you done?” He choked, the panic rising in his chest. He searched for the comforting familiarity of darkness, wrapping it around himself defensively. Still, he could feel the light where the darkness couldn’t reach. Her touch was beguiling; her light had seduced him from the darkness, and he had allowed it. Despite his master’s teachings, he had always felt the pull to the light. Now it was inside him, like an infection. Years of training, yet she had found the light within him with a single touch. What had she done? What had he done? They had… healed each other through their connection.

_Involuntary healing? It’s not possible!_

“Ben, how did we do that?” she asked in awe, but his mind was still reeling. His trembling lips could not articulate an answer. He dragged himself backward on his hands until his back hit a tree on her side of the connection. Her words confirmed she hadn’t done it herself. The bond had done it. The strength of their bond was growing to dangerous levels. Did it know no limits? At this rate, he would soon have no mental defenses against her. Theoretically, she would be capable of hearing and seeing _everything_ in his mind. He cursed the absence of a voice in his head. They needed guidance. They had to find a way to control it before it was beyond their control, before they lost themselves, before it allowed the light back in forever.

She knelt in front of him as he panted against the tree. “Ben?”

“What have you done? You healed yourself… with the light within me.” His voice was barely above a whisper between agitated breaths.

Her eyes were wide with wonder, brimming with tears. “I told you there’s still light in you. I felt it.”

“Don’t, Rey. Not now.” Kylo clenched his fists tightly beside his head.

What they had done – it was treachery. Snoke… Sidious would have punished him for it until he was barely breathing. He would punish _himself_ until he was barely breathing. He had enjoyed every second of it, as if he was not consumed by darkness, as if he was not a monster. There was no place for him in the light; it would destroy him. Yet he embraced it with the slightest touch from her. His skin felt too tight, there wasn’t enough oxygen in the galaxy to satisfy his lungs, he wanted to scream with everything in him until the emotions building inside him died away.

_You are sickening_, he told himself. _You are merely a fleeting shadow to the worthiness that is Vader._
His chest was tight, as he realized what voice his own had transformed into in his mind. The darkness flooding into his veins did little to ease the war inside him. He could feel the residual warmth of her light pulsing through him. He was terrified.

“Ben...” She reached for him, but he pushed her hand away.

“Haven't you ruined enough?” Somewhere in the darkness, he knew he was lashing out, he knew that his words had broken the fragile truce between them. But she had cracked something deep inside him, and he knew it had ruined him. “What have you done to me?”

Rey’s eyes darkened, and she lowered her hands. She stared at her palms for a moment, refusing to look at him. “I’m not sorry you hate me,” she growled, “for showing you the truth inside you.” Kylo wanted to demand how she could believe he hated her. After everything he had risked for her, after what he had done to his own master for her. He could never hate her; she continued to be his only reason to breathe. He wanted to say all those things, but that is not what he said to her as he clutched fearfully to the darkness.

“You don't give me many reasons not to hate you,” he said instead. Immediate regret ached in his chest. They were silent as she wrapped her arms around herself, turning her face so he wouldn’t see her tears. But he saw them and hated himself more for being the cause. Moving away from him, she returned to her silent vigil next to the dead creature.

The darkness he had grasped onto had faded when she spoke again. “I know you have no reason to help me, but can you please just bring Ben back.” He studied her face for a moment, his eyes softening at her pained expression. “The bat, I mean. If you can heal me, then you can heal him... you’re strong in the Force. Please, you’re the only other Force-user I know. Then I’ll leave you alone, I’ll never ask for anything again.”

“Ben is dead,” he said, his voice colder than he intended. Before she could argue, he continued, “The Force doesn't work that way. Death cannot be undone. Trust me, I wish it could be. Even if it were possible, to save a life requires a life, and there’s only one person I know that could have done it. In theory, he could have been healed if he were still alive but...” His voice faltered as he watched bitterness twist across her expression. There was a familiar darkness he sensed clouding her light again. It was suffocating even to him, and he had struggled with the darkness his entire life.

“So if you had joined the Resistance, he would still be alive?”
No, because you wouldn’t be.

“I never studied it, Rey. I learned basic techniques and read about it in a book. I have never been capable of healing anything beyond a flesh wound,” he said, but his mind supplied a memory of a time he had tried to save a life and failed. The memory was like ripping the scab off an old wound that would never heal. He swallowed the pain of remembering the past. “That was before I joined the First Order, and I haven’t tried it since. I don’t know how we healed you. I don’t think I want to know. Healing would require me to surrender myself to the light, and you know I can’t do that.”

“So, you could have saved him, but you care more about the darkness,” she spat. “Why shouldn’t I be surprised?”

Kylo could feel the familiar heat of anger igniting like embers under his skin. “Luke knew how to heal. How is it my fault that he taught you nothing? If you would have let me teach you, I would have...”

Jumping to her feet, she turned to him with blazing eyes. “No! You don’t get to make this my fault!”

“You’re making it mine!” he shouted back, pushing himself up to face her. “This was not me, or the First Order, or darkness that caused this. It is nature at its cruelest. It is fate. Everything and everyone dies. I didn’t do this; you can’t blame me for this.”

Her stare hardened. He recognized it; the darkness had a firm grasp of her again. There was a resignation that shuddered through him. Not only was the truce broken, but the confrontation would likely end with scarring wounds or words. “If I can’t blame you for this, I still have plenty to blame you for, Supreme Leader. Can I blame you for your father’s death?” Startled by the accusation that had seemingly appeared from nowhere, he staggered away from her, his eyes wide in shock. She had tempted him with her touch, exposed him to the light, ruined him. Then she had begged him for his help, and when she was denied, she moved in for the fatal blow, just as she had in the throne room.

“Can I blame you for Luke? For your mother slowly dying? Can I blame you for my friends having to waste away in hiding? For them not trusting me? For destroying my friendship with Poe because I was forced to kiss him to protect you? For ruining my friendship with Finn by forcing him to lie for me to protect us both? Can I blame you for looking so disgusted by the light that I regret ever touching you? Can I blame you for that?”

It took everything in him to hide the pain underneath the shell of darkness, to hide the waver of emotion in his voice when he managed to rasp, “Can you?”

“Can I blame you for making me believe you were dead when you disappeared in a giant fireball?” she persisted. “You couldn’t have found a way to let me know you were alive? Do you have any idea what that did to me?”

“And how would I know that, Rey” he snapped. “I thought you wouldn’t care. And I wonder why I thought that?” He paused, waiting for her to make the connection, waiting for her to remember what she had done in darkness. Recognition flashed across her features. “Ah, I know, it was your answer when I asked what you wanted from me. I know you remember what you told me. Say it.” He sensed her regret shudder in the bond. “Say it.”

The darkness in her eyes faded. “I told you I wanted you to die,” she said, her tone soft and feeble.

“I hope your fighter explodes with you in it, that’s what I hope, Supreme Leader,’ is specifically what you said to me,” he added bitterly. “So, excuse me if I thought you would be ecstatic that the Force had given you exactly what you wanted. I figured showing up again would only dampen your celebration.”

“I didn’t mean it.” Her eyes reflected the truth of her admission, as did the bond, but it meant little to him as his emotions still unraveled from her earlier comments.

“Then will you finally answer what I asked you that night? What do you want from me? Beyond using me for my knowledge and training in the Force.” He studied her, intrigued, as she withdrew in upon herself. It was almost as if she was hiding something. She hated him, she only needed him for his power, so what other reason did she have to continue to interact with him?

“I want you to turn back to the light,” she said softly after a moment, her inner conflict still raging. Kylo sensed that there was something… something else she didn’t want him to know. He had the good sense to recognize she would never tell him, and he couldn’t bear looking into her eyes anymore.

“Then you would be better off hoping for that explosion,” he said sarcastically. He didn’t know how to shut the connection by sheer will, but he would certainly try. His fingers itched to damage something.

“You’re insufferable!” she shouted, the darkness returning to her eyes. He refused to stay and watch the connection devolve further. Pivoting on his heels, he swiftly walked away from her.

“I don't tell you the comforting lies you wish to hear, as your friends do. I call you on your delusions,” he retorted without looking back. “If that makes me insufferable, then so be it.”

“Maybe someone should call you on your delusions!”

Kylo hummed dismissively. “Be my guest, sweetheart.”

“Stop that!” she demanded behind him, as if she had the power to demand anything from him. It irritated him that she dared command him after choosing not to join him. It irritated him further that what he had said sounded too much like his father, but he covered his disdain with a wry smirk. Not that it mattered when she couldn’t see his face. He swallowed his irritation as he imagined the indignant expression on her face. It was too easy to wield sarcasm and derision as a defensive shield against her destabilizing words. She was so reactive; she willingly relinquished any superiority she held over the argument.

Kylo could have continued to instigate a fight, but he wasn’t his father. He was tired of the fighting. “You should go. Trust me, if there’s one of those panthers, there are others.”

“Finn! Rose!” she gasped.

Kylo had a habit of saying things around her without thinking it through first; he knew that. Words often left his tongue with an unintended meaning, or were unintended entirely. She had a way of eroding the very foundation he stood upon. Perhaps that was why he didn’t think twice about the suggestion, “You might want to break your Jedi mind trick first...”

He should have known, as the darkness flooded into the bond, the mistake he had made. Her voice grew cold. “You were spying on me!”

Closing his own eyes, he exhaled slowly. “You brought me here. You sought out the abilities in my mind, after I asked you not to use our bond, so you could betray your friend’s trust. Don’t forget that.” Kylo may not have been facing her, but he felt her approach from behind him. He could sense her intention. Before she could shove him, to force him to look at her, he pivoted out of the way. Rey fell forward into the undergrowth. It must have been her own form of retaliation that she didn’t catch herself with the Force when she fell. It worked.
Swallowing heavily, he stepped forward and offered his gloved hand. She knocked his hand away in spite and jumped to her feet. “I don't need your help! I can take care of myself!”

Working his jaw, he swallowed his damaged pride. “Clearly,” he sneered, refusing to withdraw his hand as he nodded in the direction of the panther. The flash of metal at her hip reminded him of what he needed before he could return to his side of the galaxy.

“I had no weapon; I was waiting for it to get closer so I could defend myself,” she snapped back. He studied her carefully to determine if she would use the weapon. Evidently, there would be no gratitude from her for his help with the beast.

“You're welcome,” he said, ignoring her assertion, which only sparked more fury in her fierce eyes.

If she was prepared to battle again, through words or weapons, then he would have the upper hand. He cleared his throat, his hand outstretched persistently. She raised her eyebrow. “What do you want from me!”

“My lightsaber, sweetheart,” he sighed, “or do you expect to steal this one as well?” There was a flash of contrition in her eyes, but then they flared with ferocity again. She shoved the hilt into his chest.

“You don’t get to call me ‘sweetheart,’ not after trying to kill me on Crait! I’ll never be yours!”

Kylo stilled, swallowing his immediate desire to lash out again. He tried to feign that haughty indifference once more. “Not just you, Jedi, the entire Resistance. Every single one of those anarchists. I would have ended the war right there.”

“It wouldn’t have been over,” she snarled back, “you would have had to burn down every last world, kill every last lifeform in the whole galaxy until there was no one left to fight back.”

“No, it would have been over,” he said as he met her furious glare. “I had no intention of staying the Supreme Leader,” without you, he didn’t add. “If everyone who had betrayed me was gone, then it would have been over, for me. I brought Hux with me to avoid friendly fire, so I could complete my only purpose since I burned down Luke’s temple. With the Resistance and Jedi dead, Hux wouldn’t need me anymore; he would have staged a coup. I would have never left Crait. I never intended to leave Crait.” As his voice wavered, he turned away before she could see the pain.
twisting through him.

“So what,” she cried, her voice wavering with emotion. “You would have died a murderer.”

“And you would have died a traitor.” He was thankful his back was to her, so she could imagine a sardonic smile spreading across his lips rather than pained scowl of reality.

“If you truly would have killed me on Crait, then why did you save my nothing life just now!” she demanded. He should have considered she would know exactly how to rip open every raw wound on his soul.

“Why did you spare mine on the Supremacy?” he growled through clenched teeth, turning to face her. “I begged for you to stay with me. But instead of just rejecting me, or begging me to join you, you said nothing! You tried to kill me instead. You had your chance when I was unconscious on the floor. You could have finished me with my own weapon. Why did you try to kill me, then spare my life just to leave me for dead?”

Something different was blooming in her eyes. She studied his eyes closely, for what, he wasn’t certain. He chastised himself for laying his wounds bare before her. He knew what she could do to him; he knew it was safer to keep her at arm’s length as he had learned to do with everyone else, but for some reason, his traitorous heart wouldn’t shut her out. “I believed that your life was not mine to take,” she replied calmly. “I had to save my friends, and I knew that you would have never let me go. I grabbed my lightsaber to leave, not to hurt you. And I didn’t leave you for dead; you made your choice to stay, I just left you to it. Now give me an honest answer.”

His lips twitched as he sensed the Force vibrating around him. He could have left her without an answer. He could have won.
Chapter End Notes

Death

Death of an animal

Jealousy

Both Rey and Kylo express jealous thoughts
Leia's Revelation

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
When Finn had asked Rose if she needed help with cataloging the inventory collected from the old base, she immediately put him to work with the weaponry. He knew why, of course, though she wouldn’t say it aloud. He’d had extensive training. Finn had spoken often of the academy, to remind her of what he was, but for some reason, it never seemed to bother her. The First Order had killed her family and he had been one of them when it happened, but she treated him like some hero.

And she’d said yes. She wanted to spend the rest of her life with him. It still didn’t seem real. Nothing had changed between them; there was no awkwardness or detachment as he had feared. They hadn’t told anyone, except Rey, of course. Rey had been happy for them, but there was something behind her offer of congratulations. Rose believed it was residual heartbreak from the fight with her boyfriend, but Finn knew better. Though she refused to be honest with him, he saw her reaction to the death of that bat, he knew her mind was on Kylo Ren. Her feelings were not those meant for an enemy, and it terrified him. He had given Rey an ultimatum: she had three days to kill Kylo…or he would. Once that creature was gone, then maybe he could have the old Rey back.

Then the three of them could be a family. Rey had looked past what he once was, and now Rose had as well. It was different, he thought, not only befriending a former Stormtrooper, but marrying one. They hadn’t told the rest of the Resistance yet, but Finn wondered what would happen when they did. Would they look at her differently for vowing eternity to someone like him? Would she change her mind? Finn knew Rose; he knew she wouldn’t, but he couldn’t help adding it to his list of fears. The man who wanted to run away feared losing the people he loved. He feared their death, leaving him because he was not good enough, and losing them to murderous dark warriors. In three days, one of those problems would be solved permanently.

“I hate the First Order. I hope every single one of them dies a slow, fiery death and then burns in Hell for all eternity,” Rose whispered as she tinkered with an outdated holopad they had recovered from the dilapidated base.

Finn paused his inspection of a defective blaster. “You know I was one of them, right?” Rose looked positively contrite, abandoning the holopad to grasp his hands in her much smaller ones.

“You're not, Finn,” she assured him. “You refused to be like them. They made our colony, my family, into slaves. You... you would never do that.”

“I chose not to kill the villagers on Tuanul, but, Rose, I wasn't only in sanitation. I had other missions for the Order. I was put in executioner rotation, and had I been ordered to carry out executions, I would have had to do it. I would have done it to save my own life. I went through cadet training with many of those troopers; I killed with them in simulations. They had no families, either, and had no choice but to fight for the only cause they have ever known. Many of them are no different than me, except they don't have a Resistance pilot to help them escape. I wasn't different, Rose; I was lucky.”

Finn wondered if this was the moment she saw him for what he truly was. Rose rocked back in her seat, trying to find an option that would align with both of their beliefs, but he knew she could find no way to save the wayward souls of his old training buddies.

Rose squeezed his hand tighter in support. “When Poe Dameron was on that ship, tortured for information, no other trooper tried to help him; just you, Finn.”

“I needed to escape before they discovered I didn’t fire my blaster; I needed a pilot,” he said, eyes downcast on the blaster even though his hands hesitated in their work.

“You’re different,” she reasoned, “even if you don't realize it, yet.” Finn wanted to argue that she didn’t realize it yet, but he was different. Not a good different. Although he had fought for the Resistance, defeating his former troopers when the battle necessitated it, he didn’t know what would happen if the Resistance launched an attack and he was asked to kill stormtroopers who were not actively trying to kill him. Sure, he had helped with Starkiller, but he wouldn’t have had the guts to blow it up. He couldn’t actively press the trigger that ended defenseless troopers' lives. Would they expect him to wield the weapon that judged them for their crimes, even if he knew them, even if they begged for forgiveness?

When he looked up at Rose, he might as well have spoken a thousand words in his silence, because she seemed to know exactly what he was thinking. “I understand, Finn, I do, but you know we have to kill them when it comes down to it, even if that means executing them. It is our lives or theirs. You know that, don't you?”

“Yes,” he snapped, though his face instantly softened after he realized how harsh he had sounded. “I'm sorry, Rose. I'm not upset with you.” He turned his attention back to the blaster, his brows furrowed in thought.

“I love you,” she said, hoping to brighten his mood, return him to the uncomplicated bliss in the jungle. Finn hummed, lost in thought as he inspected the defective blaster. There was so much he wished she would understand about him, but he wouldn’t say it for fear she would look at him as a monster. He knew his sullen distress concerned her. He knew she was living in bliss after he had asked her to spend the rest of her life with him, and she wondered why he wasn’t as well. He was, of course, but the war weighed heavily on his mind. Everything was just so complicated.
“I said 'I love you,'” she repeated, smiling when his eyes met hers.

The tense rigidity in his body fell away for a moment, and he smiled devotedly, “I love you, too.” He turned back to his work and the smile faded, a shadow returning to his heart. Everything about him was drawn and weary in agitation. Rose may not have been Force-sensitive, she couldn't read other's emotions at will, but she had come to know him better than anyone else. He knew she could sense it. He couldn’t wait until the war was over, when complications like his past and Rey’s connection to Kylo Ren would be a distant memory. He couldn’t wait until all he had to worry about was his speech or whether his shoes were on the right feet or making sure Poe didn’t drink too much at the wedding. Finn yearned for the normalcy of “after” on the distant horizon.

“Finn...” She began but was interrupted by the general's protocol droid, who turned to address Finn.

“Greetings, my name is C-3P0, Human-Cyborg relations. General Organa has requested your company.”

Finn's skin grew clammy, and his heart stuttered. This was it. He set down the blaster he was repairing and straightened to his full height. Rose's eyes grew wide as she noticed the finality in his. “I love you,” he whispered. “That's all that matters.”

He turned away from her, following faithfully behind the golden droid. There was only one reason the general would want to speak with him – she suspected the secret he was keeping. If there was proof of his surreptitious silence, then he was presumably being led to his fate. If it was merely a suspicion, he would have to choose between protecting the woman whom he had gone back to the First Order to save and the woman who had promised him eternity and had given him a purpose and belonging. He would gladly fall to a monster's red blade for either of them. He refused to make it a decision between Rey and Rose - the two people he loved most in the galaxy - because it wasn't. It was the decision between the two parts of Rey. It was the part of Rey that was a Force-user bonded to another, very evil Force-user, and the part that was a warrior who fought for the Resistance – a choice between what Rey thought she wanted and what was best for her.

Finn was no fool. He knew the struggles Rey had likely suffered on Jakku. Though she did not confide in him about them, he knew he had found a kindred spirit in her. She had no parents, and neither did he. Both hoped their parents would one day come back for them; both were both disappointed. He knew how it felt as he steered his speeder into the business end of that battering ram cannon, finding the purpose he had sought his entire life, willing to give his life for the people around him. It was the first time in his life he hadn't wanted to run; he finally had a cause he truly believed was worth dying for.

Rey had found the Force. Coming from nothing, it made her feel important. She had searched for her belonging with Luke, but, from what he could gather, it did not go as planned. It couldn't have if she left him in an attempt to turn the monster instead, who just so happened to be the only other practicing Force user she'd had contact with. It wouldn't be too far of a reach to believe that the master of the Knights of Ren had told her exactly what she wanted to hear, promising her belonging and purpose in an attempt to lure her to Snoke. Rey in her naïvete had believed him.

Finn couldn't understand how she had the desire to do anything but drive her weapon through the beast after what he had done to her, Poe, and Han – as well as Finn himself. Perhaps the creature convinced her that he was still Ben Solo, that she could return him to his mother, taking advantage of an abandoned child's empathy of fixing a broken family. She barely survived the last encounter, yet Finn knew she was still stubbornly holding onto hope that the monster could be saved. She had spent her life fixing things, after all, but Finn had seen what Kylo Ren could do. He knew evil couldn't be fixed.

Finn knew Rey had not been alone in the jungle. The Supreme Leader, or at least his Force apparition – or however their connection worked – had been on that bluff overlooking where he and Rose had celebrated unawares; he was certain of it. As he walked into that clearing, he could smell the mixture of ozone and life-support systems he had come to know on the Finalizer, as well as plasma-burned flesh. It had corrupted the air around them like a stain. There was something else, something... not evil in and of itself, but it had haunted his nightmares nonetheless. Every sight, smell, and sound of his last moments on Starkiller – as the creature bore down on him with his fiery lightsaber while he was backed into a tree – were burned forever into his memory. The smell of him was burned into his memory. And Finn had no doubt the monster had been there, watching them.

What they had been doing there, together, Finn didn't know, nor would Rey ever grant him an honest answer, but he had reached his breaking point. He wished he knew the man with ties to the Resistance that Rey had feelings for, so then maybe he could talk some sense into her about her connection to the Supreme Leader. She was not only putting herself at risk, but Rose and everyone else he cared about as well. He hoped she would do the right thing and kill their greatest adversary, but he was no fool. If she was going to continue to maintain their connection in secret, then Finn would do what was right. He had given her three days, but they were running out of time. Even if it meant earning her hatred, he would kill Kylo Ren, because he loved her that much. The only problem was, now the general could force his hand. If that happened, his only regret would be that she wouldn't have a chance to make the right choice on her own.

“You... you asked to speak with me, General?” Finn stuttered as he entered the makeshift communications room. Poe Dameron stood in the corner, arms crossed, staring at the spot on the floor he was scuffing with his boot. Finn wasn't the best at reading people, but when Poe did not look up to greet him, it increased the growing panic churning in his gut.

“Yes, please come in.” Leia was all business, which did nothing to settle Finn's nerves. He fidgeted anxiously as she concentrated on a holomap at the center table, the perfect manifestation of what a leader should be. “How are you, Finn?”
It was a question he hadn't been expecting. “You're a traitor” or "You're being detained as a spy” were higher up on his list of expectations of the accusations they would assuredly level against him. He was a defector from the First Order, after all. What reason did they have to believe him when they discovered he had been complicit in hiding the truth concerning the Supreme Leader? “I'm, uh, I'm fine; everything’s fine, General. You?”

“Well, since you asked, I might as well be blunt about it – I'm dying.” That definitely wasn’t what he had been expecting. Finn noticed the difference in her now as he looked upon her with a new lens. Her hands were splayed on the table, not so much to provide her a more adequate view of the holomap as he'd first presumed, but to yield enough leverage to support the weight of her failing body. Looking closer, he could see the exhaustion on her features, the shallowness of her breath, the faint bluish hue of her sweat-glazed skin. Realistically, he had known she was weakening, but to see the physical confirmation with his own eyes left no room for denial. It wasn't until this moment that the consequences finally sank in; their general wasn't just sick or injured or heartbroken. The strongest woman he had ever met—and he had met three incredibly strong women – was actually going to die.

“Was it the Raddus,” he found himself asking, “when Ren –”

“It was not my son, I felt his reservations in completing his mission through our bond,” she answered, not unkindly, the woman's noble upbringing evident in her diplomatic response. “But it was one of his squadmen.”

Poe, however, was less tactful. “Too bad he didn't have such 'reservations' about his father.” Leia cleared her throat and turned to the colonel. Finn could not see the look in her eyes as she faced away from him, but, judging by Poe's contrite expression, it must have been positively withering.

“To answer your question, Finn, yes, the failing of my body is partly due to the events aboard the Raddus... and the necessity for me to prematurely cease medical care to assist in the evacuations. Hypoxia, it seems, destroyed my most vital systems beyond repair. The droids have branded me with multiple organ failure. It is only a matter of time – something I am quickly running out of.” He sputtered for a moment in shock, searching for the right words to say, before she silenced him with a raised hand. “No need for platitudes; that's not why you're here.”

The tightness in Finn's throat released enough for him to form words. This was it; this was the moment it all came crashing down on him…and Rey. He was well aware of the consequences – death was a very real possibility, imprisonment or exile if he were lucky – and he would accept them without hesitation, as long as they recognized Rose's innocence. “Why am I here?”
“Don't look so despondent, Finn.” Leia studied him for a moment, a covert look in her eye. “It's nothing like that. I have asked Poe to take over the responsibilities of general. He will need a new colonel, someone with bravery, military experience, and, most importantly, someone he trusts – both in the war room and on the battlefield.”

“And I,” Poe cut in, pushing himself off the wall, “chose you.”

Finn stared at them both, waiting for them to continue, because, clearly, there had to be a "however." Except, they were both quiet, their eyes meeting his expectantly. “I don't know what to say.”

“Say yes,” the incumbent general said with a shrug as if it were that simple.

This, however, was not a simple answer for Finn. Yes, he would give his life for the cause in a heartbeat, but could he accept such a high-ranking position if he was deceiving them in the same breath. “Why would you trust me? I used to be with the First Order, and I wasn't even an officer at that. Why me?”

Poe smiled as if it were the easiest decision in the galaxy. “You saved my life, you brought Beebee-Ate back to me and the map to the Resistance, you willingly infiltrated Starkiller and the Supremacy, you gave us insider information, and you almost sacrificed your own life for the good of the Resistance... twice. Why wouldn't I want you to be my colonel?”

Finn returned the smile, though his gut still churned with apprehension. He hoped with everything inside him that Rey made the right choice, because Poe was taking a risk on him, and he wanted more than anything not to let the man down. “It would be an honor.”

“Great, buddy,” Poe clapped his friend on the back, a relief settling over his features. Finn felt closer to his friend for believing in him when he had every reason not to. Maybe his role at the First Order wouldn't haunt him forever.

“If you don't mind,” Leia interrupted. “Let's get started.”

Poe shared a long look with Leia, nodded, then tapped the table to call up a holo. “I'll introduce you to our allies.”
“Allies?” Finn asked, the apprehension inexplicably building inside him. The last he had heard, they hadn't had any allies. Was he only learning now that he had been promoted?

“Yes, but this is confidential. This alliance is our last hope, and the identity of our allies does not leave this room, understood?” Finn groaned at the idea of more secrets. Poe expanded the holo, and a large, hideous creature slithered into view, Finn had seen them in history holos, had heard the stories of their depravity. Of the thousand thoughts exploding into his mind, he focused on one terrifying thought – if they were truly committed to helping the Resistance, what were the Hutts receiving in return?
Chapter End Notes

Mention of Leia's impending death
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Rey sat at the base of an ancient, damaged tree, one of Luke’s Jedi texts opened in her lap. She had been excited with her newfound skill, regrettably thanks to her intolerable bond partner. But the more she read, the more she feared that the Jedi dogma was not for her. It was as disappointing as Luke had been as a teacher. Somehow, she couldn’t reconcile the difference between the reality she experienced and the fantastical legends she had heard. How had that cynical old man been the Master Jedi that she had believed in? How could an Order immersed in the light side of the Force be so rigid and radical about their beliefs?

She sighed in frustration.

Her eyes closed as she lost herself in the warmth of the sun on her face. She imagined she was back on Jakku, the sun much harsher, but a comforting presence all the same. There would be no friends to disappoint, no war that hinged its hope on her "gift," no enemy to share a confusing connection with. They would all still be out there, of course, but she wouldn’t be a part of it. She would be alone, but had that truly ever changed?

Her eyes flickered open at the sound of faraway screech, breaking her reverie, and part of her expected to see an endless expanse of sand. A dry ache tightened in her throat as her eyes settled on an endless expanse of trees instead. She was still on Barkhesh, a disappointment to everyone, and confused as ever. She shut her eyes again.

She should have lied to Finn and Rose, found any reasonable excuse to lure them from the rainforest and those creatures. It was a mistake to show them its body. They hadn’t bothered to challenge what she had been doing in the forest, observing them. But they did ask how she had killed the beast, alone, without a weapon. It was a question she was not prepared to answer. She had lied confidently enough, but she noticed the shadow pass over Finn’s face and the distrust in his eyes. He knew a large stick had not created that hole through the panther. Had Finn recognized the burn patterns? Or was it the lack of blood around the wound that gave it away?

Finn had immediately distanced himself from her. Even as she had embraced them and expressed her happiness for their commitment to each other—which was true, despite her own selfish longing– his eyes stared through her. His thoughts were somewhere else. She had been all too aware of what he was contemplating. He had his suspicions. He knew she had not been in the forest alone. And she knew they had reached an impasse when he had asked Rose to meet him back at the temple. Their conversation replayed over and over in her mind.

“I need to talk to you,” he had told her. The kindness, the brightness in his eyes was missing. She had been terrified, convinced that he would force her to tell him about Kylo. Maybe she should have. “Listen, Rey, I know I promised you that I wouldn’t tell anyone about your bond, because you needed time. But Poe came to me. He has no proof yet, but he knows. He thought he heard a man’s voice in your room. I didn’t tell him, but it’s only a matter of time before he figures out what’s happening. You’ve changed, Rey, and I don’t know what to believe anymore. I think you’re losing control over whatever this is. You need to end this. Now. You have three days to kill him.
I’ll be forced to tell Poe everything I know. I can’t lie for you. This puts the entire Resistance…
everyone I care about – including you – at risk. If you think you can’t do it, say the word, and I will do it for you.” He wrapped her tightly in an embrace, assuring her that she always had his support. But he hadn’t waited for a response. He cared for her, but he had given her an ultimatum.

And he was right. She had lost control, she knew that. Kylo had been in the forest, spying on her, and she had been clueless. He had seen what she had done, had heard every word that she had said.
Most concerning, he had rendered himself defenseless to save her life. When she asked him why he saved her, his words flipped the axis of her entire world.

“Maybe you were wrong,” he had told her, before disappearing across the galaxy. “Maybe... someone would be destroyed by your death.”

His words tormented her more than had he said nothing. How could the man who desired to kill her be “destroyed” by her death? It made no sense. None of it did. Kylo saved her. He could have allowed that creature to kill her, and the bond would have ended. He could have been free. Yet he trusted her with his weapon instead. Why? What did he gain? He saved her from Snoke because he needed her help, needed someone to blame. But this was different. He could have gotten what he wanted. There had to be a reason. Because he couldn’t...

Her eyes flickered open as she sensed the familiar vibration of his presence in the Force. Despite how their last connection ended, and her overwhelming fear of the ultimatum she refused to contemplate, she felt herself grin when she sensed him.

Kylo sat at a small circular table, playing a holographic game with his droid. The gameboard had a circular white space in the center, surrounded by two rings of alternating black and white spaces.
The first ring had twelve spaces that emanated from the center like rays of the sun. It was surrounded by the second ring with the same number of spaces, only wide where the spaces of the first ring were long. These spaces completed each ray, only they were opposite in color of the first ring. There were twenty-five spaces in total. There were monstrous holographic creatures on the board, controlled by small buttons on a control panel at each side of the table.

There were twenty-five buttons in total. The first twenty-four buttons were split evenly for each monster on the table; eight for attack, defense, and monster selection. The final button was to roll a holographic die to determine the strength of a particular attack or defense. Rey had seen the same game on the Millennium Falcon; Dejarik. Finn had made the mistake of challenging Chewbacca to a game. Rey knew enough to understand that the purpose of the game was to destroy the other player’s monsters. She knew there were typically eight monsters on the board – four monsters each – but this game had already begun. There were only four monsters.

There was a large, blue, hunch-backed creature with hands that dragged on the ground and a long, red arthropod with yellow eyes that she assumed belonged to the droid. They were labeled on the screen as a Mantellian Savrip and a K’lor’slug, respectively. The creatures Kylo controlled looked like they depended more on agility than brute force, which Rey found ironic, considering Kylo’s tactics on the battlefield. The first of his monsters was blue with a trunk-like snout like a Toydarian and its body looked almost skeletal in appearance, with long hands like talons. It was labeled Grimtaash the Molator. His other monster was yellow, brown, and red. It stood tall with a primitive staff in its hands. It was labeled a Monnok. The creatures that had been defeated flashed on the screen; the Ghhhk, the Houkix, the Kintan Strider, and the Ng’ok.

After spending hours watching Finn and Chewbacca play, Rey had learned that each monster typically had a different strength, so their numbers in attack, defense, and movement varied. Based upon the readings of their screens, however, each monster had a reading of “two” for their statistics. Perhaps it was to make the game easier for beginners, or because he preferred battles where the playing field was even. Rey wondered if he preferred a game that relied more heavily on tactics. Regardless of his reason, Kylo was using his turns to flank his opponent, moving both of his monsters, rather than focusing on one monster at a time as she had seen her friends do.

Kylo ignored her as he focused on the game, but she knew he had felt her; his entire posture had changed the moment the connection opened. Blue had seen her as well, answering whether or not they would be visible to others in their environment now that the bond had grown stronger. The droid looked back and forth between Rey and her bondmate, but he let the matter drop when Kylo asked him to “focus on the game, and only on the game.” Kylo’s hands weren’t clenched, his body wasn’t rigid, his scowl hadn’t deepened. He wasn’t angry, but he had curled in upon himself slightly as if he were protecting himself. She wondered if he feared physical or emotional pain.

There were questions she wanted answered, of course, but they were questions he clearly had no intention of answering. Did you lie, she wanted to ask him, or would my death destroy you like you said? What she did know in that moment was, as much as she loved her best friend, she couldn’t do what he demanded. She imagined firing a weapon at the man as he played a game his father played, the ghost of a smile on his lips as he explained the rules regarding a “fork” to the droid he had saved. It was moments like this when she could see the light – the humanity – in him. Kylo might have commanded the monsters with ease, but he wasn’t one of them as her friends believed he was.

She watched quietly as Kylo made an impulsive move, moving his Malator away from the protection of his Monnok. The droid moved his Savrip away from where the K’lor’slug had blocked it, confident in his Savrip’s ability to destroy the Molator. Kylo, however, looked pleased, as if the droid had stepped into a trap. They both rolled, and Blue easily won by over six points. The Savrip lifted the skeletal body of the Molator and snapped its spine in two. The Savrip dropped the body of the Molator in a heap at its feet as it roared in triumph.
Blue let out his own screech of triumph, but paused as he noticed the lack of disappointment on the man’s face. With growing suspicion, the droid asked him why he had left the Molator to be killed. “That’s the point, Blue,” Kylo explained plainly to the droid, “It was a distraction, a trap. I sacrificed the Molator to draw out the Savrip. You were more focused on killing the Molator than protecting your most valuable piece. It’s endgame now. I can still win without my Molator, but without your Savrip…” Kylo moved his Monnok in to quickly attack the now unguarded Savrip. They both rolled, but neither were surprised by the outcome. The Monnok stepped around the Savrip, using the staff to strangle the creature from behind. After a moment of disturbing gurgling sounds, the Savrip fell dramatically as the Monnok celebrated.

The two final monsters moved to the center white space of the board. The statistics of the monsters changed on the screen now that it had reached endgame, restoring their ratings to what Rey had seen at the holotable on the Millennium Falcon. It seemed that the monster’s ratings did matter in this game, but only in the final round. It changed the strategy of the entire game. The K’lor’slug had lower ratings in both attack and defense, so Blue’s loss was inevitable. They both rolled and the Monnok thrust its staff against the K’lor’slug’s long neck with force, breaking it instantly.

Kylo had won.

It was a different side of Kylo than she had seen before; a more strategic, less impulsive side. It made her question how impulsive the man truly was. His uncontrolled emotions made him seem reactionary, but what if he was more calculating than she had presumed? What if his impulsive moves had only seemed impulsive because she had not seen them for what they were? After what had happened in the jungle, her previous beliefs about him didn’t make sense.

What if I was wrong about you?

Kylo turned to her then, as if he had heard her. It wasn’t out of the realm of possibility that he had, indeed, heard it. There was an indescribable ache in her chest that she knew was not her own. His eyes met hers, and it was impossible not to see the man from the hut, from Kamino, from the other day in her room with the Rammahgon. His lips parted as if he would finally acknowledge she was there, but his comlink stopped him.

“Supreme Leader,” Hux snarled across the channel, “The strategy meeting was set for oh-six-hundred hours Galactic Standard Time, was it not, because the other officers and I have been waiting for the past – ”

“Not now! I’m busy,” Kylo growled back.
“With all due respect, should we not focus on the movement and disposition of our forces and save our energy for when we encounter the Resis –” He switched off the comlink.

He looked away, the apple of his throat bobbing as he swallowed his fear. It paled in comparison to her own fear rising in her chest. “Where are you going, Ben? What battle are you preparing for?”

“Rey, I –”

“Do you know where I am?” she demanded.

He stood. His eyes looked pained, as if this was what he had been expecting all along. “Would it matter if I did?”

Her bondmate was excellent at deflection, but she was having none of it. He might win at a Dejarik game, but she knew this game and she would beat him at it. “Say it, Ben. Tell me the truth. Honesty is so important to you, isn’t it?” Her voice wavered as she heaved uneven breaths. “Where am I?”

Kylo chewed the word before giving life to it, doing more damage than she could have imagined. “Barkhesh.”

He had known, likely by something she had done. She had put the entire Resistance at risk. "How long have you known?” she cried in anger. He sighed, closing his eyes, as if bracing himself for what was to come.

"The whole time,” he replied quietly. Her blood was igniting with rage under her skin, feeding the darkness that crashed through her veins as if she’d opened a spout full throttle.

No, that's impossible.

"How? How could I not?" He snapped, the derision piercing his words. He stormed back and forth, fading from his quarters to the forest floor and back again, gesturing wildly. "That bed you sleep on? It’s a sacrificial altar. Want to know where they have those? Ancient temples. And that plant by your bed? It’s a Century Flower found on Outer Rim rainforest planets. Fewer than .1% of planets are forest or jungle planets, Rey. Even fewer are forest or jungle planets in the Outer Rim. How many planets have rainforests and temples and are sparsely habited enough for the Resistance to hide there? Not many. Do you know how many rainforest planets in the Outer Rim have temples, and a Rebel base that your own FN-2187 has first-hand knowledge of...because he had been sent on a mission there...to scout for Resistance activity...at said base...by yours truly? One.”

His chest heaved in his frenzy, his body was tense with agitation as he continued to pace. “Ah, he didn’t tell you how he knew of this planet? He was one of our top cadets; he went on several missions for us, though he seemed utterly incapable of handling native wildlife. Ask him to tell you the story of the Kowakian monkey-lizard or the creature from GUHL-JO387O. He should have known I would not forget the worlds to which he was deployed, especially not after his infamous...departure from our army. And the others, especially my mother, should have known that I would search any planet that had a known rebel base or was sympathetic to the Rebellion during the war. There are only a handful of members left, and I know every rebel base two of your members have visited. It was an easy process of elimination.”

His eyes were dark and pained, his entire body vibrating in his feverish outburst. Kylo never ceased to amaze her. For all his misguided ideals, he was incredibly intelligent and observant. He would have made an incredible leader – a Senator like his mother – if he hadn’t chosen darkness. “If that isn’t enough, I am certain I could have researched the symbols all over the stone walls in your room – written in a very distinct ancient language – if I really needed confirmation. But Rey, even if you didn’t expect me to see those things early on, how could you honestly be surprised that I knew where you were after everything that happened? You knew I saw that native species of panther and the bat in the jungle. You didn’t think that would be a clue to your whereabouts? What about the other night you kissed the pilot? I know you could see part of my sky. Did you believe I couldn’t see yours? You weren’t worried I could determine your location in relation to the rest of the galaxy? Your brightest star is Mustafar's star; if I knew nothing else, I would still be able to pinpoint the right sector. What do you want from me? Did you believe me a fool? If you wanted to keep the location of the Resistance a secret, you didn’t take any precautions.”

Rey was shaking in her own fury by the time he finished. “It doesn’t matter how naïve I was; I don’t care – you knew where we were and let me keep my friends in danger this whole time.”

"Were they in danger, Rey?" he countered in that condescending voice that made her want to hit him with something heavy. “Yes, I have known where you were the entire time, but nothing has happened to you or your friends. I could have leveled that entire planet if I wanted. I could have used our bond to help the First Order as you try to use it for the Resistance. Not only did I not act on my knowledge, I withheld information from the First Order to keep you safe!”

“Keep me safe?” Was he insane? She knew Kylo had some irrational beliefs, but this one was beyond logic. “You’ve set course to kill me and my friends. That's not keeping me safe, Ben.”

He shook his head emphatically, pinning her with his pleading eyes. “I didn't.”

“Congratulations, Supreme Leader, you outsmarted us all. You're the best liar in the galaxy –”

“I never lied to you,” he said, his jaw tight with growing anger. He had no reason to be angry; he was the liar.

“But if you knew where I was, why did you wait this long, why didn't you come for me right after Crait? Why didn't you kill me before I –”

“You know why I didn't!” Kylo shouted, slamming a fist against the wall.

“Because you wanted me to suffer more–”

“Because I had no intention of intercepting the Resistance on Barkhesh!” There was something more than truth in his eyes. Fear. The admission terrified him. It was as if he had only just realized his true intentions… his intentions of not chasing after his one enemy.

“But you said –”

Kylo sat back down at Dejarik table, pressing buttons, refusing to look at her. “I've set up particular fail-safes. Is the Resistance in danger, Rey? I think you know the truth. The First Order is no closer to the Resistance now than they were after you disappeared off Crait. It's just another reason why I... can't... leave.”

“Why didn't you tell me?” Part of her longed for him to give her a reason to believe him, while the other part hoped he confirmed what everyone else claimed about him. “I trusted you,” she whispered.

“No, you didn't trust me. That's why I didn't tell you.” He may not have lied to her, but his eyes were guarded; there was something else he wasn’t saying.
She’d had enough of his secrets. “If you want me to trust you, give me a reason to.” Unfortunately, Kylo never had the opportunity to answer. Rey watched as the blastdoor to his quarters slid open.

“Ren!” The general barged into the room as she was jolted back across the galaxy.

Chapter End Notes

Mild violence
Dejarik monsters are killed in a game
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey flipped through the pages of Luke’s text as she made her way down the corridor. She only glanced up as she heard boots echoing down the hall. Finn had a pack slung over his shoulder and a blaster on his hip. After her disturbing vision, the sight of her friend alive was always a relief, but the thought that his life was in danger terrified her. She smiled at him, but it faded as he stared past her, around her, anywhere but in her eyes. As she approached him, her stomach dropped in anticipation. She purposely blocked his path, forcing him to look at her.

“What, Rey?” he sighed. His body was turned away from her, prepared for a quick escape. She knew the tension between them was as toxic to him as it was to her. But she saw no weakness on his hardened features – something she was unaccustomed to observing in her best friend. “Did you kill him yet?”

Kylo had kept a secret from her, a secret that could have put her friends’ lives at risk. She had no reason to trust him and every reason to kill him. But she couldn’t. No matter how angry she was with him, she couldn’t do it. It was more than just weakness; she couldn’t allow her friends to do it, either.

Please don’t do this. Please don’t make me choose.

She shook her head dejectedly. “No, but I…”

“Then I’ve said my piece, and there is nothing more to say,” Finn replied curtly. His eyes were unyielding, and she saw little of the man who was the closest thing to family that she had. He attempted to step around her, but she blocked him again.

“Where are you going?” Her tone was plaintive, desperation shuddering through her voice. She felt like she was losing him, and it was all her fault because she refused to choose. Her heart ached with the familiarity of being left behind by someone she loved. She couldn’t stand him leaving when he was angry with her.

“We are heading off-world,” he replied quickly. “We need to meet with... our allies, Rey. Leia believes if we go to them in person, they may be able to help with ships. We’re stuck on a planet with few supplies, no fighters, and barely enough people to call this a Resistance. We have no chance against... the First Order without them.”
“You’re taking the _Falcon._” It was an observation, not a question. She knew the light freighter was not hers, but she had begun to feel a possessiveness toward the old thing. It had been Han’s, it was her last connection to Luke, and eventually Leia as well. She had imagined herself and Chewbacca bringing Kylo home in it one day. Even if she could never trust him, even if she _hated_ him, she couldn’t allow Leia’s son to die. That meant she only had two more days to convince him to come home. What if she needed to go to him?

“Yes. It’s the only ship we have,” he whispered. It was the absolute worst time to leave the rest of the Resistance stranded there. What if Kylo had lied? What if they were already on their way? She would be the only defense between her friends and the First Order.

She was desperate, grasping at any thread of hope that would keep all of them together. “What about the bounty?”

“Maz’s pirates and their attacks on First Order freighters are holding the galaxy’s attention at the moment,” he said confidently, but his eyes betrayed his fear. “We’ll stick to the Outer Rim.”

“Well, you’ll need a pilot,” she said with an attempt to sound cheerful. “I’m going with you.” There was a terrible warning in the Force that screamed that if she allowed them to leave, they would never return. What if they were wrong? What is the First Order was waiting for an opportunity to track the Falcon? What if they led their army back to the Resistance? What if her vision came true?

“No, Chewie volunteered.” His response was quick and dismissive, but she could see it hurt him to treat her that way.

_Why are doing this, Finn? Because of Kylo Ren? Is the only way to fix our friendship to kill him? To break my own heart?_

“Okay, I can still help...” She reached for him, but he pushed past her instead.

“No,” he said, a finality to his tone. “It’s better if you’re not involved, especially with your... Force problem. I’m sorry, Rey.” She knew he was right, she had no control over their bond. Her connection could expose their secrets, or, worse, lead him straight to them. She knew she was a risk to them. But she wanted to save them all.
“But you could use my help!” she insisted. “I’ve got the Force; I could be helpful if—”

“No Force!”

The fear in his eyes set off Rey's intuition. “Why?”

He sighed. “This is one time when using the Force won’t protect us, Rey. You can’t go. End of story.”

“Who are these allies, Finn?”

“I...” His hesitation told her everything she needed to know. Whoever these allies were, she wasn't supposed to know. What was he keeping from her? “It's classified, Rey. But trust me, it could be dangerous for you.”

“Finn, if it's dangerous for me then it's dangerous to you. Don't go,” she warned, hoping her words would stop him in his determined path away from her. But he continued on with only a slight hesitation as he pivoted to smile at her heavy-heartedly.

“It would be dangerous for a Jedi, maybe even more dangerous than whatever it is you're continuing with our enemy.” Finn's head hung with the weight of the tension between them, and Rey held back tears of abandonment as he left her. There was something else in the Force, however. Something off.

Dangerous for a Jedi? Who could these allies be that would be dangerous to a Jedi?

There were endless civilizations and organizations that disliked the Jedi, but her mind kept wandering back to that strange conversation that Poe intentionally hid from her. The one that Kylo had translated from Huttese. The Resistance wouldn't form an alliance with criminals, would they?

It didn’t matter. Finn could be going to the safest world in the galaxy, but she couldn’t let him leave. Not on the Millennium Falcon, not with what she knew, not with the vision she had. As a last-ditch effort, she chose to tell him the truth.
“Finn don’t go,” she begged, tears were swelling in her eyes. “It’s not safe! I had a… dream, and you were dead under a blanket on the Falcon! The Force inside me is warning me that if you go, you won’t come back. I can’t lose you! Please!

Finn grabbed her shoulders and pivoted around her. “If you want to keep me safe, then kill the man who would put me under that blanket, Rey.” With a shake of his head, he turned and left her. There was nothing she could do to make him stay. Even if she told the Resistance the truth, it was too late. The voice inside warned her of leaving Barkesh. It begged her to wait, to have patience, to make them stay. If she told them the truth, they would leave—and run straight into the First Order. If she told them, she would be imprisoned, and there would be no one to stand between Kylo and the Resistance. If she wanted to save him, she had to do something she didn’t have the strength to do.

You do, the voice of the Force whispered. She stared at Finn's back as he faded from view into the darkness of the temple, lost in thoughts heavy with consequence. When he had disappeared from view, she followed her way out of the temple in a daze. Her legs felt heavy as she climbed the stone steps leading to the outside world. She settled on a step at the apex of the temple, opening the text to distract her from the war raging in her heart.

What if they have formed an alliance with the Hutts? We need any help we can get. But how can Finn accept this alliance in one breath and condemn my bond with Ben in the other? How is it any different? I trust Ben more than I trust a cartel of criminal traffickers, but Finn intends to force me into choosing between his friendship and Ben’s life. I can’t...

That is not the choice…the choice is between Finn’s life and Kylo Ren’s life. The voice from the Force whispered. Heed what the vision told you... your heart already knows... if Kylo Ren survives, Finn will die at his hand... if you do not choose, it could be both... or everyone you care about... Kylo does not want to live anymore... he knows he must pay for the deaths caused by his hand... do not condemn your family to death for him... you can stop the war by ending just one insignificant life of a monster no one will miss... you could be their hero, you can finally find belonging...

What if I condemn my friends to death by keeping Ben selfishly alive? He made his choice. I can’t sit by and allow the vision to come true. If it was Finn under the blanket, can I prevent it? How do I prevent something when I don’t even know what happened?

The bond moments were coming more often and strengthened in intensity each time they were connected. She knew she had to tell someone, and she knew exactly who needed to hear it. But her thoughts were interrupted by the sound of footsteps behind her. Her head snapped around to see Poe slowly approaching her on the steps.
“Can I join you?” he asked, blinking into the sunlight.

“Hey, Poe,” she said, attempting to conceal the awkwardness she felt to be alone with him, coupled with the fear of her consequential thoughts. She closed her eyes. It was all too much to shoulder. Pivoting back around, she chose not to answer his question. He sat down next to her on the steps anyway.

“We need to talk.” His tone was controlled but weary, and, for the first time since that night, she worried that she had hurt him. She hadn't given it much thought, her fear for Kylo's safety eclipsing the consideration for the man with whom she had shared an empty kiss. For the first time, she wondered if it had been empty for him as well.

She sighed, searching the bright turquoise sky for an escape. She may not have been able to avoid the conversation with the man sitting next to her – too close – but she could at least avoid looking in his charming eyes. She couldn't stand to see the pain in one more person's eyes – pain that she knew she had unwittingly caused. “Yeah, I know.”

“What was the other night about?” His anger was tempered but still audible in his voice. She imagined what would happen if she told him the truth: I was trying to protect the Supreme Leader of the First Order, our enemy, who was truly the one I wanted to kiss.

Yeah, that would go well, she decided, right up until they throw me into a cell. Though, the look on his face would almost be worth it.

“It was a mistake.” If he wanted to talk, she would tell him the truth, or as much as she could under the circumstances. “It meant nothing.”

“Yeah, I got that,” his words as sharp as a dagger's edge. “Why did you do it?”

The edge of uncertainty was exposed in her voice as much as her words. “I don’t know.”

It was true. She didn’t know why she kissed him. The Force guided her to do it, but she still didn't understand why. She could have distracted him any other way, maybe slapped his smug, drunken face for believing she would do that without getting to know him first. It would have saved them all the heartache. She wondered if he would have gone and told Leia about that too. Tempering her growing – possibly misplaced – anger, she reminded herself that he only wanted answers for what she had done to him.
“You have to do better than that. I know you never wanted to kiss me. So why? Was it a joke?” he asked through clenched teeth. The resentment was less fettered, his voice trembling with emotion. Her stomach lurch with guilt.

“No!” She turned to him, finally meeting his eyes. “I would never do that to anyone.” He jerked away when she moved to reach for his hand.

“Revenge?” he spat as if the word itself tasted of poison.

Shaking her head vehemently, she pleaded for him to see the truth in her eyes. “Of course not. I have nothing to get revenge for.”

I wish I could tell you, I’m so sorry I did this... to you and Ben. I hurt you both, and all I wanted was to protect you.

There was desperation behind his eyes; he longed for a logical reason for what had happened. She wondered if it would have been easier for him to swallow the lie that she had done it in jest or revenge rather than being left with whatever thought was churning through his head. “Did someone else ask you to do it?”

“What? No!”

“Then, why?” His voice cracked. His eyes, in that moment, reminded her of Kylo’s when she first saw him after Crait. There was deep, radiating anger within them that nearly eclipsed the underlying wound that oozed betrayal. But only nearly.

“It’s... complicated,” was all she could manage. She didn’t have an answer for him. She didn’t want to lie, but she couldn’t tell him the truth either.

“Complicated,” he muttered in indignation, clearly insulted that she could not be honest with him. There was no doubt, she had wounded him with her recklessness. She turned from him, reopening the text, avoiding him in a moment of remorse. She wanted to apologize, she truly did, but she was unsure how to do it without giving him the truth he desired... and deserved. This was why she deserved to be alone. She was terrible with people. Her fingers trailed across the page in distraction, reading the symbols with ease. She had nothing more she could say to him, and if she tried, she knew she would only further cause him pain. She hoped he would take the hint and leave.
her to her thoughts.

Fate, however, would not be so kind.

“Yes,” she replied without glancing up at him, grateful at least for the change in subject. But she should have known. Poe was more similar to Kylo than she was willing to admit. His mind was always analyzing, deducing, and reasoning. Learning. He was constantly thinking three steps ahead, and even if he asked a seemingly innocent question, there was always a motive behind it.

His words more suggestive this time, his tone heavy with implication. “The texts you couldn’t read?”

“Yes...” She slowly raised her eyes to see the understanding in his. He had successfully ensnared her in his trap, and they both knew it.

His voice was immediately accusatory, and rage swiftly replaced the remorse churning in her stomach. “What are you hiding?”

“Nothing!” she snapped back, knowing it was less of an answer and more of a diversion until she could formulate a better lie.

“How can you suddenly read texts that were foreign to you days ago. Who taught you?” he demanded, making it clear that this was a subject he wouldn't drop easily. He had caught her. Her only option was to lie or risk imprisonment. If she was in a detainment cell, she couldn’t help the Resistance.

“Threepio helped. I learned. I’m not hiding anything.” She may have felt confident in her dispassionate response, but Poe was less impressed with her performance.

“Is that the best you've got? Because it’s not just the books, Rey. You’ve been secretive lately, and I know Finn suspects something, too.” His eyes narrowed as she gulped in fear for her friend. “Or maybe he already knows? I told him I heard a man’s voice in your room the other night, the night you called me ‘Ben,’ and not once did Finn come to your defense or try to rationalize away my suspicions. Have you got him lying for you, or does he also realize you're not the girl we thought you were?” Rey tried desperately to suppress the panic that flashed across her expression, but she knew he noticed it. He studied her meticulously, as if he were a Force-user, but he might as well have been one. Recognition settled over his features. “So, Rey, who was it in your room?”

She tried to withdraw back into herself, moderate her emotions. “Why do you care?”

_He is not Ben, he has no Force abilities, he can’t read my mind_, she reminded herself.

“So you admit it.” The fear rose in her throat as she realized what she had said, or at least, hadn’t denied. He may not have been Force-sensitive, but he was perceptive.

“Who I have in my room at night is none of your business, Colonel,” she replied calmly and defiantly. Perhaps she could twist it in her favor, make him believe it was another Resistance member in her room.

He looked down, his face growing red in anger. When his eyes rose back to hers, they were black, almost evil. Rey startled. “It will be ‘General’ soon enough,” he said. It sounded suspiciously like a threat. “And it will be my business if that voice belonged to who I think it did.”

She was careful to control the fear that gripped her senses. “And who do you think it was?” They both knew the answer; she had said his name, after all. The only question was what he would do. And what she could do to stop it.

Their argument was interrupted by a vibration that should not have been echoing through the valley. There were many sounds of the rainforest that were new to Rey – the sound of the wind shivering through trees, a creature’s call that sounded distinctly like air raid sirens, the sound of disembodied whispers whenever she strolled by the river nearby – but she knew the hum they heard was none of those new sounds. In fact, she was quite familiar with this sound – an engine. The blanched panic on Poe’s face was all the confirmation she needed. Practically in unison, their faces tilted upward toward the sky as a ship flew low overhead. Poe stiffened.

Rey barely heard Poe’s shouts over the thrashing of her heartbeat. “It’s a First Order recon ship!” He jumped to his feet, dragging her along with him.

_He lied._
They’re here.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Poe sprinted down the steps inside the temple, and Rey stumbled in panic behind him.

What were they supposed to do? Should they hide? Should they spread out into the forest and wait for the troopers he would send to find them? Should they fight and rest their survival in the hope of overpowering their numbers? Or should they try to run? If they made it off-world, was there a destroyer waiting for them?

Poe skidded into the corridor and thrust his fist into the portable emergency siren that they had re-purposed from the old base. In an instant, he had switched from a wounded man desperate for answers to the fearless colonel. “First Order!” he shouted into his Master Comms. “They’re here!”

In a matter of seconds, the corridor was crammed with swarming bodies and decisive shouts. The effect on the Force was overwhelming – too many stimuli at once to focus on. Rey stood in the center, trying to gain her bearings. Finn crashed into her as he ran down the corridor, his mission abandoned. “What do we do?” he yelled to Poe. “Do we evacuate?”

“No! Get your weapons! We fight!” was the disembodied answer from somewhere deeper in the temple.

Finn turned to Rey with fire in his eyes, grasping her shoulders roughly. She had never seen her friend with such distrust in his eyes. “Did you know about this?” he shouted in anger. “Did you do this to make me stay?”

Rey shook her head angrily, tears welling in her eyes.

“What did you do, Rey? You led him here!”

“No, I didn’t!” she insisted.

“He’ll kill us all,” he rasped, overcome with emotion, “because of you.” He shook his own head in disbelief, pushing her away from him and disappearing into the crowd swarming the corridor. Rey stood in shock in the center of the chaos as members of the Resistance prepared for battle.
Your friends warned you, the voice in her head whispered. You had the chance to keep them safe... But instead, you led him right to you... Your friend is right; he will kill you all.

Did I do this? Did I do or say something that brought him here? How do I stop this? What do we do?

Ben, what will you do?

People shouted, boots squeaked down the corridor, the preparation for battle echoed off the walls of the temple. But the sound faded as the Force crackled in familiarity around her. She had done it, she had brought the monsters to their doorstep. Backing into the nearest room, she collapsed against the nearest wall in the darkness. Her breath was ragged as the severity of their situation pierced like ice through the shock.

“You’re afraid,” a deep voice said quietly from the shadows. “Why?”

Because you’re sitting in a ship outside, waiting to kill us all, and it’s all my fault. Or are you too much of a coward to face me again?

“Ben, I need you to be honest with me.” Her voice trembled in fear. “What are you here for?”

“Just you,” he answered.

He has come for you... The bond led him straight to you.

Her voice broke. “Why did you come here?”

His brows furrowed at her question and he studied her carefully, his eyes pinning her in place. She wasn’t certain how she expected him to react, but nonplussed did not top her list. “You brought me here.” He stepped closer, searching her fearful expression. She folded under his piercing stare, stealing a glance at the chaos of the corridor. His eyes followed her line of sight perceptively. “What is happening?” His voice was hushed but urgent. “I can’t help you if you don’t tell me.”
He’s lying... he doesn’t want to help you... he’s here to kill your friends and take you as his prisoner, he wants to know what he’s walking into, the whispers told her.

“‘What is happening?’ You’re here to finish what you started on Crait!” she cried. She shut her eyes, pretending that this man whom she shared a bond with was not attempting to murder her only family. The darkness eased away her fear, silencing the siren and shouts from the hallway, slowing her thundering heart.

“Is this still about Barkhesh?” He straightened, the anger rolling off him in waves, but he remained silent until she opened her eyes to return his glare. “That’s not how the bond works. I have no control over the Force across the galaxy! And even if it did, even if I wanted to hurt you or your friends, I would not use the bond when I have an entire military at my disposal!”

“And you’re using that military to kill us all!”

“This,” he said, stepping closer as he pointed at her in irritation. “This is why I didn’t tell you I knew where you were.”

“I’m not stupid! I saw a First Order ship that just flew over our heads with my own eyes. Do you expect me to believe you know nothing of that, Supreme Leader?” She shoved against his solid mass, forcing him to take a half-step backward. As the astonishment faded, grim realization then fear flickered across his tense expression.

He ignored her physical challenge, his jaw tightened as he visibly tempered his anger. “Did they see you?” She was surprised by his sincerity. Lowering his head to meet her gaze, he moved to step closer, but stopped himself from reaching out to her. “Did they see any of your friends?”

How can he lie as if it’s nothing?

“I don’t know.” Her voice softened into a whisper, brows creased as she attempted to discern what game he was playing. “They could have seen us. Poe and I were outside on the steps when it flew over.”

“I’m sure you were,” he said petulantly, turning from her to stare out toward the corridor she hoped he couldn’t see, casting his face in shadow.
“Stop it! You, of all people, have no right to be angry with me!” her tone shuddered with disgust.
“Everyone hates me. Finn won’t talk to me. Poe was hurt by...what I did to him. He wanted me to explain why I did it. I lied to him. To protect you!” He worked his jaw but otherwise remained silent. “But I suppose I am the one that needs protection, not you.”

For once, his eyes were downcast instead of meeting hers. He seemed almost... chastened. “Don’t do anything. I can fix this.”

“You can fix it by leaving us alone!”

_Please don’t do this again. Don’t be the monster on Starkiller. And Concordia. And Crait._

He stared off behind her, lost to his thoughts. He refused to meet her furious stare, so she shifted into his line of sight, forcing his eyes to flicker to hers. “I can’t make them leave. It’s not that simple, but I’ll figure it out.”

_He can make them leave... he is the Supreme Leader... they are his army... but you know the truth... he doesn’t want them to leave... _the voice reasoned.

“No, it is that simple, Ben; you’re the Supreme Leader! Let us go! You don’t have to do this!” she echoed.

“I am not doing this,” he said through clenched teeth. “I wouldn’t do this! My general sent reconnaissance ships to habitable planets throughout the galaxy. If they haven’t seen you, then they don’t know you’re there. Don’t engage them. I told you I’ll figure this out.”

“We have weapons. How many are on the ship? We can fight them!” He had turned to walk away, but her words spun him on his heels. As he moved toward her, his fists clenched at his sides, it was the intensity in his eyes caused her to stumble back.

“No, Rey! There is only a squad of ten onboard, but that’s not the concern. They have to maintain periodic communication at fixed intervals with their commander!” Her back hit the wall behind her, but he continued to step closer. “If they miss one report, then more will come looking for them. They will find you!” His hands slammed against the wall on either side of her head in vehemence. His arms were locked, his hands splayed beside her, caging her in as he lowered himself to eye level. His chest was heaving in... Fear? Guilt? Deceit? She could not sense the cause; his emotions were tightly guarded behind the rage.
Her own side of the bond was slowly surrendering to darkness. The starving beast inside her could only be satiated with anger, and she was more than willing to surrender to its will. She knew he sensed the darkness through the bond and wondered if he resented how easily she could control it. He chewed his thoughts instead, letting them be swept away in his torrent of emotions. She stared at him fearlessly, challenging him as he loomed before her.

Do not let him fool you... he has already kept secrets from you... he will lie to take what he wants from you... show him that true Jedi spirit of yours... show him you won't stand by and watch your friends die, the whisper warned.

“How do I know this isn’t a trick, Ben?” She crossed her arms over her chest defiantly. His eyes darkened, a storm raging behind them. He studied her, hunching down to her eye level, but made no move to back away.

“A trick?” he scoffed. “If you believe that, you don’t know me at all, Rey.”

“I believe you have given me no reason to trust you.” His jaw hardened and his hands clenched into fists next to her head. She glared at him fearlessly, even as she watched the resentment spark into a blazing fury in his eyes. She would show him no fear; he didn't deserve to have that, too. She felt a snap in the Force and she prepared for him to thrust his fist through the wall by her head; but he shoved himself off the wall instead, backing away from her. His face was twisted in disgust.

Clearly, you don’t, his voice slipped through the barriers of the bond. She swiftly realized he had sensed her anticipation and was appalled she thought he would threaten her with harm, which was laughable, considering their current situation.

His eyes were narrowed, his fists clenched, his head shaking in disbelief. “I’ve only ever told you the truth. Isn’t that reason enough?”

“You also told me you could take whatever you want, so was that a lie? Or is this?” She felt a slight vindication at returning the derision that he had excelled at using to manipulate conversations to his will in their early connections.

“Neither,” his voice wavered. His tense expression was anything but the calm and controlled mask he was struggling to compose. “I believed it was true at the time, but I underestimated you. If we are going to relive when we first met, when you were only my enemy, it’s only fair to remember everything. I also told you I wanted to be honest with you from the beginning. And I have been.”
He told you that you would never be alone... but then he didn’t choose you... he lied... he chose to be your enemy... the voice in the Force reminded her.

“I’m sorry if my enemy assuring me of his honesty doesn’t inspire much faith,” Rey spat. It wasn’t until his sharp inhale shattered the blind fury surrounding her, when her eyes finally connected with his, that she saw the truth and torment piercing through his crumbling default anger. As the darkness faded, she felt as if she were fully in control over her own mind again. Remorse tightened in her throat. He stared at her in wounded reticence, hands hanging loosely in defeat at his sides, his presence withdrawing from her in the bond. She feared he would leave.

“We have this rare bond, yet you refuse to use it to your advantage when it is actually important.” His voice was strained, his expression unreadable. “Since I am only of use to you when you need something from me, using our bond should be of no consequence to you. Go ahead, search my mind for the truth, I’ll wait.”

Rey could feel through the bond how deeply she was wounding him. If she were honest with herself, she knew she didn’t want to lose him. When she thought about Kylo and the bond, he had become something permanent to her. Sure, their connection was wrought with frustration on both sides, but he was always there nonetheless, even if it was not in the capacity she had hoped for.

Bond aside, Rey had never had a connection with anyone like she had with him. He had been there for her in ways no one else had and hurt her in ways no one else ever could. She was not particularly adept at social interactions, living the majority of her life alone, and Kylo was a lost, broken, difficult man. It didn’t help that emotions were intensified and complicated because they were enemies on the opposite sides of the war. The conflict that had arisen from fleeting moments of vulnerable truth was too consequential for either of them to deny the significance of their connection. She could not tolerate him most days – well, she could not tolerate what he stood for, the absurd thoughts that he allowed to become words, or the nonsensical decisions he made – but there was something there that she could not, nor particularly desired, to explain. Maybe that was why something deep inside was screaming at her, pleading with her to listen, because there was no denying the look in his eyes. She was pushing him away; she could lose him.

“Ben, I can’t let them die. In my vision, I think the Force was trying to show me that Finn will die. I can’t lose him. I need your help,” she whispered. “Please.”

“I won’t let them die,” he said tensely, staring at the ceiling, willing the words from his lips. “I promise you, I will handle this. Just... trust me.” For just a moment, in the center of chaos, she felt that everything would be all okay. Something deep inside her continued to plead with her to let the Force guide her.
An explosion drew her attention away from him. Fear bloomed, renewed, and with it, darkness. The cold, dark tendrils soothed her, silencing an intuitive warning that she should fight it; but she did not fear the darkness, she believed she was strong enough to control it this time. She had controlled hunger, loneliness, pain, and longing her entire life. How was darkness any different? Luke feared it because he did not understand it. Kylo feared it because he had followed it blindly to the dark side. Darkness had never wronged her, had never led her astray, had never caused her to make the immoral choice. Why should she fear it?

Your friends are in trouble… his fleet is killing them… while he keeps you distracted from it all… do you truly trust him with their lives after everything he has done… the voice whispered, overriding her internal pleas.

“Why would you help me? Why should I trust you?” she asked, following the guidance of the whisper.

“I don’t believe it wise to ask me to consider that, Rey, as I am the only one standing between you and the army of the First Order.” His voice hardened with contempt and he tore his wounded stare away from her. “I am talking about actively committing treason; don’t ask me to contemplate the utter insanity of betraying everyone I lead. More importantly, if you deem me untrustworthy, why are you asking me for help?”

“Because I don’t have a choice!”

“You do have a choice; either you trust me, or you all die,” he said, his expression dark and closed off to her scrutiny. “If the Order discovers what I am about to do, for people who would kill me in a heartbeat, I will be executed. I’ve made my choice, now make yours.”

If you trust him… he will kill them all… and keep you for himself… he will not make the mistake of allowing you to escape this time… the voice whispered.

Rey was confused. Everything of the light in her begged for her to trust him. Could she trust the darkness? Luke had proven that the light was not always right, but shouldn’t it be the darkness guiding her to trust Kylo, not the light? Why did the voice side with the darkness? She wanted to trust him, but the voice was wise.

“You know about Barkhesh! Your general was talking about battle preparations! How do I trust you when I know that truth?”
“I don’t know what else to say,” he replied, his voice weary and embittered. “Either trust in me and the bond or listen to the darkness I sense in you. You have no idea what you’re playing with. I can’t explain its intensity in you, I’ve never felt anything like it. And I can’t help you if you don’t let me in. I know you think you can control it. I know it feels right. And I know there is nothing I can say to prove that the truth the darkness promises you is a lie. But remember, everything you hate in me is because I believed that lie, too. So make your choice.” His words were earnest, and he seemed momentarily startled by his admission. Had her own mind not been clouded by darkness, she would have been pressed to consider the significance of that admission.

He’s trying to distract you… this is not about you… him… the light… or the darkness… he is here to eliminate the Resistance…

“But you would kill my friends!”

“I promised you - not today.” He rubbed his eyes with the heels of his hands as he put distance between them. She could feel the escalation of agitated energy in the Force. Kylo was growing impatient and irritated, losing the limited control he possessed, but she needed the truth.

Her lips curled as she bared her teeth. “So you admit you would.”

“Only if necessary,” he said as he leaned his weight onto a chair by his desk, gripping it tightly to center himself. “I’d prefer to imprison them. But it’s war. They wouldn’t protect me as I am prepared to do for them. They would kill me the second they had the information they needed from me, though I realize now that matters little to you. It should concern you more for practical reasons, considering what little information we have of the bond we share. My death could kill you. But, yes, worry about the anarchists who would cast you out if they knew our secret.”

“You would imprison your own mother?” She glared at him in disgust, and he lowered his eyes in ... guilt?

“She would do worse to me,” he murmured, still refusing to make eye contact.

If he would imprison his mother…and kill his father…what would he do to the others… His obsession with your power will be the death of everyone you ever loved… You have led him straight to your friends… if you do not stop him… your vision will be realized… your friend’s broken body will be under that blanket… because Kylo Ren will have put him there… the voice continued.
No... I won’t be the reason for the death of the only family I have ever known.

“What if...” Her voice trembled in desperation. “What if I promise I’ll go with you as your prisoner? Right now. I promise I will not fight back or try to escape, if you promise to leave this planet with my friends free and unharmed.” It was everything he’d asked of her in the throne room, but this time, she wouldn’t flee. They would both get what they wanted.

His arms tensed as his hands curled tighter around the back of a chair in front of him. He hunched over until his desperate, needy eyes were level with hers. He stared at her for far too long, searching her stare as he considered her offer. “You would be a slave, as you had been on Jakku?”

This is what he always wanted, why does he sound so offended?

“Please, spare them,” she whispered. “And you can… take whatever you want.”

His only response was a slight tick of his jaw before his eyes slid closed. The only sound in the room was his heavy breath. He was apoplectic; his fingers clenched onto the back of the chair, and it groaned underneath his vice-like grip. Her only understanding of his thoughts was the white-hot rage burning in the Force around them. And underneath... disgust. No, that wasn’t a strong enough word for what she felt in him. Unrestrained revulsion.

I don’t understand...

Without warning, he turned and threw the chair across his room. Then he swept his arm violently over his desk, sending the objects crashing to the floor. With the surface clear, he lifted the desk itself and threw it against the wall. There must have been a holobook shelf or cabinet that he threw it into, because it sounded like the room exploded. Undoubtedly, it left a staggering amount of damage in his wake. None of the destruction was achieved with the Force, as if he wanted to feel the weight of it all in his hands. The entire Force around her was screaming. Rey couldn’t determine whether his enraged screaming was in the room or over the connection or both. She didn’t move as he continued his rampage. He was indiscriminate in his violence, destroying everything in his path, though the objects were clearly directed away from her. When he moved toward the bed, she’d had enough.

“Ben!”
When Kylo turned, he looked positively feral. The bond burned with the tension between them, his eyes blazing in intensity. As his chest heaved with darkness – with frantic rage – she steadily held his glare. His fingers twitched with a desire for destruction, but she watched as the vicious hunger of darkness tempered slowly as the adrenaline faded. He was left trembling in the center of the room, eyes locked with hers. “Are you quite done?”

When he had finally regained control to speak again, his voice was harsh but restrained. “This isn’t me. I have no reason to lie, and, even if I did, the bond does not. I promise you, if I was there, you would know it, you would feel it.”

“And I… I can’t…” His lip curled, his hands clenched, and she thought he would lose control again. But after a moment, he continued, his voice low. “How could you offer yourself to me like some… some bargaining credit. I’m not a Hutt. I don’t want you as my prisoner, or my… slave. How could you think I want – ”

“You’re the one who kidnapped me!” she shouted in an odd mix of righteousness and shame. He stared at her for a moment, searching her eyes for something. He must have not found what he was looking for, because he clenched his jaw in anger and turned away from her.

“If you don’t believe another single word I say, believe this: If I wanted to find you, I would find you myself. I wouldn’t send Hux’s men to do it. I wouldn’t even trust the Knights with your safety. And where am I right now, hmm?” Defeated, he manipulated the Force to return the desk to its original location. Then he lifted an overturned chair off the floor and dragged it to his desk. He called a datapad from the floor – now cracked – and tossed it onto his desk. With a sigh, he slumped down into the chair, holding his head in his hands, surrounded by his own destruction.

Rey could feel the tension in him again, his emotions at the tipping point. Waiting for him to say something, anything, she stood in the quiet room as bombs exploded in the distance. The temple was abandoned save for them, but she couldn’t leave until she knew her friends were safe. Kylo was in no hurry to speak with her again, however. The silence between them stretched into minutes. Then, just as she stepped forward to talk some sense into him, he snapped. Kylo slammed his fist on the desk, deepening a crack that was etched across its surface. He closed his eyes as his breathing slowed. “This just might kill me, but I can’t…” He shook his head, refusing to look at her. “I can’t do this anymore with you.” He twisted his body away from her and focused on the datapad in front of him.

The heartbreak in his words had shattered through the darkness.

The screams of her inner voice returned, begging her to open herself to the bond. She was surprised to find his side of the bond open completely, a rarity between them. His despair and resentment were overwhelming, but at the center of the torment was the truth. It had been there all along, but only now did she see it clearly.

An even more terrifying truth was that she hadn’t needed the bond. Rationally, she should have known, but she realized the darkness had clouded her thinking.

He’s been honest, about all of this. Of course, he’s not here, he’s at a desk in his chambers, she realized. Even when he was destroying his room, how did I not realize… He’s right, I can’t control the darkness. If I know one thing about him, he’d be here with his troops if he knew about this. He’d be leading them despite his general’s protests. This is not some trick, he is not here to kill us, this wasn’t Ben at all.

“Fine, I believe you, okay?” she said, her voice soft with shame, but he refused to even look at her.

I need help. I’m afraid! You’re right. The darkness clouds my thoughts.

Kylo had been right – about all of it. He had assured her that he would protect her friends, but in her darkness, she hadn’t believed him. In her darkness, she had made many mistakes with him. There had been too many words she had regretted after the darkness faded. This wasn’t who she was, she knew that, so why did she continue to listen to it? She had never feared it before, but she did now. While the whispers in the Force spoke the truth, she didn’t have to be cruel. Even after all he had done, she wasn’t entirely certain he deserved it.

And now… because of her darkness, she hadn’t seen his offer of help for what it had been. Now she had wasted the time to warn her friends, now they were in danger. Now Kylo wouldn’t even look at her. She knew she owed him a conversation – an explanation of what was happening to her – more than anything, she owed him an apology for her cruel words.

“What do we do?” she said instead. “My friends didn’t stay here and do nothing. I can hear explosions. How do I stop this? Please, you have to help me.” He was no longer paying attention to her, instead, he focused intently on typing something on the screen at his desk. She could see it over his shoulder. It was nothing important. He was scrolling through an officer directory.

Is being a Supreme Leader more important than our lives?

“Ben!”
When he finally dragged his eyes up to meet her stare, she whispered. “Please.”

“Ah, so now that you believe me, you expect my help?” he sneered, the look in his eyes positively malicious. “No. I told you, I can’t take this anymore. I have sat by and let you fight me and play your mind games with me. You attempt to kill me every chance you get. I see now, I truly am only an enemy to you. That is all I will ever be. My only worth is what I can do for the Resistance. I am nothing to you unless your friends need help. Then once you’ve used me, you throw me away again like garbage. I guess you’ve learned from the best.” The tone itself was not cutting, but the words gutted her nonetheless. She knew she would never forget exactly how each devastated word sounded as he bared his soul to her.

“I will help you all now, because I promised I would. And promises actually mean something to me. But if you want to treat me like your enemy, Rey, I’ll be your enemy. It’s what I’m good at. You have no idea the lengths I have gone to keep you safe, but if you want to doubt me, I’ll show you what being my enemy is like, and you can find some other fool to use. If I were you, I’d leave Barkhesh, because your enemy knows where you are, and I won’t commit treason for you again. I don’t need you, this forsaken bond, any of it. I have spent my entire life alone, and even loneliness is better than this. I want you to leave, and I never want to see you again.” His voice broke with his words, as he tore his stormy gaze away from her.

Rey could barely hear her own voice over her shuddering breath. “Ben, what are you saying?” His eyes remained fixed on the datapad as she realized just what she had done in her darkness. She was left with nothing to do but plead. “Don’t do this!”

There was as much desperation to her plea as there was finality to his whisper. “It’s done, Rey.”

You don't mean this. You can't.

For all his harsh words and cruel choices, she never imagined he would be the one to end it. I'm sorry, she wanted to say, but it was meaningless. She wasn't sorry for not trusting him, only sorry she had hurt him. She knew that wasn't enough.

“What do we do now?” she gasped through a hiccuped sob.

“There is no ‘we.’ What you do now is stop your friends from doing something foolish. You’re a Jedi; you don’t need my help. I’ve watched you use persuasion on your friends. You’re strong, I’m certain you will have no trouble doing it again. Now leave.”
“I don’t know how,” she said, voice quivering.

“Walk away,” he answered. “That is all you ever had to do. Just walk away, you're good at it.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey backed away from him in disbelief, trying to wrap her mind around his cruel words. The bond snapped shut as she entered the corridor, just as he said it would. There were sirens and explosions, and the Force was chaotic with energy as she navigated the empty corridor. She had to find her friends, she had to do something. She found Rose sprinting up the temple steps with a blaster.

Rey pulled the blaster from her own belt, following her friend up the steps. “Where are Finn and Poe?”

“Rey, where were you?” Rose huffed between breaths. “They think the ship landed by the old base, and there shouldn’t be more than a dozen onboard.”

“There are only ten,” Rey said quickly, squinting as the bright rays of the sun blinded her temporarily. They didn’t hesitate to sprint across the small landing and down the steps to the jungle. Rey felt each step down in the Force as she blinked away the dark spots in her vision.

“Even better,” Rose panted next to her, eyes forward with determination. “They left with the others, hoping to eliminate them all before they can relay our position.”

Rey nearly tripped down the last step as her friend’s word sunk in. “No, Rose, they can’t! If those stormtroopers disappear, a lot more will come looking!”

Rose stopped at the base of the stairs. “How do you…”

“Just trust me!” Rey shouted, pulled her friend by the arm. “We have to stop them! If we don’t, we all die!” The two women took off into the jungle after Finn and Poe. Rey buried her fear over Kylo’s angry words, her fear for the future, her fear for her friends, and focused on what she knew she needed to do. She had to trust Kylo. She had to stop the fighting, persuade both the First Order and the Resistance to lay down their weapons. It was the only way they could avoid a massacre. It was all up to her.

Branches reached like claws from the shadows, ripping and tearing at their exposed skin. Rey stumbled as something wrapped around her ankle. The momentum threw her toward the ground, slicing her cheek. She screamed in fury, kicking and pulling at the tightening black vine that was dragging her toward a hole in the forest floor. Channeling the darkness around her, she found the strength to rip it from her ankle and immediately took off toward the base. Wiping the blood from her cheek, it was only then that she realized she was crying, the salt from her tears stinging her fresh wound.

Rey burst from the trees into the clearing, crashing into a wall of dread. The crumbled base loomed before them; the First Order ship had set down to the left. Panic squeezed the breath from her lungs as the sounds of blaster fire echoed across the clearing.

“We’re too late,” Rose gasped beside her, mirroring Rey’s thoughts.

What could she do? Even if she used a mind trick to persuade the Resistance to stop fighting, the First Order wouldn’t, unless...

“We have to try!” Rey shouted, sprinting across the grass.

If the Resistance had the element of surprise, the battle did not reflect it. The stormtroopers had corned them inside the rubble of the entrance to the base. Rey climbed over broken segments of the roof, finding a crevice large enough to squeeze herself through. Rose followed behind her, calling out to Finn as she ran. Red and blue blaster bolts illuminated the darkness around them as the troopers continued their advance. Members of the Resistance found cover behind fallen debris and sections from the collapsed ceiling. Rey found Poe in the darkness, nearly crashing into him in her haste.

“You have to surrender!”

“What?” His arms were raised as he fired suppressive bolts at the entrance of the base. His eyes flicked to hers quickly to judge her sincerity. “No way! We win or we die.”

“There’s another way!” she pleaded with him. Poe, however, refused to listen to her. She sighed, accessing the bond to use it just once more. With a flick of her wrist, she pushed Poe’s firing arm to his side, as Kylo had once done to her in the woods of Takodana. Poe’s eyes burned into hers. She definitely had his attention now. “Just trust me. We can all walk away from this, but they have to believe we are surrendering.”

Poe couldn’t move, but he didn’t look as terrified as he should have been, as she was. “How do I know this isn’t a trick, Rey?”

Blasterfire flew past them, but Rey barely noticed. She was trying to help him, but he believed she was deceiving him. It hurt, not to be trusted. “What? Why would I deceive you?”

“I have my suspicions.”

Rey released him from her hold, hoping she could more easily reason with him. “Look, Poe, they have to check in with their commanders at pre-set intervals. If they disappear, more will come looking.”

“Who told you that?” Poe’s eyes flashed wildly as his perceptive mind deduced a dangerous conclusion. “Because I know it wasn’t Finn; he told me we had to engage them, or they'd immediately contact the rest of the First Order. And no one else here has first-hand knowledge of the First Order. How could you possibly come across that information?”

“You will not remember any of this,” she suggested, waving her hand. “And you will surrender to the First Order.”

Poe turned the blaster on her. “Did you just try a Jedi mind trick on me to secure victory for the First Order?”

“No...I...Why didn’t it work on you?”

A chill pricked across her skin at the sight of his conspiratorial smile. He winked. “Answer the question, traitor.”

“It was for the good of the Resistance!” She knew they were running out of time, but Poe looked more determined to ignore her pleas than when she had first arrived. Yes, she had made a mistake, but couldn’t he see that she had no choice? If he didn’t listen to her, they would all die. She had no reason to deceive them. “If you pretend to surrender, I can...”

“I’ll consider it after you tell me who gave you the information, Rey.”
“It doesn’t matter!” she cried defensively, trembling like a trapped animal. “What matters is that continuing this battle will be the death of us all!”

“Oh, it does matter, Rey, when the one supplying your information is Kylo Ren.” His accusation was ice in her veins. She panicked. The look in his eyes was murderous. Just as she had done every time she felt lost and alone, she turned to the only person she knew she shouldn’t.

Ben!

She sensed the buzzing of the Force around her, the familiar precedent to their connection. But as his form began to appear in the shadows – and she began to regret her decision to reach out to him – the bond snapped shut like a slammed door. Sound returned, and the Force was peaceful.

“You’re paranoid! How would I even talk to him! He’s across the galaxy!” she prevaricated in fear, realizing she was alone. Poe raised his blaster, leveling it between her eyes.

Ben, I need your help! Please!

She found his presence in her mind and pressed against it, willing the words into his energy in her mind.

Go away, his resonant voice groaned broodingly through their bond.

Poe is going to kill me! I told him we can’t kill the stormtroopers because they have to check in regularly. Now he has a blaster to my head, he’s demanding to know who gave me inside information on the First Order. He knows it’s you. I don’t know what to do!

He was quiet for a moment, and she thought he had abandoned her. Then she felt his profound fear.

Tell him the truth, Rey, tell him it was me. Tell him that I’m providing you information on the First Order. I’m the one committing treason, not you.

No, if they know about our bond, they will never trust me. It’s too much of a risk.
And if you don’t, they’ll kill you, Rey!

You don’t see the look in his eyes. He’ll kill me if I tell him it’s you!

“Tell me it isn’t that creature or, so help me, Rey, I will shoot you right now!” Poe demanded.

He knows it’s me. Tell him you’ve convinced me to turn myself over to him. You’ll be a hero for bringing me in. He won’t pass up the opportunity for my capture. It should give you enough time to escape. If I leave now, I can be there in –

And you’ll be killed. I won’t have you come here, not this way. Absolutely not.

Rey!

“Poe, please!” she stammered. “General Leia wouldn’t...”

Rey!

“This is treason, Rey! This is war! What did you think would happen?” Poe shouted. He aimed the blaster at her forehead and counted down. “Five...” Beads of sweat dripped down his forehead, but he held the blaster steady. The blaster barrel consumed her vision as she awaited her fate. “Four...” Not even when Kylo was at his most furious did she see the murderous rage that currently stared back at her. Undoubtedly, Poe would kill her where she stood. “Three...” She would die alone, abandoned by everyone. Maybe I deserve this, she thought, I have committed treason and kept Ben a secret from the Resistance. I betrayed everyone. “Two...” And I drove away the one person I have ever had a deep connection with. He warned me that it would end this way, but I didn’t listen. “One...” Rey closed her eyes and held her quivering breath.

I’m so sorry, Ben, for hurting you. I just want you to know that –

She heard the weapon fired, and she flinched, her eyes snapping open on instinct. He had aimed the blaster to the left of her head and fired. Her ears were ringing at the proximity of the bolt, terror and helplessness streaming into the bond. “Tell me now!” Poe screamed over the blasterfire behind “My mother!” Kylo shouted in desperation. Tell him it was my mother.

“It was Leia!” she cried. The fire in Poe’s eyes faltered. He studied her for a moment, the blaster still aimed at her forehead.

“We’ll see,” he sneered. He turned toward his lieutenant, who had taken cover from the advancing attack behind a large pile of rubble. “Lieutenant Connix, raise the general on the comlink. Ask her if she gave Rey sensitive First Order information considering their recon ships.” Kaydel relayed the message into the comlink.

Please mother, please save her. Rey presumed Kylo hadn’t intended to project that thought.

“Yes, Lieutenant, I have been giving Rey all the information I have on the First Order. Heed her warnings,” Leia’s voice rasped over the comlink. A sob escaped from Rey’s throat as Poe slowly lowered the weapon.

Ben, why would she lie for me?

“See, that wasn’t so hard,” Poe smiled sardonically. “And you know I wouldn’t have actually shot you, right?”

Rey tried to speak through her shuddering breath. “Will you trust me now that we need to surrender?”

Ben?

“It’s too late. We already killed at least one, and I would bet my life they’ve already been in contact with the First Order.” He turned away from her to rejoin the fight.

“Poe, stop!” she screamed, grabbing his arm. But his head snapped to the entrance of the base. Rey followed his line of sight, her eyes falling on a turret aimed in their direction. A large flash illuminated the darkness.
Chapter End Notes

Threat of violence

Poe holds a gun to Rey's head to force her to admit treason
Kylo's plea

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Recon ships may have been unexpected, but how could they have not at least suspected the Order would commission recon droids in our search. Leia is smarter than that! There was no one monitoring ships in proximity on RADAR? No comms scans? No ordinances for daylight hours? No procedures at all? Did she not realize how far the grasp of Hux’s army... my army reaches? What was she thinking?

Blue was the perfect projection of an obedient droid, rolling silently behind him as he maneuvered past the other officers.

“Lieutenant Mitaka, a word?” Kylo said to the man who had avoided eye contact with him since he had made his presence known on the Command Bridge. Based upon the man’s paling expression, his tone had suggested the intended level of intimidation.

“Y...Yes, Supreme Leader?”

“Take a walk with me,” he said, leading him away from the bridge.

“Is there a problem, sir?” the lieutenant asked, his voice trembling nearly as much as his hands.

“The directory indicates you oversee the reconnaissance missions to the Seitia Sector in the Outer Rim. Is that correct?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Good.” Kylo’s eyes flashed seditiously. He waved two fingers discreetly as he manipulated the man’s mind. “You will destroy and forget any reconnaissance information regarding Barkhesh. You will not relay information regarding Barkhesh to anyone else. When the squad from the Barkhesh mission returns, you will have them report directly to me. Barkhesh is of no interest to the First Order. You will not remember this conversation.” The lieutenant mechanically repeated his words.
Ben?

Rey’s voice whispered in his head.

“That is all, Lieutenant.” He considered choking the man to maintain appearances, but he was distracted. As Mitaka slinked back to the bridge, the Force crackled around him. No, not now. He concentrated intently on their bond, blocking his energy from the magnetism to her. The connection forming between them snapped shut. Good. He stormed back toward his chambers. I told her I was done. I can’t do it anymore. Why won’t she just leave me in peace?

Ben, I need your help! Please!

He sensed her energy clawing desperately at his mind, her terror shivered down his spine.

Go away! he groaned.

He was frustrated with himself that he would make resolutions, then immediately break them for her.

Poe is going to kill me! I told him we can’t kill the stormtroopers because they have to check in regularly. Now he has a blaster to my head, he’s demanding to know who gave me inside information on the First Order. He suspects it’s you. I don’t know what to do!

Her words crashed into him like a quarterstaff to the diaphragm, forcing the breath from his lungs. She was panicking, he could sense her mortal fear. Rey was not one to panic easily, and he knew Poe Dameron well enough to know that if he raised a weapon against her, he intended to use it. If Poe was demanding the truth, there would be dire consequences if he didn’t receive it. Kylo ducked inside the nearest conference room, collapsing forward with both hands splayed on the table as he centered himself. There was no time to lose control. Rey needed him.

Kylo knew that it was inevitable that their bond would be discovered, when they were forced to answer for something that neither understood themselves. If fate were kinder – and it had been him who was discovered – Hux would have had him on his knees before an execution squad before third rotation. He had not considered what would happen to her if she were exposed first, though he never would have expected his mother to be as unforgiving as the First Order. That led him to the conclusion that the pilot was acting independently, which was far more dangerous.
She had committed treason, Poe would be within his rights to shoot her. There would be only one reason to stay his hand; if she were worth more alive to him than dead. Kylo instructed her as calmly as he could muster in his fear: tell him the truth, Rey, tell him it was me. Tell him that I’m providing you information on the First Order. I’m the one committing treason, not you.

_No, if they know about our bond, they will never trust me. It’s too much of a risk,* she answered stubbornly. He wondered what was so important about those people that she would risk her own life to maintain their trust. He was more than aware that it was too late for trust.

And if you don’t, they’ll kill you, Rey! he warned, pleading with her not to fight him for once.

_You don’t see the look in his eyes. He’ll kill me if I tell him it’s you!_

“Tell me it isn’t that creature or, so help me, Rey, I will shoot you right now!” He could hear Poe shouting at her over blaster fire. The true complications became clear. The Resistance had already engaged the reconnaissance squad. Any other day, he would chuckle at their irrationality, but not when it threatened the only person in the galaxy whose life was of consequence to him. He quickly contemplated a new strategy. They had run out of time. She had to offer Dameron something he wanted. Kylo suffered no delusions, he knew what Poe wanted more than anything else. If there was one decision he was not conflicted about, it was that he never intended for Rey to suffer for his choices.

_He knows it’s me. Tell him you’ve convinced me to turn myself over to him. You’ll be a hero for bringing me in. He won’t pass up the opportunity for my capture. It should give you enough time to escape.* He moved to the conference room computer terminal and began frantically mapping and calculating the distance to Barkhesh in his Silencer.

If I leave now, I can be there in – But Rey interrupted him to explain why she hated his plan to help her, a technique he had become increasingly familiar with over the last few weeks.

_And you’ll be killed. I won’t have you come here, not this way. Absolutely not,* she argued. He decided he would never understand her logic. She had attempted to take his life on numerous occasions, but the moment his death would mean something, she would not allow it. He feared she was too stubborn to accept his help, even though she had asked for it, and would pay for her irrationality with her life. He focused on tempering his frustration with her before he said something foolish and she shut him out. If he could just convince her to trust him…
“Poe, please!” he heard Rey beg her alleged friend. “General Leia wouldn’t...”

“Rey!”

“This is treason, Rey! This is war! What did you think would happen?” Poe sounded unhinged. Kylo recognized his tone as one belonging to a man prepared to escalate to the extreme.

Poe began a count down, “Five...”

Rey was officially on borrowed time, and he had only five seconds for one last desperate effort. Five seconds was a lifetime when he watched the light fade from his father’s eyes. But as he fought inevitability, it would pass as quickly as a stuttered breath. “Four...”

What could he do? If she refused his help, and if Dameron was intent on killing her, there was nothing Kylo could do from across the galaxy. There was no hope. She would die because she was bonded to him, and he and been too selfish to let her go.

“Three...”

No!

There had to be a way. He couldn’t stand by and allow Dameron to kill her. This was all his fault. His very existence threatened to end hers, as he always feared it would. “Two...”

Why hadn’t she taken his life on Starkiller? Why would the Force create the bond, knowing what he was? Why didn’t he just walk off that ledge? If he were dead, she would have been safe.

“One...”

I’m so sorry, Ben, for hurting you. I just want you to know that –
Kylo knew what those words meant. She had surrendered to her fate and was saying her goodbyes, but he refused to bear witness to her last words. Calling out to the Cosmic Force, he begged for the answer to save her. Just this once. The Force was silent.

The piercing sound of a proximate blaster shot caused him to stumble back against the wall. He sensed her jolt and all went silent. His reeling mind staggered to a halt. He tried to scream. He tried to call out to her. He tried to beg the Force to take him instead, but his throat forgot how to function, his lips trembled too fiercely to form words, and his lungs would not cooperate to suck in a breath. Time stood still. Stuck in limbo, he crumpled against the wall, paralyzed as he waited for a sign of life or for her energy to drift away into the Force.

The sound of a terrified breath across the bond drew oxygen into his own lungs. Something between a sigh and a sob escaped his lips. Tears stung his eyes. There was hope, she was alive.

“Tell me now!” He startled at the unhinged voice of Poe Dameron screaming across the bond. He refused to lose her. Please, he begged the Force. A kind face appeared in his mind and he shouted her name in desperation.

My mother! he gasped hoarsely. Tell him it was my mother!

“It was Leia!” she cried.

It had to work. It had to. He knew that he could survive her hating him. He could survive breaking the bond, spending the rest of his miserable life alone. But her death? In that moment, he understood the depth he had allowed their bond, her, to embed into his soul. He knew the bond was too strong for him to survive her death. While her fate was, hopefully, not tied to his, his fate was intrinsically tied to hers. He was relieved by that. Her death was an agony he did not want to live to bear. But that revelation was of little comfort then, because, more than anything, he wanted her to live.

The staccato of his pulse in his ears nearly drowned out the pilot’s next words. “We’ll see...Lieutenant Connix, raise the general on the comlink. Ask her if she gave Rey sensitive First Order information considering their recon ships.” The woman obediently followed his order. Kylo waited, back slumped against the wall, his entire body tense and shivering. His head tilted toward the ceiling, hot tears rolling down his cheeks. He silently begged his mother to not let him down again.
Please mother, please save her. He chanted it over and over in his head like a mantra, squeezing his eyes shut, listening in agony for the dreaded sound of a blaster shot that would extinguish the remaining flicker of light in his soul.

“Yes, Lieutenant, I have been giving Rey all the information I have on the First Order. Heed her warnings.” Kylo’s knees weakened under the weight of his emotions. Falling to pieces, he slid down the wall of the empty conference room. He barely recognized his mother’s voice; it was weak and broken, nothing like the commanding voice he once knew.

“See, that wasn’t so hard,” the pilot said. The reality was not lost on him that his mother had lied and risked her own life to save Rey. But that mattered little at that moment. What mattered was Rey’s fear had dissipated as she cried in relief. She’s going to be okay. Everything would be okay.

In his desperation to be alone in his own mind, he forced his energy from their connection, effectively shutting himself from the bond. She was safe, he had no doubt she could handle the squad of stormtroopers, and he could handle the cleanup. He released a long, shuddering exhale as the tension crumbled into the Force. His eyes startled open when he heard the crash on his side of the bond.

The conference room looked like an explosive device had been detonated. Every chair and object that was not secured to the floor had evidently been levitating only moments before. Presently, it all lay haphazardly around the room after it had been released from his unknowing hold. He hadn’t noticed any of it in his panic. His general could have waltzed in and shot him in the face, and he’d have been none the wiser. The bond would kill them both.

Kylo had tried to quietly – and not so quietly – to take her impulsive reactions. Nothing worked. There would always be a push/pull between them as long as they were on opposite sides of the war. She was systematically destroying him, and he would clearly allow her to do it. He continued to suffer for the small taste of peace he felt around her. Perhaps he would have endured it indefinitely, if it didn’t threaten to destroy her too.

Rey didn’t need him as a teacher or anything else, she needed him as her enemy. The events had bolstered two resolutions in his mind. The first resolution was that the bond had to be destroyed, for her sake and his own. Despite the peace, he couldn’t take her hatred anymore. It would be better for her to give up on him, and it would be better for him to let her go. Even if he wasn’t strong enough to end it for his own sake, he would do it for her. She needed him to let her go to survive. The other resolution was that he could never leave. If he was in control of the First Order, she was safe. He found purpose in his resolution.

The decision had done little to soothe the mercurial emotions raging inside him, however. His body still trembled with adrenaline, his mind achingly reliving the events of the past few minutes. He urgently sought equilibrium in the fading storm. He could let go, release the emotions surging inside him, and sob uncontrollably until he collapsed in exhaustion on the cold, comfortless floor – or – he could destroy, release the emotions surging inside him through violence, until he collapsed in exhaustion on the cold, comfortless floor. Kylo stood weakly. The crackling of his lightsaber echoed off the walls of the empty conference room.

Chapter End Notes

Threat of violence
Poe's threat of violence from the last chapter from Kylo's POV
Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
“Get down!” Poe shouted, collapsing over Rey as he forced her to the ground, and the location they had been standing exploded in a blinding fireball. The concussive wave of the blast knocked Rey unconscious momentarily. When her eyes snapped open, her vision was blurred by the resulting cloud of dust. The battle around her was silent save for the loud ringing in her ears. She coughed as she pushed herself to a stand, immediately regretting the decision. Nausea and vertigo crashed through her senses. She dropped to her knees, crawling to a form kneeling a few meters in front of her.

As she dragged herself closer to the figure, her senses came crashing back all at once. The blaster fire was muffled by the screams of the injured and cries of the desperate. Smoke assaulted her lungs, and a metallic taste remained on her tongue. Her shoulder ached from the fall, but she was otherwise unscathed. Her hand bumped something solid. Rey looked down, disoriented, and realized it was a person. She waited for the rise and fall of their chest, but there was nothing. The woman’s face was covered in ash. Rey didn’t even know her name. The woman were sprawled lifeless at her feet, and there was nothing Rey could do.

Rey searched around her, but there was no one sprinting to render aid. The woman had fallen defending the Resistance, but no one stopped. No one cried. No one tried to save her. She was immediately accepted as a casualty of war as the others ran past her. This was the reality of war. Rey could just as easily have been the one dead on the floor. Would anyone care if it was her instead? Other than the man who had just offered to exchange his life for hers?

“I’m so sorry,” she cried. Her tears were lost to the debris on the ground. She knew there would be casualties in the war, she had seen good people die before, and she didn’t know the woman – but seeing someone dead made the impending war a reality it hadn’t been before. This woman had died for nothing.

Rey began crawling forward, searching for Poe to help her drag the woman’s body to safety, but she stilled as Poe’s form appeared through the cloud of dust. He was rocking on his knees, screaming in agony. But not physical agony... she realized. He was concentrating on pieces of singed wire, chips and drives in his hands. There were metal fragments in his lap.

Barely recognizable orange and white metal fragments.

Perhaps Rey could have convinced herself that her scavenger brain did not easily recognize the charred remnants in his hands as droid parts, but that antennae that was scattered among the debris she would have recognized anywhere. Rey choked on a sob as she realized who else had been an unnecessary casualty of the explosion.

_Beebee-Ate._

Poe was unhinged. He reminded her of Kylo in that moment, tears of sorrow replaced by screams of fury. If she gave Poe a lightsaber, she had no doubt he would destroy the entire base. He would blame the stormtroopers, kill them all, but it was his choices that led to the droid’s destruction. She wiped at the tears falling down her cheeks as his sweet binary beeps replayed in her mind. Rage burned through her veins, quickly replaced by the cold nothingness of darkness.

“This is your fault!” she shouted hoarsely at Poe. “His death is on your hands! You should have just listened to me and surrendered!”

She pushed herself to a stand and waved her arms in defeat. “Cease fire!” she shouted. “We surrender!” Neither side heeded her words. Blaster bolts streamed across her vision from every direction.

She swallowed apprehensively and stepped out from behind a section of rubble, her arms waving above her head. If the Resistance saw her, she had to believe they would stop firing. Her only hope was that the stormtroopers noticed their surrender before they killed her.

“I surrender!” she shouted. She waited for her friends to suspend their attack, but it was the First Order that ended the assault first.

“That’s the girl! That’s the girl! Cease fire!” a trooper shouted.

_The girl?_

“I have come to negotiate our surrender,” Rey said, stepping toward the stormtroopers, her hands raised non-threateningly. The troopers kept their weapons trained upon her as she walked cautiously out to meet them. She counted seven alive; three more lay dead by the entrance to the base. If Kylo had told her the truth, then they were all accounted for. She waited until they had surrounded her before speaking again. Manipulating each of their minds as easily as she had Finn’s and Rose’s in the rainforest, she spoke with persuasion.
“You will leave on your ship immediately. You will not remember the battle that took place here. You will remember that you landed on this planet, there was no sign of the Resistance, the base was destroyed, and three of your men were killed when you were attacked by a pack of wild beasts. It is your opinion that no further reconnaissance missions are necessary for this planet.” The seven troopers repeated her speech in unison, then turned back toward the ship.

“Wait,” she said to the trooper closest to her. “You will answer me honestly.”

“I will answer you honestly,” he repeated mechanically.

“Who am I to you?” Her voice softened as she thought of the young man under that mask, not unlike Finn, who had become a pawn of war.

“The girl from the holo,” he replied simply.

“What does the holo say?”

“The bounty. ‘Capture Only.’ We are under direct orders by the Supreme Leader not to engage or harm the Jedi girl or the general under penalty of death. We are to detain them and await further orders from the Supreme Leader himself.” It would have been easier, she thought, if he wanted her dead. Shame churned in her gut.

“You will leave and not remember this conversation,” she whispered through tears.

“I will leave and not remember this conversation.”

Rey stepped back into what was left of the base. They were safe... again. Poe would see now what she could be for the Resistance. Even if he suspected her bond, it had helped save them. Maybe she was meant to be a Jedi. Maybe she could be what they all wanted her to be. Maybe there was still hope for her in the Resistance. She hadn’t prevented casualties, but she’d prevented a massacre. She smiled - even though she knew they had an uphill battle.

Rey would have to tell Leia the truth after the woman willingly assisted in her lie. She would have to forgive Poe for almost killing her and convince him she was not committing treason with their enemy. And she would have to apologize to Kylo and tell him the truth about the darkness that was clouding her thoughts. There was so much to fear, but, for the moment, everything would be okay.
She was not nothing with them. They needed her as much as she needed them. She smiled, because she finally had hope that she was exactly where she needed to be.

She smiled… until she saw the expression on their faces. No one else was smiling, celebrating or, at the very least, thanking her for fixing their mistake. No, the other Resistance members only stared at her in silent incredulity... and terror. Her eyes scanned through the dust and smoke until she found Finn. She waited for him to say something, to embrace her in relief, but he stood as motionless as the rest.

_Are they... afraid of me?_

“Finn...” she began, but he shook his head in disbelief. His eyes told her everything she needed to know. He didn’t trust her. None of them did.

“You’re all welcome!” she spat, pushing past them to search the rubble where Poe had knelt only moments before. _Please, she begged the Force, please let it be intact._ In answer, she caught the glint of something silver in the rubble. It could have been anything, but she knew. _The central processor._ She cradled the component to her chest, turning back toward the temple. This wasn’t for Poe, this was for Beebee-Ate. Rose may have called after her, but the anger spurred her forward. As she stomped through the trees, she dared the beasts that hid in the shadows to instigate a fight with her.
Chapter End Notes

Death

BB8 is blown-up
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey didn’t need to avoid her friends when they returned to the temple; they all kept their distance from her. As she walked past them in the corridors, she sensed their fear and heard their harsh whispers. She felt even more lonely than she had before. Kylo’s emotions were volatile on the other side of the bond in a way she had not felt since Crait, but her connection to him was soothing. He was there; he understood this alienation and solitude.

The more she thought about him, the less she feared he was the temptation to the dark side as Luke had feared. No, not when he was the one pushing her from the darkness. Underneath the mask others saw, she knew the truth – she had from the beginning, and it scared him. She had felt his powerful light, she knew the real Ben Solo that no one else was privy to. He was the only one who told her the truth, who understood her, who knew who she was under her mask.

He just happened to be the most incorrigible and frustrating person in the entire galaxy. Every time she thought he was finally accepting the light, he would become unpredictable as ever – or perhaps predictable from her perspective – and would disappoint her again.

He had, however, never pretended to be more than he was, never promised more than he had to give, never attempted to hide his faults. And he held her to the same expectations. He only wanted her to be her, even if that made her his enemy. Except, she wasn’t so certain she saw them as enemies anymore. Her only certainty was that their connection was complicated and confusing. She didn’t know when it happened; the bond’s one constant was that they were always pitted against each other, arguing their sides, yet somehow over those arguments, she had only thought of him when her life was in peril. Even when he was angry with her, he feared for her life, he saved her, willing to exchange his own in the process. That wasn’t the behavior of an enemy, either.

A golden protocol droid interrupted her thoughts. “Miss Rey, it is I, See-Threepio, human-cyborg relations. Princess Leia has presently requested your company.”

Rey knew it was time to talk to Leia. In hindsight, she knew she should have talked to her from the beginning. Rose and Kylo were right: Leia likely suspected she’d been hiding something all along. Leia knew she lied, but how much she knew, Rey wasn’t certain. Did she know about the Supremacy? Did she know about the bond? What would she do when she knew the truth? Rey had kept the connection she had with her son, their enemy, a secret from her. Rey had lied to the mother of her bondmate, but she had still lied for her. Leia had saved her life. Why?
Maybe it wasn’t for her, maybe it was for Kylo. Maybe she had the same hope Rey did - if Kylo was willing to commit treason to protect them, he was not the man he was on Starkiller or Crait, he could come home to them... to her. Rey had to bring Kylo home for his mother. If not in person, then through the bond. The past didn’t matter, Rey knew he would want to see his dying mother after he begged Leia so desperately to save her.

Threepio had given her the perfect opportunity to sit down with Leia, but Rey wasn’t ready. She needed to talk to Ben first, he needed to be there to help explain it to his mother. If she opened a connection with Leia in the room without forewarning, she doubted he would react favorably. Rey smiled politely at the protocol droid. “Please tell the general that I am exhausted and heading to my room to rest, but I will see her first thing in the morning.”

“I will, indeed, Miss Rey,” Threepio responded.

As he sauntered away, Rey let her curiosity get the best of her. “Threepio, do you remember Ben?”

The droid turned. “Are you speaking of Ben Kenobi?”

“No, Ben Solo,” she whispered, fearful of those who might have overheard.

“Ah, yes,” the protocol droid said, clearly not understanding her desire for a clandestine conversation. “Of course, Master Ben.”

“Can you tell me about him?”

“I am sorry, miss, my service was to the princess,” the droid answered, “but if my memory serves me correctly, he was quite proficient with languages – for a human – did you know that I am fluent in over six million forms of c–

“Yes, Threepio!”

“Right,” the golden droid said with a huff, “They spared no expense in his education. He was groomed at an early age for the Senate. I do believe he showed promise with piloting as well.”
“But what was he like,” Rey asked with barely concealed exasperation.

“Kind, to those of the cyborg variety. But mostly sad. I do apologize, I am not certain I have much more to tell, as I have been instructed not to mention the younger Master after… there I go, rambling again. The pr… general will have my core processor one of these days. Do have a pleasant slumber, Miss Rey.”

Rey blinked. “Slumber?”

“Your rest?

“Of course,” she said, trying her best to hide her disappointment. “Thank you, Threepio.” Rey wanted someone to tell her who Kylo had been, so she could understand who he was now. The real him; not the man her friends believed he was or the man she thought he had been. Rey walked to her room and closed her eyes. There was only one person in the galaxy who could tell her who he really was.

Ben.

Thinking his name was all it required. Her eyes flickered open as she felt the electrical charge of their bond.

Kylo stood with Blue in a massive library. Archives. His back was to her as he swiped through a holobook, which cast his face and dark hair in a blue hue. Something stirred low in her belly at the sight of him; something she couldn’t explain away as purely relief, fear, or hope.

“Ben?” she asked hesitantly. Hanging his head, he slowly pivoted to face her. He discarded the holobook – the topic holocrons – and his eyelids slid closed as exhaled a long breath. After a moment, he opened his eyes to gaze up at her. His eyes were red-rimmed and swollen, flickering with conflict.

“You’re alright?” he murmured, the relief spilling over into the bond.

She smiled. “Only because of you and Leia.”
He glanced away, nodding as he swallowed his emotions. “Good.”

Her heart beat wildly as he walked toward her, stopping close enough to hand her the other half of the broken lightsaber. It was the one she had thrown at him with the droid parts in their earliest connections after Crait. He had kept it – his family’s legacy symbolized in its broken crystal – and he had returned it to her. Her smile widened.

It was only as he walked past her that she realized something was wrong. The bond was hardened and closed-off. Her smile faded. She knew the last time they had seen each other that he was angry, but he had helped her, he had saved her. He wouldn’t have done that if he meant what he said, would he?

“Where are you going?”

“I thought it was obvious. Away from you.” His words tore through her as if he’d fired them out of a blaster. Everything about him felt wrong, as if his Force energy was flowing against the currents of destiny. He had spoken the words, but he couldn’t have meant them. Could he? She reached for him, to make him stay, but he jerked his arm away.

Ben, no. Not this.

“Why?” she gasped. “We need to talk about everything that just happened! What you did for me and offered to do for me...”

“...was nothing. It changed nothing. Understand?” In desperation, Rey moved in front of him, blocking an easy exit. She weighed nothing compared to him, but he did not push her out of his path as he easily could have. Clearly, he wanted to avoid confrontation. His words and actions seemed almost forced, as if it wasn’t truly what he wanted. His eyes remained fixed on the floor as she pleaded with him.

“Obviously, it changed something! You won’t even look it at me. Please, look at me. My friends stare at me like they don’t know me, but not you. From the moment we first met, you looked at me like you knew me better than I knew myself. Maybe... maybe you do. I’m afraid and I feel so alone. Don’t do this. Please.”

“What do you want from me this time?” he sighed, “Have you not used me enough? I thought I made myself clear.”
She wanted to embrace him, slap him, scream at him until he at least looked at her. If she could just see his eyes, she would know where they stood. “You saved my life, again. You disappeared before I could thank you. I think that deserves a conversation at least.”

“Fine, say it,” he said with a flippant wave of his hand. His energy felt like jagged ice, nothing like the flickering fire she had come to know.

“Thank you, for – ”

“Now you’ve thanked me,” he said impassively. “Leave or move.”

Her knees felt weak, her body shivering as she held back tears. It didn’t make any sense. What had happened since their bond had last closed? He had helped her when he didn’t have to, and now he suddenly hated her again?

“You committed treason to keep me safe; you were going to turn yourself over to the Resistance for me. You would have died for me.” Rey could feel the weight of her emotions on her voice; she knew it was wavering, she knew he heard it when it cracked under the weight. “Why?”

Kylo didn’t answer, instead, he growled and pivoted to walk around her. She blocked him again, hands raised as if he were a beast that could lash out at a moment’s notice. “The chance has passed for your prying questions in your quest to... what? Know why I am the monster that I am? It doesn’t matter. I refuse to entertain your curiosity as if I’m merely the schematics of an unknown starship. I don’t want to be your broken scavenger project. Did I not make myself clear enough? Leave.” It was cruel, it was antithetical to everything he had been before – everything she had refused to see. The resentment bled into his words, but Rey considered it progress. Anger was better than the void left by his fettered emotions.

She tilted her head to meet his gaze, but he closed his eyes instead, breathing mechanically. His resolve was crumbling, she knew it was; she just needed to break through the emotional barrier he had built around himself. “Why are you doing this, Ben? Please, talk to me.”

“It’s too late for that, Rey. I warned you,” His tone was nearly robotic, as if his desire to subjugate his emotions left his voice hollow and lifeless. “Don’t think of me, don’t talk to me, close the bond the moment it opens. Block me from your mind the best you can. I will do the same. With time, the bond should fade. I never want to see you again.” There was a heaviness to his last words, but Rey barely noticed beyond their meaning.
The first tears fell as she began to understand his sincerity. “Ben, you truly want that? I thought –”

“You thought wrong,” he interrupted curtly.

“No, I know you don’t want this,” she said, stepping closer to force him to look at her. If she could convince him to look at her, she knew he would not be strong enough to ignore her. Even at his most angry, he had never been capable of ignoring her. “You don’t have to do this.”

“I do,” he breathed. “If you don’t go, I will.” He moved to leave, but she grasped his arm. He recoiled from her touch as if lightning flowed through her veins. “Don’t!” he growled, turning his back to her, his visceral reaction leaving her more confused than before. Why was he doing this? It didn’t feel like hate.

“Ben, please! Talk to me! Tell me you hate me! Tell me I’m nothing! Tell me that you can’t stand my ideals! Tell me why you never want to see me again!” she pleaded. She craved for the moments when he was angry and brooding, or derisive and stonewalling, or haughty and insolent. At least then she knew how to respond. This had pulled the very foundation out from under her. “Please, be anything but this!”

“No, Rey.”

Rey stepped around him to force him to face her, but he had shut down, eyes closed, willing her away. She wasn’t foolish enough to reach for him again. “You wish to never speak to me again, and you won’t at least say why? Please, say something!”

“There’s nothing more to say,” he whispered.

Rey had promised herself after what happened at the temple that she would refuse the darkness. But the assurance of comfort was too strong in the face of the wound he was reopening in her heart. With a long, measured breaths, she allowed it in. “No, that’s not good enough,” her voice quivered. The tears spilled down her cheeks, chasing her falling hope. “Just when I was starting to believe that everything we felt in the hut was real. I don’t understand. You will not abandon me like everyone else without giving me a reason.”

“I’m not your parents,” he said, spitting the words out as if he hated them as much as she did. “I’m not abandoning you, because I was never more to you than your enemy.”
“Yes, you are! Ben, you’re turning your back on our bond just like you did your family!” she cried between sobs. She knew her reactionary words wouldn’t make him stay, but he hurt her, and anger was the only way to make the pain go away.

He shook his head, puffing his cheeks as he struggled with his control. “I didn’t. They turned their backs on me.”

“You left them!”

Kylo’s eyes raised to her, burning with rage. She had received her wish; he was angry. “Luke left his family to die, but you all worship him!”

“He saved them when it mattered,” she shouted back, “and he didn’t leave to join a legion of mass murderers!”

“No, he’d already done that,” he said, his voice as dark as his eyes.

“Fine, then what you’re saying is you’re no better than him?”

“I’m better off without this bond, and so are you. That is all that matters,” he rasped. His voice faltered, and she pushed harder, hoping his stone façade would crack.

“That’s not a reason, Ben. If honesty and truth are so important to you, then tell me why. Why are you turning your back on me? Why did you turn your back on your family, your name? You had everything I’ve ever wanted, and you threw it away like it was nothing... like they threw me away. I waited years for my family to return, but they never did. Your father came back for you, begged for you to come home, but you killed him instead. Why? And if you want so desperately to abandon our bond, too, why bother saving me? Why not kill me like you killed him? I deserve to know the truth! Just tell me why!”

“Get out!” he roared. An unstable blade split the void between them, illuminating his face in a crimson glow. His pupils were blown, his eyes wild and unhinged. Her words had their desired effect – his resolve was faltering, he was as unstable as his weapon.
“Not until you tell me the truth!” she demanded. “Why, Ben!”

“No, you are in no position to dictate.”

“You wouldn’t hurt me,” she challenged, stepping toward him confidently, “and we both know you can’t hurt me, not through the bond.”

His conflicting emotions flickered through eyes. “Would you bet your life on that?” he sneered, as she took another hesitant step toward him. He rolled the hilt in his wrist, emphasizing the physical barrier between them.

Rey noticed him track the tears down her face. He still cared, enough not to kill her, at least. “You would risk your life to save mine, just to kill me like this?”

“And you would rather die than leave?” he said through clenched teeth. “I’m evil. I am your enemy, a monster, a murderer... what else, Rey? I killed Han Solo, nearly killed FN-2187, destroyed countless villages like Tuanul and Concordia, massacred the entire Hosnian system. I am... Kylo Ren, the Supreme Leader of the First Order. What other legitimate reasons do you need to hate me? I’m nothing to you, remember? I am a threat to you and the Resistance. Stop fighting for the sake of fighting. I don’t want to turn. Just let it go.”

She shook her head defiantly. “Ben... please don’t. This is greater than you and me. The Force wants us to be bonded. What if the Force destined us to save the galaxy together?”

“The Force was wrong.”

“Think about what this bond means,” she pleaded.

His eyes grew cold and empty at her words.

“No, you think about it,” he snapped. “Think about what this truly is. What you thought you saw in that vision was not real; you won’t join me, and you can’t turn me. This bond was created and manipulated by Snoke to lure you into a trap for the map to Luke Skywalker. We were both fools and played directly into his hand. We have only ever been enemies, and that is all we will ever be. Think about the connections we’ve had over the bond. Aside from that night in the hut, every moment has been spent arguing or trying to kill each other. All you have ever done is fight me.
You have made your hatred for me crystal clear. Do I need to remind you?

“The first bond in the hut, you tried to shoot me. I shouldn’t have been surprised, since that was the first thing you did when we met and the third time you tried. The second connection in the rain you called me a ‘murderous snake’ and a ‘monster.’ The third, after my training session, you called me a liar after I told you what my uncle did to me. You could barely stand to look at me. The vision in the hut was a lie, but you saw my weakness for you, didn’t you? You figured out your use for me, and you came to turn me. But you didn’t expect that I wouldn’t be fooled by your desire to turn me to save your friends, so you betrayed me and left me for dead after I begged for you to stay with me. Our fifth connection on Crait, I tried to destroy the entire Resistance, and you shut me out.

“Our sixth connection, you stared at me like you hated that we were still bonded. Our seventh, I watched you and Luke attempt to breach my consciousness for secrets. Our eighth, you ignored me. Our ninth, you expressed your desire to be free of me. Our tenth, on the Command Bridge, I told you I would destroy you and your friends, and you called me a ‘traitor’ when you realized I had no light left in me. In the eleventh connection, in your room, you told me, and I quote, ‘I will free the galaxy of a monster, and they will thank me, because everyone hates you! The galaxy hates you! Your mother hates you! I hate you!’ That was after throwing droid parts at me and trying to kill me with my own lightsaber.”

“Ben, stop; that’s enough...”

“No, you wanted this conversation, then listen. The twelfth connection, you watched me execute those prisoners. The thirteenth, you were angry with me because you showed up in my room, in my bed, and I had the audacity to be in the same room as you. I tried to sever the connection and failed. The fourteenth was the visions, and if yours was anything like mine, you know why we need to end this bond. The fifteenth, my favorite. Kamino. I was going to end all of this, but you stopped me. You looked at me in ways I wish you never had. It still plagues me. But you wanted to keep me alive so you could use me. Didn't you? Isn’t that the reason you saved me in our sixteenth connection? Because the next time you saw me, the seventeenth connection, was just after Concordia. It was back to fighting again. Then in the eighteenth connection, you kissed the pilot, then claimed I tortured you with the bond. You told me I ruined everything and reminded me that you would never join me. You said I was evil, a monster, a murderer, a liar, and weak with lust for power. You said I was nothing to you, you could never love someone like me. You said you hated me. You hoped the Silencer would explode with me in it. Which it almost did, by the way. Did I miss anything?”

“Ben, please..”

“The nineteenth... I'm not going to pretend to know what that was. You cried on my shoulder, and, maybe, for a moment, you forgot who I was. Again, I was foolish enough to think maybe it would change. The twentieth you stayed asleep the entire time, but it still tortured me, because, for once, you looked peaceful. The twenty-first connection, in the forest, I trusted you with my weapon, but you couldn’t find a moment to swallow your animosity for me enough to thank me. In the twenty-second bond, you were angry with me for knowing where the Resistance was. Then in the twenty-third connection, you proved you didn’t trust me when you accused me of conspiring to hurt your friends when I tried to help you. You wouldn’t trust me even as I committed treason for you. You still believed I would lie to you. Then you tried to use yourself as a bargaining credit as if I wanted you as my prisoner. I only ever wanted you by my side! I wanted you as my equal! But then your attitude changed the second you realized I could help you, because me placing you above the First Order despite the consequences is expected now, isn’t it? I told you I wouldn’t let you use me anymore, and I told you I never wanted to see you again.”

“Ben, I didn’t…”

“Yet, in the twenty-fourth connection, you called out to me, begged me to help you. The pilot discovered our bond, something I warned you would happen. Our bond puts your life at risk, the next time you may not be so lucky. And now, here we are, the twenty-fifth connection. It is an endless cycle of you showing kindness in an effort to use me and reacting violently when I do not obey. And now you want to save this? After everything that has happened, endless connections filled with your spiteful words and your desire for my death. Now this matters to you? You could be killed for being seen with me, and every second we are together is a fight. What part of this is worth saving? I have tried taking your anger in stride, reasoning with you, yelling back… none of it works. There will always be a push and pull between us, like my parents, and I refuse to live my life like them. We’ve found the way to separate the bond, now you can go back to your side of the galaxy, and I can stay on mine, until our paths collide again. You’ll have your chance to kill me soon enough.” Her chest ached as if each word was a weapon, piercing into her heart.

“I wouldn’t kill you, I care –”

“Liar, you don’t care!” he shouted, but the anger was gone. His weapon was no longer in a defensive posture; his hand held it loosely at his side, all but abandoned in his unforgiving diatribe.
His cold demeanor had disappeared to reveal the broken man suffering underneath. “You want to save me so you can save your friends. That is all I am to you!”

Rey stepped toward him, but he backed away. This is it, she realized. Ben truly hates me, and it’s all my fault. She had been too angry, too scared, too weak against the pull of the darkness, to see how much the bond meant to her. There had never been a moment when she considered that he would walk away. He was still wrong, but now she realized, so was she. Just because he aligned himself with an evil organization didn’t mean he deserved to be treated the way she had treated him in her darkness, not when she cared for him as she did. He was an enemy of the Resistance, but not to her. “I do want to save you Ben, but that’s why I care.”

He shook his head, staring down at his lightsaber. “You can’t save me.”
Rey was losing him, and she was helpless to stop it. There was something uniquely terrifying at not having control over a shared destiny. It was impossible for her to consider the consequences of destroying the bond as she argued with him, but the Force inside her seemed to understand. It was screaming in warning, clawing at her chest as if it intended to reach across the growing divide between them itself. This was beyond the Force, however, beyond hope. This was her worst fear realized, this was what his family had felt as they lost him. “You told me I’d never be alone.”

“So did you! But you made your choice, you left me, Rey, and now I’m doing what we should have done after Crait.”

“You can look me in the eyes right now and tell me you want to end our bond?” she whispered through tears. He disengaged his weapon and held her gaze.

“Yes,” he said, his eyes tearing in earnest. There was a growing pit of despair inside her like a poison eating away at her. She feared when it was done, there would be nothing recognizable of her left.

“You never want to see me again? You truly don’t care?” she choked.

“Will you leave the Resistance?” he asked quietly, knowing the answer. This wasn’t how it was supposed to go. She was supposed to be demanding ultimatums, she was supposed to ask him to leave the First Order. She shook her head through tears. “Goodbye, Rey.” He moved past her down the corridor.

“Ben, please. I saw our future when we touched hands, I came to bring you home, but you broke my heart. I was angry and cruel, but I thought you deserved every bit of it for not choosing me! Yet through all of it, you never gave up on me! Why? I was beginning to think that maybe you wouldn’t leave me, then maybe you would stay... I believed you wouldn't abandon me as they did. I am a fool. You're no different, are you? I've only ever been your enemy. I truly am alone.”

_This bond between us would have never worked, because you would have always pushed me away. You were too scared of getting hurt again not to, but I can’t kill the past for you_, his voice whispered across the connection. He paused, his entire body rigid and trembling. She waited for the outburst that never came. “Goodbye, Rey,” he repeated, though his voice was barely a whisper. He refused to face her, and the darkness ignited her blood with rage. She summoned the book of Force bonds that he had gifted her from the direction of her bed.
“I let you in! I let you in! I have never let anyone in. Not like this! You want to betray me and our bond, fine! Take this back!” she screamed, throwing the book at him, which skidded to a stop between his boots. “You'll need it so you can run from our bond like you've run from everything else. You're a coward. But you want another enemy, Kylo? Fine. You won't have a friend in this entire galaxy. If you walk away, I hope you remember what I did to you the last time we were enemies!” The rage rolled off her in waves. If she had a working lightsaber, she would have challenged him to a duel right there.

Kylo paused for a moment as he collected the book. She expected him to leave without another glance, but he pivoted slowly, a strange look on his face. His glossy eyes widened, his lips parted to allow passage of his stuttered breath. Was it surprise? Horror? Grim realization? But she couldn't mistake the pained expression transforming his face as he turned back. He walked further down the corridor, leaving her in a mix of fury and despair. When he was almost out of sight, he suddenly pivoted and drove the book into the wall, roaring in a tortured agony. The Force chose that moment to take pity on them both and snapped them apart again.
Chapter End Notes

Mild Violence

Kylo slams a book into a wall
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“If you walk away, I hope you remember what I did to you the last time we were enemies!”

As Kylo bent to collect the book that had slid between his boots, he was reminded of a memory from a lifetime ago; a pair of golden dice sliding between his retreating father’s boots.

If you leave, you’re dead to me! He had screams.

Kylo glanced back at Rey, remorse shattering his resolve. I’m no better than him... He turned with the fear that history was repeating itself, fearing the heartbreak he would see in her eyes that mirrored the heartbreak that was tearing his chest apart. But there was no heartbreak in her eyes, only darkness. She hates me. The realization cut him deeper than he thought possible, but it steeled his resolve. He convinced himself it was for the best. So he shut his eyes and forced himself to move forward. He left her behind.

I believed you wouldn’t abandon me as they did. I am a fool. You’re no different, are you?

Her words echoed relentlessly in his mind as he remembered his own furious shouts toward the man that abandoned him.

Turn around! At least look me in the eyes when you admit that all I am is a burden to you. You don’t want me! You are abandoning me with someone I barely know!

Before he considered the consequences, he was pivoting, his arm crossing his body as he propelled the book he had given her – the book she had carelessly discarded as he had done to her – into the nearest wall. The pages fell apart around him as he leaned his forehead against the cool durasteel, his dark bangs falling over his eyes. What have I done?

She has the Resistance. She will be fine. He imagined it; she would concentrate her efforts on training, on becoming the fierce warrior they both knew she could be. One day, she’d meet him on a skywalk, or a cliff, or a barren desert. She would kill him as he had killed his father. She would have her family, she would find someone she didn’t hate, and she would be happy. He was doing her a favor. He was doing himself a favor.

She is systematically destroying me piece by piece, and I let her do it. I’ve tried everything to have her accept me for who I am. The only thing left is to shut her out and be the enemy she needs me to be. It’s for the best. He could do this. It was nothing he couldn’t survive. The churning in his stomach and tightness in his chest were all too familiar. He’d had enough practice; he could do this. The ache was just loneliness. He knew loneliness. He could survive loneliness.

This pain. This was why he never allowed anyone close. This was why it was easier to be alone. As he pressed himself off the wall, he had half a mind to leave the destruction in his wake. He didn't much care for possessions. But that book symbolized the only good thing he'd had in his life. He couldn't bear to lose both the last and only reminder of her and his reason for letting her go. Collapsing to the floor in an action that was not becoming of the Supreme Leader, he hastily collected all the detached pages.

By the time he was done, his resolution and anger had ebbed. He walked in a daze, focusing on each step forward, refusing to allow his mind to contemplate the truth of what he had done. The corridors blended together, the lights blurring into a numbing haze, and the sound of his boots echoing off the wall consumed his senses. He followed his feet absently until they led him to his chamber door. It opened for him, and as he walked through, he didn’t focus on how empty it felt.
Loneliness at the Resistance

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
For three days Rey tried her best to keep herself busy. The Resistance had plenty of equipment salvaged from the old base that required rewiring; she could throw herself into work — into surviving — as she had always done. The others, however, complicated her plans. They looked at her as if she were a lothcat in a herd of nerf. Their whispers of mistrust followed her down the corridors. Before, they had seen her powers as a gift, but now she began to understand Kylo’s warning.

Stop thinking about him.

No matter what she did, her thoughts would wander back to him. Everything reminded her of him: the vial, the flower, the scar, the ship, the other members, the broken lightsaber, the Jedi texts, the droid parts, the blaster, the bed where he had sat, the bootprints on the dusty stone where he had stood, the corridor where he had lain dying, the room where she had accused him of bringing the First Order to Barkhesh, the temple, the steps, the stars, the jungle, the dark place for him in her mind, the echo of his voice in her dreams. There was a lake she dreamt of every night and she could feel his energy there. It was tormenting.

On day two, Finn asked her if she had killed Kylo. He had asked her with a smile, clearly anticipating from her pensive silence that something must have happened. His happiness as she struggled to come to terms with her loss only deepened her misery. No one understood, not even Kylo. Withholding tears, she told Finn that the bond had been destroyed. He didn’t question her further, though his smile faded, and he continued to glance at her with concern throughout dinner. There seemed to be a question behind his eyes whenever she glanced back, but he didn’t dare speak it. Rose looked between Finn and her with concern, but she held her tongue as well. After the base, what was there to say? They didn’t trust her. That was why they looked at her like any moment she might crumble or explode, why they whispered when they thought she wasn’t looking, why they didn’t say a word to her other than superficial drivel.

She hated it.

She hated avoiding Leia as well, but what could she say to her? Kylo was gone, forever lost to darkness. She had failed to realize how important saving him had become to her until the Force stole him away across the galaxy. He was by far the most antagonizing man in the galaxy and lived in opposition to everything she fought for, but the thought that he would willingly leave had never crossed her mind. The darkness had convinced her of a great many untruths. Being inside the temple with the others only furthered her misery, so she took off into the jungle. No one would care that she was gone anyway.
There was something freeing about being on her own again. Physical training was exhausting and mind-numbing. She practiced forms with her staff, climbed trees, jumped the expanse between cliffs, and ran until she couldn’t breathe. It reminded her of being back on Jakku. The familiarity of it was comforting.

There was no one to disappoint, no one watching her for the slightest misstep, no one deciding for her who she was supposed to be. She didn’t have to hide the darkness that surrounded her energy like a storm cloud. She loved her friends, but she couldn’t stand the look of concern or fear in their eyes anymore.

There were monsters hiding in the jungle, she knew there were, but she was not disquieted by their presence. Monsters would never fear her, would never be disappointed by what she was. She knew where she stood with monsters, she knew what they wanted from her, and that unambiguous danger was comforting. Certainly, it was simpler in the jungle, where friend was friend, and foe was foe. She almost felt at home there.

When she had nearly collapsed in fatigue from her intensive training, she walked the paths she had scrambled over only a few short days before. She crossed a stream with white, glittering rocks, the water soaking into her boots and tingling on her skin. She passed the stack of rocks she had made into a makeshift grave for both the Jugalor and bat, the hunter and the hunted entombed together in death. She crossed the clearing with the vines where the plant had ensnared her ankle in their trap. The severed, thorny shoots still lay dead and shriveled on the forest floor.

She reached a split in the path and followed the more overgrown trail to the largest flowers she had ever seen. Her eyes wandered up the six- to ten-meter stalks along the path to the beautiful marbled petals from giant blooms that were larger than the inside of her AT-AT. Reds and oranges, purples and yellows, blues and pinks swirled together in beautiful displays. She ran her fingers along the long seeds of domed, shimmering plants that reminded her of stars and watched the seeds take flight and glisten against the bright turquoise sky in a kaleidoscope of colors. The wind swept through her hair, and she breathed in the smell of the damp red soil and the sweet scent of the most dangerous crimson blooms. A young Borgle bat weaved through branches in the canopy, screeching as it was lost in the darkness of the shadows cast by the trees, and Rey smiled.

It was a beautiful distraction, until the sound of the jungle disappeared. She felt the tell-tale signs of another connection. His energy grew in her mind, the bond grew taut between them, she knew a connection was imminent. “Ben?” She spun where she stood, searching for him. There was a sharp snap in her mind, and the sounds of the jungle returned. It had happened at least once an hour, day and night, since he had shut her out. There was no sign that the bond was dying as he suggested. Every time she felt the snap of him shutting the door, a different emotion emerged.
First, it was disbelief, that he truly didn’t want to see her ever again. When the bond snapped shut, that was his choice. The man had wanted to die because of his loneliness at the First Order; was she worse than that? Then, it was something like sorrow that it was over; she had failed him, failed his mother, failed the Resistance. Then it was anger; how dare he shut her out of the bond, he wasn’t innocent in any of this, he was the mass-murdering leader of an evil organization. This time, it had been hope, again. After such a beautiful moment in the forest, she ignorantly believed that he had come back. She had lain awake at night, imagining the words she would say to him again. They weren’t all kind, but they needed to be said. Now that she’d had the time to think about it all, she wanted the chance to say them.

Guided by her feet, Rey stumbled upon the ruins of the old base. It seemed different without the stormtroopers and the entirety of the Resistance taking cover inside it. She could almost feel the vibrations of the explosions, could almost smell the smoke and dedlandite, could almost hear the blasterfire and screams, as if the sensations had been forever imprinted upon the Force there. She didn’t know what she was looking for until she found the remains of an orange and white astromech.

She had lost her parents, had lost Han, had lost Luke, had lost Kylo to darkness, but perhaps not everything had to stay gone. With tears of determination blurring her vision, she began painstakingly gathering each wire and bolt from the debris. Controlling the darkness and moving on from a complicated bond; those were things she could not achieve yet. But Rey knew what she was good at, she could fix Beebee-Ate. Not only for herself, but for Poe and the Resistance, whom she failed with her treachery. The bond was gone; she could earn their trust again. What Kylo did; it was for the best. The ache behind her ribs would fade. At least, that is what she convinced herself.

Rey was surprised when a hand grasped the same piece of charred metal she had reached for in the rubble. She startled, before pivoting to see the apologetic grin of her best friend. “What are you doing here?” she asked, and she knew it sounded harsher than she intended, but he took it in stride.

“I’m sorry, Rey,” he said, his eyes looking more tired and red-rimmed than she had remembered them being when she left. “I should have trusted you. And I shouldn’t have given you space the last few days, not when I knew you needed me.”

“I’m sorry, too.” Her lip pulled up into a wan smile. “I shouldn’t have put the Resistance at risk.”

Finn’s eyes glanced down at the droid parts in her hands. “I know you spent most of your life doing things alone, but you know you don’t have to do that here, right? I’m here for you, no matter what.” His smile transformed into something more consoling. In that moment, she was reminded that he was not only a champion of the Resistance and enemy to her bondmate. In the turmoil of being pulled in two different directions, she had forgotten just who he was to her.
Rey said the only thing that was meaningful enough in that moment; nothing. Instead, she wrapped her arms around her friend, and he held her against him. He was not just another person she cared for whom she needed to protect from the First Order. He was the first person to ever care for her; he was the first person to come back for her. She didn’t have to endure this by herself.

You are not alone, echoed in her mind. Kylo may have left her, but she wasn’t alone, not with Finn by her side. He may not have understood her like Kylo had, he may not have sympathized with the despair she buried deep from the loss of Kylo and their bond, but he would support her.

“I want to be here for you too,” a voice said over her shoulder. Rose. “If you want me to be.” Rey opened one of her arms in invitation, and Rose joined their embrace. “We can start off by helping you rebuild Beebee-ate.”

“Together?” Rey asked through tears.

“Together,” Finn assured her.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
The officer was speaking to him. He couldn’t remember the man’s name, nor did he care. Behind the mask, Kylo could see the officer turn to him apprehensively, his body tilting away from him as if he were a rabid beast on a short chain. It was evident he expected an answer.

What are they going on about?

Was it the planets they were mining for precious resources? Unlikely. They never cared to ask his opinions on that before. Was it another Outer Rim rebellion? Improbable. He hadn’t argued with Hux through holomessage over the negotiations. Another mass-murdering weapon? Doubtful. He had already ended Hux’s hopes of another Starkiller. From the pinched look on Hux’s face, it was something he had done… or not done… or done in a method that differed from the general’s own master plan. Speaking of the general, he had turned to face him as well.

“What Supreme Leader, would you care to respond?” The frustration was plainly evident underneath his saccharine tone.

Kylo stared at him in silence. He wouldn’t be the one to tell Hux he wasn’t listening because of his perpetual focus on life without her. It was almost laughable; he had existed his entire life without her. As it turned out, however, it was far easier to miss something when he didn’t know he was missing it.

Hux’s jaw clenched tightly as he prompted the Supreme Leader again. “To the concerns of lifting your sanctions on Kessel?”

“I thought I made myself clear,” Kylo sighed, drumming his fingers on the table. “The First Order does not support slavery or the spice trade.”

He knew there would be a considerable blow-back from his sanctions, but it was necessary. The corruption on Kessel was the reason the Republic had failed the galaxy. The Republic had allowed Wookiees and other sentients to be enslaved and used for the spice industry. Their life expectancy in the mines was an average of six months to two years for a race that lived hundreds of years. Millions suffered and died in those mines, and on other worlds throughout the galaxy, but somehow he was the monster for desiring to overthrow the Republic.

They would never have allowed those sanctions, because the politicians made their money from the spice trade. The spice trade created chaos, not order; unless the masses becoming indolent parasites incapable of demanding change or rising up against the corruption of the Republic was their definition of order. Follow the money, his mother had told him. How right she had been. If only she had realized that the Republic was not the answer to affecting change.

“With all due respect, my lord,” Hux said, tugging at his collar with impatience. “Kessel is a valuable ally.” Hux evidently believe Kylo would bend on the issue, which was presumptuous, considering their volatile relationship. Kylo would sign off on weapons and aggressive negotiation tactics, but not this.

“Was,” Kylo corrected imperiously.

The general’s face pinched in irritation. “Excuse me?”

“Was,” Kylo repeated, “Kessel was a valuable ally. They will likely cease all funding following the sanctions.”

“Supreme Leader, you can’t –”

“I can, because I am the Supreme Leader.” Growing tired of watching the red-headed man sputter in indignation, Kylo stood from the table and turned toward the door.

“Supreme Leader!” Hux shouted after him.

“Excuse me,” the general said politely to the other officers in the room before Kylo heard the clacking of the man’s boots as he stormed after him. “Supreme Leader!”

Kylo did his best to maintain a pace that exuded authority rather than escape. “General?”

“That is the third meeting you’ve walked out of in as many days! You can’t –”

Kylo clenched his jaw to temper his anger. The fool deigned to test his patience again by forcing him to repeat himself. It was a simple concept to understand; he could do whatever he damn well wanted, because he was the Supreme Leader. Everything in him wanted to stop and choke the vermin so he wouldn’t have to hear another syllable from his irritating voice. Unfortunately, he had a job to do. “Do not presume to dictate what I can and cannot do, General. I have other duties required of me.”

Hux clearly had no self-preservation instincts. “And how do you suggest you perform your supreme duties when you’ve spent days holed up in your chambers?”

“My apologies,’ Kylo replied. “I presumed you were aware of these extraordinarily convenient new inventions called the holopad and comlink for such occasions when I was otherwise unreachable.”

“Unreachable?” Hux huffed mirthlessly. “You’re not tied up with on-world negotiations – a responsibility you have now delegated to me after that incident with the Quarren on Mon Cala. You sit in your quarters with a BB unit, that is not how the Supr –”

“Likewise, do not presume to dictate how I should delegate responsibilities or allocate my time.” His voice was weary even behind the mask. “Know your place.” All of it was true, of course. He had delegated the duty of negotiations to Hux. He knew the general’s philosophy behind galactic domination differed from his own, but he couldn’t find it in himself to care anymore. His former master had never attended meetings; he told them what to do, and they listened. It wasn’t his absence that bothered the general, it was their difference of opinion when he did attend.

By the sound of the tut behind him, Hux was affronted by his statement. It wasn’t enough, unfortunately, for the man to stop following him. “I know my place and presume to intervene when it affects the functionality of the First Order.”

This was ground Kylo was confident enough to battle on. “Tell me, General,” he said evenly, “which part of the Order is not functioning?”

“There are rebellions –”

“There will always be rebellions.”

“Well,” Hux huffed. “What do you presume to do about them, Supreme Leader?”

Kylo smirked behind the mask. “You question my ability to perform my duties, but I thought it was you whose responsibility it was to attend on-world negotiations.”
The general stopped, and Kylo felt victory pump through his veins. Foolish child, he could imagine his former master castigating his behavior. It was beneath him to argue with the weak-willed, but he found gratification behind it, nonetheless.

Whether he liked it or not, he needed Hux, or he would lose the support of his army. That didn’t stop him from riling up the man as often as he could afford. If Kylo was patient, there would come a time when the general was no longer useful. When it arose, Kylo would take great pleasure in eliminating him. For the time being, the general needed to be reminded where his place was. Presently, Hux’s place was behind him as the distance between them grew. Kylo was nearly free.

Then all at once, he could feel the prickling over his skin, the tightness at the base of his skull, the sound fading from the destroyer. He stopped and closed his eyes. The sounds and smells of a distant forest invaded his senses. Without hesitation, he found the place in his mind where the bond still connected him to Rey, and he severed the connection. The sound returned, but his stomach was in knots. He hadn’t been thinking of her this time, which only made the alternative worse to consider. Why would she care? Still, he found himself biting back tears, never more grateful for the mask than at that moment. Why hadn’t it gotten any easier? Why wasn’t the bond disappearing?

“Supreme Leader, are you well?” To say Hux’s question arose from concern was to say that a Krayt Dragon watching a wounded Bantha arose from concern. Even the look in his eyes was predatorial.

Kylo turned to stare at the man. What could he say? His insides were fractured and falling apart piece by piece. He felt as if death had already taken him but left his soul behind in this useless body. He couldn’t decide whether he wanted to find the weapon that destroyed the entirety of Malachor and reproduce it on a galactic scale, or whether he wanted to find a machine to alter time and kill his grandfather before he ever left Tatooine. Both seemed beneficial to the greater good in the long run, because he would no longer have to live in a galaxy where their fates were intertwined.

“Supreme Leader?” Hux cleared his throat, stepping closer, waiting for an answer until he realized it would never come. “Are you well?”

Kylo wanted to rip his helmet off and throw it at the general. He wanted to scream until he couldn’t breathe. He wanted to run until his legs gave out, fight until his he couldn’t lift his weapon, destroy everything the Force could touch until the entire galaxy was consumed by his wrath. But he wasn’t “well.” He was tired of all of it. He just wanted it to end, and there was no end in sight. “You won’t be if you continue to irritate me with these questions.”
Hux did not follow as Kylo gathered energy from the Force to storm away. His boots guided him down the corridors back to his quarters. The other officers and troopers avoided him at all cost, diverting their eyes and choosing alternate routes. He used to enjoy how the others had cowered from him, but not anymore. You fear me, knowing nothing about me, other than what anyone has ever seen in me. They would never know him; he would never allow anyone in again. It only ended in pain. It was easier to crave power than to crave people; power never lied, power never betrayed, power never used him.

The door opened to his chambers, but there was no reprieve. Blue began his line of questioning again. The droid chirped brightly, asking him how the meeting went. He was always so interested in what Kylo did as if it weren’t… “Pointless,” he answered. “I don’t remember what it was about.” He moved to the wardrobe to begin peeling away the layers of the Supreme Leader.

Blue chirped again, asking his favorite question. Why? Better question, why does it matter? Kylo pressed the release on his helmet. It irritated him that the servomotors no longer hissed and sparked. He tossed the mask onto the table, watching it upset the other objects.

“Because I wasn’t listening.”

Another beep. It was a reasonable question. Why bother attending the meeting? The agitation boiled under his skin, but he knew it wasn’t directed at the droid. He removed his gloves one by one, refusing to allow his mind to wander to when he had removed them before.

“Because I have to go.”

Another response from the droid. Why? He swallowed his first reaction, tempering his tone.

“Because I’m the Supreme Leader.”

Kylo should have expected the droid would repeat himself. Why? It was a simple question; the answer shouldn’t have been complicated, but it was. Explaining complicated concepts to a droid with the mentality of a child challenged his views on topics he wasn’t prepared to contemplate, but he never failed to answer the droid’s questions. This time, he couldn’t find it in him to give Blue an adequate answer. Why am I Supreme Leader? Because I… His fingers began on his cloak, removing it with more force than necessary. Because I am. It didn’t matter why anymore. He was what he was, and there was no going back. He slumped down into the chair at his desk.
“Because I chose to be,” he said. “I wanted to be Supreme Leader, Blue.”

The droid, however, was not satisfied with his answer. Kylo had barely begun on his first boot when Blue repeated the question.

Why had he wanted to become Supreme Leader? He’d never planned to kill the creature he believed to be Snoke until… until he was forced to choose. He’d never considered taking the throne until he looked upon his master’s fallen corpse. At the time, he was certain of his reasoning; he believed he knew how the Supreme Leader should rule, and he could do better to create order in the galaxy. He had believed he could make a difference, but his motives and desires had shifted. What he was doing – it all seemed…pointless. Even if he succeeded in creating the New Order he had imagined, it meant nothing. The droid had prevailed in encouraging him to accept that truth, but he still couldn’t understand why. It should have been everything he wanted. It had been.

“I wanted to change the galaxy,” he whispered.

A message pinged on his datapad, distracting him from his reverie. It was another encrypted message from outside the Order. He knew there was no one else it could be. Kylo had been expecting the message, even if he pretended that he needed time to decide whether to open it. He didn’t; he had already prepared the holomaps traced with the navigational routes, after all. He just couldn’t bring himself to open it, because it was one step closer to the end.

The message was brief, one question: Shall I take this as your admission of the truth? The words only served to twist the dagger deeper into the aching wound left behind in her absence. He forced himself to reply, choosing his words carefully in the chance that the eyes of the First Order were watching.

Take it however you want it to be. Seventy-two hours is all I can promise. You know my conditions.

Attaching the maps to the message, he made his choice. As he stared at the receipt of its delivery, he exhaled slowly. It was almost over. He deleted the message, as if its significance would dissipate with it, and stood from the desk. He set the boots in their place, righted the helmet and reorganized the table that had become the latest victim of his agitation. When he was finished, he turned, staring out the viewport.

It was an old habit – staring out at the stars, searching for people who would never come back to him. He couldn’t help searching for the Seitia Sector. The droid softly whirred a question behind him. Blue shared a propensity with… his former bondmate to ask the most upending questions when he was at his most vulnerable. With his family or the First Order, he could manipulate the conversation to his will; with Blue and her, he could never gain his footing. This question was no different.

Blue caught him staring out the viewports on one of their nightly walks around the ship – the only occasion Kylo would voluntarily leave his chambers – and the droid asked him why he did that. He had explained to that droid what he had never told another soul other than two ghosts from a temple he refused to name. Staring up at the stars was how he had occupied his time on those long nights, waiting for his family. The past was easy to tell the droid, because he never judged nor pitied him for it.

What Blue had done instead, however, was much more destabilizing. He had asked what Kylo was still waiting for, what he was missing? He asked his questions as if there were easy answers. Who was he missing? Someone he shouldn’t. In his weakness, he had told the droid about Rey. It made this moment as he stood before the viewport, staring off at the Seitia Sector, more tormenting. The droid had repeated the question he had asked numerous times since he had shut out the bond. Was he missing her? The droid’s questions were always disarmingly simple; merely an attempt to understand the complexities of the human mind. The answers never were.

Did he miss her? It doesn’t matter. What did matter was he should have been thriving without her constant interference. What he couldn’t comprehend was why he had lost all desire to rule once she was gone. The pain inside was growing worse. How could nothing from the bond be worse than her hatred? It was for the best, what he had done; they were better off without the bond. Still, he found himself responding.

“Yes.”
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 650,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
The Finalizer had definite day and night cycles. While the destroyer traversed the darkness of space, it was the only way to differentiate one day from the next. The third shift had reduced personnel tasked to operate on dimmed lighting and “comm-silence” protocol, but if Kylo had been a stormtrooper, it would have been the shift he preferred. The night cycle made it easier to blend into the shadows. The corridors were empty, the Force was quieter, and most of the other officers were asleep, which meant there was no one to bother him. It should have been easy to count the passing days when he wandered the corridors at night, but they all blended together, like ink on parchment in the rain. He couldn’t remember the last time he slept. He couldn’t remember whether it was a week or a month since he’d shut out the bond. The scratches in the wall continued to grow, but not by his own efforts. When he had given up, Blue had continued the ritual in his stead.
Kylo wasn’t certain if it was the lack of sleep or avoiding any sentient being with a pulse, but something in him had changed. He didn’t feel anything anymore. It should have given the peace he had always craved, but he just felt… hollow. Lifeless.

Blue loyally rolled by his side as they walked back from yet another trip to the archives. He should have felt something; a plan was starting to formulate in the chaotic thoughts in his head. Stopping Sidious had become his life’s mission, and the latest research had finally guided him in the right direction. He longed to feel victory surge through him, to feel the power and strength it delivered to him, to feel anything. Blue had been excited enough for the both of them, and he decided that would have to do. The droid chirped joyfully as they walked, and Kylo considered his next step. He decided that he would attend the meeting with Hux at five hundred hours to maintain appearances. It was more important than ever that he kept his general close while he followed through with his plan.

It was then that the Force rolled through him. There was a familiar twist in his stomach as he recognized the forewarning to an imminent connection. He closed his eyes to locate the bond and sever it, but he was distracted as sound traveled down the connection. His breath hitched as he heard her voice. No, not just her voice, her laugh. His eyes popped open and he saw her.

“No!” she laughed, pointing at something. When he concentrated enough the destroyer faded away to her temple room. She was kneeling next to another woman as they both worked companionably to assemble a partially-constructed droid – a BB unit. She was pointing behind the traitor as he searched through tools on the floor. “No… no… no… the red one… no… next to that one… no… next to that one… no!” Giggling, she continued to point as he lifted different tools to show her. It was exactly what Kylo knew would happen – she would be happier without their bond – but that didn’t stop the ache in his chest. She was laughing, she was smiling, she was happy.

He could pinpoint the second she noticed his presence. It was the second she froze, her smile dropped away, and she slowly turned toward him. Before he could witness the hatred in her eyes, he lowered his own and found the connection. With a practiced swiftness, he severed it. For several moments he stood in the center of the corridor, afraid to raise his eyes. When he did, only Blue was staring back at him. As a flood of something painful swept through him, Kylo took off toward his chambers. The droid beeped a string of questions, but he couldn’t answer. He couldn’t breathe. “Not now Blue, please,” he managed. He couldn’t remember the last time he felt anything, and he didn’t know what to do with what was boiling up inside him. He felt alive again; alive, he knew, because it felt as if he were dying.

When the door to his quarters opened, his eyes flickered up to view the receiving hall of his antechambers. He stopped just inside, his feet refusing to carry him any further. His legs only held his weight with assistance from the Force. Blue whirred curiously, hesitating for a moment, before sensing Kylo’s desire to be alone. Without another sound, the droid continued further into his chambers.
He had only once sat upon the throne, when the bond had connected them again after Crait. There were days he would pause as he left his quarters, staring at the object that symbolized his title. He convinced himself the reason he refused to touch it was that it seemed too ostentatious, but he couldn't overlook the fear that spiked as he stared at the stone. He knew why; the turmoil he had felt when first taken his place on the throne, the wrongness of it, he feared what would happen if he felt it again.

The throne loomed in front of him, menacingly, mockingly. It had been everything he had wanted, but the very sight of it agitated him. Still, he found he was inexplicably drawn to it, his feet unable to obey his commands until he came to rest in front of it. He noticed the carmine hue reflecting off the translucent surface of the Wayland Marble. It was only then he realized he had ignited his lightsaber.

His fingers tightened around the hilt as he studied the carved stone that symbolized every sacrifice he had made in the name of revenge. It was insignificant, hollow, and meaningless. Like his mask, once a symbol of his destiny, it tormented and taunted him. He stared at the throne with renewed volatility tensing through him, images of Rey’s face and laughter, his father, his mother, the other Jedi students flashing through his mind. His pulse stuttered as the familiar fire surged through his veins. He knew the fuse had been lit; there would be only one way to satisfy the dark hunger. Apoplectic, his eyes glazed over, darkness dug its claws in deep.

And then he snapped.

The crimson blade crackled and sparked as it slashed into the object representing his torment. The plasma burned through the stone, leaving nothing but mangled destruction in its wake. Kylo’s hands were calculated and precise, led purely by instinct and training. The glowing pieces of the throne became an orange blur as he rampaged through the broken room. The sound of his writhing pulse consumed his senses, every beat a torturous reminder of the suffering he had condemned others to and been condemned to. He hadn’t realized that he was screaming until his throat burned like the molten remnants of what once was the receiving hall.

He stood in the center of the chaos, shoulders slumped, his lightsaber grasped loosely at his side. With his chest surging with adrenaline, his eyes surveyed the wreckage of the room as the hurricane of emotions inside him – momentarily tempered by the physical exertion – now returned in full force. His muscles trembled with the desire... hunger... demand... for more destruction. Rey’s heartbroken, tear-streaked face when he had destroyed the bond and her – equally agonizing – laughing, smiling face when they were last connected, flashed through his mind. That was enough to reignite the fire inside him.

Remorse, sorrow, and despair tore at his resolve, corrupting the Force around him. Had another Force-sensitive been in his vicinity, they would have found themselves drowning in the heaviness of the energy around him, his emotions spiraling wildly and out-of-control into the Force. The more desperate he became to fetter them, the more powerful they became. The spiraling emotions created a whirlwind of Force, whipping violently around the room. His self-loathing flashed like a spark, and fire exploded from his fingertips. In an instant, the whirlwind around him had ignited into an inferno.

“This is new,” he whispered, the words drowned by the raging fire blasting around him.

Fire and embers licked the surfaces of the room as the blazing winds of the Force flared around him. Discipline and rationality had been suppressed by the passion of darkness, but somewhere deep inside was a scream, begging him to come to his senses, warning him of the danger of such destructive Forces on a pressurized ship with an oxygen-rich life support system.

No, it wasn’t a voice inside. The voice was echoing from behind him. He turned, volatile and unhinged as the Force seared through the room around him. There were flashing red beacons above him, alarms blaring in warning, personnel sprinting frantically down the corridors. Hux stood frozen in the door opening, his eyes wide in terror. A squad of stormtroopers guarded him, weapons trained on Kylo.

“Ren! Stop or they’ll be obligated to defend this destroyer!” Hux shouted over the fiery winds. Kylo was beyond reason, though, self-preservation the furthest thought from his mind. As were his mental defenses. The familiar energy in the Force was suffocated by the ravaging winds, the crackling that announced a new arrival coalesced into the surrounding flames. He was too distracted by his general’s presence to recognize the presence of any other.

“Ben, stop!” The words echoed from a memory he had long ago repressed. He turned away from his general, toward the shout emanating from inside the room. Rey. The anger burning in her eyes raged stronger than the fire rippling from his fingertips. Even in her anger, her light in the Force enveloped him. He was irritatingly aware of the inexplicable calm her mere presence rendered his volatile emotions. This time, he actively fought against it. This time, he didn’t want it.

He searched deep into the darkness for the strength he required, desperately craving to drive her away. The whirlwind intensified as it fed on the swelling darkness. To her credit, Rey did not flinch as the fire surrounded her as well. Her fierce stare remained fixed upon his. Before he realized her intentions, she was rifling through his thoughts. By the time he understood, it was too late.

“Fire at will,” the general said behind him.
Chapter End Notes

Mild violence

Kylo destroys a reception hall

Threat of violence

Hux threatens to shoot Kylo for destroying said reception hall
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
When the Force connected them during his fiery Force-outburst, Rey was still furious at him for abandoning their bond and continually shutting her out. Yes, she had doubted him, but he was their enemy; he had admitted to keeping vital secrets from her. He had given her no reason to trust him. He had chosen to become Supreme Leader rather than save her friends. What was she supposed to think? The truth was, he thought he could turn her. When she wouldn’t join him, he tried to kill her. When she wouldn’t accept him as the Supreme Leader, he shut her out. If he wanted to be evil, she shouldn’t care, even if part of her did. He had chosen his path. She did care, however, if he died. Not for herself, but for his mother.

Rey had never seen a fire-storm before, but she did understand the feeling of losing control. With ten blasters pointed at his head and an entire room reduced to embers by winds of fire, Kylo clearly had lost it, and she tried to help him the only way she knew how. Using the bond to learn how to sever his mind from consciousness, she intervened to prevent the wrath of his general. And she would have gone back to ignoring him if she hadn’t accidentally witnessed a memory in the chaotic seconds before he lost consciousness.

She hadn’t meant to access it; in her inexperience with the skill, she had pushed through his mind – through his memories – to sever the connection. In the darkest reaches, just before the last thread of consciousness, she found memories of uncountable deaths by his hand. She saw Snoke, she saw Han, and she saw her memory of her parents flying away on her ship.

Only, it wasn’t her memory; it was different. Just as she had seen in her nightmares, she heard herself scream as she watched the ship fly away. Her memory usually ended with her vision growing red. But this memory continued further than she remembered, as a bright white light exploded across her vision. When it died away, small pieces of the ship were falling to the ground like meteors. Young Rey was screaming, but this scream was different – this was a cry of mourning. Before the memory could finish, she had severed the final thread, and Kylo had collapsed in unconsciousness.

Rey, however, had not slept since.

To possess that complete memory, Kylo had either seen her parents’ death in his vision in the hut, or he’d been there. Either way, he had lied to her. Kylo had told her they were buried in the desert on Jakku. Why had he never told her that the ship exploded? That voice inside told her the answer to that question was of unimaginable consequence. Rey knew her bondmate; if he had purposefully omitted that detail, it was deliberate. The only question was, who or what was he protecting?
Pacing the corridors, she found the dark place in her mind that was their bond. And waited. She knew he was awakening, because she felt his energy strengthen in her mind. With a mental nudge against that energy, she was pulled back to the destruction of that receiving hall. When she appeared, he had barely pushed himself up from where he lay on the dais, his hands shackled in binders. She stood silent, watching him. She didn’t care what he did to the bond, as long as he waited until after she received her answers.

Before he could sever the connection, she spoke those five life-altering words: “What happened to my parents?” Instead of the anger and resentment she had felt in him when he severed their connections, she sensed an overwhelming fear flood the bond. It was all the confirmation she needed; he knew there was more to the strange memory. He was hiding something.

“Ben, you can shut me out, you can never speak to me again. But I’m not leaving until you tell me the truth,” she demanded, though she could feel an unease growing inside her. A little voice told her she didn’t want to know. She refused to listen; she had come this far, and he held the key. “I saw your memories. I saw their ship exploding. That's not what I remember.”

Part of her wondered if he would cruelly shut her out again, but he just stood there, staring at the floor. He chewed his lip anxiously before his eyes met hers. “I know.”

“Which memory is the truth? I don't understand.” She could feel his reluctance to answer her in the bond. Being apart had done nothing to weaken the strength of the bond, and she would have admitted to herself how comforting it was to feel it again – to feel him again – if her mind wasn’t solely focused on the past. There was a question she had wanted answered since she was a child; why hadn’t her parents returned to her? There was another question she had wanted answered since the throne room; if they had left on that ship, how had they ended up buried on Jakku? This was her chance to receive answers to both. If she had to fight him, so be it, but he wasn’t going anywhere.

He folded under her withering stare. “The truth is what I told you, Rey – what you admitted to yourself. They were nobody. They sold you for drinking money.”

Rey’s tone darkened as she sensed his fear grow. “No, that’s not enough.”

“I just saw flashes,” he insisted.” They came from off-world with you to a research facility in Tuanul that paid money for young Force-users. Your parents feared your Force powers, as my family had feared mine. They spent all their money to get you there, but the research facility didn’t want you, because you didn’t have enough darkness. They became junk traders to save up enough money to leave, but they got sucked into the Jakku lifestyle. Their scavenging pay wasn’t enough to support you and their drinking habits, so they incurred debts they could never repay. They were offered a way off that planet and forgiveness of their unpaid debts in exchange for their servitude aboard a ship for wealthy collectors, but they couldn’t take you with them. So they sold you for more drinking money and left you to rot in that hellhole. They're buried in the Jakku desert. I wasn't lying. But how do you think they ended up buried on Jakku if you saw them flying away on that ship? It exploded before it broke atmo, and the debris was buried in the sinking fields. That's the truth.”

“A pauper's grave?” she said, glaring in disappointment. He only stared back at her with something guarded in his eyes. “Show me what happened. I want to see everything you saw, then you’ll never have to see me again.”

“No,” he said resolutely, his stare returning to the floor. He moved for the blastdoor, but she blocked his exit.

“I will follow you anywhere you try to hide in this star destroyer, and you get to explain to them what ‘the girl’ from the Resistance is doing here!” she shouted. Kylo backed away instead, like a cornered animal. When she searched the bond, all she felt was his unwavering determination. It was one of the rare times that Kylo was completely devoid of conflict.

“No, Rey!” There was something else there. This wasn’t his anger stopping him, it was fear.

“Why? I already saw the explosion. I already know what happened.” But something in the Force immediately told her she was wrong. “Ben...” He shook his head defiantly, a sharp dread overwhelming the bond. Her stomach plummeted. “What haven't you told me?”

Kylo finally worked up the nerve to drag his stare back to hers. They were pleading. “Rey, please,” he swallowed his fear, but she could see him shaking. “I won't lie to you, but I can't do this. I promised myself I would never do this. You don't want this, just let the past die!”

“What are you afraid I'll find out?” He tried not to move, but she saw the panic flicker across his eyes. This was the path he didn’t want to explore. There was something he didn’t want her to discover, and it took her one guess to figure out what that something was. “Ben, how did the ship explode?”

He shook his head again, the dread intensifying. This was what he was hiding. “Don't make me do this, Rey.”

“Was it Snoke? The First Order?”
“No,” he said, squeezing his eyes shut as if it were that easy to rid himself of her. “I don't want to hurt you. Please.”

You know the truth. There is only one reason he would hide this from you, the voice in the Force reminded her.

He was the pleading, desperate Kylo of the throne room, but she found the answer in the darkness left behind by his treachery. He said he didn’t want to hurt her, as if she mattered to him at all. He had left her, shut her out, but now he was breaking her heart beyond repair. She bit back a sob.

“It was you.”

His eyes snapped open, glistening with unshed tears. His face twisted with misery. “What...”

Her voice wavered as she forced herself to give voice to the agonizing words that had found her in the cruel clarity of the darkness. “That is why a vision of my past was so important to you; that is why you hid it from me. It all makes sense now; you killed them”

“No,” he choked. His lip quivered as he sucked in an uneven breath. “Please, no.” He was desperate, but she wouldn’t listen to his lies anymore.

“You were there. You did this to me,” she whispered, closing her eyes so she wouldn’t have to see the face of the man who murdered her parents. Exhaling a shuddering breath, she allowed the darkness in to soothe her. She knew what it did to her, but she didn’t care.

“I didn't!” he yelled in frustration. “It was an accident.” With those words, the cold darkness growing inside her ignited. Burying her pain, she reacted.

“It was you the whole time!” she screamed through tears, backing away from him in disgust. “You're the one that sentenced me to a lifetime of loneliness. You told me to ‘let the past die,’ because you didn’t want me to discover the truth! You're the one who took everything from me!”

“Rey!” He reached for her in desperation, begging her to stay. It only served to enrage her further; he had already abandoned her in every way a person could; it was too late for his regrets.
“Don’t you ever touch me again, you monster.” His hand recoiled at her words, his body jolting as if she had shot him with her blaster. He swiped at his eyes but refused to let her see any sorrow for what he had done. He wasn’t sorry he did it, only sorry she had discovered the truth. This was why he had truly shut her out – he hadn’t wanted to face what he had done to her. This was why the Force had given him the vision of her parents, why he had been so "supportive," why he had helped her friends and saved her life. He had done it all out of some belated sense of guilt, or maybe that was all contrived as well.

_I hate you for what you did to me. I will never forgive you._

The fear she sensed in him faded as something like resolve passed across his features, but he didn’t say a word. His jaw was clenched, as were his fists, but the rest of his body was otherwise impassive. His barriers were high and fortified, but she could _feel_ the heaviness of his emotions in the Force. He studied her face, as if committing it to memory. He knew he would never see her again. Still, he said nothing. The darkness devoured her anger. “Tell me the truth.”

His consuming stare rolled down to the floor. He worked his jaw for a moment, exhaling slowly before his gaze returned to hers. His eyes were wet, overflowing with emotion. She wished they looked dark and hollow or evil; it would have been easier that way. “You already know the truth; what more do you want me to say?”

There was only one word left to say to him. “Why?” Her voice cracked as the tears escaped down her cheeks.

He held her stare as he swallowed thickly. “You asked me that before – why did I do it? Why did I kill my father? Did it matter then? Does it matter now, Rey? It won’t bring any of them back.”

The intimacy of her name on his lips gutted her. She never wanted to hear him say it again. She never wanted to hear him say _anything_ again. “I hate you, Kylo Ren. You’ll pay for what you did. That’s a promise.” She turned away from him before she could see the pained expression on his face. She turned away before he could tell her what promises meant to him. She walked away, without a glance back in farewell, before she could see him collapse onto the remnants of his broken throne.
Chapter End Notes

Death

Brief description of Rey's parents' death
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey couldn’t sleep. She was exhausted. She should sleep, but the death of her parents replayed in her mind. All her suffering had been because of the man the Force had cruelly bonded her with. She had started to believe she cared about him and foolishly believed he cared about her in return. She had been so consumed with fighting to save him that she hadn’t seen through the deception and lies. She was bonded to a monster. The only question that tore away at her, the only question left unanswered, was why?

Why did he tell me I’m not alone when he was the one that did it? Why did he pretend he cared? Why didn’t he tell me? Why did he do it? Why does he save me when he kills everyone I love?

Because he had a selfish reason to save you... the voice hissed in her head. You felt the pain of trying to sever your connection... He is fearful that if you die, then he will as well... he believes the only chance he has of finding the Resistance is through your bond... And, he would rather have the satisfaction of killing you by his own hand... He does not care for you, foolish child... No... Kylo Ren cares for no one but himself... He has proven that... Remember, he wanted it this way...

He meant to abandon your bond, and you with it... You are nothing to him... You owe him nothing... He threw you away like garbage, as your parents did... He would still kill you... Just as he killed your parents... and Han... and Luke... and soon he will finish Finn... and Rose... and Poe... and his mother... Even if he had moments of... compassion... He will murder everyone you care for... You must protect the Resistance... Their lives have been at his disposal through this bond... You cannot trust that he will walk away with the knowledge he has... You remember Crait... You cannot put your friends in that position again... You cannot allow yourself to save him again in your weakness... It will be your own destruction... You tried to save him, but you failed... It is time to face your destiny... And for Kylo Ren to face his...

Rey breathed the darkness into her lungs, surrendering to its cold, consuming its depths in resolution. Force’s will or not, I have to kill Kylo Ren.

The Force responded to her declaration, giving her the means to stand by her words. As she lay on her back on her makeshift bed, staring at the ceiling, she sensed the familiar vibration of his energy. Dread and anticipation tumbled in her stomach.
She sensed his presence around her and inside her mind. She waited. All she could hear was the pounding of her own heartbeat in her ears. She felt vulnerable, lying helpless on her bed. Her eyes darted around the room in search of his looming shadow. Nothing. She sat up and scanned the room, her eyes landing on a dark figure beside her. She gasped and threw herself to the floor, sliding backward across the stone until she could go no further. Then she sat with her knees to her chest, holding her agitated breath, as she stared at him. Even after all the commotion, he was asleep.

He hates you... He lied to you and betrayed you... He abandoned you because you mean nothing to him... He let you suffer alone on Jakku...

Kylo was on his side, facing her, his head resting on his outstretched arm. His wrists were still bound in shackles, but he looked otherwise uninjured. Without consideration of the consequences, she slowly stood. She was not scared to wake the sleeping dragon. She was drawn toward him, like the gravitational pull of a planet to its sun. Every step she progressed closer to the sleeping beast, she could perceive more of his surroundings. His quarters were dark, as lacking in personalization as he lacked in empathy. When she finally came to rest next to him, time slowed as if she were in a dream. He didn't stir.

She felt the urge to touch him.

Her hand hovered over his face, and she felt soft currents flow against her palm in the Force. She pushed deeper into the currents. What had first felt calm became more erratic and tumultuous as she dove deeper. She began to sense images in the current. They were only brief flashes, but it was enough to discern what she was sensing; dreams. What she saw churned her stomach. Faces twisted in pain, screams of the dying, blood, and death... it was all death. Most of the faces she didn’t recognize, but when she saw Han’s face, she nearly ripped her hand away.

Rey wanted to see, however. Apart from Han, two faces appeared again and again. There was a young man, a Jedi by the look of his clothes, shivering as he died in the rain. There was another, a young red-headed woman. Her eyes were closed as he held her in his arms. There was something tender about the moment that gave her pause. The last flash was of a beautiful garden, of him smiling. It made no sense. Rey tore her hand away as his smile tore through her resolve.

He is the cause of all your suffering... He will do it again... He will find your new family... and kill them all, just as he did to his father... You know now that you can’t save him... You must kill him... Save his mother, your friends, the Resistance, the galaxy from his wrath... Before he does what he did to your parents... Do him a favor... end his suffering... It is the only way to break the bond, the whispers convinced her.
The fear trembled through her as a thought passed through her mind. What would he do to me if he awoke right now? Kylo was, if nothing else, incredibly unpredictable. He would kill me, she convinced herself. If not right now, then the moment he found us. He would kill us all. I have no choice. I have to do this. For the Resistance. The cold darkness returned, devouring her fear and anger, twisting through her... claiming her. Her attention was drawn to his lightsaber next to him. He said it himself. The only way to end this is through death. I could end everything right now. I could end all this pain. I could sever this connection once and for all. She called his weapon into her hands.

It felt heavy, much heavier than Luke's – but not nearly as heavy as the weight of taking a life. She triggered the weapon and admired the unstable, serrated plasma blade and the dangerous lateral vents. She hadn't had time to admire it the last time she held it. But seeing it now, she knew it was everything that Kylo was. She was surprised by the peace that settled over her as the energy of the lightsaber pulsated through her.

It would be so easy, and poetic, to end him like this, by his own weapon. But I also know he would hate for death to take him in his sleep. He is a warrior. He would want to fight until the bitter end. But if he wanted a choice in his death, he should have done it himself. She breathed raggedly. Willing herself to do it, terrified of what she would do if he awoke. Come on! Do it! Do it for the Resistance! Do it for Leia. She imagined it. She wouldn't have to witness the pain or regret in his eyes. It would be quick. It could be painless. All she had to do was access the strength to do it.

Surrender to the darkness... Its power will give you the strength you need, the voice whispered.

You are nothing to him! He abandoned you, twice! He lied to you! This is the path he chose! He killed your parents! He killed his own father! He’ll kill again! He’s a monster!

Tears rolled down her cheeks as she looked upon the man she was destined to kill. The man in front of her didn't resemble a monster. His face seemed kind and youthful, missing the storm of emotions he typically harbored while awake. Locks of his dark hair tumbled across his forehead, and she felt the increasing desire to sweep the errant strands away in a gesture not meant for her enemy. She had never seen him look so peaceful. So… normal. His broad chest was still covered in the uniform she had last observed him wearing, and she presumed he had not left his quarters at all.

She tried to suppress her own conflicted feelings for him, tried to forget the visions of a future together, tried to ignore the desperate plea to save him screaming from somewhere deep inside her soul. She knew that this final justice would be what anyone else in her position would not hesitate to do. Even with the darkness clouding her mind, however, even though he had committed the ultimate evil against her family, she didn’t want to kill him.

How could I look at his dying mother tomorrow and tell her I killed her sleeping, defenseless son!
A man that I...

Kill him now... The voice commanded ... Kill him with the cruelest stroke.

As her hand descended, another voice screamed. Rey! No!

Luke?

Rey startled at the familiarity of it, fumbling with the lightsaber and nearly dropping it on Kylo's exposed throat. She caught the weapon centimeters from his skin, the right lateral vent burning a hole in the dark pillow supporting his head. A clarity burst through the darkness that had consumed her, at once understanding the horrifying consequences of the temptations she nearly surrendered to. They were the same temptations his uncle had nearly succumbed to that ultimately contributed to Kylo’s fall.

I’m no better than you, Luke.

She moved her finger to the switch to deactivate the weapon, but found that her hand would not obey her.

A biting cold passed over her. She felt paralyzed. No, she was paralyzed. It awakened memories of the first time they had met on Takodana. She was so consumed by own fear that she did nothing to fight against it. Never threaten someone with your blade unless you are willing to use it. The deep, familiar voice of her bondmate echoed through her mind. Don't hesitate. Your hesitation or your weapon can be used again you. You should have killed me. Kylo’s burning eyes shot open. He reached out and wrapped his large hands around hers on the hilt of the lightsaber and forcefully jerked the weapon down, closer to his throat, pulling her with it.

The second he touched her hand, she gasped. A spark of energy passed between them. When she regained her awareness, she realized she had been jolted into a vision. Thousands of memories and emotions flooded past her eyes, overwhelming her senses. She realized quickly that she was seeing the world through the eyes of a little boy.
Chapter End Notes

Threat of violence

Rey nearly kills Kylo in a very familiar way

Warning! The following chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.
Rey realized the Force had dragged her into a vision, and she was seeing the galaxy through the eyes of a little boy. She saw younger versions of Han and Leia. She quickly understood that this wasn't a vision, but memories. It was Kylo before he had turned. It was Ben. There were quick snippets of memories as if only fragments of the memories remained. He laughed with his father in the cockpit of the Falcon... his mother sat on his bed and lovingly tousled his hair... he giggled as he showed a room full of people a pair of golden sabaac dice... his father playfully tossed him to his mother in a lake... he walked through a crowd on top of Chewbacca’s tall shoulders... and laughed as the Wookiee chased him through the Falcon... a man he referred to as "Unca Wanwo" threw him playfully into the air as he donned a long, extravagant cloak... his father patientely taught him how to shoot a blaster... his mother read to him... Rey heard his laughter, felt the bright, beaming warmth of his happiness. His light was overwhelming. It was everything she had imagined when she wondered why he had thrown it all away.

How did that boy kill his own father... and my parents?

It was everything she had ever dreamed of in a family. Old pangs of hunger found her from her life on Jakku. Not the hunger for food, no, this was deeper, this carried her through the darkest nights. It was the yearning for a family. When she shared in his happy memories, even for a moment, she felt as if she had found the belonging she had always been searching for. That little boy with everything he could ever want, grew up and took everything from her. She had never wanted to hate someone so much in her life.

Then the happy memories faded into a new one.

She saw the world through the eyes of the same little boy, but this memory was different. The memory was hazy and incomplete, with more images and emotions than a typical memory. Ben was sobbing, though she felt the cause was insignificant, as he couldn’t even remember why he was crying. Rey was not the best judge of a child’s age, but by the sound of his voice and the small hands covering his face, he couldn’t have been more than a couple years old. There was a tingling down the back of his neck. Rey recognized it for what it was; a warning in the Force. Ben may have been naïve to what it meant, but she felt his visceral fear.

Run, Ben.

Startling at the sound of his own name in his head, he spun around. He felt something inside of him guiding him to where he should fix his attention. His eyes focused on the arm of the droid, which had unfolded into a sharp blade. He didn’t know why, but he knew he should be afraid. Ben threw his hands out to protect himself when his fear exploded from inside him. A bright white light exploded from his hands, and he recoiled in terror.

His hands were shaking, soft whimpers escaping his throat as he huddled in the corner. His vision blurred as he stared up at the kitchen droid, eyes wide as he awaited his fate. The droid’s arm retracted, the serrated blade disappearing inside the mechanism. The droid began chattering about returning to the kitchen and fixing the young Ben caf.
Though Rey realized that the danger had passed, Ben did not. He stayed shaking in the corner, knowing instinctively the droid had intended to hurt him, but not why. Rey knew he didn’t understand what had happened. The only thing he knew was that he was afraid and there was no one there to comfort him. He was alone. Biting his lip until he drew blood, both hands over his mouth, he tried not to cry in fear that the droid would come back.

It’s okay, Ben; you’re safe now.

The memory faded with his muffled whimpers, and a new memory emerged. His hand was outstretched toward the heavens, screaming, as the Millennium Falcon rocketed out of the atmosphere. She shuddered as it mirrored that fateful day from her own childhood. The day he took them from me. Ben fell to his knees and cried. He pulled the pair of golden dice from his pocket, letting the light catch them as he dangled them between his fingers, then grasped onto them in a trembling fist. “Don't go!” Rey could feel his longing for his family. His thoughts centered on his father's broken promise that this time he would take Ben with him. He wondered what he had done wrong, why he had been left behind again. His torment radiated through the bond. She knew that loneliness all too well. “I wanna go too!”

A familiar voice whispered in his mind. He doesn’t love you, boy...

It was the whisper she had heard from the Force.

How was she was hearing the same voice that Ben had heard as a child? Did every Force-sensitive hear the same voice, or was it another connection between them?

An inexplicable dread twisted in her stomach.

No one loves you...You are a burden to them...You have darkness in you...You'll never be good enough for them... You’re not worthy of their love...They hate you...They will always hate you...They hate what makes you truly unique...

Ben began to hyperventilate, wondering if the voices were right, if that was why he was left alone. His fear, loneliness, and anger began spiraling into the Force. Rey listened to him convince himself that he was good, he was loved, that they did want him. She couldn’t understand why the voice was saying such cruel things to him. She knew Leia and Han loved him, why would the Force say such lies to a child? With every word the voice whispered in his head, her anger with him faded to the background.
Let’s be secret friends... Can you keep our secret... Think of what they will do if you tell them you’re hearing voices in your head... You see the way they look at you... They will send you away... You will never be good enough for them... You are nothing to them... But I can see how truly special you are... Only the comfort and power of the darkness will ever be there for you... Yes... I can feel it flowing through you now... Let it in... It has always been a part of you... It will give you strength... Power... It will make this pain go away... She could feel his emotions escalating beyond control.

“No!” he screamed, his intense emotions expelled in a wave of Force that leveled the surrounding shrubbery and stone sculptures, creating destruction in its wake. He tumbled backward and stared at his own shaking hands in fear. An older woman stomped outside and grabbed his arm, yanking him off the ground.

“I...I...” he stuttered, his voice small and impossibly young. He was confused; he couldn't understand what had happened. “Ow, let go!”

“Ben, get inside,” the woman demanded through clenched teeth, dragging him, as he fought to twist his arm away from her.

“No, I need 'em!” He reached for the chance cubes that had landed somewhere amongst the debris in the aftermath of his emotional explosion.

Rey could feel the tumultuous emotions building uncontrollably inside him again. “They’re just dice!” she snapped, dragging him farther away as he resisted her.

“No!” This time the release of his emotions formed a wave of Force that crashed against the older woman as he pulled away. He fell forward onto the ground, searching the debris for the object he so desperately desired. He moved his trembling hands hysterically through the brush as he blinked through tears. His fingers uncovered a sliver of gold in the dust. He was able to wrap his hand around it before he was yanked backward.

“You little monster!” the woman growled as she dragged him through the dirt. “You tried to kill me!”

Ben sobbed an incoherent apology. Rey knew he hadn't meant to hurt the woman, but he believed he had done something wrong; thoughts about being “bad” were swirling through his head. You’re not bad, she wanted to assure the boy, forgetting for a moment what he had become, but the chastening ire in the woman's eyes confirmed Ben's suspicions. He ripped his arm from the woman's grasp, but she thwarted his escape by catching him by the ear.

“Look at these ears! You're lucky you were practically born into royalty because no one would want an ugly, useless, disobedient little monster like you. You are nobody without your family, Ben, and how much longer until they can see what the rest of us see? No one knows what to do with you.” The woman yanked him to her side and walked back to the house with him in tow, ignoring his yelps in pain and protest. “I quit, you destructive little brat. Are you happy now? I’m taking you to your mother. She is very busy at the Senate, trying to solve real problems in this galaxy, and she will be very disappointed that you’re causing problems again! They will bring the droids back to care for you; is that what you want? Why can’t you be the good little boy that the heroes of the rebellion deserve?”

The vision faded with his sobs.

Why did the Force show me that?

Another memory appeared. He was hiding in the refresher with his hands clamped over his ears. He was crying on the ground as he stared at himself in a long floor mirror. Rey knew that boy. Where had she seen him before? Those eyes... The hallway! He was the boy from the hallway in her vision on Takodana. Why did I see a vision back then of Ben as a little boy? His eyes looked nothing like that of her bondmate, yet those hopeful orbs contained all the intensity of his venerable gaze. He was not much older than she was when her parents abandoned her; he looked... full of life. Haunted, but unbroken. Struggling, but not yet lost. Lonely, but not yet burdened by the atrocities he would one day commit.

She heard a man and a woman fighting through the door, and she knew immediately that they were quarreling about Ben. His inner dialogue told her that these arguments were a regular occurrence.

How often did Ben overhear what they said about him?

“I don’t know! He won't talk to me about it!” the woman cried.

“Well, he better start! He nearly killed that boy!”

“He’s just a child, Han,” her tone was less angry than defensive. “He just lost control. The Force is stronger in him than he knows. He didn’t mean to hurt that boy!”
“Holy mother of meteors, he didn't mean to hurt him? He threw him against a tree with his mind!” Han shouted in frustration. “He's getting worse. Everyone sees it, Leia. If you spent any time with him, you'd see it too.”

“That’s not fair. This is about more than our family. I cannot sit idle and watch the New Republic descend into chaos and instability!” It was an unexpected realization that Leia’s impassioned claims about “chaos and instability” reminded her of her bondmate. Yes, he was her son, but he was the Supreme Leader. Rey had assumed he had learned his political beliefs from the First Order. What if it wasn’t that simple? “I am trying to prevent the rise of another Empire! I’m trying to prevent the destruction of another Alderaan!”

“What about preventing another Darth V...”

“Don’t you dare say that name in this house!” There was a loud crash as something breakable hit a wall somewhere beyond the refresher door. “Just because he is strong in the Force...”

“Strong?” Han scoffed, “Luke is strong in the Force. But this is something else. Nobody’s seen anything like this before. Now I ain't got no special powers, but I can tell you there's darkness in that kid. He’s too emotional. He destroys everything. You should see how they look at him! They treat him like a sideshow for some galactic circus. Nobody wants to be around him, he's too... different! I don’t know what to do with him; I'm not cut out for this! He needs his mother!”

“He needs his father! Do you not see the way he begs for your attention? He tries desperately to impress you! I’ve seen the way you look at him! He’s your son! How do you know what he needs when you are gone for weeks at a time at your races?”

“I’ve tried,” Han sighed. “We’ve got nothing in common. He’d rather watch your political meetings, do his Force mumbo jumbo and write with ink all day. He's a fine pilot, but he's too young for the races.”

Leia hummed. “And those occasional smuggling runs you think I don't know about?”

“I...” Han started defensively, as if he was preparing a lie, but thought better of it. “He has no interest in smuggling runs. He argues with me about the effects of spice on the galaxy. What am I supposed to do with that? And then there's his temper. He screams at no one and puts holes in my ship with his Force tantrums. He bends durasteel with his mind. That kid ain't cut out for space travel. And the more I try, the worse he becomes! Nothing I do will change him. He’s too much like his grandfather.”
Leia’s voice was quiet, but every word was still audible through the door “I don’t know what to do with him anymore.”

The edge of anger in Han’s voice had been replaced by something else. Fear? “I don’t know what to do with him, either, but we’ve got to do something, I won’t lose him to the dark side, too!”

“He’s not evil, Han. He’s a child! Our child! The Sith are dead. As long as we strengthen the New Republic…”

She could hear the argument continue into another room as Han clearly tried to escape the argument. “Enough with the New Republic!”

“Enough with your obsession with the dark side! Just because she…”

“My obsession? Damp down your power core, princess. This isn't about Qu’... this isn't about her,” his voice was sharp with warning. “This is about your father. You think this is easy for me? You don’t know what it’s like to lose someone to the dark side!”

“That’s not fair,” she snarled. “I’ve lost enough to the dark side.” It was quiet for a moment, and Rey thought the argument had ended with that vulnerable statement, but then she continued. “I lost people too. Some even died in my arms.”

“Yeah, I bet you wish Kier was here instead of me. Then you could have a different husband and a different son. He apparently looks enough like him, though. That’s why you keep Ben's hair longer, isn't it? Maybe you just wish you never met me. Better politician, better husband, better father – too bad he’s dead and I’m here, huh? He would probably bend to your every whim and –”

“That’s enough, Han!” But the damage was done. Rey could sense Ben wondering if his mother wished she had another family – one without the man she always fought with, and without a son who was a burden.

“You’re the one still holding onto a dead man’s lock of hair!” Based upon the gasp, Leia was unaware Han knew about her secret. “Yeah, don’t look so surprised, Princess. I found it in a box in your drawer with everything else you refuse to deal with.” Han paused for a moment, and when he continued, his tone was not as cutting. “You're stuck in your past and obsessed with the future of the galaxy. Where does that leave me and your son?”
“I am not obsessed with my past,” she said. Though Leia believed it, Rey wasn’t certain anyone else did. “And as for the future, you cannot expect me to stand by and watch the New Republic fail.”

Han huffed loudly. “When it comes to this family and the Senate, someone will lose, and it ain’t gonna be me.”

“The New Republic needs my help.”

“Fine by me, sweetheart. Go fix the New Republic!” he said flippantly. “Who cares about the struggle of one screwed-up kid if you save the galaxy, right?”

“I can't change the darkness Ben struggles with,” she said quietly, but not quietly enough. “We should have been more careful. I should never have brought a child into this galaxy with a bloodline like mine.”

Ben shuddered. Rey wasn't certain if it was from the impact of his mother's words or the sound of his father's voice booming through the house. “It's a little too late for that, isn't it?”

“Where are you going?” Leia's tone was tight and strained as if she were forcing away emotions she refused to feel. Rey recognized it from arguments with the woman's son.

“What do you care?” The sound of shuffling and zippers were apparently well known to Ben. He knew what it meant. His father was abandoning him for the stars. Again. “I'm leaving early to train for the championship race. I'll be back in a few weeks. Trust me, your highness; you won't even notice I'm gone.”

“Stop calling me that,” the fight was gone from her voice. “And don't leave without saying goodbye to your son, but spare him the promise of a holocall. He doesn't deserve to bear your excuses anymore.”

“Sure thing, your worship,” he replied derisively, the smirk most certainly on his lips evident in his voice.
Ben shook uncontrollably, covering his ears. Blood dripped from his quivering fingers as his nails dug into the side of his head. The objects on the counters and shelves levitated off the surfaces as the anxiety intensified inside of him. Rey's chest ached as she felt Ben's anguish. She never had a family to compare it to, but as his thoughts centered on the burden he had become to them, she wondered if maybe he hadn't had the happy family she had imagined.

Judging by Ben's demeanor, it was an argument worse than he had ever experienced before, but perhaps that had made it memorable enough for her to experience. She reminded herself that, if this was the worst, then his happy memories still far outnumbered the bad. Though their words were upsetting, she knew they loved each other… and their son. Young Ben knew that, he had to know that, because at least he had parents. And not just any parents, but heroes of the rebellion. Even if her parents were dirty junk traders, she would have given anything to have memories of them fighting. He took that from her. The voices outside the door faded as the whispers began again.

Listen to them... They wish they never had a son... They don’t want you… They don’t love you... No one could ever love you...They all hate you...You can see it in their eyes...You are a burden...A monster to be feared...You mean nothing to them...That boy deserved worse than to be thrown into that tree for what he said... He deserved to die, not break a few bones...You were merciful… But they don’t see it… Your mother is too busy with her precious Republic...Your father loves his ship more than you... They don't care...They want you gone... And if you tell them about me, they’ll have their excuse to get rid of you... Do you want them to make you go away...They would be happier without you... But they don’t see what I see…I can help you...I see how special your power is...You can be better if you just let the darkness in... This pain can finally go away... It's your destiny...

“Get out of my head!” the young Ben screamed. The objects dropped from mid-air and shattered into pieces on the floor around him. Rey heard two voices calling out for him from beyond the door, two sets of heavy footsteps quickly approaching, two pairs of fists pounding on the Force-jammed door, hysterically begging him to talk to them. The emotions of their fight immediately disappeared, the love in their voices evident as they called to their son. His mother started singing to him, and his father's frightened voice announced that he was going to find his tools.

Ben stared with burning eyes into the mirror, hyperventilating as he rocked on his knees and ripped out his hair. Ben was hypersensitive to their emotions vibrating in the Force. He felt their anger and desperation as if it were his own, and now their escalating fear. Their thoughts were loud, drowning his own thoughts. It was overstimulating and overwhelming. She felt his emotions reaching a crescendo that could only spiral out of control again. She braced herself for another Force wave of destruction. Instead, he propelled his fist into the mirror, exploding his reflection into tiny fragments.

The physical release quieted the dangerous intensity of the Force swelling inside him. A broken mirror was still destruction, but it paled in comparison to the uncontrolled destruction the Force could create. He sighed, studying the blood dripping from his knuckles onto the shattered pieces on the floor. She sensed his relief at his newfound outlet, the physical pain far more preferable to the suffocating emotions.

The memory left her insides feeling slimy and uncomfortable. Her questions only grew after each interaction, as did her desire to know why the Force wanted her to see it. Where would it end? When he killed her parents? The memory faded into another.

Ben was sitting with his legs crossed, his back against a wall. He was perhaps a year or two older than the previous memory, but his voice still held the gentleness of a young boy. He hummed a song softly to himself in a quiet corridor. The tune sounded eerily familiar, then he began to sing:

“Mirrorbright, shines the moon,
its glow as soft as an ember
When the moon is mirrorbright,
take this time to remember
Those you have loved but are gone
Those who kept you so safe and warm
The mirrorbright moon lets you see
Those who have ceased to be
Mirrorbright shines the moon,
as fires die to their embers
Those you love are with you still-
The moon will help you remember.”

It was a lullaby. The one she remembered from her childhood – the one Leia had asked her about when they first arrived on Barkhesh. How did Ben know that lullaby? He continued to hum the song, mindlessly rolling Han's chance cubes on the floor by his feet. There was a pervasive loneliness that fluttered in the periphery of his consciousness, a dull ache that Rey recognized all too well.

Where are Han and Leia? A droid? Anyone?

She could sense the anger and resentment in him, even then; and there was darkness, too, but inside that darkness was a light that was stronger than she had imagined, yet somehow... familiar.

His small, youthful hands released the dice again, practicing with a flick of his wrist to roll them to his will. Rey noticed that he manipulated the Force with unpredictable variation; his control was nearly non-existent.

He repeated the process over and over again, becoming more frustrated with every endeavor, observing each outcome with the attentiveness of a disciplined student. He was dedicatedly distracted by his simple game, and he did not notice the individual standing before him until the golden cubes deflected off a shiny black shoe. As he reached for his father's dice, deformed fingers wrapped tenderly around his hand. His eyes flickered up to the individual who was kneeling uncomfortably close to him. He startled when he looked upon the strange creature's twisted face. Rey's stomach dropped at the sight.

“Ah, young Ben Solo,” Snoke said, smiling unnaturally. Even young Ben sensed a wickedness behind the display. Rey cringed. A strong protectiveness tightened in her throat. She had no idea Snoke had been in her bondmate's life for that long.

“H...hello, sir,” he squeaked. Rey could feel the fear in Ben that Snoke undoubtedly sensed as well. His thoughts made it clear that Ben was uncertain what exactly unsettled him about the energy that surrounded the creature, but he felt the fierce instinct to run. He glanced over the humanoid's shoulder, attempting to meet the eyes of a Mon Calamari walking past, all at once terrified of being left alone with this monster of nightmares. Snoke moved into his line of sight before the amphibian could notice his silent plea.

“Do you know who I am?” He smiled again, and nausea rolled through Ben's stomach. Fear prickled the back of his neck, the small hairs standing on end.

“Do you work with my mother?” Ben guessed. “I’m waiting for her. She should be along any minute to collect me.” His speech struck Rey as overly formal for a boy so young. She supposed his education had resulted in the pedantic and pretentious speech she knew so well, rather than his high rank in the First Order, as she had originally assumed.

Ben tried to be brave, lifting his chin in the face of pure evil, but his hands trembled and his voice faltered. Rey sensed his revulsion toward the creature – every cell in his body vibrated with distrust. After witnessing this interaction, if she had not known the eventual outcome, she would have had no trouble believing that one day Ben would grow up to kill Snoke. She would have imagined a heroic Jedi who stood strong in the face of evil, as he had done as a child. Had someone told her he would willingly serve the creature as an apprentice, she never would have believed it.
“Lies...” The creature tutted, running his fingers through Ben's hair, before tenderly caressing his cheek. Ben was too terrified to move, but Rey was livid. Don't you touch him, you sick monster! The young boy looked away, anywhere but in the creature's predatory eyes. “You know your mother is too busy for that, Ben. She is working; she won't come to you for hours. Because she wishes she had a different son. A better son. She doesn't love you. No one loves you. She will abandon you. You will be alone, just like this, every single day. But you don't have to be. With my help, I see you becoming more than a burden to be cast aside like garbage. I see you becoming the greatest of all Jedi. Even more powerful than Luke Skywalker. You are special, more than you know. Let the darkness in, feel its power.” Ben inhaled sharply, meeting the creature's stare as he recognized those words.

“It's you,” Ben realized. “The voice from my head. You're real...” The boy was shaking uncontrollably, tears blurring his vision.

No.

Rey whispered, her own realization sinking in her stomach. That voice... it wasn’t the voice of the Force. Just as she had always known deep down the truth about the identity of her parents, the realization of who had been whispering in her mind was only confirmation of a truth she had been denying herself. She had chosen to be blind to it. It didn’t sound like Snoke, but the truth was right there in the Force for her to find. It was that creature’s voice in her head, convincing her to alienate and murder his once apprentice – the man with whom he had bonded her.

Snoke is manipulating me just as he did Ben. What would have happened if I listened to him...

“Yes, I am the voice in your head. You should be grateful. I was the one who helped you escape that kitchen droid. Say ‘thank you.’” Ben didn’t think the two voices sounded the same, but he considered the consequences if he argued.

Ben shivered in a new wave of fear. “Thank you, sir.”

“But it has to be our little secret, child,” Snoke warned, “or they will find out and send you away.” Ben nodded obediently, the tears finally spilling down his cheek.

Mama, where are you?
He began to snuffle.

“Shh...” Snoke rasped, slowly wiping a tear that had fallen on the boy's lips with a gnarled finger. “Tears are for weak little boys. You are not weak, are you? No more tears or they'll ask questions. If you tell them, I'll have to hurt them. You wouldn't want that, would you? I'll know if you tell them; I'm in your head, remember? I can hear your thoughts, every... single... one, even the very naughty ones, boy. You can't keep any secrets from me, but you will keep our secret, won't you?”

“Y...yes, sir,” Ben said, pivoting out of the creature's grasp to wipe his tears.

Please. I want to go home.

“Call me master.” Snoke smiled again, a knowing, predatory baring of yellowed teeth.

“Yes, master,” Ben whimpered, wrapping his arms around himself. Rey wanted nothing more than to hold the young Ben and assure him that he would okay.

But that would be a lie, wouldn't it? Because he won't be okay. That monster will get his prize.

This was merely a memory, she had to remind herself. Ben had already fallen, tempted to the dark side by Snoke years before. But she wanted to fight for that boy, to save him, and she felt hopeless knowing that she couldn't.

Why did the Force bring me to him now? Why not then?

Sensing Ben's fear of him, he tried a different tactic. “Do you like stories?” Ben nodded hesitantly. Snoke patted his knee and offered his revolting hand to the boy. “Come sit, and I'll tell you a story.” Rey’s stomach churned as Ben obeyed.

“There once was a fire in the jungles of Dagobah, and the creatures were trying to escape across a river. The Porcuspine asked the Aquatic Gundark for a ride to the other side, as he could not swim. At first, the Gundark refused, because he knew the Porcuspine was poisonous. ‘You will sting me,’ he said. The Porcuspine assured him he wouldn’t. ‘If I sting you, then we both will drown.’ Accepting his logic, the kind Gundark decided to help him. The Porcuspine climbed onto the Gundark's back, and they made their way into the river. Halfway across, the Porcuspine stung the Gundark. The poison set in quickly. As the Gundark began to sink under the water he cried, ‘Why would you do that? Now we’ll both die!’ to which the Porcuspine replied, ‘I’m sorry; it is my nature.’”
In his innocence, Ben was more horrified that the creatures died than the dark moral of the story.
“I… I don’t understand.”

“You will, young Skywalker,” Snoke promised. “You will.”

Rey found it difficult to hate him when all she wanted to do was save him from the fate he had already suffered.

_I had no idea. Ben, why didn’t you tell me?_

Had she ever given him the chance?

The memory faded into another.

He was still young, sitting alone at a table, his chin resting on his folded arms. A fluffy, bread-like food with a creamy, brown spread was presented in front of him. There was a collection of lit candles in a circle on top. Rey had never seen anything like it.

“A joyful date of birth, young Master Ben,” A T-2LC protocol droid said.

_Date of birth... Birthday? That's right, I remember, those are important to families. I don't even know when my birthday is, Rey thought._

She knew of birthdays from her time on Jakku, had heard the off-worlders speak of its celebration and traditions. Rey didn't know much about them, but she did know they were supposed to be happy occasions surrounded by family. This one seemed to contain neither criteria. She could sense Ben's resentment of the candlelit food, a boiling itch under his skin to smash it to bits.

“Thank you, Elsie,” Ben said softly. “Did mother or father call yet?”

_Or Uncle Chewie or Uncle Lando? he thought miserably. At least they made it to my birthday last year, and they don't even live in the same system as us._
“Not yet, but your mother had your favorite cake flown in from the finest shop in Coruscant.” The masculine programmed droid answered.

Favorite? I don’t even like chocolate... She could sense the bitter edge to his words even through his thoughts, but Ben didn’t seem particularly surprised that he was celebrating his birthday alone.

“And your father bought you the newest flight simulator on the market as your birthday gift, sir. All the other younglings will surely be envious.” Rey was envious. Having only an ancient starfighter to run flight simulations on, she was itching to try his new gift. Not that anyone had gifted her anything – before Han Solo gifted her a blaster, ironically enough – but if they had given her such a thoughtful present, it would have meant everything to her. But Ben seemed to... resent the gift. It left a sour taste in her mouth, how unappreciative he had been of something she would have loved. The small number of possessions she owned had been important to her because she never had anything. He could have anything he wanted, yet it all meant nothing to him.

What more could he ask for?

As if in response, young Ben's voice whispered in her head. I don't want another machine to teach me; I don't want any more presents – I just want him.

She realized then how profoundly simple it was to misunderstand another person. It was difficult to see the galaxy around her without the jaded lens of her upbringing. Maybe Ben didn’t see the galaxy as she did. Maybe the point of showing her his memories was to help her understand how he saw the galaxy. Maybe that would explain why he could have done the unforgivable. She had begged the Force for an answer; maybe this was it.

Underneath the simmering anger, Rey could sense appreciation in him. Toward the protocol droid, she realized. Ben was grateful to receive no sympathy, apologies, lies, or excuses from the droid, though he recognized they were not capable of such human emotions or pretenses anyway.

I like droids, he thought. They never leave me or forget me or make me cry. They never look at me like I’m bad. They say what they think.

As a man who pushed everyone else away, his relationship with the droid called “Blue” began to make more sense to her. She had wondered how a man who would not think twice before taking a life, could be so gentle with a heap of parts and sensors. He had been raised by droids. The kitchen droid had nearly killed him, but no droid had ever hurt him the only way her bondmate feared to be
Ben watched the fire flicker above the candles, making no other effort toward conversation. There was an ache in his chest that Rey knew well, though she never imagined that Ben had ever experienced feeling unwanted as a child. It wasn't true, obviously. He had a family, of course he was wanted. Rey knew Han and Leia had wanted and loved him very much. Ben knew that too. He had to know.

His thoughts suggested he didn’t; they focused on what he had done wrong this time. Was it his fight with the two sons of the neighbor? Or the incident at the dinner party? Was it his screams from those nightmares that awoke his parents at night? Was it the holoprojector he broke in anger at his father? The third shattered mirror this week? Or perhaps when he "rudely" told his Uncle Luke that he never wanted to become a Jedi over that holocall? Ben tried to pinpoint exactly what he had done for them to reject him this time, enough to not bother coming home for his birthday. Again. Snoke’s lies replayed over in his head, and Rey realized that, though he denied them to the monster, he believed them.

The fire danced as the candles burned. Ben wondered: if his anger had taken the form of fire, would he look like the melting candle on the inside? What happens when my candle is all burned up? The darkness found him then, soothing him, and he could find no reason or will to fight against it. Rey knew how easy it was to let it in and how impossible it was to cast it out again. Ben perked up slightly as the darkness numbed him. He enjoyed watching the wax roll down onto the food. The darkness was pleased with the beautiful destruction created by the fire. “I believe the proper protocol is to blow out the candles, Master Ben.”

He hadn't moved from resting his head on his arms, clearly having no intention of participating in his own birthday ritual. “Where is Beex? He should be here at least.” Ben's voice was heavy with anger and exhaustion, his thoughts consumed with loneliness. It was a snippet of the man her future bondmate would become.

“Master Ben,” Elsie chided. “He is a culinary droid; his place is in the kitchen. And you know what happened the last time he oversaw charge of you. The masters would have my power core if you were in the same room again. He nearly killed you.”

“I won't be alone with him. And I won't run around the house with a power drill this time,” Ben suggested with feigned levity.

Why would they care anyway? Ben thought sullenly. Without me, they would never fight, because they could have the kid they always wanted.
His thoughts focused on the "perfect family" for Han and Leia. Perhaps a son and daughter – maybe twins; they ran in the family, after all. With any hope, they would be born without the Force. Han could have the co-pilot son for his smuggling runs and races in the Falcon, and Leia could have a daughter to braid her hair, adorn in fancy dresses, and teach how to be the perfect politician.

Droids could not sense darkness, but there must have been something about the expression on Ben's face that inspired the protocol unit to change his mind. “I suppose BX-778 could break away from his duties to celebrate. Excuse me for just a moment, sir.”

“Elsie?” Ben stared up from the cake to the pivoting droid. His eyelashes were wet as they fluttered against his cheek. “You're my best friend.”

Rey’s heart clenched. She had never been good with people, but she had forgotten – or willfully ignored – how they had found each other in mutual loneliness. Perhaps he truly had been lonely long before he left his family.

“I am but a protocol droid, sir.” The T-2LC unit turned without hesitation and left Ben in the room alone. His attention returned to the small flickering flames. He thought about what wish he would make when he blew out the candles after the droids returned. The anger resurfaced, his control over the darkness melting like the candles before him. He was alone on his birthday. He didn't want the fancy cake or expensive presents. His only wish was for his family.

Remember, Ben... I can make all your wishes and desires come true... I can bring your family to you on your birthday... All you have to do is trust me... If you trust me, I will show you everything you have ever wanted... Not expensive gifts; material possessions make you weak... As does sentiment, so dry those tears... I can provide you worth and a destiny, if you give me your loyalty... Trust your master... If they won't come for candles... They will for the flames... Set fire to the house... Burn it all... I promise, they will come... Show them they can't leave you alone without suffering the consequences...

Ben stared at the flames that were slowly dwindling. The longer he considered listening to the voice, the darker the shadows were cast over his thoughts until he couldn't think of a reason not to obey. He plucked each candle from its place on the cake, dropping them on the expensive-looking fabric of the chairs surrounding the table. It was the first time in his memories that Rey had felt an intense darkness in him. He stood back against the wall, watching the flames grow higher. The heat intensified as bright orange scorched the chairs and licked across the expanse of the table. With his hand out in front of him, he directed the limited command he had over the Force to spread and fan the flames. The concentration of energy ignited the room in seconds. The smoke irritated his lungs, and he coughed instinctively, but he didn't leave the room. The pain made him feel more alive than he had felt in years.
"Burn," he thought. There was a vengeful satisfaction that shivered through his body. I did this.

Perhaps he was good at something, he realized. All he ever did was destroy, but this was beautiful. What if he stopped trying to hide who he was? He was finally in control of something. He couldn't make his parents stay, he couldn't make them love him, but he wasn't as powerless as he had believed. He had choices; he could control one aspect of his life. He had listened to the darkness and created something with his own strength in the Force. All this destruction was by his hands and his hands alone. He doubted he would find belonging in his family, as the outcast that everyone wanted to change, but he could forge his own destiny without them. He didn't need anyone but himself to create beautiful destruction. Ben laughed darkly, and a chill shuddered through Rey.

"Try to forget me now."

The memory faded into another, but it quickly became clear that this memory took place on the same day as the last. Ben was covered in soot and ash, reticent as he sat on the back of a police speeder. He was staring daggers at the ground, his thoughts swirling around a harsh chastisement he had apparently received from a police officer.

Rey had never seen the police in action as a child – Jakku had no police department, no governing body whatsoever – but Ben seemed well acquainted with law enforcement. For a man who despised anarchists and disorder, she had always assumed he had never broken a law until he joined an organization that believed it was above it. She shouldn’t have been surprised, she supposed, considering how inconsequentially he regarded murder. She wondered how often he had crossed paths with police as a child. She felt his longing to be good, to be the worthy son his legendary family, the officers, the galaxy expected him to be.

What's wrong with me? the question repeated in her head as it did his. Why can't I be me and be good?

“It's the Organa-Solo kid again,” one officer, a tall blue Pantorian or Chiss, grumbled. Rey wasn’t close enough to see the officers’ eyes to discern which species. The two conversing officers stood far enough away that the average human wouldn’t have heard them, but Ben – and Rey, by association – was Force-sensitive.

“There's somethin' not right about that one,” the other shorter, more round, reptilian officer – most likely a Trandoshan – responded in his best Galactic Basic with a cigarra in his mouth. “Normal kid runs screamin' from a fire, but the firefighter droid found him in the room with the fire, laughin' like a rabid Kowakian monkey-lizard. Then the kid attacks the droid like a mynock on a power couplin' when they tried to drag him out. He said he set the fire himself – used candles from a cake to do it. Kid's got a couple of bolts loose if you ask me.”
“No, he must have wanted a Jogan fruit cake instead of whatever they gave him, so he set a fire as revenge for their 'oversight.' Spoiled little rich brat is what he is.” Both officers laughed, and Ben took every word they said to heart. His parents wouldn't tell him what was wrong with him, a thought that plagued his waking thoughts, so he searched for the answer from anyone who would tell him.

The Trandoshan took a sip of caf. “You're tellin' me. As the son of a senator and general, that kid has everythin' he could've ever wanted, but he acts out like he’s the victim. He's got no idea what it's like to struggle in this galaxy. He's rich, he's human, lives on a core world, in a nice place, Force adept, with famous parents... he's got royalty in his blood; he has no right to shame them like this. He’s got no reason not to be appreciatin' the opportunities he has over the rest of us, ungrateful little delinquent. What's the over-under that he's locked up in the next ten years?”

“But his parents are always there to bail him out.” The light reflected off the tall officer's yellow eyes – a Pantorian, Rey realized – as he smashed the cigarra under his boot. “I had to take a report last week after he caused a disturbance at a high-profile benefit dinner party he attended with Senator Organa. Poor woman, she looked mortified. He lashed out at one of the attendants for no reason, slashed his face clean open, and stole a speeder. Kid’s got one thing going for him – he's a helluva pilot – too bad he wastes that talent with his evil. Of course, the victim refused to press charges on the brat for Senator Organa's sake. His only request was that the kid be forced to meet with him to apologize. Maybe the kid will learn something from him.” Rey was confused. Had she missed something? Why was she shown some memories, but not others that seemed equally or more important? Wouldn't slashing open someone's face be a more important insight to Ben than anything she had seen so far? Why hadn't she been shown something so significant? Was Ben choosing these memories? Was the Force?

What is the point of all of this, if not to show me everything? I want to understand!

“Either way, what a disappointment that two of the greatest war heroes of the Republic ended up with that little monster. Heard when he was born, Senator Organa fought for three days to birth him. Nearly killed her, he did, and he came out with all his teeth and that mop of hair as black as the dark side. I reckon he was born causin' trouble and never stopped. Heard they won't be havin' any more because of him. Such a waste, if you ask me. I wish I could've had parents like them, I'd never have a thing to worry about.” The Trandoshan's words confirmed everything that Ben had feared. He was bad. His parents would be better off without him. Everyone knew it, but he had been too foolish to see what Snoke had been telling him all along.

“After all they did for the galaxy, they deserve better than this. The droid should've left the kid in the house and let it burn – solve their problems for them,” the Pantorian added.
The anger Rey felt originally at hearing what horrible things they had to say about Ben faded as she realized that wasn't the worst part of what those officers had done. Ben heard every word, but he wasn't angry, he wasn't on the verge of lashing out at their hasty judgment and blind misconceptions. He believed them. Every word was more confirmation of his own insecurities. They gave weight to the voices in his head that told him he would never be good enough. And Rey could only watch as the words twisted into darkness in his heart, helpless to change any of it.

They want me... to die? No, no it's not true. They wish I wasn't... me, but they don't want me dead. They love me. Don't they? I'll be better. I'll make them want me.

Rey wondered if fate had been kinder – if she had been born a decade prior, if she had left Jakku with her parents, if her Force-sensitivity had been found earlier, perhaps they would have found each other sooner. Perhaps they could have found belonging in each other. Perhaps he would have never listened to Snoke, because she would have ensured he was never alone. She imagined herself sitting on the speeder next to him, holding his hand in comfort, telling him how much he meant to her. If she had learned anything from that moment when the blade hovered precariously over his exposed throat, it was how profoundly his loss would have affected her. She believed somewhere deep down, his uncle had felt the same. He may have killed her parents – something she could never forgive him for – but watching his memories unfold made her wish she had the ability to change them.

Ben hadn't always been a man hellbent on mass murder and galactic domination. Everything in her heart told her if only one person had understood him, if one person had been able to reach out to that boy before Snoke twisted his talons in, then Ben Solo would not have fallen. She couldn’t blame them; she wasn’t any better. But she could have been if she had been there.

A commotion behind him drew their attention. Han Solo. There was a flash of hope in Ben as his father arrived. But his stomach fell at one glimpse of his father's furious expression.

“Ben!” Han shouted.

Ben scrambled down from the speeder, falling to the ground in his haste. Ben choked on the dust cloud that was displaced in his fall. “Ben!”

Fear flooded through him at the rage in his father's voice. He had only wanted them home; he hadn't thought of the reaction they would have once they got there. Impulsively, he jumped off the ground and started running. Han only had to take a few strides forward before he caught him by the arm, not roughly, just enough to prevent his escape. As Ben struggled, Han spun him around, grasping his shoulders to force his son to look at him.

Rey could see the anger in Han's eyes, but also fear; fear for his son's safety. It was clear in his eyes how much he loved Ben and how terrified he had become at the thought of losing his son, but his features were hardened, and Ben only saw his fury. It was apparent to her that he was trying to hold himself together, project the tough, emotionless exterior of the galactic smuggler. She wondered what would have happened if he had allowed himself to fall apart in front of his son. Perhaps Ben would have thought the heaviness of his breath or the quivering in his father's arms was something other than anger. Han could have said a million words in that moment; Rey winced at the ones he chose. “What in the eight Hells is wrong with you!”

Ben dropped his head and refused to look at his father, which only served to make Han more agitated. “Look at me!” He shook Ben, with his hands firmly grasping the boy's shoulders, as if he could shake some sense into him. “Why, Ben! Why!”

His breath smelled like alcohol as he breathed heavily in his son's face, but Ben had no fear that the man would hurt him. Rey was thankful for that; until Luke, she never realized how disillusioned she would feel when her heroes did not turn out to be the people she thought they were. If Han had hurt Ben, she didn't know if she could have ever had forgiven him, even in death. How could she have helped her bondmate forgive him if she couldn't? Han was... Han... but he still had his heart in the right place.

“Answer me!”

Rey could feel Ben withdraw in upon himself, sobbing as he shut his eyes to his father's anger. He shook his head obstinately, fighting the urge to flee. “What am I supposed to do with you? Tell me what to do!” Han continued, his voice strained.

“Just this week you've blown a hole in the wall with your Force nonsense! You woke up your mother every night with your tantrums, and you know she has a job to do! If her highness doesn't sleep, we all don't sleep! Give us a break, kid! You've shown up at your mother's work twice when you were supposed to be with your tutor! Those meetings are important, we've told you that you can't show up like that every time you hear a voice in your head. Luke told you it's just whispers in the Force; you gotta stop this. Now you set fire to the house! Oh, and how could I forget, cut a man's face and stole a speeder! Blast it all, Ben, you're lucky I already flipped the Falcon around when I heard about what you did at the dinner party. And you're lucky you weren't locked up! It ain't fun, trust me! Is that what you want, 'cause that's where you're heading, kid!”

Ben burst into tears. “No!”

Han didn’t relent, clearly frustrated that the boy refused to look at him. “Do you want us to send you away?”
“No!”

“Do you hate us?” There was a weariness in his voice that hadn't been there before. Rey wished Ben had just been honest with them, but he was defiant and withdrawn into his familiar laconic defense.

“No!

Without a doubt, she knew he never told his father the horrors he suffered, but she couldn't help wondering if only he had. If he had just opened up with them once in the years he still had a chance, once as he first had in the less than a week bonded to her, then he could have been saved. If there was one thing she knew about Han and Leia, it was that they would die to protect him. She could hear the plea in his father's voice; he only wanted to understand. “Don't we give you everything you want?”

But no matter how much his father begged, Ben didn't trust him with the monsters that haunted him. “No!”

Han hesitated. “Hold on. ‘No,’ we don’t, or ‘no’ we do…”

“I don't know!”

“That's it, kid,” Han snapped, his patience wearing thin. “We ain't leaving here until you tell me what you want from us. Huh? Why do you do this to us?”

“I don't know,” he said, his voice barely above a whisper.

“For Force sake, son! You do know. Knock it off. We know there's a lot going in your head that you're not saying, Hell, I'm guilty of it, too, but you have to talk to us, Ben! We can help you! What do you need?” He shook his son with a rough jolt and was finally rewarded with Ben's incisive stare.

Rey felt the walls Ben had built around himself crumble, just enough to allow hope through. He struggled with his own darkness for a moment, fearing what his father would do if he revealed his weakness, before forcing himself to answer in a small voice. “You...”
“What did you say?” Han rasped, his firm grip easing from Ben’s shoulders as he backed away.

“I...I...” He was shutting down again, staring at the ground, yearning for a sarlacc pit to form under his feet and swallow him whole. Ben had removed the proverbial mask he had already begun to hide behind. In his one-word admission, he had offered his father an outstretched hand; all Han had to do was offer his in return. If Han traded Ben's vulnerability for his own, perhaps his son would have realized that it was not him against the galaxy. Rey knew how their story ended, so she shouldn't have been surprised when he didn't.

“This was for me? Oh, swell, kid, I've always wanted an idiot son who burned down my house,” Han said, his tone clearly sarcastic. Rey had barely known the man, but she was well aware that this was Han’s way of communicating. There was even a smirk on his face, but it hurt Ben all the same. Han didn't mean to hurt him, Rey knew, but he didn’t understand his son as she did. And even she didn’t understand him as well as she had thought. Ben did not share his sense of humor, at least, not concerning serious consequences. His father seemed to recognize that he had missed something important and awkwardly rested his hand on his son's shoulder.

“You know what; I'm not mad about the house. We can fix it. I’m not that mad about the stolen speeder. I’m actually a little bit impressed you evaded half the police department and ended up on the HoloNews… but only a little bit,” he chuckled, before adopting a serious expression as he cleared his throat. He stood sternly and pointed a finger at Ben. “Don’t tell your mother I said that.” Ben nodded, the weight on his shoulders fading. “And don’t get cocky, you still need a lot of work before you’re any good as a pilot.” Han leaned down, sighing, and Rey believed that Han could have said anything in that moment, and Ben would have listened. “But that’s not why I came back here.”

_Tell him you love him, tell him he’s good, tell him you’re sorry, tell him happy birthday, tell him…_

“You’ve got to stop hurting people, kid. You hurt your mom’s career at the Senate, you made me disqualify for the cup, for what? Now all the old coot said to you at that dinner was 'pleasant dreams.' You're lucky he's not pressing charges, all you gotta do is go back to his...”

“No!” Ben screamed, twisting out of his father's grasp. “I won't go back there!”

“Like hell you won't!” Han shouted back, struggling to subdue his son. Rey could feel Ben's emotions immediately overwhelming him in the Force. Each breath became more constricting, the tingle of the Force under his skin had become a burning torrent. The whispers of the officers behind him, the smell of the smoke in the air, the whiskey on his father's breath and the fire in his eyes, the tension in his father's fingers on his arm, every thundering heartbeat in the Force of sentient beings in the near vicinity... all of it overstimulated him, splintering his control over the Force. He could sense himself unraveling, which only served to further erode his limited restraint. “Calm down!”
Rey knew it wouldn’t work. He couldn’t just “wish” himself better. The darkness had an influence over him that he couldn’t entirely control. He could try to be like they all he wanted, but he would fail. He did. He needed help understanding it, not suppressing it. She had made the mistake of underestimating the darkness in him, believing he could easily turn his back on it, but it wasn’t that simple. His parents should have learned that. Han should have never confronted him on that skyway, hoping he could turn him. They didn’t understand the power of the darkness, but she was beginning to.

“Let go!” Ben begged as he tried to escape. “I don't want to hurt you!” Han loosened his grip on his arm, allowing him to jerk it away. Han's eyes betrayed the hurt he felt at his son's words. Ben wrapped his arms around himself protectively as he backed away, trembling as he searched for an outlet or an escape. Rey could feel his emotions spiraling; it wouldn't be enough. Ben, as young as he was, understood that quickly as well. He dug his fingers into his hair, covering his ears. Curled in upon himself, he squeezed his eyes shut, willing his emotions away. He was teetering on the edge, counting each breath in hope the pressure in his chest would fade. A warm hand on his shoulder should have been soothing, but he inhaled sharply, causing something inside him to snap.

Rey winced as the Force wave leveled everyone standing around him. It would agitate Han, of course, but it would confirm to the officers and neighbors standing around them that all their opinions were right about Ben Solo. Her bondmate looked up at the destruction in his wake to find his father already standing over him. “Get up,” Han demanded. Ben chewed on his lip roughly as he stared at the older Solo, the pain soothing him. “Are you trying to kill me, son?”

Ben said nothing, but for once she was privy to his thoughts. He was sickened by the thought that Han would think he would ever intentionally hurt his own father. His conviction caused a rueful tightness in her own throat.

What happened to you, Ben? How could this lost little boy become Kylo Ren?

“What am I supposed to do here?” His father knelt in front of him, his usual aloof bravado exchanged for a tense awkwardness she recognized more in his son than him. Not that I knew him very well, Rey reminded herself. Han had been the father she'd always wanted in the short time she'd spent with him. It broke her heart that it took his death to finally reach Ben.

Han sighed, running a hand through his hair. “I'm not good at this, kid. I never say the right thing. But I promised you when you were a baby that I’d keep us going in the right direction, even if we got a little lost along the way. I meant it. So how do we fix what's...wrong with you? I can help you.”

“It doesn't matter,” Ben whispered, Snoke's proselytization repeating endlessly in his head, the words so entrenched in his own thoughts that they had become his own.
They don't love you... they never loved you... they lie to you... you're a burden... they would be happier without you... they only want to fix what is wrong with you... when they can't, they will abandon you... they will betray you...

“You say you care. You don't care. Nobody cares. I know you don't.” There was an enmity to Ben's tone, a darkness that terrified his father. Rey could see that Han's fears stemmed from the sudden darkness in his son, but Ben only saw the terror in his eyes as fear of him – the monster.

“How could you say that? Your mother and I have given you everything you need. Any other kid your age would be happy to have –”

“I don't want those things!” Ben balled his fists to contain the Force that tingled in his hands, itching for release.

“Son, you should be grateful to have those 'things,'” Han said sharply, his finger pointed at his son in accusation. “You should be grateful to have a family! I grew up on the streets with nothing! No home to burn down, no parents' lives to ruin. I had to fight to survive! You have everything a kid like me ever wanted, and you act like it’s nothing!”

“I don’t care! They’re just things! What good's a family if you're never here! You never listen! One day you won’t want me anymore! Because I'm bad! I tried, but I can't be good!”

Ben ran.

He ran from the officers, the firefighter droids and the neighbors. He ran from the disappointment of his father. His thoughts centered on a place to hide, a lake or an ocean to lull him to sleep, as his feet carried him down a path through a meadow. The darkness seemed to fade with every step he took toward his destination. It was the first time in Ben's memories that she had seen his thoughts brighten to something almost... happy. There was a strong pull from the Force as he started scrambling over a large rock outcropping, calling to the light inside him. The light was bright, blinding, greater than anything she had ever felt in him. Whatever this place was, it was his literal light in the darkness.

It'll be okay, he promised himself. I'll just go to sleep and see her, and she'll tell me it's... A strong arm pulled him backward off the rocks.
“Damn it, Ben, you can't just run away every time we try to talk to you!” his father said, voice thick with frustration as he struggled with his son. Ben's eyes welled with tears as he accepted that he couldn’t escape, surrendering silently, his light and hopes fading away as if they had never existed in the first place. He met his father's eyes as he waited for further discipline. Han sighed. “Don't look at me like that, son.”

When Ben didn't respond, Han scuffed at the dirt with his boot. “You have your mother's eyes.” Ben did not break his silence with an answer, instead, he narrowed his eyes and tilted his head slightly in confusion.

Han sighed again, scratching the back of his head. “Look, before when you said... you're not bad, okay? You're not the easiest kid, but you're my son, so what did I expect? I won't pretend I was the best kid, either. I get it. I should tell you to play with your simulator or learn a new language or do your weird writing thing. We can pretend that was my advice, okay? But since you're my son, what I would do, if I were you, is open up the HoloNet and watch holovids without the filters, or eat all the sweets Leia keeps in the closet, or get into the whiskey on the top shelf or find myself a girl… they're fun. Hold hands or whatever kids do at your age. You know... normal trouble-making stuff.” Han winked conspiratorially.

Rey could see how Han was trying desperately to reach his son. The problem was, he was so focused on the wrong Ben had done that he hadn’t stopped to wonder why he had done it. Without the Force, Ben needed help that Han couldn’t give him. “Look, kid I… What do you say we go back to the Falcon and watch Moray and Faz.”

Ben might have smirked in response to his father, though she couldn't sense the mirth she had before. He must have done something, however, brightened up in his own way, because Han relaxed in return. “I haven't watched that in years.”

“No, of course not; I knew that.” Han cleared his throat, glancing away. “But what about watching it for old time's sake?”

Ben nodded, and Han wrapped his arm tightly around his shoulder, smiling as he looked down at his son. This time Rey could feel the warmth in Ben and knew he was smiling back. It broke her heart and mended it with the same simple gesture between father and son.

The memory fractured suddenly; the edges were jagged, and the picture was broken and stuttering like an old schematic in the corroding remnants of ships in the Starship Graveyard. It reminded her of the first flashes of memories she had witnessed. The warmth was gone, the voices dark and distorted. “Let's go,” Han suggested, “Maybe later, I'll show you how to—”
The memory stopped abruptly, leaving only darkness for a moment. The memory hadn’t finished, but it was almost as if he had purposely forgotten any of the good parts.

It had become clear to Rey that the Force was trying to show her something. It had selected particular memories to share with her, and she suspected she would see exactly how he fell to darkness. Perhaps, it showed the events that led to the death of her parents. No matter how angry she was for what he had done, it hurt her to watch him suffer, knowing how it would end. There was a part of her that was growing to understand Ben Solo, and she hated it, because if she could see it, why hadn’t they?
Warning! This chapter and the following chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
A new memory appeared, only adding to her conflicted feelings.

Ben was sitting with his family at an ornate table, and he seemed… happier. Both of his parents were sitting at the table with him, and she felt his excitement by their presence and desire to hold their attention. Though she expected Ben to be a quiet and withdrawn child, as he was as an adult, she found him quite needy. Perhaps he still was.

Rey could feel his desire to be good, to prove he was worthy of their love. He was constantly fixated on gaining their approval, and Rey couldn’t understand why he would measure his worth by other's standards. Kylo clearly didn’t care what anyone thought of him. He was skilled, intelligent, and quite strong, why had Ben been so plagued with thoughts of inadequacy and disappointment in the eyes of others?

As a lowly scavenger, Rey knew that most of the galaxy judged the value of someone by their status and importance to others, a sentiment Rey knew from the throne room that Kylo accepted as truth. It made sense from his upbringing; he was the son of legends, he was already important enough by the galaxy’s standards. Why then, did he still torment himself with a desire to be worthy? Why had he cared what strangers whispered? He had his family, and his thoughts made it clear that they tried harder to be present after he set fire to the house. Rey was grateful that they tried to do right by him. They loved him. It may not have saved him, but it was better than giving up on him as her parents did to her. “My tutor says I’m ready to skip forward another academic year,” Ben said, leaning forward in his excitement.

Leia was scanning through a report on a datapad. “Of course, you are. I wouldn’t expect anything less from an Organa,” she replied. “Now get your elbows off the table. You may not be a prince, but you will behave like one.”

Ben huffed but did as he was told. “I beat the simulator in ten minutes today.”

“See?” Han piped in over a mouthful of food. “He’s got Solo blood in him too… somewhere.”

Leia lifted her eyes to glare at them both. “Well, that ‘Solo blood’ is giving him horrible posture. Sit up straight, Ben.”

Han smirked across the table at his son. “Ah, lay off him, princess.”
“It’s my responsibility to prepare him for the future, Han. He’ll thank me when he’s older.”

“I flew onto an Imperial Destroyer,” Ben continued as he shoved a large bite into his mouth. “I blew up the hangar and flew back out through fire before it collapsed. You should’ve seen it! And I blew up the bridge without engaging any of the enemy fighters at all!”

“Ben, chew like you have a secret, dear,” Leia said, without looking up.

Ben giggled as his father showed him the food in his mouth, but he swallowed his laughter contritely when Leia pinned him with a withering stare. Han cleared his throat as his attention shifted back to his meal. “Don’t get cocky kid, wait until you’ve got a real ship under your hands.” Han… wasn’t the best at compliments. Rey knew that from spending the short amount of time with him that she did. Ben, however, seemed immediately affected by it, even before the whisper confirmed his fears.

You’ll never be good enough for them…

There was an edge of resentment to his tone when he spoke again. “Does that mean I can go back to flying real ships?”

“You come from Naberrie, Amidala, and Organa blood,” Leia cut in, perhaps sensing how the conversation would turn, “a long line of influential politicians. Remember what I told you about our responsibility to create a better galaxy, Ben. You can change it for the better, but not from a cockpit.”

“Hey!” Han whined in mock petulance. “I think I’ve done plenty to help the galaxy from my cockpit.”

“Han.”

He shrugged when she looked up at him. “What? I’m just trying to help.”

Leia rolled her eyes before shifting her attention back to her datapad. “When have you ever helped?”
“The Death Star.” Han winked at Ben when she didn’t have a retort.

Ben, however, was not in the joking mood. “I don’t know if I want to be a politician.” Rey thought about him as a Senator, fighting for the right side. What if he had used his powers for good? Would the galaxy be any different?

“You are privileged, Ben,” Leia said, setting her datapad down to finally meet his stare, “and it is your duty to the galaxy to use that privilege to help others. You are destined for greatness.”

Rey could feel the pressure of her words spike an anxiety inside him, unraveling his tightly coiled emotions. “Do I even get a choice?”

Leia seemed to sense the change in her son. “Of course, we just want what is best for you.”

What’s best for you, or the galaxy…

Ben echoed the sentiment, the darkness leeching into his thoughts. You never cared what’s best for me.

“How am I supposed to be a politician when I can’t even control the Force inside me?” he said.

“It’s not like you can be a pilot, either,” Han said. “You might explode the ship with your mind.” Ben shot up from the table in anger.

Leia sighed. “What your father is trying to say is we all know where the… strengths you were born with would benefit the galaxy the most, and we’re encouraging you toward that very important destiny.”

“I don’t want a destiny!” Ben shouted. If Rey hadn’t been inside his mind, she would have thought the reaction overly severe to the conversation. But she felt his fear that he couldn’t become what they wanted him to be, and unfortunately, their words only fed that fear. Ben slammed the cup in his hand onto the table in his agitation, the glass breaking and slicing his hand under the force of it. Rey heard a chair scrape behind him as he fled from the table, but then his mother spoke. “Let him go, Han. You’ll only make it worse.”
You’re not good… you’re not worthy of their love… you ruined dinner… you ruined their happiness again… you ruin everything… can you do anything right… can you be what they want you to be… but the darkness can –

“Shut up!” he screamed as he fled to the solace of his room. Cradling his injured hand, he collapsed to the floor, leaning against the wall as he cried. Glass protruded from the wound, blood dripping onto the floor, but it wasn’t the physical pain that caused his tears.

“See?” Han said from the other room. “Right there, that’s what I’ve been talking about. Something’s wrong with him; the kid’s too emotional. We try to talk to him, and he throws a fit. Every time.”

“Oh, he just hasn’t been sleeping well.” Rey was dumbfounded by Leia’s dismissive tone.

You are so intelligent and observant as a general; why didn’t you see that something was happening to your own son?

Han lowered his voice, but Ben heard him all the same. “You like to talk about Naberrie and Amidala and Organa bloodlines, but we both know there’s another bloodline you refuse to talk about.”

“Han…” Leia said in warning.

“Stop trying to make him an Organa or Solo, when you know the kid’s a Skywalker.”

Ben gripped his fists in anger, plunging the piece of glass deeper into his hand. Rey sensed that Ben didn’t know why he hated being included in the Skywalker legacy, only that when they were disappointed in him, Anakin Skywalker was the one they compared him with. Anakin Skywalker… not Darth Vader. It was a curious distinction to Rey, but one he didn’t contemplate.

“And what?” Leia’s voice carried from the other room. “You think he’d make a better Jedi than a Senator?”

Han’s next words sent a shudder through both young Ben and Rey, for entirely different reasons.
“I’m just saying, he is more like his grandfather than any of us.” Why can’t I be like them? Ben wondered. Why do I have to be like him? Rey knew it was not the first time he had heard the comparison; she sensed his loathing toward the man he had never met. Ironic, she realized, that he would grow to idolize that man, fearing that he was not enough like him.

One day… the whisper promised, you will realize the true power of your bloodline.

And with those words, Rey understood that they had not yet told him who his grandfather was.

What will he do when he finds out?

“That Jedi life may work for my brother, but I would never want that for our son,” Leia insisted. “He already struggles with darkness; you know how that ended for… his grandfather. I’ll teach him to hide those emotions behind a politician’s mask. I learned it early, he’ll learn it too. And we’ll just work more to teach him how to suppress the Force. I lived fine without it, so can he.” Rey wondered if he would have been happier if he could have.

A new memory emerged, though at first Rey thought the last memory had repeated.

Ben was sitting rigid and taciturn at the same ornate table, staring at a plate of food that made Rey’s mouth water. She had never seen food in the amount and selection he had in front of him. What was worse, he wasn’t eating a single bite of it. He had pierced a piece on his utensil and was dragging it aimlessly around the plate. It physically hurt Rey to see food that had not been consumed. Until she had spent time at the Resistance, she had never witnessed someone waste food before. Her aversion to his meal habits was quickly forgotten when she realized why.

His thoughts before had centered upon a yearning for his parents’ attention, a desire to be good enough for them, but these thoughts were different. This was the first family dinner with both parents in months, but all Ben wanted to do was escape from that house. His teeth clenched as his parents carried on in – what Rey suspected – was not the first argument of the day.

Leia hadn’t asked Han to do anything, but she must have given some facial expression or signal, because he huffed in response before she whispered fiercely, “Now.”

Ben was staring at his own plate, but Rey could hear the exasperation already in his father’s voice. “Gee, I must have forgotten I was speaking with royalty.”
“Force, Han, you are so… so….”

“That bad, huh?” Rey could hear the smile in Han’s voice. Ben braced himself for his mother’s reaction.

“Is everything a joke to you?”

Han placed his hand over his heart in mock offense. “Hey, you love that about me.”

_No one loves that about you_, Ben thought to himself. He stared down at the table, fighting the anger that was boiling up inside him and the darkness beguiling him to help him ease that anger.

“No one loves that about you, Ben thought to himself. He stared down at the table, fighting the anger that was boiling up inside him and the darkness beguiling him to help him ease that anger.

“Not when I’m trying to have a serious conversation,” Leia hissed through her teeth, refusing to raise her voice at the dinner table. Clearly some parts of being raised a princess just stuck.

_What did you do now, Ben?_

“I’m not interested in having a serious conversation, Your Worship.”

_Listen to them…_

“For the last time, stop calling me that!”

_You cause them to fight like this_...

“Fine, Princess, no need to blow a fuse.”

_They would be happier without you…_

Their words were rapid-fire, and Ben did his best to ignore them. Judging by his thoughts, Rey knew he believed it was best not to get involved, because he was convinced he would only make it worse.

Leia sighed. “Do you care at all?”

This is all your fault…

“Hey, now don’t go twisting my words again,” Han’s voice had gained a more frustrated tone. “I do care. More than anyone else sitting here. Probably.”

“You sure have a funny way of showing it!” Rey didn’t need Ben’s thoughts to know that it wouldn’t end well. Eying Ben’s food on his plate, the food he was still pushing around aimlessly, she suddenly didn’t feel hungry, either.

“Sorry, sweetheart, dinner first, no sense in letting the food go cold on me, too,” Han said, before gesturing to Ben with his utensil. “Eat up, kid.”

“If you’re in the mood for another serving of Leia’s version of a perfect family, then be my guest,” Ben grumbled. “But save room for a dessert. Tonight it’s accusations covered in witty comebacks with a sprinkling of resentment. As tempting as it is, I think I’ll pass.”

How often was it like this? Rey wondered.

Both parents ignored Ben as if he hadn’t even spoken; they were too busy glaring at each other across the table. “Stop avoiding this, Han. This is more important than food.”

Han fiddled with his fork, something – Rey learned through Ben’s thoughts – that profoundly irritated his mother. “The problem can wait another twenty minutes.”

The irritation clearly had its desired effect; Leia’s lips were pursed, her jaw tight. When she finally spoke, her words had lost their plea. “It’s always later! Or next week! Or next month! Now!”

“But how can I think on an empty stomach?”
“This isn’t funny, Han! Something is wrong with your son!” Leia shouted, and Ben’s fists clenched as his own anger escalated. He stared at his plate with such intensity, Rey thought it might shatter from his thoughts.

_They think something is “wrong” with you... No matter what you do, you will never be good enough… Do they love you… Do they want you… Or will you only ever be nothing but a burden to them… Worthless…_

The humor had disappeared from Han’s voice. “How is that my fault?”

Ben exhaled slowly through his nose.

_Do you have to ask? She’ll blame you for leaving for months, you’ll blame her for caring more about the New Republic than us. We all know how it ends._

Rey wondered if Leia would take the bait as Ben suggested, knowing the general she would become, but she did not disappoint when she replied sharply. “Don’t you dare make this about my career!”

_Would they even care if you were gone…_

“Shut up!” Ben screamed, slamming his fists on the table, disrupting the dinnerware. His hands were no longer those of a boy, but he was not yet a man. She wondered how old he was. She wondered how old she had been, what she had been doing, as the darkness slowly consumed Ben Solo.

_Why can’t they see what this is doing to him?_

“Watch your mouth!” Han said sternly, pointing his utensil at Ben. “Don’t you talk to your mother that way!”

“Why? I learned from the best!”

Han stood, glaring at his son across the table. Ben’s eyes shifted down to his plate, tense as he waited for his father’s reaction in uneasy silence. Rey couldn’t see the expression on Han’s face, but based upon the split second of pain she witnessed before Ben looked away, she didn’t think it was the anger that Ben believed was there. At least, it wasn’t anger directed at Ben. Leia said nothing to ease the tension, or perhaps she believed any words would only escalate the argument further. The silence stretched between them all until Han moved. Without a word, he picked up his plate from the table and left the room, something loud crashing on the other side of the house.

Run away like you always do, Ben thought miserably.

The memory changed to a new one, but the setting didn’t. Ben was still seated at the same table, still staring down at his untouched plate, but the darkness in the Force around him was suffocating. Rey assumed it must have been several years since his last memory, solely based upon the sheer weight of his darkness.

What did I miss?

He wasn’t asking himself what he had done wrong or why he was "bad" anymore. It was almost as if he had stopped trying to win his parents’ favor – he had accepted everything the others had said about him. She wanted to go back, to see the moment it changed. That was what she was there for, wasn’t it; to see the moment it all began to spiral? Rey grew frustrated with the Force, balking at having to witness his memories without an answer for why the darkness had grown.

What happened to him?

The Force answered as it was wont to do, through feelings and perceptions. It guided her to focus on his thoughts, which weren’t centered on one particular event that was drawing his agitation. His anger lacked a source, a defining moment that he drew his darkness from. She felt the same problems she had felt in him from the beginning. He had continued to feel the pressure of living up to the expectations thrust on him by the legacy of his family. He had continued to disappoint those around him because he was different, because he couldn’t control his darkness, because he was too much like his grandfather. The whispers continued to shape his thoughts, and his parents didn’t see what it was doing to him, or convinced themselves they didn’t. They fought more as he pulled away, because he had been the one holding two very different people together. It was simple to see the progression looking back, and Rey realized perhaps there hadn’t been a single cause. Perhaps that was the point of witnessing all those memories.

Ben had believed it was one defining moment that had caused his fall, but maybe that was too simplistic; maybe those memories were all pieces of a puzzle, each seemingly insignificant piece fitting together to create an inevitability; a perfect storm. No single event, no single person, was responsible for his turn, and yet, all of it was. If that was the case – if it wasn’t just Snoke or Luke or his parents or his own darkness, if it wasn't only that night at the temple as he had suggested –
“Why were you in the Senate building today?”

Ben's eyes darted up from his plate to his mother sitting at the other end of the long table that stretched between them. He studied her for a moment, gauging something from her reaction. His eyes drifted back to his plate, and the air became uncomfortable and heavy in his silence. The only sound in the room was the irritating scratch of his utensil on the plate in front of him.

This time, her tone was less casual. “Ben, why were you in the Senate building today?”

“Why do you care?” he responded with a petulant sigh, his tone clipped and abrasive. He hadn't even bothered to look up from his food that he had no interest in.

Leia was having none of his deflection. There was a loud clang as she slammed down her own utensils on the table. Judging by the jolt through his body and his eyes snapping to hers in rapt attention, it was something quite abnormal for her. She carefully folded her napkin across her lap with trembling hands before continuing. “What business did you have with the Arkanis Senator and that guest you attacked at the benefit dinner?”

His breath caught in his throat. She knows. “People don’t lie to the ones they love,” she reminded him. He wished broken promises had been included in that sentiment as well. Ben wouldn't lie to her, but he couldn’t tell her the truth, either.

You know what happens if you tell her the truth... Snoke whispered in his head.

There was still a twist of revulsion in his stomach when he heard the creature's voice. Rey wondered when that changed, if it ever did. Ben could feel the heat of his mother's stare as he hardened his face into an unreadable mask – a “politician’s mask.” He recalled the steps Snoke had taught him to protect his thoughts and feelings from other Force-sensitives. Rey was taken aback by his gratitude toward the monster, believing someone cared enough to help him when no one else would. She knew Snoke never cared; why couldn't her bondmate see it? Ben carefully raised the barriers around his mind, the effort strenuous and incomplete in his inexperience. Leia's eyes widened as she sensed him withdraw from their familial connection in the Force.

“Ben!”
Why would you care now? I tried to tell you before, but you were too busy. I tried to get away from him, but you wouldn't listen. Now that he is showing me the failures of the New Republic, showing me that all your time away from us has been for nothing, showing me what the galaxy needs, now you care?

He lowered his eyes from hers, desperate to avoid the look of despair, as he shoveled a bite of food into his mouth. Forcing himself to swallow, to pretend that everything was all right as they always did, he grasped the edge of the table to center himself. Rey could sense that Leia had never questioned him like this before. He pushed more food onto his utensil, scooping it past his lips, before answering around the mouthful with feigned ignorance. “Why, uh, why would you think I went somewhere with Snoke?”

Leia's gasp created an immediate tension in his body. She didn't need to say another word for him to know that he had just inadvertently told her everything she needed to know. “Ben,” she breathed. “How long has this been going on?”

He swallowed wearily, refusing to meet her eyes. He continued to shovel bites of food in his mouth, to belay his fear, overriding his desire to gag.

If you tell them... they will see your darkness... they will send you away... when that doesn’t work... you know what they will do to you... Snoke whispered in warning in his mind.

Ben hoped that Snoke was wrong, that they would never send him away, but he still found himself too terrified to test it. “It's none of your concern,” he said as steadily as he could muster, “Waste your time on the New Republic like you always do. My life never mattered before; there's no point in pretending now.”

Leia's hands slammed down onto the table as she rose from her seat. His eyes followed her movement automatically, and he saw the fear in hers. She stared at him as if she was only now truly seeing him for the first time, and, perhaps, there was a part of him that she was. “What has he done to you?” she grit out.

“Nothing.” He said it as if it were true. Rey felt the call from inside of him, the bright light of truth, to reveal all the secrets that he had built up around himself. It begged him to see that he had yearned for this moment for years. Leia was listening; she wanted to know what was wrong rather than pretend he wasn't suffering. There was a hand outstretched to finally help him, but he wouldn't take it. He carefully set his utensils down on either side of his plate, wiping his mouth with his napkin before setting it on the table in a grand display. He pushed his chair back, prepared to stand in an effort to escape her pointed stare.
“You are not going anywhere!” Leia snapped, “You are staying right here with me and explaining what has happened to you, or so help me, Ben, I'll drag you with me to the Senator and her associate and find out myself. No one is leaving until I get to the bottom of this.” Ben felt the anger burning in his chest, flickering down his arms into his fingertips that were pressed against the table-top in a challenge. His mother stared him down, mirroring his posture. Her eyes looked at him – truly looked at him – for the first time in as long as he could remember. She saw him for what he was, not what she wanted him to be. Her face softened. “Ben, if he... hurt you, in any way, you can tell me. I won't be mad. I can protect you.” Rey sighed in relief. Understanding – this was what he needed all along. Leia had stopped pretending he would be all right long enough to notice that he wouldn't. This was everything he needed, but Ben didn't agree.

He scoffed, before a laugh escaped his lips. It was a humorless, sordid thing. “Can you?” Rey could hear the cruel smile in his voice. “It's a little late for that, isn't it?”

Where were you! his mind screamed. Where were you years ago when I begged you to listen about the whispers, when I crawled into your bed at night after my nightmares, when you told me you would never let anything bad happen to me, and I was foolish enough to believe you? But in the morning, you would pretend that the whispers and the terrible things that happened in my nightmares were all just my imagination! Where were you when I tried to tell you about the darkness, when I tried to tell you what he was doing to me, when I begged you to listen? Every call for help went unanswered. You never protected me; why should I believe you now?

Ben didn't scream any of those accusations at his mother, the one person who needed to hear them. She loved him, Rey knew without a doubt she would have listened, she would have tried to help him. He didn't give her any insight into his cruel behavior, however. Rey wondered if he had done the same to her. Was the true Ben Solo hiding behind everything that wasn’t said? What had she missed? “And what if I don't want your help?”

Leia was stunned into silence. It was as if the woman instantly aged before her eyes. Rey could see the illusion of her perfect family threatening to crumble around her, but she drew strength from the Force, standing strong against the pain that would tear her down. She stood against the darkness that was tearing her family apart, against the past she refused to face. The Force was ignited in the light that buried her agony. Her biological father had killed her mother. He had blown up her home, killed her adoptive parents and the people she loved. He had committed mass murder, and she shared his tainted blood. Her first love had died in her arms. Her marriage to Han was failing. Her son was troubled, more than she had realized, and showed signs of his grandfather's darkness. The New Republic was failing. She should have been lost, but the light inside her gave her the strength to weather it all. She still suffered. It was too much for any one person to face, and Ben's own struggles had slipped through the cracks. Still, Rey was thankful that in that moment she was present. “How long has he been turning you against us?”

Anger darkened his hopeless words. “Long enough.”
There was an immediate pain that pierced through his mind. He cried out and fell to his knees, covering his ears as he struggled to block out the sensation. Something foreign, yet terrifyingly familiar, seeped into his mind and paralyzed his thoughts, clawing and digging for something. Images of his own family attempting to kill him in every way he could imagine flashed through his mind. She knows... the voice whispered. She knows… they will send you away... they will abandon you... they will betray you... then they will kill you because of your darkness… I’ve seen it… I can help you before it’s too late…

“No!” he screamed, refusing to listen to the voice. “You're a liar! Get out! Get out of my head!” His fear consumed him, building and strengthening in the Force. They all knew he was losing control, and they all knew the consequences if he did. Ben squeezed his eyes shut in a futile attempt to shut out both his emotions and the monster in his mind. He struggled against it until he felt his mother grasp his hands, tearing them away from the side of his head.

She struggled with him as he tried to fight her off. “Ben, is that Snoke? Is he one of the whispers?” With the uncontrollable power in his hands, he was a weapon, he could kill her.

Use the darkness, Snoke suggested.

In desperation, Ben released himself to the power of the darkness, intentionally sabotaging the years of barricades he had created against its reaching depths it could never be extracted from. A sharp cold burst through him like rushing water through a broken valve, feeding on the fear to soothe the escalating chaos. It was working. Surrendering to the intoxicating power of the darkness, he allowed his head to fall forward and closed his eyes in relief. Control over his emotions slowly returned. The weight on his chest diminished; he could breathe again. That is, until a hand brushed the hair back from his face.

“Get away from me!” he shouted instinctively. He startled, the cruelty in his voice instantly sobering. Leia stumbled away from him, falling backward into the table and sending dishware shattering to the floor. She said nothing as she stared in horror at her son. Han staggered into the room moments later to investigate the commotion. Ben turned toward his father, and Rey watched his face twist in terror.

“Holy Hell,” he whispered, his hand moving to the blaster at his hip. “Leia, what happened? His eyes are black and –” evil, Ben fished from a quick skim of his father's mind.

“I don't know,” his mother lied, her eyes never leaving Ben's. If she had intended to win her son’s favor with the secret, it didn’t work. All Ben focused on was her lie. According to her, people didn’t lie to the ones they loved. But she lied to Han, even though she claimed to love him. He feared she lied to him as well. Why did you keep that secret from Han? Leia reached for her son, but he flinched. She reluctantly lowered her outstretched hand. “There’s just so much darkness.”

Han stepped forward into the room with his hands extended, as well. He wasn’t trying to reach for Ben, however, only calm him, as if he were trying to quiet a caged animal. His attention was focused solely on his son as he walked further into the room. Ben recognized the look in his eyes from the other children and neighbors and police and teachers and strangers who witnessed his outbursts. Fear. They all saw the same thing in him. Monster. “Leia, lock yourself in our chambers, then call your brother.” With one last tearful look, she fled from the room, giving her husband as wide a birth as her son. Ben winced as her door shut him out with a loud whoosh. Once she was gone, Han abandoned his attempt to reach Ben. He backed from the dining area, his eyes still fixed on his son in warning.

“Stay here.” He pressed his palm into the controls, and the door to the dining area slammed shut with a taunting echo. Ben shut his eyes to escape the terror on their faces that was burned into his retinas. He collapsed against the wall and slid down to curl upon himself. As the darkness faded, the fear set in.

_They will abandon you, but I won’t. You are worthless to them, but I know your true potential._

In that moment, as the room was locked from the outside, casting him in darkness, and he wondered if Snoke was right. Rey began to understand how Ben could join that monster. He felt so worthless, he trusted the first person who told him he wasn’t. The creature had manipulated him to be exactly what he wanted him to be. Ben thought he had made a choice, but all he did was allow Snoke to lead him into his trap.

The next memory was eerily similar. His parents were seated at the other end of the table from Ben. It was clear that a short time had passed since the last memory, as his thoughts were still analyzing and reanalyzing what had happened. His hands were clenched in fists as he stared down at his plate, not bothering with the pretense of eating.

“I forgot to express my congratulations on your championship win, Han,” Leia said with sincerity.

“Uh, thank you,” he replied without the usual tinge of sarcasm, “congratulations on passing that, er, Senate thing.”

Leia chuckled softly. “The bill? I’m surprised you were paying attention.”

Ben braced for another argument, but was pleasantly surprised with his father’s answer. “I do. Pay attention. More than you know.” The words broke through Ben’s stormy thoughts. He lifted his eyes to watch his mother reach across the table, squeezing his father’s hand. His father returned the gesture by raising her hand to his lips, kissing each of her fingers gently. There were no snide remarks, no defensiveness, no battle of wits. Their hands remained clasped as they both went back to staring at their own datapads, eating their food contentedly in the silence.

It was the most peaceful moment he had witnessed between them in a long while, and he felt it was because he wasn’t sharing a part of it with them. They were both on top of their professions, equals, each powerful in their own right. They had earned the other’s love with their success. He would never be valuable unless he was someone important like they were.

He looked up when he heard whispering as Leia showed Han a message on her datapad. Both of their eyes turned to him, noticing him for the first time since they had sat down at dinner, and he wanted nothing more than for the peace to return to what it had been.

“Ben,” Han said, clearing his throat after she nudged him with an elbow, “how do you feel about your uncle teaching you more about the Force? I think we all know your mother and I are out of our depth here.”

“That’s fine, I guess.” His eyes were suddenly everywhere but on the heavy stares across the table. “When is he coming?”

“We think,” his mother drawled, eying her husband nervously. “You should join him at his training temple.”

Ben was confused. They knew his desire to be a pilot. They had never mentioned their hopes for him to train before; they had both actively ignored his Force abilities, asking him to suppress them, not explore them. As far as he knew, they both wished he had been born without the Force. “You want me to train as a Jedi?”

“Yeah, uh, Luke thinks it will help you control your…powers,” Han said, and Ben began to wonder if their intentions were less about bettering him and more about fixing him.

“But I don’t want to be a Jedi.”

Leia sounded as if she were on the verge of tears, something he had heard rarely from his mother. “Give it some time, sweetheart; maybe you will.”
He began to understand then; this was how he could be worthy. His parents grew angry with him when he couldn’t control the Force, but they also talked about how powerful he could become. Leia pushed him to be "someone important to the galaxy." If he was the best at what he did, like they were, then they would see him. If he became powerful, someone important, then he would deserve their love. The galaxy would look at him as something other than a monster.

They wanted him to become a Jedi like his uncle and like his father before him. They had compared Ben to his grandfather since he was young, and now he understood why. This was the life they wanted for him. If he became the powerful Jedi hero like Anakin Skywalker, then he would become someone important to the galaxy, then he would be important to them. It wasn’t the life he wanted for himself, but if he could become as great as his grandfather was, then maybe he would finally be worthy of their love.

Rey listened to the thoughts he was convinced were truths, and she began to understand the man he was a little better. To someone who thought the way she did, his actions were evil; but she was starting to understand how profoundly differently he experienced the galaxy. What had been her truth was not necessarily his. She had been right before. It was impossible to understand him through her own worldview. Though she was certain his beliefs were skewed, as long as he believed them, then understanding his beliefs and motivations was the only way she could empathize and reason with him. Kylo didn’t want power because he was evil; he wanted power because he believed it made him worthy of those things he had always wanted. She just had to prove it didn’t.

He sighed in defeat, abandoning his own hopes and dreams in an instant as if they were meaningless. “Okay, when do I leave?”

“We will leave as soon as we’re packed,” Han said, his own voice tight and abnormally quiet.

“How long is each training year?” It hurt Ben to imagine being separated from them for what could amount to months at a time, but they were gone so often anyway, he thought perhaps scheduled breaks would give them a chance to schedule vacations together. Perhaps they would miss him. “When are my breaks to come home?”

The look shared between his parents stirred a heavy, bitter feeling in his stomach. He tried his best to swallow past the tightness in his throat as his vision blurred. “I’m not coming home again, am I?”

Leia wouldn’t look at him as she spoke, “Training takes years. By the time you become a Jedi Knight, you’ll be an adult, Ben. You’ll have a life of your own.”
Snoke was right.

Rey listened to his internal dialogue, and suddenly the path before him was becoming clearer, like walking into the eye of a dust storm. His parents thought they were setting him on a new path to something better, but his internal truths were so twisted that they didn’t see where it would end. There were still so many unanswered questions, but she could see the outcome now. They weren’t terrible parents; they were only trying to do what they believed was best. They could have saved him if they had only had the benefit of foresight. Without it, Ben Solo’s fall was all but inevitable.
Warning! This chapter and the following chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.

On a lighter note, I always imagined the 'Mirrorbright' song having the same melody as 'Once Upon a December.'
Jedi Knight Training

Chapter Summary

Fun fact - the characters introduced in this chapter are repurposed Legends characters, scroll down to the end notes for the names of the actors and actresses I imagined for the characters.

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
The memory faded into a new one.

Han and Leia stood before him as he begged with an unsteady pitch to his voice.

“Please... don’t make me stay. Let's go home. I’ll be better, I promise. I’ll control it, I’ll do anything. I don’t want to be a Jedi. If you love me, please, let me come home,” his voice cracked. “Please... don’t leave me.” Rey could feel the agony tearing him apart. His mother embraced him.

“Ben, it's only goodbye for a little while. We'll come back for you, I promise,” Leia whispered.
Those words... my dream. Could that dream have been about Ben the whole time? Was it his memory I was reliving, not my own?

“Then why does this feel like goodbye forever?” Rey's heart ached with his as he felt from the depths of his soul that they would never come back for him.

“We love you, Ben,” she cried, “Don’t you ever forget that.”

“Mom, wait!” he shouted after her, but she shook her head between soft sobs, as she turned back toward the ship. Ben turned toward his father, twisting his hand into the material of his father's shirt to force him to stay.

“Please... don’t do this,” Ben begged him. “I need... I need your help. There's so much darkness inside me, I don’t know how to stop it. If you leave me here, I’m so scared that I won’t be strong enough to fight it alone.”

“Look – I'm not great with this 'advice' thing, kid,” Han said distantly. “Or saying goodbye. But, it's too late for all that, son, it’s time to grow up. You've got to stop blaming everyone else for your problems. You have darkness in you that we don’t understand, you’re scaring your mother. We're as lost in this as you are, and we can’t give you the help you need. Your uncle is the only one left who can do that. This is the only way to fix you.” He reached for his son as if he would embrace him, grasp him on the shoulder, touch his cheek... but he stopped himself, dropping an object into the boy's hand instead. Ben knew what it was, but he looked down at the pair of golden dice resting in his palm. “For luck,” he whispered, refusing to meet his son's desperate, beseeching eyes, before turning back toward the Millennium Falcon.

“We're not done yet!!” Ben cried. “Turn around! At least look me in the eyes when you admit that all I’ve ever been to you is a burden. You don't want me! You are abandoning me with someone I barely know!” Han hesitated, his head dropping as he rubbed his hand over his face. “Look at me!”

“No, son,” his father said quietly, standing with his back to Ben. “I won't do that.”

“What do you think you’ll see if you do! My mother?”

“No.”
Ben’s voice trembled as he forced himself to give life to his next words. “A monster?”

“I don’t know anymore,” Han sighed, trudging back to the ship after his wife.

“Don’t make me watch you leave again in that piece of junk. You care more about that ship than you do me!” His father did not respond, which only agitated Ben more. He squeezed the pair of golden dice in his fist, shaking in anger, before throwing them at his father. They landed in the dirt at the man’s feet. “If you leave, you’re dead to me!” Ben screamed. Han picked them up, paused for a moment, then continued walking to the ship. The whispers returned.

_I told you they would leave...They do not recognize your potential... They fear your raw, untamed power... They call you a monster...But that is what makes you unique... You are truly special... If they cared, they would recognize that...But they reject you...They don’t love you... They all hate you... They lie to your face...You do everything for them... yet they throw you away like garbage... But you’re no fool...You see it... They have abandoned you... They will all betray you... And one day they will kill you because they fear your power...You belong on the dark side... The darkness realizes your true potential... I realize your true potential... Reject the Jedi... Train with me... Call me master..._ Rey’s blood ran cold as Ben hesitated, considering the words. Before, he had done everything he could to force the voice out. He didn’t obey, but he considered it.

“Hey, kid.” The boy stiffened and turned. Rey recognized the man standing in front of Ben. His hair was shorter and darker, his eyes less jaded, but she would recognize him anywhere.

“It’s Master Skywalker now. Welcome to my Jedi temple,” Luke smiled. Ben believed his parents had abandoned him, given up on him. Luke had become his last hope. _It'll be okay, he can fix me. It's Luke. He found the good in Darth Vader – the man who killed his father – and convinced him to turn on the emperor to save the galaxy. Vader was a stranger; I'm his nephew. If anyone can find the good in me, it's him_, he thought, still so optimistic that the dull ache in Rey's chest returned. It was torture, watching his inevitable fall, knowing all she could do was bear witness.

Luke turned to reveal a dozen other young students in Jedi robes behind him. “Padawans, this is Ben Solo. Ben, these are the other padawans.” She –Ben – was introduced to the other students. His memory was clouded unnaturally, almost fractured, as he was introduced to the first six.

The first student, a Mon Calamari, stepped forward. “The name is Clighal, from Mon Cala,” she introduced herself with a giggle. Her overtunic, pants, and robes were all shades of tan, it brought out the vibrant orange of her skin. Though the young student’s energy was kind and gentle, the response Rey felt in her bondmate was bitterness and resentment. Rey wondered if Ben’s feelings arose more from his lack of desire to be there than toward the Mon Calamari herself.

She was followed by a human male who was darker in complexion like Finn. He was not as broad as her best friend, but he was taller. His smile was as warm and bright as her best friend, with an energy to match. His energy was strong. When Rey noticed his clouded eyes, she realized he used the Force exclusively to navigate and perceive the galaxy around them. He wore shades of blue that reminded her of the oceans on Ahch-To. “Hi, I’m Dal Konur, from Ord Mantell.” When Rey felt her bondmate’s resentment toward him as well, she wondered if they were Ben’s feelings in the past, as she had first believed, or Kylo’s feelings currently.

The next student was a tall, blue Twi-lek wearing robes in different shades of grey. She stepped forward with a poise and confidence that caught Ben’s attention. And Rey’s. Still, there was an animosity there she couldn’t explain. “My name is Alema, from Ryloth,” she said with vibrant red lips. It was her sparkling green eyes that Ben focused on, but there was something else there; a memory of something or someone else. The Twi-lek’s energy belonged to a warrior; it was strong and fierce, but also more jagged than Clighal or Dal’s energy had felt. The scars that painted her skin told a story of a harsh upbringing on her world. Rey knew that several of the students eventually left with Kylo after he killed the other students. Rey wondered if Alema had been one of them.

The next student was another human. He was a blonde-haired boy, paler in complexion than even Ben. The black and dark browns of his attire contrasted with his vibrant green eyes. They were oddly dark for a Jedi, Rey thought, and looked more like Kylo’s current attire. There was something else about the boy that seemed… less than friendly. “Cade Calixte, from Ossus,” he said. The burning hatred her bondmate carried toward the boy was not reserved for a stranger. These intense feelings left Rey with little doubt that she was feeling Kylo’s, not Ben’s, emotions.

Most of the students seemed close to the same age, but the last girl, a human, seemed a few years younger. “Hi, I’m Tionne. Tionne Solusar, from Rindao,” she said timidly, twisting her fingers nervously as she stared up at him. Despite her demure demeanor, her golden-brown eyes were bright and friendly. Her energy was gentle and easy-going, nothing like the anxiety she outwardly portrayed. Her tunic and trousers were shades of tan with a long green robe that contrasted well with her beautiful red curly hair. Her skin was tanned from years of exposure under a bright sun as Rey’s was, but the girl did not bear the signs physically or in her energy of the harsh upbringing on a ruthless world. There was an innocence to her energy that none of the others possessed. Rey had seen this girl, in the flashes of memories in his dreams. For the first time, she didn’t feel the anger from her bondmate that he carried toward the others. Only… sorrow.

The next boy reminded her of Poe. He was taller, and his thick, black hair was not quite as curly. They both had the same scruffy shadow of a beard. This boy was more serious as opposed to Poe’s cockiness, but the commanding eyes were the same. They were perceptive and captivating eyes, confident, shadowed underneath bushy eyebrows. The only difference was the color. This boy had a light hazel blue to Poe's darker brown. His attire was similar to what she had seen most Jedi wear; tan pants with a mixture of browns for his tunic and robes. Though not as volatile as Ben, his Force signature was intense. I have no doubt he would be a formidable opponent. Rey was not sure whether that was Ben’s thought or hers.

“Kyp Durron, from Deyer,” he told Ben, never breaking eye contact. Strength in Force Persuasion, specifically Force Fear, and Battle Precognition. It was her bond mate’s resonant voice, a reverent pride in his tone. She wondered if he was talking directly to her, or if it was an echo of his mind’s knowledge tied to the man.

The next boy seemed a year or two older than Ben, though he had facial hair on his lip and chin that might have made him look more mature in her eyes. “Corran Horn, from Corellia.” Strength in Psychometry and Crucitorn. His light-colored eyes were hidden by the hair that fell in his face – long brown hair that reached his shoulders – but she could see the hardness to them. He did not strike her as a Force-sensitive. He seemed more like Han – rough, roguish and solitary. He looked like he had lived a hard life but could get himself out of any sticky situation because of it. Corron wore black pants, a darker tunic, and a sand-colored robe that was slung over his shoulder. His Force signature was calm, controlled, and unemotional. In short, he was the opposite of Ben.

The next was a tall, Khommite clone. He wore monochromatic brown, but it contrasted well with the green of his skin, which was covered with warts and knotted bony structures, including a protruding, monstrous ridge on his hairless cranium. He had webbed, clawed hands and bright yellow eyes, but they seemed kind and gentle to Rey. He wrapped Ben in a strong, unwanted, and – most definitely – unreciprocated embrace. “Dorsk 81, from Khomm,” he smiled. “You can call me Dorsk.” Strength in Force Empathy and Force Suppression.

A younger boy walked up to Ben. He was slimmer and shorter than the others, possibly the youngest, but it was difficult for Rey to guess their ages. He had a bubbly, genuine personality, but his dark almond eyes were deep with intellect. He had shiny, wild, spiked black hair that seemed to defy gravity. While he wore mostly brown, there was a colorful blue band that wrapped around his forehead, which matched his outer robe. Strength in Morichro and Pyrokenisis.

“Rayf Ysanna from Ossos,” he said with a wide smile. “Please tell me you like holochess. No one here will play holochess with me.”

“That is because you always win,” a lilting voice behind him replied. Ben turned to meet a pair of icy blue eyes staring up at him through long, black eyelashes. Rey had never seen a blue as intense as that girl’s eyes. She had beautiful, thick, chestnut brown hair that flowed freely around her face. Her full lips were cocked in a coy smirk, and Rey immediately felt a pang of jealousy as Ben studied her with intrigue. Her clothes were dark, almost black, and their fit left little to the imagination.
She was classically beautiful and carried herself with an air of refinement and elegance that Rey could never replicate. Even though she exuded poise and class, her eyes warned that she was intense and strong – a Force not to be reckoned with. Deadly. Rey could see why she intrigued Ben.

“My name is Jaina Fel and this is my twin brother... “

“Jacen,” he finished for her, “we’re from Coruscant.” Both have strength in telepathy, as well as Force cloak and Force wound, respectively. Rey wondered what her bondmate’s strongest abilities were, but her best guess after her experiences when they were enemies was Telekinesis and Mind Probing.

Jacen had the same piercing blue eyes as his sister. His hair was a lighter chestnut color and relatively shorter than the other padawans. He was of slighter build than Ben and comparatively shorter, but still muscular. He smiled a genuine, captivating smile, and Rey knew he was someone that she could have easily been friends with. His clothes were lighter than his sister’s, but still dark comparatively. His Force signature shimmered with strong emotions. She knew, somehow, that he was a very passionate and loyal soul.

Another boy stepped forward, with wavy dark brown hair like Ben that swept across his face in the breeze. He had brown eyes with bright gold flecks as well, but his eyes were kind, gentle, not nearly as intense as her bondmate’s. His energy wasn’t strong, but it was warm and bright, like a steady river. “Dev,” he said. “Dev Sibwarra, from Chandrila. Strength in Force Healing and Force Vision. His clothes were light, nearly all white, and Ben seemed interested in the righteousness it portrayed. Everything about the boy screamed “Jedi,” and Ben decided that he wanted to become more like him. Rey remembered from the memory he had shared with her on Ahch-To, that he had, at least in appearance.

A pang of sympathy twisted in Rey’s stomach. Something about the strong, tumultuous conflict that radiated through the bond told her that this boy had been important to Ben. It didn’t require her memory of the flashes in his dreams to know that he did not flee the temple with Ben; the profound ache over the bond was enough.

Fractured memories began to flash before her eyes again. The first was Ben playing a game of Dejarik by saber-light with Rayf in the middle of the night, both taking the game too seriously, but enjoying it nonetheless. Then the memory cut away to him throwing daggers with Corran; the emotions had faded, but she could sense their easy-going friendship anyway. Then she saw a flash of him training against droids with Kyp. When the jagged edge of that memory had passed, she watched him run laps around the temple with Tionne in the early morning hours, companionably debating Jedi beliefs as they pushed each other to go faster. That memory flickered into one of Dorsk teaching him techniques to control his emotions and him returning the favor by teaching the Khommite different fighting stances. She watched him play Force games with Jaina, bantering with sarcasm and witty retorts.

The last memories were longer, though no less fractured. It was clear he was closest to Jacen and Dev, as they practiced, explored and drank Corellian Whiskey together. Ben smiled often in those memories; she felt the brightness in his energy. He seemed genuinely… happy. He confided in them, trusted them, was closer to them than she had seen him with anyone before, even his family. Dev was the voice of reason and stability, Jacen the voice of playfulness and adventure; together his two closest friends helped provide him balance.

There were even memories of Luke, his affect less serious and pessimistic than she remembered him as he patiently instructed Ben how to manipulate the Force to do things like… lift rocks. Luke laughed, playfully messed up his nephew’s hair, and they talked over long walks around the temple. Luke was patient and mirthful and hopeful; he seemed to be a much greater teacher than he had ever been to Rey. Ben didn’t seem to be falling closer to darkness as he’d been before. The training seemed to be working; he seemed to have found himself. By all outward appearances, he was thriving at the Jedi temple.

Rey didn’t understand. From the very first memory, she was slowly watching the darkness take over, as Snoke was clawing a stronger hold over his thoughts. She had expected the darkness to steadily consume him until it was too late, but it hadn’t. He was the furthest from falling that she’d ever felt him, he’d had a chance. It hurt more than an inevitable fall ever could.

What happened to you, Ben? You had every reason not to fall. How could one mistake change everything?

Another memory flashed before her eyes, though Rey surmised, based on his surroundings, that he was at another Jedi temple. She knew several years had passed since the previous memories; she finally recognized the deep voice that had become so familiar over the past few weeks. As if the realization that Ben could have been with Luke wasn’t enough, another startling realization crossed her mind – one that hadn’t occurred to her until she wondered what she had been doing that moment when he was at his brightest.

His voice gave it away. He must have been an adult by that point, or close to it… and he was still with Luke. Rey could feel the light inside him. He had conflict, but it wasn’t because he had killed anyone. She knew that if he had killed her parents, it would have happened under Snoke, but he was the furthest from joining Snoke that she had ever seen him. For Kylo to have killed them, he had to have been a young teenager when it happened. By the time he turned, he would have been too old; they weren’t more than ten years apart.
He couldn’t have killed them.

She had stayed awake with endless questions burning in her mind; questions that didn’t make sense, questions she knew he would never answer. There was something about it that hadn’t made sense, only now could she understand why. He had never lied to her, she knew that even at his darkest the truth was important to him, but he had lied to her about this.

Why would he lie about something that evil? Does he want me to hate him?

They were questions for another time, because his memories continued on without her. Jedi students were practice fighting with their lightsabers in the darkness. She noticed Kyp and Corran, observing the duels from the shadows. Dorsk and Rayf were betting on something a few yards in the other direction. Ben was kneeling next to Dev, Tionne, and Jaina across from them, as they watched Alema and Jacen duel with intrigue.

Rey realized quickly through Ben’s mental calculations that he favored Jacen. He was not as tall as the blue Twi’lek, so he relied on quicker reflexes and agility. His form was still considered Djem So, but there were subtle flourishes of the more controlled but darker form of Makashi. His icy blue eyes were enchanting under the light of his matching lightsaber. Alema had a greater reach, but her specialty seemed to rest with Force manipulation rather than a lightsaber. Rey could sense her vibrating desire to unleash a Force attack, though she knew it was against the rules of the duel.

“She left her weak side open; why didn’t he see it?” Tionne whispered to Ben.

“He did,” Ben whispered back, “But he knew she left it open on purpose; she was baiting him.”

“I would have been baited,” Tionne sighed.

Ben turned to her, his voice gentle with reassurance. “It’s okay, you’ll get there, I’ll teach you.”

Tionne smiled, twirling a red curl around her fingertips. “You’re the best, Ben.”

“You’re the best, Ben,” Jaina mocked breathlessly next to him as she twirled her own hair around her finger and batted her eyelashes dramatically. Tionne stood up in a huff and stormed away, and Ben shoved Jaina with the Force.
“Why do you have to do things like that?”

Jaina groaned, standing up and brushing off her legs. “Because you’re clueless, Ben,” she said, slapping him on the shoulder before sauntering off in the same direction as Tionne. There was something dark and slimy inside Rey that was grateful Jaina had caused Tionne to leave. Something about what he had said to the young woman irritated her. There was no reason for her to feel that way, Rey knew that. He was only being kind to the girl – something she should have been content to see from a man currently hellbent on galactic domination – but his offer irked her.

You need a teacher, his voice echoed in her mind. Rey shook the memory away. Ben’s focus had switched to his best friend, and Rey refused to admit that she was pleased with the development. “I’m not clueless.”

“A little,” Dev said with a soft chuckle.

Ben turned to argue, but he was distracted as he watched his friend stare at the Twi-lek engaged in a practice battle with their friend. It wasn’t necessarily that he was watching her, it was the awe in his eyes as he did. “I’m not clueless about who you’re staring at.”

“Isn’t she beautiful?” Dev said softly as Alema spun her blade gracefully, her leeku swaying with her movements.

It seemed to catch Ben off-guard; that her ferocity and power could be beautiful. He had never physically met anyone who captivated him the way Alema captivated Dev, but he supposed that was exactly what drew his friend to her. “She’s very strong,” he agreed.

Dev blinked rapidly, but didn’t turn to look at Ben, as if he feared that Ben would stop talking if he did. Rey knew the feeling well. “Is that what’s beautiful to you? Power and strength?”

Ben shrugged. “I don’t know. I never thought about it.”

“I know I’ve never seen you give anyone here a second glance, but there’s been someone, right?” Dev looked at him knowingly, as if he believed there was, and Ben feared that he had seen his dreams.
Despite her curiosity, Ben didn’t want to investigate his friend’s assumptions any further. If he was giving his life to the Jedi, it didn’t matter anyway. “I don’t know, I don’t think I’ve known anyone well enough to desire them.”

Dev turned and gave him a perplexed look. “You need to know someone to desire them? Isn’t that love, not attraction?”

“I don’t know. I don’t know what love feels like to know the difference,” Ben said, his eyes returning to the duel. Jacen was on the offensive, his quick changes in stance confusing Alema and leading her to falter in her own movements. Ben sensed Dev tense next to him when Jacen’s blade came within centimeters of her face. “But I think you love her.”

“Why do you say that?”

Ben didn’t need to look back to his friend, but he knew if he did, he would see the truth as plain on his face as he’d hear in his voice. “Because you look at her like she’s… home.”

The sound of Alema’s shout quickly drew their attention back to the duel. The identical blue blades whirled through the air. Jacen’s chestnut hair was longer than when he and Ben had first met. It fell across his bright blue eyes as he spun and kicked the Twi-lek onto her back, kneeling over her with his practice lightsaber to her throat. Alema stared up at him, studying him carefully. Blue eyes were locked onto black ones, as blue plasma illuminated their faces. The Twi’lek took this opportunity to swing her own lightsaber up from the ground, striking Jacen in the side. He cried out in surprise, releasing Alema from his hold.

“Smart, Alema!” Dev yelled from his crouched position. “Rule number one, Jacen! Don’t hesitate!”

“The second you trigger that lightsaber, if you don’t kill, you’ll be killed,” Ben added. “If you have the opportunity to end it...end it quickly.” Rey thought back to their fight on Starkiller. He had hesitated at the edge of that cliff. He could have killed her, but he asked to teach her instead. It almost led to his own death. She wanted to know why he had broken his own rule.

“I know. I know,” Jacen admitted, his icy blue eyes glowing in excitement. “I just want my kills to be personal. I want to stare them in the eyes as I take their life. I want to see the life drained from them.”

Dev snorted. “At least disarm her of her weapon first.”

Ben stood, removing his own weapon from his hip. “Should we be concerned with the ‘morbid pleasure you receive in imagining the consequential act of taking a life?’” Rey could feel his amusement; he was… mocking his uncle, if his thoughts were anything to go by. This version of him was nothing like the man she thought she knew.

A wry smile spread across Jacen’s face. “You sound like Skywalker.”

Jaina stood, her hand on her own weapon, but Rey sensed Ben’s aversion to fighting her. “Last time I checked – my dear, idiot brother – he is a Skywalker and you haven’t killed anyone.” Her words were directed at Jacen, but her eyes never left Ben.

“So... neither have you. And neither has Dev. And neither has he.” Jacen challenged, raising his lightsaber and gesturing toward his friend. “Prepared to fall, Ben?” Her bondmate activated his own weapon in response. The reluctance she had felt in him from the idea of facing Jaina bubbled into thrill as he drew the blade in short arcs and flourishes in preparation to face her brother.

“Hey, I called next,” Dev protested, standing to ready his own lightsaber. The green blade was striking among the other blue.

“Two against one?” Ben shrugged, “I’ll take those odds.” Darkness flooded Rey’s veins as it did Ben’s. He must have known, even then, its power when used for combat. He didn’t give them a chance to agree as he swiftly closed the distance between himself and the other two students. Both were caught off guard, stumbling backward from a swing that intended to separate them. Ben did not doubt his strength in a fight, even then. Perhaps that was why he had been confident that he could face both her and Finn while critically wounded. He would have succeeded, had he not hesitated and just pushed her off the cliff instead.

She could feel the steady emotions flowing through the bond. He was meticulous, calm, confident, and poised. Rey found herself enjoying the feeling of fighting as Ben. Each strike flowed through him as if it had been rehearsed, each attack quick, precise, and perceptive. She wondered if he had been stronger as a Jedi, when the light and darkness had been more in balance… or was it she who weakened him? This wasn’t the Kylo she faced on Starkiller; she didn’t want to face him like this. The strength of his swing knocked Dev off his feet, his friend gasping for air as he landed flat on his back. Ben kicked the weapon from Dev’s hand, then turned and brought the blade down upon his other friend with velocity, singeing Jacen’s clothes.
Jacen cried out in surprise, but Ben did not revel in his victory. He immediately pivoted on his heels, swinging his blade to barely block another blue blade that had attempted to take advantage of his unguarded back. As their lightsabers clashed, he came face to face with a blue-eyed beauty.

“I never agreed to three against one,” he laughed, still winded, his breath coming out in harsh pants. “You’re becoming too predictable, Jaina.” The words were lost on Rey as she realized she had never heard him laugh before. She had never even seen him smile. She had felt it in his memories, but she had never seen it for herself. The deep, rumbling sound of his laughter simultaneously warmed her soul and churned her stomach. She craved to be the reason he laughed, but she feared the boy capable of that laugh was gone.

Jaina seemed to enjoy his laugh as well, smiling coquettishly as she tucked a lock of hair behind her ear. The confident and graceful woman accepted defeat and disengaged her lightsaber. Ben hesitantly followed suit. Without the presence of the blades, they stood uncomfortably close.

“Predictable, huh?” Jaina smiled, her eyes flashing seductively. She quickly leaned up and captured his lips with hers. Ben’s brows furrowed in confusion, but his mind went blank. Rey immediately understood why he had become unhinged when she kissed Poe. Her stomach dropped and rolled with nausea, but she refused to admit why a kiss from the past between Ben and that young woman troubled her.

_He just... didn't seem the type to kiss random girls who throw themselves at him_, she decided. _He said so himself._

Rey realized she had never given a thought to exactly who Ben was romantically. She had never given a thought to who she was romantically. On Jakku, she didn't have time for those thoughts, though there had been opportunities presented by the off-worlders, her concerns focused only on survival and her parents' return. After she had joined the Resistance, the war consumed most of her thoughts. One moment her bondmate was her enemy, the next, she thought about kissing him. Though she could acknowledge the attractiveness of her friends, there had only ever been him that she imagined that way.

When he looked at her with those striking eyes, he had made her feel as if she was the only other person in the galaxy. She had never considered how many other women he had made feel like that. She suddenly wondered about his experience with other women, and what type of woman he was attracted to. she wondered if Jaina had ever seen his bare chest as she had, or if he had told Jaina that she would never be alone. She wondered whether his kiss would be as gentle as his hands.

She steeled herself for further emotionally complicated torment, but as his thoughts returned, Ben jolted in surprise and stepped back from the beautiful woman. His emotions were a mix of shock and an awkward boyishness that made Rey’s heart flutter. Jaina did not look distressed by his rebuff. Instead, she winked and blew him a flirtatious kiss. Jaina didn’t look distressed, but Tionne did.

“Gross, plain-Jain, you don’t know where that’s been,” Jacen teased, breaking the tension. Ben ignited his lightsaber and flipped the training blade at his friend, burning his arm in retaliation for the slight.

Jaina threw her lightsaber at her brother. “Shut up, jerk-cen .”

The lightsaber stopped before it hit Jacen square in the chest, suspended in mid-air. They all turned to see Dev standing behind them, smiling mischievously. He manipulated the weapon slowly into his waiting hand. Jaina called her brother’s weapon, igniting it as she pointed it at Dev. “Let’s see what you’ve got,” she said. “Winner keeps the loser’s lightsaber.” He paused, eyes distant for a moment before he smiled and nodded in agreement. Jaina rolled her eyes, dropping out of her stance. She disengaged the lightsaber and threw it back at her brother, aiming low. She tutted playfully. “Using your visions is cheating, Dev.”

“I’ll challenge you, Jaina,” Tionne said, picking up her own lightsaber.

Jaina smiled wryly, calling her lightsaber from Dev’s hand. “We both know you’ll know lose. You are not cut out for lightsaber combat. Every time you actually hit someone; you apologize.”

“Oh, I know I won’t win,” Tionne replied sweetly, trying to keep a straight face. “I was just giving poor Ben a head start to get away from you.”

Jaina rolled her eyes and shoved the other woman with the Force. Jacen caught the redhead with a Force hold of his own, and Tionne smiled brightly in return. “Thank you, Jacen.”

Jaina narrowed her eyes playfully at her brother, settling into a challenging stance. “Traitor.”

The playful atmosphere was shattered when a student with long, shaggy blond hair and beguiling green eyes approached them. Rey knew his cunning smile meant trouble. “Don’t let Master Skywalker catch you practicing. You know it’s against the rules,” he warned. “And I don’t know why you bother, Jaina, Jacen defeats you every time. Just like Ben always defeats him.”
Jacen smiled, though his eyes were no longer crinkled in amusement. “You can’t become the best if you don’t practice against the best.”

Jaina turned her back on him in irritation, gathering her other personal effects. “Cade, complaining won’t change that you’ll always be a sub-par Jedi.”

“He’s just mad that he could never defeat Ben,” Jacen said, further antagonizing the other student as he clipped his lightsaber on his belt, also preparing to leave. Evidently, they had sensed the student was trouble as easily as Rey had.

Jaina’s eyes were alight with amusement. “Or you,”

“I don’t need to defeat Ben or Jacen; we’re supposed to be on the same side,” Cade argued, “and Master Skywalker said...”

“If you have a problem, Cade, why don’t you go snitch to Master Skywalker like you always do,” Kyp cut in, emerging from the shadows he and Corran had been observing the escalating argument.

“Hey Cade,” Jacen continued to bait him. “I bet Ben could defeat Master Skywalker too. I have seen how fearful he is of Ben’s power. I bet that is the real reason why it’s against the rules to practice.”

“No, Master Skywalker is powerful,” Ben had said it in a teasing tone, but Rey sensed the loyalty he had once held for his uncle under the surface.

“Or, it’s against the rules because Master Skywalker is worried Ben will follow in his grandfather’s footsteps,” Cade scoffed. She felt trepidation in Ben’s emotions. Corran jumped to his feet, anticipating a fight, but the other students stood in shock.

Finally, Jaina stepped forward, grabbing Ben’s arm. “Let’s go.”

“Great idea Jaina, anyone else want to go for a run?” Tionne suggested. The offer itself wasn’t odd – other than the common knowledge that Jaina and Tionne never agreed on anything – but her tone was out of place. Ben immediately felt as if she knew something that he didn’t, something she feared he would discover. When he turned to look at her, he saw the matching fear in her eyes. Rey knew her bondmate well enough to know it only piqued his curiosity.
“What are you suggesting?” Ben hid the confusion in his voice, ripping his arm from Jaina’s grasp so he could face Cade.

Dev, who had remained silent to that point, was seething. “Cade, leave!” Rey felt his unease escalate at his friend’s outburst. Evidently, he had never heard Dev raise his voice in anger before. There was nothing that would have convinced him to let the matter drop after that.

Cade, however, decided to double-down instead of heeding Dev’s demand. “It’s not exactly a secret around here that you’re Darth Vader’s grandson.” As Cade’s words settled in the silence between them all, Rey didn’t sense the anger or fear she had expected, but confusion. Rey realized the truth as he did; they never told him. The cogs were turning in his head, connections were being made, an understanding of why the people he loved had feared him became clear. Still, he refused to believe that his entire life was a lie.

Why did you never tell him, Leia?

“My grandfather was Anakin Skywalker, Jedi Knight. Darth Vader killed him,” Ben growled. Dev and Jacen exchanged nervous looks. Rey wondered how Ben had gone so long without discovering the truth. Certainly, there had been signs. Perhaps he had been as deep in denial about his grandfather as she had been about her parents. Perhaps that was why he had thought she would turn in the throne room.

A smile grew on Cade’s face as the tension grew thicker between them. “Darth Vader was Anakin Skywalker.”

Yes... only now can you realize the potential of your bloodline...You can be something truly remarkable... young Skywalker… the voice in his head whispered.

Ben shook his head, trying to shut the voice out.

No.

He turned to Dev, sorrow written on his face, and then to Jacen, regret written on his.
No!

He shut his eyes, breathing deeply as he tried in vain to center himself.

It’s not possible. For it to be true, everyone in my life would have to be a…

“Liar!” Ben screamed, turning his practice lightsaber on the other student. A powerful strike to Cade’s side forced the boy to the ground. Ben stood over him as he held the lightsaber to his throat. “Darth Vader was a murderer and a monster! He is everything my family fought against! My grandfather was a hero!”

Even then, the pieces continued to snap into place. He had always believed they never talked about Anakin because it was painful to talk about; he thought that was why the comparison hurt them. Had they been comparing him to a monster his entire life? His mother acted as if Anakin had never existed at all, as she had with him when he wasn’t good enough. It explained why some of the other students at the temple had begun to avoid him, and why his uncle had begun telling him more stories about his grandfather's background over the past few weeks.

“You didn’t know?” Jacen cautiously approached him. Ben pivoted to read his friend’s eyes. Rey could see the pain hidden there. “We...we thought you knew. Luke has been projecting it in his mind when he’s watched you train lately. We've known for weeks. I figured it would have been a hard secret to keep in your family. And I thought it was something you would talk about eventually over our raids of Skywalker’s Corellian Whiskey, when you actually talked about your family. I didn’t think…”

Jacen looked to their friend for help, but Dev was already stepping forward next to Ben. “I should have just asked you about it. I would have told you... we would have told you, so you wouldn’t have found out like this. I’m sorry.” She could hear the regret and concern in his voice, and she could feel the trust in Ben. His anger wasn’t focused on them.

Other than his family, Dev and Jacen were the only other people she had ever seen deeply care for Ben; and she felt the strength of their brotherly bonds through Ben, it was obvious they were close. She knew Ben killed the other students at the temple. She had seen the dreams. Could he have killed Dev and Jacen? The thought sickened her.

Logical thought became difficult as her bondmate's emotions spiraled. Ben was reeling. Rey could feel him draw on the Force to keep himself upright, the room spinning around him. The breath was squeezed out of her chest just as it had been for him. The darkness invaded her senses.
They lied! Ben screamed in his mind as he unraveled.

They all lied!

My entire life has been a lie.

People don’t lie to the ones they love, Ben, repeated tormentingly in his mind.

They don’t love me.

Though the thoughts had plagued him since Snoke first began whispering in his head, there was always the hope inside him that actively fought against the words. They had always been Snoke’s words. For the first time, they became his own. No one could ever love me or want me. I’m worthless. I’m nothing I’m a burden. That’s why they lied. And abandoned me here. I’m the grandson of Darth Vader. A monster. Everything I believed...

In an instant, everything he had believed about his grandfather had changed. The man was no longer the heroic Jedi he had believed he was. He hadn’t died trying to save the galaxy from Darth Vader; he had become him. It was impossible for Ben to reconcile the man in the stories his uncle told of his father with that monster. Darth Vader killed his grandmother; that meant Anakin killed his own pregnant wife. His grandfather killed Ben’s namesake; a man who had been his brother in every way but blood. His grandfather killed children. And Ben was just like him. No wonder his family feared him and his darkness. Ben’s stomach churned with the thought. Ben felt the immediate urge to run as far away from everyone he ever loved so he could never hurt them.

Rey could feel his disillusionment toward the man, but there was a loyalty the truth didn’t erase. Ben had been compared to his grandfather – the dark, but heroic Jedi Knight he believed him to be – so often in his life that he had begun to feel a connection, a loyalty, to the man he had never met. He believed the man was someone who would have understood him when no one else could. Though the truth about the man had changed, his loyalty developed by a genetic link could not so easily be destroyed. By not telling Ben about who his grandfather was, his family had unwittingly created his idolization of his grandfather, and, in turn, Darth Vader. Rey knew when he couldn’t inevitably separate the loyalty he had with the man from the monster he had become, it would have been nearly effortless for Snoke to turn that loyalty against the Jedi instead.

It’s all a lie. When they said I was too much like my grandfather... they were talking about Vader the whole time. They were afraid of me becoming a monster... The hollow void left behind by their lies gave way to fear.

Am I?

Am I the monster they were afraid I’d become?

Am I just like him?

The fear transformed into anger. He was angry at his parents, his uncle, his grandfather, but he was even angrier with the Force. It’s not fair! Ben just wanted to be a pilot and have a real family. He didn't ask to be born. It wasn’t his fault a monster’s blood coursed through his veins. He didn’t want heroic parents. He didn't want the Force, he didn't want to be a Jedi, and he certainly didn’t want to be anything like his evil grandfather. He's evil.

I could never be like him.

But the darkness does call you, Snoke whispered through his mind. You knew you would never be good enough for them. You can fight it, as your grandfather did. But you were never meant to be a Jedi; this is not your part to play. You will fail, and then you will never worthy of your bloodline. Or, you could take the path destined to you. Then you will become more powerful than you could ever imagine.

Maybe Snoke isn't my enemy; maybe I have been denying the truth that is my destiny... the truth that is my family. I have fought so hard to be someone I'm not for people who fear me... hate me. My entire life I thought I was weak because I couldn't control the darkness. I was weak because I have been suppressing my true power. Maybe I was always meant to become like him. Maybe I was always meant to become everything I hate. Maybe Snoke was right, maybe I do belong in darkness. His thoughts may have been dark and focused on inevitability, but his physiological reaction was anything but resolute. He was hyperventilating, his body shaking uncontrollably. She watched his emotions spiral out into the Force, creating a whirlwind of energy around him.

The other students stepped back from him in shock, but Jacen and Dev were caught inside the whirlwind with him. Kyp was the closest outside of the winds to stop him, but he stood frozen in shock, watching the scene unfolding before him, choosing not to intervene other than scream. “What did you do, Cade!”

“Ben, you’re stronger than this,” Corran warned, stepping forward next to Kyp with a level-headed calm. “Don’t let it control you.” He lifted his hands to brace against the winds, attempting to slow them, but the energy was too strong.

“Somebody, do something!” Alema shouted as the winds whipped around them violently. She did not intervene either, and Rey assumed it was due to fear of injuring Dev in the process.

“Please don’t do this, Ben,” Jaina pleaded helplessly as Jacen stepped closer. Ben held his lightsaber firmly at Cade’s throat, the whirlwind heightening in intensity until they were all using the Force to stay rooted to the ground. Dorsk and Rayf carefully approached the escalating confrontation.

Dorsk held his hands up in preparation to help suppress the Force raging around Ben but hesitated. The empathy on his face made it clear he wanted to give Ben a chance to control it on his own. “You are not your grandfather,” he tried.

Rayf stepped up next to Dorsk, his eyes not showing the fear that the others did. He shrugged. “You can’t help who you’re related to.”

“Skywalker was his son, and no one here thinks any different of him,” Tionne added with an earnest smile. “I don’t think any different of you.”

But I am him, Ben thought. Don’t you see? No matter how much I don’t want to be him, that is all they will ever see in me.

“Ben! Stop!”

Ben turned, but his weapon remained fixed upon the other boy. Luke was standing in the darkness, illuminated by his own green lightsaber. It was held at his side, non-threateningly pointed toward the ground. Rey could feel the fear and anger vibrate through their bond; fear that his uncle had ignited the lightsaber, and anger that he had lied to him as much as his parents did. Rey wondered if those were past emotions or currents ones.

“Is it true?” he demanded, turning the lightsaber toward his uncle. Luke disengaged his weapon in response. “Is my entire life a lie? Am I the grandson of Darth Vader?” Luke didn’t answer; he didn’t need to. She could see the truth in his eyes, and she knew Ben could see it too. There was also regret and understanding in Luke’s eyes. Somehow, she knew he had been against keeping that secret, perhaps because he knew what it felt like to live that lie. It wouldn’t change the outcome, however, as Ben felt immediately alienated by everyone he had ever loved for keeping the secret from him.

The whispers echoed through her mind again.

Yes... Let the darkness flow through you... Give into it... The darkness will carry away the pain... The darkness gives you power... Your bloodline gives you power... You can be greater even than Vader.

The whirlwind grew to dangerous levels around them as the whispers continued in his head. Luke reached out his hand to manipulate the Force, but his eyes grew wide as he realized that even he did not have the capability to control the darkness surrounding them. It seemed inevitable that there would be a Force explosion.

Then he felt a strong pressure on his shoulder. Ben turned to see an abnormally calm Jacen, hand grasping his shoulder, smiling reassuringly. Dev stepped forward, standing over Cade. He grabbed Ben’s wrist, forcing Ben to disengage the lightsaber. Rey could feel the calming warmth of Dev and Jacen’s light as they helped their friend fight the darkness. Ben immediately accepted their help, leaving Rey to wonder if they had helped him that way before. The whirlwind slowly dissipated into the Force as Ben’s own emotions quieted in his mind.

Jacen and Dev helped him control it, she realized. And Ben... let them. Something horrible must have happened to both of them. They cared too much to let Ben fall. They have to be the key to this.

As a new memory emerged, it became clear to Rey that he was no longer at the temple. Ben was landing what looked to be a light freighter on a dark, barren planet. Rey was more familiar with Galactic Civil War era ships, but it looked to her like a newer version of an Allanar N3 light freighter. Ben seemed comfortable and practiced at the controls, but she could sense his boredom and the underlying irritation that he was trying desperately to suppress in the Force.

After successfully setting the freighter down onto the world’s surface – and running through the menial task of shutting it down – he stepped down the ramp to join the rest of the padawans on the planet’s surface. The terrain was uneven, rippling almost as if it had once been a lake that had turned to stone. Over that was a layer of ash thick enough for the group to leave bootprints. As he joined the others in their semi-circle around their Master, Luke began his introduction.

“This is the site of the Great Scourge of Malachor,” Luke began. “The Sith had constructed a temple under the planet's surface, hiding a superweapon that legends proclaim housed the largest kyber crystal in existence. No one knows the extent of the damage the weapon could inflict upon the galaxy, but it was rumored to have the capability of destroying entire star systems.”

Ben laughed. “That impossible, Master. This battle happened, what, thousands of years ago? No one has discovered that capability even now. To fire a weapon of that supposed magnitude from a fixed position across the galaxy would require –”

“– an alternative to realspace or hyperspace travel, yes,” Luke finished. He sifted through the debris of the battlefield with his boot until he found a scrap piece of metal. Blowing the remaining ash from its surface, he used the Force to lift it up and levitate it before his students. “When we travel through hyperspace, we travel across the galaxy,” he demonstrated his explanation by reaching up and dragging his finger in a long line lengthwise across the metal surface. “Ben, bend this in half.” Ben manipulated the Force as instructed with practiced ease, the metal bending in on itself, resembling the crest of a sand dune. “What we are talking about, is creating a hole in the realspace continuum, bending time and space, if you will. The discharge of the weapon would be moving through the galaxy, not across it.” He demonstrated by igniting his lightsaber and piercing a hole straight through the sides of the metal crest. “If they were to fire such a weapon, the destruction of star systems on the other side of the galaxy would be nearly instantaneous.”

“But that is a theory, Master,” Ben interjected. “If we don't have the ability to create such a weapon now, how could they have the technology to create it back then?”

“That is why we are here, kid.” A glimmer of excitement bloomed in Luke's eyes. “Many ancient secrets and technologies are lost with the civilizations that created them. The most important part of learning Jedi history is to acquire the collective wisdom of the past, otherwise it could be lost, as this was. A great secret was buried here. We are here to listen, to learn from the past. What we know is this – there was a weapon here, powerful enough that the Jedi initiated an attack on the temple. The Sith defended the temple, and there was a great battle. During the battle, for reasons unknown, the weapon malfunctioned. The misfire instantly killed everyone on the planet. All that was left of both Jedi and Sith were their petrified forms. They remained solidified in their last fighting stances, gradually crumbling to ash over time. The temple is still buried underneath our feet, that weapon is still inside. Can you feel the heaviness of the darkness in the Force here?”

Rey could feel its pull on Ben. There were whispers calling to him in a language she didn't understand, thoughts in his head that both knew were not his own.

Yes... Snoke whispered. Feel the absolute power... Don't fear it...Let it guide you...

Ben was struggling internally to block it all out, fighting the polarity that conflicted with the Jedi teachings. Ben could also feel his uncle's piercing gaze, watching him for signs of the darkness they all knew he had. He felt trapped – fighting the call of the dark, drowning out Snoke's whispers, and hiding his struggle from Luke. His skin crawled with agitation – too tight, too confining. Something inside him was clawing at the surface, leaving him with the overwhelming desire to destroy. He considered climbing back on the shuttle and setting coordinates for an uncharted planet across the galaxy, where he could be free from all of it. The hair on the back of his neck prickled as he continued to feel studious eyes focused on him. Ben finally met Luke’s stare, challenging him, before shame washed over him and he looked down at his feet instead.

“We will try to find a way into that temple, together,” Luke continued slowly, breaking his scrutiny of Ben with reluctance. “It will require both mental acuity and strength in the Force to pass the trials set forth by the Sith. This will be a team-building exercise, requiring all of you to work together to gain access to the inner rooms of the temple. If you succeed, we could discover the secret to a long-forgotten Sith superweapon. Everyone grab your packs; let’s head inside the main atrium before we head down to the first protected door. Everyone stick together, because there are many false passageways.

Ben was nervous as he drew closer to the temple. The darkness was nearly suffocating in its density, and he knew it would only become more powerful. This was what he needed, however, to prove to himself that he was better than his grandfather. He could fight the darkness and win. Walking through the door and down into the darkness of the main atrium, it immediately became cold in an unnatural way that made his bones ache. The air around them was heavy with moisture and smelled of mold and decay. The Force tingled down his skin, more concentrated there than he had ever felt it.

They ignited their lightsabers to use as the only light source in the darkness. Ben studied the stone walls that had been overgrown with vines. It was the only vegetation he had seen on the planet. There were carving in the walls, something he assumed was Sith. He followed the other students further into the atrium. Dev and Alema used their lightsabers to read the inscriptions on the walls. Kyp, Tionne and Corran practiced their forms, pretending their opponents were the vines hanging from the ceiling. Clighal, Dal, Dorsk and Rayf pushed against the stones that made up the walls, laughing about "secret passageways." The others examined the relics and debris scattering the floor or standing in the center, awaiting Luke.

Ben moved to explore the entrances to the different antechambers attached to the atrium when he heard a cry and splash from a small, dark corridor to his left. Without a word or consideration for his own safety, Ben took off down the corridor, fearful that one of his fellow students had fallen into an underground pool of water. Knowing that some of them were not proficient swimmers, he feared for the other student’s life. Rey felt his loyalty; she understood that, no matter his disagreements with them, he would have given his own life to save any of theirs, even Cade. Ben stopped, panting, at the entrance of a small room. There was no pool of water, only stone and a wall that was frosted with what looked like ice. He turned, believing he had run down the wrong corridor, when he heard the whisper.

Let me see them… It was a woman’s voice, echoing around him in the small space. The voice sounded… familiar. Rey thought it sounded like her voice.

…please…

Ben turned in search of the voice. He stopped short when he realized the frosted wall was not a wall at all, because he could see a shadow on the opposite side. Was it one of the other students?

“Hello?”

The Force around him called him, a magnetism inside him drew him to the wall. Somehow, he knew it wanted to show him something. He found he wanted it to show him. Under closer inspection, the "wall" looked like ice or glass that had frosted over. As he reached the shadow, it raised its hand to the glass. He stepped closer in curiosity, wondering if it expected him to mirror its movement. “Show me,” he whispered, his voice echoing in the emptiness around him. He didn’t know what he wanted to be shown, but he knew this was what he was there for.

“Show me my destiny.”

Rey understood why he had asked it, even if he had been surprised by his own words. She remembered facing another cave; speaking a similar question, not knowing why she had asked it, but craving the answer all the same. The difference was hers had been a question of the past, but Ben’s had been a question of the future. He touched the mirror, reflecting the position of the shadow on the other side. The frost began to fade in a way all too familiar to Rey. She had expected answers, but the Force hadn’t given them to her. Her own face had been her only answer. Ben would soon learn the same.

Only, that wasn’t what happened to him. When the mirror cleared as it had for her, it was not his reflection looking back at him. As it changed, the shadow on the other side almost looked like her silhouette. But then it transformed into a terrifying sight. She had never seen him before, but she knew by the dark regalia, the heavy breathing, the mask, exactly who it was staring back at them.

Darth Vader.

Ben had been given exactly what he’d asked for. He startled, pulling his hand from the mirror. The image did not disappear, however. Instead, the man’s labored, mechanical breaths echoed around Ben as the Sith’s hand left the mirror and reached for the mask.

Ben stood frozen as a pneumatic hiss filled the room. The image of Darth Vader removed the helmet, and Rey gasped along with Ben. It was her bondmate, Kylo Ren, complete with the scar bisecting his face, staring back at them. Had his fall always been his destiny?

“No!” Ben staggered backward, tripping and falling to the floor in his panic. The image faded, but the consequences did not.

Yes, the voice whispered in his head. This is your true potential… You can become greater than Darth Vader. Join me. Fulfill your destiny.

“No!” Ben cried again, scrambling from the floor and sprinting down the corridor. He stopped short when he nearly collided with a shadow that blocked the archway to the atrium. Ben raised the lightsaber to defend himself, but his entire arm was paralyzed with the Force.

“Whoa there, kid.” He recognized that voice. It was his uncle. “I told you to stay with the group; there are false…” he stopped, finally recognizing the turmoil in Ben. “Are you all right?”

Ben lowered his lightsaber, still shaking in fright. “I saw… I saw something in there,” he answered. “I think it was a vision.”

Luke looked past him down the corridor. When his eyes returned to study Ben’s, there was something grim in them. “What did you see?”

Ben knew he should tell Luke the truth. He was a Jedi Master; he could have helped him meditate on it and find an explanation for what he saw. But a larger part of him wondered if it would make Luke afraid of him, too. In the moment, the truth failed him. “Darth Vader,” he said. He refused to give life to the rest.

It was me. I was my grandfather. I was Darth Vader.

Luke turned back to the others in the main atrium. “No more exploring; everyone wait for me by that wall,” he said, pointing with his lightsaber to a vine-covered wall on the far side as removed from the antechambers as possible. He clasped a hand on Ben’s shoulder reassuringly, but his nephew startled, “Hey, kid, let’s get some air.”

Ben nodded. As he walked past the others, his eyes met Tionne’s, and she stared at him knowingly. It terrified him. Are you okay? she mouthed. Ben stormed past her without answering. He couldn’t answer. He wasn’t okay. He followed Luke out of the temple, trying everything in his power to fight the darkness that overwhelmed him in his fear. It physically hurt to fight against it.

Give in, the voices told him, it’s easy.

Ben tried to practice the steps Luke had taught him. He retrieved the memories that made him happy: reading, flying, Dev and Jacen, the girl in his dreams, the hope of becoming a Jedi. But in the darkness, his thoughts were twisted. He tried to think of reading, then remembered the times he spent up late into the early hours of the morning, reading, as he waited for his mother to come back. He tried to think of flying, but he remembered his father flying away. He tried to think of the girl, then remembered that she had disappeared years before, abandoning him as everyone else did. He tried to think of Dev and Jacen, but feared that they would abandon him, too, if they knew what he saw. He thought of his hope in becoming a Jedi, but all he could see was the mask of Darth Vader sliding away to reveal his face.

Rey could feel the conflict in him. He was falling apart but pretending that he was fine. Ben shut his eyes, but all he could see was the vision. When he reopened them, the concern in Luke’s eyes was staring back at him. There was something else in them – something he never thought he would see in his uncle, but something he had seen in his mother and his father’s eyes. Luke was staring at him as though he was his grandfather. It only fed the uncertainty building inside him. “Let’s go talk in the shuttle,” Luke suggested.

Ben knew how it would go. His uncle would speak to him like a child, asking him questions about how he was doing while tip-toeing around the real questions he wanted to ask. Luke hadn’t been teaching him how to use his power or control it, only suppress it, only to find “peace.” What if he couldn’t find peace? What if the vision was true? What if the darkness was stronger inside him? What if he was becoming his grandfather? All he knew was, Luke was staring at him as if he believed that at any moment, Ben could pick up a lightsaber and kill every last one of them. Still, Ben followed his uncle obediently into the shuttle.

“What’s there to talk about? I’m fine.” Ben said, doing his best to hold strong against the darkness.

“Ben, I...” Luke sighed, hesitating, clearly conflicted with what he was considering. “I think I made a mistake, bringing you here.”
Rey knew Ben struggled on Malachor; she knew he could feel it as well, and that was why she didn’t understand his extreme reaction. She didn’t understand the fear, the hopelessness, the betrayal he felt at those words. Then she realized that, while Ben had been thriving by all outward appearances, his internal struggle was still very much alive. There had been a dread that had been building inside him since his parents had left him at the temple; a permanent shadow over everything he did, over every failure, reminding him that this was his last chance. The life he had built, the sacrifices he had made, his plans for the future came crashing down upon him under the weight of his uncle’s doubt. This meant more to him than a temple on Malachor. “What… what are you saying?”

“I’m saying I can feel the darkness in this place, and it’s too great a risk. I need you to stay behind for this mission.”

Ben’s stomach churned in sickening realization; as long as tainted blood flowed through his veins, he would never escape the evil of his grandfather. Not even by the man’s own son. “Why?”

“You’re not ready,” Luke said softly but firmly. He winced when he said it, clearly believing he knew how it would affect his nephew. He had no idea. There was uncertainty in his eyes, but his voice was unyielding.

No, not you, too. Please don't give up on me, Uncle. You’re my last hope.

Ben’s voice broke as the fears that had stalked him like a shadow – every single moment since his parents left him with Luke as a last resort – were realized. “Is it because of the vision?”

“No.”

Ben tried to contain the betrayal simmering beneath the surface. He knew he should stop challenging Luke; it would only get worse if he lost control, but he couldn't pretend that he wasn’t falling apart on the inside. “Is it because of my grandfather, Uncle?”

“No.”

His uncle's words ignited the wick to Ben's rage. A cold darkness twisted through him. This time he didn't fight it as it found him in his anger. When he spoke again, there was a cutting edge to his voice that was achingly familiar to Rey. “Is it because of my darkness? Because I feel yours, too, Master. Even now. The same blood flows through my veins as in yours. Do you fear me, or do you fear yourself?"

“Don't be difficult, Ben!” Luke's typical patient demeanor faded as his own anger grew. “This place... it clouds your thoughts with darkness; it calls to the darkness in everyone. I felt its effects on all the other students. But the difference is, they immediately searched for the light in their fear. You went straight to the dark. It’s my fault; blame me. I failed you by letting you go in that temple. But you had a vision in there, and I felt what it did to you. What you found in there, you brought with you, do you understand? I want you to stay here and think about what you brought to that room. What did you feel? Was it patience? Calm? Compassion? Mercy? Hope?” He paused, watching his nephew's reaction. Ben hated it.

What do you see in me?

“What did you feel in there, Uncle?” Ben intoned spitefully. “Because, I swear, I sensed fear in you, and fear is a path...”

“All right kid, point taken, but I'm the Master, and you are the student. So trust me. It's just a precaution. I have no idea what that temple holds. If it had this effect on you in less than ten minutes, I don't want to risk putting you back inside, especially when we haven't found a solution to your... outbursts. It's for your own safety.”

“For my safety, Uncle?” Ben said resentfully. “Or yours?”

Luke leveled him a pointed look. “Don't fight this, Ben. You think you're ready, but you're not. I know you want to do this, but it won't turn out the way you think. Trust me. Have patience. There will be other temples.”

“You would leave me here when you know I could help you get into that temple?” Ben was angry. No, he was livid. You ask me to trust you after you all lied to me, but you won't trust me! What have I done? Or is it even me? Am I being punished for your father's sins? She could sense the darkness sinking in deeper with every thought. “Give me a chance! I won't fail! I'm not afraid!”

“You should be, Ben,” Luke warned. “You don't understand the power of the dark side like I do. Stay here and trust in your fellow padawans to find a way into that temple.”

Ben would not give up without a fight. He was pleading with his uncle to not give up on him, too. “I'm stronger in the Force than all of them! You'll fail without me! Let me prove to you that I can do this!”

Rey could hear the chaotic thoughts tumbling through his mind; there was no reasoning with him. Ben was focused on one absolute – either Luke would trust him, or he wouldn't. And if Luke didn't trust him, then he was hopeless. Every choice made by his parents and his uncle flashed through his mind. Rey knew that it was the final betrayal that caused Ben to turn, but this... Luke was losing him because he didn’t see the significance it carried with Ben.

“No, I'm sorry. Not this one,” Luke said. There was a finality to his tone that matched the finality in Ben’s heart. Rey could see it in his eyes. Luke was beginning to understand that this meant more to his nephew than he had thought; if only he had known how much. “We'll only be gone a few days. Keep your comlink on you, but if you want to take the shuttle, go wherever you want to go. Go home and visit your parents. Or have some fun on your own. I... trust you. Think of it as some free time.” Luke smiled, attempting to add levity to the situation, though his eyes still searched Ben's in concern.

“Just don't tell your mother, kid.”

Ben considered the offer. If Luke would leave him behind here, then it would only grow worse as his own power grew; he knew he could never be a Jedi. Luke felt his power, he feared it. The second Luke uttered the words, Ben knew Luke would never trust him. He could take the shuttle, fly off to that uncharted planet, be free. Rey could feel his loyalty to his uncle and the others, the last tendril holding him to them. He couldn't abandon them, not how – he believed – his parents abandoned him.

Anguish dripped from every word as he gave one last effort to make Luke see that giving up hope in Ben’s ability to handle the mission was giving up hope in Ben. “I've given everything I have to you,” he breathed, “to the Jedi.”

“It's not enough this time, Ben,” Luke said gently.

Will it ever be enough? Will I ever be enough? You don’t trust me! Because you see me as a monster, I will never be a Jedi. All I'll ever be to you is Darth Vader.

Power never lies... Snoke's voice whispered. Power never leaves...You can be so much more than your uncle's unappreciated student...They called you a monster, just like your grandfather...They abandoned you... They lied... They will betray you... This was always your path... Vow allegiance to a master who can show them your true potential... I can make you more powerful than Vader... Come to me... I can show you how powerful you can be. She felt his resolve to fight the voice dwindling. Ben’s thoughts were heavy with darkness.

What if I was wrong? What if my whole life, he was actually the only one telling me the truth? What if he is the only one who can help me find who I am truly meant to be? What if my true destiny is a path of darkness? What if I was meant to become even greater than Vader? The darkness calls to me here. And for once in my life, it feels right. Rey grew more frustrated as she watched his memories. Ben Solo was slowly becoming Kylo Ren before her eyes.

He shuddered as fingers followed his spine up his back while he hunched over in the pilot's chair. “Hey,” a soothing, feminine voice whispered. For once, the sound of Jaina's voice didn't ignite something feral and possessive deep within Rey. She knew his fall was all too near, remembered what it felt like to fail and be failed by Luke, and was thankful that there was a fleeting moment when he didn't suffer alone, just as he had ensured that she hadn't.

Ben sat up and turned. Jaina stood by his shoulder, beside her stood Dev and Jacen, and behind them, Kyp and Tionne leaned against the entryway. “If you don't go, we don't go,” Jacen said with a smile.

“What about Luke and the others?” Ben asked, his voice strained as he bit back tears.

Dev shrugged as he dropped into the seat next to him. “He’s ‘disappointed’ in us.”

“That’s just because he knows they’ll fail,” Tionne giggled.

Corran strolled into the room swinging a generic bottle of fire-water. “Let ’em fail,” his eyes twinkled with mischief. “Who wants to play a game?”

Rey could feel the warmth of Ben’s smile.

The memory faded into another. They were at the Jedi temple again. It was apparent from Ben’s thoughts that there had been more unintended consequences of Luke’s decision on Malachor. The group that had gone into the ruins, and failed and were resentful toward the others who had chosen to stay with Ben. Those who had stayed with Ben were resentful that the others had gone into the ruins instead of supporting him in unity. The feud was strongest between Cade and Jacen. Dev, Tionne, Dorsk, and even Ben had tried to mediate between the two groups, but even after a long sit down with Luke, there was still a strain between the two sides. That was how Ben found himself sitting around a small fire with his fellow students, waiting for Luke.
They sat in a semi-circle; Cade was was at the top left, followed by Clighal, Dal, Dorsk, Rayf, and Tionne. At the lowest point of the half-circle were Alema and Dev. Then Kyp, Corran, Ben, Jaina, and Jacen made up the right side of the circle. Jaina was playing with the hair that curled at the nap of Ben’s neck as she stared at Tionne. Ben’s focus, however, was on Jacen, whose glare was focused directly across the fire on Cade. Everyone was silent, the tension between them all palpable.

A shadow in a hooded cloak approached the fire, and Ben’s attention snapped to the figure. Entering the ring of light from the fire, Luke removed his hood. A mischievous smile was on his face. “Ten years ago tomorrow – or was it fourteen – my nephew Ben was born.”

Ben rolled his eyes at his uncle’s attempt at a joke. “Hilarious.”

“You’re the biggest fourteen-year-old I’ve ever seen, Ben,” Jacen said. Clighal and Dorsk snorted, and Jacen raised his palms in submission. “Sorry, biggest human fourteen-year-old” He cackled as Ben shoved him with the Force.

“Oh, be a good a sport, kid, or the next time we’re in a cantina, I’ll convince them you’re a decade younger with a mild Force suggestion.”

“You wouldn’t,” Ben said, and Rey knew he was smiling. “That’s abuse of the Force.”

Luke shrugged with a carefree chuckle. He shifted his weight to access his pack and removed a large bottle of Corellian Whiskey along with collapsible cups. “Since you have a habit of stealing mine,” he gave Ben an accusatory side-eyed glance, “I thought we could celebrate with this.”

He began pouring the liquid into the cups and passing them around the circle. It was obvious from the shocked glances exchanged between the students that this was something out of the ordinary for Luke. He raised his cup to Ben, and the others followed suit. Ben swallowed the burning liquid, and something like hope sparked in the darkness. Rey’s heart clenched. Luke had made mistakes – he was human – but he had tried desperately to do right by them.

After several refills, the entire group had loosened up remarkably. The division between the two sides disappeared, and Rey watched the tension in Luke’s shoulders dissolve. Ben was more relaxed than she had ever felt him; she was certain he had a permanent smile fixed on his face. At one point, Jaina had graduated to more audacious touching and began petting his hair, so Jacen and Dev sat sentry on either side of him to block her. The three friends splintered off from the main group, entertaining themselves by telling stories and reminiscing over old memories. Ben was… happy, and singing, and laughing until his eyes watered. The conflict inside him was forgotten. It was beautiful; he was at peace. It was the only happy memory she had witnessed that hadn’t fractured. What was different about this one that he allowed it to remain intact?

When the fire dwindled, the students made their way back to their own huts. Their laughter cut through the silence of the early morning hours. Ben went to make his leave, giving Dev and Alema time alone with the dying embers, and Luke took it as his own cue to retire for the night. He walked Ben back to his hut, teasing him by disheveling his hair. It was painful for Rey to see how affectionate and hopeful Luke had once been. Outside Ben’s hut, Luke’s energy became more serious as he gripped his nephew’s shoulder. “Your energy seemed… different, tonight. A good different. I’ve planned a quest to more Sith ruins. Are you up for it? We’ll need your help.”

Ben nodded. Rey knew it was everything he wanted to hear from his uncle. For one brief moment, she forgot how it ended, and she believed with Ben that everything would be okay. Unfortunately, the mention of the temple had unintended consequences. The image of his own face behind Vader’s mask flashed through his mind, and his fear spiked. In his inebriated state, Ben panicked further when he realized that his mental barriers weren’t as strong as they should have been. It was only a flash, but if he grew suspicious, Luke could easily search Ben’s mind.

The crash of thunder brought his eyes to the sky. The sound of it caused an ominous chill to coil down his spine. He shuddered. His attention was drawn to his uncle in fear of what he had seen, but Luke was focused on the clouds as they opened up above them. As rain began to tap against the huts, he patted Ben on the shoulder. “Get inside; we don’t want to catch our deaths out here.”

Luke turned away. In his insecurity, Ben called after him, “Good night, Master!”

Luke hesitated for a moment, then replied, “Good night, kid.” Ben watched his uncle’s retreating back, trepidation crawling under his skin. Had he seen it? Ben knew he couldn’t chance it, he had to tell Luke the truth.

_In the morning, he decided. I’ll tell him the truth in the morning._

Something told Rey that Ben would never have the chance to tell his uncle, but after the happiness shared between them all that night, Rey had never expected what occurred a few hours later. Though she hadn’t expected it, the next memory was gut-wrenchingly familiar. Ben opened his eyes to a flash of light and a steady hum that signaled danger. When he turned, he found Luke’s green lightsaber poised to strike him down. He believed it to be a nightmare at first; though Ben had feared his uncle would give up on him as his parents had, the thought that Luke would attempt to murder him in his sleep had never crossed his mind. Rey saw the fear and shame in Luke’s eyes – he never intended to hurt his nephew – but she felt the terror and anguish in Ben.

_Not you, too._

He summoned and ignited his own blue lightsaber to block the inevitable fatal strike, but he knew that his tuned-down training saber stood no chance to defend him against his uncle’s deadly one. He begged the Force... anyone... to save him from his uncle’s wrath, but no one helped him. Not even the Force found him worth saving.

_I warned you... You are nothing to them... They all abandoned you... They lied to you... They betrayed you... They tried to kill you... But you’re strong..._

Ben may have never found control over his own life, but he would control how it ended. In desperation, he used the Force to crush the hut inward upon them, risking being impaled by either lightsaber in favor of dying on his terms.

He awoke with his lungs screaming for air. Rey’s fingers burned as Ben clawed his way out of the debris of the hut. He was sobbing in a combination of fear and betrayal as he took stock of the situation. Her mind reeled with his. His parents feared him to be a monster; they had believed that Luke was his last hope. But even Luke had lost hope in him, had given up on helping save him from the darkness, enough to attempt to end the life of his own nephew. What did that make him? Every last choice in his life had led him to this moment, and it all came back to his grandfather. And the darkness within him.

What now? Where would he go? What would he do? His life as he knew it ended when that hut crashed in upon them. He knew he couldn’t go back. She heard the whispers and knew this time he’d listen.

_Luke is dead... And you killed him... What do you think will happen now... You have become the monster they feared... They will not believe you... They will kill you for your role in the death of the Jedi Master... There is nothing left to go back to... Let go and free yourself to the dark side... The darkness can eliminate this pain... Power never lies... Power never leaves... Power never betrays you... Power never tries to kill you... You can be someone worth their fears... You can be greater than your grandfather..._ Ben dropped to his knees, defeated. She breathed his doubt, loneliness, and hopelessness as he finally surrendered.

_Ben, I know it’s too late_. Rey whispered as he collapsed. _This happened years before we even met. But it’s not fair, I wish I could turn back time. Because that is the only way to bring the old Ben_ Solo back, isn’t it? I wish I could have helped you before it was too late, before you made choices you could never take back.

She had wondered how he could have turned his back on people that loved him, but she was beginning to understand. They had failed to help him, and because of their mistakes, he truly believed they didn’t love him. Her family had failed her, and she couldn’t let them go, because she still loved them. Ben Solo was no different. He didn’t hate his family. No, even after their failures, he still loved them. That was why he couldn’t let go, either. He had turned his back on them, because he believed they had turned their back on him.

The intense, bright light she had felt radiating inside him was extinguished like a flame. She could feel the strength and power of the darkness as he did. He surrendered to its intensity. The agony from the betrayal by everyone he had ever loved disappeared as the darkness dug its talons into him, numbed him, consumed him. He stood. Emotionless. Determined. Resolute.

You must end the Jedi Order... Join me and I will help you become stronger than you could ever imagine... I can bring you peace...

He's right. I have to end the Jedi Order, Ben realized. Everything Luke taught me was a lie. The righteousness of the Jedi is a lie. They are no different than the Sith; they would kill for as self-serving reasons as their enemies. I have sworn to eliminate the evil from the galaxy, and the Jedi are the worst of them all. They must be stopped. I'll burn it down. I'll burn it all down.

He decided to start with the temple.

How do we get off this place before they find us? The only ships Luke had were a shuttle and an old x-wing. The shuttle could carry all of them, but it was short range. He didn’t know where they would go, if they would meet Snoke, or just run away to the Wilds, but they had to leave. There was nothing left for them there. Ben wondered if any of the others would come with him. What else would they do? The Order had betrayed them, Luke had failed them – all of them. If we try for the light freighter Luke left at the spaceport on Torque, without Luke, we’ll have to steal it and risk detainment. We need a ship. I have no one. No one to raise on Luke’s personal comms to escape this place. No one except...

“Ben?” a voice he hadn’t heard in years answered after being fetched by the droid who had answered his plea. It was the middle of the night cycle there, and Ben knew he had likely been asleep.

“I’m in trouble,” he gasped out, his lungs still burning from the rubble. “I need a ship, but I can’t Rey could feel the fear; Ben expected questions that he wasn’t prepared to answer. He expected hesitation, or refusal, of what he believed to be his only chance to be saved. He hadn’t expected an immediate response. “All right. Where are you?” Ben gave him the coordinates, the odd detachment in his voice belied by bouts of vomiting. He staggered from the concentration of darkness and the consequences of the night’s events, body shaking as the adrenaline wore off. His thundering heart wouldn’t slow no matter how much he searched for calm in the Force. There was nothing but darkness in his fear, so he grasped tight to the darkness.

“You’re lucky I’m on Coruscant for business, kid,” came the reply. “I’m on my way.”

Rain began to fall again as he set fire to the temple. He strengthened and spread the flames with the Force, making the fire impervious to nature’s efforts to stop him from destroying it all. As cold droplets fell from the sky, he stood out in the open, watching the inferno with pride as he had once as a child on a lonely birthday. The light cast by the growing flames drew the other students from their huts. Dev was the first one out. “Fire!” his friend shouted to the others, before sprinting toward the temple to fight the flames.

Dev noticed Ben standing in his path as he approached, and his friend grabbed his arm as he ran by. “Ben, let’s go! Fire at the temple!” Ben refused to move from the spot. Dev must have noticed a change in his energy, the darkness surrounding him, or saw a splinter of the future, because he froze in his tracks.

“Ben?”

It was a plea.

“I know,” he told his friend. “I did this.”

The man who had become Ben’s family slowly turned to face him. When their eyes met, he stared at Ben with a grim resignation, as if it was something he had feared all along. Perhaps they all had. It reopened the wound in Ben’s bleeding heart. As Ben saw it, even Dev had given up on him. “Ben, listen to me, don’t do this,” his friend begged.

Ben couldn’t stand seeing the disappointment in Dev’s eyes any longer, so he turned to the others who were gathering outside their huts. “Luke Skywalker is dead,” he announced bitterly over the rain. “My own uncle tried to kill me in my sleep. If he feared my power, he would have feared yours as well. The Jedi Order has failed us. We must destroy it all and leave this place for good.”

“Ben, what did you do?” Tionne whispered. It was evident by the sudden tightness in his throat that he hadn’t expected to see the mortification in her tearing eyes. They’re turning against me, like him. The other students reacted in fear and anger. Rey could see that they divided very quickly. Some blamed Luke, and others blamed Ben.

“He killed Master Skywalker! We can’t trust him!” Clighal exclaimed, backing away from Ben in fear.

Kyp was quick to come to Ben’s defense. “Did you not hear the part about Skywalker trying to kill him?” There was a ferocity behind his words that caused the Mon Calamari to shrink away even further.

“What would you have done, if your master was trying to kill you?” Corran added. He was leaning against his hut, whittling something with a vibroblade that glistened in the starlight, his voice disinterested as if they were discussing politics, not the death of their master.

“How do you know he was trying to kill you?” Alema stepped forward, hand grasping her lightsaber. “This is Master Skywalker we’re talking about!”

Tionne stood by her side, holding her back. “Alema don’t,” she begged. “Let’s just talk about this, okay?”

Ben glared at Alema in contempt. “I woke up to the sound of him triggering his lightsaber. I blocked his strike with pure luck and instinct. If I did not collapse the hut, he would have killed me.”

“He’s telling the truth, I can sense it,” Dorsk said to the group, stepping between the two sides. “I can see his mind.”

Dal’s hand was at his hip, resting on his lightsaber, prepared to fight a man twice his size. “Why would Master Skywalker want to kill you?”

Rayf joined Dorsk between the two groups. “You’ve seen Ben’s power.” He reasoned, assisting Dorsk in an attempt to deescalate the emotions heightening on both sides. “Skywalker feared him. And you all know what the Jedi teachings claim about fear.”

Alema wanted nothing to do with their attempts to pacify the others. She unclipped her lightsaber from her belt. “Luke didn’t even kill Vader. You expect us to believe that he would kill his own nephew, his student, a Jedi, while he slept?”

Dev stepped toward the Twi-lek with his hands raised, attempting his own rationalization. “Alema, Skywalker had no logical reason to be in Ben’s hut in the middle of the night. If he wasn’t attempting to kill Ben, what was he doing there?”

“Oh, only two people know the answer to that, our fallen master and the man who killed him,” Dal spat back.

Ben felt betrayed again. Not only had his master attempted to kill him, but some of the others didn’t believe him. No one will ever believe me. His words were sharp with malice. “You are either with Skywalker... or me. Make your choice.”

One of the students drew his weapon. Rey recognized the shaggy blonde hair. It was Cade. He twisted the tuning knob on the hilt of his training lightsaber to high. It was now effectively a deadly weapon. He activated it. “How do we know you’re telling the truth? You’re Darth Vader’s grandson!”

Jacen stepped forward, blocking Cade’s advancement toward Ben.

“Why would Ben lie?” Jaina’s voice was low and feral, protective. She was weaponless, but she joined her brother between Ben and Cade, hands raised to defend her friend.

Cade moved around them, attempting to find an opening. “Why wouldn’t he lie?”

“You saw the way Skywalker looked at him!” Dev shouted, joining Jacen and Jaina in blocking Ben from Cade.

“Maybe there’s a reason for that!” Cade screamed back hysterically, pointing his lightsaber between the siblings at Ben. Jacen twisted the tuning knob on his own lightsaber and triggered it.
“Back up!” Jacen clashed his lightsaber against the other blade. Cade stepped back and took a swing at him. Jacen returned with a strike of his own, and the duel began.

“Jacen, don’t!” Dev shouted, trying in vain to drag him back with the Force, but he easily broke through the hold.

Jaina realized her brother was beyond reasoning with, turned on her heels, and sprinted back to her hut to find her own lightsaber.

“Stop!” Ben demanded, but Cade and Jacen’s tempers had escalated past the point of backing down. The others stood in silence, watching the events unfold before them. She felt his darkness devour the fear. He was all too aware of the consequences of this fight; so was she.

Rey knew Ben felt betrayed by his uncle, but it had never made sense to her why he had killed the others, especially not after she knew young Ben through his memories. Knowing what inevitably happened that night, Rey had a terrible feeling about how the fight would end. She could imagine Jacen falling to Cade’s blade. She could imagine Ben’s reaction, what he would have done in revenge. But she also knew, for Ben to become the man he was now, he had to lose both Jacen and Dev. Dev defended Ben, but he did not share his disdain for the Jedi; he had been disappointed in Ben that he burned down the temple. He wouldn’t join the Knights, she was certain.

She remembered Luke’s words. He had vanished with a handful of my students… and slaughtered the rest.

If Dev didn’t join him…

Then Ben killed him.

He killed one of the two people he loved most in the world. Maybe the light in him really is gone.

Rey was numb as she watched Ben retune his own lightsaber and activate it. He circled the fight slowly. Jacen stumbled, and Cade slashed his weapon centimeters from his chest. In his effort to dodge the blade, Jacen tumbled backward, falling onto the muddy ground. It was enough to give his opponent an advantage. Cade moved in to finish him. The fury and terror burning through Ben overwhelmed her. Part of her wanted to look away; part of her wanted to jump into the fray and stop it all. It wasn’t fair that nothing she did would stop what happened next.

“Jacen!” Jaina screamed from the darkness, but they all knew she was too far away to help him.

Ben edged closer to the fight when Cade turned his head to judge her distance. It was enough distraction for Jacen to jump to his feet. When Cade reversed his grip on his weapon, threatening to thrust the blade through Jacen’s chest, Ben stepped up behind him. He could easily run him through with the lightsaber, but he hesitated to take a life. He tried to rationalize with him instead. “Cade!”

In the pouring rain, he barely registered when Dev stepped between them, hands up in an appeal to end the fighting. Dev’s plea died on his lips as Cade’s blade swung around at Ben. Her bondmate was not in close enough proximity to be injured by the weapon, but Dev was. The blade slashed across his chest. The wounds it left behind were deep. Rey knew, without a doubt, they were fatal.

Ben didn’t kill Dev, she realized, Cade did.

Ben caught his friend as he crumpled to the ground. “What have you done!” Rey could feel the darkness roaring inside him as he stared at Cade with pure, unbridled hatred.

Cade dropped his lightsaber, backing away frantically. “I… I didn’t know he was there!”

Ben turned back to his friend in his arms, resting him gently onto the muddy ground. “Why did you do that?” he murmured in a softness that was inconsistent with the severity of the situation. “I could have taken him!”

“I know,” Dev choked, his words rasping through wheezing breaths. He grasped tightly to Ben’s tunic. “But I had to try.” Ben shrugged off his outer robe and laid it over his shivering friend. The once white material was dirty from the rubble and wet from the rain, but it was better than nothing. “I see the path before you, Ben. Don’t choose this way; it’s not too late.”

Ben ignored the plea, not for the last time. “Why didn’t you see this?”

Dev had visions of the future; he should have foreseen it. Perhaps he had been careless, or perhaps he had foreseen it. His sacrifice could have been made in an attempt to spare one of the others from that fate, or perhaps he had foreseen exactly how it would end and made the decision to intervene anyway. Perhaps he knew the outcome and thought he could save Ben in more ways than one. Perhaps Dev loved him enough to give his life in hope of saving him. Rey couldn’t foresee the future, but she knew what would happen. If Dev sacrificed himself, it wouldn’t save him. Ben would fall.

Dev’s body began shuddering violently from shock; blood trickled from his mouth and nose. Rey had seen it enough to know what it meant, but she realized through his naïve thoughts that Ben had never seen anyone die before. It deepened the sorrow churning inside her to feel his blind hope that his friend could be saved. She knew it would make the inevitable outcome that much worse. Tears blurred his vision, his breaths were panicked, his hands shook violently as he attempted to help his friend.

Jacen dropped to his knees across from Ben, examining the damage. “Dev…” he croaked, his voice heavy with anguish. He began rocking back and forth, biting his fist to suppress the sobs torn from his throat. With his other hand, he grasped tightly to Dev’s hand. Rey could see it in his eyes even if Ben couldn’t; he knew.

Ben, drowning in more darkness than she had ever felt in him, was still naïve with hope. “Please, Dev, stay with me, help me do this.” he begged. He placed his hands over the wound across Dev’s chest, trying to remember the words he had once read in a book, trying to recall the lessons taught to him by the very man who was dying in his arms. Ben released his will to the Force, guiding the power flowing through his veins to save his friend. His own lifeforce began to leave his body, flowing into the wound; but the lifeforce flowing from the wound was greater than the lifeforce he was able to give. It was as if his energy met a wall in the Force, preventing him from saving his friend. He drew from deeper inside himself, increasing the flow into Dev.

He knew that his own death was a real possibility, but he would gladly die to save him. Dev was one of two people he considered family, and Rey knew she would have done the same if it was Finn. “Ben…” Jacen pleaded, but Ben refused to heed his warning. He was asking Ben to give up, and Rey knew him well enough to know Ben wouldn’t give up easily. He gave everything he had, pleading with the Force, his grandfather, even Snoke, to help him save the young man he considered his brother. Jacen struggled with the need to keep his friend alive at all costs, as Ben did, but also the fear of losing another person close to him. He could more easily see the truth that Ben denied. “Ben, stop; you’ll kill yourself!”

Ben ignored Jacen as he concentrated on his limited understanding of healing. “I should have listened,” he lamented, his voice wavering with despair. “I should have listened when you tried to teach me…”

“Ben, stop,” Dev rasped, echoing his friend’s warning. His hand shook as it covered Ben’s. “You can’t…”
While the others shouted at each other over the rain, Cade paced back and forth as he sobbed. “I’m so sorry, Dev. You weren’t supposed to be there…”

I was, Ben finished for him. It should have unloved, unwanted, worthless, monster Ben. It should have been me.

Crouching to the ground, Cade reached for Dev in a devastated sorrow of his own, but Ben stopped him with a glare Rey was certain was as vicious and vengeful as his energy felt. The hatred burned inside him, and Dev’s eyes filled with fear. His hand grasped tighter to Ben’s tunic in desperation. He tried to speak, to beg, but he couldn’t. Rey knew the last thing he saw was the resolution in Ben’s eyes.

I will kill you, Cade.

With his last breath, Dev watched his best friend turn to the darkness. Ben searched his friend’s eyes in panic as the convulsions stopped. “Dev?”

Rey had seen that endless stare before; Dev was gone.

“Ben…” Jacen gasped through sobs.

Ben, however, refused to give up. “Dev!” he cried, holding onto hope that his friend would be okay. He grasped Dev’s shoulders and shook him desperately as tears blurred his vision. When he didn’t respond, Ben pulled the robe from his friend’s body and began tearing open Dev’s sleep shirt to better access the wound.

“Ben, stop!” Jacen cried as he grabbed his arm and attempted to pull him away from their friend’s body. Ben shook his head, wrenching his arm free from Jacen’s grasp.

“No! I have to heal him!” he cried. “I have to… I have to…” Rey could feel the desperation in him to save his friend, but also the desperation to believe the lie, to hold onto hope. “Come on, Dev, you have to get up, we have to go, please,” he begged, his voice cracking. His hands were no longer doing anything purposeful, his fingers were just clenching and unclenching in the soaking wet material of his friend’s shirt. Jacen placed his hand over Ben’s fist, but Ben still held onto Dev. “Please.”
“Ben, let go,” Jacen breathed between broken sobs, “he’s dead. Dev’s gone.” The words were nearly lost over the torrent of rain pounding around them, but Ben heard it as much as he felt the words in the cold shivering across his skin, in the tightness of his throat, in the sinking in his gut, in every agonized squeeze in his heart. He felt it in the tear fracturing his soul.

“No.”

Ben shook his head, repeating the single word as if it was his lifeline to returning his world to the way it had been. Rey could see, however, that those two words had finally shattered through his denial. He closed his eyes, remembering his friend’s carefree laugh by the fire only hours before. Before. Before Luke had seen his vision in his thoughts, before his uncle had tried to kill him, before he brought the hut down upon them, before he had set the fire, before the others had confronted him, before Dev had… died. He wanted to go back to before.

Ben knew, however, that he couldn’t. The damage had been done; he had killed his uncle, he could never be a Jedi – he would never want to be a Jedi. His only option was to join Snoke, the only person who had ever warned him that this was how it would end, the only person who trusted in him to become someone. The vision was an inevitability, otherwise his uncle wouldn’t have made the decision to take his life. Staring down at his friend, he wished he hadn’t reacted with his survival instincts; he wished his uncle had ended his misery before he awoke.

With a tenderness contradictory to the darkness flooding through him, he tucked his now drenched robe around Dev. With trembling fingers, Ben slid his hand over his friend’s eyes to close them, and his brief control faltered. He cried out into the cold night and collapsed against his friend.

“It should have been me!” he sobbed into the drenched fabric, angry at his grandfather, uncle, his father, his mother, the New Republic, the Jedi, everyone that had pushed him down this path of no return. But most of all, he was angry at the Force. “Why didn’t you just take me!”

It wasn’t the Force who answered.

I only wish you had come to me earlier, Snoke whispered. Only with darkness could I have shown you how to stop him from dying… I could have made you powerful enough to save him… it is too late now… but I can teach you to stop it from ever happening again…

Skywalker didn’t teach you… this is all his fault… he set these consequences into motion… he tried to kill you because he feared your power… he poisoned their minds against you… his disciple has taken the life of your friend… and if he believed in you as I do, then he would have taught you how to save your friend… His failure as a master is the reason for all of this… the new Jedi Order is a plague on the galaxy… spreading death and suffering in its wake… I can give you the power he never did… but you know what you have to do…

The Force had spared his life, and he knew why. It was too late to change the course of his fate; he wouldn’t allow his best friend’s death to be in vain. He would end the Jedi and anyone who stood in his way. Jacen must have sensed the heavy darkness that surrounded him, because his hand found his shoulder in support. Ben would have none of his consoling. He shrugged his friend away with a jerk of his shoulder and stood in a murderous rage. He turned toward Cade. “You bastard! You’ll die for this!”

Cade backed away slowly. Dal and Alema were closest and moved to stand in front of him. “It was a Jedi who tried to kill me and a Jedi who killed Dev. The Jedi Order must be destroyed; the Jedi must end. Snoke will complete our training if we vow our loyalty to him.” His voice was cold; the darkness snaked through him as he addressed the others.

“If you join the dark side, you would become everything we’ve been trained to fight against!” Cade shouted over the rain.

“The Jedi Order is everything we’ve been trained to fight against,” Ben lifted his lightsaber to level it at Cade. His face was illuminated in a cerulean glow. “Luke was a murderer, you’re a murderer… and you will pay for what you’ve done, as will anyone who stands in my way of delivering justice.”

Rey was surprised when Jacen stepped forward. “You’re either with him or against him,” Jacen challenged the others between sorrowful breaths. “Make your choice.”

Why didn’t you stop him, Jacen! Rey demanded in anger. Snoke wasn’t in your head; you were good! You know this wasn’t what Dev wanted!

When Ben turned to his friend, Rey could see the darkness in his eyes. Rey had assumed that the Jedi forbade attachment for the same reason she had struggled at the Resistance; to prevent opposing loyalty. Perhaps it was more complicated than that. Perhaps they forbade attachment, not in fear of love, but in fear of less. Jacen was fiercely loyal. He loved Ben like a brother. He had loved Dev like a brother, and he had felt the agony of losing that bond. It was clear in his eyes; he refused to lose Ben Solo too. If he had to surrender himself to the darkness to protect him, then he would do it. Jacen didn’t follow Ben to the Dark Side because he didn’t care about him, but because he did.
Corran and Kyp stepped forward, joining Jacen at his side. Jaina was not far behind, still panting from exertion. Rayf and Dorsk took a moment to look at each other before ultimately stepping forward, loyalty to their friends and disenfranchisement with the Jedi Order superseding any desire to join the dark side. The six students stood on either side of Ben, and Rey was suddenly reminded of her vision on Takodana.

In that moment, her bondmate decided that Ben Solo was dead; the weak and foolish boy had fallen when his uncle had given up on him and tried to kill him. The death of Dev inspired the rise of someone stronger, more powerful. From the ashes of Ben Solo was born Kylo Ren, the Jedi Killer. Kylo, Jacen, Jaina, Kyp, Rayf, Dorsk and Corran had chosen the path to become the Knights of Ren. “Before we go, Dev deserves a proper burial,” Kylo said, stepping into the role of leader seamlessly. The Knights set to their task in silence, but Kylo stayed behind. The remaining students loyal to Luke ignited their lightsabers, blocking him from Cade.

Clighal, Alema, and Dal stood between him and Dev’s murderer. They were determined to deliver justice for their fallen Master, and he was determined to deliver justice for his fallen brother. Dal stepped forward first. Kylo didn’t charge him as she had seen him do before. He waited for them to attack, as he had waited for her on Starkiller. His movements were more defensive than she expected. He backstepped, almost toying with them, waiting for them to make a mistake. They did. Rey knew their fates long before Dal and Clighal fell at Kylo’s feet. Alema was the last to stand between them.

“Dev loved you, Alema!” he shouted in fury, lowering his weapon to give her a choice. He had known it for years, had known long before Dev confided in him and had wondered if Dev’s morality would have ever allowed him to break the Jedi code for their love. “And you defend his murderer?”

“Dev would have defended his murderer!” she shouted back, her voice drowning in sorrow. “I love him too, Ben! And I know Dev believed in the Jedi; he believed in the Light! This isn’t what Dev would have wanted!”

“Dev is not here to say what he wanted! And he…” Kylo raised his weapon to level it at Cade again, “…is the reason my brother is gone. Stand aside or die with him.”

She raised her own weapon into a fighting stance, “Then you leave me no choice.”

“You’ll die, Alema!”
“So be it, Ben. Then in defending Dev, you will kill the woman he loves.” They both knew her words did nothing to break through his hatred for Cade. Her blade was swinging through the air before she had finished speaking. She was skilled, she was fierce, she was powerful, but she was no match for his wrath. She had made her choice, and he showed the woman his best friend had loved no mercy. He caught her unguarded side in a swift spin, and she dropped lifelessly to the muddy ground. The moment she collapsed, he diverted his eyes. He refused to glance down at what he had done.

Only Cade remained, unguarded.

Cade’s lightsaber remained abandoned next to where Dev’s body had lain only moments before. Cade stood tall as Kylo stepped closer like a wraith in the rain. “Beg the Force to save you,” Kylo said darkly. “Like I did before my uncle tried to kill me. Like I did when Dev was dying, because of what you did. Let’s see if fate is kinder to you.”

“No, I won’t beg for my life,” Cade said through tears, defiant in the face of death, “You do what you have to do, Ben. I deserve this for the part I played. Dev was the best of us, and he died by my hand. But we both know it should have been you; you are the reason all of this happened. You’ll have to live with the ghosts, Ben, not me. How many lives will it take for your ‘revenge?’ How many people would still be alive if you had never been born?”

Towering over Cade, brown eyes meeting green, Kylo did not hesitate this time. The fallen Jedi impaled him on his lightsaber, watching as Cade’s green eyes widened in grim acceptance. Cade never made a move to fight back. Kylo withdrew the blade, holding Cade upright as he watched the life drain from his eyes. Kylo’s hand shook as the realization struck him that he had taken four lives – three of them innocent – and he felt no regret. The problem was, he didn’t feel anything. It didn’t satiate the darkness burning inside him, the desire for vengeance. The rage inside him craved to destroy everything until that hunger for revenge subsided. When Cade’s body grew limp, he released him to collapse to the ground.

A sniffle behind him had Kylo spinning on his heels to find Tionne. She had chosen not to fight, she was no threat to him, he could have left her behind.

She will continue to train in honor of her fallen master… she will seek revenge against you… If you leave her alive… she will revive Skywalker’s Jedi Order … and she will kill the others… she will take Jacen from you too.

Rey knew, when Luke had told her the story of what had happened at the temple, that the others had either joined Kylo or fallen to his blade. Rey knew the choice he would make, but it didn’t stop her from begging him.
Don’t go this way, Ben. This is different than revenge. Or anger. This is taking the life of someone innocent and unarmed, she’s not a threat to you. Please, just let her go.

Rey felt his resolution as he found truth in Snoke’s words. He saw no other choice in the darkness. She knew what the darkness had almost convinced her to do, she knew how it twisted into thoughts and corrupted them, she knew he feared it was his only choice. She only wished she could have been there, to show him that it wasn’t. But the Force had only fated her to watch.

Kylo lifted the weapon above his head. The blue illuminated Tionne’s fear-stricken features. Staring into her eyes, he realized he couldn’t do it. He was suffocating under the weight of the darkness he had allowed inside, but it wasn’t enough. There was a glimmer of light – the voice of hope from somewhere deep inside him – that his fall into darkness had not eliminated that prevented his arm from swinging down upon her. Even at his darkest, there was still light, and he loathed it. With the betrayal he felt toward his family, fear of what he had done, anger toward the students who defended his uncle, hatred toward Cade, it was all too much. He wanted to feel nothing. He wanted the pain to end, but the light inside him fought desperately to save him.

“Come with us.” He pled with her as the light inside him appealed to everything good in him. He didn’t want to make that choice. “Join Snoke. He will show us – ”

Her answer was to call her lightsaber and swing it at his chest, forcing him to step back. “Never!”

Lunging forward, he ripped the lightsaber from her hand. He cried out into the night as he threw it as far away from them as he could. Rey could see the fear in the young woman’s eyes. She knew Tionne didn’t intend to hurt him, she only meant to keep his wrath at bay. He did not see her defensive posture for what it was. To him, she had made a choice; she had sided with the Jedi, she had become the enemy. Rey understood him well enough to know how he reacted to betrayal.

The events in the throne room were suddenly painted in a different light for Rey. Had he thought she was against him, too? She had taken the lightsaber because she refused to stay when he chose the path he did. It had been clear to her then that the dark side had a stronger hold on him than she had naïvely thought, and no person was strong enough to overcome that for him. He had to forsake it himself, he had to make his own choice, so she left. If he chose a path that led back to her, then, and only then, would Rey help him. Perhaps he didn’t see it that way, however, just as he didn’t see the desire to run in Tionne. Rey was wrong. Even if she had been there, she couldn’t have saved him.

Prove your loyalty to me… and there will be no more pain… no more suffering… no more wanting… you will feel nothing… you will have your peace… you know what you have to do.
His eyes dropped to the muddy ground, the puddle reflecting the burning temple behind him. The truth – as he saw it – was clear. It was too late, he had to destroy the Jedi Order for what Luke had done. He had to eliminate the Jedi; to protect the ones he had the chance to save and avenge the ones he didn’t. Tionne refused to join them. She believed he was the monster. She had sided with the Jedi, with Luke, with Cade. She had made her choice.

I know what I have to do.

“I know what I have to do.”

“Close your eyes,” he said as gently as he could muster under the pervasive darkness. Rey recognized those words from Mustafar.

Tionne’s tears blended with the raindrops trailing down her cheeks. “Please, Ben, let me go. I… I don’t want to die. Don’t do this. This isn’t you.”

“Just… close your eyes, Tionne,” he repeated, his voice breaking under the emotion. He disengaged his lightsaber, the night swallowing them in darkness.

Tionne began openly sobbing, but she nodded, complying with his request. “Imagine someplace beautiful,” he murmured, stalking closer. “Think of everything that makes you happy.” She nodded again, her sobs growing louder with every splash of his boot in the puddles surrounding them, rhythmic like the countdown of a chrono as he drew closer. He skimmed her mind, finding her thoughts centered on a beautiful garden of flowers, with her dead friends and… him. He was smiling, laughing and carefree in a way Kylo knew he would never be again. There was light, beauty, and peace, but it only reminded him of his heart full of darkness. She would find none of that in the face of the monster looming over her, so with a twitch of his hand, he ensured her eyes stayed closed.

The images in her mind burned in his own and Kylo reached up to her temple, found her connection to consciousness, and swiftly severed it. Her last thoughts shouldn’t have been of him. He caught her in one arm, her body limp, her breathing slow and deep. Placing the hilt of his lightsaber against her chest, he hesitated. Could he do this, could he ensure the vision he hated was realized? Could he become no better than his grandfather?

I’m not "becoming" anything; this is all I’ve ever been. It’s too late. The damage has been done, the Jedi Order needs to be stopped. If I don’t do it, all of Snoke’s warnings will come true. He was right about everything. I will see the end of the Jedi, just as my grandfather tried to do. Then I can have my peace.
With a flick of the switch, the blade was ignited and extinguished in between breaths, just a flash of crimson on their faces. “It’s over,” he whispered. It was quick, it was painless, but he had taken a path of no return. Snoke had ensured that. He’d had many choices to save himself, but he had chosen to slaughter them all.

Rey had no doubt the images of that night – and the cries of the dying – would haunt her nightmares for the rest of her life, just as she had no doubt that Luke had heard those agonized cries when he searched through his nephew’s mind. The irony was not lost on her that his desire to prevent it was the very catalyst that caused it. And if she learned one thing from Luke, it was that visions of the future were dangerous.

_I don’t understand, if he had lost Jacen, too, then it would all make sense. Those two bonds meant everything to him. Dev was lost, but he saved Jacen. How could Jacen allow him to fall so far? Snoke was in Ben’s head, but not Jacen’s. Why didn’t Jacen save him from Snoke? Where is he now? Why does Ben refuse to let anyone else close to him when he has a bond like that?_
Warning! This chapter and the following chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.

Okay, now that we got that out of the way, if you want to know the names of the actresses and actors I chose to play the new characters, here they are:

Jacen - Aaron Paul
Jaina- Alexandra Daddario
Kyp - Adrian Grenier
Corran- Norman Reedus
Rayf- Satoshi Tsumabuki
Dorsk- Common
Tionne- Chloe Grace Moretz
Dev- Tom Holland
Alema- Zendaya
Dal- Dayo Okeniyi
Clighal- Masie Williams
Cade- Tom Felton
Chapter Summary

Fun fact - a few of Snoke/Sidious's monologues belong to Sidious and other Sith from Legends

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
---CHAPTER 65---

The memory faded into a new one.

Kylo was pacing in an empty room, in front of a window overlooking a large building, the darkness she sensed in him split by the intense light she had felt before. The destruction of Luke's temple had not extinguished the light permanently as he had hoped.

Rey was hyperventilating – Kylo was hyperventilating – his hair gripped tightly in his fists.

His thoughts were focused on a conflict raging inside him.
I did my job. I used persuasion on the guards; my mission is complete. Everything else is out of my hands.

He had proven his loyalty to Snoke and the darkness. The Amaxine Warriors would do what was needed to ensure the First Order’s survival. The bomb would be detonated at the breakfast conference with or without his help. That was it. He had to allow it to happen. Leia had too much power in the Senate. He knew she had become a complication to the plans of the Order. He was positive she knew what happened at the temple; it had been long enough, and she had done nothing to find him.

She’d had her chance; Snoke refused to train any of them until they had proven their loyalty to him, but she had pretended like he never existed. She was too worried about being related to Darth Vader. He knew all of that. She didn’t care. And as long as she was alive, she would never allow the First Order to bring law and control to a chaotic galaxy. It shouldn’t matter to him; she had lied, she had abandoned him, she deserved it for what she had done. He knew all of that, and yet, the foolish love for her wouldn’t fade.

Kylo knelt next to the window, resting his head in his hands, the sun of Hosnian Prime warming his shoulders. He searched for guidance in the darkness, but something deep inside him, something the darkness could not touch begged him to save her. He began pacing again, his heart beating wildly in his chest, as he tried to convince himself that his mother deserved to die. But the drive to save her remained.

I can't. I can't stand here and let her die.

No, there’s nothing I can do, it's too late, the bomb has been set. I can't stop it.

I have to...

His eyes scanned the empty room, desperate for an answer. His gaze fell upon his pack.

I have to warn her.

The message would have to be brief – and messy so she didn’t recognize his writing. She could never know he warned her. He opened the pack and removed a stylus and ink from inside. He had no parchment, but he knew there must be something he could write a message on in the conference room. He moved to the window, reaching into the Force to map a layout of the room.

I could find something, a poster, a sign...a streamer and hide it under a napkin at her assigned seat so only she can find it...

From the window, he caught a glimpse of a strong Force signature walking across the courtyard. Leia. He immediately withdrew from the Force and blocked his energy to the best of his abilities, hoping she had not sensed his presence. Her hair was arranged in a perfect Alderaanian braid, and her smile caused a crushing pain in his chest. Rey was taken aback by the strength of the love that remained in Kylo's heart for his mother.

Leia was speaking to a man he did not recognize, unaware of the fate awaiting her at the conference. Kylo could have walked across the courtyard and warned her himself, but he didn't want her to know it was him. He couldn't look in her eyes as she stared at her fallen son. He remembered the expression on her face when she spoke about his grandfather; he couldn't let her see the monster he was. As deeply as he ached to see her, to ask her why she had abandoned him, he made his decision. He would leave the warning for her, and after that, he could be done with her.

But what would convince her? It has to be something simple.

Kylo quietly left the room before he could change his mind. The bomb would still detonate as planned; his only intervention would be a message. That was not treachery, he convinced himself, because Leia's fate would still be in her own hands. Rey couldn't help but wonder if he had only chosen to go to his mother instead, if she could have saved him. This version of Kylo was not a cold and ruthless murderer. He was a scared and broken boy.

What changed? she wondered. Or did he just become better at hiding it? Has this lost soul been the true boy behind the mask all along?

Kylo pulled the hood of his cloak over his head, blinking back tears as he made his way to the conference room where his mother – without intervention – would meet certain death. His chest constricted in guilt – guilt for betraying the First Order, guilt for not being as strong as he wished he could be, like Vader, and guilt for coming within yards of the mother he hadn't seen in years and turning away. If she looked as broken as he felt, he didn't know if he could return to the First Order.

Set in his decision, and with his energy actively blocked in the Force from her and the others, he brushed past his mother into the building. He was a looming shadow of darkness, hardly someone who was easily missed, but her eyes did not even shift his way. She laughed at something her colleague said. Laughed! Rey braced herself for his hatred but found only despair.

Kylo loathed himself for how profoundly he missed his mother, but with that laugh, he was convinced she was happier without him in her life. Her son was missing, after all, and she was smiling and continuing her work as if he never existed. For all she knew, he was dead. She hadn't come searching for him, hadn't even released a statement pleading for his return. She had done nothing. She hadn't lifted a finger to get him back, only confirming to him that he had made the correct choice. He would have done anything to protect her, died for her, before they abandoned him. But she made it clear she didn't want him – she had never wanted him.

At the First Order, he had access to the holonet in ways he did not have planet-hopping with Luke and the other padawans. He had learned all about the young senators Leia had taken under her wing, and the young pilots Han had trained. They were the surrogate children his parents had always wished they had. Kylo believed he had been replaced long before the night he burned Luke's temple. Rey could feel how deeply it wounded him, yet he wouldn't allow his mother to die.

He used persuasion on the same guards that had allowed the team into the building to plant the bomb earlier that morning. The people in the corridors were quick to move out of his way as he focused determinedly on the destination. Perhaps they could sense his resolution in the energy around them, or perhaps they caught a glimpse of the hardened features of his face, but they scattered from his path like swamp rats.

_That's it, run away. Fear me,_ he thought as he used more persuasion to influence their memories.

Watching them scurry as if they sensed the monster inside him ultimately gave him the idea. He knew what he should write. It was simple, unmistakable and sufficiently poignant as a warning.

_Run._

Rey had little time to ponder whether he had gone through with the plan to save her or if Snoke had discovered his involvement as a new memory emerged.

Kylo’s eyes were closed, or covered, but she knew he was standing before Snoke, because she could see him without actually seeing him. Rey understood he was using the Force, but this was not perceptions or feelings. The objects and people were visible as varying degrees of bright white light. Though the people standing around him retained their forms, they were all vibrating. At first, she wondered if their brightness was related to the light within them, but with Snoke appearing the brightest, she presumed that it was the strength of their energy in the Force. It reminded her that – though their power in the Force was equal – their understanding of it was not.

You need a teacher, he’d told her. Maybe she did.

Though she didn’t know how or why, she knew he was waiting for something. She could feel the calming effect of his slow, steady breathing. It was the only sound in the room.

Then there was a bright flash from one of the forms, and Kylo raised his bright plasma blade. There was a beam of light that traveled the distance between them. It created a blazing spark when it connected with his blade. It was the unique sound of a blaster that enlightened Rey to the exercise.
They were firing at him, as she had in the forest, and he was blocking them. It was clearly training, with blasters set to stun.

Rey felt the ripple of something in the Force – a warning – and Kylo turned to block another beam of light. Despite the constant assault of energy, his movements were less wild and more agile than she remembered from her own duels against him. He was surprisingly restrained, even in darkness.

“More,” Snoke commanded. There were more warnings in the Force from all around him; the others were no longer taking turns to target him. His pulse increased with his speed as he tried to calculate in fractions of a second the trajectory of the next threat. After several near misses, Snoke instructed him again.

“Use the darkness and the light to guide you.” It was strange advice from a creature of darkness.
As far as Rey knew, Snoke had demanded Kylo to destroy the light inside him. Had it not always been that way? What had changed?

Kylo released himself to the Force’s guidance, using the darkness for speed and the light for anticipation. As they were fired in rapid succession, Kylo parried and blocked as he moved back and forth fluidly in a circle. Rey felt something close to pride in his capabilities.

“More,” Snoke growled. The others fired near-simultaneously. Rey could feel his panic as he tried in vain to block them all. When one slipped through his defenses, he attempted to slow its velocity, but it was too late.

Or it would have been, if the beam hadn’t been suspended centimeters from his chest. His breath hitched in fear, and he tensed as he prepared for impact, until he realized someone had saved him.
Kylo tore off the blindfold, staring down at the fatal red beam hovering close enough that it had singed his tunic. The blasters were not set to stun. Kylo was thankful that his master had intervened, but when the beam was redirected away from him, he realized that it was Jacen’s hand that twitched, not Snoke’s.

He would have saved me, Kylo convinced himself. He knew Jacen would do it.

Though when Snoke turned to Jacen with disdain, he wasn’t as certain. “If you seek to aid everyone who suffers in the galaxy, you will only weaken yourself… and weaken them. It is the internal struggles, when fought and won on their own, that yield the strongest rewards. You stole the struggle from them, cheapened it. If you care for others, then dispense with pity and sacrifice and recognize the value in letting them fight their own battles. And when they triumph, they will be even stronger in victory.” Jacen nodded in deference. “And as a reward for your… intervention, you are next.” Jacen nodded obediently, but when his eyes met Kylo’s, there was uncertainty there.

Snoke turned back to stare at Kylo. “You’ll need more training if you expect to become my apprentice, young Solo.”

“Oh! With your guidance, I can do it, Master,” Kylo said, panting from the exertion. “I’ll train harder. I’ll find a balance. I’ve already learned so much more with you than I ever learned with –”

Before Kylo could finish his conviction, blue sparks had flown from the creature’s fingers into his chest. Kylo was on his back by the time he realized Snoke had used lightning against him. He clenched his teeth against the residual pain, accepting the admonishment as “necessary.” It sickened Rey that he was almost… grateful. Snoke stared at him for a long moment, undoubtedly skimming his thoughts, before he finally spoke. “What have I told you?”

“The past is the ghost that haunts us. Ghosts must be banished. Lingering on the past is weakness.”

“And?” Snoke gestured vaguely with an air of boredom to his tone.

Kylo’s stare slid to the floor. “Fortune does not favor the blind, the ignorant, the arrogant or the naïve. Trust is weakness. Once you let your guard down, there’s nothing to shield you from the knife in your back.”

This time, when the lightning arced from Snoke’s fingers, Kylo raised the weapon to defend himself. Snoke smiled. “We are, all of us, always being tested, young Solo. It makes us stronger, and strength is power, and power is purpose. We must succeed against the trials we face... or die in the effort.” The lesson did not end there, however. The creature raised his hands again, directing the lightning at Kylo, but this time when Kylo blocked it, he bounced more energy off the floor.
Kylo was unprepared for the second arc, and it knocked him down again. He pushed up onto his hands, confused. His question of why must have been apparent in his eyes, because the creature answered.

“The first was a test, the second a reminder,” he explained. “The master and apprentice relationship is symbiotic, but in a delicate balance. An apprentice owes his master loyalty and must be dedicated to destroying his weaknesses. A master owes his apprentice knowledge and must be careful in showing only strength. These obligations are reciprocal and contingent. Should either fail in his obligation, it is the duty of the other to destroy him. The Force requires it.”

Kylo stood again, chin lifted high. Snoke’s words only inspired him to fight through every lesson his master taught him, no matter how brutal. He would destroy his weaknesses, or die trying. “I will not fail you.”

Snoke’s eyes brightened as if in challenge. “We’ll see.”

The memory faded into a new one.

Kylo had collapsed to both knees on the floor, gasping for air, as Snoke towered over him. Rey sensed Kylo’s defiance as he stared up at him.

“Yes, pathetic child, let the anger and the hate burn through you. This fiery spit of hope reminds me of your mother. Your grandfather had quite the difficulty torturing her. Alas, he was too focused on the use of the Force as punishment to see the true effectiveness of these powers for enlightenment. And he did not share my resolve. Or capabilities. But you... you have such potential. You have the capability to hate the ones who could undo you that he never did. In the end, he was weak. We will break you of your weaknesses, one way or another, and then you will kill Luke Skywalker. You will be the Skywalker they all remember.”

Rey sensed Kylo’s confusion. Luke Skywalker was alive? He couldn’t be. Kylo sensed nothing from him after he had awoken in the debris of that hut. It had to be a test, to see how he would react. What bothered him more was the very thing Snoke had once wanted him for originally— his strength in both the darkness and the light – had now become the one thing the creature wanted to train out of him. When their training had first begun, Snoke promised to teach Kylo abilities that made him a stronger adversary. His lessons were focused on tapping into the power of the darkness, but also using the light to keep the mind sharp. As the training progressed, however, something had gradually changed between them.
The more powerful Kylo became, the more Snoke desired to drive out his light. Perhaps it was the threat of Luke Skywalker. Perhaps Snoke began to fear the strength of the light in him and his attachment to the others. Perhaps Snoke just couldn’t stand the thought of Kylo becoming more powerful than him. No matter the reason, Rey wished Kylo had seen what she saw; nothing would ever be good enough for Snoke. His training made Kylo weaker. Yes, he taught the fallen Jedi how to properly manipulate the Force, but he would have never allowed him to become as powerful as he could be.

Apprentice became captive, training became torture, but it had happened so seamlessly that Kylo didn’t see it for what it was. He believed if he just tried harder, did better, fulfilled every order that Snoke dangled as the "finish to his training," then the abuse would end. Snoke was systematically weakening his apprentice, manipulating him into a weapon reliant upon his master, and, though Rey could see it, Kylo couldn’t. He was the same lost boy, trying to be "good," to change himself to be in the good graces of someone else; but just as he had failed before, he couldn’t be what Snoke wanted him to be.

Kylo’s throat began to constrict again. Rey panicked as the air compressed in her own lungs, but he sat motionless, save for the convulsing in his muscles from the lack of oxygen. He stared up at the creature, fighting the self-preservation instinct to grasp at his throat as he struggled for air. The shadow of unconsciousness overcame him, but the monster released him as he collapsed forward. Kylo gasped for breath on his forearms, beads of sweat dripping down the strands of hair falling over his forehead.

His windpipe collapsed again under the pressure of the Force tightening around his neck. He struggled to push himself back up to his knees, raising his eyes to the monster who was slowly drawing the life from his lips. Snoke chuckled as he held his gaze. As Kylo lost his connection to the conscious world, he was released again. The creature leaned down, grasping Kylo’s chin in his hand.

“You...will...submit,” Snoke rasped, “Or you will die fighting a winless battle. Only when I bring you to the border of death will I release you. I will allow you to take enough breaths to remember the taste of oxygen. Then it will all begin again. I will do this over and over and over until we break that defiant streak in you, young Solo. Find the darkness, destroy the weakness of the light inside you. You choose how long this takes.”

Snoke released his chin and slid his gnarled fingertip along Kylo’s cheek to catch a falling tear. Kylo flinched under the monster’s touch, which elicited a tut of disapproval. Rey’s skin crawled as she remembered the revolting sensation of the creature’s hand grasping her face.

Kylo struggled to control the shuddering of his oxygen-starved body. His eyes burned from the broken blood vessels, but entirely out of stubborn spite, he never broke eye contact with the creature. She begged him to let go, for both their sakes, even as she felt the strength surge into his aching muscles. There was a light, a hope, illuminating the darkness of his mind. I can save you, a child’s voice whispered. Snoke sensed the newfound strength he had drawn from that hope. He smiled cruelly, holding Kylo’s defiant gaze as he drained the oxygen from his lungs. Kylo attempted to stand, but his body would not cooperate.

“Why do you hold onto this imaginary embodiment of hope?” the creature chuckled. “Did you forget? Even she abandoned you a decade ago. She stopped finding you in your darkest hours, she left you alone to struggle against the nightmares, she is no better than your parents. You weren’t even worthy enough for her love, and she was a delusion of your imagination. But I believe you will show them all how worthy you truly are. Yes, you have great potential. Such strength. And your attachment to the light will break...eventually.”

I don’t understand. Why didn’t he leave? What power did Snoke hold over him that he would choose to remain under his control? Why would he call that man his master? Yes, in his mind, Luke would have killed him. But Snoke was no better; why did he stay?

Rey did not have time to further ponder her questions.

A wall of psychological agony crashed through her senses. She cried out and was answered with a wicked, vile laugh that chilled her to the bone. Snoke. The next sound churned her stomach, bile rising to her throat. It was Kylo’s tormented screams. He writhed violently on the floor, scratching at his face, ripping out his hair, anything to alleviate the torture in his mind. Images and emotions flashed in relentless visions as Snoke tore the rest of his memories apart. The jagged, broken snippets of happy memories Rey had witnessed in his mind hadn’t been Kylo’s doing, but Snoke’s. Rey would have wondered if he had lost all happy memories of his childhood, and how that had affected him, if his screams weren’t drowning her in her own darkness.

All she could do was watch as his darkest fears were realized over and over again before his eyes. The ones he loved were graphically beaten, tortured, brutalized and murdered by his own hands, each vision more vicious than the last. Their unseeing eyes, broken bodies, nauseating screams permeated his senses – her senses – but he lay powerless to do anything but experience it all. The smell of burning flesh and the metallic taste of blood overwhelmed her. Even as an observer of a memory, it felt all too real. Every nightmare, every doubt, every fearful thought was used against him, twisting into reality in his mind. There was no escape; he couldn’t shut his eyes to the images in his own head.

As soon as his mind began to numb to the obscene and depraved images, the ruthless black claws tearing apart his consciousness would release him. As he regained control of his mind, his senses returned. Screams echoed off the walls. He rolled, disoriented, to his side, searching the room for the source of the screams. The others were suffering equal torment. Jacen was struggling on the floor across from him as he faced the same psychological torture. Drawing blood from the deep gouges he was carving into his own face with his fingernails, his screams of torment cut through the haze in Kylo’s mind. He called out for Jacen, aching to provide his friend a sliver of hope, but the cold, black claws tore into his mind again. The break in the torture had been just long enough to remind him of the overwhelming mercilessness of the torment on his senses.

Every happy memory he’d had – his mother’s loving eyes, his father’s approving smile, Dev’s comforting words, Jacen’s infectious laugh, tickle fights with Chewbacca – were torn into fractured flashes of memory or twisted, contorted, and permanently remolded into something evil and stomach-churning. Rey had never imagined such depraved horrors, and judging from the vomit that Kylo retched upon the floor, neither had he.

Please let me die. Please let me die. Please let me die, his mind begged.

The dark claws released his mind from the torture just long enough for his humanity to return, and then the torment began again. The focus would vacillate between horrors he wrought upon others – the people he loved most – and then his own torture, all without him suffering a single wound. Rey assumed that was how Snoke explained away the cruelty of it.

Inside his mind, anything could become a reality. It felt as if every bone was crushed under a massive weight until it shattered; his skin felt as if it was ripped from his body over and over again, his limbs severed one by one, he was lit on fire, caustic chemicals injected into his bloodstream, he was fed on by rathtars, and it all became his reality, because his mind believed it was. All he could do was thrash and scream.

How long did he suffer like that? Hours? Days? I don’t want to imagine. How could he have been loyal enough to do those terrible things for someone who tortured him like that? Torture is not a strong enough word for that evil. Why did he stay?

The vision faded. Then there was darkness. Only darkness. There was no connection to the Force.
It was a numbing experience, even for Rey, who had spent the majority of her life without it. He could not stand in the cold, cramped room – no, not a room – it was a dome-shaped prison of Force.

The containment field was impenetrable and electrified. The shock itself would have been tolerable, had he not been immersed in water. Every brush of the barrier sent a paralyzing current seizing through his muscles, leaving a crushing pain in his chest and a grinding ache in his lower jaw. That didn’t stop him from beating at it relentlessly when the only thread left connecting him to sanity was pain.
Rey could sense him teetering on the borderline of delusional. He was attempting to function without sleep. Even if the nightmares would relent, the prison itself was designed to hinder sleep. Enough water covered the chamber floor that he could only lie down by submerging at least one of his ears. The water was charged with a ringing tone that was maddening for even the few seconds that Rey experienced it. His throat was raw from screaming, his fists bloody from striking the barrier, his body weak from the electrocution and whatever torment he had been subjected to previously.

Rey had seen him unhinged before, but this was... something else. His mental stability was a jumbled tangle of emotions held together by a single thread. She wondered how long he had been confined like that; no food, desperate to sleep, senses deprived, and perceptions altered. Had he been left in there hours, days, weeks? She knew it was less that he had lost track of time and more that time no longer existed to him. There was an agony cracking deeply within his soul, the darkness seeping in to fill the emptiness. The boy he once had been was gone. He was nobody, nothing, broken pieces held together by darkness; he was existing in a purgatory of time and reality. The loneliness devoured his soul. He was exactly what Snoke wanted him to be.

Left with nothing but the torture of his own thoughts, he relived the warped memories that Snoke had manipulated into nightmares. The light was gone, the will to fight eliminated, the voices of hope quiet. But another voice was not. She felt the dark claws of Snoke tear through his mind. A vision of someone she could only assume was Darth Vader consumed his thoughts.

“Grandson.”

Kylo looked beyond the energy containing him to see the Force ghost of Darth Vader. A calm settled over him in the presence of the apparition; something he hadn’t felt since he had been thrown into the cell to destroy his weaknesses and prove his "strength." Kylo tensed his body to control the shuddering of weakness. “Grandfather.”

“I need you to finish what I started,” the man said. “Our bloodline is not a curse as you have been led to believe. You do not yet know the true power of the dark side; you can become stronger in the Force than they ever imagined. They will kneel at your feet and regret the day they underestimated you. See through the lies of the Jedi, create order through their destruction. Do not fear the dark side; let the anger and hate guide you. Defeat the weakness of the light. You will bring peace, freedom, justice, and security to your new empire, as I did. Kill Luke and end the Jedi order. Avenge my death at the hands of my own son. Let no one stand in your way. It is your... destiny.” An image of Kylo in his onyx robes and mask – exuding power, strength, and authority – flashed through his mind. There was no conflict in his heart, only emotionless peace.

The yearning for that peace enraged Kylo as he grasped for the darkness that was just beyond his reach. That vision became his will to survive, but also the focus of all the wrath that had built in his torment. He felt it rising inside him to levels beyond his control. It was something hateful and dark, and he was too weak to fight it. The loneliness, betrayal, fear, rage, and pain clawed their way out in an explosion of suffering.

Kylo screamed.

Shock waves rippled through the Force, leveling everything around him. When he realized that it had collapsed the dome of Force around him, he pushed himself into a wide stance on wobbling legs. The Force flooded back into his veins and, for once, he felt relief in finding it there. Raising his eyes from the floor, he met the stare of his master.

Snoke smiled. “Did you feel that power when you channeled your fear and anger? Use it. It’s the only path to your destiny.”

A new memory emerged.

Kylo dejectedly knelt before Snoke, his head bowed in defeat. The other six students were lined up in front of Snoke in the vast training room, with a hooded prisoner at each of their feet. Rey sensed that he knew what would happen, that he had feared this moment. Kylo obediently stood at Snoke’s command.

“The Sith believed that ‘taking the life of an innocent is always harder even than taking your own, if you're sincere. This is the ultimate test of selflessness – whether you're ready to face unending emotional pain – true agony – to gain the power to create peace and order for billions of total strangers. That is the sacrifice. To be vilified by others, by people you know and care for, and for the personal sacrifice to be totally unknown to those billions you save. To do your duty for the good of the galaxy. It's easy to be a clean-cut, hero-slaying monsters. There's always a little bit of vanity to it. There can be no room for vanity or pride in being despised.”

“This is your final test before you face the other fallen Jedi in combat. This is a simple test. You will kill the six prisoners before you for the First Order. If you hesitate, your fellow apprentices will be punished until you complete the task. If you refuse to complete your task, you will die.”

Kylo swallowed apprehensively as he approached Dorsk, who held the first prisoner. He refused to look him or the other apprentices in the eye “Lower your defenses.” Kylo did as commanded, allowing Snoke complete control over his mind. Rey felt the revolting touch of the creature in her mind as he felt it in his. Dorsk removed the hood, and Luke Skywalker was staring back at him.
Snoke cackled.

Kylo knew logically that Luke was an illusion of Snoke’s manipulation. He had seen it before in training; the illusion distorted reality and reason. Snoke could make him see exactly who he wanted him to see...and hear. But it was all in his mind. They were merely insignificant prisoners of the First Order. Unfortunately, that rationality was falling to the delusion; his mind was at the mercy of his master.

“Begin.”

Kylo ignited his cerulean lightsaber, a burning reminder of the boy he had been. It had been altered, of course, the training knob removed, the intensity of the plasma set at full lethality. This would not be the first life he had taken with the weapon, but it was the first time he wondered if the crystal would continue to aid and guide him through the Force. Though it did feel right that the life taken would belong to a prisoner who looked – in his mind – like his one, true enemy, Luke Skywalker.

If only it was Luke.

Kylo smiled as he severed the man’s head. The darkness pulsed around him and through him. Sorrow deepened in Rey’s heart as the darkness slowly penetrated deeper into his soul, twisting into his defiant core of light. With every new band of darkness that clawed its way in, he became more like the man she recognized. Kylo was intent to deliver the fate of the prisoners as quickly as possible.

Rayf met his eyes as he removed the second prisoner’s hood. Kylo stilled as he recognized Chewbacca. He had thought after Luke that he would be eliminating his enemies, not murdering his family. What happened to leaving the ghosts in the past? The Wookie whined and growled his pleas for him to spare his life, reminding him of the childhood games they played when his parents were away. He apologized for wounding Kylo with the bowcaster, but he ignored his plea for forgiveness. Kylo sliced through him instead. He waited for the emotional heartache, but he was oddly numb to it as the prisoner that his mind told him was Chewie slumped to the floor in a pool of blood.

Corran had his eyes downcast as he revealed the next prisoner. Kylo shuddered as he met the eyes of his father. He hoped Snoke couldn’t see memories pooling his eyes.
It’s not real. It’s not real. It’s just in my head. This means nothing.

“Ben, it’s not too late. I miss you. Your mother misses you. You're not a monster or a burden. We know you can be good,” the illusion of his father told him. Kylo bit his tongue to stop himself from responding to the man, from begging to know why he left him. “I’m sorry we lied to you about your grandfather and left you alone with Luke. But I’ve come back for you like I promised I would. Come home. I’ll help you, son,” his voice broke as he begged. Kylo shook his head as he fought back tears.

This isn’t real.

His father refused to look at him the last time he saw him. He left him. He never came back for him. He never loved him.

Kylo did what he had to do. He closed his eyes and impaled his father through the heart.

It’s not real. He’s not real, he reminded himself.

When he reopened his eyes, his father’s shocked eyes stared back at him. He didn't feel sorrow; Kylo was almost relieved as his father collapsed. He felt himself shedding the weaknesses of attachment as he killed the past. He was convinced the exercise would only bring him more strength. Rey's heart ached as she remembered in detail when the real man fell at his son's hand.

Kylo tore his stare away from his father and stepped in front of Kyp. He knew who would be under the next hood. Kyp removed the hood and he had to swallow the bile rising in his throat. His resolve wavered.

Mother.

“Ben, my sweet boy. You were right. I spent too much time away from you, ignoring our family and the whispers in your head. I’m so sorry. If you come home, I’ll give it all up. We can be a family again. We love you, and we never gave up on you,” she said gently, tears falling down her cheeks. He wanted nothing more than to dry her tears, to beg her to take him home.
No, she’s not real!

But it was as if reason was just out of reach. Snoke’s control was not only altering perception but logic as well. He couldn’t remember that it was a random prisoner. All he saw was her. His mission, however, was not forgotten. They had already made their choices, and so had he.

If he could kill his father, then he could kill his mother as well. With a trembling hand, he stepped forward. He pressed the blue blade into his mother’s chest, in a swiftness he hoped ended her suffering quickly, as she screamed in agony.

I’m sorry.

She lay unmoving at his feet, her eyes – the eyes his father said looked like his eyes – staring blank and empty up at him. It was only when there was nothingness in her eyes that he realized how deeply he still loved his mother.

What have I done?

Somewhere inside he knew she wasn't dead, that he could go back to her. But she wouldn't tell him the things he needed her to say. That wasn't real; she had left him to be murdered by his uncle. And, even if he wanted to leave, it was too late. He had made his choice. He blinked back tears as he forced himself to move to the next prisoner. Rey felt his body tremble uncontrollably as he increased his grip on the lightsaber.

Jaina stood in front of him, her eyes pleading with him to finish it quickly.

He killed Luke, Chewie, Han, and Leia. Who else can he be forced to murder? Rey wondered.

When Jaina removed the hood, Rey’s heart clenched. Kylo’s eyes were locked on the face, unable to look away.

“Ben, don’t do this!” Dev cried with tears in his eyes.

Kylo shook his head as he exhaled a trembling breath. He’s dead. This is isn’t real…
Images of Luke crushed under the weight of the collapsed hut, of rising again, of reviving the other students passed through his mind. Rey knew it was a manipulation of Snoke, but even she questioned its veracity. Luke was powerful, he could have restored life. But she remembered what Kylo had said in the jungle. If he had been telling the truth, then reincarnation was a dark side skill.

Kylo felt him struggle to sift through his own memories, to prove it to himself, to prove Dev died that fateful night and was not kneeling in front of him. He couldn’t break through the fetters on his mind. “Please, Ben. It’s a trick! It’s me! I didn’t die that night. Skywalker brought me back, but the First Order found me. Please, you have to help me!”

Kylo studied the young man on his knees. He looked like Dev, he sounded like Dev, he had the same plea in his eyes. He hadn’t felt his energy in what felt like a lifetime, but he knew it was his. He had to be Dev. What if it was a trick? What if Snoke was testing him? What if he drove his saber through the only other person who mattered to him anymore?

I can’t do it! I can’t! I won't kill him!

Rey heard a scream, and Jaina fell to the ground as Force lightning coursed through her. She writhed in agony as Kylo searched Dev’s pleading face. “I trusted you!” his friend cried. “You’re better than this. I see the path before you, Ben. Don’t choose this way, it’s not too late. Don’t betray me like Luke betrayed you! You're like my brother!”

It’s not real. It’s not real! It’s all in my head. He’s gone, I watched him die in my arms that night, I tried to save him. He couldn’t be saved…

But I thought Luke was dead too. What if…

No! the others weren’t real, he isn’t real either! he tried to convince himself, but the illusion spread whispers of doubt in his mind. Jaina was screaming, Dev was pleading, and Kylo realized the sobs were coming from himself.

Before he lost the resolve, he thrust the blade forward. Tears cut down his face, like a scar, as he pierced the heart of his brother, ending the pain quickly. The screaming stopped as the body fell to the floor. The only sound was his guttural cries, his voice reverberating off the training room walls as he screamed at the heavens.
His memories returned, a small mercy from Snoke. Flashes of that night returned; the blood trickling from Dev’s nose as he convulsed, the disappointment in his eyes, his plea. Kylo’s hands shook violently and he refused to glance at his master's eyes. He knew the disapproval he would find there.

He stared down at the body of a stranger, feeling a mixture of relief that he had not killed his friend and sorrow that Dev was truly gone. His renewed grief would have to be buried down deep with the jagged pain of everything else that would make him weak. He couldn’t spare another tear for his best friend, because he knew it wasn't over.

Rey understood as he did – the last prisoner was much smaller. Too small. A child, Rey realized. He shut his eyes as Jacen removed the hood. He refused to see what he knew would be there, but what he had shut from sight he could sense in the Force. Snoke ensured that.

“Ben, it’s not too late,” the child’s voice whimpered. “I can help you.”

Snoke sensed his hesitation. “Would you give your life, Jacen's life, for an imaginary girl? Even if the child was real, she promised that she would never leave you. But she lied. She saw the monster you are inside and left you! Just like everyone else. She made Ben Solo weak, but you are strong now as Kylo Ren. You do not need any of them; they held you back, they used you, they underestimated your true power. Kill her, kill them all, only then can you be what you were destined to be.”

“I can save you,” the child pleaded.

“But I can’t save you,” Kylo whispered to the child, collapsing to his knees. Screams echoed in the room, electricity vibrating in the air around them. Rey knew if Kylo opened his eyes, she would see Jacen thrashing on the floor.

Whether it’s the girl or not, whether she deserved this for leaving me alone... this is still a child!

“Make your choice!” Snoke bellowed. “Jacen dies, the girl dies, and you die. Or...just the girl.”

No, I can’t do it!
“Destroy your hope, Solo!”

I can’t!

“Please!” Jacen pleaded.

“You’re killing him!” Jaina screamed. There was another vibration of energy through the air and her cries of pain joined her brother’s as she writhed on the floor next to him.

I’m sorry. I’m so sorry. Please forgive me, I have no choice.

Rey felt him force out the light, succumbing to the darkness. He allowed the Force to guide his arm, surrendering to its will. As the humming blade met flesh, all the screaming abruptly stopped. Not a single tear was left to shed. He was numb. Innocent people were dead by his hand – a child was dead by his hand, and he had, in his mind, murdered nearly every single person that had ever meant something to him. Nearly. The others were still alive, Jacen was still alive. Kylo stood, opening his eyes to meet the glare of his master. He refused to allow his eyes to wander to the bodies that lay in his wake.

“It is done,” Kylo announced, devoid of emotion, his voice nearly as robotic as his eventual mask. Snoke closed his eyes, breathing in the darkness that surrounded them.

“It is, indeed.”

The memory faded again to a throne room. Snoke sat in front of what had become the Knights of Ren.

“Kylo Ren, I see in you something truly special - the potential of your bloodline. You have killed all other warriors who could have contended with you, but to become master of the Knights of Ren, you must prove your worthiness by defeating your fellow Knights. You must prove your insurmountable strength in the Force. There is only one opponent left for you to face. Let the darkness guide you through this final test. Show him how powerful... how capable... how merciless the son of darkness can be.”

Kylo turned obediently to face the other Knight. It was Jacen. Rey knew she would soon receive the answer to her questions regarding what happened to Jacen. She was overwhelmed by darkness as he readied his stance, his blue lightsaber poised to strike. There was a part of Kylo that did not want to face his friend, knowing that the lethality of his blade could cause accidental injury in their fight. He had already split open Kyp's shoulder with his carelessness. But he knew the inner turmoil – devouring him alive inside since the moment he was born – would never stop until he completed his training and found peace. Luke had tried to save him with the light, but he had failed. Snoke had promised him peace if he surrendered to the darkness, and that was his last hope. If he had to injure his closest friend to do it, so be it.

Determination flashed across Jacen’s face as he prepared himself. Kylo did not hesitate. He quickly closed the distance between them, forcing Jacen to stagger backward off-balance, fear replacing the determination. In every duel she had witnessed, Kylo – and Ben – had charged his opponents, overwhelming them with offensive strikes. On Starkiller, he had waited for her to make the first move. Everything about the fight was nothing like she saw from him in his memories.

She felt her bondmate's confidence; he was keenly aware of his friend’s weaknesses. Jacen responded in fury by taking the offensive, but his strikes were lazily and adeptly blocked by Kylo, who tauntingly rolled his weapon in a flourish as he chewed his lip to suppress a smirk. Kylo toyed with him as a lothcat toyed with its prey. Jacen became increasingly frustrated.

He may have been on the offensive, but he did not control the battle. Jacen lunged where Kylo wanted him to lunge, where he purposely left himself open. Then he would shift out of the way, allowing Jacen to stumble forward, carried by his own momentum. Kylo could have taken half a dozen chances to attack an exposed flank, but he waited patiently for Jacen to right himself, and the game would begin again. Rey knew Kylo could have ended the fight quickly, but he chose to agitate and embarrass his friend instead. Jacen was red with fury, but he was weakening in exhaustion.

“Enough, Kylo Ren,” Snoke instructed blithely.

With the command, darkness surged inside him, and Kylo swiftly became the aggressor. He swung his lightsaber down forcefully upon Jacen, as he had in the training fight she had witnessed, but this time the other knight remained on his feet. Jacen had clearly been training extensively for this moment. But Kylo was, unfortunately for him, stronger.

His strikes were destructive, dominant, fierce, and unforgiving. Though Jacen did his best at parrying and blocking Kylo’s powerful strikes, he could not gain control of the duel. He was pivoting and backstepping defensively, which only seemed to encourage Kylo’s confidence. Kylo overwhelmed him with several quick slashes at varying heights before flipping his grip on the lightsaber and slashing across Jacen’s midsection, burning his clothing.

Jacen’s eyes widened as he realized how close his friend had come to taking his life.
Kylo thrust the lightsaber at his abdomen, forcing him to stumble back. Off balance, he blocked the next few strikes as best he could, but Kylo could sense his weakening with predatory accuracy. He swung wide at his friend’s throat, using the momentum to quickly rotate and crash the lightsaber down upon him with incredible velocity.

Their blue lightsabers – the embodiment of peace and hope – clashed as Jacen’s arms stretched high above his head, leaving him with little leverage. Kylo disengaged his lightsaber as his hand shot out with manipulation of the Force. He jerked Jacen forward violently, using his friend’s own momentum against him. As Jacen fell forward onto the obsidian floor, the lightsaber clattered from his grasp. Kylo stood over his friend, his cerulean lightsaber reignited and humming at his throat as Jacen turned over in surrender.

“Yes...” Snoke hissed. “Now finish him.”

Kylo blinked rapidly, emerging from his trance-like state, his eyes raised to his master in disbelief. Snoke was grinning cruelly. “Darth Plagueis once said, "Tell me what you regard as your greatest strength, so I will know how to best undermine you; tell me your greatest fear, so I will know which I must force you to face; tell me what you cherish most, so I will know what to take from you; and tell me what you crave, so I may deny you." That, Kylo Ren, is how you give yourself to the dark side. You must first sacrifice everything before you can rise to power in darkness. Before you can become as powerful as Lord Vader. Do it. Finish him.”

_This is how Snoke intended to complete his training, by taking away the closest thing Ben feels he has to family. Ben wouldn’t do it, he couldn’t, but Ben is gone. Kylo will do anything, kill anyone, to find peace._

Kylo’s stomach dropped in understanding, grief tightening in his throat. He slowly lowered his stare back down to his friend. The fear in Jacen’s blue eyes reflected his own. Rey sensed Kylo's loyalty surface through the fear. It gave her hope.

_I was right. There’s still light in you. I can feel it. But is there enough? Ben, please don’t do it..._

Kylo’s voice echoed in her mind. _I can’t do it._ He deactivated his lightsaber.

“He would be more useful alive, as an asset in battle,” Kylo said indifferently, turning from his friend to casually inspect his lightsaber. He hoped his performance was convincing, though his inner emotions did not reflect his tone. He summoned Jacen’s lightsaber, with an ease as if he called his own, and offered it to him in an outstretched hand. It was effortless, as if they shared…

_A bond_, Rey realized.

Jacen struggled to his feet and snatched the weapon from his grasp.

Rey understood that Snoke had intended for Jacen’s death to complete Ben’s training. He knew taking the person who meant the most to Ben would complete his path to darkness. But Ben couldn’t do it. He must have hoped the same for Han, but it only made him more conflicted.

_But that means… if he thought my death would complete Ben’s training, he had to believe I… meant something to Ben. No, not just something._

_Everything._

It didn’t make sense. How could Snoke have been so wrong? Why had he even bonded them in the first place? How could he have known she would fall for the lies? Her thoughts were interrupted by a warning in the Force.

Kylo had turned to address Snoke, and he caught the sight of blue in his peripheral vision. His hand shot up instinctively to block whatever he sensed was moving toward him. With the threat temporarilily neutralized, Kylo turned to face it. A bright, blinding blue obscured his vision. Bright, blinding blue _plasma_. The arc of the blade had been stalled only centimeters from his hand. The blade had been aimed for his throat, intended to kill.

The blade disappeared back into its hilt, revealing the Knight who had betrayed him. Hot tears burned in his eyes as he stared into Jacen’s; once a striking icy blue, now a piercing, fiery yellow. Evil. Nothing reflected in those pools of darkness. His best friend, his brother, had tried to kill him as he stood defenseless. Jacen was the last person he cared for. His friend had betrayed him after Kylo spared his life. It was in that moment that he swore he would never let anyone close enough to hurt him again.

She had thought the worst thing that could have happened to Kylo would be losing Jacen in death. She was wrong. This. This was how he had become the hardened and callous Kylo Ren. This was why Snoke allowed Jacen to live. Kylo was suffering, hiding a wound so profound that it would never heal, not when he was too fearful to allow the only remedy to heal it. He wasn’t so different from her, she realized. They refused to let anyone past the mask and armor they wore to protect themselves from further disappointment and pain. It was easier to keep everyone at arm’s length than lose people to death, abandonment, or betrayal. At least it had been, before the bond had torn everything away until all they could be with one another was themselves.

And they had betrayed the sanctity of that bond.

Ben, I’m so sorry.

A new memory emerged. Kylo was kneeling in a cold, dark chamber.

“This is your final task on your path to darkness. You will bleed your crystal, dominate it, force the Kyber to obey your command. You will demonstrate your loyalty to the dark side, the First Order, and to me. You will not leave this cell until you have proven your faithfulness to the First Order, and proven your worthiness as my apprentice,” Snoke commanded.

“Yes, master,” Kylo said. The door shut and he flinched, dragging himself off the floor to stare down at the lightsaber he had created under Luke’s tutelage. He triggered the ignition switch, inspecting the familiar bright blue hue of his weapon. Rey could sense the strong bond he carried with the crystal, a bond he would have to break and subjugate. It was entirely unnecessary; the crystal did not respond to either the darkness or light – it would respond to him no matter how he used the Force.

This is it, he realized. To bleed the crystal was to bleed his soul. Destroying the bond would destroy him. There would be no coming back from that, but he believed he was already too far gone. His hands trembled as he disengaged the weapon, the sigh that escaped his lips stuttered with fear. Before he could change his mind, he made quick work of disassembling the outer housing in the hilt, revealing an inner chamber that contained the functioning components of the lightsaber.

Rey recognized basic circuitry and energizers, a chamber containing a Kyber crystal, and the power cell. It was built similarly to Luke’s severed weapon, which she had spent hours inspecting over the past few weeks. Kylo carefully removed the pale blue Kyber crystal and turned it over in his fingers. Rey could feel the warm strength attached to the bond between Kylo and that crystal. Its vibrations in the Force were attuned perfectly to his – its frequency sang the intricate song of his very soul. It had called to him, had been fated to align with his powerful Force signature. It was the single most significant relationship to a Jedi.

An overwhelming sorrow consumed him as he contemplated the loss of a deep, intimate, trusted part of himself. The only bond in his life not poisoned by betrayal. But it would be. And he would be the cause. Rey craved the bond with a crystal that would become an extension of herself, so she understood the devastation of what Kylo had been asked to do. She had seen his weapon. She knew what he had done. But to witness it was... heartbreaking.

Kylo gathered the Force around him. He allowed the anger, fear, and pain – feelings of betrayal, abandonment, and loss of control – to build inside him, twisting in volatility as the unstable battle of light versus darkness raged in his soul. He concentrated on his connection to the Force, his connection to his Kyber crystal, and imposed his deepest pain onto the bond.

Rey screamed in response to the splitting pain she felt through Kylo as he tortured the crystal in domination, in turn torturing himself, imposing his will upon their trusted connection. Rey could feel the Kyber resist, attempting to oppose the betrayal that was destroying their bond, but Kylo had become nothing but willpower and determination. The act was rending a fracture in his soul he knew he could never heal; the bond would be irrevocably damaged by the unnecessary subjugation.

Kylo cried out into the chamber as the pain burned within him, tears streaming down his cheeks as he forced himself to continue the torture. His body shook violently with exhaustion, the psychological agony so intense that he straddled the border of unconsciousness. He imposed his superiority with brutal might, infused his pain into it, but the crystal was equally matched in power and refused to surrender.

He continued in single-mindedness to sever the connection instead, ripping and tearing through the deepest parts of himself. The torture had reached the limit of the pain he could withstand – an unstoppable Force meeting an immovable object in the most literal sense. There was a desperate plea, an appeal made from the depths of his being, to end the violence and save his soul. Rey begged through tears for the torment to end; the agony had become unbearable to endure, and she did not even share the bond with the crystal that he had. Kylo pictured the death and betrayal that had led him down that path. Using that pain, he cried out with one last effort.

Something snapped, a searing pain forcing him to his knees. It felt as if a vacuum had sucked the air from the cell. He gasped for breath as he fought to remain conscious. It was done. He opened his hand, expecting to see his crystal tainted in a red hue. Though it had bled as he had desired, there was a deep fracture that splintered down its length. Rather than severing the bond, he had only damaged it beyond repair – the connection vibrated in tormented betrayal. The act had not solidified his heart to darkness. No, he felt as fractured and defeated as his crystal.

Rey cried for him. Mourning, she realized, the death of Ben Solo. Kylo believed that he had killed Ben the night at the temple, but she could feel the damage he had done by bleeding his crystal. That soul-splitting torment was the true end to the Ben he had once been. It was the past. Rey knew she could not change it, but it provided her little comfort that she could have done nothing. She thought she could save him, help him become the man that he once was, but he had done damage that was beyond repair. She thought she would be angry at him for being so foolish, but all she felt was sorrow for the loss of the man he could have been. And beyond that, she knew one thing – she would never allow him to try to sever their bond again.

A new memory emerged.

Kylo and the others were standing inside a dark cavern.

No, not a cavern, Rey realized. A temple.

Dust and ash covered the cracked floor. Statues, columns, and sections of walls carved top-to-bottom with symbols laid in crumbled ruins of stone. There was not a single opening that allowed light to penetrate the darkness there. A crimson glow was cast onto a point in the center of the room by nearly a half dozen lightsabers. Nearly, because Kylo was standing weaponless. Rey sensed from his agitated thoughts that his weapon was not functional; he was struggling with containing the heat released by the cracked crystal. His mind was lightyears away as he tried to find a solution so he wouldn't further disappoint Snoke.

There was a large crater in the stone floor, and, as Kylo shifted closer, the chasm revealed the reflective shimmer of the largest Kyber crystal Rey had ever seen. It was then that she understood that he was standing on the same forsaken planet he had once stood upon when he had been "Ben." He stood in a semi-circle with the others, in an image reminiscent of the one they had stood in their last mission together when they were still loyal to the Jedi Order. This time, their new dark attire matched the darkness that consumed their hearts. This time, they surrounded the holo of their so-called master who had tortured and tormented them. And this time, Kylo had not been left behind for the mission.

“You have made it through the complex trials and puzzles that have shrouded this temple in mystery for thousands of years. You have succeeded where Luke and the other Jedi had failed. Luke was ruled by fear in the face of true power, and by leaving Kylo Ren – the strongest in the Force – behind, he compromised the mission. Fear... vanity... failure is the legacy of the Jedi. This,” the hologram of Snoke gestured lazily to the room, “is the legacy of the Sith. They were too consumed by greed and revenge to survive their own weapon. But with the threat of this weapon you have discovered, we will bring the New Republic to its knees. The Republic has failed you all differently, but you will all have your retribution for it. We will bring order and justice to the galaxy; no one will suffer what you each have suffered. They will bow to your power. And it all begins with this weapon. The Empire had their Death Star, but what we have discovered here will make that weapon seem like a child's toy.”

Kylo stared at the ancient text in his hands. He held the secrets to creating something greater than the Death Star. His mind was not focused on power, however, but the destruction of another Alderaan. Kylo had witnessed the effects of that destruction; he had witnessed how his mother had suffered. He had wondered if that was the moment his mother had changed into someone who would sacrifice anything to prevent that from ever happening again, including neglecting her own family. For years, he had blamed Vader and the Empire for taking his mother from him that day as much as they had taken those lost on the planet. But Snoke wouldn't destroy a planet, would he? That was not order.

The yawning abyss that housed the weapon stretched to the edge of his boot. He could drop the plans, and the text would be lost forever to the depths of darkness. Something inside him screamed to loosen his fingers on the grip, implored him to see the consequences if a weapon of that magnitude was operational. Could anyone be trusted with this absolute power in their hands? Kylo believed he could, but whose hands would the text fall into if it left the temple?

“Kylo Ren stays,” Snoke’s holoprojection said, staring at Kylo, “the other Knights return to the surface.” As the others followed the maze of passageways back the way they had come, their crimson lightsabers disappeared into darkness. Kylo turned to his master.

Snoke studied him for a long moment. “Do you remember the story of the poisonous Porcuspine and the aquatic Gundark?”

“A child’s story, master,” Kylo answered. “The Porcuspine asked for help, but stung the Gundark in the middle of the river because it was his nature.”

“And what is your nature, Kylo Ren?”

Kylo wasn’t certain what the correct answer should be. “Master?”

Snoke’s smile crept across his face. “I feel your conflict with the light. It is tempting you.” It was ironic, he thought, that at the same temple, one master could believe he was tempted by too much darkness, and the other believed he was tempted by too much light. Kylo cursed both the powerful light and darkness that flowed through his veins.

“I can feel it again,” Kylo admitted, knowing that a lie was futile. “But I will not be seduced by its weakness, master.” He tightened his grip on the book, stepping away from the temptation of the vast crevice.

Snoke ignored his words, choosing to push his energy into Kylo’s mind instead. Searching. Interpreting. Manipulating. “Do you see that the Jedi Order must be eliminated?”
“Yes, master.” There was no conflict Rey could sense in his words. He truly believed it.

“And you know the Jedi are the extension of the New Republic,” Snoke continued. “They are just as flawed, just as culpable. They took parents from their children. And they have nothing to show for it. Do you see that the New Republic is a failure as extensive as the Jedi Order? They need to be stopped to bring order to the galaxy.”

“Yes, master.” Kylo hesitated, only for a split second, but it was enough for Rey to notice. And Snoke.

“Then what is the conflict I sense in you?” Snoke pushed deeper into his thoughts, but Kylo altered his thoughts subtly. It seemed intentional, as if he was planting thoughts for Snoke to find. After what had occurred in the throne room, Rey believed he was doing just that.

His answer, however, was truthful. “The weapon, master.”

“The galaxy cannot save itself,” Snoke reminded him. “It will not bend to our will without cause. The weapon is required to contain the chaos, bring order through the threat of power. Don’t fear. What would be left to control if we destroyed it all? Construction has already begun, this is merely the final key. You will become the operative member of the weapons’ triumvirate command with General Hux and Captain Phasma. But do not concern yourself with them, only you and I will have final command over the weapon, young apprentice. It is merely a tool in our plan to gain power.” It was only then that she realized what that weapon would become, what it would destroy. And Kylo had once held the key to it all – millions of lives in the balance – over a pit of darkness.

“For now,” Snoke continued, “your mission is to expand our hold in the uncharted territories. I will introduce you to the Attendants who will help you navigate the Unknown Region. We must first control the hermetic kingdoms there, and quell the uprisings, starting with Tehar. We must have a strong presence in the uncharted region to successfully mount a strong enough offensive against the New Republic. The Knights will join you on subsequent conquests after they have returned the superweapon plans to me.”

Kylo lowered his eyes to conceal his disappointment. “What about Skywalker?”

“All in good time.” The holo flickered and disappeared without parting words, casting the temple into darkness.
“Yes, master,” Kylo answered to the empty room.

Without the aid of his lightsaber, Kylo lit a glowrod to help navigate around the pit containing the crystal, and into the passageway where he paused to admire his handiwork in solving the final puzzle. Kylo had done it, Rey realized. He had been the one to do what the others before him had not. Kylo was more powerful than even she had believed. Somehow, Snoke had known that Kylo would make the difference in the war, long before anyone else had recognized his potential.

What would have happened, Rey wondered, if Luke had trusted him on their mission here? Would the plans have still ended up in Snoke's hands? Or would that one decision have changed the war?

As Kylo stooped in the narrow passageway, his boot kicked an object hidden in the debris. He called it to his hand, recognizing the dark shape for what it was – a lightsaber. It was shaped in a crossguard configuration, an ancient design he had only seen in history holobooks. He triggered the blade, but it did not ignite.

Kylo nearly dropped the useless weapon, but he was struck with an idea. It would benefit him twofold. The crossguard design could fix the instability concern with his lightsaber, channeling the unstable heat through the vents. Then there was his uncle. His mission was to find Luke, eventually, and, when he did, he would have to face the man who nearly succeeded in killing him. If he could alter the hilt to fit his own lightsaber...Luke would know where the weapon originated. Kylo could show his uncle the consequence of underestimating him, striking fear into the Jedi as he had done to him. He would succeed where Luke had failed.

He trusted his master; he would lead the campaign in the Unknown Regions until the First Order became a viable threat. That would certainly draw his uncle out of hiding. He would bide his time and wait, years if he had to. The galaxy was a vast place, but how long could Luke possibly stay missing? If Luke was too much of a coward to finish what he started, then Kylo would force his hand.

Yes, all in good time.

A new but familiar memory emerged. Kylo was standing in a torrential downpour on a planet foreign to her, but she plucked the name Yashuvhu from his thoughts. His darkness was heavier than she had ever felt in him, with his crackling crossguard lightsaber in his hand and the Knights of Ren at his side. She could feel his simmering agitation. By all accounts, battle was his element, it calmed him. She couldn’t find a reason for the turmoil until he turned his mask to the sky.
“I hate rain,” he growled. The other Knights didn’t respond, but it was low enough that it was likely lost in the deluge. Rey had connected with him twice in the rains on Ahch-To and once on Kamino, but she had never heard him direct this seething malice toward it before. It wasn’t until she saw the flashes of his memories of a burning temple in his thoughts that she understood; rain reminded him of that night. Why hadn’t she noticed his torment that night in the hut, or as he stood on the edge of that cliff? She had recognized the light and compassion in him when he had seen her pain and empathized, but had she seen his?

Rey watched him struggle with the anger – attempting to dominate his pain like an opponent – so he could successfully complete his mission. His mind was singularly focused; everything he did and planned to do was with the ultimate goal of killing his uncle and ending the Jedi Order. His role with the First Order was partly due to misguided ideals, but predominantly, it was a means to an end. She wondered what his purpose had become now that Luke Skywalker was dead.

Certainly, there were few ties that pulled him to the First Order other than that original purpose. Luke was dead, Snoke was dead, and what camaraderie he may have once held with the other Knights had been lost to the cruelty and manipulation of Snoke’s training. The love she had felt between the students at the Jedi temple was gone, the bonds having faded to nothing. They would have been a stronger unit had the bonds remained, but she knew from experience that Snoke was too fearful of loyalty to anyone but him. Kylo was surrounded by people who had once been his family, but he was emotionally isolated.

Curiously, the others were not wielding lightsabers, but other seemingly effective weapons, some that Rey had never seen before. At first, she believed that their lightsabers were simply not drawn, following Kylo’s lead. Perhaps the other weapons were a necessity to their battle plans. It was his distrust and paranoia as he carefully watched their movements in his limited peripherals that gave her cause to think otherwise. Perhaps that was why she had never seen the Knights of Ren. Perhaps Snoke had feared them standing together against him, so he divided them. Or perhaps Kylo’s paranoia had formed from Jacen’s betrayal – perhaps he trusted no one.

“You are in no position to negotiate,” Kylo said flatly to a group of men clad in armor standing before him. The vocal modifier in his mask sent a shiver of familiarity down her spine.

“We will never bow to the First Order! We’d rather die than allow you into those mines!” a villager shouted defiantly as he raised his sword, his face obscured through the immense downpour.

“That can be arranged,” Kylo responded, striking out abruptly, separating the man’s head from his shoulders with a brutal swing. The other villagers shouted in unison as they besieged the Knights. Without an ounce of fear, he channeled the darkness and engaged them.
The crystal still called to him through the bond, but Kylo forced his will upon it – compelling it to obey rather than opening himself to the bond so it could answer willingly. It was physically and psychologically draining to dominate it – not to mention unnecessary – and Rey realized that was what Kylo suffered every time he used his lightsaber.

Is that why he wanted Luke's lightsaber?

It had been a slaughter – the men who stood against the Knights were no match for the weapons and skill of the fallen Jedi. Rey watched one Knight sever a man in two with a long sword. Another Knight used a blaster rifle to swiftly cut down an entire group. One of the smaller Knights had some type of flamethrower that drove the men to his will. Kylo was counting the people who fell to his weapon.

The battle was quickly falling into their favor, with a single combatant remaining. The villager had turned away from the Knights closing in upon him, however, raising his sword to a figure on the ground. Kylo wasn’t certain why the villager would kill someone on his side – as the fallen lifeform certainly wasn’t a Knight – but Kylo would allow the villagers to kill themselves if that was their desire. He would have, if there wasn’t a warning in the Force that terrified Kylo for reasons he couldn’t explain. He stepped up behind the villager and impaled the lightsaber through the man's chest before he could strike.

The rain distorted the figure on the ground, but Rey knew immediately who it was. She had seen this before, in a vision, from the viewpoint of the girl scrambling to get away. Kylo was momentarily taken aback, the darkness inside him abating as he sensed the girl's strong Force signature. Something about her seemed oddly familiar to him. Kylo moved toward her, dozens of questions burning in his mind, but the girl disappeared as he reached her.

“Who are you?” he shouted into the rain, finding nothing as he reached out into the Force in search of her.

“What was that?” a mechanical voice said as a Knight stepped up next to him. Even behind the voice modulator, she recognized Kyp’s voice. “A manipulation by Snoke?”

“No,” Kylo replied with certainty, surveying the deadly scene around them. “This was... something else.” A whisper deep inside him told him he would see the girl again. He knew from the depths beyond where the darkness could reach that this girl would be important.

It wasn't just a vision, Rey realized. He had seen her, despite it occurring years before she ever left Jakku. Somehow, across time and space, I was there. But why? Of all the moments for us to meet, why bring me back to that one? Why not bring me to the moment before Luke ignited that lightsaber? I don't understand. I never had a chance to change anything.

As if on cue, Kylo's comm beeped. Removing it from his pocket, a hologram of Snoke appeared.

“Kylo Ren, your report?” Snoke said it more like a statement than a question, as if he would not accept anything less.

Kylo considered telling him about the girl, but he swallowed it. It was the first time Rey had witnessed Kylo deceiving him. “The mission was successful, master.”

Snoke was quiet for a moment, waiting for Kylo to reveal more. It was clear through his thoughts that Kylo was conflicted about concealing the information from his master. He feared Snoke expected more, but he was not forthcoming. She’d influenced him, even back then. Why? Why had his connection to her caused him to stray – even temporarily – from his path? She wondered if Snoke had felt it then too. “The campaign in the Unknown regions has been an overwhelming success,” the creature drawled. “The troops can finish with the remaining systems... I have an important mission for one of your Knights.”

“Master?”

“The Resistance is expanding under the command of Leia Organa.” Kylo's stomach churned at the aching familiarity of a name he hoped he would never have to hear again. “They are attempting to find the map to Skywalker. We have recovered a navigational chart from the archives of the Empire, but we have discovered Lor San Tekka has a section that contains the rest. We must find the last section before the Resistance does. You know what will happen if Luke Skywalker returns. Choose a capable Knight to spare for this mission, and you will return to my side for training to face Skywalker.”

It was everything he had been waiting for. Training to kill his uncle was his only true mission. “Yes, master.” He had never questioned their assignments before, but he couldn’t stop wondering about the girl who had appeared in the Force. He knew there was a reason the Force showed her to him. It couldn’t be a coincidence that it occurred seconds before he heard his mother’s name again. Something deep inside him – an intuition he had repressed long ago – told him he should be the one chosen for the mission, even if he wanted nothing more than to train in preparation to kill his uncle once and for all, even if he wanted to stay as far from Leia and the Resistance as possible.

No, he had never questioned their assignments before, but he had never hidden anything important from his master, either. Something had changed inside him when he saw her, and he knew he had to be the one to find that map. If he asked Snoke to send him instead, if he reminded his master of the importance that map held to him, he knew he would be denied. Kylo formulated a different strategy. “This mission should be my mission, master. I should be the one to retrieve the map and bring it to you. I trust no one else with the whereabouts of Skywalker.” He knew the others heard his admission; he didn’t care. He needed Snoke to change his mind, and Snoke rarely did anything that wasn’t thoroughly considered and deliberate.

“I suppose I can suspend your training to entrust this to you, Kylo Ren, but do not fail me. You will be tested,” his master sighed. “San Tekka’s last known whereabouts is the planet Pillio in the Jinata system. You will start there, then tear apart this entire galaxy until you find him. Bring...
Skywalker… to me.” The holo of Snoke disappeared, leaving Kylo alone in the rain. This was it.
This was what he had waited years for, but he would not obey his master.

I will not bring him back to Snoke. This ends when I find him. He dies, or I take him down with me.

He had made his first, small rebellion against Snoke. It was still made in darkness, his desires still focused on power and revenge, but in doing so, he had chosen a path that had led him directly to her. And he had done it all because a vision he had seen of her. It didn’t make sense. If he had seen her in a vision before they met, why hadn’t he said anything? Though, to be fair, she hadn’t said anything about the visions she had seen, either.

Rey felt her connection to the vision fracturing. His presence tried to force her out, but she held on.
She wanted to know more, wanted to understand his loyalty to Snoke and what Snoke had done to him. As the Force was wont to do, it answered.

Instead of revealing the most consequential memories, as it had before, the memories moved into overdrive, the emotions hitting her full force. One memory after another crashed into her – time no longer relevant – she watched and felt the years of physical and psychological torture by Snoke.
Kylo was so impassioned by the rhetoric regarding his grandfather, and his sharpened hatred for his uncle, that he didn’t see Snoke’s motives as they began to change.

But Rey did.

In the beginning, Snoke believed Kylo, as a Skywalker, would be the one to destroy Luke and the Jedi. As time wore on, however, Snoke sensed his true power. He seemed to decide the entire Skywalker line was a threat, especially Kylo. The very thing he wanted – for Kylo to become his grandfather – became his greatest fear. The balanced light and darkness that had drawn Snoke to him became his greatest nemesis.
Kylo could have done everything for Snoke, and it would never have been enough. Snoke would have used Kylo until he killed Luke and then would have disposed of him in his own fear, but Kylo didn’t see it. The torment that Snoke wrought upon him in his jealousy and fear was only seen as training to Kylo. Every day, he was hit with Force lightning, choked, compelled to his knees or whatever manipulation of the Force Snoke decided to use until he was submissive, humiliated, and on edge. Every day, Snoke had pried into Kylo’s mind, as he had done with Rey on the Supremacy, tearing through every memory that gave him hope. Every day, Kylo was demeaned and humiliated, his own thoughts used against him. Every day, Snoke endlessly whispered his manipulative script into Kylo’s head.

She felt it gradually break him down until there was nothing left but an empty shell of who he used to be. By the end, he stopped fighting back against the abuse. He welcomed the physical pain. He adapted to the psychological torture, learning how to perform it himself in the process. The manipulative and demeaning words became his own thoughts. The repulsive graze of Snoke’s fingers upon his skin never lost its nauseating reaction, but he covered every inch of his body so he would never have to feel the sensation of touch again. He learned to feel nothing – emotionally and physically. Still, it was never enough for Snoke.

She watched how Snoke had slowly broken the last pieces of his brotherly bond with Jacen, as well as his relationship with the other Knights, relentlessly provoking envy, rivalry, and resentment through competition and constant comparison between them. Snoke had used the last bond Kylo had left against him. Jacen may not have killed him, but something inside him died after the day of Jacen’s betrayal.

Kylo’s hope of peace was always just slightly out of reach. He gave everything he had to the dark side, yet it had never been good enough.

You have too much of your father’s heart in you...You are just a child in a mask... You will never be Darth Vader... echoed endlessly in his mind.
Warning! This chapter and the following chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.
Memories of a Monster

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story is 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You’ve been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
The memories became more intense, nightmarish in nature. And then...

Her.

Something in him changed the moment he saw her in the woods of Takodana. He had heard of this girl that had helped the traitor and the droid escape Jakku. He should have sought the droid with the map, but he was drawn to her. He had no reason to find her, but Rey felt his desperation to see her. His mind was focused on the girl, his hands trembling as he sensed for her energy in the Force. He seemed almost… excited to see her. It was the most alive he had felt since he left his uncle’s temple. He saw her, and he instantly knew she was the girl in the Force he had seen that night in the rain. Still, he was looking for more.
He wasn’t angry she fired at him with the blaster, but she sensed his confusion… and offense. As he stepped closer to her, he seemed interested that she recognized him, but was disappointed when he found nothing more than a vision in her thoughts. “You would kill me,” he had asked her, “knowing nothing about me?” The words took on a deeper meaning now that she knew he had seen her as well. His question was not only in offense; it was probing. He wanted her to confirm what she knew. He had expected her to know him.

I know everything I need to know about you, she had told him once in the rain. His hopeful – and then disappointed – response on Ahch-To began to make more sense.

His curiosity and desire to toy with her fell away the more he interacted with her, because the darkness inside her intrigued him. He was impressed by the strength of her energy and her fearlessness in firing upon him. He was accustomed to others running from him, not fighting back with the ferocity he had felt in her. She sensed his surprise that someone not aligned with darkness would use it indiscriminately. His thoughts already focused on discovering more about her, along with a desire to train her, but there was something else underneath. It was as if his light was already attempting to connect to hers, as if the bond already existed.

That’s impossible, isn’t it?

“How wouldn’t I kill you? I know about the First Order,” she had challenged. Rey wished she could return to that day, ask him the questions that burned in her mind now. Who was she to him?

“I would say otherwise. But that is a small thing. Simple ignorances are easily remedied.”

She could feel him sense her terror at being unable to move, she could feel his darkness feed off it. “So afraid… yet I should be the one who should be scared. You shot first. You speak of the Order as if it were barbaric. And yet, it is I who was forced to defend myself against you.” There was something in her mind that he was searching for, but it wasn’t the map. He discovered that she had seen it, but his search continued, focused on memories when she was young. On dreams. She knew now that he couldn’t have killed her parents, so that wasn’t it; what was he looking for?

The memory fractured without answering her questions, and another, darker, memory took its place.
“Ben!” a gruff voice shouted, stilling his escape down a skyway.

No.

Kylo didn’t have to turn to know whose face would be staring back at him. He could feel the familiar energy calling him to remember its importance. He momentarily considered walking away, allowing the stormtroopers to handle him. But Snoke... he had to face his father, prove his selflessness and loyalty to the Order; he knew the time would come eventually. This was his chance to finally prove his worthiness as Vader’s grandson. He swallowed apprehensively, turning to face his father. He hoped Han could not hear his breath hitch in his throat at the sight of him. It was a dagger to his heart.

“Han Solo,” he said as confidently as he could muster, though terror scratched and gnawed under his skin. Seeing his father’s face immediately transformed him into a young, weak little boy again, but he refused to allow his father to see that weakness. Kylo was grateful Han was not a Force-sensitive. “I’ve been waiting for this day for a long time.”

His confidence waned as his father stepped closer, forcing him to engage him further.

Please don’t. Please go. Don't you understand what I have to do? Just leave. You're good at it.

He waited as his father approached, acutely aware of the eyes of the First Order scrutinizing his every move. His father was backing him into a corner, and he could do nothing to stop it.

Rey’s throat clenched in anguish as she noticed the shuddering breath Han exhaled as he looked upon his son, the tears reflecting in his eyes as he hesitantly walked toward the boy he had failed. But Kylo only focused on his father’s commanding posture as the space between them disappeared. Kylo forced himself to stand tall in response; back straight, head high, shoulders squared, intimidating only in posture as he faced the man whose approval he had spent a childhood yearning for. He may have looked the part, but he wanted to shrink away in shame.

“Take off that mask; you don't need it,” his father demanded. Kylo could feel his resolve melting away under the older man’s imposing presence.

“What do you think you'll see if you do?” he mocked petulantly, echoing their last conversation when his father had left him, refusing to look at him. He wished his father refused to look at him this time.
"I'm a monster; remember, old man?"

“The face of my son,” came the heated reply. Kylo drew in the Force to stop his knees from giving out from under him.

No. You don't get to say things like that. It's years too late for that. I'm not your son. You left me. You're dead to me, remember? I'm dead to you.

He wanted nothing more than to tell Han Solo where he could shove his demand, but his trembling fingers pressed the release of his mask instead. Years of training under Snoke, and he bent to his father's will in seconds. He used the self-loathing to drown his weakness in darkness.

Kylo hadn't considered what he expected of his father's reaction, but he hadn't expected to see him so...emotional. He could hear his father's broken gasp, could see the agony in his father's eyes as he looked upon his face for the first time in over a decade. His chest clenched in return, but he turned the pain into strength.

“Your son is gone,” he managed, his voice strange to his own ears as he attempted to suppress the emotions bubbling in his throat. “He was weak and foolish like his father, so I destroyed him.”

You destroyed him.

The rage inside him screamed at him to say it, but he wouldn't allow his father to know how profoundly his betrayal had broken him. It was necessary that Han Solo realized how strong and powerful he had become.

“That's what Snoke wants you to believe,” his father dared.

Now you care about what Snoke wants me to believe? Now? Where was this advice when I was eight years old and struggling with the whispers in my head?

“But it's not true,” Han continued. “My son is alive.”
If only it were that simple. Your son has been gone for years. You left me to be murdered by Luke. There's no going back now.

He hadn't even contemplated his next words before they flowed with practiced ease from his lips. “No, the Supreme Leader is wise.”

“No, the Supreme Leader is wise.” Han reasoned gruffly, continuing to step closer to his son. “When he gets what he wants, he'll crush you.”

No. He is the only one who believed in me. He would never betray me. He needs me.

But Kylo knew his words were empty, and his father knew he knew it; he could see it in his eyes as he moved closer. Too close. His tone was too gentle. His eyes were too caring. The yearning he had felt his entire life to be the son his father wanted returned with a painful ache. Kylo wanted to maintain his impassive façade, but it was crumbling. The darkness was fading. He stepped back against his will. “You know it's true.”

He did. Everything in him knew it was true. They were the truest words his father had ever spoken. Snoke had only ever used him – everyone had – and one day he would outlive his usefulness. But what was he supposed to do? He had made his choice. He couldn't be the son that Han knew. Han had never wanted that boy anyway. Ben Solo was truly gone.

It was too late. He wished he could go back, be a pilot as he had always wanted. Be free. But it didn't matter anymore. Snoke might kill him if he stayed, but he would destroy him if he left. His master was eternally in his head; he could make Kylo suffer in ways infinitely more terrifying than death. Kylo had sold his soul to the darkness in exchange for power and revenge; there was no coming back from that. He didn’t want to come back from that. “It's too late,” he said. It sickened him that his voice trembled in heartache, but it tormented him to admit it aloud.

“No, it's not. Leave here with me. Come home. We miss you.” When he lay awake every single night at the Jedi temple, he imagined his father coming back for him and saying those very words. He had imagined it more times than he could count as he fell in deeper under Snoke’s oversight, but, more importantly, he had heard it before in his training with Snoke, spoken by the illusion of his father.

Ben, it’s not too late. I miss you. Your mother misses you. You're not a monster or a burden. We know you can be good. I’m sorry we lied to you about your grandfather and left you alone with Luke. But I’ve come back for you like I promised I would. Come home. I’ll help you, son.
When Kylo had faced the choice before, he killed the illusion, but everything inside him screamed to trust the man standing in front of him. Could he do it? Could he trust a man who had lied and betrayed him? The mere thought of hurting this man – who looked upon him as Kylo always wished he had – caused bile to rise in his throat. No. He was too weak. He could not be the heir-apparent to Vader that Snoke had trained him to be, not if it meant doing this.

He couldn't hide the truth from his father, not when he saw the desperation in his eyes. “I'm being torn apart,” the truth was laced with despair as it tumbled from his quivering lips. “I want to be free of this pain. I know what I have to do, but I don't know if I have the strength to do it. Will you help me?”

“Yes, anything.” The words stung more than his father could ever imagine.

Why now! His mind screamed.

Searching his father's eyes, he only found honesty. For a moment, Kylo imagined it was possible. He could fly away into the Wilds to live a simple life, Luke could wither away in obsoletion, Snoke could find another pet. He could be no one. He could be free.

Kylo dropped his helmet on the skyway, the weight of the galaxy falling away with it. He unclipped his lightsaber to offer it to his father, surrendering the fractured symbol of everything he had sacrificed to become Kylo Ren. He considered the weapon for a moment; the bond to the crystal was destroyed beyond repair, Ben Solo was destroyed beyond repair. What he had done, what he had lost... could he do it? Could he go back?

As he extended the lightsaber to his father, the whispers began.

Can you go back... After everything you have done... After everything they have done to you... You are a fool if you believe there is a home to go back to... If you leave, everything you've sacrificed will have been for nothing... He doesn't understand the darkness in you... And he's lying again... He knows you can't be saved... He knows you're too powerful... Why is he here now... Did he come for you... Or did he come for the girl... He never cared before...

Use your power... He laid explosives under your feet... Tell me, who is he here to stop... If not you... Don't forget, Ben Solo didn't heed my warnings... Ben Solo was too trusting... Ben Solo allowed himself to be betrayed... You can be something great, Kylo Ren...You can be stronger than this weakness that draws you to him... You know he can’t leave here... He’s seen too much... Probe his mind...

Kylo’s fingers clenched around the weapon instinctively. The room darkened around them as the darkness flooded his veins. With a sinking feeling in his stomach, Kylo skimmed his father’s thoughts, knowing instinctively what he would find. It wasn’t difficult to locate; Han Solo may not have been weak-minded enough to succumb to Force persuasion, but his thoughts were still easily accessible. Kylo had wondered why the droid would trust a scavenger with the map, but what he hadn’t considered was that she was a witness in the room, not the intended target. The droid would have only trusted that map with the Resistance. Who better to trust than General Organa’s own – albeit estranged – husband?

Han Solo had seen the map; the mission ended on that skyway. He couldn't kill his father, but he would retrieve that map. If Snoke had Luke Skywalker, he wouldn’t care about Han Solo. Han began fighting back, however, complicating the extraction. In his desperation to keep the map from Kylo, thoughts spiraled through his mind chaotically. Kylo knew the pain Han would endure by fighting back. He may not have been there as he was growing up, he may have lied about his bloodline, he may have abandoned him when the darkness became too powerful... but he was his father. It hurt to hurt him.

Kylo would have taken the map if it wasn't fated that Han had been thinking about Leia at that moment. Particularly, a conversation they'd had before Han left with the traitor to rescue Rey and destroy Starkiller.

We lost our son, forever... Nausea twisted in the pit of his stomach. Han thought his own son was too far gone. Had he lied to him? When Kylo had said it was too late, had his father believed it too?

If Luke couldn't reach him, how could I? The nausea faded to anger. Of course, Luke couldn't reach him; he tried to kill him. How could his own father believe that the Jedi had given a valiant effort? If Han failed, would he try to kill him too?

How do we blow it up? There's always a way to do that. It was his suggestion to blow up Starkiller. The base he knew his son was stationed on. Kylo had his answer. Han had planned to kill him if he failed to turn him.

If you see our son, bring him home. It wasn't Han's idea, it was Leia's. Han wasn’t there for him, he was an afterthought. Infiltrate the enemy base, save the girl he just met, and blow up the base; that was his mission. If he saw his son, he would bring him home for Leia. If not, then he would let him die in the explosion. Snoke was right, his father didn't care. He was doing it for her. There it was, the betrayal. Ben Solo was a fool.

Never again… he promised himself. The darkness smothered the naïve hope in his chest. His will to run, to fight, to save himself faded as the darkness consumed and tainted his thoughts.

All you must do to find peace is sacrifice yourself to the darkness…

Kylo wanted the pain to end, and with this sacrifice to darkness, he would find peace. He ripped away from his father’s mind, abandoning his pursuit of the map in his despair. His father may have seen the map, but Kylo didn’t need it from him. There was still Rey. His master had already known that; Kylo knew he never intended for him to take the time to draw it from his father on the skyway. Snoke only wanted him to see the truth.

Han’s hands were clenched around the hilt of the weapon, battling him physically as well, urging plaintively with increased pressure for him to release it. As the light of the sun disappeared, so did Kylo’s hope. There were only two ways to end the pain ripping him apart thread by thread. Either he turned the blade against his father, sacrificing himself to the darkness, or he turned the blade against himself, sacrificing himself to the Force. It would be so easy – to turn the blade against himself – force his father to witness what he had done to him long before that moment. The pain would end.

Complete your training, fulfill your destiny. You know the truth… the voice whispered. You know what you have to do.

The memory of those same words, spoken as he was encouraged to take Tionne’s life at the temple, brought back all the pain of that night… Tionne, Cade, Luke, Dev. There was no going back. Just as he had that night, Kylo knew the truth.

They were already surrounded by his personal squad of stormtroopers on a base with tens of thousands of personnel scrambling toward their position. His men would capture Han; they would torture him for the map. Snoke would likely command Kylo to torture his own father. Kylo had experienced enough of Snoke’s training to understand the torment Han would suffer. When they finally drove Han to his knees and executed him, it would be long after he begged for it. That final act of pain and suffering would be mercy, even if it lacked the dignity he deserved. The story of Han Solo would come to an end in some humiliating public display at the hands of someone who did not understand the weight of the life they were taking. The only chance Han had to escape off that base with his life was if Kylo helped him, but he knew he couldn’t leave. It was too late.

Resolutely, Kylo raised his eyes to search his father’s – to find the anger that would channel the darkness. He only found love within them. In the end, it wasn’t hatred or anger or betrayal that gave him the strength to do it. No, it was his love. For once, his father was exactly whom he needed him to be, but it wouldn’t be enough.

Han's eyes widened. The split second before Kylo's thumb found the trigger, his father knew. His face hardened in grim acceptance. It was an outcome he had already prepared for.

Rey jolted as the lightsaber crackled to life, painting their faces in a bloody hue.

Kylo thrust the plasma blade deeper into the man who had given him life, assuring Han's suffering would end swiftly. He was flooded with relief and... peace. Kylo had done it – it was over. He had finally found the strength to destroy the light, to end the conflict in his soul.

It was the selflessness Snoke spoke of often, the final peace that would complete his training; he had sacrificed himself to the darkness by taking the life of his father, and, in doing so, he had spared his father a fate worse than death. The deed had set them free. There was no need for pretense, they both knew the wound was lethal. This was the end of the great Han Solo, of Kylo’s torment, and he couldn’t have done it without his father’s help.

“Thank you,” he said. Kylo meant it. Han had offered to do anything to help him, and inadvertently, he had. Kylo withdrew the saber to end his suffering, but his father would not die peacefully. The blade had cut through the void created by years of good intentions, misunderstanding, and regret – piercing through a hopeful father, and, in his final breaths, a hand of forgiveness caressed a broken son’s cheek.

Kylo longed to look away, to give his father his last moment without being forced to stare into the eyes of his murderer.

_His murderer_...

But his father's pained eyes pinned him in place. Kylo found only remorse and... forgiveness... and _love_ there.

Nothing truly pierced through the darkness until the light began to fade from his father's eyes. His father – who still loved him – would die by _his_ hand. His throat tightened as he pushed Han away, off the skyway, but the look in his eyes was burned into Kylo's retinas. His father's forgiving touch was imprinted on his cheek long after he was gone. The pain he felt from that touch was worse than any betrayal or abandonment ever could be.

I killed him. My own father.

The peace was gone. He felt as if he had turned the lightsaber on himself, rending his soul into broken pieces. Consuming self-hatred, guilt, and anguish immediately split open a wound he knew would never heal. He was plagued by the thought that there was nothing he could do to bring back his father, and there was no path before him that would lead him to peace. The love in his father’s eyes had fractured his soul, allowing the light to bleed through the darkness. He knew in that moment; he would never have peace.

Rage consumed all else.

A blaster bolt pierced his side, a manipulation of the Force milliseconds before impact was the only act saving him from an otherwise lethal blow. His own uncle had done it, not that he should have been surprised. He hadn’t been the first uncle to try to kill him. He glanced up further. It was the girl who had found all his weaknesses, and next to her… the traitor. He had started it all. He was the reason the droid and the girl escaped off Jakku, the reason Han Solo was on Starkiller. If he had just killed the traitor on Tuanul, none of it would have ever happened.

This time, he would kill him.

Rey had always believed Kylo was coming after her, but in his mind she found the truth. If she and Finn had split up, he would have abandoned his pursuit of her – and the map – to destroy his former subordinate first. It didn’t make sense. If all that Kylo wanted was the map – or to bring her back to his master – then why did he care about Finn and the lightsaber? Why fight her, why offer to teach her?

What had changed from the skyway to the edge of that cliff?

The memory ended abruptly, replaced by the memory of Kylo’s mother on the Command Bridge of the Raddus. Rey didn’t know if she had the strength to brave any more torment. Watching Kylo kill his father would haunt her nightmares for a lifetime; she couldn’t watch him try to do it to his mother, too. The Force, however, didn’t consider what she wanted.

There was something simmering under Kylo’s calm exterior. There was a desire to prove his worthiness to Snoke that Rey didn’t understand. Kylo had killed his own father, what more did he have to prove? Unless, as was everything else with Snoke, it wasn’t enough. Nothing he did would ever be enough for that monster; why hadn’t he seen that?

Kylo circled the Raddus with two other members of his squadron. He planned to end the Resistance once and for all; not with Hux’s superweapons, but with good old-fashioned, well-placed proton torpedoes. He had destroyed their hangar, rendering Poe and the black squadron useless. If they destroyed the bridge, it would decapitate the Resistance. It was all too easy.

Then he sensed Leia.

Surprise, fear, and panic overwhelmed him. There was no anger or hatred from his mother, even after what he had taken from her. She expressed only love and fear for him…and a final hope that he would come home. His inner conflict raged.

He had already made the fateful choice to kill his own father, but this was different. This wasn’t mercy, this wasn’t under the delusion that he would find peace. Kylo could not find the strength to push that button. He couldn’t do it, but his wingman could. He was plagued by the thought that he could have stopped the missile, if only he had been calm enough to consider it sooner.

The memory cut away, replaced by his confrontation with Luke. Rey witnessed the moment he had to face him. His soul was filled with darkness, his heart hollow in betrayal. He had lost his will to live, and he was resolute to take everyone who had hurt him down with him. If necessary, he would burn down the entire galaxy with Luke in it. His fear of the man who had tried to kill him and anger for what Luke had pushed him to become all but consumed him. He had become so obsessed with his uncle, he had projected omnipotent qualities upon the mortal man.

Luke had given him an outlet for his fury and betrayal without deepening the wound in his soul caused by the death of his father. There was a brief moment of peace, when he thought he had finally killed his former master. That peace was replaced by terror when he found him still standing. Even after he was claimed by the Force, Kylo only carried contempt for Luke. He knew Luke’s parting words would haunt him. His only regret was not having his death on his hands. And with the death of Luke, Kylo's myopic focus on purpose disappeared.

The flashback abruptly changed - the anger, pain, and fear that overwhelmed the previous memories had faded. The memories were clearer now. Emotional and conflicted yet calm. She watched flashes of every single one of the interactions between her and Kylo over the past few weeks – in reverse – through his eyes. She tried desperately to slow them down; she wanted to dissect them, to know what he was thinking, to experience it all from his side. The memories were focused, however, on his response to her words.
From his decision to end their bond, to the base, to the jungle, to her room – more connections than she had realized they’d had – it was all tainted by the same feelings he had struggled with his entire childhood. While she had left the confrontations angry or irritated, he had been left hollow, disparaged, and self-loathing. In the few she didn’t, there was something else under the surface, something warm, like hope.

In those memories, she learned less about him than she did about herself. The majority of what she had said, she had believed he deserved at the time. After reliving his memories, however, there was a shame she couldn’t explain away. With her words alone, she had hurt a man who was strong enough to ignore lethal wounds. She had hurt a man who had already been hurt by so many people. In her darkness, she had become someone she didn’t recognize, and she hated it.

It was the memory of the hut on Ahch-To that hurt the most, not because of more negative feelings, but because it was imprinted with such warmth that it made her smile. It was the greatest hope she had ever felt in him. Coupled with his feelings of betrayal, it made her wonder what she had done to fail him. Certainly, she couldn’t have joined him, but could she have prevented both of their suffering by never going to him at all?

The only positive result of her recklessness was that he had killed Snoke, but then he took his place. If she had stayed on Ahch-To, maybe their connections could have continued as they had in the hut, maybe eventually he would have come to her. It hurt to imagine the possibilities she had destroyed by finding him, but she was positive of one thing; she felt his light in that memory on Ahch-To. She hadn’t been wrong about him.

His hand stretched to meet hers, and she felt his hesitation. He was so lost that his first expectation in touching her had been pain. His entire existence had become pain at every physical touch. He hadn’t known what to do without it. The warmth and comfort he had felt overwhelmed him, mirroring her own memories by that fire. There was no manipulation, no ulterior motive – just a raw, intimate, human connection. In that moment, he had been exactly who she had believed he was.

Then she saw it – the vision – the moment she desperately wanted him to explain. She had seen an impossible future, but he had seen the past. Rey waited for the moment of her parents’ death, could feel her agony, could hear her screams as she reached for the ship…

“Get out of my head!” His voice lurched her out of the vision. She grasped to hold on, but she was ripped back to her own consciousness. Whatever his vision had been, she had sensed understanding, not fear. There was no doubt in her mind that he hadn’t killed her parents. He had lied to make her hate him, but he hadn’t counted on the Force to show her exactly who he was. She wouldn’t give up hope in him yet, even if he had given up hope in her.
You're still in there, Ben. I know it.

Her eyes snapped open. Their faces were centimeters apart, separated only by the crackling blade. His face was bathed in the bright hue of the plasma, red like the blood spilt by his hands. Her eyes prickedled from the intense heat. Sweat coated her skin as it did his, but she noticed more than just sweat: tear streaks stained his cheeks. He was shaking violently, his breath uneven heavy through trembling lips. Guilt tightened in her throat as she realized that not only had he witnessed her nearly taking his life, but he had relived every single tormenting memory with her.

I'm no better than Luke. I'm no better than any of them. After everything he has been though... I am the monster.

“Ben...”

He gripped her hand tighter, pulling the blade closer to his throat. “Do it.” There was a grim acceptance to his words, an emptiness in his energy under the burning betrayal. His pained eyes were the same ones she remembered from Kamino – broken, haunted, and lost. Those eyes she had grown to know, the eyes that had never reminded her so much of... his mother could not hide the ghosts of the past that forever plagued him.

If there was ever a moment she wanted him to be angry, it was then. Anything he said to her in that moment, she would have deserved; but for once he wasn't angry. His words were not sharp with hatred, but heavy with pain. “Do it, Jedi! What are you waiting for? Do it for your friends and Han and your parents. You’ll be doing my mother a favor, trust me.”

His words jolted her into action. She deactivated the weapon and pulled her hands away, sobbing. “No...I can’t...” she gasped between sobs. Kylo’s intense gaze finally left hers. Laying on his back, he stared at the ceiling, gasping for air to calm his nerves, his body still shaking from the adrenaline. Rey wanted to tell him that his death would break his mother’s heart, that she had trustingly listened to Snoke’s whisper, that she never wanted him to die, but words seemed hollow under the weight of what she had done. Even if she found something that would mean anything to him after what she had done, no sound could escape the growing tightness in her throat. She wanted to touch him, fix what she had broken, but he wasn’t a scavenged ship part. He would never trust her again, if he ever had in the first place. The damage had been done.

“It was always going to be you. Just finish it.” Her eyes darted up to study his face as another wave of nausea crashed through the darkness. He still stared up the ceiling, exhaustion evident in his voice. This was not an impulsive plea under emotional duress; there was a resignation in his tone that spoke of long-suffering anticipation that he would awaken to her blade at his throat.
She knew of the trauma caused by his uncle, and then she had done this. She had naïvely allowed the darkness in and proven him right. How did she not see where the path was leading her? She had been angry, but she never wanted this. She had never regretted anything more in her life, vowing to never allow that voice into her head again.

What have I done? What have I done to him? After everything he suffered, how could I do this to him? How could I be so easily tempted by the darkness, by that creature? I could have killed a sleeping man like it was nothing!

She felt the electricity in the Force again. His presence was drifting back to his side of the galaxy. As his chambers faded, she heard a thought bounce around her mind.

If it makes you feel any better, I wasn’t sleeping.

“Ben...I’m so sorry,” she whispered, but he was gone. She cursed the Force for taking him away when she finally understood what the bond had been attempting to show her all along. Rey understood exactly who her bondmate was. Kylo lived and breathed self-imposed torment. She understood why he had contemplated ending his life, why he had told her he was tired of it all. She understood now. His every breath was dedicated to sustaining the betrayal, abandonment, loneliness, and desire for control over his own destiny – not because he necessarily wanted power, darkness, or violence – but because he had given up everything he had for it. To turn would, in his mind, make his suffering in vain. He had sold his soul to the darkness. What would be worth more than that to convince him to return to the light?

What would happen when she told him that it had been Snoke who had been in her mind? The same creature that had tortured him for years had nearly convinced her to kill him. She thought back to all the untruths the darkness had convinced her of, all the pain she had caused her bondmate by listening to his former master. Even if Kylo hated her, she owed it to him to warn him.

I have to tell him the truth.

You know what the truth would do to him, the voice – Snoke – whispered in her head. He would live in eternal fear. He would push you away. It would be simple, in his weakness, for me to convince him to give in to the darkness again. I could turn his heart for good. But if you don’t tell him the truth, child, then I will stay out of his mind. I’ll give him peace.

Rey closed her eyes and found the light to push the darkness away. If she kept the barriers in place, if she kept the darkness at bay, then the whisper wouldn’t find its way back in. Kylo had been a young boy when the voice appeared, but she knew better; she could control it. She decided right then that she would carry the burden for him, even if he severed the bond. It was worth it to make sure he never had to hear that monster in his mind again. It was his only chance.

Chapter End Notes

Warning! This chapter and the previous chapters are very dark chapters. Rey is reliving some of Kylo's darkest memories. If you're concerned about a trigger, it is likely in here. There is graphic violence, many characters deaths, physical torture, psychological torture, grooming of a young child, gaslighting, abuse, manipulation, you name it. If you have a specific trigger, it's better to play it safe and message me with concerns as there are many specific violent scenarios encountered here. Nothing written here is worth putting yourself through mental duress. I would be more than happy to piece together parts of the chapters or give a detailed overview as I understand they are important chapters.
Kylo's Reaction

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Kylo sat on the edge of his bed, his head resting in his shackled hands, for the remainder of the night. He knew sleep would not come easily; he was lost to his own tormenting thoughts. He knew the nightmares would come, like every other night, but after Rey contemplated killing him, too, he knew the nightmares would be much worse.

It hadn't been in combat, or during one of their explosive confrontations. He wasn't threatening her friends’ lives, or hers. He had walked away. She had found him in the quiet of the night as he lay unconscious, just as his uncle had done. He knew why; the hatred in her eyes was evident from the moment he had taken the blame for killing her parents, but he couldn’t tell her the truth. If that was what she chose to believe, then that was better than the alternative.

After his meltdown in the receiving hall, then Rey’s subsequent decision to render him unconscious, he had been locked in his chambers with armed guards posted outside. But when he sensed the guards retreating, he realized it was more of a "sleep it off" situation rather than actual imprisonment.

When it was officially more "early," than "late," he easily discarded the shackles with the Force. He opened the last received message, as encrypted and anonymous as the others. Supply freighters secured at primary pick-up location, it read. Cargo will be secured at secondary pick up location shortly. Transport will depart on designated route in twenty-four hours.

Twenty-four hours.

Kylo deleted the message with finality. It was almost over. Despite his conflicted feelings he knew it was for the best. But the next twenty-four hours would be torture if he didn’t distract himself. Sleep was out of the question, so he decided to weapons train. An abysmal amount of his time was spent in isolation on this ship, but training was a different type of isolation. This was an isolation from his own mind.

His plan was to spend the entire day cycle and subsequent night cycle weapons training, or until he passed out from exhaustion – he had no preference. His sole focus was to distract himself from the impending departure that would signify the beginning of the end, but also to suppress the previous night's events that replayed in his mind with a nauseating relentlessness.
Kylo remembered feeling her presence next to him as he slept. When she did see him, she tried to get as far away from him as possible. His presence had repulsed her. He pretended to sleep, to avoid another confrontation. If she asked him about her parents’ death, he would be forced to tell her the truth; he couldn’t do that. He thought if he just ignored her, eventually they would fade away to their divergent lives on opposing sides of the galaxy again.

But she had approached him, and for some ill-conceived reason, he had just waited, curious – and naïvely hopeful – of what she would do. He could sense her through the Force, could see her staring down at him. Her hand had hovered over his face, presumably to touch him, but then she withdrew it as though he were some terrifying creature. He sensed that frighteningly familiar, oppressive darkness when it overwhelmed her.

Part of him had known what she came for, but he had refused to believe she would do that after what she knew. Holding his breath, he awaited her judgment. A sickening ache settled in his stomach as she called his lightsaber, an ache that had not dissipated since.

The sight of her, plasma blade held to his throat, as she contemplated severing his mortal coil was nearly identical to... that night. The only difference was, he had known Luke would do it. There was something in her eyes. Weakness. Even in her darkness, he knew she didn't have it in her. He had impulsively reacted to her weakness, possibly to teach her to a lesson – or possibly he had reached his own moment of weakness. He should have expected it, every time they had met in person, she had tried to kill him. Why should their bond be any different?

When he had grasped the weapon to wrench her closer to him, to frighten her, something... happened. He could sense her rifling through his memories like she was studying a holobook. He had built up a fortress against her, but she was able to slide in as if she had the passcode. She saw everything. She felt everything. He was powerless to stop her. It left him so...vulnerable, and Kylo hated vulnerable. But he didn't hate her. Even after she had attempted to kill him. Even though she had been the first person that he had confessed to about what had happened that fateful night at Luke's temple, and she had used it against him.

When she was on Ahch-To, he convinced himself that confiding in her was a warning of what Luke would do when he inevitably sensed her power. But there was a part of him that wanted to share everything with her, for her to see who he truly was. When he thought back to their bond connections, it was a moment he thought he had felt something change in her. She knew how he had awoken to Luke's weapon prepared to strike – a moment that had subjected him to paralyzing nightmares ever since. It had seemed that she believed him, that she cared what his uncle had done to him. But then she betrayed him in the exact same way.

Rey was the person he would do anything for, including suffering without her for the rest of his life to keep her safe. He had tried to end the bond that tormented her, yet she desired to kill him. He should hate her, as he hated them, but he couldn’t bring himself to do it. Luke hadn’t given his own nephew a chance. This was different. He was her enemy; he let her believe he killed her parents.

He deserved her hatred.

But killing him would have been more merciful.
Chapter End Notes

The chapters-long memory sequence is officially over, so we have been downgraded from 'heavy angst' to just 'angst.'

Reference to threats of violence

Kylo briefly references Rey nearly killing him
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“Let me in, Ben!” Rey screamed as she spun her staff and thrust it expertly into her imagined target, nearly twisting her ankle on a white, glowing rock under her foot. She kicked the rock to join the others shimmering in the stream that cut through the jungle floor. The red of the sediment tinted the water. It was an ever-present reminder of what she had almost done. Her body was shaking, sweat glistened on her skin, but she was relentless in her practice. Kylo had effectively shut her out. His presence was still as strong as ever in the corner of her mind that he had carved out for himself, but no amount of screaming, begging, meditation, or pushing into his energy brought him to her.
Rey had listened to Snoke and betrayed him; in a manner nearly identical to what Luke had done when Kylo first fell into Snoke's grasp. She feared what he would do this time. She couldn’t stomach the thought of losing him to the darkness forever. He had light left in him; she had seen it. What she had done to him was unforgivable; she knew that, and she wouldn’t blame him if he hated her. She deserved it. If he wanted to end their bond, she wouldn't blame him, but she wouldn’t give up on bringing him home.

Leia deserved to have her son back. She believed if she could only explain to him that it was her weakness, that she allowed the darkness tempt her – that he was right about her – then maybe she could convince him to talk to his mother. Then maybe Leia could succeed where Rey had failed. The last thing she would allow to come of her betrayal would be to leave him to his own darkness again.

“Ben, I'm sorry! Please!” she screamed into the trees. Her only answer was a low rumbling.

Another recon ship?

Breathing deeply, she attempted to calm her nerves. Her head tilted to the heavens above.

No, thunder, she realized.

The turquoise sky was growing darker, but she wanted to delay the inevitable for as long as possible. She knew she could not stall the conversation with Leia any longer, but after what she had done to Kylo, she dreaded facing his mother.

How do I explain to her that he saved my life, and then I tried to kill him?

Before she could further contemplate her fears, the skies opened above her. She reluctantly gathered her weapon and pack, preparing to end her training session early.

Then she cried out in unexpected pain.

It wasn't until the first few droplets had touched her skin that she understood her oversight. Round, red wounds were forming on her exposed shoulders as the acid rain fell around her. With a jump aided by the Force, she leaped across the river in the direction of the temple.
Her panic spiked as she sprinted through the trees, searching for protection from the immediate downpour. After being caught in enough sandstorms, she understood the dangers of a progressing storm, and knew she wouldn’t make it back to base. She pressed herself against the tall stalk of a towering purple flower – its 3-meter-long, trumpet-shaped petals providing her adequate cover. She sank to the ground and closed her eyes, waiting for the storm to pass. The thunder sounded directly above her, and she couldn’t help the childish fears, the loneliness, the helplessness that returned.

Her mind drifted back to the dust storms that she had weathered in the abandoned AT-AT, covering her ears as she had back then as the weather raged around her. The Force was overstimulating her senses as she perceived the movement and sound of every raindrop around her. Defiant tears fell down her face, and she hissed between sobs as stray droplets dripped through the shelter. But she had survived worse. It wasn’t the acid rain, or being stuck by herself in the jungle, her friend’s distrust, her impending conversation with Leia, or her bondmate’s silence, but the weight of it all that finally released the floodgates to her tears.

What was worse, the reason all of it was happening to her was no one’s fault but her own. She had failed everyone.

“I assume you are alone out here?” a deep voice asked with a solemn huff. Her eyes fluttered open to the dark shadow of her bondmate kneeling before her.

“Ben?” Her voice sounded small and weak to her own ears. She dried her tears with the back of her hand. “Be careful, the rain will –”

“Here.” His curt tone and downcast eyes made it clear that he had no interest in what she needed to tell him. His dark crimson lined cloak dangled from his fingertip. “Take it.” The refuge of his cloak was the furthest thought from her mind, however.

“I have so much to tell you. I thought you shut me out forever.” The relief of seeing him in front of her washed over the bond. Rey couldn’t help it, everything she craved to tell him and ask him was overwhelming when it was likely her last chance.

“I did.”

His words twisted the dagger of guilt in her stomach. “Then why would you help me? After everything I–”
“You may hope for my death,” he sighed, his eyes focused anywhere but on hers. “But I do not wish for yours.” Whenever his eyes snared hers in their magnetism – which he unwaveringly maintained whenever he was in her vicinity – it was overwhelming, leaving her feeling exposed and vulnerable, as if her very soul was bared to him. But this... this was far worse. The absence of his unyielding stare left a hallow and wanting ache behind her ribs.

“You shouldn't care if it hurts me, I deserve it.”

If you want to shut me out, why did you come back to torture me? I really do mean nothing to you, don’t I? This is tearing me apart and you look... fine.

“Enough,” he snapped as if he had been privy to her thoughts. Perhaps he had; she had a habit of projecting, after all. “Just take it.”

It was tearing her apart inside, and he was apathetic. Evidently, he was better off without her. Anger rose in her throat as he made it clear that she meant nothing to him. “I don't need your pity or your help.”

His face was blank and unreadable, his only tell was the annoyance in his voice – the lip-curling manner in which his response passed through his teeth: “Clearly.”

“I survived on my own my entire life! I never...”

“Needed me?” he finished. “No, but you could have used my help. Just because you can do it on your own, Rey, doesn't mean you should. If your friends were here to help you, if you would let them in enough to help you, then I wouldn't have had to subject you to my presence. Consider this a selfish request. I may block you out, but if you do not block me out, I can still feel your pain. It's... distracting.” His tone was bitter under the sneer of his words, and it was enough to break her reactive anger. As hurt as she was, she didn’t want their last moments together to be contentious.

“Ben, I...”

Kylo shook his head to silence her. “Don’t.” There was a desperation to his plea that hadn't been present before. It sounded almost pained. His indifference was a pretense, she realized, and it was crumbling. “Just...humor me?” His hand trembled as he extended the cloak for her, reaching across the galaxy, his eyes finally meeting hers in painful familiarity, imploring her to take it.
“Fine, but stay with me,” she begged, her voice cracking with emotion. “Please, just listen.”

“No,” his lip quivered as he spoke. “It's best if… I can’t. I've stayed too long already. The bond - we have to block it out.” Understanding that she would not willingly take the cloak from him, he placed it on the ground in front of her and stood.

No. I can't let you do this!

She jumped to her feet and reached for him. “I don't want to end the bond, Ben! I'm sorry! You can hate me, but please, just listen!” He huffed a stuttered breath, his body trembling behind a façade of strength and resolution. She caught the slightest glistening in his eyes before he turned from her, walking away without another word. Refusing to let him leave without a fight, she abandoned the safety of cover to run after him. “Talk to me,” she shouted, wincing through the pain, “Or I'll stand out here in the middle of the rain until you do.”

He sighed, acquiescing to her demand by pivoting to face her. His jaw tightened as she glared up at him obstinately, but he pressed his lips together to suppress whatever thought had passed through his mind. He chose to extend their suffering through silence instead. A lack of pain suddenly stole her attention, as she realized a single raindrop hadn’t fallen on her since he had turned to confront her. She cautiously tilted her head up to see the droplets – suspended in motion by the Force – hovering above their heads.

They glistened like jewels in the low light, and Rey stared in awe at the skill her bondmate possessed. She couldn’t remember if she had ever seen the Force used to create something so... beautiful. Rey was distracted enough by the sight, she barely registered when the cloak was gently removed from her grasp. It wasn't until his looming form stepped closer that her eyes flickered up to study him.

Kylo leaned down, his full lips close enough for her to feel the huff of his warm, anxious breath on the side of her face. She swallowed thickly as he wrapped the cloak around her shoulders, securing it with practiced hands. His eyes were focused while he quietly worked, and she studied the softening sorrow in them. He removed the broach displaying the First Order insignia, leaving a plain silver clasp underneath. Part of her hoped he would discard it on the jungle floor, a symbol of his growing disillusionment with the side he had chosen, but he clenched it tightly in his fist instead. She refused to speak, fearful to break the fragile armistice between them.

Countless lives had been taken in the violence delivered by his hands, but it was nearly impossible to imagine as he carefully lifted the hood over her head. His hands were torturously gentle, his fingertips tickled her cheek when he brushed a lock of hair from her face. The gesture was more tender than anything she had ever experienced. The warmth that fluttered in her chest drove away any darkness that lingered along the border of her consciousness. She hadn't realized how profoundly the darkness had clouded her thoughts until it was gone. Remorse and guilt twisted through her stomach as she felt with clarity what their bond meant to her.

“Ben, you don’t have to do this.” Her eyes searched his frantically for a reflection of the emotions pooling in hers, but the only emotions she could recognize behind his red-rimmed eyes were fear and pain.

“I do,” he choked, fists clenched as he forced himself to release the hood he was still gripping. His body leaned toward her as if he were desperate for her touch, betraying the harrowed words his lips had spoken. He might leave her, but she couldn’t let him go without knowing she would fight for him.

“I'm sorry, Ben. What I did to you... If you hate me, I understand. If you want to break our bond, I deserve it. If you can't forgive me, I'll have to live with that. But I want you to know, if you walk away, I'll still fight to bring you home to your mother. And if you feel alone, I'll be here waiting for you. I know who you are, and nothing will ever make me forget that, not even the darkness.”

She sobbed as he shook his head silently, blinking back tears in his own eyes. He pressed his lips together and swallowed his emotions. She could sense an inner conflict rage violently inside him. Squeezing his eyes shut, he huffed a trembling breath, and she allowed herself to hope that he would stay. Her hope dwindled, however, as she felt darkness seep through the bond. When he opened his eyes, there was a steely resolve that broke her heart.

“Goodbye, Rey,” he said hoarsely. “Here are some bacta patches for those... 'training wounds.'” Kylo discarded the bandages at her feet, then turned away without hesitation, leaving her behind. She realized immediately he was referencing the lie she had told him about the wounds on her hands when she first arrived on Barkhesh, a lie he had likely never believed, but let her tell anyway because that was who he was. He would accept the lies and cutting words, and internalize it all, suffering in silence until the relationship was broken beyond repair. It was what he had done his entire life. He wore a practiced mask as the cruelty of others tore him to pieces inside.

He had become loyal, protective, and nurturing to her in his struggle with darkness, but she had been too blind with disappointment and anger to see it. Everyone he had ever loved had let him down. Rey should have been different; she knew he had hoped she would be, but she hadn't feared the darkness. She never had reason to fear it and had nearly fallen because of her ignorance. They had warned her, but she didn't listen – she didn't want to listen. It had cost her the only person who understood her. Her only consolation was that he had learned to walk away. His loyalty had caused him a lifetime of suffering, and for once he had chosen to let go. She would have been proud of him if it didn't mean losing him.
He walked with determination, not taking a single glance back to where he had left her in the rain. He did not exude the confidence he had when he was cruel to her on the bridge or the conflicted anger when he had told her he wanted the bond to end—no, this time his shoulders were slumped, his head sagging as he disappeared from sight. This time, she knew he meant it. The Force snapped as he was jolted back to his side of the galaxy. The closed-off bond was strong in her mind, but she wondered how long before it began to weaken and die.

Will he find a way to sever it completely? Or will it slowly disappear until I can't feel it anymore?

Rey wrapped the cloak around herself and sobbed into the textured cloth as she found her way back to the temple. It smelled distinctly like him—a mixture of Trillium soap, leather, and ozone, with the hint of durasteel, recycled air, sweat and masculine pheromones that were uniquely Kylo. It was her favorite smell, she decided, even more than food, flowers, or rain. She hiccuped a sob as grief grasped her in its steely claws.

That cloak was all she had left. She would never be able to smell him again. How long before his smell was gone from his cloak? How long until she forgot what he smelled like completely? Or what his energy in the Force felt like? Or the softness of his hand? Or the fire in his eyes? Or the tender murmur of her name on his lips? Would his face haunt her dreams? She hoped so. She never wanted to forget him.

How long until he forgets me?

Rey followed her feet back to the Resistance, a hooded wraith in the rain. As she made her way up the steps of the temple, back to the reality of war, she considered turning around, finding a suitable shelter and surviving in solitude. She had done it before, she could do it again. Her certainty of belonging with the Resistance had waned. They needed her to be something she couldn’t.

Rey wouldn't kill the Supreme Leader, and she couldn't bear the thought of standing by and allowing them to do it—listening to their cheers as she grieved the loss of his energy in the Force. Kylo was her enemy, but she couldn't be present when Kylo Ren took Ben Solo down with him.

If there was a spare ship that could blast her away from that planet, away from all of it, she would have left in a heartbeat. Maybe she would find a desolate outer rim planet like Ahch-To, or maybe she would return to Jakku. Maybe she would float in space until the bounty hunters found her, delivered her to the First Order, and forced Kylo to talk to her or kill her.
As she descended the steps into the darkness of the temple, she almost retraced her steps back outside the temple and into the rainforest, but a familiar voice echoing from their makeshift command room caught her attention. The Force called to her, drawing her closer as if she were in a trance. She was not in an emotional state to socialize, but her feet had a mind of their own as they carried her toward the room. As she entered the vast hall, her friends’ eyes met hers. Rose and Finn stared at her tear-streaked cheeks in concern.

“I need to speak with Maz,” she announced firmly. “Alone.”

There was a commanding coldness to her voice that she barely recognized, a darkness that was not the influence of Snoke. She knew they sensed it. Most left the room silently, averting their eyes from Rey. Poe hesitated in front of her.

“That’s new. Where did you get it?” he asked, pointing to the cloak. The levity in his tone belied the gravity of his question. Had it been any other day, she would have trembled in fear. She felt nothing as she glared at him fiercely.

_Fight me, Poe, I dare you._

Her hand curled around her staff as she prepared for another confrontation with him, but Maz spoke up from the holo behind him.

“Give us ladies the room, kiddo,” she told him. He turned, and they stared at each other silently for a moment, a heaviness in the air, before she nodded in affirmation of her request. He left promptly without another word, but not without a glance back at the cloak she wore.

“Do you have news?” Rey asked, fearful that it had something to do with Kylo.

“I will try to summarize it as best I can for you, dear,” Maz supplied, eying the trembling woman carefully. “During the Galactic Civil War, the war between the Galactic Empire and the Alliance to Restore the Republic, there was a Rebel base on Dantooine. Due to a hasty evacuation – in favor of a new rebel base on the moon Yavin IV – spare starfighters, supplies, equipment, and munitions had been left behind. Leia, still a princess then, was captured by the Empire and provided them with the location of Dantooine as the Rebel base, knowing that it had been abandoned.”

“She believed that the base had been destroyed by the Empire in that war over thirty years ago. But I was recently provided coordinates for the base, and we discovered that it is still as the Rebellion had left it. The Empire must have searched it, but never had the chance to destroy it. As your current base has likely been compromised, it has been decided that Dantooine will be your next destination. I have traded in a few favors, and the entirety of the Resistance will be transported safely aboard Corellian transport freighters that routinely carry supplies for the First Order. I'll help my boyfriend the Wookie find a safe route aboard the Falcon and meet you there.”

“That was lucky – the coordinates,” Rey said quietly, more relieved that the news did not involve her bondmate than anything else. She knew her current emotional stability was held together by a single thread; the volatile emotions churning inside her threatened to spill out into the Force. Had she heard news that Kylo had done something hopelessly evil or that the Resistance had plans to attack his ship, she would have likely lost control of her emotions and leveled the room in her grief. She was thankful, as she stood trembling, that her emotions tore apart her heart instead.

“It was more than luck.” Maz's words were cryptic, but Rey was too exhausted to care. Maybe Rey should have been elated that the Resistance would find a new base, with supplies, and become a formidable opponent to the growing empire of the First Order, but she wasn't. She wanted the First Order to fall, she wanted her friends to survive, but she wanted Ben Solo to come home too.

Rey was beginning to realize the truth – hoping for a fantastical ending to the war was naïve. The Force required balance; too much damage had been done. For the galaxy to find peace, and the family she had found to be saved, there had to be destruction and loss. The First Order would fall, and if it did, Kylo Ren would die. Kylo wasn’t ready to turn. How could she save Ben Solo if he shut her out?

Maz was on a freighter, a large one based on her limited view of the counter that stretch across the entire holo. Rey could see others moving in and out of the holo, and she assumed that it was the other smugglers who had been displaced when the palace fell. Wherever Maz was, she was removing tumblers and what Rey assumed was alcohol from a shelf behind her.

“Maz?” she asked, her eyes downcast as she considered giving life to words she knew she shouldn’t.

The venerable pirate queen studied her carefully. Rey could feel the heat of her gaze. “Yes, child.”

“I don't know if I belong here – the Resistance.” Rey hiccuped as the floodgate of her tears reopened. The older woman patiently waited until Rey reluctantly met her gaze.

Maz's hands had abandoned the alcohol bottles to lean her hands on the counter and focus her attention on Rey. Her smile was warm and open, not as judgmental as she had anticipated. Rey resented it; she deserved her judgment. After a moment of studying her, Maz directed her focus on gathering more bottles from the shelf. “Where do you belong?” she asked over her shoulder. “Back on Jakku?”

Rey fumbled with the edge of her cloak. “No.”

“Ah, you know now that your belonging is not in the past,” Maz gestured toward Rey with one of the bottles. “But you fear it is not with the Resistance. The question is – have you found the belonging you seek, Rey?”

Rey shook her head in response.

“No?”

“No.”

_I thought I would find home here. I thought the Resistance would be my family. But they all fear me. Even Luke. He refused to teach me and show me my place in this. I am still as lost as I ever was. “You were wrong.”_

Maz hummed. “How so?”

“You told me I would find belonging with Luke,” Rey said through tears. “But he refused to teach me! And now he’s gone, just like everyone else,”

The older woman set aside the bottles she was holding to adjust her goggles as she studied Rey’s eyes. “Young Rey, search your feelings. You know the truth – it is right in front of your nose. If I remember correctly, I told you ‘the belonging you seek is not behind you, it is ahead.’ And I believe my words were ‘those you are waiting for on Jakku are never coming back, but there is someone who still could, with your help.’”

Rey remembered it well. It was a simpler time then. She had escaped Jakku and had feared that her parents would be searching for her in her absence. Finn had left her like everyone else. The war did not matter to her. There were no people in her life to let down. She had no idea Kylo existed. There had been no pressure to be someone she wasn’t, and the Jedi were merely a legend.
“Right... Luke, but he can't come back. And I didn't find my belonging with him.” Rey attempted to hide the vexation in her voice, but she didn't know why she bothered. Maz was sure to sense it anyway.

Maz lifted the different colored bottles and began pouring them skillfully into a tumbler. When she glanced up from the tumbler, there was a secret twinkle in her eye. “No, dear child. You assumed Luke.”

You said there was someone who could still come back. The people I am missing - my parents, Han, Luke, they are all dead. There is no one left who could come back.

Only there was one person, her mind supplied, that she wanted desperately to come back.

Ben.

“There, yes, right there,” Maz startled her from her thoughts as she slapped her hand on the counter next to the tumbler she was preparing. “I saw truth break through the denial clouding your eyes. Rey, whatever you just saw in your mind? That is your answer.”

Rey’s response was immediate, almost mechanical: “No.”

I thought after the vision he could be, that he would turn, but I was wrong.

Maz adjusted her goggles, her knowing eyes piercing deeper into her soul. “Hmm...” Maz moved back to preparing the drink, focusing her attention on pouring a bright purple liquid over the previous concoction. When she had finished, she stirred it idly as she spoke. “Is this person the cause of those tears?”

Rey willed away more tears. She reminded herself who she was talking to and whom they were talking about. “Yes, and he's never coming back.”

“He?” Maz said with a smile as she dropped a tablet into the tumbler that immediately began fizzling. “Hmm... interesting. Why do you believe that?” The casualness with which she spoke was disarming, Rey felt like she could tell her anything.
Where do I begin? I have been cruel and selfish and clouded by darkness. I have somehow been hearing the whispers of a creature I thought was dead and listened to his lies until I almost killed someone who has become a part of me, while he slept. I don't want to kill Ben, I want to save him. But he thinks I was using him and wants to sever the bond. And now he’s further from turning than ever, and it’s all my fault.

“I did something I can never take back,” she whispered, hoping that projected thoughts were courtesy of the bond and Maz was incapable of hearing her treacherous thoughts.

“Well, that is an interesting sentiment; nothing you do can ever be taken back, Rey, only atoned for. It is the past, we can't change it.” Maz finished sprinkling glittery flakes on the fizzy purple drink and slid it down the counter. Without a second’s pause, Maz began on the next drink, lifting a fluorescent green bottle from the shelf and uncorking it with her teeth.

“What I did was terrible,” Rey amended. “He hates me.”

If Maz was incapable of reading her mind through the Force, she seemed to do just fine through studying her eyes. The conspiratorial smile that crossed Maz's face was unnerving. “Is he the same man who gave you that distinctive and unique cape?” Rey's heart stuttered as time slowed. She couldn’t know, could she?

Maz wasn’t studying her, searching for the truth, but Rey’s next words were cautious anyway. “If he was?”

The older woman began pouring the liquid delicately into the tumbler as it bubbled and smoked. She spoke around the cap in her mouth as if they were discussing nothing of consequence. “Then I would tell you that lost, foolish boy does not hate you, Rey.”

Maz couldn’t know. The cloak wasn't that unique, especially after he removed the broach. Even if it was, Maz would have had to cross paths with Kylo, and talk with him, about Rey. She knew Kylo would never do that. But that knowledge did nothing to dull the spark of hope in her broken heart.

Rey lowered her voice to nearly a whisper, so her tone wouldn't betray them both. “How would you know?”
“As I said, that is a very unique cape.” Maz's smile grew wider, her eyes sparkling in a shared secret that Rey hoped she remained ignorant of. Maz finished mixing the drink and passed that one down the counter as well. This time, however, she didn’t immediately embark on creating the next drink. Her stare was focused on Rey. “I happened to have a conversation with a certain lost boy wearing that exact cape recently – retrieving my crew from a First Order supply freighter, just outside Taris. I saw it in his eyes, kiddo; he doesn't hate you. Not at all.”

Rey's memory flashed to Kamino when Kylo's general had informed him of a supply freighter outside Taris that had been lost. Then it skipped forward to the night of the meaningless kiss with Poe, when Kylo said he was handling a “pirate problem.” Maz was considered a pirate queen.

_Oh Force, she knows._

Rey moved closer to the holo, lowering her voice to a whisper. “Maz, it's not what you think...”

“Oh, but that's not the truth, is it Rey?” She replied, not unkindly. “It is exactly what I think. That is why your eyes are filled with fear.” The entire scenario seemed completely impossible. He had been in his fighter. Why would he talk to her? Why would she talk to him?

Though, Rey conceded it _was_ possible. Maz did know Han Solo. Had she known his son as well? Rey shuddered. What happened after his fighter exploded? If he _did_ talk to her, what did he tell her? Why didn’t he tell Rey? Who else knew? The possibilities were terrifying as Rey imagined what Leia or Poe would do when she relayed her suspicions.

“Please, don't tell anyone!”

Maz chuckled as she shifted on the stool she was standing on to reach a bottle on the far side of the shelf. When she turned back, her eyes seemed... compassionate. “Oh, child, though it is an interesting one, it is not my story to tell. In all my years I haven’t seen a story quite like it, and I am most curious to see how it plays out.” It was not the response Rey had expected when she finally revealed that she had a complicated, and treasonous, connection with the Supreme Leader.

The words slipped out before Rey had time to consider the consequences. “What did he say about me?”

“Hmm?” Maz's expression was playful and feigned innocence. She poured a clear liquid into a tumbler that looked deceptively innocuous compared to the other liquids she had poured.
“In your conversation,” Rey said, her words rushed and impatient. “What makes you believe he doesn't hate me?”

The teasing smile that twitched on Maz’s face further frustrated Rey. The woman wouldn’t look at her now that Rey wanted answers, too busy pouring another clear liquid into the tumbler. “Who?”

“You know who!” Rey clenched her fists in irritation, prepared to scream at the woman or storm from the room. She was in no mood for games.

“I do,” Maz said in amusement. “Do you?”

“Ben!”

Rey gasped, covering her mouth to prevent more treasonous admissions to the woman who clearly sympathized with the Resistance.

Maz, however, wasn’t nearly concerned as she was. With a snap of her fingers, the surface of the clear liquid ignited in a blue flame. “The truth feels freeing, doesn't it?” Maz slid the tumbler down to the counter and returned her gaze to Rey, who had started to sense that their exchange had become a lesson to the centuries-old humanoid. A purposeful, vexatious lesson that she didn’t understand.

Rey shook her head, wrapping herself tighter in the cloak. “The truth is terrifying, actually.”

“The truth usually is, child. It is a fear you must face, however. The truth reveals who we are. And,” Maz said, using another bottle she pulled from the shelf to gesture to the young woman, “the truth you spoke is quite revealing.”

“How so?”

Maz took Rey's irritated tone in stride, chuckling to herself before her expression became knowing again. “You chose not to refer to him as Kylo Ren.”
After feeling like she was playing a game in which she didn’t know the rules, she was thankful for something that finally had a simple answer. “Because that’s not his name.”

Maz took her time pouring the viscous, sapphire liquid into the tumbler. The moment stretched, and Rey wondered if she would answer. When she had nearly finished pouring, she said casually, “It is to those who do not care for him.”

Rey sighed. She was weary of the games and the attempts at great cosmic lessons; all she wanted were answers that Maz was clearly in no hurry to give. “What does it matter what I call him?”

“It intrigues me,” the older female chuckled. The holoprojector followed her as she hopped over the counter onto a tall stool. When she had settled into her seat – which took a suspiciously long time – she took a long sip from her tumbler. When she was finished, her gaze finally returned to Rey. “You never knew him as ‘Ben,’ the ones around you do not refer to him as ‘Ben,’ he chooses not to call himself ‘Ben,’ you are confident that he is never coming back… and yet, you refuse to call him Kylo Ren. Why?”

_I called him Kylo Ren when I believed there was no light left in him. The moment I call him Kylo Ren again, is the moment I give up on him. And the moment I give up on him is the moment I give up on hope. I know who he truly is. I betrayed him and he brought me his cloak. Ben Solo is not dead._

“Because I know him.”

“How?” Maz continued to pry, swirling the sparkling blue liquid of her drink until it looked like she contained the galaxy in her glass. “How did you get to know a man who is stationed halfway across the galaxy in a way that no one else has? How do I sense your energy within him and his energy within you as if...”

“We have a Force bond, okay?” she snapped in frustration. “That is how he gave me this cloak today. When we are connected, I see him as if he is physically here. But I betrayed him when I... listened to the darkness. I nearly murdered him, Maz, just before the Force showed me a vision of his memories. I know exactly who he is now. And I know he is not a monster. But Ben Solo is still trapped inside Kylo Ren. He is still the Supreme Leader, and he wants to destroy our bond. That is why I can't tell the Resistance.”

Maz was quiet as Rey recovered from her outburst, the words strengthening in meaning the longer the silence grew. She hadn’t meant to say it, but Maz continued to push her. Part of Rey wished she could take them back if only to spare herself further judgment. “Why must you keep this burden from people who care for you?” Maz was kind in her questioning, but Rey knew that in this excavation of secrets, she would be forced to confront truths that she was not prepared to face.

“Because he is my enemy!”

“Is he?” Maz asked, eying her over the glass as she took another long sip. “He doesn't sound like an enemy to me. Quite the opposite, in fact.”

“He is their enemy. He is supposed to be my enemy. As the last Jedi, I am supposed to fight him,” her voice broke, “... to kill him.” The tears began spilling down her cheeks again, the thought of his life ending by her hands unbearable. She felt ridiculous for crying in front of Maz about someone the woman likely despised.

Maz's voice wasn’t reproachful for the emotional display, but she continued to press Rey, forcing her to confront her beliefs, as Kylo had done on Ahch-To. “According to whom?”

_Everyone._

Rey hiccuped a sob. “Well, as far as the Resistance is concerned –”

“Now is not the time to let others forge your path for you,” Maz said, her voice growing sterner. Her hand slammed the tumbler onto the counter surface more forcefully than necessary in her sudden agitation. She leaned forward to capture Rey’s undivided attention, tapping her finger on the counter to emphasize her words. “The Force has intervened with your destinies, and that is not something to be taken lightly. The Force has a significant destiny for you. As for the Resistance, they are mere mortals, Rey, just like the rest of us. We cannot see the future. In all my years, I could have never foreseen this bond between you. Nor can I fully appreciate its consequences. We can only make decisions based upon what we know to be true. And individual truth is subjective. We have not seen what the Force has shown you. We do not know him like you say you do. The important question is not what others expect of you, but what do _you_ believe? Where does the Force guide you?”

“I thought the Force showed my belonging with him, in a vision,” Rey whispered. The comfort of finally having somewhere safe to express her thoughts lessened the ache in her chest. “But it was a lie. The Force was wrong.”

“The Force is never wrong, kiddo.”
Maz was so certain, and Rey wondered how she could have such blind faith. Undoubtedly, Maz must have suffered in her centuries of life experience. If Rey had learned one thing in her short life, it was that she could trust no one, especially not some omnipotent power that would supposedly make everything okay. She had trusted the Force too many times to count since she left Jakku. When had it ever been okay?

“Now, I am no Jedi,” the older woman continued as she finished her drink and shoved the tumbler aside. “I have lived centuries and still know very little about the Force. Some say you have infinite destinies woven in the Force. The Force can guide you, provide you with a vision of what could be, but your own actions could alter your path from that destiny. You could have made the simple decision to walk past this room – never having this conversation – and your entire destiny could have been altered. Every single decision, no matter how insignificant, could change the path of your destiny. I have heard it explained as placing a large boulder to block a small stream of water. Depending upon where the boulder is placed, it changes the flow of the stream. Once the boulder is placed, the flow of the water is forever altered. Each boulder is every choice you make in your life. It means every choice you make is life-altering. But that is only one theory.

“There are others who believe there are infinite universes, each fulfilling a separate destiny. A vision in the Force may show you a destiny of yours in another universe. It was a destiny never meant for this version of you. There could be a universe where you had a family who never abandoned you, or one where young Solo never turned to the dark side. In one universe he could kill you. In another universe, you could kill him. In yet another, you could fall into one another’s arms as lovers. Those destinies would be very different from the destinies in this universe.

“Or... maybe not. Maybe the same destiny is fated to you for the eternity of lives you live and universes you experience. Maybe you and young Solo always have and always will have destinies that are intertwined. And whatever fate is to befall you both, no matter what choices either of you have made, is the only destiny you will ever be fated.

“As for me, I believe a little bit of it all. I believe there is only one destiny in the Force meant for each of us, but that does not necessarily mean that it will come to pass. I believe we have the choice to forsake our true destinies, but I believe that will only bring our soul suffering if we make that choice. I believe we live many lives, maybe for eternity, or maybe until we follow the path of our true destiny. I do not believe we are condemned to repeat the mistakes of the past, or that our choices are meaningless to our future. Your fate is what you make of it, child. Choose wisely. And I believe Force visions can be very...complex. It is difficult to interpret a vision of the future with the eyes of the present. So a vision is never wrong, only your interpretation of it.’’

“How do I know what choice to make?” Rey asked the wise older woman. “How do I know when the Force is guiding me down the right path? How do I know when to listen? How do I know when to fight, and when to let go?”
“The Force will always guide you down the right path, Rey. Listen. Not with your ears. Listen to the truth in here,” Maz said, placing her hand over her chest. “You will always know if you listen hard enough. Close your eyes. Feel the warmth inside you, let the Force flow through you. You will find the right path when you are honest with yourself about where the Force is guiding you. You just have to have patience and trust in it.” Rey wanted to scream. Maz didn’t understand the darkness. She didn’t know the conflict of the Force trying to guide her down two opposing paths. How could she know which side to trust? Sometimes the darkness didn’t present itself as darkness. If she had heeded this advice, with the guidance of the Force she would have killed her bondmate while he slept. Even if she allowed only the light to guide her, what if it led her away from the desires of the Resistance?

“How? How do I trust in a truth that everyone else tells me is wrong?”

Maz offered her a sympathetic half-smile. “They do not have the Force to guide them, Rey. They do not know the truth that is inside you.”

If only it were that simple.

Rey leaned back against the wall, more discouraged than she had been before the conversation. When had this gift begun to feel like such a curse? This was her destiny, wasn’t it? Too many sacrifices had been made for her to become the “last hope” of the Resistance, too many people were counting on her. She didn’t want to disappoint them. Why couldn’t she be what they wanted her to be? Why couldn’t the Force guide her down the path they needed her to follow?

When Rey glanced up, she met Maz’s perceptive stare. She knew she might as well have thought it all aloud. “Rey, when you go outside and look up into the sky, you cannot see the stars beyond the brightness of this one, but you know they’re there. You know that truth and you trust in it, even if you can’t see it yourself. If everyone around you told you there was nothing beyond this star, that the truth you believed in was wrong, would it change what you know to be true?”

“I guess not...”

“Trust in the Force,” Maz repeated. “Everything else will work itself out in the end. What does your heart tell you, Rey?”

Her only thoughts lingered on the strong barrier in the bond, the ache in her chest that reminded her that she had lost Kylo. The darkness found her in her despair; soothing as it seeped into the crevices of her shattered heart.

The truth is Ben was right.

“It tells me that none of this matters. He's right, it's too late to save him.” Even in the darkness, she could hear the screams of something inside her telling her she was wrong; it was never too late.

Maz’s eyes were still kind, but they had narrowed slightly. “Is that why you went to the Supremacy for him and killed Snoke? Because of this belief that it’s too late?”

“I went there, but I didn't... it was Ben…” she said, lowering her voice to disguise the sorrow underneath. “Snoke said he created the bond and used Ben’s weakness to draw me into a trap. It worked; he took the map to Luke from my thoughts. Then he ordered Ben to kill me, but Ben killed him instead.”

Maz stared off into the distance, smiling and chuckling to herself as she shook her head. She murmured something too low for Rey’s ears, but she caught the tail end, “that son of yours.” When her attention returned to Rey, Maz’s smile transformed into something furtive. She rested her head on one hand, adjusting her goggles with the others. “He killed his master for you. That is quite something, young Rey."

“Does it matter?” Rey bit back the anger that was clearly misplaced. “He didn’t turn, and I thought I hated him for it. Now that I know I don’t, but he wants nothing to do with me anymore."

“Your boyfriend...” the older woman's eyes brightened with the endearment “...asked me the same question – does it matter? If you have to ask, you already know the answer.”

Rey choked on air as her chest seized, coughing forcefully she gasped, “My boyfriend?”

“...does not hate you,” Maz supplied without addressing her true question. “He has his father's heart. In fact, that boy loves too deeply. He cannot let go of that love when people inevitably disappoint him. And I know they have. It is not hate you see, but fear and anger manifested from his profound love. He feels every emotion quite passionately, as I am sure you have learned through your bond with him. You said yourself that you disappointed him, and Ben Solo does not handle that well. He has not learned how to trust or forgive; it will be a struggle for him to learn. He will need help. But there is quite a difference between pushing someone away and hating someone, Rey.”
Rey had seen the wrath of Kylo on Starkiller, the Supremacy and Crait. She was intimately aware of his hatred. “Then why did he try to kill me on Crait? He hated me after I wouldn’t join him and left him on Supremacy.”

“That is a question for young Solo.” Maz was the perfect air of calm in the face of her wrath, but it irritated Rey further. Maz should care, Maz should be upset, because Kylo’s life hung in the balance. Saving him was not only important to the war, but important to her. How could the older woman be calm when Rey felt like she was falling apart? As Maz studied her, she seemed to take pity on her struggle. “I suspect that it meant more to him than he let on.”

“He wanted power,” Rey spit out in anger, “and needed me to help him kill the guards.”

“I don’t doubt that.”

“And he hated his master.” That part didn’t bother her; she hated Snoke, she hated what he had done to her – had done to him. Even if the throne room had irrevocably altered their bond, she was thankful that creature was no longer in his head.

“Perhaps,” Maz said as she carefully peeled her goggles from her eyes. It was relieving, if only for a moment, to not be pinned under her all-knowing stare. “But that doesn’t explain why he reacted – very poorly – when you left.”

“He wanted me to rule with him.”

Maz grinned. She used a cloth from under the counter to meticulously clean the goggles. “So a man fixated on power wanted to share it with you. Interesting.”

Rey was certain Maz couldn’t see it, but she leveled a frustrated glare at her anyway. Whose side was she on? “He just wanted me as an ally.”

“There is no other reason a young man would ask a young woman to rule with him? Hmm?” Though Rey couldn’t see the woman’s eyes as Maz focused on cleaning her goggles, she was certain if she could, she would find mirth there. Rey was not amused. Her mind unhappily reminded her of the conflicting feelings he felt toward her in turbolift, but what Maz suggested was impossible. She was nothing. No one would ever care for her that way.
“No,” she answered.

“No?”

“Why are you so convinced that it was anything more?” Rey could feel the heat prickling underneath her skin. She was tired of Maz’s games and ridiculous questions. Kylo hated her, she was certain of that fact.

“He could have used you to help kill the guards after he killed his master, and asked you to join him in the sole pursuit of power, or…” Maz paused long enough to lift the goggles that took entirely too long to clean and placed them back over her eyes. She adjusted them as she carefully studied Rey. “Or Snoke saw something in him you didn’t. I have to ask myself what ‘weakness’ Snoke exploited through the bond to draw you there? Perhaps it was just the light you saw in him. But if that was all it was, why did he ask young Solo to kill you? That beast knew that he was forcing him to choose, I have no doubt about that. And he chose to kill someone he was loyal to – whether we believe Snoke deserved that loyalty – because he had a stronger loyalty to you. Was that loyalty why he asked you to rule with him? I suppose only your ‘Ben’ knows that answer.”

Rey’s anger, the emotion feeding her darkness, would not be tempered. Instead, she found herself screaming. “If he ‘cared’ for me, he wouldn’t have called me nothing!”

“He told you that you were nothing to him?”

“He said my parents were nobody,” she said bitterly. “I had no place in the story. I came from nothing and I am nothing, but not to him.”

“Oh, that foolish, foolish boy. Solo men and those mouths of theirs, they speak before they think. That boy needs a good smack upside the head for saying that to you. I had to give his father a few of those in my time,” she chuckled to herself. Her eyes brightened at the mention of Han. “What he said to you was cruel and misplaced. Your anger with him is understandable and necessary, but am I wrong in assuming you have forgiven him for it? You only use it as a reason to deny the truth. You know him better than anyone. What you need to ask yourself is – if he truly believed you were nothing, would the man you know save you, share the throne with you, and lose his temper when you left? Does that sound like Ben Solo?”

Everything inside her implored her to listen, but it only served to further terrify her. She knew she had been wrong about him, but she refused to admit she was that wrong. “It doesn’t matter!”

“Oh Rey,” Maz’s lips pulled into her infuriatingly perceptive smile. “You and young Solo are more alike than you want to admit. An unwillingness to let go of the past, a loneliness and desire for belonging, a constant fight against the acceptance of who you are, and a denial of the truth that is right in front of you. Of all the words of enlightenment or wisdom that I possess, none can remove the blanket of denial – the false truth – that you are desperately holding before your own eyes. Correcting your assumptions about him is your first step correcting your cynical view of the future of your bond.”

Rey turned away. She couldn’t bear to have hope and lose it again. When Rey didn’t respond, Maz continued. “Dear child, you have spent your entire life fighting the truth. Listen to your heart. Let the Force guide you to your destiny. Trust in what will be, not what is. There is not one place in the entire galaxy you can stand and see the entirety of it. There is a bigger picture to this life. We cannot see our path interwoven in the Force, only trust in it. It is only a matter of admitting it to yourself.”

“It’s not that easy!”

Rey sucked in a shuddered breath before she turned back to Maz and continued, “If I believe Ben… cares and will somehow forgive me and come back to the light, how do I make him believe that? How do I make them believe that? What if I'm wrong, or they don't believe me? I can't lose him or them.”

More than anything, she wished Maz would assure her in her near clairvoyant assurances that she wouldn't have to forsake one half of her heart for the other. The very thought of losing him felt as if Snoke had invaded her body again, this time tearing the breath from her lungs rather than the thoughts from her mind. She longed to save him with a deeper ache than she had ever craved food in the most hopeless moments of starvation. It was physically painful in a way she had never felt emotional wounds before, even those left behind by her parents. She needed Maz to tell her that he wouldn't leave her; the ancient humanoid was only ever honest.

“I can't promise that your Ben or your friends won't become casualties of this terrible war,” Maz admitted, and though the reasonable part of Rey knew that, her words still stung. “The bond has put you in an unfortunate, but significant, position between that boy and the Resistance. Your lies have put you in the far more precarious position you now face. If I may give you some centuries-old wisdom… You have got yourself so tangled in the lies and secrets that even you do not know the truth anymore. And the problem with a secret is, eventually, the truth will be exposed, by you or others. Your choice is how that truth is revealed. This is quite a consequential secret you are keeping, my dear. There will be more trust if you are the one to expose your secret. And perhaps, you may be surprised that the others know more than they have let on.”
Rey wanted to scream to relieve the conflict raging inside her, but she found the strength to swallow her emotions and rasp, “Such as?”

“What happened to Snoke…your presence at his death. The minor detail of who actually killed him may be inaccurate.” Maz chuckled, but Rey felt anything but humor from the revelation. What she was suggesting could change reality as she knew it.

One of the smugglers slid a holopad in front of Maz. Her attention was drawn to the screen, and Rey could feel the unease growing with each passing second. It was impossible that they knew about the Supremacy, wasn’t it? Unless Finn told them. Maz turned to the smuggler. “You mapped this route to his exact specifications?” The smuggler nodded in affirmation and Maz turned back to the holopad.

Rey couldn’t stand waiting any longer. She attempted in vain to temper the fear quivering in her voice. “Why would they think I killed Snoke?”

“It is listed as one of the crimes you allegedly committed on the bounty.” Maz gestured vaguely with one hand as she continued to study the holopad.

Though Maz was not concerned, Rey was gripped with terror. She had lied, and they would know. What would they do when she was discovered? How could she explain what happened without exposing her connection to Kylo? “Did you tell the others?”

“Poe Dameron knows.” It finally clicked, why Poe had been so distrustful of her. He had known the whole time, and if the ever-loyal colonel knew...

“Then Leia knows.”

“More than you think, I am sure,” Maz chuckled. “She is Force-sensitive, smart as a whip, and he is her son, after all.”

Her emotions began to unravel into the Force as she considered the consequences. Maz must have sensed the change in her, because she pushed the holopad aside and directed her attention toward Rey. “This is nothing new,” she assured her, “she’s known since you landed on Barkhesh.”
It wasn’t that simple. Rey had lied, and Leia knew it. The weight of the secret she carried was too great. As the tears fell, Rey understood now when he told her he was tired of everything. Rey was tired of pretending she was someone else, she was tired of lying to the people she cared about, she was tired of fighting with her bondmate, she was tired of the conflict and the heartbreak and the war. Most of all, she was tired of disappointing good people. Leia didn’t deserve it. “She lied for me,” Rey said through tears, “I know she suspects something. But I can't break her heart. Because of what I did, her son is never coming back.”

It already tears me apart that he shut me out, I can't see the disappointment in her eyes. What if she shuts me out? I can't lose her too.

“Rey.” Maz waited patiently for Rey to meet her eyes. “Tell her the truth. She has suffered a lifetime of heartache, kiddo. She already lost her son a long time ago. In the eyes of everyone she cares about, her child is a monster. Maybe the truth about her son will mean more to her than the fight you had with him.”

Rey smiled through her tears. “Okay, okay. I will.”

“And Rey?” Her expression transformed into a knowing, yet almost protective, expression. “You don’t need me or the Resistance or Ben Solo to be happy. If you feel that you are compromising who you are with them, then don’t be afraid to walk away. You don’t need anyone to define you. You know who you are, in here,” she patted her chest over her heart.

“But if you ever happen to fall in love with the right person down the road, I want you to know something.” Rey opened her mouth to argue, but Maz silenced her with a warning glare. “Love is not easy. No one is perfect, some more... imperfect... than others. Love is the acceptance of those imperfections, but not if it conflicts with who you are.”

“And if you ever fall in love, give that boy, or girl, a chance to be who they are. Good or bad. Not who that person once was, and not what you want them to be. Some people have scars that occurred long before we met them. We can't erase those, and the person they are in the future will not be who they were before those scars. As much as we would like to, we can't change them.”

“Love is not always enough. It doesn’t atone for the bad choices people have made. Love alone can't save people. Their path is one they must choose for themselves, but that doesn't mean they must walk that path alone. Love is not always enough, but sometimes it is the catalyst for change. You, my dear, are a force to be reckoned with in more ways than you understand. But to love someone, you have to allow them into your heart, as terrifying as that may be. You are worthy to be loved, Rey, no matter what choices people have made in the past to make you feel otherwise. Never forget that.”
Rey smiled, the first true smile in days, warmth of hope spreading in her chest. Hope for what, she wasn't certain, neither did she desire to contemplate it. “Thank you, Maz.”

“If you know him and truly trust Ben, tell him about those coordinates for the new base. His allegiance to the First Order might surprise you.” Before Rey could argue the preposterous idea of providing the Supreme Leader of the First Order coordinates to their new base, Maz continued, “Oh, and, Rey?”

“Yes?”

“When you see her, can you relay something to Leia for me?” Maz asked. Rey nodded. “May the Force be with you. Always.” Before Rey could ask why, the hologram fizzled away.
Chapter End Notes

Mild injury

Rey is superficially injured by acid rain
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo had intended to spend the entire day in the training room working himself into exhaustion. He hadn't expected to feel Rey's pain through the Force, or break the promise to himself that he would shut her out no matter the circumstances. His weak resolve with her did not last a day before he was interrupting his training to bring her his cloak. He hadn't intended to stay and listen to her beg, or witness the sorrow in her eyes, but every moment he spent with her he was inexorably drawn to her. It had taken everything in him to walk away.

He returned to his training without the strength or desire to even lift his lightsaber. And all Kylo wanted was to forget the events of the prior twenty-four hours. It was an avalanche of consequences that had all been triggered by the appearance of a First Order recon ship on Barkhesh.

Kylo knew he should have been monitoring the outer rim situation more closely, or at least been up front with her about the possibility of search and probe missions. He understood her original fear; what was she supposed to think when a First Order ship landed at the base? But he had explained everything to her, and still she hadn’t trusted him. He knew her better than that; didn’t she know who he was?

Does she? the Force unhelpfully called him to wonder. Have you shown her who you are? Or just who you want her to see?

The thought only stoked the resentment tightening in his chest. Had he not proven to her that he would go to any length to keep her safe? She accused him of attempting to deceive her as he committed treason for her friends – anarchists he would find great satisfaction with removing from the galaxy. Then she offered herself to him as a sacrificial martyr for her friends’ lives. How could she believe, after the throne room, that all he wanted was a prisoner or a slave? He didn’t know what was worse; that after everything she had been through, she would offer herself to him like that, or that she believed he would ever consider that. He wanted her to join him, to stand with him at his side, not fall to her knees at his feet. How could she believe that he thought so little of her that he would consider her an asset to be bargained with? He told her in the throne room how much she meant to him. He showed her by killing his own master. How could she not see the sacrifices he had made for her? He would do anything for her…

Yet he was nothing to her. His use had only ever been to protect the Resistance – his enemies and terrorists of the galaxy – and yet he protected them for her. That was why she came to him on the Supremacy. Every moment they were connected was spent by her using him to save her friends, screaming at him, trying to kill him, or using him for her powers. Should he have been surprised? Everyone he had ever known only wanted him if he could be what they wanted. When he couldn’t, they abandoned or tried to murder him. Why should she be any different? There were moments – brief moments – when he thought she was. He thought that she saw more than the monster, but that was all he was, wasn’t it? What would she see in him? He was only as important as his use to her, and she... she meant more to him than she would ever know.
He could have helped her if she had chosen him to teach her. She was drowning in her darkness, and he had seen it before in himself and the others to know where it led. What had Luke done? In his fear, or hatred for Kylo, he sensed her power and refused her training; she was forced to learn the practicalities of the Force from ancient books and necessary skills from... a monster. How could he leave her in a situation that necessitated the cooperation of her enemy for knowledge of the Force? How could he not foresee her struggle with the darkness? He failed Kylo and abandoned her to the same fate. Her darkness was unlike anything he had ever felt before. She would be lost to it without guidance... and he had shut her out. Who else was left to help her fight it? Poe Dameron? The traitor? Leia? Was there anyone powerful enough to help stop the prophecy from being realized?

What was he supposed to do? Even if he could accept that his only use to her was to save her friends, their connection would only ever put her in danger, and that he couldn’t accept. Rey nearly died at the hands of Poe Dameron, for treason, and had he been in the pilot’s position with one of his subordinates, he would have made the same decision. It was war, and she was a risk as long as she had a bond with the enemy. Leia had saved her life, but she could only do so much. He had to end the bond – for her safety.

That was his misstep – he never anticipated his own weakness in ending the bond. The Order was lucky he had only destroyed one room on that ship in his... instability. Unfortunately, now Hux had the evidence he required to prove Kylo’s inadequacies as Supreme Leader. Their game of holocheess was swiftly approaching endgame, but Kylo had underestimated him. It was not as much due to his strategy as Kylo’s own oversight. He willingly stepped into his general’s trap. His fear was that he was continuing to underestimate his strategy. Perhaps his subordinate was not as incompetent as he had anticipated, and he had been scheming three steps ahead in the shadows the entire time.

Kylo had underestimated Rey as well. He never anticipated that shutting her out would deliver her to his chambers as death’s implement. From the moment he sensed her powers, he knew she would be the death of him. He imagined she would deliver his fate on the battlefield, besting him in a final duel – not in his sleep by his own weapon. He had never imagined she would use their shared bond, but that was his own oversight. He shouldn’t have trusted her.

The best advice Han had ever given him was this: “Trust no one, kid. If you go into every situation believing they’ll betray you, then you’ll never be disappointed.”

Kylo had never been good at following advice... evidently, neither was his father.

He activated the MSE-6 droid in the corner to entertain Blue, then activated the three training droids in front of him. The droids’ lightsabers sizzled in anticipation. Kylo knew he could have used the training sabers, lined with barbs filled with temporary paralyzing agents. As painful as the training lightsabers were, he much preferred a burn to the loss of control that accompanied paralysis, unable to fight, left alone with the voices in his head. He activated his lightsaber and lifted it into his fighting stance – the weapon raised to his line of sight so he could focus on his target down the length of the blade. Exhilaration shuddered through his body.

His memories flashed to the last challenging duel he had participated in – when he had fought with Rey at his back. He had forged a brotherhood with the Knights and still, he would not turn his back to a single one of them. In that fight, he had trusted in her more than he had ever trusted anyone in his entire life. She could have easily killed him, and he would have been powerless to stop it. But he knew she wouldn't. When their eyes met before the guards descended upon them, there was a reflection of recognition in her eyes. They had both trusted in the bond when they had every reason not to. He knew she would stand by him, and she did... until he wouldn't let her use him to save the Resistance the way she wanted. A sigh signaled the dampening of his mood, and he shook the line of thinking from his mind.

If one silver lining arose from their battle in the throne room, it was that he had discovered more personal weaknesses. That glorious yet loathsome day, he had thrust his weapon into a guard but was forced to abandon it in a desperate attempt to avoid another guard's reaching swing. The result was his eventual off-balance struggle with a weapon to his throat. Had it not been for Rey...

He may have thought practically eventually, but he should never have been in the position in the first place. His weapon was an extension of himself, even if his bond to the crystal had been damaged when he bled it. In the constant battle to subjugate it, his training in the fundamentals of lightsaber duels had suffered. In his agitation, he had forgotten rule number one of lightsaber combat– the weapon was the last line of defense; never abandon it.

Kylo decided to train by using the teachings of Trakata by engaging and disengaging the lightsaber strategically during the fight instead. It would force the weapon to become second-nature in his hands again, even in his attempt to control it. This was a more trust-driven form of fighting than he was used to. It required moments of vulnerability that terrified him, but it would be a deadly move to use on an opponent when their blades were locked. A quick deactivation and reactivation would cause his opponent's weapon to fall through. If he could dodge it, that left them nothing to block with once he reengaged the blade.

He practiced relentlessly against the three droids. The most difficult part to learn was to trust that he had moved out of the other blade’s path and focus on the quick re-engagement of his own weapon. Every time he watched the path of the other weapon, rather than trusting in himself, he felt it slice into his arm guards. That distraction was always enough to leave him open to an attack on the flank. So he focused intently on trusting himself and his training, a foreign dependency.
In his concentration, his command over his weapon slipped. He noticed the sudden ease in his movements as if the lightsaber itself was guiding him. Then he realized... it was. The crystal that he had bled was cracked, the bond was damaged, but the connection was still there. He had been forcing it into submission for years, but it would have readily answered to his direction the entire time. He realized then how much stronger the bond with the crystal made him in his efforts.

That was why it responded to Rey. Her bond with him had created a bond with his crystal. She wasn't commanding it to her in the throne room, she was appealing to the trusted connection that had long survived what he had done. Why did he bleed it? Why was it important to him that he dominate something so strong? It only made him weaker, but that was Sidious's intention, wasn't it? He needed Kylo weak so he wouldn't kill him, and in his attempt to eliminate the person who had given him that strength, he sealed his fate.

What could I have been without him?

Kylo allowed the weapon to guide his movements for the first time in years. The connection was weak due to the crack in his crystal, but the trust was there, nonetheless. It came as naturally as his connection to the Force. He had betrayed it, denied it, yet it had continued to call to him. It was a forgiveness he didn't understand, but it gave him a feeling of completeness he hadn’t felt in years. He was sweating profusely, but he reveled in this release. His breathing was steady, his mind calm, his connection to the Force felt even more powerful. His muscles ached as they performed from memory; it was a dance he had long forgotten but fell back into quickly. There was no place he felt more at home than standing there with the lightsaber in his hand. His body felt electric as the power vibrated through him.

Then he realized, it wasn't power. It was her energy attempting to force through the barriers he had constructed in the bond.

No. I will not give in again.

He pushed back forcefully, but she was insistent. The bond was strong, and so was she. It was an inevitability that she would force her way through. Abruptly, he felt faint, and he realized she had made an oversight of her own. Dropping the barriers, he appeared in time to witness her collapse on the border of unconsciousness. He yearned to step forward and catch her, as he had on Takodana, but he used the Force instead.

With his hand outstretched, the Force suspended her fall only centimeters from the floor. He hated the way she watched him, the Force holding her at his mercy, as if he was anything other than the monster he was.
“What were you thinking,” he said through clenched teeth. “You could have killed yourself.” She stared up at him, eyes wide. Was it surprise? Comfort? Relief? She had nearly knocked herself unconscious attempting to bring him to her side of the galaxy. Why? No matter what she said, she didn't want him there for the company. He was certain of it. There were tears on her cheeks and a storm of emotions behind her eyes. He knew he was the cause.

She was still wearing his cloak, but her hair was… different. Part of it was still down, but the front part was pulled back into a braid. There was only one person who could have done it, and it was no accident which one she had chosen. It was a message to him, and he hated it. Abandoning his resolution to shut her out, he surrendered to his curiosities.

“You changed your hair – an Alderaanian braid,” he said. He knew she wasn’t foolish enough to deny who had done it. “Did she tell you what it means?”

“If you want to shut me out. I won't fight it anymore, Ben, I promise. Under one condition,” she begged. He had stopped her from hurting herself, breaking the promise to himself twice in one day. He knew he should leave. But if he left, what would stop her from attempting to break down the barriers again? She was promising to stop fighting if he did one last favor for her.

What is it this time? Which one of the traitors needs my help now? What treasonous act do you expect of me?

He worked his jaw in agitation, “Yes?”

“You listen to what your mother has to say.” His breath caught in his throat. Of all the favors he expected her to ask of him, speaking to his mother was not one of them. She knew what it would do to him, didn’t she?

No. I can't see Leia again, it's too late for anything she has to say. Not today. How could she do this to me? She saw everything, she saw what they did! She wouldn't use the bond like this. Would she? No, she wouldn't do this to me. This...this would be worse than trying to kill me.

He stared at Rey, silently pleading with her to take back what she had said, begging her not to betray him again. His eyes followed the stray wisps of hair framing her face to the intricate, noticeably Alderaanian braid woven in a meaningful style by expert hands. What had Leia done to make her use the bond like that?
His galaxy fell away as he perceived a quiet gasp to his left.

A stuttered breath escaped his lips as he turned, and his eyes met haunting, familiar eyes. A wave of nausea rolled through his stomach. She looked terrible – her face was drawn and pale, dark circles of exhaustion matched the ones under his own eyes. She was the strongest woman he knew, save for Rey, but she looked weak, frail, and impossibly small sitting on one of the temple's sacrificial altars. She looked as she did in his vision in the mirror. He had thought it was his own tormenting mind that made her look that way. He had done this to her, he was certain. He was slowly killing his own mother.

“You're here...” Leia's voice broke the silence. He swallowed the sob rising in his throat.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Rey knew that she had avoided it long enough. Holding her breath, she followed C-3PO into the temple room. The woman was focused on a box in her lap. Rey watched the droid leave the room and cleared her throat. "Leia, I need to talk to you. It's about Ben."

"Come in," the general replied weakly. Leia had been steadily growing weaker, but the Force only felt stronger around the woman every time Rey saw her. Although she was a fighter, it had become evident that Leia was fighting inevitability. She was pale, her breathing was irregular, and she was too weak to stand. Leia was the physical representation of strength in every definition of the word. To see her body fail her was a unique kind of torture, because it was altogether foreign in the woman that she knew. Rey had seen death—it was Jakku’s greatest specialty – but not like this. The desert claimed the weak or foolhardy.

She had never watched someone suffer – someone she had grown to love – especially not someone who was the strongest of them all. She had accepted death as a natural process of life on Jakku, but, since leaving, it was a more formidable pill to swallow. To watch her lifeforce slowly fading was a different, but equally tormenting, pain to endure as the loss of Han Solo. Though it was further tormenting that the people she had grown to love and respect – for as short of a time as she had known them – could not be reconciled with the people she had witnessed in Kylo’s memories. Rey knew that Kylo was a painful subject for Leia, as well as a risk to her association with the Resistance, but she could not bear the thought of hiding her connection to him any longer.

For the first time, she felt the touch of disappointment while standing before his mother. It was the same disappointment she had felt with Luke, not for her own sake, but for her bondmate. She imagined who Kylo could have become if his parents had not failed him. It was easy to blame them; to have someone to point a finger toward and lament their influence on his fall. It was easier than admitting that, ultimately, it was Kylo’s choice to fall, and Kylo’s choice to remain loyally committed to the dark side.

She reminded herself that she had not been there; she had only seen the most traumatic memories, through Kylo's perspective. Just as the truth of what happened the night Kylo burned down Luke's temple was dependent upon the perspective, so could the truth of the events that comprised his childhood. She didn't know the reason why Leia or Han made the choices they did, though it was difficult for her to comprehend how anything could have been more important than saving a struggling child from the nightmare Kylo had faced.

Perhaps it was her feelings of abandonment that she harbored toward her own parents, perhaps it was the emotions she had felt in Kylo's memories that she had empathized with all too well. Rey loved Han and Leia; they had been more like parents to her than her own parents. More like parents to me than to Ben, she thought, before realizing the sentiment was unfair to them. She knew they loved him; they were just too late in showing him in the way he needed. She breathed deeply to cleanse the resentful emotions triggering the darkness. Though Leia had failed her son when he needed her most, Rey hoped she would have the wisdom to help bring him home before it was too late.

Leia grasped her hands and tried her best to smile. “I have been hoping to speak with you as well, Rey, and I know you have been avoiding me. We can skip the formalities. I think we both know I do not have long;, this may be our last chance. Are you ready now to be honest with me?” Rey nodded, shuddering in anticipation.
“I know there is much you haven’t shared with me, secrets involving my son, and perhaps I do not deserve to know the answers,” Leia sighed. “But I needed to tell you something... I hope it doesn’t scare you. If you are here for the reason I think you are here... then it won’t.”

“I need to know something first,” Rey choked on a sob as tears began to pool in her eyes. “I need to know why you sent him away when you knew the darkness he struggled with. He loved you, and you abandoned him with a man he didn’t know. A man who feared him and – in Ben’s eyes – tried to murder him.”

“Come sit,” Leia directed, rummaging through the box in her hands, one of only a few personal items the woman carried with her. “May I braid your hair?”

The look in her eyes revealed a significance to the request, but Rey could only nod. No one had ever done anything with her hair before, save for the people who had abandoned her, and her eyes prickled with tears at the thought that Leia offered her that gift. Motioning with a comb for Rey to sit at her feet, the older woman’s hands trembled. Rey obliged and Leia removed the tie from her hair, sifting the strands through her fingers.

“When I was pregnant with Ben, I felt him through the Force. He felt like a bright band of light that was sometimes split with a shadow of darkness. Luke reassured me that the deeper the darkness, the brighter the light, and that truly was Ben. His light was the strongest I had ever felt in anyone.
He loved fiercely. But for as long as I can remember, he also struggled with darkness, hearing whispers from the Force. He said he heard many different voices calling to him, and I thought….

“Luke told me it was normal, he had heard whispers from many people in the Force. I knew Ben had a strong connection to the Force, too, but I never studied it in-depth as my brother did; I never considered what those whispers could mean. Ben has always been introspective and solitary; he never wanted to talk about the voices, but I noticed some disturbed him. One more than others. I could sense his fear at night when he was alone, or when he would suddenly stop playing and begin to scream at an empty room. I began to wonder if the darkness I felt surrounding him was entirely his,” Leia’s fingers hesitated in her hair for a moment, and Rey glanced up as a tear tracked down her aged face. She immediately turned away, ashamed that she had interrupted Leia’s vulnerable moment. It was the most emotional Rey had ever seen the woman. Leia parted her hair, but only pulled back the front pieces. She began weaving the locks of Rey’s hair with expert hands.

“I think I had a chance to stop it,” she whispered, and Rey wondered at first if she was meant to hear it. “Ben lashed out at him at a Senate dinner years before we sent him away. He cut his face open with cutlery from the table and ran away. He stole a speeder to escape that monster. Ben led the authorities on a chase that could have killed him, but I was so concerned with how it would make me look in the eyes of the Senate, that I didn’t stop to think why he did that. Snoke didn’t want to press charges; he wanted time alone with my son. I thought he would teach him a lesson, force him to clean his office or something equally tedious. I should have known something was wrong when Ben came back from his visit with Snoke and couldn’t remember that dinner at all. At the time, I convinced myself he was just embarrassed by his behavior. I never… it has haunted me since the day I learned Ben left to join Snoke, what that creature could have done to my son when I was too busy to listen.”

Leia paused for a moment when her voice broke. She struggled to remain strong, but Rey wished she knew she didn’t have to be. “I never told Han, but Snoke visited me at the Senate one day. It was probably too late, even then. I have no idea how long Snoke had access to him. Years? Snoke confessed to contacting Ben, having an interest in Ben’s power, and suggested that I send my son to him for ‘training’ in the Force. When I refused, he threatened to turn my son against me. All I could think about was how my father, his grandfather, had been turned. I was… scared. I knew Ben was vulnerable. He was only a child, and I was not knowledgeable enough in the Force to stop Snoke.”

“That was why I sent him to Luke. Ben never wanted to be a Jedi. He would have made a passionate Senator in the New Republic, or a great pilot like his father, as much as I disliked the idea at the time. Isn’t that the cruelty of life? I would give anything now for him to have become exactly like his father. I thought if he trained with Luke, he would be too strong for Snoke to manipulate. If Luke could save our… father, whose cold heart had already been turned, then certainly he could save my sweet boy with the biggest heart I know. I regret sending him with every breath I take, because that is when I lost him. I knew he would never make a good Jedi; I knew he would fail. As his mother, I knew it better than anyone. Everything in me told me it was a mistake, but I was too scared to listen.”

“I knew the strict rules of the Jedi Order would set him up to fail. Ben was... driven by his strong emotions, he felt everything in extremes. He had more love in his heart than he knew what to do with. He was too needy, passionate and sensitive to live without deep connections. He was too desperate for love to become a Jedi. Han and I – we were too young and focused on our own problems to figure out how to give him what he needed. Luke did his best, but he had to fulfill a role that couldn’t provide that love, either. There is a thin veil between love and hate, and when he felt like he had nowhere to put that love, well, Snoke turned that love into hate, and created Kylo Ren.”

She said it with such resignation, such remorse, that Rey found her own vision growing blurry with unshed tears. She could feel the love Leia had for her son, even after all he had done. She had never heard Leia voice life to that name before, never believed she would, but with those two words bled all the heartache that name had caused her to suffer.

“Ben always struggled with darkness, like his grandfather. We were so fearful of what the knowledge of the identity of his grandfather would do to him, what ammunition it would give Snoke, that we waited and waited until it was too late. I wish I had told him sooner. Or let Luke tell him; he has far more compassion for our father. I was scared. I loved my son, but I saw the darkness in him, and it reminded me too much of... him. The man had given life to me, but he had tortured me and ordered the death of my only family. I hated my father, not my son, but I didn’t realize – or didn’t want to realize – how that hate had left little room for anything else.

“I could only see Vader in my own son, and I found myself disgusted by my own bloodline. I couldn’t bear telling him. By the time I tried, it was too late. He never received my message; he was already gone. The whispers had turned him against us. It had been Snoke the whole time; he had been stealing my son away from me for years, maybe even from the moment he was born, molding him into what he wanted him to be. And he did it right in front of my eyes. In my fear, I played right into his hand. By the time Han found him, it was too late. Han always knew he wasn’t going to die of old age. I think he would have wanted it to mean something. He died trying to save his boy. I think even if he knew how it would end, he would have done it anyway.”

There was a silence that grew between them, as Leia’s hands stilled in her hair, and flashes of that fateful moment on the skyway replayed in Rey’s mind. With a long exhale, Leia began working diligently on her hair again. “We tried to be there for him, but we weren’t there for him the way he needed, does that makes sense? If I had been honest, shared my own darkness, maybe we could have battled it together. I knew I had reason to worry about the future of the Republic, but I never thought…

...the greatest threat to the Republic would come from within your own home?

“I never thought Han and Ben would think I cared more about the galaxy. They were my galaxy. I think the hardest part for me to accept is that Ben would do this. He cared about the galaxy; I never thought he was capable of this. If I had just been there the way he needed, maybe he’d be here with us. Maybe I would be preparing him to become our next general right now.”

Rey thought about what it would have been like if it all had ended differently. Would it have Ben and Han who brought Rey to Takodana? Would he have helped Finn come back for her? Would they still have formed a bond? Would Han be alive?

She imagined him walking down the corridors with Finn, discussing – arguing – strategies as allies. She imagined him competing with Poe for the title of "best pilot in the Resistance.” She imagined him having long, philosophical talks with Rose. She imagined him laughing as he worked on the Millennium Falcon with Han and Chewbacca. She imagined Luke, happy and at peace, training them together. She imagined sitting alone by the fire with him, without the conflict of war pulling them apart. Would there be a war at all? It ached painfully to imagine. “If he was here,” Rey said, stumbling through the words as they wavered under the weight of her sorrow, “do you still believe we would be fighting the First Order?”

“Ben had little to do with the formation of the First Order,” Leia replied softly. “Snoke would have found another apprentice. If Ben hadn’t fallen, I believe he still would have been Snoke’s target. That monster would have stopped at nothing to take him from us; by betrayal… or by death.”
Rey thought about Jacen, the other Knights, Darth Maul, and the other unknowns he had his sight set on to build his army. Snoke had chosen Ben because of his powerful bloodline, but if he hadn’t turned, destroying Luke and especially Ben would have become that monster’s obsession. What if Snoke had found her – Ben’s equal in the Force?

Rey was drawn back to the pain of the present as Leia secured the braid.

“There,” she said warmly, as if the last few moments hadn’t happened. She handed Rey a portable mirror. Rey turned her head from side to side to appreciate the intricate Alderaanian braid that wrapped around her head. Where Leia’s braid had topped her head like a crown, most of Rey’s hair was down, falling in soft waves as it had before; but the front pieces were woven on either side of her head and came together in the back. It looked so seamless, so elaborately braided, that she couldn’t tell where one side ended and the other began. Rey smiled, something about it reminding her of a warm embrace. It wasn’t until Leia wiped a tear from her cheek that Rey realized she had been crying. A sob bubbled in her throat. It was all too much – how beautiful she felt, how wanted, how appreciative she was of a woman who was dying, how much she missed this woman’s son, and how selfish that felt when his mother hadn’t seen him in years.

There was one last thing she couldn’t let go. “Leia, how old was he when he fell?”

“I don’t know.” The sorrow deepened in the older woman’s eyes. “With their travels, it wasn’t unusual for us to go without long periods of contact… twenty-three, possibly twenty-four.”

_That’s it. You couldn’t have killed them, Ben._

“Rey, that’s not your burden to bear. You didn’t fail, because it’s always only been up to him. No one can make the choice to turn for him. You gave him a chance to turn when no one else would. You killed the monster who took him from us.” The woman smiled at her genuinely, despite her silent acknowledgment that she had known all along the secrets that Rey had hidden from her. As it turned out, Rey had only _thought_ she had successfully hidden it from her. “You did what I was not strong enough to do. Even if Ben never comes home, I can have peace in knowing that the creature who tormented my son is gone.”

“I didn't kill Snoke, Leia.”
Leia studied her for a moment, and Rey was reminded of another pair of warm, brown eyes. They were the same fierce, stubborn, intelligent, jaded eyes as the ones she had memorized over the past few weeks. She could only imagine the intense staring matches that took place between those two. “Rey, the bounty…”

“Ben did it,” Rey smiled wanly. She began slowly unrolling the wraps around her arms. “Snoke ordered him to kill me, and Ben killed Snoke instead. He saved my life. We fought the Praetorian guard together, we were on the same side. I could feel him and what he was going to do and what he needed. It was like a dance I had practiced my entire life. There were eight guards, but I survived with this.” She turned to show Leia the scar that cut across her arm like a brand; a reminder of the bond at its best, and only moments later, its worst. Her smile faded. “I thought I had saved him, but he chose power. He asked me to join him to rule the galaxy instead of saving the Resistance. So I left. But he's still in there; I know it. There is still hope, and I won't give up on him.”

“I sensed that more happened between you after some things you asked after Crait, but I don’t understand; my son asked you to rule with him? After what happened between you on Starkiller? Why?”

“When we touched hands on Ahch-To, he saw a vision that made him believe I would stand by his side,” Rey said quietly, struggling to suppress the disappointment that threatened to leak down her cheeks. “But I saw a vision of his future, a vision where he turned.”

Intrigue settled over Leia's exhausted features. “You touched hands… on Ahch-To?”

“Yes, I didn’t tell you, because it’s complicated, and I was scared of what it would mean for me here. But I see Ben all the time. That night when I asked if you knew if he was alive, he had been here. Poe almost saw him, and I kissed Poe to distract him. He saw Poe kiss me and nearly got himself killed in his anger. And when the recon ship landed? Ben warned me that killing them would be a trap, more would come if they went missing. And Ben is the one who gave me a vial to destroy his new clone army if he is killed. He saved me from a creature in the rainforest, and he gave me this cloak today to protect me from the acid rain….”

“He's here?” Leia cut in with renewed hope. “I know I thought I felt him, but it's impossible, he…”

“Ben and I have a Force Bond, Leia,” Rey admitted hesitantly, refusing to look his mother in the eyes. “I can see him, talk to him, touch him, feel his emotions, even feel his pain across the galaxy. I have seen his memories. I saw him as a child, and the pain and regret he felt when Han died. I saw the moment he couldn't kill you on the Raddus and felt his love for you. I know who he is. He is not Kylo Ren.”

Leia gently tilted the young woman’s face to search her eyes. “Rey, I know he’s my son, and you have reason to save him, but you have to understand that this bond could have very real consequences as long as he is Supreme Leader of the First Order. I need you to be honest with me – is he a threat to the Resistance?”

“That’s not an easy answer,” she replied with tears in her eyes. Leia read the truth in them as effortlessly as her son could.

“If he is,” she said, decoding the fear she had witnessed, “I hope you understand the unfortunate position you have been fated, Rey. You are the one the Force has chosen to stand between these good people and Ben’s terrible choices. I need to know you’ll do what’s right, even if it’s the hardest thing you’ll ever have to do.”

Rey nodded, scrubbing at her eyes. If Kylo threatened the lives of her friends, she knew what she had to do. The Force had bonded her to him; she had the best chance to help save him, but if he made the choice he had thus far refused to make, she was also the best chance to help stop him. “If he makes that choice, then I’ll protect the Resistance. But I know him, Leia; I have hope.”

“Rey, how long has this been going on?”

Rey considered her question for a moment. She still had a lifetime of knowledge to learn about the Force and the bond that connected her with their enemy. Though she supposed she would never know the exact moment their bond had formed, as there had been many stages that had led to the complexity their connection had become, she could at least admit it was an easier question to answer than why it had formed. “I don’t know. I had a vision of him when I touched Luke’s lightsaber, and that was before we ever met. When Ben kidnapped me, he searched my mind, so I pushed back and we felt this... connection. I was able to draw from his power and skills after that on Starkiller. Then on Ahch-To, we were able to see each other even though we were star systems away. We could talk to each other, and I realized that he was just as alone as I was. He understood me better than anyone ever has. Snoke said he created the bond, but I think it was there before. There are moments when I wonder if he knew about me before all this.”

“I think you’re right.”

It was Rey's turn to be confused. “About what?”
“I told you about the whispers that plagued Ben's childhood. But in the darkness, there was this light. For as long as I can remember he would have dreams of a little girl. He told me that he didn’t know her name, but he was convinced the dreams were from the Force. She was sad and lonely, but she would still give him hope. He said his favorite thing about her was her eyes. He told me they looked like the sun. He held on to that dream through his darkest moments. I am sure by now you have heard the quote that so many attribute to me: 'Hope is like the sun. If you only believe it when you see it, you'll never make it through the night.' I learned that from Ben. He would wake up from horrible nightmares, and he would repeat that to himself over and over. His hope was that dream, that girl, in a nightmare of darkness that he struggled against. I thought it was an overactive imagination of a lonely boy.” Leia paused, wiping the tears with shaking hands.

“I don’t know why, Rey, and maybe it is a hope of a dying mother who just wants her son to come home. But I can’t help but notice the way the golden flecks in your eyes shine like rays of the sun. And I thought maybe, just maybe, you were more than the hope for the Resistance. Maybe you were Ben’s hope all along.”

Tears burned Rey’s cheeks. She remembered his eyes studying her in awe in the interrogation room. Something. There is something... Who are you? he had asked her.

Then she recalled his face on Starkiller when she had summoned Luke’s lightsaber. It is you, he had said, with that look like he knew more about her than she knew herself. What if he had known her all along? There was something about it that rang true, but there was something stronger inside her screaming that it was all wrong. She didn’t remember a single one of those dreams, she couldn’t have been that girl. She had been a nothing, scavenger girl on Jakku. She hadn’t been his enemy then. Why would the Force connect her to him?

The one part she couldn’t deny was the Force had eventually chosen to connect them. Their Force Bond. Their visions. Their string of fate had been woven together for reasons Rey couldn’t understand. Was it such a stretch that their connection through the Force had existed their entire lives?

Her thoughts were interrupted by a small, ornate box that Leia placed in her hands. Rey searched the woman's eyes for the meaning, but Leia only nodded toward the box. She opened the box, and the room was filled with the soft notes of a lullaby—a lullaby Rey knew well. Leia began to sing:

“Mirrorbright, shines the moon,

its glow as soft as an ember

When the moon is mirrorbright,

take this time to remember
Those you have loved but are gone
Those who kept you so safe and warm
The mirrorbright moon lets you see
Those who have ceased to be
Mirrorbright shines the moon,
as fires die to their embers
Those you love are with you still-
The moon will help you remember.”

“It is an Alderaanian lullaby I learned from my mother named ‘Mirrorbright.’ I sang it to my son… and he sang it to the sad little girl in his dreams.” Leia observed Rey carefully before speaking again. “You know that song.”

Could she have been the little girl in his visions? Was the idea of it that absurd? After witnessing his memories, she knew he was the little boy in hers.

“Why didn't he tell me?” Rey choked on a sob, “What have I done?” Leia waited for her to elaborate, with an understanding but expectant expression on her weary face.

Rey sighed, hastily wiping the tears from her swollen cheeks. “Leia. Snoke found me. I know he's dead; I can't explain it. I thought his whispers were the Force, but I know it was him now. He has been attempting to turn me against Ben; he almost convinced me to kill him. I didn't do it, but I betrayed him, and he shut me out. I won't give up on him, but he gave up on me.”

Leia's eyes were more forgiving than Rey felt she deserved. “Does he know about Snoke?”

“No, I couldn't do that to him.”

“Ben has never been very efficient at communicating his feelings, but from what I know about you, my dear, neither have you,” Leia chuckled dryly. “Give it time. Force bonds are not easy to create, and they are even more challenging to break. I believe fate will bring you together again. Demand the truth from him. The whole truth. Because for every thought Ben says aloud, there are a hundred others bouncing around that brilliant mind of his. And in exchange, tell him everything you have told me. I think the truth is something you both deserve to hear. I have hope that you can do what I never could – bring him home. And if he does come home, please tell him I love him and I'm sorry.”

Without a thought to the consequences, Rey made her decision. “No, you should be able to tell him yourself.”

“Rey, don't,” Leia warned.

Ben! she screamed into the bond, shoving against the obstinate, durasteel wall that was his energy in her mind.

Ben!

His side of the bond had returned to the blocked state it had been earlier in the day when she screamed at him relentlessly in the forest. Leia watched her intently, a combination of fear, sorrow, and anticipation bringing life back to her weary eyes.

Ben Organa-Solo you will let me in this instant! You will talk to your mother!

If he wanted to be stubborn, she would show him how stubborn she could be. She closed her eyes and focused on his energy. She forced everything she had at the wall of their bond, refusing to relent until he let her through. He pushed back against her, and she knew he was actively fighting her, but that meant that she was forcing her way in. She was so focused on breaking down his walls that she didn’t understand what the energy expenditure was doing to her physically.

Rey didn’t notice when she began to sway. It was not until she felt the ground rising up to meet her that she realized her oversight. She expected to feel her head crack against the stone surface of the temple room floor, but she found herself hovering only centimeters above it. She glanced up to see her bondmate with fear furrowing his brow, his hand outstretched as he held her with the Force. The smile that warmed her face was entirely involuntary.

“What were you thinking,” he growled. “You could have killed yourself.” His eyes studied her face, then followed the braid in her hair. His expression softened slightly as his eyes came to rest on her bare arms and the cloak she was still wearing.

“You changed your hair – an Alderaanian braid,” he said, and his implication was clear enough. My mother, his face said plainly. It was more bitter than wistful, and Rey wondered if she had made the right decision. “Did she tell you what it means?”

Rey reminded herself that he was there for a reason, she owed it to Leia. “If you want to shut me out. I won't fight it anymore, Ben, I promise. Under one condition,” she begged.

He worked his jaw in agitation, “Yes?”

“You listen to what your mother has to say.” His eyes flickered with confusion, then sorrow, then anger. It wasn't until he took stock of his surroundings, that the fear ignited in them. His lips parted, and his pupils grew as his head whipped in search of the other presence in the room. The eyes of mother and son locked into a silent connection. The only sound in the room was the heavy breaths of the three force-sensitives and the staccato of her heartbeat in Rey's ears. She prepared herself for his, likely, extreme reaction. Either she would bring him home to his mother, or Kylo would destroy the room in his anger and set course to Barkhesh.

“You're here...” Leia's voice broke the shock. Kylo flinched at the familiar sound, squaring his shoulders and clearing his throat. They both stared at each other in a fragile silence, absorbing the details that unkind years had rendered upon them both. Rey could only watch in anticipation as the seconds ticked by, wondering if the unspoken words overflowing in the void were friend or foe to the threadbare relationship between mother and son.

“Thank you,” he said hoarsely, his breath uneven, his eyes focused on the corner of the room. “For saving her life.” Rey was stunned into silence that he had spoken to his mother, kindly. Should she dare have hope?

“Ben... oh, my Ben,” Leia whispered. Her eyes were filled with love and relief. He was across the room from her, across the galaxy, but she lifted her hand and reached for him, yearning to touch her son.

He scowled as he stepped forward, his voice low to control the trembling. “No, don't... after everything I’ve done. Don't say that name as if I have any significance to you anymore. Not that I ever did...”

Leia's hand remained outstretched, her energy in the Force fading, but Rey had never felt someone so strong in the face of a lifetime of suffering. She was the strongest person Rey had ever known. “Ben, you have always been everything to me, even if I didn’t show it. I forgive you.”
“You do?” His voice became hardened and defensive, but his feet betrayed him as he stepped closer. “Like you forgave the monster that was your father?”

Leia took his defensiveness in stride. “It took me thirty years, but I forgive him, too. I was forced to face the truth when you turned to darkness. I see him differently now. Because of you. He found the light at the end; it is not too late for you. Death was your grandfather’s redemption, but it does not have to be yours.”

“But I killed him,” his voice cracked. All three people in that room – connected by destiny, kinship and the Force – knew whose name he refused to say. Kylo’s eyes were pleading with his mother to hate him as he had long believed she did.

“Your father forgives you too, Ben,” Leia’s voice wavered, but her assured and sincere expression did not. She tilted her head up as he towered over her. When she reached for his hand, he didn’t back away. Both Leia and Rey gasped as her fingers clasped onto his solid hand. He didn’t return the gesture, but he allowed her hand to remain dwarfed in his.

His explosive emotions collided together in the bond in an intensity Rey had not witnessed in him before. His energy in the Force was erratic, his ordinarily sharp edges were in a distorted, jumbled chaos. There was a tension, a taut, wrenching sensation, drawing energy toward Ben. She felt weakness in her own knees and realized he was using the Force as a crutch. He needed the strength to remain standing. She had to stop herself from crossing the room and embracing him. If she knew that if it would not further agitate him, she would have.

Kylo was nothing but capricious facing his mother. Rey expected him to react with the volatile emotions churning just below the surface. But when he spoke, his voice was enervated and weary. They were words of a broken man. “I don't deserve forgiveness.”

“Forgiven is not about what you deserve, Ben, and it is not your choice,” Leia murmured, a weary smile gracing her worn features. “I love you; your father and I have always loved you. All I can do is ask for your forgiveness. I had no idea what Luke did to you. I wish I had known, because I would have protected you – from Snoke, and my own brother. I’ll still protect you, Ben, if you come home.”

He refused to look at either of them as he focused on her hand in his. His body was rigid and tense, like a band stretched too far, ready to snap. His lip quivered as he shook his head. He was falling apart, and they all knew it. He couldn’t hide behind his anger anymore. Leia didn’t relent. “It was you, wasn’t it? Who wrote the note that saved my life on Hosnian Prime?”
Rey was surprised when he answered with a nod. Kylo looked as if he would collapse to his knees any second. He was so close. If she could just convince him to look at his mother – to see the love, hope, and forgiveness in her eyes – then she knew the strong façade would break. He would break. And she would help him put himself back together again. They both would.

I’ll help you.

Leia’s next words were shattering, but not in the way Rey hoped. “Do you remember what today is?”

“Don’t,” Kylo shook his head, his eyes were glistening with unshed tears. “I can't... I can't do this.” Before either woman could say another word, he disappeared with a snap of the Force, jolting the other two women in the room with its finality. Leia’s outstretched hand fell to her side, empty. It was clear he needed time, but that was something they couldn’t afford.

Ben, don’t do this! Rey shouted into the bond. You can still fix this before it's too late. I know you couldn't kill her, I know you don't hate her, I know you still love her. Please, let her say what needs to be said! Her desperation collided with the hurricane of emotions that were coursing through the bond. She expected to be overwhelmed by his rage, but the strongest emotion was... longing.

No. You don’t understand. You don’t know. Here's what I know; I know people don't always get storybook endings, I know sometimes people are just too broken, I know sometimes ties are too far gone to be saved. I don’t hate her, Rey, but even if I could forgive her, I can't forgive myself for what I've done to her. I can’t look at her without reliving all of it. That's reality. Please, just let it go. Do you have any idea what you have done to me? Killing me would have been kinder. As he slammed his walls up again, Rey felt as if those words were meant for her as much as his mother. As more tears fell from her red-rimmed eyes, she turned in disappointment to Leia.

“I’m so sorry,” Rey sobbed. “I thought I could bring him back to you.”

“You did, Rey. You did. Thirty years ago today, I gave birth to him, and now I got to see him one last time. You gave that to me,” the older woman smiled, though it didn't quite reach her eyes. “My sweet boy. I saw it in his eyes, my Ben is still in there. But what did Snoke do to him? I barely recognized my own son.” Leia knew of the scars Rey had left upon him, of course, but she did not have the heart to tell her of the torture he suffered at Snoke's hand. It was a burden she believed his mother did not need to bear, nor was it her story to tell. The woman was trembling, and Rey removed the cloak from around her own shoulders.
“This is Ben's,” she sniffled, wrapping the cloak around the grieving mother. Leia stroked the soft material lovingly, closing her eyes as she breathed in the scents on the cloak. Some were new and foreign, of course, to a mother who had not seen her son for most of his adult life, but there was a familiarity there, Rey could tell by the contented smile that fleetingly crossed Leia's face.

She turned to Rey as realization settled over her face. “Perhaps it was real?”

“What was?” Rey asked, confusion evident on her face.

“When we first arrived on Barkhesh, you held my hand as I fell asleep. I had a dream of my Ben, it felt real, I could even see the scar running down the right side of his face. What he told me was painful, but true. And he talked about you, Rey. He begged me to keep you safe. I have never heard my son speak of anyone as he spoke of you. The look in his eyes... It was a look I remember well, from his father. He’ll be angry, Rey, but I saw the truth; he does care.” Leia dried her cheeks with shaking fingers. “Thank you. It felt like I had my Ben here with me again.”

Rey’s mind returned to the beautiful thoughts of what could have been. If the confrontation between mother and son proved anything, it was that her fantasy of Ben at the Resistance would never come to pass. It wasn’t fair. Leia should have had her husband and her brother and her son sitting there with her. Not a nobody. Rey wondered if Ben had become the Jedi he was meant to be, what would have happened to her? In his obsession with destroying the Skywalkers, would Snoke have found Rey through her connection with Ben? What if he had chosen her because of her nothingness, because he knew there was no family to turn her? What if he turned the slave of the New Republic against them as Palpatine had done to his grandfather? She no longer held the delusion that she was untouchable against the darkness. Snoke had already been in her head and nearly convinced her to kill Kylo. What else could he have convinced her to do? Would she have become the Resistance’s greatest threat?

Maybe it would have been better that way; if I had fallen. Then Ben could have had his family.

Leia seemed to sense the direction of her dark thoughts. “Rey, if Ben was here… I fear Snoke would have already found a way to kill him. Or he would have found us all through him. If Ben never killed Snoke on the Supremacy, the Supreme Leader would have found us on Crait. If Luke didn’t confront Ben to distract them, and you weren’t in the Falcon, then we wouldn’t have made it off Crait. We must have hope, Rey, in the design of the Cosmic Force, and your connection. I don’t believe the Force brought you together by accident. His connection with you is dangerous, but am I wrong in my understanding that he tried to protect you from those stormtroopers that landed at the base?”

Rey shook her head.
“Then your connection is also the best chance we’ve had since they destroyed the New Republic.” Rey took a steadying breath; it felt as if the weight of the galaxy was on her shoulders. Did the fate of... everyone lie with whether or not she could turn Ben? “Luke told me, ‘No one is ever really gone,’” Leia continued. “I love my son, and I still believe he has light left in him. But if losing Ben to darkness was the key to saving this galaxy, then I would choose that over watching my Jedi son die with the Resistance at the hands of another empire. So would Han. Maybe that was why the Force chose us to be his parents.”

“There is nothing I want more in the entire galaxy than to save him,” Rey said softly, her heart aching for both mother and son. “I want you to know that you're right, your Ben is still in there. I've seen his light. I've felt his heart. I promise I will never give up on him. But how, Leia, how do I help him save himself?”

Leia patted Rey's hand gently and smiled knowingly up at her with tears in her eyes. Rey waited. She waited for wisdom... for guidance... for hope... for anything, but nothing ever came. The Force seemed to grow even stronger around the woman for a moment, and Rey finally realized what it was she had been sensing in Leia since they left Crait. Leia was gathering its strength to delay the inevitable, she was using the Force to fight death. She had likely been using it since the Raddus for the strength to carry on in the fight for as long as she could. Even a woman as strong as Leia, however, couldn’t hold on forever. She hadn’t left them in their time of need when survival looked bleak. She fought with everything in her just to stay alive until she knew they had a chance. It was a feat that should have been impossible; but if anyone could do it, Leia could. The loss of her brother couldn’t have made it easy, or perhaps Luke had been by her side to support her through her final fight. Either way, as the heavy concentration of Force around her dissipated, Rey realized that she was letting go.

Leia closed her eyes and sighed. Rey didn’t have to reach out into the Force to know that her heartbeat was fading. A powerful, warming light soothed her soul. She felt like a million flowers were blowing in the breeze through her heart. Beautiful vibrations like music surrounded her and dissipated into the light. She was overwhelmed with happiness, love, and peace. There was a heaviness in the energy of the Force around her, and, for an instant, she felt two strong presences in the room.

The energy enveloped her, warmed her, then peacefully drifted away. Kylo's cloak that had been wrapped around his mother's shoulders dropped gently onto the empty cot. Rey sobbed quietly as the only mother figure she had ever truly known disappeared into the Force. Leia Organa Solo... princess of Alderaan... senator of the New Republic... general of the Resistance... daughter of Anakin and Padme Skywalker, and Bail and Breha Organa...wife of Han Solo... mother of Ben Solo... hope of the galaxy...was gone.

“May the Force be with you... Always,” Rey whispered through tears. From somewhere across the galaxy she felt the emotional implosion as a son collapsed.
Chapter End Notes

Major Character Death

It is not graphic, character disappears into the Force. This is not a surprise death.
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
The Force snapped, and Kylo was returned to his training room. His back collapsed against the wall as he tried to steady his heaving gasps. He never expected he would see her again. Why would Rey do that to him? Didn’t she consider how that would destroy him? How could she not warn him that his strong, iron-willed mother looked so... broken? What had he done to her? His mind supplied the answer, of course; he had taken her husband and brother from her, what should he have expected? Not love. Why did that make it even harder?

*She abandoned me, she lied to me, I was just a burden, a monster - how could she still look at me like that after everything? She was relieved to see me. Why?

He screamed out into the room, igniting the lightsaber with trembling hands. "Go home, Blue!" he commanded his droid. He knew what he needed, and he refused to allow the astromech to witness it. The droid sensed the ferocity of his tone and complied immediately. When the room was empty, he turned to the training droids.

Kylo enabled all three with a wave of his hand.

The training had faded, however. Kylo launched a deadly assault against the droids. They were designed for both offensive and defensive maneuvers, but he knew their weaknesses. It would not be a fair fight. Skewering the weapon straight through the first droid, he launched it across the room. It shattered into pieces as it struck a wall. The second was easily decapitated with the momentum as he pivoted. It dropped to the floor in a shower of sparks. The third forced him to parry a few attacks, but he swung his lightsaber above his head and with a perfectly timed deactivation he brought it through the droid’s defenses. His blade severed the droid in half, and it crashed to the floor with a dull thud, smoking from its inner chambers.

He roared in dominance, his back arched, his face raised to the heavens. The primal war cry reverberated off the walls of the training hall. His chest heaved as he took stock of the destruction around him. He sighed in contentment. It felt like nothing could diminish that feeling of triumph and conquest. The universe took it as a challenge, however, as the universe always seemed to do with him.

He realized his victorious moment would be short-lived as the energy around him changed. He felt an overwhelming tranquility settle over him. The Force felt... heavy. It was the same heavy sensation he had perceived moments after Luke had disappeared on Crait. He felt an abrupt breeze gently tousle his hair. He felt her presence. Not Rey. His mother. The energy warmed him as his blood ran cold. He choked on his breath.
He knew.

No.

Sensing her energy around him, he froze. Even after all those years, he would recognize it anywhere. He felt love, regret, and forgiveness gently envelop him. For a moment, he felt the peace he had long sought. Then, like a flame extinguished by the wind, she was gone. He closed his eyes to the galaxy, but he couldn’t shut this out. His hands trembled, his breath came in short pants, and his sight blurred. He was desperate to be wrong.

The truth, however, hit him like a blaster bolt to the stomach. There was no denying the devastating loss of her energy in the Force. She was gone. Leia Organa Solo was gone.

His mother was dead.

I killed her.

Thousands of memories, many he had attempted to repress, exploded in his mind, each one splintering into the depths of his soul. He first remembered her fearful eyes when she had seen the destruction he had ravaged in his room after an especially terrifying bout of nightmares. It was then that he realized the only person who ever believed in him was scared of him and all he could think of was not you, too.

He remembered the sting of her hand on his cheek as she slapped him, jolting him back to his senses after he had snapped and thrown his father against the wall with the Force. It was an act of betrayal in his eyes, choosing the man who was screaming belligerently at her over her own son who had come to her defense.

He remembered the polite, but curt words she used in the presence of the other Senate members, explaining again why she was too busy to hear about his problems. It had happened in a moment of weakness, when he had almost broken down and told her about what that creature had whispered in his head. He never made that mistake again.

He remembered the sound of a slight snuffle as she lay on her bed, the only sign she was crying, as he sat next to her and comforted her. “Just go!” he screamed at his father, the object of her sorrow, who was standing remorsefully in the doorway.
He remembered the lonely nights when he could almost hear her voice, as he stared up at the stars in search of her ship, waiting for her to come back to him. To come back home from the long Senate meetings, to come back from her travels, to come back to the Jedi temple, to come back for him after he'd fallen, to care enough about her son to bring him home.

Those were the easy memories to remember, but, as his grief crashed through his resolve, he remembered more.

He remembered her soft fingers as she guided his hands to create swift strokes of ink across the parchment, an encouraging smile playing on her lips as he groaned in irritation. “Better you than me, kid,” his father chuckled from across the room.

He remembered her lulling voice, both staring up at the stars through his window, as she sang him lullabies and recalled the fantastic adventures of his father while he was away. Sometimes his father would join the storytelling on a holocall. His favorite was their love story, though neither could agree quite how it happened. “...And I called him a 'scruffy-looking, nerf herder,”’ she said. “That's when I knew she loved me back,” his father replied, mirth beaming in his eyes.

He remembered the praise in her eyes as she counted the complicated steps of the Alderaanian royal dance, her patience calming when he clumsily tripped on his gangly limbs again. If his father walked in, he would suddenly have something he desperately needed help with on the Falcon. His mother would roll her eyes, fix the older man with a reproachful stare, but allow his father to rescue him. It took him years to figure out that his father never actually needed his help.

He remembered her joyful laughter as his father and Uncle Chewie taught him to fly out of the atmosphere for the first time. Chewie sat next to him, calmly barking directions. He laughed hysterically as his father shouted warnings behind him, knuckles white as he gripped the back of his chair. His mother smiled and said, “Now you know how I feel flying with you and the walking carpet over here.”

He remembered her warm embrace as he cried in shame, having destroyed an irreplaceable heirloom at the Museum of the Republic with his untamed power in the Force. They were banned, and he thought it was because of him. He later found out it was because his father punched the curator in the nose, though no one ever told him why.

And he remembered the tears, the first time he had ever truly seen her cry - when she promised she would come back, when she told him it wasn't goodbye forever... but it was forever. He would never see her again, save for once in a courtyard on Hosnian Prime, and what Rey just forced upon him through the bond.
It didn't seem real. He had just seen her. She had talked to him, she was alive. Then he had run from his past – again – and his mother was gone because of it. The past was dead. He finally got exactly what he had wanted all this time. It was over. And that meant nothing to him in the face of what he lost.

There was no freedom from the conflict as his former master had promised. He had lost the people who had abandoned and betrayed him. He had been tormented for years over what they had done to him. Yet nothing compared to the torment he felt when he lost them.

When will I be free? Why do I still… why do I still love them?

His knees buckled under the weight of what he lost. He collapsed to the floor in a heap amidst the debris of the droids spread haphazardly around him. Tears blinded him as he reached out for the comfort of anything near him. He found the robotic hand of a fallen droid and grasped it desperately, squeezing until the physical pain took over. He hummed softly to himself, and the long-repressed tune of an old Alderaanian lullaby was the only sound in the training room.
Chapter End Notes

Mild violence

Kylo is slapped in a memory after he Force-shoves his father

Kylo destroys training droids
Red Dawn

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
What was left of the Resistance gathered solemnly in the immense underground hall of the temple. After holding a small, quiet, but deeply moving funeral for Leia – all they could give her without risking their own safety – Poe Dameron stood before them to address the hopeless rebels.

"When I think of General Leia, I think of hope. She was the embodiment of hope, and it’s easy to believe that when she took her last breath, hope died with her. But the essence of Leia did not die with her body. Leia is the Resistance. We are her legacy. As long as the Resistance keeps fighting, then Leia's legacy is alive.

“I stand before you and ask you to have faith in me as you did Leia; everything in me is for this cause, for Leia. I will finish what she started. We will end this war now! We will not bow down! We will not give in! We will not stop until we pry back our galaxy from their dead, cold grip. We will continue to inspire as Leia inspired, giving courage to the beaten and downtrodden to take arms against the enslavement of our galaxy. We are the spark that will burn down the First Order.

“Over the past few hours, Leia's passing has ignited a spark across the galaxy against the evil of this war machine. The civilizations sitting idly by, waiting to be saved, have realized that their freedom is now in their own hands. We are finally receiving support from systems around the galaxy. We will be combining our forces for the ultimate stand against tyranny. We will not run away any longer! Let's give 'em a war!” he shouted.

The small group erupted in cheers, the cacophony echoing off the temple walls, intensifying the sound. Rey imagined it reverberated like a crowd of thousands. She studied Poe in admiration. He had made his mistakes, but he was the leader the Resistance desperately needed in that uncertain time.

As the cheers subsided, he continued. "Our moment is now, and I have a plan. We will save tonight to mourn Leia. It’s what she deserves. But an hour ago an ally arrived to assist us in preparations to relocate, and time is of the essence,” he winked at Maz standing off in the shadows. “We have found a suitable base outside of the First Order's clutches on the Outer Rim world of Dantooine. The Resistance will be jumping to hyperspace for the Riaoballo sector in twelve hours. From Dantooine, we will begin to coordinate with our allies around the galaxy. The First Order is strong, impenetrable even, but we all know the one major flaw of any tyrannical military faction – too much power lies with only one person. As Leia said, 'cut the head off the dragon, and chaos ensues.'"

“The head of their war dragon is Kylo Ren. While our allies coordinate their forces, we will organize an ambush of Ren.”

Rey’s pulse quickened as nausea twisted through her stomach; she knew this was coming eventually, but the reality of it was more devastating than she could have imagined. Hours earlier Rey had brought mother and son together one last time with hope that he would come home. They had been so close. Leia's bed was still warm, and Poe was already taking action to assassinate her son.

“We will draw him into a trap with the enticement of a rematch with our Jedi Warrior Rey. Ren's pride will lead to his ultimate downfall. We will ambush him, and the mighty Kylo Ren will fall.”
Once we take out Ren, we will inspire further allied interest. Before they can recover, we will quickly launch an offensive strike on their fleet around the galaxy. We will burn down the entire First Order in one allied battle. This is our moment. We will never give in! We will never surrender! Let’s bring them a war! Do it for Leia!"

Cheers erupted again, but Rey was silent. Poe stared through the crowd of people directly into her eyes. She knew why. He had just entrusted the fate of the Resistance to her. She could save them all, but she would have to lead Kylo to his death to do it.

The room was closing in, too many voices at once overwhelming her senses; her breath was stolen by the indistinguishable figures crowding around her. She desperately searched for an exit, but lightheadedness overcame her, and her surroundings began to tilt and spiral nauseatingly. A familiar face, etched with concern, appeared before her as darkness invaded her vision.
Chapter End Notes

Threat of violence

Poe talks about assassinating Kylo in a speech
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
It was finally over. He should have gathered the Force and stood to fight until she put him out of his misery, but he had believed she would have the decency to kill him. When the ground had opened up to swallow him whole, he could have given chase or tried to save himself, but he had been bested by someone better than him; it seemed a suitable death. Watching the same stars he had studied as a kid was almost peaceful, so he laid back in the snow and surrendered to his fate.
He was alone. He was always alone. Though the weak part of him wished she would stay... to end it, to just be there, staring at him with those fierce eyes. But she was gone. At least it was quiet. The snow seeped into his wounds, shivering through him. The pain anchored him to consciousness, but the cold numbed him. The pain faded and a warmth enveloped him as his mind slowed. It was a good enough death. He closed his eyes and waited for his fate, either by blood loss, hypothermia, or planetary collapse, whatever happened first. But his eyes opened to a harsh nudge to his rib cage. As his vision cleared, he figured he was in Hell. And, in a way, he was.

Kylo blinked languidly in a daze as he stared up at his general. He studied the upside-down figure. It was a disappointing sight to see Hux standing over him as he bled out in the snow. “Look at you, Supreme Leader. Living up to your full potential, I see.” Supreme Leader? An antagonistic beep from a droid next to him fractured through his spiraling thoughts as he lay adrift in a sea of devastation. This wasn’t Starkiller. He wasn’t lying in snow, wounded in every way he could be. Hux hadn’t arrived on Snoke’s orders, following his tracking beacon to where he lay defeated. Snoke was dead. Snoke wasn’t even Snoke. Kylo was lying on a training room floor, on the Finalizer. His mother was dead. Perhaps Hux should have left him there on Starkiller, or taken him out of his misery. Perhaps Hux should consider it now. Kylo had awoken to a warning in the Force as he lay unconscious after the destruction of the Supremacy. He knew Hux wanted to kill him. That was why he had brought Hux along with him to Crait in the first place, to keep an eye on the traitor, lest he find a bolt through his back before he had the chance at revenge. But perhaps he should allow Hux the opportunity, because Kylo truly felt... nothing. Whatever he had suffered through before, it was inconsequential compared to the hollow ache that consumed him. He was startled when his general spoke again. “Where are your shackles?”

“If you wish to detain me, you will need Force-suppressing restraints,” his voice said, but he didn't remember forming the thought. He didn't think he was capable of articulating coherent words. He had shattered into pieces, like a smashed mirror, and the man he had been was gone forever – broken beyond repair. Hux could drag him to detainment for all he cared; he wouldn't fight it.

“What...happened last night?” The general pressed. There was concern in the red-headed man's tone. He easily contended with Kylo’s volatility, but this... it terrified him. If Hux had better judgment, he would kill him where he lay. Kylo posed no threat, had no strength to defend himself. And he didn't care; he wouldn't try to stop him.

“I lost everything,” he answered. Hux rolled his eyes, clearly accustomed to his propensity for melodramatic gestures. But it was true. Rey was gone; she tried to kill him, then used their bond to set him up. He caused his own mother's death. Nothing mattered. Hux made no move to usurp him, however. Perhaps his death would not be sporting enough for him like that. Why else would he keep him around after his outburst in the reception hall?
“Did Snoke know you could create fire with your mind wizardry?” It was almost as if Hux was attempting to antagonize him, light the fuse that would make them at odds again, drag them back into familiar territory. But the anger that fed Kylo's darkness was gone.

“New development.”

“I know this means little to you, but you put the lives of everyone on this destroyer at risk,” the general continued spitefully. “You nearly forced me to kill you.”

“You should have.” Kylo would have if the roles had been reversed. Hux would have likely been obligated to as well if Rey hadn't severed his connection to consciousness through the bond.

Why didn't she let him kill me? It would have saved her the trouble of doing it herself.

“I would have, had it not been a risk for mutiny. The Order wouldn't look upon my leadership too respectfully if I was the one to have you killed. But I'll keep that in mind for next time,” Hux sighed derisively as if he were speaking to a petulant child. “Get up.”

“Just leave me.” Kylo closed his eyes, attempting to shut the universe out. But all he could see was his mother's face as she looked upon him for the first time in years. She didn't hate him, she still loved him, she held him as if she truly wanted her son back. It was more devastating than if she had stared at him like he was the monster she always feared he would become.

“What happened to Snoke's high-esteemed Jedi Killer, heir apparent to Darth Vader himself?”

Against all better judgment, he answered his general honestly. No equivocating, no counter-questioning, no snide comments – just the truth. “My mother…” Kylo choked out, prying his eyes open so he wouldn't have to see her face in the darkness behind his eyelids. His thoughts returned to the night on Starkiller, the last time he been the reason for a parent's death, the last time Rey had nearly succeeded in killing him. He was as weak and vulnerable as he had been then, blinking in disorientation as the general stared down at him with that expression on his face – the one that looked like he smelled something repulsive.

Come to think of it, he realized. I'm positive he always looks like that.

Hux's expression reminded him of that night he lay bleeding out in the snow, so did his – surprisingly—nearly merciful behavior. For the second time that the general had found him on his back, he pulled the fallen Knight to a stand. Though this time, instead of letting his Stormtroopers carry the larger man's weight, Hux supported him with one gloved hand wrapped tightly around his upper arm, and the other controlling him by the wrist. He could not stand unassisted—they both knew it—but Hux established the least amount of contact between them as necessary.

Kylo was grateful for that—he would never have put his arm around the general's shoulder, leaning his weight on him, and Hux would most assuredly never allowed that, either. Kylo did appreciate the purposefully aggressive grip on his arm, as insubordinate as it might be, if only for the pain that helped maintain his grasp on lucidity.

“Straighten yourself up,” Hux sneered quietly. “You are the Supreme Leader. Your weakness reflects weakness upon the Order.”

Hux marched next to Kylo with his eyes forward and head held high, gripping him as inconspicuously as possible as they made their way down the corridor. The general wisely chose the least traveled corridors back to Kylo's chambers, but whenever another soul crossed their path, he was quick to bark “kneel to the Supreme Leader,” or if they noticed his grip on his arm, “prepare the infirmary.” They still hated each other, there was no doubt about that, but Kylo respected Hux's dedication to the appearances of the First Order—even if that meant assisting the man he desired to usurp. He had no further need to make Kylo look weak; the Supreme Leader did enough of that on his own.

Hux marched Kylo into his quarters, past the destruction of the receiving hall and antechambers, and into his private chambers. The general glared in disgust at the deformed helmet of Darth Vader, reposed reverently atop an altar of ashes in his meditation chamber, but otherwise kept his comments to himself. There was a level of terror that trickled down his spine as he noticed the small, black datacard sitting on his desk. If Hux saw it... Kylo would have typically reacted violently to Hux stepping into his private chambers, but he kept his eyes down in an effort not to draw attention to it. He did not offer as much as a snide remark as they stood before his bed. Without preamble, Hux released his grip on Kylo's arm and allowed him to collapse upon the pristine sheets.

“Stay here until you are mildly capable of functioning as Supreme Leader again,” Hux said flatly, gesticulating with his hand. “Or at least whatever it was that you were doing before.”

“Why?”

Why help me?
“The First Order is only as strong as its weakest member,” the general sighed as he adjusted his gloves and straightened his uniform. “And that currently is you – our assumed leader, no less. I will not have the Order fall to chaos or mutiny because of your instability. You are a liability, Ren. You need to consider the consequences of this downward spiral you are dead set on dragging us down into with you.” Kylo nodded in conceded gratitude, aware of how pathetic he must appear to his greatest adversary, but thankful that Hux had chosen to handle it as privately as possible for the good of the First Order. Had Kylo been in the general's position, he would have likely been more ruthless. He would never have expected anything less of his subordinate, either.

“I remember when my mother was killed by the New Republic,” Hux added with an impromptu hastiness. It was the closest statement between them resembling what either would consider sentiment. Without waiting for a response, he switched the Master Comms off and disarmed Kylo of his lightsaber, placing it on a shelf near the bed. “Don't make me regret 'forgetting' that here, Ren,” he said, gesturing toward the lightsaber, before turning on his heels and leaving Kylo alone in his chambers.

In the moment before he left, Kylo considered provoking an argument, if only to have his presence in the room with him for a few moments longer. He waited for his emotions to spiral out of control, but he was too exhausted, closing his eyes to the tears he had bottled up for so long before they could chase the misery down his cheeks.
Chapter End Notes

Brief suicidal thoughts

Brief recount of former injuries
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
“Rey?”

She opened her eyes to Rose and Finn's faces huddling over her, their eyes wide with worry. Strong arms were wrapped around her, making her feel safe, and she realized that Finn was carrying her.
“What happened?” she asked drowsily.

“You fainted,” Rose explained, placing her hand on Rey's forehead in a gesture unfamiliar to her.

“Are you feeling okay?” A skim of her mind revealed she had been attempting to measure her temperature, something Rose had surely learned from her parents. It was something Rey had never experienced before. Rey felt a warmth, a deep attachment, to the woman who had shown her more tenderness and concern than her own family.

Her mind wandered to the other woman who had been the only mother figure she had ever known; the woman who had disappeared before her eyes as Rey begged her to help her find a way to save her son – the same man that her friends were preparing to assassinate. She could feel both sides pulling at the strings of her heart, unraveling her. Either she committed treason for a man who had shut her out, or she lured that broken man to his death. Tears bloomed in her eyes as the reality of it twisted in her chest. She didn’t want this.

Her friends read the emotions that were clear on her face, but they didn’t pry. Perhaps they already knew, but they stayed by her side. She loved them more for it. Finn gripped her tighter and Rose grasped her hand. “We love you, Rey,” Finn murmured, “We're here for you.”

She didn’t have the strength to lie anymore. “I can't do it,” her voice trembled with fear and sorrow, “I can't fight Ben.” Finn set her down gently, grasping her by the shoulders as he stared into her eyes.

His eyes scanned hers, but there was a scrutiny to it. He was searching for an understanding or an answer she hoped he would not find there. “You can fight Ren,” Finn assured her. “You are the strongest person I know –”

“She didn’t say ‘Ren,’ though; did you, Rey?” a voice interrupted.

Poe.

The new general of the Resistance.

He was the last person she wanted to see after what he had tasked her to do. She still feared his intentions after their confrontation at the base. She knew he suspected the truth. Their enemy’s given name on her lips was the last word she wanted him to hear. “Poe, I didn't...”
He raised his hand to silence her explanation. “Ren...Ben... whatever name you choose to call him doesn't matter. Don't worry, you don't have to kill him. You don't even have to fight him,” Poe continued. “All you have to do is draw him in close enough for the rest of us to avenge his mother and the rest of the galaxy.”

“This is not what Leia would have wanted!”

The words were reactive, originating from somewhere deep inside her that rational thought couldn’t silence. It was the most foolish thing she could have said to him, other than admit the truth, but she only recognized that after she had said it.

“I know what Leia wanted,” Poe's voice was low in warning. “That’s why she entrusted the Resistance to me. Leia wanted to save the galaxy by whatever means necessary. Yes, she still had hope for him – a hope she has clearly passed down to you. I don't fault a loving mother for wanting her son back, but you need to understand; she was grieving a boy who died a long time ago. Ben Solo was the first casualty of Kylo Ren, and we will be added to the list if we don't eliminate him first. Leia is not here anymore. And I know the only hope for that monster is a hole through the chest. We all learned that after he killed Han Solo; why didn’t you?”

Rey couldn’t tell him the truth, couldn’t explain the bond that had allowed her to her know him. She doubted he would even if he did know. Her frustration at being caught in the middle boiled over. “I won't be part of this!”

“Yes, you will!” he retorted, his own anger building to match hers. “Of your own free will or as a prisoner of the Resistance.”

“Poe, that's not...” Finn began, but Rey was already pushing past them in tears to flee from the new general's presence. Finn was intent on going after her – to talk some sense into her – but hesitated when he noticed the look of horror widening on Rose's features.

“Finn, I need to talk to you. now,” she rasped.
Chapter End Notes

Vague threats
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
As Hux stepped out of the Supreme Leader's quarters, he came face to face with a squad of stormtroopers.

“Are you lost?” he barked in irritation.

“No, sir,” the commanding trooper said, clearing his throat. “We were ordered to debrief directly with the Supreme Leader.”

Hux's brows pinched in suspicion. “By whom?”

“The Supreme Leader, sir.”

A myriad of expressions crossed Hux's face before he regained his composure, each more formidable than the last. There was something the Supreme Leader was concealing from him, and this was the key to it all, he was certain. “What was your mission?”

“Outer rim reconnaissance, sir,” the trooper obediently supplied.

A calculating smile twitched on Hux's lips. He knew what Ren was hiding. “What sector?”

“Seitia sector, sir.”

“Data report?” One of the other troopers stepped forward and silently handed him the datapad. He swiftly scanned the report, searching for what he expected to be there. Oddly, there was no mention of the squad encountering anyone. There was only a single anomaly. “The mission suffered casualties?”

“Yes, sir,” the trooper said hesitantly. “Three personnel.”
Despite the normality of the report, there was something he couldn’t place that further drew Hux's suspicion. For the loss of three troopers, the detail was sparse. “Proceed... mission specifics.”

“We landed on-world. It was routine. We encountered no sentients, no sign of the Resistance, and the base was destroyed. Three of our men were killed when we were attacked by a pack of wild beasts,” the trooper said mechanically.

“Right...” Hux drawled. The general had faced enough beasts in his day. Ten qualified troopers should have been capable of neutralizing a terrestrial threat with the weaponry they were allotted.

“Were your thermal scanners or weaponry faulty?” he continued probing, following his intuition. “What species were the wild beasts? What were the fatal injuries to the three troopers? Why did the Supreme Leader ask to be debriefed on the particulars of this mission?”

“We landed on-world. It was routine. We encountered no sentients, no sign of the Resistance, and the base was destroyed. Three of our men were killed when we were attacked by a pack of wild beasts,” the trooper repeated.

Hux's eyes were alight with realization. “Excuse me?”

“We landed on-world. It was routine. We encountered no sen–”

“No! That's quite enough,” he smiled, a wicked, cruel thing. “Which planet?”

“Barkhesh, sir.”

“Dismissed,” he said to the troopers, marching back toward the bridge. They had confirmed two things – where the Resistance was hiding and who was protecting them.

“You thought you could fool me with a mind trick? Well, I found you, Jedi,” Hux scoffed to himself. “And your Supreme Leader boyfriend can’t save you this time.”
As he felt the pieces falling exactly where he wanted them, he raised the bridge on his comlink. “Captain Peavey, plot a course to Barkhesh – grid coordinates K nineteen in the Seitia Sector of the Outer Rim.”

“It was absurd. When Hux had left the bridge, they had not been on course to Barkhesh. He had left to find the Supreme Leader, who was crumpled on the training room floor like the weak man-child that he was, and he promptly returned him to his chambers. What had happened since he left? “On whose orders,” the general snapped. “I just left the Command Bridge minutes ago.”

“Supreme Leader Ren, sir.”

Impossible. There was something else at work, something the general didn’t understand, because Kylo Ren couldn’t have contacted the bridge after he left, Hux had turned the Master Comms off himself. Even if he had, Kylo hadn’t spoken to troopers yet. How did he know to change course?

It cemented the fact in his mind – Kylo Ren was a traitor and had outlived his usefulness to the First Order.
Chapter End Notes

Mention of death
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey stumbled down the halls in a daze. The walls appeared to slowly narrow around her, bearing down upon her like the destiny that was all too near. The thought of betraying him again stole the breath from her chest. No matter what Poe said, this was not what Leia would have wanted. How could they do that to his mother on the day she died? How could they ask Rey to take part in a betrayal of that woman? Not just take part – they would use her as bait to kill him.

That was not the Resistance she thought she knew. That was not the Resistance she was fighting for. Rey was fighting to end the war, not to exact revenge. Revenge was the dark side; isn’t that what the Jedi taught? How could she reconcile such a divergence to her moral compass? It was no different to her than when Kylo asked her to join him to rule the galaxy. Rey knew what she had to do.

_I have to find him. He needs to know, even if it's so he can stay far away from me._

“Ben where are you?” she begged.

As Rey entered her room, she could feel the Force change around her. Instead of entering her underground room in the ancient temple, she walked into a dark and elaborate compartment of rooms. If she hadn’t known any better, she would never have guessed it was meant to be lived in. It was dark and cold, and the uniform lights were harsh. The design was sharp and conservative. There were no open viewports, there were no decorations, only smooth black surfaces of varying material. She knew it was on a large cruiser or destroyer, most likely the _Finalizer_. The front room had been destroyed. Plasma had rendered the ornate furniture of the room unrecognizable. Though she had not surveyed her surroundings in the fiery maelstrom, Rey realized that the room must be the location of the confrontation that had happened the night prior when his general had nearly killed him – the same night she had nearly killed him.

She sensed his energy; he was somewhere in one of those rooms. As she explored deeper into the quarters, she noticed that – although the front room was more pretentiously built with daunting architecture and large, heavy furniture – the other rooms were more simple and modest, at least for the Supreme Leader. There was not a single piece of furniture or object that was not a necessity. There were few personal items, which struck her as odd. It was as if no one actually lived there. It was sterile and sparing, stark and uninviting. Her shelter in her AT-AT had felt more like a home than this. No, this... this was a prison. Nothing was out of place, save for a broken mirror, the pieces meticulously gathered and stacked in a neat pile. She walked through the door of the antechamber, and there it was.

His sleeping chamber.

As she gathered the nerve to walk through the doors, she noticed marks in a wall off to her left. No, not marks, scratches. She had seen those same scratches before - on a wall in her AT-At on Jakku. There weren't as many on this wall as hers, but it was unmistakably intentional. She had been counting the days until she was reunited with her family; what had he been counting?

Those thoughts were abandoned the moment the door slid open, because she was jolted with the anguish he felt. He was lying on his side on the bed, in much the same way he had been the night before. When I betrayed him.

Would he even want to see her?

The black, shiny blankets were undisturbed underneath him. Kylo's eyes were red and swollen. His chest was bare, and his strong arms were wrapped around himself as if he was all he had to hold onto. She supposed it had probably been years since he had been lovingly embraced. Their brief touches through the bond and when his father caressed his cheek with his dying breath on Starkiller, could have been the only intimate human contact he had in nearly a decade. She remembered those lonely nights on Jakku, curled up on herself as he was now, and it struck her how their remarkably different circumstances had shaped them to be so unbelievably similar.

There was a difference, however. She craved touched, she sought it out, but he feared it. When she witnessed the moment their hands touched in his memories, he anticipated pain. Not only had Kylo gone without touch for years, he had become so accustomed to pain that he didn't know what it felt like to be touched without it. If pain had become the only language he understood, could she break through to him? Or would he run from any tenderness she showed him? After what she had done, he would likely hate it either way.

With that in mind, she cautiously approached him, preparing herself for his rejection of her presence. For the many reactions she had anticipated, however, she hadn't expected no reaction at all. As she moved closer, there wasn't a single flicker of reaction in his eyes. It was almost as if he was staring right through her. Could he see her? She knew he could sense her in the Force. Whether or not he could see her physical presence, she could see him. She would be there for him, because he needed someone. Even though he was the one person in the galaxy she should avoid, she was the only person in the galaxy who could be there for him.

She chose to stay.

Kylo finally dragged his gaze to her face and studied her, searching for her intent. She sensed the raw, exposed edge of vulnerability that threatened to ignite at any moment. Closing his eyes, he sighed in exhaustion. His thoughts echoed in her mind.
Kill me or leave me; I can’t do this tonight.

“I don’t want to leave you,” she whispered. “Do you want me to leave?”

He didn’t answer. His eyes remained closed, his energy distant. It was as if he was not even registering that she was speaking.

“Ben... please look at me...”

“Ben...”

“Kylo...” His eyes flickered up to hers. She glared at him in annoyance that he forced her to use his chosen name. “Tell me that we are alone, and I’ll leave.”

She could feel the weight of the choice she was asking him to make as it settled between them. After everything that had happened, she steeled her heart, but hope bloomed there as his eyes warmed with a spark of life. His throat bobbed with emotion and he shook his head, refusing to give truth to those words.

Rey was distracted when a blur of beeping fury slammed into her legs. Blue was angry at her – as he should have been – that she almost hurt Kylo. He blamed her for his master’s sorrow. “Blue, I’m sorry!” she tried. “I promise, I don’t want to hurt him!” The droid was nothing but persistent, shoving her away from his master.

“It’s okay, Blue,” Kylo rasped. “She can stay.” Blue rolled to the corner, still grumbling in disapproval. Rey walked to the edge of the bed. He stared up at her through his lashes, making no move to sit up or protect himself from her. “You can stay.”

Lowering herself to sit on the bed next to him, she watched his eyes carefully for a hint of protest. There was sorrow and confusion, and something else that looked a lot like hope, but no animosity. With a deep, emboldening breath, she made her decision.

Rey gently climbed into the bed next to him, facing him. His eyes widened – guarded and uncertain – but full of wonder. These were not the eyes of the leader of a radical military junta, but those of a wayward, broken boy. Without a word, she pried his arms away from where they were wrapped around his chest. He let her, brows furrowed, confusion twisting across his face. He inhaled sharply, his muscles tensing instinctively as she slid down next to him, her head tucked against his chest.

Kylo shuddered as she wrapped her arms around his broad back. She swallowed her gasp as her fingers settled on a latticework of scarred ridges underneath his smooth skin. She had seen his back, there were no noticeable scars – only a sprinkling of moles – but below the surface... it was extensive. It was as if he had only placed Bacta patches on long enough to heal the skin, but not the wounds underneath. Instead of shying away, she splayed her hands to cover as many of the wounds as she could and squeezed him tightly.

After a moment, his body relaxed into her embrace. His disciplined muscles rippled under her fingertips, reminding her that he had the capability to hurt her, but that wasn’t why she was afraid. Rey waited for him to shove her away, to tell her he never wanted to see her again, to abandon her. His chest shuttered against her as he breathed, his pounding heartbeat vibrating against her cheek, reminding her that he was just as terrified as she was. He slowly and tentatively wrapped his large arms around her, sighing into the comfort of her touch. It was as if she were actually there in his bed holding him, not across the galaxy.

The grief left no energy for mental barriers. Touching him, she could feel every raw emotion that twisted through him as her own emotions flowed uninhibited from her. The bond was completely open. It simultaneously tore her apart and mended her back together again, soothing the aching hollowness that plagued her.

Every emotion coalesced between them, flooding the bond. They were drowning in a sea of grief, with only each other to hold onto. He wrapped his arms tighter around her, and then his body began to shake – imperceptibly at first, but it built in severity. There was not a word in any language Rey had learned that could explain the sounds that were wrenched from deep within him. The heartbreaking sound fractured her own resolve.

As if a dam had finally broken inside him, rasping sobs wracked his body, muffled by her hair. She let go of the last strength she had held onto for the sake of everyone around her and let her own body convulse as she wept against him. Her hot tears rolled down his chest, his dampened her hair. Neither said a word...neither needed to. They clung to each other desperately as the sea of grief washed over them.
Chapter End Notes

Grief

Two characters share in the experience of grief
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Finn stumbled down the steps of the temple in search of his fiancée in the shadows cast by the Barkhesh skies. The briefing with the new general had taken longer than he had anticipated, but he knew that Rose was not one for dramatics. Whatever she needed to tell him was urgent, and likely of dire consequence. He found Rose pacing at the bottom of the steps.

When she turned to him, his heart dropped. Her eyes were brimming with pity and remorse. Whatever it was, it was worse than he thought.
“What's wrong?” he stammered, wrapping her in a fearful embrace. “Is everything okay?”

Rose hesitated, before pulling herself from the comfort of Finn's arms. She wouldn't look at him when she said, “I think you need to sit down.”

Finn chuckled humorlessly. “Rose, you’re scaring me. Is it about us?”

Rose shook her head, but he found no relief in it. There was a dread growing in his gut that was almost… instinctual. Whatever she said next would hurt him, he was certain. “It's about Rey.”

Terror hitched his breath. A thousand terrible possibilities flooded his mind as he contemplated his greatest fears coming to fruition. “What do you mean?” he grasped her shoulders to better study her eyes as he bent down to her level. “What happened?”

“It was something Poe said.” Her words were low, almost mumbled, as if she wished she didn’t have to say them. “He said Rey had to kill Kylo Ren to “avenge his mother.”

It should have been a relief, that they were only talking about a conversation. The dread wouldn’t fade, however. Finn wasn’t following her line of thinking, why did it matter that Poe was talking about Kylo and Leia? What did that have to do with Rey? He looked at her expectantly. She bit her lip as she finally met his eyes. “Kylo Ren is…?”

“Leia’s son,” he supplied, confusion still wrinkling his forehead. It never occurred to him that someone wouldn’t know their relation, especially after what Kylo did to Han on Starkiller.

Rose sucked in a breath apprehensively, wiping her sweaty palms on her jacket. Finn was trying – trying to be patient, trying to understand what Kylo’s genetics had to do with Rey, trying not to scream as his unease escalated, but he just wanted her to get to the point. His fingers tightened insignificantly on her shoulders as he fought his frustration, but it was enough for her to notice and force herself to continue. “And his real name is?”

It was easier for Finn when he only knew him as Kylo Ren – Jedi Killer. Before he saw his face, he imagined a monster found only in nightmares. To learn his name, his history, see his face, meet Han and Leia, and then witness what he did to them, was far worse. He hated hearing that name, hated saying it even more. “Ben Solo.” He spat the name as if it were poison, his lips curled into a sneer.
Rose nodded, sighing in acceptance of the truth she had feared. Nothing prepared him for her next words. “Do you remember when Rey told me about the man she has feelings for?”

“Yes...” The confusion was fading to a grim realization. This involved Rey and Kylo Ren, and that fed the fear inside him. He wanted to go back to the moment when Rey didn’t want to kill him because she thought she saw ‘light’ in him, not because...

Sympathetic pain swelled in her eyes as she witnessed the understanding in his. It only confirmed his fear of what she would say next. He refused to look at her when she said it. “Do you remember when you asked me if that man was Kylo Ren?”

“I don't like where this is going, Rose,” he said, voice tight with emotion. Finn rocked on his feet, refusing to meet her eyes even though he could feel her studying him. He wanted to run, so he wouldn’t face the truth he knew he'd see if he looked at her. But he couldn't run, because she needed him, and Rey needed him. Especially if what Rose was insinuating was true. He knew she was waiting for him, so he forced himself to raise his eyes.

“Finn, I swear I didn't know,” she whispered.

“Please, no,” he begged as tears blurred his vision. He was pleading with her as much as he was the universe. He shook his head in denial, refusing to believe his best friend was capable of caring for a monster. “No, you're wrong. She wouldn't...” His voice broke under the weight of the truth.

“No, Finn, I'm not wrong,” she replied, not unkindly. “Rey told me she has feelings for a man she’d been meeting in secret through the Force. She said he was Leia's son, Ben Solo, but he’d had a ‘falling out’ with his family and she was trying to convince him to come home.” She paused and there was something terrifying in her eyes. Whatever it was, she didn’t voice it. “There’s more I need to tell you, but now is not the time. We need to focus on Rey and what this means. I swear, I only found out tonight that he goes by something else now. I had no idea Ben Solo is Kylo Ren.” If Finn had considered his reaction before that moment – when his entire galaxy was turned upside down – he would have imagined screaming, throwing something in anger, perhaps a panic attack.

But he just closed his eyes and exhaled slowly.

There was only one question that plagued his thoughts, and it wasn’t for the woman standing before him. “Why, Rey?”
“I thought Ben was at risk of being killed by Kylo Ren, like his dad,” Rose continued. “I never imagined he was him. You told me they have a connection through the Force. I should have realized after the battle with the First Order recon ship, she had information that I knew she shouldn't have had,” she paused for a moment, tilting her head to stare up at the sky before continuing. “This puts everyone in the Resistance at risk, whether she has willingly provided him information or not. Finn, keeping this secret, this is...”

Finn shut his eyes as he nodded in agreement. “Treason. I know. Have you told anyone?” he asked in a strained rasp.

“No.”

“Don't, please.” Finn knew he had no right to ask. Every moment the others were unaware of the threat in their midst was another moment their lives hung in the balance. Kylo Ren could use Rey to find their location, or maybe he didn’t even need it, maybe he could find them through the bond and kill them while they slept. If they didn’t tell the Resistance about what they found immediately, then they would be complicit in treason.

If it had been anyone else, he would have already found Poe in the war room. But Rey was his best friend; he had to give her one more chance. He remembered her distress over the Borgle bat in the forest, her sympathy for broken creatures. Finn was sure Kylo was manipulating her, convincing her he wasn’t a monster, just as he had done to his father. But Finn knew just how dangerous Kylo Ren was. He wouldn’t let their enemy do to Rey what he had almost done to him.

“Finn,” Rose warned. “if we don't tell Poe, then we are as guilty as she is.”

“This ends tonight, you have my word.” His voice was cold in a way he had never heard himself before. Murderous. Rose’s eyes grew wide in fear. “Where is she?”

“I... I don't know.” she stammered. “What do we do?”

“Give me some time with her. Go pack for Dantooine,” he straightened to his full height, his thoughts focused with fierce resolution. Kylo Ren would die before they left Barkhesh, he just needed to think of the best way to confront her. “I need to go for a walk. Alone. Then I'll find her and kill him myself if I have to.”
Communication

Chapter Summary

Fun fact - Kylo's monologue about order and instability (though paraphrased) is a cannon monologue from The Force Awakens novel. His recitation of Leia's monologue about monsters is also a real monologue made by Leia from a comic Star Wars Annual #2.

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey sighed deeply into the warmth of Kylo’s arms, drifting in the comforting lull of their bond, waiting for the Force to inevitably separate them. At some point, he had turned from his side onto his back. His arm held her tightly against his side as he stared up at the ceiling, lost in thought. It seemed like an eternity before either of them said anything. Rey wondered if they lay there long enough if the entire galaxy around them would disappear.

No Jedi, no Sith, no Resistance, no First Order, no war – just Ben and Rey, together, safe in our bond.
She lifted herself onto her elbow to study him; her hand was on his chest to support her weight. His dark, burning eyes were filled with pain and longing, and for the first time since they were bonded, she knew why. She had been on the other side; she had seen his life through those eyes. She told him she had understood him in the hut, but she realized now, she hadn’t understood him at all. Had he ever truly understood her? He thought he did.

But so had she. She had known what his uncle had done and knew it contributed to his fall. It was simpler when there was someone to blame, when one choice could have prevented it all. But from the moment he was born, he lived in the shadow of a man he could neither become nor escape. His entire life had been a series of events that culminated in his fall. How could she fix that? How could she help him before it was too late?

“Why are you looking at me like that?” Kylo asked, breaking the heavy silence. His stare was still fixed on the ceiling.

“I was wondering how many times a boy can be called a monster before he believes it,” Rey said softly, tentatively allowing her hand to follow the ridge of his collarbone, wondering if he would push her away. The ache was heavy in her heart. She had witnessed the loss of his mother, she couldn’t stand imagining the moment he shut her out again.

I don’t want to lose you.

“I am a monster.” His voice was tight, and even if she didn’t have the bond, she would have heard the truth of it. The bond was open, however, and not only did she hear it, but she felt it all. There was an agony inside him she could feel squeezing her own chest. “I killed my mother.”

“Ben, that’s not your burden to bear,” she whispered, her hand settling over his pounding heart. “She knew she was dying; she just wanted to see you one last time, and she did. She said what she needed to say.”

“Did she suffer?” he choked.

I wish you could have been there. I wish you could have shared her last moments with her. Maybe you would have seen how loved you are.

The idea settled over her like a warm beam of sunlight bursting through the clouds. She grabbed his wrist and brought his hand up to her temple.
“You can see, Ben... if you want to.” His eyes widened with the understanding of exactly what she was offering him. She knew his father’s dying face haunted him, but she trusted that witnessing Leia’s death would be different. He nodded hesitantly, his heart conflicted. He blinked back tears, and his lips trembled in anticipation.

Rey closed her eyes and thought back to that moment at Leia’s bedside after he had shut her out again. She felt his consciousness accessing her memory. It was agonizing for her to relive, but she suffered through it for him... and Leia. It was how he had felt, after all, when she forced him to relive his most painful memories. It was worth it to give him closure, something she feared she would never have in her own parents’ deaths. At least she hoped it would give him closure, his emotions were… tumultuous. His sharpest reaction was to his mother’s last words.

I love my son, Leia said in her final moments, and I still believe he has light left in him. But if losing Ben to darkness was the key to saving this galaxy, then I would choose that over watching my Jedi son die with the Resistance at the hands of another empire. So would Han. Maybe that was why the Force chose us to be his parents.

Rey feared what those words would do to him. Had she been wrong to show him? Would Leia’s last words only serve to push him further away? Something happened, however, as her energy dissipated into the Force. The bond was overflowing with sorrow and regret, but also gratitude, peace, and love. The heaviness of his presence in her mind seemed less burdened.

As the memory faded when his cloak dropped onto the empty bed, another memory emerged. Rey wasn’t certain whether it was her doing or his. The memory was a moment she had thought about endlessly in the past few weeks, she knew every detail by heart.

Kylo reached across the galaxy to touch his fingertips to hers over the fire in that little hut on Ahch-To. A spark of energy passed between them, and for a brief moment, she was transported away from his sympathetic eyes. There were only brief snippets of a future, but the emotions were clear. She knew then the feelings she felt for this man were not meant for an enemy. The first flash was sand… then snow… a lake… then trees… his open palm, bare and outstretched… him standing beside Finn and Poe, weapon raised… her head on his shoulder… lightning… him standing to face Snoke… his carefree smile… ink written carefully on paper… deft fingers switching the falcon’s controls… a boy’s laugh… a pair of dice exchanging hands… a twin sunrise… an indigo hued kiss… his eyes bright with love, purpose and hope… and a blue, crossguard lightsaber. The emotions of the brief flashes were bright and hopeful. She had believed then that they would never have to be alone again.

She had been wrong.
There was nothing clear that was proof he would turn, or when, it was only a future that inspired hope. It validated the feelings that she had been developing for him, convincing her that if she went to him, he would turn. For her. It convinced her there was a future where they could be together. It had not turned out the way she had hoped.

The memory continued in her mind. The vision faded as Luke entered, shouting. Her fight with Luke in the rain played out in front of them. She wondered why he cared to witness it. Kylo knew she left Luke behind on Ahch-To. He fixated on their fight, of course, but also the moment she said, then he's our last hope. His hand was shaking uncontrollably against her, his response to the mere sight of Luke still visceral, but he did not sever the connection until it was over.

Rey opened her eyes, but his were still shut. Tear streaks stained his cheeks. He was quiet for a long time, minutes ticking by like hours, but she stayed silent. She feared she brought him more pain. The shields around his emotions were high, but she could still sense the hurricane of emotions raging behind them.

“Ben, say something,” she whispered. He finally raised his eyes to meet hers.

“You…” he said finally, “You defended me, you fought him. For me. Why?”

She shook her head, brows pinched in confusion. Why did he care about Luke? She was angry after Luke had interrupted them. She was angry after she discovered what he had done to his own nephew. He wouldn’t help her save the people who needed him. Of course, she fought him. After everything that happened following her confrontation with Luke, she hadn’t considered its relevance to him. “Luke didn’t believe in you like I did,” she said. “Like I still do. If I had been at that temple, I would have believed you, I would have defended you.”

His jaw hardened, and he shook his head. His emotions spiked again over the bond. She knew it was a sensitive subject, so she refocused his attention back to the other memories he witnessed. “What about the vision? And your mother?”

The moment she mentioned his mother, something flashed in his eyes. “Don't,” he warned, his voice cracking with emotion. “Not now, I can't...”

She closed her eyes for a moment, breathing deeply to center herself. He had been more open with her than ever before, and she had hoped it was her chance to finally get through to him. She swallowed her disappointment, feeling his barriers slowly close off his side of the bond.
She was losing him.

“Ben, please, don't shut me out,” she begged, striving to convey through her eyes just how significant their open bond had been to her. “Don't leave me alone again, please.”

“Why?” There was a resentful edge to his voice. His stare was fixed above him, and he swallowed apprehensively before continuing. “Why are you here, Rey? What do you want from me? You scream at me, tell me the galaxy is better off without me, use me to save your friends, then try to kill me. All of that I understand. I deserve that. But this...”

I don’t understand this.

His voice faded as they both tried to put to words what exactly had happened between them. Neither had bent to the will of the other. From an outsider's perspective, nothing had changed. But Rey knew after what they had shared through the bond, there was something there that hadn’t been there before.

“Okay, I'm just going to say it,” she said, pressing herself up again so she could study his eyes. “I know there’s nothing I can say to convince you of the truth, but you are worth it for me to try.” There was a flash of confusion in his eyes then. It was as if he could not comprehend being worth anything to anyone.

“I'm sorry, Ben – for everything I did to you. I realized after you shut me out how awful I have been. And I am not excusing the awful things you do, because you have done truly awful, awful things. I mean, awful, and I can say that because I know that’s not who you are. I thought I would never forgive you. And I know you will never forgive yourself. But I want to forgive you, and I'm trying, and I know the person that did those things is not who you are.” As Kylo stared above him, she studied the hard line of his jaw and wondered which part upset him more; that he had done terrible things or that she knew he was better than what he had done.

“All I can ask,” she continued, her voice heavy with the weight of her regret, “is that you try to forgive me, too. I said awful things. I did awful things to you. I betrayed you and became just like everyone else in your life. I didn't realize how much bringing you to your mother would hurt you. I didn't fear the darkness, and I almost lost us both because of it. I don't know what else to say that could make this right... I’m sorry. I know it's just words, but I truly am. I’m sorry if you thought I was using you to save my friends, and maybe I was, but it wasn't my intention. I wanted to save you, Ben – not only for the Resistance, or the galaxy, or your mother, or even me, but for you. Because I...” She let her voice trail off before her words started down the dangerous path of her complicated feelings for him. In her silence, his gaze found hers.
“I believe the Force brought us together because we understand each other in ways no one else can. We were supposed to be the one person the other could trust, and we betrayed that, but it’s not too late learn from our mistakes. I know I am asking too much for your forgiveness. You wouldn’t forgive your family for their betrayal; why would you forgive your enemy? But I would always regret it if I didn't try.” Kylo studied her eyes for a moment, searching for something. Not that he needed to; the truth was waiting in her open side of the bond. When he didn’t ask the question in his eyes, she continued.

“To answer your question – without all the rambling – I came here because I want to be here for you. You don’t have to be alone anymore if you choose not to be. From the moment we touched hands, I knew I didn't want to lose you, Ben. I’ve been so angry because I was disappointed. It tears me apart to have my loyalty to you and my friends pull me in two different directions. But I’d rather suffer that than have you hate me. Every moment I have spent without you in the bond has been the loneliest of my life. I won’t take that for granted again. But I understand if you don’t want me to stay.”

Part of her still couldn’t explain what it was that made her fight for him. If he had been anyone else, she would have walked away long ago. She didn’t know why the Force had chosen to connect them, knowing she would have given up on him as everyone else had, but she wouldn’t give up on him now. She had never felt this way for anyone, never cared to.

It had only ever been him.

As he searched her eyes for the truth, she feared the worst. The damage had been done. She had meant what she said; why would he forgive her when he refused to forgive the people he loved? When he shut her out, she would know she tried. They had weathered the dark hours after Leia’s death together; it would have to be enough.

He chewed his lip before responding. “I want you to stay,” he rasped. With those words, it felt like the weight of the world had fallen away.

His fingers tightened on her back instinctively, and only then did he notice he was touching her. He jolted as if she were made of lightning, and his hands dropped away. His words and his hands were at war, and she didn’t know what to believe. As if responding to her fear, she heard his thoughts pass across her mind like a whisper.

_I could never hate you, and you have nothing to be forgiven for. I don't deserve any of this._
Knowing he believed that released the floodgate to a new set of tears. “I know you, Ben,” she said, holding his stare. “I’ve been inside that deep, chaotic mind of yours. You deserve so much more than the path you’ve lived and the awful things done to you.”

Please let me in.

He answered by cautiously lifting his arm in invitation, his eyes wide and hopeful. She slid back into his warm embrace. Her tears pooled on his heated skin as she rested her head on his chest. He didn’t seem to mind as his arm moved to wrap around her, gentle with hesitation. The steady thrum of his heart dried her tears; each beat pumped a renewed promise through her veins, vowing that as long as that heart gave life to him, it gave life to hope.

A calm settled over him, too, settling his raging emotions, when a light – his light – passed between them. As the warmth settled in their connection, his grip tightened around her. His strong arms held her against him, leaving her feeling safe, valued, and wanted. She smiled.

I know who you are, Ben Solo, she repeated in her mind. I feel your light. She knew he heard it; her mind was completely open to him.

"I don't even know me, Rey," he whispered into her hair, his voice laced with deep emotion. They were both quiet for a moment, pondering the depths of his admission.

Don’t be afraid, I know who you were, show me who you are.

She had learned to understand the man who died that night at the temple, or at least, somewhere in the horrors of Snoke’s training. And she knew who he was deep in his soul; a truth he did not have the power to hide. She also knew, however, that there was another side of him, a side that she liked to pretend didn’t exist. Kylo Ren was who that monster wanted him to be. But she would be a fool to believe that there wasn’t a part of him who wanted to rule the galaxy and destroy those that opposed him.

She wanted to know that dangerous, powerful man – her enemy – the man who chose power over her, but the same man who held her as if she was his very life source. She wanted to know the man caught somewhere between Kylo Ren and Ben Solo. She wanted to know everything about him. To do that, she had to push past the assumptions and ask him anything...everything...until he finally understood. Somehow, she knew this time he would answer.
Rey knew this was her chance. There was something like longing in his eyes. From the very beginning, he wanted her to know him. She just had to convince him to trust her when he had every reason not to. She lowered herself down next to him again. She rested her head on his chest so she could fully wrap her arms around him. His pulse beat wildly against her cheek. Holding him tightly, she hoped she showed him that—no matter what—she would stay. "I want to know everything about you, even the bad things. I want to understand, Ben."

It was everything she wanted from the others—understanding—and with the spike of his emotions at that word she knew he felt the same. She could feel the fear, but, underneath, she felt his hope. "Ask me anything," he whispered.

"Anything?"

The deep baritone of his voice resonated against her cheek. "Anything that is mine to tell. I'm done hiding from you, Rey."

She considered his answer for a moment. "My parents…"

His entire torso moved with his sigh. "…is not my story to tell."

"Then at least admit that you lied—you didn’t kill them." He was quiet, though she knew his thoughts were loud. She only wished she was privy to them.

He spoke slowly to control the resentment in his tone, but she felt it through his skin. "I never lied to you."

She had never wanted to be back inside his mind more than that moment. She knew logically he couldn’t have killed them, but everything about his words sounded true. He had never lied to her before; why would he lie to her about something that would make her hate him? If he wouldn’t answer the question that burned in her mind, then she craved to know why; why he would kill them or why he would lie to her, whichever turned out to be the truth.

"Will you lower the barriers in your mind again? I want to know all your thoughts, not just the ones you choose to say." His body tensed underneath her, and her hope dimmed. He may not have said the words, but his swift withdrawal to his side of the bond made it clear he would not share that openness with her again.

You're not done hiding from me, are you, Ben?

Silence stretched between them in her disappointment and his stonewalling.

“Compromise?” Kylo suggested hesitantly. “I need... I'm not ready to share everything in my head with you. But what if I promise to answer anything and share the thoughts I don’t usually say?”

She smiled and nodded against him in agreement. “Don't blame me if you don't like what you hear,” he added softly.

Where do I start?

She knew it wasn't a moment to waste on questions about childhood hobbies or favorite colors. Though she was quite confident she could guess the color. She didn’t know how long their connection would last – they had already been together longer than they ever had before – and she didn’t know if she would ever have the chance again.

Rey tilted her head to rest on his shoulder so she could examine his expression. “After everything he did to you, why did you stay with Snoke?”

He eyed her in resignation, arching an eyebrow at her bold first question. He chewed his lip in reluctance to answer, but she was pleasantly surprised when he acquiesced. “He was the only person who ever believed in me. Without him... I was nothing. I owed him everything.”

Even after witnessing his memories, knowing that he saw the galaxy differently than she did, Rey wasn’t prepared for an immediate divergence in their beliefs. Not over something she thought was simple to see. She didn’t understand how he could believe those lies. His family made mistakes, but they believed in him. They never gave up on him; though he hadn’t realized it then, certainly he saw that now. Rey believed in him, but Snoke didn't. That was obvious after what the monster did with the bond. Rey tried to hide her frustration with his answer. He had been honest and open; she couldn’t condemn him for an answer she didn’t agree with.

“But he used you. He tortured you.”
“There are more painful ways to torture someone than a little Force lightning,” he answered flippantly, though his expression was solemn, his eyes dark. “It wasn’t torture, it was training. I was used to it. I deserved it.”

Rey closed her eyes and slowed her breathing, forcing her darkness away. It would be so easy to allow the darkness to soothe her, but she would never make that mistake again. She focused on his heartbeat under her fingers until the anger ebbed. Opening her eyes, she only felt empathy and compassion that her bondmate truly believed he deserved to suffer. “Ben, what he did to you – ”

“I don’t want pity, especially not from you,” he warned, his teeth clenched as he tried to temper his anger. “I know the torment you’ve suffered. What you saw in my memories... right or wrong, I chose to join him. What he did to me was necessary, it made me stronger. It was nothing.”

The darkness was growing stronger, becoming more difficult to keep at bay. The images of what he suffered crashed through her mind unbidden, and the fierce protectiveness she had felt over him in his memories returned. “I saw what he did to you. I felt it. Don’t you dare say that was nothing. You begged for death. If he wasn’t dead, I would kill him myself.”

His face softened at her declaration, his eyes still wounded, but appreciative. “I survived.”

“I don’t understand...” she said, her voice still heavy with emotion, but the darkness abated as she stared into the warmth in his eyes. “You were so angry with your parents for lying and abandoning you, at Luke for betraying you, but what Snoke did to you when you joined him was worlds worse.”

He was quiet, but she waited patiently as the moments stretched. No one had questioned him like this before, and she would force him to face it. “Did you ever think that maybe I can't forgive them because they are the reason I turned to Snoke?” his voice was low and strained with the admission. She was breaking through his defenses, layer by layer. “Did you ever think that if I hated him, too, then my whole life would be meaningless? I would have no purpose.”

Her eyes filled with sorrow. “Is having no purpose worse than torture?”

“Yes,” he whispered. “His training made me stronger.”

“No, I felt your powerful light in your memories. Ben was stronger.” She was adamant but not unkind. There was no doubt in her mind, after fighting as him in his memories, and fighting against him on Starkiller; suppressing the light suppressed his natural strengths.

“Ben was weak,” Kylo scoffed. “He believed the lies of his family. He was too trusting and hopeful. He allowed himself to be betrayed. He nearly fell to his own uncle’s hand.”

“Kylo was weak.” Rey knew she risked him reacting with volatility, but she also knew her only chance to save him was to force him to see the truth. “He believed Snoke’s lies. He remained loyal to his master, allowing himself to be tortured and torn apart until he didn’t know who he was anymore. Snoke was possessive and jealous and cruel, but Kylo didn’t realize how he was being used. Kylo would have fallen to Snoke’s hand, had he not found enough light in himself to kill his master.”

“He gave me a chance at a destiny worth fulfilling.”

_Enough about destiny. What if the destiny everyone has decided for us is wrong? What if you are not supposed to be another Vader? What if I am not supposed to be the Jedi who defeats Kylo Ren?_

Rey was sick of hearing about destiny. What if the destiny the others had decided for them was wrong? What if he was _not_ supposed to be another Vader? What if she was not supposed to deliver the fate of Kylo Ren? How could the Cosmic Force will her to be abandoned by her family, will him to feel betrayed by his, destine them both to a life of suffering – even if part of that suffering was self-imposed – and then bond them together so they could kill each other? Why would the force care about her? She wasn’t a Skywalker; she was a nobody. “Do you even believe in destiny?”

He huffed a humorless chuckle. “Do you?”

“It’s difficult to believe in when the vision of the future I saw on Ahch-To was a lie.” She could feel the tears stinging in her eyes again, the disappointment from the throne room returned. He was supposed to turn, the vision had foretold it, but he refused her.

He hummed.

“Visions in the Force are difficult to read,” he replied, pointedly avoiding addressing what she had seen or what he did. “I do believe that there are no absolutes in life, even prophesies.”
“Does that mean you don't believe visions?” She wasn't sure what she hoped his answer would be. She had believed in destiny when the Force showed her a future of belonging with him, but her latest vision of losing Finn terrified her. She wouldn’t allow it to come true.

“I believe they can show the future,” he said, choosing his words carefully. “But we interpret visions based upon past experiences, and our judgments are biased by those experiences. So the vision could be realized in the future, but not necessarily in the way we interpreted it.”

Do you or don't you?

The ambiguity of his answer was irritating. He reminded her of his uncle. “If you believe that visions show the future, then you must believe in destiny?”

“I’m as conflicted about destiny as I am about everything else,” Kylo said with a humorless huff. “Once I joined Snoke, I believed I was always destined to fall; this path had been fated to me before I was even born. I still believe my destiny is forever linked to my grandfather.”

“But you’re not you’re grandfather.”

Kylo stared up at the ceiling, studying it raptly as if it held answers. “If I did not have Skywalker blood in my veins, do you think my parents would have feared my powers like they did? Do you think Luke would have tried to kill me? Do you think Snoke would have searched for me? No. I know now I am nothing more to them than my grandfather’s legacy. So perhaps I was always going to fall to darkness. And you were always going to find the light because you’re... you.”

What is that supposed to mean? You said I had no place in this, and I was nothing to this story.

“You survived abandonment, starvation, and slavery,” he continued, “and yet you’re forever hopeful. You were always meant to be good, so the inverse is true. ‘Darkness rises and light to meet it’ – we were always going to collide. But after that last vision, there’s a part of me that wants to believe I have a choice, that I am fighting for something. The Force has a will, the Force connected us, and I know the part I play in this was not meant for a happy ending. Since the moment I met you, I knew that you would be the one to deliver my fate. But I have to believe that if there is an ultimate destiny, I can alter what happens before I reach it. Otherwise, what’s the point?”

“I agree, Ben,” she said, hope blooming in her heart that he wanted change. “I believe we can still make the right choice. You weren’t destined to fall; I felt your light with Dev and Jacen. It was what happened with your uncle, his choice, that led to your fall. So if my destiny truly is to play a part in your fate, then we can change it, right? We can change our destiny by making different choices. So what choice do we make to save you?”

He exhaled slowly. “Only the Force has the answer to that, Rey. The choices we think are right could very well lead to the fate we are trying to prevent. Luke made the choice to kill me for the greater good, to stop me from falling to darkness and prevent this exact destiny from occurring. Instead of changing fate, he ensured it. Or Snoke. He feared my compassion for you long before I admitted it to myself. He feared the sentiment would lead to a betrayal like Vader, so he demanded I kill you. And he fell to the very fate he was trying to prevent. You may think that the only way to save me is for me to defect and join the Resistance. But I warn you, Rey, that choice to save me could very well lead to my death by the First Order or even the Resistance. We will never know what the right choice is. All I do know is that every choice made as the result of a vision is ultimately the wrong one.”

There was an undertone of bitterness when he spoke again. “In our visions, you thought I would turn, I thought you would stand by me. Either the destiny we saw was wrong or the choices we made were. Visions are impossible to read.”

He seemed focused that it had not come to pass as he’d hoped, but she only found more hope in his argument. “Ben, if the visions were real, then you’re right, the choices we made changed them. We changed the future, which means we can do it again.” We can save Finn. “Did you have another vision when I touched your hand?” Her mind recalled to his appearance in that corridor in her vision. Fear in his eyes, but also…hope.

“Yes.”

“No you think it is the future?” Rey’s heart was conflicted. She desired the vision of Kylo to be true, but the body under the blanket... the thought of losing one her best friends, was frightening. Was it a warning? Would someone she loved be lost by his hand? Could he save himself and save her best friend in the process? Or would she be faced with a choice – an impossible choice?

His voice was barely a whisper when he answered. “I saw….” He exhaled with a shudder, trying to force himself to say it. “I saw you fall to darkness, Rey.” Fear trickled through her. She had forced away the darkness since then; surely that had to change something. His eyes finally shifted back to hers in his promise. “If it is real, then I will do everything in my power to stop it from coming true. I won't let you fall, Rey.”

You do regret it.
“You mean, you won’t let me fall like you?” she asked boldly. The tenderness in his eyes hardened. “I meant what I said before; I wish I could have been at the temple, Ben.”

“No.” She didn’t know whether he was arguing with her or reassuring her. Maybe both. “Don’t be naïve, Rey. You would have been disappointed like you were in the throne room when you couldn’t save me. If you were there… it wouldn’t have been any different than Dev or Tionne or Jacen.” The names sounded rusted on his lips. It was quite possible he hadn’t spoken them aloud in years. “You saw what happened to them. You would have fallen too, either by death or to darkness.”

“But Jacen could have helped you! I would have helped you –”

“Perhaps now that you know how it turned out,” he said. “But even if you were at that temple, even if you could have made a difference, you couldn’t have known how it would end. You wouldn’t have known how to help. Just imagine what you would change if you could go back to when we first met? It’s no different. You couldn’t have done anything. You would have been asleep in your hut when my uncle tried to kill me, just like the others. You couldn’t have stopped Cade. You couldn’t have prevented Dev’s death. You couldn’t have silenced Snoke in my head. Nothing you could have done, aside from killing me, would have helped me. You would have either joined me or died, too. That is why the Force ensured you weren’t there.”

Would she have done anything differently? Without everything she knew, would she have believed him? Would she have been able to convince him to stop? Rey remembered the desire for revenge she felt that night on Starkiller. If she had held Finn as he died, would she have killed Kylo? If she had been at that temple and watched him be betrayed by other Jedi, would she have done anything different than Jacen? They had been simple answers before. Now she wasn’t so certain. “I would have helped you sooner, when you were a child. I would have protected you from Snoke, I would have shown you that you weren’t alone.”

His eyes lost focus as he considered her assertion. “No, it wouldn’t have mattered.”

“You’re so sure.”

“Yes, Rey, I am,” he said, his voice tight with emotion. “No matter what, I was born with my grandfather’s blood in my veins. Even if you were there, my parents would have lied to me. They would have feared my darkness. Snoke would have found me. My parents would have abandoned me. Luke would have tried to kill me. And I would have turned. Nothing you or Dev or Jacen or Alema or Tionne could have done would change that.”
The tears were swelling again, but she still held desperately onto the hope that the Force had shown her those memories for a reason. “Fine. If I couldn’t have helped you before, maybe I still can now. I can do what Jacen couldn’t do for you… and what you couldn’t do for him.”

Kylo was silent, but she knew whose memory had brought the pain to his eyes. Of all the memories that she witnessed, the loss of Jacen to darkness cut her as deeply as the Dev’s death, because it had cut him as deeply. Everything that happened in his childhood paled in comparison to the pain she had felt – he had felt – when Jacen was lost to darkness.

Maybe the key to bringing Ben back to the light is to turn Jacen.

“It breaks my heart, Ben. You two were so close. It’s not too late. We could save him, too. I’ll help you...” she offered quietly.

“There is nothing left of Jacen to save, Rey. The Jacen I knew is gone. The Jacen I knew died that night at the temple with Dev,” he exhaled an uneven breath, the pain evident in his voice. “Ben Solo did, too.”

She thought about the memories she witnessed. She had seen the moment he had become Kylo, but believing that Ben Solo was gone was giving up hope in him. “You will never convince me that I am lying here in the arms of Kylo Ren.”

“Why is that?” His voice was distant. She didn’t have to search his eyes to know that his thoughts were somewhere else. She wished she could read his mind, but his barriers were high and strong. She nudged against his side of the bond, but he was unyielding.

“You may not see the change in you since we first met, but I do. You’re different – a good different. You want to do the right thing; I know you do. There’s nothing Kylo Ren about you, except maybe all these scars,” she said, watching the twitch of expressions cross his face as her fingers wandered over the rough ridge of his visible scars.

His mind snapped back to the present, his eyes pinning her with their intensity. She certainly had his attention. He hummed to feign disinterest, but she could see nervous bob of the apple of his throat and feel the rapid thrum of his heartbeat.

Rey wondered if it bothered him that her fingers trailed over his bare skin, when his memories made clear his negative opinions on touch. She watched him carefully. He allowed it, as he had allowed her to touch his bare hand on Ahch-To, so she continued. "What are all these burns on your shoulders from?" She traced the wounds lightly with the tips of her fingers. He shuddered. There was something about touching him that was… thrilling, even when it was brushing over imperfections. They were his imperfections, and she wanted to memorize them all with her touch. Soothe them. There was a heated protectiveness she felt when she traced the grooves, even over the ones she had given him.

“Training droids.” She sensed gratitude for the change of subject. Physical pain was an easier matter for him to discuss.

She, however, did not share his apathy toward imagining him in pain. “You use training droids that burn you?”

His voice was light, almost... amused. “Their lightsabers do, yes.”

“Why?” Rey asked, truly curious. Was it the quick path to the darkness? Did he find twisted enjoyment in the pain?

"I learn faster."

She gently trailed her fingers over his chest, finding the ridges of old wounds hidden under the surface. The skin was smooth and soft; without touching him, she never would have known they were there. She supposed it was like the rest of him; there was far more to him beneath the surface. It was only when he let her close that she understood the truth.

As she traced them, she could almost feel the pain associated with each one, and the weight each burdened him to carry. “What are all these scars from?” Some she recognized, especially the fresh ones. Chewbacca’s bowcaster had left a large one on his lower abdomen. Finn had left one on his shoulder, as had she. None compared to the other one she left.

"Punishment," he replied quietly. He closed his eyes and swallowed the emotions she felt surfacing in the bond.

"For what?"
"Failure." The scars were merely the physical manifestations of the emotional wounds that cut deeper than even she had suspected. She reached up to trace the scar on his face. Her scar. He recoiled at her touch, catching her wrist before she could pull away. She winced in pain as his grip tightened.

“Ben?” His eyes snapped open, and he immediately released her, the bond vibrating in horror of his visceral reaction.

“Rey? Did I hurt you?” he choked. “I don't know what...” His body was all at once clammy, and his heart stuttered rapidly underneath her. He pushed up on an elbow to reach for her, but she jerked away from him. She wanted to run, get as far away from him as possible. Not because of what he had done, but because of her guilt for causing that reaction. If she didn't feel as if that moment in his arms was their last chance, she might have run from her shame as she had done in the throne room.

When the impulse faded, she saw the remorse in his eyes and fully comprehended what she could have done if she had left. He wouldn’t have seen it as her running from her shame, but running from him. It would have continued the misunderstanding and miscommunication to further deepen the chasm between them. Instead of continuing down the cycle that had been tearing them apart; she stayed. Her eyes were downcast in guilt as she finally spoke, “I shouldn't have... I don't know what I was... I'm sorry – for touching your scar and for being the one who caused it.”

“No, no, Rey. it's not you,” he assured her, dipping his chin so she would meet his gaze. “I didn't mean to panic. It's a reaction, sometimes, from... before. I thought that weakness was trained out of me years ago.”

The heat of anger immediately ignited underneath her skin. “Snoke?” her voice wavered with the fire of her hatred toward the monster. Kylo simply nodded, refusing to speak the creature's name aloud. “What did he do to you?”

It was his turn to avert his eyes in shame. “I told you; Nothing I didn't deserve.”

Remembering the instances of torture she had witnessed, and sensing he did not wish to relive those memories, she held her tongue. She didn't want to force him to relive it, either, nor did she want to know the depths of Snoke's depravity over the six or seven years he was in the creature's clutches, or the decades before when he was grooming him into the perfect apprentice. Rey sensed, however, that whatever the Force had shown her only skimmed the surface of what he’d endured. "Do you think you deserve the scar I gave you, too?"
“Yes,” Kylo said, dropping onto his back from his propped-up position. "But this is not like my other scars. I didn't leave it as a reminder of my failure. It is the best thing that ever happened to me." He bit his lip to suppress a smile. But she saw it. The corners of his eyes crinkled. Slight dimples accented his blushing cheeks.

"How so?" She had expected anger and resentment, but the bond swelled with admiration and something else... something fleeting, but warm and steady. He tilted his head to the ceiling to avoid her stare.

"It reminds me of you," his tone was inexplicably amused. He was describing less of a painful reminder and more of a thrilling memento. Rey felt regret for what she had done, now that she knew him, but she sensed none from him. He had access to skin grafts and bacta to erase the scar. He could have treated it. She had wondered why he chose to live with something so noticeable and permanent.

He left it not as a reminder of failure, but a reminder of... me?

"You want to be reminded of me?” Her voice sounded breathless, and she averted her gaze, twisting her fingers through the hem of her grey tunic. “Why?”

He studied her for a moment, before forming a captivated interest in the structure of the ceiling. Before Kylo could respond, she decided she didn't want to know the answer. “When you think of me, what’s the first thing you think of?” she asked instead. It was still bold, yes, and dangerous. She had left herself vulnerable, and she feared he would notice. He could hurt her with his response, though she would not dwell on why. He pleasantly surprised her when he exchanged her vulnerability for his own.

“Your eyes,” he said without hesitation. “Sometimes they’re warm brown. Sometimes they’re fierce green. It's your light, I think. You look at me, and I hate it, but your light finds my darkest shadows. And as much as I try to destroy it, it remains. Your name suits you and your eyes. Bright and hopeful, like the sun.” Her breath caught in her throat. His mother’s words replayed in her mind. Mostly to herself, but audible enough for him to hear, she repeated those words.

“Hope is like the sun,” she whispered. “If you only believe in it when you see it…” Kylo inhaled sharply, his fervent stare finding hers in an instant. She watched him mouth the rest of the words. He turned toward her slowly, searching her eyes answers.

“Where did you hear that?” his voice trembled. The cadence of his heart danced rhythmically against her open palm on his chest. Her pulse spiked with the hope that his mother was right.
“Your mother...” Rey breathed, searching his expression carefully. His face was stoic, but his eyes were fireworks of emotion. A shadow settled onto his features.

“Of course, Leia is... was forever hopeful. She loved that quote. But it is hard to believe in the sun when the darkness never ends.” There was darkness in his voice to match his words. In a moment of vulnerability, he had turned to the comfort of the dark, but she persisted. She had to know the truth.

“I heard she learned it from you, Ben,” she said. His lips parted, his eyes dilated, and his breathing quickened. He couldn’t temper the fear swelling in the bond.

_He knows. He remembers._

“It was the naïve ramblings of a weak little boy.” The answer was quick... almost rehearsed. She sensed the words were not his own, but she also knew they were words forged from his agitation. That could only mean one thing; he knew something, and she was breaking through.

She wouldn’t allow Snoke to continue his influence from the grave, on _either_ of them. “Was it or was that what _he_ wanted you to believe? If that was true, why would you hide it from me?”

“Hide what?”

“Do you remember the lullaby 'Mirrorbright?’” she asked, pinning him under her hand and stare. She wouldn’t let him avoid this answer. Kylo shuddered underneath her palm; it was all the answer she needed.

_Why didn’t you tell me?_

“You do,” she said. It wasn’t a question. “I don't have any memories of when I was a little girl, but I do remember a lullaby from my dreams. I used to hum it to myself on lonely nights, waiting for my family.”

“I heard that lullaby in your memories, Ben. And imagine my surprise when your mother just gave me a music box with that very _Alderaanian_ lullaby. How would an orphan on Jakku know a lullaby from a planet that was destroyed decades before she was even born?”

“I don’t...”

“No, Ben, you said you never lied to me; well, don’t you dare lie to me now,” she said, silencing his attempt at an alternative explanation. “When we first met, you looked and talked to me like I should know you. On Starkiller, you said, ‘It is you,’ and I didn’t understand it then, not until I talked to your mother. You saw that little girl in a vision a long time ago, didn’t you? And you sang her a lullaby.” He swallowed, preparing his words, stalling. “Didn’t you, Ben?”

Kylo's defenses fell.

“I convinced myself you weren’t real,” he murmured. “It wasn’t like the bond, but there was this girl in my dreams, for as long as I could remember. She was so lonely, and the nightmares kept her awake, like me. So I sang to her, like Leia would sing to me sometimes when I couldn't sleep. I didn't know what else to do for the girl. Even in her torment, she worried about me. She always said the same things; she was worried about me, she wanted to help me, she would call for me, asking where I was. I had no control when I would see her in my dreams, but she seemed to show up after the worst nightmares. She had sunshine eyes, and Leia would call her my ‘ray of hope’ in the darkness. Well, until I was fifteen years old. Then she was gone. She abandoned me like everyone else. When I was older, at Luke’s... at the temple, there was a flash in my dreams of an older girl’s face. But it was just a flash, and it was hard to see her eyes in the blue light, so I started to convince myself she wasn’t real. I tried to hold onto her hope, but after a while... the darkness won.”

Rey knew logically that there were parts of the story that only made sense if she was the girl, but she didn’t remember any of it. She didn’t remember him. It hurt her to know that, what would it do to him? “And you think I was the girl?”

He pushed himself up to face her and nodded.

They both tensed as Rey sat up and shouted at him. “Why would you never tell me!” She reacted defensively. Perhaps she was angry he kept something considerably significant from her. Perhaps it was to mask the fear of the consequences of his words. They had been bonded by something far more consequential than an accident, long before Snoke.

He’d had more than enough opportunities to tell her. She had nearly killed him, and she would have never known. She immediately appreciated her insignificance in the size of the universe, but simultaneously recognized her significance in the intricately woven fate in the Force. It was important enough for the Force to ignite a chain reaction of events – beginning long before either of them were born – that undeniably led them to the present moment. Anxiety rose in her throat as she felt powerless to control her destiny. The implication of his dreams was all-consuming – and terrifying – to contemplate.

“This isn't something you keep from people, Ben! You didn’t think that was worth mentioning?”

“When was I supposed–”

“I don’t know, Ben, maybe when you knew?” she shouted, pushing away the darkness despite her anger. “Maybe when we first met? Maybe when you realized it was me before I cut you open on Starkiller? Maybe when we had our visions on Ahch-To? Maybe in the throne room when you were begging for me to join you? Or how about when you told me you killed my parents? On Kamino, or after Concordia, or in the forest or my temple room, or – Force! – anytime before I almost killed you! I deserved to know!”

“What was I supposed to say, Rey? ‘I know we’re enemies; you hate me so much that I physically repulse you and you call me a monster and try to kill me whenever you see me, but I used to have dreams about you before you were even born? You were the only light I held onto through years of darkness? I used to believe that finding you was my destiny?’ Yeah, I am so sure that would have gone well,” he spat sarcastically.

“Yes! Why couldn’t you have said that? It’s better than telling me that I’m nothing!”

“You’re not nothing,” his voice deep and low, his tone vehement. “What would you have done if I told you in the throne room? Would you have believed me? Would it have mattered? You still wouldn’t have stayed...”

“No, I couldn’t stay with the choice you made, but it would have changed everything between us sooner. I would have understood.” Kylo rolled to his back and stared up into the darkness. He was quiet. She feared losing him to his thoughts.

“And I don’t think you're a monster,” she continued. “If you think I would fight for you, fly across the galaxy to an enemy ship, and lie here like this with you if I thought you were a monster... then you don’t know anything about me. And if you think I am physically... repulsed... by you because I asked you to put on a cowl while I was trying to argue with you... then you don’t know anything about women,” she whispered.
She absent-mindedly trailed her fingers lightly across the expanse of his bare chest. He seemed warmer under her touch than he had a moment before. They both shivered, but he didn’t pull away. His stuttered breath shocked her back to reality. Rey stilled her hand, quickly changing the subject.

“How did you know I was that girl, Ben?”

He cleared his throat. “I was convinced the girl abandoned me like everyone else, but I never stopped thinking about her, even when Snoke told me it was all my imagination. I found myself searching for her energy among the crowds when I led my forces from world to world. Snoke tried to train it out of me, I tried to train it out of myself, but even at my darkest I was still searching for her. I had learned through Snoke’s training how to destroy my memories, and I had decided when I returned to Snoke, I would remove every memory of her to finally prove my loyalty.”

“The battle of Yashuvhu was my last mission before returning to the Supremacy. It was on that mission that I had a vision; I call it a vision because I don’t know what else it could be. It had been more than a decade since I had last seen the girl, but I thought I saw her at the end of the battle when I stood with the other Knights. It was raining, and she disappeared too quickly to see her face, but I swear I knew that Force signature from somewhere. I thought perhaps I remembered it from a dream. If the girl from my dreams and the girl from my vision were the same, then it seemed like the key to... something... everything.

“When this vision appeared right before I planned to willingly forget the girl, I believed there was a purpose in the Force, one even my master couldn’t see. I was not assigned the mission to retrieve the map, but I chose to go, to prove to myself that the Force wasn’t guiding me with that vision. That it meant nothing. When I landed on Jakku, I didn’t sense that signature in the Force, or I would have torn the world apart looking for her. I felt... an awakening... in the Force the following day, right before I heard that a girl had helped FN-2187 escape off Jakku, on the Falcon. It awakened something in me, something I had thought died a long time ago. I couldn’t shake this tugging in the back of my mind that somehow, she was important. When I landed on Takodana in search of the map, it led me straight to you. I thought it had to be all connected.

“When you and I first met, I swore I recognized you as the vision from Yashuvhu, or at least your energy. In the interrogation room, I removed my mask, but you looked at me like a stranger. I was supposed to find the map, but I searched your memories instead. I was hoping to find the same dream from my childhood, from the girl’s point of view. When I searched your mind, I was hoping to find... me.”

“I only found dreams of an ocean and an island, memories of my... father. I began to think Snoke was right, it was all in my mind. But when you called my grandfather’s lightsaber on Starkiller to avenge your friend – that fiery light in your eyes like the brightest sun– I knew it was you. I know it sounds crazy, but it was like I’d seen that moment before. When you accessed my training to defeat me, I knew that my fate was tied to yours. When we were bonded, I had hope. When I saw the vision in the hut, I was certain. You were that girl. That changed everything for me.”
“But this whole time... and you never told me?” Rey tried to hide the emotion in her voice. “Would you ever have told me? Did I not deserve to know? I could have killed you and never known any of this...” Lying back down next to him, she pressed on his shoulder to encourage him to turn on his side and face her. He obliged. Lying on their sides facing each other made Rey feel even more vulnerable than before.

Kylo sighed heavily as he adjusted his body to lie comfortably. When he was finished, the air between them seemed thicker. He was silent for a moment as he allowed her to search for the truth in his eyes. “I knew for certain in the hut, but my uncle interrupted us before I could say anything. Then you showed up on the Supremacy, and I was more focused on what I had to do. In the throne room, I was just trying to convince you to stay. You didn’t remember me. I knew the information I had about your parents would be more important to you than I would be. I thought that would be enough. And part of me was still worried Snoke had implanted that vision after what he said about using me to trap you. After that, it didn’t matter, you left. I meant nothing to you, our bond meant nothing to you. Why would the past mean anything?”

“Isn’t that my choice to make?” she murmured.

“I thought about it,” he said. “I thought maybe I would tell you if you could ever look at me with anything other than hatred. I thought maybe I would tell you when it would mean as much to you as it does to me. I just... I didn’t know what to make of it. I saw you in dreams my entire life, and then you showed up as my equal in the light. And you only knew me as a stranger, as your enemy. It made no sense, and I had no proof. You never saw me before Takodana, you didn’t remember me. What I saw doesn’t matter.” His voice was even and calm, but there was a slight edge of pain. It did hurt him that she didn’t remember.

"It's my fate, too. You should have told me, Ben, whether it scared you or not. I could have told you that even if I didn’t remember the dreams you remember, I had visions about you, too.”

His lips trembled in what she could only describe as relief. It gave her the courage to continue, knowing it would change everything between them. “Not as a child, I don't think, those dreams were more like whispers. I don't remember anything before my parents’ ship flew away. I never felt the Force until I touched Luke’s lightsaber on Takodana, minutes before I met you. That was when I had my first vision of you. What the Force showed me, it all concerned you. I saw you as a child in a corridor with Snoke, the burning of the temple, and in the snow on Starkiller. That was also when I saw you with the Knights of Ren on that planet in the rain, but it had to have been years after you were there. I don't understand any of it. The visions were more like nightmares to me, but maybe I just didn't know how to interpret them yet.”

He let out a deep breath and closed his eyes. "I knew it. I knew it couldn’t have been just me. This bond between us was never Snoke's doing, he only tapped into something that was already there. It was our destinies to meet, Rey."
Rey felt like every choice she had ever made had not been her own, but rather a predetermined stroke on some unfathomable canvas, and she was too close to see the whole painting. If everything had been predestined, could she save him? Could she save Finn? She stared at his face until his eyelids fluttered open. She searched his eyes for comfort in the uncertainty. “And that doesn’t bother you?”

“It terrifies me.”

Rey was quiet for a moment, before she whispered, “Well then, what does the Force want from us, Ben?”

“I don’t know, yet. But if I have had visions of you my entire life, that has to mean something, right? We are enemies because we have been told we are supposed to be. But they don’t know what we know. I can’t see these visions, feel this bond and dream of you my entire life and still believe that our only destiny is to kill each other.”

"I could have killed you, and you could have killed me,” she reminded him, “so are you saying the Force intervened?”

“I think Crait was the closest I came to… to…. I felt so betrayed. I don't remember much after waking up to Hux instead of you in the throne room. But I would have regretted it once the darkness cleared. You were foolish to let me live.”

She rolled her eyes and snorted. He truly was an enigma. “What about on Starkiller?”

"I could have,” he confirmed. “I could have pushed you off that cliff. I didn’t want to.”

Rey couldn’t help but smile. “Is that why you broke your ‘never hesitate’ rule?”

“How…” His eyes tracked her smile before wandering over the rest of her face. “I have broken many of my ‘rules’ for you, but I told you on Starkiller, I wanted to teach you.”

"The dark side?”
"Dark side or light side...it’s all learning the ways of the same Force... don’t forget that,” he said. “I felt you access the Force to draw knowledge of training and fighting techniques from me. How is that any different? I wanted to teach you how to reach your full potential. You still don't realize it, even now. You can do unimaginable things."

"I’ve read most of Luke's Jedi texts, and they say the teachings of the light and the dark are very different –"

"Do you have the journal Science of Creating Life?" Kylo grasped her shoulder, his eyes wide as he searched hers intently. It wasn’t the first time he learned she had the texts; he had taught her to read them, but he acted as if it was. Her breathing quickened with his. There was an urgency to his tone and almost ... hopefulness.

Her eyes narrowed. “Why?”

"I need it. It’s important."

She wasn’t certain she wanted to know what he would use it for, but she didn’t want to offend him by asking. Still, she couldn’t hide the suspicion in her eyes. “How important?”

“Life or death important.” His own eyes were guarded, and she knew he would not reveal more. She wanted to press him, wanted to know why. If it was for the First Order, he wouldn’t trust her with their secrets.

How important can one ancient book be?

She worried her lip as he studied her, waiting for her response, waiting for her to trust him. Could she? "If I give it to you, will you help me?"

Rey watched the disappointment fall over his features, but he nodded. “Yes.” His voice was tight, almost sharp, when he answered her. She wondered what he believed she would ask.

Fiddling with the edge of her tunic, she worked up the nerve to ask him. Would he laugh? Would he be angry? She was still his enemy, after all. “Even if I ask you to help me rebuild a lightsaber?”
His expression softened and his voice lost its edge. "That I can do."

"Promise?"

"I promise, Rey," he assured her. The twitch of a smile played on the corner of his lips. She searched his eyes as he steadily held her gaze. It was the truth. He tenderly brushed a stray hair from her face, but immediately stiffened when he realized what he had done. He continued, eyes downcast, slightly abashed. "And I'll help you build one even if you don't trust me enough to give me that journal. You should know that. But you don't need to build one, you can take mine. I have the means to make another."

Rey understood the significance shrouded in his offer. A lightsaber was more than just personal, it was an extension of himself. To give her his lightsaber, was to give her himself. It was a connection to his very soul... and the last connection to Ben Solo. "You would give me your lightsaber?"

"Yes," he said. "Because of our bond, it will respond to you as does me, maybe even more." He summoned his lightsaber and handed it to her. She trailed her fingers over the grooves in the hilt, remembering how powerful it made her feel in the throne room... and standing above him.

She laid it reverently down next to him and watched his entire body tense as he braced for rejection. Without hesitation, she wrapped her arms around him. He tensed further, but didn’t pull away. "The gesture means a lot to me," she whispered. "It really does, but I cannot accept it. You need it. It suits you. And it has a connection to you still, even if you believe it is gone. Maybe you can help me, rebuild this one or a new one, together?"

He nodded, distracted by her arms wrapped around him. It would take time, but she would teach him to enjoy a hug again. She would have tried to convince him to relax if she wasn’t battling unease herself. The thought of building her own lightsaber was daunting. Logically, she knew she would have to intentionally dominate the crystal – she had watched him do it to his own – but she feared the color her crystal would be if she had to find a new one.

"Ben, I’m afraid. What if my crystal is red?"

Kylo pulled away from her embrace. "You’re afraid? That I’ll do to your crystal what I do to everything else I touch?" The words stung when formed by his lips. They were the same words she had screamed at him in her temple room as she threw droid parts at him. She swallowed the guilt tightening in her throat and shook her head. She wasn’t concerned about his darkness; she feared her own.

“No, Ben, I’m afraid I won’t be good enough. How do I know I’ll pick the right one?” She could hear unease slipping into her voice. She knew he heard it, too. “How do I know what color it will be?” Tears blurred her vision, but she blinked them away. When she found his stare again, she found remorseful understanding.

Kylo soothed her fears by rubbing his thumb along the soft slope of her shoulder, though she was certain he wasn’t conscious of it. He rarely touched her. “You will find a world with Kyber crystal caves, and the crystal will choose you. Crystals begin colorless, and when you form a bond with the crystal, the color of your crystal becomes what is inside of you. But it won’t be red, I promise, not unless you bleed it like I did.”

“But I have darkness. What if I bleed it accidentally?” Rey feared what the Resistance would do if her lightsaber was red. Would they force her to leave? What would she do? She could never be a Jedi.

“You won’t,” he reassured her. “I had darkness, but mine was blue. You saw my memories. What I did – it was no accident.”

Rey was relieved for once by his logic, but she sensed the return of his self-directed resentment and shifted her focus to something less painful. "If I can’t find a Kyber world and I fix this lightsaber, will it need crossguards?"

“Maybe,” he said after a moment of thought. My crystal is cracked, which causes unstable thermal reactions and unstable heat. The quillons are lateral vents to divert the heat, otherwise it would explode. Which it did. Twice. Your crystal is broken, so theoretically it could work without the vents, but I don’t know what it will do to the plasma in the chamber. You may need vents, but you’ve wielded mine, you’ll be fine. I like it - it's more intimidating… and just as deadly.” The memory of how deadly it could be flashed before her eyes. She was quiet as she attempted to force the images from her mind. She couldn’t reconcile the violence that night on the skywalk and the man she was bonded to. She had asked him before, and she had seen his memories, she knew the answer. Did he? Did he regret it?

“Ben, why did you kill your father?” she whispered, voice trembling as she struggled to suppress her tears. She knew he was changing, she knew he wanted to change, but would he admit that to himself?
“Rey...” he warned, his voice heavy with emotion.

“You said I could ask anything.”

His tone, his eyes, his side of the bond was pleading. “I don’t want to fight you again. I don’t want you to leave.”

And I don’t want you to shut me out again, but I have to know.

“I won’t, I promise. I just want to understand why,” she whispered. Kylo hesitated, shifting onto his back as his eyes wandered away from her. Unsteady breaths escaped his quivering lips, his muscles contracted and loosened against her as he clenched his fists. If she believed she had more chances, she wouldn’t put him through it again while he was still grieving his mother. The thought of what Poe wanted her to do was never far from her thoughts, and she was running out of time. Still, she wondered if she had pushed it too far.

“You may not get the answer you were hoping for.”

“The only answer that I am hoping for is the truth,” she said. He stared at the wall until his eyes glossed over, almost as if he was staring right through it.

Please look at me. Please don’t hide from me again.

“I did it to kill the light left in me, to sacrifice everything I had left to the dark side.” He refused to move his eyes from his fixed stare into nothingness. “So I could have peace.”

“But you almost didn't do it.”

“I thought about going home. Or leaving for good, flying off into the Wilds, never to be seen again....” He was quiet for a moment, preparing himself for the wound he would be reopening by indulging her. She held her breath, fearful he would change his mind. “I realized there was no home for me to go back to after everything I had done, and everything they had done to me. For him to believe that I could just go with him was foolish. Or a lie. None of them had cared about saving me until I had fallen. The things I had done, the people I had lost, everything I had sacrificed would have been for nothing.”
“But they did want you home, everything your mother ever talked about –”

“I listened to his thoughts for the truth. And I found a memory of my mother begging him to bring me home. It hadn't even been his idea. He was just doing it for her. He never cared about me.”

“Ben…”

“It’s true,” he said, the pain cracked through his voice. “Han was only there for you, otherwise, he would have come for me sooner. You were gone a day or two, and he breached a secure First Order weaponized planet for you. He left me with my uncle at the temple and never came back for me. Not once. In over a decade. Not once when I trained with Luke. Not once when I had fled to the First Order. He only tried to turn me to save you.”

“Ben, he had already found me,” she said, wishing he would look at her. “He set the charges. He could have left, but he stayed for y –”

“He should have left!” he shouted, pressing the heels of his hands over his eyes. His entire body was trembling, and she immediately regretted putting him through that. “Or in those last seconds, I should have pointed the emitter chamber toward my own heart, forced him to watch the life fade from my eyes. That fate he deserved. But he wouldn’t have walked out of there; the entire First Order was watching us. If I didn’t…”

Kylo paused as his voice broke. He exhaled a shuddering breath. She didn’t have to see his face to know she would find tears there. “If I didn’t help him, he would have died either way. So I did the next best thing; I ended it before they could do worse. I didn’t lie when you asked me if I hated him. I didn’t. I convinced myself to do it because I loved him, even if he wouldn’t do the same for me. It was easier to trigger it than I thought it would be. The words he said to me... it was an echo of the moment I had done it before, when it wasn't Han, but an expendable prisoner. And when I triggered that lightsaber, when I had the strength to do it, I did feel peace. It was finally over…”

“And then he touched me, like I meant anything to him. I shouldn’t have looked in his eyes. He knew he was dying, but you should have seen it, Rey, he looked at me like his son. He had every reason to hate me, but right then Han was everything I had wished he could be my entire life. And it was too late. I could never take it back.”

This. This was what she had been waiting for. “If you could, would you take it back?”
“It doesn’t matter.” His voice was sharp and jagged on the surface, but she knew him well enough to know there was regret buried underneath and she would unearth it. She could feel how close he was to turning; it was as if they were standing at the edge of the precipice. If they only took a few more steps, he’d have to face the truth.

“It does to me,” she said, urging him that much closer. “I need to hear you say it.”

Prove to yourself that Ben Solo is still in there.

“I regret it more than you will ever understand.” She bit back the relief that bubbled in her throat, he was so close to seeing his dark path for what it was. She waited quietly for him to come to the same realization she had; he couldn’t be the man who killed his father any longer. “If I could give my life to bring him back, I would.” The words dripped like venom from his tongue. She had opened a nerve; his pain seeped into the Force around them like a heavy cloud. “I thought I found the answer – a life for a life – but I was wrong.”

The words were ominous. What answer? Was that what he wanted the book for? If it was, she wouldn’t give it to him. She fiercely disliked the idea that he had considered trading his life for his father, and she knew Han wouldn’t have wanted that. His thoughts were growing darker. She had to redirect him back to the light, back to hope, back to saving himself. “Ben, did Snoke ask you to kill him?”

“No.”

That’s not true, it can’t be.

“No?”

“He told me I had never ‘faced such a test’ and I knew ‘what I had to do.’” He murmured. “But that was my choice.”

“But he wanted you to,” she pressed. “Han had no Force powers, you were estranged, why would Snoke want you to kill him?” Her tone was gentle, in fear of further agitating him, but she knew she had to keep probing deeper.
You have to see what I see in you. Then you'll turn.

“Han tried to warn me,” he said, with less provocation than he had before. “He told me Snoke was only using me for my power. I wish I never had the Force, I wish I could be free from the shadow of my bloodline, I wish I could be the hero who didn't need anyone or anything like Han. I hated it, tried to deny it, but I still wished I could just... be like him. It was the reason Snoke asked me to kill him. He knew the foolish sentiment I still held for my father. If I had just hated him, he would still be alive.”

It was twisted, and painful to hear, but Rey knew it was the truth. Snoke knew he would never truly have Kylo until he broke that connection. “You have your father's heart,” he had told him in his memories. Snoke was jealous and wanted Kylo to himself. Snoke feared him, just like everyone else did. He needed to control him, and he could only do that when he was weak. Snoke guided him to make the ultimate sacrifice to do it, in the promise of being stronger than Vader. He knew the torment Kylo would suffer at the loss of his father. Even after he proved himself to be a worthy apprentice, it was not enough for Snoke. It was never going to be enough. She knew all of it from his memories, but she never expected him to realize it, too. “Peace is a lie, Rey. He used me to destroy my uncle, he used me to lure you into a trap. My father was right, when I was of no use anymore, he would have killed me, just like Luke failed to do.”

“If you know what he did, why stay with the First Order?” she pressed.

Please, Ben.

She curled in tighter against him, refusing to look into his eyes in fear of what she would find there. “If I left, my father's death would be for nothing,” he breathed into her hair. It wasn’t an admittance that he was ready to turn, but it was close enough; she still had hope

“But Han died trying to save you,” she said, her heart pounding against its cage in plea. “If you can't be saved, then his death will be for nothing.”

“I can't be saved, Rey.”

No, I won't let you do this again.

“No? Then why didn’t you kill your mother?” She was desperate, searching for the key to getting through to him. He sighed in frustration, and she wondered if those were the words that would
She didn’t expect him to answer.

“I don’t know. I wanted to... but then I felt her. She wasn’t even angry with me. After everything I did. After the monster I became. I only felt her love for me, and her foolish hope that one day I would come home,” he exhaled slowly at the thought as he blinked back tears. “I knew Snoke was wrong. Killing her wouldn’t end the conflict tearing me apart. It would make it worse, just like the death of my father did. I knew, but it wasn't enough to break my loyalty to him, and now she’s dead because I didn’t think fast enough to stop those missiles,” he said through clenched teeth. “No one could’ve broken my loyalty to Snoke, not until you. He underestimated what I would do for you.”

She wanted to say every thought that burst into her mind.

Not enough to turn, was her first thought.

Or

Why me?

Or

What exactly would you do for me?

She didn’t ask him any of it, because she noticed his eyes grow distant. She was losing him to his thoughts again. “Ben.” She didn’t know why she did it, but she wrapped her fingers around his wrist and trapped his hand between her palm and her cheek, forcing him to look at her. His eyes found hers immediately, dragging him back to the present. “What do you want from me, Rey?”

To turn, she thought. She believed with everything in her that he could, so she pressed on.

“Why did you kill all those innocent people on Hosnian Prime? There were children.”

“Believe it or not, under Snoke, I did not make all the decisions for the First Order,” he said. She could hear the resentment in his tone, but she wasn’t sure if it was directed toward her or his former master. “Hosnian Prime was Hux. Starkiller was his endeavor. Snoke knew when I found the plans for Starkiller on Malachor that I didn’t agree with the weapon being created. I thought they would only use the weapon as a threat, but Snoke lied; that had never been their intention. He hid their plans from me until they were prepared to use it against the Republic. I was off-world when they unleashed its destruction on the galaxy. I was powerless to stop it.”

Yes, Ben. You know the truth, don’t you?

Rey could see it; this would be how he’d realize that everything he had killed for was a lie. He had admitted more than she could have hoped for about Snoke and his father. He had said it himself, he regretted all of it. He wanted to give his own life to save his father, he knew Snoke had used him, he knew what the First Order did at Hosnian Prime was wrong. He could finally see the First Order for what it was and turn. Come home. She could save him, all he had to do was realize that destruction was no longer a path he wanted to follow. “Then why not leave the First Order?”

Say it. You have no reason to stay.

She stared into his eyes, pleading with him to give voice to the words she knew he felt. Something was reflecting in them, however, that made her heart clench. She could feel her hope fade.

Please, don’t do this again, Ben.

“Rey,” his voice was soft, but it didn’t soothe the bitter sting that accompanied them. “I’m the Supreme Leader now, so I can assure that there are no more Hosnian Primes. And I may not have agreed with their method, but I agreed with the principle. I still do. The New Republic had to be defeated.”

No!

“No, Ben. What about the innocents!” she demanded, pulling herself further from his grasp to search his face, as his hand slid from her cheek to her arm. She was too concerned to care, hoping that the progress they had made was not unraveling before her eyes. In her heart, however, she knew. The pain and conflict had faded from his eyes; he was still holding onto a lie.

Why?

“Rey, sometimes the loss of innocent lives is a necessary evil. Do you think Luke considered all the maintenance workers, mechanics, contractors, families, and prisoners located on the Death Star when he destroyed it? Did you consider them on Starkiller? Or the stormtroopers like FN-2187 that had been brainwashed as children and could have been turned to your cause? No. Why? Because it was for the greater good. It was the price of war.” Rey was quiet as his words settled over them. His logic terrified her. She knew his reasoning was flawed, that mass genocide could not be explained away as a "necessary evil." But he spoke with such conviction that for an instant it nearly sounded reasonable. And after Luke’s third lesson on Ahch-To, she wasn’t certain his uncle would have disagreed.

It’s impossible. You couldn’t believe these things. You couldn’t think you’re right in this.

She couldn’t argue it with him; they would never find common ground. Poe would argue similar beliefs for the opposite side; she knew well enough that moral righteousness was subjective in war. That was not something she could change in either of them overnight. She searched instead for a way to lead him back to the path of regret again. She still had hope in him. “Then what about the other students at Luke’s temple?” she tried. “I saw what happened. You could have left them alive.”

He closed his eyes, his fingers twitching on her arm as if he feared she would flee. Despite her agitation, she laid her hand over his in assurance. Her heart fluttered when he gripped her tighter. “Rey, I know you're hoping to find excuses for everything I've done, to give you reason not to give up on me. But it’s not that easy; there isn't some convenient reason that absolves me from what I've become. I’m not a spy for the Resistance, and I wasn’t possessed by some evil entity. I killed people, by my own free will, because I am a monster. That is the truth you're seeking.”

“Ben, please...”

“I don’t remember why I killed them... survival... revenge... The ones who believed me about Skywalker’s betrayal became the Knights of Ren, like Jacen. I killed the ones who took Skywalker’s side, who defended Cade.”

“What about Tionne?”

Please, come back to me.

She was losing him, she could almost feel him grasp desperately onto his convictions. “When I first joined Snoke my only purpose was to eliminate all the Jedi and destroy the Jedi Order. It… it is still my purpose. I became the Jedi Killer. I did what I had to do. If I didn’t kill her, she could have become the next Skywalker. She could have grown stronger, trained others in the error of their ways and eventually killed the other Knights.”

“Ben, how is that any different than me?” His thumb rubbed her arm gently, almost reflexively, as he considered an answer that never came. Instead, he turned onto his back again, as his eyes focused above him. He was running away. The conversation had not turned the way Rey had hoped. He was defending unfathomable mass murder, rather than realizing that he was not the monster everyone wanted him to be.

Still, she wouldn’t give up on him. If he wouldn’t admit the truth, she would force him to see it. Her most challenging task was to convince him to stay long enough to have a chance. “You are called the Jedi Killer...and I am called the Last Jedi.” Despite the dire consequences of his words, and hers, she found herself struggling to stifle a smile at the ridiculous monikers.

Kylo turned his head to glare at her, but she caught him rolling his lips to suppress a smile. He seemed all too eager to accept the temporary peace offering she had extended to him with her jesting words, avoiding the perilous spiral the debate would have taken. “Are you mocking me?”

“No, never,” she said unconvincingly. He snorted. “Well, perhaps. It's just... I don’t think you’re doing a very good job with me.” Her attempt to suppress a grin failed miserably as she bit her lip. He huffed a breath, which Rey interpreted as an almost chuckle.

“I suppose not,” he said, amusement coloring his tone.

“What would your friends think?”

“I suppose it’s a good thing I don't have friends.” He had said it lightly. She knew it wasn't meant to be taken seriously, but it stung because she knew it held truth.

“What about me?” she asked quietly, allowing her hand to travel over the soft vein in his neck and along the line of his jaw. He swallowed thickly. She had been drawn to touch him since that night in the hut – to prove to herself that he was real – but now that she had, she couldn’t help exploring him – both emotionally and physically. Was it socially acceptable? She had no idea. But he didn’t stop her.

There was something warm and comforting she felt when his heated skin was under her palm. Even if his words were disappointing, it made her want to touch him even more; to hold onto him desperately in fear that she would lose him. Somewhere along the way she had become invested in the fate of Kylo Ren, and though she knew it was his own fight through the darkness, she couldn’t help trying to be the light that would help guide his perilous journey out. “Am I not your friend?”

He tilted his head down to study her face, locks of dark hair falling across his eyes. She fought the urge to sweep it back; that gesture felt too intimate. “I don’t think you want to be friends, Rey.”

“Well, I don’t make a habit of lying in bed with my enemies,” she said softly. He considered her answer for a moment, his eyes piercing through any defenses she could have created.

“You didn't answer my question, Ben.”

“I would kill for you, or give up my life for you,” he said, refusing to meet her gaze as he stared over her shoulder. “Does that count?”

“I’d prefer if you didn’t die for me,” she replied, “And it depends on who you would kill for me.”

“I suppose FN-2187 is out of the question.”

She knew it was his deadpan humor, but it forced her to consider the truth behind it. “After everything we've been through, would you still kill my friends?” She begged him to show the remorse she had seen earlier. “Would you kill someone even if I asked you not to?”

Kylo did not hesitate to answer. “Yes, if I had the right reasons, I would take the life of just about anyone, whether you asked me to or not.” His tone was impassive, not a hint of remorse or conflict in his voice. “If, for instance, they threatened your life.”

“But Ben, if you kill the people I care about, then you hurt me. You might as well cut me with your weapon,” she reasoned. “And if I ask you not to kill someone, but you choose to do it anyway, then you are breaking my trust in you. That's like breaking a promise.”
His brows furrowed slightly at her mention of a promise. She watched the conflict in his eyes as he struggled with the truth of her words. “Your life is more important than all of that. I can survive your hatred of me,” he said stubbornly, but she sensed that her words affected him more than it appeared.

“What about me, Ben?” Before Rey could catch herself, she brushed his raven hair from his forehead, his eyes bright in wonder at the gesture. He didn't comment on her lapse in judgment, but his eyes followed her hand as she rested it gently over his heart. “Would you kill me?”

“Never,” he breathed.

“Why not? I’ve betrayed you, I’ve left you, I’ve used you, I’ve lied, I’ve done everything they did.”

Why kill all these people but spare me?

He inhaled deeply as he considered her question. His eyes begged her to see what he didn’t want to put to words. This was something important, it would bring change, she could feel it. She waited. He chewed his lip before drawing in the Force for strength. “Rey, you are the only person who matters to me in the entire galaxy. Take that to mean whatever you want.” Her breath was trapped in her throat. The lilt of his steady heartbeat caressed her fingers through his chest. She felt the devotion and loyalty warm her through the bond before his shields were raised again. She had not been prepared for that kind of honesty. Frozen in his vulnerability, his eyes studied hers intently as he waited for her response.

She wasn’t prepared to search for the truth in her own feelings. She had succeeded in denying the extent of the emotions in her conflicted heart. Panic overwhelmed her. She wasn’t ready to face any of it.

Rey desperately sought for a question to distract herself from the emotions threatening to spill over into the bond. “How many...” she paused, chewing her lip, “how many people have you killed?”

Kylo shifted his glare away from her in disapproval of her question, a muscle in his jaw twitching in agitation. Rey could almost see the hope die in his eyes. She knew she was the one running away this time, but what was she supposed to say? She was betraying her friends, lying in the arms of her enemy; the man she was supposed to hate, the man she was supposed to kill. And it felt... right.
She knew she would continue to betray her friends in her pursuit to help save him, find belonging with him. What kind of person did that make her? In the end, did it matter what she wanted? No matter how she felt, or he said he felt about her, he was still on the wrong side of the war. He was still the Supreme Leader of the First Order. She couldn't forget that, and she refused to explore any of it until he had proven he was the man she knew he was. If her only way to escape those thoughts was to run away from them, then so be it.

Kylo didn’t push the issue, which she was grateful for. Instead, he returned to ponder his thoughts while staring at the ceiling. “That is a complicated question.”

“It’s not, Ben” she stared up at him, tears in her eyes.

_How many? Ten? Fifty? Oh Force, one hundred?_

His voice sounded remarkably even and casual for the severity of the subject. “It is, Rey. Do you count by my hand or that I’m responsible for?”

“What’s the difference?”

_Please just tell me a number._

She held her breath apprehensively. The longer she lay in his embrace, the more difficult it was to deny her complicated feelings for him. Did she want to know? What if she realized he was beyond saving, could she walk away and still pretend it didn’t hurt? What was the line, the number, that would make her abandon hope? How would she know what the right decision was when they were entangled in this impossible war?

“Take Tuanul – the village on Jakku where I captured your pilot... I killed an old friend of my family’s, Lor San Tekka, after he gave the pilot the map to Skywalker. But I ordered the stormtroopers to eliminate all the remaining villagers for harboring a fugitive of the First Order. Your FN-2187 hesitated to kill under my orders; he’s a liability to the Resistance.”

Rey huffed with irritation, giving him a pointed look as he continued, “Regardless, I am responsible for every villager’s death, but I only took one life myself. Or Concordia. My men were responsible for the deaths of the entire tribe on my orders; my hands were only responsible for a few that had been captured for information. Or in the vision you had of me with the Knights of Ren. Do you count the villagers I killed myself or how many we all killed together?” She shook her head, swallowing the bile rising in her throat. Despite the ache behind her ribs, she allowed him to continue.

“So what is it, Rey?” his tone pedantic. “Is it just those by my hand, like my father, or those I am responsible for, like the people on Concordia and the dozens of other worlds in the Unknown Regions my troops and the Knights conquered? And if you include those I am responsible for, does it matter if I was following orders or if it was by my orders alone? Does it matter if they were killed by others in the Order, making me guilty by association, considering that is how the Republic would charge me for War Crimes? If I was punished for my crimes by your friends, I would be held accountable for Hosnian Prime. If that's the case, then the destruction of the New Republic sets my total at millions... perhaps billions. How about the troops on my side that lost their lives under my command? I am responsible for their deaths as well. And do you count people like Snoke and the Praetorian guard? Or are you only counting people you don't agree with me killing?”

Why did the war and this man and her bond and morality have to be so complicated?

“I don’t know, Ben.” Rey buried her face in his chest, and he wrapped his arms around her. “I don’t know what the right answer is.” She wanted to cry or scream or break something fragile. She wanted the galaxy to know that it wasn’t fair that Ben Solo became this man. It wasn’t fair that this man was the only person in that galaxy she wanted to be bonded with. The war, her orders, her desires, her place in it all – it wasn’t fair. It took him a moment of hesitation, before he wrapped his arms around her tightly, accepting that as much as she hated his actions, she needed his comfort.

“Three hundred and eight.”

She pulled her face away from his warmth to stare at him. “What is that?”

“Three hundred and eight people,” he whispered, but she could hear the waver in his voice. “By my hand.”

It was everything she feared. The number was staggering, far beyond her hopes. She had seen him kill in her visions of him, had heard him speak of the villages he slaughtered, had watched him kill people with her own eyes, but she had never expected that. The tears rose unbidden to her eyes, and she leaned into his chest again to hide them. “How could you…”

How could you not regret the lives you’ve taken? How can you lie here and talk about murder as if it was nothing? How can you be two different people?
“I never said I didn’t regret the lives I’ve taken,” Kylo said after a moment of silence, reminding her of her bad habit of projecting. “But have you stopped to think maybe I’m not two different people?”

“Do you regret the lives you’ve taken?” she asked, ignoring her projection and his other assertion. She couldn’t see the emotions in his eyes while pressed up against his chest, but he said enough by not answering her question.

“How many have you killed, Rey?”

She shook her head defiantly. “No, I am the one asking the questions. In fact, you are not allowed to ask any more questions. Especially while answering my questions. I know your games, Ben.”

He hummed.

“Humor me,” he murmured into her hair. “Unless you would rather deflect?”

“I am not deflecting,” she said with conviction. He huffed another half-chuckle, she felt the heat of it against her temple and the vibration of it against her palm. “It’s different... that was survival.”

“War...survival...revenge...different dagger, same blade.”

“I would never kill someone who wasn’t trying to kill me.” She knew he wanted to turn her, so she would join him to rule the First Order. I am not like you, Ben. She expected him to pull away from her in anger, but her words had little noticeable effect on him.

“Ah... are you sure?” he asked in his derisive Kylo way that, for a split second, made her reconsider deepening the scar on his infuriating face. “You shot first, if I remember correctly. I first remember your darkness on Starkiller. You could have run when I went for my grandfather’s weapon. But you activated your weapon, my grandfather’s weapon, first. You charged me. You wanted to kill me, Rey, not because you were defending yourself. You wanted to kill me as revenge for FN-2187... and my father. Do I blame you? No. I deserved it.”

“But your darkness is rising, just as it did in me, to levels I never believed possible. When I was your age, I was not responsible for a single death... yet. In a few weeks, you have gone from trying to kill me on Starkiller to contemplating killing me in my sleep with my own lightsaber, because you hated me. If you believe your reasons are justified to kill for – revenge, war, survival – then you are justifying the reasons why I have killed.”

She was quiet for a moment, digesting his frustrating logic.

Why can’t you see that it's not the same? You were the enemy, you were killing people I cared for. I had no other choice. I had to do it for the sake of the galaxy. And when I took your lightsaber, it was the darkness... but you already knew that, because you were awake. Yet you let me do it. You could have defended yourself. You could have stopped me. You could have said... anything.

"Ben, why were you going to let me kill you?"

He snaked his arms tighter around her. "I wanted to know if you would do it."

Her throat tightened at the admission, overwhelmed with conflict. Her emotions were at war; part of her was remorseful that he was so obviously tortured, and part of her was furious that he gambled with his own life. "So, what... you would just let me kill you to satisfy your curiosity? Force, Ben!"

"If you really want to kill me, Rey, then I won't stop you," he murmured. She shook her head in frustration, biting back tears. I don’t understand. She had fought for fourteen years to survive in the harshest of conditions. Giving up had never once crossed her mind, even when the hope of survival was grim.

Rey was his enemy and yet she wondered if there was ever a time she had seen his life as expendable as he did. There had been more times than she could count that she had held his fate in her hands – had imagined taking it – yet she had never found it her right to do so. Even on Starkiller, when she hated him the most, she had the chance to end it all but hadn't. She had chosen not to do it in the throne room, even though she was heartbroken. And even when the darkness called her, and Snoke himself beguiled her to do it, she still couldn't kill him. She faced an ultimatum to end his life, but found his life meant more to her than any punishment by the Resistance. She truly did want to save him, more than she would ever admit. What would that mean for their future? Should she warn him of the Resistance's plans? What would he do? What would he ask her to do? All she knew, was that she wouldn't willingly help them. "Well, thankfully
"I couldn't kill you."

"I know. I'm grateful, for your sake," he whispered, resting his chin on her head.

She rolled her eyes at the ease at which he manipulated a conversation. "My sake?"

"I told you, I sense the darkness in you."

Rey pulled back from his embrace so she could study his face. "This... coming from the Prince of Darkness, who asked me to join him, and has seen how hate made me strong enough to best him on Starkiller." She grinned as she traced her finger along his scar. She didn’t know why she had done it, but by the time she had done it the damage had been done. Except, it hadn’t. This time, he didn’t flinch under her touch. He huffed a near chuckle instead.

"Snoke called me son of darkness. I am no prince."

“Your mother was a princess,” she reminded him.

He leveled a pointed look at her, but there was no heat behind it. “Of a world that no longer exists.”

“So what you're saying is... I'm Nothing and you're a Prince of Nothing.” She smirked in amusement, crinkling her nose. Kylo made a choking sound in his throat, but it only encouraged her. “Prince Ben. I like the sound of that.”

“You do remember that I am essentially the emperor of the galaxy, right?”

_How could I forget?_

Her finger trailed from his scar to the shell of his exposed ear, an endearingly boyish feature that was usually hidden in the sea of his raven locks. “I like Prince Ben better.”

“Ah,” he sighed in understanding. “You wish for me to have a respectable title without any of the power.”

Rey smiled as their eyes met. “Precisely.”

Kylo groaned in irritation, but his grip tightened around her, suggesting he felt otherwise. She had never felt safer than she did right then in the arms of her enemy. “I would have joined you,” she admitted quietly, the smile fading from her lips as swiftly as it had appeared. “If you were the Prince of Nothing, instead of the Prince of Darkness.” His breath hitched in his chest. He blinked rapidly as he digested her confession, and she wished he allowed her to be privy to the thoughts in his head. She searched his eyes for an indication of the emotions that were undoubtedly raging inside him, but he glanced away, refusing to look at her.

“I never asked you to join the darkness, Rey,” his voice was strained, the apple of his throat bobbed as he swallowed thickly. “Just me...”

“But it was the darkness in you asking me,” she objected. He nodded, in agreement to what, exactly, she could only guess, and dragged her closer to him so she couldn't see the expression on his face. But she could feel his pain in the bond. “Ben,” she said carefully, “if you live in darkness and asked me to be by your side in the company of darkness, then why do you fear my darkness? I don't understand.”

“The Jedi were wrong. Hate... anger... suffering... has its place. Darkness has its place. But darkness can easily consume you, Rey. I recognize myself in you, and that's why it scares me. There's so much light in you. If you killed me, you would have opened the floodgates to that darkness. Thankfully, you are stronger than me, and resisted its temptation...”

If you only knew, Ben.

“The way you channel your hate and anger has served you well. I fear that you will reach a point where you can no longer control it, as I did. I'm not Luke, I'm not asking you to eliminate it completely. You demonstrated the power of your darkness on Starkiller, but it was your light that spared me. It makes you unique. It makes you far better than I could ever hope to be. Don't lose that. But don't lose that warrior spirit either. The way you manipulated the darkness to challenge and best me on Starkiller that night is one of my favorite things about you.”

"The Resistance doesn’t think so,” she said before she could consider the consequences. She knew it was coming eventually, “They want to use what happened on Starkiller against you. They think if I challenge you to a rematch, then you’ll come. They are planning an ambush, and they intend to use me as bait. They would use your desire for revenge to lead you to your death."
Rey expected him to pull away from her, question her loyalty, or leave her to plan a counterattack. She expected anger… derision… panic, perhaps. Kylo was unpredictable, but she expected a reaction. He hummed but was otherwise silent.

Say something! She screamed at him across the bond.

"Revealing critical tactical strategies of the Resistance, Rey? That sounds an awful lot like treason,” he finally said, the deprecating tut of his tongue as irritating as his flippant tone.

"As if you know nothing of treason,” she snapped, abandoning the warmth of his chest to stare in his eyes. The anger flooding through her left her voice quivering. “And that's all you have to say? I'm telling you the truth! They plan to assassinate you! Why are you not taking this seriously?"

I don’t understand, everything is serious to you unless it involves your life.

"I'm in a position of power. The list of those desiring to assassinate me is a very, very long one. My own general would kill me if given the chance. I think you'd be hard-pressed to find someone who doesn't want to kill me,” he replied impassively. “I knew the consequences when I made my choice.”

“But they would use me to do it.” She gripped onto him tighter, pleading with him to care. His hand found the scar on her arm, and his gaze shifted to the old wound she had gained in the throne room. He seemed to have completely forgotten about the current topic. Of all the reactions she had expected, indifference was not one of them. “Ben!”

“Considering you are the only other Force-user in this war and you have a history of defeating me in combat, I think it is a reasonable decision,” he rationalized, still not looking up at her as he studied the scar. It was as if they were speaking of the efficacy of mag-pulse warheads versus proton torpedoes, and not his potential assassination.

Her pulse was pounding in her ears, each beat like a second, counting down until every choice they had ever made coalesced into a crescendo of destiny; a destiny that was fast approaching. "Well, do you want to know how they plan to do it, at least?"

"No."
"Why?"

"I like surprises," Kylo said bemusedly, distracted by tracing the pattern of the old wound. She rolled her eyes at his ironically laissez-faire attitude.

She sighed in irritation. “No, you don’t.”

“Do you know that your scar looks like two hands touching?” he interrupted with intended levity, signaling the conclusion of his side of that conversation.

"Don't say another word, or so help me, Ben, I'll strangle you right now with my bare hands. This is serious! You need to know! I can’t stand by, I can’t let you die, but I need your help! Their plan is already in motion!” Her voice was louder and more fearful than she had anticipated. Rey searched his eyes for reassurance, but his mind was somewhere else. The smirk that was twitching on his lips revealed his thoughts were nothing of consequence.

After a moment of heavy silence, she'd had enough. “Ben, for Force sake, say something.”

It was clear he was still not taking the conversation seriously as he avoided her stare, rolling a lock of her hair between his fingers. “Can I?”

“Can you what?”

“Say something,” he said. “You told me not to say another word or you would strangle me with your bare hands... because you want my help in preventing my death. I have to admit, that's an interesting method.” As she exhaled slowly in irritation, she regretted every single time she was annoyed by his brooding silence. “Although I would like to point out you could easily strangle me without your bare hands, considering you have access to the Force.”

“This is not funny!” Rey never thought those were words she would ever say to him. His father, perhaps, but not him. It was just proof there was still Solo in there somewhere. She grasped his face in her hands and forced her fear into the bond. “Please.”

Kylo sighed heavily in surrender.
“Why would you tell me this, Rey?” he whispered, trailing his finger down her arm. She closed her eyes, the frustration fading as she melted into his touch. “Why do you desire so strongly to save my life?”

“I...” Rey considered the many different reasons she had convinced herself why she needed to commit treason for this man; why she would travel across the galaxy for him, carry on in secret, put herself in danger, and lie in bed wrapped in his arms. None of the reasons were true enough. She knew if she was to continue to ask for his honesty, it was time for her to be honest with him. And herself.

“You are important to me too,” she said, “and not just because I want you to turn. We’re bonded; that means something.” His eyes narrowed as he peered into hers, reading her soul for the truth. “I won’t betray the Resistance, but I cannot allow them to kill you.”

Kylo pulled her closer to him. She closed her eyes as she leaned her forehead against his chest. "There are worse things you could do to me, trust me."

"Such as?"

"Such as making me live in a galaxy without you."

Rey didn’t know exactly what Kylo had meant by those words, but something deep inside her told her there was no going back. One thing she knew for sure, there was no denying his intentions anymore. He cared. They had both danced around their blossoming emotions, but he had vocalized the truth in her traitorous heart. Rey could not deny that they were both traveling down a dangerous road...and fast. She had pretended she was still teetering on the edge of this star-crossed, irreversible chasm of fate, but she had already fallen; and to her alarm, and relief, so had he.

"I'm not going anywhere...well, until the Force takes me back to the Resistance again." Rey smiled. She wrapped her arms around his back and breathed in the scent of his chest. Everything about him was intoxicating. As long as she stayed in his arms, then everything would be okay. She was safe. She was wanted. She was not alone.

It was just a lost boy and a broken girl wrapped in the warmth of their bond. Nothing else mattered, like the moment in the hut on Ahch-To. Just as it had been in the hut, however, their perfect bubble could not last; because it wasn't only "Ben and Rey," as desperately as she wanted it to be.
He buried his face in her hair. "I wish... I could hold you like this forever," he whispered.

"But... you can't?"

Kylo squeezed her tighter.

"No," he breathed.

That one syllable was enough to drop the entire galaxy out from underneath her. She was falling, her stomach turning with the weightlessness... but this feeling wasn't warm or flighty. It was terrifying and sickening. She didn't want him to ever let go, but she needed to know where he stood.

_You couldn't hold me like this and still want power more than me, could you?_

"So what happens now?" Rey wanted more than anything for him to just do what she knew in her heart he would do. Turn. Come back with her, so they could be together. She imagined he could hold her in his arms every night as the rest of the galaxy melted away.

"I don't know," he answered. It was honest. Kylo could have placated her. He could have whispered false promises to keep her there in his embrace, but he didn't. It struck her then, that no matter what evil this man did around him, he would be honest with her.

She pulled back in his arms and stared into his eyes. He pressed his lips together and swallowed. She recognized the way he chewed his words when his emotions threatened to expose him as vulnerable. As she felt him pulling away in the bond, her thoughts flashed back to the throne room.

"Rey..." The way he breathed her name was both a plea and a warning. She craved to melt further into his strong arms, but the look in his eyes was breaking her heart. He didn't say anything, but he didn't have to. She didn't want to know, but she knew.

_He's not going to leave the First Order._
Rey sat up as bile rose in her throat. "What is your plan here, Ben? You go back to destroying planets and trying to kill everyone I care about, and I go back to my friends who are plotting ways to assassinate you?" Her voice shook as she begged him to come to his senses, for him to choose her.

Kylo rolled onto his back and covered his eyes with his fists. "What would you have me do?" Her heart beat wildly. This was it. This was her moment to get through to him, this was her chance.

_I have to save him._

"Leave! Right now, Ben! We can be together like I saw that night when we touched hands. We're meant to be more than enemies across the galaxy. You can come to fight with the Resistance. You and I would be unstoppable against the First Order! You can come back to the light, and everything will be okay!" She pleaded with him desperately.

Kylo dropped his hands from his face and turned toward her. The moment in the throne room when she begged him to save her friends replayed in her mind. The pounding of her heart was deafening just as it had been there. She needed him to turn. He _had_ to turn. She had to save him.

_Please, Ben._

He was not Ben, however. And Kylo was not Kylo without his streak of total unpredictability. He intently searched her eyes for something, and when he didn't find it, he sat up and started... laughing. It was dark and tormented, but it was a laugh nonetheless. Confusion flooded through her as she had never seen the man truly smile let alone laugh and he chose right then – as she begged him to come back – to do it. She felt the anger burn in her chest.

"What could possibly be funny right now, Ben?" she growled indignantly through clenched teeth.

"Forgive me, Rey... “ Kylo cleared his throat to suppress his laughter. “You have no idea how long I’ve wanted to be more than an enemy to you. I don't understand what changed, but... saying I can leave the Order and join the Resistance? That’s incredibly naïve, sweetheart. Think about it. If I defect from the First Order, it's abandonment, if I go to the Resistance, it’s high treason. Any ship I take to get to you will be tracked, followed and promptly shot down if they have no strategic forethought. Or, if they were resourceful, they would track me right to you and eliminate the entire Resistance right then and there. If I leave the First Order, it is a death sentence… for both of us.”
In battle, he would fight even with all the odds stacked against him, but now he just gives up so easily. I'm not ready to give up that easily, Ben.

"Then I'll come get you. I went to you before, this time I'll bring you back with me!"

Please, Ben, don't give up on this.

"No, you need to stay there. It's too dangerous for you to be flying around the galaxy right now. And you had some help in surviving the last attempt to turn me, remember? But even if you did succeed, what's your plan? Bring me back to the Resistance? The ones you said yourself are plotting to assassinate me? Do you honestly think I can just walk into your base and your friends will take me at my word and just... absolve me of all my perceived crimes? I am an enemy of the Resistance, Rey. I am worth more to them tortured for information and then dead. Is that what you want?"

“They will protect you, I know it. We're a family. You can have a home here.” Her eyes were pleading with him to try. “Your family may have broken you, but it is not too late to make your own family.”

Kylo parted his lips to say something but thought better of it. He chewed his lip for a moment as he considered his words carefully. “You live in ignorance, Rey…” he began, and she glared at him, her brows furrowed in chagrin.

That is what you decided to go with?

“It's not your fault. You spent your entire life alone, learned to trust and rely on no one, and then you were thrust into this war. On your world, it was clear cut – everyone was out for themselves; only families cared for each other. So when the Resistance took you in like family, something you never had, you didn't stop to think about their motivations and intentions.”

“You’re right,” she said, the anger raw in her voice. “I never had a family, but whose fault is that?”

“I’m sorry.” His expression didn’t change, but his emotions over the bond did. She could feel the truth over their connection. He was sorry, but not because he did it.

“Why?” she asked, watching his reaction carefully. “I know it wasn’t you.” His stare swiftly found interest above him again, hiding his emotions from her.

Why did you lie and tell me you killed them? What did I see in your memory?

He didn’t deny it. “None of that changes that the motivations of your new family are not what you think they are, Rey.”

“And what are your motivations, Ben?”

“Right now, that is more for the First Order to fear than you.” Rey studied him for an answer to his cryptic words, but his eyes had still not returned to hers.

“Is that true? Does the First Order have more to fear from you than the Resistance? Or do you still plan on killing the Resistance if you find them?”

“If I find them?” his voice was light with humor. “If I want the Resistance dead, I know where they are.”

“Why haven't you come for them?”

He finally met her stare, tilting his head, confounded that she would ask something he clearly viewed as obvious. “Because of you.”

“What if I wasn't with them anymore?” she urged, a bloom of hope swelling in her chest. His jaw hardened. There was an edge of irritation, as if he resented her for asking. He wouldn’t answer, but she found her answer in his silence. He hadn’t found the Resistance because they were important to her, and she… was somehow important to him.

You are in there, Ben.

“If you're turning on the First Order, and you won't kill the Resistance, then it only makes sense for you to join us. You can turn, you can—”
Anticipating her line of thinking, he cut in, “Listen, Rey, I may be biased, but hear me out. I know you grew up in a troglodytic world, but the Resistance is not a family. It’s a political faction – a rebellion. The people may feel like a family, as long as your views and actions further their cause. The moment your views do not, they will put the needs of the organization over you. The pilot nearly killed you because of a bond with your enemy that you have zero control over. What you are doing here, with me, is a choice; it’s treason. Make no mistake about that.

“It is an offense punishable by death, no matter how close your 'family' is. My mother is no longer there to protect you, and you are a risk. As far as they know, you could be providing me information on their location or tactical plans. They wouldn't be wrong in assuming so. You are Force-sensitive, that is already reason enough to fear you. Their only motivation is to protect the Resistance, and if you interfere with that, you are no longer of use to them. Family or not, they will turn against you.

“But, let's pretend they are your family. What do you think happens if you bring me there? Even if they did not immediately kill or imprison me –which is very, very unlikely– they will not trust me. They have no reason to. And that means they will not trust you. You will lose your family because of your ties to me.”

Rey cried out in frustration. "Then prove they can trust you! Give them all the information willingly! If you help them dismantle the First Order, they will have no choice but to see what I see in you!" She imagined Kylo and Poe sitting across the table from one another, negotiating an end to the war. It ignited more hope in her aching heart.

"I can't do that," he said flatly.

"You can't or you won't?"

His dark eyes burned unyielding into hers. "I won't."

"Why?" Tears stuck to her eyelashes as she bit back her sorrow. Rey wanted to run again. She wanted to pretend that if she left for long enough, he would come to his senses. He was grasping onto lies. She would never be able to turn him on her own, she knew that, but she believed Ben Solo was in there, fighting against the years of gaslighting and brainwashing to do the right thing. He needed help, and she would fight with him. It would hurt to stay and fight when all she wanted was for him to turn. He had changed since she left him in the throne room; although Snoke was no longer in his head, the damage had been done. He needed the voice of reason, that was why the Force had brought her to him. She only hoped he found his own voice in the end.
When he spoke again, she prepared herself for the battle for Ben Solo. "I know I have not been loyal to the Order, but you must realize that all my treachery has been out of a necessity to keep you safe. There is still a part of me who will not betray the cause I sacrificed so much for."

“We as beings are naturally prone to chaos,” he continued. “It was the task of the New Republic, and now the First Order to eliminate chaos, instability, and disorder. It is the task of the First Order to save us from ourselves. This is much bigger than you or me, Rey; civilization is dependent upon the rule of law. Order promotes stability, and stability promotes progress. Progress was achieved through order under the rule of the Empire... but the stability was reduced to anarchy and chaos by the Rebellion. Instead of establishing order and stability, and promoting the progress of the civilizations they governed, the New Republic was gripped by the same disorder and weakness intrinsic to the Rebellion and now, in turn, the Resistance. The First Order will bring progress back to a galaxy gripped by chaos. The anarchy created by the Resistance is everything that is wrong for civilization. Can you not see that?"

In seconds he had transformed again. This was not the fierce warlord of Starkiller. This was not the soft-hearted son of a smuggler on Ahch-To. This was not the emotionally stunted cur of a monster's war machine on the Supremacy. This was the Supreme Leader. Her emotions warred between pride in his strength as a leader and disappointment that perhaps he was not as lost as she had assumed. She had seen Kylo slip into his verbose political façade before, but never like this. He was his mother's son, whether he liked to admit it or not, and she was not equipped to engage him in this arena. Rey, however, was never one to surrender, even when the odds were stacked against her.

"You may be well versed in politics," Rey's voice trembled, "But I know that violence and ruling with an iron fist is not what is best for the galaxy. Destroying entire systems is not what is best for this galaxy! It's mass murder! The New Republic served the people! You control them!"

“The republic you revere condemned you to a childhood of slavery!” Kylo sneered. “How is what I am doing worse than that?"

I was not a slave!

Rey shuddered in resentment but swallowed her retort. She waited, knowing the silence was when Kylo would usually be lost to his thoughts. He had promised to speak those thoughts that typically filled the void between them; so she quietly studied him, seconds stretching into minutes, yet she held her tongue in exchange for deeper insight into his head.

Please, Ben, just let me in. I need to understand, she begged him across the bond.
His tone softened as he conceded defeat and finally continued. “Do you want to know why the New Republic failed? Corruption had poisoned the highest levels of the Senate. It was unable to properly govern under the continual deadlocks and infighting. My mother wanted to change that and became a candidate for First Senator. Had she won, the First Order would never have had the opportunity to become a viable threat. Perhaps she would have done what I am trying to do, perhaps I would have followed her path after I failed at becoming a Jedi. But she never had the chance to make the changes necessary to save the New Republic. She had many enemies, including Lady Carise Sindian, who was a secret member of the First Order. She discovered my mother's parentage, but it was my mother's closest political ally Ransolm Casterfo who betrayed her and exposed her as the secret daughter of Vader. She would have been the most qualified First Senator, but revenge and the self-serving desires of political foes never spared a thought to what was best for the galaxy. That is the truth of the New Republic.

“I was never involved in the military hierarchy here, I never had an interest in the throne. But when I stared at Snoke's body, I remembered why the First Order was necessary. It was why I couldn't leave. I realized I can make a difference in a position of power, because I know the weaknesses of the Jedi Order, New Republic, Empire, and First Order. I can save the galaxy, because I will not placate the desires of the rulers of civilizations in exchange for the greater good. I will not be a slave to what the people want, but instead fight for what they need, because I cannot be bought.”

“But Ben, one person cannot possibly know what the civilizations of the galaxy need,” she argued. “We need law, yes, and passionate people like you to establish a Republic that does work. We need politicians like your mother who put the people first. But the First Order is just as self-serving as the New Republic was. You still have officers and generals who undermine your vision. Nothing will change! It is too much power for one person to possess! You killed all those people on Concordia. You did it, not for the good of the galaxy, but to protect one person. You killed women and children without trial or sentencing. You don't have to become the monster that everyone feared that you would be. You don't have to take this path.”

"Do you know what my mother said?" His demeanor had changed, the imperious tone subsided to a pensive tenderness, “I would rather be a monster that believes in something, that would sacrifice everything to make the galaxy better, than be someone who sits on the sidelines and watches as if it has no consequences to them.' Those were my mother's words, Rey, but I live by them. We may have ended up with different perspectives on how to resolve this, but my mother and I took a stand to fight for the betterment of this galaxy. We are not the type to remain complacent as the galaxy suffers around us. It's easy to sit idle and do nothing.”

“But it's also easy to be the hero,” he continued with a vehemence that implied conviction, not mechanical recitation. His views were deluded, but they were not formed solely by Snoke’s influence. “It requires little sacrifice. Civilizations are fickle. Legends never die, but the people who lived to witness those legends do. Civilizations change, and with them the collective perspective. If legends last long enough... the heroes will see themselves become the villains.”

“Like Luke and my mother. His greatest contribution to history was his exploitation of the sentimental weakness of his father. Hers was destroying an empire. There are arguably no two other people who have sacrificed more for the good of the galaxy. But time was not kind to their legacies. Civilians of the galaxy turned on them, because they couldn’t escape the truth that was their family. Perhaps in the future, their achievements will be forgotten, and history will instead remember their roles in the creation of Kylo Ren as their greatest contribution.”

Rey shook her head, but Kylo persisted. “Details and sentiments are forgotten over time. Morality and ethics become muddled. Righteousness becomes the judgment of the narrator. So whether right now, in this time, the group of anarchists you call the Resistance view me as the enemy is inconsequential. If I have to be the one they call evil to save this galaxy from itself, then that is a sacrifice I'm willing to make.”

"Please, Ben, I know you are trying to be the change the galaxy needs. You saw what the New Republic did to your mother, and you want to create a government that serves the people and addresses the true issues that civilizations face. I understand that. Law is necessary and order is important. You could still do good, but you don’t need to be the enemy of the people to save them. The First Order only cares about domination. That won’t save this galaxy, giving the power back to people will. You can still make a difference – just not this way, not with them." She begged him to see the truth, but he believed his own lies.

Kylo was so calm... so certain... so rational. Rey found herself struggling, again, to debate with him, because he had a strong mastery over the manipulation of an argument. She used emotion to sway him, but he used derisive logic misrepresented as fact. Arguing with him was dangerous, because, as misguided as his beliefs were, she could find truth, reason, and validity behind what he said.

"I don't know what you want from me, Rey. I’ve sacrificed everything for the First Order, and I finally have a chance to make a difference. You expect me to give it all up and walk away. For what?"

For me, Ben.

Naturally, he heard her in her moment of vulnerability. The significance of what she said seemed to escape him in his agitation, however. “But you wouldn’t do the same for me. You’ve fought for the Resistance for days not years, but when I asked you to leave them, you wouldn’t. I’ve committed treason for you and your friends; when will it ever be enough?”

“This isn't about what I need from you,” she said, fearing that his defenses had become impenetrable. “This about saving you! It will never be enough until you are free from the First Order.”
“And what do you think happens to you all if I leave?” he asked, his tone darkening. “It is easy for you to sit there and condemn me for staying here, but I am the only one standing between the First Order and the Resistance, don't you see that? If you want to help me, then join me here, we can destroy everything that is wrong with the galaxy. Together.”

No, not this.

The anger inside her seethed. She didn’t argue with him in the throne room, because she hadn’t trusted him to let her go. But there was nothing he could do over the bond, so she would make him answer for it now. Rey wanted to shake him, snap him back to reality, make him see how wrong he was.

"No, Ben! Don’t go down this path again! Don’t be the man who killed Snoke for his throne! Don’t be the man who chose power over me!"

"I killed Snoke to protect you!" he seethed. “I knew I had to kill him when I saw that vision in the hut. You put yourself at risk and forced my hand by showing up on the Supremacy! Why would you come to me? I walked into that throne room with no plan, no strategy, nothing... against the most powerful being in the galaxy. You are lucky it turned out the way it did! If he wanted to kill you himself, I would have been powerless to stop him! I trusted in the Force like I never have, had to watch him torture you. I couldn’t react at all, or he would have known everything. I waited for the moment it would guide me to save you, because I knew the Force may abandon me, but it would never abandon you. It may have worked, but that could have ended a million other ways, most of them in your death.”

He paused as he sucked in agitated breaths. “Sometimes, Rey, you can be frustratingly naïve. If I wanted to choose power over you, then I would have killed you and waited to overthrow Snoke until after I had the map to Skywalker, which died with him! I chose you over the only thing that had mattered to me for years! I didn’t choose power over you! I asked you to share it with me! I am nothing without the First Order. I offered you everything, and you tried to kill me.”

His words were sharp and cutting, but his words also revealed a deep underlying wound. Even after witnessing his memories, she believed he had killed Snoke for power. It made sense that he also wanted power because he believed he could create something new, something better. After spending his entire life defending himself, he would finally have the power. What she hadn’t considered was perhaps his desire to take the throne was a consequence of killing Snoke and not the catalyst. That would mean he did kill his master for her, and he believed she wanted to kill him for it.
“I didn’t try to kill you, Ben. If I wanted to, I would have when you were unconscious. I could have done it when I checked to make sure you were okay,” she said, blinking away tears. “And you did not offer me everything, not what I wanted. You only offered me your ambition.”

His jaw clenched as the betrayal burned in his eyes. His sorrow did not stream down his cheeks, but it did flood his voice. “What do you want from me then! I begged you. I offered you the galaxy! Everything I have!”

"I didn’t want the galaxy, Ben; I wanted you!"

He was quiet for a moment as he studied her, but it still wasn’t enough to fight through the darkness. "This is me," he said, the betrayal fading to regret in his eyes.

She may have believed him once, but she had seen everything in his mind. She knew the truth. "No, I don't believe that. I know who you are. We both know who you truly are. And you are not a Sith. You are not Snoke. You are not some master of darkness."

Kylo exhaled slowly. “You’re right, I am not a master of darkness; I am its prisoner.” He worked his jaw, the foul taste of those words in his mouth evident in the repulsed expression that hardened his features. “I did not choose the darkness; the darkness chose me. It’s too late. It’s always been too late. My fall to darkness was inevitable. It was fate’s design. There will always be darkness, Rey. That is what the Jedi never understood. There would be no light without it. I cannot deny the darkness because it is a part of me; it always has been. I was destined for this path before I was even born…” His eyes lost their focus as he absently stared beyond her, his thoughts were lost to the torment of his mind.

“No, that’s not true,” she grabbed his clenched fists to force him to look at her, but his eyes remained distant. “It is never too late to make the right choice, Ben – no matter what darkness is inside you, or torture you suffered through. You can still make the choice to be saved. I’ll help you save yourself from the darkness.”

Her words snapped his eyes back to hers. Had they been capable of lighting her on fire, she would have ignited under his gaze. “Is this all I am to you... a fight for my soul? Am I just some conquest to be won? Because that is all I ever have been to anyone.”

“Is my worthiness in your eyes dependent upon whether I’ve embraced the light completely, denying who I truly am?” His teeth were clenched in a resentment that crashed through their bond. “Because I can never be what you want me to be.”
“Does it matter what I want? Because I don’t want to be what everyone has tried to make me be my entire life, Rey.”

She chewed her lip with worry. This was infinitely more complicated than she had originally anticipated. She considered for a moment if she had been wrong. Was she trying to make him someone he wasn’t? Was she not meant to help him save himself? If that was true, why had the Force bonded them?

“I’m fighting for you, because I know that the man that you pretend to be is not who you are. Ben, if you continue down this path, Kylo Ren will die, either by your side or mine. Don’t let Ben Solo be another casualty of Kylo Ren. I don’t want to lose Ben Solo. Is it so wrong to fight for someone I care for?”

His eyes studied hers carefully. “I thought I was impossible to care for,” he replied bitterly, echoing her words.

“When you act like Kylo Ren you are!”

Rey immediately regretted her impulsive reaction.

His anger sparked in the bond like a rekindled ember. “This right here...” he shouted, pointing to his chest, “This is Kylo Ren. Or Ben Solo. Or whatever you want to call me. I’m not two different people living in one man’s body! You seem to have this idea that everything I have done that you hate was Kylo, and everything I have done that you agree with is this so-called Ben. It’s not. It was all me, no matter what name you use. There will never be a day when Kylo Ren miraculously disappears. Those actions that you hate are still mine. Pretending that there is some perfect man trapped inside me – only needing to be freed – is delusional. There are not two Reys – the one that tried to kill me and the one here in my arms. That was all you, and this is all me. It’s easy to care for the man I am when we are alone but that means also caring for the Supreme Leader who killed his own father. Because I am both, Rey. This is all me!”

“Kylo Ren is not who you are. It is the mask you hide behind,” she said categorically. “You can be Ben Solo again. It is not too late.”

“Rey, can you be the person you were before your parents abandoned you? Or even the person you were before you left Jakku? The person you were before Han died? Or before you met Luke?”
“No, but I wouldn't want to be that person again. I would never go back to who I was in the past because everything that happened made me who I am, and I am proud of who I am,” she said, “But, Ben – murder, darkness, galactic domination – that isn't you. It’s what you’ve been led to believe you are.”

“If you understand why you could never be that person again, then you understand why I cannot be Ben Solo.”

“No. Ben Solo is the man you truly are, you just don't see it like I do. You can still come home.” Kylo opened his mouth to react in anger, but stopped himself. He was quiet for a moment before speaking again.

“I'm not coming home,” he whispered, not unkindly. Rey hiccuped a sob as her heart clenched. He hesitated before swiping his thumb gently across her cheek, catching her tear. “My life was never meant to last long, sweetheart. It is the fate of most Jedi and Sith who do not go into exile. And I will not hide from my destiny. My first memory is a droid trying to murder me, I do not fool myself into believing that my last will be old, warm in my bed, surrounded by family. My parents and grandparents, more worthy people than me, were not granted such a kind fate. Why would I? When I say Ben Solo is gone, it is not out of stubborn defiance. That name belongs to a man of the past, a man before Snoke. That man cannot return without rewriting the past.”

“I know everything changed when you witnessed those memories,” he continued softly. “I wish you never did. Because now you have hope for a man that I cannot be anymore. Even if I retook the name of that man, I will only disappoint you. I will never be him. That man died at Luke's hand. And I have made choices that have changed who I am. Ben Solo and Kylo Ren are just names, yes, but the legacy attached to those names are inherently different. What I have done as Kylo Ren is a legacy I will never escape. The galaxy will never see me as anything other than a monster. The man in my memories that you have compassion for, he’s gone, Rey. All that is left is me.” By the time he had finished, Rey was silently sobbing. She shook her head in denial, but the truth of his words lay heavy on her chest.

Kylo was right; she knew the man in his memories was gone. He carried burdens that had left scars deeper than the physical ones that marred his body. And just as the scar bisecting his cheek could not be removed to reveal the face that had been before, neither could his experiences and choices be taken back to reveal the man he could have become.

“But Kylo Ren is not real,” she said. “And maybe you can’t be who you once were, but that doesn’t mean that you can't be the person I see inside. You have already committed treason for the Resistance. You know what the First Order is doing is wrong. You don't have to be who you used to be to come home. The sacrifices you made for Snoke were a lie, there is no reason to stay.
Please, I don't want to lose you.”

He smiled wanly, but it didn’t counter the anguish in his eyes. “If I can’t convince you to join the First Order, then I will have to accept that.” His voice was even and controlled again. “You need to accept that I can’t and won’t join the Resistance. There is no path without consequence and no ending where either of us join the other side. That's the reality. All we have is this.”

“Is that what you’ve decided for us, Ben? And when this ends?” she asked spitefully, rubbing at her eyes with the heels of her hands. “What do we do when we inevitably meet in battle, because your side is trying to kill mine. Do you expect me to fight you?”

“Yes, I do,” he said, his voice adamant as if he wasn’t asking her to consider the unimaginable. “And you will not hesitate. You will kill me, Rey, as you are destined to do.” Kylo tried to reach out for her, to soothe her, but she pulled away.

“I won’t kill you, Ben,” her voice was as pointed as the daggers she was glaring at him. “I can’t.”

“You can,” he insisted. “Promise me, if I ask you to, you will.”

“No, I won’t! I don’t care what you say, I will never do that. We can run away, Ben. We can forget the First Order and the Resistance.”

"Rey, stop. You don't want to run away.” His voice was firm and unyielding as if she had no opinion on the matter. “You would never see anyone in the Resistance again. They are your family. You would never have a home because we would always be running. We would be hunted by the First Order, the Resistance, bounty hunters, you name it. Or you would be forced to a life of meaninglessness isolated on an uninhabited planet like you were on Jakku. You would give up your life for what? To save me? No Rey, I couldn't do that to you. You would resent me for the rest of your life.”

“Ben, my life would not be meaningless,” she said. “We can continue the Jedi Order and start our own Jedi temple! I have Luke's books!”

“We can't. It’s a wishful dream,” he murmured. His eyes were soft but unwavering. “The Jedi Order needs to die. You don’t know it like I do. Their legacy is failure. I will end the weakness that is the Jedi Order; there is nothing you can do to change that.”
“Then just come with me, Ben, please. Anywhere,” she begged. “When you are away from the First Order, you'll see… you'll see what I see in you. We can come back when you’re – ”

“You say you want to go with me, but you don't want me. You want who you think I was, you want the aspiring Jedi Knight. You want my uncle… or my father. I could never be what you want me to be, because you won’t accept me for who I am. I am Kylo Ren, the Supreme Leader of the First Order. I will always have darkness in me.” His tone was final, and there was a sharpness to it. Rey wondered if the anger was more directed at her or himself. “This is no different than holding onto hope for your parents all those years. You’re holding onto ghosts.”

“I’ve seen your nightmares, Ben,” she sniffled. “I’m not the one holding onto ghosts.”

He does these horrible things, and I thought he just doesn't care that he’s wrong, but that's not it. He does these horrible things and convinces himself that he’s right. He doesn't see this as evil. He doesn't see himself as wrong. He truly believes in what he is saying... which is terrifying. Ben is intelligent, logical and passionate, and his argument is valid. It is not necessarily his beliefs that are wrong; it’s the method he feels is his only choice in applying them. He's not a monster. He's just too radicalized to see his own ideology for what it truly is. How do I help save a man when he doesn't know he needs to be saved?

"I know who you are, Ben Solo, even if you refuse to see it.”

“I don’t think I was ever Ben Solo. I was told how lucky I was to be me, and I was a monster if I didn’t see it that way. But I wasn’t me. I was Captain Solo and Senator Organa’s son, Master Luke Skywalker’s nephew, Ben Kenobi’s namesake, Darth Vader’s grandson. That is all I’ve ever been to anyone until I became Kylo Ren.”

“But you can’t run from your past,” she said. “You can kill your father, your mother, Luke, Snoke, Jacen, me…everyone who has ever betrayed you, but that won’t erase the scars. You can’t destroy what they did. You can’t destroy the pain it caused. All you will do is burden yourself with more suffering. You’re trapped in the past, Ben.”

“The past is trapped in me, Rey,” he replied softly. “It always has been.”

“I want to pretend that I don’t know how you got here, Ben. But I saw everything. I understand how you became Kylo Ren. And honestly, I can’t blame you, because we’re not so different. You shouldn’t have had to go through the loneliness and abandonment and betrayal that you went through. But you can’t change what happened in the past. You can only change what happens now. Those people aren’t here now. I am. You have to let go of the anger and resentment. Let go. Let the past go. That’s the only way you can be who you’re meant to be – Ben Solo.”

His eyes flashed in humor as he recognized his words on her lips, but it was fleeting. A shadow darkened his features. “Ben Solo is dead.”

“No, Ben Solo is not dead,” she whispered. “I see him in you; when you saved me, when you fought by my side, when you touched my hand… You asked me why I didn’t take your hand. I did. In the hut, I took Ben’s hand. I came halfway across the galaxy for Ben. For you. That’s the man I want. Offer me Ben’s hand again and I’ll take it.”

Kylo stared at her for far too long – eyes piercing to the deepest reaches of her soul. She thought he would finally see the truth, but he sighed instead, and then glanced away. “If only it were that simple.”

“It has to be that simple, we need your help,” she argued. “You are the galaxy’s last hope, Ben.”

Kylo huffed a soft chuckle. “No, Rey. You are.” Her lips parted in awe as his words settled in the bond between them. She searched his eyes, and his brow furrowed slightly. There was uncertainty in them as if he feared he had said something wrong.

“I think that is one of the nicest things you have ever said to me,” she whispered, “But I don’t want to be the last hope.”

His smile was remorseful. “Neither do I.”

Rey was too discouraged to continue. She saw no point in trying to convince him of something so ingrained that it had become a part of him. Tears rolled down her cheeks and her body shook uncontrollably. She lowered her eyes, refusing to look at him. Remorse and sorrow trickled into the bond.

I know what happened to you, I know how you ended up here. So why am I so... disappointed? I have the answers to your past, but they bring me no closer to changing your future. I don’t know what I expect from you. I know I’m asking for unattainable things. But what else would you have me do? Giving up on you would be sentencing you to death. But you have to save yourself, because you have to want to be saved. You’re not ready yet. I want to keep waiting, but we’re running out of time.
“Please don't hate me for being honest, Rey,” Kylo whispered. “You make me want to be someone I wish I could be, even though I know I can’t.”

She raised her eyes to his. “I don't hate you, Ben,” she said softly, “But do you know how much it hurts to watch you destroy yourself? For what? The First Order? When has the First Order cared about you beyond what you can do for them?”

“When has anyone cared about me beyond what I can do for them?” he replied.

“I care, Ben.”

Perhaps he did it out of guilt, perhaps he did it to explain what words could not express, or perhaps he realized he had nothing left to give her, but she was overwhelmed with emotion as his mental barriers dropped away.

Rey did not have experience with emotions of those depths and ardency, she couldn't put a name to it, only recognize its familiarity in her own heart. It was an emotion of pure light, and had it not surprised her to feel such light in him, she might have further pondered the meaning of such a strong emotion. It filled her soul with a safe and comforting warmth – a warmth that matched the flickering in his soft brown eyes. She closed her own eyes and basked in his powerful light. It reignited her hope for him after his heartbreaking words.

When she opened her eyes, Kylo cautiously reached for her as if she were a steelpecker in the wastelands of the Jakku desert that would fly away at any moment. She leaned into his broad chest and he hesitantly wrapped his arms around her. I hate that you do this to me, Ben. How can I be so frustrated with you and yet all I can think about is staying in your arms? The thought of spending the rest of my life across the galaxy from you breaks my heart... but if this is the only way I can be in your arms then I will spend forever waiting for you like this.

Rey lifted her head off his chest, gaze downcast in disappointment. She sniffled. Kylo put his large hands on either side of her face and wiped her tears with his thumbs. She smiled up at him and searched his eyes. When her stare met his she discovered something new... something dangerous... flash across them. Looking into his eyes felt like the moment of anticipation before she jumped across a large expanse in a Star Destroyer.

She immediately became all too aware that her hands were on his broad, but very bare chest as they leaned into each other on his bed. Her heart fluttered as a different warmth shuddered through her. She couldn’t deny, even in this moment of frustration with him, how attracted she was to him. There was a madness inside her, a tension that eased as the void between them closed, an irrational temptation luring her to him. She stared at his parted lips with a terrifying desire. The bond pulsed around them as he dipped his head and she tilted hers up to meet him. Her heart rate quickened. He was so close she could feel the warm puff of his heavy breaths on her lips.

What would happen if I kissed him?

Rey decided she wanted to find out. But when the Force sparked like electricity as the distance between them closed, leaving a tingle of anticipation on her lips, Kylo's body tensed under her grasp. She would have assumed it was the same nervousness as before, but he pulled away slightly. The bond hardened and her stomach sank. His palm slowly slid from her cheek, moving swiftly and stealthily like a stalking predator. Her eyes followed as his hand reached out with practiced precision. If her eyes hadn’t been following his movements, she would have missed it. The Force spiked and a dark, formidable object was pulled fluently to his hand.

He had summoned his lightsaber.

Distrust. The bond was shuddering with distrust. A sickening terror twisted through her stomach.

“Ben, why are you doing this? I don't understand?” Her head snapped back to anxiously search his eyes. His intense gaze did not meet hers as she had expected. He was staring behind her.

That was when Rey felt the other presence in the room.
Chapter End Notes

Mention of violence

Characters speak of past violence and murder
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
"General Hux, the last of the Knights of Ren have arrived. Shall I inform the Supreme Leader?" Lieutenant Mitaka stood patiently waiting for an order, as the general faced away from him, overlooking the complex machine looming in the darkness.

"No, send them to me," he said.
“Sir?”

“I have a special security Holovid to show them, to ensure their loyalty to me.” Without turning, Hux activated the Holovid, moving the projector into view of the officer. The images of Kylo using Luke's lightsaber against Snoke and the following battle with the Praetorian guard flashed in front of them both. "Wait, wait, wait this is my favorite part," he laughed as Rey reached for the lightsaber rather than Kylo's hand.

"Sir, how did you..." Mitaka stammered.

"I had it salvaged from the wreckage of the Supremacy.” With a chuckle, Hux slipped the projector back into his pocket. “He should have known, we have security cams all over our ships, someone is always watching.”

"Sir, this is high treason, should we bring this to the attention of the..."

"All in good time," Hux said, grinning wickedly in the darkness. "But first, Ren must lead us to the girl, the last of the Jedi, and the remnants of the Resistance that he let slip through our grasp. The girl and her band of traitors will be no match for the Knights of Ren. Then I can begin my experimentation with Force Destiny and the power of what dark energy can create. The applications are limitless.”

Hux couldn’t see the Lieutenant, but he could hear the edge of fear in his voice. "Yes, sir."

"And bring me the Rodian bounty hunter, I have a job of collection and live transport for him.” He gestured lazily and then returned his clasped hands behind his back, silently admiring his work. “That is all.”
Chapter End Notes

Threat of violence

Hux threatens another character vaguely
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, at over 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Rey’s fear was not the presence behind her - the presence that was the sole focus of Kylo's attention - but whose side her bondmate would defend when he was forced to choose. Before she witnessed his memories and felt that light inside him, before she better understood his mindset in the throne room, she would have assumed his loyalty was to the First Order. But everything he had done to save both her and her friends from certain death called for her trust in him. She searched for the loyalty in his eyes that would save them both, but his guarded stare remained fixed on the doorway. His energy felt like a coil ready to snap.

He was waiting.

For what? Rey didn't want to know. She imagined his general standing behind her, blaster raised. He would undoubtedly try to kill her. Would the bolts reach across the galaxy? Would Kylo try to protect her? What would they do to him if he did? When she considered it, her fear withered and hope sprouted in its place. She trusted him to protect them both. If they could survive it, this could be the push Kylo needed to leave, even if it was not by choice. If he left, he would be free.

Unfortunately, the reality was far more complicated… and terrifying.

"Rey!" A distant voice echoed around the room. She knew that voice.

His chambers slowly faded as she turned in search of the object of his attention. Kylo was now with her on her temple bed, and Finn was standing in the entryway, a blaster rifle pointed in their direction. His eyes were burning with hatred.

"Do it now! Kill him!" Finn screamed when their eyes locked. Another flicker of distrust radiated in the bond before Kylo slammed his mental barriers shut. Rey glanced back at him, trying to discern his mental state without the aid of the bond, but he did not take his eyes off Finn.

The two men she cared for most would undoubtedly kill each other. It wouldn’t be Kylo’s loyalties that would be tested, but hers. She had no weapon, not in the typical sense, so she used the only weapon she had. She shifted to place herself in the line of fire between them.
Her decision surprised Kylo if the sudden emotions that slipped through his barriers into the bond were any indication. He had been waiting for her to make a move against him, to betray him again, she realized as his distrust faded.

Fear bloomed in its place.

He thumbed the trigger of his lightsaber with one hand and grasped her shoulder protectively with the other. He attempted to drag her backward, most likely behind him, but she remained steadfast in her place on the bed. As long as she was between them, then they were both safe.

Kylo's jaw clenched, but he was otherwise eerily still. He made no move to raise his weapon, but she knew he was carefully analyzing the possibilities. She remembered this silent volatility from the throne room. An explosive Kylo was terrifying, but a calculating Kylo was deadly.

"Ben, please don't hurt him," she whispered.

She heard Kylo's voice inside her mind. Don't worry about what I'll do, Rey, but what I can't do. I can put raindrops into stasis across the galaxy, but I don't know if I can stop a blaster bolt. The energy required...

Rey wondered if Finn fired the weapon if it would even hit Kylo. She fired at him on Ahch-To, and it did nothing. But the bond was stronger now. She could hit him with those droid parts. What about the lightsaber? Could he hurt Finn? She would do everything in her power not to find out.

Rey knew she was the only thing standing – sitting – between the two most important people in her life. She needed one of them on her side to prevent bloodshed. When she was forced to choose, she made the unexpected decision that she trusted her enemy bondmate over her best friend. She trusted in him enough to turn her back to Kylo to face Finn.

"I gave you three days, now do what you know needs to be done," he said, voice wavering with fury. She shook her head defiantly, tears flowing down her cheeks as her heart was torn in two directions. "This ends now. If you won't do it, I will. Move, Rey."

She raised her hands in supplication, trying to calm her friend. "Finn...please! Lower the weapon. No one is hurting anyone, okay?"
There was a loud screech and a frenzied ball of black and silver rolled between them. Blue was begging Finn not to hurt his master, but it only agitated Finn further.

“You!” Finn shouted. “I should have known you’d belong to someone like him!”

“Blue, leave, now;” Kylo demanded. His eyes remained fixed on her best friend, even as the droid backed from the room. “Your problem is with me. Don’t talk to the droid again or I’ll make it so you can’t talk.”

Finn was livid. “Move, Rey!”

Move, Rey. Kylo's voice echoed in her mind, begging her with a fear she had not witnessed in him often. I know you can sense his instability in the Force. He may do something unpredictable, I don't want you caught in the crossfire. I... won't hurt him. Trust me. Move. Kylo was right, Finn was becoming more frenzied, his hands were shaking with emotion as he pointed the weapon, but she knew what would happen if she moved.

No, Ben. If I move, he will pull that trigger.

"Rey, move! Can’t you see he’s manipulating you? You heard what Poe said. You know what this guy has done to all of us and will do to all of us. He killed Han, he almost killed me, doesn't that matter to you? Why are you defending this... this monster? Think of the Resistance! You have the chance to take down the Supreme Leader of the First Order right now, all you have to do is move! I... I don't want to hurt you!" Finn's voice cracked with emotion, split between his hatred for Kylo and his fear for her.

"Rey... listen to your friend. Move. I'll be fine, you won't be," Kylo growled. She turned, hearing the anxious tone of his voice, his calculating eyes remained fixed on Finn's movements. She looked back to her friend; his eyes were wild.

You don't know that, Ben. He could kill you. I'm not moving.

Finn's chest was heaving, his finger was quivering against the trigger. "It's us or him, Rey, choose!"
"Don't make me choose," she begged, her eyes searching Finn's in an appeal to his good nature. I'm not moving, she conveyed with a shake of her head.

Rey had faith that her friend would not shoot through her to kill their enemy, and she had faith that her bondmate would not attempt anything as long as she was in the way. The Force was heavy with anticipation as both men's fingers hovered over their respective triggers. Rey held her hands out between them, but without a weapon, she was helpless to deescalate the situation. They all knew Finn could switch the blaster to stun for his shot or Kylo could use the Force to render her unconscious. If they chose to go through her, they could.

Her skin prickled in a warning in the Force; one of the men had made a decision, though she was powerless to know which one. The chosen action and resulting consequence was all but inevitable. She only had the chance to mentally prepare herself. If Finn fired, she would shove Kylo out of the way and hope she was not caught in the crossfire. If Kylo activated his weapon, she would stand in front of Finn to protect him.

Before she could further plead with either of them, Kylo was the one to make his move. He shoved her off the bed with the Force, slowing her velocity before she slammed into the wall on the opposite side of the room. She was out of the crossfire, but that meant there was no longer a barrier between the men. He slowly shifted to his feet on the other side of the bed. His eyes remained fixed on Finn's as he activated his lightsaber.

She stood swiftly, but she was too far to move between them. “Ben don't!”

Trust me, his soothing voice whispered in her mind.

“You aim a weapon in her direction again and I'll kill you, traitor,” Kylo promised, raising his lightsaber.

There was a flash of resolution in Finn’s eyes. The Force rippled around them, it was another warning. She knew Finn had made his choice. He was going to chance his own safety to kill Kylo.

"Stop!" She shouted, analyzing her possible courses of action in the milliseconds before Finn's finger touched the trigger. Finding no other viable option, she chose to further trust in her bondmate. She used the Force to summon the blaster to her own hands. As the weapon jerked away from him, Finn's finger brushed the trigger. An errant bolt blasted from the muzzle in her direction.
“Rey!” Kylo choked, reaching for her in futility, his manipulations of the Force did not reach across the galaxy. But the Force had not abandoned her. Rey surrendered to its guidance as she turned, hissing in pain as the bolt grazed her arm. The blaster rifle crashed to the ground at her feet.

“Rey, I... I didn't mean to,” Finn stammered. She knew that. Finn would never intentionally hurt her. But she had barely a second to recover before Kylo was moving across the room.

“You could have killed her!” Kylo's voice was booming with rage, his weapon raised to strike down her friend. The Force was vibrating with hatred, oppressing them all in a cloud of darkness.

“Ben, stop!”

Her plea fell on deaf ears.

Don't do this! I will never forgive you if you hurt him.

Her bondmate continued toward her only family with his weapon raised in a promise.

Please, Ben! I love him!

Her admission stalled him mid-step. He tilted his head over his shoulder to stare at her with eyes burning in... something fierce, something that Rey could have easily mistaken for betrayal.

You asked me to trust you. I’m trusting you. Please don't hurt him.

His jaw clenched as a tremor shivered down his body. That was the only warning she had before he snapped.

Spinning on his heels, Kylo cried out in a guttural howl. His lightsaber crackled brightly as it connected with, what was likely, an electric panel on his side of the bond. Sparks flared into the air around him. He remained facing away from her, his body shuddering with heavy breaths.
You love him? his voice rasped across their connection.

Of course, she did. It was a peculiar fact to focus on, especially after she admitted to trusting him, but she hoped it was enough to arrest his violent response.

Yes, he’s my first friend, my best friend. Please don’t hurt him.

What is it, Rey? Are you just friends or do you love him?

‘Just friends?’ Ben, friendship isn’t a consolation prize.

I didn’t mean –

To answer your question – both. He’s my family. The brother I never had. And I love him. Don’t take him away from me.

There was a pause as her words settled over the bond. Slowly, his fury flickered to embers. Kylo’s eyes met hers. They were still dark with fury, but he didn’t move to attack her friend. It was good enough for the moment.

“You see, Rey?” Finn shouted, gesturing to the damage Kylo had wrought with his temper. “He's dangerous!”

Kylo's voice was a low growl. “I'll show you dangerous.”

“And he could have done much worse if he wanted to! Just go, Finn!” she shouted back.

Finn's eyes were wide in disbelief. His eyes flashed to the weapon abandoned at her feet, and the Force bristled in a warning. Holding her friend's stare, she kicked the blaster behind her, hoping it would convince him to abandon whatever desperate thoughts were clouding his judgment.

“I’m not leaving you with him, Rey.”
She loved her friend, but he was foolish to face Kylo with a solitary blaster and no element of surprise. Finn refused to go anywhere. His glare returned to her bondmate and his deadly crimson lightsaber. Her best friend was prepared to face his destiny protecting her. Kylo was staring right back, prepared to seek revenge for his perceived threat upon her life.

“Ben...”

_He could have killed you!_ he roared over their bond.

_But he didn't._

_But he could have. And I would have been powerless to stop it._ Even through their connection, his voice was strained with emotion.

_It's tearing me apart Ben– the two people I care about most are trying to kill each other. Please, don't make me choose._

Kylo huffed a breath, before tearing his eyes away from Finn to meet hers.

_Please._

With clear reluctance, he deactivated the weapon and tossed it behind him on the bed, begrudgingly holding his hands up to placate them both. “Thank you,” she mouthed silently at her bondmate. His jaw worked in clear irritation, but Kylo managed a stiff nod.

Rey sighed in relief. She couldn't help but smile across the room at her bondmate. She had trusted him, and he had kept his word. His chest was still heaving in agitation, but he was staring at her with that look again. The look from the throne room. It set fire to her skin, and she nearly forgot they were not alone.

"I guess you made your choice, Rey," Finn whispered resentfully from the entryway, fracturing the moment. He glanced back and forth between them, searching for an answer Rey feared he would find. She closed her eyes so she wouldn't have to see the betrayal in his.
I didn't choose him, Finn. I did everything I could to keep both of you safe. I don't want to choose. Why can't you see that?

When she opened her eyes, Finn was gone. It was likely for the best; he wouldn’t listen to anything she had to say in his current condition. Finn cared, he wanted to protect her, but he was blinded in his anger and needed time to cool off. In the morning, she would find him before they left for Dantooine. He knew her secret now; she had no intention of taking part in the plan to ambush her bondmate. Once the shock had worn off, she could explain what Kylo meant to her. If the Supreme Leader could be reasoned with when a lightsaber burned in his palm and bloodlust burned in his eyes, then there was no reason to believe that Finn couldn’t come to a similar understanding. He was her best friend; he would help her find a way to explain it to the others. They could find another way to stop the First Order. Everything would be okay.

Rey expected Kylo to be gone as well, jolted back to his side of the galaxy. But when she turned, he was sitting on the bed, his fists clenched. She sat down next to him, and the room slowly faded back into his chambers. He looked as exhausted as she felt.

“I'm...” sorry. The word sorry sounded trite. She let her apology fall away, leaning into him instead. He briefly examined her wound before wrapping his arms around her. They collapsed back onto the bed together. She was thankful the Force hadn't sent him away yet, she wanted a few more stolen moments to lie in his arms, her face pressed against his heated chest.

"That... right... there... is why this won’t go the way you want, Rey,” he murmured, his body still trembling from adrenaline wearing off.

I know, her mind screamed, but her heart didn’t agree. What was the truth? Finn’s reaction was everything Kylo had told her to expect, but she still knew her friend better than he did. There was still a chance that it would go the way she wanted.

Everything will be okay, Ben, you’ll see.
Chapter End Notes

Threat of Violence

Two characters threaten to injure/kill other characters
UPDATE: I've posted about half of Part 2 and will post the second half before opening day (hopefully). I am forever grateful that the amazing and talented Meauxwalk had offered to help beta so we could get this out on time. Thank you! Thank you! Thank you!

PART 2

It is 100 percent finished, but because I have no beta, editing is sloooow. Part one editing took me well over two months. I will edit as much as I can by December and then post the rest unedited. As of right now, part two is much larger with 118 chapters, which will likely climb as I added about ten chapters to part one while uploading due to maximum word constraints on chapters. As I've stated before, it is well over 700,000 words and it is a slow burn. Thankfully the galactic idiots are friends now, and their relationship will progress - and be tested - in part two. Buckle up for the angst!
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Kylo felt cold. It was a bone-numbing cold, and he had felt it once before on Starkiller. There was the pull of the Force around him, but his senses weren’t heightened as they should have been. Distantly, Kylo knew he was still safe in bed, asleep, but this felt too real to be a dream. At first, he believed it was a memory of Starkiller, when he collapsed into the snow. But his face didn’t burn as it had then. In fact, nothing hurt. Kylo looked up to find one of his Knights standing over him in the snow. There was something off about the Knight’s posture, something threatening. Reaching into the Force, he recognized the familiar energy.
Jacen.

When he sensed a warning in the Force, Kylo pushed himself to his feet and ignited his lightsaber. He barely lifted his blade to meet Jacen’s swift strike. His body, however, didn’t respond with the strength and power he was accustomed to. He found himself on the defensive. With every block and parry, he grew weaker. He could barely stand. Groaning through gritted teeth, he struggled against Jacen’s wrath. His arms shook as the weakness overwhelmed him. This fight would be to the death, but Kylo knew he wasn’t strong enough to overpower the other Knight.

"The mighty Kylo Ren can barely wield his own lightsaber! Snoke was right; you are weak and foolish, like your father!" Jacen laughed. There was no fear in the other Knight’s eyes as there once had been when they faced each other. Kylo could see the thrill of recognition; Jacen knew his master was struggling, his body was surrendering to whatever weakness possessed him. No matter how skilled Kylo was, they both knew he would fall.

Physically, they were close to equally matched, even when Kylo was at his strongest. But Kylo could barely stand, and he couldn’t feel his connection to the Force. He had always wished he had been born without Force-sensitivity, but in that moment, he wanted nothing more than to feel its power surge through his veins. Kylo was struggling against a man who knew his every weakness in a duel, but without the Force, it was no contest. His fate was an inevitability. Kylo didn’t fear death, but his mind was screaming that if he fell, there would be no one to stand between Jacen and Rey. He didn’t know how, but it was a truth he was certain of. If it was the last thing he did, he wouldn’t let her fall because of his mistakes.

Enough people had already died because of him. Jacen was right; he was weak and foolish. But his father was not. He had known what Kylo was too blind to see and knew that sacrificing himself was the only way to save... The realization settled over him with shivering clarity.

"I won’t fight you, Jacen. You have what you want. Let her go." Kylo said, raising his hands in surrender. “Please.”

"If you won’t fight, then you will die," Jacen sneered. “You may have been like my brother, but you took my sister from me. I will make you suffer, Kylo.” His eyes flashed with bitter contempt, and Kylo immediately recognized it as something he had seen in his own eyes when he looked in the mirror. Kylo hadn’t taken Jaina from him; he would have remembered that. Still, something inside him knew Jacen wasn’t lying. There was yet another ghost he would have to atone for.

"I'm being torn apart," Kylo whispered to his old friend, "I want to be free of this pain. I know what I have to do, but I don't know if I have the strength to do it. Will you help me?" He swayed as he struggled to stand, staring into the eyes of the person he had failed. Jacen nodded once. They both knew it was the truth; this was the way it had to end. Rey screamed from somewhere behind him, but his understanding that she was there only served to reinforce his decision. Through their bond, he had no doubt she could sense his grim acceptance and resolution; she knew what he was going to do.

Jacen cautiously walked toward his old friend, but Ben made no attempt to move. They both knew he had no strength left to fight. His knees shook as he struggled to stand. His hand let his deactivated lightsaber slip to the skyway with a loud clang. He kept his eye on the Knight as he approached but also on the woman closing in on them. She was nearly upon them.

Do it. End this.

Jacen grasped Kylo by the shoulder, never breaking eye contact. His pupils were blown, not an ounce of light reflected in them. Kylo wouldn't allow the darkness to be the last thing he saw. He closed his eyes, imagining Rey's bright smile under the stars and blocked her from the bond as best as he could in his weakened state. He exhaled slowly as he steeled himself; he'd had enough wounds by a lightsaber to anticipate the sharp burning pain that would soon pierce through him.

He thought back to all of the lives he had taken with his lightsaber. It had started with the other students at the Jedi temple. The sickening crescendo was his own father, whose death would not be in vain. It only seems...right that it would end this way...for both of us. If Jacen chose to strike his heart, he would likely only be able to hold on long enough to take advantage of their proximity and take his old friend down with him. He hoped that Jacen would be cruel and aim for his abdomen – if only so he could have one last moment with Rey.

Jacen chose his heart.

The heat of the blade burned through him. It stole his breath, but it wasn’t nearly as painful as he expected. With one last exertion, he called the lightsaber to his hand as he ignited it. Jacen jerked violently as the blade pierced through his abdomen. The fate of both men had been sealed. With betrayal in his eyes, Jacen collapsed to the skyway. A wave of weakness crashed over Kylo, and his knees gave out on him. As he fell backward, all he could hear was Rey’s screams.

Kylo jolted with the impact and opened his eyes. Gulping heaving breaths, he searched the darkness around him as the sleep-addled fog of his mind cleared. He was surrounded by warmth, and the pain was gone. Kylo checked for the lightsaber wound, but there was nothing. His heart still thudded strongly in his chest. Blinking as his eyes adjusted to the low light, he realized he was in his chambers on the Finalizer.

It was a dream.
Kylo refused to accept that it was anything other than a dream. He had called the Knights to his side in his fight against the First Order, and he had no reason to believe they would turn on him. The Knights' sole interest had always been to destroy Skywalker and the Jedi. Their loyalty was to each other, to their master – not to the First Order. They would feel as betrayed as he did that their master had lied about who he truly was. Kylo did not doubt that after everything they had suffered through together, they would stand by his side. And he would need their help to destroy Force Destiny, Sidious, his Dark Army, and the First Order.

It was merely a dream, a nightmare, and Kylo took comfort in that.

His eyes fluttered shut and he tried to talk himself into surrendering to the peace of unconsciousness again. His senses flared to full wakefulness, however, when he felt something warm move against him in his bed. In his panic, Kylo nearly threw himself to the floor, weapon already in hand. But with a bit of logic and cursory probe of the energy around him, he sighed and eased the weapon back onto the table with a gentle manipulation of the Force.

Not only had Rey fallen asleep in his arms, but she was still there. Had the Force allowed the connection to remain open as they slept? Or had the fear from his nightmare brought her back to him? It should have soothed him – awakening to her warmth – but nothing would ease his agitation. The dream most certainly hadn’t helped with that endeavor, but Kylo knew the true source of his disquiet.

Though he thought she would leave him to chase after her friend, she had stayed, and Kylo found it ironic that he questioned her decision. He still wondered what would have happened had they not been interrupted, but he knew how it would look to the Resistance. She was certain the traitor would protect her. As deeply as everything in Kylo yearned to disagree with her, he had no proof her friend would betray her. The traitor had seen them connected before, but her secret had remained safe from the others. She trusted her friend, and Kylo trusted her, as irritating as it was to rest her safety with a man he didn’t trust. So he had watched her fall asleep in his arms without further protest. He knew she had been exhausted from their grief and their argument, and part of him was selfish. He wanted her to stay.

This was a gift she had given him – staying – and he wouldn’t ruin it by his fatalist thoughts. Instead, he forced himself to lay back and revel in the warmth of her body against his. He stared up at the darkness above him, refusing to sleep. Not because of the threat of nightmares, but because he wanted to spend every last second he could with her. This was a chance he knew he would never experience again, and too soon time would take her from him. There was a part of him that recognized just how deeply he craved anything she would give him – it was a weakness Snoke… Sidious had warned him of endlessly under his tutelage.
The Jedi weakened you by teaching you to ignore your emotions. Anger, hate, pain – use them. Channel your suffering into strength. The goal of the dark side is power, but more importantly, survival. Your greatest revenge is surviving when your enemy does not. Give into your emotions, all except compassion. Compassion is a weakness. Your compassion will be used against you. It will be your downfall, just as it was your grandfather’s.

His master had seen it, had known of his weakness long before he admitted it to himself. You have compassion for her.

No – never. Compassion? For an enemy of the Order?

Kylo Ren. It appears that a reminder is in order.

If only Sidious could see him now. Perhaps a reminder was in order. Kylo could barely recognize himself from the man he had been under his former master. By the grace of your training, I will not be seduced. Oh, but he had, hadn’t he? His master was right, she would destroy him, he just couldn’t find it in himself to care. There was no darkness to grasp onto, no suffering to sharpen into a weapon, when he held her in his arms. There was no anger or fear or pain, only calm as he listened to her peaceful breathing, content and safe as she slept in his arms.

His thoughts weren’t focused on revenge or galactic domination or the past, but rather the braid in her hair and the rebellious strands that fell across her cheek, her strength and how she challenged him as no one else could, and the warmth of her light. The darkness was so far out of reach, he couldn’t feel it even when he thought about how she had been beyond infuriating as she blindly clutched to her ideals. There was nothing that could contend with the absurd happiness he felt when he thought about how she fought for him. The parts of him that still sounded remarkably like his former master reminded him that she only fought for him to save her friends, but that didn’t explain what she did.

She would deny it later, but he was almost certain, she had considered kissing him. Certainly, it was a lapse in judgment on her part, but she still touched him and wasn’t repulsed by it. She stayed. It was his fault, of course, he lost the composure to maintain his strong mental barriers when she told him she cared for him. It meant nothing to her but everything to him. He was a fool. There was no doubt she now knew how he felt for her – not that he was ever adept at hiding anything from her.

It was for the best that she didn’t kiss him, especially if it had been out of a misguided attempt to show him pity. Her regret would have wounded him, but not as deeply as losing the amicability between them. The kiss itself didn’t matter, he convinced himself, but what it represented did. Despite logic to the contrary, there was a small, foolish, fragile hope in his chest that there was something new between them that hadn’t been there before. For the first time in years, he held
There was a tiny voice that reminded him – if it all had been a deception as he had long presumed, there was no explanation for what happened with her friend. If she wanted to end the war, she had every opportunity to do it. She could have killed him or allowed her friend to do it. But she didn’t. She trusted him, she stood by him, she defended him. It had been years since anyone had done that for him. And she had not only defended him from her friend, but she defended him from Luke Skywalker – her hero – as well.

Maybe she understood him after she had seen his memories. Or, more likely, she hoped he could be someone he could never be. Whatever it was for her, his only certainty was that he had never known what he was missing until he felt her in his arms. Now he couldn’t let her go. He didn’t want it to end. But it had to, didn’t it? If the vision was true, then she would be lost to darkness if the bond remained. Only, that tiny voice reminded him that he hadn’t felt that powerful darkness in her since she held his lightsaber to his throat.

It should have been an easy decision; one that he had been certain of after he ended the bond nearly a week before. Their ideals were decidedly different, and neither would bend. Their argument had only been further confirmation of that. They could walk away on amicable, but understanding, terms. The bond would fade over time. The problem was, he didn’t want it to.

And the more he admitted to himself that he didn’t want to let her go, the more he wondered what truly was important to him. The more he agonized over every word she had said to him, the more he questioned himself. Kylo thought he had everything figured out. He thought he knew what he wanted. He had everything he ever desired and more: command over the First Order, master of the Knights of Ren, control of the galaxy. It was everything he’d worked for in his life up until that moment.

He should have been content, but as he watched her smile while she slept, he wondered, why does it all mean nothing?

Though he was loath to admit it, he knew what did mean something to him.

Ben Solo is dead.

No, Ben Solo is not dead, she had told him with such certainty that he wanted to believe her. Offer me Ben’s hand again and I’ll take it.
With the heat of the argument gone, he was left with nothing but the truth. As he felt her light warm him across the bond, he knew his former master was wrong. Everything he had sacrificed to the dark side only served to conflict him more. The Force was guiding him to a terrifying conclusion; maybe she was right. Maybe Kylo Ren – and his grandfather by extension – was something he aspired to be, but never could attain. He was always too conflicted, always felt the pull to the light. He tried with everything he had to kill that side of him – the weak and foolish side of him. He failed.

But if Kylo Ren is just a mask as you claim, then who am I?

Rey said she saw something in him that he couldn’t see. Could he trust her that it was there if he just fought hard enough? Could he ignore every time he had trusted before, every time that trust had been broken? Could he ignore every time he had tried, given them everything, but it wasn’t good enough? Could he weather another round of her hatred when he inevitably disappointed her again?

She spoke with such conviction, as though it were that easy. Maybe for her, it was. Everything seemed to come so easily for her. No matter what life dealt her – and it had dealt her the worst he could imagine – no matter her struggles, she persevered. He wished he had her strength. Kylo? He gave them all everything he had, and it had never – not once – been good enough for anyone. What happened when he inevitably failed to be what she wanted? Where would he be? What would he be?

Nothing.

Without the First Order, the Knights, and the power of the dark side, he had nothing, he would be nothing. He was a shadow; it had consumed him for so long, without darkness he would disappear. He would always feel the pull from the darkness. To deny it was to deny a part of himself. If he couldn’t be what she wanted him to be, then what was the point? Was he supposed to abandon his destiny?

Kylo had sacrificed everything. Everything! He believed in what the First Order would do for the galaxy. No, he believed in what the First Order could do, if the others had a similar vision for the galaxy. He wanted a new Order. He wanted an Order that overcame the lawlessness, corruption and moral detachment of those who had failed before him. Unfortunately, the longer he endured the painfully tiring discussions with the higher command, the more he realized how profoundly his ideals differed from the path of the First Order. He believed it would be simpler to convince them, but he had been naïve. He wanted order, but they were intent on creating chaos.

Even if he could ensure her safety – which he couldn’t – if he defected, their plans would be realized. There would be more Starkillers, more Hosnian Primes and Alderaans. Rey was right; they would be no less self-serving than the Republic. At least he was trying. Without his interference, the fate of Rey and her friends would be bleak. If Sidious returned, it would be hopeless.

Even if Kylo could leave without consequence – which he couldn’t – what then? He couldn’t be a valiant resistance hero like the pilot or the traitor. He couldn’t go back to who he used to be, the man she envisioned from his memories, because he had always been forced to be someone else. Who he was had never been good enough for anyone, so he had tried to be what they wanted him to be. His parents wanted him to suppress the Force, Luke wanted him to suppress the darkness, and Snoke wanted him to suppress the light. Ben was as fake as Kylo Ren.

What was the point of any of it? Why did she care? What did she want from him?

To save him?

From what? Death?

Leaving the Order wouldn’t save him. When he seized the position of Supreme Leader, he sealed his own fate. Whether by the hand of the Resistance, First Order, or her... he had never intended to survive it. His only choice was how it ended.

His thoughts were interrupted when Rey reached her arm across his chest and pulled herself into his warmth. He wasn’t certain he had been as close to anyone as he had been to her in that moment. His eyes wandered back down to her face. She opened her eyes, blinking the sleep away. “You’re still here,” she smiled. His throat clenched as he forced himself to swallow past the tightness. He was terrified of the moment the Force would separate them again, but he was equally terrified of these moments. She had an undeniable control over him. “Sleep... Ben.”

“I can’t,” he breathed.

“What’s wrong?” she asked drowsily. The softness of her expression and the raspy breathiness of her voice were far more intimate than he expected them to be. It triggered that flighty feeling in his chest again – something he was beginning to associate with her. It was as exhilarating as it was unfamiliar. It was destabilizing. He knew he had no right to that knowledge, loathed the vulnerability of it, but he still found himself committing it all to memory. He both yearned for more and wished he had never seen this side of her.
Rey shifted to study him, and he felt the warmth of her fingers on his chest. His traitorous heart began thundering underneath her fingertips. It was difficult to remember the last time he had been touched like that. Had he ever been touched like that? It made him feel both alive and at peace. Kylo tried to remind himself that sharing beds was likely a common occurrence for her – a practical matter for a rebellion with limited space – that she wasn’t affected by it like he was. His mind, however, unhelpfully focused on how perfectly she fit in his arms, how calm he felt basking in her light, and how content her features were when she looked at him. She had never looked at him that way before.

His voice was thick with disuse. “What do you want from me, Rey?”

“For you to get out of your own head and go to sleep.” Kylo nearly laughed as she lowered her head to his shoulder. Sleep was far beyond the realm of possibilities. He was hyperaware; he could feel the tickle of her eyelashes as she blinked, he could feel the heat of her breath on his skin, and he could hear the slide of material as she shifted next to him on his bed. He had memorized the sound of her steady breaths and the rhythm of her heartbeat and the warmth of her touch. It was intimate and domestic and terrifying. He was content to never sleep again.

Rey reached up and traced the scar down his face and onto his shoulder. It was almost… possessive. He shuddered, but not from latent fear. “You know what I mean,” he rasped.

“And you know what I want.” She wanted impossible things; she made him want impossible things. “I feel the conflict in you, Ben,” she whispered sleepily, allowing her fingers to branch over the hidden scars under his skin.

“I know.”

He wrapped his arms around her and held her tightly as she fell asleep.
Imagined violence - a character experiences lethal wounds in a dream
Premonition

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey found herself in a dark room, the figures within obscured by smoke. The only light in the room was a flashing red alarm. Her heart pounded as she walked deeper into the room. “Rey!” she heard Finn cry out from beyond her sight. She pressed forward into the darkness. Something terrifying was lurking in the shadows; she could feel its evil stare as it watched her. Her friends were in danger, and she was running out of time.

She could see a figure, a shadow, emerge from the mist. The silhouette looked familiar – tall, broad, dressed in all black. The man had his arm outstretched, his fingers clenched. “Ben?” As she stepped closer, she noticed two other shadows in the mist. They were on their knees, grasping at their throats. It was Finn and Rose, she realized. It wasn’t until she heard the soft gasping sounds that she realized what he had done. They collapsed backward on the ground and the vision of Finn’s jacket and the body covered by a gray blanket flashed in her mind. She had no doubt he would kill them. “Why, Ben!” she screamed.

All three disappeared with her shout and she was left alone in the heavy darkness. Her only company was her heavy breathing as she stepped further into the room. As she followed the flashing red light, she found him by a control pane. He was illuminated by the flashing light above that was unlike the others, this one was blue. No, it wasn’t as much blue as it was… indigo. “Rey?” He looked like her bondmate, he sounded like her bondmate, but he couldn’t be her bondmate. This man was dressed in the color of blood.

“You’re not the real Ben,” she said as she called her lightsaber to her hand. It wasn’t hers – this lightsaber – yet its energy spoke of a familiarity and intimacy that she couldn’t explain.

_He will kill your friends_, a voice told her, _he must be stopped._

Stepping forward, she grasped the hilt tightly, her hands shaking as she pressed the weapon against his abdomen. There was fear in his eyes, but also an incredible darkness. “I am Ben,” he told her, “I won’t hurt you, Rey.”

It wasn’t true; she knew it wasn’t. His hand wrapped around the hilt of the lightsaber, and she felt his intention to use it against her. The Force was alight in warning. Her friends were in danger; she could feel their energy fading in the Force. They were dying, and she knew who was to blame. “You’ll die for what you did,” she spat at him. “Any last words?”

There was no emotion reflected in the pools of darkness that stared back at her. “You know what I have to do,” he said. She struggled to pull the weapon away from him, but he was unrelenting. Rey felt her own darkness swell inside her.

There was a whisper in the dark, “Yes.” It was Kylo’s voice. “Kill him.”

The glow of the plasma reflected in his eyes as she activated the weapon. His body jerked in shock as the blade pierced through him, blood staining his trembling lips. Her eyes raised slowly to his. He smiled weakly and reached up to touch her face. Her heart broke staring into the warmth of his familiar, searching eyes.
“It was you,” she realized. This was no imposter whose fate she delivered at the end of her blade. With trembling fingers, Kylo cupped her face and kissed her gently. The warmth of his lips was too fleeting, but when he pulled away, he offered her a mesmerizing, dimpled smile. It was almost enough for her to forget what she had done, but then his eyes fluttered, and he began to sway. Kylo dropped to his knees and she collapsed beside him, grasping his tunic to ease his descent to the floor. “Ben,” she cried as he reached up to wipe the tears from her cheek. “Please stay with me.” She trapped his palm against her cheek, pleading with him to hold on as his eyes pooled with sorrow. They both knew he couldn’t stay. His hand fell away as the light in his eyes faded. The Force grew heavy around her, and one final breath escaped his lips. The man she had fought to save was dead, because of her.

“Ben!” Rey awoke with a start. She gasped for breath, tears dampened her cheeks as she searched the darkness of the room.

The temple room.

_It was only a dream._

She tempered her uneven breaths as she re-accustomed herself to reality. The last threads of the dream were rooted deep into her consciousness, leaving her caught in a state of uncertain reality. It had felt real. Too real. She wanted Kylo to wrap his arms around her and tell her it was just a dream. His calm voice would temper her fears, and everything would be okay when he held her. But she could feel the emptiness in the Force; she was alone in her bed.

It should have been simple – routine – to be alone. She had slept alone her entire life. They had only lain in each other’s arms for a few short hours, but now that she knew what it felt like, she didn’t want to sleep alone anymore. She had almost kissed him, but knowing the warmth of his touch, learning the softness of his eyes when his hardened mask had been lost to the early morning hours, and trusting him when she was at her most vulnerable and defenseless was more intimate than a kiss could ever be.

Exposing a side of herself no other man had witnessed – and baring a side of him no mask could ever hope to hide – hadn’t seemed as consequential at the time, but she knew she would never lie in her bed without thinking of him again. The air in the room was too oppressive as she attempted to calm her thundering heart. Her skin crawled with longing until she decided she couldn’t stay in that room another second.

Rey grabbed her blanket and sleep mat, heading into the darkness of the corridors in search of fresh air. When she neared the temple exit, she paused at the entrance of the mess hall. With hours left in the Barkhesh night, she liberated some portion packets from the supply in hopes the bond would connect them again before sunrise. She climbed the steps to the apex of the temple, sighing in relief when she reached the entrance. She breathed in deeply, the cool night air soothing her agitation. The twinkling stars above her head were a welcome change of scenery.

The forest was dangerous at night, but Rey was on a mission. She jogged quietly through the trees in search of something suitable. It was no different than scavenging in the endless labyrinths of Star Destroyers. When she set out, she didn’t know what she was looking for, but she would know when she saw it. Weaving through the trees, she split her attention between her search and anticipating danger. She walked parallel to the temple so she could easily escape.

As if the world itself wanted to assist in her search, Rey’s eyes were drawn to a sliver of moonlight that had penetrated through the canopy. The ray of light shone on thick vines wrapped around a tree. On the vines were small, orange and red swirled spheres.

Berries.

Biting her lip to contain her excitement, Rey picked a berry and squeezed a drop of fluid on her gums; a habit she had learned from her life on Jakku. She wasn’t typically a cautious person – throwing herself across vast expanses of Imperial Destroyers before she considered whether it was possible – but this was different. Though the deserts of Jakku were unforgiving to those ignorant or reckless enough to underestimate its cruelty, it was the enticing Tuanulberry bushes that tempted too many to their death with its toxic berries. Rey had spent days in Death’s shadow – curled up at the bottom of her AT-At retching bile and blood – after she had stumbled upon those berries. She had no intention of allowing herself or anyone she cared for to suffer that fate again.

Rey waited by the vine, scanning the darkness for other dangers as she rubbed more of the juice into her gums. When her mouth didn’t lose sensation or feel like she bit into the heat of a thousand suns, she decided it was safe. Popping a berry into her mouth for good measure, she plucked just as many as she would need, then set off for the safety of the temple.

Settling down on the sleep mat she had laid across the cool stone under the archway, she wrapped the blanket around herself. She opened the portion packet of sweetened polystarch and mixed in water from her canteen as she had done thousands of times before. Rey crushed the berries to make a thick paste and spread it over the rounded surface of the polystarch. It was messy, but as Rey licked the juice from her fingers, she was pleased that it tasted like she imagined the finest delicacies in the galaxy would taste. Satisfied, she set her creation aside and tilted her head to study the vast expanse of stars.

Oh, Ben, I wish you were here to see this.

It was beautiful, and he had offered it all to her. As a lowly scavenger, it was a significant offer. Despite the part of herself that imagined never wanting for anything again, she didn’t want to possess it – only to explore its wonders. What Kylo wanted was like plucking a flower. The selfish desire to keep it would ultimately lead to its death. Its beauty could only truly be appreciated by admiring it and ultimately allowing it to thrive on its own. The galaxy was never meant to be under one man’s – or woman’s – control. In an attempt to save the galaxy, the oppressive domination would ultimately lead to its destruction.

Rey wished Kylo would understand that. The true value of the galaxy did not lie in the power of its civilizations. There was far more to the galaxy than its wealth. The galaxy was already theirs…. to explore. They could spend the rest of their lives enjoying the beauty it had to offer in its endlessness. Somewhere out in its vastness was Jakku and Takodana, Ahch-To and Crait, Starkiller and the remains of the Hosnian system. Somewhere out in its vastness was adventure.

Somewhere out in its vastness was Kylo.

He felt closer when she imagined him on the Finalizer, staring up at those same stars, making choices that would affect them all. She wondered which star was closest to him. She wondered if he’d tell her, so she could find him in the night sky. Perhaps that would ease the dull ache in her chest.

Where are you right now, Ben?

“Next to you.”

Rey startled, turning her head toward his voice. “You’re projecting again, Rey,” he whispered. He was sitting under the archway next to her, leaning back on his hands, long legs extended in front of him on the temple steps. His chin was tilted up, staring at the same dark heavens.

“I brought you here… by thinking of you,” she said as she studied his face. His expression was soft, but he looked terrible. He had just lost his mother; she doubted she looked any better. “Did I wake you?”
He chewed his lip to hide a smile. “You didn’t wake me,” he said, eyes still fixed on the stars above them. “And I was thinking of you, too.”

Her heart leapt with something warm and weightless.

“Well, if it was me, I’m not sorry that you’re here,” she yawned.

“Me, neither.”

The bond between them was warm and bright with their amicability. Even after their argument over ideals earlier that night, something had changed between them. He had changed. Despite what had happened, his energy didn’t feel as burdened as it had in the past. She didn’t want the day to end, fearful of what the morning would bring as he fell back into the role of the Supreme Leader.

They sat in comfortable silence for a moment, until she remembered her trek to the forest. “You were born today,” she reminded him, as though he’d forgotten.

“Is that supposed to be an insult –”

“I meant it is your Anniversary of Birth –”

“According to Galactic Standard Time, not anymore –”

“I think it counts until sunrise –”

“I’d rather it didn’t,” he sighed. “I hate birthdays.”

“Well, I thought I’d try to make it a little better,” she said softly, lifting her creation with outstretched hands. He stared at her, expression unreadable.

Rey had been excited when she made it for him, but it faded when she presented it to him and saw it in a more realistic lens. The sweetened polystarch cake looked absurd with an uneven and sloppy spread of lumpy, mashed berries. Kylo wasn’t the Jedi-in-training with the boyish smile; he was the Supreme Leader. With all the food in the entire galaxy at his fingertips, why would he touch a ration loaf with random berries from the forest? How could she be so naïve?

She lowered her hands in shame, but before she could toss it away, it lifted from her hand. Raising her eyes to follow its path, she watched Kylo’s fingers manipulate the cake until it landed in his palm. He split the ration loaf in half and handed one of the pieces to her. Her brows narrowed in confusion.

“It is customary,” he said. “to share the birthday cake.” With a dip of his head in gratitude, he lifted the pseudo-cake in a silent toast. She expected him to take an experimental bite, but he popped the entire portion into his mouth. There were residual crumbs stuck to his lips, and Rey watched him lick them clean. She hid a shiver when he began sucking the berry juice from each finger as well. When he noticed her observing him, she glanced away, blushing. To distract herself from the heat of a combination of shame and something a little more frenzied, she bit into her portion of the cake.

It was… not as delicious as she expected. She forced herself to swallow it down – there was no point in wasting perfectly edible food – but the mixture of artificially sweetened, overly dry bread, and the inconsistently tart berries did not blend well together. As they swallowed it down, their eyes remained locked, studying each other’s reaction.

“That was disgusting,” she sighed finally, “and that's coming from someone who ate rations her entire life.”

Her heart stuttered as his face broke out into a wide smile, transforming his entire countenance. “Repulsive,” he said in amusement. Rey decided she would swallow her awful concoction of ration polystarch mixed with possibly toxic berries every day, just to see him smile like that.

“At least it wasn’t chocolate,” she replied with a smile of her own. There was something like awe reflecting in his eyes. He smiled again, something softer than before, but it was equally breathtaking. “Happy Birthday, Ben.”

“I’m… thanks, Rey.” He took his smile with him when he turned his stare back to the stars. “When is yours – birthday, I mean?”

“I don’t know.” Rey shrugged, but she knew he felt the pain hiding there. She couldn’t hide the real her from him if she tried. He hadn’t turned, but she knew the entirety of his attention was focused on her.
“Why don’t you pick one?”

It was absurd, wasn’t it? To just pick a birthday? It would be meaningless, wouldn’t it? Her mind helpfully reminded her that Finn had chosen his name; why couldn’t she choose a birthday? It was just a date, but the decision seemed daunting. Rey dragged her fingers over the cracks in the stone steps. “I don’t know what to pick.”

Kylo hummed, as if he knew her indecision went far beyond choosing a date. “What’s the happiest day you can remember?”

There was no simple answer. Her best days were also her worst. She finished restoring a ship, but it was stolen. She met her best friend, but she was dragged into that awful war. Finn came back for her on Starkiller, but Han was killed. She had found Luke Skywalker to help her find belonging, but he wanted nothing to do with her. Kylo saved her, but he chose to become Supreme Leader. The bond had changed between them, but Leia was gone. There was one moment she still thought about regularly. It had been interrupted, but every time she thought of it, she was filled with hope.

“What was the date we touched hands?”

Kylo snorted, and he turned with humor in his eyes. His face grew serious, however, when he saw the sincerity in hers. There was something heated that passed across his stare, but it was gone before she could study it. He returned his attention to the stars in pensive silence. Fearing she’d upset him, she found a safer subject.

“Are you still in your bed?” Rather than answering, she felt a spike in his Force energy. The archway of the temple dissolved away, and she was abruptly sitting on black sheets under a large viewport. The night sky above his bed was dusted with stars, but they were blurred into the brilliant vortex of hyperspace.

“How did you do that?”

He answered again by changing their environment back to the quiet night atop the stone temple. “It’s all the same Force. Visualize what you want and manipulate it to your will,” he said quietly.

“If you can control it, why did you choose to see my side?”
“I spend the majority of my time in the isolation of these walls, breathing recycled air, on a destroyer in open space. They can replicate quite a bit of the sensation of being ‘on-world,’ but fresh air from a real atmosphere is not one of them.” His tone sounded almost… wistful. What if his power and wealth wasn’t enough? He wasn’t happy; what if there was a chance he could be? What if it wasn’t too late to help him leave? Even if his family was gone, and all hope seemed lost, her heart told her that he could still free himself of the evil that had stolen his loyalty. She could help him, if only she could find a good enough reason for him to leave. They could find where his loyalty was supposed to belong before his destiny had been decided for him. Her devising was abandoned, however, when he spoke again. “I like it better where you are, that’s all.”

Rey bit her thumb as she grinned. There was something soft and candid to his words; a vulnerability that Kylo’s eyes often revealed, but his tongue did not. It was something that could only be found in those raw, dreamlike hours when the rest of their worlds slept. Their worlds—opposing in every way—and yet, he could switch back and forth between them with ease. “Can you show me how you do it?”

Without abandoning his study of the galaxy he sought to control, he answered, “Just take it.”

She pressed into his memories, searching for the knowledge she needed. He flinched as she found it. For the first time, she wondered if what she was doing to him was painful. She didn’t bother asking, knowing her bondmate would never admit to it, even if it was. She focused on the surrounding energy, separating the warmth of her environment and the chill of his. Once they were separated, she was able to move between them, her surroundings fading into his and then back into hers. It was nothing new. As the bond strengthened, they seemed to be pulled entirely into one side or the other, but she had never been capable of controlling it. As his environment disappeared completely, it was as if he were actually sitting there with her. She wished she could forget that he wasn’t. What would her life have been like if she wasn’t forced to stand between him and her friends?

“I wish you were here,” she whispered.

“I am here.”

“I mean, truly here.” She studied his expression for a glimmer of reciprocal feelings; but his scowl was guarded, his stare fixed above them. He remained quiet, contemplative, and she wished she were privy to the thoughts he kept hidden.

When he finally answered, his words were so soft, they were nearly stolen by the gentle breeze. “I know.”
“Maybe someday...”

Kylo didn’t answer. His unspoken words were left drifting among the stars.
Imagined Violence - imagined injuries in a dream
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Kylo didn’t know when it started, this fascination with her, this magnetism. There was an attraction in the conventional sense, yes, but it hadn’t started that way. It should have been physical at first. It would have been simpler if it was something he could explain away as biology. With Sidious in his head, he had long ago learned to curb his… desires. If it were only attraction, he could have acknowledged it and moved on as he did with everyone else. He had tried to move past his fascination with her.

He had failed spectacularly.
Watching her now, as she stared at the vast universe before them, there was a soft hopefulness about her that reminded him of the moment she arrived on the Supremacy in that escape pod. She had looked ethereal, and he had done everything in his power not to drop to his knees before her in that crowded hangar. What terrified him was that he had been drawn to her long before that hangar. From the moment he heard about her, there was a fascination with her he couldn’t explain. From the moment she fired upon him the first time, he couldn’t help but wonder if it was her – his childhood hope.

When he had seen her dreams and memories – her past – and she had seen his deepest fears, he felt a connection, a deeper knowledge shared, long before he first felt the bond when she accessed his skills in the snow. Once their souls were connected, had he even had a chance? In the hut, that deep knowledge evolved into understanding.

She had seen him in a way no one else had, not even his close friends at the temple. She had seen the monster – he could hide nothing from her – yet she reached across the galaxy for him. He had recognized her strength and wit, but it hadn’t properly occurred to him how beautiful she was until after she had touched his hand by that fire. Her wet hair that had fallen around her bare shoulders begged him to touch it, the fire reflecting in her eyes burned a fire inside him, and the promise she made him had changed the course of his destiny irrevocably. He thought he had been mistaken when she had refused him in the throne room – he thought she hated him – but now…

Now, he wasn’t so certain what she wanted from him. Rey wanted him to turn, of course, and to save her friends, but there was something else. The events of the past twenty-four hours proved that. She would never reciprocate what he felt, he knew that, but it wasn’t just hatred. He wasn’t just her enemy. Was it attraction? Friendship? A kinship like she shared with the rest of his family? He didn’t know yet. What he did know was that she was there with him, willingly, and that was enough.

“You’re quiet,” Rey said. He could sense her studying him, but he refused to meet her eyes. He feared the emotion he would see in them.

Kylo searched for an honest explanation for his silence. Staring up at the stars, he decided there was nothing safe about his thoughts, and chose to side-step the question entirely to preserve the tentative amicability that had formed between them. “Space is… complex, and infinite, and impossible to contemplate,” he said, his voice sounding distant even to himself. “Yet we look to it when deliberating our own lives. We look to it for answers… even though what we see is a lie. There is so much darkness, but we ignore it to worship the light. And the light you see from those stars – it isn’t the truth. Not anymore. When we look to the stars, all we see is the past. Still, there’s so much beauty among so much conflict, isn’t there?”

Rey hummed. “When you describe it like that, it reminds me of you.” He could still feel the heat of her stare as she spoke, and he knew she was waiting for a reaction. Instead, he resisted the temptation to turn his head, and wondered what part of space reminded her of him. “Maybe that’s why I spent so many nights on Jakku watching the stars.”

You didn’t remember that I existed. “You were waiting for your parents.”

“I knew I was waiting for someone who was gone, but maybe I was wrong when I thought it was my family,” she answered, and that was enough to draw his attention. Her expression was inexplicably soft. When had she started looking at him like that? He feared the moment it would change again. “Why are you not asleep?”

Kylo hadn’t been mocking her desperation to sleep when he searched her mind in the interrogation room, he had been sympathizing. Sleep was like happiness; it was so simple for others, but it escaped him. He didn’t tell her that the last night he had slept more than an hour at a time was the night he had become Kylo Ren. He didn’t tell her about the nightmares – the ghosts – that plagued his dreams, demanding his rest and peace as penance for their deaths. He didn’t tell her of his pathetic fear whenever he awoke, believing in the fog of sleep that he was not alone in his room. He didn’t tell her, but when he turned to look at her, something in her eyes was knowing.

Understanding.

Was he doing it again; allowing himself to see things that weren’t there, believing anyone could possibly see him as more than what the galaxy saw?

“I sleep better now since I left that place. I’m less lonely, too,” she said. “It was hard to leave, but maybe it’s the only way to change for the better.” He knew what she was trying to do, but she didn’t understand that leaving for him was not that simple. They had already argued at length why he couldn’t do what she wanted, and he refused to address it again, there was a more pressing matter at hand.

“Is that why you’re awake right now?”

“Well, I had a nightmare,” she admitted. “Don’t get me wrong, it’s better than Jakku, but I’m still… different. I don’t sleep or eat or celebrate or think like they do. I don’t fit in here like they do. Sometimes they look at me like they’re scared of me. No one understands me.”

“I do,” he said without considering whether she would find that of any comfort. You know you’re different than them, but you stay with them, helping them fight the monsters they fear in the hope they will accept you. Until one day, they turn on you, and you become the monster they fear. He understood it all too well, just as he understood the torment of nightmares. It hadn’t been the answer he was expecting, but he still hoped she would admit the truth. He repeated a question he had asked her before. “Nightmares – do you have them often?”

You, Supreme Leader? Concerned? For anyone other than yourself? Her voice echoed in his memories. My dreams are of no consequence to you.

If he hadn’t realized the change in their bond before, he would have seen it now with her response. “Yes, every night usually. Mostly it’s the past. Sometimes it feels like a vision from the Force. Sometimes it’s you.”

“And tonight?” His voice was weak, somehow, he already knew the answer. He was the monster of her nightmares. “Was it about what happened between your friend and I?”

It was a risk, asking her about the confrontation earlier, but she hadn’t spoken about it at all. He tried to understand that she trusted her friend, but – accidentally or not – the traitor had nearly killed her in his rage. Kylo didn’t know their relationship well, but he did know what it looked like when a man was betrayed.

The traitor had witnessed the… near affection between them. He had told her to kill Kylo like they had planned, and then left believing that – when asked to choose – she had not chosen him. Whether Rey believed it or not, he was dangerous.

The problem was – she would never believe anything Kylo said about her friend. For all he knew, she blamed him for what happened, not the traitor. Perhaps she dreamt that he killed the traitor as she had nearly done on Starkiller. Everything he did would appear as if he was trying to distance her from her friends, and she wouldn’t be wrong. He didn’t trust that she was safe now that his mother was gone. Dameron had nearly killed her before and if he discovered this… there would be little he could do to help her. As long as they were bonded, she wasn’t safe there. She needed to run, but she would never trust him enough to understand that.

If he was a stronger – less selfish – man, he would destroy the bond to keep her safe. But he couldn’t do it. He knew he should do it, end it however he could, but he feared it wasn’t enough. What if it was already too late? What if the Resistance turned on her? What if the First Order found her? What if she needed his help and he wasn’t there? He was too weak with fear.

“No,” she answered finally, “it wasn’t about Finn. But I did have a vision once, Finn was dead under a blanket on the Millennium Falcon, and I was scared you put him there.”
Would he do it? Would he kill her friend? He had chances, plenty of chances. He didn’t want to hurt her, but he wasn’t naïve enough to believe that there weren’t possible scenarios where he would be forced to take that man’s life. To defend himself? Possibly. To defend her? There was no question. And after their confrontation, that was exactly what he feared it would come to. “Listen to me, I didn’t hurt him even though he nearly killed you. But what is your plan here? He believed you wanted me dead, Rey, and I doubt he assumes that anymore. Am I wrong to suspect that Dameron is in charge now? Do you understand how exponentially more dangerous this has just become for you? What happens the next time he finds us together? What happens now? You could be executed for being seen with me. If your friend tells Dameron what he saw…”

She shook her head emphatically. “He won’t.”

“You’re so sure,” he said, voice low, as he tried to control his hatred for a known traitor.

“He won’t.”

You can’t know that! You can’t know that he will put you over the safety of the Resistance – the safety of his fiancée! I am your enemy! This is treason! “Would you bet your life on it?”

Rey met his fiery gaze with hesitation. “Yes!”

“Would you bet mine?”

Kylo didn’t know why he said it; what led him to believe she cared at all, what convinced him that it would break through her obstinance. But her certainty faded. Something haunted and pained passed over her expression. Tears pooled in her eyes and her voice was suddenly overcome with emotion. “I’ll tell him the truth, okay? I’ll explain everything tomorrow. I know him; he’ll understand. Please, I just can’t take any more of this tonight.”

He wanted to remind her of the night Luke had seen the flash of a consequential vision in his nephew’s mind. He wanted to remind her of that naïve boy thinking those same damning words, I’ll tell him the truth in the morning. He wanted to remind her of what happened that night. But all he could see was her tears, all he could manage was, “What happened?”

“I dreamt I killed you, Ben,” she cried. “I thought it was someone only pretending to be you, but it wasn’t. You died in my arms and it was all my fault. It wasn’t my friends or the First Order, it was me. It felt so... real. I don’t care about what Finn saw earlier, I care about that. I care about a future with you in it.”

A shivering energy passed through him. It was the same sensation he had felt that night on Starkiller when she ignited his grandfather’s weapon – bathing herself in a cerulean hue. Something felt terrifyingly familiar with those words. It felt like a memory he couldn’t quite touch, but somehow knew was there. He could almost imagine her voice screaming it.

“I deserve a future with you in it! You don’t have to do this! You don’t have to die!”

Perhaps it wasn’t a memory of the past, but a memory of a dream. Had he seen it, the moment of his death? There was no shiver of truth as he imagined her killing him. No, he hadn’t foreseen his death, but he remembered those words. It had to mean something. He swallowed the miserable acceptance rising in his throat. “That sounds like a vision.”

“Don’t talk like that,” she said through tears. He couldn’t deny the misery he recognized in her voice. He could feel it. “My greatest fear is that I won’t save you. I just lost your mother, I can’t lose you too. It would destroy me if I was the one to…”

Kill you.

How could he comfort her when he knew the inevitability of his fate? “Rey, we’re equals in the Force,” he said softly. “The odds that you’ll kill me are good. But if you do kill me, it won’t be in darkness, I promise you that. I won’t let you fall.”

“Stop talking like that!”

He knew it upset her, but it was the truth. “What am I supposed to say?”

“You’re supposed to comfort me.” She sighed as she gestured vaguely with her hand. “Tell me you’ll be okay. Tell me it’s not too late, that I can save you.” Rey was strong. She didn’t need comfort. Comfort was the denial of truth. The comfort of believing her family would return was what kept her suffering on Jakku for over a decade.

“Do you want comfort or honesty?” he said bluntly. He didn’t intend for it to come out so... harsh, but he wouldn’t pander to her delusions. “You can have one or the other, not both.”
Even though he couldn’t bring himself to look at her, he could feel the warmth of her challenging smile in the bond. “Comfort.”

Though he still didn’t understand why – what did it matter if he survived – he knew what was important to her in that moment. “No matter what happens, I’ll be okay.”

“Then promise me. Promise me you’ll leave the First Order. Promise me we won’t be on opposite sides anymore. Promise me you’ll survive this. Please…” Her tone was beseeching; he knew she was sincere in her desire to save him, but his promises meant more to him than maintaining the peace.

“No, because it’s a comforting lie,” he said unequivocally. Rey sighed in vexation. He didn’t know what she wanted. If she needed comfort, hope, denial, he was certain that someone at the Resistance would be more than happy to help her. But it would do her no favors to pretend.

“And the truth?”

_You can’t save me, it’s too late, I will die before this is over._

He paused to search for a less harsh truth. “I don’t know exactly what the future holds for me, but, whatever happens, you’ll be okay,” he assured her.

“If you die, I won’t be okay,” she whispered. It hurt more than he cared to admit. Why did she care? His uncle had tried to kill him. His parents had sent their best pilot to kill him on Starkiller. Every single one of his nights would kill him to take his place. The Resistance would execute him, as would the First Order. Had his life ever meant anything to anyone?

“Why?” he rasped. “I don’t understand, Rey. Can you imagine how many people you care about would be alive right now if I wasn’t? Why do you care? Why does my life matter now, when it didn’t before?” When she first saw him on Takodana, she shot at him. His parents had sent their best pilot to kill him on Starkiller. When they were first brought together by the Force, she shot at him again. She left him for dead on the Supremacy. She tried to kill him while he slept. Then she had seen his memories and… everything changed.

He felt the heat of her glare again. “Why does it matter to you that I live?”
Kylo recognized her attempt to use his tactic of counter-questioning, but this was one question he was willing to answer. “Because your importance to me is not based upon my turning you to win a war.”

Her retort was sharp. “Neither is yours.”

“For someone who isn’t trying to turn me, you certainly are focusing on it,” he intoned, fighting the urge to meet her stare. He couldn’t look at her, not when they were talking about this. Not when she could see the weight of her words in his eyes.

“Ben, I need you to understand something. I don’t want to use you or pity you or turn you for the galaxy’s sake. I want you to turn, I want you to be saved, for you. I know your past, I know the struggle of darkness, and I know who you truly are. I know you can turn, but your importance to me is not dependent upon you turning. If you want to stay with the First Order, I won’t stop you. I won’t join you, I won’t support the things you do, I will hate every minute that you’re there, but I won’t let you be alone, either. I believe you’ll find your way on your own. I believe in you,” and that was enough to drag his eyes from the stars. “Until then, I’m here for you any way I can be. I promise.”

It was a mistake to look at her. Kylo turned away, not because it angered him, but because he was on the verge of tears. She believed in him. It seemed impossible, yet there was only truth in her eyes.

“I’m just terrified that my friends will find you first, and you would let them kill you.” Kylo could hear the weight of her emotion in her voice. It hurt to know he did this to her. He wished he could tell her she was wrong.

“It’s not that I would let them,” he sighed. “It’s that I don’t see this ending any other way. There’s nowhere to go from the top except down. You said it yourself: they plan to use you to kill me. It’s a valid strategy; one I fear would be successful.”

“Do you want to die?”

He shook his head, lowering his gaze to his hands. “Not anymore.”

“Ben,” she whispered. The way she said his name upended his entire galaxy every time she said it.
He knew by her tone that she was demanding his gaze, and he knew he didn’t have it in him not to obey. His eyes found hers in the moonlight. “I saw your memories. From the earliest one with the droid, you were a fighter. After everything you’ve been through, you would just give up? Accept your fate?”

“Heaven you ever played Dejarik?” he asked, watching first confusion then irritation flicker across her face. She thought it was another diversion tactic, so he continued without waiting for an answer. “My father tried to teach me games of cards and chance, but I always favored something more like war… when chance and hope are useless. You’re either the best or you’re not. Before I knew how to fight, I knew how to win. There’s a place for strength on the battlefield, but when it comes to war, I’d rather outsmart my opponent. War is like Dejarik; it’s the battle of minds. My strategy for this war was… short-sighted. I outsmarted my opponent, I took the throne, but I was too distracted to anticipate. There’s a point in a losing game when you know your choices were miscalculated, your sacrifices were inadequate, and your options have been exhausted. You don’t surrender, but you accept how it will inevitably end. That is where I am, Rey. This is approaching endgame, I can feel it, and my only concern is what I lose before I fall.”

“I care about Ben Solo being alive. I won’t let you die.” Rey was strong, fierce, and skilled, but she was also compassionate and forgiving. It shouldn’t have surprised him when she grasped his hand in her entreaty, but it did. He didn’t think he would ever become accustomed to her touch. It upended his entire galaxy.

“The pain… the conflict… this war… it all has to end eventually,” he said, reminding her as much as himself that all of this was only temporary. Happiness always was. “How do you realistically think this ends for me?”

“Fine, then take probability out of it. How do you want this to end?” she asked, her eyes searching his. Her expression was soft when she looked at him now, even when he was disagreeing with her, and he couldn’t overcome the significance it held for him.

“I want you to be alive,” he replied. “And free. And with people who will never leave you.”

“What about you?”

What would he want? Things monsters couldn’t have. Even if they were a galaxy apart, moments like this for the rest of eternity sounded better than anything he had ever imagined. Everything he had ever suffered was worth it when she held his hand like that. He didn’t want it to end, but it would, and that was what he forced himself to remember. Kylo knew his answer was a deflection – and an extraordinarily vague one at that. “I try not to think about it.”
“Ben... I know you. When you don’t want to answer something, you’re either quiet, derisive, deflecting, or stonewalling. Let’s just skip that part.”

“Fair enough,” he conceded, a ghost of a smile on his lips. She knew him. It didn’t terrify him, not as it would have had it been anyone else. He rewarded her with the truth. “This ends one of four possible ways for me; prison, exile, escape, or death. What am I supposed to want? Prison is unlikely for the severity of my crimes. As is exile. And I’m not going to run from my destiny.”

“You forgot defection.”

His stare fell to the hand she still held in hers. “Even if I defect, it still ends one of those four ways. How do you see this ending, Rey?”

Her voice was strong with hope and determination, and he couldn’t help admiring her for it despite her naïveté. “We’re connected in a way that no one else is. We’ll find a way to end this and be together. I believe that.”

“How?”

“I don’t know,” she whispered, her voice waveriing in her attempt to convince them both. “I trust the Force will guide us.”

“And then what?” he pressed. “Become Jedi? Is that what you want? Because you don’t need me.”

“I told you earlier. You know what I want.” She turned her face back to the stars. He sensed her frustration join his in the bond, but she didn’t release his hand.

You want to live in denial again.

“You want things I cannot give you,” he said instead.

“Why? I thought I was ‘important’ to you?”
His stare hadn’t left the spot where their fingers were intertwined. “More than words can express.”

Her trembling shuddered through the bond. He sensed her surprise and confusion at his admission. “You would give me the entire galaxy, but not this?” He instinctively raised the shields around his mind higher to protect a fragile and vulnerable emotion that fluttered with her words. It overwhelmed his senses. It was desperately pure and warm. And it terrified him. He struggled with her question; he knew she could feel his conflict through the Force.

“This has nothing to do with...me or your importance to me, Rey. This has to do with reality. And consequences. You want impossible things.” His voice was deep with emotion. It was his traitorous heart that let more vulnerable words fall from his lips. “You make me want impossible things.”

Rey had fully turned to him now, and he reluctantly dragged his stare from their hands to meet her imploring stare. “If you could leave the First Order without consequence, would you do it?”

Kylo had always had difficulty imagining hypotheticals. It was impossible to envision, because he knew the scenario was unconditionally impossible. It seemed no better than a comforting delusion, and it would hurt less if he refused to contemplate it at all. “I don't know.”

“Why don’t you try, Ben?” she pleaded. She looked at him as if she knew exactly who he was, and he wished he could have been that imaginary man. Her eyes were bright with hope. “I'll help y...”

“Because I cannot leave without consequences,” he said emphatically. “If I leave, the Resistance will fall. Even if they can negotiate a surrender, which the Order under Hux will not grant them, you will all be executed.”

“If you stay, you die.”

“If I leave, we all die.”

Her other hand came up to rest against his cheek, covering the scar on his face. “But I don’t want you to die.”

Staring into her eyes, he was lost. He was weak. He was uncertain. He would give her anything – the entire galaxy – if he knew she would take it. If she had asked anything of him in that moment of vulnerability, he would have done it. He would have left the First Order. He would have damned them all to a violent end, if she promised never to stop looking at him like that.

“Ben...” His stomach twisted with the breathy softness of his name on her lips. When had she drifted across the gap between them? Her chest was heaving, her face close enough that her warm breath disturbed the hair framing his face.

“You will live,” she said. Her voice was compelling, which snapped him out of his internal battle. If he didn’t know any better, he would believe his first instinct that she was practicing mind persuasion on him. Then he felt the unmistakable spike in the Force.

Do you honestly think...

Kylo pulled away from her grasp. His fear softened when he noticed she was failing to suppress a smile. She teasingly waved her hand over his face. “And we will fly away together, and you will take me to every one of those planets up there.” He wiped his hand across his mouth to hide the smirk playing on the corner of his lips. It had been years since he’d felt the bubble of a genuine laugh in his chest.

“Every single one?” He asked, his tone light with the hint of a chuckle. He couldn’t find it in himself to hide it.

“Yes! I have spent my entire life on Jakku. Every other planet I’ve seen, well, I’ve spent my time running from you. I just want to see the galaxy...with you.” Imagining it would have torn him apart, if the genuine and vulnerable look in her eyes didn’t already do it first. When she stared at him as if... as if he was not a monster, he felt positively lost.

“You know the best way to see the galaxy? If you rule it with me,” he teased. She sighed dramatically, grinning as she shook her head. He would die for that smile. “Which one first?”

“What?”

“Which one do you want to see first?” He said, turning back to the heavens, gesturing to the stars.

“That one.” She pointed to the right. He closed his eyes, focusing on their bond. Pushing into her consciousness, he could see in his mind what she could see. Seeing the galaxy through her eyes, he was able to pinpoint what drew her attention.

“Priate? You just like it because it’s bright, because it’s close…”

“I want to go to a planet there,” she said with a smile.

He snorted to suppress a chuckle. “The only planet we could land on is Mustafar, and I doubt you want me going there.”

“Why not?”

“That would be the location of Darth Vader’s castle.” He must have sounded reverent, because his words earned a raised eyebrow.

“Of course it is,” she groaned. “How many times have you been there?”

The memories of Sidious’s constant reminders that he wasn’t "ready," that he had to shut out the light before he was "worthy" enough to go there, echoed through his thoughts. He shook his head. “Never.”

“What do you think would make you worthy?” Her eyes held only sincerity, as if she cared. She wouldn’t make that mistake again when he told her the truth.

“When I finish what he started,” he replied, as if it were obvious. Restoring his grandfather’s legacy had been his former master’s, and by proxy his, obsession for the last seven years. Kylo had always only been a means to an end for Sidious, he knew that now. His former master needed someone to destroy Luke and the Jedi – to succeed where Anakin had failed. Anakin found the strength to kill his wife, but Kylo would die before he ever let anything happen to his bondmate. It was the one variable Sidious hadn’t accounted for and it had cost him his life. Or at least, Snoke’s life.

Rey studied him for a moment, but she didn’t look angry. There was something in her eyes – something knowing – which didn’t make sense. What did she think she knew about his family – about him – that he didn’t? She grinned, and he wondered if she intended to mock him. “Finish what Vader started – killing thousands in the name of an idea? Or what your grandfather started –
“The ones he loved?” he scoffed. “He couldn’t save the ones he loved. Not from himself. They said he loved her – my grandmother – but in the end, he killed her, like the monster that he was. I bet the legends left that part out.”

“He failed because he turned to darkness to save her. He saved Luke, and himself, by fighting the darkness. I bet Snoke left that part out,” she quipped. “You and your grandfather are not so different after all; you both killed a monster.”

If only she knew, they had both killed the same monster. “Ah yes, compassion has always been my family’s weakness.”

“Or strength...” she grit back. Her frustration with him saturated their connection. “You think Vader’s choice tarnished a legendary life, but I believe that choice made his story worth telling. Do you think your sentimentality was a mistake? Do you wish you had killed me instead?”

He leveled a pointed glare at her, but there was only sincerity over the bond. She looked at him as if she expected an answer. “Rey, that’s one of the only things in my life I don’t regret.”

“Then what do you regret?”

“I regret telling you about Priate,” he mumbled.

“Fine, that one,” she said, pointing to another star nearby.

“That is Naboo, which shares its name with the third world in the system. That world is the homeworld of my grandmother. She and my grandfather were married there. It has the most beautiful gardens and waterfalls in the galaxy.”

“What about that one?” Rey held her finger over a bright star slightly above Naboo – or at least, that’s how it appeared in their sky. Wouldn’t it be fate that she had pointed to the cluster of stars that had begun it all? Kylo knew the stars were systems apart, but that small section of sky Rey was drawn to meant more to the Skywalker bloodline than the entirety of the galaxy.
“That is Tatoo II; Tatoo I is its binary. The first planet in that system is Tatooine. That is the homeworld of my grandfather. And Luke. And where my namesake – of my old name – Ben Kenobi lived in hiding. It seems Jedi are destined to end their days alone on forsaken planets.”

Rey threw up her hands in mock frustration. “I give up.”

“What do you want to see?” He asked, his voice was as gentle as his grasp on her hand. He knew what his former master would have said, what he would have said before now, but he couldn’t find it in himself to care. There was just something about her that changed what was important to him.

“The Kessel Run.”

Of course.

Who could forget the legend of the great smuggler Han Solo, delivering spice to the galaxy, addicting and destroying the minds of millions? He looked past the human and Wookiee slaves whose life expectancy in those mines was a couple of months. The conditions were sickening. But there are no morals where credits are concerned. Of course, he was a hero to the galaxy, and the Republic overlooked it all. Under Kylo’s orders, the First Order had shut the mines down, though he was certain his subordinates would be quick to negotiate a lucrative deal to reinstate operations. Yet somehow, he was the monster.

“It’s not that impressive,” he muttered.

Rey bit her lip, and he was grateful she at least attempted to temper her excitement, but he could feel it over the bond. “Did Han take you? Are the legends about him true?”

“Not you, too,” he groaned with half-hearted indignation. He had forgotten about her obsession with his father.

She nudged him in the ribs with her elbow and smiled. “If you know it’s not that impressive, does that mean you’ve flown it? Did you do it in twelve parsecs, too?”

“I take calculated risks in the cockpit – not reckless ones. The first time he did it, it was a necessity, but after that the danger he added to the mission was unnecessary for the short distance he saved.
He was interested in being the best... the fastest. I think there are more significant marks for determining a good pilot.”

“I would say you are only jealous,” she said, laying her head on his shoulder. It was incredible that she seemed to just fit there… perfectly. He wondered if she felt that, too. His attention was drawn back to her when she continued, “but if Poe believes you are a 'formidably skilled opponent,’ then you must have inherited at least one of those Solo piloting genes.”

“I do what I need to do when it counts.” Kylo bit back a smile, but he knew she could feel it over the bond. There was very little he could hide from her. It still terrified him sometimes, but not like it had before, and not for the same reasons, either.

“Don't let it go to your head, flyboy,” she said with a gentle squeeze of his hand. It seemed almost unintentional, and he wondered if she had even realized she had done it. Did she have any idea what it did to him – those small gestures that were likely inconsequential to her? “So, did you do it?”

“Hmm?”

“The Kessel Run,” she laughed. “Did you do it?”

He snorted. “I’m better at blowing things up.”

"See, you and Poe have something in common,” she said brightly. He hummed. Of course they did – more than she realized. “But you never answered my question, did you?”

“I wouldn’t smuggle that poison in the first place,” he mumbled. Her reaction wasn’t quite what he expected. Her side of the bond rippled with mirth. Her amused voice bounced around his mind.

You have the most skewed moral compass of anyone I have ever met.

“You’re projecting again, Rey.”

“I’m not sorry,” she laughed into his shoulder.
“And I did fly it – once – and did it in less than twelve parsecs. I was young and foolish and wanted to impress him. I nearly got us all killed. But the closer you cut to the black holes in the Maw nebulae, the shorter distance you travel. It’s not that spectacular. Here...” he moved their joined hands to the left region of the sky. “Start at Formos and follow this route,” he guided her hand through a slight curve upward to the left. “To Kessel, pick up the precious supply of spice, and back down again cutting right... through... here.” When he lowered their hands and glanced back at her, she had lifted her head to stare at him, not the stars above them. Her face was unreadable, so he dropped her hand and stared down at his feet.

Rey cleared her throat. “You got to see a black hole?”

“I am a black hole,” he muttered.

“I think they're beautiful.”

He tilted his head and raised his eyes to hers, studying her expression after those distracting words. “They are the absence of matter. True nothingness,” he rasped. It didn’t surprise him that he was staring at her again. There was something that drew his gaze to her like a tractor beam. It used to agitate him – how intrigued he was by her – but now he just accepted that this was how he would always be around her. He found a surprising calm every time she held his stare.

“You know that black holes absorb all the light, so you're basically admitting to having powerful light inside you,” Rey said, reminding him of their conversation.

This woman forced him to fight more smiles in an hour than he had felt in his entire life. “You forgot the part about destroying everything around me.”

“No one knows what happens in a black hole.” She crinkled her nose; a lesser man would have given up the argument right then and there. “It might not be destroying anything, just soaking up all the light and goodness.”

“But it literally disintegrates everything that –”

“Shhh... just accept it for what it is,” she whispered and threaded her fingers through his again. “Where was Alderaan?” He lifted their hands to the furthest left reaches of the night sky.
“Alderaan was right about... there,” he guessed. “It’s a graveyard now. I went there once with Luke, and again with Snoke. It was supposed to make me feel something. I mostly felt numb.”

“If the Empire hadn’t destroyed it, do you think you would have remained the Prince of Alderaan? Do you think you would have become king? Or would you have left for the First Order anyway?” she asked in earnest. He didn’t want to disappoint her, he didn’t want to ruin what they had, but he didn’t fear it as he had before. He had no reason to believe this time would be any different, but everything in him told him it was. This time, he chose to have hope.

“Maybe if I never knew who my grandfather was,” he conceded, “or at least no one else did. If they feared my mother, they would have never let a monster like me rule.”

“You’re not a monster, Ben.”

He hummed, taking her defense of his character as a challenge. Moving their hands slightly lower in the sky, he hesitated over a section of stars that often drew his attention. “That...was Hosnian Prime.” He knew she sensed the slight edge to his voice, but she ignored it.

“That was not your fault,” she breathed, though he wasn’t sure who she was trying to convince.

“The galaxy would disagree with you.” He could sense her disquiet. He was reminding her again that he was not Ben Solo. She knew the things he’d done, yet she made excuses in hope that he fit the narrative of the man she’d created in her head. But seeing the real-world effects of his darkness was difficult to ignore.

When she spoke again, her voice was defeated. “Where is Jakku?”

“Behind you,” he said with a certainty he hoped she felt. He knew what had happened to her there. No matter what befell the Resistance in the war, he would do everything in his power to ensure she never went back there. At least, not permanently. If she wanted to procure her revenge against the thugs who attacked her, then he would respect that. Hell, he would accompany her and watch. He would blow up that entire planet in a heartbeat if she asked. She wouldn’t, of course, but that didn’t change the fact that he would.

Rey smiled. Though he was fairly certain he wasn’t projecting, it was knowing – almost as if she had heard his thoughts.
“If you could go anywhere right now, where would you go?”

Kylo moved their hands back in front of them, hovering over an unassuming star. “Chandrila. My homeworld. The galaxy looked so different from there.”

“Will you take me there?” she asked sleepily as she leaned against his shoulder.

“If the fates allow, I would love nothing more.” Kylo gently pushed on her shoulder until she lay back on the cool stone of the temple. He slumped down next to her. “You should get some rest. Dream of all the worlds you will see when this is over.”

“I don’t want to sleep,” she lamented, turning to face him, “because when I wake up, you won’t be there.”

He hummed, swallowing down his own longing. “That is the nature of the bond.”

“And I’m afraid of what tomorrow will bring,” she said, blinking her eyes to restrain her tears. He sensed the fear in her voice. Did she not trust her friend as absolutely as she had claimed? Or did she fear her friends would carry out their plans to assassinate him?

“The sun will rise whether you want it to or not, Rey.”

“Can we just pretend that it won’t for a few more minutes?” There was an emotion deepening in her eyes, a yearning that he couldn’t comprehend. She wanted him to stay, and even though he did as well, the thought of anyone seeking his company without ulterior motives was a foreign concept to him. What did she want from him? Even if her sole desire was to save him, what did her remaining in his company accomplish?

“Delay the inevitable,” he murmured. “To what end?”

“Happiness.” Kylo was rewarded with another of her world-stopping smiles. She spoke with such certainty that it was difficult not to believe her. “Even if it’s temporary.” He flinched when she reached toward him, running her fingers through his hair. Her touch was both electrifying and calming, which defied basic physics, but so did everything else about their bond. The world around them disappeared, and all he could do was breathe to avoid drowning in her mesmerizing eyes. She had a power over him that was stronger even than the Force. But she spoke of temporary happiness as if it was easy to let go.

“I know you feel it, too,” she said as her eyes drifted closed. Of course, he did. It overwhelmed his senses and dragged him into a hole even deeper than the darkness ever could. He was a casualty of a war he wasn’t prepared to fight. The fear of his irresistible temptation toward her – toward the light – should have broken through the spell that had crumpled his resistance. It didn’t. All he felt was peace. He knew it was temporary, but for the moment, that was okay.

“Sleep,” he whispered when her eyes, heavy with drowsiness, blinked open.

She shook her head languidly. “I don't want to; I want to stay here with you.”

“Remember the lake?” he asked softly. “Dream of the lake, and you'll find me there.”

“Ben, will you… will you hold me while I fall asleep?”

He nodded. Rey pushed his shoulder and he obligingly rolled onto his back so she could rest her head on his chest. His eyes wandered the vastness of the heavens as her breathing slowed. Fighting the urge to wrap her in his arms, lest he lost himself completely, he allowed his mind to wander to their temporary amicability.

Rey was curled against him for the sole reason that she wanted to be there. This wasn’t about grief or turning him or helping her friends or saving him. He didn’t know why she stayed. A treacherous part of him wanted to believe that she stayed because she cared. Was it possible that she no longer viewed him as an enemy? Were they... friends? It certainly wasn’t everything he wanted, but it would mean everything to him if he earned something from her other than hatred. He knew it was far too much to hope for, but part of him still held onto that foolish hope.

He cursed the Force. What had he done to deserve this? Any of this? The Force created a man to restore balance, led him to a lifetime of destruction on the dark side, then gave three complete strangers heroic destinies to ultimately defeat him. Kylo was the only product of those heroes. He wasn’t what they wanted, but he didn’t ask to be born. He didn’t ask for this...gift.

Someone like him shouldn’t have had the Force. But the Force wanted him, so he had trusted it to guide him. And where did the Force lead him? Down the same path as his grandfather. He knew now that he was destined to be the end of a legendary bloodline. He could accept that, but why would the Force introduce him to her? Why would it give him this torturous glimpse into what could have been – everything he could have ever wanted – when he was never given a choice? He wished he had never been born. The galaxy would have been better for it. Rey would have been better for it.

As her hand slid up his chest, however, he wasn’t so certain anymore.

“Will you stay with me all night?” She asked, ghosting her fingertips in circles over his skin. He swallowed nervously. There was nothing he would rather do.

It will tear you apart when this ends, he reminded himself. You won’t survive losing her. Kylo couldn’t find it in himself to care.

“I will stay with you as long as I can,” he whispered. “But I don’t control the Force.”

Kylo held her as she grew heavy with sleep. As he listened to the steady rhythm of her breathing, for once he didn’t fear what the morning would bring. He refused to rest his own eyes, because he couldn’t remember the last time he had felt so content.
Chapter End Notes

Conversation about death
Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Rey opened her eyes to a bright blue sky, the warmth of the sun on her face, and something soft and cool underneath her. Sitting up, her eyes settled on a familiar sight. It was as smooth as ice, enchantingly clear, and strong with vibrations of the Force. It warmed her soul, sparking feelings of peace and happiness that made her never want to leave.

"Lake Andrasha," a voice rumbled behind her. She smiled as his familiar energy enveloped her. This lake she had seen in dreams – he knew of it. Had she only been a witness of his dreams? Or were they connected in this place somehow? It didn’t terrify her as it should have. She no longer feared the strength of their bond. Every connection between them was tense with danger as they risked chance of discovery from both sides, but here, this was a place safe for them to meet. A secret. Theirs.

The sun reflected off the crystals lining its depths, sparkling like underwater stars. "Ben, it's beautiful," she breathed. It was mesmerizing, but she found her gaze drawn to the man behind her. When she turned, she was almost surprised to find him there. Her heart fluttered. The lake wasn’t the only thing mesmerizing in its beauty. There was no sign of the Supreme Leader in him as he stared out at the water, eyes bright in the sun, hair gently blowing in the breeze.

"It's my favorite place in the galaxy."

Rey remembered his preoccupation with a lake in his memories. He had hidden from the voices there as he curled up next to the shore and slept. Dreamed. Was this the place his mind returned for comfort? She remembered the nightmares she witnessed, when was the last time he had found this place in sleep? "This is the lake, the one from your childhood," she said, wishing she understood how it fit in the puzzle of their bond. "It's like a dream."

"Technically, it is a dream," he chuckled. "Let me show you something." Without hesitation, he grasped her hand and led her down to the water. Stealing a glance up at him, she found his expression was soft and content in a way she had never seen before. She had never seen him so... unburdened. He still wore his dark tunic and trousers, but he seemed lighter. Was this truly him? Or what he could be? Or what she wanted him to be? Was he even there at all? She knew it was a dream, but she could have stayed in that place forever.

They removed their boots and sat near the water's edge, letting the warm water caress their feet. It all felt so real. “There's...energy in the water.”

"It's the Kyber crystals at the bottom of the lake," he explained, "I used to come here to escape...away from disappointing my father...away from scaring my mother...away from Snoke's voice in my head, which disappeared when I came here...It was the closest I have ever been to happy here. I would sit here and practice my manipulation of the Force with the water until I fell asleep.” He waved his hand gently over the lake and a cone of water reached up toward his fingers. He twisted and manipulated it until it broke free of the surface tension of the lake. It bounced together into a bubble of water in mid-air. He moved his hands around the bubble, stretching and collapsing it. She was captivated by the way the sunlight refracted through the water bubble and created colorful beams of light.

"Open your hands," he whispered." Rey stared into his eyes as she silently complied. When he manipulated the water bubble over her upturned palms, she felt the warmth of his energy. The light. It was as powerful as she had felt in his memories. This wasn’t the man she knew and it hurt more than she ever imagined to admit it. It's just a dream, Rey, she reminded herself. He’s not really here.

Kylo held the sphere of water in front of her as she manipulated it with the Force. Though it was new and strange, it didn't seem abstract and fantastical like her dreams usual did. His energy seemed too strong for a dream. She tried to concentrate on the beauty in her hands, but she was too focused on the light in him. It wasn’t until he released the water gently so she could feel the ever-changing energy that she allowed herself to bask in his light. She felt her own light mix with the energy in the sphere and felt the currents combine in a melody she could feel in her soul. His breath hitched and her gaze found his again. He felt it too. When he released the energy in his distraction, she let the water slip away between her fingers.

"Ben, is this real?"

"I don't know how this works. It's as real as you want it to be, I guess,” he said dismissively and flopped back onto the grass. Rey watched him for a moment, but his expression was guarded. Perhaps this was her bondmate. She tentatively rested her head down next to his. He used his hands to manipulate a wave to roll over them, but instead of crashing upon them, it hovered above their heads. The light of the sun shimmered through water, creating bursts of color around them. She put her hands up to help him hold it; something Rey knew she hadn't learned how to do. Was anything possible in this world? Was that how Kylo could use light without consequence?

Something changed as she held up the water. She felt… different. When she turned her head to the side to look at her bondmate, he seemed different too. “This is the first time in my entire life that I have been able to share this with anyone,” he said.

“Ben Solo! Don’t you get her wet,” someone warned behind them. “You don’t want to face the bride’s wrath by getting their only groomswoman’s dress dirty.” They both sat up under the sparkling water and turned toward the voice. Rey caught sight of a glimmer at her waist and realized she was wearing a dress. It was green, and the material was delicate and thin. She had never worn a dress before. This must be his dream.

“Maz?”

“You best get a move on, child,” she said, eying her bondmate with irritation. “You have that important meeting which you cannot be late for, and dear Rey has to put out all of those pre-celebration fires.”

“I can’t even escape meetings in my dreams,” he grumbled.

“And Rey,” Maz shouted down the hill. “Your friends are running late, so they may need help setting up as well. I don’t trust the droids to set up by themselves.”

“Finn and Rose,” she whispered.

“This must be your dream,” he murmured back.

“Devis ready, so I sent him to fetch the rings” Maz continued. “Hopefully Poe has them, but we can’t find him. He might be with the others in Hanna City at the Senate House.”

“Dev? So this is your dream,” Rey giggled.

Her bondmate’s attention was elsewhere. “What are they doing there?”

“Do you know the place?”

“Well, you could say that,” he grumbled in irritation, “I’ve been to that senate house with my mother more times than I can count. I hate it all. They claim to represent the civilizations of the galaxy, but they exude ostentatious pretension. The entire place smells of avarice and vanity. Every bill that passes through the Senate, projecting the betterment of the galaxy, belies their true greed-driven, self-indulgent intentions. At least, it did, because the Senate was destroyed on Hosnian Prime.”
“You forgot the part where the Chandrila Senate House in Hanna City became the interim capital of the rebuilding of the Republic Systems Alliance, as it had been for the New Republic after the Galactic Civil War,” Maz cackled with a tone that implied it was both a surprising revelation and common knowledge he should have known.

“What is the Republic Systems Alliance?” Rey asked the older woman. There was a knowing smile on the woman’s lips that unnerved her.

“There is no Republic Systems Alliance,” he answered. “There is no Republic.”

“Tell that to your friends, Ben Solo.” Cane pointed at him in challenge, Maz stared him down, daring him to argue.

“What business do they have at the Senate house?”

“They arranged for young Solo’s meeting with the council to coincide with this hearing. Admiral Dameron invited Finn and Rose to speak in front of the new Senate of the Republic Systems Alliance concerning the events that had transpired during the fall of the First Order. They were supposed to have plenty of time before the wedding, unfortunately, it’s running past schedule.”

“The fall of the...” Her bondmate seemed… terrified. “Maz, none of that happened.”

“Oh, dear boy. You have your father’s heart, but also his fear of the unexplainable,” she replied, which did nothing to ease the fear Rey felt emanating from her bondmate. “I thought you would understand better than anyone; time is relative, my dear. I'll see you two at the wedding.”

Maz disappeared over the hill, but the tension didn’t ease with her departure. Rey waited for him to say something, anything, but he remained silent. He lay back and continued manipulating the water above their heads, lost to his thoughts. “Ben?”

“It’s just a dream.”

“Of course, it is,” she replied, and, just like that, the dream changed again. The fancy dress was gone, and she felt the weight of the galaxy again. He must have felt the change as well, because he turned to look at her. Noticing that the dream had returned to what it had been before seemed to ease his agitation.
After a moment, she spoke up again. "I can imagine you lying here as a child and practicing this."

"It was one of my favorite escapes," he replied. When Rey pictured him – dark curls flopping in his eyes as he manipulated the water over his head – he was no older than five. His laugh, his smile, the brightness in his eyes – it seemed more like a memory than imagination. Was it his memory? Or was it just her naïve hope that the darkness hadn’t always held him tightly in its clutches. Rey would have given every last portion to have five minutes with that little boy. Could she have saved him? Was there anything she could have said that would have given hope when there was none? Perhaps she would have taken him far away from Sidious, his family and the politics of the Core Worlds and given him the chance he deserved. It seemed like a far simpler task than picking up the pieces of a broken man.

Rey couldn’t stand to imagine it any further. "What were your other escapes?"

"It's been so long since I thought about it," he whispered. Rey nodded, biting back the tears she knew would inevitably fall. Tears were a luxury she hadn’t had for most of her life. When her only focus was to survive; hope was all she had to hold onto, and tears could easily lead to dehydration. Now she was healthier, physically stronger, safer than she had ever been, but the tears were unbidden. She shed tears for herself – tears of loneliness and isolation. She shed tears for her friends – tears of fear and helplessness as the galaxy crumbled to war around them. She shed tears for the people she’d lost – mourning some, condemning others. But mostly, she shed tears for him. Today she would cry for the man he never got to be. Kylo seemed to sense her sorrow and broke the silence to distract her. "I had a few escapes," he said. "I liked things that would get me out of my own head; dejarik… practicing piloting the Falcon... reading...calligraphy..."

"Calligraphy?" she asked, her sorrow momentarily forgotten as she dried her tears with the back of her hand. Turning to gauge his expression, she found a flicker of embarrassment in his eyes. It was the truth. It faded quickly to something far more sobering as he searched her face. His brows pinched in concern. She could map every tear track on her cheeks by the path his gaze followed as he memorized them. It upset him – that she was crying – and she wondered if he knew it was because of him. If he had opened himself to embarrassment in hope of comforting her, it had worked. A smile slowly lifted her lips as she imagined him scrolling beautiful words across parchment. “I have so many questions.”

Kylo’s face softened in response. Rey was certain he would avoid any further mention of it. Perhaps the dream left him feeling less vulnerable, or perhaps his desire to dry her tears was stronger than any embarrassment her felt from the admission, but he surprised her by continuing. "Yes, my mother taught me. Well, she had someone teach me. My mother saw to it that I was raised with an emphasis on education and culture as if I were a Prince of Alderaan. It was important to her that I was taught Alderaanian dances, pretentious languages, calligraphy, hair braiding... all the ancestral royal customs. She thought it would keep me busy when they were away.”
Rey’s interest had caught on two words, interrupting all other thoughts with increasingly humorous images. She smirked. “Hair braiding?"

“Force, you have no idea the intricacies behind hair braiding,” he grumbled. “Each braid means something different; there are customs about braiding someone’s hair or especially taking it out. It’s complicated.”

She reached up to trace her fingers over the intricate plait Leia had tenderly weaved into her hair. “What does my braid mean?”

“Forgiveness,” he answered vaguely, without more than a glance toward her hair to study what his mother had delicately placed there. “And, yes, she absolutely knew what she was doing.”

“What did your mother's mean?”

He puffed out his cheeks, blinking more than necessary, but he surprised her by answering. “It's worn during times of grief or separation.”

Rey’s fingers slid down through the tangles in the unbraided sections of her hair. The last time a mother figure had fixed her hair, she had left it styled that way for nearly a decade and a half. What Leia had done meant far more to her, but she couldn’t do that to herself again. It was time to move on. “Will you braid my hair?” she asked softly. “Something with a different meaning?”

“You’re only supposed to have someone you trust braid your hair.” He didn’t shake his head, or tell her "no," but the way he said it was with finality, as though trust between them was inconceivable. He didn’t trust her; she knew that. And though there was part of her that trusted him – the part that allowed him to see a side of her no one else had– she didn’t trust him completely. She feared trusting him when the bond closed and he slid that mask over his face. She feared trusting him with the lives of her friends. She feared trusting him not to break her heart again.

“What about taking it out?”

Kylo studied her quietly with an expression she couldn’t quite place, then shook his head. “For Alderaanians, it is the most intimate thing you can do. My father used to do it for my mother every night.”
“Apparently, they didn't have Force bonds,” she said, nudging him with her shoulder.

He huffed a near chuckle, but there was something other than mirth in his stare. “No, I suppose not.”

His focus swiftly shifted back to the beauty above them, and she allowed her own eyes to drift to the sparkling water. He was manipulating the energy to create currents, causing the light to refract differently as it moved. Rey lifted her hand to watch the beautiful colors dance over her skin. Smiling, she turned to follow the colors that glimmered over her bondmate. The red stained his hand like blood, the orange, yellow and green brightened his dark attire, and the blue climbed upward across his scar. She would have never imagined when she carved that wound with her blade that they would be anything but contentious. Only two days before finding herself in this dream, she would have never imagined this amity – this warmth – between them. That was the problem, though, wasn’t it? This was all a dream. It was nice to imagine for a moment that it wasn’t. “Well, if you won't braid my hair, will you write something in a beautiful language for me?”

His hand abruptly stalled in its gentle flourishes and she wondered what about her question shocked him. “What would you have me write?”

Tentatively, she touched the hovering water with her fingertip. It rippled. “Surprise me.”

“Okay, I will.”

There was something hopeful in his tone. She could feel his smile across the bond but didn’t turn to see it. She didn’t want to break the fragile moment. Instead, she returned the conversation to safer territory. “Did she teach your father, too? I can’t imagine Han Solo writing calligraphy.”

“Absolutely not,” he said, clearly amused by her suggestion. “There was no room in his life for that. Or the Force. No matter what my mother did, there was absolutely no civilizing my father. His only concession was that he would dance with her – not the formal Alderaanian dances – but I think that was one of her favorite things about him. It was her way of proving she had tamed the rogue.”

“Well, I think calligraphy has to be my new favorite thing I've learned about you.” She wondered how long it had been since he had practiced. There were no personalized items in his quarters and she imagined that old-fashioned writing instruments were not likely readily available on a star destroyer. The only calligraphy set she had ever seen was in a chest… in the basement of Maz’s castle… on Takodana… with his uncle’s lightsaber. “Ben, whose calligraphy set was in that chest on Takodana with Luke’s lightsaber?”

“My grandfather’s lightsaber,” he corrected. “Everything in that chest was mine. I told you that lightsaber belonged to me. I gave it to my… to Lando, to keep it safe, but he gave it to Maz to hide from me after I joined Snoke.”

“You know Maz? Then why –”

“Okay, Rey, now it's your turn,” he said as he moved his fingers and the water vibrated in return.
The movement caught the light of the sun and it temporarily blinded her. “What did you do as an escape?”

“Well, I mostly just learned how to build things... but I also studied alien languages and the schematics for starships, and I ran flight simulators to learn how to fly from a downed Y-wing bomber.”

“No wonder you're good at everything,” he murmured. It sounded surprisingly sincere. It was an odd sentiment from a man who had called her “nothing,” and claimed she needed a “teacher.” Did Kylo view her in a different light than she had always assumed? She would have asked him, if he hadn’t spoken first. “But that’s practical. What did you do as an escape?”

“I guess... I had a doll I made from a flightsuit and a rebellion helmet that belonged to someone named Captain Raeh. I used to wear the helmet and play with the doll and pretend I was part of the Rebel Alliance. I pretended my parents left to fight a war far away and I found them on one of my missions after I joined. I imagined I found them hiding in the desert and we hugged and cried and promised to never leave each other again. I imagined winning the war and coming home to them and listening to them tell me how proud of me they were for becoming a rebellion hero.” Rey turned to Kylo when he made a noise in his throat. The sound was more animal than human. He wasn’t looking at her, but his jaw was clenched tight. Was he angry because she mentioned the rebellion? “I also counted the stars. And wondered which star was closest to my parents.
Sometimes I would pretend they had moved to a closer star each night. I still think about –”

“I used to count the stars too,” he said, his voice was low and bitter. Rey didn’t understand what had antagonized him, but there was no doubt he was angry. This concerned far more than her childhood fantasy of joining the rebellion. “But I wasn’t a slave, starving on a forsaken planet, sentenced to that fate by my junkie parents who were buried a few kilometers from where I slept.
They don’t deserve another second of your thoughts. Rey knew he was angry, but she had never heard his voice so cold. She turned to him, releasing her control of the water above them, so he allowed the wave to crash upon them.
“Ben!”

Rey’s eyes snapped open, sleep still settled over her features. “Ben?” she whispered. She felt the emptiness in her mind first. She rolled over in her bed. Kylo was no longer beside her. And she was back in the temple room. It wouldn’t have been surprising if she had remembered going back down to her room after they talked on the steps of the temple.

Did he... no, he wouldn’t risk being found by the Resistance to come down here himself.

She might have considered it further if she wasn’t focused on that dream. From start to finish, the dream had been strange. He had seemed more like Ben Solo than she had ever seen him. But the things Maz had said... it terrified him. Did he fear is becoming true? Did he have reason to fear the First Order would fall? Or was it the first time he had ever considered it? Was he even there? Was it real, or was it merely the desire of a little girl in denial with too much hope? It didn’t seem like the man she knew at all. Then again, she didn’t know who her bondmate was anymore. There was a side to him she never imagined. And in her dream, if he was there, if it was real, he seemed almost... happy. At least, he had until the end. She still didn’t understand what had happened. She needed to see him again. Closing her eyes, she attempted to drift back to sleep. But her body was suddenly very awake when she felt a presence.

Is he still here?

Fear pricked the fine hairs on the back of her neck as she realized she sensed two different energies in the room. No one had announced themselves and there was no reason for anyone to be in her room. It was too dark to see them or determine the purpose of the intrusion, but the warning screaming in the Force made it clear she had reason to be concerned. The intruders’ steps were soft, deliberate, as they circled close to the walls to meet at her bed. They moved as if she couldn’t sense them – or they believed her to be asleep. Even though they were holding their breaths, she could hear their hearts thundering in the Force.

Rey had faced many predators in her life, she had no doubt the intruders’ intentions were nefarious. Her only fear was what they wanted from her. Surprise was their greatest advantage, so she decided to use it against them. If they would force her to engage them, then she would draw them in close. She listened to her own unsteady breathing as she waited for the inevitable. Seconds stretched like hours. The tension around her was palpable; her nerves were pulled taut, ready to snap. She nearly cried in relief when a familiar presence suddenly invaded her thoughts.

Are you okay? his voice echoed in her mind. It was unsettling how strong the bond had become. He had somehow sensed her fear. Though she was initially relieved, she knew that situation would become exponentially worse if he was there.

She blocked his energy from her mind to the best of her abilities. There was a far more pressing problem that she had to direct her focus. The sound of squeaking boots reverberated off the stone floor, drawing closer. She slowly straightened up in bed, searching the dark room for a weapon. Her eyes fell on her staff just as a blue arc of electricity shattered the darkness in front of her. She cried out as a sudden flash of pain jolted through her. Her teeth clenched as her body went rigid in paralysis.

Rey?

Panic trembled in Kylo’s voice. She wanted to reassure him, or close herself off from the bond, but she wasn’t strong enough to do anything but writhe against the currents still crashing through her system. All at once, she was ripped from her bed by two large men, but Rey was not one to be kidnapped willingly. She screamed as she fought the weakness in her limbs. The paralysis interrupted her connection to the Force, and she was unable to will it away. She struggled under their grasp, but she was too numb to even kick out at them. She screamed at them to release her, threatening the use of the Force she couldn’t manipulate.

Biting and scratching, she snarled like a wounded, feral animal. Undeterred, they pulled her out into the hallway, and she recognized them as members of the Resistance. The fight in her died as her anger was swallowed by confusion. She focused the Force to restore the sensation in her body. They dragged her down a long corridor and into the war room… to a waiting Poe Dameron.

"Get your hands off me!" she screamed, shoving one of them away with the Force. The other Resistance member lifted his blaster rifle and aimed it at her. She turned her focus on the general. "Is this entirely necessary?"

"Please, don't hurt her!" Finn begged from behind the kidnapper, grasping the man’s shoulder to redirect his aim. Grim understanding finally clicked in her mind then. It had only been a few short hours since the last time she had seen her best friend, but after everything that had happened since then, it felt like days. The confrontation between Finn and Kylo had nearly become deadly, her friend had become more unhinged than she had ever seen him, Kylo had even warned her about the repercussions, and yet, she still hadn’t seen this coming. She had wholeheartedly believed that her friend would never betray her. She thought she would have to face his disappointment with the rise of the sun, but not this. There was only one reason why she had been dragged out of her bed.

Rey glared at him furiously. She trusted him. He hadn’t even waited to talk to her. How could he do this to her? How could he betray her – to Poe Dameron? There was conflict in his eyes, but it only confirmed what he had done. She hardened her voice so he wouldn’t hear the tears that threatened to spill over. “You told them.”
Rey! she heard Kylo’s voice again. His presence pried at her mind, desperately clawing at the bond like a frenzied beast, trying to get through to her. His fear resonated through their connection, crashing into her own.

Poe was just as relentless. “Tell me now, or, so help me, Rey, I'll execute you for treason. Leia's not here to help you this time.”

"Then how… was he in… your room?" Poe’s voice was a low growl. He glared at her as if she were Snoke himself, all his willpower consumed with finding a reason not to pull the trigger.

It was the moment of truth. She had been running from it her entire life. If there was one thing Leia had taught her, it was that she should have trusted her sooner. It was time to face her fears again. "He was not actually there, Poe. He just... appears to me... sometimes. Neither of us has control over it. The Force brings us together against our will. We haven’t figured out how to stop it yet. It was something Snoke created to draw me into a trap. Obviously, that didn't go as planned. I went to Ahch-To for Luke's help, but he refused. Kylo was there for me when Luke wasn’t. That was why I went to him on the Supremacy, to turn him. Last night, he appeared to me after his mother died, but he was still on the Finalizer the whole time."

Her words did nothing to alleviate Poe’s agitation. “So you lied to me,” he said. It wasn’t a question. His face was twisted with disgust, as if she were a piece of garbage littering the floor he walked on. “You lied about going to the Supremacy, you lied about that night I heard voices in your room, you lied yesterday about your cape in the forest, you lied about the kiss... all you've done is lie to us. And you expect me to believe a word you say now?”

Rey tilted her chin higher in defiance. “Yes.”
“And when were you planning on mentioning this to the Resistance?” he hissed. There was a darkness that surrounded his usual faint signature in the Force. Rage. “He’s our enemy, Rey! He’s not some lowly stormtrooper; he’s leader of the entire First Order! And you have been communicating with him the whole time! You have a relationship our enemy! I have no choice but to assume that you revealed sensitive information about the Resistance. This is Treason, Rey!”

Rey panicked. This hadn’t gone the way she had thought. The words were falling off her tongue before she could consider them. “Leia knew!”

"I’m sure she was thrilled.” His mocking tone was sharp and sarcastic, almost petulant. The others in the room had their weapons trained on her, waiting for his command, as if she were the enemy. She had no doubt they would kill her if she didn't find a reason for Finn discovering the Supreme Leader in her room. So she lied. Rey did not have much experience with military discourse, so she delved deep in her experience with her bondmate to deliver her most believable tactical summarization.

“My communication with him was Leia’s idea. She was made aware of the bond when I was on Ahch-To. She believed Kylo Ren could be turned and tasked me with a mission to form a rapport with him and push for his defection. He has emotional weaknesses that Snoke did not possess and has revealed a disenchantment with the First Order. The greatest obstacle I have faced in my mission is that he believes his second-in-command, the one responsible for Hosnian Prime, would take drastic measures if he defected. But I believe now he can be turned. We have an undeniable opportunity to dismantle the First Order from the inside if I can turn him. I just need more time.” Her eyes burned daggers into Finn's to threaten his silence, both knowing her words were a lie, but he looked away.

Catching her glare, Poe refocused his suspicion on Finn. “And why didn't she tell me any of this?”

“It was classified as 'need to know,' and you didn't,” Rey spat acerbically.

Poe clicked the safety off the blaster. “You lying traitor...”

Finn must have feared Poe's volatility. “It's true!” he shouted, jumping between them. “I... I knew about it, too.” And just like that, Finn had committed treason for her. It made no sense, he was the one who betrayed her in the first place. If their lie was discovered, the Resistance would kill him, too. It should have left her grateful to know that part of him was still loyal to her, or angry that he had forced her into that situation, but she only felt regret and shame that she had dragged someone she loved into her mess. Since the confrontation, she had only considered her trust in him, not the trust he’d had in her. He felt just as betrayed But he hadn’t abandoned her when she needed him.
Poe considered the new information for a moment before continuing the interrogation with a predatory focus in his eyes. She tried with everything in her to maintain eye contact to prove she had nothing to hide. His mind was three steps ahead, not only processing the information and determining its validity, but creating a strategy that best suited the needs of the Resistance. He may not have been a Force-sensitive, but he was a force to be reckoned with. “Is it true that you can hurt him through this bond?”

What else did Finn tell him?

"I was able to will a droid part to hit him," she confessed with great reluctance, fearful of the direction the conversation had turned, of what he would ask her to do. "But my blaster was ineffective against him, and I do not have a lightsaber."

That–apparently–was the wrong answer. The distrustful ire lay heavy on his words. "Where is the lightsaber? With him?"

"Not that it's any of your concern," she said through gritted teeth, “but it was broken in Snoke's throne room after Ben killed him to save my life.” Let him be angry. She had spent her entire life under someone else's control; she bowed to no one.

"Not any of my..." he started, but his head tilted, and he blinked as if his mind had caught on a single word. A dangerous look passed over his face. “Ben? You mean Kylo Ren, don’t you? Our enemy?” He scoffed derisively. “Careful, Rey; it almost sounds like you have compassion for this monster.” The resentment tightened in her chest. She could sense the darkness tempting her.

Careful, Poe; it would be too easy to summon that blaster from your hand.

Poe turned his attention to Finn. “Do you hear this, Colonel? Can we trust her with our lives? With your fiancée’s life? Has she been compromised? What did you see or hear when you entered the room last night?” Finn glanced at her nervously, his face painfully conflicted, but Poe stepped between them, blocking his view of her.

"Ren was half-dressed, and she had her arms around him when I walked in," Finn reported, his lips curled as if the words themselves were bitter. “It looked...intimate. Too comfortable for enemies. He and I both drew our weapons. She defended him by disarming me of my blaster. I think... she has been manipulated by Ren. She believes his lies. But I don't think she would ever intentionally do anything to hurt us.” A tear slipped down his cheek. Rey couldn't fault him for his honesty. His words spoke of more confidence in her than she had given him reason to have. But, truth or not, he had endangered both her and Kylo's life by confiding in Poe. That wouldn't be so easily forgiven. Poe moved from between them, but Finn refused to meet her piercing stare.

_You know what you did. You signed our death warrants. After he spared your life._

“He promised he wouldn't hurt you, and I trusted him! If he wanted you dead, you wouldn't be standing here, Finn!” She had said it before considering the implications, but once the words left her lips, she knew she had revealed too much.

“Oh, so Snoke's rabid weapon does your bidding now?” Poe chuckled darkly. “Are you his new master? Or do you expect us to believe he actually cares for you?” The way he said it reminded her of a time Kylo stood before her with the same arrogant look upon his face, insinuating she was nothing. _You? A scavenger?_

Finn stepped forward, attempting to deescalate the situation. "Kylo Ren cares for no one – not even his own parents who loved him. Don't forget that, Rey."

He was so certain of his truth that, for a moment, Rey wondered if he could be right. Kylo had called her nothing. He had tried to kill her. He had shut her out and was prepared to never speak to her again. He was actively trying to kill them all. Finn had known him for years, and she, only a couple weeks. Weeks of harsh words in unending arguments. When he wasn’t holding her in his arms, it was easy to convince herself that it was all a ploy to gain her trust. It was easier to convince herself, because it would be easier if it was true.

What if Finn _was_ right? After all she had done to Kylo, how could he care? That small voice inside her that had been screaming to trust him for weeks refused to be silenced, however. This one was not as persuasive as the darkness – as Snoke – but it still guided her to the truth. Kylo _did_ care for her, if not now, then before on Ahch-To. He had only ever been honest with her on the island. She had felt his conflicted emotions on the _Supremacy_, before he felt she betrayed him, and the rare moments since when he allowed a short glimpse into his soul. His feelings had reflected hers when he lowered his mental barriers the previous night. He had held her, comforted her, but never lied, even if it would have been easier. He spared her friend. And the dream... what if it _was_ real? Her friends had been wrong about her, what if they were wrong about him too?

Rey still hadn't sorted through the complicated emotions to understand exactly what it was she felt for him, and in what capacity, but she knew she cared for him. She wouldn't have been so angry with him for choosing power if she didn't. Finn may have known him for years, but had he _truly_ known him like she did? He hadn’t seen Kylo’s memories; he didn’t understand Kylo as she did. If Kylo didn't care, then what had she felt from him? Why would he risk his own life to help her? He had gained nothing in return for his treason, not even her gratitude. Her heart told her that she wasn’t a fool for believing in him, and if she couldn’t trust that, then what could she trust?

"He's not who you think he is," she whispered. When Poe raised his eyebrows mockingly, she feared his retaliation if she attempted to persuade him further. What could she say without revealing the depths of their complicated – and, admittedly, treasonous – connection? Regardless, he was steadfast in his judgment of Kylo and didn't trust her, so there was little she could do to alter his perception.

They will only ever see him for the wrongs he has done. No one will give him a chance to see what is in his heart. I was no better, and I was connected to him. How can I expect them to see what I refused to see when it was right in front of me?

She lowered her eyes to the stone floor. “I believe with more communication that he can be turned.”

“Rey,” Poe said, lowering his weapon when she glanced up at him. Shaking his head, he softened his voice to a sympathetic tone. "No more chances. He had his chance to turn when he killed Snoke, but he tried to kill us instead. He almost did, if not for you. I don't understand your need to turn him after what you watched him do to his own father, but I get that the thought of his death might affect you because of your ‘bond.’ It's like junking your fighter after spending hours trying to save it. Except, you know, if the fighter was a mass murderer. It's too damaged, and there comes a moment when you finally realize that there's nothing more you can do, but it's still hard to give up. I think if there was a mission for Leia as you say, you got too close. Your bond has clouded your ability to see him for what he actually is, not just what he is around you.”

Before she could respond, he raised his hand in the ubiquitous demand for silence. “Listen, Finn and I think he's manipulating you. He will use you to further his desire for galactic domination. But I'm giving you the benefit of the doubt right now, so hear me out. 'Ben' is the holoposter child for the emotionally unstable – always has been. I don't doubt you've seen him vulnerable, but, at the end of the day, he is still the leader of an army that wants to destroy us. What I am saying, Rey, is a man can cry because his mother is dead and still be the sole reason she died in the first place. He can be broken and lost and lonely. He can be gentle or regretful with you and still march back to the bridge of the Finalizer the second you're gone and order the genocide of an entire system. He can have every emotional weakness that makes a conflicted man and still run his lightsaber through every single last one of us. He can be whatever you think he is with you, and still be exactly what we all believe him to be – a murderer intent upon eliminating us. It is my job to ensure that doesn't happen. So I want you to consider my next question carefully, because this is the only part that matters – Will he surrender or swear allegiance to the Resistance? Right now?"

Even if he would surrender, Rey found that she would not allow it. She knew that if he did swear his allegiance to the Resistance that very moment, Poe would never give him the chance to prove himself. There was no doubt in her mind that her general would kill her bondmate. Poe was right; he had done truly terrible things, but she couldn't fathom the thought of losing him. If he died at the hands of people she thought of as family, she could never look at them the same way again. She would have to walk away from the Resistance, and, whether or not she wanted to be their last hope, she knew they needed her. She fought the tears that threatened to expose her. “No, he won't. And I don't blame him.”

His demeanor instantly transformed at her words, the fire in his eyes returning. "Then he is exactly who I think he is,” he sneered, “our enemy. An enemy who could be dead right now, without your interference. Let me make this clear for you – your mission has changed. Kylo Ren cannot be turned, because he cannot be trusted. We will use your bond to our advantage. You will call him here, and he will be charged for war crimes. Or... you will be. Either you're with him or us. It's that simple." She felt agitation radiate across the bond. Was he angry she shut him out? Or had something happened to him as well? She hoped whatever was happening to Kylo, he stayed far away.

“Poe, it's not that simple. The Force –”

"Where do your loyalties lie, Rey?” Poe leaned against the wall of the war room, arms crossed. "If you're with us, then you are fundamentally and ethically against everything that creature represents. If you're with him, your supposed 'assignment,' then you're implicitly against us. Choose."

Why! Why does it have to be us against him? Why can’t I have both?

Poe stepped forward and raised the weapon to her head. “The First Order or the Resistance. Your life or his. Final warning.”

“Poe! We're all on the same side here,” Finn pleaded with their general to see reason. When Poe didn’t so much as blink in response, Finn turned her instead. “Please, Rey!”

"I choose the Resistance,” she whispered. "But don't you dare ask me to kill him.”

“I would never ask you to do that.” It should have been reassuring, but his words were emotionless. Cold. I would never trust you, his eyes told her. I’ll kill him myself. “Call him here over your little Force link, tell him whatever lie you want. Tell him we want to discuss negotiations to surrender, tell him you want to continue your... relations from last night, tell him you love him for all I care, but get him here.” Tears burned in her eyes as she imagined Kylo falling by her friends' hands, deceived by the one person he trusted enough to open himself to that betrayal. Execution for treason would have been a kinder fate than having to look him in the eyes as he realized she was responsible for his death.
Please, don't make me do this. I will never forgive you.

“Call him here!” Poe's eyes were wild with rage as he jammed his blaster against her temple. She had no doubt he would pull the trigger. Kylo was right. Poe's only allegiance was to the Resistance, and once she was viewed as a threat to their operation, she had become expendable. “Now!”

“Ben...” she said to the temple room, fearing that the Force would hear her call and bring him to her. If he could hear her, she had to say something that would warn him of the danger without alerting Poe to her deception. “Ben, I need you. It's urgent. A matter of life or death. I hate to do this, but I have to ask you to come to me,” Poe eyed her suspiciously. “You have experience with this, Luke taught you that night at the temple. There are certain matters you explained last night that I am beginning to understand. I'll listen now. Trust me. Please, Ben.”

The moment she finished, Poe wrapped his arm around her and put his hand over her mouth, aiming the blaster toward the empty sections of the room, scanning methodically for her bondmate. She could have fought him, but could she fight them all?

“If he doesn't show, I'll know you warned him,” he whispered in her ear. She wondered how long she could pretend she had actually contacted Kylo before she was thrown in a holding cell or executed. It was preferable to the thought of what would happen if Kylo didn't understand her furtive warning. Poe would kill him if he was careless. And if Kylo understood her warning and still revealed himself... she was the only one standing between her friends and certain death. She had trusted him not to hurt Finn the night before, but could she trust him if they tried to kill him?

Or her?

The room had originally been a celebration hall, nearly three times the size they needed for the war room. They had a limited supply of glowrods, which were only affixed to the torch sconces located around the long, makeshift table. The other two-thirds of the room was cast in darkness. There were only six members in the room – herself, Poe, Finn, the newly restored Beebee, and the two guards that dragged her there.

All weapons were aimed toward the void in the dark. Their eyes and the shadows played tricks on them as they searched for movement. Rey begged the Force to keep Kylo as far away from her as possible for his sake and the others she cared for in the room. She couldn't bear to be thrown in the middle again, asked to choose between two lives that she valued the most. They had been lucky the previous night. She wasn't naïve enough to believe it could end well with Poe in the mix.
She wanted to warn him through the bond, but she feared that even if he did hear her warning, their connection would bring them together against their will. There was no vibration in the Force, the sound in the room never faded, there was no slight tug at the base of her neck. But she could still feel him as strongly as she had when she first heard his voice calling her. She waited as fearfully as the rest of them. The only sound was the anxious huff of her breath through her nose, amplified by Poe's hand over her mouth.

It was quiet.

Too quiet.

Then all Hell broke loose.

The crimson light that illuminated the shadows of the dark sent a shiver down her spine the second before she heard the vengeful sparking of its volatile blade.

Ben, no! Watch out!

The room was immediately alight with a succession of blaster bolts aimed toward the black shadow. Rey cried out into Poe's palm, too overwhelmed by the thought that Kylo could be killed to fight the general off. But she should have known – Kylo had held his own against three members of the elite Praetorian Guard all at once; of course he could manage four blasters. Each bolt was easily blocked, though she did notice the blade strategically directed them toward the wall rather than back toward her friends. One question had been answered: if the bolts hit the lightsaber, it meant they could hit him. They could kill him.

“Ben, go!” she screamed, but her words were muffled by Poe's hand.

Poe understood quickly that they had not caught him as unawares as they had hoped, so he resorted to a different tactic. “Cease fire!” The others obeyed as he moved her to the center of the room, still separating them from Kylo with the table. He lifted the blaster to her head and depressed the trigger enough to make his warning clear; if Kylo attempted to summon the weapon, he could inadvertently cause it to fire. He could freeze a blaster bolt, but could he do it before it exited the barrel directly into her skull?

“Let her go, Dameron and I'll spare you,” Kylo's deep voice echoed through the darkness. Even if the others in the room were not Force-sensitive, she knew they must feel the intensity of his wrath.
in the Force. If they didn't, they most certainly heard it laced through each word. His threat was clear. If they didn’t do as he commanded, he would kill them.

Poe whispered a directive in her ear and removed his hand from her mouth. “Come into the light, Ben,” she repeated, failing to control the fear trembling in her voice.

Finn parroted her request from somewhere off to her right. “Show yourself, Ren.”

Kylo ignored their commands. She had never felt such unbridled rage from him. Not on Starkiller or Crait, the night she kissed Poe, or the day he shut her out. Poe had threatened her life. While she understood the tactic, she feared Kylo's reaction. He had wiped out an entire civilization when they made vague threats against her life; what would he do to a man who held a blaster to her head?

“Let her go!” he repeated.

Poe was having none of his demands. “Put down the lightsaber, or I shoot her, Ren. And then I’ll throw you in a cell with her corpse!” She knew that Poe would not back down; he was quickly losing control of the situation and was prepared for bloodshed. Was Kylo? Would he do that to her?

Ben, are you there?

Always, his voice rumbled in her mind, though there was a sharpness to it that concerned her.

You have to go; your life is in danger!

It's better than the alternative. She could sense his fear and anger through the bond, but also...betrayal. Why betrayal? She remembered the pointed anger that had pulsated through the bond earlier. What had happened across the galaxy? It wasn't the time to ask, but his mental state concerned her.

They won't hurt me; they're using me to get to you. Please, go. They mean to kill you.

They can try. With that, his mental barriers were raised. He was shutting her out.
Kylo surprised them all by disengaging the lightsaber, casting the room into darkness. It did little to calm the nerves of her companions, however. As frightening as his blood-red blade was to behold, being unable to locate their lethal enemy was far worse. They had fired upon him, they had made it clear they intended to do him harm, and his least favorite person at the Resistance was holding a gun to her head. They had all been witness to or had heard stories of the terror this man could deliver with the Force.

And now he had the advantage.

The only evidence of her bondmate lurking beyond the shadows was the soft reverberation of his boots upon the temple floor. The small hairs prickled on the back of her neck as she held her breath, waiting for the inevitable break in the standoff. She had never been more thankful that he was on her side; she only wished her friends could say the same. She wouldn't let him kill them, but she was at a disadvantage without a lightsaber of her own.

“Ben, don't do this!” she begged. “Show them that you're not the man they think you are! Please, don't hurt them! Just go. I'll be okay!”

“You are exactly who we think you are, aren't you Supreme Leader?” Poe's voice was strong and authoritative in the face of fear, attempting to draw Kylo from the darkness. “Poor Ben Solo – spoiled little rich boy, who had everything anyone else could ever want. It must have been awful to have two of the greatest heroes of the rebellion as parents. It was such a terrible life that he got to train to become a Jedi Knight under Luke Skywalker! But he threw it all away to become everything his family fought to destroy! Isn't that right, Kylo?”

Kylo's answer was surprisingly even and low. “You know nothing about me.”

Poe smiled. “I know whatever is wrong with you is long and difficult to pronounce.”

“Everything is long and difficult to pronounce for someone like you,” came the reply from the darkness. There was something there, a familiarity that Rey expect.

“I know you thought mommy and daddy didn't give you enough attention,” Poe called out, gesturing with his head for Finn direct his aim to the left. Finn stepped forward slowly with his blaster raised as he searched the shadows for his target. Poe shifted his grip on the blaster pressed against her temple. “But I grew up with my parents away a lot too. Why didn't I join the dark side, huh?”
There was only a low growl from the darkness. “Your parents quit the rebellion for you; your parents loved you.”

Finn moved toward the sound of his voice and Poe pushed Rey so they followed closely behind. “What about Finn or Rey?” Poe said with a feigned calm as he hissed anxious breaths in her ear. “They had no parents. A lot of us here at the Resistance either had parents away fighting against the evil in this galaxy or dying because of it. And look at us: we're not mass murderers.”

“You are,” the darkness answered back. “You just rationalize that the ones you kill are your 'enemy.’”

Poe had been trying to instigate a reaction from Kylo but had become agitated himself. “You killed your father! Your mother! Your uncle! We are nothing like you!”

“No?” a dark chuckle rumbled from the void. “You killed the traitor’s best friend on Tuanul, your poor choices led to the death of his fiancée’s sister, your mutiny led to the obliteration of the majority of the Resistance. Are we that different?” Poe’s finger twitched on the weapon, but he remained silent. Rey watched Finn turn to the general, his expression conflicted, but his blaster remained aimed in the direction of their enemy. She knew Kylo had been watching as well. “You may wear her wedding ring around your neck, Dameron, but we all know you're the real reason behind your mother's death. You left Shara without saying goodbye. You broke her heart. When you hate me for what I did to my mother, you hate yourself.”

Finn grabbed Poe's arm to prevent him from reacting to the inciting words, then made his own demand. “Put the weapon down and kick it to us. No one needs to get hurt.” He exchanged a warning glance with Poe as they waited, the air in the room heavy with tense anticipation.

Kylo hummed but ignored the demand. Instead, he stepped forward into the low light, the shadows playing ominously on his hardened features. He looked positively murderous. “You shot first. This is not a negotiation.”

“You're right,” Poe scoffed. “You have nothing that I want to negotiate with. But I...” he paused, gesturing to Rey's body, “...have something you want, don't I?” He grasped Rey's chin to judge Kylo's reaction, but his face was a careful mask of impassivity. Poe grabbed a black cloth from one of the chairs, and Rey’s heart stuttered when she saw the silky, red material reflect in the low lights. The last time she had seen it was when Leia disappeared. He threw the cloak at Kylo, who caught it instinctively without removing his eyes from the general. “Is that yours?” he challenged. “Spies for the First Order sure are getting pretty, aren't they, Kylo?” His face remained settled into the hungry, calculating expression he always wore, but her face twisted in fury.
After everything I sacrificed for them, he accuses me of being a spy?

“How dare you...” she started to protest, but Poe turned her chin toward him and tilted his head down slightly to whisper in her ear.

“Are you loyal to the Resistance, Rey? Prove it. Prove me wrong, prove you're not a traitor, prove there is nothing between you and him.” His breath huffed feverishly against her cheek. “Kiss me like you did when you were protecting him. And then look your enemy in the eye and tell him who has your loyalty.”

Underneath his saccharine words was a thinly veiled threat – she had to prove her loyalty to the Resistance or face execution. There was no arguing her way out of this. They had been caught committing treason. Kylo had warned her of the consequences, but she hadn't wanted to believe her own friends would turn against her. She realized now how it looked, however. She had been caught embracing the enemy. As far as they knew, she could have been providing him critical information on the Resistance. She should have been surprised they waited until morning. Her only guess for that was Finn had been conflicted, he hadn’t run to the general immediately. If she had chased after him, perhaps she could have prevented all of this. Now it was too late; Poe suspected her being a spy.

It had been quite the opposite, Kylo had risked his own life to help protect them – to what end she still didn't understand – and never asked for her to betray them in return. But she was still guilty of treachery, she knew that. There had been no mission to turn him; she had maintained a connection to the enemy despite the risk it posed to the Resistance. If she had allowed him to shut her out, neither he nor her friends would be in danger right now.

Is this war? she thought jadedly.

If they had been caught by the First Order, Kylo would already be on the floor in a pool of his own blood. She knew what she had to do, yet part of her felt as if she was back on Jakku, standing before Plutt as he denied her the appropriate portions she had earned. Rey had stayed strong then – she was a survivor – and she could be strong now, for them both. This was her chance to prove her loyalty, even if it was only long enough to save Kylo from their ambush and save them from his wrath. She knew in that moment that she couldn't join the First Order, but neither could she stay with the Resistance.

Not after this.
“Who are you loyal to?” Poe asked, loud enough for them all to hear.

She quickly caught Kylo’s stare, concern piercing through the fury. He had no idea what decision she had just made to protect him. Not that her reasoning would matter to him. Her mind flashed to the betrayal in his eyes after she had kissed Poe at the top of the temple that night. This would hurt him. He would hate her. And she feared what he would do to her friends in retaliation. But perhaps it was good fortune in disguise; perhaps it was the only way to convince Kylo to leave this trap. Even if he never forgave her, it was worth his life. With fearless determination, her eyes fluttered to meet Poe’s. He lowered his weapon slightly as she leaned into him.

She pressed her lips to Poe’s in a chaste kiss. Refusing to look either man in the eye, she pulled away. With a smile that was as convincing as she could muster with a blaster to her throat, she said, “I am loyal to the Resistance.”

As soon as she spoke those words, she jolted as if her chest had been ripped apart by a blaster. In a panic, she stared down at herself. Nothing. It was a phantom injury.

It was... him.

Her eyes snapped to her bondmate, fearing the worst. His chest was surging heavily, but there was no physical sign of a wound. No one had moved from their positions, a single blaster bolt hadn’t brightened the room, but the residual ache from the phantom injury still lingered. She was certain she felt his pain. His barriers on his side of the bond were tightly sealed, but she wondered if it was possible to wound him so deeply that it could cause physical pain. That wasn't possible. Was it? She feared the hatred she would find when she finally braved his familiar stare, but she needed to know what she had done to him.

Her throat constricted as she dragged her eyes up to meet his. The truth was far worse than she had imagined. She would have preferred the hatred. Rey swallowed a sob at the sight of the raw agony darkening in his broken eyes. She held his stare, yearning for him to find the truth in hers, but his stare dropped to the floor as if it pained him to even look at her.

I'm sorry, she tried, though she knew it wouldn’t reach him in their closed-off bond. It was trite and devastatingly inadequate, but there was nothing else to say. Poe, the kiss, her declaration of loyalty – they had meant nothing to her in comparison to her bond with him. But it had meant the galaxy to him. He had looked at her as if death would have been a kinder fate. She wished she could convey how strongly she had desired for the lips she kissed to belong to him. But now it was too late.

Rey felt a spike in the Force and startled at the sound of two loud thuds to her left. She craned her neck away from the weapon pressed into her skin to discover the two guards crumpled on the floor, weapons abandoned at their sides, unconscious. Finn had nearly dropped his blaster at the display between Poe and Rey, but the collapse of the guards renewed his attention toward their enemy. He raised his blaster toward Kylo as Poe shifted his weapon back toward her temple.

Kylo reignited his lightsaber and stepped forward, the two sides separated only by the flimsy table of the war room. It was a false security; the Force could remove the single obstacle between them with ease. Rey knew her friends were kidding themselves if they didn't believe the only reason there was still a table between them was because Kylo wanted it there. She flinched when she looked back at her bondmate. Blood lust burned in his dark eyes.

“Ben, please, don't do this!” she begged. “Just go.”

“No! He...” Kylo paused as an invisible force seemed to crash through his body. He hunched over as if he was going to be sick, his eyes shut tight, sucking in uneven breaths as if oxygen would ease his suffering. A low whimper escaped his throat, his face twisted into a grimace as his entire jaw quivered. In front of his enemies, no matter what was tormenting him internally, Kylo was usually the embodiment of intimidation and strength. For the man to be nearly brought to his knees, he must be wounded far greater than she imagined. She remembered how weak he had become in their battle on Starkiller. She feared what would happen if he fell apart surrounded by the Resistance.

Kylo overcame his misery enough to straighten, standing quietly with his head slumped forward, dark hair obscuring his eyes, his shoulders tense and trembling. There was a heavy draw on the Force – on the darkness around them – and Kylo straightened to his full height. With a stuttered breath, he forced his pained eyes open. Raising his weapon with an unsteady hand, he stared at Poe, but he was speaking to her. “He nearly killed you the last time. He won't have that chance again.”

“I won't hurt her,” Poe said, his voice as cold and apathetic as she had ever heard it. “If you drop your weapon, turn around, get on your knees, and put your hands on your head.”

Finn had finally had enough. “We're not the Hutts, General; she's not a bargaining credit.”

“Or...” Kylo interjected as he stepped closer, stony and imposing. The darkness had found him in his pain, soothing him into feigned control. Unfettered rage sparked in his eyes, his attention focused entirely on Poe. “I could rip your mind apart until you can't remember your own name. You were lucky the last time. I promise you, it gets much worse.”
“Lucky?” Poe stammered, forcing Rey down onto her knees in rage. He pressed the blaster to her forehead. “I have nightmares every night, flashbacks during the day! My memory is jumbled. Sometimes I still feel you in there! I'll never forget what you did, and I will take from you what you took from me. I don't need the Force to make you suffer. And I promise, after I am satisfied you've lost everything important to you, I'll kill you.”

Kylo rolled the hilt of his lightsaber in a lazy flourish, clenching his jaw. To the outsider, he might have looked bored or even smug, but she knew Kylo well enough to see the guilt written across his features. He sold his haughty indifference with the tone she recognized from their first interactions. “Trust me, the nightmares won't end with my death. Or my suffering. I wonder, though,” he narrowed his eyes as he cocked his head in that derisive Kylo way, “Does the Resistance know their leader has dark side thoughts of revenge? Do they know what I've seen in your mind? Leia made a mistake making you general, Dameron. Hell, even FN-2187 is more rational, and he's a known traitor! But if you're suffering, I'd be more than happy to put you out of your misery. And mine.” Rey sighed internally at his inciting words.

_Ben, what are you doing? Do you have a death wish?_

“You want misery Ben Solo? I'll give you misery!” Poe snapped as he stared down at Rey. The use of her bondmate's given name seemed heavy with familiarity on Poe's tongue. She wondered then if there was more history between them before the torture. She knew Poe's family had known Luke and Leia. Was it too far of a stretch to believe he had met Ben Solo? Did he loathe Kylo Ren so intensely because he knew the boy he was before? Not that it mattered; there would be no talking the general down from his quest to kill their enemy, even if he had once known the young Ben Solo. And the kiss only served to send Kylo into a dangerous spiral that threatened to drag them all down with him – no prisoners, no mercy. Her heart was being wrenched in two separate directions, and neither side would meet her in the middle.

“That's enough! Both of you!” she demanded helplessly.

_Ben, go! Please!_

“Poe, you can't hurt her. Point your blaster at our true enemy.” Finn was terrified, she could hear it quiver in his voice, but he spoke in a soothing tone that straddled the line of insubordination. Was he beginning to distrust their general as well? Did he regret what he had done?

“We can end this war right now.” Poe's eyes never left hers as he spoke, not to address Finn or threaten Kylo. But the ambiguity of his words was the most disconcerting. Did Poe think killing her would make Kylo suffer? Would Poe hurt her as revenge against Kylo? Or was this all one disturbing bluff to test the depths of Kylo's loyalty to her? It had to be.
Ben, it's a trap! He wants you to surrender! They'll kill you!

Kylo did not disappoint. He could have feigned apathy; it was an expression he wore well. He could have called Poe's bluff – it was a bluff, wasn't it? Ignoring her pleas, he gave Poe the leverage he was desperately searching for. “If you hurt her, you're right; the war ends now. Because I'll burn this entire place to the ground with every single last one of you inside it.” Poe grinned knowingly, and Kylo continued. “She's done nothing to you. She's nothing... to me. But she's your last hope. You kill her, and there will be no one powerful enough to stop me. And if you believe killing her or me will end this war, you're either naïve or thoroughly delusional.”

“I'm willing to find out,” Poe sneered. His finger twitched on the trigger, but the warning in the Force never came. Rey watched in silence as he held the blaster to her head, his determination waning with every passing second. Poe was many things, but he was not a cold-blooded murderer.

Rey did not fear him; her mind was still tormentingly replaying Kylo's words, as if they would change if she repeated them enough. He had told Poe that she was nothing to him. When he had glanced over at her after he'd said it, his eyes were wide, and he struggled to swallow. He had known what saying those words would do to her. You're nothing, echoed in her mind. But not to me. She had always been nothing, but now she was nothing to him, too. She was right. After what she had done to protect them, he hated her. Finn studied her carefully as she bit her lips to overpower her tears. None of them deserved to see her cry.

Finn had not come to the same conclusion she had, or he had misinterpreted why her eyes were brimming with tears. Finn may have had an allegiance to the Resistance, but his loyalty was to the people he loved over the organization he fought for. He raised his own blaster, aiming it at the general's head. “You will not hurt her,” he said with such authority that Rey knew he would make a strong leader in his own right. Poe turned to stare at Finn in bewilderment. Reading the resolve in his colonel’s eyes, Poe cautiously lowered his weapon, and Rey stole the first opportunity to jump to her feet.

“He is our enemy!” Poe shouted, gesturing to Kylo.

“Then act like it!” Finn fired back, his weapon still trained on his own general.

Rey wanted to point out that their "enemy" could have killed them both while they were bickering. If it had been a few weeks ago she would have said it. But she had learned that her mouth could make a critical situation worse – she happened to share that quality with her bondmate – and this seemed to be one of those times.
Kylo's emotions were spiraling out into the Force. His suffering was imbued into the energy around them, the strength of his pain debilitating even across the room. He was wound so tightly that, given his capricious nature, a violent outburst was likely imminent. Scrutinizing the other two men intently, his burning eyes held their focus, but he made no move to harm them. He had every opportunity, but he somehow found restraint in his struggle. This was not the man she first met in the forest. She smiled at him appreciatively, but he continued to avoid her. Kylo suddenly bristled, taking a half step forward, and her attention was drawn back to her friends.

The confrontation between her friends had escalated to deadly within seconds. Rey always assumed consequential moments would occur in slow motion – when she had fallen off the wreckage of a destroyer, or fought in a lightsaber battle, every second passing like a lifetime. But this happened so fast that she hadn't time to scream before it was over. She was left frozen in shock, her mind reeling in an attempt to understand how it had deteriorated so quickly.

Temporarily distracted by movement from Kylo, Finn turned his attention away from the blaster he had firmly pointed in Poe's direction. In his anger and betrayal, Poe had lunged for the weapon. Finn held steadfast to the blaster, however, struggling with Poe to regain control. Both men were shouting, neither would back down. The Force was instantly alight in warning of danger. Before Rey could form a coherent sentence, Finn's finger slipped on the trigger.

The shot was deafening – the sound of it jolted Rey where she stood. Both men stood frozen in fear and shock, eyes fixed on a blue blaster bolt hovering in stasis centimeters from Poe's chest. There was no doubt from anyone in the room that it would have been fatal had its progress not been interrupted. Poe eyed his colonel in disbelief before turning toward her. Finn followed suit. As they stared at her in awe, she realized they thought she had stopped it. She hadn't. But if she hadn't saved Poe from certain death, that meant...

“Ben?” Rey whipped around in search of her bondmate. He stared back at her with a guarded expression, chewing on his words. With his gloved hand outstretched, he swiftly manipulated the trajectory of the beam of plasma, allowing it to fly unhindered into the wall behind them.

“You saved him,” she whispered in awe.

_Why? You had every reason to want him dead._

It was as if she was seeing the man in front of her – wholly – for the first time. She saw him for who he truly was, something she had been too blind to see before. He was not the boy he had once been, nor the monster he pretended to be, nor the man she hoped he could be. She saw his darkness for what it was – it was permeating the Force around them – but she also saw his light. It was a light that Snoke could not snuff out, nor Kylo suppress, nor Rey provide. She knew in that moment, even if Kylo never walked a path she could follow, even if he hated her, there was inherent good in him. Good beyond whatever compassion he held for her.

This was Ben Solo. He didn't need to change into the man he could have been before Snoke, or become an unrealistic version of himself, free of darkness, to be saved. He could carry the scars of his past and struggle with darkness and still save himself. It didn’t matter what he believed; she saw the truth in him. That gave her the most genuine hope she’d had for him yet. He could make the right choice, not because of her or their bond, but because somewhere inside he knew it was the right thing to do.

A warmth blossomed in her chest, overwhelming and all-encompassing. In a moment of curiosity, she didn’t fight against its strength. She allowed her feelings for him to swell free of their bonds inside her heart for the first time, surrendering the control that was so deeply ingrained it had become second-nature. The purity and intensity of the truth in her soul stole the very breath from her lips.

Despite their desperate situation, she couldn’t help but smile. There was no denying her feelings for him, and though part of her was terrified, it felt right. She wanted nothing more than to run to him, throw her arms around his strong shoulders, and show him what he meant to her. She couldn’t yet, not before he was ready to turn, but she had inextinguishable hope that one day he would. He tilted his head slightly as he noticed a change in her. Did he see it in her eyes, what she understood now? It was almost as if they were the only two left in the room.

Almost.

All at once, his eyes flared, and his lightsaber rotated up to block his face. The bright blue spark of another blaster bolt ricocheted off the blade. His chest heaved as his anger returned in an instant. She spun back to her friends, knowing what she would find, yet her stomach sinking all the same. Poe stood with his blaster still aimed at Kylo's head.

“How could you! He spared your life!” she shouted in disbelief. Poe's eyes flashed to hers, but just as quickly refocused on the Supreme Leader.

“How disappointing, Dameron. Did you not learn the last time?” Kylo said behind her, his words seared with deadly intent. “Your blasters are ineffective against me. This, on the other hand...” he paused, twisting his lightsaber in a series of practiced swings and slashes, “This is very effective.” He swung the blade down upon the table with velocity only he could muster. Not that he needed it. The table easily split in two from the intense heat of the plasma.
“Ben...” she warned. He had controlled his anger better than she had expected, considering the circumstances, but she could see the restraints fraying by the second. She knew Kylo well enough to know he had been pushed too far, and she feared what would happen once he snapped.

“Sure, your poorly constructed lightsaber is effective...” Poe said in his antagonistic tone that she knew was intended to push Kylo to react, “…especially if you're a coward and kill your own father while he's defenseless.” Poe got the reaction he was hoping for. Kylo moved toward the general, lightsaber raised in threat.

Beebee-Ate, who had watched the confrontation in silence thus far, came screeching between Kylo and his master. Poe flinched at the sudden change in dynamics, and Kylo read it for what it was: fear. Perhaps he had known it before, or perhaps he had seen it in Poe’s eyes, but he understood the droid meant something to him. He stepped toward the droid and lifted his lightsaber. With power beyond his own strength, he brought the blade down upon the astromech. And with power beyond his own strength, he stalled the momentum of the blade before it struck.

In his rage, he had nearly missed Blue rolling in front of the other droid. “Move, Blue!” He was seething with rage, his energy a storm of emotion. The droid couldn’t have known what it would have done to Kylo if he struck him, what it would have reminded him of. The black and silver astromech whimpered in fear as he beeped a response back at him. Why? It had asked him. Why would he hurt the other droid? Blue said he wasn’t “bad like the others,” and, while Rey didn’t understand what it meant, Kylo apparently did. The rage visibly faded from his eyes. He lowered the blade and backed away from the two droids.

Rey sensed Poe take advantage of the distraction to re-aim his weapon toward the Supreme Leader. Before she could warn her bondmate, his head snapped to Poe’s direction. He had sensed the threat as well. Roaring in a feral rage, his free hand shot out, his fingers curled in as though he was squeezing...

“Poe!” Finn cried out from behind her as their general dropped to his knees. Rey turned to see Poe, his face red and eyes wide in fear, grasping at his throat as he made frantic gurgling sounds.

“Ben, stop!” she begged, once again caught in the middle between them. “Let him go!”

“Why, Rey? He threatened to kill you!” His tone was cutting and cruel. His eyes flashed in betrayal, as if he couldn't possibly understand how she could defend Poe. “What is your excuse this time? Hmm? Do you love him, too?”

“No, I love you!”
She inhaled sharply as the realization of her admission struck her.

What have I done?

She hadn’t meant to say it aloud, for all of them to hear, but it wasn’t a lie. She loved him. She didn’t love the Supreme Leader, the Knight, Kylo Ren; no, those were all disguises he wore to hide the man she loved – Ben Solo. When did this happen? How did this happen? She felt…something in that hut, in the elevator, when he saved her life, and when they fought together; but then he broke her heart, and she was sure that whatever it was she had felt had been wrong.

She hadn’t wanted to love him; she had wanted to hate him. It would have been infinitely easier to hate him; but no matter how angry she was at him, it was still there. The moment she was around him again, she could feel that pull to him, like nothing else in the galaxy mattered. Then she had seen him for who he was, and she didn’t fear her feelings for him anymore.

Her mistake was saying it aloud. What she had learned in her life was that if she loved something, she had to keep it close to her heart, or others would only ever steal it or destroy it. It was easier not to love anything. She knew this could only end poorly. They would convince she was crazy or stupid. They would tell her she was wrong.

Was it wrong, though? Was loving someone broken and lost and drastically misunderstood wrong? Was it wrong to believe that people could change? Or, at least, be the person they truly were inside? To her, he was so much more than the crimes he had committed. He was so much more than what that monster had created him to be. It didn’t matter to her if no one else could see what she knew to be true. She would never have known it herself – or cared – if their souls were not connected. Her bond let her see what no one else could; there was light in Ben Solo.

And now she loved him. She loved the broken man who had once been a broken boy, whose first memory was his own attempted murder. She loved a man who suffered a childhood of loneliness, abandonment, gaslighting, manipulation, self-loathing, and lies. She loved the man who fell to darkness when he awoke to his uncle’s lethal blade. She loved the man who suffered torture, brainwashing, and deception at the hands of a monster. She loved a man who raided peaceful worlds, mass-murdered innocent civilians, killed his fellow Jedi, took the life of his own father, nearly killed her best friend, killed many members of the Resistance and chose the darkness over her. She loved the man who told her she wasn’t alone, killed his own master for her, committed treason for her, saved her life, saved her friends’ lives, was bonded to her since before she was born, stared at her as if she were the only woman in the universe, and was the matching complement to her soul. He was her equal and helped her feel belonging in ways she never had before. She loved the darkness in him with the light. She loved him.
It was greater than love, this emotion that had developed sometime over the past few weeks; it was greater than the both of them. It felt as if this connection to him had always been there, as if it was always meant to happen, as if their souls were destined to be drawn to each other. It seemed impossible, of course, that he would ever learn to love her. Her own parents couldn’t even love her, but anything would have seemed impossible to the girl curled up in an abandoned AT-AT just a few weeks ago. She had to believe he wouldn’t abandon her like her family had, and, in return, she wouldn’t give up on him like his once had. Was it possible they could never be lonely again? Her heart leapt at the thought.

The room was silent save for the pounding of her heart, the crackling hum of Kylo’s lightsaber, and Poe's loud gasps as he sucked in oxygen. The apple of Kylo's throat bobbed in apprehension. He was staring at her with unwavering fixation, his eyes piercing straight through to her soul. She laid the truth bare for him, knowing – for the first time in her entire life – she had willingly trusted someone with her heart, and she had given it to the man with the greatest capacity to break it. Kylo was not the “safe” choice or the "easy" choice or the choice ensuring "happiness" in the end, but he was worth it. To her, it didn’t matter what he deserved; she had learned before she ever truly knew him that it was not her role to judge his fate – it was the will of the Force. All that mattered to her was what she believed; she believed in compassion, mercy, and understanding, she believed in hope and the light she felt in his soul, she believed in him. Then again, wasn’t that what stories said love was anyway?

His eyes were wide, brows raised. He was dumbfounded into silence. It was the same expression he wore in the interrogation room when she had forced her way into his mind. He sucked in a shuddered breath. Shock, fear, and disbelief played across his features, but then, on his slow exhale, it morphed slightly. His eyes flared, and his parted lips spoke of recognition and awe. He looked as he had on Starkiller when she summoned the lightsaber. "It is you," he had said. He seemed to be thinking the same thought as he stood before her. His eyes were bright; she could almost feel his fragile hope and light, even through the barriers in place in the bond.

Then he pulled away from their connection as his eyes scanned the room. His default emotion – anger – burst through, shadowing his hope in darkness. His jaw shifted, his eyes darkened and narrowed, his brow furrowed. She sensed new emotions take hold.

Distrust.

Pain.

Betrayal.

“Liar!” His voice thundered off the walls of the temple room. Biting his lip, his breathing ragged, he lifted his lightsaber and pointed it toward her with a trembling hand. She shook her head as her sight blurred with tears.

“No, Ben...”

“It’s okay, Rey.” Poe rasped, his voice raw and strained from the damage done by Kylo. “Our ruse didn’t work. You tried your best, but he obviously doesn’t believe you could ever love an evil monster like him. We should have pretended to surrender instead. But it’ll be all right; we’ll find another way to kill him.”

Rey flinched as if she had been slapped. She spun to face her friends in horror. Finn’s eyes were wide with disbelief and Poe’s were dark and cruel. He knew what he had done. The man, for all his rash decisions and propensity to blow things up, had become general for a reason. He was more than an excellent pilot. He was smart, perceptive, he understood the strategy of war, and he knew words could be weapons just as dangerous as the strongest cannons.

She turned back to Kylo, but it was too late; his face was cold and closed off. The damage had been done. She had two choices – tell Kylo the truth and risk facing charges of treason or say nothing and let him believe she played a part in their scheme to assassinate him. She risked losing her freedom or losing him forever.

“No, Ben, he's lying. You have to believe me. I love –”

“Stop it, Rey. Just...stop. I know you don't,” Kylo interrupted, his tone callous. “If you did, you would be a fool, and you’re no fool.” He lowered his eyes, refusing to look at her as if he was disgusted by her presence.

Sorrow bled into her words as he tore her heart to shreds. “How could you say that?”

Poe’s gruff voice spoke up behind her. “Because it’s true, Rey. You would be a fool. But he knows all about that from experience, don’t you, Ben? I see the way you look at her. I see how that kiss destroyed you. But not as much as hearing her lie about her love for you, right, Supreme Leader?” All at once, Poe’s aggressive demeanor changed. He clapped Finn on the shoulder as he laughed deliriously. “This... this is too good. Has the Jedi Killer fallen in love with the Last Jedi? Is that why you're here? You thought she would love someone like you?” He paused, and when he spoke again, the laughter was gone from his voice. “I promise, I'll let you die her hero if you surrender now.”
Kylo stood quietly for a moment, his eyes still downcast, his expression guarded. His only movement was the working of his jaw. The room was silent as they waited for a response – any response – to the accusation. With all the responses she expected or possibly hoped for, she hadn't envisioned what came next, but Kylo was nothing if not breathtakingly unpredictable.

“Okay,” he smirked sarcastically, meeting their stare to reveal a wicked glint in his eye. He disengaged his lightsaber and clipped it on his belt. Raising his impossibly large hands, open palms in front of him, he lifted a brow in instigation. “I surrender. Come get me.” He had never looked more like a Solo to Rey than in that moment.

Neither Poe nor Finn made an immediate move. They made brief eye contact before Finn raised his blaster. “The lightsaber.”

“Want it?” Kylo unclipped it from his belt and extended it in an outstretched palm. “Come get it.”

“No, he saw what you did the last time you offered someone your lightsaber in surrender.” Poe continued to needle Kylo – to what end, Rey wasn't sure. If Kylo did react, it wouldn't bode well for him.

Kylo ignored the general, his dark eyes fixed on his former trooper. “I can defeat you without the lightsaber, Eight-Seven. You know that. Don't be foolish.”

“Drop. The. Weapon.” Finn, to his credit, showed no fear, though Rey knew what it did to him to be in the presence of the man he had known as the enforcer of the First Order. She couldn't fault him for it. She had no idea the atrocities he had witnessed her bondmate commit. She had no idea the history between them other than when Kylo nearly took his life. Rey remained quiet, watching the battle of wits unfold before her, willing the man she loved to disappear. Love. She loved their enemy, complicating her role in the war, endangering everyone.

Kylo considered Finn's command for a moment. “Okay.” The environment around them changed, transporting Rey and Kylo to his quarters. Rey watched her friends for a sign that they noticed the change, but their eyes never left Kylo. Rey suppressed a grin as she watched Kylo flip his wrist, holding the weapon over the floor in full view of the two other men. She knew what he planned to do. “I'll drop it.”

He released the weapon, then manipulated the surroundings until it faded back to the war room. The lightsaber dropped and disappeared somewhere on his side of the connection. He dipped his head down slightly to catch their eyes, studying them for a reaction. He looked positively predatory.
He's… playing with them.

If Kylo felt any fear in the situation, he wasn't revealing it. No, this was a game, each move calculated, like Dejarik. Perhaps she had once again mistaken his calculated decisions for impulsivity. She turned to look at the other men. Finn's eyes were wide as he scanned the floor for the lightsaber. “What did you do? Where did it go?”

“You said 'drop it.' You didn't specify where.” Kylo smirked again, but this was not his father's smirk. It was much darker. She wondered if he looked more like his grandfather in that moment instead. Even though she associated him with darkness, it didn't remind her of Kylo Ren. He didn't smile. This reminded her of a young Ben Solo, who had not been all light as she had first imagined. This was the smirk of a young boy who was lonely on his birthday, so he set his parent's house on fire and watched it burn.

His eyes were alight with some undefinable emotion between mirth and blood lust. It seemed as if he found some sort of pleasure in tooling with them. He was a walking contradiction that left Rey more confused than ever. Despite the barriers, she could feel the staggering weight of his emotions burdening him in the Force. Outwardly, he displayed little sign of it. She was certain, to her friends, his act was convincing. She wondered if he had perfected that mask long before his recruitment with the First Order. But Rey knew him, he was too expressive of a man to successfully pretend he was unaffected by it all as pain ripped him apart inside. Her friends didn’t notice his pain – or, more likely, didn’t care – and his cavalier attitude had worn their patience thin.

“That's it!” Poe snapped. “Get on the ground.”

To the surprise of no one, he did not comply. Instead, Kylo slowly pulled off a glove and lowered the barriers in the bond. His agony hit her like a duracreept wall, suffocating her in emotion. His overwhelming pain temporarily blinded her in darkness. If she hadn't witnessed the cause, she would have thought he was gravely injured. Perhaps he was, but the wound wasn't physical. I'm sorry. She yearned for him to look at her, for him to understand, but he was entirely focused on her friends. Never breaking eye contact with the general, he bent over and picked up a dagger-sized splinter from the debris of the table.

Ben, what are you doing?

With the splinter grasped tightly in his gloved hand, he studied his bare palm with apparent rapt fascination. When he raised his eyes, there was something wild that betrayed his calm exterior. Without a word, he stabbed the splinter into the center of his palm. Rey yelped in surprise as a similar pain radiated from her hand. As he withdrew the splinter from his hand without a twitch of a grimace, she clutched at the phantom pain in her hand.

Finn gasped in understanding.

“Before you kill me,” Kylo said, switching his attention to Finn. “You might want to know a little detail about our bond. She can feel my pain, and I hers. Have you considered what happens if you kill me?”

Rey watched her friend's eyes widen in horror. If Poe was surprised, he didn't show it, but Poe excelled at strategy and card games in his own right. Leia had once mentioned that he would have given Han a run for his credits in Sabaac. Kylo may have been playing games, but Poe was there to match him move for move. She turned back to her bondmate, fearing what his next move would be. That was her mistake.

“As I said before,” Poe said resolutely as he fiddled with his blaster before pressing it into the back of her head. “I'm willing to find out.” She didn't register the sound of the blast before her vision faded to darkness.
Chapter End Notes

Manipulated/forced kiss between a male character toward a female character

Threat of violence with a lightsaber

Threat of death with a blaster

Account of past violence

Jealousy
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
Kylo cried out into the room one last time before collapsing to his knees in exhaustion. His voice was hoarse, his breaths came heavy as he doubled over, disengaging his lightsaber. Enough had been destroyed by his rage. The bed was in an impressive number of pieces on the floor, the edges of each piece of blanket glowed orange, some pieces still fluttering down through the recycled air. He hated the air here. He hated this ship. He hated this room. He hated the bed they had lain in together. He hated himself for being so foolish. He hated all of it.

At least he could still feel her in the bond. She wasn't dead, as he had believed for the split-second he watched her body crumple to the floor before they were ripped apart to opposite sides of the galaxy. He had watched her eyes flutter closed, her knees give out under her weight, and he thought he was witnessing the moment his own life ended. Not because he would die, no, he wasn't lucky enough for that.

In that moment, he understood – losing her would be like tearing out his soul; he would be an empty husk of a man, even more than he was after Luke betrayed him. He would have found them, killed them all, burned the entire galaxy to the ground. She was alive, and, for the moment, that was all that mattered. There was something strangely comforting and familiar to know that she was a breath away across the bond, and he was terrified of what would happen if that was taken away like everything good in his life.

Trying to exist without her after holding her in his arms—he knew it would never be enough. He had lived his entire life lonely in a crowded room, alone to face the creatures of the darkness. Kylo had never needed anyone—though he hadn't always understood that—and it had been years since he wanted to let anyone into his cold, dark, vapid world. There had been no point—not when he refused to trust anyone, focused solely on achieving his destiny and destroying his past. Once his family was gone and he held the power of the galaxy in his hand, it had all become meaningless. His life revolved around monotony, counting the days until the Force took mercy on him and ended his miserable life.

The only light in his dark, empty world was her. It was only ever her. He had foolishly allowed her in and had never wanted anything – not power or revenge or destiny – more than he wanted to just be in her presence, allowing her light to warm his worthless, defective heart. She had ruined him, but he didn't hate it. He refused to admit how much he didn't hate it.

He hadn't wanted this fiery tempest of light to burrow her way into his life and disrupt everything, distracting him from the goals he'd sacrificed for and committed to for the better part of a decade. But he had allowed her in, foolishly revealed the most vulnerable side of himself to her, and shown her the monster he truly was. She had become a permanent fixture without him realizing it, and now the thought of a life without her felt empty and meaningless.

He didn't know what he wanted anymore, only that it all centered around her. He wondered if he confessed those thoughts that plagued him, if it would terrify her more than all the evil he had done. Yes, he decided, it would. He couldn't bear to see the look in her eyes—the one from the forest when she called him a monster—after he revealed such weaknesses for her. If there was one truth he knew, it was that he would never deserve someone as good as her. He knew all of this, yet he had never thought she would betray him again after what had happened between them.

But she did.

She betrayed him spectacularly. What she had done, what she had said, it had gutted him. He closed his eyes, reliving it all in torturous detail. Only that pain would provide him strength in the Kylo had awoken in a panic. He suspected a nightmare, but for once the images didn't haunt him when he woke. As sleep faded from his mind, he remembered the strange dream with Rey, where they had lain together by his favorite lake. Not only that, but she had fallen asleep in his arms. He reached instinctively toward the other side of the bed, the sheets cold under his explorations. Rey was no longer curled up against him. His bed was empty – suddenly too large, uncomfortable, and foreign – and he couldn't help the disappointment that sank heavily in his stomach. He knew the bond had not brought her to him permanently, that the contentment he had felt would fade away with her, but he hadn't considered how hollow and lost he would feel without her.

Kylo groaned as he rolled over, the aches and stiffness from years of injuries and training reminding him that his years under his former master’s guidance had not been kind on his body. Not that life had ever taken a particular interest in showing him kindness. Despite his physical deficiencies and the Rey-shaped void spreading irritatingly in his chest, something felt... off... with how he had awoken. It had been gradual, not plagued by fear. His mind was clearer, his emotions calmer, his connection to the Force effortless. It was such a rare sensation; it took a moment for him to realize what it was that he felt—rested.

When had he fallen asleep? He glanced at the chronometer on the desk. He had been asleep for nearly four hours. He hadn’t slept that long since the night at the temple. The relief was extensive, softening his most jagged edges, assuaging a profound inadequacy he hadn't appreciated he had.

As sleep faded from his senses, agitation set in. The fleeting calm faded as anything good in his life was wont to do. A sweep in the Force explained why. Dread pricked the hairs on the back of his neck as he felt a presence close by. Too close. Scanning the room quickly, he called his lightsaber. He stood silently in the darkness, listening, and waiting. His eyes darted around the room, but he sensed no movement. He felt out into the Force again. There was no one else in the chamber with him.

He wondered why he had sensed a presence. Why he had felt such...panic.

The realization shivered down his spine. That emotion was not his own.

“Rey.”

He sought out her presence in his mind, willing his thoughts into her consciousness.
“Are you okay?”

She did not answer him, but he sensed her push back against his energy. If she was forcing him out, then clearly she was okay. “Fine.” He deactivated his lightsaber and threw it on his bed in frustration. He sat down on the edge and waited anxiously for the fear across the bond to subside. But it only intensified. A sudden jolt of pain arced through his abdomen. He doubled over as his senses numbed. That wasn’t his pain.

“Rey?”

She didn’t answer. He fettered the panic rising in his chest as he deliberated a plan.

She was halfway across the galaxy. If something had happened to her...he knew he was powerless to stop it. At first, he feared the involvement of Hux. Did the general find her in an attempt to compromise him? No, he realized. Hux would have demanded to be on-world. He wouldn’t have missed the opportunity for self-glorification in front of his troops. He knew it wasn’t the First Order. The traitor... It couldn’t have been a coincidence; the traitor’s appearance and then fear she faced the following morning. They had turned on her as he feared.

Should he have expected anything less from the scum of the galaxy? It was all his fault. He shouldn’t have trusted her faith in the traitor, he should have done more to warn her. He could have come for her, rather than holding onto her all night like a naïve fool. Would Dameron go as far as executing her?

Not if Kylo got to her first; he would not allow her to pay for his own mistakes. He decided to bring her to the First Order, so he could keep her safe. If she refused or was already taken captive, then he would offer himself in her place. He would die before he let them hurt her. He sensed a rise in her fear... and betrayal. He knew he was running out of time.

“Hold on, Rey, I’m coming for you.”

He had hastily grabbed a tunic, throwing it over his head as he searched her consciousness again.

“Rey!”

As he pulled a boot onto his foot, he pushed again and she let him in. He overheard a conversation
“As far as I know, he's on the Finalizer,” he heard her calmly answer. She was talking; she didn't sound like her life was in immediate peril. He listened to the other voice, a man, asking her about why Kylo had been in her room. He recognized the voice – it was Poe Dameron, he was certain of it. He knew he shouldn't be listening, if Rey knew... she would never trust him again. But the new general had almost killed her once, and he had good reason to do it again. There was no alternative he considered to staying as long as the Force allowed. He would rather risk overhearing sensitive Resistance strategies that he would force himself not to use against them rather than risk terminating their connection. He would stay until he knew she was okay. At least, that was why he convinced himself he stayed. She had closed herself off to him as thoroughly as she could across the bond; he could feel her trying to keep him out. It seemed she had something to hide as well.

He couldn’t have imagined, however, just what she was hiding from him. Rey was calmly explaining their bond away, revealing to her general that she had only followed Kylo to the Supremacy to turn him, but he didn't care what she said as long as Poe believed her. At least, he didn’t care until she mentioned his mother.

“My communication with him was Leia’s idea. She was made aware of the bond when I was on Ahch-To. She believed Kylo Ren could be turned and tasked me with a mission to form a rapport with him and push for his defection. He has emotional weaknesses that Snoke did not possess and has revealed a disillusionment with the First Order. The greatest obstacle I have faced in my mission is that he believes his second-in-command, the one responsible for Hosnian Prime, would take drastic measures if he defected. But I believe now he can be turned. We have an undeniable opportunity to dismantle the First Order from the inside if I can turn him. I just need more time.” He dropped the other boot in his hand and sat on the edge of his bed, his eyes losing focus.

It was all a lie.

In a rare act of self-preservation, he almost shut himself out of their connection entirely. But he tortured himself further and stayed. Perhaps it was part morbid curiosity, and perhaps it was part masochism. Primarily, it was his foolish sense of loyalty. Even if he was only a mission to her, he couldn’t leave Rey to handle the wrath of Poe Dameron alone. He expected anger, hatred, sorrow... something in reaction to her admission. But he just felt... hollow. Relieved, almost. It was a feeling he had grown quite familiar with; the disappointed acceptance that the people he feared trusting had proven him right. No one had ever wanted him, just his power. To believe Rey could ever want anything else from him was delusional. He knew that. He knew it was just a matter of time before she left like everyone else. It was easier this way. He didn't have to constantly wonder when it would all collapse around him; he didn't have to fear losing her if he never had her. It made sense – he was grateful for it. At least, that was what he convinced himself.
He stayed and he listened. He listened to Poe call her a traitor and a liar, accuse her of being naïve and manipulated, and demand she swear her loyalty. Of course, she had chosen the Resistance, that was no surprise. But... she had defended him. Facing punishment, she had still insisted he was worthy of salvation. She had even attempted to warn him when Poe asked her to lure him into a trap. It was foolish, but it meant something to him, nonetheless. Even if she hadn't warned him, he would have still shown up for her. It was his fault they had confronted her in the first place. And, no matter her intentions, she had shown up on the Supremacy for him. He had planned to negotiate for her life; he was the one with the power, after all, but the moment Poe held a blaster to her temple, Kylo had become every bit the monster they believed he was. His fear and hatred had blinded him, as it had on Crait, and he remembered little else of the confrontation.

He remembered little, except her kiss with Poe and the loyalty she swore to him after he had threatened her life. That image was burned into the skin on the back of his eyelids. He didn't know why it affected him so profoundly this time; for a moment, he feared the Finalizer had lost artificial gravity and was listing dangerously. He found the strength to remain standing, to fight for her safety as he fell apart inside, but then she lied and told him that she loved him. It was a one-two punch, and he was a goner.

Any pain he had ever felt before paled in comparison. He knew he would never recover, and part of him didn't want to, because it meant forgetting her. He wanted to be angry, and it was necessary to pretend when faced with his enemies. But it wasn't anger that he felt. Or betrayal. Or hatred. He had never felt this overwhelming feeling before. It tore at his insides. It left him weak, exposed, and vulnerable. He wasn't certain if he was going to be sick or die, but neither surprised him. It was everything he hated.

He didn't know why he saved Dameron. It was instinctual, mostly. Perhaps part of it was because it would have hurt Rey to watch the man she obviously cared for die. He wouldn't contemplate whether it had anything to do with the nagging guilt he felt from the lasting effects of his torture. Whatever the reason, before he had considered the consequences, he stopped the glowing beam of plasma from connecting with its intended target. With that single act, he revealed his weakness. Knowing he would not kill them gave them the upper hand. Kylo realized his mistake the second before Dameron fired the blaster. He wouldn't make that mistake again. He would kill them all. She was in danger with the Resistance, and nothing else mattered. When Dameron had made him believe for that split second that he had lost her, the general had signed his own death warrant.

They would be expecting Kylo to come for them on Barkhesh. But not Dantooine.

The rage that clawed and carved and slashed through him as he stood in the debris of his chambers was his oldest friend. He had spent most of his youth attempting desperately to contain it, fearing the darkness that it would unleash. It was all-consuming, blinding, a satisfying loss of control that bordered on insanity. He couldn't see straight or think straight or do anything at all but bend to its will. It would only be obeyed. It was order in a chaotic war between two opposing forces that tore him apart yet held him together. It was always there, right underneath the skin, watching, waiting, until the spark was ignited. The fire intensified into an inferno until it burned him alive from the inside. The only reprieve, the only relief, was to release it all. To feed the monster within, to lash out, to destroy. The power within, the darkness, would slowly kill him if he didn't let it out, and rage had been his only outlet.

Rage... rage was comforting. It was familiar, it was easy, it was everything his other emotions were not. Pain was his only language; pain was how he lived, how he survived. He never realized the weight of the pain he carried until he found the comfort of burning rage. The pain, the suffering, every emotion that festered and churned inside him was replaced by rage. In those moments, when every nerve was alight in a burning blaze, he drifted close to a temporary peace.

His life revolved around it, or, at least, it had before Rey. It was with rage that he sought to destroy his past, that he forced civilizations into submission, eliminating all who opposed him. Destroying the Resistance—perhaps that would finally grant him the peace he had always craved. He straightened to his full height, smoothing down his tunic. As he walked through his quarters, his eyes settled on his discarded helmet in the corner of his room. He knew how she hated it when he wore it. He lifted it from its resting place and placed it over his head roughly; its considerable weight was not as painful to endure as the emotional burden it carried. Kylo stopped when he nearly stepped on the pile of black material on his floor. He grabbed the cloak and whipped it around his shoulders. Leaving his room in ruins, he stalked with deadly purpose to the bridge.

“It’s time to finish this once and for all.”
Chapter End Notes

Description of past violence
Description of manipulated kiss
Jealousy
A Trade

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
“Rey?”

Rey awoke to a spinning sensation. Her mind was sluggish and her body numb. The stone felt cold beneath her back. When her eyes fluttered open, the meager contents of her room came into focus. Had she been on her makeshift bed, she would have thought it all a dream. Her head felt heavy as she lifted herself off the floor, her ears buzzing with... no, it wasn't her ears buzzing. It was a particle shield blocking the exit of her room. They had effectively locked her in her room as they prepared to leave for Dantooine. Finn stood sentinel on the opposite side of the blue energy shield. And if she was imprisoned, that meant Kylo...

“Ben!” She jumped to her feet, searching frantically in the small space before searching the other visible rooms through the particle shield. Her connection to the Force wavered as she struggled with another bout of dizziness. She couldn’t search for him in the Force and he was nowhere to be found. Poe was also missing. Was Poe torturing Kylo? Had he killed him the moment she collapsed? Every possible scenario she imagined grew increasingly more grave for her bondmate. “Ben!”

“He disappeared back to... wherever he was the second Poe stunned you,” Finn said quietly. Poe had switched his blaster to stun, well, that explained why she felt out of sorts – why she had collapsed. “General, she’s awake,” he said into his comlink.

“Traitor,” she said, voice low in betrayal.

“What did you expect me to do?” he shouted, turning to strike the energy barrier between them. “You left me no choice! You put my life, Rose's life, all our lives at risk! For him, Rey! If this was me carrying on a relationship with Phasma or Poe with Hux, I wonder what your reaction would have been? I tried to reason with you; I tried to give you the chance to do the right thing! Please, Rey, tell me what you would do have done?”

She stared defiantly across the barrier between them. “I wouldn't have betrayed you.”

“You already did,” he said softly, backing away from the vibrating blue energy. “You chose him over me.”

“I didn’t!” Rey pounded the barrier with her fists. Tears and anger blurred her vision. “You said you were my friend, but you turned me over to Poe to get stunned and imprisoned!”

“In my defense, the plan worked perfectly,” Poe said from down the corridor. He hadn’t entered her limited vision yet, but she knew he was smiling.

Finn stepped closer to whisper, “I am you friend and that is why I did it. This is for your own good, Rey,” before backing himself against the far wall and crossing his arms. When Poe appeared – smiling – Finn nodded in deference. Her best friend made his loyalties clear; he firmly sided with the Resistance. Her fate was left in the hands of the general, who leaned against the particle shield on both hands, staring at her with an amusement that didn’t fit the situation.

“Let me out!” she demanded. He shook his head slowly, his smile growing wider. “You shot me! You can’t just do that to people, Poe!”

“I can, I’m the general. You and Snoke are the only people I’ve seen him that blindingly loyal to.” There was something calculating in his eyes as he studied her. He pushed off the shield and shrugged his shoulders flippantly. “I played the cards I had.”

“He saved you!” she shouted over the hum of the vibrating energy. “You could have turned him and ended the war! Now…” She wiped away her thoughts of consequences as she wiped away her tears. “What you did was evil, Poe.”

His smile fell as his face hardened, and she thought for a moment he would leave without another word. Instead, he squared his shoulders and pressed his finger against the barrier between them. “You committed treason, Rey, I had cause to shoot you with a lethal bolt. You should be thanking me. You think it’s evil? Fine. But it was a necessary evil. It’s war. I tried to be understanding, because you came from nowhere and had no idea about what we’re up against, but I’m not going to sit by and watch the Resistance die because you want to screw the enemy. I will do whatever it takes to stand up against the em… the First Order to answer the call to free the galaxy. Just like my parents did. They spent my childhood fighting the war to save the Republic and I will do anything to make sure that what they sacrificed will not be in vain. Anything. Do you understand?”

What happened to you? How could you defend this?

Her thoughts about a different man – a man on the opposite side of the war – replayed in her mind. He does these horrible things, and I thought he just doesn't care that he’s wrong, but that's not it. He does these horrible things and convinces himself that he’s right. He doesn't see this as evil. He doesn’t see himself as wrong. He truly believes in what he is saying... which is terrifying.
“And what about the Hutts?” she argued. “Are they a necessary evil, too?” Rey knew all too well that arguing ideals with the misguided didn’t end well, but as long as she was a prisoner and his actions endangered the Resistance, she had to try.

His attention was drawn away from his prisoner. He leveled an accusatory look at Finn, but his words were still directed toward her. “How do you know about the Hutts?”

“I didn't until you just confirmed it,” she said hastily, striking the barrier between them to draw his attention back to her. Finn may have abandoned her, but this was her fault. She wouldn’t allow him to be thrown in a cell next to her, not when he had committed treason to protect her. “I overheard you speaking to someone in one of the empty rooms. I repeated a phrase to Ben, and he told me it was Huttse... You lied to me, too.”

Poe glared at her through the blue energy. His lip curled in anger. “I had reason to lie to you. Good reason, as it turns out, considering you've sworn your loyalty to a monster.”

“You say I have sworn loyalty to a monster, but don't you see, General, so have you. The Hutts are the very thing that is wrong with this galaxy; they are what Ben is fighting against. As misguided as his method is – ”

“No!” Poe shouted. Catching himself before continuing, he took a steadying breath as he checked the halls for anyone who had noticed the disturbance. When he spoke again, it was in a harsh whisper. “He is trying to take over the galaxy. They are standing with us when no one else will. The enemy of our enemy is our ally here, Rey, regardless of the difference in philosophies we may or may not share.”

Rey did not share his desire to keep their confrontation a secret from the others. “They want to kill all Jedi! They nearly killed Luke and Leia! That's not a 'difference in philosophy!'”

“And Kylo Ren succeeded in killing them both,” Poe spat back, his face centimeters from the barrier. “You think he doesn't want to kill the Jedi? His nickname at the First Order is 'Jedi Killer!'”

Rey stepped closer until their faces were only separated by the vibrating energy field. “Where is my place, General, if my allies would kill me as easily as my enemies?”
Poe rested his arm above his head against the barrier. He leaned his head against his forearm, staring at her with a sudden openness. Was the hardened, callous general just a front? Was he as lost as she was? Was the Poe she thought he was still in there? “I have no plans of bringing you anywhere near the Hutts,” he murmured.

This was her chance to break through to him. She swallowed her anger. “So, what now—you're just going to leave me here to die?”

“Of course not.” Poe pushed away from the barrier. His derisive demeanor returned as if his gentle words had only been an illusion. “He’s likely already set course here. You’re far too valuable to leave behind. Maybe I should stay here with you to wait for him, but I’d rather bring you with us and draw him into a trap. Go ahead, warn him, I’m counting on it. Or don’t. It doesn’t matter either way. I will see the death of Kylo Ren, I promise you that.”

And what if I won’t fight him, Poe? Will you stand as loyally by my side as I’ve stood by yours if I have a different vision to end the First Order? Or am I only worth anything to you because you believe I am the sole person strong enough in the Force to kill him?

With a nod to Finn, Poe began walking back the way he had come. Evidently, he had decided the conversation was over. She couldn’t let him go; Kylo’s life depended on it.

Rey could warn her bondmate, but, after the war room, she knew he wouldn’t listen. The man was so stubborn, he would willingly walk into a trap. Poe would use her to kill the man she loved if she didn't find another option. “Wait,” she begged, her voice too loud for the space. “Please, Poe, I am loyal to the Resistance. I am the only Force-sensitive you have. I can help you!” The words tasted bitter, like a lie, on her tongue. She was still loyal to them, wasn’t she?

The echo of boots on the stone floor indicated that she had given herself a chance. That’s all she needed. She would do anything to protect her bondmate. Poe reappeared in her line of sight, hands in his pockets, walking slowly as he studied her. “Prove it,” he said. “Give me intel on Kylo Ren. Something that proves I can trust you.”

There was no conflict in her heart. Rey was imprisoned, she was desperate. Kylo already hated her for what she said to Poe, his life was already in danger. What further harm could the intel possibly cause? He would understand, she was doing what she had to do to protect them both. Rey didn't have information on Kylo's whereabouts, nor did she trust Poe with that information. Whatever it was, it had to be something good, something big, to convince him to trust her. But she had to be careful. Anything she provided him, she needed to make certain it couldn't be used to threaten the life of her bondmate.
She thought back to every connection with Kylo, seeking the one piece of information that would prove her loyalty and keep her bondmate safe from her friends. She scanned her room in desperation until her eyes settled on the makeshift flowerpot…and the perfect diversion.

“I am loyal to you, Poe,” she said demurely. “I don’t agree with an alliance with the Hutts, but I could still help the Resistance. Though we don’t agree on strategy, my calling will always be to save the galaxy from the First Order.” She glanced up at Poe through her lashes; he was listening. “I have a vial that I received from Kylo Ren during my mission as an offer of trust. It contains the genetically modified Blue Shadow Virus that will destroy his new clone army on Kamino. And only those clones. Without an army, I can… arrange a meeting for negotiations. We can take him prisoner. I can work to turn him under the watchful eye of the Resistance.” Giving Poe the vial was perfect. It could be used for good. Eventually, it would be used to destroy the army that threatened the lives of her friends, long after she convinced Kylo to leave the First Order. Because he would leave; she believed that. In return, she would earn her freedom and gain a chance to protect Kylo from the Resistance. Rey had no intention of meeting him for negotiations or taking him prisoner. She would never trust Poe with Kylo’s life after what he did. But she hoped Poe believed she would.

“An ambush is more practical,” Poe replied, shaking his head. But it wasn’t resolution that she saw in his eyes. She could still convince him. “I’m not sending you to meet with the Supreme Leader with no ability to defend yourself.”

“I’ll have a weapon.” Her mouth was working faster than her strategizing thoughts, but the Force was guiding her to something, she could feel it.

A lightsaber – I need a lightsaber – but how?

"What weapon? Your broken one?” Poe raised one eyebrow, clearly suspicious of the validity of her claim. The Force guided her to focus on his question. Yes, the broken one. Her lightsaber was broken, and she was good at two things; waiting, and….

"I can fix it. It needs a new Kyber Crystal – "

"– From the crystal caves of Ilum," he finished. “You would have to travel to Ilum, and everyone knows that Ilum is the world that…” he paused, a smile playing on his lips. It reminded her of the expression he wore when he spoke of victory in his stories. He cleared his throat. “The world where the Jedi find their crystals.”

I’ve been searching everywhere through the Jedi Texts, but nothing was written about where to find them. How does he know where to find them?

He must have seen the confusion scrunched between her brows. "The Force and Jedi are not completely foreign to me, Rey," Poe said, answering her thoughts. "Luke Skywalker and my mother fought together in the war. Luke recovered two pieces of the Great Tree from the Jedi temple on Coruscant. He kept one and gave one to my mother. I grew up playing on that Force-sensitive tree, hearing stories about the Jedi from my mother. The crystal caves of Ilum are the most sacred place to every Jedi, because that is where the padawans found the Kyber crystals for their lightsabers. We'll need a working lightsaber to force him to surrender, but this could work."

"Thank you," she smiled weakly. "After I return from Ilum, I will release the vial on the clones on Kamino, then draw Kylo Ren into negotiations."

Poe removed the rods and bases that created the particle shield. “Dantooine is on the other side of the galaxy. For obvious reasons, we can't take the Hydian Way even though it cuts straight across. We'll have to chance it in the uncharted territories. The Wilds are dangerous, but the Unknown regions are, well, unknown. There are no mapped hyperspace routes, and no one knows what else is out there. But Maz has given us specific navigational routes along the western route that avoid secret First Order travel lanes. I don't know how she got them. I don't know anyone who has even been in the Unknown regions, let alone figured out where the First Order would be out there. But she found it with the supplies on Dantooine, and she's given the Resistance our last chance. She and her crew will also be shuttling us all there. You'll stay with us until Ilum, then continue on that route to Dantooine when you find the crystal. You can leave this cell freely, under two conditions."

Rey swallowed thickly. She didn’t much care for Poe’s ultimatums. “And those are…?”

“No more contact with Kylo Ren until the negotiations.”

It was a reasonable request, she supposed. Rey reminded herself that Kylo was their enemy and speaking to him was treason. It was impossible to guarantee, however, unless she shut out the bond – something she refused to do to Kylo – but she would say whatever Poe asked her to say to get out of the cage and away from him. “Okay. And?”

“You hand me that vial in good faith.”

Her heart stuttered and her stomach churned. She never had any intention of handing Poe that vial. Perhaps he knew that. Just as they both knew his demand wasn’t about loyalty. What he was truly asking of her was to betray Kylo. “You still don't trust me?”
“Would you if you were in my position?” If she wanted her freedom, if she wanted the chance to keep Kylo far away from the Resistance, she had no other choice but to give it to him. She knelt next to the flower she had saved and dug into the red dirt to expose the hidden vial. She gathered her other few belongings quickly into a box before turning to Poe.

“There,” she dropped the vial in front of him—its likely descent to the ground saved by his quick reflexes—and pushed past him. “You might want to check that it’s closed correctly. I’d hate for you to catch the virus and die a long, horrible death,” she shouted as she left down the long hallway.

“As hilarious as that would be, I doubt Ren was stupid enough to clone me!” he called after her. “Oh, and make sure to take the Millennium Falcon!”

When she was out of sight, he grabbed Finn by the arm. He checked the corridors before whispering his orders. "You're her friend. Go with her. Keep an eye on her; make sure she is not planning something else with Ren."

Finn glared back in anger. He was caught between two people he believed were wrong. “She swore her loyalty to you, gave you that vial…you still don't trust her?”

“Not for a second,” he scoffed. “She was 'Ben... Ben... Ben...’ until she realized I wasn't going to release her, and then it was 'Kylo Ren' in the same breath she swore her loyalty. But this is better than waiting for him to come to us. When we reach the safety of Dantooine, I'm going to go find every ally that we have. This is it, Finn. This is how we win.”

“What is?”

“She is,” he said, smiling in excitement. “I was so focused on her feelings for him that I missed what was right in front of my eyes. Something she said never sat right with me, and now I know why. She said Kylo Ren never tortured her, even though she had seen the map. He looked through her dreams instead of finding the one thing he desperately wanted. Then a Sith who can freeze blaster bolts like it's nothing lost a battle to a girl who never held a lightsaber before? No, he didn't want to kill her.”

“The Supreme Leader of the First Order was in bed with her last night, he protected her from us, he lost his mind when she kissed me! He has some sick, twisted attraction to her! He trusted her with a vial that could destroy his entire army. Ren doesn't trust anybody, but he trusts her. When she betrayed him – that was when he made his mistake. What deadly mistake will he make if he thinks she betrayed him again? This is huge, Finn; this is what we've been waiting for!” he laughed, clapping his friend on the back.

“We can use this to our advantage. Go with her. The next time Kylo Ren shows up in this Force thing and is... distracted... with her, don't hesitate, kill him. We'll see if Rey told you the truth about the blaster bolt not touching him. If it doesn't or if he freezes the bolt, grab her. Put the blaster to her head. Tell him he comes alone, or she dies blah blah blah. Trust me, he'll know exactly where to find her. We can use her as bait. We'll ambush him. Once we take down the Supreme Leader, that leaves the First Order vulnerable to attack. Then I'll lead the allies into an airstrike on the Finalizer. We can end this war, Finn. You can have your friend back.” Poe shoved a blaster into his hand.

“What about the vial?”

“I'm already planning a rendezvous with the Hutts on the way to Dantooine,” he said. “Maybe I’ll take a detour.”
Enlightenment on the Bridge

Chapter Notes

This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes
Kylo had only just stepped out into the corridor when the droid caught up with him. He hadn’t spoken to the little traitor since he had protected the other BB unit in the war room. Not that there was much chance to speak when he was systematically destroying his quarters. The droid may have been naïve, but he was no fool. When he strung together his question in binary, Kylo sensed his cautiousness.

“I’m going to the Command Bridge, setting course to Dantooine, and destroying the Resistance once and for all,” he told the astromech. Without missing a beat, the droid repeated his favorite question – why?
“Because they almost killed her.” Blue was relentless, however. He could never just take an answer at face value. He was always poking and prodding, forcing Kylo to answer questions that positively unbalanced him.

“No, she won’t leave. She’s loyal to them.”

The memory of her kissing Poe and swearing loyalty to a man who nearly killed her replayed in his mind. Why couldn’t the droid let it go? Blue continued with his questioning, despite Kylo’s quickly escalating agitation. “I only plan to take her prisoner, and, yes, I trust them not to hurt her because I am their Supreme Leader!”

Kylo was sick of the questions. First Rey, then the droid, did everything in their power to destabilize him – tempt him from his certain destiny – and then they betrayed him. His problems ended with the destruction of the Resistance. He had been distracted on Crait, but Luke wouldn’t be there to save them this time.

He imagined Rey’s stricken face when he arrived on Dantooine as he had on Crait – when he did what she had always feared he would do – but he shook it from his mind. He couldn’t concentrate on those foolish thoughts. As Supreme Leader, he had a job to do. Nothing else mattered… or at least, it shouldn’t have. His thundering heart wouldn’t allow him to forget the significance of what he was about to do. His emotions were spiraling. It was the droid’s persistent questions that he blamed for his instability.

“No, Blue! Imprisonment is not worse than death!” He stopped as the lie twisted in his stomach. Looking away, he slowly exhaled the anger that had been building. “It doesn’t matter if it is; it’s the only way I can ensure that neither the Order nor the Resistance kills her.”

If the droid knew what was good for him, he would have let the matter drop, but he continued needling him with questions. “I have asked her. She will not leave her ‘family.’”

The droid’s final question finally pushed him over the edge.

“I can’t leave!” he seethed, turning toward the droid, the unlucky outlet for his unstable emotions. “And I wouldn’t have to do any of this if it weren’t for you! She almost died because of you!” He could plainly see that his words were hurtful to the young droid, but he couldn’t stop himself as the darkness coursed through his veins. It fed on the anger and fear until he was intoxicated under its power. “She could have died for a droid. But you don’t care, do you; you just had to protect the enemy! For what? The droid was protecting his master; where were you? Where were you when they were firing upon me? You’re not loyal to the First Order or me or anyone except your own kind who would kill you for his master if he was so ordered. You want the fighting to end, but it will never stop! You understand? Never! And until you get that, you’re a liability to her… and me.”

The droid rolled forward, pleading, but Kylo wouldn’t hear it.

“No! I’m done with your foolish questions! Just… leave me alone! You’re fixed, go find another master! My life was easier without you in it!”

He regretted it the instant the words left his lips, filling the void between them with poison. The droid turned and sped away, his domed head sloped forward in anguish. Kylo almost called after him, but he swallowed the plea for forgiveness. He knew the truth; the droid was better off without him. Kylo would likewise be better off without the droid, it only ever served to be a distraction. The remorse and sorrow that flooded his system could be used for strength. He refused to ponder the loss; he had a mission to complete. Turning away, he channeled his self-loathing into the anger he needed. He would finish it.

All of this is your fault, Dameron. I’ll kill you.

Kylo stormed onto the bridge, startling every officer with his presence. “Set course to –”

“Barkhesh?” Hux stepped forward from the corner of the room. Kylo took a half-step back. His resolution was replaced by fear. “We’re already on course to Barkhesh,” the general said with a smile. Kylo was grateful for the mask. He had no doubt that the shock he felt had flickered across his face. “But you already knew that, didn’t you Supreme Leader? You were the one to order an alteration in course. Pray tell, what will we find on Barkhesh?”

His hatred for Dameron was secondary to preventing mutiny. No, if Hux discovered what he did, it wasn’t just ensured mutiny—it was treason. “I have reason to believe the Resistance is regrouping on Barkhesh,” he said evenly.

Kylo bit his tongue as Hux cackled mirthlessly. When the general finished, he straightened. The look on his face was predacious. He was out for blood. “Funny, isn’t it?”

“What is?”
Hux clasped his hands behind his back and sauntered deliberately to the viewport. “That my intelligence had narrowed down the likelihood of their new base on Barkhesh, but you were adamant about poisonous insects.” He stopped, turning to glare at Kylo. “What changed your mind?”

As Hux continued his stroll to the viewport, Kylo tried to temper his raging emotions. He should be irritated and flippant with his subordinate, but he was doing his best not to allow the fear to bleed through the vocoder. “The Resistance has likely been on the move. I was made aware by... an anomaly in the Force.”

“The general is dead.” Hux said provocingly, knowing what Kylo had endured the day before. “Is the Jedi girl with them?”

“I believe so,” he answered through clenched teeth. Hux stared at him questioningly for a moment, suspicion blooming in his eyes. A new wave of fear crashed over his senses, and he searched for darkness to gain control again. He breathed in the cold, all-consuming power. When he spoke again, his voice was steady. “I felt it in the Force.”

Hux was too cheerful for his consequential words. “When did you order the change in course?”

“Why does that matter?” he challenged. Kylo considered choking the man to distract from the line of questioning and relieve the anxiety building under his skin.

“Because, Supreme Leader, it’s curious. When I left the bridge, we were on course to Kessel to reevaluate the sanctions you imposed upon them. I find you in the training room, pick you up off the floor, drag you directly to your chambers, turn off your master comms...” That was it. That was why he had not been alerted to the change in course. His Master Comms had been off; he hadn’t received the transmission. There would be little time to warn them, but, knowing Dameron, they had already evacuated to their new base. “And yet,” Hux continued, “imagine my surprise when I intercepted a reconnaissance squad outside your quarters, clearly affected by Force wizardry with their repetitive, mechanized answers. Then I return to the bridge to discover that – in the few minutes since I had left your chambers – the course had changed, and you had altered it.”

“I felt it in the Force when my mother died,” he answered impulsively. The darkness in him swelled with the lie, calling for more. “When I realized the implication of what I felt, I contacted the bridge immediately.”

“Is that so?” There was the slightest bit of irritation to the general’s tone. “Well then, Supreme Leader. When you walked onto this bridge a moment ago, you asked for a change of course. Where was the destination, if not the location of the Resistance?” Hux had caught him. If he didn’t give him Dantooine – something worth deviating from a course to their greatest enemy – he would confirm everything Hux suspected.

Kylo could easily explain that the Resistance had left Barkhesh after encountering the troopers and that he had received intel of their new base. It would ease Hux’s suspicion. It would end Poe Dameron, the traitor, and his mother’s ridiculous legacy. They deserved it for what they had done. It would be doing Rey a favor. She might not be lucky enough to survive their wrath the next time. He had left his chambers with the resolve to end the war, to give the Order the coordinates to Dantooine, and end the conflict. One word—three syllables—and he would have his peace.

“Nal Hutta,” he answered instead. The vocoder in his mask deepened, leveling his voice into a confident tone. Even as he said it, he didn’t know why he hadn’t given them Dantooine. As deeply as the darkness in him called for him to end it, he couldn’t allow the Order to find that base. He refused to contemplate it further. He would end them, but not yet. There was a more pressing, internal issue that had to be solved first. Kylo convinced himself his time would be better spent in the archives than on the battlefield. “An informant has revealed to me that the Hutt cartel has formed an alliance with the Resistance. Without their support, the remaining Resistance members will be easy targets.”

Hux stood still, spluttering, before remembering himself. “Yes, Supreme Leader. I will arrange a flotilla to engage Nal Hutta, and we will stay our course to Barkhesh. Is it your order for planetary annihilation?” The Hutts had enslaved Kylo’s mother, frozen his father in Carbonite; there was no love lost for those creatures. Could he be responsible for the extermination of an entire civilization? Another Alderaan? Hosnian Prime? Could he forgive himself? The darkness swelled inside him as he held the fate of an entire civilization in his hand.

“Yes. Annihilate Nal Hutta.”
Chapter End Notes

Implied mass murder
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.
"Rey, wait!" Rose called, out of breath from sprinting down the corridor. Rey turned with tears in her eyes. Before her friend could mention them, she wiped her emotions away. If Rose asked her why she cried, how would she answer? Were her tears formed in anger and betrayal at Poe? Betrayal but gratitude for Finn? Fear for the Resistance? Fear for Kylo? Frustration? Guilt? Conflict? She didn’t want anything to do with the Resistance, but Rose had never been anything but kind to her. Reluctantly, she waited. When Rose caught up to her, she smiled. "I'm coming with you."

"What?" It was surprising, certainly, but also heart-warming. After everything Rey had done – after all the secrets her friend undoubtedly knew she kept – Rose still wanted to stand by her side. Rey didn’t want to be alone again, she needed someone to understand now more than ever, but she couldn’t be responsible for the peril her friend would face without the protection of the Resistance. "No, Rose; it's dangerous!"

"Which is exactly why you need your friends by your side," Rose said unequivocally. Her eyes were bright, warm, and sincere. Rey didn't deserve friends like that. She had lied to her. She had led her to believe that the man she loved was Leia’s son Ben Solo, not the dark lord Kylo Ren. Or at least, she had led her to believe they were not one in the same. It was her fault they were all in danger, yet Rose still wanted to help her. It didn’t make sense.

Rey shook her head adamantly. “I would never be able to forgive myself if anything terrible happened to you... because of me.”

"And I wouldn't be able to forgive myself if something terrible happened to you if I could have stopped it,” Rose replied, grasping Rey’s hand in hers. “You're the last Jedi. You give the Resistance hope. Like I told Finn, 'We won't win this war by killing what we hate, but by saving what we love.' I love you, Rey, and Finn loves you. Like I told you before, we're all family, and I'm here for you no matter what. I never thought that 'guy' you were talking about was Kylo Ren... it definitely would have been helpful to know before…” She winked at Rey, blushing slightly. “And, honestly, I don't understand it, but I don't have to. I will stand by you and help you fix your lightsaber so you can be the Jedi this galaxy so desperately needs.”

The Jedi this galaxy so desperately needs... what exactly was that? What if she didn’t want to be what they needed her to be? Did the galaxy need someone to defeat Kylo Ren? Because the thought of staring him in the eyes with her lightsaber thrust through his heart tore an ache deep within her soul. It would be easier to end her own life than his. She couldn’t do it; not after the memories she witnessed, not when she loved him, not when she believed in who he truly was. She knew that the fate of the galaxy should matter more than one man’s life, but how can they expect her to kill someone who was a part of her? They only cared about winning, but how could she side with them when she loved him? “I don’t know if I can be the Jedi this galaxy desperately needs.”

Rose pulled her into a tight embrace. “I believe in you, Rey.” It was a strange sentiment; Rey didn’t even believe in herself. How could this woman believe in her after she had failed them all? Rey wondered if she would still believe in her if she refused to fight for the Resistance. But if she didn’t fight for the Resistance, what would she fight for? The First Order had to be destroyed. Could she abandon them all to a grim end at the hands of the man she loved? Or would she be forced to choose between her heart and the fate of the galaxy? Was it foolish to hope that Kylo would make the right choice when he had chosen time and again to remain with the First Order?

“I know I have to face the fact that I might not save him; he may choose not to be saved. But our destinies are intertwined. I believe that. Is it truly my destiny to kill him? Why would the Force bring us together, why would it show me his memories, why would it let me love him if I was only intended to kill him? Is this some cruel cosmic test? What if I fail? What if I refuse to kill him and save the galaxy? What if I succeed? How do I live with myself, knowing what I know, feeling what I feel? I don’t want this. I don’t want to choose. Where is my place, if not here? What do I choose? I don’t want the fate of the galaxy resting in my hands.

"Hey..." Finn said cautiously as he approached behind them. Rey released Rose and met his eyes. They hadn’t spoken since she was imprisoned and she didn’t know where they stood. She didn’t know where she wanted them to stand. Her heart was caught somewhere between begging him forgiveness for forcing him to commit treason for her and screaming at him for taking Poe’s side over hers.

It would have been so easy to condemn him, to give into the darkness that pleaded entry, but she knew it couldn’t be trusted. As long as she kept the darkness at bay, she kept Snoke at bay, and Kylo was safe. Even if she trusted herself to manage anger without the darkness, what was the point? The true difference between Finn and Kylo – why she had been more disappointed in her bondmate than anyone else in this war – was not morality as she had first assumed.

The difference between them was she believed Kylo could change. She may have gone about it the wrong way under darkness, but she had become so passionate because she knew he could be better. While she held disappointment in Finn, she knew he would never change his mind. His eyes confirmed everything she needed to know. They were guarded in a way she had never seen before. She didn’t have to be bonded to him to know he felt betrayed, and nothing she could say would change that.
"Hey, I just told Rey I'm going with her," Rose said with her arm around her shoulder. There was a tenacity to her tone that signaled her decision as final to both Finn and Rey.

Finn looked at Rey as if he feared her reaction but with a firmness that betrayed his resolution in his decision. "Okay, then I'm coming, too."
This is a dark story that delves into both psychological and physical trauma. Many of these chapters WILL have triggering content. As I am a firm believer that tagging reveals major plot points of a story, not all warnings are tagged. I DO think every reader should be able to make informed decisions about triggering content, however. As a compromise, I will provide warnings at the end of each chapter along with a brief explanation of the triggers. If you find certain material triggering, PLEASE read the end notes of each chapter first. If you find a certain chapter triggering, I would be more than happy to explain the major plot points of the chapter. This story in 100 percent finished (except the editing of the second half of part 2) so I can also answer any questions about triggers in part one as well as future chapters in part two. If you MUST know the ending, I can answer those questions over message as well, but I might die a little inside. You've been warned, with it finishing around 700,000 words, this is a definite slow burn.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.
Kylo stood in the archives, alone, staring at the holobooks as if they would give him the answer. Poe Dameron could wait, he convinced himself. Hux had begun to suspect his loyalty; his words were borderline mutinous. It was only a matter of time before he staged a coup and took command of the First Order. It was an inevitability. Kylo knew his days were numbered. Force Destiny had to be destroyed before then.
I will bow at Dameron’s feet before I allow them to complete Force Destiny.

That revolting thought earned a few holobooks thrown across the Archive floor. It was not lost on him that the last time he had been in that room, he had tried to end the bond. He had been unsuccessful, but he wished he hadn’t been. He wished he had never heard her say those treacherous words to him. He wished he had never met her.

