Desperately Seeking Ranma

by pixelwriter1

Summary

Ranma and Kasumi are missing, everyone is annoyed about it. Nabiki is doing her best, Akane is going slowly crazy (or at least crazier) and the parents are still idiots.

Mostly told from Nabiki's point of view.

(Originally posted on FF.net 10/Dec/2013, still ongoing)

(A character list can be found at https://docs.google.com/document/d/1szka75s0_N9v61J4rowDaqGa_yKzze_msc2R2fE3PjQ/pub Contains spoilers!)
"It's been six months, Nabiki! You always say you can find anyone, but you haven't managed to track either one of them down so far." The aggrieved female voice echoed through the yard of the large house complex, coming from an upstairs window. Several neighbours grumbled and closed their own windows, trying to keep the noise down. Those Tendo sisters were weird, loud, and annoying. The nice one had disappeared some time ago, leaving the loud one and the scary one. The father, known to the neighbourhood as 'The Fountain' behind his back due to his habit of bursting into tears when emotionally stressed, was fairly inoffensive, although his choice of house guests had raised eyebrows.

The two long-term guests currently staying were odd. One, a good-looking auburn-haired woman who appeared younger than many suspected she was, had seemingly given up her habit of carrying a cloth-wrapped sword with her everywhere she went. This had made many people feel slightly relieved although she had never to anyone's knowledge threatened anyone with it, or even unsheathed it, outside the house. The other one, a bald male in his early forties, who gave the misleading appearance of being somewhat overweight due to a heavily muscled body type, was in some way associated with a large Giant Panda, which could fairly often be seen wandering the area. Strangely, the panda and the man were never seen together.

Some of the members of the community had a frankly unbelievable reason as to why that was, but most people from outside the Neriman area tended to think their stories were idiotic. That said, most people from outside Nerima thought the entire place was insane at best, and incredibly dangerous at worst, the Furinkan suburb being the centre of insanity. Those that had even heard of it at least. For various reasons other districts tended to pretend that Nerima didn't exist. One or two of the other wards of the Greater Tokyo area had a certain sympathy for Nerima, infested as they were by odd magical goings-on, intermittent attacks by unnatural creatures, and occasional flurries of magical girls, who were normally skimpily dressed in impractical uniforms, with a near-total disregard for collateral damage.

These wards were rather envious of Nerima, as all it seemed to have to deal with were outbreaks of martial artistry. No one from outside could really see what the fuss was about, demons and demon-hunters seemed like much more trouble. The one or two civic leaders who had gone on fact-finding measures to Nerima to work out whether they could trade one problem for another had come back pale and shaking, needing copious amounts of alcoholic beverages before they said that they preferred the demons. They were at least fairly predictable.

"I know! I don't know what's going on, damn it, I can't work out how the hell they could have vanished so effectively. And stop shouting at me for god's sake!" A different, smoother, but no quieter voice rang out, causing the neighbours to turn the TV up. Most of them were vaguely regretting whatever had happened to make the nice one and the teenaged boy leave half a year ago. The very pretty red-headed girl who was often around had also vanished. The three of them were beginning to be missed, the older sister had somehow managed to keep a lid on the household to a large extent, and the boy and his sister/cousin/friend/something unbelievable, depending on who you talked to, had kept a lid on most of the district. The nice one had a calming influence on every one she met, but since she'd been gone the Tendo household had become a loud and argumentative place. Both remaining sisters seemed to spend most of the time shouting at each other, the younger one often making a lot of noise practising some form of either martial arts or demolition work, no-one could quite decide what. It certainly involved a large number of concrete blocks.

The three older people in the house also seemed to consider arguing late into the night a regular basis an acceptable occupation. This annoyed everyone. When the other peculiar visitors were taken into account, all of whom had their own notable and normally loud voices to be added to the mix, everyone within earshot was missing the young people who seemed to have escaped the madness while at the same time rather envying them. The dark-haired young woman with the odious laugh was particularly unnerving.

Although, when the pig-tailed boy and the red-head had been in residence, some quite spectacular displays of martial artistry had broken out, often at inconvenient times of day, they'd normally been over fairly quickly. The accompanying damage to the civic infrastructure was occasionally impressive, even if not on the level one heard stories of from that ward on the other side of Tokyo with the demon problem. That said, it was also usually repaired quite fast. Since the night six months ago when, after some altercation that involved a truly remarkable effect that looked and sounded from a distance more like something out of a rather good science fiction movie, the two, or possibly three, young people had vanished, things had gone downhill.

All the lesser martial artists in the area seemed to be fighting amongst themselves almost daily, and with a total lack of thought for innocent bystanders. The pig-tailed boy, whatever his faults, had been a professional, never endangering anyone not directly involved. The other characters didn't suffer from the same reluctance, as a result of which a number of passers-by had found themselves in hospital, luckily so far not seriously injured. The police had been called a number of times, without much effect, as they were outnumbered by the abilities of the miscreants in question. They had tried their best, giving a number of them a stern talking to, but to be honest that was about all they could do. No normal cell could hold any of the freakishly overpowered people involved, and frankly they were hoping that if they ignored it long enough it would solve itself as a problem.

One or two of the more experienced officers were quietly running their own search for either the pig-tailed boy or the red-headed girl, hoping that if they were located they could be asked, persuaded, or bribed to come back and deal with the problem. The overenthusiastic sergeant who had announced that he would personally force either or both of them back at gunpoint had been restrained for his own good until he came to his senses. As bad as the current crop of martial artists was, no one who had ever had even the slightest interaction with the boy, girl, or boy/girl Ranma wanted to make them angry. Enough was known or suspected about the abilities of the person or people in question to make it clear how terminally stupid that action was likely to be, especially if the rumours of what had happened that night were accurate.

The remainder of the police were kept busy trying to clamp down on the steady rise of mostly petty crime that had accompanied the loss of the young martial artist. He or she had, almost incidentally, had a profound effect on gang trouble and petty theft. Not overtly as far as the general public was concerned, but enough that the people who were prone to cause trouble, especially ones who harmed their victims, had become aware that they tended to wake up in a ditch severely beaten. Normally with no idea what had happened, other than a memory of blue eyes in the dark, and a voice telling them that it wasn't nice to attack the weak and defenceless. For the last six months, though, the crime rate had been going slowly up, crimes against the person making most of the rise.
The only good part was that the perennial problem of a diminutive underwear thief seemed to have resolved itself, as the perpetrator of the constant thefts had apparently vanished soon after the elder Tendo daughter and the boy had. Every female in Nerima had relaxed just a little bit since then.

A couple of weeks ago, though, a rather nasty crime had happened. A young school-girl had been attacked and raped, nearly losing her life in the process. The attacker had apparently been scared off by a passing policeman, who had never even seen him. This was the first time in over two years that any sexual assault had taken place in Nerima, since the last time it had happened the young man who had committed it had turned himself in, with a ruptured testicle, dislocated arm, broken jaw, broken wrist, several broken ribs, innumerable bruises, and an overwhelming terror of any female with red hair that he kept for the rest of his life.

The red-headed girl really didn't like rapists.

One bright spark in the Neriman police force called in a favour at a large national newspaper and got the crime reported Japan-wide. A few days later there was a lot of screaming in one of the local parks, which attracted official attention when the sound died down to the point that the responding officers were sure that the cause had left. They found a middle-aged man, who turned out to be known to colleagues elsewhere in Tokyo for a number of crimes of violence, including rape, lying on the ground, beaten nearly to death and missing his right hand and his genitals. The wounds were unlike anything they'd ever seen before, looking more like something incredibly sharp and at the same time immensely hot had made perfectly clean cuts, cauterising the wounds simultaneously. The missing body parts were never found, although a small glassy crater a few metres away hinted at what had happened to them.

Next to him was a camera, the film from which when developed had a number of unpleasant shots on it, documenting not only the rape of the Neriman schoolgirl but three more until now unsolved assaults, one of which had resulted in a murder. While officially the police were investigating the assault on the rapist, unofficially the entire affair had been swept into the drawer labelled 'He damn well deserved what he got, the bastard, and anyway do you want to try to arrest her?' There wasn't a hope in hell that whoever had done it would ever get charged as far as the Neriman police were concerned. No-one else in the ward cared much either, although a number of the more perceptive citizens had a shrewd idea about what had taken place in the park and were privately supportive.

The level of violent crime dropped like a stone immediately after that incident, and although it had been slowly rising again, a number of the more intelligent criminals had left the area. The collection of martial artists informally known as the Nerima Wrecking Crew had, of course, completely missed the entire sequence of events and what it implied. Nabiki Tendo would eventually work it out, being nobodies fool, but the discovery would come far too late for her to follow up on.

"Look, Akane, I've got every contact I have keeping an eye out for them. It's costing a fortune," Nabiki got up from her desk, leaning over to close the window against the chill late evening air, much to the relief of the neighbours. "No one has seen a sign of them since about two days after that night. There were a couple of sightings near the train station, and another one in the main business district of central Tokyo, but after that the trail goes dead." She sat again, swivelling around in her chair to look at her sister who was sitting on her bed scowling and grinding her teeth, apparently furious. Since that night, one she would never forget, the younger girl had been steadily getting more unstable in her sisters opinion.

Sighing, Nabiki leaned back in her chair and thought back to that night. Three days after the wedding disaster, three days of near constant arguing, shouting, and fighting. A large part of it coming from or due to the younger girl she was looking at. The night they nearly lost their eldest sister, only to have her almost miraculously saved, then lost her again. The only good thing to have come from that was that the loss was due to her leaving rather than dying, although it looked like the former state was likely to be as permanent as the latter would have been. At least Akane wasn't a murderer, mused Nabiki, watching her younger sister fume. 'Not for lack of trying,' she thought uncharitably, regretting the thought almost immediately.

She had been finding herself feeling slightly more sympathetic to Ranma's point of view recently. Without the pigtailed boy to buffer Akane's tendency to boil over and hit things, everyone in the area was walking on eggshells. She regularly exploded into rage, but lacking a convenient martial-artist-based target, resorted to beating the crap out of a steadily increasing number of concrete blocks. Nabiki was buying them in by the pallet-load at the moment at ruinous expense. The only good part was that she had negotiated a bulk discount due to the quantities involved. She'd also had a brainwave a few weeks ago and found a purchaser for crushed concrete to be used as hardcore for building purposes. That at least got a small amount of the money back.

The brunette was dreading the day they could no longer afford to keep her sister in blocks to break. The effect on the immediate environment, not to mention the people, was apt to be unpleasant. She hoped that they could somehow get Ranma back before that happened. Momentarily she regretted the likely damage to the boy, but decided that it was better that it happen to him than, for example, her. A slight thought of the expression in the eyes of the, at the time female, Ranma as she'd walked out the gate gave her pause, it had been the expression of someone who wasn't going to take being pushed any further. Shaking her head, she dismissed the thought. It was Ranma, he never hit Akane back...

Two days after Ranma and Kasumi had walked through the gate, both of them wearing the weirdest smiles Nabiki had ever encountered, the trail had gone dead. The day after that, a group of worryingly professional appearing men with a large van had come to the house, apparently under instruction to box up and take away the majority of Kasumi's belongings. They'd had a very well itemised list, signed by the missing sister, and an attitude that suggested they wouldn't take no for an answer. Nabiki had looked at the one who had knocked politely at the door, evaluating him carefully, then at his three compatriots, before stepping out of the way. She knew when she was out of her depth. Akane had taken a certain amount of persuading to stay quiet, while their father had just cried. Nothing particularly unusual there.

The middle sister knew that Ranma was behind this somehow, torn between being curious how he'd managed to get people who looked more like high-level members of the Yakuza rather than normal removals men to do the work, and feeling that she wasn't entirely sure she wanted to know. They'd filled the boxes quietly and efficiently, documenting everything, given her a receipt, and left. Although she'd tried to have them followed the trail had gone cold immediately, they were apparently professional even in counter surveillance techniques. Yet more proof that they weren't quite what they presented themselves as.

She had found out that more or less at the same time someone had turned up at Furinkan High School with a letter giving them the authority to collect Ranma's school records and transfer him away from the school. There was no indication where he was transferred to, unfortunately. It suggested that he intended to complete his schooling, not that this gave her much to go on.

After that, there had been nothing. Happosai had disappeared sometime around then although they hadn't realised until considerably later that he wasn't coming back. The first few weeks had been very loud and quite hard on the immediate surroundings. Both Kunos had taken to walking in day or night, demanding to know where Ranma or the pig-tailed girl were, more or less interchangeably. Neither one of them having been present the night it all came to a head they didn't believe anything they were told. Eventually Ukyo and Ryoga, with some interference from Akane in the guise of 'help' had beaten them senseless, after which they tended to stay away. Nabiki knew from her contacts that both of the crazy siblings had been using their considerable resources to do much what she was doing, with a similar lack of results. In fact she knew rather more about their results than they did, due to her having arranged to intercept the information before it was given to them. In effect the Kuno family was paying for a lot of her searching, not that it was doing much good.

Cologne and the two Amazon teenagers were also looking using more non-standard methods. The brunette girl had at one point, exasperated, talked to the Amazon elder, finding her at least as frustrated as she was. In an unusually garrulous mood, mainly due to being furious, she'd let slip that she'd been attempting to trace either Ranma or Kasumi via mystical means. What had been driving her around the bend was that all her attempts had met with failure, which according to the wizened elder, meant that somehow the magical surveillance was being blocked. When she'd learned that Happosai had not been seen for a couple of months she had immediately exploded with rage, suspecting him of being the reason she was having no luck.

Nabiki had thought it was quite likely the old woman was correct, although she'd also thought it wasn't impossible that Ranma himself had learned or acquired methods of his own to deal with such tracking. He'd certainly had sufficient reason to do so even before the big blow up, as the Amazons had been a constant thorn in his side with their magic long before that day. She was under no illusions as to how effectively the martial artist could learn new techniques and methods when he had a reason to do so. She wouldn't have put it past him to learn some form of magic as a backup plan.

Whatever the truth of it, none of the considerable resources brought to bear on the problem of the missing martial artist or Tendo sister had produced any result other than large bills and huge frustration. The result had been chaos, even by the standards of the various members of the NWC. Everyone seemed to be at everyone's throats. Ryoga and Mousse had nearly killed each other for some reason neither one of them was clear on. Shampoo and Ukyo likewise. Akane was crushing blocks at a rate high enough to pave most of Nerima with the rubble produced, while the Kunos kept popping up in the background annoying everyone. Her father almost flooded the house for the first two weeks before, dehydrated and cried out, he'd gone on a massive bender, only to be slapped back into a slightly more sensible frame of mind by an unlikely saviour in the form of Genma.

Nodoka had spent a month walking around with her sword in her hand ready to use it on anyone who even looked at her oddly, before one day suddenly putting it under her bed and apparently forgetting about it. This was still puzzling Nabiki, but for various reasons she didn't feel like asking why. All three parents now spent most evenings getting morose and melancholy about all the good times, most of which were misremembered, and loudly wondering where they'd gone wrong. It was left to the younger members of the household to do the bulk of the practical work. In essence this mostly meant Nabiki, which annoyed her no end. Akane would occasionally help out, but the one thing she actively wanted to do, cook the meals, had been firmly taken over by Nodoka after the first couple of days.

The older woman had argued fiercely with the youngest sister, matters only being resolved when Akane was pushed far enough to try her own food. She'd had to beat it into submission first, which to a normal person would have been warning enough not to put any of it into her mouth. In her case the three days of projectile vomiting that followed such an ill-advised move had pretty much cured her of the desire to try again.

As a result of the loss of Kasumi the household was eating food that, while good, wasn't up to the previous standard, in a house that was much less neat and tidy. It was only since she had gone that the remaining people had realised what an extraordinary amount of work looking after a houseful of people really was, and how well she'd done it for all those years. Nabiki at least was feeling somewhat ashamed over how much they'd taken their older sister for granted. Akane had occasionally espoused a similar opinion, but normally then followed it with a rant about how it was all Ranma's fault for kidnapping the woman. She didn't appear to remember that it was Kasumi's decision to leave, and why.

Turning back to her computer, Nabiki dismissed her sister for the moment, brought back to today by the sound of an email registering in her inbox. Quickly opening it she read it, then slumped.
"Damn. Another dead end."

"What was it?"

"A contact at a small university in Osaka claimed to have seen someone who looked a lot like Ranma in female form, only with blonde hair. She investigated and found it was definitely not her."
The middle sister crossed another line off a very long list of dead leads.

"Are you completely sure? Maybe we should go and check ourselves." Glancing over her shoulder, Nabiki scowled.

"Yes, I'm sure. My contact was very thorough, she even got the girl's birth certificate. She's three years too old, five centimetres too tall, and her breasts aren't big enough. What more do you want?
Anyway, we can't afford to go to Osaka right now." Glowering, Akane crossed her arms and stared back.

"Some intelligence genius you are. Outwitted by a dumb martial artist jock."

"Oh, for god's sake, sis. I've told you over and over, he's not dumb. That's been evident for a while now. I don't know how he's covered their tracks so well, he probably had help, but the one thing I am damn sure of is that he's a hell of a lot smarter than he let on all this time. I'd have found him for sure otherwise."

The other girl snorted. "Yeah, right. Him, smart? So why didn't he do better at school?" Nabiki shrugged.

"I have no idea. I'm pretty sure he could have, but for some reason he decided not to. I managed to get a copy of his transcripts and he was doing a lot better than we thought he was. Apparently he had some sort of deal with several of the teachers to downplay his marks in public. Again, I don't know why." Her sister looked unconvincing but dropped the subject. There was quiet for a while, only broken by the intermittent sound of grinding teeth, both sisters lost in their own thoughts.
Eventually Akane spoke.

"So what's the next step?" she asked. Her sister looked pensive.

"I'm not sure. I have a few contacts that haven't checked back, so there might be something from one of them, but I'm not hopeful. I even talked to a couple of people I know in the police. They'd like Ranma back as well, they seem to think he was a positive influence on the neighbourhood as far as reducing crime went." Akane snorted disbelievingly but kept quiet otherwise. Her sister favoured her with a raised eyebrow, then continued after a few seconds. "They don't have any idea where he is either. My contact said they were actually quite impressed over how efficiently he's vanished. Again, it points to him having some sort of help. Who from is the mystery."

"OK, so he's got help. That doesn't help us, though, does it. We need to find him." Spinning her chair around Nabiki studied her sister for a while.
"I'm beginning to wonder why we need to find him," she said slowly. Akane looked at her in amazement.

"What do you mean?"

Scratching her forehead, the older sister thought about it for a moment. "Well, aside from the expense and frustration, what is all this searching managing to do? We're no closer to finding him now than we were six months ago. Even if we do track him down, what then? Ask nicely if he'll come back? After what happened, I'd be a little surprised if he didn't basically shoot first and ask questions later, if at all. It wasn't like she and Kasumi left under the best of terms." She shuddered a little at the memory. "The look in her eyes when she stood up from under all that rubble... I really thought for a moment she was going to kill everyone in the garden without mercy. I've never seen so much anger and pain in someone's eyes before."

Rubbing her eyes for a moment, she glanced at her sister. "And that attack she used on your mallet, the one she saved Kasumi with? It was like something out of a sci-fi movie. I don't think you saw it properly, you were too close, but it was like a solid beam of light that came from the rubble. The noise was incredible. I had no idea she was able to do anything like that and neither did anyone else." This was indeed true. When she'd mentioned it to Cologne, the old woman had gone very quiet for some time, then refused to discuss it. She'd got the impression that the elder was genuinely shocked and scared by what she'd seen that night. None of the younger people had paid a lot of attention to the implications of the surprise new attack, but Nabiki thought this was a serious mistake.

She'd examined the rubble pile closely the next day, finding the large piece of stone the ki beam had passed through on it's way to intercept Akane's mallet. There was a fifteen centimetre diameter hole piercing entirely through it, the edges of which were glass-smooth and parallel. It looked like it had been polished, or perhaps exposed to extreme heat. Even after passing through over thirty centimetres of granite, the beam had continued on through the ki mallet wielded by her sister, disrupting it very loudly, and when she traced it's path, she had noticed a semicircular notch in the tiles on the peak of the roof some forty metres away. Climbing up by way of a ladder she'd found this was also completely smooth and glassy. Curious, she'd measured both the hole in the stone block and the notch in the roof, finding that they were basically the same diameter, implying the beam had very little spread to it.

The possible implications of all this were very disturbing. Leaving aside how on earth the red-head had been able to aim the attack so precisely from under tons of detritus, or for that matter had even known what was happening and when to use it, how had she learned to produce such an attack? No one had ever seen her use anything like it before. It was devastatingly powerful, of that Nabiki was certain, to a level that made her extremely worried. She was aware that the martial artist had a remarkable respect for life, and also that he held back a lot of his more dangerous attacks in the encounters he had with his peers, but she had developed a sneaking suspicion that nobody realised quite how much he was holding back. The look on the girl's face as she'd risen from the ground like an avenging demon still made her wake up in a cold sweat on occasion. It was the face of someone who had reached their breaking point.

"I'm kind of starting to think that maybe we should let him go," the brunette said reluctantly. Akane glared, appalled.

"I don't care if you're chicken or not, but we're going to get him back. He kidnapped Kasumi, don't forget, and we have to rescue her." Nabiki sighed heavily.

"He didn't 'kidnap' Kasumi. You know damn well what happened. Our sister went with her willingly. You did nearly kill her. If it hadn't been for Ranma..." The middle Tendo was still haunted by the memory of the shock, fear, and betrayal in their elder sister's eyes, and the sudden simple joy that she'd glimpsed as the woman turned away from them and left. Akane looked away at the mention of her near-disastrous inadvertent attack on their sister, refusing to meet Nabiki's gaze. Memories of those few seconds when she knew beyond doubt that she'd killed her sister filled her until she pushed them down, yet again, by blaming it all on Ranma. If he hadn't hidden under all that debris for three days instead of coming out and taking his punishment like a man, she wouldn't have nearly hit Kasumi.

Wondering what was going through her sister's head, Nabiki watched her face, in fact coming quite close to what the other girl was thinking. After a little while she could see that the younger woman had dismissed whatever doubt she'd been feeling as her face once more filled with anger. "We're going to get him back," she repeated, abruptly standing. "He's got responsibilities to us, to me." Glaring at her sister she paced back and forth on the carpet. Nabiki sighed a little, yet again. "Easier said than done," she muttered, turning back to her computer. More loudly, she commented, "We also need to figure out how to get more money in. In six months we've barely started repairing the Dojo, and the household budget is straining. We're likely to be eating rice and pickles again pretty soon unless we can start either making some heavy cuts, or earning more money." Casting a jaundiced eye at her sister, still wearing a hole in her carpet, she saw that the girl was pretty much ignoring her. "Akane? Are you paying attention?"

"Yes, yes, money, pickles, I heard you. What are you going to do about it?" the blue-haired girl snapped.

"Me? What about you? You could, I don't know, perhaps get a job or something? You've graduated now, you don't have to go to school any more, and you don't have any university plans at the moment. Use some of that free time and earn your keep!" Nabiki was losing patience again. Stopping in the middle of the room and raising her voice, Akane retorted, "Well, you're the one who's always selling information and photos and blackmailing people. Can't you just do more of that?" Nabiki glared back.

"Unlike you, I do have university plans, which start quite soon. I'm having enough trouble earning money for that, never mind paying for a lot of the household as well. Father brings in something from his council job, Nodoka has contributed a fair amount, and even Genma has kicked in a little now and then. Although he probably stole it, the indolent bastard. You're just a net drain on the finances. You're eighteen now, time you started to help." The younger girl went dark red about the face and neck.

Even with the window shut the shouting annoyed the neighbours for hours.

"Damn and blast!" the voice shouted, accompanied by a crash of breaking ceramic. Shampoo looked up from her work in the kitchen, wincing at the yell. Wiping her hands she walked further into the private part of the building, peering cautiously into Cologne's work room, unwilling to enter without permission. Not after what had happened to Mousse that time...

"Great Grandmother? Are you all right?" she asked politely in Mandarin. The elder looked over her shoulder, glowering, then reluctantly nodded.

"Yes, child. I'm sorry, I'm getting frustrated. Every time I think I might have figured out a method to track that pig-tailed menace, I find that someone, somehow, has already thought of it and blocked it. I'm running out of ideas." Turning back to the remains of what had been her best scrying bowl she ruefully poked through the shiny fragments, glad it had had simply shattered rather than exploding. The backlash from the spell she'd tried could easily have caused much more serious damage. "I wish I knew who was helping him. Whoever it is has a serious amount of power. That spell should have punched through pretty much any anti-scrying countermeasure, instead it just bounced. It's got to be Happosai. That little pervert, despite his disgusting ways, knows a hell of a lot about all sorts of things he shouldn't." Shampoo stepped just inside the doorway, looking curiously at the wreckage.

"Are you sure it wasn't husband?" Cologne shook her head.

"How could he possibly have learned to work magic? It takes a certain mindset which I don't think he has." Shampoo wasn't convinced.

"You know what he's like when he decides to learn something. Nothing stops him." This was indeed true and the elder considered the idea carefully for a while.

"I'll admit that future son-in-law does have an impressive ability to adapt and learn when he is up against a threat, but... It still seems very unlikely to me. I think it's Happosai." She muttered to herself, not intending Shampoo to overhear, "I should have killed the little shit decades ago." The young woman heard, but suppressed the smile that threatened to come on as she didn't think her great grandmother was in the sort of mood that would appreciate it.

"Have you managed to learn anything?" she asked instead. "It's been over a year since he and the nice sister vanished." Sweeping the debris into a bag, Cologne dropped it into a waste bin, sat down, and sighed.

"Nothing. Nearly fourteen months, I've lost track of how many spells, every contact I have anywhere, and nothing. Not one verifiable sighting or even decent rumour of him being sighted, or the Tendo girl for that matter. I don't even know if they're still in Japan. Hell, for all I know they're not even in this reality or time any more." The girl with the long lilac hair looked askance at the old woman at this, which made her grin a little. "Come on, you've seen enough over the last few years to know that where that boy is concerned, almost nothing is impossible. But yes, you're right, it's unlikely that he's jumped through a portal to hell or anything like that."

Leaning against the wall, Shampoo gazed unseeingly at the floor. Eventually, she looked up. "Do you think we'll ever find him?" she asked softly. Cologne shrugged.

"I hope so. He'd be an incredible asset for the tribe. And... by now I'm actually getting worried. I hope he's all right." They looked at each other for a moment, sharing a genuine concern for the boy, difficult as he was.

"Has the mercenary girl had any more luck?" Shampoo asked after a few seconds. Cologne shook her head.

"No, not that I am aware. Not that she'd tell me if she did, but I'd have found out by now anyway. She's still trying although the last I heard they were running out of money to pay for the search. I believe that she's somehow managed to subvert most of the investigators working for the Kuno children, very sneaky, she's getting the rich idiots to pay for the bulk of her search. But, just like us, she's found nothing."

There was silence for a moment, then Shampoo nodded, turning to go back to work. As she left the elder reached for yet another scroll, opening it and looking for a spell she hadn't tried yet.
"Son of a bitch!" Nabiki yelled, staring at her computer screen. Akane, who was passing her room at the time, came in to find out what was going on. The elder girl was home during a short holiday, normally she stayed at the university accommodation as much as possible, due to the somewhat strained household relationships. Genma and Nodoka were still living in the Tendo house after nearly two and a half years, which slightly puzzled her, but at the same time it at least meant that edible food was being cooked. Soun was even slowly recovering his mental health, reaching the point that he had been discussing with the other martial artist the idea of taking on a few students.

Of course, where to teach them would be the problem, the Dojo itself was still only half-rebuilt, due to a lack of funds. It at least had a roof without holes now. They were thinking of renting space in a nearby warehouse, with the thought that they could put any money earned into completing the rebuilding. Nabiki was all for the idea, but privately felt it was pretty ambitious for a pair of middle-aged albeit undeniably very good martial artists, especially as one of them was nearly the text-book example of sloth while the other tended to have major emotional breakdowns on a semi-random basis. Still, it might work, and if nothing else would keep them busy.

Her sister and she were getting along better at the moment, after a long period during which they barely spoke. Akane had managed to find a job in retail that stuck, having gone through a number of others, losing most of them due to her bad temper. This last one was working for a small jewellery shop, the owner of which had been impressed when an attempted theft on her first day had resulted in an unconscious thief with two broken arms. He'd decided that the enhanced security was worth the occasional argument. The money was reasonable, adding a welcome flexibility to the household budget. Unfortunately the debts that had built up would take some time to pay off before she could seriously start saving for her own further education.

"What's the problem?" she asked, entering the room. Nabiki pointed an accusing finger at her monitor.

"An old police report a contact sent me. It's from nearly two years ago." She was extremely pissed off, and a curious Akane came over and read it over her shoulder. The details were somewhat gruesome.

"I remember hearing something about that. The pervert got what was coming to him, everyone thought. The girl he assaulted was the sister of someone I knew at school." Nabiki shook her head.

"No, you're missing the point. Read it again, and think about it. Read the notes from my contact as well." The younger woman did so, then glanced at her sister.

"I still don't get it." The brunette sighed impatiently.

"Look. Someone at the police station here in Nerima got this crime, nasty but local, reported in a major paper covering all of Japan. Five days later the rapist is found nearly dead in a park with bits missing. The police got reports of screams for at least an hour before they bothered to investigate, which is unusually inefficient of them. The missing parts were never found but they did find a melted crater in the ground near him." She looked at her sister's face to see if she was following. "No one has ever been arrested or even questioned about the attack on the rapist, and my contact said that they had no intention of following up on it. Doesn't that sound a little odd to you?" Akane shrugged.

"So?"
"I recognise the name of the lieutenant at the station who called the papers. He knew Ranma, he was one of the few policemen that knew all about him. The guy is smart, and also kind of... flexible... in his approach to life in Nerima. Pragmatic, I guess." Paging through the document, she pointed to a line in the medical report. "Totally clean cuts even through the bone, cauterised, almost no blood loss. No tool marks of any kind. The man was beaten to a level that the doctors say should have killed him, but whoever did it was so good they missed everything critical, just hit all the painful places." Akane was still looking blank and now slightly irritated.

Nabiki swivelled her chair around, staring at her sister like she was looking at a child. "It was Ranma. I'm sure of it." The blue haired young woman returned her gaze for a few seconds, stepping back and sinking down to sit on the bed

"Ranma did that?" She didn't immediately disbelieve it but wasn't convinced. Nabiki nodded firmly.

"It was a martial artist, definitely. Only someone very skilled in the art could do that much damage without critically injuring the person. And the cuts? The only thing I can think of that I've ever seen that could do something like that was some sort of ki attack. The cat-fist could certainly slice someone into little bits as easily as a knife through butter. The cauterisation is a bit odd, but even so, it fits. As does the crater."

"Maybe some other martial artist could have done it? There are a lot of them around here, you know." Akane still wasn't convinced.

"Possibly. But I don't think so. Any of the others I know personally would have just kicked the shit out of the guy then dropped him off at the police station. I'm aware there are quite a few I've never met, but one thing I do know is that Ranma is much, much better than any of them. And I know for a fact that he absolutely hates rapists. It's almost scary how he feels about rape. One time I saw him read something in the paper about a girl getting assaulted near here, he looked like he was ready to kill someone. You know what he's like about defending the weak, and nothing says the weak needing defending like rape." She paused, watching Akane, who seemed less disbelieving. "I think the fact that he's female a lot of the time gives him even more reason to get upset about attacks on women. Whatever, he doesn't take prisoners where that sort of thing is concerned."

Turning back to the report she scanned it again, nodding. "It was him, I'm certain. Which means that he was back here nearly six months after he vanished. And it's taken me two damn years to find out about it!"

"Can we use that to find him?"

Nabiki shook her head. "It's much too long ago. Perhaps if I'd found out at the time... perhaps not. He seems to have been very careful to cover his tracks. Apparently the police did unofficially poke around a little but found nothing."

"So it's useless, then." Akane stood up, dismissing the report with a grunt. Stomping out of her sister's room she went downstairs to shout at Genma, the reminder of her errant fiancé bringing on a bad mood. Nabiki watched her go, then turned back to her computer with one eyebrow twitching a little. The girl, young woman now, as she had just turned twenty the previous month, was still erratic and prone to outbursts of massive anger. Both the middle sister and her father had told her to keep the public displays of destruction to a minimum as she was now a legal adult, which gave the police slightly more leverage if she caused trouble. Amazingly she seemed to have listened at least to some degree, with the result that she didn't get into as many fights as before. How long that would last was anyone's guess.
A lot of it probably hinged on the next time Ryoga would turn up. About a year ago Akane had finally worked out what everyone else had known for a long time, that Ryoga and her little pet P-Chan were one and the same. It had been completely accidental, she'd managed to spill a pan of near-boiling water on the little pig when she was in the kitchen and Ryoga hadn't seen it coming. Even while he was screaming in agony, red and naked on the floor, she had seen, understood, gone almost purple with rage, then proceeded to inflict the beating of a lifetime on him. Nabiki had in the end been forced to call on Ukyo and Shampoo to help pull her off him before she killed him. If it hadn't been for the fact that he was nearly invulnerable there was little doubt that he wouldn't have made it.

Even so, he spent nearly a month in the hospital and was walking with a limp for another six. The damage to the side of the house where he'd been knocked through, the garden, the garden wall when he'd gone through that, and two cars in the street outside looked more like a decent size bomb had been dropped on the area. The two policemen, veterans of Nerima, that had finally showed up when everyone was sure that it was safe had been genuinely impressed with the level of damage, and quietly appalled that one slim female had done it with her bare hands. No one wanted to see a repeat, so Ryoga was quickly spirited away when Akane was arguing with Ukyo, what was left of him being taken to recover at a hospital well outside the area. Afterwards everyone denied knowing where he'd ended up. The youngest Tendo looked for him for at least a couple of months after this, intending to finish the job, but luckily for both of them couldn't find him.

Nabiki had gone to have a quiet word with the part-time pig when he'd recovered enough to be able to talk. She'd pointed out that while he was undoubtedly tougher than her sister, she was a lot like that American comic book character The Hulk in that the angrier she got the more dangerous she became. Ryoga had managed to make her angrier than anyone had believed possible. His inability to effectively defend himself against women, unless the woman in question was Ranma, would also work against him. There was a good chance she could, and indeed would, kill him if they met up again while she was still furious, so it was strongly suggested that he steer well clear of Nerima for the foreseeable future. Like the next ten years or so. She'd given him some cash they could ill afford, a new set of accurate maps and a compass, and told him to make sure he stayed out of the area in future. He hadn't been seen more than a few times since, always moving at a dead run directly away when he realised he had accidentally strayed back into danger range.

It was only a matter of time until he popped up too close before he could work it out, which made Nabiki lose sleep now and then. Hopefully by the time this happened her sister would have cooled off a little, although it didn't seem likely at the moment. She was even more convinced that all men were perverts, although she made a few rare exceptions if they were old enough and she felt that they deserved some respect. That was the only reason she was able to get a job at all. The middle sister had wondered for some considerable time whether her sister was a closet lesbian, her intense dislike for males seemed excessive otherwise. Her dislike for anything she deemed 'perverted' was even more intense, most definitely including anything that smacked of homosexuality, which went a long way towards explaining her constant anger. Even on a good day it was simmering just below the surface.

Repairing the damage to the house and garden had used up most of the money that Nabiki had budgeted towards rebuilding the Dojo, delaying that project even more, but the house took priority. She still hoped to get it finished within the next six months so when winter came it was done.

Looking through the police report yet again, she re-read the notes from her contact, thinking about what it all meant. After a few minutes pondering it she emailed a request for more information on any other cases over the last couple of years that met a certain set of specific conditions, then turned the computer off. Lying on her bed she stared at the ceiling for a while, mulling over what she'd learned.
Despite Akane's arguments to the contrary she was certain that the report detailed something that Ranma had been responsible for. There were just too many things that didn't add up otherwise. But that said, the report raised worries, ones she was sure that Akane had missed. The level of brutality involved in the injuries sustained by the rapist spoke of a certain coldness that she'd never have suspected the young martial artist capable of, at least before that unforgettable night nearly two and a half years ago. On that night, having seen the expression the red-headed girl had worn as she walked out of the rubble, she'd have believed almost anything you cared to mention. It had been terrifying. If it was Ranma, he had changed.

'Not surprising, all things considered,' she thought to herself. 'People do change as they mature, and god knows he's had more reason than anyone else I know...' Closing her eyes for a moment she massaged them. 'I suppose the fact that the rapist lived is proof that he hasn't completely thrown away mercy, although under the circumstances it might have been kinder to finish the job. I wonder if that was the point?' Sitting up then swinging her legs around, she sat on the edge of the bed for a moment before standing up and heading downstairs to begin cleaning the living room. She still didn't like doing the work, but as she didn't have to all the time now since she was away at university a lot of the time, she felt it was her duty to improve on the rather indifferent job Akane and the others managed when she was in residence. She liked coming home to a clean house.

As she ran the vacuum around the room she was still thinking about the whole Ranma situation. In truth over the last year she hadn't been putting as much effort into the search as she had for the first eighteen months, partly due to a lack of funding, partly due to thinking that if the boy hadn't been found by that time, it was unlikely that he'd suddenly give himself away. If she ever did find him she suspected it would be by luck more than anything else. Akane had slowly stopped pushing so hard, although it didn't take much to get her ranting on the subject. In fact Nabiki was pleasantly surprised that she'd not seized on the police report to start yet another argument about how the middle sister should be trying harder to track the martial artist down.

Both of them still missed Kasumi every day, but even there Akane's guilt about what she'd nearly done had stopped her pushing too hard eventually. In the end she barely mentioned their older sister unless either very tired or very angry. Nabiki wasn't sure if this was a good thing or not. When the subject did come up the younger woman would usually change it quickly with a look in her eyes that made it clear the subject was uncomfortable for her. Everyone had learned not to mention either the missing fiancé or the missing sister unless they really wanted a good shouting match.

The NWC had slowly moved on after the Ryoga incident. Both Kunos still occasionally put in a highly unwelcome appearance, although neither one seemed to have their hearts in it. Tatewaki would every now and then deliver a request for pictures of his 'pig-tailed princess' but it seemed to be more for old times sake than anything else. Kodachi had a habit of intermittently dropping into the back yard and giving off one of her horrific laughs, but after Akane nearly killed Ryoga she'd become much more circumspect. No saner, though. Nabiki still got reports on her behaviour towards whatever poor sod had sparked her interest that month, most of whom left the area for good as soon as they could. The young woman needed professional help, or possibly just locking up. Not that either of these events would be likely to happen due to the family's political influence.

Ukyo had gone home for an extended period a few months ago, cutting contact with Nerima completely for a while and closing the okonomiyaki café. Some time later Konatsu had disappeared as well, both of them eventually reappearing a few weeks later, reopening the shop and carrying on as if nothing had happened. Nabiki's curiosity had driven her to investigate, but all she'd easily been able to find out was that Ukyo had managed to persuade her father that there was no chance of her marrying Ranma. Oddly enough she seemed quite relieved about it and happier than she'd been for some time beforehand. The middle Tendo had visited her café many times since, noting that the cross-dressing ninja seemed to be very close to Ukyo now, closer than before, reaching her own conclusions after watching them for a while. As far as she was concerned it was their own business but privately she was pleased for the sake of someone who had become a friend.

The thing she found most surprising was that the Amazons were still in the area. With so long having passed since Ranma disappeared she had expected that they'd return to China, but they hadn't moved. Nabiki was on fairly good terms with them, strangely. She didn't trust Cologne, Cologne didn't trust her, but it was a sort of Cold War détente type of mistrust. Neither one thought the other was likely to suddenly turn on them, while at the same time neither one would necessarily believe anything the other said without checking it carefully. They both occasionally exchanged information on their respective searches when it suited them.

Shampoo had become considerably better at speaking Japanese over the last couple of years having put in quite a lot of effort. The young woman had almost the exact opposite of a gift for languages but got annoyed about being taken as something of a bimbo, in the end finding a good mail-order language course and sticking to it with surprising discipline. In the end she still made the odd mistake but overall sounded a lot smarter. Mousse was still pursuing her with no apparent luck but refused to give up. He was impressive in his dedication but showed a lack of common sense in Nabiki's opinion.

A couple of months ago she'd asked Shampoo outright why they were still in Japan. The answer both surprised and amused her. Both young people had come to realise that while they held great affection for their village they found daily life in Japan much more to their liking in most respects. They'd integrated pretty well into Neriman life which was probably helped by the fact that Nerimans were quite used to the unexpected and found foreign martial artists who occasionally turned into animals more comedic than anything else, as long as they refrained from fighting in the streets and damaging the fixtures and fittings. Since Ryoga had left, or more accurately been kicked out, the number of fights had reduced considerably. This pleased the average Neriman nearly as much as it pleased the local police who had been getting very irritated by their impotence in the face of the random attacks of martial artistry.

That's not to say that these things had stopped completely, or even dramatically reduced in number. It's just that without the main heavy guns of the local martial artist group the damage had become much more manageable. Nerima was still a pretty weird place by most people's standards, with a higher density of martial artists and mystical fighters than probably anywhere on the planet.

With the drop in fights between each other the various parties had taken to exercising their martial instincts on any evil-doers who were dim enough to do evil within the boundaries of the ward. Crime had plummeted to levels lower than anyone could remember as a result. It was a spectacularly brave, stupid, or ill-informed mugger who tried plying his or her trade within Nerima. It never ended well for them. This suited the police quite nicely as they were a particularly pragmatic bunch by normal cop terms. As long as the crime stayed low, no one was too badly beaten, and they could claim credit for the arrests, they were perfectly happy to let things proceed as normal. Most of them were cynical enough to realise there wasn't a hell of a lot they could do about it anyway, something that had been brought home pretty effectively during the first few months of Ranma's disappearance.

The few police who knew the truth were still quietly keeping an eye out for either the pig-tailed boy or the red-headed girl, but had given up actively searching. Long before Nabiki had come to much the same conclusion they had decided that to vanish so thoroughly meant the martial artist either had powerful help, knew something they didn't, or had left the country completely. 'Possibly the planet,' quipped one lieutenant, which got him some odd looks followed by slow thoughtful nods. You couldn't put anything past that person.
The only reason they bothered with even the amount of vigilance they did was due to the intermittent reports that came in at widely separated intervals of sexual predators who met particularly nasty comeuppances. These happened all over the Greater Tokyo area and in a few other cities throughout Japan, giving the people who looked into this sort of thing the distinct impression that there was a sexual predator predator out there somewhere. Discussions had been had between the local Neriman police and a few high-ranked officers from other districts, after the third one of these cases. Much information was given out behind a firmly closed door, some photos and video shown, and the high-ranked officials eventually left looking more than a little disturbed. Even slightly frightened.

After considerable thought the decision was made that as long as whatever it was kept to doing what it was doing, there was little they should do about it. Or, the unwritten addendum added, could do about it. Some of the video they'd been shown was, well, worrying. Not to mention that there was no proof whatsoever that the events were connected other than a certain feeling in the bones of various experienced cops. Each method of retribution, while excruciatingly painful, appeared to be unique, and carefully judged to be non-fatal. For all they could prove it was merely a series of vaguely similar but unconnected random attacks. As these were all on people who were known to be extremely dangerous sexual deviants, accounting between them so far for over fifty-three murders spanning some forty years, no one could really bring themselves to be overly worried about the ‘victims’. Technically, crimes were being committed, but in the process they were solving much worse crimes.

There was also the fact that no collateral damage was created, no one had ever seen or heard anything other than some nasty screaming, and in any case it was a lot less bother than random demon attacks, which some wards still suffered from. These wards, when they became aware of what had happened to certain unsavoury individuals, began rather wishing that whoever or whatever was behind that would turn their attention to demons. They were certain to cause less trouble than those bloody magical girls, who still didn't seem to realise that destroying an entire street and hospitalising a dozen people for shock at each demonic encounter was heading into definite overkill territory.

Finishing with the vacuum cleaner Nabiki put it away in the cupboard, then began cleaning the table and generally tidying up. She'd become quite good at household tasks, something she'd long felt was beneath her, partly due to circumstances and partly out of belated respect for her vanished elder sister. The brunette still held out hope that Kasumi would one day walk through the door and didn't want her to come into the house she'd run so well for so long to find it a mess. Finishing with the living room and moving into the kitchen she looked around with a snort. "Some cleaning, Akane," she mumbled under her breath, picking up a pan and looking at the crud caked on it with disgust. The younger sister had obviously snuck in and tried her hand at cooking once more, despite the threats from both Nabiki and Nodoka at what would happen if she did that again.

There were only so many times you could chase chicken teriyaki around the garden with a shovel before you decided that enough was enough, after all.

Grumbling, Nabiki reached for the hammer and cold chisel they kept in the drawer for just such an occasion, viciously chipping whatever it was off the sides of the pan, wincing as it sparked. She continued musing on the whole Ranma affair.

The most unexpected thing about the Amazons in her opinion was Cologne. The old woman, lead elder of the tribe, seemed to prefer being as far away from that tribe as possible. The young woman had never quite summoned up the nerve to ask her outright but it seemed likely that the reasons Shampoo and Mousse had for staying in Japan applied to the elder as well. Certainly she seemed to find modern appliances very useful, and apparently enjoyed running a noodle restaurant. While Nabiki had no doubt that she was still as devious as ever behind the scenes the old girl seemed to have contentedly settled into a certain routine.

A few times she'd gone back to China for a couple of weeks, once or twice taking Shampoo with her, but always reappeared. The tribe itself still seemed to want Ranma found and Nabiki suspected that Cologne was using that desire to give herself a convenient excuse to stick around in Nerima.

Finishing with the pan she dropped it into a plastic bucket, then half-filled it with water. Retrieving a bottle of hydrochloric acid, normally used for cleaning particularly stubborn drains, from under the sink, she poured a generous amount into the bucket, leaning back from the cloud of purple vapour that rose from the bubbling contents accompanied by a hissing sound. "Purple? That's new. What the hell was she cooking with, ink?" The smell was appalling so she held a hand over her mouth and picked the bucket up with the other one, quickly carrying it out into the back garden. The fumes subsided after ten minutes or so, during which she finished with the rest of the dishes. Reclaiming the bucket she carefully lifted the stainless steel pan out, half-expecting to find it full of holes. Or possibly transmuted into gold.

In fact it was as shiny as if it was brand new. "Damn. If I could find out how she made that stuff we could sell it as a heavy-duty cleaner," she muttered, rinsing off the pan and inspecting it. While she was looking at it and marvelling at how clean it was there was a tired little squelching noise from behind her, making her turn just in time to see the bucket collapse into a soft mess of dissolved plastic and spill it's contents all over the floor. Luckily the mix of acid and whatever Akane had cooked up seemed to have expended it's activity, so it only left a nasty black-blue puddle rather than a hole. Nabiki sighed heavily and went to find the mop.
"Well, Genma old boy, I think we can be proud of ourselves."

"Indeed, Tendo. Five students, and no fatalities yet. Or even any serious injuries! The Saotome-Tendo School of Anything Goes Martial Arts is a success."

"You mean the Tendo-Saotome School, surely?"

"Not at all, my friend. The Saotome name is far better known in martial arts circles than the Tendo name. No offence."

"None taken, my dear friend. But I believe you may be mistaken. The Tendo Dojo has been a fixture of Nerima for far longer than the Saotome name has been associated with anything other than random thievery. No offence."

"Oh, I'm not offended, Tendo. How could I be after you so generously allowed myself and the boy to stay with you for so long. Even if you did let your daughter drive him off."

"Ah. Yes, your son, a true genius at the martial arts. Such a pity that he ran away."

The two men glared at each other while behind them three young men and two young women exchanged glances in the brightly-lit Dojo. This sort of thing was a fairly regular occurrence, but still caused mild concern, since at this point it was a fifty-fifty toss-up whether the two elder martial artists would shake hands and forget about it, or devolve into a shouting match followed by a certain amount of fighting. The students watched for a while longer, then decided that this was going to be one of the longer insult sessions and went back to sparring with each other. Eventually their teachers would get back to the actual teaching part of the process.

There had originally been eight students in the first group to join up with the re-established Saotome-Tendo, or Tendo-Saotome, depending on who you asked, school. In the beginning they had been taught out of part of a warehouse a couple of kilometres away but as the fortunes of the Dojo improved the old training hall was repaired to the point it could be used again. A couple of months ago they had moved in. Just after the move two of the students had become disillusioned with the teachers and had left, and a few weeks ago another had left for family reasons, although she said that she'd be back one day. So far no one else had joined although recently there had been interest from a few other teenagers and a couple of adults.

Soun reached the point of punching Genma in the face, which normally meant that in about five minutes one or other of them would end up in the koi pond. None of the students could understand quite why that particular place seemed to always be where the fight ended, but it invariably was. The first time they had witnessed the sudden change that overtook Sensei Saotome one of the women and two of the men had fainted, but by now they simply took it as one of those things that happened. This was Nerima after all. Once more the students stopped what they were doing to watch as the fight in progress rapidly left the building, following it outside and around the house, making bets as to which Sensei would end up wet. The two girls, who had picked Soun, smiled and collected their winnings, before going back inside followed by three irritated young men, one dripping and grumbling Master, and an irritatingly smug one with a smile on his bespectacled face.

Nabiki turned away from the window of her room, having been watching the antics of her father and Genma in the back yard. The sight brought back memories of Ranma and his father fighting in a similar manner, fights that also usually resulted in one or other participant getting dunked. She was slightly surprised to realise that at some level she somewhat missed them. Just over three years had passed since she'd last seen the pig-tailed boy. She wondered what, at twenty-one, he now looked like. Likely he had grown a little taller, probably in both forms, but she guessed not by much. He'd never had the build of someone who would reach a great stature, although he had been extremely well developed even so. Once or twice she'd caught sight of him in the bathroom, genuinely by accident unlike what she suspected of Akane, and had been quietly impressed.

With a small private smile she sat in front of her computer and resumed reading the various police reports and other information she'd managed to cajole out of various contacts in official positions in the seven months since she'd read the one concerning the rapist in the park. In total nine reports had turned up that met her qualifications, and a further four that she was by now sure were unconnected. The most recent was only two months old, while the first one dated back to just under six months after the night of the great disaster. As the police had done before her she had found no real connection between them in either method or location but a feeling in her gut made her sure at a level she couldn't ignore that they were all the result of one person, that being Ranma. In another life she would have made an exceptional detective.

Dull thuds and a faint shout from the direction of the Dojo made her glance up for a moment. By the sounds of it Akane had joined the lessons. The two fathers had begun teaching her formally some months ago, Genma unwilling to get involved with her martial arts education until Soun did. They had known for some time that she was actually quite good in some respects, but hadn't really realized just how bad she was in many others. Soun had been very disappointed when he found out quite how much she had concentrated on attack to the exclusion of defence. The training that Ranma had been surreptitiously giving her in the guise of not giving her any training at all had improved her speed considerably, but since he'd left she had picked up even more bad habits.

Her father had always believed her to be reasonably good, and compared to the average martial artist she was better than average, but brute strength and an overwhelming attack didn't win fights against the sort of people Ranma had gone up against. Even when she attacked and nearly killed Ryoga, it was only the unexpectedness of her first blow that had allowed her to keep him off balance enough to press her advantage. If he had ever truly defended himself she'd most likely have soon found herself on the defensive. In Nabiki's opinion, one she shared with both the fathers and Ranma himself, she mainly lacked discipline and the ability to not let her temper get away from her. If she could overcome those defects she had it in her to be a decent but probably never spectacular practitioner of Anything Goes, which would put her in a very high class of martial artist generally. Her sister wasn't convinced that she would succeed, although she couldn't deny that she certainly had enthusiasm.

Another yell was followed by a crash and Nabiki winced slightly, adding a couple of thousand yen to the list of new damage in her head, not looking away from the screen. She was genuinely impressed with the fact that both the older men had kept at the teaching as long as they had, with no signs yet that they intended to give up. There had been a number of teething problems at the start, partly due to Soun being rusty and Genma being calibrated to teach someone at Ranma's level, which almost no-one was or indeed could be. Eventually they had managed to work out the bugs and had in fact become pretty good teachers. Soun was becoming much more like the father that she remembered, while his friend wasn't quite as big a pain as he had been. That wasn't to suggest she liked him very much though. At least the teaching school was on the verge of becoming financially independent, and even possibly mildly profitable.

Trying to ignore the noises drifting over the house and into her open window she concentrated on the work in hand. She was once more going over the various reports she had determined detailed places and events Ranma had been involved with, trying to pin down some sort of pattern. It wasn't easy, if it hadn't been for her familiarity with the martial artist and her certainty that the reports were related she would have given up months ago. Sitting back having re-read the latest one yet again, she pulled at her lower lip absently while considering it, then opened another document. This one contained a number of items of interest to her, ones she had gleaned from various sources and that on the face of it were unrelated to either the police reports or her search.

There were reports on various apparent mystical goings on in and around Tokyo, such as demon attacks, magical girl sightings, even events that seemed more hearsay and rumour than fact. In addition was a list of various petty crimes, some solved, some not, that had attracted her attention. A few of them had the official police reports included, others came from reports in newspapers and online. All in all it was a fairly eclectic mix that to most people would have seemed pretty much random, but to her mind had something that interested her. Not truly something in common, or anything as crude as a pattern, more just a sort of vague trend. She scrolled through the list of reports, photos, and a small amount of video, looking yet again for the elusive thread that would tie things together into a whole.

The brunette wasn't even sure that whole was the one she hoped it was, but she was sure it was there. Somewhere. Eventually she sighed and slumped into her chair, turning off the monitor. It wasn't going to come to her this time.

Three days later she received another batch of information from a contact at a police station in a ward on the other side of the centre of Tokyo, along with a short note that suggested the contact would very much like to renegotiate his rate. A quick phone call during which no specific threat was made, but several were vaguely implied, left the young sergeant sweating slightly and regretting ever having become involved in any way with that damn Tendo girl. She put the wind up him more than some fairly unpleasant Yakuza thugs he'd had to deal with recently did, yet he was hard-pressed to explain exactly why. Putting the phone down Nabiki smiled icily in satisfaction then began looking through the information she had acquired.

Most of it was irrelevant but a couple of items stood out to her. Re-reading them very carefully she looked at the single photo enclosed, which showed a blurry image of a frankly unbelievable creature that most outside Tokyo would have dismissed as an obvious fake. Being a resident of Furinkan the middle Tendo sister accepted it as simple fact, then ignored it. The demonic creature apparently in the throes of expiring wasn't what she was interested in, neither were the three teen-aged girls in skimpy and impractical clothing cavorting around the creature with odd weapons. What was interesting was something barely visible on the extreme edge of the photo, a perfectly straight line of actinic purple-white light that looked like a special effect, originating from a source off-camera and intersecting the head of the demon. She was suddenly positive she'd seen something very much like that once before, under circumstances she'd never forget.

"Fuck me," she breathed faintly, staring at the photo, magnifying it on the screen to see if she could make out any more detail. "Could it really be...?" Looking through the attached text she saw that the photo had been taken in a ward she had never visited, one she had heard of as something of a hot-bed of odd demon attack events. The place apparently suffered from demons and magical girls in almost equal quantities, people being hard-pressed to say which group caused more damage. She'd heard at least one wag comment that on balance the inhabitants would prefer that the magical girls leave them to the demons rather than the reverse. The civic cost of their battles was apparently on a scale that would have made the NWC at its peak feel that it wasn't trying hard enough.

Digging further into the report, then calling her police contact back and pushing him slightly further down the path to developing an ulcer, she found out that the photo originated from a part of the ward in question that encompassed a small but world renowned private medical and research university. Apparently it was also well off the normal patch of this particular group of magical girl demon hunters, which had sparked the curiosity of several groups that followed such things. This led her to some news groups and forums where she found even more information, some from this recent event a week ago, some dating back several years.

It took her another week to exhaust all the sources she could find on this new avenue of enquiry but in the end she had drawn some fascinating conclusions. The entire ward suffered from various semi-random demon incursions, for reasons she was unable to determine, which were normally dealt with moderately efficiently but in a remarkably overblown manner by one or other group of magical girls, as was the custom in those parts. The exception was a small area in the vicinity of the university which seemed to have almost no demon attacks, or for that matter demon hunter attacks. The ones that did occur seemed mainly to be accidental, quite likely the result of one party chasing the other into or through this area.

One thing that stood out was that interactions between demons and the hunters thereof often ended very abruptly when they crossed an ill-defined boundary around the general university area, sometimes with the extremely efficient and ruthless elimination of the demon in question, sometimes with the apparent just as sudden retreat of same, and at least once with the demon hunter involved having the shit kicked out of it while the demon watched from the sidelines and by all accounts laughed it's arse off. The other, unique, aspect about this was that no damage to anything other than the participants in these fights seemed to happen most of the time, or if it did it was quickly repaired. No one outside the limited audience of a couple of small internet forums seemed to realise anything odd was going on and even they hadn't put it all together for some reason.

Very interestingly, this state of affairs had begun fairly suddenly approximately two and a half years ago. Before that the place was just as likely to get hit as anywhere else in the general area. It was clear that something had changed back then, and the brunette had an idea what that could be. The question was what to do about it.

Assuming she was correct and this had something to do with the long-missing martial artist, the implication was that he was living in or somehow connected with that specific area, defending it against something he felt wasn't welcome. If that was the case how would he react to any of the people from his former life turning up on his doorstep? If she gave or sold her suspicions to pretty much any of the various parties who still wanted to find him, there was no doubt that all of them would find out sooner or later and go looking for him. That sounded to her like a recipe for disaster on a remarkable scale.

One issue she was having trouble with was that most of the old crew were more or less beginning to get their lives in order. Throwing Ranma back into the mix would scupper that, and presumably do much the same thing to him. How he would react to such a thing was an unknown but it was unlikely to be positively. Ukyo, certainly, seemed quite happy with Konatsu and Nabiki considered them both friends. She didn't want to cause them any problems. Sitting back and considering this thought some more brought the realisation, along with a slight shock of worry, that they were among the very few people she really did think of as friends rather than acquaintances or pawns.

The other thing that slowly dawned on her was that she no longer really had much interest in causing Ranma any more problems either. If he had managed to build a new life for himself, was it something she could bring herself to disrupt? 'Perhaps I have a conscience after all, despite what everyone says,' she thought with a wry grin. Shaking her head at the thought she reached out and turned off the monitor, stood, stretched, then went to the window to look out over the yard. What to do?

Noticing Akane walking back towards the house she sighed slightly. Her younger sister was still bound and determined to find the young man, even though she didn't talk about it nearly as much nowadays. There was little doubt that if she got even a hint of a possible location for him she'd be off like a shot intending to drag him back by his pigtail. Not that she had much chance of that. If what Nabiki suspected was true, the results of the blue-haired young woman actually meeting the martial artist again would probably be epic and perhaps lethal. The evidence suggested that any bias he had against striking a woman, at least one who was attacking him, had long since vanished. Nabiki was under no illusions about how her sister would stand up to an enraged Ranma if he decided to go all out. The battle would be short, violent, and probably visible from space.

In some ways she felt it might be best to simply forget about what she'd worked out. Two things stood in the way of that, though; Her curiosity, which would keep her awake at night until she found out whether she was correct, and concern for her other sister. She still missed her terribly, so if there was the slightest chance that finding Ranma would lead her to Kasumi she had no choice. "Damn," she mumbled, turning away from the window. "I guess I'm going to Minato tomorrow."

Hearing Nodoka calling everyone to come for lunch Nabiki left the room, closing the door on the way out, completely unaware that she had been, as on many occasions in the past, observed and overheard in the room she believed private. The observer left soon after she did.

The gently bleeping phone was answered after half a dozen rings.

"Hi."

"You're sure?"

"I understand. It was inevitable, sooner or later. It's taken longer than I expected, actually."

"Yes, we're pretty much ready. It all depends on whether she tells anyone else first."

"Thanks, my friend. You've been a lot of help over the years."

"Yes, the usual place and amount. I'll let you know how it goes."

"Goodbye, Sasuke."

The person who had answered pressed the disconnect button, dropped the phone back on the table, then turned to his companion who was listening with silent interest. Meeting concerned brown eyes, he smiled. "We're going to have a visitor soon."

"Oh, my."
Chapter 4

As it happened it was four days later that Nabiki set out on her visit to the area she suspected contained an errant martial artist/fiancé to her sister. A number of things cropped up that she had no choice but to deal with, various bills needed to be paid, and above all she had to make sure she could travel without being followed or in any way suspected of anything. Assuring herself of this last point was nearly a day's work in itself. Finally, though, she left the Tendo residence early one morning heading for the nearest train station with her cellphone turned off just in case. Taking a train in a different direction she carefully checked for a tail, switching trains three times before she was sure she wasn't being followed. After travelling nearly twice the actual distance between home and her destination she finally arrived at the station one stop away from her target, as another precaution, taking a taxi the final two kilometres.

After some thought she had decided to start at the university itself, then work her way outwards. She had photos of both forms of Ranma and of Kasumi, with the hope that someone might recognise either of them. It seemed a faint chance, none of her contacts in the area had ever come up with anything, but it was worth a try. Heading for the university admissions office she found herself talking to a pleasant middle-aged woman who, after some buttering up and a decent bribe, was willing to look at the photos. This drew a blank. She was sure she'd never seen any of the three people shown, and as she told Nabiki, she had worked in that position for twenty years and had a very good memory for faces. Thanking her with an inner feeling of mild disappointment, the Tendo woman left the office and walked outside to sit in the sun while trying to decide on another approach.

To be honest she hadn't expected that avenue to bear fruit, but it had been an obvious first attempt. Deciding to ask around in the various cafés around the campus, she picked a direction more or less at random and started off.

Three hours later she was getting irritated. She'd spoken to dozens of people, spending quite a lot of cash on 'incentives,' with nothing to show for it but sore feet. Sitting at a table outside the last café she made some notes, looking up to order a coffee when the waitress stopped by. Sipping it appreciatively when it came the brunette considered her options. She could give up, chalk the whole thing up to coincidence, go home, and forget about it. The idea made her snort derisively. She could expand her search, going further out into the community and hoping that she found something. A twinge of pain from her abused feet made her reluctant to do that unless necessary. Or she could sit here for a while, trying to come up with another plan. That seemed like the easiest solution, at least for the next half hour or so. Smiling slightly to herself she ordered another coffee and a sandwich, kicking off her shoes and massaging one foot.

Half an hour or so later a pretty brunette girl of average height, casually dressed in the normal student attire of a T-shirt with the name of a popular band on it and tight jeans, her long braided hair tied off with a bright red silk bow, came up to her, looking uncertain. Pushing her stylish sunglasses up her nose with one finger she glanced around nervously, then leaned closer. Intrigued, Nabiki watched with curiosity, waiting for the girl to speak. "Um, excuse me, but someone mentioned you were looking for some people?" The middle Tendo sister nodded with a faint smile. This was the sort of thing she was used to.

"Yes. Why, do you have some information for me?" The girl glanced around again, then pulled out one of the other chairs and sat. Leaning forward she lowered her voice a little.

"I might have. You have photos, I'm told?"
"Yes." Pulling out the now somewhat dog-eared pictures Nabiki dropped them on the table in front of the girl, who spread them apart with one hand while nibbling a nail on the other. She inspected them carefully, picking each one up in turn and looking at it over her sunglasses which had slipped down her nose again. Nabiki noticed that she kept coming back to the one of Ranma's female form and smiled internally.

"OK. I might have seen some of these people, I think," the girl said, putting the photos on the table in a neat line, reaching out with one finger to align one of them better. Not looking at Nabiki she casually, or at least what she presumably thought was casually, said "Ah, I believe you were offering, um, payment... for information?" Her cheek was twitching a little as she quickly glanced at the face of the other woman then away again, while once more her table-mate was smiling inside.

"If you have some real information I think I could probably come up with, hmm, shall we say five thousand yen?" The girl seemed slightly taken aback.

"Um. I could get in a lot of trouble if anyone finds out I told you anything. Twenty thousand." Nabiki grinned coldly.

"Trust me, dear, you could get in a lot more trouble if you're wasting my time. Six thousand."

Looking around again, her eyes darting back and forth, the girl sweated a little. Pushing her sunglasses up her face she replied, "Eighteen thousand, and I'll tell you where I saw them." Leaning back in her chair, Nabiki considered the increasingly nervous-looking young woman for long enough to make her squirm.

"Take me to where you saw them, tell me what you know, and I'll agree to sixteen thousand." The other brunette went still for a moment then reluctantly nodded.

"OK." She pushed the photos further apart, then indicated the one of the female Ranma. "This one, I think. She looks younger in this photo, but I'm pretty sure it's her. I think she's some sort of martial artist, I've seen her doing some sort of practice. She and a friend moved in to my apartment building about eighteen months ago. They always seem to be really careful about being seen outside." Trying not to grin, Nabiki leaned forward.

"What about this one. Have you seen her?" She pushed the photo of Kasumi forward. The girl picked it up and studied it again, looking doubtful.

"It might be her friend. It kind of looks like her but she's got different hair. I haven't seen her as much." Inspecting the photo some more, she finally put it back down. "Sorry, I can't be sure." Slightly disappointed but not showing it, Nabiki nodded.

"All right. Where is this apartment building of yours?"

"It's about a kilometre and a half away."

"Fine. Show me where, and I'll pay you when I'm sure you're being honest with me." The girl appeared offended.

"I'm telling the truth!" Nabiki smiled coldly.

"They always say that." The brunette looked at her oddly, then glanced around again.

"Fine. Come on. It's about ten minutes walk." They stood, the Tendo woman dropped a couple of notes on the table before following her new acquaintance out of the café and down the street. The girl struck her as a fairly new student, perhaps first or second year. Curious, she asked, "I assume you're a student here? What are you studying?"

"Sports medicine," the girl replied, constantly looking around as if she was sure they were being followed. Her obvious paranoia was becoming irritating and Nabiki had to suppress the urge to tell her to calm down. "Physiotherapy, biomechanics of athletes, that sort of thing. It's fascinating." Nabiki nodded in the right places as the girl chattered nervously, learning far more than she wanted about oxygen depletion in muscles. Eventually her continued silence seemed to make the girl sufficiently nervous to shut up and they walked the rest of the way in silence, with the brunette looking over her shoulder now and then. Reaching a block of what looked like high-end apartments that backed onto a large park, the girl stopped.

"This is it. That girl and her friend are in the apartment on the top floor." Nabiki inspected the building, which had a high-security door access control panel next to the main entrance. It looked like a nice place to live and as a result quite expensive. If it was indeed Ranma that the girl had seen, how did he afford this? Looking up at the front of the building she saw that it probably didn't have many flats in it, perhaps one or two per floor, each of them with a balcony at the front. The top one also seemed to have some sort of roof garden from what she could see from the ground.

"Expensive place." The girl nodded.

"Very. My grandfather pays for my apartment, but I don't get much money otherwise. So..." She held out her hand looking embarrassed. Nabiki smiled.

"Get me inside and I'll pay you." With a slight sigh the brunette nodded, reaching into her pocket and pulling out a swipe card. She walked to the door and ran it through the reader which beeped and illuminated a small green light, then she pulled the door open. Nabiki walked through with satisfaction. The girl followed her inside, leading the way to an elevator. Pressing the button and looking around nervously, she jumped a little when the elevator dinged and the doors slid open. Waving Nabiki inside she once more followed, pressing the top button once inside.

"Only building residents can access the top floor. There's a swimming pool up there as well." She swiped her card through the reader next to the control panel, the doors slid shut, and the elevator ascended. When it stopped and the door opened she stuck her head out, looking quickly around. Waving Nabiki out she held the elevator door open with her foot and held out her hand again. "Down at the end on the left. Apartment 601." The Tendo woman glanced in the indicated direction then nodded.

"Good. Thank you." She pulled out a roll of notes and peeled off the negotiated amount, handing it to the girl and putting the rest back in her pocket, "Here you go." The girl took it and smiled a little uncertainly. As she stepped back into the elevator the doors slid silently shut. Satisfied, Nabiki turned and headed in the direction the girl had indicated, finding that at the end of the corridor was only one door, with a discrete 601 in gold numbers on it above the lens of a security viewer. Below that was something that made her heart miss a beat. A small sign in the form of a wooden duck, painted yellow, hung from a screw in the door. This one was unmarked but she felt it couldn't possibly be a coincidence.

Raising a hand which she noted with inner surprise was trembling a little, she knocked on the door next to the wooden duck. There was no immediate answer, so she knocked again, slightly more firmly. With a faint click the door opened a little, apparently not having been shut properly. After a moment's thought she gently pushed on it, watching as it swung open to reveal a hallway with a number of doors opening off it, some coats hung up on the wall inside above a rack for shoes.
Tentatively stepping inside she looked around curiously. There were a couple of house-plants on a table a few metres down the hallway, three or four paintings and a pair of prints hung on the walls, a nice carpet on the floor. The walls were painted a muted yellow with white trim on the woodwork. Walking slowly down the hallway she glanced into each open door as she came to it, seeing sparse but nice furnishings, a well-equipped kitchen, three rooms that seemed to be bedrooms, only one of which appeared to be in current use, and a large living room that obviously opened out onto the balcony at the front of the building.

So far she hadn't seen any sign of life, but for some reason couldn't bring herself to call out. This is going to be very awkward if it turns out that Ranma doesn't live here, she thought wildly to herself, trying not to laugh hysterically. The quiet was starting to get to her. Hearing a faint noise from somewhere behind her she whirled around, looking about for the cause. Nothing was visible but she noticed something she'd missed up to now, that the hallway turned away from the front of the building just beside the living room, heading towards the back. The apartment seemed to occupy the entire top floor, nearly as large as the entire Tendo house. Cautiously heading down the corridor towards the back of the building she came to a closed set of sliding doors. There were faint noises coming from beyond that point which sounded like footsteps.

Taking a deep breath she slowly slid one side of the double doors to the side. It silently opened to reveal that the entire back half of the apartment was one enormous room, floored in polished wood, with several large windows overlooking the park beyond. There were a pair of skylights in the ceiling which was a good three metres up. All this she took in at glance, before her attention was drawn to the figure in the middle of the room.

The person, tall, female, brown hair in a ponytail down her back to her waist, dressed in loose black silk clothing, was concentrating completely on an intricate martial arts kata, one Nabiki instantly recognised as belonging to the Anything Goes school. She was performing it smoothly and flawlessly at considerable speed, smiling gently to herself. Stepping further into the room Nabiki watched with her heart beating at twice the normal speed. She had seen Ranma perform this kata dozens of times, but this woman wasn't Ranma.

It was, of course, Kasumi. She turned towards her sister and smiled more widely at her, apparently unsurprised at seeing her standing there with a dumbstruck expression on her face, unable to speak. Nabiki got the sudden impression that Kasumi had been aware of her presence the entire time she'd been in the apartment. Taking a couple of steps towards her long-missing sister she raised one hand, then slowly let it fall to her side, watching as the woman continued the long and complex series of motions, a graceful dance with deadly potential. Just as she was finishing Nabiki heard the noise from behind her of the door to the room closing with a click, spinning around to see the young woman who had led her here. The brunette dropped her hand from the door and walked past Nabiki to meet Kasumi who was coming in the other direction. They met, then hugged, while the middle sister watched agape, unable to work out what was going on. Both turned to smile at the stunned Tendo woman, who saw they were holding hands.

"Hello, Nabiki. We were expecting you three days ago," said the young woman with a cocky grin, one she recognised with shock even if the face it was on was one she'd never seen before today. While she was staring in disbelief the girl shimmered as if seen through a heat haze, shrinking slightly, hair brightening and changing colour. A second or two later the once-familiar sight, last seen three and a half years ago, of Ranma in her female form grinned at Nabiki.

Who promptly fainted.
Chapter 5

Nabiki opened her eyes and stretched, staring at the ceiling with mild interest. The bed felt amazingly comfortable today, making her reluctant to get up. Her eyes drifted shut and she relaxed. Five seconds later her eyes snapped open again, she tensed, then slowly lifted her head and looked around. This wasn't her room. Memory flooded back, but what she remembered was so absurd it couldn't possibly be true. Could it?

Turning her head towards the window in the side of the room near the head of the bed she was lying in she could see buildings in the distance she recognised as the university. With a sigh she dropped her head back onto the pillow. "It really happened," she muttered, before pushing the covers back and sitting up. Looking at her watch she saw it was now mid afternoon, she must have been asleep for a couple of hours. Stretching again she yawned, then got to her feet and explored the room, which was nicely furnished and painted a delicate egg-shell blue. Briefly examining a painting hanging on the wall, a watercolour by an artist she vaguely remembered hearing about, she ended up standing by the window looking out onto the street.

The view out over the local area was very good, showing off the university campus well, a kilometre away to the east. Down at street level a few people were walking about, with the occasional car going past. Overall it seemed like a nice quiet area, one that was pretty affluent. It made the question of how Ranma and Kasumi could afford to live here even more puzzling. This apartment, for example, must cost a fortune to rent. It was huge and well-appointed, not to mention the location.

Ranma. Kasumi. She'd finally found them, but was left with more questions than ever. Not the least of which was, how the hell had Ranma pulled off that stunt? He, She, had looked and even acted completely differently, fooling her totally. Even allowing for some sort of shape changing magic, which she was kind of used to after all, the mannerisms, voice, everything, had been completely convincing. The thought that it was Ranma, not the young female university student she presented herself as, would never have occurred to her. If nothing else, the last three years or so seemed to have made an amazing actor out of the gender changing martial artist.

Taking a deep breath, the brunette Tendo turned and walked towards the door, opening it with a determined air. She was going to find out what was going on. When she left the room she found it was one of the ones that opened off the main hallway, next to the one that seemed to be in use. Heading towards the living room she looked around, once more finding it deserted. This time, though, she could clearly hear sounds coming from the large room at the rear of the apartment and went in that direction, questions burning in her mind.

The double doors were open so she went through, to find Kasumi and Ranma, who was still female but now wearing the same black silks as the older girl, sparring in the middle of the room. She watched, fascinated and somewhat shocked, as her gentle older sister attacked the smaller red-head with the level of ferocity that she'd have expected from Akane, but also with a skill that was clearly orders of magnitude past what their younger sister could bring to bear. If it wasn't for the fact that both women were grinning happily the middle sister would have thought that they were in a fight for their lives.

As it was the bout was clearly just for practice. Ranma deflected the strikes that rained down on her, her opponent moving with blurring speed, dodging and leaping about to the sound of arms and legs striking each other. Both participants were clearly enjoying themselves, even as they exchanged blows that could shatter concrete. Nabiki's eyes bugged out as her sister suddenly performed a standing front flip right over the head of the younger red-head, to land behind her with her arm around her neck and the other hand pressed lightly against her spine.

"Brilliantly executed, Kas," Ranma said with a broad smile, before somehow spinning around and redirecting the pressure so that Kasumi was now the one in a precarious situation. The move was so fast Nabiki couldn't determine what she'd done or how. "You're getting very good at that move." The red-haired woman released her opponent, both of them stepping apart and bowing formally to conclude the match. They turned to look at the middle sister, who was gaping with her mouth hanging open, before exchanging amused glances. Ranma walked towards the door. "I'm going to change. Meet you in the living room." As she walked past Nabiki she gently reached out and closed the other woman's mouth with a faint click. "Still take your coffee with milk, Nabiki?"

The brunette nodded weakly as the martial artist left the room. She followed the black-clad red-head with her eyes for a moment before turning them back towards her older sister who was approaching her with a familiar smile, one that seemed somehow happier she remembered. Kasumi stopped in front of her, looking her up and down, before opening her arms. "I've missed you, sister," she said softly. The other woman stared for a long moment before launching herself at her older sister with a wordless cry, grabbing her and hugging her hard, tears running down her face. Kasumi held her tightly, resting her head on the shorter woman's shoulder, her own eyes glistening.

A few minutes later the elder sister had led her still-crying sibling back into the living room and was sitting beside her on the L-shaped sofa that fitted into the corner of the room, still holding her. Ranma, male now and dressed in black jeans with a red silk shirt, came into the room with a tray full of drinks. Putting it on the low table near the sofa he poured three cups of coffee, putting one in front of each of the women, before taking a seat on the other arm of the sofa and leaning back, sipping his own coffee and watching them silently.

Eventually Nabiki sniffled, wiped her eyes, and pushed herself upright on the sofa. Reaching for her cup she brought it to her mouth and gulped a few mouthfuls of the hot drink, finding it strong and just the way she liked it. Holding the cup in both hands, allowing the heat to warm fingers that seemed to have gone cold despite the pleasant ambient temperature of the room, she composed herself, glancing between the other two. They looked at each other for a moment, understanding seeming to pass, then Ranma nodded. Studying Nabiki he smiled a little, putting his cup down on the table and leaning forward.

"So, how have you been?" She stared at him for a long while before a slight smile twitched one corner of her mouth. He responded with a grin, and before she knew it she was howling with laughter. The other two joined in, the living room ringing with their amusement for some little while. Eventually it wound down and she wiped her eyes, still giggling.

"You bastard. Thanks, I needed that." Graciously he tilted his head towards her with a smile.

"You're welcome."

Looking at him curiously, she assessed the martial artist carefully. Since she'd last seen him he'd grown slightly and filled out a bit, all of it obviously hard muscle. His face was a bit more mature, harder adult planes and features replacing or supplanting the traces of adolescence left at eighteen, now he was nearly twenty-two. She'd noticed that his female form, while still petite, was noticeably taller and if anything even more developed than before. In both cases the changes were all for the positive. The man sitting across from her was someone she could easily see almost any woman being attracted to, even more than as the boy she remembered. Likewise, the red-headed young woman was truly beautiful, even more than the girl had been.

Switching her gaze to her sister she inspected her as well. Kasumi looked much like she remembered but carried herself with an air of assurance that she hadn't had before, a quiet competence overlaid on the serene gentle woman of old. It gave the impression of a mother figure who could also pull the arms off an attacker and beat him to death with them, all the while looking apologetic for the inconvenience.

The mental image made her giggle, Kasumi smiling at her even without knowing why she was amused. Reaching out she hugged her older sister again. "God, I've missed you, sis," she whispered. Releasing the older woman she once more glanced between her and Ranma. "Will you tell me what's going on? How did you get so good at martial arts. Why did you? Where have you been? What are you doing? And you!" She pointed at Ranma, who looked mildly amused. "How the hell did you do that, that... whatever the hell it was! You fooled me completely." He grinned, accepting the comment as praise.

"Thanks. That was a lot of fun." She glared at him, then giggled, not sure whether to laugh or scream.

"It wasn't meant as a compliment!"

"I know." He was still grinning, and in the end all she could do was laugh. Kasumi smiled at both of them, drinking her coffee and watching.

"Ranma, you're still an idiot. I've missed you too." He appeared both slightly surprised and rather pleased.

"Of all of them, you're the only one I did miss, Nabiki. You were a pain in my rear, but at least I could talk to you as a person. The only other one like that came with me." He smiled at her, then glanced at Kasumi, who was looking at him with what Nabiki could easily see was much more than simply fondness. They obviously meant a lot to each other. For some reason this made her considerably happier.

Kasumi asked, "Would you like to stay overnight? It's going to take quite a long time if you want to hear the whole story. We've got plenty of room."

Glancing around Nabiki could only agree with this. The apartment was huge. "I guess I could. I'll have to call home and tell them something though, they're expecting me back tonight." Ranma tossed her a cell-phone unexpectedly, making her blink as Kasumi's slender hand came out of nowhere faster than she could follow to snag it before it could hit her in the face. Her sister handed it to her with a slight smile.

"Use this one, it's a special one that can't be traced to us. Just in case." She looked at him curiously, this seemed paranoid even to her, also very high tech for the Ranma she remembered. Still, she accepted it and dialled the number of the Tendo residence. Nodoka answered, and after exchanging pleasantries Nabiki told her that she'd bumped in to a friend from university who had invited her out for the night, so as a result she was going to stay over rather than come back very late. The older woman thought this was a good idea, told her to have a nice time, then bid her goodbye. Disconnecting the phone she handed it back to the martial artist who put it back wherever he'd gotten it from. When he looked back to her she was grinning at him, having just noticed that his hair was still in the braid that he'd worn as the brunette student, complete with the red bow.

"The hairstyle suits you better as a woman, Saotome," she said with amusement in her voice. He laughed.

"I know. It took ages to braid it like this though, and I'm going out as a female later, so I left it." Reaching back he pulled his braid over his shoulder in the manner that Kasumi had always affected, looking pleased with the effect. Both women laughed.

"He's quite vain about his appearance, even more so when he's a she," Kasumi loudly whispered to her sister, her eyes twinkling. Ranma looked outraged.

"That's only because I look good." He waved the end of the silly-looking braid at the sisters, who exchanged glances then giggled. Carefully adjusting the bow he flipped the braid behind him, looking satisfied, then grinned. Nabiki watched with amusement.

"You seem a lot better adjusted to your female aspect now," she commented. He nodded happily.

"A very good person helped me a lot with that. I came to realise it's only another side of me, one that's as much me as any part could be. There's no point fighting it, better to accept it and move on." It was clear who he was talking about, Nabiki could see how proud Kasumi looked at his words.

"So you've stopped looking for a cure?" Suddenly serious, he met her gaze with his own.

"There is no cure. I'm sure of that."

"But, the springs..."

"Mix. They don't replace. Taro is proof of that, but no one seems to have worked it out." Nabiki's eyes widened at the concept.

"Ah. Yes, I see, it is pretty obvious. I wonder why we didn't see it before?" He smirked a little.

"Everyone was so hung up on the mistaken idea that if one spring changes you, logically another one should change the change. It does, but not in a generally useful way."

After a moment's thought Nabiki asked, "Surely Cologne should know that? Why would she try to bribe you with the Spring of Drowned Man water? For that matter, why did the Jusenkyo Guide send you some for a wedding present?" Ranma's face hardened.

"Oh, I'm absolutely certain Cologne knows full well that there is no cure, and that the results of mixing the springs would be... unwelcome. I'm not sure why she never brought it up, I'll admit, but my suspicion is that she was working on the basis that by holding that over me she could control me. She may think that If she'd come right out and told me there was no cure I'd have been even less cooperative with her plans." He didn't look happy, his expression showing there was a good deal of anger left in him over the way he'd been used by the Amazons. "As far as the Guide goes, I'm kind of puzzled. Certainly he should know about the effects of mixing the springs, but he acted for a long time like it was a cure. Perhaps he was acting under the influence of the Amazons? No idea. One day I'll have to ask." Nabiki nodded slowly, pondering the implications and the possible causes of the Guides behaviour.

"I don't think either Mousse or Shampoo know about it either," Ranma added. "Mousse particularly. I know he'd love to be rid of his curse, the fight over that damn water proved that. Shampoo, maybe, she tends to follow Cologne's orders, but even there I kind of doubt it." He shrugged. "It's all a bit strange. I've put it down mainly to the Amazons being both secretive and authoritarian."

"Did you look for a different cure?" He nodded.

"For a while. I know some pretty good magic users, and after we... left... I spent a couple of months talking to a few. Everyone who looked into it agreed that the Jusenkyo magic is horribly powerful, very old, and completely unbeatable. At least without paying a price that sane people would be unwilling to pay." He looked a little haunted for a moment, then shook his head. "No, once you've got this curse you're stuck with it for good. That's kind of the point. Luckily, I had help realising that at least in my case it isn't really a curse."

Kasumi interjected, "It took some time to convince him completely, but even before the wedding fiasco he was slowly working this all out and coming to terms with it. If it hadn't been for his, um, unhelpful upbringing with Genma, he'd probably have been able to deal with it much earlier." She momentarily seemed as irritated as Nabiki had ever seen her, a mild frown crossing her face. "That man has a lot to answer for..." Ranma smiled at her.

"Don't get all worked up, Kas. Sooner or later he'll pay for his actions, one way or another."
Returning his attention to the other sister he watched her face for a moment, then added with a sly look, "All that said, it turns out that with the right methods and a lot of practice, the curse can be... useful." She looked at him with a raised eyebrow wondering what he was talking about, then nearly choked on her coffee when he suddenly turned female without the aid of cold water.

"Ack! What the fuck?" she managed, coughing violently. Kasumi deftly relieved her of her mug and slapped her on the back at the same time while shooting an evil look at her companion.

"That wasn't very nice, Ranma," she scolded. The red-headed woman looked abashed although the corners of her mouth were twitching a little.

"Sorry." They both waited for Nabiki to regain her composure. Eventually she managed to clear her throat of misplaced coffee, then glared at the red-head, who grinned back. Even with the apparent shape change earlier in the practice room, the sudden shift of gender had taken her by surprise.

"How did you do that, Saotome?" she demanded. The other woman looked satisfied with the reaction she had caused, bright blue eyes glinting with humour in the late afternoon sunlight.

"Lots and lots of practice, mainly." Nabiki didn't seem satisfied so she expanded on her subject. "It's kind of a hybrid of ki control, magic, and meditation. I finally figured out how to make the curse think it's been triggered, by fooling the bit that looks for hot or cold water. It's not perfect, water still makes me change unless I'm ready for it and concentrating, but it's a huge improvement. One day I may be able to suppress the water part completely but that will probably take years of practice. The best part is that I'm almost certain I can stop any changes to the curse, such as it being locked, now. Not that I've had reason to try, but the method I've worked out seems plausible." She seemed very pleased with herself. The middle sister was impressed and a little awed.

"How did you learn magic of all things?" She found she wasn't nearly as surprised as most people would have been, remembering her thoughts over the years that the martial artist seemed to be able to learn anything he or she had an interest in. The woman shrugged.

"Just kind of picked it up. Like I said, I know quite a lot of magic users. I watched what was happening whenever I was near one, and I've been around a hell of a lot of magic over the years for some damn reason. Eventually I started to make sense of what was going on, and how to do it myself. It annoys real mages as they tell me I can't possibly make it work the way I do, but whatever they say it works." The brunette stared at her for a while, then smiled.

"Not an idiot. I was right."

"Thanks." They shared an amused look for a moment.
"So, earlier, that incredible bit of acting? Was that magic as well?" Ranma looked pleased with herself again.

"Partly. The change is magic, it's a sort of an illusion more than a genuine shape change. This is a real shift, I am completely physically female at the moment. When I use that spell, though, it doesn't make a change as complete. But it's very flexible." She shimmered again, and a couple of seconds later the girl from earlier was sitting in her place. Another shimmer, and it was a much older woman there, then a young boy. "You see? Under all this I'm still me, but the outside looks and sounds completely convincing. It fools cameras, people, and even most magic users. Some really good ones can see through it, or at least tell that it's not real, but even they can't work out what the real person is behind it." The small boy shimmered and turned into something that made Nabiki's eyes widen and forced a strangled squeak from her throat.

The thing sitting there grinning at her from a mouth with far too many teeth was humanoid, female, and damn scary, seeing as it appeared to be some sort of demonic creature. Dark blue scales covered it under quite a lot of thin black leather, yellow slit-pupilled eyes looked back at her with cold amusement, while a forked tongue slipped between the fangs. It crossed one hoofed leg over the other knee and waved at her with a taloned hand, before shimmering again and changing back into the familiar and definitely welcome form of Ranma again.

"Holy shit," Nabiki managed after a long pause, in a small voice. Kasumi was half-smiling, half-frowning.

"Again, that wasn't very nice." The red-head grinned.

"No, but it was funny." The older woman sighed.

Licking dry lips, the middle sister asked after a pause, "So, that's how you've managed to stay hidden all this time?" Ranma shook her head.

"No, not at first, although it's been very useful. I only completely mastered this about a year and a half ago. I sort of cobbled it together from several spells I learned that were a lot more limited, then worked on it until it did what I wanted. There's still room for improvement, I think, but it works pretty well as it is. Before that, we used a different approach." She gestured around at the apartment. "This place is shielded against magical surveillance, as are both of us. In the beginning that was Happosai's work. He has all sorts of interesting artefacts and techniques that he helped us with. We also picked up a lot more useful methods to stop people tracking us over the years." She produced the secure cell-phone again.

"This, for example. I got it from a contact in a part of the government I can't mention, along with a few other useful tech toys. They owed me a few favours for helping them with a... sort of a problem... a while ago." She put the thing away again. "There are a lot of other things as well. Some are just techniques, some are equipment. All together it makes disappearing possible. For a while, at least." Inspecting Nabiki, she smiled a bit. "I knew that eventually you'd find us if we stayed in Japan, but there were reasons for doing so. Although you took longer than I expected." She looked smug.

Nabiki had been listening with a slight feeling of unreality. How on earth had Ranma learned all these skills, met all these people? She was becoming aware that there was a major part of the gender-shifting martial artist's life that had completely bypassed her. Something the woman had mentioned made her think. "Happosai. You said he helped you. I always thought that was what happened when he disappeared. That night, the way he looked at both of you, it was clear that something had changed. He didn't talk about it, but it must have been about two weeks later that he left and just never came back." Ranma smiled slightly. "So where is he? No-one seems to have seen him for at least two, two and a half years."

The red-head changed back into the man, making Nabiki stare once more. The casual way he did it was weird, the way Kasumi didn't react was weirder. "Oh, he's around, some of the time. Yes, you're right, he followed us almost immediately. Once we'd established our first cover I let him know where we were, and he helped us make a much better one. When that was working, we spent nearly two years staying out of sight and training. That's when I started teaching Kas the art."

Kasumi turned to look at her sister. "He's a very good teacher. At first, me learning was just for self defence, in case our precautions didn't work. There was always the possibility that one of the fiancées or rivals would track us down and Ranma felt that if I was with him I was in danger. So he wanted to teach me to be able to hold them off long enough for him to help." She smiled at the other woman. "Neither one of us expected that I would enjoy it so much." Ranma nodded.

"Or that she'd be so good at it. It's practically criminal, the raw talent for the art that nearly got wasted. She's got it in her to be almost as good as I am, and the 'almost' is only because I've been learning since I could walk. Even so, in a bit more than three years she's learned as much as most people would in twenty." He looked very proud. "If someone does attack her now they'll regret it. Not for very long, mind you." Kasumi seemed worried.

"Oh, my, I could never kill someone, even if they were attacking me." She paused, then added with an unnerving smile, "I could probably force myself to maim them a bit though." With wide eyes Nabiki edged slightly away from her sister, making Ranma smirk.

"She's a lot better than Akane will probably ever be," he said with distinct pleasure. Kasumi appeared embarrassed, but Nabiki nodded thoughtfully. While not an expert she was the daughter of a very good martial artist, and could assess the abilities of someone like that pretty well. What she'd seen in the practice room lent a lot of credence to Ranma's assertion. Her younger sister, while extremely strong, lacked a certain something that would inhibit her progressing much past the point she was now unless she fixed it. Which didn't seem likely, as it was almost certainly tied in with her temper and overall emotional immaturity.

Inspecting her older sister with new eyes, Nabiki slowly asked, "So, have you learned any ki techniques as well?" Those abilities were what turned someone like Ranma from implausibly powerful into appallingly powerful. Kasumi looked down, frowning a little.

"Well, yes, but not as much as I should have." Ranma laughed.

"Kas, don't be so hard on yourself. You know, or you should do, I've told you often enough, that you're already very good. You just need more practice." He glanced at her sister. "She's a perfectionist. I can do things that she can't yet, but she wants to. It will come with time." He seemed very pleased. "Go on, show her," he said to the older sister. With a slightly embarrassed smile Kasumi held out her hand, making Nabiki squeak with surprise when a softly glowing ball of light suddenly appeared in it. The light grew in size and intensity, stopping at the dimensions of a softball. The white-gold light looked like the woman was holding a hundred watt light bulb in her hand, but the slight tingle of static that came from it made it clear that something a lot more dangerous than a globe of thin glass was present.

Nabiki stared in amazement, watching as Kasumi quickly flipped the ball of ki from one hand to the other, then made it vanish again. "Bloody hell," she breathed, very impressed indeed. The only people she'd ever seen do anything like that were Ryoga and Ranma. Presumably Happosai could as well, but he used ki in other ways most of the time. Looking at her sister with near-awe, she smiled. "You have been busy," she commented. Kasumi smiled back, pleased.
"It was a lot of work, but I'm getting there."

"She's a lot better than she thinks," Ranma said. "I'd put her overall level with ki at about where I was before I went up against Herb the second time. General use of the Art, probably around my level when I arrived in Nerima, but with a number of techniques I didn't know then. At the moment she could probably beat me at that point, and give Ryoga a seriously bad day right now. Anyone else other than Happosai, Cologne or possibly your father, would be in trouble." Nabiki was surprised by the last name. He noticed her expression. "Your father is actually very good. Probably slightly better than Pop in some ways. He's out of practice though, even with the new school."

Nabiki stared, surprised. "You know about that?" He nodded, scratching the back of his neck in a gesture she recognised as one of slight embarrassment.

"Um, yes. We've... Well, we've kind of been keeping an eye on things in Nerima." She looked hard at him, then at her sister, who also appeared embarrassed.

"How? And why?"

"You have your network, I have mine." He smiled mischievously. "They overlap." Nabiki stared at him for a long moment, light finally dawning.

"You suborned my contacts, you bastard!" The man smirked, very amused.

"Not all of them. But enough. Anyway, you did the same thing to the Kuno loonies."

"That's different!" Ranma laughed, delighted at her outrage.

"Not really. Anyway, yes, I kind of flipped a number of your people. Mostly ones in this area, but a few key ones in other places, and in Nerima. Plus I have others you don't know about."

"How the hell did you do that?" Nabiki was desperately curious, and knew full well he knew it.

"I could pay better, for a start. Also, the difficult ones turned out to be a lot more scared of me than of you, when I pushed a little." He paused, then grinned. "They don't know it's me, in most cases." He shimmered again and there was a much larger, very dangerous looking man sitting there, wearing dark glasses and with a scar down his cheek. "Some of them know Gorou here," he said in a much deeper voice. With another shimmer the hulking man was replaced with a tall dark-skinned woman, wearing a business suit with her long hair up in a bun. "Others know Mika." The voice this time was low and sultry. With a final shimmer, an exact duplicate of Nabiki sat on the other side of the table.

"One or two think they're talking to you, and you've told them not to talk except face to face, after the right password has been given." The duplicate watched her with a cold smile she recognised with a chill from the mirror from when she practised it.

"Fuck me..." she said faintly, staring in disbelief. The faux Nabiki suddenly grinned in a very Ranma-like manner and shimmered back into the dark-haired young man.

"You should see your face," he chuckled.

"Ranma...," Kasumi said warningly. He looked abashed.

"Sorry. I couldn't resist." The older woman gave him a long-suffering look. Nabiki's mind was reeling. This was far beyond anything she had expected, but it explained a lot of things that had been bothering her for years.
"So," she said slowly, working it out as she spoke, "Ever since you left, you've been playing me and everyone else, from only thirty kilometres away?" He nodded.

"Kind of. It's a long story, so I guess I should start at the beginning. I'll skip a lot of the boring stuff, we can go over that later if you really want to. First, though, we need to know what you intend to do." He and Kasumi both looked intently at her, making her uncomfortable.
Chapter 6

Nabiki met their gazes uncertainly. "What do you mean?" Kasumi put her hand on her sister's.

"He means, are you going to tell anyone else about us? We won't stop you if that's what you want to do, but it will make things a lot easier if you don't. At least for the time being." Nabiki studied her sister, then glanced at the young man watching them both.

"I haven't decided yet. A couple of years ago, yes, I would have told the others, or more accurately, sold them the information." Ranma chuckled, while Kasumi seemed resigned. "A year ago, I might have told Akane. But now..." She trailed off, trying to work out what she meant to herself. "I'm really not sure. On the one hand, a lot of people have been looking for you for a long time. That aside, Akane really misses you, Kasumi." The older sister looked regretful.

"I know. I'm sorry."

Nabiki waved this off. "It doesn't matter, right now. I kind of know why you left, and even though for a long time afterwards I was really pissed off about it, now I tend to agree. You seem happier than I've seen you for as long as I can remember." Kasumi and Ranma shared a glance and a smile. "And I can guess some of the reasons." She paused again and the other two waited politely for her to gather her thoughts. Eventually she continued. "On the other hand, a lot of the people back home are more or less sorting themselves out. No offence, but having you around seemed to be the catalyst for a lot of trouble, even if it wasn't your fault." She looked at Ranma, surprised when he nodded thoughtfully.

"I know. I even know some of why that was. One day I'll find out the rest, and there will be a reckoning..." He didn't seem inclined to expand on that, so after a minute she resumed talking.

"Ukyo is happy with Konatsu. Tatewaki and Kodachi are staying away now, most of the time at least, the Amazons seem to have settled down to just being neighbours, and Ryoga, well, I guess you know what happened to him?" Ranma nodded, looking simultaneously regretful and highly amused.

"Oh yes, I know. I have to admit I'd have liked to have seen that. It serves the little pig right in my opinion. It's a pity it ever came to that but it was entirely his own damn fault." It was Nabiki's turn to smirk. She agreed completely.

"Akane is the one I'm really worried about. She doesn't talk about you much nowadays, but she's... well, she's not very stable, I'm afraid. I don't know what would happen if you came back into the picture. She's still obsessed with you, I think. The thing that scares me is that she might really try to hurt you." Ranma looked both thoughtful and resigned.

"That's pretty much what we thought." He paused, looking at both Tendo sisters. "I have to tell you, that wouldn't end well for her." The young man didn't look happy about it, but seemed determined. Nabiki sighed.

"I thought as much. I don't even disagree. She's obsessive, overbearing, and short tempered at the best of times nowadays. She hasn't matured much since you left." Looking at him sympathetically, she added, "I don't truly think any of that was your fault. In all probability she'd have ended up like this anyway. You were just a convenient target who happened to come along at the right time. Personally, the two people I blame, if anyone is to blame, are Tatewaki Kuno and our father." Kasumi seemed upset.
"Oh, Nabiki, is that really fair? Father?" Nabiki nodded firmly.

"Oh yes, it's fair. He dropped the ball on raising Akane properly. You did your best, I know, and I even understand why he failed, but that doesn't change the fact that he did fail. If mother had lived, perhaps..." She shrugged helplessly. "We'll never know." Glancing at Ranma she said, "In a way it's a good thing you did come into our lives. If she hadn't had you to hit, she might have picked someone who couldn't take it. That would have ended very badly." The young man sighed, but agreed.

"Both our fathers even seem to be growing more sensible. Which isn't something I ever thought would happen, especially with yours." Ranma grinned, as did she. "Their new teaching school actually seems to be working. They've got real students, ones that genuinely want to learn, and even more surprising, are learning. OK, they tend to have at least one fight every day, and insult each other all the time, but they've stuck to it for the last six or seven months so far. It's possible that they'll make a real success of it." Both Kasumi and Ranma smiled at this.

"That's the most surprising thing of all," the young man said, "It's just a shame it took so much pain and trouble before they finally started being sensible."

"I know." Picking up her mug she found the coffee was stone cold. Kasumi took it from her and went into the kitchen to make a new pot. When she came back they resumed talking.

"So. What will you do?" Ranma looked at her curiously over his coffee. She sighed.

"I guess, at least for the time being, I won't tell anyone. If I do decide to let them know, I'll tell you first. OK?" He shared a glance with Kasumi, who nodded.

"OK. That's fair enough." Nabiki sipped her coffee, thinking, then chuckled. "What?" Ranma asked, curious.

"I was just thinking about what they'd say if they knew I know where you are. How they'd react. Akane would go absolutely insane with rage. Our fathers would be wailing and crying, 'The schools must be joined! The schools must be joined!' Shampoo would be running around shouting 'Airen!' Complete chaos." Ranma and Kasumi glanced at each other, sharing a smile. Kasumi turned to her sister.

"Nabiki? The schools were joined three months ago." She held up her left hand, and for the first time Nabiki focussed on the slim gold ring on it. Freezing in shock, she stared at the ring, then at her sisters face, before glancing at the young man across from her. He held up his hand to show a matching ring. There was a very long silence, before the middle sister hugged her older sibling hard.

"Congratulations." She was crying again. "It took him that long to ask you?" Ranma laughed.

"She asked me. What could I do except say yes?" The middle sister laughed with him. Kasumi had a pleased look on her face. Eventually Nabiki released her sister and sat back, grinning at the pair of them.

"I'm very happy for you both. I had wondered whether this would happen, but... It's still a surprise. I'm just sorry I missed it." She thought for a moment, then laughed again. "Oh, god, Akane would explode. And the fathers! Their greatest wish, the Tendo and Saotome schools of Anything Goes are finally one, and they don't know!" She was nearly unable to breath for the laughter. Ranma was looking smug.
"Oh, it gets better." He got up, walked over to the wall, and removed a decorative scroll that was hanging there. Bringing it back to the sofa he handed it to Nabiki before sitting down again. Curiously she read it, her eyes widening.

"This is..." He nodded, smirking once more.

"Official notice from Happosai naming me Grand Master of the Anything Goes Martial Arts School. He finally decided he'd taught me everything he could and said he was proud to name me his successor. The little pervert really is a little pervert, and in a lot of ways a horrible person, but he's also a damn fine martial artist and a good friend." He chuckled. "And if you'd told me four years ago that I'd ever say that I'd have thought you were drunk."

"So, that means you outrank both our fathers in Anything Goes?" He nodded once more.

"Exactly. I can teach anyone I want any part of it, as well. I've been teaching Kas all sorts of interesting things." Nabiki glanced at her sister, who had a weird smile on her face. She held out her hand, from which dangled something Nabiki recognised. Dropping the scroll she hastily felt her chest, then snatched the bra from her sisters fingers.

"Kasumi!" she screeched, outraged. Ranma was nearly pissing himself with laughter.

"Sorry, I couldn't resist," her older sister said with a very Ranma-like smirk.

"Oh, god, there's two of them now," Nabiki moaned quietly, making Ranma laugh even harder. Even Kasumi was giggling by this point.

"I told you he taught me everything. Some of those things are pretty strange." The young man finally stopped laughing, changing into a young woman and sitting up again from where she'd fallen while laughing. Nabiki was slowly becoming used to the apparently random gender changes, accepting it as something that the martial artist just liked doing. The fact that Kasumi didn't seem to notice or care helped in that respect. "A lot of his techniques are based on or around some really deviant things, mainly to do with women's underwear. They can obviously be used for other things as well." Kasumi handed Nabiki her wallet with a grin. Then her watch.

"Oh, for heaven's sake, Kasumi," her sister said, laughing. "So the pinnacle of martial arts is a super-powered pick-pocket?" The older woman dissolved into giggles. Ranma watched with considerable humour on her face.

"That's not the main use, but..." she said, shrugging.

"You two obviously deserve each other," Nabiki commented, putting her belongings away in her pocket then staring suspiciously at her sister to make sure she wasn't going for anything else. "I would never have suspected you of such a weird sense of humour, sis. This idiot is obviously a bad influence on you." She was both impressed and amused by her sister's new skills. "What else can you do?" Ranma smiled, tossing her wife one of the sofa cushions. Kasumi caught it deftly and made it vanish while Nabiki looked on with astonishment. "Hidden weapons as well?" The older woman nodded with a smile, pulling a bo staff from nowhere and balancing it on one finger, then making it disappear once more.

"It's really useful for shopping," she said, looking pleased. Nabiki stared for a moment then laughed again.

"Now that's the Kasumi I remember."

Her sister looked at her for a moment, then stood up and walked a few paces away. With a serene, very Kasumi-like smile, she faded from view until there was no trace of her. Once again Nabiki stared in shock. "Holy crap." Ranma smiled happily.

"She's really good at that. Probably better than I am. It's a kind of hybrid of some of Pop's techniques and Happosai's, which Kas and I both tweaked. Originally it fooled someone's ki sense, Happosai's method went further to true invisibility, while this method covers everything I could think of. It works on microphones, cameras, heat sensors, everything I've been able to test it with. Even magic. But it's a bit tiring so generally you don't use it for long." Nabiki twitched violently when suddenly Kasumi reappeared on the other side of her and sat down wearing an amused expression.

"Happosai was really impressed with that technique. Especially the improvements Kasumi made to it. She came up with several modifications that made it much easier to pull off." The tall woman seemed slightly embarrassed by the praise, which made Ranma giggle a little. "She's very good at making ki techniques more efficient," the red-head said, looking at her wife with pride.

"While Ranma is amazing with coming up with new techniques in the first place. We work well together." Kasumi returned the look, as Nabiki glanced between them, grinning a little.

"We do have a mutual admiration club going on here, don't we?" Both of them nodded, laughing. Kasumi pulled the sofa cushion back out of wherever she had stored it and tossed it back to Ranma, who put it back where it came from.

"OK. I guess we should really tell you the whole thing." The red-head leaned back, as Kasumi put her arm around her sister's shoulders. "You remember what started all this, that damn wedding, and the total cluster fuck it became? Right. After the Dojo partially collapsed, I was under the wreckage..." Ranma recounted the story from her point of view up to the time she and Kasumi left for good. It made Nabiki uncomfortable to listen to her talk, even after more than three years her words betrayed a level of pain, loneliness, and despair that was horrifying. She was also appalled at how close they'd all come to a truly incredible disaster, if Ranma had been pushed just that tiny little bit further.

At the time she'd had no idea how stressed the martial artist was, or how powerful. Hearing about the way she'd invented a whole new set of techniques even while lying under tons of rock and wood, merely because she didn't want to face her family both impressed the hell out of her and made her nearly cry. It also scared her a little. It was apparent to her that everyone had very severely underestimated the intelligence of the person sitting across from her from day one. The sort of mind that could do what she'd seen and heard about was by no means that of a mere jock, in fact it probably rivalled her own. She was getting a sneaking suspicion that it might even exceed it. Kasumi listened silently, her eyes fixed on her currently female husband, an expression on her face that most observers would have thought neutral but Nabiki had the experience to realise was quite upset.

When Ranma finished the story of the night when everything changed, she paused, looking at the floor. "I was so happy to be leaving. So happy. You can't imagine what it was like, to finally be free of being treated like a pet, no, more like a gold mine. Something that people wanted for what they can dig out of it, but not something that they really cared about personally. Even a pet would have been treated better in a lot of respects. It felt like most of the people who wanted to use me, had plans for me, wanted more than anything to stop anyone else getting me. Lying under that pile of crap for three days listening to you all shouting and screaming at each other, not one person worried about me, just about what they wanted." She stopped again, a tear running down her cheek.
"I was so close to just giving up, letting nature take it's course. It would have been so easy. Eventually you'd have found a body, everyone could have argued about that all they wanted, but I'd be out of it. It would have been such a relief." She looked up, meeting Nabiki's shocked gaze with her own. The pain there was still evident but was nothing compared to what the middle Tendo woman remembered from that night years ago. "Then, I remembered that there was someone who was as mistreated as I was in that house. Even more so, really. I decided that I couldn't give up, I wasn't going to let life beat me. Ranma Saotome does not lose!" She nearly hissed the last words, her eyes blazing. Nabiki shrank into the arms of her sister, truly frightened for a moment. The eyes, while completely human, were for a brief few seconds more terrifying than those of the illusory demoness the martial artist had become earlier.

Those eyes softened as they moved sideways to land on the face of the other Tendo woman present. "The worst night of my life, with one action from your sister, became the start of a new life." Nabiki wasn't sure which one of them the red-head was talking to. "She acted like she always does, with excessive anger and violence, but for once she was about to do something she could never take back. So I stopped it. And in the process found something I'd overlooked for two years. In a weird way I owe Akane thanks." She turned male again, smiling at his wife. "It took nearly three years, but we were finally ready to complete what we started that night." He fell silent, the two women watching him for a while. Eventually Kasumi picked up the story.

"I was completely disgusted with everyone. Even, for a while and to my shame, with Ranma. But I came to realise that it wasn't his fault, that he was as much a victim in the whole thing as I was. The difference between us was that in my case it was self-inflicted. I was trapped in a situation of my own making, one I'd slowly built around myself from the best intentions but that was gradually killing me." She smiled at her sister. "I don't blame any of you, please understand, not really. What happened needed to happen. But, it had reached a point where I had to make a decision. If I hadn't left then, I never would have, and eventually would never even want to. I knew deep down that it was going to destroy me as a person in the end but I couldn't work up the nerve to do anything about it." She reached out for her coffee mug to find it was empty. Ranma got up to make yet another pot.

"Then, in her rage, Akane tried to kill me." She shivered at the memory. "Even as she was swinging that mallet, I could see in her eyes that she knew what she'd done, but she also knew it was too late to stop it. I knew I was dead. Then..." She swallowed. "Then, I lived." Ranma came back with the coffee, sitting next to them on the sofa and holding her free hand. "By a miracle, I was saved, in a situation where I couldn't possibly be saved." She shook her head slowly. "It was impossible, but it happened. When she offered me her hand, what could I do but take it? It was the only choice. For both our sakes." Gently disengaging herself from both her sister and her husband she leaned forwards and poured them all coffee, handing each of her companions a cup. Sipping hers she stared into the past for a while, then smiled.

"I've never regretted it." Turning her head to gaze at her sister, she inspected her for a moment. "I missed all of you so much, but I don't regret what I did for an instant." Nabiki nodded quietly, understanding. There was silence for a while as they all found themselves busy with their own thoughts. Eventually, Ranma moved back to the other part of the sofa so he could see both sisters more easily, picking up the story again.

"When we left, we didn't really have anywhere specific in mind, just 'away'. I was still in quite a lot of pain from the hole in my side, Kas had some superficial burns and bruises, but neither one of us needed much medical attention. I had a fair amount of money stashed away for emergencies, money you and Pop didn't know about." He grinned at her. "We ended up just getting on a train at random, heading out of the city until we found somewhere I could put up my tent. We just collapsed into it when it was up, we were both exhausted. The next morning I was mostly healed and Kas was a lot better. We talked for a while, trying to decide what to do. I wasn't sure if she wanted to stay with me or go on her own." Kasumi smiled at him.

"I told her that there was no way I was letting her go off alone, not in the state she was in. We argued about it for quite a while. Ranma was convinced that everyone would be looking for both of us very quickly and if any of the fiancées found me with her I'd be in danger. I told her it didn't matter, I wasn't leaving her. In the end she gave up." Ranma chuckled a little.

"OK, so occasionally I do lose. That time, I didn't mind at all." He drank some coffee, putting the cup down on the table. "After talking it out we decided that the best thing was to disappear completely. And basically for good. I wanted to complete my schooling at least, after that we could decide what to do. Kasumi was still interested in learning, something other than household stuff, perhaps become doctor. Perhaps not. I wasn't sure what I wanted to do except keep training in the Art, but I also wanted to broaden my horizons. In either case, we needed to hide from you lot, probably for years, we needed money, and for both we needed help." Producing a pack of chocolate chip cookies from nowhere he took a couple and handed the packet to Nabiki.

Nibbling one, he continued, "I didn't have a lot of friends. At the time, I thought none. Acquaintances, yes, lots of them, but no one I could turn to when I had real trouble. It turned out I had two friends as it happened. One was with me, the other one was a three foot tall deviant." He smiled ruefully. "Anyway, I was slightly startled when I started thinking about how many people owed me favours. People in some interesting places seemed to think that they owed me something, because at some point I'd helped them. After I thought about it for a while I started contacting a few of those people, the ones I thought I could trust. I was genuinely surprised at the response." He mentioned some names and Nabiki' eyes widened.

"Good grief. I thought I had some impressive contacts!" She was extremely impressed and very curious. What on earth had he done for these people? "Hey, you mean those 'moving men' really were Yakuza?" He nodded with a small grin.

"Oh, yes, that particular Oyabun feels he owes me a debt he can never repay. But he was willing to try. He helped a lot with discreetly moving things around, and so on. Sort of his speciality." She looked narrowly at him.

"You mean smuggling." The martial artist laughed.

"I mean he specialises in moving things that other people want moved without different people knowing about it. His organisation is very good at it indeed." She was still looking at him speculatively. He shrugged. "Crime is going to happen no matter what. Organised crime is in many ways preferable to disorganised crime. I generally stay out of their business unless they do something I can't ignore. If they do, well, we came to an arrangement."

"Which is?"

"They don't hurt people who don't deserve it, and especially they don't hurt women, I leave them alone. Otherwise we have words." The young man said this in a completely flat tone that sent shivers down her back. After a moment, he went on in a lighter vein, "His group, and various other people I knew, helped quickly find us somewhere to stay off the radar and helped set up temporary identities. When it was safe for the time being I decided to contact Happosai. He came very quickly, and it turned out it was the best thing I could have done. Somehow I had really earned his respect that night, while the others had lost it completely." Ranma stopped and looked at her for a moment.

"Have you ever wondered how old he really is?" Nabiki looked puzzled.
"Well, no, not as such. I know he's pretty ancient. Contemporary with Cologne, I guess, from what I've heard, and supposedly she's something like two hundred and fifty plus years old."

"Closer to three hundred." He smiled. "The result of clean living and a pure soul?" They all looked at each other with amusement. It seemed unlikely. "Whatever. Pretty damn old. Happosai is older, by quite a bit. At least five hundred years as far as I can tell, as unbelievable as that sounds. He cheats." Kasumi produced a muffled giggle, making Nabiki look at her for a moment. Ranma smiled again.

"Anyway, old. Really, really old. And under the happy little deviant act, really, really smart. It turns out he's been saving money for a very long time indeed." The young man looked at her with a raised eyebrow. "You'd know if anyone would. What effect do you think compound interest would have on money over three or four centuries?" The middle sister stared, then went pale.

"Oh, hell. He must be richer than god."

"Not quite, but it turns out he's got more resources scattered around than you'd ever believe. He helped us out financially." She was curious, money was a favourite subject of hers.

"How much did he give you?" Kasumi smiled gently at her, then waved her hand around.

"All this? We own it." Nabiki was astounded.

"You own this apartment?" Her sister shook her head still wearing the same gentle smile.

"No. We own the building." Nabiki almost stopped breathing.
"You own this building," she said after a long, long pause. Kasumi nodded.

"Yes."

"The entire thing."

"Yes."

"That must be nice." Her sister's smile widened.

"Yes."

Slumping back into her seat, Nabiki looked at the coffee cup on the table. "I need something stronger than that, I think." With a grin Ranma got up, went into the kitchen, returning with two bottles of beer. Handing one to each sister he sat down again. Nabiki opened hers and drained half of it, then put the bottle on the table. Staring at it for a while, she mumbled to herself. Eventually she looked around at the others.

"The whole thing?" she asked plaintively. Ranma glanced at his wife, who seemed amused, then nodded.

"Yep. All six floors, the basement, the roof garden, the parking garage, all of it. It was a pre-wedding present from Happosai. He was sure we'd get married in the end even if we weren't." Kasumi raised a hand.

"I was." He looked at her and sighed a little.

"OK, you were. I wasn't." She grinned.

Nabiki was still trying to wrap her mind around the concept that her sister and her brother/sister in law owned an entire apartment block in one of the most affluent areas of Minato. "Would you like to see it?" Kasumi asked. Her sister nodded numbly.

The next hour was a guided tour of the entire building, starting with the roof garden. This was huge, as it turned out, covering nearly the same area as the Dojo garden did. It was accessed from the end of the practice room, which while not quite as large as the Tendo training hall was pretty impressive, at around eighteen metres long by eight wide. There was a fairly large swimming pool in a glass enclosure at one side of the roof, including a sauna and a jacuzzi, the rest of the roof area, about twenty-five metres on a side, being devoted to the garden. There were several paths through the foliage, making the garden seem much bigger than it was. Surrounding the roof was a wall about one and a half metres high, enough to stop someone accidentally falling off but low enough that one could look over it to see the rest of the city.

Exiting the roof by means of a different staircase at the other side they found themselves in the corridor next to the elevator Nabiki had come up in. Kasumi pressed the button and the doors slid open, all of them getting in. The next floor consisted of an apartment nearly as large as the one on the top floor, the remaining space being occupied with the machinery to run the pool and jacuzzi. There was no room as large as the practice one on the top floor, but the rear room overlooking the park was still considerable in size. Nabiki noticed for the first time that there was a balcony on the rear of the building outside each apartment as well as at the front. Opening the door and walking out onto it she looked around, then down.
"This is incredible. And there's no one else living here?" she asked curiously. Kasumi shook her head.

"No. The place was empty when Happosai gave it to us six months after we left the Dojo. Even back then he was sure we'd end up together. The lower four floors have two apartments each, one of those we've set aside for him when he visits. He likes to have a private space for his... special interests." She smiled and grimaced a little at the same time, Nabiki knowing exactly how she felt. "The rest are vacant, although furnished. I go and air them out every now and then. We haven't decided what to do with the space yet. I suppose we could rent them out, they'd bring in a lot of money in this area, but up until now we've wanted the privacy for obvious reasons." She pulled the balcony door shut as they walked back in, locking it behind them.

Ranma, who was checking the kitchen appliances were in good order, turned as they came into the room. "Pretty neat, isn't it?" Nabiki nodded, still having difficulty with the concept.

"You'd get a huge amount of income if you rented out the empty apartments," she said.

"I know. But like Kas said, there were good reasons for not doing that, at least for the time being. Perhaps one day. Anyway, we're not exactly hurting for money." The three of them left the apartment, going down in the lift to the next floor. Nabiki was shown the two apartments there, both of which were still very substantial. "The other three floors are basically the same as this one. All the apartments from here down have the same floor plan." They got into the elevator again and descended to the parking garage. This had space for at least two dozen vehicles, although it was currently empty, with a powered door at the rear. Below that was the last floor, an enormous basement, covering the entire floor area of the building, supported at intervals by steel and concrete pillars. It was at least three metres high and well lit.

An odd feature that caught Nabiki's eye was a pile of concrete blocks at one end of the basement space, apparently propping up several large metal plates which, when she walked over to have a look, each turned out to be about five or six centimetres thick. The entire stack was close to thirty centimetres from front to back, lying at a steep angle against a couple of metres of concrete blocks next to the wall. The top plate had a number of scorched and melted spots on it, and a few small holes. "What's this for?" she asked. Kasumi glanced at Ranma, then at her sister.

"Target practice." Nabiki looked at her oddly.

"What?"

"Target practice. Watch." The elder sister waved her sibling over to the other end of the basement, then took up a stance with her hands at her waist, cupped with the wrists together. Nabiki watched with amazement as a ball of golden-white ki once more built between her hands, until she pushed them towards the pile of steel and concrete. The ball of light shot across the basement, crossing the twenty-five metres in a fraction of a second, to impact against the steel plates with a deafening crack that echoed around the large room. The plates rang like an enormous bell for several seconds.

"Um. Ow." Nabiki stuck a finger in her ear, which was ringing. She saw the plate now had another shallow crater with melted edges. "That's kind of scary," she said, making her sister appear pleased. Ranma was grinning.

"Like I said, she's getting pretty good at ki manipulation. That was a really small one, we have to be careful down here, or the place might collapse." He held out one hand and a thin beam of blue-white light flickered between his palm and the plates, making a weird crackling whoosh sort of sound. Once more the plates rang. This time there was a pencil-diameter hole in the top plate. Kasumi looked at him with her eyebrows raised, then performed the same trick, her beam the same golden white as the ki ball had been. It was noticeably weaker than the one Ranma had produced, but she squealed with joy and clapped her hands.

"That's the first time I've made that work properly!" She was very pleased indeed. Nabiki smiled, while inside she was thinking that her sister was becoming a very dangerous person. Ranma hugged his wife with a broad smile.

"Well done, Kas. Remember what you did, and try again." It took her three more attempts to duplicate the feat, but she grinned happily when she did. Then she did it twice more, to prove it wasn't an accident. Her sister watched with amusement as she hopped around, more excited than she'd ever seen the older woman.

"That was what you did to stop Akane's mallet, isn't it?" she asked. He nodded.

"Yes. It was the only thing I could think of at the time, and I really wasn't sure it would work. It seemed possible when I was thinking about it, but the circumstances weren't ideal to try a new technique for the first time. I didn't have any choice though. If it hadn't worked..." The dark haired man looked momentarily upset. Kasumi put her hand on his shoulder.

"Don't think about it. It worked, you saved me, and came up with a whole new technique at the same time." Glancing at her he smiled slightly. Turning to Nabiki he waved at the holes in the steel plates.

"That technique is much more difficult than the ki spheres, but a lot more powerful. If I wound the power up I could easily punch a hole big enough to fit a basketball into all the way through all of that stuff and the wall behind it. Not a good idea down here. I don't want to go blowing holes in the foundations of my own house." She agreed that it seemed like a bad idea.

"I had a look at the damage you caused when you saved Kasumi. It was pretty impressive. If anyone had been in the way... Hell, that ki beam went through thirty centimetres of granite without stopping, and part of the roof tiles as well. I wonder how far it went?" He looked interested.

"I don't really know what the maximum range is. A couple of years ago I did try zapping something a few kilometres away and managed it, but haven't tried anything like that again. I was more concerned with limiting the range so I wouldn't accidentally hurt someone." He turned towards the target plates again and once more raised his hand. The beam that formed this time only went half-way across the basement before stopping abruptly. As he concentrated it steadily shortened, until there was about a metre of blue-white light coming from his hand. Nabiki stared as he tilted it up, then slowly moved it around like he was holding a pole made of light.

"Bloody hell, you've got a light sabre!" He grinned.

"Silly movie, but yes, it gave me some ideas." Ceasing projecting the beam he walked over to the pile of steel, then made another, much shorter one, this time only about thirty centimetres long. Waving it casually past the corner of the top plate he watched as a piece the size of a dinner plate dropped to the floor with a loud clang, the cut edge glowing red. Once more, Nabiki stared in awe. The two sisters walked over to look at the damage, the younger one only then noticing that the plates showed signs of having a similar attack used on them many times before. Prodding the lump of steel on the floor with her foot, which didn't make it move a millimetre, the brunette wondered how on earth they got all this stuff down here in the first place.

Ranma gestured to the elevator. "Let's go back upstairs. I'll tell you the rest, and we can get something to eat. Late lunch or early dinner, it's around half past five now." Nabiki followed him, looking back over her shoulder to see where her sister was. She stopped dead when she noticed that Kasumi had picked up the chunk of steel, which must have weighed over thirty kilos, with one delicate hand, putting it neatly on top of the pile of concrete blocks as easily as if she was tidying up books in the living room. Her elder sister met her gaze with a small smile, brushing her hands together as she walked past. The other woman shook her head in amazement.

Upstairs, they went back into the apartment, Kasumi stopping to change out of the black silks which she was still wearing and to shower. Ranma and Nabiki went into the kitchen where he started very competently preparing a quite elaborate meal. "Kas isn't the only one who's learned a lot over the last few years," he said when he noticed Nabiki's slight expression of surprise. "She's taught me all sorts of things as well." While he cooked, Nabiki wandered around the apartment looking at it. Up until now she hadn't seen all of it. The place really was very large. There were five bedrooms in total, she found, one that was clearly Kasumi and Ranma's, the one she had woken in, and three guest rooms. One of these looked like it had probably been Ranma's room before they married, judging by the furnishings. Something she found interesting was that it wasn't by any means the largest room.

In addition to the bedrooms, there was the kitchen, the living room which also doubled as a dining room, and the practice room, all of which she had already seen. Going beyond them she found a room clearly set up as a study, which had another smaller room opening off it that seemed to be a library judging by the large number of books and scrolls on shelves neatly laid out in it. Two bathrooms, not including the small one opening off the largest bedroom, and a utility room with laundry facilities nearly completed the apartment. The last room she found by accident, it was almost hidden off the practice room. When she went in she found a large collection of martial arts weapons and equipment, which reminded her of the similar storage room at the Dojo, although if anything Ranma and Kasumi had a larger collection than Soun did. Shaking her head at the sheer size of the place she returned to the kitchen.

Kasumi had joined Ranma at the cooking, chopping vegetables for a salad, and smiled at her sister when she came in. "What do you think of our home?" she asked. Nabiki leaned against the counter edge and looked around, then grinned.

"I think I want to move in," she replied, only half-joking. Ranma laughed, while Kasumi looked pleased.

"The meal will be ready in about forty minutes. Let me put this in the oven, and we can continue with the story, if you want," he said, finishing up his preparations and washing his hands. Covering the dish he slid it into the oven, set the time and temperature, then closed the door. Offering her another beer he led the way into the living area, Kasumi following with a bowl of snacks. Once they were all sitting again, he thought for a second. "Right, where did we get to. Ah, Happosai. OK, so aside from this place, he sorted us out financially, which barely made a dent in his resources. We'll never have to work for a living if we don't want to, though." Nabiki was astounded again.

"Once we had a good cover sorted out, one that would keep anyone from finding us for the foreseeable future, we had time to think about what we were going to do." He popped a few nuts into his mouth, chewing while Kasumi took up the story.

"Ranma wanted to finish his schooling and graduate high school, at the very least. You know he was actually doing very well in Furinkan?" Her sister nodded. "For various reasons he didn't make too much of a fuss about it, but he was in the top ten percent of students there. It's very impressive when you realise that before he came to Nerima he'd only had about two years of formal schooling, which wasn't even continuous." She smiled at her husband with pride. "The problem was we couldn't enrol him in another school under his own name, it would have made it too easy for people to find us."

"What did you do?" Ranma swallowed another nut, then answered.

"Early on, in the first week or so, I called in a favour from someone a bit unusual." He seemed slightly embarrassed. "You know this area is awash with different groups of magical girls for some weird reason?" She nodded once more. "I still haven't worked out why. Anyway, a few of them are fairly sensible people, most are idiots. Well meaning idiots, but still idiots. They're often grossly overpowered, yet have next to no tactical skills or real martial arts abilities, and show an amazing level of arrogance over anything that falls into the category they think of as 'demonic.'" He frowned a little. "I mean, you only have to look a little out of the ordinary in some parts of this ward and you get jumped by half a dozen pretty schoolgirls in some perverts idea of a cheerleader outfit ranting about foul fiends. It's like being surrounded by dozens of female versions of Kuno, only genuinely dangerous."

Nabiki looked amused at his description, while Kasumi was smiling at her husband in a tolerant fashion, obviously having heard these complaints before. "They're mainly a damn menace, in my view. Oh sure, some of the demons and other odd entities that pop up from time to time are worse, but quite a few of them are essentially harmless and just want to be left alone. Just because someone has a tail and scales is no reason to immediately start chucking magical shuriken or some such thing at them. And don't even mention the stupid names they come up with for their attacks. It's ridiculous. Half the time a competent fighter would have wiped them out before they finished the wind-up for the attack and shouting out the name. Which is always stupid." He didn't look impressed.

"They usually can't even spell overkill never mind know what it means. The amount of damage they cause is amazing, it makes Ryoga look like an amateur." He shook his head in disgust. "All that aside, sometimes they do deal with a real threat. One day I've got to figure out why so much of that sort of thing happens here. So anyway, a few years ago, one of the slightly less crazy groups ran into something they couldn't handle. Basically they bit off a lot more than they could chew. Kind of their own fault, actually, the threat would have gone away on it's own if they'd just stayed back. As it happened I was in the area, completely coincidentally, it was where I'd landed after one of Akane's more impressive mallet attacks." He rubbed the top of his head unconsciously, while Nabiki winced a little in sympathy. "I pulled myself out of the hole I'd made when I landed to find myself in the middle of a major magical battle. The thing they were attacking, and losing to very badly, took an interest in me."

Ranma smiled a little at the memory. "That was kind of a mistake. I was in a really shitty mood anyway, Akane had jumped me out of the blue for no good reason, and I'll admit I was spoiling for a fight. When this stupid demonic whatever it was decided to take a swing at me, especially after I'd seen how badly it had hurt those girls, it was a really good outlet for all the frustration from dealing with your sister." His smile widened in reminiscence, becoming quite predatory. "It was an amazing fight. The thing didn't have much technique but it was damn tough, tougher than Ryoga. Didn't help it much in the end. I got annoyed with it and really cut loose after about a quarter of an hour. You can still see the crater in that park." Nabiki's eyes widened as she glanced at her sister, who nodded.

"He showed me. It's about fifteen metres across."

"Good grief." She was thinking about what would have happened if he'd ever become that angry in Furinkan. Returning to his seat after having quickly gone to retrieve a glass of water, Ranma sipped it, then continued.
"I'd ended up getting soaked because of a fountain it threw me into, which made these girls think I was a magical girl as well. That took a while to sort out. They were very grateful that I'd helped them, saved them is more accurate, and I ended up helping them a few more times over the next month, filling in for one of them that was badly injured until she healed up." He grimaced a little, while Nabiki began to smirk. She could see where this was going. "Um, they insisted I wear their uniform, when I was helping out. In the end I gave in, they were very persuasive." He glared at the middle sister who was snickering. "It's not funny. That damn uniform was nearly obscene. It made me look more naked than being naked!"

She started to laugh, Kasumi also giggling. "Thanks a lot. The important thing is that they had these magical artefacts that were a sort of a disguise. They made people who saw them unable to remember much about what they looked like. Not invisibility, more like a confusion spell. Without either using one yourself, or being present when they were activated, when the things were in use you'd never be able to describe or recognise the person using them later. They even screw up cameras. Very useful if you're going to run around looking like a pornographic version of a schoolgirl." Nabiki was limp with hilarity, picturing the female Ranma in one of the skimpier magical girl uniforms, looking really, really annoyed. Much like he looked at the moment in fact. He waited impatiently until she stopped giggling. "Finished?" She nodded weakly.

"I got in touch with them and explained, so they gave me a couple of spares. We used them for a year or so every time we went out, which made it nearly impossible for anyone to trace us." Taking another drink, he paused for breath. Kasumi picked up the tale once more.

"We were able to enrol him in a local school under a different name. It was as a her in fact. We discussed it for quite a while, but it seemed safer even though he wasn't happy about it at the time. The chances of getting splashed with hot water accidentally are much lower than with cold water. Happosai helped us, finding some way to get the school to accept Ranma's transcripts under that name, and keep any reference to who we really were out of the records. I don't know how he did it, it was probably naughty though." She smiled happily. "It worked. With the magical devices we could come and go as we pleased and no-one ever worked out that she wasn't who she said she was. She graduated with very high marks."

Ranma was grinning a little. "Kas took ages persuading me to go to school while female, but I've found over the years I can never really say no to her. Especially when she's right. It was really embarrassing at first but I got used to it much faster than I expected. I kept my head down, stayed out of any excitement, just tried to stay in the background and finish school. It was mostly uneventful." Rising once more he went into the kitchen to check on the progress of the food. "Another twenty minutes or so," he commented as he returned. "Eventually, I worked out the first version of the illusion spell, which made some of this easier. We could set up identities that people could remember, but not associate with who we really were. Another contact has ways of getting very convincing IDs for us, which let us create a number of personae for public use. The problem is that he couldn't make them good enough to be completely sure that a passport, for example, would work all over the world. That's one reason we stayed in Japan."

Drinking some more water, he smiled. "There are other reasons as well. We wanted to keep an eye on you lot, just in case. Plus, until I was legally an adult at twenty, we couldn't do a number of things under our real names that we wanted to do."

Nabiki was going over some of what he'd just told her in her head, there was something... Ah. "OK. Either that means that you can do magic as well," she said, glancing at her sister, "or you can use that spell on other people." She looked back to Ranma, who grinned.

"I can, as it happens. It takes more power, but not enough to make much of a difference most of the time. But with Kas I don't need to." A flicker of motion caught the corner of Nabiki's vision and she turned her head to find herself, once more, looking at a perfect duplicate.
"AGH!" she yelped in surprise. The duplicate Nabiki raised an eyebrow in an unnervingly accurate imitation of the original. Looking wildly back to Ranma she yelped once more when she found herself looking at her own face yet again, wearing exactly the same expression as the first one. "Stop that!" she shouted in irritation. "It's incredibly creepy!"

Both Nabiki clones said, in perfect unison and in her own voice, "I know. But it's funny." She glared at them as they collapsed in laughter, shimmering back into their true forms in the process. Ranma was female once again which made her blink for a moment, then sigh. "You two are extremely annoying and very weird." This only made them laugh harder. She leaned back into the sofa and waited for the pair of lunatics to calm down, which took a little while.

"God, you should have seen the look on your face, Nabiki," Ranma chortled. "I wish I'd had a camera." She snorted with a complete lack of amusement, making the red-head grin.

"Oh, grow up, Saotome," she snarled. Kasumi put her hand on her sister's shoulder.

"Don't get too annoyed, sister. We didn't mean to irritate you, but you have to admit it was very amusing. I couldn't resist." She seemed apologetic enough, but the corners of her mouth were twitching suspiciously. Nabiki looked at her sister through narrowed eyes for a moment, then slumped, crossing her arms defensively.

"OK, yes, I can see you'd think that. It's just kind of scary, you understand? I haven't seen either of you for over three years, then to find out how much you've changed... it's freaking me out a little. The magic and the martial arts just add to that." Kasumi looked sympathetic, quickly hugging her sister for a moment.

"I do understand. I'm so very happy to see you after all this time. Yes, I have changed, but I had to. I think I'm probably more like I should have been, in a sense, closer to what I'd have been if I hadn't had to take over after mother died. As I said before, I don't resent what happened, it taught me so many things I could never have learned otherwise, but it was time to move on. I hope you can understand that." Nabiki was watching her with a neutral expression but slowly nodded.

"I think so. I agree, as well. But it's still strange. Whatever I was expecting to find here, it wasn't...," she looked around, waving one hand vaguely at the apartment, "all this." Glancing at Ranma, who was watching her soberly now, she suddenly smiled. "But I'm very glad you two seem to be doing so well. Don't worry, I'll get used to it. Eventually." The red-headed young woman smiled back, then looked up as a beeping sound came from the kitchen.

"Aha. Dinner is ready. Kas, can you help me set the table?" Her wife patted her sister comfortingly on the knee then stood and followed the other woman into the kitchen. Within a few minutes they had the table laid out, the food on it, and all three of them were seated around it. "I hope you enjoy it," Ranma said, picking up her chopsticks. The other two began eating, Nabiki's eyes widening after the first couple of mouthfuls.

"This is really good, Ranma. You've learned a lot about cooking." The other woman smiled in gratitude.

"Thanks. Kasumi is much better than I'll ever be, but she taught me a lot." There was silence for a while as they ate, then Nabiki thought of something.
"Hey. If that illusion spell can do clothes and hair and whatnot, why bother braiding yours like that? Or for that matter, wear the clothes you were wearing when we met? Which I'm still annoyed about, by the way." Ranma grinned at this.

"Good. Consider it payback for all the times you charged me for stupid things." Nabiki grinned back.

"Speaking of that, you still owe me forty-three thousand, five hundred and twenty yen, you know." Kasumi sighed a little, while her female husband laughed.

"I'll write you a cheque." She ate some more food, then answered the original question while Nabiki was snickering. "Yes, the spell can do clothes and hair, pretty much anything you'd want. But the more complex the illusion the more energy it takes. Having my hair like this and dressing in the clothes I want the illusory persona to have means I only need to change myself. It lets me keep the illusion running for a long time without as much drain on my power level, which can be very useful." The brunette nodded thoughtfully.

"So, you use that form a lot, then?" It was Ranma's time to nod.

"Yes, that one is an established persona I have ID papers for." She shimmered and became the girl from earlier. Nabiki watched, fascinated, the change was perfect. Nothing at all remained to indicate that the girl sitting there was the Ranma she knew. Even the body language changed. "Hello. I'm Maiko Nakahara. Pleased to meet you." She held out a hand and after a momentary pause Nabiki shook it with a small smile. The voice was slightly deeper than Ranma's own female voice, with more feminine intonations. Totally convincing and giving nothing away. After a few seconds the girl developed the Ranma grin, the body language reverting to something she was very familiar with. She stared, impressed.

"That's absolutely amazing. How did you get so good at acting?" Ranma, in the guise of Maiko, grinned.

"Again, lots and lots of practice. It was more difficult at first, but I seem to have something of a gift for this sort of thing. Kas is pretty good at it as well. We both have a couple of standard identities we use outside the house. This is the one I go to university as." Nabiki stared again.

"You're going to university?" 'Maiko' smiled.

"Of course. Why, did you think I made up all that stuff about oxygen depletion in muscles?" Nabiki shrugged.

"I didn't think much about it, after I found out who you actually were. But now you mention it..."

"It's true. I really am taking a course in sports medicine and biomechanics. I'm in my second year there. It's going pretty well, I should have a degree in it in two years." The middle Tendo sister shook her head, impressed and surprised.

"Won't it be a bit difficult, having 'Maiko' be the one with the degree?" The brunette girl smiled a little.

"There are ways to deal with that when the time comes. It won't be a problem." Intrigued, Nabiki started to ask for details until another thought struck her.

Turning to Kasumi, who had been eating silently and listening with a small smile on her face the whole time, she asked curiously, "Are you at the university as well?" Kasumi's smile widened, she shimmered in the same way Ranma had done, and there was a completely different girl sitting there. She was still quite tall but a little shorter than Kasumi's true form, with short blonde hair in a sort of a pageboy cut. Her eyes were hazel, her face very pretty but showing no relationship to her normal features at all, looking like a Northern European/Japanese ethnic mix. Nabiki would never have had the slightest clue that this was her sister if she'd passed her in the street.

"Hi. I'm Rika Nygaard." Her voice was quite deep for a woman, with a trace of a foreign accent of some sort. Nabiki stared at her transfigured sister for several seconds, appearing slightly stunned. 'Rika' went on, her face quite serious unlike Kasumi's normal expression, "I'm in the second year of a medical degree. I have another three or four years to go to become a doctor. Oh yes, in case you're wondering, my father is Danish. He met my mother when she was on a trip to Europe, followed her back to Japan, and has lived here ever since." Her sister was still staring at her. With a shimmer she resumed her normal appearance, looking pleased.

"Was that convincing?" she asked curiously. Nabiki nodded, speechless.

"Oh, yes. Very." After a few more seconds of staring she shook herself a little. "Bloody hell, Kasumi! That was even weirder than her," she pointed at Ranma, who was eating quietly still in her Maiko guise, "How did you get so good at that?" Kasumi seemed amused at her sister's reaction.

"Like Ranma said, a lot of practice. We both spent entire days, once or twice a couple of weeks, in those forms, quizzing each other on our persona until it became second nature. The illusion spell sorts out the voice, but the mannerisms and so on take lots of repetition until you can do it without thinking. I can't do male forms at all convincingly, yet. Ranma is a lot better at being female than I am at being male, for obvious reasons." Nabiki stared for a moment more, then resumed eating before her food got cold, shooting both her sister and current sister in law curious yet respectful glances.

Ranma went back to her true appearance after a few minutes. "We each have a couple of properly documented alternate personae we practised with until they were second nature, and several more that we use less often. Basically, it's one for use at the university, and one for everywhere else, which we try to keep separate so that people won't link them to each other. The others are for specific purposes. You've seen a few of mine earlier." Nabiki grinned.

"Was that demoness with the scales a special purpose one? Or just something you came up with to scare me?" Ranma looked very amused.

"Oh, Zytha'a is a special purpose one, definitely." Suddenly the blue scaled demoness was sitting in the red-head's place, delicately putting some chicken in her mouth with the chopsticks. Nabiki leaned away for a moment, startled, then inspected the apparition more closely now that she wasn't scared of it. That's not to say that those teeth didn't make an impression.

"What possible purpose could looking like that serve?" she asked curiously. The demoness grinned in a worrying way, making her blink despite herself.

"Dealing with a very specific group of magical girls," she said in a throaty voice with a weird accent that Nabiki couldn't place at all. "They keep turning up and causing trouble, so a year or so ago I decided that I'd had enough. I came up with this, it's based on someone I know." This made Nabiki stare in disbelief.

"You know a demoness?" The disguised Ranma nodded with a toothy grin.

"Several, actually. Decent people, by and large. As are quite a few of the male demons I've met. Oh, they have some pretty odd ideas of normal behaviour by our standards, but overall they're easy enough to deal with. Assuming you don't simply attack them on sight, like those idiotic girls tend to do." The demoness changed back into the red-head, making Nabiki relax very slightly. Even when she knew who it was under the illusion, it was so convincing it was a bit worrying. "Zythra'a has a tendency of popping up when those girls are beating up something that doesn't deserve it and returning the favour, normally in as embarrassing a way as possible. They absolutely hate her, but they're also terrified of her. It's been quite effective at keeping them out of the area around the university so far, without me having to resort to more serious measures."

"Isn't that a little dangerous?" Nabiki queried. "They could end up getting some allies together and coming after you. Or Zythra'a, at any rate." Ranma shrugged.

"It's not an ideal method, I'll admit, but so far it seems to be working. There's quite a bit of rivalry between the different groups of magical twits and I've been careful to have Zythra'a only go after that one bunch. The others seem to think it's hysterical. Once, one of the other groups was even watching and taking bets on the outcome of a fight. That really didn't help relations between them, especially when they accepted a bet from me." She grinned widely, and Nabiki could only laugh at the red-head's style. "I won." Kasumi sighed a little, but with a patient look.

"One of the reports I read seemed to suggest that a demon-hunter has had to be carried out of here on a stretcher. And that the demon that the hunter was hunting seemed extremely amused." Ranma chuckled.

"Oh, that one. Yes, that was kind of funny. This girl was over the top even by the standards of that type, she chased a demon into the area I'd made clear was off limits, started causing a lot of damage, nearly killed two bystanders with some sort of explosive attack, then went after me when I told her to push off. She had no idea of how to minimise collateral damage at all, I don't think she cared how many people got hurt as long as she got her demon. A bit like Ryoga on a bad day, but even more pig-headed. The demon wasn't much of a problem, really, he was here just looking around when she jumped him. Young one, he should have known better. Anyway, in the end I was forced to give her a pretty good pounding to get her to stop, she just wouldn't back down. I'd admire that normally, but she was completely out of control and likely to kill someone. The demon found it all highly amusing, I don't think he appreciated being attacked like that. He was rolling on the ground laughing his tail off when I broke her arm. Weird sense of humour. I've got a standing invitation to visit him if I'm ever around where he comes from." She looked amused.

Nabiki was listening with a mild sense of unreality. If it hadn't been for the things she knew damn well the martial artist had experienced and done she wouldn't have believed a word of it, but even so it was a lot to accept. "What about the other reports of the demons or whatever coming in to this area and not going back out?" Ranma seemed saddened.

"Oh, they're true as well. While quite a few of the so-called demons are, while not harmless, basically just tourists, there are certainly things that are extremely nasty." She paused, trying to think of a way to explain it. "These creatures come from different worlds, normally through some sort of portal from there to here. They don't all come from the same place. A couple of the places they do come from are a pretty close match to what you'd think of as hell, or a hell at any rate. Those are the dangerous ones. Most of them are pretty dim, one or two are anything but. They're the really dangerous ones. I'd prefer to send them back, I don't like killing, but sometimes there's no alternative. The magical girls do a reasonable job in many cases of dealing with these things, and if they stuck to the dangerous ones things would be a lot better. But they don't, and most of them also don't think much about blowing up an entire building to get one demon. No finesse."

She looked very irritated. "I don't want to live somewhere where at any moment some damn creature or even worse creature-hunter might decide to blow the front off a building I'm in. Especially this one. So I've been taking steps to make sure that they know damn well to stay away.
The smarter ones got the hint pretty quickly, but not all of them are smart, on either side." Finishing her food she put her chopsticks in the bowl, then sighed a little. "It's a nuisance. I find that turning up as soon as they do, blowing up whatever they're chasing if it won't see reason, then shouting at them normally does the trick, but sometimes I have to go further. I guess it keeps me in shape at least." She glanced at her wife, who smiled back. "And it's been good practise for Kas." Her sister looked at the older woman in shock.

"You've fought demonic things?" Kasumi nodded happily.

"And a couple of magical girls. They weren't very good." Nabiki stared once more. This was getting very weird indeed.
"I'm having a lot of problems with all this", the middle Tendo sister moaned, dropping her chopsticks and putting her head in her hands. Kasumi and Ranma glanced at each other, the martial artist turning male after a few seconds, then leaning over and putting his hand on her back.

"We're sorry, Nabiki. I know it's all different now. A lot of things have changed over the last three years, for you as well as us. But we're basically the same people. Your sister is still your sister, she just has some new skills and interests as well." The brunette rolled her head to the side so she could see him out of one eye, then sighed heavily.

"I know, I know." She raised her head and looked at him, then at her sister, who appeared slightly worried. "But still, it's a lot to take in. Every time I think I've come to grips with it you drop something else on me." She pointed at Kasumi. "You, my older sister, the ultimate home maker, the woman who abhors violence, fight both demons and magical girls with your superhuman martial arts skills?" She giggled a little hysterically while Kasumi smiled uncertainly. "It's completely insane. I kind of expect insanity from him," she jerked a thumb at Ranma without looking at him, "But you were always the sensible one." Ranma glanced at his wife and shrugged a little, he couldn't deny the truth of her words. There was silence for a while, then Nabiki picked up her chopsticks and resumed eating with a far-off expression. Ranma and Kasumi exchanged glances again and wordlessly agreed to let her think things through.

The rest of the meal passed quietly. When they finished, Ranma cleared the table while Kasumi sat and watched her sister, who was staring at the table wearing a puzzled expression. After some minutes she looked up at her older sister and smiled a little. "I'll be OK, sis. It's just a lot to take in."

"I know. I'm sorry you're having a hard time with it." Standing, she motioned to her sister to follow her, then led the way through the practice room up to the roof garden. They stood beside each other at the edge looking out over Tokyo in the evening twilight, admiring the view. "Please don't blame Ranma for any of this," the older woman said after a while. "He saved me from myself, as much as I saved him from himself. I love him very much, but I love you very much as well and don't want you to be upset. It's been very hard all this time, knowing how close you were but being unable to talk to you. You have no idea how many times I wanted to just go back to Nerima to see you all." She smiled sadly. "When we got the illusion spell working we did pop back a couple of times, just to see the place, but I couldn't risk contacting anyone. I watched you and Akane from a distance though." She put her arm around the shorter woman's shoulders and pulled her close.

"I missed you so much. It's wonderful that you finally came." Nabiki leaned against her sister, listening to her words carefully. It helped.

"It wasn't through lack of effort that I took so long, you know." Kasumi laughed.

"I do know. There were good reasons for us both to vanish, ones you understand. That didn't make it any easier." She smiled a little deviously. "I was slightly disappointed that it took you so long to track us down." Nabiki looked annoyed.

"I'm sorry I didn't live up to your expectations. It's been pretty hard the last three years. Money is always tight, Akane has been an absolute nightmare a lot of the time, and all the insanity at home didn't stop when you guys left. If anything it got worse." Pulling away from Kasumi she put her hands on the railing around the roof and stared out across the city silently, while her sister watched. After a few seconds she sighed. "Sorry, I didn't mean to be rude. It's getting better now, but Akane is still a nightmare. At least I'm at university myself most of the time, so I don't have to put up with her. It worries me, though, when I think what will happen if she ever finds out about Ranma. Or if Ryoga is stupid enough to come back, either." Turning she leaned her rear on the wall and looked at her sister.

"She's getting really unstable, Kasumi. It scares me. She was bad enough when Ranma was there, hitting him all the time for stupid reasons, but now... Oh, she's much quieter about him, unless you manage to trigger a rant, but I know she's still obsessed. More obsessed, even. She hasn't grown up at all." The brunette looked upset. "I lost two sisters that night. I finally got one back, but the other one is still slipping away." Shaking her head she turned to look out over the city again. "Even when she was younger she alternated between the nice Akane, the one I remember growing up, and the violent paranoid one that hit Ranma. Fair enough, sometimes he provoked it, but most of the time he didn't, the poor bastard. The violent Akane is pretty much all that's left now." Kasumi stepped closer and put a hand on her shoulder.

"I didn't realise it was that bad. The reports we have are quite detailed, but don't go into much about Akane, they mainly concentrated on you." Nabiki glanced at her with a frown.

"You make it sound like you have someone watching me all the time." Kasumi was silent but had a slightly guilty expression. Nabiki stared. "Fuck me. You DO?"

"Not all the time. Just... quite a lot of it." Nabiki shook her head in disbelief.

"Who? And why?" Her sister looked at the ground, then met her eyes.

"I don't think I should tell you who, not at the moment. But the reason is because you were the biggest threat to us. If anyone could track us down it would be you." She laughed briefly. "As shown by the fact we're having this conversation." Nabiki couldn't help but smile a little. "Ranma thought we needed to know in advance what you were doing, in case we had to change our plans in a hurry. So we arranged to have you monitored, at least some of the time. I'm sorry, I know it's an invasion of privacy, and under normal circumstances I'd never have allowed it. But we didn't have much choice."

Her sister thought it over then sighed. It was exactly what she would have done, and in fact had been trying to do since they'd left. She could hardly object to it too much. Although she was desperate curiously to know who it was that was spying on her and how. "I guess I forgive you, sis." Kasumi smiled and hugged her. Curious, she asked, "Are you watching the others as well?"

The taller woman nodded with an amused look.

"Yes. Not all by the same method. Cologne is extremely difficult to sneak up on, but Happosai found a way to keep an eye on her from a distance. Ironically, blocking a lot of her attempts to do the same thing to us in the process. The Kunos are easy, and most of the rest either weren't much of a threat, or could be watched by keeping an eye on the Dojo." Nabiki looked impressed.

"It sounds like you're in the middle of quite the spy ring," she chuckled. Kasumi seemed both pleased and embarrassed at the praise.

"It's mostly Ranma and Happosai who did the work. I did come up with a few contacts, though." Her sister looked at her curiously. "Do you remember Mrs Tachibana?" The name didn't register beyond a very faint familiarity. "Ranma calls her the ladle lady." This did register, making Nabiki snort with surprised laughter.

"Her? The ancient little woman who waters the road even when it's raining? She's one of your spies?" Unable to stop herself she collapsed in giggles. "That's brilliant. No one would ever suspect anything." Kasumi was looking very pleased with herself.

"She's a lovely woman. I stopped and talked to her almost every day on the way to the market. She was really happy to help us, she thought the whole thing was enormously funny."

When she'd collected herself, Nabiki asked her sister curiously, "So you recruited old women to spy on us all?" Kasumi nodded.

"Some of them. And shopkeepers, delivery people, various other people we knew. Ones we knew you'd never have any reason to suspect." The middle sister stared with amazement. She'd had no idea her older sister was so sneaky. It was very impressive, even if it had worked against her. The silence this time was much less emotional, as they watched the sky slowly darken.

Kasumi eventually said, "We can help out financially if you like." Nabiki glanced at her. "We have more money than we need, and would happily let you have some. You could get the Dojo fixed properly and not have to worry about the bills." She fell silent again, not pushing, just allowing her sister to think it through.

After a minute or so, Nabiki replied thoughtfully, "My first instinct is to say thanks very much. But the more I think about it the more it worries me for some reason." Her sister looked at her curiously. "Yes, money is tight at the moment, but the situation is slowly improving. Akane has a job, one that she seems to be able to hold on to, and the two fathers are actually working for the first time in years. I'm worried that if I turned up with a decent sum they might all decide that they didn't need to try as hard and it would all fall apart." The older woman nodded slowly.

"I think I understand. I'm not sure it's correct but you'd know that better than I would, you're closer to them right now." She was silent for a little while. "Still, perhaps you could take some of our money anyway, for emergencies? You don't have to spend it, but knowing it's there would take a lot off your mind. And mine." Nabiki thought it over then slowly agreed.

"All right. Thank you." Hugging her again, her sister smiled.

"That's what family is for." The two of them walked around the roof garden, which was now being lit by small lamps hidden in the undergrowth, coming on automatically as the evening progressed.

"What can we do about Akane?" the older woman asked as they stopped near the middle of the garden. Her sister sighed.

"I really don't know. The only thing I can think of at the moment is to keep her away from Ranma, and Ryoga. Other than that... Perhaps she'll grow out of it. Perhaps now that Father and Genma are teaching her they can redirect some of that rage into something useful." Shrugging helplessly, she sat on a bench under a large fern. Kasumi sat next to her and held her hand. "It gives me nightmares. She's nowhere near as good as you at the Art, and lacks any form of discipline, but she's horrifically strong and very fast. You add uncontrollable rage to that and the results could be appalling. What terrifies me is that one day she'll lose it towards someone who isn't Ranma or Ryoga, which will end up with corpses for sure." She shuddered.

"We won't let that happen," the older woman assured her, with a worried expression of her own.

"How can you stop it? OK, sure, if you get warning you and Ranma could get there and stop her, but what if she just snaps in the middle of the street? By the time anyone who could stop her gets there she could wipe out the entire area. She's nothing like as dangerous as Ranma is, or even you are now, but even so she's a lot more than the cops could handle." Neither one of them liked that thought but neither could work out a solution. Eventually Nabiki said, "I guess there isn't anything much we can decide about it right now. With any luck it won't happen, anyway."
Turning to look at her sister, she deliberately changed the subject from the depressing turn it had taken. "By the way, congratulations. I kind of got distracted earlier, but you're going to be a doctor! That's fantastic." Kasumi smiled brilliantly.

"I know! It's something I wanted to do since I was a little girl. At one point I thought perhaps being a nurse would be a good idea, but after I left Nerima, and talked to Ranma and Happosai, I decided why stop there? Whether I end up a practise GP or not I haven't decided yet, but I'm having so much fun at the moment you wouldn't believe it. I've missed learning like this all these years." Grinning at her sister's enthusiasm, Nabiki stood up.

"Come on, let's go back downstairs. You guys can tell me the rest of the story, then I want some alone time with my sister. I want you to tell me everything you've been doing at university." Kasumi smiled back, gracefully rising to her feet. When the two women re-entered the living room where Ranma was reading a book, he looked at them with a raised eyebrow. Both seemed much happier than when they'd left, Nabiki in particular.

"You look better, Nabiki. I'm sorry about overwhelming you earlier."

"Don't worry about it, Ranma. It was a lot to take in, that's all." She stared hard at him. "But I am going to have to talk to you about your spy network." He glanced at his wife who smiled and raised a hand to her mouth.

"Oh, my. How did she find out about that?" After a moment, all three of them started laughing.

When they wound down, Ranma grinned at the brunette woman. "Sorry about all the spying, but you understand the reasons I'm sure." She nodded, still giggling a little. "So, do you want to hear the rest? If it's not too much to take in."

"I can handle it. Hit me." She grinned back at him.

"OK." The two woman sat on the sofa again, settling in comfortably. "So, once I graduated high school, not around here, we spent nearly a year training Kas in the Art, ki practice, that sort of thing, while also getting all our contacts, and yours," he grinned and she looked annoyed, "sorted out so we knew what was going on back in Furinkan. Once we were sure we weren't going to be discovered and have to run for it again, we talked it over and decided that university for the both of us was what we wanted to do. Happosai was very supportive about that, he thinks education is much more important than Pop does. He suggested this place, he's got some sort of history with it. I'm not sure what. Since this building was available and the courses we wanted were taught here, that's where we ended up." He smiled. "Happosai had already given us the building long before we'd decided on the university. He's pretty sharp, I think he had a good idea what was going to happen."

"Around then I got the first version of the illusion spell working, so we also set up various identities using it and got the paperwork for them in order. I still didn't have control of the curse then, so we decided to continue with me going to university as a woman. The illusion spell could have covered for me if I'd changed but it was one more thing that might go wrong. Keeping it simple was the idea. Changing what I look like a little, like from one woman into a roughly similar sized one, is easier than for instance suddenly having to cover up being female when I'd been male up until then. In the early days that could have gone wrong very easily. Now I'm much better at it, but just carrying on as we have been is simplest." He shrugged a little. "I'm used to it, it doesn't bother me at all now. It's just part of who I am."

A thought struck him, and he glanced at the two women. "Does anyone want some ice cream?" Nabiki looked a little surprised at the randomness of the question, while Kasumi giggled.
"OK," the brunette said after a moment. He grinned and went into the kitchen, coming back after a few minutes with three bowls of strawberry ice cream and some spoons. Handing it out he sat and shovelled a considerable amount into his face, making both women look mildly disgusted. "Well, that hasn't changed, at any rate," Nabiki commented, starting in on hers in a much more appropriate manner. Kasumi laughed, also trying a spoonful.

"You have no idea. The amount of ice cream we get through... It's a good thing his metabolism is insanely fast or he'd weigh about two hundred kilos by now." Ranma stuck out a strawberry-flavoured tongue at her, making her giggle again.

Finishing his bowl he put it on the coffee table, then resumed talking. "After that, we pretty much settled into a routine. Practice for a couple of hours in the mornings, go to university, more practice at lunch, then for a couple of hours when we get home. Keep an eye on Nerima, beat up the occasional demon or magical girl, you know. More or less the usual." He snickered. Nabiki gave him a long look before shaking her head.

"Very weird. Both of you." She finished her treat and put her bowl on top of his. "And that's it?" He nodded.

"Pretty much. The last year or so has been surprisingly quiet. There's been the odd need to go outside Minato, for various reasons, but mostly we've just been learning things and waiting to see what happened with everyone in Nerima. A few months ago Kasumi decided that she wanted something more permanent with our relationship, we discussed it for a while, then more or less got engaged. We went on a few dates, something more formal than what we'd been doing up until then. One day, she basically sat on me until I agreed to marry her." He grinned, while Nabiki glanced at her sister with raised eyebrows. Kasumi was smiling happily, obviously remembering something. "We moved into the same bedroom, three months later we got married."

"I wish you could have been there, sister. It wasn't very romantic, we had to keep it quiet. That part I regret. It was just the two of us, Happosai, and the legal clerk. One day, perhaps we can do it over again with family." The elder sister smiled gently, thinking about the marriage. Her smile widened fractionally. "Since then it's been... very nice." Nabiki looked at her carefully, then at Ranma, who was wearing a slightly evil smile as he watched his wife, who seemed to be matching his expression quite closely. After a moment Nabiki coughed.

"Right. Well, again, congratulations." She was feeling a little uncomfortable. Kasumi and Ranma both jumped, looking guiltily at the middle sister, who snickered. "Are you considering children?" She was very curious about that. The other two exchanged glances, but it was Kasumi who answered.

"We have talked about it a few times. Neither one of us thinks that it's a good idea right now. But later on, well, we're not against the idea at all." Her sister nodded thoughtfully then got an odd look.

"So," she said slyly, "which one of you would have the kid?" Ranma stared wide-eyed at her, then at his wife, who looked first surprised then contemplative. Nabiki grinned.

"We haven't decided," Kasumi said, glancing at her husband mischievously. "Maybe one each?" Ranma seemed uncomfortable, but Nabiki was interested to note he didn't refute the suggestion. It gave her something to think about.

"Anyway," he said, his voice squeaking a little on the word and making both sisters smile, "that's basically it. We ran away, hid, learned magic, got money, found somewhere to live, went to school, got married, and here we are." He waved his hands at the room with a grin. Nabiki looked at him for a long moment.

"I'm pretty sure there's a lot more to it than that."

"Oh, sure. But it would take days to go over it. We've already been talking for hours. I can tell you more another time if you want. Quite a lot of the story is very boring though."

After another pause, Nabiki sighed a little, then reached into her pocket and pulled out a couple of sheets of paper. Unfolding them she put them on the table face down. "OK. Thanks for letting me know everything. There's one thing you haven't mentioned yet, though, that I really need to know."

Pushing the papers across the table to him, she pulled her hand back. He watched her face for a moment, then picked them up, turned them over, and went still. Only his eyes moved as he read the top sheet, before putting them back on the table. He glanced at her with a neutral expression. "Was that you?" After a long moment during which he and Kasumi exchanged looks, he nodded.

"Yes."

"All of them?"

"No. Only the first eight." He locked eyes with his wife, and Nabiki slowly turned to look at her sister.

"You?" She couldn't believe it.

"He was a monster. He'd killed at least nine women, and was in the process of killing another one when we found him. She was only eleven!" Kasumi started crying and Ranma got up to sit beside her. Nabiki watch in silence, trying to understand how her gentle older sister could have done that to someone, even if he was a monster. Then she remembered the reports she'd read about the other victims of the person in question and found it quite easy to understand.

"Good for you, sis," she said quietly, leaning over and holding her tightly. On the other side Ranma was doing the same thing.

"I found him before Ranma did, we knew he was somewhere in the area but not exactly where. I was so angry when I saw what he was doing to that poor girl. It was strange, at first I was almost shaking with anger, then I went cold. Almost emotionless, like Ranma's soul of ice technique, but I wasn't using it. When I pulled him off the girl and threw him across the park into a tree his arm broke. I remember walking over and looking at him lying there with his pants around his ankles, his hands covered in blood..." She shivered at the memory. "There was a lot more blood when I stopped hitting him." Turning her head she buried her face in Ranma's chest. Nabiki looked over her shaking shoulders at his expression, while rubbing her sister's back. He looked upset, but weirdly proud as well.

"That bastard was the worst of the lot," he said quietly. "He'd raped, killed, and dismembered nine children over three years and the police had absolutely no leads. If Kas hadn't got him I would have, and I'm really not sure he'd have survived." The martial artist was silent for a while, hugging his wife. "I absolutely hate rapists, more than I can say. They're one of the most extreme examples of the powerful hurting the weak I can imagine, going against everything I believe, that I've trained for. Even then I find it difficult to think I could kill another human, but I came very close with a couple of those fuckers. None closer than this revolting excuse for a person." A bitter laugh escaped him. "You want to know the funny thing? The demoness I based Zythra'a on would have slaughtered him on the spot as someone who didn't deserve to live. What does that tell you about what he was like?"
The quiet in the room was only broken by the sound of Kasumi crying for some time.

Eventually she sat up, wiping her eyes. "I'm sorry," she said in a small voice. Ranma tenderly wiped a tear off her cheek.

"You have nothing to be sorry for, my love. Either for what you did, or for being upset about it. It needed to be done, you were the person in that place at that time. We had the ability to stop a horrible crime and if we hadn't we'd have been as guilty as the one committing it. You saved at least one life, and who knows how many more that he might have gone on to take."

Nabiki watched them, realising once more how much they cared for each other. She was very pleased that her sister had someone like that in her life, even under the circumstances. "I suspect the law might have a different interpretation, despite how much I agree with you myself." Ranma looked at her with a slight smile.

"Possibly. Possibly not. All nine of the people we've... dealt with... have been sexual predators of the worst possible type. None of them were people the police could catch." Watching her for a moment, he added, "Did you figure out that we were pointed at them? I suspect by the police themselves?" She stared at him for a long moment, some things that she'd noticed suddenly coming together in her head.

"Bloody hell. So that's what happened." While he watched she thought hard, then slowly asked, "Let me guess. Newspaper articles covering crimes on a national scale, that normally wouldn't get reported outside a smaller area?" The dark haired man nodded.

"More or less. Not the last one, he was enough of a threat that the story had been covered nationally anyway, but not very much. No one had any real details, the guy was very careful. But the rest, yes. The first one was in Nerima, I know you found out about that. Thanks to you I even know who came up with the idea. I always kind of liked that guy. For a cop he has a very straightforward attitude to life. I can't prove it, but I have a pretty good idea that he told a few people scattered around the country, probably friends of his, which made some of them try a similar thing when they got stuck."

The middle sister was listening with interest. It seemed plausible and fitted the facts. "You realise that if you're right they're using you as their own unofficial wet-work specialist, someone they can genuinely say they have no knowledge of if you get found out?" He smiled a little.

"Of course. In a way I don't even mind. I would if it wasn't for the fact that the people they're pointing me at really are the worst scum around. I don't truly enjoy hurting someone, even someone like that, so much, but if I don't people will die. Like I said to Kas, if I have the ability to stop a horrific crime and don't, in my mind that make me nearly as guilty as the person committing it."

"I'm going to have to look into this some more. It's kind of disturbing in a way." Ranma shrugged.

"I agree. But I'm not going to stand by and let anyone get raped under any circumstances."

Nabiki nodded, but cautioned, "Be careful. I doubt very much that any of the police from Nerima have any intention at all of ever trying to arrest you, but you never know if someone from a different city might not have a go."

"I'm not planning on making it a hobby. But thanks for the thought." He grinned at her, and even Kasumi looked happier. Nabiki retrieved her papers and looked at them for a moment, the picture of the injuries the last rapist had suffered making her shiver. The thought that her elder sister had done that... For a few seconds she wondered if Akane really was the dangerous one in the family. 'Yes, she is;' she thought to herself after a second or two. 'Akane is likely to do this to a random person who just pushes her buttons wrong. What it would have taken to make Kasumi that angry...' She shivered again and tore the papers into small shreds.
Chapter 10

After a long period of quiet reflection, Nabiki looked at Ranma inquisitively. "That only leaves the last issue you had, the Neko-ken. What about the cat phobia?" Ranma returned her gaze for a moment, apparently thinking about his answer.

"It's still there, to a degree," he eventually replied. "I've been talking to a very good therapist about it for the last eighteen months or so. She doesn't know all the details of who I am, I go to her as Maiko, but I told her enough to let her understand the problem. She's been extremely helpful, and also wants to find Pop and have him committed." He grinned. "She doesn't like him at all. I told her that I'd lost track of him a long time ago after I escaped the child abusing son of a bitch." He shrugged a little. "It's kind of true. I see her three times a week for an hour or so. We ended up settling on a form of CBT as the best therapy. It's helped a huge amount with the phobia. Kas comes as well, just in case the Neko-ken is triggered, she can bring me out of it. But that hasn't happened for more than a year."

"So you're not afraid of cats any more?" she asked curiously. He shook his head.

"Not to the point of terror, like I was. I seriously don't like them, I'll admit, and the psychologist thinks I never will, but I can at least stand to be in the same room as one for a while. It looks like randomly setting me off into the Neko-ken state is over. I sure hope so."

Nabiki was impressed. Both by the fact that he'd sought therapy, and that he'd admit to it. The old Ranma might not have, being too embarrassed by something he saw as a weakness. She said as much. Kasumi and her husband exchanged glances, then he smiled again. "That's probably true. But the Neko-ken was the true weakness, an extremely dangerous one. You have no idea how close we came in the past to a bloodbath, in that state I wasn't functioning much above the level of a smart cat. If I'd been really angry..." He shuddered. "It's a pity I can't control the more useful manifestations of it, but I'd rather lose the whole thing than risk what could happen. I don't like not being in control of myself. That's the main reason I don't drink, aside from the horrible taste and the pointlessness of it."

By now it was about half past eight in the evening, the sky outside the living room windows was beginning to get properly dark. Ranma looked over at the clock hanging on the wall above the door to the kitchen. "I'm going to have to go out for a while. You guys can stay here, or come with me if you'd like." Nabiki watched as he disentangled himself from his wife, stood, turned female, then shimmered and changed into a different woman. This one had night-black hair, darker than anything the middle Tendo woman had ever seen before, with a brilliant blue streak running through it from a position off-centre over her forehead all the way back through the braid which she kept. She was a couple of centimetres taller than Ranma's normal female form, and as well developed, looking about nineteen. Her eyes were purple-blue, almost glowing in the light of the room, the gaze she cast back at Nabiki a little disturbing. When she smiled the brunette could see she had small fangs like Ryoga. Overall the effect was impressive and rather intimidating.

"Very nice. Who's this one?"

"Yori. Someone who doesn't take shit from magical girls or demons." Her voice was beautiful, a smoky contralto that would make most men look to see where it came from. There were odd harmonics to it that made Nabiki shiver a little. "Yori has a little demon blood in her, you see. She doesn't like people who attack other people who are a bit different just because they're a bit different, and she particularly doesn't like the attacking people to cause damage to property or bystanders. She tends to express her displeasure physically." The girl grinned in a disturbing manner.

Ranma, or 'Yori', disappeared into her bedroom, coming back a little while later dressed in black silk clothes similar to the practice clothing she and Kasumi had been wearing that afternoon, but tighter and cut differently. There was a blue streak similar to the one in her hair running down the left side of the shirt. On her feet she was wearing black leather boots, quite stylish without being overtly feminine, while on her hands she had fingerless leather gloves, again black, contrasting with blue fingernails that looked very sharp. She'd removed the red bow and replaced it with an electric blue one. The end result was a bit like a fashion-conscious female ninja, someone who was genuinely dangerous. Nabiki looked her up and down for a moment with a smile, as she pirouetted to show off the complete ensemble.

"Yes, very nice indeed. Why female, though? Most of your alter-egos seem to be women." Ranma laughed.

"Only the ones you've seen so far. I've got as many male personae as female. This is because it's more or less expected around here that people jumping around the rooftops doing impossible things will be attractive women in odd costumes. I really have to find out why one day. Oddly enough, I attract less attention looking like this than I would if I went out beating up monsters as myself. A bit different from Nerima, that place is much more equal opportunity insanity." Kasumi laughed, as did Nabiki.

"I made the outfit a while ago. It was fun, I haven't done much sewing since we left." Kasumi inspected her work with a proprietary eye.

"Like I said, this way with the clothes, hair, and so on, I only need to hold the illusion for the body, which is a lot less effort. I could keep this running pretty much indefinitely, even while asleep, if necessary. To be honest by now I might be able to do that with any of them, I haven't tested it recently. Like ki techniques, the more you use it the more you seem to have available. Another thing that irritates the magic users I know, I'm told magic doesn't work like that at all." She grinned cockily, the underlying Ranma coming through strongly for a moment. "I think they're wrong. Or maybe I'm just doing something new. Like the healing with ki, no one seems to have thought about it before, or at least not written it down anywhere. Whatever, it seems to work."

"You certainly seem to have developed more of a fashion sense in the last few years," Nabiki said with amusement. Ranma seemed both amused and pleased by the comment, not embarrassed at all. "So where are you going?"

'Yori' got an exasperated expression on her face. "I learned yesterday that one of these damn demon-hunter groups thought that some otherworldly horror was lurking in a building on the other side of the university, and that they had made plans to deal with it tonight. I think they're wrong, I have a pretty good idea who's actually in there. Otherworldly, yes, horror, not really. I've got to go and check, tell them to make themselves scarce if it's who I think it is, then stop those idiots tearing up half the campus. If it really is something dangerous I'll have to deal with that as well." She sighed in a put-upon way. "The life of a martial artist is fraught with peril." Nabiki giggled hysterically, she'd heard Genma say the same thing many times, but she doubted very much whether this was the sort of thing he had in mind.

Ranma noted her amusement with a smile, glancing at Kasumi. "You two want to come and watch?"

"Is it likely to be dangerous?" Nabiki asked with a small amount of trepidation, glancing at her sister and wondering at the light of eagerness in her eyes. Kasumi looked back with an odd expression.
"Possibly. Probably not. But it might be a lot of fun. Come on, we can show you around the neighbourhood afterwards." With a small grunt of worry Nabiki stood.

"Oh, all right. But if you start throwing ki balls around, I'm off." The disguised Ranma laughed.

"Fair enough." She produced a thin silver bracelet and held it out. Curious, Nabiki took it, inspecting it with interest.

"What's this?"

"It's one of the magical artefacts I got from my friends. Put it on, it'll stop anyone being able to identify you later." Hesitating for a moment, the brunette shrugged a little and did as requested. 'Yori' touched it with one finger. "There. It's activated."

"I don't feel any different."

The girl with the black hair smiled. "You won't notice it working. It only affects other people, more specifically ones who aren't present when it's turned on and aren't also using the same device. But it's working, I can sense it. If you went out naked and jumped around in the street, afterwards no one would be able to describe you, recognise you, or even have a usable photo of you."

Lifting the bracelet to her eyes Nabiki stared at it closely, then grinned. "I can think of all sorts of uses for something like this." Kasumi laughed.

"We'll need it back."

"Aww..."

"It won't come off unless you deliberately take it off either, so you can't lose it," Ranma added with an amused look at the woman's palpable disappointment.

"Neat. OK, now what?" Walking over to the glass doors that opened onto the balcony, the currently female martial artist opened one side and looked out.

"Now, I turn invisible and jump off the balcony." She grinned at the expression on Nabiki's face, before looking at her wife. "Meet you two at the medical block in a few minutes, all right?" At Kasumi's nod she faded from view. Nabiki stared.

"I still can't get over that. It's amazing." Walking out onto the balcony she looked down at the street, then around at the scenery, before rejoining her sister inside. "Did she really jump off? It's at least a fifteen metre drop to the road."

"That's nothing," giggled her sister. "Even I can do that." She giggled even more at the expression on the brunette's face. "The really good trick is jumping back." Disappearing into her room for a few minutes she came back wearing a similar set of clothing to those that 'Yori' had worn, only a very dark grey in colour with a deep green belt. "How's this?" she asked, turning around in front of Nabiki.

"It's... not at all like what I remember you wearing at home."

"But how does it look?" Kasumi seemed a little anxious. Her sister raised her eyebrows, then smiled.

"It looks nice. It does suit you, really, I just never pictured you wearing anything like that." She gaped a little when her sister once more changed with the heat-haze shimmer she was becoming familiar with, her hair going ice-blonde and her face and figure changing enough that she looked like a completely different person. She had green eyes now, that looked like emeralds in the pretty face that didn't resemble her own one at all, or 'Rika'.

"Yet another identity?" Nabiki was starting to lose track, wondering how these two could keep them all straight. The new version of her sister nodded with a small grin.

"This is Chou. She's a friend of Yori's, who sometimes comes with her." Her voice was pitched slightly higher than her own one, closer to Ranma's female form. With a shake of her head Nabiki laughed.

"You two are amazing. So, what next? I assume Ranma went invisible so no one would know where she came from while in that form? How do we get out?" With an impish look 'Chou' waved her towards the practice room. The pair of women went up the stairs at the back to the roof, ending up staring at the building next door, some ten metres away, it's roof about three metres lower.

Nabiki looked at the gap, then at her disguised sister, who seemed very amused. "No. No way. It's impossible." A shriek escaped her despite herself when her sister suddenly scooped her up in her arms as easily as if she was a bag of groceries, took a few steps back, then launched herself at the other building. One dainty foot pushed off from the railing of the roof wall, then they were flying through the night.

Finding herself unable to do anything at all other than wrap her arms around her sister and hang on, Nabiki was too scared to even close her eyes. The rooftops passed in a blur, impossibly long leaps interleaved among short runs at insane speed, the wind of their motion making her eyes water. In a very short space of time they had covered a couple of kilometres and were nearing the university main building complex, finally dropping four stories to the ground near where Nabiki had first encountered Ranma as Maiko. Kasumi lowered her sister's feet to the pavement but had to wait patiently for a few seconds until the other woman could open her hands and release her.

Shaking, Nabiki staggered over to a bench and sat down, staring at the ground and blinking while trying not to throw up. Eventually she recovered sufficiently to glare at her sister who was looking completely unrepentant. "Don't ever do that again, Kasumi!" she hissed, still trembling.

"Chou. Come on, it's so much fun!" The blonde girl smiled at her upset sister.

"It's not fun. Not at all. No. Never again." Realising she was babbling a little Nabiki fell silent and just expressed her feelings with an evil gaze which only seemed to amuse the older woman. Looking around she noticed with some surprise that the few people in the area paid them no more than casual glances. It reminded her of Furinkan in the way that passersby simply accepted young women dropping several metres off a building as normal. With a shake of her head she stood, approaching her still-smiling sister warily. "Fine, let's go and meet Ra... Yori. But no more roof hopping, all right?" 'Chou' grinned at her and nodded, indicating the correct direction.

They walked quietly for another few hundred metres, the younger sister still shaken. Every now and then she glanced at her older sibling wonderingly, thinking that she'd definitely changed in a lot more ways than the obvious. She would never have believed that Kasumi would be able to roof-hop like the rest of the NWC, never mind enjoy it so much. Arriving at one large building at the far side of the university complex from their apartment, her companion waved a hand at it. "That's the medical teaching block. Yori should be around here somewhere." As if called the black-haired girl faded into existence in front of them, snickering at Nabiki's 'eep' of shock.

"Don't do that," the brunette snapped.

"Sorry." It was obvious she wasn't. Pointing to a building across the street from the edge of the campus, she added, "That's the one. I had a quick look around, I'm pretty sure I'm right about who's in there. No sign of the mini-skirted nuisances yet. I was waiting until you two turned up before I went over and checked it out."

"What are you going to do, knock on the front door?" Nabiki asked with slightly sarcastic curiosity. The other woman raised an eyebrow.

"Of course. Why not?" There didn't seem to be a good answer for that, so the three of them walked across the hundred or so metres intervening distance, going down an alley and arriving at a door with no markings on it. The building seemed to be a small commercial one of some sort, but there were no indications which company if any was associated with it. A small van was parked outside, and there were lights visible in some small windows to one side. 'Yori' walked confidently up to the door and knocked firmly, rocking back on her heels and waiting patiently for someone to answer. The others watched from a few metres away. Nothing happened, so she knocked again.

Eventually, the door slowly opened and a head peered around it slightly hesitantly. Nabiki stared, it belonged to someone or something that clearly wasn't human. The horselike ears on the sides of the head proved as much, never mind the fine scales covering it. Greenish cat-like eyes looked around, fixing on the figure of the black-haired girl waiting outside the entrance, then widened. "Yori!" the creature said in a deep voice that sounded pleased and surprised, as it flung the door open and leapt out. The younger Tendo sister gasped as the strange creature, which now she could see it properly looked like a sort of cross between a human, a horse, and some sort of huge lizard, enveloped the considerably smaller girl in it's arms. After a moment she relaxed as it became clear the thing was genuinely happy to see the young woman.

"Hi, Uthryyl." 'Yori' managed the name easily, despite the very strange pronunciation. "It's been a while. Can we come in?" The creature released her and stepped back, looking at her companions, then produced something that approximated a smile. It had a lot of teeth in it but was apparently friendly.

"Certainly." It held the door open and waved them through. Following the thing down the corridor in front of them Nabiki watched it's long tail sway from side to side, wondering what on earth she'd managed to get herself into. The disguised martial artist seemed completely accepting of the creature, talking to it as if to an old friend. When she glanced at her older sister she noticed the other woman didn't seem surprised either.

'And here I thought things up until now were weird...,' she thought to herself in mild panic. The creature Uthryyl led them through two more doors into a large room which contained three more of the things, along with a large pile of boxes. The others stopped what they were doing, which seemed to be loading the boxes onto a series of carts, looking at their companion and the three humans. Two of them smiled and called out Yori's name, while the last one seemed confused. After a moment it shrugged and went back to work.

While the three creatures and 'Yori' greeted each other, Nabiki wandered hesitantly over to look at the boxes the remaining one was still piling onto the carts. It glanced at her occasionally but didn't stop her or say anything. The young woman's eyebrows went up when she saw that according to the labels on the boxes, they were catering packs of expensive coffee beans and various high-end chocolate products. As they were still sealed it seemed likely that the contents were indeed what was on the labels. 'Are you seriously telling me that some... people, I guess... from some other world have come to Tokyo to stock up on coffee?' She shook her head in disbelief, looking at the alien appearing creature which had just positioned the last box in it's load, sighing with very human-sounding relief that the job was over.
Going back to the small group of people and kind-of-people, she listened curiously. "So those damn girls think we're evil demons come to eat the populace?" Uthryyl asked with a clearly irritated expression. One of the other ones giggled in a feminine tone. 'Yori' sighed.

"You know what they're like. That group is a real pain. They're running on some sort of prophecy, or something along those lines, which apparently requires them to cleanse the earth of the demonic taint left over from some ancient kingdom millennia ago." She said this in a very sarcastic manner, making it clear what she thought of it all. "If it wasn't for the fact that they're pretty powerful even by magical girl demon hunter standards, I'd just find it funny, but they are genuinely dangerous. Plus, they cause even more damage to the fixtures and fittings than most. I don't want that sort of thing going on where I live."

The female one that had giggled said tiredly, "Why won't they believe we're not-evil demons here to eat the chocolate? We've told them enough times." Even Nabiki laughed at that. "We bought the stuff fair and square. The local supplier seems perfectly happy to trade coffee and chocolate for gold and silver." She looked very miffed.

'Yori' shrugged. "They're idiots. I've told you before. The best thing is to make sure you're gone by the time they turn up."

"We're just about done, actually," Uthryyl said, looking around. "One more van-load outside, then we can spin up the portal and take everything through." He thought for a moment. "If you and Chou could help us unload it we could save some time." 'Yori' glanced at her disguised wife and nodded.

"Sure. No problem." The lizard-like demon went over to the roller door to the outside loading bay and flipped the switch that raised it, while his companions grabbed several more empty carts and wheeled them over. Soon all four demons and the three humans were unloading the van, only taking a few minutes to get the carts packed. Once the empty van was locked again and the door was lowered, they arranged the carts into several neat lines. All four demons took up positions at the corners of a ten-metre square and concentrated. Nabiki could feel a static charge building up in the large room, a slight wind springing up and blowing some dust around. Blinking in surprise she watched from a safe distance as a point in the middle of the square, about a metre off the floor, began to glow.

Within seconds there was a large vertical tear in the fabric of reality hanging in the air in the middle of the warehouse, the bottom edge at floor level. The demons relaxed once the portal was established. "You're getting better at that," 'Yori' commented casually, making the brunette stare at her. Personally she was finding the whole thing pretty damn strange, it was only the fact that she'd been brought up in Nerima that stopped her running screaming into the night. Uthryyl grinned at the praise.

"Thanks. It's not easy, the power requirements are pretty significant, but it should be stable until we shut it down. Right, you lot, start taking the stuff through." The other three demons grabbed a cart each and pushed them towards the portal, the first one to reach it disappearing with a slight flash of light and a faint crackle. As Nabiki watched with amazement the other two did the same, only to reappear within a few seconds to take more carts through. There were enough that it was going to take several minutes to transfer the entire load. "Can I ask a favour?" the demon said. 'Yori' nodded.

"Sure."

"Could you arrange to take the van back to the rental company, and the keys for this warehouse back as well? It's all paid for, we rented both for a month. I don't want to leave any bad feeling behind, it's not good business." At the girl's nod he handed her an envelope and two sets of keys, which disappeared into her ki pocket. "Thanks."

Nabiki was still trying to work out how the hell something that looked like that rented a van, even in Minato, when the roof fell in.
Chapter 11

It wasn't the entire roof, but a pretty good chunk of it landed on the floor narrowly missing everyone, making one hell of a bang. Dust filled the room as five figures dropped through the hole in the ceiling and landed lightly on the floor, pointing an assortment of clearly mystical weapons at the demons. For a second there was silence as the two groups stared at each other. Nabiki recognised the skimpy colour-coded uniforms of one of the most famous magical girl groups, one that was as famous for it's collateral damage as anything else. One girl at the back of the little formation muttered, "Oh, crap. It's Yori." The one in front, the obvious leader of the group, apparently didn't hear this, opening her mouth and beginning a flowery speech about smiting the evil while striking a silly pose, only to nearly bite her tongue off when an absolutely furious 'Yori' appeared in front of her so fast no-one even saw her move.

"WHAT THE FUCKING HELL DO YOU THINK YOU'RE DOING YOU GODDAMN IDIOTS?!" she roared at the blonde from less than twenty centimetres away, almost making her twin ponytails flap in the breeze. The girl shrank back in surprise, worry and no small amount of fear suddenly crossing her face. "Someone is going to have to fix that damn roof, and I'm not going to be the one to pay for it!" the black haired martial artist continued at slightly lower volume but with no less fury in her voice, along with a distinct tone of command which seemed to make them all listen even though they clearly didn't want to.

One of the other girls in the group, the one who had spoken earlier, said quietly, "I told you this was a bad idea. She really doesn't like us." The one standing next to her, another blonde, nudged the girl, who Nabiki saw looked vaguely like a younger version of Akane, hard in the ribs, making her grunt in pain and glare at her compatriot.

At the front of the group, 'Yori' was haranguing the blonde leader who almost looked ready to cry. "I told you last time, stay the hell away from here. If there's a real threat, I will deal with it. NOT YOU! Every time you stupid bitches turn up someone gets hurt, or their house gets blown up, or their car gets destroyed. Most of the time it's all over something completely ridiculous as well. You come barging in, firing off energy attacks every which way, chasing some poor sod just because he or she looks a bit different. Last time three people ended up in hospital and about half a million of someone's yen was needed to fix the road and that shop. All over a guy who just wanted to see some movies."

"He was a demon..." the girl ventured. 'Yori' glared at her.

"He was a tourist! There was no intention of causing any damage, or hurting anyone. He even paid for his ticket! The only people who got hurt, YOU hurt. If I hadn't stopped you you could have killed someone. Fucking hell, you girls are hard of understanding. STAY AWAY FROM MY HOME AND MY FRIENDS!" She yelled the last few words at the top of her voice, making the poor blonde flinch away.

One of the girls at the back of the group raised her weapon and began to point it at the furious martial artist, only to stop dead when a voice in her ear said quietly, "Don't even think about it." She rolled her eyes to the side to see a dangerous looking gold-white light playing about the hand, pointed directly at her head from mere centimetres away, of the black-haired girl's companion, who she would have sworn was nowhere near her until now. Static tingled along her neck, making the hairs stand up. Swallowing hard, she slowly lowered her weapon again. The other woman nodded, but didn't otherwise move.
The blonde leader tried again. "But these are demons as well. They're corrupting the purity of the city." 'Yori' screamed in frustration, grabbed a double handful of the blonde's hair and viciously head-butted her between the eyes while growling in a way that made even the demons look nervous. Nabiki winced, as did all the rest of the blonde's comrades except the short haired one who had commented earlier, who for some reason seemed somewhat satisfied. When the blonde with the silly hairstyle struggled to her feet, clutching her bleeding nose and whimpering in pain, the martial artist gave her an enraged look.

"They're shopping." She stomped over to one of the carts, picked up a crate of chocolate bars, brought it back to the other girl and waved it in her face. "They love chocolate and coffee, but it's not available where they come from. So they buy it here. Buy it! You understand? Give money, get thing?" Handing the crate to Uthryyl who was watching with a wide grin on his toothy face, she spoke as if explaining things to a small and rather dim child. "This is all their property. They own it. The warehouse is rented by them. The van is rented by them. It's all completely legal. YOU are trespassing, and have caused criminal damage to the building. You could have killed someone with that stupid move!" She pointed at the roof, or at least the hole where quite a large part of it used to be. Stepping back and crossing her arms she glared at all five girls, who seemed a mix between scared, worried, and embarrassed. Their leader had substantial pain added to the mix.

The demons had resumed moving their purchases through the portal, stopping occasionally to watch the black-haired girl give the demon-hunters a damn good talking to. It seemed to amuse them considerably. The leader of the group was still staring at 'Yori', who was so furious she was visibly glowing, outlined in a nimbus of purple-white light. It made the other girl extremely nervous. She remembered the last time she'd seen the black-haired girl this angry. That hadn't ended at all well for herself and her friends...

Three of the remaining girls were watching the demons go back and forth through the portal, every now and then sparing the fifth member of their group a glance. She was standing completely still, staring straight ahead while sweating profusely, very conscious of the threat from the blonde right next to her, who hadn't moved a millimetre. Eventually the demons finished transferring their goods, two of them going through the portal and not returning. The other two, the female one and Uthryyl, approached 'Yori' who was still glaring at the blonde leader. "We're done here. Are you going to be OK?" She nodded, not taking her eyes off those of the other girl.

"Yes. I'm sorry about all this mess. It won't happen again." The tone of her voice made it very clear than it damn well better not happen again. The girl she was glaring at looked at the floor, embarrassed. "Take care, Uthryyl. Give my best to your wife." He smiled and slapped her on the back.

"Thanks, Yori. Sorry about the trouble. We can sort this out next time, if that's all right. See you later." Walking over to the portal he waved, as did the female, before they disappeared through it. A few seconds later it shrank away to nothing with a faint pop.

"Right. You lot, you're clearing all this up. I'm going to go over there and watch until you're finished. If you're very lucky I won't tell the insurance company where you live." One of the other girls, one with long flowing black hair, snorted dismissively at this. The martial artist fixed her with a look that made her quail, raising one eyebrow. Prowling over to her with a graceful and dangerous gait, she leaned close and said something to her that made her go white. Nabiki could just hear what sounded like a list of names and addresses. The other four girls paled as well, exchanging worried looks. "Aside from anything else your operational security is a joke," 'Yori' commented sourly. She glanced at the one that looked a little like Akane. "You're the smart one, I'd have thought you'd have worked all this out." The girl gazed at her boots, very embarrassed.
Waving at the large pile of metal panels and support beams on the floor, 'Yori' invited them to get to work. Slowly, they walked over and began to pick up all the rubble. Nabiki helpfully handed the leader a broom she'd found leaning against the wall, smirking a little. It was close to performance art, the way that the disguised Ranma had dealt with the group. Once she'd gotten over the possibility of personal danger she'd found the entire thing extremely funny.

It took the team of magical girls nearly an hour to tidy up to 'Yori's' satisfaction. When they were finally finished, sweating and covered in dust, she walked over and inspected the work, looking up at the hole in the roof with a grunt of irritation. "God, you lot aren't subtle, are you?" She shook her head in disgust. "I'm serious. Do this again and you really won't like what I'll do. You won't like it at all." Picking up a hundred-kilo piece of steel girder as if it was weightless she started to whittle the end into a point with a short energy beam coming from her right hand. All five girls froze, staring in horror. "Now sod off."

They looked at each other then slowly filed out the exit. When she was sure they were gone, 'Yori' tossed the girder, or what was left of it, back onto the pile of debris with a clang. "Fuckwits." Nabiki walked over smiling.

"That was pretty funny. Are they all like that?"

"No, luckily. Some are nearly as bad as far as their lack of common sense goes, but don't have the raw power of that bunch. It's a good thing the others didn't come, there's several more of them. This lot seems to be the core though. They cause so much damage you wouldn't believe it." Sighing, she added, "One or two of the groups are actually pretty sane. My friends, for example. Some of them are batshit crazy. That lot is about in the middle sanity wise, near the bottom in common sense and respect for other people's property. They started off well, but got more and more over the top as time passed." Looking around the damaged warehouse she shook her head in irritation. "This is going to be expensive."

Nabiki looked puzzled. "What do you mean?"

"She means that we're going to end up paying for the repairs. Again." 'Chou' also sighed. "This place was rented by some friends, so we're going to arrange to get it fixed. We don't want Uthryyl and his people to end up with a bad reputation, they're decent people. The next time they come we'll get reimbursed but in the mean time we'll have to get this dealt with."

"How on earth did you end up friends with demons?" her sister asked, very curious. 'Yori' smiled.

"Quite easily, actually. I met them when they were buying a lot of ice cream a year or so ago. It turns out that their people have an enormous sweet tooth, and a massive caffeine habit. It's cheaper for them to import it from here than most other places they could get it, so they were in the middle of moving a couple of truckloads of ice cream through a portal when I detected it and went to have a look. We got to talking, they offered me some..." Nabiki cut her off with a laugh.

"Ah. I can see where this is going. The way to your heart is definitely paved with ice cream." Both 'Yori' and 'Chou' giggled.

"True enough. Anyway, they're friends of ours, and this is the second time that bunch of twits has crashed the party. There won't be a third one." Her face had hardened a lot. "Next time they try something like this I may start removing limbs." She glanced at her wife with a sudden smile. "I saw you threatening that fool earlier. Nicely done." The blonde smiled happily.

"Thank you. I thought it was a bit overdramatic myself, but she seemed to believe me." Her sister was grinning at her. She'd thought it was pretty impressive herself. "Shall we go and look around the neighbourhood for a while on the way home?" 'Chou' asked her sister. Nabiki stared at her.

"OK. But no roof-hopping! Clear?" The other woman nodded with a smile, while 'Yori' looked puzzled. They left the building, the black-haired girl locking it behind them.

"I'll take the van back tomorrow and arrange to get the roof fixed as well." She looked at Nabiki. "We use a firm of contractors that started in Nerima, oddly enough. They know a lot about repairing damage from... unusual causes." The middle Tendo laughed.

"Not surprising. Unusual causes in Nerima are so common they're the usual causes." A thought struck her, making her ask, "I'm surprised you didn't detect those girls before they dropped through the roof. I'd have thought it was well within your abilities." 'Yori' looked annoyed.

"It is, but the inter-world portal kicked up so much interference it masked them until it was too late. If I'd been a couple of hundred metres from it I'd have felt them coming from a kilometre away. They radiate so much magic it's ridiculous. How they ever manage to sneak up on demons or anyone else reasonably sensitive who isn't standing right next to an active portal is beyond me." The three women slowly walked back in the direction of the apartment building, one or other of the married pair pointing out things of interest on the way. Half-way back they stopped to watch as a group of very drunk students spilled out of a bar near the university, shouting and laughing. 'Yori' shook her head in disgust.

"I really don't see the point in getting drunk. I can almost understand drinking with some friends to relax a little, if that's something you enjoy and can stand the taste, but to deliberately put yourself into a state like that...?" She waved at a couple of young men who were staggering about the road, causing the light traffic to slow down amidst considerable sounding of horns. "That's just stupid." One of the men fell over in the road in front of a truck moving fast enough that it probably wouldn't be able to stop in time and she sighed, then jumped into the road, scooping him up and springing back to safety in one smooth motion. "Stop being an idiot, you idiot," she snarled, slapping his face a couple of times. Propping him on his feet she pushed him towards his friends who were watching in drunken disbelief. "Take this fool somewhere safe and make him lie down."

The young man staggered forward, landing in the arms of two other slightly less inebriated students, who held onto him while staring at the three women. One of them smiled at her, while the other frankly leered. "Thanks," the smiling one said. "We'll take him home."

"Would you like to come with us?" asked the leering one in a salacious manner. His colleague kicked him in the ankle quite hard.

"Shut up, you idiot," he said out of the side of his mouth, while still smiling at the three women who were watching him with interest. "Do you have any idea who that is?" His friend smirked, looking at the black haired girl's chest.

"Someone I want to get closer to." The saner one's eyes widened, while 'Yori's' narrowed.

"Shut up, shut up, shut UP!" the first one whispered frantically. "That's Yori and Chou. For fuck's sake don't make them angry." His friend's eyes snapped to the smouldering ones of the martial artist and he gulped.

"Oh, shit," the young man mumbled, while Nabiki watched with cold amusement. 'Chou' had her hand on her female husband's shoulder, just in case. "Um, I'm really sorry, Miss Yori." He swallowed again. "Thanks for saving Jirou." Glancing at his friend he licked his lips, then pointed in a random direction. "We'll just be going now." The pair beat a hasty retreat with their semicomatose burden, head hanging and feet dragging, slung between them. When they were safely away Nabiki snickered.

"Well, 'Yori', you seem to have something of a reputation around here." Her sister laughed, releasing her husband.

"There were a few, um, incidents when we first moved in. She's still not used to being approached like that yet and tends to react... abruptly." Both sisters looked at the black-haired young woman who was gritting her teeth and watching the three men disappear into the distance. Nabiki nudged her.

"Take it as a compliment and let it go." The girl relaxed slightly, sighing.

"Sorry. It wouldn't normally upset me so much but I'm still kind of pissed off after what happened at the warehouse."

"You did seem to be pretty mad in there. I mean, head-butting a famous magical girl in the face? That's an interesting martial arts move." Nabiki had found it quite amusing, more for the expression on the girl's face than anything else. She certainly hadn't been expecting it. 'Yori' blushed.

"It was kind of spur of the moment. Those girls wind me right up, that one particularly for some reason." She chuckled. "Anyway, it worked. It wasn't elegant, I'll admit, but it was effective."

"I think you broke her nose."

"Oh, they're pretty tough. They've got some magical healing abilities as well, she'll get better. But hopefully she'll remember the pain and not be quite so eager to punch holes in other people's roofs next time." They walked along the street past several other bars and a couple of nightclubs, whose bouncers all nodded respectfully to 'Yori' as they passed. She stopped and chatted briefly with a couple of them who seemed to know her. Nabiki looked at her sister with her eyebrows up a bit.

"For the last year or so, ever since 'Yori' has been seen out and about, she sometimes gets involved in dealing with the locals who can't handle their drink. The bars and nightclubs like it, she doesn't involve the police but shuts down any trouble very quickly. That's another reason she has something of a reputation. Most of the second year and older students know her, or at least know of her, and are very polite." She grinned. "Or just run away when they see her coming." The younger Tendo laughed, easily able to picture this. Rejoining them the martial artist looked amused.

"Apparently the word got around that I'm in a bad mood and people are suddenly being very careful not to start fights." Giggling, they moved on. After a while Nabiki was wondering how they intended to get back into the apartment without anyone seeing, but just as she was about to ask, both her companions stopped dead, turning and looking off to the right. "Damn. Now what?" 'Yori' said grumpily, getting annoyed all over again. 'Chou' glanced at her.

"It feels familiar." She nodded. Nabiki watched both of them wondering what was happening.

"aaaaaaaaAAAlAAAHHHHH!" The scream grew closer and louder, causing all three of them and several bystanders to look up. A figure flew over the roof of the building next to them with it's limbs flailing, crashing into the road before even the martial artists had time to react. 'Yori' and her wife ran over to the crater in the road, Nabiki following more slowly. When she got there they were helping another young woman to her feet. She was dressed in a now rather tattered outfit that was even less there that that of the previous group of magical girls, and looked extremely battered. She'd obviously been involved in a major fight. The fall hadn't improved her either. Her left arm was clearly broken and she was covered in wounds, a couple of which appeared quite bad. The various bystanders, having recovered from their shock, cleared out with alacrity.
"Yori," she gasped painfully. "I'm sorry, we couldn't think of anything else to do. This one is really bad. We're herding it this way. Help." 'Yori' seemed shocked at the state of the girl, Nabiki realising from her expression that she obviously knew the auburn-haired female. Spotting a familiar looking bracelet on her arm she also realised that this must be one of the group that the martial artist considered friends. Just then there was a crash of falling roof tiles and all the women spun, looking up to see something horrific falling off the roof of a building down the street, followed by three more girls dressed identically to the one bleeding in 'Chou's' arms. The creature landed on a parked car, crushing it flat in an explosion of flying glass, before rolling off what was left and slowly getting to it's feet. Nabiki stared in horror.

Unlike the chocolate-loving demons from before, which after the initial shock of their appearance had seemed fairly harmless and just a bit odd-looking, this thing was clearly not only very alien but extremely dangerous. Some three metres tall and covered in dark green chitin forming an exoskeleton, it loosely resembled a very large insect, but with only four limbs. All four terminated in vicious claws that dripped blood. The limbs were out of proportion to the body looking far too long. The head was a nightmare, something that would haunt Nabiki's dreams for months. Four huge compound eyes on short stalks swivelled around tracking each girl independently while a set of mandibles worked against each other, dripping some sort of liquid and occasionally uncovering a mouth that seemed to also have an unnecessarily large number of teeth in it. A long tail moved fluidly behind it, the end having several long spikes coming out sideways. This was clearly able to be used as a weapon as it also had blood on it.

The thing leaned forwards and roared at the three girls, who raised their various weapons and stepped forward. The one 'Chou' was holding gasped out, "It regenerates too fast. It's killed at least five people that I know of, and wounded several more. We found it eating one of the bodies. No idea where it came from, never seen one like it before. We've been trying to put it down for an hour so far. The portal it came from closed, we can't send it back." 'Yori' nodded grimly.

Glancing at her wife and her wife's sister, she ordered, "Take Tamiko over there and see if you can do something about that arm. I'm going to try to get this thing to follow me to the park, there's too many people in the buildings around here to deal with it properly." 'Chou' looked worried but nodded, gently supporting the wounded girl. The disguised Ranma spared her a quick smile before turning to look at the monstrous creature. "HEY! Ugly thing!" A ball of ki shot from her hand and blew a crater in the demon's back, provoking it to produce a hissing scream that made everyone's ears hurt. Whipping around much faster than one would expect from it's size it fixed all four eyes on the black-haired girl, who muttered, 'OK, that got it's attention at least." The three magical girls on the other side of the thing started to move towards it but stopped when she looked at them and shook her head.

Stepping closer she fired another ki ball at it, hitting it in the chest. Once more the resulting explosion made it stagger slightly, screaming in rage. Nabiki watched wide-eyed from the sidewalk next to her sister, shocked by the noise and also the way the crater in the exoskeleton rapidly filled in, leaving no trace of a wound. "Damn. It really does regenerate quickly." 'Yori' commented. Suddenly breaking into a run she shot towards the thing before it could react, blurring out of the range of normal vision. There was a flash of purple-white light forming an arc and half it's left arm dropped onto the road. Yet another scream followed her attack, this one sounding very angry. Everyone watched as the arm regrew in a matter of seconds. The body part lying on the road dissolved into a foul-smelling liquid almost immediately.

"Oh my god", Nabiki breathed, horrified and scared. The thing took a couple of steps forward, slashing at the form of the martial artist, much faster than a normal person could have evaded but far too slowly to have any chance of tagging her. She moved out of range easily, then darted back in and cut off it's right arm with her ki beam. Nabiki thought hysterically that George Lucas would be after her for copyright violations if he ever saw this, the 'light-sabre' effect was very impressive. It even made a humming noise. In a detached state of mind she wondered if that was deliberate, for effect.

Once more the removed limb regrew in seconds. The creature was beyond furious by now, and had entered the scene in a pretty bad mood in the first place. Abruptly moving much faster than it had up until now it only just missed 'Yori', who barely got out of the way in time. With a hard smile she produced a second energy sword in her other hand, each one about two metres long, then proceeded to remove all four limbs in a dazzling display of skill. The torso of the thing dropped to the road roaring in pain and fury, only to rise to it's regenerated feet ten seconds later. Moving back she waved her energy weapons at it, beckoning it forward. The thing eagerly took the challenge, charging forward with a roar, following her as she turned and ran. The other three girls looked at each other, shrugged, and dashed after them.

Nabiki stared, then turned to look at her sister who met her eyes with a worried gaze. "Is she going to be all right?"

"I hope so." The older sister turned her attention to the wounded girl in her arms, who was gently bleeding all over her clothes, having slipped into unconsciousness during the fight. Lowering her to the pavement 'Chou' inspected her carefully, then placed her hand over the worst of the wounds. Golden light flared beneath her palm and Tamiko twitched. Watching with amazement, Nabiki gasped when her sister removed her hand to reveal the wound had closed up and now looked like it was a couple of weeks old at least.

"Good god, Kasumi," she said quietly, "That's the most impressive thing yet." Her sister smiled but shushed her.

"Chou. Please, it's important." Nabiki smiled slightly, embarrassed.

"Sorry. But, that's really amazing. Ra... 'Yori' mentioned how she'd come up with it, but aside from that night I've never seen it in action. And my mind was sort of occupied at the time." Her sister glanced briefly at her and nodded, most of her attention on healing another wound.

"That's all right. Yes, it is amazing. It was one of the more difficult things to learn, it takes fine control and a certain mindset that she is a master of but most people find quite difficult to achieve. She's better at doing it without scarring, I'm faster." Finishing with the deep wounds, she turned her attention to the broken arm. "Here, hold her arm in this position. Don't move." Both hands glowed and Tamiko convulsed in pain even unconscious. "Hold it still!" she snapped. Doing her best, Nabiki leaned on the girl, maintaining her grip on the arm above and below the break. After thirty seconds or so 'Chou' leaned back, sweating a little. "That should do it. It's going to be pretty tender for a few days but it's mostly healed. We can finish that up later."

Reaching down she placed her hand in the middle of the girl's chest, once more golden light flaring around it. A few seconds later Tamiko's eyes opened. "Chou?" she asked weakly, looking up at the two faces gazing at her with worry. Suddenly sitting up, she grabbed her head in both hands, yelping in pain. "Owww!" She looked around, then flexed her arm. "Thanks. Where are Yori and the others?"

"She led it off to the park to get it away from people. I think she's going to do something impressive to it and didn't want to wreck the street," Nabiki said. Tamiko looked curiously at her, her eyes widening when she spotted the bracelet the brunette was wearing.

"Who are you?" she enquired. 'Chou' smiled at her.
"This is my sister."

"The mercenary one? Or the violent one?" the auburn haired magical girl asked with a quizzical expression. Nabiki flushed.

"The mercenary one," 'Chou' said with a laugh. Glancing at her sister who looked irritated, she amended her statement. "Formerly mercenary one. Be nice, I missed her." Tamiko nodded, grasping her head again with a pained expression.

"Agh. I need some serious painkillers." Struggling to her feet aided by the blonde, she limped around in a circle testing her injuries, stopping after a moment and inspecting her clothes. "Damn it, I only just repaired this after the last time. Now look at it!"

The magical girl and the martial artist sister suddenly froze, then turned to look down the street. "Hell, that's going to be big," Tamiko whispered in shock. Nabiki thought she could feel something weird, as if her head was picking up static like a badly tuned TV. Almost immediately a purple flash like a huge electrical discharge lit the entire street, followed by a rising flare of purple-white light from somewhere a kilometre or so away beyond the buildings. Seconds later the sound reached them, an echoing bass thump that rolled down the street making everything vibrate. Nabiki jumped, watching in horror. Ranma had done that? It looked and sounded like a small nuke had detonated. Both her companions winced and held their heads. "Damn. How much power did she put into that for god's sake? It felt like enough to vaporise a building." Tamiko shook her head, tilting it to one side as if trying to get water out of her ear.

"That's left a mark," 'Chou' said with a tired smile. "At least it wasn't in the middle of the road." They started walking in the direction of the blast, both the Tendo girls assisting the other one who was still unsteady on her feet. The trip to the park took several minutes, the injured female warrior was limping badly still, but they eventually reached it. A few people including three policemen were standing on the pavement watching four figures on the grass to one side of a substantial hole in the ground. Nabiki stared in disbelief. The crater was nearly twenty metres across and at least one and a half deep in the middle, lined with what looked like dark glass. She could feel the heat coming from it from fifty metres away. There was no sign at all of the monster. 'Yori' was kneeling on the ground a few metres from the crater looking at it, while the three remaining members of the group of demon hunters sprawled on the grass, looking like they'd simply fallen over from exhaustion. 'Chou' nodded to one of the policemen as she walked past supporting Tamiko and he returned the nod, moving out of her way respectfully. Nabiki kept quiet and went along with it. As they approached 'Yori' stood up, stretching and grunting in mild discomfort.

"Damn, that thing hit like a wrecking ball," she commented, rubbing her side. Her clothing was torn and there was some blood on it. 'Chou' left Tamiko in her sisters care and moved quickly to support her husband, inspecting the wound carefully.

"Doesn't look too bad, it's mostly healed already." She glanced at the crater with her eyebrows going up. "Was that much power completely necessary?" she asked mildly, giving the other woman a look. 'Yori' nodded slightly shamefacedly.

"I may have overdone it a little. But it was really tough!" she pleaded, looking guilty. Her wife smiled.

"I hope the park authorities don't complain too much, that's all."
"They can fill it with water and make another duck pond," the black haired girl said with a quick grin. "It's probably saved them money in the end." 'Chou' shook her head with a long-suffering expression.

"I suppose we should be grateful you didn't light that off in the middle of town." Releasing her husband she glanced at the three magical girls, who were now sitting up and talking. "Are they OK?"

"More or less. I think Aiko may have some broken ribs, that thing kicked her into a tree pretty hard, but it's mostly just cuts and bruises." She looked around, then walked over to the policemen, Nabiki trailing her curiously. Behind them 'Chou' and Tamiko joined the other girls, the Tendo woman quickly checking them over and healing anything serious. "Hi, Sergeant. Sorry about the noise." The man looked at her with a neutral expression, then significantly at the large crater. She blushed. "And the hole." The policeman smiled slightly, one corner of his mouth rising for a moment.

"That's all right, Yori. I saw what you were fighting, I'm just glad we got away with only some minor civic remodelling. Compared to what happens in the rest of the ward this is nothing." He stuck a finger in his ear and wiggled it around. "Mind you, I'm going to have trouble hearing for a week after that." She grinned.

"I'll stop by the station tomorrow and give you a report, if that's OK? Also, there's a squashed car and a damaged roof back by the sports bar, you know the place?" He nodded. "Let me know who the owners are and I'll pass on the details." They shook hands and the police left. Nabiki had watched all this with a certain bemusement. As they walked back to rejoin her sister and the four female warriors, she looked curiously at the martial artist.

"That seemed remarkably painless." 'Yori' smiled.

"Yes, we have an arrangement with the police, they're nearly as pragmatic about this sort of thing as the ones back in Nerima are. I do my best to keep the collateral damage to a minimum, they keep everyone else out of it. They're not stupid, they know full well when they're out of their league and stay well back. Most of them seem to appreciate us dealing with the odd problem for them. Since we moved in the rate of damage from this sort of thing dropped off a cliff which has made pretty much everyone in the area grateful. We get cut a lot of slack when something does go wrong, like tonight, as a result."

"What was that about the car and the roof?"

'Yori' sighed a little. "Insurance claims can be difficult to work out around here. It's not fair to deprive someone of their car, for example, just because some stupid monster from one of the lower hells decided to land on it and the insurance won't pay up. If we have to, we sort out the damage claims. Sometimes it's just a matter of going to the insurance company and asking nicely." She grinned nastily, making it clear that 'nicely' might be a variable. "Worst case we pay for it through a trust we set up a couple of years ago. Local businesses contribute to it as well, a second line of insurance in a way. It doesn't get talked about much outside the area, no one wants to upset the cart, but people are pretty pleased about it around here. That also goes a long way to keeping them happier."

"You seem to have things well in hand", Nabiki commented, impressed. The thoroughness of the arrangements was remarkable. 'Yori' nodded glumly.

"Pretty much. I just wish it wasn't needed. I don't seem to be able to go anywhere without some weird shit happening sooner or later. At least around here everyone is more or less used to it."
Arriving at the group of women, all of whom were now standing, she looked around. "Nice to see you guys again. Pity you didn't call ahead." They all smiled painfully.

One of them, a short brunette with blue eyes, sourly said, "It's not like we had a choice, Yori. That thing was handing us our asses on a plate." The martial artist chuckled. "I can see. You look like you've been through a blender. Where the hell did it come from?" The young woman shrugged in a disgusted manner.

"Not a fucking clue. We were out dealing with some pretty innocuous stuff, some Yakuza thugs who were robbing a jewellery store, when we detected the portal opening. We went to find out what was going on, thirty seconds later we were in a fight for our lives." An unhappy expression crossed her face. "It had already killed at least five people in a house. Then it started eating them." Everyone looked upset and disgusted.

"We need to find out where it came from, why, and how. One was bad enough, if more turn up that would be a problem." 'Yori' thought for a moment, then added, "And if someone brought it here deliberately I would like to talk to them." Everyone noticed she was glowing slightly and stepped back, except for 'Chou' who moved closer and hugged her. After a moment the faint aura subsided.

"Later, love. Right now we need to get out of here." Looking around at the dozen or so spectators still watching from a distance, she motioned slightly with her head. Her husband followed her gaze and nodded in a tired manner.

"True enough." Glancing at the group of skimpily dressed magical warrior girls, she asked, "You guys want to come back and rest?" They exchanged glances and agreed. "Aiko, do you have enough power for a teleport? We can drop the wards for a few seconds from here." The short brunette pulled out a golden talisman in the shape of a pair of wings, hanging on a chain around her neck, and looked at it for a moment.

"I'm low. If you can give me a boost we should be OK, though." 'Yori' reached out and held the thing with her fingertips briefly, a bright purple glow running over it and then subsiding.

"Is that enough?" The girl nodded.

"More than enough. Thanks." 'Chou' concentrated for a moment then glanced at the girl. "The wards are down, you've got ten seconds. Aim for the practice room please, it's easier to clean." Motioning her sister over from where she was watching a couple of metres away, she moved closer to the girl herself as did the others.

Aiko looked around to make sure everyone was in range. "OK. Get ready. 3.2.1." There was a flash that left the spectators rubbing their eyes. When they could see again the park was empty. They all looked impressed, then wandered off in small groups comparing notes and rating the evenings excitement. Everyone felt it scored at least eight out of ten.
Nabiki staggered across the polished wooden floor of the practice room, collapsing near the wall with her head spinning. "That was worse than the roof-hopping," she mumbled, lying on the floor watching the ceiling gently spin. Her sister reverted to her normal appearance with a sigh, walking over and kneeling beside her.

"It will pass quickly. The first time through a teleport is always disorienting. I threw up for ten minutes the first time I experienced it." Kasumi patted her sister on the shoulder, then got up and returned to the others. Aiko was sitting on the floor with an exhausted look on her face, Ranma in her normal female shape squatting beside her healing her ribs. She looked up at her wife.

"I think these guys should stay the night, they're in no shape to go home right now." Kasumi nodded agreement.

"I'll get the guest rooms ready. Two of you are going to have to share, if that's OK?" She looked quizzically at the magical girl group. Tamiko glanced at Aiko, then smiled.

"I don't mind sharing with Aiko if she's OK with it." The brunette agreed, wincing as Ranma finished healing her ribs.

"Ow. Thanks, Ranma." She got to her feet with some aid from the red-head. "And thanks for helping us. That thing was a handful. If you hadn't been here it could have become unpleasant." She looked curiously at the martial artist. "On the way over, even in the middle of all that, I could have sworn I felt a portal form."

"Yes, it was Uthryyl and his crew on another shopping trip." Aiko laughed painfully, clutching her side.

"I hope they left some chocolate for the rest of us. That's the third time this year. He must be making a fortune at home from it." Ranma smiled.

"Probably. He certainly seemed in a good mood. Until you know who decided to drop through the roof." She gave a quick description of the intervention of the other group of magical girls and what had happened. Aiko started laughing again, as did the other three.

"Seriously? You head-butted her?" A slightly embarrassed but also amused Ranma nodded.

"Right in the face. Broke her nose. She looked like someone had eaten her puppy." The warrior women howled with laughter, as Nabiki sat up and watched, feeling much better. There didn't seem to be much love lost between the two groups, she reflected with interest.

"Serves them right. That blue-haired girl is all right, but most of the rest of them are gung-ho idiots. I'm constantly surprised they haven't killed any innocents yet," Tamiko said with a frown. "It's only a matter of time." Ranma sighed.

"I know. Their stupid prophecy seems to have made them believe anything they do is for 'The Greater Good'." She made little air quotes in a sarcastic manner. "No common sense, they just jump right in. If it wasn't for the fact that they seem to have quite a high hit rate on real problems I'd be even more annoyed about it all. I just wish they'd go on a course on threat assessment or something, not simply dive in guns blazing at the smallest hint of something from another world. It makes relations with legitimate travellers very difficult. I keep having to apologise to someone they've had a go at." The expression on her face made it clear she wasn't impressed. Nabiki giggled.
at the concept of magical girl training courses, wondering wildly if this was something the Minato universities should teach. Glancing at her Ranma quirked an eyebrow. She couldn't work out how to explain her thought so just shrugged helplessly.

The red-head grinned, having some idea of what she was feeling. This must all be a bit much for her. "Exciting night out, hmm, Nabiki? Was it what you were expecting?" The brunette laughed a little hysterically.

"Is it always like this? If so, how exactly have you gained by leaving Nerima?" Ranma snickered.

"No, tonight was weird even for this place. Not the weirdest night I've ever had, even back in Nerima, but pretty strange. Most of the time it's much quieter, I went to quite a lot of trouble to make sure of that." She looked at the various people standing around her. "Come on, let's go and sit down. You guys can wash up, we have some robes you can borrow, then Kas and I can finish healing anything that needs it. Anyone want something to eat?" Several heads nodded. The entire group went into the living room, then split up, Nabiki slumping onto the sofa with a sigh, the four magical girls heading for the various bathrooms. They clearly knew their way around. Shortly the middle Tendo sister was alone in the room. She leaned back and closed her eyes, thinking on the last few hours with wonder. A few minutes later, half-asleep, she heard light footsteps and opened one eye, then the other when she saw it was her sister. Kasumi sat beside her handing her a cup of tea.

"I know you prefer coffee, but this is less likely to keep you awake," she commented with a small smile, sipping her own cup. Her sister took the offered tea and tried it.

"Thank you." They sat in companionable silence for a little while. Eventually Nabiki turned her head and studied her sister, who returned her gaze with a familiar unreadable smile.

"You have a very strange life," she commented. Kasumi merely sipped her tea. "I mean, we just teleported from a park a kilometre away into your house, after your husband, who was female at the time and disguised with a shape-shifting illusion spell, blew an enormous crater in the ground in the process of disposing of some weird man eating monster from a different dimension. There are four magical girls using the bathrooms right now. That same husband is more of a magical girl than they are!" She shook her head. "Not to mention the demons with the rented warehouse full of chocolatey goodness, which they're exporting to hell or something like that. And the other magical girls, and everything else." She drank some more tea. "It's weird." Kasumi grinned at her.

"It's never boring." Nabiki nearly choked as a sudden attack of the giggles caught her. When Ranma came in a minute or two later having showered and changed her clothes, she looked at the two sisters giggling together on the sofa with a raised eyebrow. Nabiki pointed at her and whispered something to her sister which made them laugh until tears ran down their faces. The red-head shrugged, heading for the kitchen.

Eventually the whole group of seven people was sitting around the table, having a late meal. Nabiki wasn't hugely hungry, since the meal earlier had been quite large, but still ate something, while the others were ravenous. She looked around the table at the two familiar faces and the four new ones. She knew the names of two of them, but the other two hadn't said much yet or introduced themselves. The group seemed to have a higher average age than the ones that had dropped in on the warehouse, looking like they were late teens to early twenties. The other lot had been around sixteen or seventeen. Ranma noticed her glances and correctly interpreted them.

"That's Fumiko and Misaki." Fumiko, a tall girl with short dark hair dyed blonde at the tips and grey eyes smiled at her over her chopsticks, while Misaki, who looked similar enough to be either a sister or a cousin, but with light brown hair and almost black eyes, was concentrating too hard on "Forgive her, we haven't had much to eat today. She's permanently starving anyway." Fumiko grinned, then went back to eating.

"She doesn't do much more than grunt either," Aiko commented with a sly smile. Misaki stopped eating and glared at her, then shrugged with another grunt and went back to shovelling food in as fast as possible. Everyone laughed. "Case in point," the short girl said, giggling.

Ranma shifted to male, getting up to refill the teapot. Tamiko watched him leave the room, shaking her head in wonder. "I don't think I'll every get used to that no matter how many times I see it." She glanced at Kasumi with a grin. "So which do you prefer in the bedroom?" Everyone stopped eating and stared at the eldest Tendo, who blushed. After a moment she produced a small, remarkably perverted smile and sipped her tea, not saying anything. Tamiko laughed and saluted her with her chopsticks, resuming her meal. Nabiki studied her sister for a while, wondering, as Kasumi met her gaze evenly. Deciding it was none of her business while at the same time being quite curious, Nabiki went back to eating as well. When Ranma came back he was met by six grinning women.

"What?" he asked, feeling slightly worried. They all burst out laughing. "Women are weird," he muttered, sitting down amidst even more laughter. The young man sat and sulked for a moment, feeling surrounded, before looking at Nabiki. "I'm going to have to relieve you of that bracelet." She smiled, slightly disappointed.

"I was hoping you forgot."

"I'll just bet you were." He smirked. "But I think a Nabiki Tendo with effective invisibility might be a bit too much for Nerima." Laughing, she removed the device and handed it over. "If you ever really need it let me know, I think we could help you out." Making it vanish he poured more tea for everyone.

Nabiki noticed a few minute later that she seemed to have massive difficulty remembering the faces of the four newcomers. When she looked at them directly, everything was perfectly normal, but seconds later she found their faces were just a blank spot in her mind. Aiko noticed her looking at them intently, then away, furrowing her forehead in an attempt to remember. "It's the bracelets. Ours are still on. While you were wearing one it neutralised the effect, but because you weren't present when they were activated it still affects you." She glanced at Ranma and Kasumi. "Can we trust her?" They looked at each other before nodding. "OK." Something indefinable changed about her. Nabiki inspected her for a moment trying to work out what it was, then glanced away. This time she could remember her face.

"That's very strange. I can see how it would be useful, though, in your line of work." The other three also deactivated their identity masking devices. Tamiko spoke up.

"We have to be careful. You start to get very paranoid when you think about how some people might want to seek revenge, or attack you, something like that. You get a lot more paranoid when you think about your families, especially if they don't know what you are and what you do."

"So how does one become a magical girl, anyway?" Nabiki asked curiously. Indicating Ranma with a finger, she said, "I know how he did, but what about the rest of you?" Ranma looked insulted.

"I am not a magical girl." His sister-in-law stared at him.

"Really? A man who magically becomes female? Who uses illusion magic without even thinking about it? You're more a magical girl than they are." The four females turned to look at him with interest.

"She's right," Fumiko said with a grin. Misaki nodded, still eating. The grunt this time was affirmative. Sitting back in his chair and crossing his arms defensively the martial artist grumbled.

"Not a magical girl," he muttered to himself, staring daggers at the innocent plate in front of him. Laughing, Aiko turned back to Nabiki. Kasumi leaned over and put an arm around her husband comfortably, but her eyes were twinkling.

"It varies. There are all sorts of stories, some based around reincarnation, old gods or demons, or magical artefacts from the deep past. In our case it was sort of a mix, a statue of an ancient being, no one knows if it was a god, a demon, an alien, or what. We ran across it on a school trip years ago in a museum in Kyoto. One thing led to another, we kind of got caught up in a spell gone bad, next thing you know we have these weapons and some magic powers and tools. It was a bit of a shock. For a while we tried to pretend it never happened, but the weirdness kept finding us. In the end we didn't have much choice."

"Who decided on the uniforms?" Nabiki was smiling a little, they really were extremely immodest. She could see why Ranma had found them so irritating. Aiko groaned.

"Not really our choice. When we use the magic, which gives us a large boost in speed and strength, our clothes turn into those things. Unfortunately they don't change back." The girl appeared annoyed. "I lost several really nice outfits because of that at first." She sighed. "Unlike some magical girl uniforms these ones aren't armoured or anything useful like that. They just expose as much skin as possible. Whoever designed that spell was a real lech." Tamiko laughed.

"She hates them. I don't mind, but I've got nice legs." All three of her team-mates gave her nasty looks, while Nabiki giggled.

"So why were you annoyed about having to repair the uniform earlier, if you can just make new ones?"

The auburn-haired girl looked at her as if she was mad. "Clothes are expensive! I don't want all my nice dresses turned into more uniforms."

"Ah. I see." It seemed a fairly silly argument but she could accept it.

"Some magical girls get fancy transformation sequences with pretty lights and sounds. We have to find somewhere to change, or lose yet another set of clothes." Aiko seemed pretty grumpy about the whole affair. Brightening up, she grinned and glanced at Ranma. "At least that meant we had spares when Ranma stood in for me. We're even about the same size." Everyone looked at the martial artist again, who looked embarrassed. Nabiki nearly lost it again, picturing him in female form wearing one of their uniforms. Having seen one she found it even funnier than when she'd imagined it earlier.

"Perhaps you can model for us later?" she suggested, giggling manically when he glared.

"No chance."

"Oh, come on Saotome! Let us see your long smooth legs!" Kasumi collapsed in laughter, her sister not far behind her. The other four were giggling, even Misaki having to stop eating for a moment.

"It's not funny. Shut up." He crossed his arms again and glared at them which only made them laugh harder.
When the laughter died down, Tamiko glanced at Nabiki, then at Ranma. "If Nabiki here has found you, does that mean you're going to approach your family now?" Kasumi and her husband looked at each other. With a sad sigh, Ranma shook his head.

"I don't think so. To be honest, if I never see any of them again it wouldn't worry me much. I know Kas misses her other sister and her father, but as for me... My father is a child abusing drunkard, while my mother is missing some fairly important marbles. Akane very nearly drove me to commit either suicide or murder." They all looked sympathetic, and a little scared by the concept, knowing damn well how dangerous the martial artist was even when not homicidally angry. "As for the rest of that lot of lunatics? Cologne is a manipulating bitch, if we're being polite. Oh, sure, I learned a lot from her, and I think she still has a lot I'd love to learn, but anything she ever taught me came with huge strings attached. Shampoo is in many respects a nice girl, and a fine warrior, but she's as obsessive as Akane about me although less obvious about it. Mousse is as obsessive as that about her, and is that obvious. Ryoga is just a pain. Ukyo... Her I kind of miss."

Falling silent he reflected on the chef. "She was pretty, intelligent, a good martial artist, and a very good cook." Turning his head to look at Kasumi, he added, "I already have one of those, though." She held his hand with a pleased smile. "I hope she and Konatsu make a go of it, I really do. They're both good people, probably the best of that lot." He thought about what he'd said, then shrugged. "No, all things considered I'm in no hurry to ever meet any of them ever again. The only ones I could stand either came with me or eventually tracked me down." Grinning at Nabiki he squeezed Kasumi's hand, then picked up his chopsticks. Aiko looked at his wife.

"What about you, Kasumi?" She looked sad.

"I would like to see Akane and Father again. I do understand what Ranma means, I know what he went through. But they're my family. One day, perhaps."

"Except for Akane, the rest of them do seem to slowly becoming more sensible," Nabiki commented. "Father and Genma seem to be doing fairly well as teachers, I think. It's definitely been good for our father, he's much more like the person I remember from when I was little. Genma is still a lazy idiot, but he's actually working now. It's made quite a difference." Ranma listened with a neutral expression.

"This may be true. But I can never forget what he put me through in the name of training. Oh, it was effective, I'll give him that. But I'm pretty sure that there are methods equally as effective that are less psychologically damaging." Shaking his head in disgust, he ate a few more bites. "A couple more years of him, and I would either have snapped and slaughtered everyone in Furinkan, or killed myself. Or both. Akane and the rest were pushing that timetable to a matter of weeks." The dark-haired young man put his chopsticks down and stared at his bowl, while everyone else looked at him uncomfortably.

"It was so close. So very close. If things had worked out even slightly differently..." Putting down her own chopsticks Kasumi got up and knelt next to him, putting her arms around him.

"It didn't happen then and now it never will, my love. You've grown past that. The man I love is so much better than what those people tried to force him to be. I'm more grateful than you can possibly imagine that I was finally able to see that." Ranma looked at her for a long moment while the others watched, before his hand came up to cup her chin.

"If it wasn't for you... Don't ever leave me, Kas."

"I won't." There was silence for a while, before she returned to her own chair and they resumed eating. The mood, which had become somewhat melancholy, quickly improved as Fumiko started telling dirty jokes, rapidly reducing them to tears of laughter.

After the meal the whole group retired to the sofa, which was just large enough. Swapping stories of ever more unlikely events, the four girls and Ranma and Kasumi tried to top each other, while Nabiki listened with amazement. Some of the stories sounded insane even to her, but she was assured they were all true. Eventually, Kasumi looked at her watch. "It's nearly one AM. I need some sleep, and I'm sure you four must be tired as well after tonight." Aiko nodded while Misaki yawned hugely, setting off everyone else.

"Very true. Thanks for the meal, and the beds. See you guys in the morning." The four girls trooped off to their various bedrooms, quietly talking amongst themselves. The three people left behind looked at each other.

"This has been a very unusual day. But, aside from the moments of extreme terror, a lot of fun." Nabiki grinned tiredly at her sister and her brother-in-law.

"When do you plan on going back?" Ranma asked. The brunette considered the question. "There's no hurry," he hastily added. "I'm not trying to suggest you should leave. I know you and Kas still want to talk as sisters." Nodding, Nabiki grinned at him.

"Don't worry, I know what you mean. I was thinking probably tomorrow afternoon. I can catch a train at about three, if I remember the timetable." She'd explained her roundabout method of travelling, which Ranma approved of from a security viewpoint. It was rather tedious though.

"Would you like me to ask Aiko to teleport you back? Or at least to somewhere close to home, it would cut a lot of travel time." With a slight shudder Nabiki remembered her first experience of teleportation. Kasumi looked at her, correctly deducing from her expression what she was thinking.

"It won't be nearly as bad the second time. You'll only feel a bit dizzy for a second or two. Trust me." Reluctantly, she did, and nodded.

"Thanks. That's probably a good idea."

"OK, I'll ask her in the morning." Looking at his wife, he added, "I'm heading for bed. See you in a while." The martial artist stood and with a wave to his wife's sister left the room. Left alone, Kasumi and Nabiki looked at each other.

"You must visit more often, sister," Kasumi said with an impish smile. "All sorts of interesting things happen when you're here." She giggled, Nabiki joining her for a moment.

"I'm not sure I could take much more of that sort of 'interesting thing', sis. I'm amazed you seem to enjoy it so much." The two of them talked for another half hour, before heading off to bed. Kasumi gave her sister a spare set of pyjamas, which she quickly changed into before sliding under the covers. Turning out the bedside lamp she was asleep almost instantly.
When Nabiki emerged blinking into the light the next morning, fairly late, she found Ranma and Tamiko in the kitchen making breakfast. The martial artist handed her a cup of coffee with a grin. "You still need this to get revved up in the morning, I see." She took it with her eyes half shut, drank half of it in one go, then nodded.

"Thanks. I really can't get going without caffeine." Leaning against the wall next to the door she watched the others work for a moment. "Where are Kasumi and the rest? And for that matter, have you seen my clothes?" Looking down at the pyjamas she was still wearing she admired the pattern for a moment.

"Your clothes are in the dryer, Kas washed them before you got up. They'll be done in about twenty minutes. Your sister is in the practice room beating up the rest of the team." Tamiko giggled.

"She calls it training them, but we all know she just likes showing off." Ranma grinned. "I taught her well..."

Laughing, Nabiki left to track down her sister, who was as advertised giving Aiko, Misaki, and Fumiko a hard time. The three magical girls were armed with bo staffs, standing in for their normal weapons, with which they were frantically attempting to hit Kasumi. Not very successfully as it turned out. One or two blows landed but the majority either missed completely or were deflected easily. "Stand still, damn it!" shouted Fumiko, swinging wildly. Kasumi giggled, jumping over the swing and tagging her on the top of the head. Nabiki watched from the door, coffee forgotten for the moment, as her normally reserved elder sister jumped around the room like a grasshopper on PCP, making a complete mockery of the entire group. Shaking her head she sipped her drink, settling down to watch.

Eventually Aiko managed to land a decent blow, making the older woman stop and congratulate her. She looked pleased that one of them had finally got her. The other two grumbled about it while Aiko smiled. "Damn, you're quick," she commented.

"Thank you." Kasumi bowed, happy with the praise. "Breakfast should be ready now. Shall we go and eat?"

"I'm going to have to shower all over again," Fumiko complained, handing her staff to Kasumi and heading into the living room. Misaki grunted agreement, pulling an apple out of her pocket and taking a bite out of it. "Don't you ever stop eating?" her friend asked peevishly. "Why you're not as fat as a hippo I have no idea." Aiko watched them go with a smile, then helped Kasumi put the staffs away in the storage room. Walking over Nabiki looked at her sister with renewed awe.

"You're amazingly good," she said. "It's very obvious that Ranma trained you, it's like watching a taller brunette version of his female form in action. It would drive Akane nuts." Kasumi smiled slightly, then looked a little sad.

"That's a pity. Poor Akane."

"That's the violent sister, correct?" Aiko asked curiously. Both sisters nodded.

"I'm afraid so. She has... impulse control problems is a polite way of putting it." Kasumi shook her head in worry. "Enough training to be very dangerous, not enough to have any discipline, anger control issues, and sufficient strength to pick up a small car and hit you with it." Aiko winced.

"Ick. That sounds like a real problem."

"It could well become one," Nabiki said, as they headed back to the front of the apartment. "I hope it doesn't, she's got it in her to be as destructive as that thing last night. And I really don't want my baby sister to get turned into a smoking crater because it was the only way to stop her."

"Oh my, Nabiki!" Kasumi gasped, suddenly sounding exactly like the middle sister remembered from her younger days. She started laughing, which caused both the other women to stare at her as if she was insane. It took several minutes to explain what was funny. Tamiko was in the process of bringing several plates full of breakfast to the table. Everyone sat, while she went back to the kitchen, returning shortly with Ranma, both of them laden with more plates. Breakfast itself was a leisurely affair, no one was in any hurry to finish. They talked for nearly an hour after finishing the food, Kasumi getting up at one point to empty the dryer and iron Nabiki's clothes for her.

Handing them to her, neatly folded and still warm, she looked at the demon hunter team. "We probably have some spare clothes for you as well if you need them. Your uniforms are a bit tatty."

"Will you lend me a dress?" He frowned while the others laughed.

"Not my favourite blue silk one," he said, making them all stop and stare at him, while Kasumi giggled and he suddenly smiled. No one had expected that response. "I've got some spare jeans and a top that should fit."

"My clothes should fit the rest of you." Fumiko looked happy.

"Thanks, Kasumi. Those uniforms are bad enough without walking around with half the rear torn out."

Turning to Nabiki, Aiko said, "Ranma asked me if I could take you most of the way to Nerima when you leave. Is the central train station in Suginami close enough?" The middle sister nodded.

"That's fine. It's only twenty minutes from Furinkan."

"OK. Ranma will call me when you're ready and I'll teleport back here, then take you there." She looked at the martial artist, who agreed. "We need to get the timings just right. This place is warded to an absolutely insane level, and if the anti-teleport wards aren't down, you don't bounce so much as splash." She shuddered, picturing the result. Nabiki suddenly had second thoughts.

Correctly divining her worries Kasumi reassured her sister.

"It's perfectly safe. We leave a hole, Aiko teleports in, then out again. There's no danger. It's only people we're not expecting who would have problems, and all the ones we want coming by know enough to call first. The list is very short."

Looking bemused Nabiki commented, "I still find it difficult to accept you even have a list of people you don't mind teleporting into your home! It's insane." The others grinned at her.

"This lifestyle takes a bit of getting used to," Fumiko smiled. "You do eventually. In any case, Ranma has told us all sorts of stories of Nerima, that place is even nuttier than here! Surely you got used to that?"

"It didn't affect me so directly, in most cases," the Tendo woman replied. "It was more something that got Ranma and Akane, or people like that. You know, crazy people who knew what to Once the breakfast was finished, Kasumi went to dig out the clothes they were lending the girls, while Aiko and Tamiko helped Ranma clear the table and clean up. A little while later they went into the practice room again. The girls, now dressed in the borrowed clothing with their damaged uniforms in a bag that Misaki was holding gathered around Aiko, who glanced around at them then looked at Nabiki. "Let me know when you're ready, OK?" Switching her gaze to Ranma and Kasumi, she smiled her thanks. "Sorry about dropping all that on you last night, but thanks very much for the save. And the meal, the room for the night, and the clothes! I'll bring them back when I come to pick up Nabiki." A second later the group of young women disappeared with a bright flash of light, causing Nabiki to swear in shock and rub her eyes. She was irritated to notice that Ranma and Kasumi had looked away at exactly the right moment.

"You couldn't have warned me?" she complained. Ranma shrugged.

"Sorry. I thought you knew."

"How the hell would I know?" she snapped, wiping her watering eyes again. Kasumi handed her a handkerchief.

"OK. Now you know." Ranma grinned at her. She glared a little, but relented when her sister smiled at her as well. Muttering to herself she followed them back into the living room. Walking over to the main window Ranma looked out, then turned back to them, becoming female in the process. "I'm going to go and return Uthryyl's van now. Plus I need to arrange to get the warehouse roof fixed and tell the property agency what happened." She sighed, looking irritated once more. "Damn magical girls." Taking on her Yori aspect she opened the balcony doors, faded from sight, then presumably jumped over the edge. Nabiki shook her head in amused wonder.

"Doesn't she ever use the door like a normal person?" With a giggle Kasumi moved to close the balcony doors again then sat on the sofa.

"Not if she can help it." Sitting beside her Nabiki looked out the window for a while before turning to her sister who was watching her with a familiar serene look.

"Your friends are interesting," she commented.

"They're very nice people. They attract nearly as much insanity as Ranma does, the poor things, but at least there's several of them to deal with it. My dear husband had to handle everything nearly single handed for so long." Sighing, she looked around the room for a moment. "It's such a shame he went through all that. He deserved better. But at least now I think he has it. I know I do."

"I will admit, crazy abilities and all, I've never seen you, or him, so happy as you two are now." Nabiki leaned against her sister, who put an arm around her. "I'm so very happy I found you again. I thought you were gone forever." With some surprise she found she was crying again. Kasumi hugged her for a long time while the tears slowly ran down her cheek. Eventually they began talking in the intimate way two close sisters do, going over all the things that had happened on both sides during the last three years.

At one point Kasumi studied her sibling for a moment, then asked, "Has there been anyone in your life, sister? You haven't mentioned a boyfriend, or even any dating." A smile crossed her face. "Or a girlfriend." Nabiki flushed a little.

"No, nothing like that. I like boys." She looked back at her sister. "Not that there's anything wrong with liking girls, but it's not me." Sighing, she added, "I haven't really had time for romance. I've been on a few one-off dates with various people, but nothing that would lead further. The situation at home, work at university, you know. I just don't seem to have much time for personal relationships.” Kasumi put her hand on her sister's knee.

"You should make time. You need companionship, I think."

"Perhaps." Nabiki looked away. "How am I going to find anyone who could understand the sheer insanity of my life?" With a nervous giggle, she looked back. "It's nothing as mad as yours, true enough, but compared to most people it's pretty strange. Akane, Genma, the martial arts, all that stuff. Even just living in Nerima is enough to scare off some people when they hear about it. The place has something of a reputation, you know. There's that whole guilt by association thing going on." Kasumi nodded understandingly.

"I know what you mean. Minato has it even worse, it gets reported more widely. Mention you live here to someone from almost anywhere in Japan, and certainly anywhere in Tokyo, you get some very funny looks." She laughed lightly. "It would be a lot more irritating if we weren't part of the weird side. In our case it's mainly amusing."

Nabiki snickered. "I can see that."

"What about Akane? Has she found any romantic possibilities?" Nabiki shook her head with a heavy sigh.

"You know better than that. She's completely hung up on Ranma, for a start, even after all this time. Leaving that aside, I really think she hasn't got more than a child's understanding of love and romance, never mind anything at all to do with sex. The whole concept is something we've all learned to avoid mentioning, it invariably sets her off in a rant about perverts. I don't know why but I think her emotional and sexual development stalled at about thirteen or fourteen." Falling silent for some seconds, she hesitantly added, "I also kind of think that she might like girls." Kasumi looked interested but not surprised.

"As you said, there's nothing wrong with that."

"I know it, and you know it, but I don't think she can accept it. Either that homosexuality isn't wrong in the first place, or that she herself might have feelings along those lines. I have a suspicion that's why she reacted so negatively to Ranma and his curse. I always got mixed messages from her, she clearly found him attractive in both forms when her guard was down, but as soon as she realised what was happening she instantly got all defensive, then angry. Particularly when he was female."

Her sister nodded thoughtfully. "It's possible. Ranma has made similar observations. I know I'm not attracted to women in general, but I have no real preference to my husband being male or female at any given moment. It's the Ranma inside I love. What he or she looks like on the outside is irrelevant. But it's certainly true that some people would have a lot of difficulty with that. If Akane is a repressed lesbian, or merely bisexual, it would go some way to explaining some of her past behaviour." She looked sad. "Poor Akane. It must be very lonely inside her head." The sat quietly for a while occupied with their own thoughts on the matter before changing the subject.

By the time 'Yori' came back several hours later, this time entering from the practice room after presumably landing on the roof from the adjoining building, the sisters were laughing together, looking through a photo album that Kasumi had retrieved from the study, which contained pictures of their childhood. Dropping the illusion and changing back to male, Ranma looked at them with affection before going to make some tea.
Sitting down with them and handing out cups of tea, he sighed in relief. "I needed this."

"Did you have any trouble?" Kasumi asked.

"No, not really, it was just tedious." Putting his cup down he stretched a little, then leaned back comfortably. "I took the van back fine, handed over the keys, and even got a small refund since Uthryyl had rented it for another week." Nabiki looked inquisitive, the comment reminding her of something that had been bothering her.

"How could someone who looks like they did just walk into a vehicle rental place and rent a van?" she asked curiously. "Even in Minato? Or possibly, especially in Minato, seeing as it apparently has a demon problem. Even in Furinkan they would have stood out a bit." Ranma laughed.

"True, although I suspect that while people would have looked twice no one would have said anything back in Furinkan, or most of the rest of Nerima. Bearing in mind the number of people with, um, non-standard features, that we came across they're more or less used to it. Around here, though, you're both right and wrong. Yes, there are quite a lot of not particularly human visitors, some of which are ones you don't really want visiting. But on the other hand, quite a few of them are completely fine, and even profitable. There are a fair number of people that are well aware of this and are quite happy to provide services to those visitors, since they normally pay well and on time." Picking up his cup he drained it then poured himself some more. "Uthryyl is pretty cautious. He has a spell that disguises them from people who might be hostile. It's not as effective as our illusion spell by a long shot but it works pretty well. It's quite surprising how many people can see through it, as a result of being OK with them."

"I didn't notice anything at the warehouse." He nodded.

"Because you weren't hostile, and were fine with the concept. If you'd come across them without prior warning it might have made them look like normal humans, it might not. You're pretty open-minded after all. Akane would probably always see them as human unless the spell was deactivated, though. She's a lot less tolerant of things she doesn't understand or expect."

With a sad sigh Nabiki agreed. "It wasn't always like that."

"I know. I wish things hadn't deteriorated so much." All three of them fell silent, reflecting on the youngest Tendo female. "So, I took the van back, then went and spoke to the contractors. They came to the warehouse to measure up and give me a quote, but I had to wait for a couple of hours. Although they're pretty busy at the moment they've fitted the job in for about three days time, and think it should take about two days. The material costs are the killer, almost all the stuff that fell in is too damaged to be reused." He looked very annoyed about this. "After that, I went to the police station and gave Sergeant Harada a report on last night, got the details of the owners of the car and the building that were damaged, then talked to the insurance companies. One of them is fine, the car insurer was more problematic. It took a certain amount of persuading to make them see their way clear to doing the right thing." He grinned toothily. Nabiki laughed.

"So you put the fear of god into them?"

"No, better, I put the fear of me into them. Or at least Yori. They caved in the end." Snickering, Nabiki wished she'd seen all this. It sounded interesting.

Ranma seemed to think of something. "Oh, yes, while I remember." Pulling something from his ki pocket he quickly scribbled Nabiki's name on one half of it, then folded it along a perforated line and tore off the other half, giving it to her. She found herself holding something that looked like a business card, which had both a telephone number and an email address neatly printed on it, above two strings of apparently random digits. At the top was one word, the name 'Yori'. She looked at it curiously as her fingers tingled for a moment, then laughed.

"Yori has business cards?" He grinned.

"Of course! How else can people who need her get hold of her?" Shaking her head with amusement, she pointed at the random assortment of letters and numbers.

"What's this for?"

"It's a password. Two, actually. Each card has different ones, they identify who I've given it to. Quote that in any email or when leaving a message and I'll know it's genuine. Use the top one normally. If for any reason you somehow get forced to use it, use the second one. That indicates you're under duress."

"Ah. A flaw in your plan. What happens if someone steals it or I give it to them?" He looked smug.

"Try it." Kasumi held out her hand with a small smile of her own. Puzzled, Nabiki handed her the card, watching in amazement as the writing on it immediately disappeared. When she accepted it back the writing reappeared.

"Wow. That's incredible." She suddenly laughed, making him look puzzled. "And you say you're not a magical girl. You even have magical business cards!" He looked annoyed, but then reluctantly smiled.

"One point to you." Pleased, she gave him a thumbs up. "It's a spell cast by a mage I helped out a while ago. Apparently something like it is used quite a lot in high-end magical documents. Even some governments use it, the ones that acknowledge the existence of magic anyway. Like ours. It's not completely unbeatable, but you have to be VERY good to trick it." The brunette produced a puzzled expression.

"But, all I have to do is hold it up to someone without letting them touch it, surely?"

He grinned. "No, that doesn't work either. The spell also works in a similar way to the disguise spell from the bracelets. Only the person holding it can read it, anyone else sees a blank card, as do cameras."

"Hmm." Impressive as it was, Nabiki was sure there was a way to beat it. It was more from the mental challenge than anything else. "OK. I memorise the password, then tell someone." She looked pleased. Ranma shook his head with an infuriating smirk.

"You can't."

"Of course I can." She stared at the card for a moment, committing the twenty characters to memory. Turning to him, she opened her mouth, then stopped. For some reason, the string of characters was suddenly absent from her mind although it had been there seconds ago. "Shit."

"Like I said, it's a really good spell. If your intent is to tell someone else, even read it to them, it kind of scrambles itself in your mind. You can memorise it, just not tell anyone what you've memorised." Looking at the card with considerable respect and a certain amount of wariness, she studied it.

"That seems like a hell of a lot of effort to go to for a business card. Isn't a spell like that very difficult to work?"
"Oh, it's not easy, definitely. Not many magic users even know how to do it, never mind have the finesse to actually make it work. I printed up a fair number of the cards and he put the spell on them in bulk. It doesn't need to be done to each one individually, that would be ridiculously difficult. Kasumi has some as well, we each have enough for several different personae. The tear off bit," he held up the half with her name on it, which she could see also had the same passwords on, "is my record of who has each one."

Putting it in her pocket, she grinned at him. "You have the most elaborate security of anyone I've ever met."

"Thank you." Drinking some tea, he put the cup down again. "To be fair, this was Happosai's idea. He has some very good ones."

"So where is the little pervert at the moment?" Ranma shrugged.

"Your guess is as good as mine. He drops in from time to time, often without any warning, but not much at the moment. I don't know what he's up to right now. Last time he came by was just before our wedding. He'd been visiting some friends in one of the demon worlds for a while." Nabiki's eyes widened. "Then I think he was off to annoy the females of Brazil for a while, but after that? No idea."

They talked for a while, then Kasumi went to make some lunch. Nabiki looked at her watch and checked her timetable, deciding that she'd leave at about four, which would let her catch the train from Suginami central station to Furinkan. The helpful offer of teleporting there would cut a considerable amount of effort out. Smiling to herself at the thought that she lived in a world where people could casually offer to teleport you at all, she shook her head. "This is so weird."

Ranma watched her, amused by her muttering. "You get used to it, I promise."

"Easy for you to say. Your entire life has been one weird thing after another. Up until about five years ago mine was relatively sane." The middle sister gave him an arch look. "In fact, I seem to remember that it was your arrival that made everything start to go absurd." The martial artist smirked a little.

"You're entirely welcome."

"You're an idiot." They grinned at each other. "I'm going to miss this. The last day or so has been more fun than I've had in a long time. Despite my crazy sister and her roof-hopping."

"Keep in touch. We've got your cellphone number, you have my special one. Kas will give you hers as well. It's off a lot of the time, but you can always leave a message, I check mine regularly. If it's on I'll answer. I promise if you need anything I'll help you out."

Nabiki moved to the dining table as Kasumi came out of the kitchen. "This is all so much trouble just to avoid half a dozen or so people." Helping his wife with the food, Ranma smiled unhappily.

"I know. Hopefully one day we can relax it a bit. But until then, this is the best way."

After lunch, she helped her sister clean up, then walked around the living room looking at the various prints and pictures. Stopping by the balcony doors, she stared out at the university for a while. Ranma and Kasumi sat next to each other on the sofa and watched her, his arm around his wife's shoulders. "You can come back, you know, sister," Kasumi said, amused at the way her younger sibling seemed to be trying to lock every detail of the apartment in her memory. Nabiki turned and smiled at her.
I know. I will. But I doubt it will be very often for a while at least, the situation at home is too fragile to risk someone finding out." Moving to sit beside them she held her sister's hand for a moment, squeezing it. "I missed you for so long, now that I've found you again I don't want to leave." Kasumi smiled gently at the younger woman.

"I understand. Perhaps we can visit you at some point, maybe at the university? We can disguise ourselves well enough now that there's not too much risk." She glanced at her husband, who nodded.

"That's certainly possible. Appearing as ourselves anywhere outside this building isn't a good idea for the foreseeable future, but Maiko and Rika do go outside Minato occasionally. As do Yori and Chou, and several other people you haven't met yet." He snickered. "We're a two-person multiple personality disorder. We could even come up with some new ones just for you!" Nabiki laughed.

"Just leave Zythra'a at home, please. I think she'd cause more than a little confusion at the university dorms, even if she was just visiting." The martial artist laughed delightedly at the thought.

"Oh, all right," he replied in mock-disappointment.

Kasumi gave her a similar card to the Yori one, this one having the name 'Chou' on it. After some thought, and a brief discussion with Ranma, she also wrote down her 'Rika' cell number. "I have this one with me when I'm at university. It should be safe enough letting you have it, lots of people do. Please be sure to use the right name when you talk to me on it though." Nabiki giggled.

"I have to keep track of so many names with you two. I feel like I've met dozens of people in the last day, but most of them are you or Ranma! How on earth do you keep it all straight?"

"It isn't easy, but practice helps," her sister giggled back. They hugged, then Nabiki stood.

"Well, I guess I'm ready to go." Ranma nodded, pulling out a phone and turning it on.

"I'll call Aiko." After a short conversation and a moment's concentration, he lowered the wards and a flash came from the direction of the practice room. A few seconds later Aiko walked into the living room.

"Hi, guys. Ready to go, Nabiki?" The brunette walked over to her, but turned when Ranma called. He handed her the disguise bracelet again.

"Here. Use this, so no one can identify you when you arrive. You can go somewhere private with Aiko at the station and give it back to her, if that's all right." Once again impressed at the thoroughness of his security precautions Nabiki took the bracelet from him and slipped it around her wrist.

"Thanks." She impulsively hugged him and after a moment's surprise he returned it.

"Take care, Nabs."

"Don't call me Nabs." She grinned at him. Kasumi got up and hugged her again as well. Releasing her sister, she inspected them both, then smiled. "I'll be back. Take care, you two." Quickly turning so they wouldn't see the tears in her eyes she nodded to Aiko. The magical girl smiled at her understandingly, handed Kasumi the bag containing the returned borrowed clothes, then led her into the practice room. A bright flash reflected down the hallway and they were gone.

In the living room, Ranma stood with his arms around his wife, who was also crying a little.
Chapter 14

On the train back to Nerima Nabiki reflected on the last thirty hours or so. It had been worrying, fun, terrifying, hilarious, frustrating, inspiring, vomit-inducing, and overall something she was extremely glad she'd experienced. Everything had started with a suspicion derived from police reports and media coverage. What she'd found was so far beyond what she'd expected or even hoped for she was still trying to come to terms with it. The most important thing by far was that she'd found her sister, after all this time. And her sister's husband. It was just a pity she couldn't tell anybody.

'My brother in law,' she thought with a private smile. 'I kind of expected that one day, but not from that direction. Good for you, Kasumi.' Staring out the window as the familiar sights of south Nerima slipped by, she pondered what it all meant. Ranma had indeed given her a cheque for the amount she'd mentioned he still owed her, which made her smile. During their long talk, Kasumi had passed on the access details and card for an account with a considerable sum in it. It turned out that they had several such accounts with fairly anonymous names attached for emergencies. Looking at the debit card with interest she ran her thumb over the embossed numbers then put it back in her wallet.

As she'd told Kasumi, she was very hesitant about bringing a sudden windfall into the Tendo household at the moment for several reasons, the most important of which was upsetting the status quo. Leaving aside Akane's growing mental problems, to which she still hoped to find a solution, things were slowly improving. A sudden influx of liquidity could well undo all the good that time had rather unexpectedly produced. At least, in the case of a genuine emergency, the resources were there. 'Therapy. That's certainly an idea. I wonder if I could persuade Akane to talk to a therapist of some sort? That would be a good use of the money. If Ranma of all people can benefit from it, perhaps my nutty sister could.' With a slight shrug she got up as the train slowed. It was something to consider.

Walking back to the Dojo, still thinking about the whole affair, she unexpectedly found herself entering total chaos. The cause of it was quickly identified when she heard the grating laughter. "Oh, damn it, why now, Kodachi," she groaned, watching as the crazed gymnast bounced around the yard chased by the equally crazed figure of her younger sister, who was practically frothing at the mouth from fury.

"Get back here you stupid cow!" Akane screamed, swinging a huge mallet wildly at the other woman, who skipped out of the way with little effort.

"You're still a graceless peasant, Tendo," the black-haired woman taunted, emitting yet another nerve-jangling laugh. Nabiki winced at the sound. With a sigh, she turned to enter the house, cringing at the noise of a missed mallet strike punching a large hole in the garden wall. Inside, She found Nodoka in the kitchen cleaning the sink, every now and then sighing to herself. The auburn-haired older woman looked up as she came in.

"Hello, Nabiki. Did you have a nice time with your friend?"

"Yes, Auntie, it was wonderful to see her again. And her partner." Nodoka looked at her suspiciously.

"Partner? Business, or..." Nabiki laughed. The older woman's expression was amusing.

"Not business. More like life, I guess."
"I see." Nodoka's expression was somewhat disapproving. She turned back to her task. "I can't say I think such things are very appropriate."

"Oh, Auntie, 'such things' are fine. They're a lovely couple and love each other more than almost anyone I have ever met." Nodoka's expression softened slightly.

"What do they do?" she asked.

"They're both studying different fields of medicine. Eventually they'll be doctors." The older woman looked approving.

"That's a very good career choice." She sighed a little. "It probably makes their mothers very proud. Everyone wants their children to do well." She seemed wistful, Nabiki having a fairly good idea who she was thinking about. Putting her hand on the other woman's shoulder for a moment, she smiled reassuringly, then changed the subject.

"What's all the excitement outside about?" Nodoka's expression changed to one of irritation.

"Oh, that annoying Kodachi Kuno dropped in on us about half an hour ago, ranting about the usual things. Where had we hidden her darling Ranma, shouting about the red-haired harridan, you know the routine. She must be bored, she hasn't done anything like this for a long time. Akane immediately lost her temper and attacked her, which only made the whole situation worse. My blasted husband and your father didn't help, they had their students watching and taking notes, and bets. That really made Akane angry, I'm afraid, as Soun was betting against her. She knocked him unconscious, then did the same to Genma when he laughed. Their students tried to defend them but simply aren't good enough yet, so they all ended up in the pond as well." She paused, looking reflectively out the window. "It's very odd how all the fights around this place seem to end up there. I wonder why?" After a moment, she gave up trying to work it out.

"That was about ten minutes before you arrived. Akane and Kodachi have been chasing each other around the grounds ever since. With a little luck they'll wear themselves out and stop soon." Both women winced as a loud crash shook the room. "Hopefully before the house collapses." Another crash came making the cups in the cupboards tinkle against each other.

"For fuck's sake, this is ridiculous," Nabiki snarled in anger, ignoring Nodoka's expression at her swearing. Stomping outside she shouted at the top of her voice, "KNOCK IT OFF YOU MORONS!" Kodachi and Akane both stopped dead, staring at her. Ruthlessly suppressing the sudden urge to giggle as the memory of 'Yori' yelling at a similarly shocked group of magical girls came to her, she glared at them both. Trying for the same note of command in her voice, she continued, "Kodachi, go home before I charge you for the damage. No, on second thought, I am going to charge you. I'll send an invoice. Now push off and find something else to amuse yourself with." Dismissing the woman with a glance, she was grinning on the inside at the expression of haughty irritation combined with uncertainty that crossed her face.

"Akane, please stop letting her tease you. Look at this place!" She waved her hand at the damage. A tile slid off the roof and shattered on the flagstones, making both of the fighters twitch. Nabiki successfully managed to ignore it. "Your job doesn't pay enough to allow you to indulge in this sort of thing, and I'm certainly not going to fund your little rants. Not any more. You've already knocked out father, Genma, and all their students. What happens if the students decide to give up because of that? Did you think about that?" Shame passing over her face, Akane shook her head, staring at the ground. She jumped as another tile shattered.

"Try to be more sensible. We can't afford to have you wreck the damn place every time you get pissed off. Grow up! You're nearly twenty two years old, you're not a child any more." Shaking her head in disgust, she added, "You can clear this up. When you're done I'll work out how much your share of the damage comes to." Akane looked at her in shock, starting to speak. "No, I'm serious. Now start cleaning," Nabiki snapped, causing her to close her mouth and slump. Turning her head to stare at the Kuno woman, Nabiki asked sarcastically, "Are you still here? In that case, you can help her clean up." She reached inside the door and grabbed the broom, tossing it to Kodachi, who caught it in a sort of dazed reflex. The two fighters looked at her, then at each other, before mechanically beginning to clean up the mess, without saying anything. She watched with her hands on her hips for a minute or two before nodding, satisfied. 'Thank you, Yori. I learned a lot.' She smiled coldly at them then went back into the house.

Nodoka stared at her with mixed surprise and approval. "That was... impressive. How did you learn to do that?"

With a satisfied grin Nabiki responded, "My friend's partner is, well, very forceful when she wants to be, especially with troublemakers. People listen to her whether they want to or not. I saw her dealing with some overenthusiastic people last night and thought her method might work here. I'm glad to say it did."

"Well done." The older woman smiled at the younger one, clearly pleased.

"Thanks. I suppose I'd better go and check on father and the other idiots." Nodoka tutted at her comment but looked amused. Going out into the Dojo, the middle sister looked around with irritation. There were several new holes in the walls and a couple in the floor, evidence that Akane had been making free use of her mallet. She made some notes on the extent of the damage, then went to look for the human casualties. Soun was lying on the grass next to the pond, mumbling to himself, while Genma, currently a panda, was floating on his back in it, blinking at the sky and looking as puzzled as a panda can. The five students were arrayed around the water, groaning and soaked. Nabiki stood and studied them with a disgusted expression.

"You lot are useless. Seven of you, two very experienced martial artists and five pretty decent students, and you couldn't handle one irritated Akane?"

Genma held up a sign that read, #She's insanely strong, you know#.

"That's no excuse. Next time, try harder. Or I'll start billing you lot for the damage as well." Snorting with derision, she turned and left, inwardly very relieved that there didn't appear to be any serious injuries. 'This time. What happens next time?' Despite what she'd said she knew full well that it was next to impossible to stop Akane when she was enraged. They'd done well to even slow her down. Returning to the yard she watched Kodachi and Akane still clearing up their mess, slightly surprised they both hadn't run for it the moment she turned her back. 'Wow. Yori's technique of yell a lot and not take no for an answer really works.' She resolved to try to keep on top of her sister from now on, if one good talking to worked so well. The fact that Kodachi of all people had also been intimidated enough to do manual labour was astounding. 'I'll have to let Ranma and Kasumi know about this. It'll amuse them if nothing else."

The brunette went into the house and up to her room, where she turned on the computer and waited for it to boot, idly spinning her chair around and looking out the window. When the familiar desktop came up she typed in her password, then spent the next hour carefully deleting every report, email, and media file she had gathered during her search for the two missing people. Going over the computer one last time very deliberately, in case she'd missed anything, she then pulled out her backup disks and reformatted them all twice, just to be sure. Starting a new backup going to save the current state of the rest of her data, she rummaged around in her desk and closet to find any printouts that might have potentially incriminating evidence on them, then shredded them. She'd burn the remains later.

It went against her normal practice, but she felt it was best to make sure that there was no chance that anyone else could use her research to find the pair. Not only was she worried about them should that happen, she'd been quite serious about her comments on the possible repercussions to Akane and the rest. Finally satisfied that every scrap of data that had led her to her quarry was permanently gone, she then spent some time researching therapists who had experience dealing with anger management issues. This took another couple of hours, but she ended up with a short-list of five names she resolved to call the next day.

Turning off the computer she rose and looked out the window. Akane and Kodachi were still working, although it looked like they were nearly done. Smiling with considerable amusement she went downstairs and watched from the porch as they finished up. "Well done. Right, I'll get estimates for the damage and get you both bills for your share. Akane, you have two months to pay. Kodachi, I expect payment by the end of the week or you will have a major problem. Do you both understand me?" The two young women glanced at each other, then nodded, uncharacteristically quiet. "Good. In future, if you want to play, go and do it in one of the vacant lots where no one will mind. There's a lot of them around here. If you start anything in the grounds of the Dojo, there is going to be serious trouble. AM I CLEAR?" She snapped the last three words with the volume and command of a good sergeant-major, making them jump. Again, they nodded.

"Good. Kodachi, go home. Akane, go inside. Dinner is nearly ready." Turning on her heel she walked back into the house, grinning at Nodoka who had come out of the kitchen to listen with a peculiar smile on her face. The older woman nodded respectfully to her.

"If you wish, you can borrow my katana if you have to do this again. I always found it made people... more respectful." The older woman grinned quickly, then went back to an almost Kasumi-like smile.

Surprised, Nabiki considered the offer for a moment. "Thank you. Hopefully it won't be necessary but it's nice to know the option is there." Nodoka gave her another surprisingly respectful and slightly curious look before going back to the kitchen. She got the distinct impression that she'd scored some serious points with Ranma's mother. Behind her she heard the sound of Akane entering the house. Turning she looked at the younger woman, who glanced at her then away, still looking ashamed.

"I'm sorry Nabiki. She makes me so angry, though. Why did she have to come here?" The young woman sounded simultaneously plaintive and petulant. Nabiki sighed. While she had some sympathy for her sister the fact remained that Akane over-reacted enormously to even the slightest insult.

"I know how irritating Kodachi is. But that doesn't excuse you knocking huge great holes in the house and the Dojo. It's going to cost a lot of money to get them repaired. Father and Genma can't use the Dojo for teaching until the floor is fixed, so that's less money coming in right when we need it. Never mind any potential loss of students." She studied her sister, who was fidgeting like a ten year old called in front of her mother. Suddenly getting an inkling of how Kasumi must have felt all those years she felt ashamed. "You must control yourself better. You've been doing quite well the last few months, don't let Kodachi ruin it, OK?" Akane nodded slowly, still not meeting her sister's eyes. "And if you really have to fight her, please do it somewhere else? Somewhere you won't damage anything important?" Once more the blue-haired girl nodded.

"I'm sorry, 'Biki." The diminutive form of her name made Nabiki smile, Akane hadn't used it in years. Stepping forward she closed the gap between them and hugged her embarrassed sister. "I forgive you. But you're still paying for your share of the damage." With a final nod, Akane hugged her back, before going off to the bathroom to clean up.

At the dinner table, Nabiki ate slowly, looking around at the various people in the room. Nodoka was in an oddly pleasant mood, occasionally giving her interested looks. Genma was currently human and still looked slightly stunned, while her father was concentrating on eating and seemed to be using what attention he had left to think about something. Akane was quite withdrawn, eating her food quietly and saying nothing. As the meal drew to a close, the brunette sister cleared her throat. Everyone looked at her.

"I've been giving this a lot of thought, but today's little amusement has pushed up the timetable." Looking at her father, then her sister, she went on, firmly although with sympathy, "Akane, you have a serious problem, one that seems to steadily be getting worse. This latest episode could have been very bad, and I'm terrified that the next one will be worse. You get too angry, too easily." Pausing she tried to gauge her sister's mood, which seemed to be more apathetic than angry. Delicately, she added, "I think we need to serious consider getting you some professional help for your anger control problem, before something permanent happens." Her sister sat still for a moment as her words registered, then looked at her with a mix of anger and sorrow.

"I'm not crazy." Nabiki shook her head.

"I'm not suggesting you are," she replied, while thinking, 'Not out loud, anyway. But you're heading that way.' "But even you must admit that you get angry extremely easily, and express that anger in a very destructive manner." The blue haired girl opened her mouth with a nasty retort ready, then to Nabiki's considerable surprise, stopped and thought. 'That's a first,' she thought in wonder. After several seconds, Akane tried again.

"Some people really get on my nerves," she said quietly. "They make me furious, I just boil over." Her sister nodded.

"And then you try to hit them. Luckily, so far most of the people you have managed to hit are the rare ones that can take it. But what happens when you go after an ordinary, non martial artist person. Someone just walking down the street, for instance? Or one of your friends, like Sayuri? Or me? You do realise, I hope, that the sort of damage you just caused to either of them," she waved a hand at the two fathers, who were listening intently, "would kill almost anyone else with a single hit? What you did to Ryoga would have pulped any normal person. What you used to do to Ranma would have killed any lesser mortal dozens of times over." She stopped again as Akane's eyes flashed at the mention of the martial artist, wondering if she'd made a mistake. Hoping not, she went on, pressing her advantage while Akane was in this unusually receptive mood.

"There have been so many times you could have, with one thoughtless action, become a murderer. Do you want that? I certainly don't. Your honour, the family honour, would never recover. But more importantly, I don't want my little sister to have that on her conscience." Her sudden rage subsiding, the younger woman sat back, mollified by her sibling's obvious and genuine concern.

"It's all Ranma's fault," Akane muttered half-heartedly, resorting to the tired old formula. Nabiki stared at her incredulously.

"How? How could it possibly be Ranma's fault? He's been gone for over three years, Akane. Face it, you will most likely never see him again, and if you're honest with yourself you know why. You weren't the only reason he left, we all share that shame, but you were one of the biggest reasons and the trigger. You nearly killed Kasumi! If it hadn't been for Ranma you would have succeeded. That's what I'm afraid of. If you could try to hit Kasumi of all people with your full strength, without even thinking about the results, it's only a matter of time before you do it again to someone else, and this time there won't be a miracle. There will be no Ranma to save you from the rest of your life either in jail or on the run. That sort of luck only happens once in someone's life, and you used yours up that night."

Akane's face unexpectedly crumpled and she began crying, leaning forward and resting her head on the table narrowly missing her plate. With a sigh Nabiki moved to sit beside her, putting her arm over her back and comforting her. "Oh, 'Biki, I'm sorry. I can't help it. I try to stop myself but I just can't. If Ranma was here he could stop me. Why did he leave? Why did he take Kasumi with him? I miss her so much." Helplessly, the older Tendo woman stroked her sibling's back and looked at the three adults, who peered back with various expressions. Nodoka was both sympathetic and slightly irritated, Soun looked ready to cry himself, while Genma was watching Akane with an oddly speculative look on his face, like he'd never really seen her before. Meeting her eyes he said nothing but simply watched. Trying to silently pass on the message that if he tried anything that hurt her sister she'd gut him like a fish, she smiled slightly in satisfaction when he paled a little.

The youngest Tendo sister cried for a long time, deep heaving sobs that spoke of despair. Nodoka and Soun cleared the table, sparing the two young women concerned glances, as Genma stepped out of the way and continued to watch quietly. After twenty minutes or so he nodded to himself and left the room. Watching him go, Nabiki wondered to herself what he was up to. Still holding her sister she waited for her anguish to subside. When she eventually stopped crying and lifted her head her eyes were red and bloodshot. The older sister handed her a cloth to wipe her eyes with. "Are you all right?" she asked with sympathy.

"No. Not really." Her sister looked at her with raw honesty in her eyes, for perhaps the first time in years. "I'm sorry. It was just too much. Kodachi, then Father and Genma, then you."

"I didn't mean to upset you, sis. But it needed to be said." Akane nodded slowly, still looking upset.

"OK. What do you want me to do," she asked quietly and unusually passively. Her sister looked at her with an evaluating stare.

"I think, as I said, that we need to get you to see someone who can help you, before this goes too far. If you carry on like this, someone is going to get badly hurt, and it could just as easily be you in the long run. If I find a suitable therapist, will you go? Please?" The blue-haired woman watched her face for long seconds, then stared at the table, wiping one eye with the back of her hand.

"Yes." The response was so quiet Nabiki could barely hear it.

"Thank you." Akane looked briefly at her, a hint of a smile crossing her face for a moment, before it reverted to unhappiness again.

"Do you think I'm crazy, Nabiki?" The older woman shook her head.

"No, I don't, not really. But I think you're heading into a very dark place, unless we do something before it's too late. I should have insisted on this a long time ago, and I'm sorry that I've let it get to this point." Her sister nodded absently.

"I miss her."

"So do I," the middle sister said, feeling very guilty. The urge to blurt out their eldest sister's whereabouts was almost overwhelming, but she ruthlessly shoved it down in the certain knowledge that it would not only betray a promise but without doubt make a bad situation far worse. Akane nodded again.
"Every day, I get up, expecting her to call me for breakfast. Every day, I go to bed wanting to say goodnight to her. It's horrible. I feel so guilty. I nearly killed her, Nabiki!" Her voice suddenly rose, animation coming back into her features for the first time since she'd started crying. "I didn't even think, I just pulled out a mallet and swung at her. It wasn't until after I'd started the swing that I even saw who I was trying to hit, and by then it was too late." She was trembling, whether in fear, anguish, guilt, or a combination of all three Nabiki couldn't determine. "I nearly killed my sister," she said quietly. Putting her head back on the table she sighed. "I'm a terrible martial artist, a terrible person. Everyone is better than me. All I can do is smash things. Even Kodachi is better than me."

Her elder sibling watched her sadly. "It's not a contest, Akane. You have the makings of a good martial artist, by most standards a very good one, but you have to face up the fact that there will be people who are better. Don't try to judge yourself by the standards of Ranma, for example. He's in a class of his own, so far beyond anyone else it's almost silly. But he paid a very heavy price to become that good, one he never even knew he was paying until it was too late." The younger woman looked at her for a moment, then nodded.

"I know. When I think about it like that, I know. But it was so difficult seeing him do things without even trying that most people never be capable of. And all the others. They're all incredibly good as well compared to me. It makes me feel... small and worthless." Her brutally honest self-criticism made her sister both sad, and feel that it was about time she faced some of her inner issues. Perhaps there was hope for her yet. If only she would stick to her promise of therapy when she cheered up. Feeling a little guilty for pushing when she was obviously on the verge of a breakdown but knowing it might be the only chance they'd get, Nabiki spoke again.

"You have to talk to someone about all this, as honestly as you're talking to me now. About everything. What you did to Ranma, why he left, what you nearly did to Kasumi and why she chose to go with him as a result. Why you're so angry all the time, lashing out at people for the smallest things. It's not healthy for you, and it sure as hell isn't healthy for anyone else." Akane smiled briefly.

"It wasn't for Ryoga." With a chuckle, Nabiki grinned at her.

"Well, to be honest that one was almost justified. I'm glad you didn't succeed in killing him, for your sake rather than his, but I'm not sorry you beat the crap out of him. He'd done some very underhanded things to you and to Ranma for years. You know poor old Ranma tried very hard to let you know about Ryoga's curse, but couldn't tell you straight because he'd promised the pig he wouldn't reveal a weakness?" She could see from the shocked expression that her sister had never considered this. "Every time you hit him for 'teasing' or 'bullying' P-Chan, he was trying to protect your honour, but couldn't because his own got in the way." She shook her head. "Poor bastard."

Fresh tears welled up in her sister's eyes and for a moment she wondered if she'd gone too far. "Don't cry, Akane. It's in the past and we can't change it. What's done is done. We just have to get you fixed up somehow so nothing like this ever happens again. OK?" The younger woman looked at her with teary eyes and nodded, unable to say anything. Debating with herself for several seconds, Nabiki finally decided that she had to say the last thing that needed saying.

"I've also decided that I'm not going to look for Ranma and Kasumi any more." Shock once more filled her sister's eyes, but she carried on, not letting her speak, "It's not doing us any favours. We've been treading water, trying to turn back the clock, for more than three years now. If I haven't found them by now I never will unless they want to be found, which they obviously don't." 'All too true, but I can't tell you that. I'm sorry, Akane.' "Aside from the cost, it's causing you a lot of harm, I think. You have to face the fact that they're gone, quite possibly permanently. You have to move on with you life, as do the rest of us." 'And I feel like a total bastard saying that, knowing what I do. But at the moment it's for the best.' Gently, she put her hand on Akane's. "With luck, one day they might come back to us. But it will be on their terms. Do you understand?"

The young woman searched her face with her eyes, seeking the truth of what she'd said. Hoping desperately that her inner thoughts weren't visible from the outside Nabiki schooled her expression into a cool but sympathetic one. After several long seconds Akane dropped her eyes. "Yes. I understand." Eventually, she stood and walked to the doorway, stopping and speaking without turning, "I'm sorry I disappointed you, 'Biki." Leaving the room she went up the stairs and a moment later her sister heard the door to her bedroom close softly.

"Oh, Akane," Nabiki sighed, shaking her head sadly. Hearing a noise at the door to the kitchen she looked up to meet Nodoka's eyes.

"You did well, my dear. That can't have been easy." The middle sister looked at her for a moment before slumping back into her seat.

"Not easy at all. Very hard indeed, would be a better way of putting it." The elder woman walked over and sat down facing her.

"I think it was something that was long overdue. That poor girl is a tortured soul in some ways, she needs help. I don't think any of us here are able to give her what she needs. Perhaps an outsider can." Looking curiously at the other woman, she asked, "Are you really giving up on your search for Kasumi and... my son?" She stumbled a little on the last few words. Nabiki nodded.

"Yes. As I told my sister, it's not doing anything useful and in fact causing quite a lot of harm. Not to mention costing a fortune, even with hijacking the Kuno idiots' investigators." Nodoka smiled slightly at this, then looked serious again, as well as a little depressed.

"That's a pity, but I can see your point." She sighed a little. "I would like to see him again one day. I know Genma would as well, he misses the boy even if he doesn't show it." Nabiki looked at her with mildly annoyed interest.

"Your husband is a very large part of why he left." To her surprise the other woman didn't take offence, merely nodding with another small sigh.

"Oh, I know. It may have been your poor sister who triggered the whole thing that terrible night, but we all bear various proportions of the blame. It's a stain on my honour I will take to the grave." They sat in silence for a while, Nabiki reflecting on the older woman's words. There was a surprising amount of self-realisation in them considering the source. She had always considered Ranma's mother to be too full of her own rigid ideas about 'manly' behaviour to ever think that she played some part in what happened, but apparently over the last few years she had come to understand the consequences of her actions to some degree at least.

Whether that would stick if Ranma ever did come back was unknowable until and unless it happened, of course. She didn't think it likely that it would, at least in the short term. Her conversation at their apartment had made it clear that the martial artists still harboured strong feelings over the matter, which she couldn't blame him for. She felt considerable shame for her own part in the entire affair. It had surprised her quite a lot that not once had either he or Kasumi mentioned that in anything other than passing, with no malice. In her own opinion she didn't deserve such fair treatment.

Eventually Nodoka broke the silence. "Isn't therapy expensive?"
Looking up from her thoughts Nabiki replied, "It should be covered by our health insurance, as it's clearly an urgent problem. We'll have to pay a certain amount, but I have some emergency money that should cover it. The biggest problem is going to be finding a therapist who can understand the nature of the problem, and the potential danger. I've looked up some names, I'll make some phone calls tomorrow. Hopefully someone can see her fairly soon."

Nodoka stood, then smiled. "You seem to have taken on the role that Kasumi filled very well, Nabiki. I hope that Akane can be helped." A few seconds later the middle sister was alone with her thoughts.
Chapter 15

Shampoo sat next to Cologne in the closed restaurant, sighing with relief that the evening rush was now finished. Business was going very well, but by the same token she was working very hard. The three extra waitresses they’d taken on in the last year helped hugely but she couldn't help thinking back to when Ranma had filled that role for a few weeks so long ago. She had been unmatched at the job. These girls were extremely good but not in the red-head's class. 'No one is;' she thought to herself wistfully. 'I hope he's all right.' Once more she sighed, for different reasons.

Cologne was watching her sympathetically. "It's been a long day. You and the girls did very well, even the boy worked hard. I just wish he'd wear his damn glasses all the time, it gets embarrassing when he offers a discount to a pretty girl that turns out to be a fifty-year-old businessman from Kobe." They both snickered, that had been very funny. Not for Mousse, of course. He'd been walking around with a red face for more than an hour. The young woman with the long lilac hair studied her great-grandmother for a moment, then turned to look out the window.

"I don't suppose you've had any luck?" she asked casually, not needing to say more. Cologne shook her head.

"No. To be honest, I'm completely out of ideas. I've tried everything I could think of, and everything anyone else in the village could come up with as well. Nothing has worked at all. Whoever is protecting son-in-law and the Tendo girl is better than I am." She scowled, the admission was hard. "I wish I knew who that was. And how they've done it. A huge amount of effort has been put into making those two vanish, it's a bit worrying when I think about it. In some ways the most mysterious thing is how on earth he could ever have found such effective protection. I'd never have believed he knew anyone so powerful. Even Herb or Saffron wouldn't be so effective at hiding him. And I know it's neither of them. Herb might have helped, they have something approaching a friendship, but I've talked to him and he's as puzzled about it as we are. Saffron most likely wouldn't, although he's also curious." She laughed a little.

"And, I think, a little scared of the boy. Ranma gave him a real shock doing what he did. Even though I suspect it was a bit of a lucky accident in some way, the fact remains that he somehow beat one of, if not the, most powerful entities in China. Nearly killed himself in the process, of course, but he won." She shook her head in respectful wonder. "What an asset he would have been."

After a moment, she continued thoughtfully, "If it's Happosai, I badly underestimated him for a very long time indeed. I always knew he was a tricky little bastard, but the level of subtleties in play here are remarkable. As is the raw power. If it's not him, I'm completely at a loss. It has to have something to do with that deviant, the timing of his disappearance is too coincidental, but..." She shrugged. "Hopefully one day it will all make sense."

"Nabiki told me a few weeks ago that she'd given up looking." Cologne nodded.

"I heard. I'm not entirely sure I believe it, she's not the type to give in easily, but what with their financial issues and all the trouble with young Akane, it's quite possibly true. It's been a long time and that one always did have a shrewd eye for practicality. She probably decided it wasn't worth the effort any more. Give her another few years, she's going to be a formidable opponent."

Shampoo turned to look at the elder. "What do you think about the situation with Akane? I also heard that she was seeing a doctor for her anger problems."
Cologne looked thoughtful. "Yes, that I do believe. It's a good thing, I think. While she's always been a problem to us, I never had any personal issues with the girl. She showed considerable promise at one point. With a proper Amazon upbringing she'd have been a formidable warrior. But lacking that, she's certainly become a hazard to both herself and everyone else in the area." The old woman snickered. "I was very impressed with what she did to the pig boy. He definitely had it coming. He's one of the toughest people I've ever encountered and she beat him to a pulp. No real technique, but damn, she hits hard when she gets worked up." Shampoo giggled a little, she didn't often hear the old woman talk like that.

"I hope the doctor can help her. She's always been a rival, but it's a horrible thing to slowly be going insane, and to be a danger to your own family." Shampoo shivered. Remembering that horrible night so long ago, she thought about the expression on Akane's face when she realised she'd nearly killed her own flesh and blood. Cologne looked at her for a moment, thinking about the same thing.

"So do I. I wouldn't like to have to deal with her if she did go berserk. To be honest, I'm not completely convinced I could, without causing permanent damage."

Nodding, Shampoo reflected on the truth of the statement. While she herself was undoubtedly a better-trained warrior than Akane was, she was honest enough to admit to herself that she was both somewhat out of practice and also outmatched by the sheer power of the girl. She'd probably prevail in an all-out battle, but only by resorting to lethal methods. Overall it wasn't something she ever wanted to try if it could be avoided. Aside from anything else, she felt rather sorry for the other woman, Ranma's spectacular departure with her sister had affected her badly, even if it was mainly her fault.

Changing the subject, she asked, "Did you see the local news last night? There was another monster attack in that weird Minato place. Some horrible-looking thing with huge claws nearly killed half a dozen people, until some of those strange magical girls that run around there so much blew it up. There was some video of them attacking it, it wasn't very clear but it looked like it caused a lot of damage. The funny thing is that afterwards one of the magical girls was yelling at the ones who stopped the thing, because they caused so much damage themselves. Three buildings collapsed and more people were hurt by them than by the monster." She giggled. "The girl was furious. You should have heard what she was saying. She was only a little thing, shorter than I am, with this really black hair with a pretty blue stripe in it, but she had a mouth on her like one of the battle mistresses from the village. The others looked so embarrassed, and more scared of her than the monster. She even made them clear up the street afterwards."

Cologne laughed. "Impressive. Perhaps we should try recruiting her?" Shampoo shook her head hastily.

"I really don't think that would be a good idea. From what I saw, if she ever got to the village she'd be running the place inside a month." She giggled again. "But it was very funny. Even the reporter was laughing. Apparently this Yori girl and a friend are known for keeping the others in line and they're not at all afraid to knock heads together if they think someone is being stupid, they also seem to have the power and ability to make it stick. She doesn't like being interviewed and they can't seem to get a good picture of her face, but from what the reporter was saying she's built quite a reputation in the last couple of years."

"It's about time some of those girls started taking responsibility for their actions. It's a very odd place, Minato. Not quite as odd as Nerima, true, but I went there a couple of times and there do seem to be quite a few visitors from other worlds wandering around. Most people don't seem to realise it. I'm not sure why so many demons end up there, but I'm glad its there and not here."
Cologne shook her head. "I'm too old to go hunting demons." Shampoo glanced at her with a mischievous grin.

"You haven't got the legs for the costume, either." Her great-grandmother bopped her on the head with her staff while laughing.

Arriving home for the weekend, Nabiki stopped just inside the front door to take her shoes off, then sniffed. "Agh. What the hell...?" Pinching her nose she followed the revolting miasma to the kitchen where she found a coughing Nodoka scrubbing a pan under copious amounts of water in the sink, through which bubbles of reddish gas were popping. She groaned. "Let me guess. Akane snuck in and tried to cheer herself up by cooking again?" The older woman turned to nod at her, her eyes streaming.

"I'm afraid so." Taking an incautious breath the auburn-haired woman immediately regretted it, dropping the pan into the sink as she went pale green. Staggering back and pulling her rubber gloves off she leaned heavily on the kitchen table attempting to keep her lunch down. "This may be the worst one yet," she said, once she'd forced her stomach to stay on-side by sheer willpower. "My husband is being sick, your father is lying in his bed unconscious. The only saving grace is that Akane tried some herself and has been on the toilet for the last two hours." She produced a sickly grin. "I shouldn't take pleasure in it but I am quite glad she caught herself in the whole thing. I thought we'd managed to persuade her to stay out of the kitchen."

Nabiki sighed as she watched the pan gently dissolve in the now highly-coloured water in the sink. She was slightly surprised that the sink itself was still intact. Ceramic was apparently more resilient than stainless steel. "This is ridiculous. It's the third time in two months. I'm getting tired of replacing the pots and pans, it's expensive."

"It least this time nothing exploded." It was cold comfort. The smell became too much for both of them and they hastily flung open all the windows before retiring to the porch. Gasping for breath they waited for the room to clear of the appalling stench. "Your sister has an undeniable talent, but it certainly isn't as a chef. A chemical warfare expert, possibly," Nodoka quipped, leaning against the wall still looking rather green. Nabiki half-smiled, trying not to retch. She didn't often hear the older woman make jokes.

Eventually the smell died down to merely ghastly and the two women re-entered the house. The sink was full of a noxious liquid that had iridescent patterns lazily tracing their way across the surface, reflecting the sunlight from the window into oddly beautiful shapes and colours on the ceiling. Looking at it cautiously from a safe distance they waited for something else to happen. Nothing did so after a minute or so Nabiki approached the sink with a wooden spoon in her hand, the handle extended, then carefully hooked the chain to the sink plug with it. One quick yank, and... the remains of the chain pulled out of the liquid sans plug. "Damn." They looked at each other.

"Well, I'm not putting my hand in there," Nodoka said forcefully. Nabiki couldn't blame her in the slightest, especially after having seen the contents of the sink eat a stainless steel pot.

'It was one of the good ones too,' she mused, irritated. 'Why the hell does she always use the expensive cookware for her chemistry experiments?' With a sigh she rummaged around in one of the cupboards for the heavy-duty corrosive-proof gloves she'd bought after the last such episode, pulling them on. They were very thick, came up to her elbows, and were made of a synthetic supposedly proof against almost anything. Not entirely trusting the manufacturers claims she stuck her left hand into the liquid, fumbled around for the plug and pulled it out as fast as possible, then turned on the cold tap and rinsed the glove off hastily. The surface was already starting to bubble. "I hope it doesn't eat the pipes as well," she muttered, dropping the gloves on the draining board and watching the fresh water fume and hiss as it washed the stuff away. She turned the flow up a bit.

"How the hell does she do it?" the older woman asked. "That was, apparently, meant to be fish stew. Not something from a science fiction film. I've got no idea how you make something like that from the contents of a kitchen, even if you added the contents of the cleaning shelf." Nabiki shrugged helplessly.

"Not a clue. She's getting worse, as well, or possibly better if your goal is the creation of the ultimate solvent rather than dinner." With a sigh she picked up the left glove between thumb and forefinger by the cuff, inspecting it. Every part of it that had been immersed was now bleached, the surface looking rough although apparently still intact. "These at least seem to work. Once at any rate." She tossed them back into the cupboard. "I assume from all this that her latest session with the therapist didn't go as well as could be hoped?"

"No. From what I gathered the poor doctor managed to set her off on a major rant, they had to dart her again. Once the drugs wore off she had a massive headache and felt depressed. So she decided to surprise us with lunch." The auburn-haired woman chuckled mournfully. "It was a surprise, definitely. But it most certainly wasn't lunch."

"Damn. It's been four months so far. At least this doctor hasn't needed therapy of her own yet, unlike the first two." She shook her head ruefully. The youngest Tendo sister had, to be fair, stuck at going to therapy. The problem was that it didn't seem to be having much effect. Oh, certainly, the random outburst of rage in the household seemed to have died down a fair amount but she suspected that was more because she was having them in the hospital instead. 'At least they finally came up with the idea of a dart gun, although it's a bit weird they had to borrow one from the zoo. And powerful enough drugs.' The first time someone had snuck up behind her when she was going off on a full-bore screaming fit with a syringe full of some sort of happy-juice was the last, all it had done was make her even angrier for a moment, then start giggling while she trashed the place. The doctor was in need of tranquillizers of her own by the time the young woman had calmed down.

The only good thing was that the medical people started taking Nabiki's warnings of how dangerous the slender young woman was more seriously after that. Seeing a fifty-five kilo female pick up a two hundred kilo steel desk that was actually bolted to the floor, without apparently even noticing the bolts snapping, and throw it completely through an exterior wall merely because she was a bit miffed, drove home how strong some martial artists were. Even not very good ones like her sister. What they used now to take her down in the event of an 'episode', as they rather euphemistically termed such events, was enough soporifics to drop a charging rhino. "And even then it would be out for hours. She wakes up ten minutes later looking like she's a little drunk," one of the medical technicians, chosen for his sharpshooting skills more than anything else, complained with wonder and a certain amount of bitterness. At least the young woman was normally calm again by that point.

If it hadn't been for the fact that the hospital obviously wanted her to spend as little time as possible on their premises she'd probably have been committed by now. As it was it had taken some considerable persuasion by Nabiki to make them continue the sessions. While there had been some improvement in the first few weeks, that seemed to have plateaued some time ago, which was extremely frustrating for all concerned. The latest therapist was trying a whole range of anger and emotional management techniques, coupled with a complete pharmacopoeia of mood-stabilising drugs, without a huge amount of luck so far. To her credit she hadn't given up yet, though. One major problem was that Akane seemed to metabolise the drugs so fast they barely had time to work. Enough Prozac to make most of Nerima mellow out for a week would affect her for a couple of hours at best.

The young woman was genuinely trying to become less irritable, which impressed her sister, but didn't find it easy. Overall Nabiki would take any improvement she could get but would have been a lot happier if there was more of it. And if when her sister became depressed because of the lack of progress she was making she didn't try cooking!

Both women jumped back as a deep rumble came from the pipework, heralding the sudden blowback through the drain of several litres of water that sprayed all over the room. Dripping wet and very annoyed, Nabiki stomped off to change her clothes, muttering obscenities to herself, while Nodoka sighed and began to mop the floor.

By dinnertime that evening Genma had recovered sufficiently to be ambulatory and Soun was sitting in the corner of the living room sipping some green tea while looking rather green himself. Neither of them was at all hungry. Akane had finally come out of the bathroom looking pale, wan, and extremely embarrassed. She apologised quietly to both her sister and Nodoka before going to bed early. The two women enjoyed a quiet meal, while Soun watched with a faintly nauseated expression and Genma had to leave the room entirely. "I'm going to visit friends early tomorrow morning, Auntie," Nabiki said as they cleaned up after the meal. "I probably won't be back until the next day, around lunch time."

"Is it your friend and her... partner... again, dear?" Nodoka enquired, the pauses almost unnoticeable. Nabiki was inwardly slightly irritated, the older woman seemed to still have problems with the concept of same-sex relationships, but to be fair to her was doing her best not to show it. She nodded.

"Yes. I haven't been able to catch up with them since that first time, too much to do what with Akane and university. They called and invited me out to dinner, and to be honest I need a bit of a break."

"Have fun, Nabiki. Try not to get into trouble." Nodoka looked at her sidelong, a slight smile playing at her lips. It took the younger woman a few seconds to realise she was being teased. Since the time she came down hard on Akane and Kodachi, the older woman had been treating her as much more of an equal than before, which included showing more of a sense of humour that she would have expected. She grinned back.

"I'll do my best."

"Are you going anywhere near Minato?" the auburn-haired woman said. Slightly worried, Nabiki raised her eyebrows questioningly. "Only it seems to be a bit dangerous at the moment. I saw another report on the news just before you got home about some sort of monster attack. That's the fourth one in the last three months."

"I'm not sure where the restaurant is," Nabiki said truthfully, ducking the main thrust of the question. "Four?" she asked after a moment. "I'd only heard about two." Ranma's mother nodded.

"Yes. There may have been five, in fact, but the reports of what might have been the first one are very uncertain. It was at the same time you first visited your friend, you probably missed it." Nabiki bit her lip, thinking that she'd only barely missed it. Or, more accurately, been missed by it. "The report on the news was very interesting. For some reason they seem to have a lot of attractive girls in very unsuitable clothing running around dealing with all those monsters they keep getting. I always thought that was a bit exaggerated, but apparently it's true." She made a tutting noise.
"What are their mothers thinking letting them out in public wearing so little? It's very unseemly."

Nabiki turned her face away trying not to giggle. 'If only you knew...'. Picking up the last of the plates she carried them into the kitchen. "I've heard that Minato is nearly as strange as Nerima," she commented, trying to keep the amusement out of her voice. Nodoka followed her and began to fill the sink with hot water.

"They don't seem to have many proper martial artists," the other woman said absently, putting a squirt of soap into the water and turning off the tap. "I saw some of the film they had of one of these groups of girls fighting the monster, they're not nearly as good at fighting as, for example, Shampoo is. If it wasn't for their magical powers I think they'd get into a lot of trouble." She paused with her hands in the water, looking reflectively at it. "Some of them do seem to be very good, though. There were two girls, the only ones I saw who seemed to be dressed appropriately, who obviously knew exactly what they were doing. They didn't seem to think much of the other girls either, one of them was shouting at them like a drill sergeant. The others seemed quite frightened of her. I'm not surprised, she had a very impressive presence." Nabiki was having immense difficulty not dropping to the floor and howling with laughter.

"Her friend was very pretty, actually they both were, but the little one was also a bit severe. She should smile more often. The taller blonde one didn't say much, but she seemed to worry the other girls nearly as much as the small shouty one." Nabiki made a weird little noise between her teeth, her eyes bulging with the effort of keeping her mouth shut. Nodoka didn't seem to notice. "The small girl had beautiful hair from what I could see on TV, although I'm not sure about the blue highlighting, and a lovely figure. I think she needs to be a little less forceful, though, or she'll never find a husband, men are intimidated by a woman who speaks her mind," Nodoka mused while behind her Nabiki rammed the dishcloth she was holding into her mouth in an attempt to stay quiet, her shoulders shaking.

"Still, she did seem to know what she was doing. It was quite amusing the way she made the other girls pick up all the debris their attack left behind, then apologise to the man whose car they'd damaged. She seems to have considerable civic pride. It went down well, all the bystanders who saw it looked very pleased." Shaking her head she resumed washing the dishes. "It's an odd place, Minato."

Nabiki needed a good five minutes before she could begin drying the dishes.
Chapter 16

"...and then she said, 'Men are intimidated by a woman who speaks her mind!'" Nabiki leaned weakly against the back of the bench in the roof garden, laughing so hard she could barely gasp out the punchline. Kasumi had both hand over her mouth, her eyes wide with mirth, while Ranma was rolling on the ground laughing like an idiot. Eventually the martial artist gained control of himself and managed to sit up. Wiping tears from his eyes he grinned at his sister-in-law.

"Thanks for that. I needed a good laugh. She really said all that?" Nabiki nodded, still chortling to herself. She'd arrived half an hour ago, pressing the intercom button at the main door and being admitted immediately. After greetings had been exchanged and an offer of coffee had been made and accepted, the three of them had gone up to the roof to enjoy the early autumn morning. It was just beginning to become cooler, so they wanted to make the most of the sunny day. Catching them up on the various events in the Tendo household had led to the final anecdote.

Kasumi slumped down beside her sister, giggling furiously, watching her husband with twinkling eyes. "Never find a husband..." she said to herself, making him look at her with amusement. "That's quite likely. She's a perceptive woman sometimes, your mother." He nodded, grinning, as she started giggling again. Nabiki watched them fondly. Her sister suddenly stood, approached the snickering form of her husband, then shimmered into another form, one that Nabiki hadn't encountered yet. Tall, blonde, very handsome, the man knelt in front of the martial artist, who watched with amusement. "Ah, my beautiful wench, marry me!" the disguised Kasumi said in a rich baritone. As Nabiki watched, eyes wide and a laugh bubbling up inside, Ranma became female, standing and holding the hand of his currently male-appearing wife.

"My dear sir," she said in a haughty way, "I could never marry someone who did not respect me speaking my mind."

"I find you intimidating, 'tis true, but I believe I can overcome that." The other hand of the blonde man was pressed against his brow melodramatically.

"See that you do, or we have no future together," Ranma pulled her hand back sharply, staring at the figure kneeling in front of her disapprovingly. Nabiki couldn't take it any more, roaring with laughter and sliding off the bench. Kasumi started laughing as well, the baritone voice sliding upwards in scale as she resumed her true appearance. The red-head slipped to her knees and hugged her wife, tears of laughter running down her face.

"You two would make her brain melt and run out her ears," the middle sister gasped out, holding her stomach. "If you ever get tired of beating up monsters and magical girls, aim for the stage. Or perhaps the movies." Ranma grinned, standing and pulling Kasumi to her feet. They bowed to the laughing brunette, then simultaneously curtsied, just to be sure. She howled again, nearly unable to breath. "Stop, please stop. I'm going to have an accident."

The three young women finally stopped giggling some minutes later, with difficulty. "I missed this," Nabiki said, looking at the other two. Her sister looked back sympathetically as they sat together on the bench.

"It's not been easy back in Nerima, has it?"

"No. The situation with Akane is, um, not going as well as I'd like. You know I managed to get her to agree to therapy?" They both nodded. "She's still going, so that's good, but it doesn't seem to be having much effect recently."
"We've had some reports of what's been going on, but not everything. We did hear that you gave her and Kodachi a bloody good talking to when you got back last time." Ranma smiled at her, thinking about what she'd heard. It sounded like the middle sister had been channelling Yori rather well.

"Yes, that was sort of funny. A pure fluke that everything happened right then, while you and those magical girls were fresh in my mind." She giggled again. "You should have seen Kodachi's expression. She had no idea how to deal with it. I really didn't think it would work, with either of them, but it did. Remarkably well. The Kuno idiot has been treating me quite respectfully ever since. So has your mother. Did you know she offered me the use of her katana if I needed some, ah, visual aids?" Ranma stared, then laughed.

"Wow. You must have impressed her."

"I think so. She had a weird look on her face afterwards, she heard the whole thing. To be honest she seems to be getting slightly more normal as time goes on. Sometimes she even makes jokes."

The red-head looked surprised.

"Are they any good?" Kasumi asked curiously. Nodding, Nabiki smiled a bit.

"Sometimes she can be quite funny." Her face fell after a moment. "Unfortunately, the immediate aftermath of that little lecture was that Akane nearly had a breakdown. True, it got her to agree to go to therapy sessions, but I was worried about her for a while afterwards. She was very depressed for a couple of weeks." The brunette explained about the ups and downs of the youngest Tendo undergoing therapy.

"A dart gun?" Ranma asked in disbelief. She nodded.

"Yep. It was the only thing they could think of. That first time a security guard came in and tried a taser on her. She didn't even notice. Just kept giggling and breaking things. In the end they had to evacuate that wing of the building and wait for her to get bored. After that, once I talked them into trying again, they spent quite a long time coming up with other ways of dealing with her if she went off the deep end again. That was the only thing that worked at all. The darts have enough sedatives in to stun a whale, but she shakes them off in a few minutes. The doctors can't believe it, but have to accept it." She shook her head, almost proud of her younger sister. Ranma and Kasumi glanced at each other with raised eyebrows.

"I'm kind of impressed that she's still sticking at it. That shows more discipline than she ever showed for the art." The martial artist shrugged a little. "Perhaps she's not beyond saving there either."

"Your father seems to think that's true." At the red-head's quizzical look, she explained, "The day it all came to a head he was watching her with a weird look, it was like he was seeing her for the first time in some way. He didn't say anything about it then, but I caught him looking at her in a sort of evaluating way several times over the next few weeks. I finally got annoyed and cornered him, then forced him to explain." She giggled. "He seems a bit scared of me now for some reason." Ranma grinned. "What he finally admitted is that he thinks that Akane has a lot of potential, but like you've always said, didn't have the right mental outlook to really learn much more than she has done already. But after she agreed to go to therapy, and more to the point has kept at it despite all the setbacks and disappointments, he seems to think that she might be developing the right mindset."

"I wouldn't trust him further than I could throw him," Ranma cautioned. Nabiki looked at her with raised eyebrows.
"In your case that's a fairly impressive distance, but I get your point. I don't. But everything else aside, he is a very good martial artist. Not a very good person, but... He taught you, after all, and while I know that a lot of what you can now do is a result of other people's teaching and your own work, he got you started. Perhaps he could help Akane. Perhaps not. I'm not even going to let him try until she's made more progress." She fell silent for a moment, as the other two glanced at each other. "The thing she really lacks is discipline, as you've said for years. A combination of therapy and some real martial arts tutoring might do something to fix that." She sighed a little helplessly, waving her hand at her sister.

"If only she had the ability to learn that you have. I still can't believe how good you got in such a short time." Kasumi looked pleased, while her husband smiled.

"Don't forget, Kas wasn't starting from scratch by a long way. You all had quite a bit of Anything Goes training when you were younger, that laid the groundwork very well. Akane may well have been the only one who kept at it, even in the half-assed way she did, but Kas learned a lot back then. And she's done quite a bit of Tai Chi and the like since as exercise." She looked seriously at the brunette. "All three of you Tendo women already knew more about martial arts than most people will ever learn, it's just that two of you simply didn't have the actual practice. You know a lot of the theory, in effect. I was able to build on that." She laughed a little. "That said, Kas is exceptional by any standards. I know how good I am, it's a gift added to a hell of a lot of practice and pain, but if she had gone through the same training I did from the same age, I sometimes wonder if she might even be better. She also has the gift, in spades." Her wife now looked embarrassed at the praise.

"I'm not that good," she protested mildly. Ranma looked at her with an amused expression.

"Oh, trust me, you are. I know I'm a good teacher, but even taking that into account you've learned much more in a far shorter amount of time that I could ever have hoped for or expected." She put an arm around her wife and pulled her close. "It makes me extremely proud, and also feel that everything was ultimately worth it." Nabiki watched them for a moment with a small smile.

"You two are incredible," she said softly. "And very lucky." Kasumi put the arm that wasn't occupied with holding the red-headed woman who was her husband around her sister.

"I know. More lucky than I can believe, sometimes." Squeezing her sister a bit, she looked at her serenely. "I hope that one day you find someone you will love as much. I'm sure you will."

Ranma grinned at her past his wife. "Hey, Nabiki, there's a good chance that you would be quite good at the art as well. It's in your blood, that much I'm sure of. I could teach you, or Kas could. Interested?" She stared at the other woman, very surprised. The thought had never really entered her mind. After a long moment she shook her head.

"I don't know. Do you really think so? I find it hard to believe I could ever do anything like the things I've seen you and Kasumi do. It's like magic."

"Well, to be honest, some of it is magic," the young woman said with a grin, turning back into a young man. Nabiki sighed in exasperation.

"You know perfectly well what I mean, you twit." He grinned again. "Mind you, that disguise spell might come in handy." The martial artist looked thoughtful.

"I'm not sure I could teach it on it's own. It needs a lot of ki ability as well as the magic manipulation, and I don't know any way to get either of them without the martial arts as well." He fell silent, pondering the idea. Eventually he shook his head slightly. "I'd have to think about it some more. It might be possible, but I really don't know for sure. The way I do magic is so different from the way a normal mage does they keep on insisting that it isn't magic at all. But they don't seem to know what it is. I know it's not ki, or at least not very much ki, so if it's not magic either..." He shrugged.

"Trust you to be so confusing that even a wizard or something thinks you're weird." Nabiki giggled at the satisfied expression that crossed his face at her comment.

"I do my best."

After a few more seconds, she shook her head again. "I'm really not sure. There are so many practical problems, aside from anything else. Having to be so careful when I come here is the biggest one. Thanks for the offer, but I'd need to think about it a lot more." He nodded.

"Fair enough. The offer stands, though. And if I figure out how to teach ki, or magic or whatever it is, on it's own, I'll let you know." Pushing himself to his feet, he looked down at the two women. "Speaking of the Art, it's time for practice, student." Kasumi smiled at him coyly.

"Oh, grand master, is it that time again?" Giggling she held out her hand and he pulled her to her feet. Nabiki watched them with amusement.

"Strange, you two. Very strange." Laughing they descended into the practice room, the two martial artists going off and changing into their exercise silks while Nabiki made herself another cup of coffee. Sipping it she wandered back to the practice room and watched as they sparred for an hour or so, marveling at the speed and precision of their movements. It was genuinely beautiful, a potentially deadly dance that only needed the right music to be a work of art in more than name.

The sound of blows being deflected made her wince at first, noises like that shouldn't come from a human body. At least without being immediately followed by screaming and a lot of blood. These two didn't seem to even notice, which was genuinely impressive and slightly worrying. After a while she stopped twitching at each thump and crack, sitting back and enjoying the show. It was far better than anything she'd even seen on television or in a movie. 'It makes Hollywood movies look like amateur work, and this is even better because none of it is special effects,' she thought. 'They could make a killing as stunt people, never mind that incredible acting ability.' She shook her head in wonder. 'That's just freakishly effective.'

Once the two had run the gamut of hand to hand moves, they suddenly started bringing out the special effects. Nabiki frankly stared in disbelief when they stepped a couple of metres apart and took up something similar to a fencing stance, with energy swords abruptly appearing in their hands. "Holy shit!" she squeaked. Kasumi glanced at her with a smile. "You've gotten better at that, haven't you, sis?" the middle sister asked, when she got over the shock.

"Yes, it took a lot of practice, but I can finally control it quite well." She waved her 'light-saber' around with a deep hum coming from it. It was a meter and a half of her familiar golden-white ki in the form of a rod about two centimetres in thickness. Ranma had a similar one, except that his was a pale bluish colour. Nabiki watched them with a worried expression.

"If you slip, you'll chop each other to pieces," she said, feeling nervous. Ranma smiled reassuringly at her.

"No, it's safe. The power level is very low, they just tingle. Look." He held out his arm and Kasumi waved her energy beam across it. The solid-appearing rod of light passed smoothly through his arm without leaving a mark.
"Amazing. So you can set it to stun or kill?" his sister-in-law asked with a grin.

"More or less." He laughed. "It's more along the lines of slice or dice, but at low power it doesn't cause damage. Looks impressive, though." She nodded vigorously.

"Damn right. It's incredible." A thought crossed her mind, and she asked curiously, "Is the sound deliberate?"

"Kind of. At higher power it does make a weird noise, I think it's due to the air being heated and pushed out of the way. But you can also deliberately force it to make sounds. Blame those movies. I couldn't resist, and Kas thinks it's fun." He waved his energy sword around, the light and deep throbbing hum when it moved making a very convincing effect. With a grin he did it again and this time it produced a turbine-like whistle. "With a lot of work I could probably figure out a way to make it play music, but that's just getting silly." Nabiki stared, then laughed.

"I know I keep saying it, but wow. And also, you really are very odd." He bowed to her, amused.

"What about the colour? That," she pointed at his energy blade, "is the same colour I've seen your ki attacks have before, but when you were Yori it was bright purple. And Kasumi's is that nice golden colour."

Looking at the beam of ki coming from his hand, he nodded. "Originally the ki colour was related to emotional state. Blue was confidence, for example, while green, like Ryoga always produced, was depression and sadness. Akane, when she manifests a ki aura, always made a dark red one, which is of course anger." He sighed a little at the thought. "There's a school of thought that says that using emotionally-linked ki can be dangerous, that it can reinforce those emotions. Like in Ryoga's case, because he's depressed his ki reflects that, but by producing ki attacks using it the feedback makes him even more depressed, and so on."

"That sounds nasty," Nabiki commented, thinking about it.

"It is. But I'm not sure it's completely accurate. Oh, there's some truth to it, definitely, but it's not the whole story. Becoming dependent on being in a particular emotional state to produce ki attacks I suspect is the bigger problem. If you only know how to produce anger ki, you tend to stay angry so you can use it. I think it might be the other way around than people think, not that the emotion is produced or reinforced by the ki, but that emotion helps produce the ki and you subconsciously become convinced that you can only do it when feeling that emotion." He shrugged. "In some ways it may not matter which way around it is, if you don't take steps to deal with it either one will cause major problems. I came to realise this years ago, and finally managed to separate the emotion from the ki completely. It wasn't easy, when you've been taught, or taught yourself, that the two are closely linked, it takes a lot of practice to unlearn that link."

He looked at his wife who was listening with interest. "When I taught Kas the basics of ki manipulation I was very careful to make sure that I didn't connect it to emotional state. As a result she never learned the bad habits I did. That probably sped up her mastery of it a lot as well, which was an unexpected benefit. It took longer to get her started, but once she got the idea progress was very fast."

"So the colour is more personal preference than anything else?" Nabiki found the concept amusing. He nodded with a smile.

"Pretty much. I like blue, Kas likes that remarkable golden colour. It took her ages to get it just the way she wanted it." He held his energy beam out in front of him and Nabiki watched as it slowly cycled through the entire spectrum. The sight was weirdly beautiful. "When I'm Yori, I use the purple colour because it's not something that people would associate with Ranma, and it really stands out. Kind of matches her eyes as well."

"So what about the intimidating glow when you get really angry?" The martial artist looked slightly embarrassed.

"Well, I'll admit that very strong emotions do make me... sort of... leak." Kasumi and Nabiki both giggled. "When your reservoir gets full enough, being really angry can make a small amount to kind of overflow, which makes the glow. That's where the battle aura comes from. Sometimes it's deliberate, but it can also be subconscious." He smiled a bit. "I have pretty large ki reservoirs as it happens. It's the side effect of ki usage, the more you use it the more you can use. A little like building up muscles through exercise. So far, as far as I can tell, there doesn't seem to be an upper limit. I'm sure there is one, there has to be, but I haven't found it yet. When I bumped into Herb the first time, for instance, his ki resources were so far beyond mine it was scary. The second time, I was a lot closer. He still had more, but I was closing in. Now... I'm not completely sure, but I suspect I outclass him in sheer ki output by a considerable amount. But available power is only part of it. You also have to have the ability to use that power effectively. Saffron had a lot more than me, for example, both ki and magic, but I still beat him. I figured out a way to use what I had in a way he wasn't expecting or prepared for, and that was all I needed."

He laughed slightly maliciously. "I could probably just crush him with sheer power now, but I still think that it's better to use what you have as efficiently as possible, rather than rely on overwhelming force. That's where most of those magical girls go wrong, they just jump in and blow the hell out of everything, basically carpet bombing the area, when something like a sniper might be more appropriate." Nabiki raised her eyebrows.

"I seem to remember you nuking the park only a few months ago, to get rid of one monster." The young man got an embarrassed expression while his wife started giggling.

"Um, yes. I might have overdone it a bit that time." He looked guilty. "But in my defence it was a very tough beastie."

"Might have overdone it? You left a twenty meter glass crater in the middle of the park! How much more could you have overdone it by?" Nabiki laughed, then suddenly stopped when Ranma and Kasumi exchanged odd glances. "Oh shit."

"Umm." He turned off his energy sword and scratched the back of his head.

"How much bigger could you have made it?" Nabiki asked slowly. They exchanged glances again.

"Umm..." She pinched the bridge of her nose.

"It's a lot, isn't it? And don't say 'Umm'." He smiled a little.

"Well..." She sighed loudly. "Yes, it's a lot." He paused again. "Really quite a lot."

"How much is a lot?" she asked, not entirely sure she wanted to know.

Turning to look out one of the large windows at the park behind the building, he pointed to the other side of the large expanse of green and trees. "I'm not completely sure, but I think the other side of the crater would be over there somewhere." She stared.

"From here?" He nodded. "To over there?" He nodded again. Standing, the middle Tendo walked to the window and looked at the park carefully for some time, before turning back to inspect the fairly innocuous young man standing in the middle of the room. "That must be over half a kilometre!" Yet another nod. "Fuck me," she said faintly, sliding down the wall to sit at the base of it, staring at him in horrified amazement. For some reason she didn't doubt his claim at all.

"I could probably only do it once, before I ran out of power completely," he said, making her laugh slightly hysterically.

"Oh, that makes it fine then." Shrugging, he looked at his wife, who smiled slightly. After some moments, she said in a vaguely amused voice, "You're so far beyond the normal martial artists and magical girls it's not even funny." Giving him a hard stare, she added, "I've never met anyone whose abilities should be measured in megatons before." He chuckled, walking over to sit beside her.

"It's kind of scary when you think of it like that. If it's any help, Happosai is nearly as powerful, and he's never blown up a city. Herb could make a pretty big hole as well."

"You blew up a mountain. Twice."

"Ah. Well, yes, there is that. But it was an accident."

"Twice."

"Yes."

"OK, then." She giggled, and he snickered a little. "When most people have a bit of an oopsie, they need to replace some dishes or something like that. Not redraw maps." This made him laugh. Indicating her sister, she asked, "How big a hole can you blow in the scenery?" Ranma glanced at his wife with a smile.

"We haven't had cause to find out yet. Probably only a little one, perhaps ten or fifteen metres across?" Nabiki stared at him once more, then at her sister.

"I was joking, damn it!" She inspected the gently smiling taller woman for a long moment. "Really, sis?" Kasumi nodded.

"I believe so. As my slightly disturbing husband said, the more ki you use the more you can use, and I've been practising a lot since you were last here." She vanished her own energy beam and sat down beside her sister as well. "We've run into several more of those monsters, and twice we've had to deal with them ourselves. The other two times we had to deal with the magical girls who dealt with them. Neither group was very responsible, they caused a lot of damage, so we had to be quite firm with them." She smiled gently at some memory. "It was quite funny. Yori made one group cry she was shouting so much. Everyone else was laughing." The woman looked at her husband. "You really should be less strict, they seemed very upset." He shrugged with an annoyed expression.

"They were being stupid. OK, they managed to destroy that thing, but they wrecked three perfectly good buildings in the process and totalled at least a dozen cars. It was a miracle that no one was killed. Then they were just going to walk away thinking that they'd done their bit. They give the rest of us a bad name."

"Still, you were a little harsh. That group is normally nowhere near as clumsy." Her husband sighed.

"I know. I guess I'll try to make it up to them the next time. Assuming they don't screw it up again." Nabiki was listening with a smile, hearing them talking about making the sort of people most normal citizens would run away from cry just by telling them off was very entertaining.
"Have you found out where those things are coming from? I haven't seen the news reports, I keep missing them, but from what I've been told they sound like that thing in the park." Ranma frowned.

"They are. Identical. They pop up randomly, there doesn't seem to be any pattern I can see yet. Two of them other than that first one close to here, inside our patch, two more outside but close enough I had to go and check them out. Aiko has done some research as well, but we can't find any records of anything quite like them. The portals open, one comes through, and they close again. The things just attack anyone close enough. They don't seem to be much more than very aggressive animals."

"Is it a deliberate attack?" The concept was alarming.

"I'm... not sure. It might be, but it's so random I can't really see the point. I suppose it could be considered a bit like some weird mystical form of terrorism, but it seems like a pretty large amount of effort to go to for not a lot of result. Once you know the trick they're not too hard to put down, you need to evaporate at least fifty percent of the body mass including the head in one attack. Most of the magical girls can manage that one way or another. The problem is that some of them miss." He scowled. "Three times. I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen the damage. How the hell do you miss something that size three times? They're not that fast."

"If it's not deliberate, why are they coming here? And where from?"

With another shrug he said, "Your guess is as good as mine at this point. One of the nastier demon worlds, certainly, but not one I'm familiar with. About the only possibility that makes any sense to me is that it's either some form of accidental transport, or a weird natural occurrence. Portals do sometimes open spontaneously, but five in a row in such a small area seems a bit unlikely. I guess it's not impossible. About all we can do is deal with them when they come through, and hope that either it stops, or a portal opens close enough to someone who can work out the origin that it can be permanently dealt with."

The young man shivered a little. "I'm just damn glad that so far all of them have appeared around here, where there are people that can deal with the things. If one came through in the middle of the Tokyo business district there would be carnage before anyone could get there and stop it. They've already killed seven people. None in the last three incidents, thankfully."

The thought of one of the things she'd witnessed suddenly appearing in the middle of a shopping centre was enough to make Nabiki's stomach turn. The sat in silence for a moment reflecting on the situation, before the two martial artists got up and resumed their practice. Nabiki watched with interest and amusement as they leapt around slashing at each other with humming energy blades, which made vicious crackling sounds when they intersected. The sight rapidly drove away the somewhat depressed mood she'd fallen into during the earlier discussion of otherworldly man-eating monsters.

After half an hour of practice with the blades, they each produced another one in their other hand, then proceed to have at it while dual-wielding 'light-sabers'. Nabiki stared open-mouthed. Ranma was clearly better at it than his wife, but she was no slouch either, if nothing else the sheer speed was unbelievable. 'Good grief. That's probably the most amazing thing I've ever seen,' the brunette thought to herself, watching her sister do a double somersault over the head of her husband while simultaneously blocking one energy blade with both of hers. His other one penetrated both her defences and her the instant she landed, making her stand looking at the beam of light going in the centre of her chest and out her back with irritation. "Damn," she muttered. Nabiki had both hands over her mouth, for a horrifying second she'd thought that the woman was in serious trouble before remembering that the blades were harmless.

"Not bad, Kas. Not bad at all. You're getting better very fast." Ranma turned off his blades and embraced his wife, who still seemed a bit annoyed.

"Not fast enough." She hugged him back. He laughed.

"Always the perfectionist. Come on, against almost anyone else you'd chop them into little bits." The thought clearly cheered her up while making her sister look slightly nauseous. "Right, I think that's enough for now. It's time for lunch." Standing, Nabiki accompanied them into the living room. Once they'd changed and showered, Kasumi prepared a light meal, which they slowly ate while catching up on all the things that had happened over the last few months.
Chapter 17

"Have you had much contact with the Amazons recently?" Kasumi asked her sister, while Ranma washed the dishes and listened. They were in the kitchen, putting things away, the elder Tendo showing the younger where things went. Nabiki shook her head.

"Not all that much in the last couple of months. Shampoo dropped by a while ago, just to say hello. Her Japanese is pretty good now, all that practice paid off. She's frustrated with Mousse again, he's still pining after her like, well, like she pines after him." She jerked her thumb at the young man with his hands in the hot soapy water, who looked mildly amused. "We were talking about Akane and the problems with the hospital. She thought the idea of having to use a vet's dart gun on her was very funny. Akane didn't, not very much, but took it in good humour for her." She laughed a little. "They've almost become friends in some weird way. As long as the subject steers clear of either Ranma or you they can have a civilised conversation."

"What about Cologne?" Ranma asked, drying his hands and turning to them. Nabiki looked over her shoulder.

"I haven't seen her for some time. She keeps to herself pretty much. Since I haven't been to the Café in a while there's been no real reason to see her."

Kasumi closed the last cupboard, then went back into the living room with the other two following her. They sat down on the sofa. "Any signs of Ryoga?" Ranma was quite curious.

"No, thank god. I haven't heard anything from or about him for more than a year now. I hope he stays away. Personally I never much cared for him anyway, but leaving that aside, any gains Akane is making would be ruined at the merest hint of him showing up. Even more than with you." She shuddered. "It would be absolute bloody chaos. Kodachi was bad enough, although that did work out in the end. Ryoga... No, the best thing would be if we never see him again."

"I doubt we'll be that lucky," Ranma said darkly. She nodded glumly. The part time pig did indeed have a nasty habit of turning up at the worst possible moment.

"It's been quite quiet, really. I haven't run into Tatewaki for weeks, and even when I did he was surprisingly polite. Almost sane. Ukyo and Konatsu seem to be settling down to a nice life together, I wouldn't be at all surprised to get a wedding invitation at some point. The only real trouble has been Akane flipping out every now and then, but even there she's at least breaking things at the hospital rather than home." Kasumi looked at her with a slight smile.

"Have you been able to get the Dojo repaired properly yet?" Her younger sister nodded, pleased.

"Yes. Finally, after close to four years, it's completely repaired. The amazing thing is that it was paid for by the profits from our fathers teaching. They've picked up four more students in the last month or so, which means they're actually turning a profit. Not a huge one, but still... I never thought that would happen. They run two classes now, a beginner one and a more advanced class, taking turns to teach them." She laughed. "They still insult each other regularly, and have fights almost every day. The students seem to enjoy it. To be honest, I think they do as well."

Ranma seemed both surprised and impressed. "I'm genuinely amazed that they've stuck to it for so long. No disrespect to your family, but your father never struck me as someone who could cope, well, at all really, to say nothing of the problems of running a business. And as for mine..." He shrugged. "You know my feelings towards him." Nabiki smiled a little.
"Only too well. I share a lot of them. But I will admit he's surprised me. He was the one to pull my father out of a bottle of sake years ago, and in many ways the driving force behind them taking up teaching again. Not that he's much of a role model but he does seem to have tried to improve himself. Now he's just a waste of space, not a waste of oxygen as well." Both Ranma and Kasumi grinned. "And as for Father, I've shared your opinions of him for a long time. He's our father, but he's also been pretty useless since mother passed on. She would have been very disappointed." The young woman frowned a little, momentarily depressed. "But he's definitely getting better. I really hope that this change sticks for good. I'd like to have my father back again." She looked at Kasumi, who nodded.

"So would I." She looked sad. "I do wish I could visit him, and Akane as well, but..." Ranma put his hand on hers.

"One day."

There was silence for a while as they busied themselves with their own thoughts, ultimately broken by Ranma. "So, most people seem to be getting their lives in order. Good for them. It's a pity it took... that... to trigger it." He winced at the memory. "I'm still in no hurry to meet up with them again, but it sounds like it might not be impossible eventually. We'll see." He cast an interrogative glance at the middle sister. "How's your own studies going?"

"Pretty well. The accountancy and financial operations courses are both interesting and quite easy. The advanced math is, um, advanced. Not easy at all, but I'm managing. All the computer courses are a lot of fun."

"What do you intend to do when you graduate?" Kasumi was quite curious. Nabiki made a small gesture, expressing a certain amount of uncertainty.

"I'm not sure. When I originally decided on these courses a few years ago I was kind of thinking stock broker, financial advisor, that sort of thing. I mean, I like money." She grinned as the other two nodded knowingly. "But since I started, and more to the point since one somewhat traumatic night nearly four years ago, I've been wondering if there might be something a bit more rewarding in other than the purely monetary manner." Her sister inspected her with interest, then glanced at her husband, who seemed surprised.

"Like what?" he asked.

"Again, I'm not sure." She laughed a little. "You know, all that work I did to track you two down, that was a lot of fun. Not at all easy, but it required a lot of computer and people skills, and detective work. More than once I've wondered if I should be using those skills in a career instead of the financial ones." Her sister nodded thoughtfully.

"You could combine them." Responding to the quizzical look from Nabiki, she expanded on her thought. "Forensic Accountancy. That's something I saw on TV. It requires a very sharp mind, I suspect, and also all the skills you either have or are learning. Detective work, but in the field of money." Nabiki sat up and looked very interested.

"Hmm. Now that's an interesting idea. I'll bet it pays pretty well, too." At her sister's slightly exasperated expression, she shrugged. "Hey, I told you I like money." Ranma laughed. She thought about it some more. "That's really not a bad idea. I'll have to look into what's involved." She smiled at her sister. "Thanks, sis." Kasumi looked pleased.

"So, what have you guys been up to, other than slaughtering other-worldly monsters and frightening skimpily-dressed schoolgirls with your frankly terrifying super-human abilities?"
Nabiki grinned at them. Ranma laughed, abruptly becoming Yori.

"I'm not terrifying, am I, dear?" the black-haired girl asked, her aura glowing a slightly radioactive blue-purple as she sat next to her wife, waving one hand around lazily with streamers of purple light coming from her fingertips. Nabiki watched with amused amazement. Kasumi leaned against her contentedly.

"Not in the slightest. To me, at any rate." 'Yori' grinned, her small fangs showing, putting her arm around her wife and changing back to a female Ranma. Nabiki laughed delightedly at the effects.

"I just can't get over how convincing you are in all these different identities. How you manage to keep it all straight is beyond me. And, yes, you are damn terrifying when you want to be, as you very well know." Ranma nodded pleased acknowledgement of the comment.

"Thanks. It was a lot of hard work."

"I like the visual effects. Is that new?" She nodded again.

"Yep. I got a bit bored a while back and tried to find out what else we could do with this ki/magic combination thing, whatever it actually is. It drives the mages I know to distraction, most of them pretend it doesn't exist now. One of them even looks physically ill when I mention it in his presence." She giggled. "I'm pretty sure it really is magic, because I know damn well what ki is and it's not that, even though it uses ki for control and direction. But it's some sort of magic that doesn't agree with the normal method." Nabiki laughed.

"I still have difficulty with the concept that there is a 'normal method' of magic." Her sister smiled, and Ranma giggled again.

"I know. It's kind of weird. But you can't argue with success. It works, whatever other people say. If they don't understand how, that's more a limitation of theirs." She looked amused. "I tried to teach it to one of the more receptive magic workers. She got a huge headache after about fifteen minutes and needed to lie down. After that she refused to even think about it any more. Apparently it's not very compatible with what she uses." The red-head shrugged. "Not my problem. One of the things that seems to upset them is that this method doesn't use spells in the form they are used to, it's more a matter of will, like with ki. The downside is that it can take a lot of effort to work out the right... pattern, I guess is the best word, to produce the effect you want. You have to be able to visualise it, and I think it's in more than three dimensions."

Nabiki was listening with interest and a certain amount of surprise. It sounded very strange, even given the indisputable existence of magic in the first place. "How can you visualise something in more than three dimensions?" The red-head waved a hand airily.

"Oh, it takes a lot of practice. And I suspect a very odd mindset. That might be why no one seems to have come up with it before." She looked thoughtful. "I still find it unlikely that I've invented it from nothing, someone else must have come up with it in the past. But no one I've mentioned it to seems to know about it, and most of them don't believe it until I show them. Sometimes not even then." Glancing at her wife, she smiled. "Luckily it turns out that I can teach it, although probably only to someone else with a particular mental outlook and also a lot of ki potential. It may be that learning one of the 'traditional' forms of magic precludes learning this form. It's a pity, it's a lot more flexible."

Kasumi interjected, "It's very interesting to learn, but like she says, not at all easy. At least at first. Once you master the basic principles it seems to come more easily, but needs a lot of practice to be something you can do quickly. When you do get to that point it's much faster than what I've seen of ordinary magic." By way of an example she flickered through half a dozen illusory forms in under a second, the shimmering effect associated with the spell continuous. Nabiki stared.

"Wow. Again."

Smiling at her wife, Ranma added, "It also seems to be vastly more efficient in how much energy it needs than most spells. The original illusion spells I used as the basis of this one would take several seconds to run, and a decent mage could do perhaps three or four spells like that before needing to go and sit down. When I showed that demonstration to the mage I was trying to teach, she got a nosebleed. Then she wouldn't talk to me for a month." The young woman looked amused.

"I've been trying to learn to create portals, for quite a while now. Unfortunately, that particular type of spell is in a class of it's own for complexity. Add that to the difficulty of this method when you're adapting a more standard spell, it gets kind of overcomplicated." She shrugged a little once more. "I'll work it out eventually. I may have to start from scratch though." Nabiki listened with interest, it seemed that there was nothing the martial artist wouldn't have a go at.

"Isn't that a bit dangerous?" she asked, slightly worried. Ranma looked amused.

"Well, the portals themselves are pretty safe. Where you end up might not be, of course. But I know the co-ordinates to several places that are fine. We've visited Uthryyl's world, for example, and while it's very strange it's no more dangerous than here." Once more Nabiki was surprised, staring at the two other women.

"You've visited other worlds?" Kasumi laughed.

"Oh, my, yes. Only a few times, but it was very interesting." Shaking her head her sister studied the tall brunette with new eyes.

"You haven't even been outside Japan, but you've visited other worlds. Demon worlds." Kasumi nodded, her eyes sparkling. "So very weird," Nabiki muttered to herself. After a moment's silence, Ranma continued.

"Anyway, to answer your original question, I got bored, so I started playing around with visual effects. They look impressive, don't take much power, and can make people really worried which can be useful in a battle. If you can intimidate someone enough you may not have to fight them, they'll back down." She grimaced. "Or possibly wildly overreact and attack all out. You have to judge your opponent carefully." Nabiki snickered, that last bit sounded like the voice of bitter experience. The red-head smiled back ruefully. "It's happened. We all make mistakes." Kasumi giggled.

"That was a particularly impressive one."

"Yes, I know, you can let it go any time now." She glanced at Nabiki who was smiling. "She'll never let me live that one down. Right, yes, visual effects. I worked out a way to make the ki glow persistent, mixing it with the magic, and form it into shapes. A bit like the ki beam but not dangerous, and much more free-form." Holding out her hand she formed a pale blue sphere fifteen centimetres across on it, then gently flipped it into the air. It drifted across the coffee table towards Nabiki, whose eyes widened in shock. About to scramble out of it's path, she stopped when Ranma grinned. "Relax. It's harmless." Warily watching the glowing ball she settled back into her seat. The thing slowed to a halt midway between them, hanging in the air in an improbable manner. 'In much the same way bricks don't,' was the line from a famous book that came to mind, making her giggle for a moment.
She watched with amazement as the sphere of light slowly changed shape, ending up as a perfect cube. Then a pyramid, followed by a torus. Cycling through the spectrum it changed and distorted, taking on many different geometrical shapes, before splitting apart into half a dozen smaller objects, each of which was a different colour. They began orbiting a common centre, each one changing continuously. She glanced at Ranma who was staring fixedly at the little constellation of light she was controlling, sweating lightly. It obviously took considerable work. "That's incredible," the brunette said quietly. Flashing a brief smile at her, Ranma concentrated on her light show, while Kasumi and Nabiki watched, captivated.

All the moving objects collapsed back into basic spheres again, each a different colour, then began moving in more and more complex patterns, forming three dimensional helices and spirals, expanding out from the original point. One of them whizzed past Nabiki's face and, startled, she put up her hand reflexively to fend it off. With no sensation at all it passed right through her hand, making her squeak in shock. "Holy crap!" she muttered, experimentally putting her hand in the way of another one and watching wide-eyed as it went through. "Unbelievable. You've probably invented another art form. All you need is music." The martial artist nodded with a small smile.

The collection of moving lights froze, then collapsed back into a sphere in its original position over the coffee table. A second or two later, it grew slightly then changed shape, quickly taking on the form of a human head. With a shock Nabiki found herself staring at a ghostly life-size replica of her own face. Ranma grinned looked slightly tired. "I can't do full colour yet, I need to graft in some of the illusion spell I think. That should let me create a very lifelike projection, which might have some tactical uses. But it's fun already, just a bit tiring. I haven't fully mastered it so I have to keep thinking about what I'm trying to do, which is hard work." The misty bluish replica of her head vanished, and the red-head sighed. "It doesn't need much power, the difficulty is concentrating on all the different things you need to keep track of at once."

"It's still damn impressive!" his sister-in-law said with wonder.

"Thanks. That's one of the more complex effects, of course. Simpler ones are much easier, and in many cases more intimidating." She held up her hand again, the streamers of light rising from her fingertips like smoke from a recently extinguished candle but much more visible. After a second or two the glow spread down her fingers to encompass her entire hand, making it look quite dangerous. "I can do this with a ki aura of course, but this method is more flexible, and takes less power. Plus you can do this with it." The glow restricted itself to her index finger, and she quickly wrote her name in the air, the Kanji characters hanging in front of her. Once more Nabiki was impressed.

"The funny thing is, this particular trick seems to be quite stable. Once you form the pattern like this, you don't have to do anything else. It just sits there. I'm not quite sure why yet. After a while, depending how much power you put into it, it goes pop, but up until that point it stays put." She waved her hand through the glowing lines in the air. They passed through it without wavering. "I haven't come up with a particularly good use for it yet but it's kind of amusing."

Nabiki grinned. "You could leave notes for each other. Beats refrigerator magnets and bits of paper."

"True." The other woman smiled, while Kasumi laughed.

"I'm still learning it from her, but I can do that bit now," her sister said. She demonstrated, writing her name in the air as well. The golden characters hung placidly over the table. "I can't do the projection thing very well, it's very difficult."

"How long does it last?" Nabiki asked curiously, sticking her own hand out and waving it slowly back and forth through the writing. Ranma shrugged a little.

"Like I said, it depends on the amount of power. The longest I've tried has been about a day, but I turned it off at that point because I was bored with it. It would probably have run for quite a bit longer. This doesn't have much, it'll disappear in a minute or two. You can stop it whenever you want, of course." She looked slightly worried. "It's possible to pump enough power into it that it becomes dangerous. I found that out the hard way." Looking at her finger ruefully, she added, "It hurt. Like sticking your finger on something very hot, and for me because of that phoenix pill years back, it would have to be hot." Nabiki suddenly stopped playing with the glowing characters. Ranma snickered. "Don't worry, you have to put a hell of a lot of energy into it before that happens. You'd know, you'd feel the corona surrounding it before you got your hand very close." They watched as her glowing name abruptly faded away.

"There you go. Ran out of power." Kasumi's lasted another few seconds, before it too faded.

"You know some really neat tricks," Nabiki said, impressed. The young woman smiled, becoming a young man.

"I know," he said happily. "I can't find much of a use for some of them, but they're good practice if nothing else."

"That writing in mid air one could be profitable. If you could make it last for long periods of time you could replace neon signs with it." She looked at him with a sly grin. "Except for your terrible handwriting." He seemed both amused and mildly insulted.

"It's getting better!" he protested. His wife gently smiled at him.

"Better isn't good, dear." Huffing in mock annoyance he glared at her, while her sister laughed.

"Everyone's a critic."

Kasumi got up to make coffee. Nabiki also stood, wandering to the window and looking out at the view. "You really do have a nice place here." Ranma walked over to stand beside her.

"I know. We're very lucky to have it. I can never thank Happosai enough, he helped far more than I would have believed possible. Things would have been a lot more difficult without him." He chuckled. "I still find it odd thinking that, my first impressions of the little pervert weren't very good." She smiled.

"No one has a good first impression of Happosai. But... after getting to know him, then they really dislike him." Ranma started laughing helplessly, making her smile. After a moment, she looked at him. "I wanted to ask you something," she began, hesitantly. He returned her gaze questioningly.

"Go on," he said, after a pause. She opened her mouth, then closed it, trying to think of the best way to phrase her question. Eventually she decided to just ask.

"Why are you so nice to me? I did some horrible things to you for years. A lot of what happened at the wedding was my fault, I didn't mean for all that chaos, but if I'd thought about it I should have known that it would happen. I just wanted the money. I charged you for all sorts of ridiculous things, I used you for personal gain. I'm not a very nice person. Yet you let me into your home, you trusted me with all your secrets, you gave me money. Why?" She was almost in tears. He smiled gently at her, in a way that reminded her very strongly of her sister, before leading her back to the sofa. Kasumi came out of the kitchen with coffee on a tray, sitting down and watching silently. Carefully, he helped her to sit, then joined her. Holding her hand, he looked at her for a moment while she searched his face for recriminations, finding none.

"A nice person and a good person are not the same thing. It's better if they are, of course, but it's not required." He smiled as she listened intently. "Yes, you are, or at least were, a very mercenary individual. Cold, efficient, effective. Some people don't like that. Yes, you have done some pretty nasty things to me and quite a few others. You were complicit in the wedding fiasco, that's true. You snuck into my room to take photos of me as a female to sell to Kuno, who is both an idiot and slightly insane. You always had an eye open for a chance to make money from me, and managed to do so on quite a few occasions. None of these are very nice, and several of them are certainly illegal." She stared, as he listed her crimes against him.

"But... You didn't cause the wedding to go to shit. That would certainly have happened with or without you, although you probably made it a little worse. In the end, though, it led to me finally reaching a point in my life where I could be truly happy. As it did with your sister. For that, I can forgive you pretty much anything. There's nothing wrong with being efficient, and there are places where an icy emotionless outlook is essential. While you kept a lot of the money you made from the photos, quite a bit of it went towards running the house, which is good. I wouldn't have let you take them otherwise." Her eyes widened a little and he grinned. "Of course I knew you were there. I'd have been a pretty poor excuse for a martial artist if I didn't notice someone sneaking into my room, never mind pouring water all over me!" She giggled a little nervously.

"Above all, two things stand out to me. One is that to my knowledge, you never lied to me, or anyone else. You may be a master of bending the truth, but you never broke it. And the other is that you, out of all the ones in Nerima after Kas and I left, were in a very real sense the only honourable one. You never tried to hide what you were, you were always true to yourself. You've worked very hard to keep your family together and solvent, when it would have been quite easy for you to walk away. Another thing to remember is that people change as they mature. I know, from what I've seen while we've been watching you all this time, that you had grown up, like we all did. None of us are the same people we were back then. You like money, true, but you don't let it control you. If you had, when Kas offered you a large amount of it, things would have been different." Her eyes widened again and she glanced at her sister.

"It was a test?" she whispered.

"Not completely," her sister said, looking guilty, "but we had to be sure. I was, and Ranma almost was."

"What would you have done if I'd just grabbed it?" She looked between them.

Ranma sighed a little. "More or less the same, but I suspect we wouldn't be having this conversation." She sagged back against the sofa, thinking about what she'd been told. He watched sympathetically.

"We'd have given you the money regardless. I have no wish to see Kasumi's family out on the street, despite how I feel about most of the people back in Nerima. But I don't think we would have been very close. I needed to know I could trust you. Kasumi was sure we could, and I wanted to believe it myself. Like I said months ago, despite all our differences I always sort of respected you even when I didn't like you. Now, I respect you and like you. I really wanted to be proven right, that I could also trust you. I was." She stared at him for a long moment, then hugged him. He returned it with interest, while his wife watched with a pleased smile.

"I'm still not a very nice person," she said quietly into his neck.

"I know, but I think you're a good person, and getting better every day." He chuckled. "Quite a few people would say I'm not a very nice person either." Kasumi giggled.

"No, that's Yori." Both Nabiki and Ranma looked amused.

"I also learned quite a long time ago, it's best not to hold grudges. Not serious ones, anyway. Look at Ryoga. I never really did anything very bad to him, most of what he blames me for was his own damn fault, but he pretty much ruined his own life following me around threatening to kill me. If he'd just let it go and tried to fix his problems, he might not have such a hard time. He certainly wouldn't have the Jusenkyo curse." Nabiki nodded thoughtfully.

"I have no idea how, with the upbringing you had, you turned out such a decent individual." He looked embarrassed.

"Luck, I suppose." She inspected him closely.

"No. There's a lot more to it than that. Whatever it is, I'm very glad it happened." Kasumi smiled at her.

"So am I. More than you can imagine." The older Tendo handed her sister a cup of coffee, the younger one taking it gratefully. Ranma picked up his own and took a sip.

"Feel better now?" Nabiki nodded.

"Yes. Thank you for being honest with me. And, for everything I did, I'm sorry." He waved his free hand dismissively.

"Forget it. What's done is done. All we can do is affect the present and the future, not the past."

"Very deep. Get it from a fortune cookie?" the brunette asked with a grin. He chuckled.

"Yes, as it happens." This made her burst out laughing to the point he had to relieve her of her coffee until she calmed down.

Handing it back to her, he grinned. "I was exceptionally angry at the time we left, as you can probably remember." She shivered, the burning eyes of the red-headed woman still featured in her nightmares. "But oddly enough very little of it was directed at you. Akane, yes, Ryoga, yes, those damn Amazons, oh god yes. Our parents, the Kunos, you name it. But not so much you. I'd had a lot of time to think under all that rubble, one of the things I'd worked out was that what happened was inevitable. Sooner or later something like that was bound to happen, the way my life was going wouldn't allow for any other outcome. In a sense, your contribution was a good thing in the long run, it sped up the timetable. If things had just festered along like they were, when I finally snapped, it might have been... very bad. Very bad indeed." He stopped and sipped some coffee, his eyes not on her but nearly four years in the past.

"I don't like to think about that. I'm a lot more powerful now than I was then, but even so there wouldn't have been much left of the Dojo. If anything," He shook his head, returning to the present. "It may be that you saved a lot of people by being yourself. Luckily, we'll never know what would have happened." Nabiki studied his face thoughtfully.

"Still, I apologise. It was, if nothing else, rude." He grinned.

"No harm in being rude if you pick your moment. Sometimes it's necessary." Turning to look at the clock over the kitchen door, he added, "The restaurant is booked for seven. It's just after two now, it'll take us about half an hour to get there, unless you'd like Kas or me to give you a lift over the roofs?" She shook her head emphatically, causing him to smile. "So, we've got about four hours or "Nothing specific. I'm quite happy to sit here and talk, or go out and wander around the neighbourhood. As long as there's no roof-hopping!" She looked severely at her sister, who smiled slightly and sipped her own coffee again. "By the way, where are we going, and who are you going as?" Shaking her head, she added with a smile, "I still can't believe I can ask that without it being stupid."

"The restaurant is on the other side of Minato, near the bay. It's a Thai/French fusion place, which is a weird combination but somehow works pretty well. We've been there a few times when Kas or I didn't want to cook, someone at the university recommended it." Finishing his coffee, he put his cup on the table. "As for who to go as... Hmm. What do you think, love?" Kasumi tapped her chin thoughtfully.

"Well, could we see what's on offer?" He nodded.

"Of course." Standing, he walked a couple of metres away, turning to look at the two women. Nabiki was watching with great amusement, while Kasumi seemed to be treating it like someone being asked to pick a pair of shoes. "OK. First, we have this one, a pretty little number I call Asami." The usual visual effect came, leaving behind a slender female, even shorter than Ranma's female form, with shoulder length black hair, dressed in traditional Japanese clothing. Her eyes downcast, she asked in a soft voice, "Does this meet with your approval, Miss Tendo?" Kasumi considered the figure while Nabiki tried not to giggle.

"No. Too short." She flipped her hand dismissively. "Show me a different one."

"At once, Miss Tendo." The girl shimmered, the figure was still female but now much taller, nearly Kasumi's own height. With very short greenish hair, black eyes, and dressed like a stylish biker babe in quite a large amount of form-fitting leather, she cocked a hip and rested her hand on it. "How about Cheiko?" Nabiki started laughing, the young woman looking towards her challengingly. "Something wrong, girly?" She shook her head, giggling furiously.

"No. This is..." Kasumi waved her hand languidly at the figure in front of her, doing a very good Kodachi impression, "too common. Next."

Once more the figure changed. "Hi. I'm Mariko." This woman was about Kasumi's age, around Nabiki's height, but with immense breasts and a very narrow waist. Long lilac hair reminiscent of Shampoo's hung to below her buttocks, swaying around as she moved. Walking across to Nabiki with a feminine gait, she smiled prettily. "Who are you?" The middle sister watched with amazement, too surprised even to laugh. Kasumi tutted.

"No, definitely not. Much too obvious." The young woman pouted, making Nabiki nearly explode with amusement, the expression was too cute for words. "Show me something in a male, medium-large." With a small sigh the girl walked back to her original spot, once more changing. This time there was a good-looking young man standing there grinning at them in a confident manner. He was roughly the same height as Ranma's normal male form, but with shoulder-length wavy brown hair that obviously required considerable hair-care products. His teeth were a perfect glistening white, his brown eyes twinkling. He looked like a movie star. "Is Kenji acceptable, beautiful?" he asked in a tenor voice with a slight Osakan accent.

"Oh, no, that's far too pretty-boy." Kasumi frowned. Nabiki was having trouble breathing by this point. "Next." With a long-suffering sigh the man nodded, wavering into a different person. This one was huge, at least a hundred and ninety centimetres tall, and very muscular. Dark complexioned with hair so short he was nearly bald, he looked at them through deep blue eyes.
"You're hard to please, lady. I'm Shin. Good enough for you?" Slipping over onto her back Nabiki rolled on the sofa laughing hard enough to break something. The different voices, accents and mannerisms were so convincing she had real trouble accepting it was still Ranma. The man, Shin, looked at her with an irritated expression which made her laugh even harder. "You're pretty weird, girl." Kasumi looked appalled.

"No! Definitely not. I said medium-large, that's an extra-large." 'Shin' sighed heavily.

"Women. Never satisfied." He shimmered away to be replaced by a medium height teenager with acne. Kasumi didn't even let him speak.

"No. Too repulsive." Another figure took his place. Nabiki was laughing furiously.

"No. Too short. Again."

"No. Too thin."

"NO! Too fat."

"Oh, for..." She sighed, inspecting the figure in front of her critically, while Nabiki stared in disbelief. "Too many legs." The centaur looked put upon, then changed again. "Ah. Now we're getting somewhere." Ranma grinned at her. The middle Tendo roared with laughter as he walked over and kissed his wife.

"You two are completely nuts. I do hope you understand that?" They nodded, grinning. "If nothing else you've got the best comedy act I've ever seen."

Ranma bowed ironically. "Thank you. I do what I can." Sitting beside Kasumi, he added, "We're going as Rika and Maiko, actually, that's the name the booking is in."

"How many of those are identities you really use?" Nabiki was very curious. Ranma looked amused.

"I've used all of them except the centaur at one point or another, but I only have documentation for Asami, Mariko, and Shin." He snickered. "I'm not sure where I could use a centaur. But it was interesting coming up with it. Blame too much TV."

Nabiki watched him with wonder. "Forget stunt work, you could turn the world of costumes and special effects on it's head." She suddenly looked thoughtful, then very amused. "Hey, the next time there's a comic book convention in Tokyo you could come up with some really weird ones and go. It would blow those weirdo's minds." Ranma got an interested expression. Kasumi nudged him in the ribs.

"We're supposed to be trying to keep attention away from us, dear, not attracting it."

"But, Kas, it would be so funny," he pleaded, winking at Nabiki.

"I really don't think it's a good idea." He sighed.

"You're only saying that because you don't have any good ones." Glancing slyly at Nabiki he saw her eyes widen. Looking back he grinned at the incredibly beautiful mermaid that was curled up on the sofa next to him, her shimmering golden tail wrapped around her body. Putting one webbed hand on his knee, she smiled prettily at him. "OK, you have one good one."

"Good god," Nabiki managed, staring wide-eyed. The mermaid, who she was having trouble remembering was actually her elder sister, grinned at her, flipping her long green hair over her shoulder with a toss of her head, before shimmering back into Kasumi. "Blow their minds indeed. Un-fucking-believable." Kasumi nodded in acknowledgement of the praise. "I can't get over how amazingly convincing it looks. There's absolutely no indication that it's not real."

"It's a very effective spell," Ranma said with a nod. "I'm still improving it, as is Kas. To be honest, by now it's closer to a shape-shift than an illusion in some ways. It's not really real, but for most purposes you can treat it as such. Sensory feedback is pretty much perfect, all the kinaesthetics work well, and so on. When it's active you really do get most if not all of the physical sensations of the illusory body."

"What about the extra mass? I mean, 'Shin' was at least twice your size, and the centaur probably weighed two or three times that." Nabiki was thinking about how it could possibly work. Ranma shrugged.

"You tell me. It works a lot like the Jusenkyo curse in that respect. We copied some of the, um, programming I guess, from it. That was about the only bit Kas and I could make heads or tails of other than the trigger. You wouldn't believe how complex it is. But I don't really know how it works, just what it does." He shifted to female. "I weigh about twenty kilos less like this than I do as a male. It's completely real. Even though I weigh more than I should do, because my bone and muscle density is much higher than most people's, I still lose mass when I turn female." Changing back to male, he went on, "And I get it back when I become male again. But where it goes or comes from is something I still can't figure out. We could copy it, though."

"So, when you do that spell for most purposes you really become the thing you're pretending to be?"

"Kind of. It feels, looks, and measures real, as far as I can tell. But it's not stable. As soon as you stop powering it the spell evaporates and you're back where you started, which proves it's not a real change. The Jusenkyo change is real, and completely stable aside from the water trigger. It's a biologically complete change in every way. Only the mind stays the same. Genetically, when I'm female it's as if I was born that way, and likewise for male. The illusion spell doesn't go to that level of detail. Whether it could be made to do so I don't know."

"Very weird. Magic is extremely strange." He nodded with a smile.

"Oh, yes. It is that, all right. But very useful as well." After a moment's thought, he added, "Sometimes the mass thing worries me. Kasumi mentioned it years ago, I'd never really thought about it until then, but she's right. That's the weirdest part. The worrying thing is that if you work out how much energy twenty kilos of mass represents, it's a lot. I mean, an absolutely huge amount. Hundreds of megatons worth in explosion terms. If it was really converting mass to energy and back again, the possibility of a... slip-up... don't bear thinking about. Tokyo would disappear completely." They all thought about that with uneasy expressions.

"That's pretty scary," Nabiki said slowly. He nodded.

"Damn right. But I'm pretty sure that it's not working like that. I think it's pulling the mass from somewhere, then putting it back when it's not needed, but where from I have no idea." With a shrug, he added, "Magic does all sorts of weird things that no one seems to have a good answer for. Quite a few spells should only work with completely preposterous amounts of energy, the Jusenkyo curse is just out the far end of that curve. Since they clearly don't need anything even remotely approaching that amount of energy, it must do something else." He grinned a little. "But it's a good question to raise if you want to make a mage go pale. Most of them have never thought about it. When they do, they really don't like it."
He watched her as she laughed. With a slight smile he glanced at his wife, who had been listening with interest. Raising his eyebrows he flicked his eyes at her sister. She followed his gaze and frowned slightly, then gave him a small nod. Nabiki hadn't noticed. Turning his attention back to her he suddenly got a mischievous smile, as did Kasumi. "What?" Nabiki asked, coughing slightly as her voice squeaked. Their grins grew wider in eerie synchronism. She looked at them questioningly until something made her look down. "Holy crap!" she shrieked. Jumping to her feet, stumbling a little, she stared, stunned at the odd sensations. Lifting one leg she looked at the hoof it now ended in. Blue scales covered her legs under the tight black leather. "Gahh! What did you do?" She became aware that her voice sounded completely wrong. Running to the nearest mirror, which was in the main bathroom, she heard and felt the odd sensations of hooves on tile.

Staring back at her was the face of Ranma's demon alter ego, Zythra'a. She looked at it in appalled amazement, opening and closing her mouth and blinking her eyes. Sticking out her tongue she saw it was much too long and also forked. " Fucking hell, this is weird," she said in a voice that wasn't her own. Walking slowly back to the living room she stopped and glared at her sister and brother in law, who were rolling around on the sofa laughing their guts out. " Funny. Very funny indeed. You idiots." She sat again, lifting one leg over the other and feeling the hoof on the end of it curiously. The sensations were completely convincing. "You scared the crap out of me." She ran her hand over the scales on her shin. "This is the weirdest thing I've ever experienced."

Ranma looked at her expression and exploded in renewed laughter. Kasumi was leaning against him giggling uncontrollably. She sat and glared at them with her arms folded until they recovered a little, tapping the talons on the end of her fingers against her elbow. "All done?" They nodded, still chortling. "OK. Can you undo this, please?"

With a grin, Ranma said, "But it suits you, Nabs. Think how you could scare people into doing what you want." She sighed deeply.

"You, Saotome, are a first-class nutcase." He nodded contentedly. She noticed suddenly that she was back to normal. "Thank you. And don't call me Nabs."

"Well? What do you think?" Kasumi finally stopped giggling although her voice was rich with amusement. Nabiki looked at her.

"You are also a nutcase, sis. I don't know which one of you is worse." She thought about it. "I think you could drive someone completely crazy with that little trick, if they didn't know about it. It's damn disconcerting even if you do know about it. But, yes, I admit it's pretty impressive. I could feel everything as if it was real. That's got to be the strangest thing ever." She looked at Ranma. "I suddenly have a lot more insight into what you must have gone through all those years. At least this you can turn on and off with a thought. It must have been difficult when you couldn't." He nodded soberly.

"It wasn't easy. Luckily, you can get used to pretty much anything given enough time. And the right person to help." Putting his arm around his still smiling wife he held her close.
Chapter 18

Finishing off his coffee, Ranma jumped to his feet. "Come on, let's go and do something. I'm getting bored sitting around inside. We've got nearly three and half hours to fill, let's go and wander around outside for a while. Why don't we show you some more of the neighbourhood?" Nabiki looked at him with some exasperation. He seemed rather more full of beans than she expected for a weekend.

"Oh, why not." Standing she looked around for her jacket. Kasumi glanced at her husband, who was peering out the balcony doors at the ground, then smiled. Getting up she disappeared into their bedroom, returning a couple of minutes later as Chou, wearing her grey silk clothing and carrying a small nylon bag. Ranma turned to inspect her, then grinned.

"Good idea. We haven't checked out the area for a couple of days. Clothes for later in the bag?" She nodded.

"Yes, in case we don't get around to coming back, we can change somewhere else. Unless you just want illusory ones."

"No, may as well have the real thing, there wasn't any point in buying them otherwise." He went towards the bedroom himself, his male form melting away into a female one that became Yori before he entered the room. Nabiki watched with amusement.

"You two make all this look completely natural, but it's so incredible. Most people would find it very difficult to believe." Her sister raised an eyebrow, casually flipping her bag into nothingness. Nabiki grinned. "Like that. Do you have any idea how insane that looks? You just made something vanish, for real. But you treat it like you were putting a pair of socks in the drawer." Kasumi giggled.

"I know. Sometimes I find myself thinking this all can't possibly be real. I'm so glad it is." Walking over to her younger sibling she gave her a quick hug. "And I'm glad you can share it with us now. But I'm a little upset you haven't visited more often."

"Sis, you know I wanted too, but what with Akane, my university studies, and basically life in general, it's been impossible. Hopefully things will improve soon." The older woman looked understanding.

"I hope so. It's very nice having you around." Ranma rejoined them in her black silk with the blue stripe. Flipping her long braid over her shoulder having finished adjusting the blue bow Nabiki had seen the last time, she grinned. That expression on the face of her Yori persona was a little worrying, promising a certain amount of potential mayhem.

Nabiki inspected her with interest. "You fixed the clothes, sis?" she asked. There was no trace of the place where it had been torn by the monster the last time. Kasumi nodded.

"Yes, although we each have two or three sets of these." She giggled again. "I like sewing, and Ranma does tend to be hard on her clothes." Her husband looked embarrassed.

"Do you ever go out as a man, then?" Nabiki asked, raising her eyebrows. "Every time I've seen you outside this building you've been female." Ranma laughed.

"Yes, it does seem that way. I do go out as a male, but I have to admit not that much at the moment. I'm attending university as a woman as you know, which accounts for a lot of my day, and Yori takes up quite a lot of the rest, at least in the last few months. What with these demon attacks or whatever they are, and having to deal with various oddly dressed idiots prancing around the place breaking things, I've been either Maiko or Yori almost all the time I've been out for weeks." She shrugged slightly. "Not really much of an issue, it's just what's happening right now. It will probably calm down sooner or later. These things seem to go in waves."

Glancing towards the balcony doors for a moment, Nabiki looked back to the black-haired woman and asked with a grin, "Planning on jumping off the balcony again? Or are you going to use the front door like a real person."

"I think, just to make you happy, we can go out the front door." Appearing amused Ranma pulled out a familiar bracelet. "But I think we'll be invisible. And you should put this on, it's probably not a good idea to associate Nabiki Tendo with Yori and Chou as well as Rika and Maiko." With an understanding nod Nabiki slipped the bracelet over her wrist, then held it out to be activated.

"This thing really is very useful," she noted, looking at it once more.

"Very much so. And no, you still can't keep it." The brunette looked both amused and disappointed once more. Laughing, Ranma led the way to the door to the hall. "Remember, outside it's Yori and Chou, OK?"

"I know."

"Just checking." They smiled at each other while Kasumi laughed. After stepping out of the elevator, Ranma stopped her sister-in-law. "OK, I'll cover you with my cloak. Stay close, no more than about a metre away, until I tell you, all right?" She nodded with slight trepidation, stepping closer. Noticing the black-haired girl grinned. "Don't worry, you won't feel it, but it produces a slightly odd change in the light. Ready?" A second later the ambient light did indeed change, darkening a little and changing in colour in a way that was very hard to pin down. Following the other woman from immediately behind she stepped out the main door. Quickly looking back she couldn't see any sign of her sister, just the door swinging closed.

'Very strange indeed,' she thought to herself as the pair of them walked down the street, the small number of pedestrians in the area looking right through them. 'Yori' occasionally stepped to the side to avoid someone coming directly at them, which made her have to be quick on her feet to stay close enough. After a couple of minutes they stepped into a narrow alley between two buildings and the light suddenly returned to normal. She looked around to see her sister fade into view behind them.

"That's an odd experience," she said. 'Yori' grinned.

"I know. You don't have to be completely quiet, by the way, it covers sounds as well, at least to a point. If you started screaming and shouting someone might hear something, but not much otherwise." She looked towards the street. "OK, we may as well head for the shopping area, see if anything interesting is going on. I want to talk to a couple of people in a bar there anyway." The three women walked back down the alley, emerging onto the residential road and turning left. As they walked 'Chou' pointed out sights of interest and gave her sister some of the history of the region.

Entering the more commercial part of the area they walked along a side street heading for the entertainment district. This section of Minato ward was set up a lot like a small town, within the larger city area, itself a part of the greater Tokyo metropolis. Very similar to Furinkan within Nerima but more affluent, there were a lot of trees and green areas, while the passing vehicles were mostly quite expensive ones like BMWs and other imports, or high end domestic models. Just as they reached the street along which were many of the bars, restaurants, and nightclubs of the area, most of which hadn't opened yet. 'Yori' swore slightly and shot off across the road, 'Chou' following her almost instantly. It happened so fast that Nabiki had barely noticed what was happening before it was over.

An expensive and shiny bright red open-topped sports car, driven by an obviously well off young man in his mid twenties accompanied by a good-looking young woman who appeared to be a foreigner, perhaps Italian from what she could see of her features, had narrowly missed running over two small children who had been crossing the road. 'Yori' and 'Chou' had grabbed them out of the way just in time and were now kneeling down comforting them as their worried parents ran across the road from the shop they'd all exited moments before. The driver of the car had panic-stopped far too late, having apparently driven through a traffic light that had been in the process of changing from yellow to red at the time, and was now sitting looking simultaneously relieved and annoyed. Nabiki walked over, having checked the passing traffic for more like him, approaching her disguised sister and sister-in-law.

"Are they OK?" she asked, looking at the young boy and girl, who seemed to be about ten or so. Obviously brother and sister, the boy was comforting the girl while looking at the two martial artists with wide eyes. 'Chou' nodded, standing up.

"Yes. Just a little frightened." She turned to glare at the young man in the sports car some fifteen metres further down the road, who noticed and went pale. "No thanks to that idiot. If we hadn't pulled them out of the way he'd have hit both of them." The children's parents ran up and grabbed both their offspring, hugging them with relief before turning to the three women. The man's eyes widened, he clearly knew who they were.

"Thank you so much, Yori, Chou. It's young people like you who make me very pleased to live here," he said, bowing to them both formally. 'Yori' bowed back, as did her wife.

"You're very welcome." She turned to glare at the driver of the car, who looked extremely worried by this point. He was close enough to have heard the names which he obviously recognised. Nabiki saw his lips form the words 'Oh, shit', before he put the car in gear and began to pull away.

"Oh no you don't, you bastard," 'Yori' growled, abruptly moving so fast she practically teleported from her position beside Nabiki to one behind the vehicle. Grabbing the rear of the car with one hand she lifted it clear of the ground effortlessly, making Nabiki's eyes widen slightly and everyone else who was watching stare in amazement. "Turn it off. Now." she said, no strain but considerable irritation in her voice. Looking over his shoulder with numb shock the man stared at her in disbelief. She lifted the car higher and shook it a little. "Now." He obeyed. 'Chou' walked over and reached inside the vehicle, removing the keys and dropping them to the ground. Putting the back end of the vehicle gently back down, 'Yori' moved around to stand beside her wife.

"What the hell do you think you're doing, driving like that? The light was going red. That means STOP!" She yelled the last word. He twitched violently, leaning away, a mix of worry and a kind of arrogant superciliousness on his face.

"It was yellow." She glared at him.

"It was yellow, yes, but that means it's going to go red. And there were two children right in front of you. You nearly hit them, which would have severely injured or even killed them. I don't like people who drive like that, especially around here, especially when it involves small children." He was beginning to look annoyed again.

"Look, I slowed down. They should have got out of the way." 'Yori' studied him with irritation, but it was 'Chou' who reached out and grabbed him by the shirt, lifting him easily to eye level.

Raising her other hand she slapped him quite hard, then did it again. Continuing to slap him on either cheek, making his face go red as his head jerked from side to side, she began speaking. "OK, think of it like this," she said conversationally, while 'Yori' watched with dark amusement and Nabiki stared, slightly shocked but also rather impressed, "do you want me to slow down, or do you want me to stop?" She kept hitting him, not hard enough to cause damage but more than hard enough to hurt.

"Stop. Stop! Please stop," the man gasped out with a pained and embarrassed tone in his voice. By now there were a couple of dozen people watching, many of whom were grinning. Nabiki noticed that one of the bystanders was a police officer, who was wearing the widest grin of them all. 'Chou' dropped the driver back into his seat, then leaned down.

"Now you understand the difference? Slow down and stop aren't the same thing?" He nodded, frightened and in some pain. His companion was watching him with what had become mild contempt from the shock and fright of earlier. "So, next time, when you see a yellow light, what do you do?" Nabiki's sister asked curiously.

"I stop," he said, staring at her like a mouse staring at a hungry owl. She nodded, satisfied.

"Good. Please remember this in future." She was very polite but he could see something in her eyes that made him lean away again. The blonde woman stepped back to stand beside her husband. 'Yori' looked proud and patted her wife on the shoulder. Turning to look at the policeman who was still grinning, she waved to him.

"Corporal Otani? Would you also like to have a word with this person?" The officer walked over while pulling out a notebook. He nodded to both martial artists, then turned to the driver, a professionally blank expression replacing the grin.

"Hello, Sir. Name, please?" Leaving the now very worried driver to the tender mercies of local law enforcement, the two women walked back to Nabiki, who was standing beside the children and their parents. A ripple of applause went through the crowd, some of whom came over to briefly talk to either 'Yori' or 'Chou'. A minute or so later they dispersed and the street life went back to normal, while in the background the driver was being politely given a very hard time by Corporal Otani, who was by this point administering a breath test. The driver's companion had exited the car and was standing on the pavement calling a taxi on her cell-phone while looking at the man with thinly veiled anger.

Nabiki snickered. "That was mean." 'Chou' looked at her mildly.

"Possibly, but it seemed to work." She shook her head. "Driving like that is very irresponsible. It annoys me." Her sister was smiling at her, she'd never have believed the normally very gentle Kasumi to be capable of such things. Finding that she was both gave her a bit of a shock and quite pleased her at the same time. The woman was correct, it was very likely that the man would remember his lesson. Casting a glance in his direction the middle Tendo could see the fellow seemed to be sincerely regretting coming anywhere near the district by now. Corporal Otani appeared to be enjoying himself if his expression was anything to go by. A number of pedestrians were still standing around watching, a couple of them helpfully pointing out that one of the vehicle's rear lights seemed to be broken.

"Say thanks to Yori and Chou, children," said the father, standing with a hand on the shoulder of each of his offspring. They looked up at the two women with interest. The little girl had stopped crying and was staring at both of them with a fascinated expression.
"Thank you Miss Yori. Thank you Miss Chou," they obediently chorused. 'Yori' grinned at them, bowing once more.

"It's our pleasure, kids," she said with a chuckle. 'Chou' smiled warmly at them.

"Remember to look both ways next time, OK?" she asked. They nodded. Turning to their parents she transferred the smile to them, amusing Nabiki with how they seemed to almost fall in love with her. "You have lovely children." Glancing at her husband, she added, "We have to go now, but it was nice meeting you." The two martial artists nodded politely and resumed their travels, Nabiki walking alongside her sister. Behind them the family watched for a moment with pleased expressions before going about their business.

When they were safely away, Nabiki said quietly, "You certainly know how to make a good impression by the looks of it. Do you know all the names of the local cops?" 'Yori' grinned with a nod.

"Pretty much. Over the last couple of years we've bumped into most of them at one point or another. At first they were a bit standoffish, some of the magical girl groups are very rude and dismissive to the police. I think that's disrespectful, most of them may not be able to do what we can, but that doesn't make them any less worthy of respect. They do a difficult job for not a huge amount of pay. We both have gone out of our way to be as helpful as we can. Neither one of us wants to steal their thunder."

'Chou' added, "Setting up the reparations fund and helping out in the community seems to have made a generally good impression. As has keeping in the background as much as possible. A lot of that was because we were and still are trying to keep a low profile, but it seems to impress people that we're not making a fuss about what we do. We just try to help. For instance, Yori stopping fights in the nightclubs seems to please the police since they don't have lots of paperwork to deal with, people seldom get hurt much, and they can concentrate on more important things than drunken brawls. The bouncers like it as well, they have less risk."

Curiously Nabiki asked, "Do the police ever actually ask you for help?" 'Yori' nodded again.

"Sometimes. There have been a few incidents where they've call me or both of us in because they ran into something they couldn't easily handle and thought it was the safest thing to do. I suspect they don't mention that to their superiors outside the immediate area, but I may be wrong. Minato is sort of used to young women with strange abilities, and I've certainly noticed that police outside the vicinity seem to have been very helpful and polite recently, when we've had to intervene. Maybe they've had some good reports about us?" Nabiki shook her head in amusement.

"Well, there have been at least two new broadcasts featuring you two on TV recently, the reporters apparently have had some quite nice things to say about your reputations." 'Yori' looked gratified.

"Yes, that's kind of pleasing." She frowned a little. "I'd prefer not to be on the news at all, but it seems difficult to avoid at the moment what with these damn whatevers attacking. If we have to be mentioned I'm certainly happier to have it be in good terms rather than otherwise."

"You'll be having action figures of you sold soon," Nabiki giggled. 'Yori' grinned.

"They've tried. We shut them down. Chou made sure we got all the relevant protections and trademarks on our likenesses, images, all that sort of thing properly registered right at the beginning, just in case. It was a good idea. Our lawyer has had to send several cease and desist letters in the last year." Her sister in law looked at her with raised eyebrows.
"You really did think of everything." She snickered. "Bit of a pity, though. I could give Akane a Chou action figure for Christmas, or maybe a Yori one. She likes collecting magical girl stuff. And it would be very funny, she'd never know the big joke." 'Yori' burst out laughing. 'Chou' looked slightly disapproving.

"That's not very nice, Nabiki. You shouldn't make fun of your sister like that." After a few more steps she smiled a little. "But, if you really want to, I do have a few dolls of us that one local company made but never sold before we stopped them a few months ago. They were handed over in return for us not taking it any further. You can have a couple." Nabiki nearly stumbled on the pavement, staring at her sister with surprise.

"Really?" She laughed. "Yes, please. That would be great." After a moment's thought, she added slyly, "Shampoo might like a set as well." 'Yori' began giggling helplessly. "Are they any good?" the middle sister asked. Her disguised sibling looked amused.

"Actually, yes, they're very high quality. If we ever decided to let commercial production start on that sort of thing I think we'd let them do it, their product was much better than anybody else could produce."

The three carried on walking, stopping at a few places for either 'Yori' or 'Chou' to have words with various people, including bouncers, shop-keepers, a few more policemen, and the odd passer-by. Nabiki was noticing a common theme of considerable respect and indeed fondness from the various inhabitants of this district towards the two women. It seemed that their reputation was very solidly assured. In return they seemed to know the names of dozens of people from many different walks of life, not to mention things about their lives that made it clear that these were more than just nodding acquaintances. The brunette was very impressed. Her sister and Ranma had obviously integrated themselves into the community pretty well.

There were a couple of other places where they intervened. At one point 'Yori' casually grabbed a purse-snatcher as he ran past after exercising his trade, almost without looking. She picked him up by the back of his coat and carried him along the road like a struggling item of luggage, apparently not noticing his ineffective attempts to escape, relieving him of the purse and handing it back to the older woman who he'd stolen it from. Stopping to talk to her briefly, she shook the minor criminal until his teeth rattled and he stopped wriggling. After making sure the woman was otherwise unhurt she bid her a cheery farewell, then carried on towards a pair of police officers who watched her approach with amusement having seen much of the small drama. Greeting them by name she handed over her captive who glared at her, until she gave him a dark look that made him immediately hide behind one of the officers. They smirked and placed him under arrest which for some odd reason seemed to make him feel relieved.

Grinning, Nabiki watch all this with extreme amusement. Half an hour later 'Chou' suddenly stopped recounting a story she had been telling her sister, staring at a three story scaffolding array that was against the front of a building a little further along the road. Looking at her curiously Nabiki wondered what she'd noticed. Following her sister's gaze she sucked in a breath as she saw one of the workers on the top of the scaffolding teetering on the edge, waving his arms, obviously having overreached himself and on the verge of falling. Her currently blonde sister dashed off at high speed, leaping some six or seven metres into the air to land gracefully on the scaffolding beside the man then grabbing him in one hand and the metal structure with the other. The man, who outweighed her by at least twice stopped his imminent plunge as if he'd been nailed in place. Carefully easing him back onto the wooden boards laid over the framework she waited until he'd re-established his balance, then talked to him for a moment.

He stared at her wide-eyed for a few seconds, obviously shocked and scared, then suddenly hugged her. His two colleagues who had seen him about to fall but were too far away to have done anything walked carefully along the scaffolding and thanked her as well. Shaking their hands, she stepped off the edge of the scaffolding and dropped lightly to the ground where her female husband and sister were waiting, looking up at her. The men watched with open surprise mixed with respect. Waving up at them, she rejoined her companions. Nabiki gaped a little. While she had become accustomed, years ago, to seeing Ranma casually jump on and off two or three story buildings as if they were a low kerb, watching her elder sister do it was something entirely different. Even with the memories of the first, and hopefully last, roof-hopping trip through the night, seeing it in broad daylight was impressive.

"Holy crap. That was... pretty damn amazing, sis." 'Chou' smiled at her, her eyes twinkling.

"Thanks. It's fun as well." They moved along, heading in a direction that would take them back to the apartment building in twenty minutes or so.

"Do you have this much excitement every time you come out?" her sister asked. The blonde woman shook her head with a smile.

"Not all the time, but it's surprising how many things can go wrong in a busy area like this. There are thousands of people out in the streets, sometimes they have accidents. It was just luck I spotted that poor man in time." 'Yori' snickered.

"My purse snatcher must have been from out of town. It's pretty safe around here now, I got annoyed at all the petty theft when we first moved in and cracked down quite hard on it. This place doesn't have much crime now. There hasn't been a mugging in over a year, the last guy must have spread some interesting stories when he got out of jail." Her wife gave her a long-suffering look.

"You may have been slightly overenthusiastic with him. Dangling him off the top of the university clock tower by his ankle until he promised to give up a life of crime could possibly be considered excessive." 'Yori' laughed, as did Nabiki.

"Excessive, I don't know, but effective, definitely. He apparently found religion after that. Mind you, carrying him up the outside of the tower might have helped." She shrugged. "It was only about thirty metres. I'd have caught him before he hit the ground even if I had dropped him."

"Did he know that?" 'Yori' glanced at her with a faint smile, while her sister giggled.

"Well... I didn't actually say it." Nabiki giggled again. 'Chou' sighed a little, watching her husband walk along with an affectionate expression. "Anyway, what about the one you caught? You broke both his arms."

"He had a gun. You know I don't like guns. And he fired it at me." Nabiki listened, horrified.

"You caught the bullet, didn't you? Then you made him swallow it. Then you broke both his arms." 'Yori' was grinning widely by now. Nabiki had stopped and was looking at the illusory form of her sister as if she'd never seen her before.

"I healed them up when the police came to take him away." 'Chou' seemed mildly defensive. 'Yori' laughed.

"True, but you waited for half an hour before you called the Sergeant. That guy literally pissed himself you were glaring at him so nastily."

"While you were rolling around on the ground laughing your head off." Her wife crossed her arms and raised an eyebrow. Nabiki was moving her gaze between them like someone at a particularly spirited tennis match.

"It was really funny. Especially when you started growing huge fangs and your eyes were glowing red." 'Chou' smiled a little at the memory.

"He was a nasty little man who gives the Yakuza a bad name. Even they don't like people waving guns around." This statement nearly made her sister choke, unsure whether she should laugh or look appalled. In the end she compromised and did both. 'Chou' looked at her with amusement, realising why. "I know some very nice Yakuza people. They were not at all happy with that horrible person." 'Yori' shrugged, nodding.

"It's true. He got a visit from his 'lawyer' in the police station and then pleaded guilty to an awful lot of crimes. He'll be in jail for years." She smirked. "It meant I didn't have to persuade him to do the right thing myself. The Oyabun was extremely angry."

"You know some very odd people," Nabiki commented, surprised yet again despite herself. Both the other women smiled a little.

"Funny, that's what people tell them. No idea why." 'Yori' chortled at the expression on her sister in law's face as they resumed walking.

"Can you really catch a bullet?" Nabiki asked with awe in her voice. 'Yori' nodded.

"They don't move all that fast, at least from a 9mm hand gun. Hell, I can throw something faster than the muzzle velocity of one of those things. Even Akane could probably catch one if she was ready for it. It would just bounce off Ryoga, he might not even notice. I've hit him a damn sight harder than any bullet could, it's like hitting a half-metre thick armour plate. He's pretty tough." Nabiki listened with amazement.

"Akane could catch a bullet?"

"Probably. She's certainly fast enough when she gets worked up. Coordinated enough, that's more of a problem. Strong enough, definitely." It was something to think about. She had no reason not to believe the martial artist, in fact if anyone would know it would be her.

"What would happen if she missed?" 'Yori' shrugged a little.

"I'm not sure. Something from a pistol would probably hurt like a bastard but I doubt it would do serious damage. While she doesn't have very good ki control, she still has quite a lot of power. Nothing remotely approaching what I have, or Chou, or the ghoul and the pervert. Or Ryoga, for that matter. She's right down the bottom of the scale as far as the usual suspects go, but that's still a hell of a lot more than the average man in the street, or even the average martial artist. Just look at how much trouble the hospital has in putting her down for even a few minutes. To be honest I'm a little surprised that the dart gun works, it wouldn't on most of the others or us." She shook her head.

"Yet more proof she's not been applying herself properly." Nabiki stared, then laughed a little nervously.

"Frankly I'm glad that she hasn't. If she was tougher and still had the problems she has at the moment she'd be damn near unstoppable."

"True." They all looked at each other, thinking about what that would be like, then simultaneously shuddered a bit.
Chapter 19

Arriving near the apartment they ducked into another alley, went invisible, and re-entered the building. Back in the living room both Ranma and her wife reverted to their normal appearances. "Coffee?" Kasumi asked. Both the others nodded.

"It seems that we drink a lot of coffee, you know." Nabiki smiled. Her sister laughed.

"We practically run on it at times." She disappeared into the kitchen while Nabiki and Ranma sat. Looking at each other, they smiled.

"That was fun," Nabiki said, removing the silver bracelet and handing it to her companion who accepted it with a nod of thanks.

"I thought you might enjoy it. Like Kas said, things don't get exciting every time but pretty often there's something interesting going on."

"That bit with the car was hysterical. Kasumi slapping him over and over, while politely asking him questions..." Nabiki shook her head, grinning widely. "I'd never have thought she'd do something like that. You've corrupted my sister." The red-head looked amused.

"It didn't take much effort. In my defence that wasn't the intention, but she took to this wandering martial artist and protector of the community deal like a particularly dangerous duck to water." The brunette Tendo laughed.

"I'm very impressed with how well you seem to fit in around here. There are a lot of people who look like they really respect and like you two." Ranma sighed a little, leaning back and putting her feet on the table.

"I know. It's weird, back in Nerima I did much the same thing, but for some reason there weren't a lot of people who even seemed to notice. Not that I was doing it to be noticed in the first place, but still... It's a little odd." Nabiki studied her.

"You know, I did hear various things about that over the last few years, when I was looking for you guys. I talked to quite a few people, some of whom I now know were your agents," she cast the other woman a dark look which merely caused her to smile slightly, "and there were quite a number of nice things said about you. You may not have had many if any friends other than Kasumi while you were there, but I assure you there were quite a few people who respected you a lot." She giggled for a moment. "Oddly enough, a fair few of them were cops. There were some who knew about your curse, as did a lot of the older people around Furinkan, but most of the rest thought there were two of you, possibly brother and sister." Ranma laughed.

"That much I was aware of. I didn't go out of my way to correct them, mainly because it was either too much work or just too embarrassing."

"I can understand that," Nabiki said with a smile, "but my point is that you were appreciated for the good you did as much as you and the others were considered nuisances for all the damage. In fact you were probably on balance thought more highly of than otherwise, certainly more so than any of the rest. One comment I heard was that you were much more professional in your outlook, you took care to minimise the damage and tried to put a stop to the fights as fast as possible." Ranma appeared both surprised and pleased by this.

"Hmm. Interesting. I wish someone had told me at the time, it would have made me a bit happier."
She shrugged a bit. "Doesn't really matter I suppose, not in the long run." Kasumi returned with coffee for all three, handing out the mugs to each woman. Sitting beside her sister she glanced at her husband.

"Feet, dear." Ranma looked embarrassed and took her feet off the coffee table, while Nabiki snickered.

"Sorry."

"Got her well trained, sis," the middle Tendo said with laughter in her voice. Her sister looked amused and nodded while the red-head shot her a dark look.

"It's mutual. She trained me as a martial artist, I domesticated her and made her fit to live indoors." Nabiki collapsed in laughter. Ranma grunted in mild annoyance and crossed her arms, watching them both as they giggled. Standing she pulled her braid around and removed the blue bow, dropping it on the table.

"I'm going to change and have a quick shower. We'll need to leave pretty soon. Kas, can I have the bag? Or should I pick something else?" Her wife smiled at her, retrieving the bag she'd stashed away earlier in her ki pocket and handing it to the red-head.

"No, I think that outfit is a nice one. Can you put mine on the bed?" Ranma nodded, heading towards the bedroom. Nabiki watched her go then turned to her sister.

"What's the deal with the hair?" she asked curiously. "When I came here the first time, Ranma said it was because she was going out as Yori and it was too much trouble to keep changing it. Does she intend to keep it like that permanently?" Kasumi grinned.

"To be honest I think she's rather fond of it," the older woman said softly. "It's become a signature look for Yori, and Maiko as well. It took some time to grow it so long like that even with some ki based help, she doesn't seem to want to bother again. When she's male he doesn't care around the house, and outside, the illusion spell takes care of it. Since she's spending so much time female at the moment for various reasons, it's just easier to leave it like that." Kasumi giggled a little. "I like braiding it for her. It suits her, I think." Nabiki agreed with a smile.

"I guess it's one more thing to distinguish her from the old Ranma, which is probably a good idea as well. You're right, it does suit her face very well both as Ranma and as Yori." After a seconds thought she asked, "don't you worry about it possibly connecting Yori and Maiko, having identical, pretty unusual hairstyles?" Her sister laughed a bit.

"Funnily enough, some time ago someone did kind of make that connection. She completely threw them off with a very convincing fan-girl act, claiming that she really looked up to Yori and wanted to copy her hairstyle. It was so good that several other students at the university now have the same style, complete with the bow at the end. Some of them are even taking up martial arts." Nabiki stared for a moment, then burst out laughing.

"Oh, god, that's hysterical. Ranma Saotome, fashion trendsetter. I'd never have believed it!" Both sisters were giggling hysterically when Ranma as 'Maiko' came out of the bedroom and looked curiously at them. Nabiki inspected her and grinned.

"Very nice. Who picked out the clothes, you or my sister?" 'Maiko' looked down at herself with a smile.

"It was a joint effort. Neither one of us goes in much for fancy clothes, but sometimes you need to look good.” She was wearing a silk top in dark blue, contrasting with the new red bow on her braid, held in at the waist by a silver belt that looked like very fine chain mail. A skirt, more of a kilt in some ways, that came to just above the knee, in fine wool dyed a deep indigo that became a few shades lighter towards the bottom moved around her legs as she walked around. Her footwear was a pair of calf-length boots in soft brown leather, which had a two centimetre heel. Overall the effect was a restrained and mature sort of feminine style, one that looked very nice in the middle Tendo’s opinion.

"I think that's the most female-looking clothing I've ever seen you voluntarily wear. A skirt? I never thought I'd see the day." The young woman smiled again.

"I know. Kas took some time persuading me. I don't particularly like skirts or dresses, but I have to admit this one looks pretty nice." She shrugged. "I can live with it. Kas likes it." Her wife nodded with a smile.

"It looks very nice, Ranma. I told you it would. OK, my turn in the shower, then we can leave. Nabiki, do you want to freshen up?" Her sister nodded as well. Both Tendos went off to different bathrooms while Ranma cleared away the coffee cups and tidied the kitchen. When they came back, Nabiki glanced at the dark yellow silk dress Kasumi, or 'Rika', was wearing and laughed.

"I'm starting to feel under-dressed here."

"There's a nice top in my closet you can borrow if you'd like, Nabiki. The dark red one, it should go with the rest of your outfit." The brunette smiled.

"Thanks, sis." She quickly changed, returning to the living room. "Right, I'm ready. Shall we go?"

'Maiko' was on the phone calling for a taxi. Thanking the dispatcher she put it back, then turned to the others. "He'll be outside in about ten minutes." The three left the apartment and went down in the elevator, waiting inside the front door until the taxi arrived. Nabiki looked interested, turning to 'Maiko'.

"You don't bother hiding where you live when you're using this persona?" she asked curiously.

"No. 'Maiko' in on record as living here as is 'Rika'. We need somewhere to get our mail if nothing else. All the other personae have different addresses if they need one at all. We use post office boxes, rented accommodation, that sort of thing."

"What about Yori? Does she get mail?" 'Maiko' smiled.

"Oh, yes, quite a lot of it. Fan mail, offers of marriage, requests for interviews, all sorts of things. They all go to our lawyers, who filter out the worst bits, scan it all, and email it to a secure account. 'Chou' gets at least as much.” Nabiki laughed.

"Offers of marriage? Sounds like you haven't escaped some of the more irritating parts of Neriman life then." The other brunette shook her head with considerable amusement.

"It's nothing like as bad, no one is accosting me in the street and professing their undying love in terrible Shakespearean dialogue.” Nabiki snickered. "And I don't have parents forcing or selling me into engagements left, right, and centre. That part I don't miss at all." She shuddered a little.

"The taxi is here," 'Rika' observed, opening the door and signalling to the driver who pulled over a few metres down the road. They exited the building, 'Maiko' making sure the door closed and locked behind them, then climbed into the taxi. 'Rika' gave the driver, who greeted her by name, the address of the restaurant and they settled back, chatting about inconsequentials. The driver, an elderly man in his late sixties, glanced in his mirror every now and then, smiling at the three beautiful young women in the back of his car.

Driving down a street Nabiki recognised a couple of minutes into the trip the driver pointed out the scaffolding on which 'Chou' had saved the worker's life earlier. The men were now gone, presumably having finished for the day. "Did you hear? Those two magical girls Yori and Chou were out around here a couple of hours ago, Chou saved a guy from falling off that thing. I heard she jumped right on top of it from the ground and grabbed him just before he fell." The old man shook his head in wonder. "It's incredible what those two can do. I saw the other one, Yori, dealing with both a demon and another magical girl a few months ago, she's unbelievable. I studied Akido and Karate when I was younger, pretty good at it as well, but compared to her and her friend?" He sighed. "Not even close. So far from close it's almost depressing."

"What do you think of them?" Nabiki asked, glancing sidelong at 'Maiko' who was listening with interest while appearing to be watching the scenery go past. The driver laughed.

"You don't live around here, do you, Miss?" he asked. She shook her head.

"No, I'm from Nerima. I'm just here visiting my friends."

"Nerima?" he queried, glancing at her in the mirror. "You're probably used to martial artists all over the place there from what I hear. A friend of mine lived there for years, he said it got pretty wild especially around Furinkan."

"True enough. Not as much now as a few years ago, but yes, it's a fairly weird place."

"I can imagine. Minato is very strange as well. We have so many magical girls running around here it's crazy. The thing you have to understand, though, is that Yori and Chou are different. They're polite, respectful, extremely skilled, and best of all, careful. People really appreciate that. They are honourable people. A lot of the magical girls, they're very hard on the community. Oh yes, they do stop some unpleasant things from happening but they cause a lot of damage in the process." He smiled at her in the mirror. "Sometimes they're worse than the thing they're dealing with. It was like that around here. The girls would take out the big nasty demon, but wreck half a street in the process and ignore everything else."

"So these two, Yori and Chou, they're not like that?" Nabiki probed his opinions partly to amuse herself and the others, partly out of genuine curiosity for what an outside agent would think. The driver laughed again.

"No, not at all. They're even better at dealing with the weirdness than almost all of the other groups, they have a lot of power, but they also have restraint and common sense. Some of these other girls will dive in and use a huge amount of force on something that Yori, for example, will deal with in a few minutes, sometimes just by persuading it to leave." Nabiki feigned surprise.

"What, she talks to them, demons, I mean?"

"Yes. I know it sound strange, even for Minato, but I've heard a lot of stories. Apparently even the demons respect her, assuming they're not terrified of her that is. More than once some monstrosity from another world has come charging into the community, taken one look at her glaring at it, and run away again." He chuckled. "She has a very scary glare." Slowing for a set of traffic lights he looked both ways, then turned left. "She's more than happy to resolve a problem just by talking it out. Violence is usually a last resort. Mind you, with her and Chou, when the violence happens, it happens pretty efficiently. Their fights don't usually last long. They know an awful lot about combat, a lot more than most of the others. Not to mention their magical powers which are very impressive as well."

Nabiki grinned. The man sounded like he had an almost proprietary interest in them. "Someone told me that Yori doesn't like being called a magical girl." The driver laughed again, glancing over his shoulder.

"Yes, I've heard that as well. She likes to think of herself as a martial artist. It's true, she obviously knows more about martial arts than anyone else I've ever seen except for her friend, but with all those powers as well she's as much a magical girl as any of them." He grinned. "Don't say that to her face, though, she tends to shout." Nabiki giggled.

"So I've heard. She was on TV recently shouting at some other magical girls." He nodded, looking amused.

"I saw that. It was hysterical. I almost felt sorry for them, they had no idea what to do except stand there looking worried while she ripped into them. The way she keeps the other groups in line and makes them clear up after themselves is one of the things that people really respect. People in our community are proud of them, they show everyone how it should be done. They're our girls and we like and trust them." Meeting her eyes in the rear-view mirror he seemed to be telling the truth. "One of the things people really do appreciate is that they help out with other things than just some damn demon attack. They've saved lives, like today with Chou and that fellow who nearly fell, crime has dropped like a stone since they arrived, even the police like them. Yori has even gone up a tree after a cat for a little girl once, and I've heard she doesn't like cats at all." Nabiki glanced at 'Maiko' who rolled her eyes with a slight smile.

"They sound like good people."

"They are. Pretty much everyone who lives in the area is happy to have them here." He fell silent, thinking about something with a smile on his face, while competently weaving his way through increasingly heavy traffic as they headed for the waterfront. Nabiki looked at her sister who had been listening with an amused expression, then at 'Maiko', who looked slightly embarrassed. Giggling again she settled in for the rest of the journey. Some twenty minutes later they pulled into the parking lot of the restaurant. "Here you go ladies." The driver turned off the meter, while 'Rika' produced the relevant sum with a generous tip. Handing it over with a smile she opened the door.

"Thank you, Miss Nygaard. Have a nice evening." Once they were all out he waved, then pulled back onto the road. Watching the taxi drive off Nabiki snickered.

"Well, you have at least one fan, you guys. He seems very taken with Yori and Chou. From what he says you have a pretty high community approval rating." 'Maiko' was both amused and pleased.

"It's nice to know that normal people think well of us."

"From what he was saying, and the way he was saying it, it's more than just thinking well of you. He genuinely respects you. Sounds like quite a few people do."

'Rika' smiled. "We've had thank-you letters in the past, but he went into a lot more detail than I've heard before." They entered the restaurant, approaching the Maître-de who greeted them pleasantly.

"Hello, Miss Nygaard, Miss Nakahara, it's nice to see you again. Your table is ready, if you'll follow me please?" He led them to a table with a view out over Tokyo bay, seating all three women quickly and efficiently. A waiter was waved over, menus handed out, and he went back to his post. They ordered drinks, 'Maiko' as usual having a soft drink and the other two sharing a bottle of wine. Nabiki read her menu with interest. The food was indeed a mix of French and Thai cuisine, with many of the dishes apparently a combination. Red curry with escargot caught her eye and she winced. "That's going a little too far, I think," she muttered. 'Maiko' looked over at her, so she pointed it out.

"Umm. No, I think not." The other brunette looked slightly green. Once they had decided on their orders 'Rika' looked around and caught the eye of the waiter who had faded into the background in a very effective way. Once he'd taken their order he bowed slightly and left again.

Looking around at the large room Nabiki raised her eyebrows. "This looks like a very high-end place." 'Rika' smiled.

"It is quite expensive. The food is amazing though, it's well worth it, and the service is first rate. The view is nice as well." The three talked for a while, chatting about their respective university experiences, then came back inevitably to the subject of Akane. The conversation paused while the food was served, but resumed once they were eating. "I'm not happy about what you've told us about the poor girl," 'Rika' commented. "It doesn't sound like she's improving as much as we could hope for. Do you think perhaps a different type of therapy might help?" Nabiki shrugged a little, eating with considerable enjoyment. Her sister was right, the food was remarkably good. She'd have to come back some time. The prices on the menus were high but not unreasonably so.

"I don't know. Probably not. She's pretty set in her ways, as self destructive as they are." She chuckled somewhat unhappily. "Or as destructive to other things as well. I'm glad that's happening at the hospital at the moment, it's given us a chance to get the house fixed up." Pausing for a couple of mouthfuls she chewed with appreciation while thinking. "If we'd been able to get her to this sort of help when she was younger, before it all built up so much, maybe it would have worked better. It still might work, she's only been going for about three or four months now. It might take years."

"How much improvement has there been?" 'Maiko' asked curiously, taking a sip of her lemonade.

"It's difficult to say exactly. I've noticed a difference, and our father says the same thing. But it's not the sort of thing you can put a number to. She doesn't get angry as easily, which is good, but if you do manage to set her off she's as bad as ever." The brunette laughed. "Perhaps I should see if we can get a dart gun for home. Just in case," 'Rika' looked disapproving while 'Maiko' chuckled.

"I think there may be some regulations that would make that a bit difficult," the tall blonde woman said.

"True, I guess. Oh well, it was just a thought." Sighing, Nabiki sipped some wine then refilled her glass and her sister's. "It's so damn frustrating, though. The first few weeks were going very well. Everyone could see an improvement, it was slow but it was there. But then..." She shrugged again. "It just kind of tailed off. Akane is as frustrated as anyone about it, to give her due credit she really does want to overcome this."

"Poor Akane. I wish there was something we could do to help."

"You've already helped a lot. Even giving me the idea, and some insight into how to persuade her to go to therapy in the first place." Nabiki smiled. "The 'yell a lot and don't take no for an answer' technique is a powerful one." 'Maiko' laughed.

"Indeed it is. Please don't use it for evil." They all grinned. After a few more mouthfuls, she said, "I can ask around at the university if anyone there has any ideas on treating severe anger and self-control issues. It's possible that there are some treatments that haven't made it into the mainstream that would be more effective than what she's having at the moment." Nabiki nodded gratefully.

"Thank you. Anything you can find out would be helpful." She looked thoughtfully at the other woman. "I'm a bit surprised you'd help like that." 'Maiko' raised an eyebrow enquiringly.

"How do you mean?"

"Well, despite what you said about holding grudges, in some ways it sometimes seems you do still have, ah, unresolved feelings I suppose is how people would describe it, towards a lot of the people back home." She smiled at the other woman, adding hastily, "Not that I don't understand why you would. If anyone has the right to feel that way, you do, after what everyone did to you for so long." She looked at her sister for a moment. "Both of you." 'Maiko' laughed gently.

"Oh, I have feelings, all right." She was silent for a moment while the other two glanced at each other then back to her. "It's..." she trailed off, trying to think how to explain it. "I don't think it's a grudge, not like you mean. More a hearty dislike based on experience. I don't really wish any of them ill, not any more. I did for a while but I came to realise, with some help," she glanced at her wife with a smile, "that there was no real reason for it any more. Both of us have moved on, there really isn't much any of them can do to us any more. We both took control of our own lives back, and intend to keep it." She paused for a drink of lemonade. "Ryoga, as the obvious example, does hold a grudge in the true sense of the word. He is completely obsessive in his pursuit of revenge for any slights he rightly or wrongly believes I did to him. That obsession has ruined his life. His curse, a lot of the problems he had before we left, and what happened when Akane found out, all of that can be put down to him coming after me regardless of how stupid it was."

She shook her head sadly. "He's a pretty intelligent guy, a remarkably good mostly self-taught martial artist, and in many ways an honourable man. But on top of that, he's subject to petty jealousy, sudden anger, attacks of depression, you name it. The depression may be a reason for a lot of the rest, I suppose, but his own actions have more or less destroyed any hope of happiness he could have, at least with Akane. Looking back on it, I certainly didn't help at times, I did some things I now regret to him, but in my own defence quite a lot of those were in retaliation for something he did to me. Childish, but we were children." Nabiki listened, remembering some of what the woman was talking about. She'd seen enough of the interactions between the two to know it was basically true.

Ranma had always tended to fall into the trap of ego, especially when confronted by Ryoga, but it was a two-way street. The part time pig had a massive ego of his own, in most respects far bigger than Ranma had as a teenager and for less reason. He'd certainly done some very dishonourable things to the martial artist, many of them revolving around the youngest Tendo girl with whom he was completely obsessed. Using Ranma's own sense of honour against him so many times was a particularly petty thing to do. She wasn't sorry that the guy had finally got the crap kicked out of him, in her opinion he had richly deserved it, but she was sorry for the effect it had had on her sister.

'Maiko' continued, "I don't hate him, even after what he did, but I don't particularly like him as a person. I'll admit that he helped me several times when it was really needed, and for that I'm grateful, but I'm also in no hurry to see him again. The same is true of most of the others. Akane put me through hell, and although I really did love her for a while, that's long dead. I don't want to see her hurt, even so. If we can help her I'm more than happy to do so, even if I don't want to meet her again. The same goes for most of the others. Pop is after all my father and the whole reason I'm a martial artist in the first place, but there's no denying the fact that he's not a good person. I love him as a father, but don't like him as a man, if that makes any sense."
Nabiki nodded slowly, understanding. She had felt similar things about her own father at several times during her life, for less reason than Ranma had. Loving and liking were certainly not necessarily synonymous.

"I hope I'm explaining this right. It's not easy to put into words, but it helps me think about it myself."

"You're making sense." The middle Tendo woman grinned at her sister-in-law. "And a few years ago I'd never have believed I'd say that about you."

"Ha bloody ha," the other woman said with a smile of her own, as her wife giggled. "And thanks."
She shrugged. "No one is perfect, least of all me. I don't think I'm holding grudges, I certainly try not to, but there's no getting past the fact that the way people treat you affects the way you feel about them a long time after the act itself. Quite a few people back there did some pretty shitty things to me, and while I don't dwell on it, it left me feeling like they were people I didn't want to see again. And, the nice thing is, I don't have to. I have a life I'm happy with, the best parts of the old one are still here, the new parts are mostly good, but above everything else no one is pushing me in a direction I hate." She laughed. "If I was like Ryoga in the grudge-holding area, I'd track him down and shout, 'Prepare to die, Ryoga Hibiki!' Or challenge Kuno to a sword fight." Nabiki giggled.

"That I'd pay money to see."

"It wouldn't last long, that's for sure," 'Maiko' said with a grin.

"Do you ever think of going back and seeing the place again? You certainly wouldn't be recognised." 'Maiko' looked at 'Rika' with a slight smile. Nabiki's sister turned to her.

"As I said the night you found us, we did go back a couple of times. That was about a year after we left, just to see what had happened. A sort of morbid curiosity mixed with nostalgia, I suppose. We simply couldn't risk any possibility of direct contact so we watched from a distance. It was mostly my idea, I wanted to see my family again if only from the outside." She fell silent with a slightly sad and introspective expression. 'Maiko' looked at her with compassion and picked up the conversation.

"We've talked about going back again several times since then. When you came, it rekindled a certain amount of curiosity, I'll admit. We've discussed it, it seems very unlikely that there's any real risk now, but various things have made it difficult. I think we probably will visit at some point, though." Nabiki nodded slowly.

"Who would you be going as?" she asked curiously. 'Maiko' grinned, shrugging.

"No idea. We have a lot of choices even with established IDs. Plus we could always make new ones just for that." A sudden thought struck Nabiki and she looked around with mild worry.

"I just thought of something, is it a good idea to talk about all this stuff in public like this?" 'Maiko' laughed.

"Took you long enough to think about that." Nabiki frowned, slightly insulted. "No, it's not a problem. We're both using a very mild form of the cloaking technique, it makes us sort of fade into the background a little from the point of view of most people. It also screws up listening devices.
It's sort of a habit when we're out. It's something Happosai came up with and showed us, it's much less power intensive than the invisibility technique. You wouldn't want to be invisible in a restaurant anyway, you'd never get served!" Nabiki laughed, impressed. "We kind of leave a hole That's damn useful."

'Maiko' nodded with a smile. "I know. It's not as secure as the invisibility method but we can keep it going without even thinking about it. No one is going to overhear us unless we want them to or they're so powerful they're otherwise pretty noticeable." Nabiki drank a little wine as she recalled the original thrust of the conversation.

"So, visiting Nerima." 'Rika' smiled at her.

"Who do you think we should go as? And who should we see?"

Her sister looked thoughtful. "Well, you could certainly go as you are and come to the Dojo. I've made no secret of the fact that I have an old friend I visit sometimes, who has a 'significant other' of, um, the same genital grouping." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' looked at each other and burst out laughing at her dry description, as she grinned. "Nodoka isn't completely happy with that lifestyle but to give her credit she tries not to be obvious about it. Father doesn't care, Genma probably wouldn't notice, the one who would most likely be offended is Akane." She sighed. "She's still hung up on 'perversion' in sexual matters, although not as much as she was. That's about the only good outcome of the therapy, is seems to be slowly overcoming her attitude to those matters in some ways. Not enough to really help, but I guess any change is progress."

'Rika' asked curiously, "Do you still think she's got lesbian feelings?" Nabiki nodded.

"More so than ever. I can't say exactly why, really, it's just sort of an instinct, but I'm pretty sure she's at least bisexual. Not that she'll admit it even to herself. Possibly particularly to herself. She's built up this whole anti-pervert mindset and anything related to sex at all, never mind same-sex relationships, rubs her up the wrong way."

"Maybe she needs to be rubbed up the right way," 'Rika' said with a sly smile, just as Nabiki was raising her glass to her mouth. The ensuing explosion of liquid only barely missed them all. 'Maiko' dissolved into helpless giggling while Nabiki stared in disbelief at her older sister, who looked back at her with a serene expression on her disguised face.

"I can't believe you said that, sis," the brunette said when she'd recovered. She grinned widely. "You have a strange sense of humour." 'Rika' smiled contentedly and sipped her own drink.

"Hmph. You might be right. I don't know, it's out of my field of experience. She certainly needs to face it one way or the other sooner or later. Perhaps if you two came to visit using these personae she could see there's nothing wrong with it." Glancing at her husband 'Rika' raised her eyebrows questioningly. 'Maiko' eventually nodded with a slight sigh.

"Oh, why not. It might be fun to see first hand what we've read about in the reports." Nabiki smiled.

"Any idea when?"

The other two looked at each other. "Um. Probably not for a few weeks, there's quite a lot going on at the moment we need to keep on top of. We'll let you know, and give you at least a weeks notice,
"OK?" The middle sister looked pleased.

"That's fine." She finished the last of her meal, placing the knife and fork across the plate. "This was a good choice, the food here is superb."

"Anyone for dessert?" Maiko finished her own food, then glanced sideways at the menu lying beside her on the table. "They do some fantastic ice cream, they make it here themselves. The chocolate truffle cake is amazing as well." Rika looked at her with an amused look, then turned to her sister.

"You see? A bottomless pit as far as ice cream goes." Nabiki snickered.

"I suppose I still have a little room left. Hand me that thing, I'll have a look."

"Try the poppy-seed ice cream, it's really nice." Maiko passed the menu to her sister-in-law, who opened it to the dessert section and looked through it. Rika finished her dish, nodding to the waiter who came over and began clearing the table. When he finished he politely waited as they decided on dessert. Nabiki ended up going with the suggested ice-cream, curious to know what poppy-seed ice cream looked like. As it turned out, the stuff didn't look very appetising, it was a dark grey mass that looked more like a pile of wood ash than anything else. However, when she tentatively tried it, she stopped in shock, before eagerly scooping up a larger amount. "Told you," Maiko said with a grin, eating some of her own. Rika had opted for a cherry cheesecake instead, but watched her sister with satisfaction.

"This is amazing," Nabiki nearly moaned, quickly finishing off her dessert then looking at the empty bowl with disappointment. She was debating ordering some more, it was so nice, but decided in the end that the extra calories probably weren't a wildly good idea.

"I know. I've never seen it anywhere else, it's their own recipe apparently." Carefully scraping the bottom of her bowl with her spoon Maiko managed to get a tiny amount more, licking the implement with satisfaction and regret.

They ordered a coffee each and talked for a while, before finishing up. Looking at her watch Nabiki was somewhat surprised to see they'd been in the restaurant for nearly three hours. As Maiko settled the bill she turned to her sister. "Thanks, sis. This has been a very nice evening, and I've found a new place to come back to." She caught a glimpse of the total as her sister-in-law pulled out a credit card and winced. "But not very often." Rika smiled.

"I did say it wasn't particularly cheap. The food is worth the price though." As they left the Maître-de politely thanked them for the business and hoped they would return. The two disguised martial artists thanked him in turn and promised to come back soon. Outside, Maiko looked at Nabiki.

"So, do you want to do anything else now, or just go back?"

"What else can we do?" the brunette asked.

"Well, it's about ten now, there's a big multiplex cinema a couple of kilometres that way, we could catch a movie, or go to a club there. Or just wander around the shopping area, some of the shops are still open now." As she spoke they were slowly walking along the road in the direction she'd initially indicated. The area they were in was fairly commercial but in a quite up-market manner, expensive cars moving slowly along the road and quite a number of people going into and coming out of various restaurants and bars. "Or we could..." She trailed off, looking across the road.

"We could?" prompted Nabiki, turning to look at the other woman while wondering why she had stopped speaking. She saw that both of her companions were now staring across the road and had ceased walking. Following their gaze she tried to work out what they were looking at.

"Damn. It never stops, does it?" 'Maiko' sounded a bit grumpy. Nabiki finally spotted what she was looking at, there was a small store on the other side of the road through the window of which she could see two men obviously robbing the place, one of them threatening the young man behind the counter with what looked for all the world like a machete, while the other one was leaning over and pulling bundles of Yen notes out of the cash register. Sighing, she looked both ways before starting across the road, followed by the other two. Walking into a service alley that ran down the side of the block of buildings that the shop was on, she handed Nabiki the disguise bracelet once more. "Just in case. Stay back, I'll deal with those two idiots." She shimmered and changed into her 'Yori' persona complete with distinctive clothing while looking annoyed, which on the face of the black-haired girl became quite an intimidating expression. 'Rika' became 'Chou' as well but stayed with her sister as the other woman stomped off down the alley radiating irritation. Curious, after a few seconds Nabiki followed at a safe distance. 'Chou' rolled her eyes a little, bringing up the rear. "We can never just go out and have a nice relaxing evening without someone being a nuisance." Her sister glanced over her shoulder with a smile.

"Does this sort of thing happen a lot?" The other woman sighed quietly.

"All the time. It's very irritating."

"She could have just let the police handle it," Nabiki suggested. The two shared a glance then giggled. "No, that doesn't seem like it's going to happen, does it?" Rounding the corner they stopped where they could see into the shop, which 'Yori' was just entering.

"OK, you two, drop the blade and lie down with your hands over your heads, please," she said in a voice of command. The two men jumped, startled, then whirled to face her. She snickered a little. "You really should pay attention to your surroundings better than that, especially under the circumstances."

"Who the fuck are you, girl?" the large man with the machete demanded, moving it to threaten her. The clerk took the opportunity to dive for cover, after a wide-eyed stare of recognition at 'Yori'. "I'm Yori. And I asked politely. Well, fairly politely." She smirked. The man waved the huge blade in an intimidating manner while his colleague stepped sideways to get clear, stuffing his loot into his pockets while trying to remember why that name sounded familiar.

"Get out of the way, little girl, before you get hurt." Behind the counter the face of the clerk was visible through the door to the two watching women, who saw him wince a little. Nabiki chuckled darkly. "Whoops."

'Yori' cast the man an evaluating glance, then smiled. "Nope." Holding out her hand she projected half a meter of purple energy blade, making him stare and his associate go white.

"Oh, shit," the other man mumbled, suddenly remembering where he'd heard the name Yori before. Dropping to the floor he lay face down with his hands over the back of his head. His friend shot him a puzzled glance before looking back at the girl with the black braided hair, who he now saw was grinning at him unsettlingly. Were those fangs? Tentatively he reached out with the machete, pointing it at her chest, hoping that the implied threat would make her back off. The grin grew wider, showing that yes, they were indeed fangs. Only little ones, but...
'Yori' flicked her energy blade in a series of blindingly fast movements accompanied by a deep humming noise, then snapped it back into a vertical rest position. Both of them watched as the machete dropped to the tiled floor in about fifty small pieces, none of them larger than a fingernail and all glowing red hot. The handle of the weapon still in the hand of the would-be robber was now shaking gently.

"Ah..." He looked at her, then at the remains of his weapon. Then he slowly put it on the counter, lay down on the floor avoiding the smoking shards of metal and copied his partners position. The clerk stood up and peered over the counter at the two thwarted thieves and the black-haired girl who was looking pleased.

"Well done. Now, please stay there. The police will be along soon to collect you." Making the energy sword vanish and smiling at the young man who was watching her with an expression of awe she asked, "Are you OK?"

"Um, yes, thank you." The man continued to stare, then haltingly asked, "Um, Miss Yori? Could I have your autograph?" Outside, Nabiki giggled, while 'Chou' sighed again.

"Every time someone asks her that her ego gets a bit larger." Nabiki had to lean against the building she was giggling so hard now.

"Don't people ask you for yours?" Her sister smiled.

"Oh my, yes. All the time."

"And that doesn't affect your ego?" The disguised Kasumi grinned.

"Of course not." Her sister shook her head in amused disbelief.

"Right. I believe you, of course."

'Yori' signed the notebook that the clerk handed her with a smile, giving it back to him. "You should call the police now. These two aren't going anywhere. Are you?" She asked the question in a hard voice, and was answered by a pair of muffled replies.

"No, Ma'am. We're staying right here," the man who had been filling his pockets said with vehemence. His friend reiterated the sentiment.

"Good. Please try to find a line of work that's less antisocial when you get out of jail."

"Yes, Ma'am." They both nodded into the floor. Waving to the clerk she walked out the door and rejoined her friend and wife.

"Right. Where were we? Oh yes, movie, club, or home?" They headed back to the alley where both the martial artists resumed their 'civilian' personae, then headed off down the alley to exit from the other end. Nabiki laughed.

"Just a routine robbery foiling, hmm?" 'Maiko' grinned.

"Yes, nothing at all interesting."

"You don't have to sound so disappointed, dear," 'Rika' commented with amusement. Her husband shrugged slightly.

"If someone is going to intrude on my night out I don't think it's unreasonable for them to at least be "You didn't have to get involved, you know," Nabiki said with a raised eyebrow. Her sister-in-law laughed a little.

"I couldn't just let it pass, unfortunately. Martial artists oath, and all that."

The middle Tendo looked at her with a grin. "What about a magical girl's oath? Do they have one?" 'Maiko' cast a look of mild exasperation at her.

"I'm not a magical girl," she replied, sounding slightly vexed.

"Oh, yes, you are."

"Oh, no, I'm not."

'Rika' was walking along giggling to herself as they argued.

"Are too!"

"Am not!"

In the end they saw a movie.
Chapter 20

As the taxi pulled up at the apartment building 'Rika' nudged her sister who was more than half-asleep, leaning against her and occasionally mumbling to herself. "Nabiki. We're home." The younger woman jolted awake, licking her lips and looking around. 'Maiko' grinned at her and she smiled back tiredly.

"Good. I could do with some real sleep." They climbed out of the taxi, 'Rika' opening the door while 'Maiko' paid the driver, thanking him and waving as he drove off. This one had been a somewhat younger man who had stayed quiet the entire trip, only speaking to ask for their destination. As they ascended in the elevator Nabiki nearly fell asleep again leaning against the wall. Reverting to her normal appearance Kasumi supported her as they walked to the apartment door, Ranma also dropping her disguise and opening it.

"We should have come home after the movie," the middle sister said with a huge yawn, "the club as well was a bit too much." She felt distinctly tipsy, she'd had three beers as well as the wine from dinner. Waving vaguely to her sister and sister's female husband she stumbled into her bedroom and collapsed on the bed, almost too tired to get undressed. Within thirty seconds the other two could hear snores coming from the room. Kasumi smiled at her husband.

"I think she had a good time. I certainly did." Ranma nodded, also yawning widely.

"So did I, but she's right, it's been a long night." Giggling slightly as a particularly loud snore came from Nabiki, her sister gently pulled the door shut then led the red-head to bed by the hand.

Awakening to a sunny morning Nabiki rolled over and opened her eyes, squawking in pain at the horrible sensation of daylight. "Agh! It burns!" Trying again after a few seconds she blinked ferociously, her eyes streaming. "God. That was much too much. Much, much too much." Mumbling to herself she sat up in the bed, rubbing her eyes and yawning. Eventually she felt human enough to get up, stumbling towards the nearest bathroom, muttering something incomprehensible to her sister who was coming out of the kitchen in her black practice silks. Almost without thinking she accepted the mug of coffee that was held out wordlessly, staggering off to her morning ablutions while drinking it. Kasumi watched with a smile then headed towards the practice room.

After a long shower, feeling much closer to human, Nabiki came out of the bathroom combing her hair. Hearing noises from the practice room she went in to watch Ranma and Kasumi spar with a smile. Ranma, male again, turned his head to grin at her. "Feeling better?" he asked, fending off a kick from his wife without looking. His sister-in-law nodded.

"Yes, still a bit tired, but it'll pass. Thanks for the night out, it was nice. I don't get out much at the moment."

"You're more than welcome, Kas, that's better, but you're still slightly off centre on that move. More like this." He spun and lashed out with his foot, halting the devastating kick less than a centimetre from his wife's face. She nodded while Nabiki winced, wide-eyed.

"I see. I think I know where I'm going wrong." Stepping back slightly she tried again. Her sister watched in amazement as she also stopped the kick, even closer to her husbands face than he had come to hers. Grinning, she asked, "How was that?" He smiled, moving her foot to one side with a fingertip so he could see her.
"Good. Quick and clean." Lowering her foot to the ground from where she had been effortlessly holding it she looked pleased.

"Wow." Nabiki shook her head. "Just... Wow. You two are pretty damn impressive." Kasumi shared a glance with Ranma then they both bowed a little.

"Thank you," they chorused.

"And you're both nuts." With a grin the younger Tendo sister walked over to the middle window, looking out at the park, then turning to glance at Kasumi as she joined her. "Do you guys ever use martial arts, the purely physical stuff, against anyone? All I've seen so far is basically advanced ki stuff, that looks more like magic than anything else." Kasumi smiled.

"Oh, we do have to hit things fairly often, but we try not to. The petty criminals usually give up after a demonstration of force, or simply run. The nastier demons you pretty much have to go in hard right from the start, they don't listen to reason. That usually means an energy attack. Everything else you try to talk down first. It's surprising how often that works." Ranma came over and stood next to his wife.

"That's where most of the magical girls go wrong. They never talk to anything, they just pile in with the heavy attacks, but usually escalate steadily. No real judgement of the opposition's strengths and weaknesses. They should either start very softly and talk it out, or if that's obviously not going to work go for the kill immediately, not fool around with lesser attacks. Most of the time the first approach works very well. I'd rather talk my way out of a confrontation if possible, but if not, finish it as fast as I can. There's less risk to bystanders like that. And us. We're not invincible, just very, very good."

Kasumi added, "Ranma has also had to avoid using most of his signature attacks since we left, or disguise them as something else. They're too memorable. Creating a tornado in the middle of Minato, aside from the damage it would cause, would get back to the Amazons. Most of the ki stuff can be made to look like a magical attack by changing the colour, or something along those lines."

"To be honest, a lot of it isn't strictly speaking ki any more, not completely at any rate. There's a lot of this magic or whatever it is mixed in even with the simpler stuff. The power signature is completely different, I doubt even Cologne would recognise it now." Ranma grinned. "I think she'd be very surprised indeed if she knew what I could do, and probably fall off her stick if she had any idea at all about Kas." Nabiki laughed, picturing it.

"You know, years ago I mentioned that attack you came up with, the one you saved Kasumi with. She refused to discuss it and got the weirdest look on her face. I think she was actually scared." She shook her head wonderingly. "I've never seen the old girl look like that before or since."

"Ha. I wish I could have seen that." Ranma grinned. "I tried for years to get any real rise out of her without a lot of luck. She's just too old and experienced."

Nabiki looked at him with interest. "You almost make it sound like you respect her." With a slight laugh he nodded.

"In a way I do. She knows an awful lot about martial arts, magic, ki use, all sorts of interesting things. If everything didn't come with strings attached I'd have really enjoyed learning from her. I did enjoy learning from her, even as frustrating as she was at the best of times. But there was always this whole 'Future son-in-law', marrying Shampoo thing hanging over every interaction we had. Even when she didn't say it, we both knew what she wanted." The martial artist shook his head with a tired sigh. "It's a shame. Under different circumstances I'd have loved to learn everything she was willing to teach. I'd have like being friends with Shampoo, and even Mousse, I think, as well. They're both fine warriors, honourable people in many ways, but so inflexible in their goals..." He sighed again. "No, I'm afraid that there was no way that was ever going to end in a way that didn't make me very unhappy, or dead." Nabiki looked surprised.

"Dead?"

"Oh, yes. Mousse did on more than one occasion sincerely try to kill me. Much harder than Ryoga did. Shampoo, in the early days when she didn't know about my curse, was damn serious as well. If I hadn't been as good as I was then I'd probably have been killed." Both women looked at him sympathetically, Nabiki with considerable shock as well. She'd never really understood that all the cries of 'Die, Ranma!' were actually serious.

"Do you think they still feel that way?" she asked curiously. He turned away from the window and walked back into the middle of the room, slowly beginning a complex kata, while thinking about his answer. Kasumi joined him wordlessly, listening.

"I'm not sure," he said after a few seconds. "Shampoo was much more interested in marrying me, although I think it wouldn't have been beyond the bounds of possibility that she might have thought that if she couldn't have me, no one could. She'd be far more likely to go after Kasumi, I think, not that it would turn out well for her if she did, but..." He worked a shrug into the movements. "I think she did, possibly still does, think she loves me, but it's kind of a selfish sort of love. Since I haven't seen her in nearly four years, I don't know whether she's changed." He thought some more while Nabiki waited. "Mousse, from what you've said and our 'agents' have reported," he smiled at this, "is just as hung up on Shampoo now as he ever was. If he thought she was seriously going after someone else I have no real doubt he'd try to remove them as competition. The Amazon way is sort of... direct and simplistic." Nabiki nodded thoughtfully.

"That's true enough. I don't have a lot to do with Mousse, I haven't seen him for over a year. I know Shampoo still gets frustrated with him, while she likes him as a person he drives her nuts when he tries to persuade her to marry him. She really isn't interested. Ironic, really, considering how she behaved to you." The brunette chuckled ruefully. "She could never see the parallels in your situations. I tried bringing it up a couple of times but it was like trying to explain calculus to a saucepan. Total waste of time."

"It's a pity, she always stuck me as quite an intelligent girl," Kasumi said, getting into a position that made Nabiki wince, without the slightest sign of strain. "But completely obsessed. Such a waste of time and effort."

"Ah, well. Not much that can be done about it," her husband said, mirroring the position and giving his sister-in-law an upside-down smile. "Can't change the past. Or, you can try, but it doesn't work very well." Nabiki stared at this. He grinned. "Remind me to tell you about the time travelling mirror sometime."

After a long pause, she repeated, "Time travelling mirror?" in a sort of dazed voice. The martial artist flipped upright and nodded.

"Yep. Damn nuisance, and not very reliable. Time travel is a pain, stay away from it. Some of those magical girls fool around with it sometimes, it never ends well." She stared at him as he grinned quickly, then headed for the kitchen. "Time for breakfast."

"What... Time travelling mirror?" She looked plaintively at her sister who smiled back at her with a slight shrug.
"I know. He's had all sorts of weird adventures."

"But... Time travelling mirror?" Following her sister to the living room she went over it in her head, finally deciding that this time she really didn't want to know.

After a leisurely breakfast, they went out again for a wander around the neighbourhood, this time without either 'Yori' or 'Chou' doing anything particularly outrageous. 'Yori' talked to a few people as did her wife, mainly greeting acquaintances and chatting for a while. The only bit of martial artistry that broke out was very minor, a snatch and grab thief had the pure bad luck to ply his trade at a market stall that 'Chou' happened to be buying some oranges at, apparently not noticing her. She reached out and poked a couple of pressure points while paying the trader with her other hand, barely looking at the young man who had grabbed a handful of yen notes out of the cash box right in front of her. He dropped to the ground like he been shot, groaning as he went numb from the neck down. Dropping her bag of oranges into ki space she bent over and relieved him of his loot, handing it over to the vendor who thanked her with a smile.

Looking down at the thief she shook her head with a small sigh. "Please try to find something else to do, or practice your thievery somewhere else. You're not very good at it." Nodding to the vendor she rejoined her sister and husband, who were watching from a few metres away with amused expressions. The vendor was beckoning over one of the local cops, who waved to the martial artists before taking a statement from the merchant. The thief was still mumbling to himself as they walked off. "Orange?" 'Chou' asked brightly, pulling three out of nowhere and handing them around. Nabiki shook her head with a smile. Her sister was...different. In a very impressive way.

Back at the apartment a while later she packed her small overnight bag. Going into the living room and sitting down on the sofa, she turned to Ranma who was watching her. "This has been fun. Thank you." He smiled.

"I'm glad you enjoyed yourself. We both had a really nice time, we don't go out socially much either at the moment. I hope you can come back so we can do it again. I know quite a few nice restaurants."

"You and food. I see that much hasn't changed." He nodded with a wide grin, which she matched. Kasumi came out of their bedroom and walked over, holding out a box. "Here." Nabiki took it while her sister sat next to her husband, watching her face as she opened the carton. "As promised." Reaching in and pulling out a thirty centimetre high brightly coloured box with a transparent front, Nabiki stared at the contents visible inside with a growing expression of hilarity.

"Oh, god, this is..." She started laughing. "It's fantastic!" Pulling out another box she inspected it as well, laughing even harder. The first one contained a very professionally manufactured posable doll, about twenty centimetres high, that was easily recognisable as Yori, complete with blue-streaked hair and her signature silk clothing. The work looked to be of a very high quality, just as Kasumi had said. The other box contained, of course, the matching Chou doll, equally as detailed. Reading the text on the side of the box the middle sister nearly had a fit she was giggling so hard. "Magical Girl Yori," she gasped out, "Lifelike replica. Fully moving joints, real silk clothes. Also available, Magical Girl Chou. Collect the set!" Dropping both boxes to the sofa she leaned back and roared with laughter while the other two watched with considerable amusement. Eventually she was able to speak again, picking up the 'Chou' doll in it's box and studying it with a huge grin on her face. "This is so damn funny. And really good work as well." She shook the box a little, hearing something inside rattle.

"That's the accessories," Kasumi said with a grin. Nabiki raised an eyebrow. "An energy sword, and for Yori, several bows in different colours for her braid." Nabiki started giggling again.

"Thanks, sis. These are amazing. I'm almost wanting one myself now. Akane will love them."

"There's two sets there, one for her and one for Shampoo. Although you could always keep the second set yourself and get her something else." Her sister smiled at her impishly.

"No need. I have access to the real thing." She grinned back. "But the real Yori doesn't seem to have any other colour bows. I'm disappointed." Ranma laughed.

"Hey, I like blue." After a cup of coffee each, Nabiki put the boxed dolls back in the small carton and packed it in her bag. "Would you like me to call Aiko and ask her to teleport you back like last time?" The middle sister considered the offer but declined.

"No, thanks all the same. I'm going to stop off on the way back and do some shopping, I think, I need a new top and some shoes. There's a big mall I go past on the train." Ranma nodded.

"OK. I'll call a taxi." Shortly thereafter she said goodbye to both of them, currently in their 'Maiko' and 'Rika' disguises as they'd come out of the building to wave her goodbye.

"Let me know about a visit, OK?" Both women nodded.

"I will. Take care, Nabiki," 'Rika' said, hugging her sister. 'Maiko' did as well, then she got into the taxi. As it drove off she waved through the back window, then turned to the driver. It was the same older man who had taken them to the restaurant.

"Hello again, Miss. Did you have a good night out?" he asked, smiling at her.

"I did, yes. Very good." Leaning back into the seat she settled in for the trip to the train station, a faint smile on her face. Every time she thought of the dolls she snickered a little.

Arriving home several hours later she walked in the door and sniffed suspiciously. This time there was no odd odour wafting past that might indicate an Akane-based culinary disaster in the making and she relaxed. Taking off her shoes she hung up her coat and went into the living room, dropping her overnight bag and a couple of shopping bags on the table with a sigh of relief, massaging her hand for a moment where the handle of the plastic bags had cut into it. Her younger sister came down the stairs a moment later.

"Hi, Nabiki. Did you have fun with your friends?" She smiled at the younger woman.

"Yes, it was very nice. The restaurant was amazing, then we saw a movie and went to a club for a while. We got back very late, I felt like crap this morning, but it was worth it."

"I'd like to meet your friends one day," Akane said, sitting down. Nabiki sat across from her.

"That's quite likely to happen, actually. I invited them to come and visit Nerima at some point. Both of them are very busy, the university takes up a lot of their time, but they said they'd try to arrange some time to pop over for a day. I think you'll like them." Akane looked interested, then slightly hesitant.

"Um, they're in a, a, relationship, aren't they?" Nabiki nodded. "And they're both... women?" Her sister looked amused.

"Maiko and Rika love each other very much, Akane." The younger woman flushed a little.
"I wasn't being rude, I was just... interested." She seemed to be thinking of something, nibbling her lip, but didn't add to her statement. After a moment Nabiki let it drop.

"Oh, Akane, by the way, you still collect magical girl things, don't you?" The blue-haired young woman looked up, her thoughts momentarily derailed.

"Um, Oh, yes, I do. Why?" Nabiki smiled a little deviously.

"Just checking." The other woman studied her with some suspicion.

"What are you up to, Nabiki?" she asked slowly. Her sister smirked a bit.

"Honest, I was just checking. I'm thinking about Christmas presents, and something I saw caught my eye. I just wanted to make sure it was still appropriate."

"Christmas is still three months away." The younger woman was still looking at her sister with a mildly disbelieving air.

"I know, but I like to get my shopping done early."

"Hmm." Akane looked at her innocent expression through narrowed eyes for a moment longer, then shrugged. "OK."

"When is your next appointment at the hospital?" the older sister asked, changing the subject. The other woman frowned a little.

"Tuesday. It would have been Monday, but there was some... damage... to the room." She looked slightly embarrassed. Nabiki sighed.

"Again? Akane, you have to try to calm down. If nothing else getting shot with a dart gun all the time can't be good for you." Her sister glared, then shrugged.

"It's not like it even works very well," she muttered.

"That's not the point." Slightly frustrated, Nabiki slumped a little trying to come up with something she could say that might help. She was unable to think of anything much. "Just, well, try harder, please?" Akane sighed.

"I do try, 'Biki. I really do. I just can't seem to keep my temper. It's better than it was, but..." She waved one hand helplessly. "No matter what I do, I just kind of snap, sooner or later. I wish I didn't, but I can't help it." Nabiki looked at her younger sister with sympathy. It was obvious that she was being honest about how much she wanted to change, and also, unfortunately, about how hard she was finding it.

"You'll get it sorted out eventually, Akane. I'm sure of that. It's just going to take a while. Keep at it, OK?" The other woman nodded, somewhat depressed, but with a visible effort made herself smile.

"Thanks, 'Biki. I'll do my best."

"I know." They smiled at each other. "Where are the others?" Nabiki asked.

"Auntie Nodoka is out visiting a friend, and Genma and Father are in the Dojo teaching a lesson. I was just going to visit Sayuri, we're going out to see a movie. She just broke up with her boyfriend, again."
"Isn't that something like the third time in the last six months?" Nabiki asked. Akane nodded.

"Yes, I don't know why they have so much trouble. Hiroshi is a nice guy, although when we were at school I'd never have thought that he and Sayuri would get together. But they just seem to keep having arguments. She won't tell me what about." She shrugged. "So we're going out to cheer her up."

"OK. Give my best to her. I've got to go and have a bath, I'm all sweaty from travelling." Akane stood and left, the front door closing shortly afterwards. The older sister took her purchases up to her room, hiding the carton of dolls safely in her closet, where it would stay until she went back to the university.
"Ah, Sergeant, thank you for joining us. Could you close the door, please?" Sergeant Tetsuo Harada did as requested, looking at Captain Uehara, then glancing at the three other people in her office curiously. Two of them, a man and a woman, were obvious foreigners, the other was a Japanese man. "I believe you speak English fluently?"

"Yes, Ma'am, I spend several years in the US at university," he responded, wondering what was going on.

"Good." She switched to that language, turning to her visitors. "This is Sergeant Harada. He will be your liaison and guide while you're here. Sergeant, this is Agent Naito from the PSIA, Lieutenant Harrison from the LAPD in the US," she indicated the man, "and Inspector Deveraux from the RCMP, in Canada, obviously." The woman, a tall and pretty woman in her mid thirties with short dark hair nodded politely. Sergeant Harada greeted all of them, bowing slightly to the intelligence agent and shaking hands with the two police officers. "Lieutenant Harrison and Inspector Deveraux are here on a joint US-Canadian police intelligence operation, following a criminal gang they suspect has ties to an Aum Shinrikyo splinter group and also a small branch of the Yakuza. There have been some... unusual incidents... in both Los Angeles and Toronto, which bear some of the hallmarks of previous attacks by the Aum Shinrikyo group, but with aspects that are a little peculiar." She emphasised the last word, and Harada nodded understandingly.

"You mean magic." Lieutenant Harrison looked irritated and Inspector Deveraux sighed.

"Magic doesn't exist," the American stated flatly. The three Japanese people looked at him with slightly raised eyebrows.

"Hmm. Interesting." Agent Naito studied the man with a guarded expression, but said nothing more for the moment. The RCMP woman was less circumspect.

"Richard, I don't like it any more than you do, but all the evidence is..." He cut her off.

"I don't care. It's all some sort of technical trick, or something like that. I don't know how they did it, but it's not magic. Not real magic." She sighed again. "Laura, we've worked on this for a long time, but I still haven't seen anything that would make me believe in magic."

"How do explain the fact that five suspects vanished from a completely locked room surrounded by over a hundred SWAT men, with absolutely no exits, then?" she asked mildly. "We both looked over that place ourselves. We called in an expert on escapology, x-rayed the entire building, then took it apart. There was absolutely no way out of the place except through the front door, we know that for a fact. We also know they went inside. But when we got in, the only thing we found was a weird diagram on the floor. Where did they go?" He looked both very annoyed and very puzzled, shrugging after several seconds.

"Damned if I know. But we know they've been spotted in Tokyo, so obviously they got out somehow." She started to speak, and he raised a hand to cut her off. "But not by magic."
"Oh, for god's sake..." she mumbled, looking at the PSIA man, who quirked a smile at her for a moment.

"Anyway, Sergeant, we asked your Captain to assign you to us as you have a good relationship with the local, ah, special talent. We will probably need their help." Harada looked at the man with interest.

"I wasn't aware that the PSIA knew much about our girls." Agent Naito smiled.

"Oh, we keep tabs on the comings and goings of most of the specials in Minato. While some of them are a bit of a handful, on the whole we feel they're a valuable asset to the country as a whole. We know quite a lot about what they do, and how many times their help has been essential. A lot more than I suspect most of them realise." The police officer exchanged a glance with his superior, then looked back to the security agent.

"Yori might take exception to that, you know. I assume we are talking about Yori and Chou?" Agent Naito nodded.

"Yes, indeed we are. Of all of them they are by far the most professional, and the ones we have the least information on. They take their security extremely seriously and are exceptionally good at it. Better than our people, to be honest. We have had some dealings with them in the past, they've always come through for us, but we haven't been able to find out much about them. The one thing we do know is that they're very, very dangerous." Harada smiled a little.

"You have no idea, I suspect. Dangerous doesn't even begin to describe it. Most of that type are dangerous, it's basically the job description, they are absolutely lethal. Luckily, they also are some of the most responsible, reliable, and trustworthy people I've ever met." Harrison and Deveraux were looking at each other, wondering what on earth the other two were talking about. Captain Uehara noticed and explained.

"Here in Minato we have a peculiar phenomenon, that to the best of my knowledge is almost unique to us, with the possible exception of the ward of Nerima, and one or two other places in Japan. Have you heard of Magical Girls?" The two visiting police officers exchanged puzzled glances.

"Um, like in the comic books? A sort of Japanese superhero? Always female, dress in skimpy clothing, battle supernatural opponents?" Lieutenant Harrison looked at the three Japanese people with a sceptical and puzzled expression. "My daughter reads some comics like that. It always seemed like an excuse for the artists to draw pretty girls without much on, in my opinion." The Captain smiled.

"That's more or less it." She paused for a moment, then added, "We have rather a lot of them around here."

"Oh, come on! You're telling me that there are teenaged girls in miniskirts jumping around the rooftops battling demons in Tokyo, for real?" He laughed derisively. Inspector Deveraux smiled a little, then both of them noticed that all three of the others looked completely serious.

"Basically, yes." The PSIA agent looked evenly at the LAPD man. "I understand it's a bit odd, but essentially those comics are based on reality. I don't know why it happens here and nowhere else, but I assure you it's real."

"You have to be kidding me," Harrison said, sounding almost like he was pleading to be let in on the joke.
"Sorry, but I'm not. We have magical girls, real ones, and if anything they're even stranger than in your daughter's comic books. The Sergeant here can introduce you to a couple of them. He can certainly show you the results of some of their efforts on behalf of the community."

Inspector Deveraux smiled slightly at the weird expression on the face of her American colleague, quickly stifling it when he glanced at her as if to a bastion of common sense in this strange foreign land. "So, if you have magical girls, do you have demon attacks as well?" she asked with light interest. "That's traditionally what they fight, if I have my urban mythology straight." The three natives nodded. With a sudden shock she realised they were completely serious.

"You've got to be kidding," Harrison said again, almost under his breath. Ignoring him, the Captain addressed Sergeant Harada.

"Two of the suspects in the LA attack were spotted very close to here a week or so ago. The PSIA tracked them to an area of about half a square kilometre before the trail went cold. We suspect they have some magical method of concealment, or are in league with one of our extremely out of town visitors." He nodded, understanding what she meant. "There was talk about blanketing the area with our people, but it was felt that this would both alarm the residents unnecessarily and also probably tip off our little group of nasties. If they move on we could lose them for months, if not permanently. Someone suggested setting Yori loose on them, and while it was felt that would probably sort the problem out for good, we'd like to arrest them rather than just have another duck pond." Harada grinned, while the visitors looked puzzled.

"What we'd like you to do is contact her and Chou, and ask them, politely of course, if they'd mind helping us track this group down and provide support if it goes bad." Captain Uehara paused, looking at the two foreigners for a moment. "We can't afford to have our guests get involved too heavily, it would be a bit of a diplomatic nightmare. They're mainly here for intelligence support and as observers." Harrison and Deveraux both looked somewhat unhappy about this but said nothing. Harrison was still apparently trying to figure out where the joke was about the concept of magical girls, without a lot of luck. Sergeant Harada smiled.

"OK, I can do that. It may take a few hours, her security is pretty tight and she doesn't always respond immediately."

"That's fine. There's no massive hurry, we'll go when they're available. We have some people watching from a discreet distance just in case one of the suspects shows up, but based on what's happened so far I doubt it's going to be that easy, unfortunately."

"May I use your phone, Ma'am?" The captain pushed it across her desk to him. Picking it up the Sergeant dialled a memorised number while removing a small card from his shirt pocket, then as the others watched with interest read off a long sequence of numbers and letters from it. Inspector Deveraux realised after a moment, with some surprise, that she couldn't remember what they were.
She turned to Agent Naito, who was watching her with a knowing expression.

"Weird, isn't it?"

"What's going on?" she asked, half-expecting the answer. He grinned.

"Magic, of course. That girl takes her privacy seriously and has some very cool toys." He waited as Harada left a message then hung up. "Sergeant, can you show the Inspector the card, please?" He looked puzzled, then suddenly understanding, handing it over. She took it and studied it curiously.
The card was completely blank, just a small rectangle of white card stock.

"Um, what am I supposed to see?" He grinned at her.
"Nothing. That's the point. Only the owner of the particular card can read it." Taking it back from her he put it away. Noticing her sceptical expression he explained. "The card is magical, and keyed to a particular person. Anyone other than that person can only see a blank card, and even the person it's keyed to can't tell anyone what's on it. Each card has a different password so she knows that who has it." Agent Naito smiled, looking impressed.

"I wish we had security that good. I have no idea how she does it, but I know it works. Not many people rate having her contact details, she doesn't hand them out very often. It's quite a sign of trust." Harrison and Deveraux exchanged glances.

"You realise how insane that sounds? And difficult to prove, if no one really can see what's on the card, who's to say it isn't just a blank card." Harada laughed.

"Honestly, inspector, we're not playing some elaborate practical joke. You'll see, later." Moments later the phone rang. "Hmm. That was quick. She must be bored." With a glance at his superior, who nodded approval, he picked it up and answered in Japanese. "Hello, Yori. Yes, fine, thanks. How's Chou? Good. Look, we have a problem we need some special help for. Could you two meet us somewhere? There are some people here who I'd like you to meet. Yes. Yes, that would be fine. Ten minutes? Great. Thanks." Hanging up he smiled, switching back to English for the benefit of the visitors. "She's happy to help, and will meet us outside in about ten minutes. I'd better get a couple of cups of coffee, she and Chou drink a lot of it and like ours." Leaving the room he headed for the cafeteria.

Inside, the two visiting police officers looked at each other with bemusement, then turned to the captain. "Agent Naito will come with you. You've both been given special dispensation to carry your service weapons while on this assignment, but I must emphasise, especially to you, Lieutenant Harrison, that you must only use them as a matter of last resort. Here in Japan we take a very dim view of people discharging firearms at all, never mind in the street. This isn't LA. If you use your gun you better have a damn good reason for it, or you may find yourself staying a lot longer than you planned. Do I make myself clear?" He nodded. "Good. Make sure you carry the letters of authorisation you have been issued at all times, and do not let your weapons out of your sight. And one more thing. Do not, under any circumstances, point a weapon at the magical girls. If you do the police and security forces of Japan won't be held responsible for what happens next. It wouldn't have any effect except to make them angry in any case, and trust me, you don't want to make them angry. You really, really don't." The Canadian and American police officers looked at each other for a moment, then nodded again.

"Yes, Captain." Inspector Deveraux looked at the older woman curiously. "If they're that dangerous, why do you allow them to run around the street?" Captain Uehara glanced at Agent Naito, then turned back to the woman.

"Partly because we have no effective way of stopping them even if we wanted to, but mainly because they perform a service that no one else could. If they weren't around, well, let's just say that it would get very messy if past events are anything to go by." She smiled a little scarily. "If you stay here for very long you may well find out what I mean. Anyway, good luck, and remember, do not annoy the magical girls! And if a demon attacks, get out of the way and let them handle it." They left the office looking worried, going in the direction of the main entrance.

"Masao, please keep them out of trouble, hmm?" the captain said. "I really don't want an international incident here, we have enough to do as it is. And don't let Harrison piss Yori off too much. I know his type, he's likely to be somewhat disrespectful to a young woman, which might be a bad mistake. She doesn't suffer fools gladly from what I've heard." He grinned.
"Yes, I believe you're right. Don't worry, the PSIA doesn't want any trouble from either the Americans or the Canadians either. At least the Canadians are polite, the Americans can be... abrasive. I will keep in touch." He bowed slightly, then followed the two foreigners. The captain watched him leave, then sighed.

"Magical girls. Demons. How did it come to this? Life used to be so much simpler." With a shake of her head she got back to her paperwork.

Inspector Deveraux and Lieutenant Harrison stood outside the front door of the central police station, looking around the small park it fronted onto. The Inspector was quite impressed with the area, it had a lot of greenery and seemed quite affluent and up-market, but not in an in-your-face sort of way. Everything was surprisingly clean and well looked after, the locals were respectful and pleasant, and although it was beginning to get cooler as autumn drew in, it was still warmer than Toronto. Harrison was shivering a little, though.

"Damn, it's cold. LA is much warmer than this even at this time of year." She grinned.

"If you think this is bad you should visit Toronto in the winter. It hit minus thirty last winter where I live, and that's nothing compared to further north." He stared, doing the conversion from Centigrade to Fahrenheit in his head, then looked appalled.

"Fuck. That's horrible. No thanks, I'll stay where it's warm."

"Come on, it's warm here, it must be at least fifteen degrees." He looked at her with an annoyed expression, zipping his coat up.

"Which is half what it should be to make me feel comfortable." After a pause while she smiled, amused, he slowly asked, "Do you believe everything they said in there? Magical girls? Demons? Hell, magic in the first place?" Glancing at him she shrugged.

"It's pretty hard to believe, I admit, but they seem sincere enough to me." A hand reached past her shoulder holding a disposable cup of coffee.

"We are sincere, and yes, it's all true," Sergeant Harada said with a smile as she jumped a little, then accepted the cup. He handed one to the American as well, then to the PSIA man who came up silently. Placing two of the three he had left on the wall next to the entrance to the station, he leaned against it and took a sip of the remaining one. Harrison tried his and nodded in slightly surprised satisfaction.

"Hey, that's pretty good. Especially for police issue coffee." Harada laughed.

"We take our coffee seriously around these parts." Studying the two police officers he asked, "So, you seem to have trouble with the concept of magic." The looked at each other, then back at him.

"I'm more puzzled that you guys don't," Harrison said. "I mean, magical girls? Teen-aged mini-skirted magical superheroes running around the place beating up demons. Demons, even. It's insane. Even if it was true, why does no one outside Japan know about it?" Agent Naito smiled slightly.

"Oh, some do, trust me. The UK, for instance, has a very long history of this sort of thing, but in a different way. Europe in general is aware of it, as is China. We seem to have a lot more of it, I'll grant you that, and the magical girls seem to be unique to us, but it's all around you if you know what to look for. It always puzzles me that North Americans have so much trouble believing it, while at the same time so many of them believe they've been abducted by aliens. Which is just silly." He chuckled, while Deveraux burst out laughing. Even Harrison smiled at this.

Sergeant Harada looked off to one side, then said, "Well, if you want to ask about magical girls, you can ask them." He pointed, and the other three turned to look in the direction he was staring. The eyes of the two foreign police officers bugged out at the sight of two young women, dressed not in the mini-skirts of the comics but in fairly stylish silk clothing, leaping easily from building to building some five or six stories up, heading down the street in their direction. The one in the lead, dressed in black with her long blue-striped black hair in a braid that blew behind her with the speed she was moving, reached the edge of the last building and simply ran off it, somersaulting several times during the graceful arc she made to ground level. Landing on her feet as lightly as if she'd jumped off a chair she walked towards them, while behind her the somewhat taller short-haired blonde woman in grey clothes performed exactly the same manoeuvre.

"Holy fucking hell," Harrison whispered. "How..." He ran out of words. Deveraux didn't have any to start with. Both of them watched as the two women, who looked about nineteen or twenty, crossed the street towards them, stopping once or twice to greet various people, none of whom looked even slightly surprised at what they'd just done. Waving to a couple of police officers who were getting into a patrol car, they walked up to the little group and stopped, looking curiously at the two people gaping at them before turning to Harada.

"Hi, Sergeant," the shorter woman said, accepting the cup of coffee he handed her with a nod of thanks. He did the same to her blonde companion. "So, what's all this about?" She looked the three people she didn't know up and down intently. Her unusually tinted eyes almost glowed, making them feel a sense of considerable energy only barely contained. "An American, a Canadian I think, and someone from the PSIA." This last sentence was said in very good English for the benefit of the foreigners. Both the overseas cops were still staring, but Agent Naito smiled a little.

"How did you know I'm from the PSIA?" he asked.

"That's what your ID says," the blonde woman said, looking with interest at the contents of a wallet she was holding. He stared, patting his jacket with his hand, then sighed.

"Magical girls." Holding out his hand he asked politely, "Can I have it back, please?"

"Certainly." The blonde handed it over with a smile. He turned to the black haired girl to see her reading the contents of another wallet.

"Hmm. LAPD. A long way from home, Lieutenant." She flipped the ID shut and tossed it back to Harrison, who caught it reflexively looking stunned. Neither of them had come closer than a couple of metres to any of the people. Sergeant Harada was grinning.

"Sorry. We get curious." The other girl handed Deveraux her own ID with an apologetic smile. The Canadian took it numbly, putting it back into the interior pocket it had mysteriously somehow disappeared from. "So. What can we do for the police today? Or is it a PSIA event again?" The girl smiled at Agent Naito, who grinned back.

"It's a joint operation with international links. Our overseas friends here are coming along as observers, although their respective forces have considerable interest in this case." Yori raised an eyebrow.

"It must be a significant one if you're allowing foreign police officers to carry their weapons on the street." Lieutenant Harrison looked at her, startled.
"Why do you think we're armed?" She glanced at her blonde friend, who smiled.

"You have a Glock 17 9mm pistol in a shoulder holster, with two spare magazines. Your Canadian colleague is carrying a Smith and Wesson 5906 9mm, which I believe is standard RCMP issue. She's only got one spare magazine, although she also has a number of rounds in her purse." Both police officers stared at the blonde, then at each other.

"Holy crap. How did you do that?" Harrison was astounded and quite worried. They shrugged.

"It's a martial arts thing," Yori answered. "Difficult to explain. Anyway, I'm Yori, as you've probably already gathered, this is Chou. Nice to meet you, Lieutenant Harrison." She held out her hand and after a moment he shook it. Rather unwisely he decided to try to assert his own masculinity, which was feeling slightly overwhelmed, squeezing harder than necessary. She smiled slightly at him, apparently not noticing. With a small frown he squeezed harder. "Do you really want to do this, Lieutenant?" He saw something in her sharp violet-blue eyes that made him back off. Her friend put a warning hand on her shoulder and she released his hand, stepping back.

"Sorry," he muttered. She waved it off, grinning a little which showed off her small fangs, a sight that made both North Americans glance at each other for a second.

"No bother." Naito, who had been watching their interactions with a certain amount of humour, stepped forward.

"OK, now that we've established how clever we all are, let me introduce everyone properly." He spared each magical girl a minor glare, making them look mildly embarrassed and also amused. Yori graciously gestured for him to continue. "Thank you. Right, this is Lieutenant Richard Harrison, LAPD, and Inspector Laura Deveraux, RCMP. I'm Masao Naito from the PSIA as you somehow worked out. We have a problem we hope you can help with, we asked Sergeant Harada to call you as he knows you. Would you like to come inside where we can explain?" The two young women exchanged a glance then nodded.

"Of course," Yori said. "Always happy to help. Lead on." With a chuckle he waved them inside the police station then followed, Sergeant Harada and the two visitors bringing up the rear. Harrison watched the girls walking in front of them with an expression of incredulity on his face, while Deveraux watched him. Harada watched both of them.

"Believe in magic yet?" the inspector asked her American colleague in a low voice, glancing at the two young women who were chatting with the PSIA man. He shrugged helplessly.

"I'm not sure, but I certainly believe something weird is going on. How the hell did they do that?"

"Which part? Jumping off a five story building like it was ten centimetres tall, or somehow getting our IDs out of our coats from two metres away. Or knowing exactly what our weapons are and how much ammo we're carrying from the same distance?"

He almost giggled. "Any of it. All of it. It's completely nuts. They're only about three years older than my daughter, for god's sake." Harada, bringing up the rear, laughed.

"Oh, some of the magical girls are much younger than that. Age doesn't seem to be a factor. That said, I suspect they're actually rather older than they look, they have a much more mature outlook on life than their appearance would suggest, odd sense of humour aside. Don't let what they look like fool you. Both of those ladies could take out a division of any army in the world without much difficulty, should they want too. Some of the things I've seen them do is... pretty damn impressive, even by magical girl standards. Remind me to show you the crater in the park. It's a good demonstration of what Yori can do if she feels it's necessary."

They looked at each other. "Crater?" asked Deveraux. He nodded.

"Yes. About twenty metres across, lined with glass. That's what happened when she got miffed with a particularly unpleasant demon."

"A twenty metre crater?" Harrison sounded both fascinated and horrified.

"Oh, it's a duck pond now, it was too much trouble to fill it in, but you can still see the glass slag lining. I've got no idea how much energy was needed to do that, but it was a hell of a lot. How she kept it from breaking every window in Minato is beyond me. The noise was pretty impressive even so, especially from only a hundred metres away. There wasn't anything at all left of the demon." He shook his head with a mildly amused smile while remembering, as the other two looked at each other, aghast. "I certainly wouldn't like to see her really go all out. You'd probably see the explosion from the moon."

"A crater?" Harrison mumbled again, trying to wrap his mind around the concept. Deveraux looked at him and sighed a little, he was going to have a lot of difficulty with this. She was having quite a lot herself and her mind was much more flexible.

Naito took over a small conference room, closing the door and pulling a sheaf of papers from an inside pocket. Spreading them across the table he explained the situation while both the silk-clad women listened intently, asking pertinent and insightful questions occasionally. Deveraux found her opinion of both of them going steadily up as it became more and more apparent that there were a couple of first-class minds there as well as the strange abilities. Both she and Harrison explained their respective forces' involvement in the case, while Harada sat and listened silently, watching all the participants with interest.

"So far, there have been at least forty-three deaths we know of associated with these people. We're not sure exactly what they are trying to do, or even if the deaths were deliberate or accidental. There were three separate cases in LA and the surrounding area, accounting for eighteen fatalities, and five cases in the greater Toronto area which produced the rest. The American and Canadian forces had been closing in on the suspects for nearly a year, and it all came to a head a few months ago when two of them were shot while apparently setting up to do... something. No one seems to have any real idea what. The other five who have so far been identified managed to barricade themselves into a locked basement room, but they were gone when the LAPD SWAT finally broke in over two hours later."

Agent Naito looked seriously at the two young women. "We do not like the idea of anything like that happening here in Japan, as you can imagine, so we want to stop them as soon as possible. Especially considering the provenance of the people apparently involved. But the PSIA, who ended up with responsibility for this case, knows when it's in over it's head on certain matters. Hence your involvement. You've been a great help in the past, I'm hoping you can be again."

Yori pulled out one photo from the pile that he had put on the table, looking at it again. She showed it to her colleague who nodded with a frown. "This is a one-shot teleport spell, a bit over-complicated but effective. As far as I can see the coordinates it was targeted to would be somewhere in Japan, but I can't make out a few of the symbols that would locate it more precisely than that. Someone has stepped on it and erased some critical parts." She glanced at the two visitors. "In future, if you come across something like this, try to get a clear photo of it without disturbing it." They nodded, still having trouble with the concept of teleportation.

"It's been drawn pretty amateurishly, to be honest. I doubt it was a trained mage, I think whoever made it was shown how to do this one spell and given something to power it as an escape method. Did you find anything like a glass ball, perhaps ten centimetres across?" Harrison looked up.

"Yes, actually. We thought it was the remains of a light bulb but none of them were missing. It was broken on the floor in the middle of that pattern." She nodded.

"OK, that was a sort of magical battery. It would have contained enough energy to run this spell once and transport, oh, perhaps six people at most. It probably broke when the spell activated. It wouldn't have told you much anyway, they're pretty anonymous. You can buy them by the case in some of the demon worlds." They all stared at her.

"Demon worlds?" Naito asked slowly. The black-haired woman grinned.

"Demons have to come from somewhere, right?" Harada snickered a little. He was perhaps the only one in the room who had some idea of what she was talking about, having met a number of the more peaceful otherworldly visitors, mainly through Yori. Even the PSIA man seemed slightly startled. "We get a lot of traffic through Minato, for some reason I still haven't worked out. I think that it might be a sort of gateway for demon portals, they are easier to make here than most other places. Anyway, some of the other worlds have a certain amount of trade with and through here, quite a lot of magic workers get supplies from them. These magical storage devices are a pretty common and cheap trade good in certain areas. They're quite useful for people who don't have a lot of magic themselves but need to work a spell. Not all spells can be adapted to use them, but quite a few useful ones can." Making a quick gesture with her hand she was suddenly holding a small transparent sphere that looked like it was made of glass. She rolled it across the table to Naito who picked it up and looked at it, while Harrison and Deveraux looked at each other wondering where it had come from.

"That's the sort of thing. Possibly not that exact model, there are quite a few of them."

"This is a magical battery?" Agent Naito asked curiously. She smiled.

"Yes. It can hold a fair amount of power for months, perhaps years if it's made properly." She produced another one from wherever such things came from, then held it up. It slowly began glowing, as if it was being filled with purple-blue mist. After a few seconds it was as bright as the lights in the ceiling. "That's about enough to run the spell that you found." They looked on in awe, the two foreign police officers gaping at the most direct evidence of magic they'd ever seen. Deveraux nudged her colleague.

"Still don't believe in magic?"

"I'm beginning to," he replied quietly. Yori heard him and with a smile rolled the ball in his direction. Stopping it with his hand he pulled it quickly away when he felt it tingle, like the ball was charged with static electricity.

"It's safe to touch," she said. Hesitantly he reached out and picked the ball up, looking at it in wonder, before handing it to Deveraux. Rubbing his fingertips together he remembered the odd sensation. After a moment the Canadian woman handed it back to the black-haired woman. Holding it in one hand she somehow made the strange energy go back to where it had come from, leaving the ball transparent once more, before making it disappear again. None of the watchers could figure out where it went. Naito rolled the first one back and she vanished that one as well.

"So, are you a magic worker, then?" Deveraux asked, feeling slightly foolish even as she spoke. Yori shook her head.
"Not in the way you're thinking. Our magic works differently. I can't work a spell like that, although I could easily power it. Our energy is compatible, the method isn't. It's complicated if you don't understand multidimensional visualisation techniques." They looked blank and she sighed a little, exchanging glances with Chou, who smiled. "It's complicated. Anyway, what I'm getting at is that there are a few conclusions we can draw. Either your suspects have contacts with one of the otherworlds, or know someone who does. There is a mage involved, quite a good one, although they aren't mages. I would suspect some form of demon involvement as well, although I can't explain why I think that. It just feels like it. That cuts down the possible people to a few dozen, most of whom we know. I can ask around to see if we can figure out who is involved, which should let us work out where they are."

Agent Naito produced a map, which he spread out on the table, pushing the other documents to the side. "The PSIA tracked them to this general area, but it's quite large and difficult to search." He indicated a red line drawn around a roughly rectangular block of the locality approximately half a kilometre from corner to corner. Both Yori and Chou studied it.

"Close to the university over here, half the shopping district, some office buildings, and a couple of the student dorms as well. There are a lot of people in that area, it could get very nasty if something went bad." Chou looked at the map with concern.

Harada got up and leaned over Yori's shoulder, inspecting the map himself. "Can you locate them in all this?" he asked. The black-haired young woman looked thoughtful.

"They must be quite well shielded or I'd probably have spotted them already, we check out new magic users when they pop up on our patch. I'm pretty sure there's no portal there, those things stand out like a sore thumb for kilometres no matter how well you try to shield them and I haven't felt any for weeks around here, so they're probably still in this world. I'd guess they're hiding in a building somewhere in here, most likely underground, with the best wards they could manage around them. I'll have a poke around, but our best bet is to track them through their mage, I think. Mind you, we might get lucky."

Lieutenant Harrison shook his head in wonder. "I can't believe we're having a serious discussion about demons, portals to other worlds, and magic. With a pair of magical girls, to boot. No offence," he added hastily, looking at the two young women.

Yori grinned. "None taken, although I prefer to think of myself as a martial artist. But I can understand you might have some problems with all of this. I'm sorry, it's all real. You'll have to get used to that." He shrugged.

"I'm still not sure I believe it all, but I'm willing to go along with it for the moment."

"Fair enough." She studied him for a moment longer, then turned to Agent Naito. "I'll ask around. I'd prefer not to have people like this around here, we've gone to a lot of trouble to make this a safe place to live. I'll take a day or two to contact everyone we need to, but we'll make a swing through that area tonight and see if we can get any leads."

"Thanks. All of us will be here at the station most of the time, please call immediately if you do find anything." He handed her a business card with his name and a cell number on it. After looking at it for a second she made it literally disappear. He grinned. "That's a damn good trick." Laughing, she nodded.

"It has its uses. We'll be in touch." Standing, she looked at them for a moment, then added, "We don't want anything happening either, we happen to like this area a lot. You have our word we'll do everything we can to help you." Chou nodded with a smile, glancing at Sergeant Harada while opening the door, then to the shock of the Canadian and American police officers, both magical girls simply faded from view. Harrison stared in disbelief, sharing a wide-eyed glance with Deveraux. Sergeant Harada chuckled while Agent Naito sighed slightly with a shake of his head.

"Yori likes her little moments of drama, especially with new people," Harada said with a small grin. "She can be a bit of a show-off."

"I heard that," came a faint voice from somewhere, followed by a couple of giggles that faded away down the hallway. He grinned more widely.

"Case in point." Harrison was still staring at the empty doorway with a look of shock on his face. Deveraux finally poked him on the shoulder.

"Come on, Richard, let's get some lunch. You're never going to work it out, just go with it." He shook his head hard a couple of times like he'd been slapped, then looked at her wide-eyed.

"They... went invisible? Or something?" His voice sounded both shocked and almost affronted, as if what he'd seen was annoying him. She shrugged.

"Something, I guess. Believe in magic now, then?" After a long moment he nodded slowly.

"It's as good a description as anything, at this point." He turned to the two Japanese people who were watching them with amused expressions. "And there are more like those two?" Agent Naito smiled momentarily.

"Not exactly like them. Yori and Chou are in a class of their own. But yes, we have at least some information on approximately fifty-four magical girls in Minato ward alone, either individuals or groups. The largest group consists of about a dozen, most are three to five. They range in age from around eleven or so up to mid twenties, but that's only an estimate, most of them have one form or other of disguise method available. We know the, for want of a better word, civilian identity, of about half of them, the rest are still anonymous. Those two are the most anonymous of all. We know, at least officially, almost nothing about them." He looked thoughtful. "I'm pretty sure that someone in our government knows more about them, but isn't saying. It's way above my pay grade as you Americans would say. I do know that they've helped out on a few occasions with some very sensitive operations, and that as far as the government is concerned they have a remarkably high if off the books security rating. Someone a lot higher up than me seems to feel they're very trustworthy. I'd love to know more but I doubt I ever will." He shrugged.

"Anyway, that's your introduction to magical girls. Stay around Minato for long and you'll probably run into others, but I think you've just met the best ones."

They stood up, Sergeant Harada gesturing to the door. "If you'll come with me I know a nice restaurant down the street, or we can go to the cafeteria if you'd prefer." Between them they decided to go to the restaurant. Or rather three of them did, Harrison still seemed to be having trouble with life at the moment, he looked like he was trying to understand how everything had gotten so weird so suddenly. This whole case had been an exercise in the odd anyway, but the last hour or so was almost beyond belief.

Inspector Deveraux was watching the expressions going across the face of her American counterpart with considerable sympathy, she was feeling quite a lot of what he obviously was as well. The whole situation was surreal to put it mildly. "So they battle demons, and other magical threats? Do you really have so many attacks here that so many of them are necessary? Do they do anything else?" She was full of questions, most of which seemed even to her to be weird. Sergeant Harada nodded a little as they walked down the street.
"Unfortunately, in Minato as a whole, yes, we do seem to attract incursions of an unusual sort. Not so much in this immediate area any more, for which you can directly thank Yori and Chou. I've got no doubt about that. When they turned up about three years ago, this district had as many demon attacks as the rest of Minato, which is a lot more than seems likely. Most of them are fairly low level, sort of the supernatural equivalent of a mugging, but there have been a few that could have been extremely nasty. One or two of them have been. We've lost quite a few people over the years to... things. The various groups of girls have a pretty high success rate in stopping this sort of problem. Quite a few of these attacks probably couldn't have been stopped in any other way. The main problem historically has been that the collateral damage from the battles between the demons and the demon hunters has been pretty impressive, sometimes worse than if the demons had been left to their own business."

He smiled somewhat ruefully. "In fact, having talked to Yori about a number of these cases, that's certainly true. Most, if not all of the other magical girls tend to come down like the fist of god on anything even slightly outside the ordinary, which can be very hard on the surroundings. She's shown me that a lot of the time none of that was necessary. It turns out that like she said, there is a lot of otherworldly trade to and through Minato, for some reason, which is essentially peaceful and harmless. Right up to the point that some overenthusiastic magic-powered schoolgirl drops the hammer of doom on it and blows up half a street. Yori gets extremely annoyed about things like that, she seems to take it quite personally. The result has been that she's ended up fighting other magical girls nearly as often as weird demons, to get them to stop smashing the place up."

Agent Naito chuckled and both visitors turned to look at him. "Reading the various reports, I've formed the opinion that Yori and Chou are essentially the magical girl police in many ways. The two of them have done a lot to keep the other groups under control, and aren't above shutting them down hard if they think it's getting excessive. Yori is surprisingly pleasant to talk to, I was expecting someone much more abrasive from what I've read, but you don't want to get on her bad side." Harada started laughing, all three of the others looking at him.

"No, you certainly don't. That girl has a mouth on her you wouldn't believe, it's awe-inspiring. Chou can be pretty damn intimidating as well but is much quieter about it, which is almost worse. She makes you feel like you've let your mother down. Yori just makes you wish you were back in basic training again for the peace and quiet. They're both damn effective though. Since they've been around the collateral damage has dropped to almost nothing in the district and gone down a lot throughout Minato. They took steps to arrange reimbursement to people affected by magical girl and demon fights, they'll stomp on a demon hunter just as hard as a demon if they think it's getting out of hand, and they go out of their way to deal with any real danger in a way that minimises damage. It's all very impressive. Ah, here it is." He indicated the restaurant in question, a few metres down the street.

"You call a twenty-metre crater minimal damage?" Harrison asked, looking askance at the sergeant. The other man nodded seriously as they entered the restaurant.

"To be honest, under the circumstances, yes. The thing that was attacking was practically unstoppable. I can guarantee you that conventional force, if it worked at all, would have pretty much wrecked the entire neighbourhood. She lured it to a park away from any people, then vaporised it cleanly and efficiently. Oh, she admitted afterwards that she might have overdone it a little and was very embarrassed about it, but no one who was there holds that against her. The damn thing had already killed five people a few kilometres away in another district and the local magical girl group, who are very good themselves, couldn't stop it."

"How many of them were there in this other group?" Deveraux asked curiously.
"Four, as far as I know. I don't know them very well, but they're friends of Yori and Chou I believe. One of the few other groups she seems to feel are competent. I know she trains others she feels are worth the effort, but not many of them come up to her standards." He grinned a little. "She has very high standards. I don't know where she got her own training, but that girl knows more about martial arts than any ten grandmasters. There doesn't seem to be a discipline she doesn't have a working knowledge of, and in most cases to an incredibly high level. I know quite a bit myself, a lot of the police around here do, but she's so far beyond anything I've ever seen it's almost impossible. Anything from Tai Chi to Muai Thai to Krav Maga, you name it she knows it. Plus a lot I've never heard of before. I suspect quite a few she's come up with herself." The visitors looked both impressed and a little appalled.

"How could someone that young possibly learn so many different martial arts?" Harrison wondered. Sergeant Harada shrugged.

"No idea. But seeing her in action is absolutely awe-inspiring. Far more impressive than any Hollywood action movie. She makes the best efforts of Bruce Lee look like the work of a rank amateur. Chou isn't quite as experienced, I think, but she knows nearly as much. Yori is obviously training her and has been for years. They both have a raw talent for martial arts that goes beyond genius, leaving aside the magical powers or whatever they are." The waitress that met them seated them at a window table, greeting Harada by name with a smile. He ordered a round of soft drinks and coffee, which she quickly brought along with four menus. The visitors looked through them, the two Japanese natives translating where necessary. Eventually they had all ordered food and the conversation restarted where it had left off.

Agent Naito asked, "What's the relationship between Yori and Chou, do you think? I've read all the information we have on them, which isn't much, and it's obvious they come as a set, but does it go further than that?" Harada smiled slightly.

"I'm not completely sure, and to be honest it's none of my business, but I suspect they've lovers if nothing else. It probably goes deeper. I do know that if you threatened either one of them the other one would end you so fast you'd never see it coming." The PSIA man nodded thoughtfully.

"Probably best not to do that, then." He grinned. "Not that I have any intention of ever trying anything like that. As far as we're concerned they're an invaluable asset and I suspect my own head would be on the chopping block if I was foolish enough to do anything silly, from someone at a considerable political height." Harada studied him with interest.

"I've always thought she had friends in weird places. Well, I know for a fact she has friends in weird places, but I mean high places as well. On both sides of the law." Harrison glanced at Deveraux, who leaned forward.

"What do you mean by that, Sergeant?" Harada shrugged again.

"Just that there are a number of very high-level Yakuza who treat both of them with extreme respect. More so than just the threat they could pose if they wanted to would seem to warrant. I've got no doubt that if they got seriously pissed off the Yakuza would cease to exist in short order, but by and large they leave them alone, unless they do something stupid. In this case, stupid means getting involved in prostitution or drugs anywhere in the district, or violence against people who in some way don't warrant it. Or violence against women anywhere. God help you if you try anything like a sexual assault anywhere in Minato, because no one else will. Yori has absolutely no sense of humour at all about that sort of thing and she seems to have passed that on to most if not all of the magical girls and a hell of a lot of the Yakuza higher-ups." He laughed for a moment.

"Zero-tolerance doesn't even begin to describe it. We haven't had a rape here in two years, and the last perpetrator crawled into the station and begged to be arrested. He was in hospital for two months before he could be moved to jail." He didn't seem too upset about this.

The overseas officers looked somewhat taken aback. "And you let them get away with this, this, vigilantism?" Deveraux asked. Harada looked briefly at Agent Naito, who nodded a little, then answered honestly.

"We couldn't stop them if we wanted to, which we don't. One thing you should understand is that they're not really vigilantes. Unofficially, Yori and Chou, at least, have considerable backing from people who feel that they're doing a very good job. They don't charge for what they do, between them they've saved certainly hundreds of lives, if not thousands, both from demon attacks and more run of the mill crime or accidents. Plus when we ask for their help in unusual cases, they always give it without question. I suspect if we asked them to leave they probably would, they have a lot of respect for the authorities, more than some of them warrant in my opinion, but the result of that would undoubtedly be a disaster." Sergeant Harada paused for a moment, thinking about something, then continued.

"Leaving aside the fact that the community and most of the local police force would probably revolt on the spot anyway, those two are thought of extremely highly around here. People don't make much fuss about it, but they like and respect them. Between them they know practically every resident here, a lot of whom owe them thanks for something or other. Most of the magical girls are cut quite a bit of slack since they perform a very useful service that probably couldn't be done any other way, but that pair is genuinely respected to a remarkable level." He shook his head a little. "It's difficult to explain to someone from outside Japan. We run into a cultural problem. You see a vigilante, someone working outside the law, we see something else." Trying to think of the best way to get it across he paused again, while the visitors waited curiously.

"There's a long tradition in this country of the wandering martial artist, who protects the innocent. Add to that the even longer tradition of the Samurai, and a number of other things, you end up with a very high tolerance for someone like them. All the magical girls, really, even the more inept ones. They may at times act outside criminal law, but they act honourably, to protect the community from any threat, which is a very big deal to us. People respect that they help quietly and efficiently, often resolving trouble without involving official attention. When a matter does require police involvement they let us know and we take over, they never want any credit. It makes our job a lot safer if nothing else."

Lieutenant Harrison was listening with interest. "What does happen if someone pulls a weapon on them?" he asked curiously. "Your Captain was very insistent that it was something we should never ever try." Harada chuckled.

"I can imagine. Chou, particularly, isn't fond of firearms. She seems to know a lot about them, but doesn't like them being freely available. We tend to agree. Our laws on that sort of thing are very strict, especially to an American, or even a Canadian. But occasionally some low-level criminal gets his hand on a pistol or something along those lines, often as a result of an American serviceman deciding to supplement his pay." Harrison looked both annoyed and embarrassed.

"That shouldn't happen," he muttered. Agent Naito nodded.

"Agreed, but when we trace the serial numbers it's surprising how often they turn out to have been stolen from one of the military bases." After a moment, Sergeant Harada continued.

"Even the Yakuza tend to come down pretty hard on any of their people who do that nowadays, since the laws were made much more restrictive a few years ago, they've tended to think that guns draw too much attention. Anyway, using a gun on Yori or Chou would only make them very angry."
The last time that happened some idiot from out of the area tried mugging Chou while waving a 9mm pistol in her face. That was a serious mistake. A bigger mistake was firing it at her."

Deveraux raised an eyebrow. "Let me guess, bullets bounce off them," she commented with mild sarcasm. He laughed.

"I don't know, but I wouldn't be surprised. But in this case she just caught it." He looked at their expressions, even Agent Naito's, and laughed again. "Honest. She caught the damn thing three feet from the barrel, then took the gun away from him. Then she made him swallow the bullet. Then she broke his arms." They all stared at him. "I'm not making it up. We recovered the round from the toilet a few hours later, matched it to the gun which had his fingerprints on it, and that was that. The fact that he had a visit from someone who was allegedly his lawyer, after which he confessed to every crime he'd ever committed, was a nice bonus. I don't know who the lawyer was but he scared the man shitless."

"She caught the bullet..." Harrison repeated slowly. Harada nodded, looking highly amused.

"Yes. I couldn't believe it myself so she demonstrated. One of the most amazing things I've ever seen."

"Good god." Deveraux and Harrison looked at each other. "What else can they do, for god's sake?" Naito looked at them, then smiled.

"Well, I'm pretty sure I don't have a complete list, they seem to pull new tricks out of the woodwork quite often, but let's see. They can turn invisible, you've seen that. They can run at some ridiculous speed, at least a hundred and twenty kilometres per hour, jump six stories off a building without effort, more impressively jump back again, reportedly are strong enough to pick up a car..." Harada nodded.

"I've seen that myself. It was a large van, in fact."

"...pick up a van, have insane martial arts skills, some form of healing ability we don't have much information on, and can manipulate energy to form projectiles, beams, cutting implements, not to mention all the other magic stuff that's less identifiable."

There was silence for some time. Eventually Deveraux asked quietly, "Are all the magical girls like that?"

"No, like I said those two are in a class of their own. Most of the others don't have anything even approaching that level of martial arts or combat ability, while some of them are possibly considerably more powerful in raw magical output. I'd put Yori and Chou up against any of them, though, the mix of ability, talent, and experience they have is so far unbeatable. They have in fact gone up against a lot of the others at one point or another, either just for fun or to stop them causing a mess. They've won every time to date, often within seconds. We have reports that a lot of the more difficult groups are terrified of them now, they stay well away from here. Which is presumably the point."

"Wow."

There was silence for a while as their food arrived and they began eating. Harrison chewed absent-mindedly, still thinking about everything he'd been hit with in the last couple of hours, trying to fit it into his world-view, which was having to be severely bent to make this work. After several minutes he put his fork down and stared out the window, making Deveraux look at him with some concern. Harada and Naito exchanged glances. "This is all insane," he muttered, swallowing his last bite. The others all looked at him, waiting for him to go on. After a long pause he did so. "How can you all be so blasé about it? Doesn't it bother you? School-girls with the power of a division of armour running around the place, with no controls on them? Why doesn't the whole world know about all this?" He looked like he was staring down the barrel of a gun. He felt that staring down the barrel of a gun would be an improvement, it was at least something familiar and understandable. The two Japanese men exchanged glances again, then Naito spoke.

"You get used to it." At the expression on the face of the American, he raised a hand. "No, I'm not being flippant. You do get used to it. We've been getting used to it for several decades now, one way or another. The last twenty years or so, things changed, got more intense, and I don't know why. I don't think anyone does. These girls, and I'd love to know why, at least here, it's always girls, despite everything are more of a solution than a problem. Yes, in a rational world, they probably wouldn't exist, neither would the demons, magic, all that sort of thing, but we don't live in a rational world. All of that provably exists. As long as the threat exists, it's good that we have an effective defence. From what I've been told over the years, this sort of thing has been going on all over the world for a very long time indeed, but for some reason, here and now, it's much more visible." Harrison didn't look much happier.

"Why the whole world doesn't know about it I have no idea. To be fair, it's not that the world doesn't know, we haven't gone to any great effort to keep it secret, it's more like the world doesn't notice, or perhaps care. My own theory is that it's all tied up with the magic in general. Unless you're personally involved in it somehow, even in as simple a way as living next to it, you basically don't notice. Whether that's true I don't know, but it makes a weird sort of sense. Like I said earlier, it seems to mainly be North Americans, and people from the US specifically, that have so much trouble accepting it. A lot of the world has similar things going on although in different ways. We do seem to be the leaders in this sort of odd occurrence here in Minato, though." He shrugged. "I don't have any real answers for you. All I can advise is that you accept it's real, learn to live with it, and move on. It doesn't fundamentally change the job we all have. Just think of Yori, Chou, and all the other magical girls as people who do much the same job you do, keep order in the face of an insane world, but have rather different methods and skills."

"But they don't have the training, the authority, anything!" Lieutenant Harrison had his head in his hands looking very depressed and almost angry. Harada smiled a little.

"I think you're wrong. Yori and Chou, at least, have more training under their belts than entire combat squads. Unconventional training to be sure, but effective and I have no doubt the result of an extraordinary amount of work and practice. Many years of it. The magic, where that comes from I have no idea, but even there I would think it's also the result of a vast amount of training. As far as the authority goes, they have that as well. Unofficially they're given a lot of leeway, but to their credit don't take unfair advantage of it. When police involvement is required or possible we get notified and take over. When they deal with something themselves, either they didn't need us, or we couldn't have done anything anyway. The community supports them, the government supports them although very quietly, and to date none of the magical girls have let us down. The only downside, the collateral damage, seems to be resolving itself as a direct result of our two young friends."

Naito grinned. "You have SWAT in LA? Special weapons and tactics. From what I can remember, the LAPD practically invented it. If it helps, think of our special talent as something like that." Deveraux laughed delightedly.

"SMAT? Special magic and talismans?" Sergeant Harada looked very amused.

"Perhaps MGAW? Magical girls and weapons?" The two of them spent the next few minutes coming up with increasingly unlikely acronyms for magical girl support teams, while Harrison watched and listened with irritated disbelief. Eventually he picked up his fork and resumed eating.

"You're all crazy," he growled, prompting Agent Naito to smile again.

"Probably. But it comes with the job. At least it's not as bad as Nerima." Deveraux looked at him curiously.

"What's Nerima?" Harada took a drink of coffee then signalled to the waitress for a refill.

"It's another ward of Tokyo, perhaps thirty kilometres to the north-west. They don't get demon attacks, as far as I know, but they have a bad infestation of martial artists. It's kind of a tradition there. They're even worse than the magical girls, some of them are nearly as powerful from what I've heard, but even less predictable. They seem to spend most of their time beating each other up, which is very hard on the scenery. I've heard things about that place that make me glad to be living here in Minato where life is fairly normal." Both overseas police stared at him as if he was mad.

"Martial artists?" Harrison echoed. "Like Karate, Judo, that sort of thing?" Harada nodded.

"More or less. But in a lot of cases taken to ridiculous extremes. A lot less magic, although I believe they're not unfamiliar with it, but the abilities of some of that group rival some of our girls. I've heard things about a few of them that might even exceed them. There was one martial artist, who vanished some years ago, that had some incredible stories... surrounding..." He trailed off, looking puzzled, with a growing expression of deep thought. The others looked at him for a moment, but when he didn't resume talking, turned to Naito questioningly. The agent shrugged. He had no idea what Harada was thinking about.

"He's right, though. The file on Nerima is even larger than on Minato, and that file is huge. It's a very weird place. The damage isn't on the same scale, on a per-incident basis at least, but there were a hell of a lot of incidents. It's calmed down quite a bit in the last few years for some reason, but it's still very strange."

"Japan is nuts," Harrison said morosely. Naito smiled, unoffended.

"So I'm told."

When the meal was finished they ordered desserts, Harada rousing himself from his introspection long enough to make a quick selection from the menu before resuming silent thought. Eventually he shook his head a little, muttered something to himself that none of them could make out, and rejoined the world at large. "So, what are you plans for the rest of the day? Until Yori and Chou get back to us there isn't a lot we can do on your case." Deveraux finished her third cup of coffee and put the empty cup back down with a clunk.

"I haven't got anything particular planned. Richard?" Harrison shook his head, still trying to get to grips with the curve balls life seemed to be throwing him at the moment. His Canadian colleague shot him a sympathetic glance, then looked back to Sergeant Harada. "What would you suggest?"

"Well, you could do the usual tourist things, see the sights, all that sort of thing, or I could show you around the district. As long as I'm assigned to this case I'm off duty as far as normal work is concerned, and it's probably better to be out walking around that sitting back at the station. It's a nice day, after all." The two visitors glanced at each other then nodded.

"That's fine as far as I'm concerned. Lead on, Sergeant." She smiled at him. Waving the waitress over, Agent Naito settled the bill, then stood.
"I have to get back and report. I'll be around when our magical friends call. You have my cell number if you need me before them. Enjoy your stay, and please stay out of the way if a demon attacks." He grinned at their expressions then left, whistling to himself, apparently in quite a good mood.

"Demons. Magical girls. This place is insane." Harrison grumbled to himself as they left the restaurant. Deveraux sighed a little.

"So you keep saying, but it won't change the facts. Just go with the flow, Richard, you'll probably be a lot happier." He didn't look convinced but shrugged.

The sergeant spent the next couple of hours showing his guests around the district, including the university, the main shopping area, and the entertainment zones and parks. They ended up in one large park, next to a perfectly circular pond with a number of ducks happily swimming around in it. Sitting on a bench overlooking it Harada waved at the pond. "There you are." The other two looked puzzled for a moment, before Harrison's eyes widened.

"Holy crap. You don't mean..." Harada nodded with a smile crossing his face.

"Yes. The duck pond option, courtesy of Yori." Deveraux walked closer to the edge and looked at the inner surface of the depression in the ground. It was seamless glass like obsidian. Kneeling down and running a fingertip over it, she looked impressed.

"That's remarkable. The amount of heat it would take to fuse the soil like this is... unbelievable." Standing she rejoined her colleagues. "And one smallish woman did this all by herself?" Harada leaned back comfortably on the bench.

"Oh, yes. With no real effort from what I could see. I strongly suspect she could do a much bigger one if necessary. Hopefully, it never will be."

"Christ," Harrison muttered, staring at the pond filling the crater. Harada grinned at him.

"It is fairly impressive. She was very apologetic about the damage to the park, but the park authorities were pretty relaxed about it. Apparently they were thinking about making another pond anyway and this was easy to convert. It certainly doesn't leak, the slag lining is about ten centimetres thick." He laughed. "It would have cost a fortune to make something like this deliberately. They grumbled a bit about it being in the wrong place, but I think they were secretly quite pleased that they'd saved hundreds of thousands of yen. The thing was full of water with benches around it almost before it had time to cool down."

"That's a very pragmatic attitude," Deveraux commented with amusement. Harada nodded.

"We tend to be around here. Goes with the territory." After a while Harrison stopped staring at the hole, shook his head in worried wonder, then looked towards a small crowd near the middle of the park from which music could be heard coming.

"What's going on over there?" he asked curiously. Harada looked in that direction as well, then shrugged.

"I'm not sure. We have a number of bands and individuals who perform in the park on an impromptu basis, I'd guess that's where the music is coming from. Let's go and have a look." The three law enforcement officers made their way over to the crowd to find a small group of musicians of the electronic persuasion playing a number of fast, high energy techno sets with a couple of synthesisers, some guitars, and an electronic drum machine. A fair number of younger people were dancing to the music and there was an overall air of conviviality that was quite refreshing. Several enterprising food vendors had parked their carts around the crowd and were doing a brisk business in food and water. The late afternoon sun was brightly lighting the scene, which was one of people making the most out of one of the last nice days before it started to get cold.

Even though the music as decidedly modern and very fast, there were quite a lot of older people who seemed to be thoroughly enjoying it. A few of them greeted Sergeant Harada as he and the two visitors joined the crowd. Exchanging greetings with them he smiled happily. "This is what I like about living and working here, in this district, you see," he explained. "People are generally friendly and open, much more so than in some places. It's an affluent area, but not snobbish like some places of this nature can be. Even the university students are surprisingly well behaved for the most part, although they can certainly enjoy themselves." He looked around the scene with a contented expression. "I put quite a lot of that down to a positive influence from two specific young women. Just by fixing a number of small things, the knock on effects are impressive. And of course, every now and then, they deal with something very big."

"Thank you, Sergeant, that's very nice of you, but I don't think we can take that much credit for it," said an amused voice from immediately behind him. He jumped a little, turning his head to see Chou smiling at him serenely. He grinned back while Harrison and Deveraux stared slightly, they'd had no warning at all the woman was approaching.

"Hello, Chou. Where's Yori?" The blonde women nodded towards the edge of the park.

"She's coming in a moment, she was checking up on something we detected earlier. We've contacted most of the people we needed to, there are still a few that we have to track down. So far no luck but we're expecting several responses over the next few hours to a day." Looking at the two foreigners, she asked, "Have you had a nice time so far?" Deveraux smiled back.

"Yes, thank you. This is a very interesting place, there seems to be quite a lot going on." Chou looked pleased.

"There often is. It starts to quieten down at this time of year, it's beginning to get a bit cold for playing in the park, for example, but it can get very exuberant during the summer. We had a particularly nice one this year." Turning to look at the musicians she listened for a moment. "This group is very good. I rather like the electronic music genre, although not everyone does. They're very talented, they can play classical music as well as this fast dance stuff extremely well." Harrison studied her for a moment.

"Do you live in this area, Miss Chou?" She smiled.

"Just Chou. And yes, Yori and I are both residents of the district. You'll understand if I don't say anything more about it." He nodded thoughtfully.

"Secret identities, I suppose?" She grinned.

"Something like that." He shook his head in a certain amount of wonder.

"I still can't believe I'm somewhere where there are honest-to-god superheroes." Chou laughed.

"Oh, it's not like that, not really. We just happen to have some specific skills and abilities that are a good match for the slightly odd problems that Minato suffers from. We do what we can to help." The Lieutenant inspected her some more, then nodded.

"OK. We may have slightly different definitions at work, but I can accept that." She grinned at him.

"It's a lot to take in if you haven't come across it before, I do understand that. Even people from outside this ward tend to look askance at it and they come from the same culture. I'm not surprised you're having difficulty, but you'll get used to it." The woman glanced off to the side. "Ah, Yori is here." They all looked in time to see the smaller young woman with the long braided hair take a huge running jump off the roof of the nearest building, some four stories high, clearing an impossible twenty metres horizontally to land neatly in the middle of the open space that suddenly developed in the crowd as many of the bystanders also noticed her approach. Deveraux and Harrison gaped at the incredible leap as Chou giggled. "She likes to make an entrance when she's in a good mood. Even more so when she isn't."

The young woman approached them through the crowd, smiling and greeting at least as many of them as the sergeant had. The expressions of the bystanders showed considerable affection for the remarkable person walking through them, without the kind of awe that the two North Americans would somehow have expected. It was more a sort of easy and respectful familiarity than anything else. Deveraux found it very interesting. Yori stopped close to them and grinned. "Hi, guys. How's your afternoon been so far?"

Deveraux and Harrison listened with interest. Yori shook her head, looking momentarily slightly disappointed. "A portal opened up very near here so I checked it out just in case. It was only some friends of ours on a shopping trip again." She glanced at Chou with a wry smile. "Uthryyl is going to clean the wholesalers out at this rate." Chou laughed. The other three looked puzzled, which the black-haired woman noticed. "Uthryyl is a trader from one of the more interesting demon worlds, who has a nice little business going importing chocolate and coffee, amongst other things, to his home. He and his crew turn up a few times a year and buy up tons of the stuff, then ship it back. He must be raking it in, this is about the fourth time in the last eight months." Deveraux and Harrison exchanged wide-eyed glances.

"Are you telling me that there are some demons who are walking into shops and buying chocolate?" Harrison asked incredulously. Yori nodded, grinning. "Yep."

"What the hell do they pay with?" he demanded, looking stunned.

"Mostly gold and silver ingots. Almost pure. They have an arrangement with several local wholesalers who are more than happy to sell them anything they want." Yori seemed very amused by the expressions he and Deveraux were wearing.

"Do these traders know who they're dealing with?" Chou smiled.

"Oh, yes, definitely. They don't mind. A customer is a customer, even if they do have tails." Deveraux shook her head slowly while Harrison closed his eyes for a moment.

"This is a very strange place," he mumbled. Yori chuckled.
"Oh, it is that, but it's a lot of fun most of the time." Growing more serious, she added, "I told him about our little problem as well. He doesn't know anything but he's going to check around. That deals with pretty much every avenue I can think of to find our targets, now we just have to wait for everyone to get back to us."

"Can this... well, 'demon', I suppose, can he be trusted?" Harrison asked. Yori nodded with a sparkle in her eyes.

"Certainly. He may look different but he's a decent person. I trust him a lot, I've know him for quite some time." A voice calling her name attracted her attention and she turned. A small group of young men and women were approaching, apparently students from the university.

"Um, Yori? Hi?" one of the young women hesitantly said. At the black-haired woman's nod she looked slightly braver. "Um, we were wondering, um, if you and Chou could do a demonstration for us? Please?" Her voice wavered a little and she glanced at her companions, who urged her on. Yori shot Chou a look, the blonde woman nodding slightly with a small smile. Harrison looked at Deveraux for a moment, not knowing what the woman had said as she'd spoken in Japanese.

"Of course. We'd be happy to." Turning to the three police officers she smiled. "This happens every now and then. It's good practice." Both martial artist magical girls followed the group of students to a position a few metres closer to the band, who noticed and nudged each other. Sergeant Harada grinned at his overseas colleagues.

"This should be good. Watch carefully, you won't see anything like this anywhere else I suspect." Harrison and Deveraux exchanged looks, wondering what was going to happen. The crowd was whispering to itself, people pulling out cameras and camcorders, moving back and creating a circle some twenty-five metres across with Yori and Chou in the middle and the band at one side. Harada and the others were almost directly opposite. Stepping back a couple of metres from each other, Yori and Chou locked eyes, bowing formally to each other without shifting their gazes. The band kept playing but their sound engineer slowly lowered the volume to a nice background level. Returning to an upright position, a brief grin flickered across Yori's face to be met with an answering smile from Chou.

There was a pregnant pause during which only the music could be heard, the crowd having gone completely silent, before Yori made the first move. Too quickly to be seen as anything other than a blur her right foot suddenly moved from the ground to a position a centimetre from her partners shoulder, where it stopped dead. Maintaining this unlikely stance for a second, Yori then returned the foot to the ground as quickly. Chou hadn't so much as blinked. Harrison sucked in his breath, the speed of the move was unbelievable. "Holy shit..." he muttered quietly.

A slight pause, then Chou responded, stepping forward gracefully with her left hand shooting forward to just touch Yori's forehead, again so fast that it basically disappeared from her side and reappeared, completely still, in it's end position. Once more there was a slight pause before she reset to her start position. Both women smiled very slightly at each other. "And we begin..." Yori said, with a quick glance directly at Harrison and Deveraux, who took a few seconds to note that she'd spoken English presumably for their benefit.

Then they began.

"Oh, holy mother of..." Harrison stared in complete disbelief. Deveraux couldn't even manage that much. Both women were suddenly trading blows so fast they could barely be seen, blocking with loud cracks of flesh against flesh, jumping, rolling, flipping over each other in a way that was completely implausible. It looked like some particularly good movie special effect fighting sped up by several times, except it was really happening. The sheer speed was breathtaking, while the appalling power behind the blows became apparent when Chou buried her fist to the elbow into the hard packed ground when one punch was deflected, with a sound like a hammer hitting a steak, then pulled it out again effortlessly in a shower of earth. Deveraux watched open-mouthed, glancing at her colleague to see he was doing the same.

Yori performed a standing backflip that took her over three metres straight up to land lightly on one foot on her partners head, who looked around quizzically as if wondering where she'd gone. The crowd, which had been watching engrossed, laughed delightedly. Rolling her eyes upwards Chou mock-sighed, then shot sideways a couple of paces fast enough that the other woman hung in the air for a fraction of a second before dropping to the ground. Landing lightly she smiled at the blonde, before bowing slightly. Harrison and Deveraux noticed with wonder that neither of them seemed to even be breathing hard. Again they began exchanging blows, this time with an obviously completely different style although at least as fast as before.

Once more they broke apart, grinning at each other, before taking up a pose like a pair of fencers, only without any foils. Deveraux gasped out loud when they were suddenly holding what looked for all the world like a pair of light sabres straight from the movies, about a metre long and glowing brightly, Yori's a pretty purple colour and Chou's a beautiful golden-white shade. The crowd clapped happily. The young woman whose request had prompted the bout stepped forward holding a piece of branch she had picked off the ground, looking at Yori questioningly. The martial artist nodded with a smile, and the student tossed the metre long five centimetre thick branch directly at her. Waiting until it was almost close enough to touch, the black-haired woman became a blur of movement and flashing purple arcs as her energy sword flashed into action with a throbbing hum, only to stop less than half a second later in a completely still pose with the glowing blade held upright in front of her. The branch continued it's flight past her apparently unaffected, until it hit the ground and burst into dozens of neatly cut slices, each apparently identical in thickness to the others, all of them smoking slightly. Once more the crowd applauded.

Harrison looked at Deveraux who stared back, unable to think of anything to say. They looked back as the two combatants resumed their fencing stance, then began sparring with the energy blades. Once more it was like a particularly good scene from a movie, only this time a science fiction one, as the blades roared past each other, clashing together with showers of light and a screeching sound. The crowd watched in awe as the pair fought, beginning to leap and roll as well. Within seconds they were jumping around as fast as before, slashing at each other from unlikely positions, including while one of them was flipping through the air above the other. When, halfway through the match, they each produced a second energy blade in their free hand and began using them as well, the crowd roared approval, really getting into the spirit of it. Harrison was mumbling to himself while Deveraux half-listened, her eyes fixed on the impossible sight in front of her.

After a few minutes, both the magical girls slowed then halted, once more back in their start positions. Both the energy blades disappeared. They bowed slightly to each other, then paused, before Chou grinned and bent down to pick up a number of the segments of sliced branch, each roughly three centimetres long. Yori nodded, then the blonde turned slightly to face into the park, away from the buildings. Leaning back a little Chou bounced one of the slices in her right hand for a moment, gauging it's weight, before throwing it straight up at a speed that made Deveraux blink. She almost expected to hear a sonic boom. The bit of wood travelled less than fifty metres before Yori had whipped her hand out, targeted it, and fired some sort of energy beam from her palm that intercepted the projectile with perfect accuracy. It disappeared with a flash of purple light and a sharp crack. Once more the crowd clapped, while the two visiting police officers stared. Chou threw another piece of wood and the same thing happened. Yori grinned and motioned with her other hand. The blonde laughed a little then blurred into action throwing the remainder of her ammunition so fast that no one else could see the individual motions. Yori waited for half a second... or so until all the pieces were on their way before going into action herself, firing off a number of beams so quickly it looked like they were simultaneous, each one intercepting a piece of branch before any of them had travelled more than a hundred metres. Several reports sounded so close together that there was just a ripple of sound. Chou laughed again.

"You missed one," she said, loud enough for everyone to hear her. Yori shook her head with a smile.

"No, I let it get away. It should be on it's way back down around... now, and it will be... right... there!" She raised her hand over her shoulder and fired a final beam without looking, scoring a direct hit on the piece of wood which was dropping out of the sky a few metres above her head. Chou bowed mockingly.

"Well done." Yori returned the bow.

"Thank you." The crowd laughed, amused and impressed. Even Deveraux giggled, although it was more in shock than anything else.

The two women stepped forward and shook hands, smiling, then stepped back. This time they began slowly, not touching each other, running through a stylised set of moves which both visitors recognised as a training exercise or kata. Mirroring each other the two women flowed from position to position with incredible grace and precision, speeding up until they were moving faster than most people could manage for more than a few seconds, with no sign of effort. Both were smiling, obviously enjoying themselves. The crowd watched silently, almost everyone lost in the beauty and grace of the motion. After half a minutes or so the band, which had been playing quietly the whole time, stopped and huddled together, talking quickly until they reached a consensus. Moving back to their instruments they began another set, a fast electronic dance tune that matched the movements of the two martial artists remarkably well. The sound man turned the volume up, making Yori quickly glance at him for a moment, then nod with an approving smile. Looking back to her partner, they exchanged glances and understanding, before subtly altering the pace of their movements to sync with the music.

The kata flowed into a different style, speeding up slightly. The band increased their tempo a little to match. Yori and Chou both grinned to each other, changing styles and speeds again. Yet again, the musicians adapted to keep the beat in sync, all of them grinning as well. The crowd watched, fascinated, while the martial arts demo got set to music. After a few more changes of style and tempo Yori nodded slightly and everyone stared as the two martial artists' hands began to glow in their signature colours, trails of diffuse light following their movements, slowly fading. The crowd clapped wildly, several younger people beginning to dance around the area in the middle where the magical girls were practising their Art.

The dance music changed suddenly to a much quicker beat, becoming harder and much more electronic in nature. Yori laughed out loud, both of them flowing into a completely different style without missing a beat. The trails of light from their fingertips formed spirals around them as they moved in sync, truly dancing now as much as practising. Chou actually had her eyes closed, Deveraux noticed, a beautiful contented smile on her face. Yori looked at her in a way that left no doubt just how she felt about the other woman, unconcerned who saw it.

The impromptu martial arts dance sequence lasted for nearly fifteen minutes, speeding up and slowing down, going through so many different styles of martial arts that everyone lost count. When they wound down the band slowed, the volume dropping, until they came to a halt, completely still and facing each other. After a pause in complete silence they bowed to each other, then turned to each face in different directions, bowing to the crowd. There was a moment's more silence, then tumultuous applause. Startled at the sheer noise Deveraux and Harrison both looked around to see that the circle of people had swollen in size by several times, there must have been over a thousand people standing there by now. Grinning happily Yori and Chou glanced at each other then slowly returned to the three police officers, being stopped and thanked by person after person.

When they finally reached the others Deveraux raised an eyebrow when she noticed that they still looked completely unaffected by the enormous exertion of the last half hour or more, neither sweating nor breathing hard. 'Their stamina must be absolutely inhuman,' she thought. Out loud she said, "That was the most incredible thing I've ever seen." Harada, slightly behind her, laughed. "I told you."

"That you did, Sergeant." Yori grinned. "Glad you enjoyed it. It was a lot of fun. We didn't expect that last part with the music, but it worked really well. We'll have to try it again some time." Chou smiled. "We don't often show off like that, but every now and then people ask, and it only seems polite to agree. It's fun, as Yori says, and good practice as well. We'd be doing it anyway in private. This way people get some enjoyment as well, which is nice."

"Good public relations as well, I would imagine," commented Harrison absently, staring at the pair of them as if he was having trouble believing what he was seeing. Glancing sharply at him Yori nodded after a moment. "I suppose so, Lieutenant, although I wouldn't put it like that. We don't need, I hope, demonstrations like that to have good relations with the community. That was just because someone asked politely." Looking at her he nodded, understanding what she meant. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to insult you or Chou." The martial artist grinned again. "Don't worry, you didn't, we take a lot of insulting. I know what you meant, trust me. Anyway, I hope you enjoyed it. We certainly did." She glanced at her companion for a moment. "We need to be going now, lots to do. We'll be in touch soon, hopefully. Have fun exploring until then." She glanced at her companion for a moment. "We need to be going now, lots to do. We'll be in touch soon, hopefully. Have fun exploring until then." She waved to them, nodded politely to Harada who smiled back, then ran off, leaping back onto the building she'd descended from in the first place. Chou smiled briefly at them all then followed her. The three officers watched them disappear over the rooftops before Deveraux broke the silence.

"Good grief." Harada nodded. "I know what you mean. It affected me that way the first time I saw them, and they've only become better since then. They were pretty incredible to start with." Harrison was still staring after the two women. Deveraux nudged him. "You in there, Richard?" Shaking his head slightly, he turned to look at her. "I'm really not sure any more. Did the last forty minutes actually happen?" She nodded with a slight smile. He shrugged. "Well, I guess I'm really here. I was beginning to wonder." Casting a glance at Harada who was watching him with interest he sighed. "And that's the sort of people you have around these parts?" Sergeant Harada nodded again, grinning. "Pretty much. Like I said, those two are impressive even by magical girl standards, but yes, basically that's the sort of thing that goes on a lot in Minato. Not always just for public entertainment, although they do that extremely well." He laughed. "Even the demon attacks get rated around here. People take bets on them, how long they'll last, how the demon will get dealt with, which other magical girls will get involved, how they'll get dealt with, and so on. It's kind of a spectator sport." Shaking his head slowly Harrison glanced one last time in the direction the two women had disappeared in before looking back to the Japanese officer.

"Have I said that Japan is nuts?"

"Repeatedly."

"Good. Just checking."

They exchanged a look, then smiled a little. Deveraux watched with a feeling of mild disbelief herself, the demonstration by the two women had been so far beyond anything she could have expected, even with the knowledge of what they were, that she was still stunned. "How much of that do you think was for our benefit," she asked slowly as a thought struck her. Harada glanced at her and shrugged.

"I'm not sure, but I suspect some of it was aimed at you, certainly. I think she wanted you to understand what they were capable of, and short of a demon attack which no one wants, this was the best way." He paused for a moment, thinking, then added, "One thing you should realise, though, is that what you saw is only part of it. I know for a fact that they can both move a lot faster than that if they want for example, they never show off more than the necessary amount of power. It's a sound tactical move, not to let a potential enemy know everything about yourself." Deveraux and Harrison both nodded in understanding. As the crowd dispersed, the band going back to a dance track and more students turning up while the older people wandered off, the three resumed slowly strolling across the park. The sky was beginning to darken as early evening came closer.

"I'm still having trouble with the concept of demons, especially ones that wander around buying chocolate and coffee, for heaven's sake." Harrison shook his head in disbelief. Sergeant Harada smiled at this.

"I can understand that. It was a surprise to me as well when Yori mentioned it the first time. I haven't met this Uthryyl, but I have met a few other 'visitors' she's introduced me to over the years. Unusual people to be sure, but generally polite and easy to deal with." He laughed. "Once you get past the odd appearance of some of them they're just people." Harrison seemed slightly unsure, Deveraux noticed, but said nothing.

Eventually they went back to the police station. "You two may as well go back to your hotels, I suppose," Harada said. "I have your cell numbers and I'll call you and Agent Naito immediately if Yori contacts me." Deveraux nodded, but said nothing.

Harrison asked, "What are you going to do now, Sergeant?"

"I should check in with the Captain, then I need to get home to my wife. Unless anything turns up I'll see you in the morning, Lieutenant, Inspector." He shook hands with both of them. "Oh, if you want to go out tonight, Roppongi is a short ride on the Metro from here. There are all sorts of entertainment possibilities there and some decent restaurants as well." He took a sheet of paper off a nearby desk and quickly wrote down some names, in both Kanji and English. "Here. These places are pretty good, these two are nightclubs and the rest are restaurants, except for this one which is a bar."

"Thanks, Sergeant." Deveraux accepted the paper, glancing at it before folding it and placing in into her pocket. "See you tomorrow." They left, while he headed for the Captain's office.
"Ah, Sergeant. How did it go today?" Captain Uehara looked up as he knocked on her open door. Entering the office he stood in front of the desk while she leaned back in her chair and watched him.

"Well, I think. Their introduction to our special talent was quite amusing, but Inspector Deveraux at least seemed to take it more or less in stride. I'm not so sure about Lieutenant Harrison, he seems to have more difficulty accepting it. Americans can be quite rigid in their denial of magic, in my experience." She nodded, understanding.

"Yes, I can imagine. You have quite a lot of experience with them, I understand."

"Oh, yes," he replied, smiling slightly. "My time in the US was a lot of fun and very educational, but I learned very early on to keep quiet about some of the more unusual aspects of life here. By and large they're very nice people, but some of their attitudes to life are... interesting, I suppose you could say. For a country with such a multicultural background it's odd that they seem to know so little about much of the rest of the world." He shrugged. "Not my place to criticise, I guess. Anyway, I think the Lieutenant will come around. Yori and Chou put on a demo in the park at the request of some university students, which was as spectacular as ever. Good timing as well. It drove home some of what they're going to have to accept." The captain smiled.

"I wish I'd seen it. I've heard some impressive things about their public demonstrations."

"The stories probably don't do it justice. Those two have a real flair for entertainment, as well as all the fighting." Harada laughed. "They could make an absolute fortune on TV or in the movies."

"I can well imagine. Good work, Sergeant. Keep me updated, please." He nodded at the implied dismissal, saluted, and left. The captain went back to her paperwork, a slight smile still on her lips.

Late that night Harrison was sitting in a bar just off the main entertainment district in Roppongi, near a restaurant that was on the list Sergeant Harada had given them. Idly stirring his half-drunk rum and coke with a straw he'd pulled from a dispenser of them on the counter he looked around, while Deveraux got the next round in. When she came back carrying two glasses he nodded his appreciation. "Thanks."

Sitting down next to him she glanced at his face. "You still look worried, Richard." He shrugged slightly, slowly stirring his drink.

"I guess I am. This whole experience is surreal. The case has been weird from the beginning, but I was always able to pass off the stranger aspects, at least to myself, as simply some sort of technology or trick I wasn't aware of. But now..." Trailing off he sighed, sticking the wet end of the straw in his mouth and licking the coke and alcohol from it before dropping it back in his glass. "I don't know. It's all a bit much, you know?" He looked a little lost. Laura Deveraux put her hand on his for a moment, then sipped her own gin and tonic.

"I know. I also know how much you've been resisting the possibility of magic. I've been open to it from much earlier on, but even so, having it rubbed in your face like that, like it's just a normal everyday part of life, is pretty weird." Waving a hand at the mass of people noisily enjoying themselves in the bar, she added, "I don't know how many of them know about all this, I'd assume quite a lot if not all, but no-one seems too upset. It's like Agent Naito said, you get used to it."

Slowly nodding, still concentrating on his drink, Harrison eventually replied, "I suppose. Doesn't make it any easier when you're dropped right in it." One corner of his mouth went up a little. "I was expecting a certain amount of culture shock, but..." She laughed gently.
"I know, Richard, I know."

They were silent for a while, drinking slowly and watching the night life of Roppongi go past. The crowd was a mix of obvious tourists, from many countries, locals, and Japanese people from other parts of the country. Various languages could be heard all around if you listened closely, English, German, Dutch, and many others standing out. Pretty much every person present seemed to be having a good time, some of them very loudly. The two of them had walked through an area close by which was an obvious red light district, and even there people seemed polite and pleasant. Deveraux turned to her colleague. "I wonder if the reason there seems to be so little trouble is due to the Japanese culture, or the magical girls?" He looked interested.

"I don't know. It's certainly less dangerous-feeling than an equivalent area back home, but at least as chaotic. If I visit a place like this in LA I always feel I should have one hand on my weapon." She smirked, sipping her drink.

"I know what you mean. Most of the US makes me feel that way."

"Very funny. You Canadians and your lack of arms are weird as well." He smiled at her without animosity, as she snorted into her glass.

"Americans."

Settling into a companionable silence the pair of them nursed their drinks while busy with their own thoughts. A particularly beautiful young girl, perhaps mid twenties, sidled up to Harrison and made polite enquiries as to whether he would like to partake of her services, in which, she assured him, she was both extremely skilled and reasonably priced. Ignoring Deveraux, who was giggling quietly to herself at this point, he turned the girl down as gently as possible. Not at all disappointed, she bowed slightly to him, thanked him for his time, and left, targeting another obvious foreigner across the room. Watching her go he smiled a little. "Even the prostitutes are polite. This is a very strange place." His companion was still giggling. "Oh, grow up, Laura. How old are you?" She grinned at him.

"She was very pretty, and quite affordable." Laughing, he turned away from watching the girl, who seemed to have had more luck with her next potential customer.

"Yes to both, but I'm not interested." She teased him about it for some time, until she was approached in a similar manner by a very good looking young man, the male counterpart of the girl. Harrison snickered. Having some difficulty turning him down as he was somewhat more persistent Deveraux finally managed to push him off on to another woman at the next table, who seemed rather irritated about it. Looking at her friend she wryly smiled.

"OK, you can stop laughing now."

When they left the bar a while later, just after midnight, both were pleasantly tipsy although not really drunk. Looking at a map Deveraux had bought they decided to walk back to their hotel, it was only about five kilometres and they both felt the night air would clear their heads. About halfway they were passing through a less-travelled area that seemed to mainly be light commercial and industrial properties, when Harrison stopped. "Hey. What's that?" His companion also stopped, looking at him.

"What?"

"That sound. Can't you hear it? It sounds like a fight." She listened, and sure enough there were noises of several people making the sounds one, especially if one had a background in law enforcement, would think indicated some sort of physical altercation. Not much talking, although there were intermittent sounds of at least three people grunting and swearing, but quite a lot of meaty smacking noises and the occasional crunch. They exchanged glances, police instincts finally winning out over common sense.

"You realise we're in a foreign country and about as far out of our respective jurisdictions as we could possibly get," Deveraux said quietly, abruptly feeling completely sober as she watched Harrison pull out his weapon and check it before putting his hand in his pocket, still holding the gun. He nodded.

"I do, but that sounds nasty. I can't let it go, can you?" She paused for a moment, then sighing, did the same.

"No." Looking around they headed towards the alley the sounds seemed to be coming from. "We're going to get into trouble for this."

"Probably." They cautiously peered around the corner of the alley, allowing their eyes to adjust to the darker environment, seeing nothing but more clearly hearing the sounds. They were definitely coming from down there somewhere. The alley ran back alongside a large low warehouse for some fifty metres, going around a corner, presumably to the rear of the building. With a glance at his compatriot, Harrison took the lead, sidling carefully along the wall with Deveraux following him, glancing behind herself every now and then to make sure no-one snuck up on them. Once or twice she also looked upwards to check the roof-line. As they approached the end of the alley and the turn, the noises became louder and clearer. There were at least three female voices, and another one that intermittently sounded, much deeper and somehow worrying. Stopping a couple of metres from the corner Harrison looked back at Deveraux.

"Ready?" he whispered. She nodded silently, removing her weapon from concealment and holding it pointing up in both hands, according to the best practices of the RCMP. A flick of one finger released the safety. Nodding back at her he did the same, then slowly approached the corner, sticking his head just far enough past the corner for one eye to see what was going on. Deveraux watched his back stiffen slightly as he froze for several seconds, then as slowly retreated until he was back behind the protection of the wall again. "Fuck me," he said very very quietly, not really to her. She looked at his face in the dim lighting cast by the street lamp at the other end of the alley.

"What is it?" After a moment he looked at her, wide-eyed.

"I can't really do it justice. Have a look." Staring at him for a moment, she then slid past him and repeated the same exercise he'd just finished, with almost identical results. When she was back against the wall they looked at each other.

"Is that...?" she began.

"A demon? I think so."

"And those must be..."

"More magical girls, yes." She nodded absently, then slowly had another look.

There were three young women, somewhere around their late teens or so, surrounding a... thing. A fourth girl, dressed like the other three, in a remarkably immodest outfit that a professional stripper might be embarrassed to be seen in public wearing, was slumped apparently unconscious against the wall just around the corner, mere metres from them. There was a large dent in the brick wall which seemed to conform to the shape of her body unpleasantly well, implying that she'd hit it with enough force to pulp a normal human. The three other girls all bore evidence of having been in a serious fight, one of them limping a bit and all quite bloody. They were holding a series of weapons, ranging from some sort of sword to a pole-arm of a type neither officer was familiar with, all of which were glowing in various pastel hues.

Their opponent was very clearly not human in the slightest. The enormous fangs were proof enough of that, never mind the dark scabrous skin, a colour they couldn't make out under the bad lighting, covering it from head to foot. The three legs and the tentacles were just icing on the cake. The tentacles, which were a couple of metres long, were tipped in ten-centimetre talons which seemed to be wet, one with what was clearly blood, the others something much worse and probably toxic. It had started with at least six of them but two were now writhing on the ground near it, like damaged worms. As she watched, one of the girls made a feint at the thing with her sword, while the one with the pole-arm dived forward, rolling across the ground and coming up inside the creature's defences, lopping off another tentacle before being batted away like she weighed nothing as the thing let out a screeching roar then swore in a guttural language unlike anything the inspector had ever heard.

All three conscious girls looked exhausted, while the demon, although injured, seemed to have an unpleasant amount of life left in it. Pulling her head back around the corner before any of the combatants noticed her, Inspector Laura Deveraux, RCMP, said with feeling, "Fucking Christ on a crutch." Harrison nodded silently.

"What do we do?" she asked after a few seconds.

"I don't know." He looked speculatively at his firearm. She shook her head.

"Do you think that will do anything other than annoy it?" Harrison shrugged.

"I don't know. Perhaps we could distract it, get it's attention, and they could take it out?"

"While it reduces us to hamburger, pissed off about being shot at?" she asked furiously. Looking at her, he shrugged again.

"Possibly. But if we just leave them it might end badly, they look like they're not coming out on top."

Deveraux sighed. "Fuck."

"Yep."

"We can't just open fire on it, it might distract them as well, which could be even worse." They thought for a moment, then Deveraux risked another look. The sounds from the fight were getting louder, but the girls seemed to be having trouble. One of them pulled some sort of device from her belt and pointed it at the demon, letting off a bright ball of energy that smacked into it's torso with a sizzling noise. As it stiffened in pain the swords-woman shot forwards and hacked at it's middle leg, carving a chunk out of it before being forced to retreat as it recovered. "Damn. It's not going their way," she said, glancing behind her at her companion. A sudden thought struck her. Pulling her ID out of her pocket she opened it so the badge in it was visible, then cautiously stuck her head around the corner yet again. Waiting until one of the girls, the shortest one, happened to look in her direction, she waved quickly, then held up her ID as the young woman paused and stared. Holding up her handgun she flipped the ID shut, pointed to the gun then the demon. The girl shook her head, alternating keeping an eye on the thing and looking at her.
Deveraux mimed shooting a gun, pointed at the demon, then made a little twirling motion with her finger to indicate it turning around. Pointing at the three girls she then tapped herself on the back of the head, then once more pointed at the demon, desperately hoping that the woman understood. Apparently she did, because she looked interested, then thoughtful. Covertly waving back to the officer she made a clearly recognisable 'hold on' gesture, before jumping backwards out of range of one of the thing's remaining tentacles which took her momentary inattention as an open invitation. Rolling her eyes for a moment she slashed at it with one of her blades, she was holding something that looked like a pair of highly stylised hand scythes, a weapon that Deveraux vaguely recognised from martial arts films but couldn't put a name to. The tentacle pulled back quickly and the girl whispered something quickly to her colleague, the swords-woman.

The taller girl looked startled and shot a glance at Deveraux, her eyebrows going up. After a moment she nodded, moving to cover the short girl as she dashed over and talked to the one with the pole-arm. This girl also glanced in the direction of the officer, nodding after a moment. "What's going on?" Harrison asked in a hoarse whisper.

"I think I've got them understanding that we can cause a distraction. They seem to be setting up for it. Hang on." All three girls were slowly manoeuvring around in a semicircle to put the demon between them and the corner of the alley. "Yep, they're getting into position. Get ready, and for god's sake don't miss, they're right on the other side of it." Harrison nodded, checking his weapon again out of habit. "OK... now!" The short girl waved urgently to her, and she dropped to one knee, taking careful aim at the top of the thing's back which was clearly exposed ten metres away. Harrison dived around the corner and did the same next to her. Both officers fired several rapid shots, most of the rounds hitting the demon, which emitted a horrendous roar, staggered, then spun around far faster than they were expecting something with that many holes in it to move. "Shit." Deveraux emptied her weapon into the creature's chest. Harrison stood, took careful aim, suddenly icy calm, and shot it twice in the face.

Unfortunately this only seemed to make it absolutely furious, all it's remaining tentacles shooting towards them far too fast to avoid. Just as both officers thought they were for it, the thing suddenly froze. Opening the eye which had involuntarily squeezed itself shut as the tentacle on the left had approached her face, Deveraux scrambled backwards as it slowly toppled forwards, it's cleanly severed head bouncing off the tarmac a metre to the side. The tall brunette with the pole-arm looked tiredly satisfied as she lowered her weapon. "Oh, holy god that was close," Harrison mumbled, slumping against the wall of the alley. Deveraux stood carefully as she watched the three girls walk over to the corpse and have a discussion in Japanese, their tiredness coming through clearly despite the foreign language. Nodding, the short girl put her weapons away then pulled out some sort of artefact, which she pointed at the body. Concentrating on it the device began to give off a lambent blue glow, while the corpse slowly crumbled away into dust. Within thirty seconds nothing was left. Deveraux and Harrison stared in amazement.

Putting the short metallic rod away somewhere, the girl sighed. Glancing at the two officers she nodded thanks, before suddenly catching sight of her injured colleague, gasping as she saw how injured the girl was. Swearing in Japanese she ran over, quickly checking her, the other two following only slightly more slowly. The foreigners watched with concern as she checked the young woman's vitals, sighing in relief when she found the girl was alive. Squatting back on her heels she looked up at Deveraux and said something. "Sorry, I don't speak Japanese," the woman said.

"Oh, right, you're not local. American?" the girl asked, switching to good if accented English. Deveraux shook her head.

"No, Canadian. RCMP." She pulled out her ID again and showed it to the girl. "My friend here is American. We're here on a case, luckily we have permission to carry our service weapons." She looked at the gun still in her right hand, then groaned. "But I don't know how we're going to explain this. Captain Uehara made it very clear indeed that we were only to use them as an absolutely last resort action." The girl stood, holding out her hand. She shook it.

"Don't worry, I'll explain it to her. I know some of her men, and she's in the district a couple of my friends work in. I don't think there will be any trouble. Thanks, by the way, that was getting nasty. I'm Aiko. This is Tamiko and Misaki, and on the ground is Fumiko." Deveraux nodded.

"Your friends? Would that be Yori and Chou, by chance?" Aiko stared, then nodded herself.

"That's them. You know them?"

"We're actually working with them. It's a complicated story, a case from North America that ended up here with some magical help. Sergeant Harada introduced us." Aiko looked interested.

"Ah, the good sergeant. I like him a lot. Hmm, I'd like to hear more about that case at some point, but we have to get Fumiko some help. That damn thing was vicious, and it's two friends were worse."

"There are more of them?" Harrison asked, looking around with a worried expression. Tamiko snickered nastily.

"Not any more." Aiko looked at her friend, smiling a little, then produced a cell-phone. Hitting a speed-dial number she waited for it to be answered then spoke rapidly into it. Listening for a moment she nodded to herself, then replied at length, looking at Harrison and Deveraux while she did. The latter was sure she heard her and her friend's name come up. Nodding again the young woman listened for a moment, then hung up after a couple more words.

"OK, we're going to meet Yori and Chou at a safe-house. Would you like to come as well? Apparently it's quite close to your hotel." Glancing at Deveraux, Harrison smiled uncertainly.

"Well, it's kind of you to offer, but is your friend all right to be carried all that way? Perhaps we should call for an ambulance." Aiko laughed.

"Sorry, I forgot, you're not familiar with all this. Yori explained. No, we're going to teleport. I can manage all of us." Harrison stared at her with wide eyes.

"Teleport?"

"Oh, yes. It's the best way to travel." She grinned at him. Looking at Inspector Deveraux, he shrugged. She returned the shrug.

"Um, OK, I guess. Why not?" Aiko smiled.

"Great. One thing, the first time will probably make you really dizzy for a few seconds, so be ready for it. It's safe otherwise, though." Misaki knelt and carefully picked up the other young woman, who both visitors noticed bore a strong resemblance to the brunette. She noticed them noticing.

"She's my sister," the brunette girl said shortly. Deveraux nodded understanding.

"OK, stand here, please," Aiko said, indicating a spot in front of her. With a glance at his colleague Harrison followed the instructions, as did the other officer. Satisfied, Aiko checked her colleagues, then did something. The world flickered, and both police officers staggered.
"Oh, hell!" Deveraux moaned, stumbling. Someone steadied her, guiding her to a chair, which she dropped into with gratitude, leaning back and feeling the world spin around her for a short time. She could vaguely hear Harrison making noises that indicated he was trying not to vomit. When her equilibrium settled to the point she could open her eyes without feeling like she was going to puke, she cautiously looked around. Surprisingly the nausea had subsided nearly as rapidly as it had come on, leaving her slightly dizzy but no worse than a couple of drinks. Which, she suddenly remembered, she had had. 'Ah,' she thought to herself ruefully.

She and Harrison were in a biggish room, which had a window through which she could see a street a couple of floors below. In the distance she saw the lights of several large buildings. She was sitting in a chair with Harrison beside her in another one, still looking slightly pale. Aiko stood next to them, watching them carefully. "It hits almost everyone like that the first time, sometimes worse. Chou was puking for five minutes. Yori, of course, didn't even notice." She grinned. "Feel OK now?"

"More or less. That was a very strange experience." The petite brunette looked amused.

"You get used to it." Looking past her, Deveraux saw a fold-out sofa bed which had Fumiko lying on it, with Yori, Chou, and the remainder of Aiko's team standing around it. Chou was carefully going over the unconscious young woman, speaking quietly to Yori while the black-haired girl nodded. Pushing herself to her feet the inspector walked over, followed by Aiko.

"How is she?" she asked. Chou glanced up.

"Six broken ribs, two crushed vertebrae, ruptured spleen, punctures to her liver and one kidney, broken collarbone, and a broken ankle. Not to mention a slow-acting poison of some sort. Nothing too serious." Deveraux gaped at her, horrified.

"Nothing too serious! Are you mad? She'll be lucky to live, never mind ever walk again with injuries like that." Chou smiled gently.

"Don't worry, Inspector. We're quite good at this." She looked at her partner. "You want to do the organs while I do the bones?" Yori nodded. Kneeling down, one on each side of the injured girl, the pair stretched out their hands, placing them on specific parts of her body. Deveraux gasped in shock as a glow appeared between their hands and the girl's body. She twitched a little, Chou quickly placing one glowing hand on her forehead for a second. The young woman suddenly relaxed completely and the blonde nodded, satisfied, returning her hand to the operation in progress. Looking to the side as she felt someone come up beside her, Deveraux nodded to Harrison, then followed his amazed gaze back to the scene on the bed.

After a few seconds Chou looked pleased. "Good, the ribs are done. Misaki, can you hold her leg still, please? Aiko, hold her foot. Yes, like that. Right, don't move." Once more she touched the girl and the glow returned. Thirty seconds passed until she smiled. "Done. It will ache for a day or two, I think, but it's fixed." She turned her attention to the young woman's upper torso. This time the glow lasted nearly a minute. When she had finished Yori was still slowly moving her hands across Fumiko's lower torso, concentrating. "How's it going?"

"Her spleen was a mess, I practically had to rebuild it from scratch. I'm doing the liver now," the black-haired woman said absently. Harrison glanced at Deveraux, shock and awe in his eyes. She nodded a little knowing exactly what he was feeling. In many ways this was by far the most impressive and startling thing she'd seen in a day of incredibly startling and impressive things. Chou passed the time until Yori was finished by erasing a number of cuts and scrapes on Fumiko's chest and arms. Deveraux gaped as her glowing hand passed slowly along the bleeding skin, leaving no marks behind at all.
"Holy crap," she mumbled. Chou looked at her for a moment with a smile.

"I prefer this to killing things, I have to admit. It's more worthwhile, but sometimes we have to do things we don't like." The officer nodded slowly, understanding.

"Do you have medical training other than this... whatever the hell it is that you're doing?" Chou looked back to her work.

"Yes. Quite a lot of it. This would be much more difficult otherwise. You have to know how things are meant to work to be able to put them back together. That said, Yori invented this technique years ago before she learned medicine and did pretty well." Her partner shot her a quick smile. A few seconds later she sat back.

"Right. All done. Just the spinal stuff now. We need to roll her over, very carefully. Excuse me." She stood and politely elbowed the observing people out of the way, Chou matching her position on the other side of the bed. "OK. Careful." They slowly and gently rolled the girl over onto her stomach. Harrison looked away, nauseated. "Ick. That's pretty unpleasant." This was a mild description, the young woman's back looked like someone had tried to scrape it raw with a concrete block, which was more or less accurate. Bone showed through in a couple of places and there was a lot of raw flesh and blood. The two magical girls looked at each other, sighed simultaneously, and got to work.

Ten minutes later Deveraux was genuinely stunned. She had just seen injuries that by rights should have been rapidly fatal anywhere outside a major trauma centre, and probably permanently life-altering under even the best prognosis, healed to the point that there was no evidence of them at all. Fumiko was now lying on her back on a bed that had had it's bloody coverings replaced by Chou once they had finished, apparently sleeping comfortably, with no sign of what she'd gone through except for her rather tattered uniform. She stared for a while until Yori handed her a cup. Startled, she looked at it, then took it from the smiling young woman. "It can be a bit of a shock. For some reason, healing impresses people in a way that nothing else does." Sipping the steaming liquid, which turned out to be some sort of tea, Deveraux nodded slowly.

"That's got to be the most amazing thing I've ever seen. And you worked out how to do that yourself?" The girl nodded, looking slightly annoyed about something.

"I kind of had to. A very long story, one I don't like to think about. Anyway, between us Chou and I improved the technique, we're pretty good at it now. Unfortunately like a lot of our more unusual abilities teaching it to others seems very difficult, we do things in a very weird way according to other magic workers. It's a pity, I'd really like to see that method in wide use. We simply can't use it as much as we'd like. At least we can help the people who are most likely to require it."

"So, you're the medical go-to squad as well?" Harrison smiled at the girl, who raised an eyebrow then grinned back.

"Pretty much. Some of the magical girl teams have healing powers at least as good, although I don't think many if any of them have much real medical knowledge. But most don't. We made it clear to even the ones we have... issues... with, that if they had a medical emergency they should contact us. Many of them have at one point or another. As have a number of the local police, a few others we know well, and a fair number of our special visitors." She laughed. "We've even been for what I suppose you'd call a couple of house calls for some of those visitors." Harrison looked at her oddly but shrugged after a moment, sipping his own tea.

Fumiko made a mumbling noise and put her hand to her head, wincing. Everyone looked at her, Misaki rapidly moving to sit beside her, holding her other hand. The girl on the bed opened her... eyes and muttered something in Japanese, making her sister smile. After a moment her eyes fucussed and she looked around, staring briefly at the two people she didn't recognise with a furrowed brow, before looking at her sister. The two began talking quietly. Chou motioned them all to the other side of the room, where they sat.

"Let them have some time alone. Sisters need to talk after something like that." She looked momentarily sad, then smiled. "So, Lieutenant, Inspector, what did you think of your first run in with a demon?" Harrison stared at her.

"I think I'd like it to be my last run in with a demon, to be honest." Aiko and Yori burst out laughing while Tamiko giggled. Chou nodded understandingly.

"Yes, I can see why you'd think that."

"Thank you for helping, Lieutenant," Aiko said, grinning at him. "You too, Inspector. That was a brave thing to do under the circumstances. I wouldn't recommend shooting something like that normally, as you saw all it mostly does is make them really angry, but this time it was just what was called for." She laughed. "If you do want to shoot a demon you're going to need a much bigger gun. And, ideally, be a very long way away."

"Something like a six inch naval gun would probably be about right," Harrison said with considerable vigour. Yori produced an amused expression.

"For a little one like that, yes." Harrison stared at her, unsure whether she was joking. She was smiling but there was something in her eyes which made him shiver. Glancing at Deveraux he saw she was also worried. The martial artist turned to the leader of the other team. "Three of them? That's unusual, you normally only see one at a time of that lot. I wonder why three?" Aiko shrugged.

"No idea. It wasn't very communicative. I did ask, but you know that bunch, they tend to lie at the best of times." Everyone other than the two police officers nodded thoughtfully. "Then it tried to rip our heads off. We didn't spend much time chatting after that."

"Fair enough." Yori turned as Fumiko and Misaki stopped talking, the former slowly sitting up, then standing. "How do you feel?" she called across the room, still speaking English.

"Like I got thrown through a brick wall," Fumiko said, grimacing. Misaki looked darkly amused, while Tamiko snickered.

"You didn't go all the way through." Fumiko grunted.

"That fucking thing can't have been trying very hard then. Last time, I did."

"It was a very thick wall, to be fair," Aiko said with a smile. Fumiko shrugged, then winced, touching her collarbone gently.

"If I'd had time to get my shield up this wouldn't hurt so much." She seemed irritated, more with herself than anyone else. Yori smirked a little.

"I keep telling you guys you need more combat practice." Tamiko shot her a glance.

"Yes, and then you beat the crap out of us worse than that thing did. You've broken my arm three times this year so far." The black haired girl leaned back comfortably in her chair.

"Ah, I love my work, sometimes." She grinned. Chou sighed gently, casting a fond yet mildly disapproving glance at her partner.

Harrison and Deveraux listened to the banter with a weird feeling. There was an underlying seriousness to it which belied the levity of the words. Everyone was clearly aware that it could have been much worse. It reminded them both very strongly of the sort of gallows humour that law enforcement officers the world over tended to, making them realise that these young women were very like them in many ways. If nothing else they could respect some fellow professionals, even if the profession was one they still had difficulty believing existed.

Deveraux was looking at the four girls, then away, frowning slightly to herself. Yori noticed, smiling slightly. "It's a protection spell," she said. The woman looked at her.

"Pardon?"

"You just noticed that when you aren't looking at them you can't remember details of what they look like, right?" Harrison raised his eyebrows as Deveraux nodded with an odd expression.

"Yes. It's very strange. I can remember their names, but draw a complete blank on their faces and general appearance. But when I look back at them everything comes back." Aiko looked amused, as did the other three.

"Like I said, it's a spell, for identity protection. It makes it basically impossible to identify them when they're in, well, street clothes. Not these," she gestured at the skimpy uniforms the girls were wearing, "pervert's dream clothes." Tamiko looked down at herself, then grinned. The other three looked somewhat embarrassed. Deveraux and Harrison looked at each other, eyebrows up. "That's pretty impressive. How on earth does something like that work?" Harrison started experimenting, not having noticed up until now. Yori sighed a little.

"It's kind of complicated to explain, even if you had a background in magic. I've heard it called a perceptual filter which is a reasonable description even if a bit simplistic. But that glosses over a very complex spell." Deveraux nodded.

"OK. I guess it's not something I'd understand anyway." She thought for a moment, then mused, "I wonder why I didn't notice until now?"

"It breaks down a little during very intense emotions. Still works, just slows down the forgetting bit by a few seconds," Aiko explained. "So, since you kept looking back at us, essentially it was being reset before it fully worked. Now that everyone is safe it's working to design. I don't know whether that part of it is deliberate or not."

"Magic is very strange," Harrison commented. Everyone else nodded.

"You're not the first one to have noticed that." Chou smiled at him warmly.

Yori looked around at them. "I guess we'd better get these two back to their hotel. Fumiko, you feel OK to go home, or do you want to come back with us?" The tall girl poked her collarbone again.

"I'm fine. Thanks, guys."

Aiko glanced at the two police officers. "I told Yori what happened with your firearms. She'll explain it to the captain. If needed, I'll come and give her a report as well. There shouldn't be any trouble." She smiled at them. "You did help in a genuine and nasty demon attack, after all." Harrison looked grateful, while Deveraux smiled back.

"Thank you."
"No problem. I'll go back and pick up all your brass as well, in case you need it for your report. The captain will almost certainly want this in writing. If there are any bullets in the walls I'll get them as well, but I think you hit with nearly every shot. Good work, by the way."

"Can you drop them off at the hotel, Aiko?" Yori asked. The short brunette nodded.

"Sure. Can you spare a bit of power, I'm getting a bit low after teleporting so many people." Yori grinned at her.

"Again? I'm just a battery to you, aren't I?" Aiko laughed and held out an odd looking necklace, the other woman touching it with glowing fingers for a few seconds. "There you go, that should be full."

"Thanks, Yori. See you in a moment." She turned to the two visitors who had watched this with interest. "Right. Stand over here, and I'll jump you right to the front door." Once more the world twitched and Deveraux staggered a little. It was nothing like as disorientating this time, she found, just a quick burst of dizziness that left almost instantly. She looked up to see their hotel lobby door mere metres away.

"Thank you, Aiko." The girl grinned.

"You're welcome. See you around, if you're here for a while. Take care, and try to stay away from the demons. Oh, when I teleport out it produces a very bright flash, so don't look right at me unless you want to be blinded for a while, OK?" Both officers exchanged a glance, then turned around. Behind them they heard Aiko giggle, then the street was briefly lit as if an enormous flashbulb had gone off. When they looked back the girl was gone.

"Well. That was... interesting." Harrison looked at his colleague with his eyebrows raised.

"That's one way of putting it. Frankly, terrifying would be a better description as far as I'm concerned." Both of them laughed a little, entering their hotel.

---

When they entered the police station the next day, Sergeant Harada was sitting at his desk, looking at a sealed transparent plastic bag. Glancing up as they approached he showed it to them. "This was dropped off last night for me with a note to give it to you. Something you'd like to tell me?"

Deveraux and Harrison looked at each other, then back at the bag, which contained nearly two dozen expended 9mm casings and three rather squashed bullets.

"Um, we had an interesting time on the way back from a bar last night?" Harrison tried, looking guilty. Harada gazed evenly at him.

"I just bet you did." He suddenly grinned. "OK, tell me. The captain would like to see you, but I want to hear this first." They looked at each other again, then Deveraux shrugged a little, motioning to Harrison. Sitting down he explained the events of the previous night, which felt slightly unreal in the cold light of day. When he finished Harada stared at him for a while. "Hmm. You did have an interesting time. You seem to have been dropped into the deep end with magical girls, that's for sure." He shook his head in wonder. "I don't know anyone who's shot at a demon of that type and got away with it. Normally the best response is to run like a bastard."

"I can see why," Harrison said, thinking about the thing they'd seen. "About sixteen rounds in it, two in the head, and it just got angrier. I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it." Deveraux laughed slightly.

"Hey, do you believe in magic now?" she asked.
"Oh, yes. I do indeed believe in magic now. After what I saw..." Harada grinned at him.

"It's a pretty effective way to find out the truth, but it is a little harsh. OK, let's go and see the captain. I don't think there will be too much trouble, but she may shout at you for a while. Let her get it out of her system, it's the best thing in the long run." Swallowing slightly, they both got up and went with him to their doom.

The captain did indeed shout. Quite a lot. In the end, though, she calmed down and listened carefully as they went over the story once more. At the end she sighed. "All right, I accept you didn't have any real choice once you got involved. I'm slightly sorry you did get involved in the first place, but from the way you described it that may have been for the best. I'd like a written report of this from both of you, please, by the end of the day. Sergeant, can you ask Yori to submit one as well, and Aiko if you can get hold of her?" He nodded. "Thank you. Put the casings and the bullets with the report, please. It's unlikely to go any higher, but if it does I want everything in order." She looked at the two foreign police officers. "If at all possible please try not to get involved in anything like that again."

Both nodded fervently. "I certainly have no intention of deliberately going up against a demon, Ma'am," Harrison said. She smiled very slightly.

"That's good." Turning to the sergeant she thought for a moment. "Issue them replacement ammunition and log that in the report as well."

"Yes, Captain," he replied, turning and waving his colleagues out of the office. When they were safe out of earshot, he smiled. "I think she must like you guys. That was pretty easy." Harrison stared at him.

"Easy? She made me feel like a rookie again." Harada snickered.

"She has a way with words. Believe me, if she was really angry you'd be on a plane home by now, probably in handcuffs. No, the captain was in quite a good mood all things considered. If it hadn't been Yori and Aiko's team matters might have been different, but she has a lot of respect for those girls." He showed them to a couple of computers. "Let me set these up for English and you can get your reports typed up. Best to get them out of the way sooner than later." Retrieving a pair of US keyboards from a cupboard he replaced the Japanese ones with them, then fiddled with both machines for a moment. "There we go. It should be reasonably recognisable. Let me know if you have any problems, I'll be at my desk." Both foreigners sat and began typing, a very common exercise with very uncommon contents.

A couple of hours later they had just about finished when a pair of familiar figures sat down next to them. "Hi, guys. How's it going?" Yori asked, looking curiously at the screen of Harrison's computer. He sighed slightly, leaning back in his chair.

"About as well as you could expect. I never thought I'd be writing a report to a Japanese police captain about how I and a Canadian colleague got involved in a firefight with a demon and some magical girls." She snickered.

"It could have been worse." He stared at her.

"How?"

"There was only one demon..." Harrison put his head in his hands.

"Oh, god. This is insane." Patting him comfortingly on the shoulder, she grinned.
"You'll get used to it."

"That's what everyone keeps telling me. When will this happy state start? Because, I can tell you now, I'm nowhere near used to it yet." Both she and Chou laughed, even Deveraux snickering a little.

Sergeant Harada came over, greeting the two girls with a smile. "Hello, Yori, Chou. The captain asked if you'd mind having a word with her when you have a moment." They glanced at each other then nodded.

"Yes, no problem, Sergeant. If I can use one of your computers I can write up a report of last night first, though." He waved her over to his desk. Sitting at it she altered a couple of settings on the machine, then started typing at an absolutely insane speed. The continuous buzzing noise of the keyboard made everyone in the open-plan office stare until they saw who it was. Deveraux and Harrison gaped. Chou grinned at them.

"We have extremely fast reactions," she said, "the biggest problem is having to go slowly enough to allow the computer to keep up, keyboards aren't meant to work that fast." In under five minutes Yori had typed some twelve pages of text, formatted it neatly, and sent it to the printer. Pushing her chair back she got up, retrieved the papers and stapled them together. Quickly shooting the two officers a smile she and Chou headed for the captain's office.

Deveraux shook her head in wonder. "Every time I think they can't possibly surprise me again, something like that happens."

"They are something special, that's for sure." Harrison turned back to his work, finishing it a few minutes later and printing it. "Done." Deveraux printed her report shortly afterwards. "Here you go, Sergeant." Harada took both reports, looked them over, and nodded in satisfaction.

"Thank you. I'll get these to the captain." He walked off, returning a few minutes later with the magical girls, all three of them laughing about something. "The captain sends her thanks. Here, this should be enough for you." He handed Harrison a box of 9mm cartridges. Both officers took out their weapons and began reloading them. Harada also produced a cleaning kit, which Deveraux accepted with thanks. Dismantling her weapon she carefully cleaned it, then lubricated and reassembled it, handing the swabs and fluid to Harrison who did the same. Yori and Chou watched with interest.

"You obviously know your way around a handgun," Yori observed. Harrison nodded, intent on his task.

"It's drilled into you in training. On more than one occasion this thing has saved my life, LA is a bit gun-happy even by US standards." Chou sighed a little.

"I've heard a lot about the US and your love affair with firearms. To us it seems, well, rather irresponsible, to let practically anyone have lethal weaponry." She paused for a moment. "I've heard all the arguments on both sides of it, and I do understand it's not the weapon itself that's dangerous but the person holding it, but even so, it seems to me that less guns inevitably leads to less people being shot with them. The number of simple accidents involving firearms in the US is remarkable, never mind the number of deliberate actions." He nodded thoughtfully, reassembling his weapon carefully.

"I know what you mean. Even though I come from that culture, one in which firearms are deeply embedded, in my line of work I see a lot of the downsides of it. I'm no gun nut, I carry one but I'm not entirely in favour of random citizens walking around armed to the hilt, if only because it makes my own job much more dangerous. But it's a part of the culture, much like you and your friends are here." She indicated understanding. He shrugged, sliding the magazine back into the weapon and making sure the safety was engaged before putting it away. "Nothing I can do about it one way or the other, I just have to work with what we have." Handing the depleted box of ammunition back to Harada, who locked it away in his desk, he looked around at the various people.

"So, what next? Have you heard anything yet?" Yori nodded.

"We've been contacted by about half the people we got in touch with. So far, pretty much everything came back negative. We did get one report about a mage that apparently wanted some slightly unusual information a few months back, which might be something connected to this case. I've asked for more details, which will take a few hours. No one seems to have heard anything specific, though. That said, the information I gave out has several people rather worried. We'll certainly hear back if these people are found, I have no doubt about that."

A few minutes later, while they were discussing life in the US, which neither of the martial artists had been to, a faint buzzing sounded. Yori looked at Chou, who produced a cell-phone from somewhere and glanced at it. Her eyebrows went up. "It's Uthryyl." Yori also looked slightly surprised. Chou answered the phone, in a language that wasn't either Japanese or English. After a brief conversation she handed the phone to Yori, who spoke at length in the same language. Eventually she hung up, handing it back to Chou with a nod of thanks. Harrison and Deveraux were looking at both girls oddly. The language they had used was very strange sounding. She noticed the look and correctly determined the reason.

"It's a common trade language used through a number of demon worlds. We both learned it over the last few years, it's useful when you visit them. Uthryyl speaks Japanese very well, but we tend to use the other one when we talk, mainly to keep in practice." Deveraux nodded while Harrison listened, fascinated. "Right. What that was all about is a pretty solid lead." They all sat up, listening intently. "Uthryyl made some enquiries of his own, he went back to his home, then to a couple of trade worlds. It seems that there is a mage from this general area who has been buying up a lot of materials recently, ones that are used in the creation of a specific type of portal. Normal portals are produced through one or other spell, they're very complicated and difficult to do. Quite a lot of power is needed and often more than one mage to keep them stable. They're essentially impossible to automate, they need one or more actual mages. That's a normal, two way, stable portal." She stopped, trying to think of the best way to continue.

After a moment, she went on, "It's possible to make a much simpler one, which has some severe limitations. It only goes one way, it can't be kept open for more than a few seconds, perhaps half a minute, and it eats power like you wouldn't believe, they're horribly inefficient. But they can be automated. By that, I mean the spell can be prepared and applied to something a little like the storage sphere I showed you yesterday. In fact it uses one of them to hold the power to run it. The spell can be triggered by anyone who knows the process, it runs entirely on the stored power, and this sort of thing is often carried as an emergency escape method by interworld travellers who think ahead. You can keep it in your pocket or whatever, and if you really get stuck, activate it and jump through, you understand?" The three officers nodded.

"OK, good. Now, the thing about this is that the mage involved isn't someone anyone has ever heard of being involved in making these things, which is something of a specialist art. And he's been acquiring enough materials to make hundreds of them, which is very strange. It's an expensive process, normally even a specialist might only get ten or twenty orders a year. Hundreds?" She shook her head. "No, there's something funny going on there." Stopping as a thought struck her, she suddenly looked appalled. "Oh, crap." Swearing softly in Japanese in a way that made Harada both amused and impressed at the same time, she produced another phone and dialled a number.
Impatiently tapping the fingers of her free hand on the desk, she immediately began talking very fast when it was answered. The response she got didn't make her look any happier. Hanging up she thought for a moment, then dialled another number. This one took longer to be answered, but the conversation was shorter. Again, she looked annoyed, and a little worried. "Damn it." she muttered in English.

"Do you have that blue haired girl's number, what's her name, Ami?" she asked Chou. The blonde thought for a moment, then nodded.

"I think so. Hang on." Pulling out her phone again she looked through the contact list, before showing it to Yori. The black haired girl dialled the number and waited. Again there was a conversation, which went on for some time. In the end she went quiet for a moment, then apparently thanked whoever was on the other end and hung up.

"This isn't good," she said after a few seconds, looking up at the others. "I thought there was something weird about the portal that last demon came through," she said to Chou, who nodded slowly.

"It did feel a bit strange, I remember you said the same at the time, but we were rather busy after that." Yori scowled.

"I should have followed up on it. Stupid. I called a few other groups who have dealt with particularly nasty demons recently, and they all said the same thing. When they were close enough to get a good reading on the portal the things came through, it was a weird one that came and went much faster than normal. Aiko told me the same was true about the three that came through last night." The young woman stared at the floor in anger for a moment. "It is an attack, damn it. I couldn't figure out what the point was, but that is the point. There isn't one. It's just random destruction." Looking up at the officers who were listening and wondering where she was going with this, she sighed.

"The demons we've had to deal with recently, like the one that led to the new duck pond, are different. Most visitors from other worlds are either basically peaceful, or even if not have a very specific goal. These things are simply destructive, they seem to exist only to kill anything that moves. They're damn difficult to kill unless you both know the trick and have special abilities. We did find out which world they're coming from a couple of weeks ago, which is a horrible one no one with a brain goes anywhere near, but no one could figure out how they were getting here or why." She indicated Chou with her thumb. "Her sister actually asked me nearly a month ago whether I thought they could be the result of a deliberate attack, and I said I couldn't see any reason for it, not using those things. But I missed something. What if the entire point isn't a specific goal, just general death and destruction? Chaos, in a word."

Harada looked worried, asking, "But who, and more to the point, why?" She sighed again.

"Normal terrorists, even the more extreme ones, usually have a goal in mind. Political, religious, whatever, at least by their own standards there's some sort of sense to it and something at the end of it. Not usually something that a sane person would come up with, but it's internally self-consistent. Now, these guys you're tracking are some sort of offshoot of Aum Shinriko, who were nuts even by the standards of loopy cults. And these idiots are crazy enough that they were kicked out of a group like that? One that would try random nerve gas attacks on a major city basically just to see what happened?" Harrison, Harada, and Deveraux exchanged worried looks. The concept wasn't comfortable.

"I have a horrible feeling that your case and the problems we've been dealing with recently are connected, and that the end game isn't anything other than mass destruction simply for it's own sake. Proper end of the world stuff. The original group, from what I can remember about it, were trying to bring about an Armageddon, so they could rule what was left, or something along those lines. What worries me is that these lunatics may be trying the same thing but with considerably more lethal methods. If even one of the demons we've dealt with appeared in, for example, the middle of a crowded mall, it would be a bloodbath. The fucking things have already killed nearly a dozen people in Minato, even though they get jumped and vaporised within minutes around here. If it happened in LA? Or Toronto? Or London? What would, or even could, the local authorities do then?"

"Oh, fuck." Deveraux looked sick. Yori nodded while Chou put her hand on her partner's arm.

"You see what I mean. Trust me, the thing you helped Aiko and her team take down last night is nothing compared to what these other ones are like. You could shoot one of those point-blank with an anti-tank gun and it would be back together and pulling your head off in seconds. Oh, sure, your military could deal with it in the end, but the damage would be horrific. And if there were dozens of them all over a large city..." Harrison had gone white, while Harada was calling Agent Naito.

"Are you sure?" Deveraux asked the girl in a low voice. She shook her head.

"Completely sure, no. But it fits, much better than I like. These local ones may have been a test run. You never did find out quite how the fatalities in your original cases happened, but I'm willing to bet that they were an early test of some sort of lethal magic. It may be that they settled on bringing in demons as a simpler method, death magic is difficult and touchy, while portals are pretty predictable. Minato is the global hotspot of portal and demon activity so perhaps they came here for information." She shrugged a little. "I don't know, this is at least half guesswork, but it kind of hangs together. I wish to hell it didn't."

"Agent Naito will be here in twenty minutes." Sergeant Harada hung up and turned back to them. "He didn't sound happy with your theory, mainly because I think he believes it." Yori nodded glumly.

"I wish I didn't." Pulling out her phone she dialled a number and began speaking the trade language to whoever was on the other end. After a moment she nodded, then spoke briefly to Chou, who pulled out her own phone and called someone else. By the time Naito turned up they had had a dozen conversations in both Japanese and the trade language, and one in English. Chou was still on the phone when Naito walked in, looking around then heading for them.

"OK, tell me in detail what you've found, please," he said, pulling a chair over and turning on a small camcorder, placing it on the desk facing them. Yori went back over everything while Chou murmured on the phone in the background. A few minutes in she tapped on Yori's shoulder and motioned for her phone, dialling another number on it and having two conversations at once. As Yori finished her explanation for the second time, Agent Naito looked as sick as Deveraux had done the first time around. "Oh, god damn it. That's far too plausible to be anything other than correct. What the hell are we going to do? How do we stop them, we don't even know where they are." Chou hung up both phones and handed Yori's back, putting her own away.

"Yes, we do. I think," she said quietly. Everyone looked at her. "With the information from Uthryyl I was able to find someone who had recently dealt with this mystery mage and some associates of his. The trader got curious about the man, he said there was just something that made his feathers itch." Most of those present looked at her with weird expressions and she shrugged, "That's what he said, yes, he does have feathers, anyway, he thought there was something weird going on so he arranged to have the mage followed. To cut a long story short, through a chain of people the mage was traced to an address in the middle of the area your men are watching, Agent Naito. Apparently it's a second-level basement in an industrial building, which has, and I quote, "The strongest wards I've ever seen anywhere except for that building next to the university, which is simply insane."

She looked slightly embarrassed. "We know about the building, it's not involved. Just some very private and extremely strong magic users."

Agent Naito nodded thoughtfully. "So, we have a possible location. What can we do about it?" Yori glanced at Chou, who looked back with a small shrug.

"Well, there's always the duck pond option." Naito winced.

"Um, let's leave that as a last resort, OK?" She looked slightly amused.

"I'd think the first thing we need to do is find out whether they're actually there in the first place. That's where they were, but we don't know if it's where they are. We need to get all of them at once, if one gets away they could start all over again and we might not know until it's too late."

The PSIA agent seemed to agree.

"Fine. How do we do that? If they have magic on their side I don't think my men can sneak up on them." The two magical girls exchanged glances.

"That's what we're here for." Chou smiled at him. "We'll go and check the building out. Once we're sure they're in there, we'll let you know."

Harrison looked worried. "But then what? What if they teleport away like they did last time?"

"If the building is warded like that they won't be able to without lowering the wards at least a little, which will give us some warning. In fact..." Yori suddenly looked thoughtful, then maliciously amused. "I wonder... if their mage isn't a portal expert, perhaps he isn't a ward expert either."

Harada looked puzzled.

"Even if that's the case, what does that mean?" She grinned.

"Well, Chou and I are experts on wards, as it happens. We've had a lot of practice. We were taught by the best. And I just got an interesting idea. If he isn't an expert, if he bought in the spell for the wards, there's a possibility that we can turn that around on him." They looked puzzled. "It's just possible, if you know what you're doing and have enough power, to flip a ward. Turn the direction of shielding around. It takes a hell of a lot of energy, but it can be done. So, if his wards aren't quite done right..."

Naito suddenly got the idea.

"You could take them over and turn them around? Trapping them inside, rather than trapping everyone else outside?" She nodded with a grin.

"Basically. I'm not guaranteeing anything, I need to have a close up look at them, but if we can do that, they're sitting ducks. They can't get out, at least via magical methods, and we can get in. The only downside is that someone could then open an inbound portal and bring in reinforcements, which otherwise they couldn't do. Hopefully we can shut them down before they can call out, assuming there is anyone on the outside anyway."

"I can get all the phone service, including cell coverage, shut down for the entire area. We can also jam other radio communications." Naito made some notes. Yori looked pleased.

"Great. OK, I think we may have a basic plan then. Chou and I will go and check the building out and see if we can determine how many people are inside. You set up whatever it is that you need to arrange. We need to hurry, no telling how soon this could happen, it might be months away or any minute now.” Both martial artists stood and ran out of the room.

Deveraux and Harrison looked at each other, then simultaneously checked their side-arms. Harada did the same. Naito watched them, picked up the phone, and began making calls.

It was nearly two hours later when the two young woman reappeared. Yori slumped down, looking slightly tired for the first time that Deveraux could recall. Chou sat beside her, pulling a bottle of water from thin air and draining it. "Well, their wards are pretty strong, that much is true. Luckily, I was right. It's a preset spell, or rather half a dozen of them, with a lot of power behind it and not much experience. We can flip it. I've already taken over the control function and locked it so they can't change it, hopefully they won't notice until it's too late." Agent Naito looked pleased.

"Well, that's one good thing. Are they in there, though?" She nodded.

"Yes. The mage is, definitely, and there are six other people. Five of them are the ones you and the Inspector have been looking for, Lieutenant,” she said, looking at Harrison. "The sixth one isn't on your list, but I know him, or at least know about him. He's Yakuza, or was. Not a pleasant person at all. He disappeared a while ago, just before Chou was going to have some serious words with him about the way he was behaving to certain women in the district. The Oyabun has had a large price on his head for over a year. I thought he'd left the country, to be honest." Chou looked quite annoyed, which Harrison thought wasn't an expression that she normally wore, the woman seemed very even-tempered, almost serene, most of the time, but now she looked genuinely dangerous.

"I would very much like to talk to him," she said in a quiet voice that made the hairs on the back of his neck stand up. "A couple of people I know quite well were not treated properly by him." Yori smirked a little.

"With a little luck you may yet have that talk." Chou smiled in a way that made it look like she was thinking about going for someone's throat. Everyone else but Yori eased slightly away from her.

"Ah, right. Good. So they're in there." Agent Naito looked warily at the blonde woman, who smiled back, looking quite safe once more. "So what next? This is more in your field of expertise than mine at the moment."

"We need to wait, I think. The building above it is a light industrial one with several businesses in it. If we evacuate them it might tip these people off, so it's probably best to wait for them to close up and go home normally. You should arrange to have all the other buildings surrounding them to be evacuated, though, if that can be done discreetly." He nodded, picking up the phone. Issuing a few commands, he put it down again.

"In progress. They should all be out within an hour." Yori checked the clock on the wall.

"Good. The businesses involved should all close up in about an hour and a half. We can make a sweep through and make sure everyone is out. As soon as we're sure, you cut all the communications and we'll flip the wards. Get your men to cover all the exits in case they make a run for it the normal way, while we go in and deal with them.” Naito looked at Harada, then back to Yori.

"Deal with them how?” he asked slowly. She looked evenly at him.

"Appropriately." He was the first to look away.

"All right. As I said, this is more your field of expertise." She nodded, pulling out her phone.
"I'm going to ask Aiko and her team to come and help, from the outside, just in case some magical threat turns up. They're the only ones I can get on short notice I trust to do it right."

"Fine." Naito was still watching her with a mildly upset expression. She grinned suddenly.

"Don't look so worried, Agent. I promise we won't simply slaughter them, we'll give them every chance to surrender. We're not murderers. But we can't let them get away, thousands of lives could be at risk." He didn't look completely happy.

"And the duck pond option?" She shrugged.

"Is still an option. So keep your distance."

"Oh, fuck it all, this is going to be bad, I can just feel it," he moaned. She patted him on the knee.

"Don't be like that. Think happy thoughts." Dialling, she spoke for a while, before hanging up. "Aiko and crew will be here very soon." There was a flash outside the building, visible through the windows. "About now, in fact."

The other magical girls soon entered the police station, greeting various other officers on the way. No one seemed overly surprised to see them, although there were a number of discreet appreciative glances sent their way. Harrison was struck by the thought that at home it was very unlikely that large quantities of young women with little on would be able to casually wander in and out of a police station like that. He grinned slightly. Aiko spotted him and waved. "Hello, Lieutenant, Inspector. Feeling less confused after last night?" She smiled.

"Well, we're OK with that part now," Deveraux said, "but recent developments seem to be going quite fast." Aiko and the others sat or leaned on desks while Yori and Chou explained for the third time, adding some background to the case. They looked suitably appalled and very angry. Fumiko swore viciously.

"Those fuckers. So that's why I nearly got killed last night?" Yori nodded.

"And Tamiko when that first one showed up months ago." Both girls scowled.

"What do you need us to do?" Aiko asked, looking at her team-mates for a moment. They all seemed eager to help.

"Mainly provide backup and magical security for the police and PSAI teams outside. We'll go in after these guys, but if anyone or anything either gets past us or comes in from outside, we might need some help."

"OK. When are we going?" Yori checked the clock again.

"I'd think a bit over an hour. Does that fit with you, Agent?" Naito also looked at the clock then nodded.

"Yes. My men are almost in position, everything will be set up by then." He glanced at Harada. "I'd better go and tell Captain Uehara what's going on. She'll pop a gasket if this goes off without her knowledge." Harada grinned.

"That she would." The agent left, the remaining people sitting quietly for a moment busy with their own thoughts. Deveraux looked over at Harrison, watching him think. He was rolling a pen between his fingers, staring at the clock. Feeling her eyes on him he turned his head towards her.
"What?" he asked curiously after a moment. She shrugged a little.

"Not sure. What do you think about this?"

"It's kind of sudden," he admitted, frowning slightly. "I'm used to operations like this being planned for weeks in advance." Yori snorted, making them both look at her.

"And how often does everything go exactly to plan?" she asked.

With a smile he admitted, "Not all that often." The girl nodded.

"No plan survives contact with the enemy" she quoted. "That's as true now as it was when Field Marshal Von Moltke said it nearly a hundred years ago, and for the thousands of years before that when it was known by every person who ever went into battle. The more detailed your plans, the more likely something is to go wrong. I've always felt you need a decent set of guidelines, an objective, then enough flexibility to change things on the fly." She shrugged. "It's worked so far." Everyone was looking at her with varying expressions. "Hey, I took history in school. I learned things." Aiko grinned.

"You come out with the weirdest things sometimes, Yori." The black haired young woman looked amused.

"I do my best." Glancing at the two overseas visitors, she added, "You guys should stay back with Naito and his men." Harrison sighed slightly.

"I know. We will, but it feels wrong, somehow, letting a bunch of teenaged girls go in where a SWAT team wouldn't. No offence." She laughed delightedly.

"None taken, at all. Thank you for thinking of our safety. Don't worry, we'll be fine. If we run into something we can't handle, well, there's nothing you and the entire Tokyo police force could have done anyway." He groaned as Deveraux smiled and most of the magical girls nodded knowingly.

"Oh, that makes me feel much better, thanks."

Naito came back with Captain Uehara, who looked at the six magical girls with some irritation. "This is supposed to be a police station not a clubhouse for teenagers with too little on." She inspected Aiko, who smiled at her with glee. With a sigh, she shook her head then turned to her sergeant. "Agent Naito has filled me in on this. I'd like you to go along to make sure this madhouse doesn't wreck the district, please." He nodded. "I'd send more officers with you, but from what I hear it probably wouldn't help anyway, and it's not like we're a huge station here. This is only a district station." She shook her head again. "God, magic is a pain sometimes. Magical terrorists are even worse." Glancing around at them all, she sighed once more. "Try not to get killed, or blow up the entire town. Please? For me?" Yori grinned. Chou looked confident and relaxed, while Aiko and her girls seemed ready for anything. Shaking her head the captain wandered off muttering to herself.

"She seems perturbed," Chou said with a small smile. Naito looked at her, then grinned.

"She's having a little trouble with the entire day, I think." Glancing at the clock he looked back at Yori, who nodded.

"I think it's time. Are your people ready?"

"Yes. Everyone is in place at a safe distance, the entire area has been cordoned off out of sight of the building. There's no one we know of within three hundred metres." Pulling out his phone he issued some quick orders, then hung up again. "Communications are ready to be cut as soon as you give the word."

"Right. Let's get over there. Aiko?" The petite brunette nodded, pulling out her amulet.

"Aim for the north side of Sakura park."

"OK. Everyone stand close." She looked around, then activated the teleport. The officers left in the room swore as they blinked.

"Gah." Agent Naito nearly fell over, only managing to stay upright when a slender but incredibly strong hand held onto his shoulder. "Thank you," he mumbled, his head spinning. In a few seconds he could see clearly enough that he realised that Chou was supporting him.

"Are you all right, Agent?" she asked politely.

"Yes, I think so. That was unexpected." The blonde smiled. "It only hits you like that the first time." She glanced over at Harada who was swaying back and forth with his eyes closed, Tamiko holding onto him. The auburn-haired girl nodded to her. Shortly both men had recovered enough to listen to Yori.

"OK. The building is about two hundred and fifty metres over in that direction. We'll get into position, then signal you. Cut the comms immediately, we'll flip the wards then go in. If anyone other than us comes out before we do, shoot to kill." She looked seriously at Naito. "I mean it. If they get away with any of those one-shot portals it will get extremely nasty." Reluctantly he nodded, pulling out a radio handset and issuing some orders. Looking at it, he handed it to the black haired girl.

"Here. This is about the only communication method that won't get jammed." She accepted it with a nod of thanks.

"Right. You guys make sure these guys don't get jumped from behind. You know what to do." She looked at each of Aiko's team in turn, they all nodded soberly, suddenly completely professional and battle-ready. Harrison was astounded by the abrupt air of no-nonsense imminent danger they were giving off. He found it difficult to believe that these were a lot of young women in their late teens, they suddenly seemed more dangerous than a squad of experienced soldiers. Glancing at Deveraux he saw she had noticed the change as well. She looked back at him seriously, pulling out her weapon and flicking off the safety. He did the same and saw that Harada and Naito had done likewise.

The four girls produced their own weapons from wherever they kept them, something Harrison still hadn't worked out, Yori and Chou touching each one in turn with glowing hands, pumping them full of whatever energy they had so much of. Yori did the recharging trick with Aiko's amulet again, and also a number of smaller artefacts the girls produced from about their persons. With one final check, the pair of them smiled at their friends then faded from view. "Let's get over to the command post," Naito said after a moment's silence. Everyone followed him. As soon as he got to the group of heavily armed and armoured men in the van parked up a side street out of view of the target building he plucked a radio from the hand of another agent, waving the man's protestations away peevishly. "We're in place, Yori," he said into it. A few seconds later the response came back.

"So are we. Cut the communications." He waved to a man in the open back of the van, who nodded then typed on a keyboard. Seconds later he gave a thumbs up.
"Comms down."

"Wards inverted. We're going in." The voice came from the handset he was holding and he sighed.

"Be careful," he said quietly, but didn't key up the transmitter. Aiko stepped up beside him and put a hand on his shoulder.

"They know what they're doing. Yori better than anyone, I think." Looking down at the short girl he smiled slightly.

"I know. I've read her file." His smile widened a little. "And yours. I couldn't ask for better help." She looked pleased.

After the first ten minutes had passed with nothing but silence, everyone settled in for the long haul. Another twenty minutes crept past. Abruptly, Harada looked up, as did Tamiko and Misaki.

"What was that?" A faint vibration came and went, followed a few seconds later by a slightly more intense one. There was a distant rumble. Everyone froze, then looked around the corner at the building two hundred metres away. Nothing seemed different.

"We ran into some resistance," Yori's voice crackled from the radio, interference making it difficult to understand. "It's not resisting any more." Aiko snickered.

"I'll bet it isn't. Whatever it was is probably a glowing glass hole in the ground now." Harrison looked at Naito who was looking worried.

"Please don't make another duck pond," he muttered in Japanese, Tamiko helpfully translating for the benefit of the visitors. Naito glared at her, while she shrugged with a smile. "Thank you," he grunted.

"You're welcome," she chirped brightly. He sighed and leaned against the wall.

"Bloody magical girls." She giggled at his mumbling, while Harada grinned behind him. Several of his men chuckled until he turned his glare on them, at which point they became very interested in the details of their armour. "Any signs of movement?" he called to one of his agents, who talked quietly into a headset before shaking his head.

"No, the observers on the roof haven't seen anything." Naito sighed.

"I hate waiting like this."

Another ten minutes or so slowly passed. The radio finally came to life again. "We've got them," Chou's voice came. In the background there was the sound of a small explosion. "Oops. We had them." There was a larger explosion, which they felt through the ground, making Naito wince again. "Got them again. Most of them anyway. The mage isn't an issue any longer." Harada snickered while Aiko and her team laughed. Harrison looked at Deveraux, understanding the likely meaning of that. "You can bring your men in, Agent. Bring Aiko and the girls as well, we still have a problem we need their help for." The radio went silent again. Everyone looked speculatively at each other. Raising the radio to his mouth, Naito keyed it up and answered, then waved to his men. Eight of the armoured agents jogged past heading for the building, the others following behind.

Harrison, Deveraux, and Harada tagged along, Naito glancing at them but saying nothing. As they approached the building Chou came out with six men in front of her, holding both her energy swords ready. None of the men looked like they were likely to try anything, they had a number of wounds and one or two of them were being supported by their comrades. At least one had a very obviously broken leg. "Here you go, Agent. Be careful, they're a sneaky bunch." She glared at the one with the broken leg. "Try that again and I'll break the other one. Or just cut it off." She made a suggestive gesture with one energy blade. He shied away from her, trying to put one of the other men between them, unsuccessfully as his colleague was no keener to be near her than he was.

Naito motioned to his men, who quickly and efficiently took charge of the prisoners, stripping them down to their underwear and relieving them of anything that could conceivably be a weapon, before handcuffing them and making them lie face down on the ground. "Misaki, check them for magic, will you, please?" Chou requested. "Yori and I both did, but better to be safe." The tall brunette nodded wordlessly, pulling out a small glowing device and running it over each man in turn. She gave Chou a thumbs up when she was done. "Good."

The blonde relaxed a little, dismissing her energy blades. Naito walked a little closer, he'd been staying well back while she had them out having read about what she could do with them. "Where's Yori?" he asked, looking past her into the doorway of the building behind her.

"That's the problem." She sighed. "They had six of those demons down there, in some sort of stasis spell. The mage released the spell when we got past the last door to delay us. When they realised their teleport spell didn't work they panicked. He nearly tried it anyway, which wouldn't have worked out well, they'd all have died. Luckily for them he changed his mind. Unluckily for him, he attempted to blow us up. It didn't work. Yori got annoyed." Harada nodded with a smile.

"That must have been the second explosion." She looked resigned.

"Correct. He wasn't nearly as good as he thought he was. At least it was quick."

"What was the first set of explosions, near the beginning?" Deveraux asked.

"That was one of the demons. We managed to move part of the wards and trap most of them in a couple of rooms in the sub-basement, but one got past before we could block it. It was headed out, so I had to deal with it while Yori was holding the others back. I tried to keep the damage to a minimum but there's quite a large hole down there now." Naito muttered something, making her look at him with a raised eyebrow. He apologised, slightly embarrassed.

"God, it's like my mother is disappointed in me. How does she do that?" he wondered to himself. Mollified the blonde smiled at him.

"We found quite a lot of paperwork down there, I took everything I could see, as well as some CDROMs and other media." The young woman pulled a large box out of thin air, making most of the people present stare at her. Naito motioned to one of his men when he got over his surprise, who came over and took it from her. "Here you go. This should help your case. I had a very quick look through it and as far as I could see this is probably all of them. We think we've accounted for all the portal devices as well. The plan seems to have been to use them more or less as bombs. Somehow the mage figured out a way to target demons from this end, then open a portal to one when it was moving fast. It would fall right through the open portal, find itself here, and probably in a very bad mood. They were going to scatter the things all over several major cities around the world on timers, then leave. Anything up to a few months later one or more would activate, more or less randomly dropping a demon into a crowd."

Harrison shuddered. "Jesus. That would have been..." He couldn't finish. Chou nodded soberly.

"Not good at all. Anyway, we found about three hundred of them, along with enough materials to make maybe another hundred and fifty. That matches their records. The only problem is that we don't know for a fact how many they made in the initial test batch. We've accounted for six so far, including the one that Aiko's team and our visitors here dealt with the aftermath of, but there could be more. Probably not many, but the only one who could tell us for sure is dead. These men might know, I suppose." She turned to look at the prisoners with interest. They all went white. "I could ask. They'd tell me, I'm sure."

One of the prisoners shouted, "He made a dozen of them." Chou walked slowly towards him, suddenly radiating lethal intent to a degree that made the experienced SWAT team back off nervously.

Squatting down next to the man, she asked politely, "A dozen? Are you completely sure?" He nodded frantically.

"Yes. I'm sure."

"Are they inside? Or did you put them somewhere?" Her voice had dropped a little in pitch and every person listening, with the exception of the other magical girls, felt a shiver go through them. Even Aiko and her team looked slightly worried.

"I don't know! Honest, god help me, I don't know!" The man was lying in a growing puddle. She reached out with a softly glowing hand, placing it lightly on his shoulder.

"You wouldn't lie to me would you?" she asked gently, leaning close so only he could see her face. He whimpered, then screamed in fright.

"No. no, no, no. I'm telling the truth. He took them all, I don't know what he did with them." She looked at him for a few seconds longer, everyone feeling like the afternoon had darkened a little, before suddenly bouncing to her feet.

"Thank you. Your cooperation is much appreciated." Turning she walked back to the others while behind her one of the SWAT team had to sit down. Naito and Harada stared at her in mild horror while Deveraux looked at Harrison, both of them shaking a little. Neither had understood her words, as she'd been speaking Japanese, but her tone carried over the language barrier perfectly.

"The thing to get really worried about is that Yori is the scary one." She looked subdued. They stared at her, then each other.

"Fucking hell," Harrison said again, looking at the blonde girl who had a satisfied expression on her face.

"He was telling the truth, I could feel it. He really doesn't know where the other devices are. So best case, we've got them all, worst case, there may be up to half a dozen still out there somewhere. That's not ideal, but it could be a hell of a lot worse. You should probably check where he's been in the last year, we might get some idea of where he might have put them if we can't account for them here. The paperwork has enough information to let you identify him." She looked at Aiko. "Yori is still down there making sure the wards hold. We still have five of those demons to deal with. She thinks the safest way is to force the wards as close as possible then, well, 'duck pond' them." Agent Naito looked worried.

"Um...," he started. She smiled serenely at him.

"Don't worry, Agent. We can reinforce the wards enough to contain the energy release. It will make a mess of that end of the basement but the damage shouldn't be too extensive. It won't affect the building structurally." He looked dubious. She shrugged. "It's the best way."
"Damn. OK, do what you need to." The blonde smiled at him, then turned to the other magical girl team.

"She wants all of us down there to focus the power and force the wards inwards. We'll feed you the energy, you just have to push it in the right direction. Then we zap them all at once." Aiko glanced at her team, who all nodded.

"OK." All four of them headed for the entrance.

"What about the other portal devices?" Agent Naito asked. She glanced back as she was about to enter the building behind the other girls.

"We'll destroy them. It's the safest thing to do. Most of them have already been targeted and armed, it would be a nightmare if they got out." He looked slightly worried but nodded. "Keep everyone back. You'll know when we're done." Following her friends the blonde disappeared inside the building. Naito slumped slightly as the tension left him.

"God almighty, that woman is terrifying." Harada looked at him and slowly nodded.

"You tend to forget just how dangerous those two are, they're very playful and friendly most of the time. But when they go into full blown combat mode..." He shivered a little. "I don't see that side of them very often, and I'm damn glad about it."

"I was asked to get a sample of that device, the PSIA would like to study it, but I'm not going to argue with that."

"I certainly wouldn't. Not about something she knew about and I didn't."

About five minutes later there was what felt like a minor earthquake, accompanied by a sort of mental fizzing effect. Everyone winced, the sensation was very odd although not painful. A rumble came from somewhere underground. All six magical girls emerged shortly afterwards, looking pleased. "Right, that's hopefully the end of that," Yori said, walking up to Agent Naito. "All the portal devices are slag, the demons are as well, and the sub-basement is clear. Your men can go in and look for any more evidence you may need. Three rooms are still a little warm and melty, but they'll cool down soon enough. I don't think there was anything particularly useful in them in the first place, they just seemed to be storage areas."

Agent Naito nodded to his men, waving to the building. Four of them entered, while the other four pulled the prisoners to their feet, starting them walking towards the command post. "Thank you, ladies," Naito said, looking around at his unconventional help. They all looked pleased. "You've been a great help once again. We owe you all yet another favour." Yori grinned.

"I'm keeping track." He grinned back.

"I bet you are." Shaking hands, they turned to follow the SWAT team which was fifty or sixty metres away. A sudden shout caught their attention and they all looked ahead to see one of the prisoners struggling with two of the SWAT men. He managed to knee one of them in the crotch, making him stagger slightly, bumping into his colleague, who lost control of the prisoner. Before the others could react he'd somehow managed to wrest control of the first man's pistol from him, jumping to the side and firing three quick shots at the group behind. It all happened so fast that none of the police or PSIA men could react in time.

There was a blur of motion from all the magical girls, which had started the instant the shout came. By the time the third shot rang out, Chou was just slowing from an impossibly fast sprint next to the man, her hand reaching out and tapping him on the head, making him drop like he'd been shot, while her other hand had removed the pistol from his so quickly it had broken three fingers. Yori had her right hand in a fist steady in front of Naito's face, while Tamiko had pulled her sword from somewhere and placed the flat across Deveraux's chest. The tableau held for a moment, then Yori opened her hand to reveal a 9mm bullet. Naito stared in disbelief while Harada nodded wisely. Tamiko bent down and picked a flattened bullet off the ground, handing it to Deveraux, who accepted it numbly. "Holy crap," Harrison muttered softly, looking at the round in her fingers.

"Thanks," the Canadian managed in a soft voice. Tamiko smiled at her, making her sword go away.

"You're welcome."

Harada looked at Yori. "I heard three shots. Where did the third one go?" She looked annoyed, poking at a hole in her shirt.

"Right here, damn it. I like this shirt." He stared at her, then looked at the ground. There was another bullet lying there as flattened as the one in Deveraux's hand. Meeting his look with a raised eyebrow she shrugged slightly. He smiled.

"I thought so." Nodding back to him, she gave the bullet in her hand to Naito, then walked over to her partner, who was glaring at the man in her hands. The agent watched her, shaking slightly.

"Fuck me." Harada clapped him on the shoulder.

"I told you they could catch bullets." The other man slowly turned to look at him.

"I'd much prefer that demonstration not be with one headed right at my face." Sergeant Harada shrugged.

"She caught it. No problems." Naito glared at him. Grinning, the sergeant bent down and retrieved the third bullet from the ground, looking at it curiously. "It looks like it hit a steel plate," he said wonderingly. Glancing at Yori, who was talking to Chou, he laughed. "I'll bet there isn't even a bruise. Those girls are..." Harrison, Naito, and Deveraux all nodded. They knew what he meant.

Walking closer to the SWAT team member and their prisoners, they listened as Chou and Yori had a mild argument. The blonde was holding the man who had grabbed the gun by the scruff of the neck, the others noticing after a moment his feet were nearly clear of the ground. That explained the funny colour he was going. She was showing no sign of effort at all. "I need to talk with him. You said I could." Chou sounded irritated. Yori sighed a little.

"Oh, all right. Don't damage him too badly, it doesn't look good when he's already our prisoner." She smiled toothily.

"Oh, I'm only going to talk. I'll even heal his hand. That's nice of me, isn't it?" she asked the man, who rolled his eyes as he was unable to do anything else. Taking this as assent, she walked off towards a nearby alley holding the man at arms length, talking softly to him. Yori watched her go, then turned to the others. Everyone was looking at her.

"He'll live. Probably." She glanced over her shoulder. "I think." After a moment she swore mildly. "Damn. I'll be back in a minute." Hurrying after her partner she disappeared into the alley. Slight whimpering noises began to come out of it and everyone looked away, wincing one or twice as they got louder.

"Um, so, thanks again, all of you," Agent Naito said, looking nervously over his shoulder at one particularly loud squeak of distress. There was a distinct feeling of something unpleasant radiating from the alley. The SWAT men looked at each other then turned to inspect their prisoners, all of whom had their eyes shut. Aiko smiled uncertainly, her eyes twitching towards the alley every now and then, as did those of the other magical girls. They seemed to be reacting to something none of the others felt. She winced slightly then looked a little awed.

"Good grief," she muttered. Glancing at her team-mates, she shrugged a little. "You're welcome. It was fun." Something made her wince again. Quickly looking towards the alley she seemed to listen, then deliberately stop herself. "If you have any similar problems in the future, Sergeant Harada has our contact details." Harrison and Deveraux glanced at each other as the whimpers abruptly stopped, dead silence coming from the alley. Suddenly there was a faint scream, all the more worrying due to it's low volume. Everyone jumped, even the magical girls. Silence came back, broken after a while by footsteps accompanied by voices.

"Look, all I did was explain it wasn't nice to do what he did."

"It wasn't what you said, dear, it was more how you said it." The voices got closer. The various people outside the alley listened intently.

"It's not my fault if he had a weak constitution. Big bad Yakuza man like that, having a heart attack in the middle of a nice talk. That's just rude. Anyway, I restarted it for him. He'll be fine. I even fixed his hand like I said I would." They all exchanged glances. There was a resigned sigh.

"The fangs and tentacles were possibly a little much." Everyone stared.

"Says the one who dangles muggers by one foot from thirty metres up when lecturing them."

"I only did that once."

"That was enough." The two women emerged from the alley, Yori carrying the man over her shoulder as easily as if he was a rolled up blanket. He was as limp as one, certainly. She looked at the wide-eyed expressions pointed at them and smiled a little guiltily.

"Um. He had a bit of an accident. He's all better now, just a little fainted." Lowering the man carefully to the ground she slapped his face once or twice. "Come on, wake up. You have jail to look forward to." He moaned, his eyelids flickering, then he opened his eyes. The first thing he saw was Chou looking at him impassively over Yori's shoulder. Opening his mouth he made a choked little squeak of terror, sounding like someone had just stepped on a kitten, before screaming loudly and fainting again. Yori sighed irritably. "Oh, for god's sake." Poking him in a couple of places on his chest she looked satisfied as he jolted awake again. "Look at me. No, at me, not her. Listen. You're going to get up and go quietly with these nice men, OK? And if you plead guilty and tell them everything they want to know, I'll make sure you'll never see her again. Understand?" He nodded convulsively, his eyes fixed on hers. She smiled in a way that made everyone watching go cold.

"Don't let me down." He shook his head rapidly, unable to speak, staring at her like a mouse looking at a hawk. Satisfied she stood, glancing around at the various people staring at her with one eyebrow up. "What?"

After a long moment, the SWAT men collected the now-whimpering former Yakuza man from the ground, placing him with the other prisoners and rapidly leaving the vicinity of the terrifying young women. All of them felt much happier the further away they got. Aiko looked at Deveraux and Harrison. "Told you," she mouthed, both of them nodding. Chou was bad enough. For a moment, though, Yori had been the most horrifying thing they'd ever seen. That smile was one that Harrison would see in his nightmares for years.

Naito watched her for a moment more, then shook himself a little. "Um. Right. Anyway, I was just telling Aiko and her team how much we appreciated their help. That goes for you two as well. If it's not too much trouble, could you possibly submit some sort of report on this from your point of view, along with any conclusions and insights you might have? Please?" He sounded slightly worried. She nodded with a smile.

"Of course. We'll drop something in to the station tomorrow." The PSIA man relaxed a bit.

"Thank you. We still need to work out if those six devices are accounted for or still in play." Yori glanced at Chou, both of them looking upset and annoyed.

"That's very true. I'd like to think that we got them all, but the way life works, I somehow doubt it. I have a nasty feeling that they're going to turn up sooner or later, I just hope it's not with a lot of dead people as well." Naito didn't look happy about this prospect, nor did the others. Yori looked at Deveraux and Harrison, who jumped a little at the sudden attention. "So, how long are you guys sticking around for?" They glanced at each other, then Harrison answered.

"I'm not sure. You seem to have closed this part of the case, although how the hell we're going to explain it to the people back home I have no idea." Naito laughed.

"I can help you with that. We have a certain amount of experience framing this sort of thing in terms that your people will accept." Harrison looked grateful.

"Thanks. So, I guess we need to write up our reports, get them to the captain and our superiors, then we're off home." Yori looked at Aiko, who nodded slightly.

"See if you can get a few days holiday, as long as you're here you might as well enjoy it. No demon attacks or anything. If you would like, Aiko can teleport you home afterwards, it beats a fifteen hour flight." Harrison looked startled, staring at the other magical girl who grinned at him, then his colleague. Deveraux shrugged.

"Why not? I don't like flying at the best of times anyway." Harrison looked back at the black haired girl.

"OK. But that's going to be even harder to explain." She looked amused.

"No, just tell them that someone has offered private transportation. Free of charge. They'll probably love that."

"True."

Aiko smiled at him. "I can take you to an airport or somewhere else you can go through with your passport to make everything nice and legal. Or to your house if you don't care about that." He looked interested, then nodded.

"Probably best to do it more or less legitimately. We are cops after all." She laughed.

"Fair enough." Glancing at her team-mates, she looked back at them. "Yori will call me when you need to leave. We have to get going now. Nice working with you." The four of them waved to Yori and Chou, smiled at the rest, then moved away a short distance. Deveraux and Harrison remembered just in time to look away as the flash came. Harada and Naito weren't as lucky.

"Damn, that was bright." Naito scrubbed at his streaming eyes. Yori snickered.
"Sorry, she was off so fast I didn't have time to warn you." Turning to Harrison and Deveraux she and Chou both held out their hands. "Like Aiko said, it's been fun. We'll see you tomorrow, I think." The visitors shook hands with both young women, who then waved to Naito and Harada, ran towards the nearest building, and jumped five stories straight up onto the roof. Within seconds they were gone. The four people left on the street looked up with a mix of expressions, mostly on the theme of awe.

"That was... very strange." Deveraux looked back at the others, who nodded.

"Most definitely." Naito shook his head in bemusement. "I've met some interesting people in this job, but those two are something else. Come on, I need something to eat. And drink. Definitely drink." The group of law enforcement people wandered off down the road.

Four days later Deveraux sat down next to Sergeant Harada at his desk, putting her bag on the floor and pushing it under the chair with her foot. He looked at her with a grin. "You have the tired eyes of someone who had a good night." She laughed.

"As far as I can remember." Leaning back in his chair, he dropped his pen on his desk and put his hands behind his head.

"It's been interesting and fun having you two here, Laura. Keep in touch." She nodded, smiling.

"I will, Tetsuo. There's no way I'm going to forget about all this. No matter how much I try." They were still laughing when Harrison stumbled in, looking pale and wan. Slumping in the other chair he stared blearily at them.

"How much did I drink last night?" he asked. Deveraux shook her head.

"No idea. You were still going when I passed out. I know I had far too much, if that helps." He groaned.

"Not really." Looking at Harada he asked, "Do you have any aspirin?" The sergeant opened his desk and pulled out a small bottle, tossing it to the American. "Thanks." Swallowing three of them he handed the bottle back, then put his head on the desk. "Argh. I'll never drink again."

Deveraux snickered. "You always say that."

"I mean it," he mumbled into his arms.

"You always say that as well." Sighing heavily he didn't reply.

Yori and Chou entered a few minutes later, the former sitting on the edge of Harada's desk while the latter stood next to her. Both of them looked at Harrison with amusement. "Had a bit too much to drink, Lieutenant?" He nodded painfully. Chou glanced at Yori, who shrugged unsympathetically. "This is why I don't drink." The blonde woman sighed.

"Here." She reached out and placed her hand on Harrison's shoulder. A faint glow surrounded it for a few seconds. Removing it she asked, "How do you feel?" He blinked, surprised despite himself.

"Better, actually. A lot better. Thanks." She smiled.

"Try to drink less next time. Or at least drink a lot more water, your liver was having a hard time." He nodded. Deveraux had watched with renewed amazement, shaking her head.
"Where were you two when I was going through college?" she asked with bemusement. Chou grinned at her.

"So, have you enjoyed visiting Japan?" she asked. Deveraux exchanged a glance with her companion.

"Aside from the magical terrorists, getting in involved in a demon attack, and being scared shitless on a number of occasions, yes, it's been a real laugh," she replied, making Yori chuckle.

"Oh, come on, Inspector, it's not that bad." The older woman smiled.

"No, it's not, Yori. On the whole, yes, it's been very interesting. I've certainly made a number of friends." They grinned at each other. After a moment Yori produced two cards. Handing one to each of them, she said, "You might need these one day." Harrison looked at his with interest, realising what it was quickly. Deveraux did likewise. After a moment they exchanged cards, looking amazed as they saw that they were blank. Swapping them back the could read them again. "Wow. That's, well, that's kind of freaky." The Canadian looked at Yori, who seemed pleased.

"If you need the sort of help we can provide, call. Now that you know what to look for you might find it's more apparent. Or not. I don't know much about your homes. Just in case, though, hang on to those." She scowled for a moment. "I'm pretty sure there are still six of those damn portal bombs kicking around out there somewhere. I hope I'm wrong, but..." Harrison nodded slowly, exchanging a glance with his colleague.

"I understand. If something turns up, I'll call." Deveraux said much the same.

"Good. OK, if you're ready to go, I'll call Aiko." Harrison glanced at her.

"Can you give me five minutes? I'd like to say good-bye to the captain." Yori nodded.

"Sure. We're in no hurry." Both visiting officers headed to Captain Uehara's office, Harrison knocking politely on the door-frame. She looked up, waving them in with a small smile.

"Hello, Lieutenant, Inspector. I assume you'll be leaving us soon?" Both of them nodded. She put her pen down and leaned back, looking at them carefully, before smiling again. "It's been an interesting time, certainly. Thank you for helping."

"Thank you, Ma'am, for allowing us to," Deveraux replied. Captain Uehara waved a hand.

"It's no real trouble. Compared to magical girls you two are pretty easy to deal with." She grinned at them. "Even if you do have the questionable judgement to take pot-shots at demons." Harrison laughed while Deveraux looked amused.

"I can assure you, Captain, that I have no intention of doing that again in a hurry. Preferably ever." She nodded at Harrison.

"Probably a good idea. Take care, and if you come back this way, please stop in and say hello."

They nodded, reaching over the desk to shake her hand. Leaving the office they headed back to Harada's desk, where they found Agent Naito talking to the two martial artists and the sergeant.

"Ah, our visitors." He shook their hands. "I wanted to say good-bye, and also let you know the current condition of our mutual case. We've collated all the documents Chou passed on, along with other information we dug up, and we're almost certain we got everyone involved. There were never more than about ten of them in total, and you accounted for at least two of those back in LA. We have the rest, except for the mage, who our friends here dealt with. The bad news is that we are also almost certain that those six possibly missing portal devices are actually missing." He frowned. "The records we have show that the damn mage visited at least a dozen cities all over the world in the last year or so, as far as we can tell. That's just via normal air travel. Once you bring possible teleportation into it he could have gone to dozens more. Those things could be almost anywhere." He looked seriously at them. "Including LA and Toronto, we know he went to both places." Deveraux sighed heavily while Harrison looked worried.

"I was afraid you were going to say that." Naito shrugged.

"Sorry. We don't have any way, as far as we know, to track them. Yori here thinks it might be possible, but even if it is you'd have to be quite close to one to detect it." The black-haired young woman nodded.

"They're shielded quite well, so even under ideal circumstances you'd have to be within about three or four hundred metres. If they're underground, it might be half that." Chou looked at them.

"The bigger problem is that if they are out there somewhere, active, they're going to go off within less than eight months at the outside. That's the maximum timer delay." She didn't look happy. "Hopefully they're all in Minato, where we can deal with them quickly. I'm not looking forward to that, but it's the best possible scenario. If they're somewhere else..." She trailed off, while the others all looked worried.

"We'll sweep the district, the entire ward if we have to, but to be honest I'm not expecting to find them here, at least not all of them. So keep your eyes open." Yori looked at each of them. "If you hear about anything that might be one, call us. We'll come and deal with it." Harrison nodded soberly, looking at the card she had given him again, before putting it carefully away in his wallet. Chou handed him one as well, giving one to the RCMP officer too.

"Just in case." She smiled at them. After a moment, Yori cracked her knuckles, making everybody jump.

"Right. Ready?" They both nodded. Pulling out her phone she placed a quick call. Seconds later Aiko appeared in the middle of the room, making a number of officers jump and one spill his coffee.

"Oops. Sorry," she said with a smile. He looked slightly annoyed but smiled back, wiping his desk. Walking over to Yori she greeted her, then turned to the two North Americans. "Hi. Which one first, and where to?" They looked at each other. Deveraux raised her hand.

"Can you do Toronto International?"

"Yep, been there a couple of times. Airside, I guess, so you go through passport control?" Deveraux nodded. Aiko glanced at Harrison.

"I expect you want LAX?" He nodded as well. "No problem." Waving them to a clear area, she waved to Yori and Chou. "See you guys in a bit."

Harrison and Deveraux waved to the people they had come to know as friends, then disappeared in a bright flash. Naito swore. Harada grinned, opening his eyes.

"You forgot, didn't you?"

"Yes, damn it. Bloody magical girls." Yori snickered while Chou sighed gently.
"Holy shit!" Nabiki said, staring at her sister and brother-in-law as they finished recounting their story. Ranma looked amused. Kasumi giggled, while her sister gaped at them. "That's all true?" Kasumi nodded.

"Oh yes. It was quite interesting."

"Magical terrorist cultists? Demon portal time-bombs? Magical girls and SWAT teams, with international police observers?" The middle sister shook her head slowly, still staring at them. "When did I fall into some sort of manga or anime series?" Ranma laughed, getting up to refill the coffee-pot.

"Quite a while ago, I think. Years, at least." Nabiki watched him walk off chuckling to himself.

"Idiot." Kasumi giggled again, moving over to put her arm around her sister. "It's like the plot of a bad clone of a Tom Clancy novel with added magic and martial arts," the younger woman commented.

"I know. But it's all true, I'm afraid." Nabiki looked at Kasumi for a moment then snickered. "I wonder who will play you two in the movie version?" Kasumi burst out laughing.

"From what Agent Naito was saying they're doing everything they can to keep it quiet. I think a movie would cause a collective coronary in the political and intelligence establishments. We certainly have no particular need to spread it around. It would just make people worried." Nabiki nodded thoughtfully.

"I guess so. Thanks for telling me, though. I saw the news report that just said a criminal gang had been arrested in Minato but not before setting off a bomb to cover their activities. I assume that was the cover story for the damage to the building?" Kasumi nodded. Ranma came back and poured them all coffee, sitting down again.

"It's kind of true in a way. The best cover stories always rely on the truth." Accepting a mug from him with a smile, she thought about it for a moment.

"What will happen to the cultists?" He shrugged.

"Buried in a deep cell for a very long time, I would think. I don't have a lot of sympathy for those bastards, they're responsible for the deaths of over fifty people and were aiming for possibly hundreds of thousands. They're dangerous scum." He took a drink, frowning in recollection. With a shake of his head he added, "I really can't put myself in the mindset of someone like that no matter how much I try. To want to kill so many people, randomly..." The martial artist looked appalled. "It's hard enough for me to kill even if there is imminent danger to someone, although I have had to more than once. These people, though..." He fell silent again appearing both angry and confused. Kasumi looked at him sympathetically.

"Don't try. It only worries you. Accept the fact that some things we'll just never understand, which is quite possibly for the best. We simply have to try to keep these things from getting out of hand." Her sister watched them for a moment.

"By the sound of it you did a very good job two weeks ago. On behalf of one of the non-super-powered inhabitants of the city, thanks." She grinned at them. Ranma seemed to cheer up a bit, smiling back at her.

"You're welcome. Hopefully it will go back to normal intermittent demons, something nice and sensible." She stared for a moment, then laughed.

"You have a very strange definition of both 'normal' and 'sensible'. Shrugging, he sipped his coffee, an amused look on his face.

After a moment, she asked, "So, you think there still might be as many as six of those things out there waiting to go off?" Kasumi nodded again.

"Unfortunately, that's looking very likely. I had another look at the paperwork we collected as well as the other information Agent Naito's team found and it all hangs together. There are at least four, probably all six, of the devices that the records show were made unaccounted for. It could have been much worse but that's bad enough." She sighed. "Ranma is probably right, it would be too much to hope they're all in Minato where the results could be dealt with more or less easily. We know the first six were used here, presumably as tests, but it seems very likely that he would then try a small-scale test somewhere else where no one had the experience or ability to quickly deal with the results."

"We've swept the entire ward twice, we called in all the help we could manage from magical girl teams and various demons we're on good terms with, but so far nothing has turned up," Ranma said, looking worried. "It's still possible that one or two are around here somewhere, hidden away behind really good shielding, but it looks much more likely that the mage managed to put them somewhere else."

"The one good bit of news we found out is that we're nearly certain that he didn't do much if any teleporting. It looks from his records that even the teleport spell the original suspects used in LA was bought in. He seems to have had a fair amount of skill at stitching different spells together, but not a lot of experience in using them. He was quite young and not very experienced although he had an unpleasantly imaginative bent for coming up with ways to weaponise magic." Kasumi looked grim. "It's a pity that the only use he could think of for that skill was to try to cause the end of the world." She stopped talking and drank some coffee, glancing at her husband who was looking out the window with a distant expression on his face for a moment.

"So it seems likely that the list of places he could have placed the devices is fairly short, something like fifteen cities we know he visited in the time period over which we think he finished the prototypes. LA, New York, Detroit, and Washington in the US, Toronto, Calgary, and Vancouver in Canada, Mexico City, Moscow, Warsaw in Poland, London and Birmingham in the UK, Sydney in Australia, Paris, and Beijing." Ranma looked at her for a moment.

"And the rest of Tokyo." She nodded after a moment.

"Yes. True."

"Damn," Nabiki said eventually, going over the list of places around the world. "Almost all cities with large populations, very crowded, all over the planet. Presumably the idea was to hit them all more or less at once?" Ranma looked back at them, coming back from wherever his mind had been.

"Not quite. They seem to have discounted a single massive attack in favour of a constant stream of random, smaller, but still quite serious ones going on possibly for years. Presumably he was scouting out all the possible places he could put the large batch, we don't know if he actually planted any of them in any of those places. But we don't know he didn't, either." The dark-haired young man didn't look pleased about that. "I wish I hadn't killed the bastard, we could ask him directly, but at the time it was about the only thing I could do. Pity, though." Appearing depressed, he added, "That's the first completely human person I've ever killed. Not that it should really matter, killing is killing, whether the person is human or not, but..." Kasumi looked at him sympathetically, as did Nabiki.

"You had no choice. If you hadn't dealt with him like that I probably would have had to. He wasn't sane, he was extremely dangerous. We both gave him several chances to surrender but all he did was try to kill us four separate times. He was about to release more of those demons, we might well have been overrun, which would have let them out into the street." Ranma sighed with an unhappy scowl.

"You're right of course. I don't think he was going to surrender no matter what. He was a true believer. By which I mean completely crazy. But it doesn't make it any easier." Nabiki put her empty mug down, leaning against Kasumi with a slight shiver.

"God, it makes me ill to think of what could happen." The young man sighed.

"It's more than 'could' happen, it's almost certain that it 'will' happen, eventually. If those things really are still in play, they will time out and go off sooner or later. Within a bit less than eight months, Kas thinks from looking at his notes."

"Fuck."

"Yep."

There was silence for a while as they all thought about it. Eventually Nabiki spoke. "One thing I was wondering. All the demons were the same, this really aggressive and difficult to kill thing like that one I saw the night I found you guys, except for the last set, the ones that Aiko and her team were fighting when those foreign cops jumped in. What changed?" Kasumi looked at her.

"Our best guess is that the demons that came through that portal were actually hunting the one the device was targeted on. The intent was definitely to bring through only that one type, they're extremely tough and not very bright, but horribly bloodthirsty. The ones that arrived are ones we've encountered before once or twice. Their name is almost unpronounceable, we tend to call them tripods, for obvious reasons. They're quite smart and very quick, they travel around in packs hunting for sport more than anything else."

"So they went after the demon the portal was supposed to bring at exactly the right moment and fell through the portal instead?" Nabiki asked. Ranma nodded.

"Or went through deliberately. No idea, they're unpredictable. Whatever the reason, they ended up here. Aiko and the girls were, luckily, in almost exactly the right place at exactly the right time, completely by coincidence. Even so it got pretty unpleasant, if Lieutenant Harrison and Inspector Deveraux hadn't been there they might have lost Fumiko at the least." Nabiki shivered again. It brought home once more how dangerous the magical girl job could be.

"I'm glad they were there. I like Fumiko and the rest." Kasumi smiled.

"We all do, they're very nice people as well as good friends." Her sister glanced at her.

"Can you really heal injuries that severe?"

"Oh, my, yes, bones are easy, the organs are a little more difficult but Ranma is very good at them. The poison was the most problematic, but we've seen it before." She seemed quietly confident, her sister looking at her in wonder. Ranma chuckled.

"That's the same expression the Inspector had." She looked at him and stuck out her tongue, making him laugh again. "The thing that could have been fatal was the bullet I caught that nearly hit Agent Naito. It was headed right between his eyes. That would have been very nasty." The middle sister smiled.

"I'll bet he was surprised."

"And very grateful. He had the weirdest expression, but he thanked me quite a lot the next day when he recovered from the shock." Ranma seemed pleased. "I like him, I'm glad I was there to stop him dying."

"Probably not as much as he was." Nabiki snickered. He grinned at her.

"I imagine not." The younger Tendo looked at both her companions.

"OK, changing the subject away from this very worrying and depressing one, have you given any more thought to a visit to Nerima?" Kasumi smiled with a nod.

"Actually, yes. We should have a bit of a break coming up in about three weeks, around the middle of November. Would that suit you?" Nabiki nodded happily.

"Definitely. That matches nicely with some time off I'll have, for outside study. I can lose a day or two from it no problems, I'm way ahead in my coursework."

"Good. We'll have to double check the exact date but lets say the second weekend in November, subject to change, demon attack, or the end of the world. In that case we can reschedule." She giggled while her sister looked at her with a small sigh.

"Very weird, sis, very weird indeed. Fine. I'll alert everyone at home that I'll be having visitors then." She looked across at Ranma who was uncharacteristically silent to find him looking out the window again. "You still with us Saotome?" she asked. With a slight twitch he turned his head.

"Yes. Sorry. Just thinking about everything that happened recently, trying to work out if I should have done anything differently." The brunette nodded understandingly.

"Don't get too caught up in it. Like you told me, it's pointless trying to change the past. You need to move on, not dwell on it." He studied her for a moment then smiled.

"Sound advice. Fortune cookie?" She laughed.

"Martial artist, family member, and friend. All three of them give good advice."

They grinned at each other for a moment. After a few seconds, he asked, "How's Akane doing?" She looked suddenly worried.

"Um, not as well as I'd like. She started making some real progress last month for a week or two, then for some reason sort of backslid, ending up worse than she's been for some time. Her temper has been horrible the last couple of weeks. It's slowly getting better again but at this rate it'll take another month to get back to the point she was at three months ago." Nabiki sighed, folding her arms and staring at the table. "I really had hopes that it was finally starting to work for a while."

"I'm sorry to hear that," he replied quietly. Kasumi hugged her sister.
"Poor Akane." Curiously, she asked, "Did anything change over that time? Different diet, different environment, some sort of shock or upset?" Nabiki shook her head.

"Nothing that I can think of. I wondered the same thing and checked everything I could come up with, nothing seems to be different. The only thing even slightly out of the ordinary is that her friend Sayuri got back together with her boyfriend, which if anything made her happy." She looked thoughtful. "That said, it was about the same time, maybe a day or two before." Kasumi glanced at her husband.

"That's a bit of a coincidence. But if they're connected, how?" Nabiki shrugged.

"No idea. I haven't talked to Sayuri for months myself. I know she breaks up with Hiroshi pretty regularly, although I don't know why, and always ends up with Akane cheering her up. A few days to weeks later she gets back together with him and it all starts over again. This last breakup lasted longer than any others, though." Looking at the other two, she asked, "How could it be connected to Akane's mood? Unless she really gets upset when her friends are as well." Ranma snorted. "Based on my own experience she never seemed to notice other peoples feelings very much at all. But I guess that might have changed." Kasumi glanced at him reprovingly.

"That is my sister we're talking about, dear." He looked abashed.

"Sorry, Kas. But you know what I mean." She nodded unhappily. "Unfortunately."

There was silence for a while as they considered the issue. Eventually, Nabiki looked up. "I just had a thought." She went quiet again while the other two watched her curiously, then slowly shook her head. "It makes a weird kind of sense. But, why now?" She muttered to herself for a moment, then shook her head again. Kasumi and Ranma exchanged glances wondering what she was thinking. "Damn. How could we find out?"

"What, Nabs?" She looked at Ranma for a moment.

"Don't call me Nabs." He grinned. "OK, I'm probably wrong. But..." She shrugged very slightly. "It almost makes sense, for at least part of all this." Kasumi and Ranma exchanged glances again.

"What?" they chorused. The middle sister sighed.

"We have all thought at one point or another that Akane might be a repressed lesbian or bisexual, right?" They nodded. "And she is very immature in sexual matters, to the point that she suppresses any thoughts along the lines of sex at all, actively getting hostile when the subject is brought up." They nodded again. "What if she has a crush on Sayuri? Or is actually in love with her on some level?" Both of the others stared for a few seconds, then looked at each other. Kasumi slowly nodded while Ranma closed his eyes and sighed.

"Oh, hell. Yes, that's entirely possible. She probably wouldn't even realise it consciously. She's known Sayuri for what, ten years or more?" Kasumi nodded.

"Since primary school, actually. Almost all her life. At one point they were almost inseparable, they went everywhere together. Half way through junior high Sayuri discovered boys, which is normal of course, but I remember Akane was depressed that she was going on dates and didn't have time to be with her." The older Tendo thought. "In fact, now that I think about it, it was around then that she started to talk about boys being perverts all the time." Nabiki nodded.
"Yes, I remember. She got all moody for a couple of months, wouldn't come out of her room most of the time, then one day cheered up a bit but has been really dismissive of males ever since. Which got a lot worse when that damn Kuno fool started the whole 'beat Akane to win her hand' crap. Then you came along and really confused the issue." She looked at Ranma, who half-smiled back.

"Sorry." She flipped her hand, brushing the issue away.

"Not your fault. But you see what I mean? It all kind of fits. Probable lesbian tendencies, long-standing crush on a close female friend, repressed sexual development, feelings of abandonment when said friend starts noticing the other sex, and so on. I don't know enough psychology to frame it correctly but I have a horrible feeling it hangs together. So, when Sayuri breaks up and comes running back to Akane for comfort, she's sad for her friend because at heart she is a decent person, but subconsciously pleased because it means she can be with her. When she makes up again she's consciously happy because her friend is but underneath that feels abandoned all over again."

Kasumi and her husband were nodding as she spoke.

"And this last time, it was a longer break-up than any of the others, which might have made her think it was permanent. So she improves in other ways as well. When Sayuri goes back to Hiroshi it hits her hard and she gets worse than she's been for some time," the elder sister said slowly.

"Yes, exactly." Nabiki looked both irritated and sad. "The sad thing is that I don't think, even if this is right, that she realises it at all. If she did it might be something she could work out in therapy, but I know the doctor is skating around the issue of sex because it provokes such a bad reaction. That should be a clue it's important, I should have seen it before. I would imagine the doctor has a good idea, she's pretty shrewd, but whether there's anything she can do..." Sighing heavily again she picked up her cup and finished the coffee, putting it down with a clunk and leaning back on the sofa. "Damn it."

Ranma watched her for a moment. "As sharp as ever, Nabiki. I hadn't thought of any of that at all but it holds together." For some reason the praise didn't cheer her up. His brow furrowed a little. "It would neatly explain a number of things, and certainly add fuel to the fire of her anger, but what started the fire in the first place? She's much too short tempered even at the best of times, explosive rage isn't normal even for a very sexually repressed person." Nabiki shook her head in response.

"No, it's not. And I don't know. There's certainly something wrong I'm sure, some psychological problem way down at the bottom of her mind, but what it is..." She shrugged helplessly. "Your guess is as good as mine."

"If you're right about this, and I have to say it sounds likely, I wonder how we can deal with it?" Kasumi said. Nabiki frowned.

"I'm not sure. I should have a word with her doctor, tell her what we discussed, in case it's not something she's aware of. She won't tell me much, doctor-patient confidentiality issues get in the way, but because I'm Akane's sister I might be able to talk to her about it a little." They were all quiet for a while. Ranma broke the silence.

"I did ask around a few people I know in the university. No one could come up with any radical insight for methods to treat someone with the symptoms I described other than what's already been attempted, but a couple of people suggested that it's possible that there might be a physical cause for her anger issues, or at least part of them. One doctor I talked to last week asked if this had come on quite suddenly. When I asked why, he said that there are some rare cases of hormonal imbalances caused intermittent explosive disorder which this sounded like. I looked it up and while that diagnosis fits some of the symptoms it's not right for all of them, and she's also missing some
"I haven't heard of that."

"It's a psychological disorder that's characterised by sudden wildly disproportionate outbursts of anger, often very violent and destructive, followed by feelings of relief and pleasure that often turn into guilt. Sounds familiar." She nodded. Kasumi glanced at her husband.

"Surely the doctor she's seeing would have considered that? After all, as you say, it's rare but not that rare." He shrugged.

"True. I don't know, it's not something I have any experience of. I'm just suggesting something like that as a possibility."

"Assuming it was something along those lines, what could be done?" Nabiki looked at the martial artist inquiringly.

"Well, in a normal case of IED, pretty much exactly what's being done at the moment, therapy and probably some sort of mood regulating drug regime. No one is entirely sure what the root cause of it is, there's probably more than one like in many of these conditions. If there's a physical cause, though, finding and fixing it could make the psychological treatment much more effective. Say there really was some weird sort of hormonal issue which started all of this. If it began years ago, which seems likely, it will be so deeply engrained in her mind that simply removing the original organic problem wouldn't necessarily fix the learned psychological responses, but it might mean that the therapy would stand a much higher chance of working." The middle sister suddenly looked hopeful.

"Do you think you two could find out if she has anything like that and heal it?" Kasumi shared a look with Ranma for a moment.

"Perhaps," she said slowly, thinking it over. "It would probably be very subtle. Most of the things I can think of that might have the effect we're talking about would have other symptoms which would be very noticeable by now. But it's possible, I suppose, that there might be something else along those lines that's involved. We'd need to scan her thoroughly, and even then I'm not sure we'd necessarily find anything, but it's worth a try."

Nabiki looked slightly hopeful. "You could do that when you visit."

"Ah, there is a slight problem with that," Ranma said. "Don't forget using the ki healing and scanning methods produces some rather obvious visual effects. If we're visiting as your medical student friends that might be kind of hard to explain. As would why we were scanning her with special techniques in the first place. It could lead to questions we don't want to answer." The middle Tendo's face fell.

"Oh, damn. You're right." She pondered the problem as did the other two. "We could have Yori and Chou visit?"

"How do you explain meeting them? And why would they have any more reason to check Akane than Rika and Maiko?" Nabiki looked at her sister with irritation.

"I have no idea." Kasumi smiled gently at her.

"Don't get worked up, sister, we'll figure it out." A few minutes later she looked pleased. "Ah. Of course. It's easy." Ranma and his sister in law looked at her. "We have access to a number of properties around Tokyo, mostly in Minato but a few elsewhere. Some are ones we rent or own, most belong to friends.” Nabiki looked interested.

"You own more places than this building?" This was the first she’d heard of it. Kasumi nodded, amused.

"A few small flats, nothing as grand as this. Safe-houses like the one we used during that recent affair. It's not important at the moment. The thing is that I do know someone who could probably lend us the use of a small office, near Nerima so it has no likelihood of being traced back to us." Her sister looked puzzled.

"So?"

"So, what we could do is borrow that office, then set ourselves up as a medical consultant firm. It's no problem to produce some new personae for the purpose, obviously. They don't need to have any documentation, no one will check. You tell Akane that you've been doing some research and have found a consultant who might be able to help diagnose any possible problems, having been guided in that direction by your friends Rika and Maiko, who are after all nearly doctors. I would imagine you could persuade her to visit this person especially as she's as keen to get cured now as we are to have her cured. We could come up with some reason that she needed to be scanned with some sort of high-tech machinery, which involves sedation. Then we can get a look at her without her knowing the truth."

Nabiki stared at her sister for several seconds, then exchanged a glance with Ranma, who shrugged. He was also looking at his wife in wonder. "That's the most ridiculous, over-elaborate plan I've ever heard of, Kasumi," she finally said. Kasumi smiled a little.

"But do you think it would work?"

"Probably." They grinned at each other. "So, presuming we can get her to go along with this silly charade, then what? If you find something and fix it what do we tell her?" Kasumi laughed.

"That's the good part. We don't have to tell her anything. She'll never know. She comes along, we sedate her, or more accurately we make her unconscious with some pressure points which is safer, scan her, and if we find anything, fix it. Assuming it's fixable, of course. Then when she wakes up tell her the scans were inconclusive and that she should continue with her existing treatment. She gets helped without ever knowing or suspecting who we are." The older sister smiled at the younger one who looked impressed.

"It's ridiculous. But it should work." Nabiki shook her head. "This would be so much easier if we could just tell her everything."

"You know why we can't. Even hinting at it could lead to problems both in the short and long term." Ranma looked sympathetically at her. She grunted.

"I know. But it's so convoluted just to have one sister help another." The brunette looked frustrated. He smiled sadly.

"I agree." Kasumi looked at Nabiki.

"If there is anything to fix and we can fix it, there's a good chance the therapy will work given some time. That might mean we could visit as ourselves one day." Ranma appeared dubious but nodded when his wife gave him a look.

"I suppose. There's more to it than Akane, but it would certainly help."
With a much happier smile at the thought that perhaps her sister might come home again one day, Nabiki asked eagerly, "So when could you set all this up?" Kasumi thought for a moment. "I'll have to call my friend and arrange use of the office, which might take a few weeks to set up. We'd need a time when they were able to close up for a day. Possibly over a weekend. Then we would need to design some convincing personae for the job, get some practice with them... I can't see it happening before the end of the month at the earliest." Her face falling slightly, Nabiki looked mildly disappointed.

"OK." She cheered up after a moment. "Which one will be the doctor and which the nurse?" Ranma and Kasumi looked at each other, then started a game of rock paper scissors. Nabiki began giggling manically.
"Your friends should be here soon, I believe, Nabiki?" Nodoka glanced at the middle sister as she restocked the refrigerator. The brunette nodded, checking a list while looking through a number of bags on the kitchen table.

"Yes, their train gets in at the station in about forty-five minutes. I'm going to go and meet them there, I have to leave by half past ten." Nodoka looked at her watch.

"That's in five minutes."

"Oh." Nabiki checked her own watch, looking surprised. "I didn't realise it was already that late." Quickly scanning the list she dropped it on the table, appearing satisfied. "Looks like we have everything. I'd better go. I'm going to show them around on the way back, we'll probably get here around half past one, if that's all right." Nodoka smiled.

"Of course. I'll make lunch for two, then." Looking at the older woman gratefully Nabiki nodded once more.

"Thanks. Do you know where Akane is?" The auburn-haired woman shook her head.

"I'm afraid not. She was in the yard about half an hour ago but I haven't seen her since then."

Leaving the kitchen Nabiki checked in her sister's bedroom finding it unoccupied. Going out to the Dojo she located Akane going through a set of Anything Goes katas, stopping and watching for a moment while thinking that even though by most standards she was very good, compared to Kasumi it looked slow and clumsy. Compared to Ranma she was a dancing hippo. With a small inner grin, but at the same time feeling a little guilty for the meanness of the thought, she called to her sister. "Akane? I'm just going to pick up Rika and Maiko. I'll be back in about three hours. Is there anything you need me to pick up while I'm out?" The blue haired young woman glanced at her for a moment before going back to concentrating on what she was doing.

"No, thank you. Have a nice time with your friends, I'm looking forward to meeting them." About to leave, Nabiki stopped then turned back.

"When are Father and Genma getting back?" The two fathers had given their students a day off, going to a Shogi tournament in the next ward. Akane shrugged, nearly fumbling the next move in the kata then looking momentarily irritated with herself.

"Don't know for sure," she mumbled, trying to get back into the flow of the movement. "Some time this evening I think."

"Thanks." She smiled at her sister then walked out of the Dojo. Walking back around the house and heading out of the gate she waved at Nodoka through the kitchen window, who waved back. Half an hour later she was standing on the train platform waiting for the 11.10 train from Minato. It turned up on time as usual, pulling smoothly to a halt and opening it's doors. A relatively small number of people got off as at this time of day on a weekend most travellers were going in the other direction. Amongst the people exiting the carriage next to where she was standing she recognised the familiar forms of her disguised sister and sister-in-law, who grinned at her.

"Hi, Nabiki," 'Maiko' said, while 'Rika' hugged her.

"Hello you two. Was the trip OK?" They nodded.
"Pretty smooth", the smaller brunette women said. "I haven't done a lot of travel by train for a while, it seems slower than I remember." Nabiki laughed.

"That's because you spend so much time travelling by less common methods." Heading out of the station they walked down the road, the two visitors looking around with interest.

"Been a while. It looks more or less the same." 'Maiko' inspected a shop they were passing. "Didn't that used to be a bookshop?"

"Yes, it closed down about nine months ago, I think the owner retired. Now it's some sort of dressmakers." 'Rika' also noticed several other differences as they moved on. Talking and laughing, the three of them slowly headed in roughly the direction of the Dojo, in no particular hurry.

Stopping at a café near the central shopping area of Furinkan, they decided to have a small snack. 'Rika' sipped her tea while inspecting the immediate area. "I remember all this so well," she said quietly, "but it almost seems like another life. I used to buy groceries over there. That was where the tea came from. Around the corner is the butcher." Her sister listened to her with interest, sharing a glance with 'Maiko'. "It all seems so long ago."

"Do you miss it?" Nabiki asked, eventually. 'Rika' smiled slightly.

"Of course, in some ways I do. Most of my life was spent here. But in other ways, precisely because of that, I'm so very glad to have moved on." The middle sister nodded slowly while sipping her own tea.

"I think I understand." They sat in silence for a while just enjoying the day, which while rather chilly was still sunny. Hot air came out of the cafe door immediately behind them, warming the vicinity fairly well. They'd decided to sit just outside so they could have a good view although most of the café's patrons were inside where it was warmer. "I spoke to Akane's doctor, by the way. I meant to call you and tell you but I ran into a problem with my coursework and lost track of the time. She said the IED diagnosis was one she'd considered but there were some troubling differences. She wouldn't go into details although she agreed it sounded very similar." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' nodded thoughtfully.

"The idea about Sayuri, though, was one she found very interesting. Apparently she hasn't been able to get very much if anything out of Akane about her relationships with anyone but a certain martial artist. Him she wouldn't stop talking about for ages." 'Maiko' grimaced slightly while she smiled a little. "I went into some detail about our suspicions. She asked a lot of questions about the background of Akane and Sayuri, then went quiet about it. Again, she wouldn't be drawn much on any of it but she looked very thoughtful and thanked me for the information." The young woman shrugged. "Whether it will help I have no idea, but at least she has the information now. Akane certainly wasn't going to tell her, assuming she even realises it herself. And, of course, assuming we were right in any way at all."

"How has she been the last couple of weeks?" 'Rika' looked at her sister, concerned.

Nabiki sighed slightly. "Up and down. On the whole, getting better, I think, but slowly. She seems to have been spending a lot of time practising the Art, or what she knows of it. That's what she was doing when I left. Auntie Nodoka says she's spending most of her free time doing that recently. It seems to calm her down if nothing else." 'Maiko' glanced at her wife, then looked back to Nabiki.

"How is she coming along with it?" She was very curious.
"It's... difficult to say, really. I'm not a real expert. That said, she's visibly improved in the last few months, but even so she's so far behind, for example, 'Yori' and 'Chou'," she looked around slightly guiltily, not sure whether she should mention those names, but reassured when 'Maiko' nodded, unconcerned, "that's it's very obvious indeed. I think that to a more normal practitioner of martial arts she'd be considered very good, but by the standards of the NWC she's only improved a fairly small amount."

"Any improvement is good. It will hopefully produce a more disciplined approach to life if she keeps at it, which can only help," her sister-in-law said with some approval in her voice.

"I suppose." Nabiki's tone of voice was a little dubious. She glanced off to the left as a flash of blue caught her attention, then froze. "Um, Shampoo is heading this way..." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' exchanged quick looks but schooled their expressions into polite smiles as the Amazon girl noticed Nabiki and approached. As she walked closer Nabiki hissed out of the corner of her mouth, "Will she detect anything funny from you two?" 'Rika' shook her head nearly imperceptibly.

"No," she replied very quietly, "we're masking it. She shouldn't feel anything, although Cologne might." She stopped talking as the young woman they were watching came within earshot.

"Hello, Nabiki. I haven't seen you for a while." She looked curiously at the two people she didn't recognise. With a certain amount of inner trepidation Nabiki made the introductions.

"These are a couple of friends of mine from university, Rika and Maiko. They're medical students." Shampoo nodded.

"Yes, I remember Akane mentioning them. Hello, I'm Shampoo." She held out her hand. Nabiki held her breath for a moment wondering whether she'd somehow see through the disguises but apparently the Chinese woman saw nothing but what was apparent, two young Japanese females she'd never met before. The mannerisms, voices, and appearances were perfect and nothing like the real Ranma or Kasumi. She was so used to them by now she sometimes forgot quite how startled she'd been the first time. 'Maiko' stood and politely shook hands with the woman who had caused her so much trouble for years without Shampoo having the slightest idea how close she was to her errant 'fiancé'. The middle Tendo had a sudden urge to burst into hysterical laughter at the thought but suppressed it forcefully.

Sitting down again 'Maiko' waited until 'Rika' had also shaken hands, then asked, 'Shampoo? That's an odd name." She looked momentarily confused, then enlightenment crossed her face. "Ah, yes, I remember, Nabiki mentioned you, you're from a village of warrior women in China, am I right?" Shampoo nodded with a smile. "So, it should be something like Xian Pu, I think." She pronounced the Chinese version of Shampoo's name perfectly, making the Amazon look slightly surprised.

"Yes, that's correct. Most Japanese people don't seem to be able to pronounce it properly, I've got used to it over the years. Only my great-grandmother calls me that now." She grinned. "It's nice to hear it spoken correctly," 'Maiko' smiled, then said something in Mandarin. "Very good. Your accent is a little strange but that's much better than most people here can manage." Shampoo looked impressed. The petite brunette woman thanked her for the compliment, while Nabiki listened with interest.

"I'm afraid I don't know much Mandarin, only a few dozen useful phrases so far, but I'm learning. I can understand a bit more than I can speak. Some fellow students at university are teaching Rika and me, while we help them with Japanese." 'Maiko' smiled. Shampoo looked amused and said something, to which the other woman nodded with a laugh. "OK, I got about half of that. Something about it being nice to talk to someone in a sensible language?"
"Yes. You know quite a lot of Mandarin." The brunette shook her head with her long braid waving around.

"Oh, no, I've only been learning for a year or so. It's a very complicated language." 'Rika' looked at her companion with a smile and also said something in Mandarin, leaving Nabiki wondering what she was talking about. Shampoo burst into laughter.

"I think you mean mother not horse." 'Rika' looked embarrassed.

"Yes. Sorry, those rising and falling tones in Mandarin always confuse me." Giggling, Shampoo glanced at Nabiki, who waved her to a chair. Sitting down she talked for a little while, correcting a few words the pair tried on her.

"Not bad. Keep at it, you'll get it in the end. It took me years to learn Japanese properly, I'm not good with languages at all." She sighed. "I sounded like an idiot when I first got here." Nabiki snickered a little.

"You certainly did." The Amazon flushed, glaring at the other woman, who laughed. "You said it, not me." After a moment the other smiled a bit.

"Fair enough." She looked back to the two new people. "I'm trying to earn English now, it seems a useful one to have. But it's really difficult. There doesn't seem to be a lot of sense to it." 'Rika' smiled.

"No, it's a surprisingly complicated language in some ways. There are lots of rules, but about the only consistency with them is how inconsistently they're applied."

"Can you speak it?" Shampoo asked curiously. They both nodded.

"Yes, we're both actually very fluent in English, we learned quite a lot at school, then more at university and from dealing with people from overseas. We meet a lot of North Americans and Europeans, English is nearly the only common language we have. Hardly anyone from either place speaks Japanese very well." 'Maiko' grinned. "Sometimes they think they do, but often the result is very funny." Shampoo looked amused.

"How long are you visiting for?" 'Rika' smiled at her.

"We're going to be here for the weekend. Nabiki invited us ages ago but we couldn't get away until now. We're both looking forward to meeting the rest of her family." Shampoo nodded, looking momentarily pensive.

"Not all of them." The other woman raised her eyebrows then looked understanding.

"It's a shame. Kasumi, the oldest sister, was such a nice person. I hope she's all right wherever she is. And..." Trailing off she stopped talking with a distant look in her eyes. "And... him." They exchanged glances. She didn't notice, lost in her memories for a moment. After a few seconds she shook herself. "Never mind. It's all in the past." Looking at them she smiled, slightly sadly. "If you get time drop in to the Cat Café. Nabiki can show you where it is. My great grandmother runs it. We do some very good ramen." Standing, she nodded to them, then walked away still looking a bit depressed. When she was safely out of range, Nabiki looked at her disguised sister-in-law, who was watching the distant form with the long lilac hair, a certain amount of pity in her eyes.
"She's still holding a torch, you know. I think she will for years, possibly forever." 'Maiko' nodded slowly.

"I can see that. Poor Shampoo, despite all the problems I never wanted to hurt her like that. Kill her sometimes, yes, but not hurt her emotionally." She sighed. Nabiki studied her for a moment.

"Are you going to go to the Café?" she asked. The two women looked at each other for a moment.

"I'm not sure that's a good idea. Cologne is no fool, she might detect something. Not the right thing almost certainly, but something. I don't want to make her curious about us." 'Maiko' looked very slightly worried. "Not right now, certainly. We've got enough on our plates without Amazon Elders poking their noses in." Chuckling, Nabiki could only agree.

"What do you want to tell people if they ask where you're from, or where we met?" the middle sister asked as they left the café. 'Maiko' and 'Rika' thought about the question for a while.

"Well, we can sidestep both questions a bit if we just refer to the university. As long as they don't ask which university, we're fine. They'll just assume we go to the one you do." 'Maiko' grinned.

"We could just say you live in Minato," Nabiki said. 'Rika' frowned.

"I'd prefer not to. It's one more clue we don't want to give out. Saying we visit Minato is fine, lots of people do. Or saying you have as well shouldn't cause a problem. We simply don't want to associate ourselves with Minato too closely, just in case." Her sister nodded thoughtfully.

"I understand. I've steered clear of the subject whenever anyone asked by doing much the same. So far no one has dug any deeper. I don't want to outright lie if I can help it, but bending the truth isn't a problem." 'Maiko' laughed, looking at her with amusement.

"I seem to remember that was your entire operating method, you never lied but you were very good at letting people lead themselves down the wrong path." Smirking, the middle Tendo nodded with satisfaction.

"It's much better to have the mark, I mean, 'client', persuade themselves rather than to have you try to persuade them. More difficult to pull off but a lot more convincing." She glanced at them, her sister was frowning very slightly while the other woman looked amused. "Obviously, I don't do that sort of thing any more."

"Of course not." 'Maiko' looked at her with a serious expression, to be met with a similar one. It held for about five seconds, then they both burst out laughing.

"OK. We avoid the subject. I think we're all sufficiently practised to do that," Nabiki said after a moment. The others nodded.

They arrived at the Dojo on schedule, having looked around the old neighbourhood, re-familiarising themselves with it. Neither had been to Nerima at all for a considerable time. It brought back a lot of memories both good and bad. Stopping in the street outside the Tendo residence, 'Maiko' and 'Rika' both looked at it for a long moment, then exchanged glances and a small sigh each. Nabiki watched silently. "It's been a long time, dear." 'Maiko' studied her wife carefully. The other woman looked very sad for a moment, then obviously and deliberately put a smile on her face, looking at her currently female husband.

"Yes, it has. It's a pity it's still not possible to be open about it. Oh well."

"Are you going to be OK?" Nabiki asked with concern. Her sister nodded after a short pause.
"I am." They walked towards the gate, Nabiki opening it and waving them through. Both of them walked in, feeling very strange to be once again standing in the courtyard of the Tendo house where one of them had spent years and the other her whole life, after so long away. They looked at each other for a second, the same thought going through their minds, before deliberately immersing themselves in the personae they were wearing. Opening the front door Nabiki entered first, removing her shoes just inside. The two women with her did the same. Hearing the door close Nodoka came out of the kitchen.

"Hello Auntie," Nabiki said. "This is Maiko, and Rika, my friends. Guys, this is Nodoka Saotome." They nodded politely.

"Hello, Mrs Saotome," 'Rika' said, holding out her hand. Nodoka shook it with a smile.

"Nodoka, please. It's very nice to meet you, Nabiki has said quite a lot about both of you." She shook 'Maiko's' hand as well. The disguised Ranma had a very weird couple of seconds shaking the hand of her own mother while being introduced as a stranger. Nabiki covertly caught her eye and she smiled very slightly with the tiniest of shrugs. Leading them to the living room Nodoka said over her shoulder, "I understand you two are both medical students?" 'Maiko' nodded with a smile.

"Yes, that's correct. We've known Nabiki since before then, but for the last few years we've both been learning medicine. Rika is getting a medical degree, I'm working on sports medicine and biomechanics." The older woman bustled around the room for a moment, doing a little last-minute tidying up, before being satisfied.

"Please sit down. Would you like some tea? Or coffee?"

"Coffee would be very nice, please," 'Rika' replied with a pleased look, sitting next to her companion. Nabiki sat down across the table from them. Nodoka looked enquiringly at her and she nodded.

"Coffee, please, Auntie. Do you want me to help?"

"No, stay here with your friends. I have the kettle on, it won't take long." She vanished into the kitchen, returning in a couple of minutes with a tray full of cups and a coffee-pot. Pouring them each a cup she sat down. "So, tell me about yourselves." The two women exchanged glances for a moment, before 'Rika' indicated 'Maiko' should speak.

"Um, we live near the university. We share an apartment. Nabiki's stayed over a few times since we have a spare room." Nodoka nodded, pouring herself a cup as well. Nabiki helped herself to some sugar.

"I understand you are in a relationship?" she said, half asking, half stating. Nabiki nearly choked on her coffee.

"Auntie!" Nodoka looked slightly embarrassed while 'Rika' laughed.

"Yes, that's true. Don't worry, Nabiki, we're not offended." The middle sister wiped coffee from the end of her nose, staring at Nodoka with some irritation. The older woman looked more embarrassed, while 'Rika' simply smiled gently. 'Maiko' was openly grinning.

"We love each other very much, and don't care who knows or what they think." Reaching out she held her wife's hand. "We consider ourselves to be married." The auburn-haired woman sighed, watching them.

"I'm sorry. I shouldn't have said that, but I've never met a pair of..." 'Maiko' laughed.
"Lesbians? I suppose I am, I certainly like women. Well, specifically one woman." Nabiki listened with inner hilarity. It was definitely true that Ranma liked women, but whether he still qualified as a lesbian when male was a very interesting point. She resolved to ask him the next time the opportunity came up. Nodoka blushed at the openness of the response.

"I'm sorry," she repeated. "My upbringing was very conservative and traditional. This sort of thing wasn't something my own mother would ever have mentioned, or probably even been aware of. It's taken some time for me to get over that." 'Rika' looked understanding.

"We all have parental issues to one degree or another. We don't mind, you're just curious. That's understandable." The elder woman seemed relieved that they weren't offended, she was well aware that it had been a significant breach of etiquette to even mention it, but her mouth had run away before her mind could stop it. Bowing slightly from a seated position she apologised once more. 'Maiko' waved her hand airily.

"Please, forget it."

They talked about university life and gave some information on the background stories of their disguises for twenty minutes or so, before Nodoka looked at her watch. "I have to finish preparing lunch. It will be about a quarter of an hour. Nabiki, why don't you show your friends around the house and where their room is? Please excuse me." She smiled at the two women, stood, then disappeared into the kitchen. The three females left in the living room looked at each other then silently giggled furiously for a moment, before Nabiki motioned to the door.

Once outside the room 'Maiko' said quietly, "OK, we're lightly shielded. No one will notice what we say if we keep the noise down." The middle sister promptly started giggling again.

"God, I thought I was going to explode several times in there. How the hell did you keep a straight face? Your mother talking about the problems she has had to face because of her mother was so funny." 'Maiko' grinned.

"I know. I doubt she'll ever know the irony involved." 'Rika' looked at her and laughed.

"Asking us about our 'lesbian' relationship was very amusing as well. Especially the way she did it, she got so embarrassed when she'd realised what she'd said."

"To give her credit where it's due, she is trying to understand," Nabiki commented, turning and heading upstairs. They both followed. "She's changed a lot in the last year or so, for the better. Still a bit nuts but I don't think nearly as bad as before you left. She's come to realise some of what she was responsible for, in causing you so many problems with her impossible demands." She snickered. "I haven't heard her talk about 'a man among men' for a long time." She looked over her shoulder at Nodoka's currently female son and grinned. "Although I suspect that your current state would cause her some problems if she knew." 'Maiko' grinned back.

"Probably." They arrived outside Kasumi's old room, where Nabiki stopped and looked at the little yellow wooden duck that was still hanging there. 'Rika' also stared at it, reaching out with one finger to gently touch it with a tear in her eye. Her husband put her arm around her shoulders. "You OK?"

"Yes, I will be. It brings back a lot of memories." Standing straight she pushed on the door. It swung open to reveal a room both familiar and unfamiliar. None of her old possessions were in evidence, mostly because the bulk of them were in their apartment, and the room had been repainted. But the bed was still the same, as were the curtains. She walked inside and looked around while 'Maiko' and Nabiki watched from the door. After a moment she smiled. "This feels very strange."

"Home at last?" Nabiki asked. She considered that for a few seconds then shook her head.

"Not quite. This isn't my home any more. But it's like an old familiar blanket, one you haven't seen for years, which you found while unpacking a cupboard. The same smell you remember from years ago, if that makes any sense." Nabiki nodded slowly.

"I think I understand."

"I spent so many years in this room." She walked over to the window and peered out, then sat on the bed. "In this bed. It feels... welcoming." Swivelling around she lay down for a moment, smiling to herself. 'Maiko' watched her fondly.

"Do you want to use this room?" Nabiki asked. "It's used as a guest room now, on the rare occasions we have guests, but if it's too much we could arrange something else. Happosai's old room, for example. Father usually sleeps there now but I can persuade him to move in here for a night." Sitting up 'Rika' swung her legs over the edge of the bed. She shook her head.

"No, thank you Nabiki. This will be fine. The bed is a good size and it will be nice to spend a night here after all this time." Her sister nodded.

"You'd better leave your bags here then, to make it look normal." They both pulled an overnight bag out of a ki pocket. "Hmm. I hope Auntie didn't notice you weren't carrying those when you came in." Leaving the bedroom they headed outside. Walking around the garden 'Maiko' stopped in front of the pond.

"Missing your morning swim?"

"No, not really." She grinned. "I like swimming a lot, but I prefer it to be on my own terms." They resumed walking, 'Rika' inspecting the garden carefully to see how it had been kept up in her absence, nodding approvingly. Nabiki noticed.

"Nodoka does quite a lot of gardening. She's kept everything pretty nice." Coming around the house they walked towards the Dojo, from which some familiar noises could be heard. Looking inside they found Akane going through another kata, fairly fast but still only at a fraction of the speed they performed the same one at even when they were just doing it for relaxation. 'Maiko' allowed the gentle cloak to slowly fade away. At a certain point Akane suddenly realised they were there, stopping and turning around.

"Hi, sis," she said, walking over while wiping the sweat from her forehead with a towel that was around her neck. She studied the two women with her sister curiously. They were looking at her with a slightly odd intensity, she noticed, but put it down to the martial arts she had been practising. Holding out her hand, she said, "Hi. I'm Akane Tendo." The shorter of the two women, who had her lustrous brown hair in a braid that reached to the small of her back and was wearing a red bow at the end of it, hesitated for a moment then shook it.

"Maiko Nakahara. Pleased to meet you." Her grip was firm and sure. The other woman, taller and blonde, also shook her hand.

"Rika Nygaard. Also pleased to meet you." She smiled in a gentle manner that reminded her faintly of her mother. Looking back at 'Maiko' she inspected the hairstyle for a moment. It looked slightly familiar but she couldn't place why.
"I like your hair," she commented politely. The other woman smiled.

"Thank you. It took ages to grow it this long. Braiding it is a pain but I like the look." She glanced around the inside of the Dojo. "This is very impressive." Akane smiled.

"It's the family Dojo. I practice here every day, and my father and his friend are the instructors. We have our own style, Anything Goes Martial Arts, which we teach here." She looked at the two women. "Do you do any martial arts?" They exchanged glances.

"Well, we both practice some tai chi, and I know some akido. Also we're learning about pressure points and things like that in our medical studies. They're used in martial arts, aren't they?" She sounded a bit unsure. Akane nodded encouragingly.

"Yes, that's right. Some forms of the Art make very extensive use of pressure points. I know a couple of real experts in the field." 'Maiko' seemed impressed.

"How long have you been learning martial arts?" she asked. Akane puffed up a little.

"Since I was a child. Not many people around here are better than me." Behind 'Maiko' she saw her sister roll her eyes a little and blushed slightly. "But I still have a lot to learn," she added hastily.

"It must take a lot of time and practice to become skilled at it," 'Rika' said, staring at the shrine to their mother high on the wall of the Dojo for a moment before looking back to Akane. The blue-haired young woman nodded.

"It does. Not many people stick to it and become real masters." Nabiki seemed to be having some trouble keeping a straight face. Akane glared at her sister when the other two women were looking away, making her shrug silently with a smile.

"Fascinating." 'Rika' smiled at her. Hearing a faint call from the direction of the house, Nabiki looked to see Nodoka waving to her. She waved back.

"Lunch is ready. Let's go inside. Akane, are you going to join us?" The youngest Tendo sister nodded, tossing the towel towards a bench just inside the door. It missed.

"Yes, I'll just go and have a very quick shower." She headed for the house. The three other women followed more slowly, 'Maiko' gently cloaking them again so they could take without anyone noticed.

"Still capable of being a little full of herself, isn't she?" the smaller woman asked. Nabiki grinned.

"Definitely. Although I seem to remember a certain martial artist who was similarly boastful." 'Maiko' laughed.

"The difference is that I actually was that good." The two sisters shared a smile.

"Yes, dear," 'Rika' said quietly. Nabiki giggled. 'Maiko' looked momentarily irritated then did the same.

"Yes," 'Rika' said quietly. Nabiki giggled. 'Maiko' looked momentarily irritated then did the same.

"It's true. But I'll admit that was a bit boastful." Entering the house they headed for the living room, finding Nodoka laying the table.

"Please, let me help you with that," 'Rika' said.

"No, you're guests. This will only take a moment," Nodoka replied good-naturedly. The blonde sat down with a smile, followed by her husband and her sister. "Is Akane coming?" the older woman asked.

"Yes, she's just washing up."

"Good." As soon as the table was ready Ranma's mother vanished into the kitchen once more, returning quickly with the first plates of food. Nabiki got up to help despite her protestations. Minutes later everything was ready, just in time for Akane to come in. Very soon they were all eating and talking. Half-way through the meal Nodoka looked as if she'd remembered something. "Akane, a package came for you this morning while you were out." Standing, she rummaged around on the bookshelf next to the door until she retrieved a padded envelope, which she gave to the youngest Tendo before sitting down again. Akane read the label curiously.

"Ah. It's from a friend of mine who lives near Minato. Her sister works there, she's always telling me things about the demons and magical girls in the ward." She laughed. "The way she tells it you can hardly walk down the road without tripping over a magical girl fighting a demon, or the other way around." 'Rika' glanced at 'Maiko' and her sister as her other sister ripped the end off the envelope, emptying the contents onto the table next to her plate. A DVD in an unmarked case fell out along with a letter which she read curiously, smiling with interest after the first page. "Oh, wonderful. This should be amazing."

"What is it, dear?" Nodoka asked with curiosity in her voice.

"You remember those news reports we saw a few months ago? The ones with the magical girls in Minato who were shouting at the other ones after they caused all the damage when they killed a couple of demons?" Nodoka thought for a moment then nodded. "Oh, yes. The little shouty one and the tall quiet one." Akane smiled.

"That's them. The small one is called Yori and the other one is Chou. They have a real reputation as seriously dangerous even by magical girl standards." Nabiki hardly dared look at either of her guests for fear of losing it completely, she was having a hard enough time keeping a straight face as it was. She could hear intermittent faint snorting noises coming from 'Maiko' while out of the corner of her eye 'Rika' was obviously biting the inside of her cheek in an attempt to keep a serious demeanour. Neither Akane or Nodoka noticed.

"They're very private people, oddly. Most of the magical girls seem to like showing off." Nodoka nodded wisely.

"I remember seeing the reports. So many of those girls wear very inappropriate clothing, but those two were dressed very nicely. But I'm still not sure about, Yori, was it?" Akane nodded. "I'm not sure about that bright blue highlight in her hair. It's a bit bold." Three pairs of eyes looked at her, then at the blue hair of the girl still reading the letter, then at each other. Three very slight shrugs came and went unnoticed.

"No one seems to know very much about them, or at least, no one is talking. After those reports I tried to find out more, but apparently people inside the area they're active in don't talk to people outside it a lot. It's very strange. Anyway, they occasionally put on demos by request for people of their magical and martial skills, which are supposed to be incredible. Recently they did one to music which I've heard was one of the most amazing things anyone ever saw. It got videoed but copies are weirdly difficult to track down." She held up the DVD. "Kaede's sister managed to get hold of a copy. This is a duplicate of it. Kaede says it's absolutely beautiful." She finished reading the letter while 'Rika' and 'Maiko' looked at each other with amused expressions.
"You're interested in magical girls, then, Akane?" 'Rika' asked. Akane nodded.

"Oh, yes, very much." She blushed a little. "When I was a small child I wanted so much to be one. I think that might be why I stuck at martial arts all this time." The blue haired girl chuckled a little sadly. "I know it's silly, it's not like being good at martial arts makes you a magical girl." Nabiki suddenly choked as a bit of fish went down the wrong pipe, causing Nodoka to reach out and thump her on the back.

"Thanks," she croaked, reaching for her glass of water.

Looking annoyed at the interruption Akane stared at her sister completely missing the look of enormous enjoyment that briefly flashed between the two guests before their faces smoothed out into ones of polite interest. Nodoka also missed it as she was looking at Nabiki with some concern. The middle sister indicated she was all right. "We should watch it," Akane said.

"After lunch." Nodoka looked at her firmly, causing her to wilt a little.

"Yes, Auntie." They finished eating, 'Rika' and 'Maiko' both complimenting Nodoka on the food.

"Thank you," she replied, pleased and smiling.

"Would you like us to help with the washing up?" 'Rika' asked. "We would be glad to."

"No, that's fine. We got a dishwasher last week, finally. It only takes a couple of minutes to load it up." Nabiki helped the elder Saotome to fill the machine, then once it was running they came back into the living room. "All right, Akane, let's watch this DVD of yours." With a smile Akane put the disk into the player and turned on the television. A few moments later they sat back to watch, interested for several different reasons. Nabiki grinned at her elder sister and her sister-in-law when the other two weren't looking, receiving a mischievous look from 'Maiko' in return. Pressing play on the remote control Akane sat forward on her seat to watch, clasping her hands eagerly in her lap, as excited as a child watching a movie.

The video was a little shaky at first but steadied as the unknown camera operator found a vantage point to rest the device on. It was clearly a very expensive camera in use as the picture was near-professional quality. It started just after 'Yori' and 'Chou' had begun the first sparring match. 'Rika' nudged her husband as she spotted Sergeant Harada and the two North American police officers in the crowd. 'Maiko' nodded absently, watching their performance with a critical eye. "Good grief", Nodoka muttered as she watched the sheer speed of the sparring match, wincing at the noises which the recorder had picked up with startling clarity. The blows and movements were just a blur on the screen, far faster than the shutter speed of the camera could cope with. Akane watched wide-eyed with a large smile on her face.

When the energy swords came out she gasped in amazement while Nodoka simply gaped. They watched the light-sabre fencing match with awe, even Nabiki staring incredulously. It was noticeably faster than the one she'd witnessed at their apartment some time ago. Her sister had clearly been practising a lot. Looking at her for a moment she raised her eyebrows, getting a smug smile back. Shaking her head slightly with a small grin she went back to watching the video.

Eventually it got to the point where the katas and the band converged. They all fell silent as the spectacle went on, with small gasps coming from Akane and Nodoka when the glowing trails of light appeared. Once it was over the room was as quiet as the park had been that day. Eventually Akane pressed the power button on the remote, making the TV shut down with a faint click.

"My god," Nodoka said quietly. Akane had tears in her eyes. Nabiki looked at her, then glanced at her older sister, who was watching the younger one with concern.

"Are you all right, Akane?" Nabiki asked. The other woman nodded.

"Yes," she said quietly, after a long pause. "That was... That was the most unbelievable thing I've ever seen." She fell silent again. "I wish I could see something like that in person. Those two women are..." She shook her head, unable to find the words.

"Even without the light show, that was the most incredible demonstration of martial arts I've ever even heard of," Nodoka said slowly. "I know how good some of the people around here are, but even I can see how much better those girls are. How could they possibly have learned so much, so young? They looked like they weren't even twenty yet." Akane looked over her shoulder.

"Magical girls are, well, magic. Perhaps that has something to do with it." Nabiki shook her head.

"I don't think so. It looks to me like that was the result of an inhuman amount of skill and practice. The magic just adds to it." She glanced at 'Maiko', who shrugged very slightly. Akane looked at her and nodded slowly.

"It makes me feel like I've wasted my life, in one way. There's no way I'll ever be anywhere even close to that good." After a moment, she added, "But at the same time, I also know that no one I know will ever be that good either. They're as far beyond everyone I know as the rest of the martial artists in Nerima are past me. More." She shook her head. "Even... him." 'Rika' and 'Maiko' looked at each other with a small amount of guilt mixed with some amusement.

"Your father will find that DVD interesting," Nodoka said after another silence. Akane nodded absently, still staring at the blank screen of the TV. "So will my husband." She laughed a little. "It will show them that there is a lot of room for improvement." With a small shiver across her entire body Akane came back from wherever she'd gone.

"Kaede was right. That was a genuine work of art. Those two could perform that anywhere in the world and get standing ovations." She smiled, going over to the player and ejecting the disk, putting it carefully back into it's case. "I'll have to show this to Shampoo. I think she'd like it as well." She looked at 'Rika' and 'Maiko'. "Shampoo is a friend of mine from China, she comes from a tribe of warrior women and is a very good martial artist," she explained. 'Maiko' nodded.

"Yes, we met Xian Pu earlier, Nabiki introduced us." Akane looked somewhat startled at the use of the Amazon's correct Chinese name, spoken with the correct accent, but accepted it.

"Do you speak Mandarin?"

"A little bit. Not very well yet, we're both still learning." The woman studied Akane. "What do you do, aside from the martial arts? Are you going to university, or do you have a job?" Akane sat down again having put the DVD on the bookcase.

"No, I don't go to university, not yet. I would like to one day, but there are some... problems..." Appearing slightly upset for a moment she quickly cheered up. "I'm working in a jewellery ship in Furinkan, I've been there for a while now. The owner is a nice man, he pays well and he knows a lot about his business. I don't know if I want to work there forever but for the time being it's OK, and sometimes fun. You meet some interesting people." She laughed. "It's the nearest I suppose I'll come to being a magical girl, I've stopped three robberies so far. I had to be quite harsh with the last two guys that tried to steal things, they had a knife they thought would impress us." Nodoka looked at her in shock.
"You didn't mention that, Akane. When did this happen?" The youngest sister smiled, shrugging a little.

"Three days ago. It wasn't anything special. Two young guys came in, some sort of gang members I guess, waved a knife in my face, then told me to give them all the cash and some diamond rings. I said no. They got pushy, I pushed back, they left in an ambulance. Mr Ito was very pleased and gave me a bonus. The police seemed quite happy as well, apparently those guys had robbed a couple of other shops recently and got away with it." Nabiki listened with some amusement, she'd heard some of the details but not all of it. 'Maiko' looked at 'Rika' with raised eyebrows and a secretive smile, then back at Akane.

"My, that sounds quite dangerous. Weren't you frightened?" She shook her head.

"Not really. I've had some very strange things happen to me over the years. Two punks with a knife doesn't even make the top ten most worrying things this month." Smiling, she added, "It actually cheered me up, I was feeling bored. For some reason hitting something always makes me feel better." Nabiki sighed.

"That's sort of the problem, isn't it." The blue-haired girl had the grace to look abashed. Nodoka watched her with concern.

"Sorry, Nabiki. But you know what I mean, it was something to do. I'm sort of bored a lot of the time, it used to be much more exciting around here." Her sister looked unimpressed.

"Exciting is an odd way to put it. Extremely dangerous and expensive, not to mention hard on property values, would be more accurate." Nodoka glanced at the two visitors who were listening with interest.

"Nerima has something of a reputation for strange martial artists and odd occurrences. About four years ago things started to calm down a little but it's still prone to weirdness." 'Rika' smiled.

"Yes, we've heard about some of the things that go around here. It sounds very interesting." The older woman sighed a little.

"It can be very annoying. You wouldn't believe some of the things that have happened. It's almost enough to make one thing of moving to Minato because it would be more sensible. And from what I've heard that place is also very weird." 'Rika' agreed.

"It is an odd place."

"You've been there?" Akane asked with interest.

'Rika' smiled at her. "We've both visited a number of places in Minato on many occasions." Nodoka raised her eyebrows.

"Is it as mad as it sounds on the news? I'm almost afraid to go anywhere near the place." The blonde grinned.

"I don't consider it mad, personally, but it's... unusual. You see some quite strange things there, that's true." 'Maiko' snorted slightly, amused.

"You can say that again."

"Aren't you worried about being mixed up in a demon attack?" Nodoka asked with concern. "They seem to happen quite a lot, especially recently." Smiling the blonde woman shook her head.
"No, not really. That sort of thing does happen but there are quite a few people who know how to deal with it." Akane was listening intently.

"You mean magical girls. Have you met any?" 'Maiko' and 'Rika' shared a glance.

"We've bumped into a few. They're not uncommon. Most of them seem like nice people, although there are a few that seem to be a bit, um, over-enthusiastic, would be a good way of putting it." 'Rika' smiled. "I've heard that those two you were talking about, the ones from the video, are pretty good at keeping the others in line." Akane was nodding, very interested.

"I wish I could meet them, or even find out more about them. Where do they live? What do they do? Most magical girls have a secret identity of some sort. I wonder what theirs is?" Nabiki smiled at the rapid-fire questions.

"Surely the whole point of a secret identity is that it's a secret? I don't think you'll find anyone who will just tell you who they are." Her sister nodded after thinking about it for a moment.

"OK, yes, you're right." She stopped and stared at 'Maiko' for a moment, suddenly realising why her hairstyle looked familiar. "Hey, your hair is just like Yori's." 'Maiko' grinned.

"It's quite a popular hairstyle at the university. Several girls there are fans of magical girls like you are and started wearing their hair like this. Mine was long enough to do it right." She pulled her braid over her shoulder and showed it to Akane. "I even use a bow. But mine is usually red." Flipping it back over her shoulder she laughed. "One time someone even said I might be this Yori person since I had the same hairstyle and was about the right height. It took a while to convince them I was just a medical student." Nabiki smiled, while Akane looked narrowly at the young woman before laughing.

"That must have been embarrassing. But I think a martial artist wouldn't have thought that. We can usually recognise each other just by the way someone walks and holds themselves. You can see in that video how skilled and practised Yori and Chou are. No offence, but you don't move like a fighter." 'Maiko' giggled while 'Rika' exchanged a privately amused look with her sister. Nabiki was doing everything she could not to collapse in laughter.

"No offence taken. Like I said, I'm a medical student."

Akane jumped to her feet. "I'm going to go and show Shampoo that DVD. I'll see you later, Auntie, Nabiki. It was very nice to meet you both." She smiled at the two visitors. "I guess I'll see you again later as well?" 'Rika' nodded.

"Yes, we're staying here overnight, and possibly tomorrow night as well." With a wave to the room in general the youngest Tendo grabbed the DVD and left, looking excited. 'Rika' laughed slightly. "She seems in a good mood." Nodoka glanced at her with a pleased smile.

"Yes, she does. I'm glad, she's been quite down a lot of the time recently. That video from her friend seems to have cheered her up a lot." The older woman turned to the two guests. "I'm afraid that Akane has some problems." She suddenly stopped, hesitant about saying anything else. Nabiki smiled.

"It's all right, Auntie, I've told them about Akane. They know everything that's happened." Nodoka raised an eyebrow. "They're very good friends, I trust them completely."

"All right." She nodded, satisfied. 'Rika' looked back at her.

"How has Akane been recently? We heard about her having something of a downturn some weeks ago, but it's been a few weeks since we last saw Nabiki." The auburn-haired woman sighed a little.

"It's difficult to say. She has good days and bad days. Her temper has been worse, true, but it's also been better. I'd say she's made up some ground recently but she's still emotionally rather volatile." Shaking her head she looked sad. "The poor girl. I knew her mother well many years ago, she'd have been very upset about how things worked out for Akane." She glanced at 'Rika'. "Has Nabiki told you about what happened to her older sister and my son?" The blonde looked momentarily at her companion who stared impassively back, before nodding.

"Yes, she told us something about that night. It sounds both dramatic and very sad."

"It was terrible. I have never been so frightened in my entire life as when Akane snapped and nearly killed Kasumi, and then when what happened afterwards happened." She looked at the two young women. "Ah, has Nabiki explained about my son? His... curse?"

"Yes. It's a very odd sounding thing, it must have been difficult for him," 'Rika' said sympathetically. Nodoka sighed.

"It was made much more difficult by the reactions of everyone around him. Kasumi was, looking back on it with the wisdom granted by hindsight, the only person who didn't let it change how she treated him. That young lady was one in a million. Mature far beyond her years, the kindest soul I have ever known. But she was trapped here, I know that now. When Akane had her moment of temporary madness, in a strange manner she freed Kasumi, freed both of them. When Ranma stood up out of the wreckage he'd," she corrected herself with a shake of her head, "SHE'D been buried under, for three days, three days during which we didn't even think to check, it was like..." She stopped for a moment. "Like nothing I have never known. The look in her eyes was terrible. Disappointment, betrayal, pain, anger. If you'd told me that we were all going to die right there and then I would have believed you utterly. When she finally walked out the gate taking Kasumi with her, though, even after all that had happened, I thought that they'd both come back sooner or later. But I was wrong. Four years later and we have never heard another word about them." She had tears in her eyes. After a few seconds of silence she sniffed a bit and wiped them.

"Akane got much worse after that. She was never a very stable girl in some ways, she always tended to be very stubborn and to overreact to any slight from a young age from what her father and sisters told me, but after that night she was prone to the most appalling outbursts of anger and violence. It was only recently that Nabiki managed to persuade her to seek help but it has been a very rocky road since then. She has certainly improved, not to mention the fact that she finally admitted that she had a problem in the first place. To give her credit she does truly wish to become better. But it hasn't been easy for her. The whole thing is very much two steps forward one step back, except sometimes it's more a giant leap back. I wish I knew why." Looking at 'Rika' she smiled in a slightly surprised manner.

"I'm not sure why I'm telling you all this. You are very good listeners. I think you'll make good doctors, both of you."

"Thank you," 'Rika' said.

"I've told Rika and Maiko about most of what's happened with Akane's therapy," Nabiki said. "Maiko has been doing some research as a favour to me into possible causes and treatments for uncontrolled anger like Akane has and has a few leads. I need to look into it myself, there may be other doctors we can find who could help, based on what she had found, but it will take some time." Nodoka looked interested and pleased.

"That would be wonderful. Akane and Nabiki mean a lot to me. If you can find anything that can help, I would be very grateful." 'Maiko' nodded.

"We can't promise anything but we're happy to help. Nabiki is a very close friend and we know what family means to her." After a moment's pause, Nabiki stood.

"OK, thank you for lunch, Auntie. I'm going to show them around some more. We'll be back later." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' also stood and all three left the house. Nodoka sat, occupied with her own thoughts, for some time.
Cologne followed the sound of electronic music up to her great granddaughter's room, curious as to what had the young woman and someone else, Akane Tendo by the sound of it, so excited. They were talking quickly about something, gasping with surprise every now and then, and then laughing with delighted amazement. She was a little surprised how close they'd become in the last couple of months having been rivals for so long, but since the Tendo girl had been in therapy, despite some setbacks, she'd become in many ways a much nicer person to be around. The removal of Ranma from the picture, apparently permanently, had made a considerable change to both young women. Cologne still hoped to one day track the martial artist down and retrieve him for her granddaughter but in the privacy of her own head admitted that it seemed extremely unlikely this would ever happen. Wherever he'd gone, however he'd hidden himself, it was with greater skill than she could bring to bear. "Bloody Happosai," she mumbled. "I'm sure it's all his doing somehow. If I ever get my hands on that little bastard..."

In her more honest moments she also admitted to herself she was just the tiniest bit afraid of what she'd find if she did track him down. The person that had left the Tendo Dojo that night so long ago was not the person she had thought he or she was. She still had nightmares about crystal sapphire eyes burning with a barely controlled fury, radiating so much ki energy she had suddenly had no trouble at all believing that this was the person who had defeated Saffron. When Ranma and Kasumi had left the Dojo it had been almost a relief. There was a moment she'd honestly thought that it would be the day she died. In her opinion Ryoga was extremely lucky to still be alive, the way the red-head had casually backhanded him all the way across the yard without showing the slightest sign of effort or interest had been horrifying. It had been clear she was right on the edge and vastly more dangerous than anyone had ever truly realised.

Reaching the door to Shampoo's room she peered in. The Amazon warrior and Akane were sitting on the floor watching the television Shampoo had in her room, apparently playing a DVD of some sort. Cologne shook her head. This modern technological world was stranger to her in some ways than magic was, not least because it changed so fast. That said she found it very useful. Walking further into the room unnoticed she got into a position to see what was being shown on the screen, then simply stared in amazement. "Holy crap," she muttered in Mandarin.

She recognised the two young women as the ones she had seen in a news report on the television a while ago from that strange ward of Minato. The shorter girl was the same one that Shampoo had told her about from a different report before that one. The young Amazon had been right, the girl had an amazing presence, she gave the impression of being an enormously experienced warrior and martial artist despite her young age. Watching her verbally flay an entire group of powerful magical girls who were clearly frightened of her had made her laugh like an idiot. She put some two hundred year old Amazon warriors to shame the way she took command. It had struck her that it would be amusing to get the girl to the Amazon village to see what would happen, but watching the DVD she suddenly thought better of it. Shampoo had been right, if this was what she and her colleague were capable of she wanted no part of it.

The two girls were currently sparring with what looked for all the world to be swords made from pure energy, either an amazingly powerful manifestation of ki, which seemed unlikely due to their age if nothing else, or simply magic. The skill behind the fight was incredible, matched only by the speed which was astounding. She watched some more, coming to the conclusion that they were not going anywhere near as fast as they could manage. Cologne nodded slowly, watching with interest and respect. They showed considerable intelligence in not showing their full capabilities. Akane was pointing out some of the more impressive parts of the fight having obviously seen it before.
The sword fight finished, then the shorter one, 'Yori' Akane called her, started showing off her abilities at target shooting using some sort of beam weapon she seemed to be generating from her hand.

When the two young women started a set of extremely advanced katas which rapidly became synced to the music playing in the background, the band apparently cooperating with them, she sat in Shampoo's bed and just watched in admiration and awe. Both the other women fell silent, watching quietly as the two girls performed a graceful dance that was as beautiful as it was deadly. The pure skill involved was off the scale. She felt it might even dwarf that of Ranma, wondering for a moment what the result would have been if he'd gone up against either one of these women. It didn't seem likely she'd ever find out.

When the pair starting applying some special technique that produced slowly fading glowing traceries of energy from their hands she shook her head in respect. "Amazing. Truly amazing," she said quietly, once the performance came to an end. The applause that came from the crowd in the background was thoroughly deserved in her opinion. Shampoo turned to look at her not having noticed her enter the room.

"Hello, Grandmother. How much of that did you see?"

"From somewhere during the sword fight. Is there more of it?" Cologne asked curiously. Akane nodded.

"Yes, there's some sparring at the beginning. Would you like to see it?"

"Please." Akane pressed play again and restarted the video at the beginning. The elder watched with great interest. Once it reached the point she'd come in, she thanked them. "Where did you get this, Akane?"

"A friend of mine sent it to me. Her sister works in Minato somewhere, she managed to get a copy of it. Apparently this was videoed a month or so ago in a park, the two girls, Yori and Chou, were asked to put on a demonstration of their skills. What do you think?"

"I think that I wouldn't like to go up against either one of them, never mind both. The level of skill and power there is... astounding is the only word I can come up with. I wonder how they do the special techniques, is it ki or magic?" Cologne looked at her great granddaughter and her friend. They shared a glance.

"Magic, I think. They are magical girls after all." Akane smiled at the elder who looked amused.

"Yes, Akane, I understand the concept." She shook her head. "Most remarkable. Thank you. That was not only probably the most impressive demonstration of martial arts skill I have ever seen it was undoubtedly the most beautiful." Thinking it over she left the room again, while Shampoo and Akane discussed what they'd seen, ending up playing the video again half a dozen times to see if they could work out any of the moves.

"She misses you," Nabiki said a few minutes after they left the house, not going anywhere in particular, just wandering along looking around. 'Maiko' glanced at her.

"You mean my mother?"

"Yes." The martial artist sighed slightly, looking momentarily guilty, while her wife watched her with sympathy.
"I could see that. I'm sorry about it." Nabiki studied her for a few more steps.

"Do you think you can ever forgive her?"

"I forgave her a long time ago. That doesn't mean I trust her, not yet."

The middle Tendo sister nodded. "She's changed, a lot. The woman back there isn't the same one you remember from four years ago any more than you are the same person she remembers."

'Maiko' looked at her with a raised eyebrow.

"But has she changed enough? Could she accept me now, not as she wants me to be but as I am?"

Nabiki opened her mouth to speak, then closed it again. Eventually, she quietly replied, "I don't know." Her sister-in-law shrugged.

"That's the problem. We've built up a life we like with a lot of effort and sacrifice. It's not something either one of us wants to jeopardise by revealing who we are to the wrong people, or too soon. Maybe one day, but not today." 'Rika' smiled softly at her sister.

"She's right. Much as I would like to tell Akane who I am, that I'm all right and have a good life, I can't. I wish I could. Seeing her again makes me miss her and Father all the more, but it's too soon. If nothing else we need to get her mind sorted out first."Nabiki nodded slowly, sighing with an unhappy smile.

"I understand, and I guess I agree. I just think it's a shame." She fell silent for a while. "There is a time limit, though, I think. After seven years with no word from either of you they could declare you legally dead." 'Maiko' looked at her, then smiled a bit.

"We know. There are ways around that as well, if we need to." She looked ahead, recognising the street they were on. "Hey, is that ice cream place still open?" Nabiki snickered.

"Yes, it's still there and as good as ever. I assume you're in the mood for some?" The other woman grinned.

"You know me, I'm always in the mood for some ice cream. Come on, I'm buying." Five minutes later they were eating their cold treats with enjoyment.

Nabiki pushed her empty bowl away with a satisfied smile. "I do like their mint ice cream, it's fantastic." The other two nodded, still eating. Watching them with fondness, she suddenly grinned. "I thought I was going to burst at home when Akane produced that DVD then started talking about 'Yori' and 'Chou'. Her sister laughed.

"She seems to be a real fan. I hope the dolls please her." 'Maiko' snickered, finishing her own ice cream.

"If her reaction to the DVD was any guide she'll be hugely pleased." Looking at Nabiki, she added, "Any chance you could get us a copy of that disk? I'd like to have it at home, it's good as something to study and also I'm kind of impressed with the results. Whoever shot the footage was pretty good. I think Aiko and the girls might like to see it as well."

"I'll see if I can borrow it and copy it."

"Thanks." 'Maiko' turned to inspect the display of ice cream again, making Nabiki smile. 'Rika' looked at her husband with a tolerant look.
"Don't you think you've had enough?" The martial artist shook her head with a grin.

"I've never had enough. You know that. But I'll be good."

When they left the shop they had only gone a couple of hundred metres before Nabiki spotted someone coming towards them and groaned. "Crap. I don't want to deal with this." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' followed her gaze, then looked at each other and rolled their eyes. Tatewaki Kuno was walking towards them looking at the two women he didn't recognise with curiosity. He stopped a couple of metres away.

"Nabiki Tendo. Fancy meeting you here." He inspected them closely. "Two beautiful young women I have never encountered before. Why is this?" Striking a slight pose he announced grandly, "I am Tatewaki Kuno, scion of the Kuno family and Kendo expert extraordinary. May I ask you delicate flowers to favour me with your names?" 'Maiko' looked at 'Rika' with an amused expression, then turned back to Kuno. Looking him up and down, she then walked around him inspecting him closely. He followed her with his eyes curiously.

Turning to 'Rika' she asked in a haughty voice, "What do you think? Overly brash, I feel. Some decent muscular development, reasonably good looking, but there's something missing." She inspected him again with a cocked eyebrow. 'Rika' nodded.

"Yes, overall quite pleasing to the eye but..." She also walked around the young man who looked back with a confused expression. "No. No, this will never do. Nabiki dear, is this the best Nerima can offer?" Giggling inwardly Nabiki shook her head.

"No, there are some specimens that are more pleasing to the eye. This one, though, has the advantage of being from a wealthy family." 'Rika' snorted in a delicate fashion, waving her hand in a dismissive manner.

"Money is hardly the issue. It's not as if it matters to us. No, I think not." Turning to the dark-haired young man who was looking increasingly confused, she said, "Thank you for your time, my dear fellow. I'm afraid that neither of us is interested. Good day." She bowed very shallowly as did 'Maiko' then swept grandly past him. Nabiki smiled coldly at Kuno, shrugged, then followed the two other women. Kuno looked blank for several seconds before turning to watch them walk away.

"What just happened?" he asked the air, very puzzled. There was no answer.

When they were safely some distance away 'Maiko' shielded them a bit so they would remain unnoticed in case Kuno followed them. She started laughing, Nabiki joining her.

"That was brilliant. Sis, your Kodachi impression is getting steadily better. Did you see his expression? He had no idea what to do." 'Rika' began giggling and couldn't stop.

"Silly Tatewaki. He's still a very strange person." 'Maiko' chuckled. Nabiki looked at her with an amused expression.

"Says one of the strangest people I know." As 'Maiko' laughed the middle sister looked around them. "We're quite close to Ucchan's. Fancy going for some okonomiyaki?" At their dubious expression she smiled. "Come on, it's not like they have any chance of recognising you, neither one is Cologne." 'Rika' looked at her husband, who nodded.

"Why not. I haven't had one of hers for four years and they're very good." A few minutes later they stopped outside the Okonomiyaki restaurant, looking at it with interest. "It's bigger."

"Yes. About six months ago the place next door shut down and she managed to negotiate a very good price for the lease on the building, then expanded into it. She's taken on a couple more waitresses as well. Business seems to be pretty good." Entering they walked up to the counter where the young chef was working, her long hair swaying as she moved from grill to grill. Looking up she spotted Nabiki and smiled.

"Hi, Nabiki. You haven't been here in weeks." Without being asked she started grilling Nabiki's favourite, then looked curiously at the other two women. "Who are your friends?"

"My friends. This is Maiko, and Rika. You remember I mentioned them a while back?" Ukyo nodded with interest.

"Oh, yes, the medical students. You'd met them again after losing contact for a while, I remember now. Hi, pleased to meet you, I'm Ukyo Kuonji." She held out her hand over the counter. 'Maiko' shook it while sitting on a stool.

"Hi. Maiko Nakahara. This is my partner Rika Nygaard." Ukyo looked at the blonde then shook her hand as well.

"What can I get you? First one is on the house for friends of Nabiki's" 'Rika' smiled.

"That's very generous of you. Thank you." She looked at the menu. "Can I have one with ham and mushrooms, please?"

"Certainly." Turning to the smaller woman the chef smiled again. "And you?"

"Um, squid, peppers, and onions, please. Oh, and some mushrooms as well." Ukyo nodded, quickly preparing the batter and adding the toppings. Sliding Nabiki's okonomiyaki onto a plate she pushed it over to the Tendo woman.

"Here you go. So, how do you like Furinkan?" She glanced at the other two while Nabiki began eating.

'Rika' smiled. "It's very interesting. We've met most of Nabiki's family, and a friend of hers, that Chinese girl Xian Pu. She seems nice." Ukyo laughed.

"She's a lot easier to deal with nowadays. Back when we were in school there were some, well, some issues. Over a boy." 'Maiko' nodded, eating her okonomiyaki with appreciation.

"We've heard about that. I believe you, Akane, and Xian Pu were all chasing the same one?" Ukyo sighed a little, preparing an order that one of her waitresses handed her.

"Yes. It didn't end well. I miss him though." She stared into space for a moment, coming back to reality as the sound of frying on the grill changed. "Whoops." Quickly flipping the finished product onto plates she signalled the waitress, who returned and took them. "So how long are you here for?"

"Just tonight and tomorrow, probably. We've got a break in our studies but we have to get back by Monday afternoon at the latest. This was very nice, thank you," 'Rika' replied, finishing her snack. Ukyo grinned.

"Thank you. Would you like another one?" The taller woman shook her head.

"No, thanks. We had quite a large lunch not that long ago. I will come in the next time we're around her though." Ukyo seemed pleased.
Turning to Nabiki, she asked with some concern, "How is Akane doing at the moment? I haven't seen her for a while." Nabiki sighed a little pushing her empty plate away.

"Not ideal. She had something of a setback a few weeks ago. She's improved quite a bit since then but she's still prone to depression and anger." Looking momentarily amused she smiled. "She got a DVD in the post today that seems to have cheered her up quite a bit. Some video of some magical girls in a park in Minato doing the most unbelievable sequence of martial arts you've ever seen. Did you know she was so into magical girls?" Ukyo laughed and nodded.

"Sure, she's mentioned it a few times. Bit of a fan-girl I think. She was all about that bunch of colour-coded schoolgirls in miniskirts a couple of years ago, but since then she seems to have decided they're not interesting enough. Last I heard she was trying to find out more information on a new pair, um, Yuki and Chou?" Nabiki grinned.

"Yori and Chou."

"Oh. Yes, that's right. She seems to be a little obsessed with them for some reason. They were on the news a few times, something about them dealing with various nasty demons in Minato somewhere then giving some other magical girls a hard time. I saw one of the reports, it was hysterical. The little one was laying into the other girls like something out of a military training movie. They were practically standing to attention." She snickered at the memory. Nabiki giggled.

"Yes, I heard about that. That one is Yori, the other one, Chou, is a lot quieter. She seems rather intimidating though from what I've heard." Out of the corner of her eye she saw her disguised sister exchange glances with 'Maiko' who smiled a little and shrugged.

"OK, right. Anyway, she's pretty keen on them right now. Was it them on the DVD?"

"Yes. It's fairly incredible." Ukyo seemed interested.

"I'd like to see that. I'll have to stop by when I get a moment. I'd like to see Akane again in any case."

"How's Konatsu?" Nabiki asked, putting her elbows on the counter. Ukyo smiled.

"Doing very well, actually. He's out getting some supplies at the moment, you just missed him." She looked like she was remembering something nice. Nabiki watched her face with amusement, glancing at the other two who were doing the same.

"So, is there going to be a permanent arrangement in the future?" she asked with a grin. Ukyo looked at her for a moment, then slowly nodded.

"I think so. Not quite yet, but perhaps sometime after Christmas."

"Congratulations, in advance." The middle Tendo sister laughed. "Finally one of the old crew being taken out of the pool permanently." Ukyo shrugged.

"I guess so. I suppose it's time now, after four years." Looking at her curiously Nabiki thought for a moment.

"So, if he turned up again now, what would you do?" she asked slowly. Ukyo sighed.

"Nothing. I gave up on that dream years back, I saw it for what it was. It would never have worked out anyway, I came to that conclusion a long time ago. Wherever he is, I hope he's happy. Kasumi too. I miss both of them, I'd like to see them again, especially Ranma, but mainly to say goodbye."
I'm very happy with Konatsu, happier than I think either one of us would have been if I'd got my way back in school." She looked slightly melancholy. "It's a matter of shame to me that my actions helped drive him away. I wish I could apologise for that. I know how much he tried to balance all the various things pulling him this way and that, all for honour. The funny thing is that I now think the only one with true honour all that time was him." The chef fell silent as the others looked at each other. "Oh well. Too late now." She shrugged unhappily.

Nabiki smiled at her with affection. "Don't be sad, Ukyo. It'll all work out for you and Konatsu, I'm sure. Twenty years from now none of this will matter." Ukyo nodded briefly.

"You're probably right. It just kind of makes me a bit sad to think about it, you know?" Cheering up with a visible effort of will, she smiled brightly at the two visitors. "Please come back next time you're in Nerima." The other waitress handed her an order. "Excuse me, this is a big one." Nabiki nodded, as they all got up.

"Thanks, Ukyo. See you around. Give my best to Konatsu, will you?"

"Sure. Bye, Nabiki." They left the restaurant and headed back towards the Dojo, walking slowly.

"Poor Ukyo," 'Maiko' said after a while. "Another one I never wanted to hurt. That said, she was as much part of the problem as all the others were."

"Don't worry. In the end I think she came out of it better than almost any of them. She's smart as well as stubborn. When the situation changed she was forced to re-evaluate her life and worked out how mistaken she'd been. I don't know exactly how she sorted things out with her father but she did. They'll be fine."

Arriving back at the Dojo they entered, finding Nodoka in the garden looking at the pond. She glanced up as she heard them come out of the house. "The koi are looking a bit sluggish, even for this time of year," she said, smiling at them. "I think the last fight that ended up here may have disturbed the water balance. I'll have to get a water test kit and check it." She walked over to the group of three young women near the porch. "Did you have a nice time?"

"Yes, Auntie," Nabiki replied. "We wandered around for a while, saw the area, had some ice cream, then went to Ucchan's for some okonomiyaki." Nodoka laughed.

"Right after lunch? You must have been hungry. I'm sorry, I thought I'd made enough." 'Maiko' grinned at her.

"Don't worry, lunch was very nice. We were offered a free okonomiyaki by Miss Kuonji and it would have been rude to refuse. They're very good." The older woman nodded.

"They are indeed. So, what do you think of Furinkan?" 'Rika' laughed a little.

"It seems nice. There are some slightly strange people here though. We met one young man, Tatewaki, was it, Nabiki?" The middle sister nodded with a grin. "He seemed a little..." Nodoka started laughing.

"Oh, he is a little. One might even saw he was a lot. Very odd family the Kunos. The young man, underneath his peculiar demeanour and leaving his somewhat strange attitude to women apart, is actually quite a nice fellow. None too bright but I believe he mostly means well. That said he and my son didn't get along at all." Nabiki looked unconvinced.

"Auntie, he's an overbearing idiot. Don't forget what he did to Akane, or at least was responsible for starting." The auburn-haired woman sighed a little.
"I haven't forgotten. What he did was not at all good, but I maintain it was out of ignorance rather than maliciousness. I've had several very nice conversations with the boy, he can be quite charming." She shook her head. "The sister is another matter altogether, she's definitely not all there. I think she's actually quite smart but she's also very arrogant and pushy. Even so, she can also be rather pleasant to talk to on occasion." Nabiki looked appalled.

"Kodachi? Pleasant? She's completely nuts!"

"Well, I'll admit she can be difficult and very irritating, especially when she's teasing Akane. But she hasn't done that since you lectured her that time some months ago. In fact, I haven't seen much of her at all and the last time I did meet her she was surprisingly polite." Nodoka laughed slightly. "I think you unsettled her considerably. I have to say the expression on her face was extremely amusing. I don't think I've ever seen the young lady actually look confused before." Nabiki grinned at this.

"Oh, that was very funny and satisfying, I admit. You're right, she looked completely overwhelmed." She giggled. "Speaking of that, you should have seen how Rika and Maiko handled Tatewaki a while ago." Nodoka looked curious, so they took turns explaining. The Saotome woman laughed delightedly.

"Oh dear, he must have been very surprised. Well done, both of you, that sounds like it was very funny." 'Rika' laughed.

"It was. The poor young man had no idea what to do, we were able to make our escape while he was trying to figure it out." 'Maiko' was grinning.

"Nabiki has told us quite a lot about the Kuno family. They sound very unstable to me I have to say." Nodding, the older woman agreed.

"I'm afraid they are. The father is the worst, he's certifiable. If it wasn't for his financial and political influence he would probably be in some form of institution by now, possibly accompanied by his daughter. It's a pity, I think the children would have been quite nice with a different upbringing."

"We can't pick our parents, unfortunately," 'Maiko' said with a slight grin. Her wife kicked her in the ankle, just a little bit. Nabiki noticed although Nodoka didn't as she'd turned away to look over the garden. The middle sister hid a smile as the older woman looked back at them.

"So what are your plans for the rest of your time here?" 'Rika' looked thoughtful, glancing at her sister and husband.

"We have no definite plans. I think we may go out to see a movie, possibly, otherwise this is just a pleasant break from routine. It's nice to meet Nabiki's family and friends, we've been told quite a lot about most of them."

"All right, that sounds nice. I have to go out now but I'll be back by the early evening." Nodoka looked at Nabiki. "My husband and your father are due back around seven or eight, I believe. I should be back by then. They'll probably be, um, well-lubricated if you take my meaning." She sighed a little as Nabiki nodded. "If I'm not back, can you try to keep them from doing or saying anything particularly stupid? Either to Akane or your friends?"

"Yes, Auntie," Nabiki said with a small cold smile. "I can keep them under control, don't worry. If they try anything I'll set Maiko loose on them." At Nodoka's puzzled look she added, "Remember, I learned the technique that brought Kodachi to heel from her. It's almost a martial art and she is an
"I've been told I have a commanding presence when I'm annoyed," she explained lightly. "I think it's just that people don't expect a petite woman to shout quite so much, I'm nothing special otherwise. Blame my upbringing, it was a bit non-traditional." Nodoka smiled.

"That's quite common around here. OK, girls, I'm off now. I will see you later. Have fun." Re-entering the house she disappeared. The three left behind all looked at each other.

"Can't pick our parents." Nabiki snorted with humour. "Said to your mother of all people." The shorter woman snickered.

"Sorry, couldn't help it." 'Rika' sighed gently.

"Be nice, dear." Laughing, they went back into the house. The next few hours passed quietly. They looked around the place some more, recovering old memories of when they'd lived there, their conversations shielded just in case anyone came in. While they were the only ones there the disguised Kasumi went in to the Dojo to pay her respects at her mother's shrine, resuming her own appearance while the others stood guard. When she came back out a few minutes later, as 'Rika' once more, she was crying slightly. Her female husband held her until she recovered, while Nabiki leaned against her for comfort.

"Thank you," she said, wiping her eyes, as 'Maiko' released her. "I needed to do that, I've missed it for so long."

"I understand, sis." Walking around the garden the three of them talked for a while, before Akane came back, in a very good mood.

"Oh, hi, Nabiki." She grinned at her sister as she and her friends came inside. "Shampoo loves the video. Cologne saw it as well and I've never seen her so impressed." 'Maiko' and 'Rika' looked at each other for a moment. "We've been trying to work out how they do some of those techniques. Between us we counted at least twenty different styles they were using in the kata section as well, we only recognise about a third of them. Even Cologne had never seen more than half. It's like Anything Goes taken to the most incredible level." Nabiki waited for her sister to stop chattering, she hadn't seen her this excited for a long time.

"Can I borrow that disk, Akane? I'd like to watch it myself." Handing her sister the case, Akane nodded.

"Yes, sure. Don't lose it though, I want it back. Father and Genma will want to see it as well." She stopped for a moment, thinking. "I know. Shampoo and I should go to Minato and see if we can meet Yori and Chou." Slightly alarmed, Nabiki glanced at the two women listening quietly. They looked back, 'Maiko' shrugging a little.

"Ah, I don't think it would be quite that easy. It's not like they have an office or anything, they're magical girls. Presumably they turn up when a demon does and I doubt you want to be around for that." Akane waved her hands excitedly.

"No, no, Kaede says they often wander around just helping out, not like most of the others." She nodded to herself. "I should call Kaede and find out exactly where they are most." Smiling at the others she pulled her cell phone out of her pocket and began dialling, going up the stairs. As she entered her room, just before the door closed, they heard her say, "Kaede? Hi, I got the DVD, tha..." The closing of the door to her bedroom cut her voice off. Downstairs there was silence for a "Hmm." 'Rika' looked at her husband. "This could be a problem." Nabiki sighed a little, but smiled as well.

"Figures the one thing that's made her happy in months is the one thing we really didn't need."

"It shouldn't be a problem. 'Maiko' said, a small grin on her face. "Better we get some warning. If we hadn't come all this would have happened anyway and she and Shampoo might have turned up unexpectedly. The odds of bumping into them is pretty low, they'll probably give up if we don't meet them, and we can feel both of them coming for some distance so we can avoid them if necessary." She chuckled. "On the other hand, perhaps we should meet them just to get it over with." Nabiki got a thoughtful look.

"Or..." she thought some more, glancing up the stairs to make sure Akane was still in her room.

"Or what?" 'Rika' asked curiously, studying her sister.

"Well, if you did happen to meet Akane, maybe some reason might present itself for you to check her out. Then we wouldn't have to muck around with that ridiculously convoluted plan of yours." Both women exchanged glances, then slowly nodded. 'Rika' abruptly looked disappointed.

"I like my convoluted plan."

"Fine, you can keep it as a backup, then." Smiling at her sister, Nabiki added, "But if you happen to get the chance to bypass it I think you should do so." 'Maiko' was thinking about it.

"It's not a bad idea. No offence, love, but the other plan was a little overcomplicated and 'mission impossible'." At her wife's pout, she smiled. "We can use it some other time."

"The question remains how do we come up with an excuse to scan Akane even if she does meet us?" 'Rika' asked. They all thought about it for a while. Finally 'Maiko' shrugged.

"Not sure. Let's just see what happens. If she doesn't turn up, we go with plan A."

All three of them went to Nabiki's room, where she turned on the computer and within twenty minutes had made two copies of the DVD, one for herself and one for 'Maiko'. Handing it to her she grinned. "I really do want to see it again, that performance was unbelievable. I told you you just needed to set it to music."

"It was a lot of fun," her sister said, remembering it with a faint smile. "We've done demonstrations for people before, but that time was something special." Giggling, she went on, "Poor Lieutenant Harrison looked like he'd seen a ghost. Inspector Deveraux wasn't much better."

The two fathers did turn up before Nodoka returned, staggering in through the door with wide grins, Genma holding a bottle of sake, while Soun was carrying some take out ramen boxes. Entering the living room where Nabiki and her two visitors were talking about university life with Akane, they stared owlishly around, then each flopped down into a seat. "Hello Father," Nabiki said dryly, rolling her eyes a little. "Did you and Uncle Genma have a nice time?" Soun smiled a little tipsily, managing after the third attempt to put the boxes he was holding on the table.

"Yes, Nabiki, it was a lot of fun. We nearly won the championship." Genma swigged from the bottle and thumped it down.

"We would have won if everyone wasn't cheating." Nabiki exchanged a look of amusement with "You mean, if everyone wasn't cheating better than you two, I imagine." They had the grace to look slightly shame-faced. The middle sister laughed while the other women smiled slightly. "These are my friends Rika and Maiko. Please be polite." Both fathers studied the two women for a moment then decided the food was more interesting. They were soon shovelling it in. Looking slightly disgusted, Nabiki asked, "Did you bring enough for everyone?" in a somewhat sarcastic tone. Soun nodded, his mouth full.

"I suppose I don't need to make dinner, then. Pity, it was going to be very nice." Akane grinned at her.

"Don't worry, Auntie, there wasn't much for us. We could eat." She looked at her father who was half asleep, and Genma who was twice that. "I think they're full though."

"Oh, joy. Right, Nabiki, would you help me in the kitchen?" 'Rika' smiled at her.

"Would you like me to help? I know my way around a kitchen quite well." Considering the offer for a moment, Nodoka nodded.

"That's very kind of you, dear. Yes, please, if you would. You girls, can you please clear all this up? And move them if you can wake them up." Staring at the two men with irritation she shook her head, then went into the kitchen, followed by 'Rika'. Akane and Nabiki, helped by 'Maiko', quickly cleared up the room, then got rid of the two fathers. Akane had to bodily carry Genma up to his room as he was deeply asleep, or in a drunken stupor as Nabiki rather unkindly put it. She poked her father in the ribs unmercifully until he woke.

"Go to bed, Father." Mumbling, he struggled to his feet and staggered out. She watched him go with a smile and a sigh, then turned to the others. "I don't like to see him like that. It doesn't happen very often nowadays but it brings back unhappy memories," she commented to 'Maiko' while Akane nodded.

"At least they seemed in a good mood," her friend said. "That's something." Akane helped Nabiki set the table while 'Maiko' joined her wife helping Nodoka in the kitchen.

"You certainly do know your way around a kitchen, dear," Nodoka commented, watching as 'Rika' deftly made a white sauce. The other woman smiled.

"Thank you. I'm not as good as my mother but I like cooking." 'Maiko' laughed.

"And I like eating, so it all works out." The elder woman watched as she prepared some vegetables, her eyebrows going up.

"You seem to know which end of a knife to hold as well," she said with a grin. The brunette with the long braid smiled.

"Rika has been teaching me for years. I'm not as good as she is and probably never will be but I think I've learned quite a bit." She looked up from her work. "Nabiki has told us some odd things about Akane's cooking skills," she commented in a low voice. Nodoka shuddered.
"I would debate whether her skills should be referred to as 'cooking'. They're impressive I'll grant you, but I'm not entirely sure what they are." 'Maiko' shot her a grin, while 'Rika' giggled.

"Surely it can't be that bad?"

The elder Saotome glanced at the blonde with a small sigh. "Trust me. Whatever you're thinking it's worse. Much, much worse." The meal was served half an hour later, all five women sitting around the table. "Very nice. Thank you, Rika." Nodoka looked impressed, tasting the food, while the other woman smiled happily.

"You're welcome."

Nodoka looked around at the four younger women. "Did you all have a nice day?" she asked. Akane nodded, slurping down her food with appreciation. When she finished her mouthful she started talking, nearly choking for a second. "Slowly, Akane." The blue haired woman blushed slightly, taking a drink to clear her throat.

"Shampoo and I watched that DVD about eight or nine times. We want to find out more about Yori and Chou, they're amazing. I called Kaede and found out where the video was made, it's an up-scale part of Minato near the bay. We're going to go there and see if we can meet them." Nodoka looked startled.

"Is that a good idea? How would you find them, even? I understand these magical girls tend to protect their real identities quite effectively."

"Kaede says they're often spotted walking around just keeping an eye on the area. They're not like most of the others, they don't just go after demons, apparently they have a very strong reputation as protectors of the community in general. They've saved lots of lives from things as mundane as falling off buildings or car accidents. People there really like them." She looked impressed, while Nodoka nodded approvingly.

"That's good. People so powerful helping the less powerful like that is a very honourable thing to do. The more I hear about these two the more impressed I am." Nabiki glanced at her two visitors. 'Rika' smiled privately at her over her cup while 'Maiko' winked.

"Still, there's no guarantee you'll just bump into them, presumably. You both have jobs as well, when are you going to have time to go?" Akane deflated slightly.

"Oh. Um. Perhaps during the evening? Or next weekend." She nodded to herself. "Yes. We can try during the evening this week, and if that doesn't work, on Sunday we both have the entire day available." Shaking her head slightly, Nabiki grinned at her enthusiastic sister.

"Well, good luck. I don't think you're going to simply find them walking down the street, but if you do see if you can get their autographs for me." 'Maiko' snickered and she looked severely at her. "Hey, they might be worth real money one day." This made the other woman start laughing. After a moment Nabiki joined in. 'Rika' simply watched them with a long-suffering expression.

After the meal Nabiki went up to her room, returning shortly with Akane's DVD. "Thanks, sis. Here you go." Akane took it with a smile and put it carefully beside the DVD player.

"I'll show it to Father in the morning." The table was soon cleared and the dishes washed, 'Maiko' helping Nodoka load the dishwasher. The older woman made a pot of tea and brought it back into the living room. 'Maiko' and 'Rika' were sitting next to each other holding hands with Akane surreptitiously studying them. Nodoka could see they were both obviously aware of the scrutiny, as could Nabiki, but didn't mind. Tea was poured and distributed. A few minutes later 'Rika' looked directly at Akane, who jumped a little.

"Do you have a question, Akane? Only I can't help but noticing you seem to be very interested in us." She smiled making it clear she wasn't offended. Akane went red and chewed her lip.

"Um." She chewed it some more while everyone waited patiently. "You're... involved? With each other, I mean?" she asked in an embarrassed tone of voice. 'Rika' smiled gently at her.

"Yes." Akane nodded absently still looking at them. "Do you have a problem with that?" she asked. Shaking her head the youngest Tendo woman kept looking.

"No, I guess not. It's just... well, I find it kind of... weird." 'Rika' raised an eyebrow and she hastily added, "Sorry, I don't mean it like that."

"How do you mean it?" 'Maiko' asked her curiously. Once more she seemed slightly stuck.

"When I was younger I sort of got very angry about things like this. Things that were... perverted," she said by way of explanation. 'Rika' and 'Maiko' exchanged a glance.

"Perverted? I don't think we're perverted, do you, dear?" 'Rika' asked her partner with a smile. 'Maiko' shook her head, grinning a little.

'We're many things, but I'm fairly sure perverted isn't one of them. Nabiki? Are we perverted?" The middle sister laughed.

"Insane, yes. Annoying, yes. Perverted? I don't think so." Nodoka chuckled, making them all look at her. She seemed slightly embarrassed and went quiet again, motioning for them to continue. She was finding this quite interesting on several levels.

"But, two women together? That's not normal." Akane was aware she was digging herself in deeper but couldn't help it. If it wasn't for the fact that both of Nabiki's friends seemed so nice she'd never even have raised the subject, but now she had she couldn't let it lie for some reason. 'Maiko' giggled while 'Rika' looked amused.

"Normal is a matter of opinion. I know a significant number of same sex couples, so to me it's completely normal. It may not be traditional I'll admit, but even there if you look at history it's been a large part of many cultures for thousands of years. It's not something you choose, it's who you are. Do you understand?" The youngest sister looked slightly confused but nodded slowly.

"I guess so. I don't know, I haven't met any..."

"Lesbians?" 'Maiko' prompted when Akane seemed to run out of words. She nodded, blushing again.

"Yes. That. I haven't met any before." Nabiki looked at her and grinned.

"How do you know?"

Startled, Akane looked at her. "What do you mean? Of course I'd know."

"How? Why? For all you know some of the girls you went to school with were lesbians, it's not like anyone would have admitted it to you at the time. Your attitude to anything you called perverted was well known. You seemed to classify all males and some females like that, which caused lots of fights. Just think of poor Ranma!" Akane's face darkened at the name, but she controlled her temper with more maturity than Nabiki had expected, possibly because they had visitors.

"He was a pervert. Always dressing in women's clothes, looking at me in the bathroom..." Nabiki sighed, exchanging glances with Nodoka.

"Oh, for heavens sake, Akane, we've been over this so many times. You were the one that walked in on him the few times that happened. He was very careful and respectful about it. And the women's clothing thing is just silly. Even when he was female you could only get him into female clothing with a lot of argument, even though there was nothing wrong with it. When he was a woman he was completely a woman, you know that as well as I do, so wearing women's clothing was fine by anybody's standards." Her sister crossed her arms and stared daggers at her.

"You didn't know him like I did."

"In many ways I think I knew him a lot better than you did. At least I talked to him, basically you just shout at him then hit him." Noticing her sisters complexion taking on a hue that suggest imminent danger, she raised her hands. "But that's in the past. Forget it. Get back to the subject at hand. Like I said, it's quite possible you do know some lesbians except they're just not telling you about it out of self-preservation. But surely you can see from Maiko and Rika that there's nothing wrong with it?" Akane calmed down and glanced at the two women under discussion who were watching with amused and tolerant expressions.

"I... guess so." She kept looking at them then away, still embarrassed. 'Rika' smiled and pulled her currently female husband in for a kiss, making Akane stare until she realised she was being rude. Nodoka watched with some interest and a slight smile while Nabiki grinned.

"You see? Nothing to be ashamed of. We love each other, that's all there is to it." After a moment Akane nodded very slowly, thinking about it. The others looked at each other. It seemed that the youngest sister had been given something to think about. She remained quiet for the next hour or so, studying them with covert interest, before excusing herself for an early night.

"That was interesting," Nodoka said once she was sure the youngest Tendo was out of earshot. Nabiki nodded.

"Yes. Very." Turning to her guests she said, "We may be on the right track. I guess we'll have to wait and see." She looked at Nodoka, opening her mouth to explain, when the older woman beat her to it.

"You think Akane might be a lesbian but can't admit it to herself." The others all looked rather surprised.

"Um, well, yes, that's sort of what we were considering." Nabiki inspected the older woman with surprise. "I didn't expect you to think of it though." Nodoka looked amused.

"I'm not completely stupid. I've wondered about Akane for years, there's something a little odd about how dead-set against sexual matters in general she is, not to mention her thinking that most perfectly normal expressions of attraction are perverted. I've been considering the idea that she was attracted to women on some level for quite a while. It would explain some of the stranger aspects of her relationship with my son to some degree, better than most of the other reasons I could come up with." Nabiki and the others were looking at her oddly. She grinned. "Didn't expect the old woman to think of all that, did you?" ‘Rika' smiled at her with gentle amusement.

"You're hardly old. And I believe you may well be right from what Nabiki has told us."
"Well, perhaps meeting you two will help her work some of this out for herself. God knows it's time she grew up in these matters, she's still very immature in many ways." She sighed a little. "I love the girl like my own daughter but she can be very difficult to live with." After a moment's silence she stood. "Right. I'm off to bed as well. Don't stay up too late you three. Good night." Smiling at them she left the room. They were silent until 'Maiko' nodded with a distant expression for a moment.

"OK, we're shielded. No one will hear anything." She looked at the other two with a surprised smile. "I have to admit I never expected Mom to come out with that! You may be right, she's changed quite a bit."

"We all have, dear. Some more visibly than others. I think your mother has learned a lot from the last few years." 'Maiko' nodded thoughtfully.

"Apparently. Still not in a hurry to tell her yet, though. There's all the rest to think about as well."

"You've met most of the people from your old life. There's still Genma and our father to go, Cologne, and Ryoga, I guess. And perhaps Kodachi." Nabiki looked amused as the disguised Ranma shuddered at the last name. "Not keen on her are you?" 'Maiko' shook her head.

"No, that woman always gave me the creeps. There's something... not right. I don't know what, like Mom said she can sometimes even seem normal for a while, but underneath it all there is a real problem. Much worse than Akane." 'Rika' looked sad.

"Poor girl."

"I have to admit I'm not happy about meeting Cologne just yet. Like I said earlier I'm pretty damn sure she'll never guess who we are but I don't want to take the risk. At least right now. We really don't need her popping up when we still have possibly six very nasty demons to deal with, not to mention all the normal chaos. Leaving aside the fact I like our life now, I don't want any of the old crap getting mixed up with it." 'Maiko' put her feet on the table and looked at them, until 'Rika' softly cleared her throat. Nabiki grinned as she put them back on the floor with an abashed look. "Sorry, love."

"What are you going to do about Akane and Shampoo, then?" Nabiki asked curiously after a moment. 'Rika' smiled, glancing at her husband.

"I suppose we'll have to give them the chance of meeting a pair of magical girls."

"Martial artists," the shorter woman said with a sigh. Her wife laughed.

"As far as they're concerned it's magical girls. Think about it, that's one more level of misdirection. It's a good thing." She and her sister both giggled at the expression on the face of the third woman. Leaning into her side she put her arm around the long haired brunette's shoulders and hugged her. "Don't look so sour, dear, it doesn't suit you."

"We can keep an eye out for them and meet them, I suppose. Hopefully nothing weird will happen at the same time, but the way our life goes I wouldn't put money on it," 'Maiko' said slightly irritably.

"But it's never boring," Nabiki quipped, making them both laugh again.

"Very true."

They talked for a while, before heading for bed. Inside Kasumi's old room, once the door was closed, the two married people stared at each other for a moment. "This feels very strange," 'Rika' said to her husband, who nodded.

"I know. I have to admit I never thought either one of us would be back here, never mind as invited guests." They climbed into bed, snuggling close.

"Do you regret coming?" 'Rika' asked curiously. Her husband shook her head, already half asleep.

"No. I think you were right, as usual. This was something we needed to do." Shortly after that they were asleep, the disguised Kasumi smiling gently to herself with her arms around the love of her life.
Genma ate his breakfast, looking at the two unfamiliar young women sitting next to Nabiki with puzzlement. He glanced at Soun who shrugged. Nabiki spotted their bemused expressions and sighed irritably. "Oh, come on! You can't have been that drunk last night, surely?" The two men looked at each other again. "These are my friends Rika and Maiko. I introduced them to you less than twelve hours ago." At their blank looks she frowned while the two women under discussion smiled. Akane snickered and Nodoka rolled her eyes.

"Pleased to meet you both," Soun said, still seeming slightly confused. 'Maiko' grinned at him.

"And you. Again."

"Um, yes. Quite. So, you're friends of Nabiki's?"

"Yes, we're medical students. We met at University."

Enlightenment crossed his face. "Oh. I remember. Yes, Nabiki has said quite a lot about you." Genma seemed to suddenly remember also and nodded, still eating.

"She's also said quite a lot about both of you." They glanced at each other as she looked meaningfully at them. Not knowing quite how to respond Soun smiled weakly and concentrated on his breakfast. As they finished Akane looked up.

"Father, you have to watch this DVD a friend of mine sent me. It's incredible. Your students should see it as well." Nabiki felt that this was starting to get out of hand but couldn't think of any way to stop it. Sharing a look with 'Rika' and 'Maiko' she shrugged a little. They both returned it. Jerking her head towards the door she went out of the room, while they followed.

"Is this a good idea? Letting all these people see that video? It seems to be attracting a lot of attention." 'Maiko' looked mildly annoyed but smiled nonetheless.

"Not a lot we can do about it. Even if we 'disappeared' Akane's copy, she could get another one from her friend. To be honest I'm very surprised it's taken this long for it to pop up considering the number of people with cameras in the park that day. It seems people back home really don't want to upset the status quo."

'Rika' nodded. "Anyway, if we didn't mind people seeing it we wouldn't have done it. It's a little strange having Akane of all people get so excited, especially under the circumstances but perhaps it will be a good thing. It certainly seems to have cheered her up."

"True. She's more upbeat than I've seen her for some weeks." Nabiki sighed. "Oh well. I just hope it doesn't blow up in our faces, that's all."

"It won't," 'Maiko' assured her. "It's weird but nothing we haven't dealt with before one way or another. It might even be fun." She smiled evilly. "We can amuse ourselves quite a lot with Shampoo and Akane, I think." After a moment, she looked thoughtful. "Hey, do you want to see it? When Akane leaves for Minato you could call ahead, I could ask Aiko to discreetly pick you up so you'd be there when they turned up. With a suitable disguise and the bracelet they'll never know."

Nabiki looked surprised, then got much the same expression as the other woman was still wearing.

"Hmm. That's an interesting idea. Yes, I think that might be a lot of fun. You're on, I'll call you as soon as they leave." 'Rika' was listening with a small smile.
"Don't be mean to Akane, both of you." They exchanged glances.

"We'll be good," they chorused, then laughed. Inside the living room Akane shivered for a moment. Turning back to her father she waved the DVD case.

"Look, you all have to see this. I'll bring the DVD player and TV out into the Dojo and set it up, your students will be here in about half an hour, right?" He nodded, glancing at Genma, who looked both curious and puzzled.

"What's so interesting about that DVD, Akane," the Saotome man asked. She laughed.

"Just the most unbelievable martial arts you've ever seen in your life. Trust me, I think you'll all find it amazing. Go and get ready, your students will be here soon." Both the men looked at each other, rather bemused, then left the room. The youngest sister was unplugging the TV as Nabiki and her friends re-entered. Watching her for a moment the brunette exchanged glances with the other two then looked back to Akane.

"Um, where are you going with that?" Nabiki asked curiously as Akane picked the device up. She grinned.

"Out to the Dojo. You can help, grab the DVD player and remote will you?" Walking out the door she disappeared towards the Dojo, leaving the others to look after her with raised eyebrows.

"Well, she seems in a good mood at any rate," 'Maiko' said after a moment. Nabiki nodded absently, picking up the remote for the TV and DVD player. 'Rika' took the player itself with it's cables. 'Maiko' shrugged and followed them, picking up the DVD case which Akane had forgotten on her way out. Inside the training hall Akane was setting up the TV on a bench and looked up as 'Rika' handed her the player.

"Thanks." Grabbing it she put it next to the TV and started connecting the cables. Soun and Genma came out of the back room and watched her for a moment before turning to greet one of the students who came in just then. A few minutes later everything was set up and two more students had arrived. 'Maiko' and 'Rika' wandered around the room looking at things while they waited for the rest to come in, while Nabiki sat beside Akane and talked quietly to her. She noticed out of the corner of her eye that as time went on 'Maiko' was drifting further and further away from Genma, occasionally casting unreadable glances his way.

Eventually the whole class had turned up. The youngest Tendo got up and walked over to her father. Smiling at him she turned to students. "I wanted to show you all something a friend of mine sent me yesterday. It was videoed in a park in Minato around a month ago. I think you'll like it, it shows what martial arts can really become." Everyone turned to look at the TV as she pressed play.

'The sound of eleven jaws dropping simultaneously is a wonderful thing,' Nabiki thought with a grin. Looking at her sister and sister-in-law she saw they were obviously thinking much the same. No sound but that from the TV disturbed the room until the DVD finished, when Akane turned it off. She looked at her father. After a long moment he looked back, tears in his eyes.

"Thank you," he said quietly. Genma seemed unable to articulate anything, while all the students were looking at each other in disbelief.

"Who the hell are those two girls?" Genma finally said. Akane glanced at him.

"They're called Yori and Chou. The shorter one is Yori. I don't know much more about them. They work out of a fairly small area in Minato quite close to the bay. Their reputation is basically as the most dangerous magical girls in Minato, but I think it's pretty obvious that they're also incredible martial artists as well." Her father nodded slowly.

"That's an understatement if anything is. I have never seen anything even approaching that before. It was... extraordinary. How many different styles did you see, Genma? I lost count at something over twenty-two, but half of those I didn't recognise." The other martial artist looked at him.

"I made it to twenty-four, I think. You're right, most of them were new to me, or at such a high level they were almost unrecognisable. I thought I saw some Anything Goes moves in there as well, or something that looked like it, both our schools in fact, but I can't be sure. Where the hell could they have learned all that? Even the boy didn't know all those disciplines and he soaked it up like a sponge." Soun shrugged.

"I have no idea. They only looked about eighteen or nineteen as well. I'd say the black-haired one was probably the better of the two but the other girl was incredible as well. Not to mention the special techniques. I've never heard of anything like those at all. If it was ki manipulation it was to an almost impossible level. I don't know much about magic but I would think it would be similarly difficult." He shook his head in wonder. "The katas at the end were beautiful as well as enormously impressive. A true art form." Turning to his youngest daughter he asked, "Play it again, please, Akane." With a smile she did so. The two martial artists and their students sat and watched once more. Nabiki looked over to 'Rika' and 'Maiko' who were by now at the other end of the Dojo, motioning slightly with her head towards the door. They nodded and moved in that direction. No one else noticed engrossed as they were with the images on the TV screen.

Outside the Dojo Nabiki turned to her companions. "Is there going to be a problem with either of them recognising Anything Goes forms in all of that?" With a look to 'Rika' her husband shook her head a little.

"I don't think so. Pop said he couldn't be sure, and after all a lot of Anything Goes is basically based on modifying and combining different styles anyway. We've changed and improved it so much over the last few years what we do doesn't bear a lot of resemblance to what they're teaching now. Happosai taught us both a lot of things he never taught either of them as well, things that are much more advanced than even your father knows. I don't use Pop's signature moves a lot, the more dangerous ones, and certainly not in demonstrations, so that shouldn't be an issue either." She smiled. "It's pretty unlikely that any of that will lead any of them down the right path. We've filtered out most of the things that might have caused suspicion from our own style and whatever's left could just be a coincidence." Nabiki looked slightly worried still but accepted this, it was after all their field of expertise.

"I'll take your word for it." Walking back into the house they sat in the living room, where Nodoka had cleared up after breakfast before going out. "So, what do you want to do next?"

"Not be too close to Pop, certainly." 'Maiko' looked slightly worried. "I'm sorry, I'm trying not to let it upset me, but I keep finding that if I think too much about being near him all the old memories tend to come back. It's a bit weird, that doesn't seem to happen nearly as much with the others, but he really triggers some things I don't want to remember." 'Rika' looked at her with sympathy, reaching out and holding her hand. "Sorry, love. I'm trying, but it's still difficult. I thought I could do better after all this time but..." She shrugged.

"It's not your fault. I should have realised. You've done so well, especially around Akane. Perhaps this was a mistake." 'Maiko' smiled at her.

"No, it wasn't a mistake. This was something you needed to do more than I needed not to do. I know how much you've wanted to come her for so long. And I needed to know as well. For me, in some ways, it's too soon. The funny thing is that Akane and Mom don't affect me nearly as much. Mom still makes me a bit upset, but Akane mostly makes me sorry for her." 'Rika' squeezed her hand.

Nabiki watched and listened to them. "I'm sorry I pushed you two into this." Her sister-in-law smiled.

"Don't be. I'll be fine, I just need to stay away from him as much as possible."

"I guess you were around your father more than practically anyone in your life," Nabiki said, "it's not that surprising that he would provoke the strongest feelings."

'Maiko' nodded. "True, I suppose. Oh well, this is all something we each needed for our own reasons."

"Come on," Nabiki said, standing suddenly. "Let's go and see a movie. There's a new American action one that just started last week which I want to see, it looks suitably silly. Lots of explosions and special effects, you know the thing." 'Maiko' grinned.

"OK. Although we could probably do better just by filming a week in Minato." Nabiki laughed.

"You could try, but I think you'd find that everyone would say it was too unrealistic." 'Rika' and 'Maiko' both started giggling. The three of them left the house and spent most of the rest of the day out, seeing the movie first then just looking around Furinkan some more. They stopped for lunch at a small restaurant near the centre of the district, taking their time over the meal, before heading back to the Dojo in a wide looping path that covered quite a few old and familiar sights. 'Maiko' stopped when they walked past the gates to the high school. 'Rika' watched her face for a moment then turned to inspect the large building as well, while Nabiki waited.

"It brings back memories, doesn't it, dear?" 'Rika' asked quietly. 'Maiko' slowly nodded.

"Oh, it does that, all right. Some good, some bad. I can't work out which ones are stronger." She sighed, turning to walk beside her wife and sister-in-law. "That was the first school I ever really spent much time at. I learned quite a bit but not as much as I'd like, but also had so many fights it's just ridiculous. Hardly got through a day without something weird happening." Shaking her head she smiled. "No one who wasn't involved would believe me if I told them."

Eventually, sometime in the late afternoon, they arrived back at the Tendo house. Going inside they met Akane coming down the stairs. She smiled at them. "Hi. Did you have a good time?" Nabiki nodded.

"Yes, we saw that new American movie, you know, the cop one? It's pretty good." Akane grinned.

"Yes, Sayuri and I saw it last week. The martial arts were a bit weak but it wasn't bad at all."

"How did your own martial arts film go in the end?" Nabiki asked with amusement. "Father and Genma seemed pretty impressed." Akane nodded, smiling happily at the memory.

"Yes, they were. Their students didn't seem to know whether to simply give up now or try harder. In the end everyone decided that they wanted to be that good so they'd stick at it. Father tried to tell them that it was pretty unlikely that any of them would ever be able to do what Yori and Chou can but I don't think any of them are listening at the moment." She laughed. "It's certainly something to aspire to. But without the magic and the inhuman talent, I don't think it will work." The thought seemed to momentarily depress her and her face fell, while Nabiki and the other two marvelled at the volatility of her emotional state. Soon enough, though, she was smiling again.
"I'm going over to see Shampoo so we can work out when we could both get away to go to Minato. See you later." With a wave she left the house. They looked after her for a moment, then at each other.

"She seems, well, sort of quick to change her feelings these days," 'Maiko' said with a frown. Nabiki sighed.

"I know. That's something that's been getting worse for months. She can go from depressed to deliriously happy and back in seconds. I'd almost think it was some sort of bipolar thing except the doctor tells me it isn't. It's some weird side effect of her overall depression and anger. That's just one of the ways it manifests." Shaking her head, she added, "It's not good but I have to admit I prefer it to sudden attacks of near-homicidal fury. Unfortunately she still has those sometimes as well."

They were sitting in the living room having some tea when Nodoka came back from wherever she'd been. "Hello, girls. How has your day been?" she asked politely, sitting down next to Nabiki. The middle sister poured her a cup of tea. "Thank you, Nabiki." Accepting it she sipped some.

"It's been very nice, thanks," 'Rika' replied. "We saw a silly movie, had lunch, then walked around looking at the area. Nabiki showed us where she went to school, things like that." Nodoka nodded. "Yes, the infamous Furinkan High School, site of many odd martial arts encounters." She laughed. "You wouldn't believe how many times parts of that place have needed to be rebuilt. There was one boy, Ryoga, did Nabiki mention him?" They both nodded. "He was amazingly destructive. Constantly fighting with my son, who caused his own share of damage, it has to be said, but Ryoga was in a class of his own in that regard. Even Akane couldn't match him. That boy could smash his way through a wall like some sort of demolition machine." She smiled a little at the memory. "Quite incredible. It didn't end well though." 'Maiko' chuckled a little.

"Yes, Nabiki told us about him. Apparently when Akane found out about his curse she wasn't very pleased." Nodoka nearly choked on her tea she laughed so suddenly. "Oh, that's certainly one way to put it. Yes. Not very pleased. A slight understatement I feel. The poor girl went absolutely insane with rage, it took both Shampoo and Ukyo to take her down and they barely managed it. I know that dear Akane isn't considered the best martial artist around here by the others but when she's properly angry she's a force to be reckoned with, I assure you." Nabiki sighed.

"Unfortunately. That's basically what led to all the problems four years ago." The Saotome woman abruptly became serious, nodding with a distant look.

"Indeed. Such a pity. There were a lot of contributing factors but the main trigger was certainly Akane and her actions that night." She fell silent staring into her tea while the others watched her. Various emotions crossed her face, none of them happy ones.

"Do you think he'll ever come back?" Nabiki asked with a glance at the others, ignoring the slight warning look they both gave her which vanished as soon as Nodoka looked up. The elder woman was silent for a few more seconds then sighed.

"I hope so. I truly do. I would so like to see him again. But I wouldn't be surprised nor would I blame him if he never came back, considering everything that happened here. Kasumi as well. I was very fond of that young lady. I hope that both of them found happiness, wherever they are." She resumed staring into her teacup contemplatively. Eventually she looked up. "So. Enough of these thoughts, there's nothing we can do about it. Are you girls going to stay with us tonight?"
'Rika' looked at 'Maiko', who shook her head.

"I don't think we can. We have classes tomorrow so it's probably best if we get back tonight. There's no hurry to leave just yet though. There are trains until about half past eleven, about every forty minutes or so." Nodding, Nodoka stood.

"All right. I'll make dinner for everyone then. It will be at about six. I'm going to have a short nap, I've had quite a long day, so I'll see you all later." Leaving the room she headed upstairs.

"Pity you can't stay," Nabiki said once the elder woman was gone.

"We do have to get back, I think," 'Rika' said. "We do genuinely have classes tomorrow, although the first one isn't until after lunch. Various recent events have gotten in the way of our work so we have some studying to do." Nabiki chuckled.

"Magical girls and medical students. I have no idea how you have the time to do everything." 'Maiko' laughed.

"It can be a handful juggling it all. But somehow everything works out, or it has done so far at any rate."

At dinner a few hours later Akane was very bubbly. "Shampoo and I are going to go into Minato on Wednesday evening to see if we can find out more about Yori and Chou. That's the earliest we can both get away." Nabiki looked at her and sighed, making her sister glance at her curiously.

"Akane, you do realise that the likelihood of bumping into either one of them just wandering around is pretty low, I hope?" The blue haired woman nodded.

"Oh, of course. But they're certainly not going to turn up here, are they?" 'Maiko' stifled a giggle, looking at 'Rika' with amusement which was quickly hidden before any of the other noticed. "If we don't go we'll definitely never meet them."

"What are you going to do if you do succeed in finding them?" Nodoka asked with interest. Akane suddenly stopped dead, thinking.

"Um. We hadn't thought that far ahead." This caused almost everyone to look at her with some bemusement. She flushed under their gazes. "We'll think of something, I'm sure. There's no need to look at me like that." Shaking her head but smiling Nabiki went back to eating.

"Well, good luck, I suppose."

Genma was feeling something odd, it was like someone was staring hard at him, but whenever he looked around no one was. It was making him nervous. Trying stealth he waited until he felt it again then whipped his head around so fast his glasses dislodged themselves from one ear and dangled under his chin. Unfortunately, this now meant that everyone was staring hard at him, rendering the entire exercise pointless. Looking embarrassed he carefully re-hooked his glasses and resumed his meal, flinching every now and then. Nabiki glanced at 'Maiko' who gave her a small private smile. Grinning to herself she picked up her cup and drank from it. Soun watched his old friend for a moment then shrugged and ignored the whole thing.

"I understand you two teach martial arts here?" 'Rika' asked with interest. Soun looked at her then nodded.

"Yes. You saw our students earlier today. We've been teaching for a few months now, after a long period when I didn't teach at all and Genma only had one student. It's going very well, they are" coming along nicely. Our family styles aren't widely known but are very effective, it's nice to see them being used more." She looked impressed.

"So, you have eight students at the moment?"

"Nine. Four beginners and five slightly more advanced ones, although one of the young women in the beginner group will probably move up soon, she's got a gift for it." 'Rika' nodded thoughtfully.

"Do you think you can teach more? Or is that the limit?" Rubbing his chin Soun thought about it for a moment, glancing at Genma.

"We could probably handle a dozen, I think. More than that would make the sort of hands-on approach we need too difficult with only the two of us." He smiled. "Why, are you thinking of taking up our form of martial arts?" Laughing she shook her head.

"No, I think I'm fine with my studies at the moment, thank you. I was just curious."

"Well, if you change your mind, either of you, please let us know. We'd be pleased to teach friends of my daughters." She smiled in a gentle manner at him.

"Thank you. I'll bear that in mind." Turning to Nabiki she asked, "What time is it, please, Nabiki?"
The middle sister looked at her watch.

"Ah, nearly seven." 'Rika' glanced at 'Maiko' for a moment.

"We should probably leave around ten, I think. That will get us home before midnight." Once the meal was finished, 'Rika' and 'Maiko' cleared the table, insisting that Nodoka take a break from it. "It's our pleasure. You've done so much work, let us do a little. We don't mind." The elder woman looked pleased.

"Thank you, that's very nice of you." Soon the dishwasher was running and they came back and sat down. The next three hours passed in pleasant conversation, although Genma kept getting that weird sensation of being watched. It was beginning to make him quite paranoid, twitching at any sound he didn't recognise. Eventually 'Maiko' looked at 'Rika' who nodded.

"I'm sorry, but we're going to have to leave. Thank you all so much for feeding us and letting us stay here." Soun smiled at them.

"It's been nice having you here. I'm very glad to see Nabiki has such good friends. Please visit again." Nodoka nodded as did Akane. 'Maiko' got up and retrieved their overnight bags from Kasumi's old room, coming back and handing 'Rika's' to her.

"Thank you, dear," she said, turning back to the room at large. "I hope we can come again some time. It's quite busy for us at the moment, though, so it wouldn't be for a while." She looked at her youngest sister. "Akane, it was very nice to meet you. Nabiki has told us a lot about you. Good luck with your trip to Minato." Akane smiled at her.

"Thanks. It's been nice meeting you guys as well. See you again, I hope. Have a good trip home." Nabiki stood.

"I'm going to walk with them to the station, I'll see you all later." All three young women soon left the house. Nodoka looked after them thoughtfully.

"It's nice to see Nabiki has some real friends. I thought for quite a while that she was rather lonely." Soun nodded, smiling a little.
"They seem very intelligent and pleasant young women. They'll probably make their future husbands very happy." He was very confused by the way both Akane and Nodoka started giggling at this, quickly progressing to roaring with laughter. Casting a puzzled glance at his friend he shrugged. Genma shook his head.

"Women. I'll never understand them." For some reason this made them both laugh even harder.

Standing on the platform as the train slowed, Nabiki watched it approach then turned to her sister. "Take care, both of you." She hugged 'Rika', then 'Maiko'. "It's been so nice having you back here. I wish it could be for longer. Perhaps one day." 'Rika' smiled gently at her.

"Perhaps. We'll see. Come and visit us soon, please."

"I will." 'Maiko' grinned at her.

"Don't forget, call as soon as Akane and Shampoo leave, OK? I'll get Aiko to pick you up. Um, from that alley a couple of streets down behind the dry cleaning place, I think, you know it?" Nabiki nodded. "Right. When she leaves, go there and call. That'll give us at least an hour's notice before they turn up, so we can set things up with you." The train stopped and the doors opened. "See you around, Nabs."

"Don't call me Nabs!" Snickering, 'Maiko' followed her wife onto the train, both of them waving through the window as the doors closed. Nabiki watched it until it was out of sight then with a small sigh of regret headed home alone.
"She and Shampoo left the house about five minutes ago." Nabiki looked guiltily around in case anyone was watching, even though this was very unlikely.

"OK. Hang on, Aiko should be with you in a second," Ranma's voice had a certain amount of amusement in it which she shared. The closer they got to seeing Akane in Minato the funnier it seemed likely to be. She could hear Kasumi sighing in the background and giggled. Abruptly she was sharing the alley with a familiar figure.

"Hi, Nabiki," Aiko said with a smile. "How's things?"

"Not bad, Aiko, thanks." She put the phone to her ear again having lowered it. "She's here."

"OK, tell her the wards are down for the next ten seconds." Nabiki repeated the warning. Aiko nodded.

"Right, come stand here and let's go." She followed instructions and the world flickered, resolving into the living room of her in-laws apartment. Pressing the disconnect button on the phone she dropped it into her pocket. This time there had only been the smallest twinge of nausea. Snickering at the thought that she was getting used to teleporting, which on the face of it was completely absurd, she smiled at her sister and brother-in-law, who greeted her happily. Ranma flipped the disguise bracelet at her. She caught it and slipped it over her wrist with a grin.

"Magic artefact, check." He laughed, activating it.

"Right. So who should you be, I wonder?" Aiko moved over to sit beside the rest of her team who were watching with interest, Misaki nibbling some sort of chocolate bar. Nabiki looked at the martial artist curiously.

"Why should I be anyone but myself. I thought this thing dealt with the problem of being recognised?" She held up the arm with the bracelet on. Ranma nodded.

"Oh, it does. She won't recognise you, only someone who's present when it's activated, or is using one themselves, can see through it. The spell is pretty thorough. Not only won't anyone recognise you they'll forget the details of anything they do see except for your name almost immediately, and even that will fade quickly the first few times. But where's the fun in that? While she's close to you she'll see something, so it should be something interesting!" He grinned, while Kasumi sighed again. Tamiko laughed and her team-mates all looked amused.

"Nabiki! You could be the fifth member of our group," Fumiko said with a giggle. Nabiki looked her up and down carefully.

"Um, no offence, but you'll get me into that outfit over my dead body." They all grinned, while she whirled and levelled a finger at Ranma who was smirking. "And don't you try anything. I mean it!"

"Oh, come on, I've worn it."

"So have I," Kasumi said quietly, making her sister look at her oddly. She produced a weird little smile. After a moment Nabiki shook her head.

*I'm not going to ask!' Out loud she said, "Even so. Pick something else." He shrugged, walking around her and inspecting her.
"Fine. Right, it'll have to be female, you don't know how to pull off male body language. So, human, mostly human, or not?" She stared at him.

"Human, I think, thanks all the same."

"Oh, come on, Nabiki, you'd look good with a tail. Or horns." He studied her again. "Perhaps feathers?"

"No. Keep it normal, please. Well, normal for me. Normal for you lot is insane." Even Kasumi laughed at this point.

"OK, OK. Wow, no sense of adventure at all." Shaking his head the young man smiled, thinking carefully "Right. Let's try this." Her field of vision abruptly rose a few centimetres. Everyone stared at her.

"Hey, that's not bad, Ranma," Aiko said with interest. The others were nodding. Nabiki held her hands out and noticed that she was now apparently wearing completely different clothes, which appeared to be some form of business suit. Looking down she saw that her breasts looked somewhat larger, and she was definitely taller, the floor was further away.

"What about the hair?" Ranma asked Kasumi, who studied her sister. She tapped her lips thoughtfully with one slender finger.

"No, thanks, I'm fine with it."

"Only you seem to keep missing..."

"I'm fine. Thank you." Fumiko looked at Misaki and they both started giggling. Nabiki crossed her arms and waited. "Right, where were we?" Ranma looked back to his sister-in-law. Kasumi nuded him in the ribs.

"Eyes."

"OK. How's that?"

"Not bad. Make them a little wider. Yes, that's good." She walked around the illusion-cloaked form of her younger sister looking at her carefully. "Very nice. I'm not sure about the clothes though. A bit severe." Ranma laughed.

"I was thinking that she can put on the full-blown ice-queen persona. Like this it should work pretty effectively." Nabiki listened as Kasumi thought.

"Yes, you're probably right. It's still missing something though." She looked at her sister for a moment then snapped her fingers. "Sunglasses. If you're going with this look you need sunglasses." Her husband looked at her with mild incredulity.

"At night? Really?" She nodded.

"Oh, that makes it even better. Here, let me have a go." Nabiki suddenly found herself wearing
"How am I going to see anything out there?" she asked curiously, looking around, noticing that her voice sounded different. The glasses were quite dark. Kasumi frowned for a moment.

"Let me..." The lighting gradually rose back to normal. "How's that?"

"Fine. What did you do?"

"I changed the sensitivity of the eyes a bit, and tweaked the reflectivity of the glasses." Her sister looked at her for a moment then shrugged.

"OK. I have no idea how you could do that, so I'll take your word for it." Reaching up she removed the glasses and looked at them. From the front they looked like amazingly dark wraparound sunglasses, very expensive, with a slight mirror finish. "Neat. I like these, pity they're not real." She put them back on.

"Real enough, for the moment. Go and have a look in the mirror." Walking into the nearest bathroom the middle sister looked at the reflection in the mirror with amazement.

"Holy shit," she said in a deeper than normal voice. The reflection showed a woman who looked a couple of years younger than her own age, with shoulder-length hair an unusual deep leaf-green colour pulled back into a tight pony-tail, leaving a lock either side of her ears, which she suddenly noticed with a slight sigh were noticeably pointed. 'The idiot had to get something adventurous' in there, didn't he? she thought with wry amusement. Her face was completely different but very good looking. Removing her sunglasses, marvelling at the fact that she was holding something that technically didn't really exist, she looked at deep blue crystal-clear eyes that reminded her of those of Ranma's female form, except for the catlike pupils. "Oh, for god's sake," she mumbled at the sight. After a moment, though, she smiled a little. Somehow the slightly non-standard features added to the exotic beauty of the face she was looking at.

Stepping back a metre or so she looked at the rest of her reflection. She was wearing a clearly very expensive black suit, looking like an extremely well-paid lawyer more than anything else. It was perfectly tailored, conforming to her female curves which were somewhat more pronounced that her own body was. On her feet were a pair of high-quality black leather shoes with a low heel. With a small smile she saw that her nails were done in a slightly darker green than her hair and wondered if it was Ranma or Kasumi that was responsible for that. Putting the sunglasses back on she looked at the overall effect, finding it to her liking. Practising her coldest smile she almost worried herself. In combination with the glasses it turned her from expensive lawyer into expensive female bodyguard. "Not bad. Not bad at all." Walking back into the living room she looked at the people gathered there.

"You've seen Men in Black, haven't you?" she asked Ranma with amusement. He grinned.

"Well, yes. What do you think?" Smiling at him in a way that seemed to make the temperature of the room drop, she nodded slightly.

"It will do." Aiko stared.

"Good grief. That's impressive. How do you do that?" Nabiki turned the cold grin on the magical girl who looked momentarily uncertain.

"Practice." Suddenly the expression warmed considerably. Kasumi laughed.

"Very intimidating. What should we call this one?" Ranma glanced at her, then looked back at the disguised middle Tendo.

"Um. How about Reiko?" His wife looked at him then back at her sister, who shrugged.

"All right, that's not bad. Reiko... hmm. Reiko Aoyama." She glanced around in case anyone would object. No one did. "Good. Nabiki, is that OK with you?" The newly christened 'Reiko' nodded.

"Certainly, Miss Tendo." She smiled in a worrying way, getting into the act. Kasumi sighed a little.

"Don't get carried away. Remember you don't have our abilities." Her sister laughed.

"I know. But this might be fun. Anyway, I'm surrounded by magical girls. What could go wrong?"

Everyone winced. She suddenly looked worried, remembering where she was and who she was with. "Damn. I wish I hadn't said that."

"So do I," Ranma muttered to himself, looking around for a moment, as if he expected something to jump out of the woodwork. When nothing did he shrugged. "OK. Probably best if you mainly stand around and look scary. You're pretty good at that, like this even more so." 'Reiko' smiled coldly again. "Yes. Like that." Tamiko laughed slightly nervously, leaning into Aiko.

"Make the scary lady stop doing that," she whispered, making the other girl giggle. Overhearing the middle sister couldn't stop herself from doing the same which broke the effect. "You're really very good at looking worrying, um, Reiko."

"Thanks."

They spent the next hour coming up with some backstory for the Woman In Black, as 'Reiko' was thinking of this persona. She was having considerable fun. Hearing her own voice sound so different and feeling all the changes to her body she marvelled at the thoroughness of the illusion spell once more. It might not have been a true shape-change, according to Ranma, but as far as she was concerned it was pretty damn close. Finally, looking at her watch, which had also changed to something out of a science-fiction film but still seemed to be keeping the correct time, she said, "Their train should be getting in around now. The station is about five kilometres away, so I'd guess they'd be somewhere in the area in about fifteen minutes or so." Kasumi nodded thoughtfully.

"We probably don't want them coming around the university or here, so we should try to intercept them somewhere near the entertainment district."

"How do you want to play it?" Ranma asked. "We can't just walk up to them and say hi."

"Well, you could, but it would look pretty weird," 'Reiko' said with a grin. "I don't know if Akane was planning to just say hello if she saw either 'Yori' or 'Chou', but I suppose the first thing to do would be to get into position and see what happens." Ranma and his wife exchanged glances.

"As good a plan as anything, I guess," the martial artist said. He turned to Aiko and the others. "You guys coming along?" Aiko nodded happily.

"Damn right. I wouldn't miss this, it could be very funny." Ranma grinned at his friends.

"Hopefully. OK, can you take 'Reiko' with you, then? She's not keen on roof-hopping." The middle sister shuddered at the memory.

"No, I most certainly am not. I don't mind teleporting though." Aiko laughed.
"It's definitely the best way to travel. Yes, sure, she can come with us." She held out her amulet and Ranma grinned, reaching out to recharge it.

"OK, we'll meet you guys on the roof of the bank next to that seafood restaurant in about five minutes." Aiko nodded, standing up, followed by the other girls. "Reiko' walked over to stand beside them.

She glanced at Ranma. "Won't being so far apart cause problems with keeping this going?" she asked curiously, gesturing at herself. He shook his head with a smile.

"No. I can feed it power from a considerable distance once it's established. Certainly anywhere around here is easy. It doesn't take a lot." Looking impressed she nodded, vanishing with the others seconds later with the usual flash. Ranma smiled at his wife, melting into the form of 'Yori' in the process. She smiled back as she became 'Chou'. "Let's go and meet a couple of fans," 'Yori' said. They headed for the roof.

Shampoo watched Akane bouncing along just in front of her with a smile. The slightly younger woman was in a very ebullient mood at the moment, hoping to meet the people she seemed to have fixated on recently. Since that DVD had come a few days ago she hadn't stopped talking about it. The Amazon could understand that in a way, the video was truly incredible. Even so she thought her friend was possibly banking more on it than seemed reasonable. But it seemed to have cheered her up a lot, which was a good thing after how unstable her mood had been of late. Shampoo shrugged a little. Perhaps they would meet these magical girls, although she wasn't completely sure what would happen after that.

She certainly wasn't averse to learning some of their techniques, which put almost everything she'd ever see before to shame. Even... She found herself unable to complete the thought even in the privacy of her own head. Four years later and she found herself unwilling to think about Ranma, although at the same time she couldn't stop thinking about him. The lilac-haired young woman sighed. She missed him a lot, and she was sure a lot of Akane's problems stemmed from the same source, in one way or another. In her case the loss of her eldest sister at the same time must have made it much worse, especially as it was her own action that had started, or more accurately ended, the whole horrible mess. Pushing the thoughts to the back of her mind with a deliberate act of will she moved up to walk beside Akane.

"So what are we going to do now? Just walk around hoping to see them?" Akane looked at her with a smile.

"May as well, for the moment at least. I've never been here before, it looks interesting aside from magical girls. Even if we don't find them we can get something to eat, have a look around, then come back another time. Kaede says they're often around here somewhere." She looked around in a lively manner, as if she expected to see a magical girl around every corner. Shampoo snickered a little. Perhaps they would meet these magical girls, although she wasn't completely sure what would happen after that.

'reiko' watched smiling as 'Yori' spun in place. "What on earth are you doing?" she asked curiously.

"Looking for Akane. I can feel her and Shampoo somewhere around here, their ki signatures are unmistakable. They must be just out of range." She stopped, pointing. "Over there somewhere, a couple of kilometres away." 'Chou' concentrated then nodded.

"I think you're right. That's definitely Akane." She smiled. "If she was angry this would be easier, she'd show up like a lighthouse." 'Reiko' laughed.

"You wouldn't need to follow your weird senses, just the sound of things breaking in that case."
'Yori' looked amused. 'Chou' didn't, so much, but sighed.

Looking at Aiko, 'Yori' asked, "Can you hop us over to the top of the hospital?"

"Sure." Seconds later they looked at the night scene from a different viewpoint.

"Ah. Got her. About eight hundred metres over that way. That would be, hmm, near the school.
That'll do." Aiko smiled and saluted mockingly.

"Transport ready, Ma'am." They were still laughing when they materialised on top of the main school building. 'Yori' went to the edge of the roof and looked around.

"Hah. I knew it. There they are." 'Chou' joined her and followed her pointing finger. 'Reiko' looked as well. Her sister was nodding although all the middle sister could see was a few people walking around on a street some sixty metres away, fifteen metres down. They were only visible at all due to some street-lights and the lights in the various shops and restaurants. She looked wonderingly at the other two.

"Can you really make them out at that range under these conditions?" Her sister nodded with a small smile on her lips.

"Oh, yes, certainly. Akane's just in front there, Shampoo is looking around behind her. See? Right there." Straining her eyes 'Reiko' finally saw Shampoo's distinctive hair as the pair walked past a brightly lit shop front.

"OK. Got them." She glanced at the others. "Now what?" They looked at each other blankly. Shaking her head she sighed. "We've gone to all this trouble and you have no idea what to do next, do you?" 'Yori' shrugged slightly, grinning.

"Nope."

"Idiot." The middle Tendo looked at her in-law with amusement. The other woman snickered a little.

"Well, we could..." Stopping suddenly with an expression of shock, she whirled around to look off to the right, 'Chou' doing the same thing at exactly the same time. "Oh, you have got to be fucking kidding me..." 'Yori's' snarl of anger and disbelief raised the hairs on the back of 'Reiko's' neck. "Here? Now? I don't believe it." Husband and wife looked at each other with resigned horror. Aiko and her team all looked at each other, then glanced at 'Reiko' who shrugged, as lost as they were. She found out what the problem was when 'Yori' growled one more word.

"Ryoga."

Closing her eyes in the sure knowledge that all hell was about to break loose, 'Reiko' said "Fuck," with great feeling and under her breath.

Akane wandered happily along looking around her. So far there had been nothing particularly unusual to see. They were heading for the main entertainment district, having been walking for a couple of kilometres. She was just wondering whether she should simply ask if anyone knew the whereabouts of either of the magical girls when she thought she spotting something familiar in the distance under a street lamp some two hundred metres further along the road. Staring intently, a smile still on her lips, she slowed as the distant figure passed into a better illuminated area. Shock brought her to a complete halt with a gasp, before a brilliant red battle aura abruptly flared around her taking Shampoo completely by surprise. The Amazon stared as Akane suddenly roared with rage, screamed something unintelligible, then raced down the road holding a pair of huge mallets she’d pulled from thin air.

Wondering what the hell had happened Shampoo watched for a second before taking off after her friend. After a few steps, through the raging ki emissions of a homicidal Akane, she recognised another signature with a sinking heart. "Oh, shit," she mumbled, picking up the pace. Seconds later Akane struck out with her first mallet, cratering the street and cracking several windows from the shock wave from the blow. The target of her wrath barely avoided the hit, having jumped sideways as he heard the whistle of wind coming from the ki manifestation.

"RYOGA!" screamed Akane at the top of her voice, swinging again, her battle aura heating the air around her with a crackling noise. The part time pig ducked, allowing her second strike to smash a light van parked by the side of the road, before staring at her wide-eyed unsure whether he should run, hide, or fight. Very rapidly his options dwindled to the last one as the youngest Tendo, incandescent with fury, dropped both mallets, which popped out of existence as they left her grip, only to pick up what was left of the van and heave it at him. This time he didn't have time to duck, more than a ton of crushed metal collecting him at a substantial speed and sweeping him across the street to smash into the wall of a building on the other side, which promptly partially collapsed and buried him in a huge pile of bricks.

The seven people watching on the roof of the school two hundred and fifty metres away had varying reactions to all this. 'Chou' sighed, 'Yori' scowled, 'Reiko' winced, and the other magical girls who were unfamiliar with Akane except from stories gaped a little. "Holy crap. I see what you mean. That's one bad tempered woman." Aiko looked at 'Chou' who nodded sadly.

"She was doing so well." 'Reiko' put her hand on her forehead and sighed as they watched Akane start smashing the pile of bricks with another mallet in an attempt to dig Ryoga out so she could kill him properly.

"Oh, fucking hell, this is bad. You have to stop her before she kills him or he fights back. You know he's stronger that her if he ever has a chance to react." 'Yori' nodded, still glaring at the distant fight.

"Damn it. Stupid pig boy, why the hell did he pick here and now for god's sake. I told you he'd turn up at the worst possible moment." She glanced at 'Chou', who nodded slowly.

"He does have a gift."

"That's one way of putting it."

They watched, impressed despite themselves, as Akane smashed bricks out of the way like a maniacal demolition machine, uncovering a slightly stunned young man who looked up at her with his mouth open, covered in dust. Even at that range they could clearly hear her yell, "Ryoga Hibiki, prepare to DIE!" 'Yori' suddenly had a short attack of the giggles making the rest of them look at her in disbelief.

"Sorry," she mumbled. "You'd have had to be there."

Akane swung her mallet, catching the dark-haired young man just as he was trying to both stand and scramble out of the way, punting him nearly eighty metres down the street, making a crater in the concrete wall he bounced off before landing on another parked car which died in a shower of glass. Even 'Yori' winced. "Damn. That'll leave a mark. She hasn't got any weaker that's for sure. We'd better put a stop to this before it gets any worse." She jumped off the roof followed by her wife. Both of them ran towards the fight. Akane was charging back towards Ryoga screaming insults, with Shampoo following desperately trying to figure out a plan.

Ryoga pushed himself out of the wreckage of the vehicle he'd landed on, brushing glass off his face with one hand, wondering what to do. His eyes widen as he saw a large motorcycle flying towards him and he barely got out of the way in time. His reflexes took over and he stabbed a finger into the pavement, using the breaking point, causing a huge explosion of cement and tarmac shrapnel to hurtle towards Akane. A lot of it hit her, causing numerous small cuts since she wasn't hardened to it's effects, but she ignored the pain and carried on, picking up another motorcycle and flinging it at him as she moved.

She reached him just as it did and caught him a solid blow in the crotch as he ducked to avoid the flying metal. Even as tough as Ryoga was that hurt a lot, Akane was almost as strong as he was when she was this enraged. Grunting in agony he fell over, firing a small ki ball at her defensively but missing. It almost hit Shampoo who was following behind, but whistled past her to penetrate the window of a shoe shop behind her with a fizz then a large blast as it detonated inside, wrecking the shop and blowing shoes all over the road. Luckily by now all the pedestrians in the area had retreated to a safe distance, their demon and magical girl fight honed reflexes making them seek a safe place to watch from. No one could recognise the new girl but she was clearly quite powerful judging by the glowing red aura and the flying vehicles.

Only about fifteen seconds had passed since Akane had struck the first blow, but she was getting steadily more furious, her battle aura reaching a level Shampoo hadn't seen even the first time she'd tried to kill the young man. That didn't bode well. She and Ukyo had only just managed to drop her the first time, this time she was on her own. Without resorting to potentially lethal force she wasn't sure what she could do to stop her friend.

Akane kicked Ryoga viciously again, hearing the crack of bone as his kneecap shattered. He howled in agony and struck out, catching her in the side with a hugely powerful blow. She flew across the street and into the wrecked shop, landing inside with a crash. Her incoherent screams of rage and pain were briefly stopped as she slid to a halt. Struggling to his feet Ryoga yelled, the sensations from both his leg and his groin bringing tears to his eyes. A sound from the shop caught his attention as well as Shampoo's and they both stared as a large desk came flying out of it directly towards him. His attempt to duck resulting in him falling over since his leg wouldn't hold him up. Akane limped out of the store, now glowing so brightly that she was difficult to look at, radiating enough heat to make her clothes smoke. She growled like a pit-bull, so far past the point of reason she more resembled a demon than a magical girl. The onlookers some distance up the street began rearranging their bets as to who would survive the fight.

"Oh, damn it," Shampoo muttered to herself in Mandarin, pulling a pair of clubs out of weapon space and sprinting towards her friend from the back, hoping to knock her out quickly. Unfortunately Akane's reflexes were being boosted by the amount of uncontrolled ki she was producing in her anger and she moved as she felt the beginning of the first blow, twisting and lashing out with one hand without even thinking. Shampoo felt a massive impact on the side of her head and was unconscious before she hit the road twenty metres away.

Less than thirty seconds after the start of the fight 'Yori' and 'Chou' arrived. 'Chou' stopped next to Ryoga. "Stay down. Let her handle this," the blonde said, putting a hand on his shoulder. He tried to sit up but might as well have attempted to push a mountain to the side. Eyes wide he stared at the girl above him who was watching her partner with a worried expression. 'Yori' came to a halt a few metres in front of Akane.

"Stop, please. You can't win and you're hurt." The blue-haired young woman stepped to the side so she still had an uninterrupted view of Ryoga, bending down to pick up a huge chunk of concrete that had fallen out of the wall he'd hit. "Put it down. You have to stop." Ignoring the black-haired girl as if she was irrelevant, Akane heaved the two hundred kilo block of steel-reinforced concrete at her target. 'Yori' sighed and vaporised it in flight with an energy beam before it had gone more than five metres, the boom this produced echoing around the entire neighbourhood for several seconds. The shock-wave knocked Akane flat, stunning her momentarily. Walking over and looking down at her 'Yori' shook her head unhappily, then bent down and prodded a couple of pressure points. With a faint whimper the other woman lost consciousness, the blazing red aura of her rage guttering out.

Ryoga watched this with shock, before the pain from his leg became too much and he passed out. Less than a minute had passed since Akane had first spotted him. Half a dozen vehicles had been totalled, either directly or indirectly from shrapnel, four shops were damaged or destroyed, there were numerous craters in the road, and dozens of broken windows. 'Yori' looked around and winced.

"Damn. This one is going to be expensive." Her wife nodded unhappily. She walked over to check on Shampoo as 'Reiko' and Aiko's team appeared in the middle of the road. 'Reiko' went over to her unconscious sister and looked down at her with dismay, while the others looked around in amazement.

"Oh, god. What a mess. How is she?" 'Yori' glanced at her, then squatted down, quickly scanning the youngest Tendo girl.

"Not too bad. Her leg is fractured, I'm amazed she was walking on it, I guess she was so furious she didn't notice the pain. Three, no, four broken ribs, one of them shattered, mild concussion. Oh, and her small intestine is perforated, one of the ribs got it I think." 'Reiko' gasped, one hand going to her mouth.

"That's horrible! Is she going to be OK?" 'Yori' nodded, standing up.

"Don't worry, she'll be fine. Physically at any rate. We've fixed much worse problems." Her sister-in-law slumped slightly with relief, then looked across to Shampoo and 'Chou'.

"How's Shampoo?" 'Yori' asked as they walked over to the blonde woman. 'Chou' looked up unhappily.

"Not ideal. Akane hit her very hard, she has a slightly fractured skull and a nasty concussion. Other than that it's mostly scrapes from where she hit the road." She glanced over at the unconscious form of Ryoga with a dark look. "That annoying young man really set Akane off. He's paid for it though, his knee is ruined and he's got a ruptured testicle." 'Yori' grimaced, also looking at the part time pig.

"Ow. That's got to smart." She followed her wife's eyes. "Oh well. We'll have to heal him anyway." 'Chou' seemed slightly reluctant but eventually nodded. "Come on. Let's get them somewhere safe. Then I'll have to come back and get a list of all the damage." She sighed heavily. "Sergeant Harada is never going to believe this one." Looking around she spotted someone she knew, one of the shopkeepers who was still open, standing outside his shop and gaping at the damage. She went over to him and had a brief conversation while the others watched, then came back.

"OK. Hikaru will tell everyone that we'll be back to catalogue the damage, he'll arrange to have the affected people make a start on it. Do you want to grab Akane, please, love? I'll get Ryoga. Hey, Misaki, can you carry Shampoo?" The taciturn brunette nodded and came over, dropping to one knee and carefully picking the unconscious Amazon up. 'Chou' gathered her sister in her arms, looking at her sadly and brushing her hair away from her face, while 'Yori' walked to where Ryoga was lying and looked at him with considerable irritation.

"You damned idiot. Trust you to turn an amusing evening out into a war zone." She bent down and effortlessly picked him up, holding him gently despite her words. 'Reiko', who had accompanied her, sighed.

"To be fair to the guy I doubt this was something he wanted." 'Yori' grunted as they joined the others.

"Probably not. Doesn't change it though." Reaching out she charged the amulet that Aiko held up wordlessly, before the entire group vanished in a bright flash of light. The various onlookers stared around at the devastated street and gave it nine out of ten for effort and a high six for style.

'Reiko' looked around the unfamiliar apartment they'd appeared in the middle of with interest. It was nowhere near as nice as the one her sister lived in, but was still surprisingly large for an apartment in Tokyo. There was a bed on one side of the room, with a sofa near the window next to some chairs. One door at the side of the room led into a kitchen from what she could see, while one next to it was presumably the bathroom. The other side of the room had the door to the outside hallway. 'Chou' carried Akane over to the double bed and put her down on it gently while Misaki did the same with Shampoo on the other side. 'Yori' placed Ryoga on the sofa. She reached out and touched his head with a softly glowing hand, then looked satisfied. "That will keep him out for a while until we can sort him out." 'Chou' did the same to both the girls. "Right. What are we going to do about all this?" 'Yori' was joined by her wife who put her arm around her waist as they looked at the three people. Aiko and Tamiko sat in two of the chairs, while Misaki disappeared into the kitchen. Shortly noises could be heard that made it apparent she was rummaging around for something to eat. Fumiko shook her head and went after her.

"You never stop, do you?" she said as she left the room. 'Reiko' twitched a smile and looked at her younger sister, then her older sister.

"Crap. Not exactly what we had in mind." 'Chou' shook her head sadly.

"No. This was no fun at all I'm afraid. Although it does give us a good excuse to scan her, I do wish it hadn't been forced on us like this." Nodding, 'Yori' moved to get a slightly better view of the man.

"Damn it, Ryoga," she mumbled, kneeling beside him. 'Chou' joined her, putting her hands on his leg which was massively swollen around the knee. "That's a pretty bad break. She's gotten stronger, he's really hard to damage." "You should have seen him last time," 'Reiko' observed. "This is pretty mild, actually. She caught him completely by surprise the first time and beat the crap out of him, she broke quite a few bones and nearly tore his left ear off. The doctor said he was lucky to survive." 'Yori' glanced over at the sleeping form of the youngest Tendo, almost impressed.

"He heals considerably faster than normal due to his high ki level, but even so this would take a while to get better and might leave him with a limp for a couple of years."

"That's the leg done. He's going to ache for a while. Quite a while, actually, I couldn't bring myself to remove all the damage." Yori' and 'Reiko' both looked at her with odd expressions which she returned with a small, hard smile. "Call it a reminder."

"That's harsh, sis," 'Reiko' said grinning coldly. They watched as 'Yori' placed her hand on his lower belly, glancing at them with a wry grin.

"That's as close to the damage as I want to go," she said. 'Reiko' grinned while 'Chou' giggled. The glow came and went. "OK, the Hibiki family future is fixed. Nasty. I don't even have them at the moment and it makes me want to cross my legs." This made everyone laugh.

Satisfied that Ryoga was physically whole again, both 'Yori' and 'Chou' moved over to Akane and Shampoo. They checked the two young women again. "Shampoo first, this head injury isn't too bad but it's potentially worse than anything Akane has." 'Yori' agreed with her wife, both of them concentrating on the Amazon. The disguised Nabiki and the four magical girls watched with interest and amazement as they muttered to each other while performing delicate internal operations on the young woman, finally stepping back and looking satisfied.

"That should do it," 'Chou' remarked, a smile on her face. "All the internal haemorrhaging is fixed, the swelling has been eliminated, and the skull fracture healed." 'Yori' nodded, slowly moving glowing hands over the lilac-haired woman's body, erasing all the small scrapes and grazes with no scarring. A few minutes later she grinned.

"Done. I can't find anything else wrong, she's in very good shape otherwise." 'Chou' put a glowing hand on the woman's forehead, nodding after a moment.

"Good, she's not in pain any more. I'll just put her a bit deeper under so she doesn't wake up until we're ready." Turning to look at her youngest sister she sighed unhappily. "Now for poor Akane." Both women walked around to the other side of the bed, looking down at their final patient. Shaking her head, 'Yori' placed her hands on the youngest Tendo's torso.

"I'll do the ribs and the intestines, you want to do the head again?" Nodding, 'Chou' began working. Finishing shortly 'Yori' moved down to Akane's left leg. "Aiko? Can you grab her ankle and pull her leg out straight, please?" The short girl followed her instructions immediately. "Thanks. Fumiko, hold here, yes, that's good. Right, don't move." A minute passed in silence as she rebuild the shattered bones, finally sitting back with a smile. "Great. That's done, thanks guys." The two other women smiled at her, stepping back. 'Reiko' shook her head in admiration.

"You two really are impressive. Those medical skills are astounding." 'Yori' shrugged, grinning.

"Certainly comes in handy pretty often. Of all the things I've worked out over the years I'm most proud of coming up with the ki healing, I'll admit. Between us, it's become something very powerful. I just wish it wasn't so hard to teach to other people." Glancing at her wife, she asked, "How's it coming at that end, love?" 'Chou' still had her hands on Akane's head and was frowning. She looked up.

"The concussion is fixed, that was easy, it was quite mild. But there's something... Have a look and tell me if I'm seeing what I think I'm seeing." Raising an eyebrow 'Yori' shifted up to kneel beside her partner, joining her in placing her hands on the blue-haired woman's head. "Right there." The others watched as 'Yori' closed her eyes, probing delicately with the weird senses both martial artists had. Several seconds passed then she also frowned.

"That's... not right. Not right at all."

"But what is it?" 'Yori' concentrated, gently moving her hands around on Akane's head. After some time she opened her eyes and studied the Tendo woman's face.

"I think..." She trailed off, looking like she was trying to remember something. Jumping abruptly to her feet she looked at Aiko. "Can you take me to the university medical library, please?" Slightly startled, the brunette nodded.

"Sure."

'Yori' glanced around at the other people present, all of whom looked at her wondering what was going on. Then she turned to 'Chou'. "I won't be long, I need to look something up. Keep her under until I get back." Her wife nodded, then everyone looked away as the teleport flash came and went. 'Reiko' turned to her sister.

"What did you find?" she asked curiously, quite worried. 'Chou' looked at her gravely.

"I'm not sure, but she seemed to recognise something. It almost looks like lots of tiny cysts all through areas of Akane's brain, which isn't good." 'Reiko' gasped while the remaining magical girls looked worried. 'Chou' hastened to reassure them. "It's not immediately dangerous. We just need to figure out what it is." Ten minutes passed very slowly before Aiko and 'Yori' abruptly reappeared in the room, the former holding a book with one finger marking a place. She walked over to the blonde and handed the book to her, pointing to a colour image on the page.

"I think that's it." 'Chou' studied the photo, nodding slowly, then read the accompanying text. Her eyebrows went up steadily, then she glanced at her husband.

"This could explain a lot."

"It could explain nearly everything, if the current research is right." Everyone else looked at each other, before 'Reiko' stepped forward.

"What on earth are you two talking about? What's wrong with Akane?" she demanded, getting more worried by the moment. Her elder sister looked at her while 'Yori' knelt down once more, putting her hands on the youngest Tendo again.

"We think Akane may be infected by toxoplasma gondii. It's a parasite that causes something called toxoplasmosis." Very worried, the middle sister stared at the younger one. That didn't sound at all good.

"Is it serious? Can you fix it?" Her sister nodded.

"Yes, it can be serious although in most cases it isn't, and yes, we should be able to deal with it. She doesn't show any of the symptoms of serious toxoplasmosis infection, but the parasite can lie dormant in the brain for long periods of time. The more worrying and also in this case, very interesting thing about toxoplasmosis is that there is quite a lot of evidence to show that in some cases it can affect brain chemistry, specifically altering certain neurotransmitters. It's been implicated in serious mood disorders, bipolar disorders, and even schizophrenia. That isn't common but seems to be backed up by the literature." She glanced at her youngest sister, frowning slightly. 'Reiko' quickly realised the implications.

"You mean...? Akane's emotional problems could be caused by this parasite?" 'Chou' nodded.

"Possibly not completely caused by it, but certainly there is a strong possibility that it's drastically increased the severity of whatever did cause it. It's believed to alter dopamine levels, sometimes considerably, in much the same way certain drugs do. Dopamine is very important, too much or too little can have all sorts of fascinating but very unpleasant effects. It would explain a lot if that's what's happening." 'Yori' looked up, motioning for the book. Handing it to her 'Chou' watched with the others as she looked at the photo again, then nodded.

"That's it. Definitely toxoplasma gondii. Her brain chemistry is all over the place, nothing like what it should be. According to the book this is a pretty rare outcome of toxoplasmosis but not unique. You're going to have to help me, love, this is a two person job I think." Kneeling beside her husband the two of them exchanged glances, then leant forward. Each placing their hands on Akane's head, they surrounded it with a soft glow mixing purple and gold, a peculiarly beautiful sight to the others. All five women stood and watched for nearly twenty minutes, before 'Chou' looked at 'Yori' and nodded.

"I think that's it." 'Yori' checked one last time then dropped her hands.

"Yes. It looks like it worked." Standing she turned to the rest. "We cleaned out the parasitic cysts, that was the easy part. The harder bit was repairing the damage to the brain chemistry. As far as I can see we sorted out the main changes to the neurotransmitters, but we'll have to wait for everything to settle down before we can be sure. It might require some more work in a month or two." Looking at 'Reiko' she smiled. "I can't guarantee this will fix her emotional issues, or at least not all at once, but I'm pretty sure it will make the existing treatment much more effective. It should also reduce the wild mood swings quite quickly, there will probably be a noticeable difference within a week or two." 'Reiko' looked extraordinarily pleased. Stepping forward she hugged her sister-in-law.

"Thank you. Both of you." 'Chou' smiled at her and came closer, the middle sister gathering her into the hug. Aiko and the others grinned. After a moment 'Reiko' released the other two, looking at the two women sleeping on the bed, then glancing at Ryoga on the other side of the room. "So, what's next?"

Aiko looked at the dark haired young man on the sofa. "I'd think you probably need to get him out of here before you do anything else. If Akane wakes up and sees him it's going to get messy." 'Yori' nodded, walking over to look down at Ryoga.

"We also need to persuade him to stay away from here. I know it wasn't really his fault, but there's a lot of damage out there he managed to trigger. Let's wake him up." She reached out a hand, then paused. "Hmm." Looking up at 'Reiko', she grinned slightly menacingly, fangs showing. "I have an idea..."

Ryoga fought his way to consciousness through a mist of confusion. He'd been walking, hadn't he? Somewhere he didn't recognise, which was hardly unusual, but at least it was in Japan this time. Then there had been an ungodly howl of rage from behind him... Akane! "Oh, crap," he thought, jolting awake and opening his eyes, expecting the excruciating pain he'd felt before he passed out some unknown time earlier. He could remember a hit to the groin, exploding in agony, then something about his leg.

Oddly, while he wasn't exactly pain-free, his knee only hurt a little and his poor groin seemed more or less OK. Reaching down unconsciously with one hand he gently probed, relaxing when nothing hurt very much. Flexing his right leg he winced, it hurt more than he liked but nothing like he remembered. That implied he'd been treated, somehow, and/or spent a considerable time unconscious. The part time pig raised his head and looked around wondering where he was. His eyes flicked around the large dark room he was lying in the middle of, which looked like some sort of warehouse, concrete floor disappearing into the dark, ceiling obscured by gloom, then across the woman wearing dark glasses, around the room some more...
Woman? His gaze shot back as his mind caught up with what he was seeing. Sure enough, standing a few metres away and watching him with a coldly neutral expression that sent an involuntary shiver down his spine was a youngish woman in a black suit, impeccably tailored, her green hair in a ponytail and pulled back from her face, except for a bit in front of each ear, inexplicably wearing dark glasses despite the dim lighting. She raised an eyebrow behind the glasses. "Ah. Back with us, Mr. Hibiki. I was beginning to wonder if you'd ever wake up." She took a step forward and studied him in a way that made him feel worried. "You were responsible for a considerable amount of damage today, Mr. Hibiki. Several million yen worth."

"Who are you?" Ryoga demanded with a dry throat. "More to the point, how do you know who I am?" She smiled, the expression even colder than the previous one.

"We know a significant amount about you, Mr. Hibiki. We have been keeping an eye on you for some time." This made him stare with a wide-eyed expression.

"Who is we?" he finally asked. She stepped forward, sitting down in a plain wooden chair he could swear hadn't been there seconds ago. Sitting up slowly he looked around the room, there was still nothing in it except for the woman and himself, and that chair. Glancing back at her he froze.

Two chairs.

There was now another one a meter in front of her, facing her. She gestured to it. "Please, sit down. I dislike speaking to someone sitting on the floor." Staring for a long moment, he eventually levered himself to his feet and walked slowly to the chair, wincing a little as he put weight on his knee. The pain wasn't major, just enough to let him know it was there. He sat.

They stared at each other for a moment. "I'm not at liberty to disclose who 'we' are, Mr. Hibiki. I'm sorry." She smiled in a way that made it clear she wasn't. "Suffice it to say that I represent a group that keeps a close eye on the comings and goings of people of, shall we say, unusual talents. You meet that criteria for a number of reasons. I hope you'll understand if I don't explain any further." He didn't understand, but couldn't bring himself to say that, the woman gave him the willies for some reason he couldn't explain.

"You may refer to me as Ms. Aoyama. Now, I have to decide what to do about you." Once more he stared, he didn't like the sound of that. A small noise in the depths of the darkness made him jump and look around, he was getting quite nervous, this whole experience was extremely creepy. When he looked back to the woman she was reading from a thick folder that she definitely hadn't been holding before. Wondering for a moment whether she was some sort of hidden weapons master, he stared. If she was, he might be in real trouble. "Hmm. I see you have been involved in a considerable number of previous events of a destructive nature. An impressive number, to be honest. Also a large number of interactions of a physical sort with other people we watch." He saw her eyebrows go up once more as she turned a page. "Ah. That is an interesting name. Akane Tendo. The same Akane Tendo as this most recent event, I believe?" She glanced at him, the blank glare of her dark glasses making him wonder what was behind them. When she turned her head to look back at the folder he noticed that her ear was distinctly pointed.

"Very interesting," she continued, reading from another page. "Xian Pu of the Joketsuzoku. Khu Lhon of the same tribe. Ms. Ukyo Kuonji. Quite an impressive resume. We're aware of all of these people, they have caused us some problems in Nerima for a considerable time." She flipped a page and stopped, reading it with interest. "Ranma Saotome. The same Akane Tendo as this most recent event, I believe?" She glanced at him, the blank glare of her dark glasses making him wonder what was behind them. When she turned her head to look back at the folder he noticed that her ear was distinctly pointed.

"Pity. We would like to track him down. Never mind, this is about you and what we should do.” With that rather disturbing statement she lowered her glasses back into position and held the folder off to one side, where it disappeared in a very strange manner, as if someone invisible had taken it from her. Yet again he stared. This was becoming extremely weird.

"So, Mr. Hibiki. What to do next..." She stood and walked slowly around him, studying him disconcertingly carefully, before sitting down again. Ryoga followed her with his eyes, not sure whether it was a good idea to reply or even move. He was beginning to feel as if there were several other people present, but try as he might he couldn't work out why. There were no apparent ki emanations from anyone but him and the woman, although there was something very odd about hers. "We can't have people of your abilities going around destroying buildings and vehicles willy-nilly, can we? There is enough of that sort of thing in Minato and Nerima already. We would be most upset to see that type of event spread outside those areas." Ms. Aoyama inspected him again. "Perhaps we should eliminate the problem once and for all." He really didn't like the sound of that one little bit.

"Look, it's not like any of this was my fault, Akane just jumped me out of nowhere! I didn't even know she was there. I didn't even know where I was, for god's sake!" She nodded slowly.

"Yes, I believe that is a common state of affairs, in fact. Yet, there is no doubt that without you present this sorry affair would not have arisen, is there?" After a moment he shook his head.

"Um, I guess not."

"You see my point. While you may not have directly caused the damage you were the catalyst."

"What about Akane, then?" he demanded, both angry and somewhat scared. "She's the one who smashed up most of the area." Ms. Aoyama raised an eyebrow and he flushed. "OK, the shop was my fault. But the rest of it was hers."

"Rest assured, Mr. Hibiki, I will be having a similar discussion with Ms. Tendo immediately after we deal with you." Her voice was cold and emotionless, making him shiver a bit.

"What do you mean, deal with me?" She bared her teeth a little in what some people might charitably have called a smile. It didn't feel like one.

"Oh, it is within our power to arrange matters so you would be most unlikely to precipitate such a happening again." Trembling a little he glanced around, trying to work out whether he should make a break for it, or jump the woman and fight his way out. She didn't look like a fighter, but bearing in mind the sort of people he’d come across in the past, that was no guarantee. Apparently reading his intentions somehow, she mildly continued, "It would do you no good to run, Mr. Hibiki. We can find you again easily enough. Very few people manage to escape our view." As he looked at her she added, "Please do not consider attacking me, either. It wouldn't end well for you I can assure you."

"Look, ah, Ms. Aoyama, just let me go, and I promise I'll stay as far away from both Nerima and Minato as possible. That's where I was, Minato, right? Hell, I'll stay away from Tokyo." The pig-cursed martial artist was seriously worried by now. The shadows in the room seemed to be drawing in, whenever he looked away from them, while he kept hearing disturbing little sounds in the dark just below the threshold of audibility. The whole thing had gone far beyond creepy into genuinely frightening. Not usually one to quail in the face of danger, Ryoga found himself twitching at every little noise like a ten year old in a storm. Ms. Aoyama considered his request, rubbing one finger along her cheek.
"Hmm. How do I know you will follow through with this promise? For that matter, how do you know you will? From your records you do seem to have a distressing propensity to turn up where you're not required despite your best efforts." She shook her head slightly. "No, I think it might be neatest just to... remove you from the equation. Permanently." He stared wide-eyed at her, that sounded extremely ominous. She chuckled in a voice that sent a chill down his spine. "Don't worry, Mr Hibiki. I'm not suggesting that we slaughter you in cold blood. That is not our preferred methodology. We have more... elegant... methods." Waving a hand to her right without looking she didn't even blink when a glowing blue tear in the space-time continuum silently opened a few metres away. Ryoga recognised a portal to another world with a massive shock, he'd encountered them one or twice before, usually just before something horrible came through.

"That leads to a place from which you would be most unlikely to return. It is a simple solution to the problem you represent." Ryoga stared at the portal, then at the woman. The eerie silence of the manifestation was bad enough, the way the woman almost looked bored about it was worse. It implied a number of very unsettling things both about her and the 'group' she claimed to be associated with.

"I don't like the sound of that," he remarked, desperately attempting not to show how scared he was. The green-haired woman smiled nastily.

"Your interest or otherwise in the procedure is unimportant," she assured him. Standing he moved around the chair putting it between himself and the deeply unsettling woman, as well as the portal which simply hung in the air, silently threatening a trip he was not at all keen on taking.

"You can't do this! I'm not a criminal, You can't simply throw me through a portal to some demon world like that. Even if I was, I'd need a trial and everything." She laughed, her clear voice ringing through the large room.

"Oh, Mr. Hibiki, that's very amusing. Thank you. A trial. Very good." She snickered to herself as he backed away. "No, a trial is unnecessary. We are not associated with the judiciary system."

"I promise I'll stay away. You have my word, on my honour as a martial artist. We keep our promises." She looked at him evenly for a long few seconds while he sweated, glancing between her and the portal which was radiating a sensation that made all his hair tingle. Eventually she nodded, waving her hand again. The portal vanished as silently as it had appeared. Ryoga sighed in relief, suddenly realising how fast his heart was racing.

"All right, Mr. Hibiki. Never let it be said that we are unmerciful. We will try it your way. Once. If anything like this happens again..." She looked meaningfully at him and he nodded frantically.

"It won't. I promise." Standing she walked a few paces to the side, indicating he should follow.

"We will be monitoring you." Releasing the chair he stepped away from it, walking towards her, then glancing over his shoulder. Both chairs were gone. "Transport has been arranged, do you have any particular destination in mind?" Licking dry lips, he thought for a moment.

"Um, Osaka?" She nodded again.

"Fine. Remember, Mr. Hibiki, if we meet again there will be no second chances." He was in mid-nod when the world wrenched while a horrible nausea overtook him. Staggering a few paces he vomited, barely registering a brilliant flash from somewhere behind him. When, a couple of minutes later, he recovered enough to look around he found himself standing in a park overlooking the night skyline of Osaka, which he recognised from the times he'd visited. Shaking slightly, the part time pig limped off into the dark, silently grateful that he'd managed to talk himself out of whatever horrible fate awaited on the other side of the portal.

"Damn you, Akane Tendo. This is all your fault. Because of you I nearly went to hell," he mumbled.
When Aiko returned from teleporting Ryoga to Osaka, she found 'Reiko' leaning against the wall giggling helplessly while 'Yori', 'Chou', and the rest of her team were close to rolling on the floor. 'Yori', in fact, was doing exactly that, howling with laughter. "That was absolutely brilliant, Nabiki, sorry, I mean, 'Reiko'. You say we're good at acting!" Shaking her head she sat cross-legged on the floor and wiped her eyes, grinning like an idiot. "I wonder if he'll ever stop looking over his shoulder, worried that 'Ms Aoyama' might turn up and push him through a portal?" Aiko chuckled. "That projection was pretty damn convincing. If it wasn't for the low power output I'd have been sure there really was a portal there." 'Yori' nodded with a smile.

"I still haven't completely figured out portals, but I can fake it pretty well. I know Ryoga has seen them a few times, I was banking on him not knowing much about them, and of course, not being able to sense the magic or lack of it. He seemed to believe it." She looked at 'Reiko' who was still giggling. "The way you were completely blank about it was probably the most impressive bit. You could see in his face that he truly believed you'd toss him through it without a care in the world. I think it was the right decision, turning off the bracelet. I want him to remember her for the rest of his life."

"I doubt poor Ryoga will want to be anywhere near Tokyo from now on," 'Chou' commented, smiling widely. "It was a bit mean but I have to admit very funny to watch." 'Yori' grinned, glancing at Aiko.

"Thanks, guys, your help is much appreciated, as usual." Aiko and her team looked amused. "No problem, Yori. Always glad to help, you've both helped us so many times we can never pay you back." 'Chou' glanced at them.

"That's what friends are for. You know we'll always be there for you, you're all like family to us." The four young women seemed pleased. 'Yori' pulled a phone out of her ki pocket and dialled a number.

"Hi, Yoshi. Yes, it all went extremely well, thanks. Thank you for the loan of the warehouse, I owe you one. We'll lock up on the way out. Yes. OK, see you next time. Bye." Disconnecting she made the phone vanish again. "Right, we'd better get back to Akane and Shampoo. I'll just go and make sure everything is secure, then meet you guys back at the safe house, OK?" 'Chou' nodded, walking over and gently levering her giggling sister from the wall. 'Reiko' wiped tears of laughter from her face and grinned at her elder sister.

"That was so much fun," she said quietly, still intermittently giggling. 'Chou' smiled.

"Come on, we need to get back." Seconds later they vanished with a flash. The disguised Ranma checked the doors and windows, set the alarm, then locked the door behind her, before leaping to the roof and bounding off into the night. A few minutes later she walked through the door of the apartment to find everyone else standing around the bed on which Akane and Shampoo were sleeping peacefully. 'Chou' glanced up and smiled at her husband before looking back at the two women.

"How are they doing?" 'Yori' asked, coming up beside her.

"They're just sleeping now. There don't seem to be any after-effects from the cyst removal in Akane's brain, it looks like we managed to clean up all the breakdown products enough to prevent any reactions. We can wake them up at any point." The black-haired woman nodded thoughtfully.

Glancing at 'Reiko' she asked, "Fancy being Ms Aoyama again? There's no need to scare them as much as Ryoga, but I do think we need to get across to Akane at least how serious what happened was and how much worse it could have been." The middle sister looked at him, then at her elder sister, who sighed a little but nodded.

"I think she's right. If we hadn't been there the results could have been very unpleasant, it's bad enough as it is. Akane needs to understand that." 'Reiko' sagged a little.

"Damn. You're both right, of course. OK, but it won't be nearly as much fun this time." Her sister smiled gently at her.

"We understand. Thank you." They all looked back at the bed.

"Do we wake them up together, or one at a time?" 'Reiko' wondered out loud. 'Yori' and 'Chou' glanced at each other.

"It might be best to wake Shampoo first and explain the situation to her. She's less likely to freak out than Akane is, I think." 'Yori' looked again at her wife who slowly nodded.

"I agree." Moving to the Amazon's side of the bed, she reached out a hand, gently touching Shampoo's forehead. A couple of seconds later the young woman's eyes flickered, then opened. She stared at the ceiling with a slightly furrowed brow as if trying to remember something, then her eyes widened, flicking from side to side. Spotting 'Chou' first she looked at her blankly for a moment. After a second or two she looked around the room, her sharp eyes spotting 'Yori' and the four under-dressed magical girls, then 'Ms Aoyama' who was standing off to one side appearing forbiddingly calm. She looked at each of them in turn then dropped her head to the pillow and mumbled something in Mandarin. 'Yori' recognised the word for 'dreaming' and laughed.

"No, it's not a dream, Miss... sorry, what's your name?" Shampoo looked at her again.

"Xian Pu, but you Japanese usually pronounce it Shampoo. Is this real?" 'Yori' nodded.

"Yes. You and your friend were involved in a major fight a couple of hours ago, with a young man. All three of you were injured. We stopped the fight and brought you back here to heal you. The young man has already left. You and your friend were more seriously injured." Shampoo stared at her, then looked to her right where she had felt the ki signature of Akane, who seemed to be sleeping.

"Is Akane all right?" she asked, worried. 'Chou' nodded with a calming smile.

"Yes, she's fine. There was quite a lot of damage including a number of broken bones but we repaired it all." The Chinese girl looked at her gratefully.

"Thank you," she said. "On behalf of both of us." Inspecting the blonde carefully, then looking at the smaller black-haired woman, she asked delicately, "Excuse me, but are you Chou? And Yori?" They both nodded. Shaking her head, she sat up. "And I said we'd never meet you," she muttered, glancing sideways at the sleeping form of her friend. 'Yori' raised an eyebrow.

"Excuse me?" Looking embarrassed, Shampoo looked at her.

"Sorry. Akane wanted to meet both of you, she's been a little obsessive about it since she got a copy of a video that showed a demonstration you both did in a park around her a month or so ago. We came to Minato because she was sure we could find you, although I wasn't convinced. It seems I owe her an apology." 'Yori' appeared amused.

"We don't mind meeting fans. Although we're not too happy about people smashing up the area we call home. What was all that about?" Shampoo swung her legs over the edge of the bed and sat on it, sighing.

"Ryoga and Akane have something of a history. It's a complicated story, but it boils down to the way he did something dishonourable to her, which she has never forgiven him for. She also has a quick temper. Not a good combination." 'Yori' nodded.

"I could see that. The damage was impressive. I assume you both have some serious martial arts training?"

"Well, I'm from a village in China that's been raising and training women to fight for thousands of years. We're pretty good," Shampoo said rather proudly. "Akane's father is a martial arts master, a good one, and while she doesn't know as much as he does she's very fast and strong. Especially when she's angry, and I've never seen her that angry before. I've never seen anyone that angry before." She shuddered a little at the memory. 'Chou' glanced at her, then back at her still sleeping friend.

"She certainly seemed very worked up. Her ki output was quite large for someone so young." Turning her head to look at Akane, Shampoo wondered why she was still asleep. She asked them.

"We wanted to explain things to you before we woke her up, since from what we saw you were less likely to react badly. Akane was in a very distressed state when we were forced to render her unconscious," 'Chou' explained. "Just in case she was still feeling emotional we thought it would be a good idea to have you aware of the situation." Shampoo nodded with understanding, pushing herself to her feet then wobbling as a certain amount of dizziness came and went. 'Yori' steadied her.

"You had a fractured skull and quite a nasty concussion. It's all healed up now but you might feel a bit dizzy on and off for half an hour or so." The young Amazon was amazed, the injuries described so casually should have put her in hospital for days if not weeks. Turning to look at the woman lying on the bed the magical girl added, "We'll wake her up now. We found some things during her healing that we need to explain to her." Shampoo looked worried, that sounded ominous. Correctly deciphering her expression the black-haired young woman smiled. "Don't worry, we fixed the problem, but we need to explain what it was."

'Chou' moved around the bed to a position next to Akane, placing a gently golden-glowing hand on the sleeping woman's forehead, which made Shampoo stare. After a couple of seconds she removed her hand, as Akane's eyelids twitched. A few more seconds passed, then her eyes opened and she stared at the face of the blonde looking down at her. A blank look gave way to dawning recognition. "Chou?" she asked faintly, very surprised. The blonde nodded with a gentle smile. The blue-haired woman tried to sit up, wincing as her head throbbed. Quickly reaching out 'Chou' helped her.

"Careful. You were injured moderately severely, don't make any sudden motions for a few minutes." Reaching up with both hands Akane held her head for a moment, groaning a little.

"God, my head feels terrible," she moaned faintly. 'Chou' smiled slightly, putting her hand on top of the young woman head. Once more the glow came and went.

"How's that?" she asked quietly. Looking surprised, Akane prodded her head, then nodded "Much better, thanks. What did you do?"

"We're rather good at healing." Sitting on the bed beside the younger woman, she looked seriously at her. "Akane, I hope you don't mind me calling you that?" Akane shook her head, "We need to explain something to you. You were fairly seriously hurt, you had several broken ribs, a badly shattered leg, a concussion, and internal injuries. There's nothing to worry about, we fixed all of that and you'll be fine, although I would advise taking life gently for a couple of days. However, while we were working on your head we discovered something somewhat strange." Looking worried, Akane stared at the blonde, then looked at her Amazon friend, who also seemed disturbed.

"Is it serious?" the youngest Tendo asked quietly, horrible thoughts of some incurable ailment going through her mind. The warm smile she got back made her worries drop considerably even before the woman spoke.

"Not any more, as far as we can tell. But I believe it may have caused you some considerable problems in the past. From what your friend Shampoo tells us you have been somewhat, well, fast to lose your temper in the past. Would that be a good description?" Shamefacedly Akane nodded.

"Yes," she almost whispered. "My temper has been horrible for years. No matter what I do, I can't help it, it just suddenly boils over and I go... I guess I go a little crazy. Sometimes I can't even remember why I got angry. I've done some terrible things when I'm like that." A tear worked it's way down her left cheek, her hand coming up to wipe it away without thought. "It's cost me... it's cost me a lot. Me and my family. So much..." 'Chou' put her arm around the younger woman.

"I understand, more than you might realise. People in my life have had emotional problems as well. I'm sorry you've had these things to deal with, it's a terrible burden." Everyone watched silently as Akane collected herself. When she was calm again, the blonde woman continued. "Have you tried therapy for these problems?" Akane nodded.

"Yes. For nearly a year so far. It's helped a bit, but not as much as the doctor hoped or I want, I still get really angry sometimes. I don't even know why a lot of the time, when I look back on it whatever it was that triggered the anger is such a trivial thing." She shook her head. 'Chou' watched her face for a moment.

"When we scanned your brain to see if there was any damage from the concussion," she said slowly, "We found something else. Something a little unusual." The younger woman looked at her. "Have you heard of toxoplasmosis?" Akane shook her head. "It's a disease caused by a parasite called toxoplasma gondii. The parasite is very common around the world, it's mainly spread to humans by contact with cat faeces. It doesn't take much, just the slightest amount you might pick up while working in the garden or stepping in something in the street. Some estimates are that as many as twenty percent or so of people in some countries could be infected by it. In the majority of cases it has few if any effects, the infection is dealt with by the immune system and the person never realises. In a small proportion of people it can trigger effects similar to flu, for example, but they usually get better. In a small proportion of those cases it can go on to cause more serious problems, such as neurological issues of various types." Akane nodded as she listened.

"You understand? So, a common parasite, normally not very dangerous, but in a very small percentage of cases it can be quite unpleasant. There are a different class of problems, though, which are much rarer and also much more difficult to isolate. There is still a lot of research going on in the subject, in fact. The parasite ends up in the brain where it generates tiny cysts, which can be spread throughout most of the neural structure. Once it's established it stays put for a long time, possibly essentially for life. Some of the effects of this can be very nasty but usually a healthy person wouldn't even know. One odd effect, though, is that rarely it can have a fairly dramatic effect on certain neurotransmitters in the brain, mostly something called dopamine. Dopamine is extremely important to normal brain function. Too much of it, or worse, too little of it, can cause a vast number of quite unpleasant problems." She sighed a little. The youngest Tendo was looking very worried.

"Your brain chemistry was seriously out of balance. The neurotransmitter activity was all wrong in subtle ways, which we believe was either caused by or made much worse by the toxoplasmosis infection. There were a large number of cysts in several areas of your brain that are involved with normal emotional responses, amongst other things. There is a very good chance that this is at least partly responsible for your anger issues. It's a rare but not unknown effect of toxoplasmosis infection, which it's entirely possible your doctor might not have come across." 'Chou' watched the face of her youngest sister, wishing desperately that she could drop the disguise and comfort her. Akane looked scared and upset. "The current state of medicine doesn't know of any way of removing the cysts when they become established, that phase of the disease is considered chronic and untreatable." 'Yori' sat beside Akane on the other side of the bed and grinned at her.

"Luckily, we can do a lot of things that current medicine wouldn't believe possible." The blue-haired girl stared at her. "It took a while but we were able to remove the cysts and correct most if not all of the changes to your neurotransmitter system. We won't know for some weeks whether we got everything completely back to normal, it'll need to settle down for a while before we can really check it out properly, but I'm pretty sure that we've sorted it all out." Akane stared some more, then looked at the blonde on her other side who nodded with a smile.

"What does that mean?" the youngest sister asked, her mind whirling with all the things that she'd been told. 'Chou' smiled again.

"Hopefully, the main result you'll see is that whatever therapy you're having will become much more effective. It isn't a complete instant fix, though." 'Yori' snickered.

"Yep, it's not a miracle, it's just magical healing." 'Chou' gave her a look, while Aiko and her team smiled.

"Not entirely helpful, Yori." The black-haired woman grinned unrepentantly.

"But true." She turned to Akane. "I don't know for sure that the toxoplasmosis was the only cause of whatever emotional issues you have, I rather doubt it in fact. But I am sure it was making them much worse and also interfering with your treatment. Only time will tell but we both think it's very likely that you'll find you progress a lot better with your therapy now, although it will probably take a while to really have a large effect. Removing the physiological cause doesn't instantly fix the psychological effect, you see. But it will certainly help." Akane looked from one magical girl to the other, before she started crying. 'Chou' hugged her while 'Yori' watched sympathetically.

"Thank you. So very much. I've been trying so hard to be a better person, to get better, but I just can't. If this helps... I'll owe you more than I can ever repay."

Smiling, 'Chou' said, "Don't worry about that. It's what we do, we fix things where we can. I hope we've helped you."

"We're going to have to check you over again in perhaps a month," 'Yori' commented. "Just to make sure that we got everything. But after that you'll be clear and you can go on with your life. Hopefully in a calmer mood." Akane smiled at her joyfully.
"I knew wanting to meet you was the right thing to do, but I had no idea this was why. Thank you."
Glancing at Shampoo who had been listening with interest and pleasure, she grinned. "And you said we'd never find them." The Amazon smiled, shrugging.

"I was wrong."

The sound of someone clearing their throat made everyone look at the green-haired woman in the dark suit who was watching with a calm, neutral expression. She stepped forward. 'Yori' looked at her carefully. "Do you have something to add, Ms Aoyama?" Unseen by Akane and Shampoo she winked. The disguised Nabiki pushed her inner happiness at seeing Akane's joy down ruthlessly, subsuming it beneath the persona of 'Reiko'.

"Yes. Now that you have completed explaining the medical intervention you have performed on Ms Tendo, I require a discussion with her and Xian Pu. There is still the matter of her earlier interaction with Mr Hibiki to discuss. A very considerable amount of damage was caused by that interaction." Akane swallowed, glancing at Shampoo, who looked back wide-eyed. The cold emotionless voice of the young woman with the dark glasses produced a certain amount of worry in both of them. 'Yori' and 'Chou' exchanged looks then both stood up.

"Please be considerate of the fact that both of them have recently undergone medical treatment," 'Chou' requested quietly. 'Ms Aoyama' nodded once, seeming mildly annoyed at the comment. Stepping to one side, she waved a hand to the sofa and chairs on the other side of the room.

"Would you two please accompany me over there, so we can talk?" Shampoo and Akane looked at each other, then slowly got off the bed and walked over to the sofa, sitting down beside each other. 'Ms Aoyama' sat neatly in a chair facing them, her hands in her lap. They watched her watch them through the intimidating dark glasses for a moment, feeling nervous. "Akane Tendo, of the Tendo Training Hall in Furinkan, Nerima, and Xian Pu, of the Joketsuzoku tribe, also currently a resident of Furinkan." They exchanged worried glances again.

"Um, how do you know about us?" Akane asked nervously. The woman smiled slightly.

"We have our sources. As I explained to Mr. Hibiki a short time ago, we keep an eye on persons of a certain unusual type. You are both persons of interest to us for a number of reasons. As are a considerable number of the residents of Nerima and Minato." She fell silent for a moment, studying them dispassionately, while Akane shivered. There was something extremely worrying about what the woman said, but even more so about the way she said it. Glancing at 'Chou' and 'Yori' who were watching from the other side of the room she saw they both looked interested but didn't seem likely to intervene. This was something she and Shampoo would have to deal with on their own.

"Who are we?" Shampoo asked slowly, inspecting the woman carefully. She wasn't quite as worried as Akane but there was no denying that she felt this wasn't someone to mess with. The magical girls were one thing, she could feel how dangerous they were from some distance, but this woman was a different sort of threat, one she was finding it very difficult to get any sort of reading on. There was something very weird about her ki signature, even by comparison with 'Yori' and the others, which were odd in their own right. 'Ms Aoyama' smiled again, making both young women feel that the temperature in the room had dropped.

"As I explained to Mr Hibiki I am not at liberty to explain any more. Suffice it to say that I represent a group that takes a close interest in certain people and events. We usually prefer a more hands-off approach but recent events required direct intervention. Mr Hibiki has been dealt with already." That made them look at each other with a certain degree of concern, it sounded somewhat permanent. She noticed their glances and smiled again. "He was sufficiently persuasive about his intention to stay well away from Tokyo in future that I decided to allow him to leave rather than utilise my preferred method of dealing with the problem. It would have removed the young man as a threat for the foreseeable future, although he did not seem very keen on it himself. Although his cooperation was not essential I decided to be merciful this one time. As I explained to Mr Hibiki I will not be so understanding if it happens again. I believe he understood me."

Akane was feeling somewhat torn as well as definitely scared. Despite her own feelings towards Ryoga there was something about the dispassionate way this woman was suggesting a permanent solution that made her skin crawl. The woman turned her head to look at ‘Yori’ who had walked a little closer, allowing both young women to notice what they’d earlier missed, her ears had distinctly non-human traits. Once more they exchanged wide-eyed glances. Looking back to them she studied them both for a moment. Nodding to herself, she turned to Shampoo.

"Xian Pu. From what I understand you were attempting to restrain Ms Tendo and did not cause any damage. Indeed, it might even be said you were a victim. Ms Yori informed me that you sustained a severe concussion as a result of Ms Tendo's actions and that without her and Ms Chou's medical intervention could have suffered greatly." Akane gasped, snapping her head around to stare at her friend.

"Oh, god, Shampoo, I'm sorry. I don't even remember that." Her friend looked at her and smiled. "Don't worry, Akane, I'm fine now." The green haired woman waited patiently for them to turn back to her.

"As a result, at this time I don't believe you require any further action. I would suggest that in future you attempt to either more effectively restrain your friends, or duck faster." Her smile this time was particularly cold. She turned to Akane. "However, Ms Tendo, in your case we have a problem. You were directly responsible for the destruction of a building, six motor vehicles, two lamp posts, a large amount of street surface, and a wall, and indirectly responsible for the destruction of another building. Not to mention a considerable amount of damage to local infrastructure from concussion and shrapnel. Surprisingly, aside from Mr Hibiki and Xian Pu, no people were harmed. I find that quite impressive under the circumstances. The potential for a significant catastrophe was considerable."

Akane had gone pale as the full extend of her rampage was so clinically laid out. "If it had not been for the fortuitous presence of Ms Yori and her colleagues I suspect that at the very least there would have been a minimum of one fatality, although whether that would have been Mr Hibiki or yourself is open to doubt. Our records indicate he is a formidable opponent. Luckily, at least for you, he also seems not to be particularly fast on the uptake." She paused, inspecting Akane curiously. "We are aware of his prior history with you. I find it interesting that you have been able to damage him so severely on two occasions as there is little doubt you are not remotely in the same class of ability. If it was not for the fact that he appears from the evidence available to have difficulty fighting female opponents on equal terms things might have gone very badly for you, despite the advantage your uncontrolled anger gave you. You might do well to remember that in future, should you ever meet again. I would much prefer it that you do not." She waited until Akane gave her a very small nod, looking frightened.

"So. The question remains, what to do about you? Mr Hibiki was considerably more troublesome I will admit, but you are still something of a problem. When your destructive nature was confined to Nerima it was annoying but something we could deal with. I am not particularly interested in allowing that same nature to expand to Minato, we have enough problems here already, and we cannot always assume that Ms Yori will be there to prevent more damage." Akane opened her mouth, thought for a moment, then closed it again without saying anything. Ms Aoyama's eyebrows raised. "You have something to add, Ms Tendo?" Akane shook her head. "As you wish."

'Chou' walked over and tapped Ms Aoyama on the shoulder.

"Excuse me, could we have a word with you?" Glancing at the taller blonde the green-haired woman thought for a moment then nodded. Standing, she followed 'Chou' and 'Yori' to the corner of the room furthest from the sofa, where the three of them had a quiet discussion for some minutes. Akane glanced at Shampoo who looked back, neither one of them able to think of anything sensible to say and sufficiently intimidated not to idly talk. Eventually, Ms Aoyama returned, studying them for a moment before sitting again.

"Ms Tendo, I believe you should consider this your lucky day. Ms Chou and Ms Yori have persuaded me that a reparations fund they are involved with will cover the costs of the damage you caused. I have agreed to take no further action this time. But, I must warn you, it is unlikely that in the event of a repeat performance we will be so lenient. Certainly Mr Hibiki has used up all his chances, which will make his next interaction with us his last. I would advise that unless you wish the same, you confine your exuberance to Nerima. Additionally, I would also suggest that it would be in your best interests to continue with your medical treatment in an effort to reduce the likelihood of this type of event recurring. Even in Nerima we have limits to our patience. Do you understand me?" Akane nodded again feeling like a small child that had been scolded. Cold sweat was rolling down her spine under her clothes. "Excellent. In that case, I will take my leave." She stood.

Looking at Akane once more, she smiled again, this time the tiniest amount of warmth entering her expression. It was still chilly but more like liquid nitrogen now rather than liquid helium. "I wish you the best over your medical problems. Ms Chou and Ms Yori are superb healers in addition to their other impressive talents. Hopefully they have helped you." She took off her dark glasses revealing blue eyes with catlike pupils, making both young women gasp slightly. "I bear you no personal ill will, but I would prefer not to meet under such circumstances in the future. Good bye, ladies." Putting her glasses back on she walked over to the group of magical girls, talking briefly to a short brunette, who nodded. Seconds later both women disappeared with a brilliant flash of light making Shampoo and Akane stare in shock through blinking eyes. 'Chou' came over to them.

"I'm sorry about that but we didn't have a lot of choice. Damage from demons or overenthusiastic magical girls is one thing, but what happened tonight was rather different. Ms Aoyama and her group are... somewhat difficult." She grimaced slightly. "Anyway, that's all done with. With luck you will never meet her again." The youngest Tendo nodded slowly, shivering a little.

"That's probably the scariest person I've ever met. She's not even human." 'Yori' grinned at her from across the room.

"A number of people have said that about her for years. She's all right, actually, but not the most smiley person you'll ever meet." The black-haired girl came over and dropped into the chair Ms Aoyama had occupied. 'Chou' sat in the next one, while the three other magical girls wandered over as well. 'Yori' made introductions. "These are very good friends of ours. Misaki, Fumiko, and Tamiko. Aiko is the leader of their group and also the teleporter. She'll be back soon, she took Ms Aoyama to her next appointment." Shampoo and Akane both shook off the lingering effects of the interviewer from hell, smiling at the five magical girls. "I assume you don't want to talk about this Ryoga character." Akane frowned slightly.

"No, not really, thanks." She sighed, looking at them all. "I'm sorry you got dragged into my problems. I had no idea he was going to turn up here." 'Chou' smiled.

"Don't worry about it. We can deal with the results, as long as it doesn't happen again, and it resulted in us finding what might be your main problem and fixing it. With luck soon enough this sort of situation will be a thing of the past. Concentrate on getting better, don't dwell on things you can't do anything about." Nodding slowly Akane listened.

"I'm still really embarrassed about all of that. I'm going to have to go and apologise to everyone in the area." 'Yori' raised an eyebrow approvingly.

"That would certainly be appreciated."

"Is there anyone you would like to call, to let them know what happened?" 'Chou' asked. Akane exchanged a glance with Shampoo, who nodded. She sighed.

"I guess I'm going to have to tell Nabiki. That's my older sister. She's been very supportive of me, even when I did some horrible things, she deserves to know." Reaching into her pocket she pulled out her phone, staring at it as half the casing fell off in her hand. "Damn."

"Looks like you landed on it," Tamiko said with a smile. "That's happened to me as well. I wish I could find a properly battle-hardened one, I've broken about five of them in the last three years." 'Yori' pulled a phone out of thin air and handed it to her.

"Here. Use mine."

Smiling gratefully Akane dialled Nabiki's number then waited. When it was answered she said quietly, "'Biki? I've kind of messed things up again." She talked for a while, tears once more coming to her eyes, while the others waited. Aiko reappeared half-way through the conversation, 'Yori' softly catching her up in the background. Eventually she looked up, glancing around at the others. "She thinks I should go home now. Also, she was hoping you could come and explain things to them, if that's possible." 'Chou' and 'Yori' exchanged quick looks that passed a lot of information between themselves, then glanced at Aiko, who both nodded and shrugged a little. They turned back to Akane.

"Certainly. We can't stay long, there's quite a lot of work to do here, but we'd be glad to come and meet your family to explain. We can come back later for longer if you'd like that." 'Chou' smiled at her. 'Yori' was talking quietly to Aiko and her team, then turned to Akane and Shampoo.

"We'll have to come and see you again in a month or so anyway to check on you, so it's a good idea to find out where you live. Aiko knows parts of Nerima, and Furinkan, fairly well, so she can teleport us all there, then pick us up when we need to leave." Akane nodded, smiling gratefully, then repeated most of this to her sister on the phone before hanging up and handing it back to 'Yori'.

"Thanks."

"How do you feel?" 'Chou' asked with concern. The other woman looked pale and tired.

"Physically fine, thanks, but my mind is sort of tired." She laughed in a slightly depressed manner. "This isn't quite the way I thought things would go. I wanted to meet you, but not like this." Shampoo put a hand on her shoulder and gave her an encouraging squeeze, Akane looking at her friend, nodding with gratitude.

"Come on, no time like the present," Aiko said in a cheerful tone of voice. "Tamiko, keep yourself and the other two lunatics out of trouble until I get back. Call me if anything weird happens." The auburn-haired girl nodded and saluted mockingly.

"Yes, Ma'am. Define weird, please, Ma'am." Aiko burst out laughing, as did 'Yori'.
"Weirder than usual, you nut." Grinning, Tamiko stepped back as did Misaki and Fumiko, while Shampoo and Akane both stood. "Right, you two, stand just there, please," Aiko requested, while 'Yori' gave her a quick recharge. Both Nerimans watched with interest as the glow sank into her amulet. "You've both already been through a teleport once while you were unconscious, which should have overcome the worst initial symptoms, but you may get a little dizzy for a few seconds, OK?" They nodded apprehensively, eyes wide, wondering what was going to happen. Abruptly the world shifted and they found themselves looking at the main shopping precinct of Furinkan, all the shops now dark and shut since it was after midnight. The two women new to teleporting staggered slightly but quickly recovered.

"Everyone says that. It's certainly useful." Akane looked around, orienting herself, then pointed.

"The Dojo is about a five minute walk that way." They set off, arriving at the Dojo gate a few minutes later. Akane stopped, looking at it, then took a deep breath and pushed the gate open. Nabiki was waiting by the open front door, looking worried. 'Yori' and 'Chou', standing behind Shampoo and Akane, exchanged amused glances. The middle sister was indeed good at acting, she looked very convincing. When Nabiki spotted the three magical girls accompanying her sister and the Amazon her eyebrows went up.

"Are you OK, Akane?" she asked, walking to meet them. Her sister nodded, reaching out suddenly and hugging her hard. "Ow! Careful, you gorilla, you're crushing me." Giggling and crying simultaneously, Akane relaxed a little. Nabiki put her arms around her younger sister and hugged her as well. "It'll be all right, Akane. Come on inside." She cast a look at the others. "You guys as well. Everyone is waiting, they want to hear what happened, they're worried." The entire troupe went inside, entering the living room where the three parents were sitting talking with a pot of tea on the table. Nodoka jumped to her feet, rushing over and hugging Akane, before holding her at arms length and carefully inspecting her.

"How are you, Akane dear? You look very tired. Here, sit down and have some tea, then tell us what happened. Nabiki's told us some of it but I'd like to hear the whole story." She guided the youngest sister to a seat then poured her a cup, handing it to her. Akane took it gratefully. Nodoka turned to the others who were watching with amusement. Her eyes widened a little as she saw 'Yori' and 'Chou', recognising them from the news reports, then widened a little more as she saw Aiko and looked her up and down. The magical girl smiled back, used to the effect her uniform had on people. After a few seconds Nodoka shrugged slightly and said, "Please, take a seat, all of you. Would you like some tea?"

Soon everyone was comfortably seated and provided with cups, Akane having introduced the three women to everyone. 'Yori' glanced across the table at Genma and Soun who hadn't said a word since they'd come in, but were watching with wide eyes. She grinned at them exposing her small fangs. The exchanged glances but didn't say anything, remembering with some awe the DVD they'd seen a few days before. "I understand you're both master martial artists?" They nodded simultaneously. "Ah, excellent. Perhaps we should have a spar at some point." They paled a little while 'Chou' discreetly dug her elbow into her partners side. Snickering, 'Yori' turned back to Nodoka, who had a small private smile of her own at the interaction between the magical girl and the two martial artists.

Nodoka looked at Akane, then Shampoo. "So, girls, what happened? I know you went to Minato to meet Yori and Chou, but this seems a little... excessive." Akane blushed while Shampoo stared at the floor for a moment.
"Um, things got a bit, um, out of hand." Akane scratched her nose, embarrassed. She looked desperately at Shampoo who gazed back, then sighed deeply and began talking. It took half an hour or so to explain the events that had led to the two of them being unconscious on a bed somewhere in Minato. All three parents looked angry and worried when Ryoga was mentioned. Akane pointed out with considerable shame that it was her own fault that the fight had started, making Soun sigh and look at her with disappointment. She looked back, then dropped her eyes.

"I'm sorry, Dad. I know it was wrong, but I couldn't help myself, I just saw red when I spotted him. I can't even remember a lot of it."

"Oh, Akane. I thought you were doing so well." He studied her for a moment. After a few seconds she sighed and resumed her story. Shampoo, 'Yori', and 'Chou' all told their parts as well, the two magical girls carrying the explanation after Akane and Shampoo reached the point they were both unconscious. Nodoka gasped when 'Chou' listed the injuries all three participants had sustained, looking at Akane and Shampoo with concern.

"Do we need to get you checked over at the hospital?" she asked, worried. 'Chou' smiled serenely at her.

"That's unnecessary. We're very good at healing. Neither of them has anything wrong now, we repaired all the damage. And some other things we found." She glanced at Akane for permission to explain, the younger woman nodding. "We've learned about Akane's prior anger problems and the treatment she's been undergoing. While we were scanning her brain for any damage from the fight we came across something a bit strange that could have a bearing on it..." She explained carefully and slowly the toxoplasmosis diagnosis and the treatment they'd performed, 'Yori' adding some details. All three parents listened with shock, Genma going green when the words 'brain parasites' were spoken.

"There's nothing to worry about now, though. We cleaned out the cysts and all the damage we could find from their presence. Luckily, other than the influence on brain chemistry, there appears to have been no long-term damage, but we will have to check again in a month or so when everything has had a chance to settle down into equilibrium. Neither one of us expects to have to do anything more than minor adjustments at worst." Nodoka nodded, glancing at Soun with concern, who was almost in tears at what he'd heard.

"How long would this have been affecting Akane, do you think?" 'Yori' shrugged a little.

"It's almost impossible to say for sure. The parasite, when it reaches that stage of the disease, can stay resident for years at least. It's entirely possible that Akane could have been infected for most of her adult life if not longer. In most cases, there are no symptoms, or only mild ones. The immune system fights it off in the normal way, the infection clears up, and you're immune after that. The chronic stage is rare, this sort of effect is much rarer. There's quite a lot of research going on into it but there are still gaps in the knowledge." She grinned. "It's lucky we found it. Normal medical methods probably wouldn't have, and certainly couldn't currently do anything much about it if they did. We use different methods."

Nodoka nodded slowly, understanding what she meant. Soun asked, "Does this mean that her anger problems are gone?" 'Chou' shook her head sadly.

"I'm afraid we can't be sure of that. The root cause may not be the toxoplasmosis, in fact it almost certainly isn't. But we are sure that the parasite was making it dramatically worse by interfering with the normal progression of emotional development. The neurotransmitters affected are extremely important in the operation of the brain. Now that her brain chemistry is back to normal, or mostly at any rate, things should settle down rapidly. We both think that her current treatment should become much more effective now. Hopefully this will lead to a long-term improvement." She smiled at him. "If nothing else, the wild emotional swings we were told about should soon be a thing of the past, they were the most obvious direct effect of the dopamine imbalance." Akane looked grateful, while Soun stared at the magical girls, then his youngest daughter. After a few seconds he stood. Looking seriously at both of them he bowed deeply.

"Thank you for saving my daughter. It was an act of great honour. You have my eternal gratitude." Holding the bow for a long moment, he straightened up. "I can never repay you." 'Yori' glanced at 'Chou', then they both stood and bowed back.

"It was our pleasure. We like to help, and your daughter and her friend required us. There is no debt to repay," 'Yori' replied formally as she straightened. She grinned at Soun. "Don't worry about it," she added more casually, sitting down again and waving him to do the same. "It's what we do. We could have done without the fight and the damage, true enough, but fixing Akane's medical problems, that's something we would have happily done anyway."

"Even so. You are very honourable people, if there is ever anything I can do for you, just ask." Soun sat down again, smiling at them. Nabiki watched with interest, glancing at Aiko, who looked amused. Turning to 'Yori' she addressed the young woman.

"Speaking of the damage from the fight, what's going to happen about that? From what you've said it was considerable." She saw the spark of amusement in 'Yori's' eyes as the black-haired woman looked at her although no one else did.

"We manage a fund that was set up to cover damages caused by demon attacks and magical girl fights in our area of Minato. It's stretching the definition a little but under the circumstances we decided to class this as a magical girl fight and use the fund to sort out the damage." She looked seriously at Akane. "But this is a one-time thing, Akane. If anything like this happens again I don't know if we can help you." The youngest Tendo nodded with understanding.

"I know," she replied quietly. "Thank you. It won't happen again. You have my word." Shivering with the memory, she added, "I really don't want to meet Ms Aoyama again." Soun and the other parents looked at her, wondering what that meant, but all decided that now wasn't the best time to ask. Nabiki suddenly laughed. Everyone looked at her with varying expressions.

"I just thought of something," she explained. "You always wanted to be a magical girl, Akane. Now you've been classed as one for financial purposes." She giggled as Akane looked stunned. "Or possibly as a demon." This made her sister glare at her while 'Yori', 'Chou' and Aiko began giggling. Nodoka politely covered her mouth while she tried not to laugh, while even Genma was smirking. Soun grinned. Standing, 'Yori' looked at them all.

"It's been nice meeting you all. We're going to have to go now, we still have quite a lot to do, but if it's all right we'll pop back some other time and talk some more. We need to check up on Akane again at least once, so perhaps we should come back every week or two just to be sure." She glanced at 'Chou' who nodded as she also stood, followed by Aiko. Nodoka smiled at them.

"That would be wonderful. Thank you again. If you come during the day let me know in advance and you could have lunch with us if you'd like."

"Thank you, Nodoka," 'Chou' said with a smile, "That would be lovely. Yori has Nabiki's number from lending Akane her phone, so we will call her if that's acceptable." Nabiki put a surprised look on her face then nodded. The three magical girls stepped closer together. "We must leave now. I would suggest looking away or closing your eyes, the teleport produces a very bright flash when we go." Surprised, the three parents looked at each other, then at Shampoo and Akane who had their eyes closed tightly. Just in time they all closed their own, before the three women disappeared from the living room in a soundless bright light. A few seconds passed before Soun cautiously opened his eyes and looked around. He stared speechlessly at the middle of the room, where the three young women had been. Everyone else opened their eyes then also stared, before exchanging glances. Hanging in mid air in a very improbable manner were the Kanji characters for 'Good Luck, Akane' written in beautiful golden glowing calligraphy. Akane slowly got up, inspecting the insubstantial writing with amazement. She waved her hand tentatively through it feeling nothing at all. Moments later the writing faded away.

"That was... interesting," Soun said slowly. His middle daughter grinned at him, picking up her cup again.

"I have a feeling you haven't seen anything yet."
"Were they as impressive in real life as on the video?" Cologne asked her great-granddaughter curiously, stirring the pork stew she was making. Shampoo looked thoughtful.

"We didn't see any martial arts used, or at least I didn't, by the time they got there I was out of it. Akane can't really remember much either. Probably the only one who saw anything is that idiot Ryoga. But all that said, I'd have to say yes. They certainly have healing abilities greater than anything I've come across before. A lot of medical knowledge combined with some amazing magic or something." Cologne nodded, tasting a little of the stew, then frowning slightly. She reached for the spice rack and selected a bottle, adding a small amount to the pot. "They also have incredibly strange ki signatures, Yori more so than Chou, but neither one of them is like anything I've ever seen," Shampoo added, handing her grandmother the larger spoon she gestured to. "I'm not even sure I was even reading it right it was so weird. The level of power there was... just unbelievable, really. I can't be sure I'm not underestimating it. For all I know they were shielding it from us. What I did see makes someone like Herb look like a beginner."

Cologne checked the rice, then spooned some out onto a couple of plates, adding the stew on top. Shampoo picked up both plates and took them out to one of the tables in the closed restaurant, while the Amazon elder bounced behind her with the cutlery. When they were sitting down, she continued her story. "I don't know enough about magic to even guess at their power level there, but there was certainly something that wasn't ki present in enormous quantities as well. Yori is definitely more powerful then Chou, but even Chou is much more powerful than anyone I've met before." She glanced at her grandmother who was chewing contemplatively. "Even you, Great Grandmother."

The old woman smiled, unoffended. "I wonder what would have happened if Saffron had bumped into those two?" she mused. Shampoo laughed.

"They'd have eaten him alive. No question. He'd have lasted seconds." She shook her head in amazement. "You have no idea, not without meeting them. They look fairly harmless on the surface, but the way they move, not to mention the power signatures... No, they're extremely dangerous. Incredibly, unbelievably lethal, I suspect, if they have need to be. Luckily they also both seem to be very calm and peaceful people. Chou gives off an air of serene competence, that's the only way I can think to explain it. Like my mother, but taken to silly levels. Yori is more chaotic, but also gives off a feeling that she knows what she's doing. I like them. Even with all the power, you don't feel scared, it's more like you know beyond doubt that they'd protect you from anything, even if they didn't like you." She gazed off into space for a moment.

"It's difficult to explain. You really have to meet them, I think, to get the full effect. But I begin to see why people from their district seem not to talk about them outside it. They feel a loyalty to them, they don't want to upset them because they love them rather than because they're frightened of them. Although, I can see why the magical girls Yori shouts at look so worried, I think that when she's angry she's very scary indeed." Blinking, she looked slightly embarrassed about her speech, quickly beginning to eat. Cologne watched her face with interest for a moment.

"Interesting analysis, dear. Very interesting. Thank you." She grinned, making her wrinkly face fold up even more. "You seem quite taken by them." Shampoo glanced at her, then laughed.

"It's difficult not to be. Aside from anything else, the way they helped Akane is remarkable. They certainly didn't have to, not to that extent. Healing her is one thing, arranging to pay for all the damage is amazingly generous." She looked thoughtful for a moment, then worried. "Especially with Ms Aoyama there. Now, she scared me. A lot.” Looking seriously at her grandmother, she went on, "You have no idea. There was something really off about her ki, like she wasn't human. Her eyes weren't human either. I'd guess that there might be a certain amount of demon heritage there. She was terrifying. The way she spoke about simply eliminating Ryoga as a threat, like she thought of him as no more than a fly to be squashed..." The lilac-haired Amazon shuddered. "Cold. She'd scare Nabiki, she was so cold. And she knew things, things about us and Ryoga. I have no idea who she is or who her 'group' is but I don't want to meet them again.” Cologne studied the younger woman for a few seconds. It was clear that she was genuinely terrified by her memories.

"Was she physically dangerous?" she asked. Shampoo shrugged.

"I truly have no idea. She didn't look like a fighter, but... I just couldn't say. Her ki, her attitude... Whether she was personally capable of hurting me I don't know but I have no doubt at all she could arrange it, and more to the point, would without a second thought if she felt she had to. I don't want to find out what would happen then." She laughed slightly uncertainly. "It was like talking to someone from some sort of supernatural Yakuza or something. Or perhaps some incredibly secret government organization like in the movies, only a lot scarier." Shuddering again she resumed eating, her hand trembling a little.

Watching her for a while Cologne ate slowly. Eventually she asked, "How did Yori and Chou act towards her?"

"With a lot of respect. Which makes it even worse." The old woman nodded, thinking over everything she'd been told.

"Very interesting. I think I'd like to meet these people one day, or Chou and Yori at least. The other woman, probably best to leave that alone." Shampoo nodded vigorously.

"We found one of the devices," Ranma said, handing Nabiki a cup of coffee. She took it with a nod of thanks.

"Before or after it activated?" she asked, dreading the answer. He smiled.

"Before, luckily." They walked out of the kitchen to the living room where Kasumi was just finishing putting away the tablecloth after lunch. All three of them sat on the sofa, Ranma handing his wife the other cup he was carrying. "Sergeant Harada found out that there was a bomb scare in Kyoto, with a description of a bomb unlike anything they'd seen before. He recognised it immediately and called Agent Naito, then us. Agent Naito was able to get the Kyoto bomb squad to back off and leave it alone. Good thing too, it was booby-trapped and would have activated immediately if they'd prodded it any more than they did. Aiko got us all down there a few minutes later and we disarmed it then destroyed it." He shook his head with a scowl. "The damn thing was in a school, of all places. The carnage would have been unbelievable." Nabiki felt sick.

"A school?" she whispered. Her sister nodded looking grim.

"As far as we could make out the timer was set to go off sometime in the next couple of weeks during the middle of the day. They're a bit imprecise, possibly deliberately to add a random factor.” She turned to her husband. "To be honest I'm quite glad you killed the bastard. If you hadn't, something like this would make me want to." He nodded soberly, reaching out and taking her hand.

"So that's one down, five to go." Nabiki sipped her coffee while staring out the window, thinking. "What do you think are the odds that any more of them are in Japan?" Ranma shrugged.
"I suspect not high. We're pretty sure there are none in Tokyo now, we've scanned as much of it as we could with no hits at all. I have a feeling that the mage wouldn't have left them all here, he'd want to spread them around. To be honest I'm kind of surprised that any were in Japan at all. We got lucky, or he got sloppy. Same thing I guess."

"So five left, with fifteen cities around the world we know he visited. Assuming he didn't give them to someone else to plant in which case they could be almost anywhere." Ranma nodded at her summation.

"I really hope he did it himself, that narrows it down a lot, but even so we're going to have to get very lucky to find them all before they go off. I have a horrible feeling that at least one of them is going to be after the fact."

"Damn. I wish I could help somehow." The middle Tendo looked at her sister and brother-in-law. Kasumi smiled at her.

"You help just by being here to talk to, sister." Grinning, Nabiki lifted her cup in salute.

"Even so." After a moment, Ranma looked up from where he'd been studying the table, deep in thought.

"How's Akane doing? We've been kind of busy for the last week or so and haven't had time to drop by." The brunette woman looked pleased.

"Remarkably well, actually. It's not quite a miraculous cure, but it's the next best thing. The first couple of days after you cured the infection she was tired and a bit depressed, but since then she's cheered up more than I've seen her for years. Her temper is still on a hair trigger but the random mood swings seem to be dying down steadily. Her doctor is astounded. She tried explaining what you did but I'm not sure the doctor believed her. Especially as even if she had the equipment to check for that sort of problem the evidence is gone now." Ranma looked amused, while Kasumi giggled.

"It probably doesn't matter if she believes Akane or not, as long as she keeps treating her." Nabiki nodded.

"True. Anyway, so far it seems to be having a very noticeable effect. Hopefully in the longer term her treatment will begin to work the way it should, although whether she'll ever get over all her problems I have no idea." She snickered. "If nothing else, having the number of times she needs to be darted brought down would please everyone." Ranma and Kasumi exchanged glances then fell about laughing.

"I still have trouble believing that was the only thing they could think of," the martial artist said, chuckling. His sister-in-law shrugged.

"So do I, but whatever else you say about it, it works. Bit brutal though." Kasumi was still giggling, but finally composed herself.

"We were thinking that we'd pop by on Thursday, if that's all right," she said. "Around midday." Her sister looked pleased.

"That would be fine. I'll come back from university for the afternoon." She inspected the other two. "It's Christmas in a little over three weeks. Do you have any plans for it?" They exchanged glances.

"Well, usually we stay here, perhaps with a few friends. Aiko and the girls came by last year, and Uthryyl dropped in to say hello. He finds the whole idea a bit strange but is completely fine with holiday celebrations in general. He likes a good party.” Nabiki stared at her brother-in-law for a moment, then shook her head.

"Um, OK. So you celebrated Christmas with some magical girls and a demon..." Kasumi and Ranma both nodded, grinning. "You two are very strange."

"So you keep saying." Ranma looked amused, stretching and becoming female at the same time. "I heard that Akane went and apologised yesterday to everyone affected by her little self-control problem," she said, looking pleased. "I'm genuinely impressed. It made people feel much better about things." The red-head leaned against her wife, looking comfortable. Nabiki watched with a grin. Kasumi smiled at the smaller woman, putting her arm around her.

"How cute," the middle sister said with a certain amount of sarcasm. Ranma winked at her, closing her eyes and relaxing.

"It was a big lunch and I want a nap." Both Tendo sisters chuckled as she pretended to snore.

"Twit." Nabiki got up and took the various depleted cups into the kitchen, putting them in the sink, before returning to the living room. She stood looking at the two on the sofa for a while with a small smile, before walking over to the window and looking out. "It's snowing again," she observed, peering up and down the street. "Must be about two centimetres by now." She turned back to the others. Kasumi watched her with affection.

"Would you like to come here for Christmas, or at least some of it?" the elder woman asked. Nabiki laughed.

"Funny, I was going to ask the same thing. Coming to the Dojo, I mean."

"As Maiko and Rika, or Yori and Chou?" Ranma asked, her eyes still closed but a smile on her face. Nabiki shrugged a little.

"Ah. That's the problem, you're both too many people." The red-head snickered. Opening her eyes she grinned at Nabiki.

"You could visit as Ms Aoyama. Your first alternate persona! She's a very good one as well." Moving back to the sofa the middle sister burst out laughing.

"Poor Akane would crap herself. I'm afraid I really scared her. Every time she mentions Ms Aoyama she actually shivers. God knows what Ryoga feels about her, I was genuinely trying to terrify him. Not with Akane and Shampoo though, I thought I'd dialled it down enough to just worry them a little." Ranma chuckled again.

"You needed to see it from outside. I don't think you realise just how frightening you can be when you try, especially when you look like that." She glanced up at her wife who nodded agreement.

"Sister, you can be very impressive if you try. Ryoga was absolutely horrified by you, we could both feel it. He believed it utterly, especially when you threatened to toss him through a portal. I doubt he'll ever come anywhere near Tokyo again if he can possibly help it."

"Shampoo mentioned once that the thing that scared her the most is that Ms Aoyama had a ki signature that was clearly not human. What did she mean by that?" Nabiki asked curiously. Ranma smiled a little.

"We're good at energy control as you know. Even without the invisibility cloak both of us can mask our ki and magic emanations pretty much completely, it would take a real master to notice anything at all when we really try. Happosai could, Cologne might, a few others probably could with effort. But even they couldn't read the real results, only that what they saw wasn't quite right. We can also mask other people as well, or alter their signatures. It's part of the illusion spell in fact. So, when we set up Reiko Aoyama, we gave her a... very strange... ki signature. Fairly powerful but definitely not human. It helps that your own ki levels are considerably higher than average." Nabiki stared at her, then at Kasumi, who nodded.

"All of our family have higher than normal ki outputs, Nabiki. It's in our blood, so to speak. That's one reason I found learning the art relatively easy. Ranma told you some time ago that you would probably be good at it as well, she wasn't trying to flatter you. We can both see it. It's a bit sad that out of all of us Akane is the lowest skill and power level, even after all these years. She could improve considerably, with a lot of work, but will never reach what I can do, or what you would be capable of." The middle sister looked somewhat shocked.

"But... when she was fighting Ryoga, she was absolutely blazing with energy! Even I could feel it and you could certainly see it." Ranma sat up and nodded at her statement.

"Very true. But the thing you don't realise was that was about the maximum output she could possibly produce. It's one of the reasons I shut her down like that, she was in danger of permanently harming herself with so much ki being thrown about. Another few minutes and she would have burned through all her reserves and possibly died." Nabiki thought about this for a while.

"You told me some time ago that ki use was like exercising a muscle, in that the more you used it the more you could use it. And also that you hadn't yet found an upper limit to how much you could produce, either of you." The red-head nodded again.

"Correct. But to use the same analogy, if you push yourself too hard when exercising a muscle you could tear it, or break a tendon or even a bone. That could cause permanent damage which would affect it for life, possibly even cripple you." It was Nabiki's turn to nod thoughtfully. "Ki is a bit like that. It's not a perfect analogy but you don't have the background to quite understand it if I gave you a more accurate description. What it all adds up to is that some people have lower limits than others. Akane is vastly more powerful in ki output than probably ninety-five percent of martial artists could ever be, but she's completely untrained and worse, undisciplined in it. That limits her severely. She just doesn't have the mindset for it, in essence. Even so with proper training she could do some pretty impressive things." Kasumi took up the explanation at this point, Nabiki switching her attention to her sister.

"Almost all the martial artists back in Nerima were far more able to use what ki they had available because they do have the right mindset. Shampoo, for example, probably doesn't have quite the same power available that Akane does, yet, but she is much more dangerous because she knows how to use it. She could progress to a very high level with practice, I think. Ryoga has much, much more ki than Akane, and also knows how to use it very effectively, but because of his own issues Akane has badly beaten him twice. If he'd tried as hard as he did against Ranma he could have defeated her easily either time. Mousse, again, has much more ki than you would expect, nearly as much as Ryoga, but he uses it differently."

"Pop and your father are also quite powerful when they need to be, although neither one of them is trained in the use of raw ki. Several of Pop's special techniques use it in interesting ways." Ranma grinned. "I don't think he knows that, though. He doesn't have the right mindset either. I'm not sure if he could learn to use even a simple ki blast, personally I doubt it. Your father might."

"What about Happosai? Or Cologne?"
"Happosai is a master, as you would expect. Simply being as old as he is would push his power level extremely high, but he knows an enormous amount about how to use it as well. Cologne, oddly, isn't anywhere near as powerful in ki terms as you might think, although she's certainly nothing to sneeze at, I'd put it at about Ryoga's level. Her knowledge of it, though, rivals Happosai, so she's extremely dangerous. She can use what she has very efficiently. She also knows quite a bit about magic, and can combine them effectively." Nabiki considered this for a minute or two, then asked the obvious question.

"And the magical girls?" Ranma snickered.

"Now there, it gets interesting. Almost none of them have much ki power at all, not much more than a normal untrained person. I was really surprised about that at first. The bulk of them use magic exclusively, which allows some admittedly extremely impressive results, but it's not quite the same, nothing like as flexible for instance. There are some exceptions of course, but that's broadly true. Aiko and the others are one of those exceptions, which is our fault. We've been training them for years in the art, they're coming along well. I started it when I first met them, but since we've been here we both took it up again. None of them are anywhere near our level yet, they probably never will be to be honest, but they're becoming very dangerous even without the magic. Again, probably in the top half a percent or so of martial artists, like all the people in Nerima were. There are a few others we've trained to some degree, but most of them simply don't have what's necessary to be really good at it." She sighed a little. "It's a pity, really, some of them desperately need to learn some proper fighting skills. Luck and overwhelming power will only take you so far if you don't know how to apply it right."

Kasumi smiled at her husband, who turned male again and kissed her before getting up and heading for the bathroom. "He's worried about all of them. Even the ones we don't get along with he feels responsible for in some ways," she confided to her sister once the dark-haired young man had left. "I keep telling him that a lot of them have been doing this since long before we came on the scene, but he still worries. He's a good person and doesn't want to see anyone hurt if he can somehow prevent it. You also have to bear in mind that his idea of 'really good' is so far past what anyone else would even consider possible that he tends to underestimate how effective his training is."

She smiled a little. "Everyone either one of us has trained at all has improved enormously but he has extremely high standards. Aiko and the others are certainly the best, they'd be able to give anyone in Nerima a very hard fight indeed even without using their magic. He won't be satisfied until they've all reached whatever limits they have though." She stopped talking as Ranma returned and sat beside her again. Nabiki considered her sister's words. She could certainly believe that Ranma felt a degree of responsibility to the others who occupied the same basic role, that of protecting the public, which would also explain why he seemed to take their excesses so personally. It amused her, the fact that deep down he clearly identified strongly with the magical girl lifestyle even if on the surface he disliked being described as such.

He noticed her looking at him with a slight grin, retuning the look with a puzzled one. "What?" he asked curiously. She shook her head a little, the grin widening.

"Oh, just thinking. Don't worry about it." Ranma laughed.

"That look always makes me worry, coming from you." Both sisters giggled, exchanging amused glances. "So, ready to learn the art yet?" Nabiki shook her head.

"Not yet. Like I said the last time you asked, there are things that get in the way." He shrugged.

"OK. But I'm going to keep asking." Grinning, she nodded, then changed the subject. The trio talked for a couple of hours, before Nabiki looked at her watch.

"Well, it looks like I have to go. I've got one lecture at about four I need to go to, then a lot of studying for a test tomorrow. Thanks for lunch, it's been nice seeing you two again." Kasumi hugged her sister, smiling.

"It's been wonderful seeing you as well, sister. I'll call you a taxi." She went off to the house phone, as Ranma also gave his sister-in-law a quick hug.

"We'll see you in three days, assuming nothing insane happens between now and then." She chuckled.

"Knowing your life, that's no guarantee!" Laughing, he walked her to the elevator, where they waited for Kasumi.

"Very true. But we can hope." By the time the three of them exited the elevator on the ground floor three women were in it. The taxi arrived a few minutes later, 'Maiko' and 'Rika' waving to Nabiki as she dashed through the snow which was now coming down quite heavily to dive into the door the driver opened for her. She waved back as they pulled away, brushing snow from her coat. The driver glanced at her, he was the older man she'd met when she'd gone out with Kasumi and Ranma months ago. Since then she'd ridden with him several times, enough that he knew her name.

"Have you had a nice time, Miss Tendo?" he asked politely. She nodded.

"Yes, as always, Mr Tanaka. I like this area, it's very interesting. Although I could do without the weather." She looked at the snow she'd brushed onto his seat. "Sorry about that." Laughing, he waved it off.

"Don't worry, it'll dry." They chatted until they reached the train station, where she paid him then jumped out. "See you next time, Miss Tendo. Bye." he called as he pulled the door shut. She watched him drive off before heading inside, smiling to herself.

Sergeant Harada watched the young brunette woman head for the north-bound platform, thinking hard. 'Tendo. That name rings a bell. I wonder why...' He mused on the subject as he left the station, pulling his coat collar up against the snow drifting out of a leaden sky. 'I've seen her around here a few times, near the university, but she doesn't live here. Must be visiting friends.' Shaking his head he dropped the thought, pulling out his notebook to check on his next task. 'Oh, right, check on how things are going over by the school after that magical girl fight last week. Or whatever it was, people seemed a bit confused. Good thing Yori and Chou shut it down before anything worse happened. Aiko and her girls were there as well, that lot seems to be around here quite a bit recently.' He laughed slightly to himself. 'I guess Yori is training them again. They're probably wishing they had some nice easy demons to deal with in that case.'

Half an hour later he looked at the reconstruction work across the street, which was ongoing despite the heavy snow. Turning to the mid-fifties man standing next to him he grinned. "Yori seems to have found some pretty dedicated contractors, to be working in this weather." The man laughed.

"Or she's paying them pretty damn well. Sorry, I mean, the magical girl reimbursement trust is paying them well." He looked amused. "Although we all know who is behind that. And we're very pleased about it."

"Remarkable young woman, isn't she, Hikaru?" Harada said as they retreated to the warmth of the coffee-shop the man ran. He went behind the counter, pouring them both a mug of fresh coffee, then pushing one across the counter to the sergeant. Hikaru nodded.

"Oh, yes. Very much so, even taking the magical girl part into account. Her and Chou both."

Trying his coffee, he made a face and stirred in some more sugar. "Those two are very popular, more so than I think they realise. If either one of them was to run for Mayor they'd get an awful lot of votes." Harada started laughing, completely surprised by the comment. Hikaru shrugged, looking amused. "It's true. I'd vote for them."

"Somehow I doubt either one is interested in politics. Neither is really the type from my experience. Although, that said, you're right. I'd vote for them as well." Harada grinned, drinking some more coffee. "The current guy is fine, though. He stays out of the magical girl thing completely, which is probably a good idea. I can't see a minor politician getting any mileage out of interfering at all, except to alienate the public. Especially around here." The coffee-shop owner nodded with a smile, turning to serve a customer. When he came back he picked up his mug and held it, looking out at the street.

"You remember what it was like before they came? Half the buildings in this street were damaged. Most of them because of the magical girls, not the demons." The sergeant nodded, thinking back a few years.

"It was pretty bad for a while. I remember those colour-coded girls kept popping up and breaking things, it was getting really annoying. I know Yori seems to find them particularly irritating. Understandable, the way they spend half the fight posing and shouting silly slogans and the other half using ridiculously overpowered attacks with stupid names is practically designed to piss her off." Both men laughed.

"Pretty girls, though. But their uniforms aren't exactly right for this weather," Hikaru said, grinning.

"True. I'll bet they spend a lot of time shivering unless they have some sort of heating magic." Harada snickered. "You know Aiko and the other girls with her? Yori's friends?" Hikaru nodded. "They must be having a hell of a time with this snow. Their costumes are even less practical." They looked at each other and chuckled, turning to watch the construction across the street again. "What exactly happened last week, anyway?" the policeman asked curiously. "No one seems to have a sensible answer. It's down as a magical girl fight, but something doesn't quite fit."

The store owner looked thoughtful. "Well, there was certainly a magical girl, or a girl, at any rate. She was a bit taller then Yori and seemed in a very bad mood. I mean, an insanely bad mood. She was glowing bright red and absolutely frothing at the mouth, screaming insults at this dark-haired young man. Um, Hibiki something I think she called him, or something Hibiki. It was hard to tell, by that point most people were running in the other direction." He sipped his coffee while Harada waited. "I didn't see the beginning of the fight, but apparently she jumped him out of the blue, that's when the building up the other end of the street got wrecked. She threw Yoshi's van at him. Yoshi isn't very happy about that, he'd only just got it. Anyway, the girl chucked it at this kid, smashed him right into the wall which then collapsed. She dug him out then smacked him all the way down the street, which made several craters. He's a tough young man whoever he is, a normal human would have been killed just by the van never mind everything else."

"Some sort of martial artist, I'd guess," Harada commented. The other man nodded thoughtfully.

"Probably. Anyway, by the time I got outside she was throwing motorcycles at him. He managed to get off some sort of energy attack, which missed and destroyed Mrs Watanabe's shoe shop. Then another girl, with really long sort of lilac hair, tried to knock the first one out with some clubs she got from somewhere. That didn't work out very well, the first girl knocked the second one out with one punch and threw her all the way across the street. The boy managed to punch her into the shoe shop, but she came out and threw a desk at him. By the end of it he had a broken leg from what I could see, his knee looked dreadful, but she was pretty smashed up as well. Then Yori and Chou turned up and shut it down in seconds." Putting his empty mug in the sink he looked enquiringly at the sergeant while holding up the coffee pot. Harada shook his head and he put the pot down again.

"Aiko and her team arrived at about the same time, I don't know if they were together or if it was just a coincidence. They took both girls and the man who was completely out of it by then and the whole bunch teleported away. Yori came over and told me just before to let everyone know that she'd be back to arrange the repairs later. She came back first thing in the morning and did exactly that. Very reliable girl." He accepted Harada's empty mug and quickly washed and dried both of them, putting them back on the rack.

"I wonder what that was all about?" Sergeant Harada mused, thinking about the story. Hikaru shrugged.

"No idea, Yori didn't say. The girl, the first one, obviously had some real problem with the young man. I've never seen anyone that angry before. Poor kid didn't seem to know what to do, he just looked confused and scared. Lucky for him Yori turned up when she did, the girl looked intent on killing him." He served another customer. "Not many people around this afternoon because of the weather, I might shut early," he commented on his return. After a moment's thought, he added, "The funny thing is that the girl came back yesterday." The sergeant looked sharply at him, raising his eyebrows. "To apologise, apparently. She tracked down everyone who'd had some problems because of the fight and apologised to them, from what I was told sincerely and looking very embarrassed. She didn't go into any details though, just apologised, promised it would never happen again, and left."

"How odd," Harada said slowly. Hikaru nodded.

"It's a bit weird. She didn't seem to be a magical girl, someone told me she said she was a martial artist from Nerima." Laughing, he didn't notice the way the sergeant's attention level jumped. "You know the stories about that place. They make Minato look sane. Anyway, she said she was really sorry that all the damage had been caused because of her issues with this Hibiki guy. Everyone felt she really meant it too."

"What was her name, do you know?" Harada asked after a few seconds. Hikaru looked at him with interest.

"Going to talk to her?" he asked. The policeman shook his head.

"I don't think I have to, if Yori's been involved. I'm just curious." His friend nodded understandably.

"Um, Tendo, I think. Yes, that's right. Akane Tendo. Mrs Watanabe said she obviously had some sort of martial arts training, just looking at the way she moved, but nowhere even close to our girls. Better than average except for the temper, probably, anywhere but here or Nerima." Harada absently thanked his friend, then left the coffee shop, heading back to the station.

'Tendo. There's that name again. I'm sure I've heard it somewhere before, years ago, and now twice inside an hour...' Shaking his head, puzzled, he decided to do a little research when he had a free moment.
Chapter 29

Nodoka looked up at the knock on the door. "Ah, that must be them. Would you get the door, please, Akane?" The blue-haired young woman put the dish she'd just dried on the table and headed for the door, smiling. Nabiki watched her go, then turned to the older woman.

"She's in a good mood at the moment." Since she'd arrived half an hour ago Akane had been smiling most of the time. Nodoka nodded, opening the oven and checking the progress of the cake she was baking.

"Her treatment is certainly working much better the last week or so. Those two girls worked the nearest thing to a miracle I've ever seen." She carefully closed the over door again, then stirred the rice on the stove. "Your sister still has a quick temper, but it's not such a nasty one now. She doesn't seem to be as vindictive when she's angry as she was even two weeks ago. Plus the sudden mood swings have evened out to a remarkable level. She's basically quite happy most of the time. She knows it herself, which I think helps a lot as well." Both women turned as Akane returned, followed by 'Yori' and 'Chou', talking quietly to them. "Ah, hello, you two. I'm glad you could come. Lunch will be in about twenty minutes, is that all right?" 'Chou' nodded with a gentle smile on her lips.

"That would be wonderful, Mrs Saotome." The auburn-haired woman smiled back at her in a similar manner.

"Please call me Nodoka."

"Of course. Akane, if you'd like, we can check you now, or wait until after lunch." The blonde looked at the youngest Tendo, who shrugged.

"It doesn't matter to me. Now is as good a time as any, I suppose."

"Very well. Shall we go and sit in your living room, then?" Both Tendo sisters led the way, the two magical girls following. Nodoka put a kettle on and set a tray of tea things ready. When she came into the living room a few minutes later with the prepared tea Akane was sitting on the sofa with 'Yori' sitting next to her, her hands on the other woman's head. Nodoka's eyes widened a little when she saw that the black-haired girl's hands were actually glowing visibly, in a rather pretty purple colour. Putting the tray quietly on the table she sat down next to Soun who was watching with interest and awe. Nabiki was talking to 'Chou' in the corner of the room, both of them watching the process intently.

A couple more minutes passed before 'Yori' lowered her hands and opened her eyes, smiling at Akane, who looked slightly worried. "It's fine. There's no sign of the parasite any more, your brain chemistry is almost back to normal, all I had to do was slightly adjust the serotonin levels which must have been influenced by the dopamine imbalance. Nothing to worry about although you may feel a bit tired for a few hours. I'd suggest going to bed early tonight to let everything settle down." Akane nodded.

"Thank you," she replied, looking grateful. 'Yori' grinned.

"No problem." 'Chou' came over, kneeling next to the youngest Tendo.

"Do you mind if I have a look?" Her friend glanced at her with a raised eyebrow, making her giggle. "I'm not suggesting you've missed anything, I'm just curious. This is an unusual case, I'm "Go ahead. I can't feel anything other than a faint tickle anyway." 'Chou' placed her hands on the young woman's head in the same way 'Yori' had done earlier, except the glow this time was a beautiful golden-white colour. Soun made a slight noise causing Nodoka to look at him, seeing he was watching with respectful awe. After a minute or two 'Chou' sat back on her heels, nodding.

"Yes, everything looks pretty much correct. We'll have to check at least once more, but I'm fairly sure there won't be any adverse effects from the infection." Standing, she looked down at the woman who didn't realise she was her sister. "How do you feel?" Akane grinned happily.

"Good. Better than I have done for years. Oh, I know I still lose my temper too easily but the doctor thinks she'll be able to help me with that now. I don't get the red mist any more though, or the up and down emotions. I can't thank you two enough." 'Yori' looked gratified, as did her blonde partner.

'I heard that you went back to apologise to everyone affected by your, um, incident, a few days ago," the smaller visitor said, looking approving. "Thank you for doing that. It impressed everyone with how you accepted the responsibility for the damage. It was an honourable action." Akane appeared very pleased by the compliment but also slightly sad.

"I just wish it hadn't happened." She paused, then added, "But it if hadn't, I wouldn't have met you and been cured of those horrible little parasites. God knows what might have eventually happened then." 'Yori' and 'Chou' exchanged glances, then the blonde put her hand on Akane's shoulder.

"I'm glad we were able to help. Don't worry about things that didn't happen." Moving over to the other end of the sofa she sat next to 'Yori'. Nabiki sat next to her father, who smiled at her, then went back to studying the two magical girls. Pouring the tea Nodoka handed everyone a cup then took her own.

'Yori' sipped hers, then looked at the older woman. "Thank you, Nodoka, this is nice." The Saotome elder smiled.

"You're welcome. So, tell me, what do you and Chou do when you're not saving Akane from herself?" She laughed a little. "Or terrifying other magical girls. I've seen some of the news reports from Minato, you seem to have a penchant for dressing them down." 'Yori' snickered, amused, while 'Chou' grinned.

"It's a hobby." Nodoka snorted with laughter. "To be honest I don't truly enjoy shouting at the other girls but some of them are very irresponsible. They seem to think it's OK to wipe out anything they consider 'demonic' without any thought of the consequences, which reflects badly on the rest of us. Neither of us like that, it's disrespectful of the people whose livelihoods they upset, and also rather dishonourable to just distance yourself from the consequences of your actions in that way." Everyone could clearly see that she meant every word. Soun was nodding approvingly, Nodoka noticed. "Not to mention that a lot of the visitors they go after are harmless in any case." This surprised the older woman.

"What do you mean by that?" she asked curiously. 'Yori' looked annoyed.

"Exactly what I said. There are a surprisingly large number of extremely out of town visitors to Minato for some reason and only a small proportion of them mean any harm. Most of the so-called protectors of the community don't take the time to check this, though, they just immediately go after anyone from another world with lethal force." She shook her head in disgust. "That's not the way to make friends. I know a lot of so-called 'demons', most of whom are decent people just visiting for one reason or another, often trade or tourism. It gets very irritating having to apologise to them after stopping some magical girl team from killing them in cold blood. That doesn't give a good impression. So I tend to be kind of hard on the ones who try that. They're mostly beginning to learn although it's an annoyingly slow process."

A beeping from the kitchen indicated a timer had finished it's job, prompting Nodoka to jump to her feet and rush to rescue her cake. A moment later she stuck her head into the living room. "Lunch will be ready in five minutes, could you go and get Genma, please, Akane? Nabiki, can you lay the table?" Both young women nodded and proceeded to perform their requested tasks. 'Yori' helped Nabiki set the table, while 'Chou' went into the kitchen.

"Would you like some help, Nodoka?" she asked politely. The older woman looked at her, somewhat surprised.

"Ah, yes, thank you very much. Could you get some plates out of that cupboard over there?" 'Chou' did as requested, privately amused at the way she was yet again being shown where things were in her own kitchen. Smiling gently she put the plates on the kitchen table. The elder Saotome woman investigated the meat simmering on the stove, finding it was just about right, then brought it to the table as well, transferring it into a large bowl. 'Chou' took it into the living room along with the plates while Nodoka brought the rice and vegetables. Once everything was arranged correctly, everyone sat, Genma and Akane coming in seconds later. Genma was currently a damp panda, making Nodoka sigh. "What happened this time?" she asked dryly. Genma held up a sign.

#Mariko happened. She's getting faster#

Rolling her eyes Nodoka glanced at Nabiki. "Can you get some hot water, Nabiki? I'm not having wildlife at the table with guests." Grinning, the middle sister disappeared into the kitchen, returning with a glass of hot water which with considerable glee she threw accurately into the face of the pandafied Genma, who quickly resumed human form. Akane looked at the two guests to explain the odd situation, but found them remarkably unsurprised. 'Yori' was looking intently at the martial artist.

"Ah. A Jusenkyo curse. Interesting," she said. 'Chou' nodded.

"Indeed. I haven't seen one for a while." Everyone stared at them, Genma most of all.

"You know about Jusenkyo curses?" he asked slowly. 'Chou' nodded again.

"We're familiar with them. Somewhat unusual, most people aren't silly enough to go anywhere near Jusenkyo, but there are a few around. It's extremely old and complex magic." The martial artist looked hopefully at her.

"Do you know about any cure for it?" he asked. Both magical girls exchanged glances, before 'Yori' replied, apparently regretful.

"There isn't one, I'm afraid. The magic is amazingly complicated, with dozens of traps in it, it was clearly designed a very long time ago to be as unremoveable as possible. No one knows who did it or how long ago, or for that matter why. Once you have it, you're stuck with it." She paused, watching as his face fell, internally somewhat satisfied. "Oh, and the effects of the springs mix, by the way. So if you happened to come into contact with another one you would end up with a cursed form that was a hybrid of your current one and whatever the new one was. At best. The magic is odd about exactly what happens, but I doubt you'd like it." Genma's face fell further, while Akane and Soun looked at each other, thinking back to earlier days and various attempts to track down the spring of drowned man water. Akane shuddered.
"Are you sure?" she asked faintly. 'Chou' looked at her sorrowfully.

"Yes. I'm sorry. Most magic workers have heard of the cursed springs and want nothing to do with them, the magic is far too powerful. The one thing everyone is completely certain about is that there is no way to remove it." Sighing, Akane reached for a plate.

"So, he was right," she mumbled under her breath. 'Yori' and 'Chou' both heard her, although no one else could make out what she'd said.

"Mariko is one of your students?" 'Yori' asked, taking the plate of rice and meat that Nabiki handed her. Genma nodded with an almost proud look.

"Yes. She's one of our first students, in fact, and probably the best. She's definitely got a gift for the art. Give her five or six years and she'll be very good. Even now she's better than any of the others." He laughed. "I made the mistake of forgetting just how fast she was and left an opening. She found it." Looking at Nodoka he seemed amused. "Again, right into the pond. I swear that thing attracts people to it." She looked amused, handing him a plate of food.

"It certainly seems so. I have no idea otherwise why every fight around here inevitably ends up in it. Perhaps it's haunted, or possessed." She laughed, while Genma suddenly looked worried. 'Yori' looked at Nabiki who gave her a private grin.

"I don't think we have a possessed pond, Auntie," the middle sister said, beginning to eat. Nodoka shrugged.

"Perhaps, perhaps not." She was inwardly amused by the looks both of the men exchanged, resolving to mention the idea every now and then. It seemed like it might be a source of amusement with a little work. Nabiki studied her face, getting a good idea of what she was thinking, winking at her when the two men weren't looking. 'Yori' and 'Chou' noticed, as did Akane, and all three women stifled a sudden urge to laugh.

Lunch passed in idle conversation, Nodoka and Akane asking various questions about the magical girl lifestyle and the weirdness of Minato, gasping at various points as the two visitors told various stories about their adventures. Akane had to restrain herself from asking too many questions about their origins, Nabiki occasionally giving her a hard look when she felt the line of questioning was becoming too personal, making her younger sister blush a little and swiftly change the subject. After a while Soun also began asking about their martial arts abilities while Genma listened, although the Saotome man was mainly concentrating on eating.

"A friend of Akane's sent her a DVD of a demonstration you girls performed a couple of months ago. She showed it to us and our students. I have to say, it was the most incredible thing I've ever seen. Purely on the basis of the martial arts alone I'd rank you both as higher in ability than anyone I've even encountered, never mind the magic. If you don't mind my asking, how did you become so good at it? Where did you learn?" 'Yori' and 'Chou' exchanged a glance while Nabiki watched with some worry. They had all known that such a question was inevitable eventually. After a while Soun also began asking about their martial arts abilities while Genma listened, although the Saotome man was mainly concentrating on eating.

"We've both been learning for some considerable time. Yori is better than I am, having travelled extensively to some very unusual places to train. She's taught me a lot. We've also had a considerable amount of training from various people we're not at liberty to talk about as it was under the condition we not discuss it." Soun nodded slowly, having some idea what she was referring to. Unusual but not unprecedented in his experience. "The magic is inherent, in our case, the result of much training and experimentation. We worked out most of it ourselves." Everyone who wasn't aware of this looked at them with impressed interest.
"That's not very common, is it?" Genma asked curiously. 'Yori' shook her head.

"No. In fact most of the other magic workers we know find it all very weird." She laughed. "To the point of refusing to believe it. But it's true. Our magic isn't like anyone else's at all. Which can cause problems, it makes learning other people's spells more difficult in some cases, we have to work out what they do and design our own method of performing the same thing. But at the same time we end up knowing a lot more about how they work. It's surprising how little most magic workers understand of how their own magic functions." Genma nodded thoughtfully.

"I see. Thank you." He smiled a little oddly. "Hopefully you've never encountered our own grand master, he was certainly not much liked by females." 'Yori' shot 'Chou' a look.

"You're both masters of the Anything Goes school, I believe?" the blonde asked. Soun and Genma both nodded. "So it would be Happosai who was your grand master." They looked at her in shock, as did Akane.

"You've heard of him?" Soun asked with a stunned impression. She laughed gently.

"Oh, yes. His reputation is... considerable. I believe he disappeared some years ago, though. No one seems to know where he is now." The two martial artists looked at each other, then Genma sighed.

"There was an incident. My son and Soun's eldest daughter vanished as a result, we've heard nothing about either for years. Master Happosai disappeared shortly after that, no one seems to have heard from him either." With a small smile he added, "To be honest, except for the unpleasant circumstances, people are quite happy about that. He isn't a nice person." 'Chou' regarded him expressionlessly over her tea for a moment then nodded.

"So I understand."

Akane looked at the two magical girls, who seemed slightly annoyed for some reason. Thinking of something she'd been meaning to enquire about, she asked curiously, "How did you do that writing in mid air thing when you were here the first time?" Her disguised sister transferred her attention to her, then smiled.

"It's another trick we worked out some time ago. There doesn't seem to be much real use for it but it's fun." Holding up a hand she made the index fingertip glow gold, causing several pairs of eyes to widen. Quickly writing "Hello, Akane" in mid air she lowered her hand. Akane stared in amazement.

"Oh, wow. That's incredible!" Nodoka, who was sitting beside the blonde, looked at the writing wide-eyed, then slowly raised her hand. At an encouraging nod from the magical girl she tentatively waved her hand through the insubstantial writing, feeling nothing at all, before lowering it again.

"It's a trivial little thing but a nice demonstration. Yori can do some more extensive manipulations of this sort of effect, we're still experimenting and she's better at it than I am right now." The black-haired girl grinned.

"I still can't figure out a use for it other than party tricks but it's good practice in power manipulation." She wrote "Yori" in mid air in a glowing purple script, then gave the writing a flick with her finger, causing it to begin rotating. Once more everyone stared, even Nabiki this time.
This was a trick she hadn't seen before. 'Yori' caught her glance and winked. "I only worked this one out a few days ago." Reaching out her hand again she stopped the rotation, then flipped the writing again, making it rotate horizontally this time. Standing, Nabiki waved her hand through the symbols, finding as usual that she felt nothing. Impressed she sat down again.

"It may not have a practical use but it's impressive even so," she commented.

Both magical girls made their projected writing vanish, resuming the meal. Nodoka stared at them for a moment, the way they did the impossible with such a matter-of-fact attitude was one of the weirdest things about them. Eventually she started eating as well. When the meal was finished she disappeared into the kitchen for a little while, returning with her cake and some plates. "I hope you like lemon cake and ice cream," she said. 'Chou' smiled, while 'Yori' looked pleased.

"Certainly we do," the blonde replied. Glancing at her partner, she laughed slightly. "Yori is practically powered by ice cream. And coffee." The other woman raised an eyebrow at her partner but snickered.

"I'd be offended if it wasn't true." Turning to the older woman who was cutting the cake with a smile at the banter she said, "Thank you, Nodoka. That looks very nice. The meal was excellent as well." Pleased at the compliment, Nodoka handed her a plate with a slice of cake and a scoop of ice cream on it, then served everyone else. Half-way through eating it the black-haired girl looked up sharply then glanced at her blonde friend who nodded, also apparently sensing something. "There's someone quite powerful coming this way. Are you expecting anyone?" 'Yori' asked, feeling Cologne a few hundred metres away heading in their direction. Soun and the others exchanged glances.

While no one was looking at them Nabiki glanced at her friends, mouthing 'Cologne?'. 'Chou' nodded fractionally, then quickly smiled as Soun looked back to her.

"No, we're not. Is it anything to worry about?" 'Yori' shrugged.

"I doubt it, but I don't know. It feels like someone quite old, female, fairly powerful." Nodoka looked impressed.

"Ah, that's probably Elder Cologne. I haven't seen her for some time. I wonder why she's here?" A moment later there was a knock on the door. "Akane, would you let her in, please?" The blue-haired young woman put her fork down with some reluctance, she was enjoying the cake, then got up. A few moments later she returned with the Amazon Elder behind her. The old woman balanced on her staff in the doorway, looking around with interest, while Akane quickly resumed her seat and dove back into the cake. "Elder. How nice to see you. Would you like some lemon cake?" Nodoka asked. Cologne smiled.

"Yes, thank you, Nodoka. That would be very nice." Dropping lightly from her staff she accepted the plate the auburn-haired woman handed her, glancing curiously at the two women she recognised from the DVD her great-granddaughter and Akane had shown her. "I was in the area and I felt some rather high-powered magic users I didn't recognise. It seemed quite likely that it was Yori and Chou, I decided to drop by and thank them for helping Shampoo." She didn't mention that she was desperately curious about both the magical girls. The power signatures she'd detected were extremely strange, unlike anything she'd ever encountered before, and as her granddaughter had said, monstrously powerful. In fact she was having severe difficulty despite her centuries of experience from showing her shock. Never in her life had she come across anything like the two women sitting less than two metres away from her, which worried her a lot. The fact they both looked so normal was also somewhat strange.
They were both clearly ki masters of a level she found hard to believe, although the ki signature was very weird. The magical power reading was even weirder, it almost didn't register as magic at all. If it wasn't for the fact that it obviously wasn't ki, which meant it basically had to be magic, she wouldn't even have known what to call it. Without even taking the known martial arts prowess of the two into consideration, she decided that based on the power emanations alone she very much did not ever want either of the two to become annoyed with her. She was certain that even with her experience and deviousness she wouldn't last long. None of this showed on her face as she appreciatively tasted the cake, although she was fairly sure that they both had a pretty good idea of what she was thinking from the weird little smirks that flashed across their expressions and vanished as soon as she'd noticed them.

"This is very good, Nodoka, thank you." The Saotome woman dipped her head in acknowledgement of the praise, appearing pleased, as the Amazon elder glanced at the two magical girls who returned her gaze with almost identical calm expressions. "Thank you for healing my great granddaughter, both of you. She's the only living relative I have and I value her highly." They smiled.

"You're welcome, Elder," the black-haired one said politely. "We enjoy helping people, especially when it involves healing rather than fighting. Although we do like a good fight." Her grin was momentarily the most feral and dangerous thing Cologne had ever come across. She shivered internally, masking her feelings with another fork-full of cake. "How is Shampoo?" Once more the expression was of polite interest.

"Oh, she's fine, thank you. If she knew you were here she'd probably want to thank you herself but she's working at the moment." The taller blonde woman smiled.

"Please pass on our best wishes to her, Elder," she said. Cologne nodded.

"I will do." Pausing for a few seconds she studied them with interest. "Are you here for long?" she asked curious. 'Chou' shook her head.

"I'm afraid not. We have quite a few things on at the moment. This was a visit to check on Akane's progress and for lunch, but we will have to leave soon. I expect we'll be back in one to two weeks for a final check-up. After that Akane should be fine, there doesn't seem to be anything amiss so far. I'm very pleased with the results of the healing. It was a strange case."

"Shampoo told me about what you found and how you dealt with it. I'm very impressed, that level of healing ability is extremely unusual, especially in ones so young. May I ask, how did you learn to heal like that?" Cologne inspected them both as they exchanged a glance. 'Yori' nodded to 'Chou', who turned back to the elder.

"We're self-taught." Cologne's eyes widened. "Our magic is somewhat different from that of most practitioners, which causes some minor difficulties at times, but also allows us to do a number of things much more efficiently than most people can manage. We happen to be very good at healing." The Amazon was listening with shocked respect. Even Nodoka could see she was surprised.

"You appear somewhat taken aback, Elder," she mentioned curiously. Cologne looked at her, then back at the magical girls, who seemed quite amused by the look on her face.

"I am. I've been learning magic and ki use for over two hundred years yet I would have had extreme difficulty duplicating what these two girls seem to have done with ease. And that's assuming that I could have even diagnosed the problem in the first place. The Amazon magical knowledge is the result of three thousand or more years of learning, but we have very few healers capable of such things at all." Shaking her head in respect, she added, "Self-taught mages are almost unheard of. Someone, I suppose, must have worked out the principles to start with but for a very long time magic has been taught based on established practice. The methods vary but the basic principles are the same. From what I can sense, though, these two young ladies don't use many if any of those techniques, which means they have something new." 'Yori' grinned.

"You're taking it a lot better than most magic workers do. I've had some very nasty arguments with mages who insist that there is only one way to do magic, the right way, and therefore whatever we're doing isn't magic at all." She shrugged. "I don't know what else you'd call it though. And, of course, it works."

"Indeed. That would seem to be an excellent argument," Cologne said with a grin. Despite her shock she found these two rather likeable. They didn't seem to be full of themselves to the level she would have expected from her experience of extremely powerful people in the past. It was a refreshing change.

A faint buzz made everyone look at 'Chou' who produced a cell-phone from nowhere and answered it. Cologne watched this with interest, it was obviously a variant on hidden weapons techniques. The blonde talked for a moment in a language that none of the people present had encountered before, then sighed. Saying a few more words she hung up.

"What's the problem?" 'Yori' asked, having listened to one side of the conversation with concern.

"Uthryyl has found something we need to have a look at, immediately. He seems quite upset." Nodding, the other woman pulled out a phone.

"I'll call Aiko and see if we can get a lift." As she dialled, 'Chou' turned to the others.

"I'm very sorry about this but it looks like we will have to cut our visit short. A friend of ours has made an unpleasant discovery which we need to deal with. Thank you for lunch, Nodoka, it was lovely. Akane, we'll come back in one to two weeks, certainly before Christmas, to check out your progress, but I don't expect there will be any problems. Nice to meet you, Elder." She jumped to her feet as her partner put her phone away, also standing.

"She'll be in the yard in thirty seconds or so," 'Yori' said. The black-haired girl looked around the room. "Sorry about this. Duty calls, I'm afraid." Nabiki stood and waved to the door.

"I'll show you out." Both magical girls went with her. Cologne watched, then followed, trailed by the rest. They watched as 'Yori' shook Nabiki's hand and said something to her, then jumped as the under-dressed girl they'd met when Akane and Shampoo had been brought home suddenly appeared in the middle of the yard. Cologne stared, teleportation was a difficult spell but this girl seemed to do it easily, she didn't look tired at all. Glancing around the brunette spotted 'Yori' and 'Chou', walking over to them. Greeting Nabiki she waved to the others, then all three of them vanished in a brilliant flash of light. Cologne swore and rubbed her eyes.

"My apologies, Elder, I didn't think," Nodoka said, sounding embarrassed. She'd closed her eyes just in time having remembered the previous occasion she'd encountered the teleporting magical girl.

"Don't worry, my dear, it's only a momentary discomfort." Cologne's vision cleared and she looked around the yard, then turned to the auburn-haired Saotome woman. "I wonder what the emergency was? They seem like extremely competent young women. I suspect they can handle it."

"Would you like some tea?" Nodoka asked. Cologne nodded, with a final look around the yard.
"Yes, please." Everyone trooped back inside the house, talking with interest about the magical girls, followed by Nabiki who was hoping that the problem wasn't another portal bomb.

"What do you think, Elder," she asked curiously, wondering if the Amazon had even the faintest idea of who the pair really were. Looking at the expressions that flickered across the face of the old woman she highly doubted it, making her relax slightly. She'd been on edge ever since the old woman had arrived, especially following the questions that her father had asked earlier. Once more her familiarity with Ranma and Kasumi's abilities and disguises had made her underestimate how inhumanly effective they really were to others.

"I think I would be very reluctant to get involved in any altercation with those two," the elder said after some consideration. "I haven't met a real magical girl before, but the power those girls have available is... quite worrying." She glanced at the middle Tendo sister. "It would be very unwise to upset them, I suspect," she said seriously. Nabiki nodded with neutral expression.

"I got that impression myself. I looked into them, they seem to have a reputation of being very dangerous indeed. Although they seem very nice when you meet them in person."

"Something for which we can all be grateful," Cologne muttered, almost to herself. "If that pair decided to be evil, I don't know how you'd stop them." Shivering slightly, she changed the subject.

Sergeant Harada watched Corporal Otani vomit again, wincing. Turning away from his officer he looked at Yori, who was emitting an air of danger he seldom encountered from the normally cheerful girl. He glanced from her to her blonde partner who was looking even more dangerous, then at the third member of their little group, who rather weirdly, given his appearance, was currently the least worrying person present.

The demon Uthryyl looked both upset and annoyed, glancing at the end of the alley with a clear expression of distaste on his inhuman features. "I found the... remains... and that man when I was parking the truck," he said quietly, his tail twitching from side to side uneasily. "We'd only rented the warehouse this morning, the others were inside setting up some temporary beds while I got the vehicle. It doesn't look like anyone has been down this alley for quite a while, but when I got out of the truck I could smell something unpleasant. Then I saw him. He ran, but I grabbed him on reflex. When I realised what I'd found I called Chou and Yori, it was the only thing I could think of."

Harada finished writing in his notebook, then nodded.

"Thank you, Uthryyl. I understand. It was good of you to get involved, being a visitor." The demon glanced at the unwell corporal with sympathy, then back to the sergeant.

"We come here a lot, and we like your people. This isn't right. Someone has to pay." They all turned to look at the mid-thirties man being held firmly by two more of Uthryyl's crew, both of whom looked like they'd enjoy pulling very hard in opposite directions. The man looked back at them defiantly although he was sweating. The single crime-scene technician that the district station had available finished photographing the man's hands which were being forcible held out in front of him by the demons, then turned to the sergeant.

"I've got everything from here that I can use. I'll get started on my report." She looked back at the man and the demons holding him, then shook her head. "He's covered in blood and was found dumping one of the bodies. I don't see how he can't have done it." Glancing at the three demons she addressed her superior with a smile, "Although I'm not sure quite what to put in the report about our friends here." She nodded to Uthryyl respectfully. Like many of the local police she saw right through the illusion spell Uthryyl and his people used, not having been even slightly surprised by them when she arrived half an hour previously. Harada sighed a little.
"Just report it as some civilian bystanders for now. It's basically true. I'll talk to the captain about it." The technician nodded, putting her camera away, then left, smiling at Yori and Chou on the way. The sergeant turned to them. Yori was staring at the suspect with a look that made him think she'd quite like cutting little bits off him to show him what it felt like. Just as he was about to speak a car pulled up at the end of the alley and another officer from the district station got out, accompanying a plain-clothes policeman new to them all. The two approached the little group.

"Sergeant Harada, this is Inspector Chino from Tokyo Metro central command," the officer said. Everyone looked at the newcomer, who was studying the scene with experienced eyes. He was a tallish middle-aged man who looked quietly competent, and for some reason very tired.

"Inspector," Harada said politely, bowing a little then holding out his hand. Inspector Chino shook it. "Sergeant. Good to meet you." He turned to the officer. "Thank you, Officer Iwai. You can go back to the station, I won't need you again." She nodded and turned, waving to Yori and Chou as she left. Chou smiled back, while Yori nodded to her, her attention still fixed on the suspect.

"Before you get annoyed, Sergeant, Central isn't trying to step on any toes in the local police. I'm only here because I think this may be the same case I've been working on for some time." Harada smiled.

"I'm not annoyed. We're only a small district station, we're happy to have any help you can offer. We don't get a lot of murder cases around here. Especially ones like this." The inspector walked over to look at the five bodies hidden behind the pile of crates at the end of the alley, giving the two magical girls and the three demons a curious look as he passed them. After a minute or two he returned, stopping to carefully study the suspect who was still held firmly by the two demons, before rejoining the sergeant.

"Extremely messy. It looks almost identical to two other crime scenes we've found around Tokyo in the last eighteen months, each one had six bodies dumped in it. We're certain it's the work of one person, but we had no leads on who, he was very careful."

"A serial killer then," Harada commented. The inspector nodded.

"Yes. Only the dismemberment and disposal of the remains was the same, the method of killing and the choice of victims were different each time. He seemed to be picking them randomly which didn't give us much to go on. None of our profilers could give us any real leads. It seemed likely that the only way we would catch him was through chance." He glanced at Utthryyl again, then the two young women, before turning back to Harada. "Tell me what happened, please. The report we got only mentioned some brief details of the crime scene and that the suspect was apprehended at the scene by some civilians. Speaking of which, why are they still here? Normally we prefer to have the suspect in the custody of police officers." He smiled to indicate he wasn't angry, but there was a certain amount of mild suspicion in his eyes. Harada glanced at Yori who shrugged. Clearly the man wasn't familiar with Minato in general and this particular district in particular. It also seemed likely that he didn't see the demons for what they were.

"Yori and Chou here are... special consultants." Inspector Chino looked them up and down for a moment, He smiled a little.

"They look like some sort of magical girl wannabes, only they got the uniforms wrong. Not enough skin." he said sarcastically. Harada winced while Constable Otani, who had just finished vomiting and cleaned himself up, closed his eyes and sent up a brief prayer. Utthryyl waited with some amusement to see what would happen. Yori glanced at Chou, then both girls faded from view. The inspector gaped.
When a silky voice in his ear said, "We happen to like our clothes, thanks," from far too close, he yelped and jumped, whirling around. No one was there. When he turned back the two young women were standing where they'd been, looking at him neutrally. He swallowed, then nodded.

"Um, OK, I think I see. My apologies." Sergeant Harada stepped closer and motioned to him.

"Inspector, I would suggest being very polite to both of them. They're extremely highly regarded around here, and have friends in some remarkably high places. They are also personal friends of mine, and of most of the local police. Insulting them is not a good idea, trust me. I can give you names at the PSIA if you need more verification," he whispered. Chino's eyebrows rose as he listened. The sergeant stepped back and the inspector turned to the two young women.

"I'm sorry if I was rude, ladies. I plead tiredness and unfamiliarity with the situation. I've heard about the Minato penchant for magical girls but I've never personally experienced it, this is my first visit to the ward." Both women stared hard at him for a moment, then smiled.

"Apology accepted, Inspector," the blonde said gracefully. "This situation is upsetting everyone. As far as our friends here are concerned, they are the ones who captured your suspect in the act. Sergeant Harada is short on manpower today and Uthryyl's people can be trusted to help." Harada nodded.

"We've got half the force out from some sort of food poisoning today, they went to a restaurant in Roppongi to celebrate a wedding last night and it seems to have gone rather wrong. Luckily this district has a very low crime rate most of the time, mainly thanks to these two young women and their friends," Inspector Chino looked around at all the non-police people present then sighed.

"OK, fine. I can work with that. Minato is weird anyway. I've heard some very strange stories about here." Yori snickered.

"They're probably all true. Sorry."

The inspector sighed again, then pulled out a notebook. "So, what happened." Uthryyl explained once more, his two compatriots adding their parts in the story as well. Yori and Chou also gave their side. When the inspector had finished writing everything down, he looked at Uthryyl. "The only thing I don't understand, sir, is why you called Chou, rather than the police?" Uthryyl glanced at Yori who rolled her eyes then nodded slightly.

"We're visitors from very different place, Inspector. We know Chou and Yori well, they're good friends, but we haven't had much contact with your authorities. I thought it was easiest if they dealt with you at first." Chino looked slightly puzzled, making Yori sigh.

"Show him," she suggested. Uthryyl thought for a moment, then made a small gesture with one hand. Inspector Chino's eyes nearly popped out of his head and he instinctively scrambled backwards fumbling for his side-arm while making a choked noise in the back of his throat. Someone grabbed him, preventing him from falling over, while his hand suddenly stopped moving as if in the grip of a vice. Tearing his eyes away from the totally unexpected sight in front of him he glanced down to see a hand holding his wrist in a grip of steel, then followed the arm it was attached to up to the face of Yori, who smiled at him.

"Calmly, Inspector. You're perfectly safe, these are our friends. They mean you no harm. They're just traders." Trembling slightly he slowly reholstered his pistol, Yori watching him carefully, before looking one more at the three people who had abruptly changed from perfectly normal looking individuals to things from a science fiction film. They were still there. Looking wildly around he noticed that neither of the local policemen looked either surprised or worried, having clearly known the truth all along, which made him slowly relax. Eventually he calmed down enough to talk without embarrassing himself by stuttering.

"Minato is very weird," he managed at last. Everyone chuckled a little. "I'm sorry. That was a bit unprofessional of me, but in my defence I wasn't expecting to meet anyone who wasn't human today." Uthryyl laughed, a remarkably normal sound.

"Don't worry, Inspector. We understand. Not everyone deals with people from other worlds very well. Minato is indeed strange because so many people here are so accepting. Trust me, I've seen more violent reactions, that's why we use the disguise spell." Still shaking a little from the adrenaline rush, Inspector Chino looked at the three demons, then shook his head.

"Remarkable. OK, I understand now." He turned to Harada. "If you don't mind I would like to take the suspect and the remains back to the central office. I'm sure this is the same case I've been working on." Sergeant Harada looked at the suspect then nodded.

"It's fine by me. You'll need to talk to the Captain to arrange a transfer of evidence, she's a bit picky about the paperwork being right, but I doubt there will be a problem. To be honest I have enough to do around this madhouse without a serial killer multiple homicide case on top of it. He's obviously not a local, Yori says there's no magic involved, so there's no reason to keep the case here that I can see." Inspector Chino studied him for a moment.

"I have to admit I rather expected more of a fight. Some officers I've dealt with become very resentful of someone outside their area coming in and taking over." Harada grinned.

"We're not like that around here. We all work for the same team, it only matters that the work is done not who gets the credit for doing it." Raising his eyebrows, the inspector nodded, then pulled out his phone to arrange transport for the prisoner and the remains. Sergeant Harada moved closer to Yori and Chou to give him some privacy. "Thanks for calling me, Yori. This one is pretty nasty. I'm just as happy to see it in someone else's hands." The girl glanced at the inspector.

"So am I. We've got too many other things to deal with anyway. We're only involved because of a friend in the first place." She scowled. "I wish I'd picked up on this bastard before. It looks like he's been dumping his bodies here for nearly a month. It's right on the edge of our normal area, plus we've been distracted, but..." Harada smiled at her and put his hand on her shoulder.

"Don't beat yourselves up about it. You both do so much good around here, and you don't even get paid for it. Everyone knows how many times you've put your lives at risk protecting people. Even you two can't be everywhere and do everything. There will always be ones that slip through, we all have to live with that fact. You know as well as I do a crime-free world is basically impossible while people still have free will." The black-haired girl sighed, but nodded sadly.

"I know. You're right, of course. I still feel guilty about five people being dead when we might have been able to save them."

"That's because you're a good person. Go home, have some ice cream. I know how that cheers you up." She grinned at him again.

"Very true, Sergeant." After a moment she asked, "Would you like us to visit your people who are sick? We might be able to help them." He thought for a second then nodded gratefully.

"That would probably be much appreciated. If you stop by the station in about half an hour I can get you a list of names and addresses."
"All right." She walked over to Uthryyl and talked to him for a moment, then shook his hand. Everyone watched as the two young women jumped three stories straight up to disappear over the roof of the warehouse. Inspector Chino stared in amazement then shook his head, putting his phone away as he rejoined the sergeant.

"That's pretty damn incredible," he said quietly. Harada smirked at him.

"You have absolutely no idea."

"Probably not." The inspector glanced up again, then shook his head once more. "Probably not."
"It was pretty horrible, Nabiki," 'Maiko' said, as they walked through the campus of Nihon University college of commerce. She and 'Rika' were visiting Nabiki in Setagaya for once, not having been there before. "This sick bastard had killed seventeen people that the police know of, in groups of six, chopping them up into little bits and doing something with some parts. Only about eighty percent of the bodies were found." Nabiki looked green. "If it hadn't been for Uthryyl stumbling across the guy and his quick reactions he might have got away. His pattern was six in one place then move away, the other dump sites were widely separated. He picked the victims at random as far as anyone could tell. There was no sexual aspect to the crime that we know of and he didn't torture them, just killed them, but even so..." She sighed. "I've seen some pretty terrible things in my life but this sort of reminder of how horrific an otherwise perfectly normal person can be is kind of sobering. No demons, no magic, no martial arts, just a man who enjoys killing for fun."

'Rika' put her arm around her husband, holding her tight. The three women stopped under a skeletal tree and looked at the floodlit snow scene of late afternoon, thinking about the events of a week ago. "It'll hit the news any day now, I would think," the blonde said quietly. "The police have tried to keep it quiet while they were investigating things to get enough evidence to charge him, but according to Sergeant Harada they've identified the man and located where he was living. It was some distance outside Minato, he was driving the bodies in using stolen cars. Apparently when they broke into his apartment they found some very upsetting things. They now have enough to be certain they have a rock-solid case. He's not getting away."

"It's a little weird," 'Maiko' added. "The only reason we got involved at all was because of Uthryyl. Although if we'd come across this guy ourselves... God, I wish we had, we could have stopped him. I still can't believe we missed a damn serial killer dumping bodies on our patch." Nabiki sighed, looking at her sister-in-law.

"Everyone else missed it as well, the guy was careful. You can't dwell on what you can't change. Sergeant Harada is right. Even you have limitations, you can't stop every possible crime, even horrible ones like this. Don't feel guilty about it, you've had a lot of things on your plate recently. At least he's been stopped." The other brunette nodded glumly.

"True enough. You're right. It still bothers me though."

"I'm not surprised. It bothers me as well. But that's because all of us are relatively sane people. This man clearly isn't." Smiling slightly wryly, 'Maiko' nodded. The middle Tendo pointed. "Come on, let's go in there, it's cold out here. That coffee shop is very good and they do some wonderful carrot cake." They crossed the road and entered the shop, Nabiki greeting the woman behind the counter. 'Maiko' and 'Rika' sat at a table near the window while the brunette ordered, coming over a minute later with a tray. "Here. Try this, see what you think," she said as she handed each of them a large mug and a plate with a slice of carrot cake on it. Taking the tray back having unloaded it she returned and sat, picking up a fork.

"Hey, this is good," 'Maiko' said through a mouthful of cake, spraying crumbs. Her wife looked at her with an eyebrow up. "Sorry, dear," she mumbled, abashed. Nabiki giggled while 'Rika' half-smiled.
"Honestly. I can't take you anywhere." The blonde carefully tried some cake of her own, nodding in satisfaction then making a point of swallowing before speaking. "Very good indeed."

"So, horrible crimes aside, any more word on the portal bombs?" Nabiki inquired, picking up her coffee. 'Maiko' shook her head, already half-way through her cake.

"Nope. Nothing so far. The longer it goes without news the more worried I get. We know they're going to activate sooner or later, but not when." She paused for a moment to drink some coffee. "One rather unsettling suggestion that Tamiko came up with is that as the mage clearly wanted to maximise casualties, he might well have set the timers to activate when he could be fairly sure the most people would be around. That could well mean around Christmas, depending on where they are. You know, last minute shopping crowds, or in Christmas sales." Freezing with her fork half-way to her mouth, Nabiki stared in horror.

"Oh, shit. That sounds unpleasantly likely." The other brunette nodded with a grim expression.

"I know. I mentioned it to Agent Naito who wasn't happy about the idea. He's passed it along to security forces in the possible target areas but is kind of frustrated as most of them don't seem to believe him. The RCMP is taking it seriously, the UK is as well, The Australians aren't completely convinced but are willing to work with us, while most of the rest are saying that the photos he sent don't look like much of a bomb. Last time I talked to him he was almost pulling his hair out trying to explain how dangerous the things were and how if they found one no one should do anything but call him. I suggested he try telling them it was a biological weapon, which is actually true in a weird sort of way, which he was going to do." She shrugged slightly, sipping some more coffee appreciatively.

"Not much we can do but wait. My guess is that if one activates in the US they'll try to handle it themselves, they're very sure of their own military ability. For all I know they'll succeed, they're not stupid, but I think the collateral damage will be remarkable in any case. If it's in LA I have hopes that Lieutenant Harrison will call us before it gets too out of hand. Anywhere else..."

"Not good," Nabiki sighed.

"No."

They sat in silence for a little while, until 'Rika' looked up. "We were successful in helping the various people who got food poisoning. It's a little complicated because the bad food takes a while to... pass through..." She half-smiled, half grimaced, as Nabiki laughed, "But we could kill off the bacteria that caused most of the problems. Luckily it wasn't one of the nasty ones, just something that was painful and unpleasant. I think we made some new friends as a result."

Nabiki grinned. "I can understand that. I had food poisoning once, you remember?" Her sister nodded. "It was horrible. Anyone who could have made the pain go away would have been my friend for life."

"We're going to visit Akane again the day after tomorrow. Will you be free?", 'Rika' asked. Nabiki thought for a moment.

"Ah, yes, I should be. That's Friday, isn't it? Afternoon again?"

"Yes. Probably around four."

"OK. I'll go back home early. That's the last day of this semester anyway, I can lose the afternoon with no problems." She studied the two people sitting opposite her. "We never settled the question of whether you'd come to Nerima over Christmas." Her sister smiled.

"Or the other way around." She glanced at her husband who shrugged unhelpfully. "Fine, I'll decide," she said, making Nabiki laugh. "Right. We're planning on having Aiko and the others over during the evening on Christmas day. They're all eating lunch with their families. It would be wonderful if you could come then, you could stay overnight. We could come back with you the next morning and stay over on Boxing Day. How would that suit you?" Having thought it over Nabiki nodded slowly.

"That would work. If I came over around three would that be OK?"

"Certainly." Pulling out a printed timetable Nabiki checked it.

"There aren't many trains running on either day. Looks like I'll have to take the two-thirty one, so I'd actually get to you around half-past three. And the next day we can go back at about noon."

"Trains. Feh. Teleporting is much better," 'Maiko' commented with a grin. Nabiki laughed.

"I'm surprised you rely on Aiko for all your teleporting needs. Shouldn't you have worked it out yourself by now? Call yourself a magical girl..." The other brunette chuckled.

"But I don't call myself a magical girl, as you well know." She looked amused rather than insulted, while Nabiki grinned. "I'm still working on portals. Getting pretty close, I think. Teleporting is a whole different problem. In theory it's less complex but there are some nasty little traps if you're not careful. It's not the sort of thing you want to just experiment blindly with, it can go pretty spectacularly wrong. Aiko is very unusual, the artefact that allowed her to learn to do it is extremely old and remarkably efficient. She doesn't have many of the limitations that normal teleportation spells have. The only real limitation she does have is one of energy, she builds it up much more slowly than she'd like although that's gradually improving. A lot of that is our training, as her ki levels increase it's having a knock-on effect on her magic. We didn't expect that but it's a pleasant surprise."

"You seem to be able to recharge her amulet thing very easily." 'Maiko' nodded.

"It's basically just a very efficient magical battery. It only provides the bulk of the power, the teleportation is her own magic. Without the amulet she can only teleport herself, or perhaps one more person now, but with it the number is increased considerably. Probably around a dozen or so. Our magic control isn't compatible with her spell, as usual, but our energy is, so pumping power into it is easy. It's a tiny drain by our standards, really. I've been trying to figure out a way to provide the power without having to touch the thing but so far haven't worked it out." Nabiki listened with interest.

"Do you think you'll be able to duplicate her ability eventually?" 'Maiko' looked at 'Rika', then nodded.

"We both think so. Working out the portal spell is teaching us a lot about converting complex operations to our method. By the time we've managed it we should have a good handle on some of the things we've been struggling with. Every spell we redesign lets us learn more about how we do what we do, it's getting steadily easier."

"It's fascinating," 'Rika' commented. "Designing these techniques from the beginning teaches you so much about how it all works. It always surprises me when we talk to a more traditional mage how little most of them know about how their magic functions. They know what the spell does but not how it does it. That goes a long way towards explaining how so many of them are quite inflexible in what they can do." She shook her head sadly. "I suspect that may be one of the main reason we've had so little luck teaching them our healing method. It requires a very low level access to the magic, and a lot of ki control as well."

"We're hoping that eventually we can teach it to Aiko's crew once we get their abilities high enough. They're not really mages in the normal sense of the word, they just use magic, so it should be possible to change the magic they use to ours without too much trouble. It would make them much more formidable aside from anything else." 'Maiko' grinned. "And it would mean that they wouldn't need those damn uniforms any more." The middle sister snickered.

"I suspect that's incentive enough for most of them. Although Tamiko seems happy enough."

"She's something of an extrovert," 'Rika' said with a smile. "And she's right, she does have very nice legs." Laughing, Nabiki looked out the window where it had resumed snowing.

"Blue ones in this weather, I suspect." Her sister nodded, finishing her coffee.

"The uniform is a little impractical for winter." Leaving the coffee shop the little group headed for the main building. Nabiki spent the next hour showing them around, before they went back to her small apartment in the women's dormitory. Sitting on her bed she waved her arms grandly at the two rooms she had.

"Here we are. My huge apartment, where I spend many a happy night entertaining all my friends." She smirked as 'Maiko' looked around, then grinned at her.

"I'm jealous. It makes our little hovel look very small."

"Oh, ha ha. I should transfer to your university and move in with you." 'Rika' giggled, sitting beside her sister.

"You can if you would like to. We certainly have the space." Somewhat surprised, having only meant it as a joke, Nabiki considered the idea for a moment then reluctantly shook her head.

"That would be fantastic, but the courses I need are here. The college of commerce is world-renowned for it's business classes. Thanks for the offer though." She smiled at her sister who looked slightly sad. "Oh, I was meaning to tell you, I looked into your idea of becoming a forensic accountant. It looks very interesting. My accountancy tutor thinks it's a good idea, apparently there is growing demand for that sort of thing with the growth of the internet making international money-laundering more easy. He thinks it would be a sensible career choice." 'Rika' looked pleased.

"I'm glad I was able to suggest something useful." 'Maiko' turned to look at her from where she had been peering out the window.

"You always suggest useful things, love." She chuckled as her wife smiled at her. "Well, as fun as this has been, Nabs, we need to get back. We'll see you in a couple of days." Her sister-in-law nodded.

"OK. And don't call me Nabs." All three women laughed as they left the room.

Sergeant Harada entered the Furinkan district police station, showing his police ID to the officer on the front desk. "Hello. I'm here to see Lieutenant Sasaki. He's expecting me." The officer nodded, checking the ID, then pointed to the left.
"Down the corridor, third door on the right."

"Thanks." Harada went in the indicated direction, knocking on the door he arrived at then opening it. The short man behind the desk grinned at him.

"Tetsuo! It's been years, I haven't seen you since the ten year reunion. How are you?" He got up and came around the desk as Harada closed the door behind him. Shaking the out-thrust hand of his old friend he smiled.

"I'm fine, Norio. Actually very good. And you?"

"Not bad at all, despite working in this madhouse. Mind you, you work in Minato, that place is as crazy as here from what I hear. I haven't been there for years but I remember there seemed to be a lot of skimpily dressed young women bouncing around the place." Returning to his seat he gestured to the coffee machine on a side table. "Coffee? Help yourself." The sergeant poured himself a cup and added some sugar, then sat in one of the two chairs in front of the desk. "So, still a sergeant, after nearly sixteen years?" Sasaki looked at his friend inquiringly. Harada laughed.

"I like being a sergeant. I have enough authority to get things done without being responsible for too many people. Besides, I seem to have ended up as the magical girl liaison officer somehow, which gives me all the work I can handle."

"You have good relations with them over there, then? I've heard some even weirder than normal stories in the last few years." The other man grinned. "I saw a news report a few months ago from somewhere around your area, there was this little black-haired young woman ripping into a group of girls that had just smashed up the place defeating some sort of monster in a way that would have put old Iwao at the academy into shock. She was absolutely ferocious." Harada laughed.

"That's Yori. She's one of our girls, all right. She and her partner Chou are truly remarkable. Very pleasant and helpful people, but you most definitely don't want to get on their bad side. They're terrifying when they get angry and they have a very low threshold for stupidity on the part of the other girls. Yori more than Chou, but even she can get annoyed." His friend looked interested.

"You know them well?" Harada shrugged.

"As well as anyone, I suspect. They take their privacy extremely seriously, and I'm certainly not going to begrudge them that, not after all the help they give us." Lieutenant Sasaki raised his eyebrows.

"Sounds like they're more than just the normal run of the mill magical girl."

"Oh, definitely. Extremely professional, very modest, and incredibly effective. They have quite close relations with us, almost every officer in the station has cause to thank them for something or other. The community as a whole is in love with them. Both of them help out in all sorts of ways other than the usual demon-killing." He snickered. "In fact, they don't really kill demons much at all. Most of the demons that do turn up are friends of theirs." His friend looked puzzled. "It's true. I've met some very odd people through them. Yori particularly gets extremely miffed if any girls from outside the area turn up and start attacking random demons, as far as she's concerned most of them are simply visitors that should be treated with respect. Oddly enough this is usually correct. The hostile ones either run away when they see her coming, the smart ones all seem to know about her, or they just get evaporated if they're too stupid to run." Sasaki appeared both amused and impressed.

"A very formidable young woman, by the sounds of it." Harada chuckled a little.
"Honestly, you have no idea. The most dangerous person I've ever met by a long way, but at the same time one of the people around whom I feel safest. She and her friends seem to take protecting the community more seriously than a lot of cops I've met. If you're ever in the area I'll introduce you." He sat up a little straighter.

"Besides taking the opportunity to catch up, I had another reason for coming." Sasaki smiled.

"I suspected as much. How can I help?"

"I wanted to know about one Akane Tendo, a martial artist who lives around here. Do you know her?" His friend sighed heavily at the name.

"Oh, yes. That I do." He paused, trying to think of how to put it. "OK, you know that Nerima is as infested with martial artists as Minato is with magical girls?" Harada nodded, smiling a little. "It's completely nuts. Martial arts everywhere. Martial arts dining. Martial arts calligraphy. Martial arts chess. You name it, someone probably has made a martial art out of it, and they all end up here. Anyway, Ms Tendo comes from a family right in the middle of all the weirdness. Her father, Soun, runs the Tendo Dojo about a kilometre away, over closer to the school. She's the youngest of three daughters. Akane, then Nabiki, the middle one, then Kasumi, the oldest. Their mother died, oh, about ten or fifteen years ago, I think, their father brought them up."

"Poor girls."

"Indeed. To be honest, from what I heard it was mostly the eldest, Kasumi, who did the bulk of the raising of her sisters. Soun had a kind of mental breakdown when his wife died and for a long time was only a pale shadow of what he'd been. He stopped teaching, he's a very good martial artist, and pretty much just sat round getting drunk. Even so he'd be a dangerous person to go up against if you weren't also very highly trained." He sighed a little. "A real pity, from what I know he was really something when he was younger. The daughters were more or less left to run their own lives and it's testament to how dedicated Kasumi Tendo was that the family stayed as sane as it did. Which isn't saying much, unfortunately."

"What do you mean?" Harada asked curiously. His friend got up and rooted through a file cabinet next to the desk, removing a set of folders that together were about twenty centimetres thick. Dropping them on the desk he waved at them as he sat down again.

"That's about half the file on various incidents connected in some with with the Tendo Dojo." Sergeant Harada looked impressed. "Akane Tendo is in probably a third of them. The girl is in many ways quite a nice person, but she has the most vicious temper I've ever encountered. She's also insanely strong, even by martial artist standards, even around here. There are quite a few that are stronger, but when she snaps she just goes mad and a sane person runs for the hills until she calms down. You wouldn't believe the damage she can cause, has caused, when she's angry." He shook his head in awed respect. "An enraged gorilla with a rocket launcher would be less destructive." Harada snickered at the description, picking up one of the folders and leafing through it, his eyebrows going higher and higher.

"Holy shit," he murmured, looking at one set of photos. Sasaki glanced over at them, then nodded.

"You see what I mean. That one was when she got particularly pissed off with her fiancé of the time about five years ago. She went on a bit of a rampage, smashed him right through that building, then started throwing concrete blocks at him. If it wasn't for the fact that he was something exceptional even by Neriman standards she'd have killed him for sure." He started looking through another folder. "That kid was amazing. Probably the best martial artist ever to come through here, possibly anywhere. Soaked up the art like a sponge, could turn his hands to practically anything..."
even if he only saw it done. A true genius in his own way. Nice kid as well. I felt very sorry for him, his life was insane even by local standards." He put the folder down.

"Nabiki Tendo had something of a reputation as well. She was a dab hand at blackmail and information brokering when she was in school, probably would have ended up running the Yakuza if she'd stuck at it. Scary, scary girl. Not at all violent, but the sort of person that made you want to count your fingers twice after she shook your hand. Very cold and calculating, although I think devoted to her family in her own way. She'd sell practically anything to practically anybody, her main saving grace from what I heard is that she never lied and always kept her bargains. Not someone you'd want to upset though." He sighed a little. "Again, a pity. Probably the smartest person I've ever met, I suspect she could have done almost anything she set her mind to, but from a very early age that mainly seemed to be aimed at being an efficient mercenary. Which she certainly was. That said, in the last few years she seems to have changed course, since she went off to university." Harada came across a photo in the folder labelled as being of Nabiki Tendo, who he recognised with interest as the same girl he'd seen at the train station.

"Kasumi Tendo was remarkable. The gentlest, kindest young woman I've ever met. She had a kind word for everyone, was unfailingly polite, and basically ran the Tendo Dojo since she was about nine or ten. Everyone loved her, I never heard a bad word about the girl. But at the same time I think she was very unhappy although you'd never know it looking at her. I never saw her without a smile. The problem is I think she was trapped in a role she didn't really want but couldn't refuse. I always got the impression she was very intelligent, possibly as smart as Nabiki, but she basically hid it under the perfect housewife façade. It was a shame, she deserved better."

The sergeant looked at his friend curiously. "You say 'was remarkable', past tense. Did something happen to her?" Sasaki sighed again.

"Yes, although I couldn't tell you exactly what. There are a lot of stories about that night that don't make any sense." Gathering his thoughts, he tried to explain. "The Tendo family has close relations with another martial arts family, the Saotomes." Harada started at the name, listening intently.
"About, oh, perhaps six years ago, Genma Saotome wandered into Nerima with his son, Ranma." Harada nodded, recognising the name with a shock.
"I've heard of Ranma Saotome. He was, according to what I've heard over the years, supposed to be the best martial artist in Japan even when he was still in school. There are some very odd stories around him as well."

"That's him. I have a feeling that whatever you've heard is an understatement. I didn't know him hugely well, but I liked him. Kind of full of himself at first, a bit overconfident, you know the bravado of young men. That improved a lot over time. His skill level was off the scale. Truly incredible, like something out of a manga. The problem was he was definitely a weirdness magnet in a big way. He attracted the crazy like you wouldn't believe. The number of bizarre things that happened to him in a little over two years was simply ridiculous." Harada thought for a moment.

"I heard he disappeared some years ago. Was he this Akane Tendo's fiancé?"

"Yes to both. Apparently his father had arranged with Soun that his son would marry one of the Tendo girls and Akane ended up with him. I don't know exactly how. To be honest, either one of the others would have been a better choice, I think, for a whole range of reasons." Pausing for a moment he got himself a cup of coffee, then resumed the story. "The real problem was that his father is a bit of a bastard. And a thief. And a child-abuser. He'd managed to engage the boy to at least two dozen women before he was sixteen, although only about four or five of those engagements were really followed up on. That still left the poor bastard with something like four girls chasing him all the time and beating each other and him up in the process. Each of the girls had at least one other suitor as well, all of whom tended to attack him regularly."

He laughed slightly bitterly. "Not to mention the Tendo girl constantly being kidnapped by the weirdest collection of lunatics you could possibly imagine, which meant he had to go and rescue her. Then throw in Chinese Amazon warriors, various magical opponents, a number of very nasty demons, random magic, and so on. It was completely insane even by local standards." Harada stared in amazement. "Honest, it's all true. I'm certain that there was a lot more to it than I've heard about. Almost everyone in Nerima who was around at the time has a strange story involving that boy somehow. To be fair to him, most of it wasn't his fault, but he certainly attracted trouble."

"Then, one night, everything changed." The man sighed again. "I still don't know exactly what happened, I've long since decided I never will. What I do know is that he finally got pushed to his limit. The two fathers had tried to trick him into marrying Akane, somehow, but it all went pear-shaped in a huge way. By the time the fighting died down the Dojo was almost destroyed and the boy had vanished. Three days or so later he reappeared, did something no one seems to want to talk about, but which scared the absolute shit out of quite a few people, then disappeared again, taking Kasumi with him. From what I know she went willingly. Anyway, nobody has heard a thing out of either of them since, they vanished as cleanly as if they'd dropped off the planet."

"Wow." Harada couldn't think of anything else to say. Sasaki nodded.

"Wow indeed. Everything went to crap at that point. It turned out he'd been keeping a lid on an amazing number of things around here. Not only did the various martial artists who'd been constantly attacking him start beating each other up, causing a hell of a lot of damage in the process, but we had a crime wave for months after that. He'd been quietly dealing with muggers and the like when he was bored, which kept the crime rate down amazingly effectively. You wouldn't believe how many minor crooks were found unconscious next to their crime scene over the years." The sergeant grinned, but before he could speak, there was a soft knock on the door, causing both men to glance over. It opened to reveal an elderly woman pushing a cleaners cart.

"Sorry to bother you, sir, but I need to empty your waste bin." She smiled vaguely at Sasaki. Nodding politely to her he moved to one side as she tottered over, emptying the bin into a larger bag then putting another liner into it before replacing it under the desk. "Thank you." Leaving the room she pulled the door closed again. It took the two men a moment to work out where they'd got to. Eventually Sergeant Harada spoke.

"I heard he had a sister who was nearly as good as he was. Really good looking red-head." The other man looked at him for a long moment, then opened a folder and found a photo, handing it over. The girl pictured there was indeed extremely attractive, brilliant red hair contrasting with extraordinary sapphire-blue eyes. "So what happened to her? Is she still around?"

"Not as such." His friend looked at him again. "You believe in magic, I suspect?" Harada laughed quite hard for a while.

"Believe in magic? No, in the same way I don't believe in the sun. I simply know it exists. After what I've seen back home, there's no way I could deny it." Sasaki nodded slowly.

"Good." He retrieved the photo, looking at it for a moment, before slipping it back into the folder. "There are a lot of stories about Ranma and his sister Ranko. All of them are true, except for the fact that the sister didn't exist." Sergeant Harada looked at him curiously.

"But you have a photo of her right there."
The man behind the desk smiled. "I have a photo of a beautiful red-head here, true enough. But it's not Ranma's sister." He paused. "It's Ranma." Harada stared.

"Um, what?"

"I'm not kidding. The poor fellow had a weird curse he picked up in China, a few months before he came to Nerima. One of the most convincing proofs of magic I've ever seen, although most people seemed to have trouble believing it. Basically, when he got wet with cold water, he turned into that girl. Warm water changed him back. It drove him nuts and was the cause of quite a lot of the problems he had."

"Bloody hell," Harada said, trying to grasp the concept.

"I know. It's pretty weird. The curse is from some sort of magic pond or something. There seem to be several variants, his father has one that turns him into a panda." Harada stared again, then snickered.

"You've got to be kidding." Sasaki grinned.

"Nope. Get him wet and bam! Instant panda. Very odd. There's a few more around here, there's a Chinese girl who changes into a cat, a boy from her tribe who becomes a duck, one kid who turned into a little piglet, and a couple more who wander in occasionally I've heard, although I don't know what they turn into."

"That's... very strange indeed. Sounds like this Ranma got the best of them, though." The lieutenant nodded.

"Very true, although he didn't see it that way. What young man would? Not to mention both his father and his mother had very strange ideas about how a man should act, which probably confused the poor sod even more. He was always looking for a cure, but from what I was told there most likely isn't one. That made his relationship with Ms Tendo even more complicated, she's kind of intolerant of anything she considers deviant behaviour. Regularly changing sex certainly counted."

Harada thought about what he'd been told. "So, he and the oldest Tendo sister vanished nearly four years ago, and that's the last anyone has ever heard of them."

"Yep. Poof, just like magic. For all I know, it was magic. We poked around a little in the early days, unofficially you understand, mainly just out of curiosity, but no one could find anything at all. However they did it, there's no trace anyone has ever been able to find. Quite a lot of people have looked very hard, some still are."

"Perhaps they left the country?" Sasaki looked at his friend for a while, then nodded to himself, having come to a decision.

"I don't think so. I have no way of proving it, but there's circumstantial evidence that suggests they stuck around for at least a while." Harada looked curious, and he sighed. "It's my fault, actually. A few months after they both vanished, we had a particularly nasty sexual assault case here. It took us by surprise, there are a lot of martial artists around here who take a very dim view of that sort of thing and tend to sort it out very harshly." Harada nodded understandingly.

"That's very similar to Minato as a whole and our district specifically. We don't get sexual assaults any more, not since Yori and Chou turned up. The assailants tend to regret it very quickly indeed. All the magical girls now come down on that sort of thing like a ton of extremely angry bricks."

"Right. So, we were kind of shocked. This was a very bad one as well, it was all too close to being a rape-murder case. The problem was we had no leads at all. No one had seen anything, the victim couldn't identify a suspect, she was too young and traumatised, we had nothing. The community was up in arms about it. In the end I had an idea, the sort of thing you think of at four in the morning after a long day. I called in a favour at one of the big newspapers and got the story in the national press. Everyone in Japan read about it." Harada nodded, now that it was mentioned he vaguely remembered it.

"A few days later, we found the rapist in one of the parks. He'd been beaten to within an inch of his life by a real expert, then... well, mutilated. Lets just say he won't be raping anyone ever again." The sergeant winced. Even the experienced police officer looked slightly ill. "I'll spare you the photos, they're not much fun. The thing is, the way the wounds were made, plus other evidence, made me fairly sure it was something that could only have been done by someone with some pretty unusual abilities. I have a very good idea who, although I could never prove it and to be honest, have no wish to at all." He shrugged, frowning. "The fucker got what was coming to him, screw the law. There was a camera next to him which showed beyond doubt that he'd perpetrated the assault, plus three others no one could solve, including a murder. I certainly didn't lose any sleep over it."

"And you think that this was the work of Ranma Saotome?" Sasaki shrugged again.

"I have my suspicions. I know he had some very impressive abilities that went far beyond the normal martial arts, even around here, almost to the point of being magic. He also had an almost pathological need to help people who he felt were being taken advantage of. His curse gave him a unique view on crimes of violence against women as well. If it wasn't for the amazingly strong value he put on life he could have ended up being unbelievably dangerous. No, scratch that, he was unbelievably dangerous, but it was tempered with amazing compassion. I suspect, though, that whatever happened at the Tendo Dojo that night removed some self-imposed limits."

"Interesting. And a little worrying." Harada's old friend nodded again.

"Quite." After a moment, somewhat ashamed, he added, "But it was very useful. I'm slightly embarrassed to say I mentioned the basic idea to a few friends around the country, when they got stuck under similar circumstances." Harada looked at him, fearing he knew what was coming. "They tried a similar approach. It usually works. There have been a number of other very dangerous sexual predators who have ended up in a bad way, solving a remarkable number of assaults and murders. It started to make quite a few people rather uncomfortable. A couple of years ago we had a meeting here, with senior law enforcement people from all over the country. We showed them some files, even some video." A small grin passed over his face. "You should have seen the expressions. The guy from Minato seemed to take it in stride, and there were a couple of people from some department of the government I could never get any details on who didn't seem at all surprised, almost like they were expecting it, but most of the others looked like they'd seen a ghost."

"Not used to magic, I guess."

"Or whatever was being used. I mean, video of a pretty normal looking teenager who can create an honest-to-god tornado on demand makes you re-evaluate your world view pretty quickly."

Harada gaped. "A tornado?"

"Honest. We got some security camera footage of him doing it although no one has a clue how. There was also video of him when he was a female picking up an entire steel lamp-post and using it like a baseball bat, with about as much effort. Those things weigh about half a ton! We managed to make the point that even if you did want to arrest him, no one had the faintest idea how to do it, or make it stick. The same problem we have with most of the martial artists around here.
Handcuffs would be about as useful as damp spaghetti. Luckily, aside from fighting in the street, the majority of them are surprisingly law-abiding." Even as used to extraordinary things as he was from dealing with magical girls for years, Sergeant Harada was shocked by what he'd heard.

"You really think this young man is behind all these... incidents?" His colleague shrugged, sighing a little.

"I don't know. There's nothing I or anyone else can prove one way or the other, nor do I personally want to. Whoever did do it, they were extremely careful not to leave any evidence. There are no weapon or tool marks, no trace evidence, nothing. All the events were different, the only common factor is that the 'victim'," he made little air quotes, making Harada smile, "was a very dangerous sexual predator. To be honest, even though what happened was clearly illegal, no one really seems too concerned about it now. The government agents who turned up kind of strongly implied that it would be best to forget about it. They didn't seem worried."

"Hmm. That's intriguing. And slightly scary." Sasaki nodded, then drank some coffee.

"Obviously, none of this is to be talked about. I probably shouldn't have told you, but..." Harada nodded, understanding. "So, why the interest in Akane Tendo, anyway?"

"There was a fight in my district about a month ago. It turns out it was mostly Akane Tendo. Apparently there was some problem she had with a guy named Hibiki?" The lieutenant suddenly laughed.

"Ryoga Hibiki. If those two met up, I'm not surprised there was a fight. She hates his guts. He's the one that has the piglet curse. I've heard he used it to, well, kind of get intimate with her." Harada's eyebrows rose. "She thought he was her pet. Took him to bed..."

"Ah. I see. And she found out?"

"Oh, yes. In spades. It took an amazing long time, practically everyone else knew, but for various reasons didn't tell her. When she found out she went completely berserk. Almost killed the idiot, which takes some doing, aside from the Saotome boy he was probably the most powerful martial artist in his age group. Nowhere near Saotome but much better than the rest. You could probably shoot him in the head with an assault rifle and he wouldn't even bother to wake up if he was asleep. He's a tough bastard. She still kicked his ass. Put him in the hospital for months. It took two of the other lunatics to pull her off him long enough to get him out of here. He's avoided Nerima like the plague ever since."

"There was another young woman involved, I was told she had very long lilac-coloured hair."

"That would be Shampoo. One of the Chinese Amazons. She was, and for all I know still is, totally obsessed with marrying Ranma. Her great-grandmother is apparently the leader of their tribe in China, but at the moment she runs a ramen cafe across town. Very good ramen as it happens. The old woman is at least two hundred years old but is still a very dangerous fighter, as unlikely as that sounds. Shampoo turns into a cat when she gets wet with cold water. That made Ranma's life even more difficult, apparently he had a phobia of cats for some reason." Harada shook his head in amazement.

"I thought Minato was weird. It sounds positively sane by comparison."

His friend grinned. "It's certainly not boring. Although things have become a lot quieter in the last two, three years, the weirdness is still pretty strong here. Very odd things happen quite often. So, tell me what happened with this fight." Harada went over the story as best he could, from the information he'd acquired from witnesses. Sasaki nodded at the end of it. "That certainly sounds like Akane on one of her rampages. This Yori must be remarkably skilled to shut it down so easily and quickly."

"She is. Both of them are, to be honest. While some of the magical girls may have more raw power I don't think any of them could really take on those two if they got annoyed. Certainly, they've had some fairly serious altercations with a lot of them and won every time. Usually almost instantly, they don't muck around with fancy attacks, they just go for the kill immediately. Most of the other girls seem to think it's cheating." He laughed. "There are a couple of groups they're training, one in particular, who are becoming nearly as effective. They'll end up running the place at this rate."

"What happened after they took Akane and the other two and disappeared?" Harada shrugged. "I don't know for sure. I'd think, knowing them, they healed them all up, then probably gave them the talking to of a lifetime. You certainly wouldn't enjoy Yori being angry with you. All I know is that the Tendo girl came back about a week later, apologised to everyone she could locate who'd been inconvenienced by the fight, accepted full responsibility for it and promised it would never happen again, then left. Yori and Chou set up a sort of reparations fund somehow just after they arrived a few years ago, which is paying for the repairs. It all got sorted out remarkably easily."

"Impressive. They can heal, these girls, then?" The sergeant smiled.

"Amazingly well. I'm constantly surprised by the number of things they can do. I've got no idea of where they learned all this stuff but they're certainly experts in a number of fields. Their martial arts skills are astounding, their healing abilities likewise, and the magic they use is like nothing anyone else has ever seen. Incredible people. I consider myself privileged to know them."

Lieutenant Sasaki looked amused. "Sounds like you like them a lot."

"I do." After a moment, he continued, "You told me something you shouldn't have, let me return the favour." The next ten minutes were spend recounting the story to date of the cult and the portal bomb problems. The other officer listened with interest and growing concern.

"Like you said, wow. That's both amazing and worrying. There are still five of those things out in the wild somewhere?"

"Unfortunately, yes. Yori and Chou are pretty sure that there are none in Japan, but that's not a lot of comfort. Sooner or later there's going to be a pretty unpleasant incident, I just hope they can get to wherever it is and deal with it before too many people end up dead."

"Shit. I'm glad we haven't had anything that nasty around here. I'll take the Tendo weirdness any day over magical terrorists." They were silent for a while, thinking about the problem. "Do you want to talk to Ms Tendo, then?" The sergeant shook his head.

"I don't think I need to. I trust Yori to have dealt with the problem correctly. I was mainly curious about the background to it, the whole event was a bit strange even around my district."

Lieutenant Sasaki glanced at his watch, then at his friend. "You want to get something to eat? It's nearly lunchtime, there's a nice cafe around the corner." Harada nodded.

"That's not a bad idea. I'm quite hungry, as it happens." Sasaki picked his coat off the back of his chair, putting it on as he opened the door. He nearly tripped over the old cleaner lady who was polishing the frames of some photos on the wall outside his office. Apologising to her, he closed the door to the office when Harada was out, locking it behind him.
"If you ever happen to come across anything about the Saotome fellow, let me know. I doubt you will, but just for my own peace of mind I'd like to know if he and the Tendo woman were OK. They were good people." His friend smiled as they left the building.

Behind them the old woman, eyes remarkably sharp now, watched them go for a moment before pulling a cellphone out of her pocket and dialling, as she stepped into an empty side room. "Hello. I've got some information for you, dear. A sergeant from Minato has been visiting our good lieutenant. Yes. Yes, that's the fellow. He was asking questions about the Tendo family, and Ranma Saotome. I'm not sure how much he learned, I didn't hear all of it." She listened for a moment. "I'll see what I else I can find out and email you a report. Thank you, dear. Good luck." Hanging up she dropped the phone back into her apron pocket and resumed cleaning.
"Everything looks fine, Akane," 'Chou' said, sitting back with a satisfied expression. "Your brain chemistry is basically normal, there doesn't seem to be any left over effects from the infection, or any other symptoms or problems I can see. How is your therapy going?" The blue-haired woman smiled in a way that was calmer than those who knew her would have believed possible.

"Very well, I think. The doctor is extremely pleased with my progress over the last month. It's done more good since you cured me than since I started. She can't believe the change. Neither can I." Sitting beside her, the blonde looked pleased.

"I'm glad to hear that. Is your temper improved?" Akane looked slightly embarrassed but proud as well.

"Well, it's still kind of short. The doctor is pretty sure there's some sort of psychological issue at work there, but she's also fairly convinced that she can deal with it now. The drugs still don't work worth a damn but the various therapies are finally having an effect. I feel... calmer, I guess. The sort of low level constant anger is gone. You have no idea what it was like, I didn't realise myself until it wasn't there any more. Oh, I know I still get too angry too easily, but I don't lose it like I did." 'Chou' looked very pleased.

"Good. Very good. Keep at it. I wish you a lot of luck in getting better." She patted the young woman on the shoulder.

'Yori' grinned at her, feeling rather satisfied despite her history with the girl. "You might also consider extending your knowledge of the art. Nabiki tells me you've been working harder on it for some time now, which I personally think is a good thing. It builds discipline, which from the sound of it is something you've been lacking. No offence." Akane looked at her with an amused expression.

"None taken. You're right. I can see that now. I doubt I'll ever be more than competent in the art, at least by Neriman terms, but I think I can improve quite a bit from where I am." She sighed a little. "I can see now that I was always too impatient to really work at it the way I should have done. I wanted too much too soon. Ran..." Her voice hitched a little. "Ranma always told me that. He made it look so easy, you have no idea what he was like. Or perhaps you do. Both of you are so good at it, like he was. But looking back on it I can see that was the end result of an absolutely huge amount of incredibly hard and dangerous work. I expect much the same is true of you two." The magical girls looked at each other, then 'Yori' nodded slowly.

"Essentially, yes, that's true."

"I don't have it in me to work that hard, give up that much, for anything. Not many people do. But I am sure I can get a lot better than I am now," Akane smiled at them. "Thanks to you both." The blonde woman beside her squeezed her shoulder.

"No thanks necessary. We did what needed to be done." She glanced at Nabiki who had been listening silently, sitting next to Nodoka, then at her partner, who nodded. "All of this started because you came to Minato to meet us, after you saw a demonstration we did in the park months ago on a video, correct?" Akane nodded.

"Would you be interested in us doing something similar for you here? Call it an early Christmas present." The youngest Tendo's eyes widened to the point they made everyone else feel sympathetic pain.

"Really? You'd do that?" The excitement in her voice made 'Chou' giggle.

"Of course. Why not?"

"Call anyone you want. We can't do more than about fifteen minutes since we're going to need to get home fairly soon, but we don't mind." Bouncing to her feet Akane dashed for the phone, frantically dialling. Nodoka looked at the two women with gratitude.

"Thank you both for this, and all the other things you've done for us. We owe you a lot." 'Chou' gracefully waved this away.

"No you don't. Healing Akane was the right thing to do, and she's so interested in us it's only fair to let her see what we've shown lots of people back home."

"Still, it's very nice of you." The elder Saotome woman looked at Nabiki who had an amused look on her face. "Why don't you go and tell your father. I'm sure he and Genma, not to mention their students, would find this interesting." The middle sister grinned and got up, shooting both visitors a glance filled with laughter. Moments later Akane rushed back into the room.

"Ukyo and Konatsu will be here in a couple of minutes, Shampoo is on her way as well. Thank you so much for this." 'Chou' smiled, then looked at Nodoka.

"Where should we do this?" she asked. Nodoka thought for a moment.

"I'd suggest between the house and the Dojo. The back yard is slightly bigger but the pond takes up quite a large part of it. If there's any martial arts going on out there someone is bound to end up in it as well." 'Yori' snickered.

"Because it's possessed?" Laughing, Nodoka nodded.

"Oh, yes. I'm working on that idea. They're starting to look worried when they walk past it." Akane and the two other women burst out laughing while the older Saotome woman looked pleased with herself. A minute or two later there was a knock on the door and Akane went to answer it, coming back with Ukyo and Konatsu. The chef stared at the two magical girls with amazement, then turned to her companion.

"I was beginning to think this was some sort of practical joke." The female-appearing man looked amused.

"I am fairly sure that these are the real Yori and Chou. They certainly look like the pictures I've seen and they have an awful lot of ki." Moments later Shampoo jumped over the garden wall and tapped on the door to the garden, then slid it open.

"Hello, Yori. Hello, Chou. It's nice to see you again," she said politely. They greeted her, then everyone went out into the yard. Nabiki was coming out of the Dojo followed by the two fathers and all their students, who studied the two women with interest.

'Yori' strode into the middle of the yard, looking around at the various people watching her. 'This really is kind of weird,' she thought to herself with inner laughter. 'I wonder what would happen if I revealed who I really am?' Dismissing the thought, she grinned at the occupants of the Dojo, slowly turning in place to see everyone. "OK, Chou and I are doing a special request demonstration of our form of martial arts, with added magic. It will have to be fairly brief, as we don't have long, but I hope you find it interesting." Turning to face Akane, she bowed slightly, then stepped neatly to the side as 'Chou' lunged for her out of nowhere. The blonde smiled, flipping twice in mid-air before landing facing the shorter girl.

They stared at each other for a moment, bowed slightly, then began sparring. Everyone in the yard gaped in amazement, the chill of the mid-December day forgotten. Nabiki looked around and quickly mimicked the expressions of awe, inwardly highly amused. Devastatingly powerful blows passed between the two females at lightning speed, almost too quickly for even the experienced martial artists to register. Style after style came and went, too many for any of them to count. Each was executed with expert precision and remarkable grace. Soun was nearly in tears at the beauty of it while Genma was lost in the sheer skill involved. Shampoo and Ukyo exchanged awed glances, realising that these two were undoubtedly the most dangerous martial artists they'd ever heard of.

The terrible power behind the blows was apparent from the remarkable sounds even a miss made. Several times the onlookers could swear they'd felt a shockwave from a punch or a kick. There were definitely snapping noises from tiny sonic booms when 'Yori' unleashed a flurry of unbelievably fast punches at 'Chou', who neatly blocked all of them. She promptly did exactly the same back, the black-haired girl laughing with delight. They bounced around the middle of the yard, jumping over each other in a way that made even Genma, whose branch of the Anything Goes school was rooted firmly in aerial work, gasp in amazement. After a few minutes they suddenly stopped while facing each other from a distance of about two metres. Everyone noticed they didn't even seem to be breathing hard, like this was just a simple exercise.

Each took up a fencing posture, making Akane look excitedly at Shampoo, realising what was next. Sure enough, bright glowing energy swords suddenly appeared in their hands, one golden and one purple. There were gasps from some of the students who hadn't been completely sure whether the DVD they'd seen was real. Raising their light-sabre-like blades the pair touched the tips together making a crackling sound, before starting their match.

The energy blades made humming roars as they flashed about, crackling viciously against each other. Everyone took a few steps back, the sound was very intimidating. Both women produced a second blade, then began leaping about wildly, somersaulting from the ground to the wall then to the top of the roof as they got into it. Out in the street people stopped and watched in shock. Laughing, 'Yori' jumped clear across the yard from the house to the top of the Dojo, pursued by 'Chou' who was grinning madly. They chased each other around the roof for a couple of circuits, first 'Yori' in the lead then 'Chou'. The students began clapping and laughing at the sight. Eventually 'Yori' leapt across the yard again, landing on the roof of the house, then looking slightly surprised as she slipped on the snow covering it, disappearing from sight behind the house. A splash echoed across the yard making Nodoka sigh and cover her eyes. Nabiki started giggling.

"AHHH! The possessed pond got me!" 'Chou' stood on the edge of the Dojo roof and laughed until she nearly cried, both energy blades vanishing, while Nabiki collapsed in a fit of giggles. Nodoka groaned.

Genma and Soun exchanged rather worried looks, then stared in the direction the yell had come from. Suddenly a soaking wet 'Yori' faded into existence standing in the middle of the yard grinning at them. 'Chou' dropped down beside her and hugged her, still giggling like mad. "Idiot."

"Hey, I couldn't resist," the shorter woman said with laughter in her voice. She shivered a little. "Damn cold, though, and the ice was about a centimetre thick." Stepping to the side she went cross-eyed, visibly and comically straining, before a huge cloud of steam burst from her clothes, leaving them bone dry. Everyone stared, then burst out laughing. The two magical girls bowed with wide smiles, turning to Akane who clapped loudly, grinning with delight.

"Merry Christmas, Akane," they chorused, before fading from view. Stunned silence fell before they all started talking. Akane had the widest smile on her face anyone could recall seeing in many years. Nabiki looked at her sister, very pleased, then slipped away.

Outside the gate she looked around carefully, seeing no one looking at her, then stepped into the alley a few metres down the street. In a conversational tone she said, "That was very amusing." 'Yori' and 'Chou' faded back into view, giggling, as they extended a shield around the Tendo sister as well to ensure no one overheard them.

"Did it make her happy?"

"Oh, yes, that it did. She'll be in a good mood for days I suspect. Thanks." She smirked. "The bit with the pond was extremely funny. Your father and mine are looking quite upset." 'Yori' chuckled.

"Good. Mom really does seem to have developed a sense of humour, she may be able to keep that going for weeks." In a very good mood, 'Chou' hugged her sister.

"That was fun. I'm glad Akane is doing so well. Perhaps we can be open about who we are sooner that we thought." Nabiki smiled.

"Maybe. Don't rush it, everyone has too much to lose." Her elder sister nodded, looking sad for a moment.

"Ah well. One day, I hope." Releasing her sister she stepped back. "We'll see you on Christmas day, then. Only a week to go. Bye, Nabiki."

"Bye, sis. Take care." The middle sister watched as the two women jumped onto the roof, fading from view as they went, then returned to the Dojo after carefully checking no one was around, still smiling.

Descending the stairs early on Christmas morning, Nabiki yawned widely, closing her mouth with a snap and mumbling to herself. Never a morning person at the best of times she felt that seven AM was far too early for any normal person to be awake. Glancing at the window into the darkness of the winter morning she shivered a little. The temperature in the last two or three days had dropped very low and there was close to thirty centimetres of snow on the ground accompanied by a high wind. Drifting snow piled up against the side of the Dojo she could just make out in the darkness. As she passed it she moved the thermostat up a couple of degrees, the sight of the snow made her feel colder than the actual temperature of the house was.

The pond had finally frozen thickly enough that when fights ended up in it, as they inevitably did, the participants bounced rather than splashed. Peering out the door from the hallway she found that she couldn't even see it any more, the snow in the garden was thick enough it covered everything in a pristine layer of white crystals, only a couple of the larger stones around the edge protruding through giving away it's location. Looking at the snow blowing off the top of the wall she decided that she was quite happy to remain indoors for the moment. The brunette wandered into the kitchen in search of coffee, yawning again and knuckling one eye tiredly.

"Good morning, Nabiki," Nodoka said, turning from the stove with a just boiled kettle in her hand. "And Merry Christmas." The younger woman tried to respond intelligibly but yawned half-way through the words, making Nodoka smile, then busy herself making coffee. A moment later she handed Nabiki a cup. "This should wake you up," she said, looking amused.

"Thanks, Auntie," Nabiki responded groggily. Taking the cup she drank half of it in one long swallow, coughing a little as she came up for air.

"Slowly, dear. Don't drown yourself." Nodoka giggled slightly, watching the middle sister with affection, before turning back to making breakfast for the household.

"Is anyone else up yet?" Nabiki asked feeling more human as the caffeine started to take effect. Nodoka shook her head without turning away from the stove.

"No, not yet. I'm a little surprised you are, in fact, this is earlier than you normally manage to drag yourself out of bed." The brunette laughed.

"All too true. But I though I'd come and help with breakfast." Looking over her shoulder Nodoka seemed pleased.

"Thank you, that's much appreciated." Both women busied themselves with cooking and setting the table, as over the next half hour the other three occupants of the house slowly arrived, taking their places in the living room. Akane smiled at her sister as the older woman brought the tea in, sitting next to her while Nodoka served the food.

"Merry Christmas, Nabiki," she said, sounding calm and happy. Nabiki looked at her, grinned, and wished her the same.

"You're looking good today, sis," she said, sipping some tea, "very happy." Akane nodded.

"I am. I just feel... kind of at peace with the world at the moment." She smiled. "The therapy is working well, I've been cured of a nasty problem, my family is here with me, it's Christmas, and I know a couple of magical girls. Well, six, really, but mainly Yori and Chou. And there's a nice Christmas lunch to look forward to." Reaching over with her hand Nabiki squeezed her sister's arm, smiled, and began eating.

After breakfast, Nabiki and Akane helped clear the table, loading the dishwasher while Nodoka cleared up the stove and counter-top. Once they were done, they all went back into the living room.

"So, would anyone have any problems with exchanging gifts early this year?" Nabiki asked the room at large. "I know we normally do it in the afternoon but I'm going out to a party around two and won't be back until tomorrow morning." She looked around. No one seemed to have any objections. "Great. I'll be back in a minute." She disappeared up the stairs, while the others looked at each other then got up and went to retrieve their presents. Shortly thereafter they were all sitting around a pile of colourfully wrapped boxes in the middle of the table.

"Who goes first?" Akane asked, inspecting the pile curiously. Nodoka reached out and picked up a small box wrapped in shiny red paper.

"I will. Nabiki, this is for you." She handed it to the middle sister, who accepted it with a smile. Unwrapping it she unveiled a cardboard box with a picture on the front that made her grin.

"Thanks, Auntie. I've been meaning to get a new phone for ages, this is the one I was thinking of. How did you know?" Nodoka looked pleased.

"You mentioned it to Akane once as you were going past the shop, she remembered, and told me. They were on special a couple of weeks ago and I couldn't resist." Opening the box the brunette removed her new phone and admired it, before unpacking the charger and plugging it in, then connecting the phone to charge. "Apparently it even works as a very small television," the older woman remarked. "And it has a camera in it. The man in the shop said it had all sorts of options, although I think a lot of them are just there to make it sound better." Nabiki laughed, nodding.

"That's pretty common. But it's a very good phone even with all the gimmicks." Pulling a large green box from the pile she flipped it neatly to her father who caught it easily, smiling. "That's for you, Dad." She picked up another apparently identical one and bounced it off Genma's head, who winced, not having been paying attention as he was looking at the box in his friend's hand. "And that's for you, Uncle Genma." Everyone but Genma laughed, while he rubbed his scalp and looked mildly embarrassed.

"Thank you, Nabiki," he said, opening the box. Both men pulled out brand new Gis, made of soft but hard-wearing cloth, Genma's a dark blue while Soun's was deep green. She knew both were their favourite colours. Soun held his up and looked at it, a broad smile on his face growing as he noticed the embroidery on the back which read, "Tendo-Saotome School of Anything Goes Martial Arts", in elegantly sewn Kanji. On the left breast was embroidered his name. Genma looked at the name on the back of the Gi and frowned, but before he could say anything, Nabiki pointed to his own present.

"Read yours," she suggested. He did so, finding that his one read "Saotome-Tendo School of Anything Goes Martial Arts", which made him laugh and nod his head.

"Thank you, Nabiki. A neat solution, and a nice present." Nodoka looked at both presents and laughed slightly, smiling at the middle sister, who grinned back.

Over the next ten minutes they exchanged more gifts, ending up with numerous items of clothing, various ornaments, expensive chocolate, books and DVDs. Akane received from Nodoka a necklace in the form of the same sort of duck she had in wood hanging on her door, which made her smile. It was quite small, gold with silver highlights, on a silver chain. She held it up in front of her and inspected it closely. "It's exactly like the sign. Where did you find it?" The older woman appeared satisfied with her reaction.

"An old friend of mine makes jewellery, she has done for many years. She's even supplied your Mr Ito a few times. I asked her to make this for me."

"It's beautiful. Thank you."

Eventually there was only one box left on the table. Everyone looked at it for a moment, then Nabiki picked it up and looked reflectively at it. She glanced at Akane. "I got this months ago, it was a once in a lifetime offer. I thought you might like it. On the one hand it wasn't expensive, but on the other it's very rare indeed, and based on recent events you might like it even more than before." She handed it to her sister who was looking very curious at this point, only slightly less so than everyone else. Akane gently shook the box, trying to work out the contents from the sound, then carefully unwrapped it. Revealed inside was a cardboard box with a lid, which she removed, then she froze for a second before a huge grin spread across her face. Nabiki enjoyed her expression with a smile of her own.

"Where on earth did you find these?" Akane asked in a reverent whisper, staring at the contents of the box. Her sister looked proud.

"Some friends of mine in Minato came across them, it's kind of a weird story, and long. The main thing is that they are very, very rare. Only a small number were made and it's unlikely that any more will exist. I've got two sets, one for you and one for Shampoo. The offer was made out of the blue and I grabbed it." The three parents were becoming very curious as to what was in the box, exchanging curious glances. Akane noticed and smiled. Putting it on the table she removed two smaller boxes from the larger one, admiring them for a moment before turning them around and holding them up so the others could see. Nodoka started laughing while Soun and Genma grinned.

"I don't believe it," Soun said, reaching out and taking one as his daughter handed it to him, while she gave the other one to Nodoka. "It looks exactly like her." He read the side of the box the Yori doll was in and laughed. "Fantastic." Nodoka was admiring the Chou doll through the transparent front of the box.

"These are remarkably accurate, Nabiki," she said with an amused and impressed expression. The middle sister nodded, looking pleased.

"I know. They're pretty good, aren't they? Like I said, I never expected that Akane would actually go and bring Yori and Chou home with her, but I knew she was into magical girls and I couldn't resist. I must admit I didn't know how into magical girls she was." She gave her sister a sly look that was returned with a stuck-out tongue and a giggle. "Apparently they are pretty protective of their image, they're very smart and thought ahead. They have legal protection of their likenesses and so on and crack down on people who try to cash in on it. I'm a little surprised that it doesn't happen more than it does, but I'm told that people in their community tend to protect them. Anyway, these were made by a company that they set their lawyers on, they only made a very small number before they got shut down. A few of them have been given away as presents, my friend managed to get some and thought I might like them." She shrugged, smiling. "Not really my thing but I knew someone who'd appreciate them." Akane got both boxes back and looked at them again, grinning with joy.

"Thanks, 'Biki. These are fantastic."

"Normally, I'd say leave them in the boxes as an investment, but you couldn't sell them legally anyway, so it's up to you." Akane nodded as she listened to her sister, thought for a moment, then carefully opened the Chou box and removed the doll very gently. Looking at it she admired it from all sides before doing the same with the Yori one. Putting them on the table she leaned over and hugged her sister.

"Again, thanks. They're wonderful." Nabiki looked pleased.

"I hope Shampoo likes hers as well. I'll stop by the Café on the way to the train station." She and Nodoka cleared away the wrapping paper which was all over the room while Genma and Soun went to try on their new Gis, and Akane sat and played with the dolls for a few minutes, looking very pleased. Eventually she put them carefully back into the boxes which she took into her bedroom and placed on a shelf overlooking her bed. Nabiki came up the stairs and stood in the doorway, looking at their positioning with a smile. "Protecting you during the night?" she asked mischievously. Akane appeared slightly embarrassed.

"Um..." Her sister laughed gently.

"When I go to the station, do you want to come as far as the Cat Café?" The blue-haired young woman nodded.

"Yes. I've got presents for them as well."

"OK, I'll be leaving about an hour after lunch." The middle sister went into her room to put her presents away and to transfer all her contacts from her old phone onto the new one. By the time she'd finished and gone back downstairs Nodoka was just starting the lunch preparations. "Do you want any help, Auntie?" she asked. The older woman smiled at her.
"Thank you, Nabiki, that would be nice. Can you peel those potatoes, please?" They got to work, Akane joining them some time later, making them glance at each other with apprehension. "Um, Akane..." Her sister snickered.

"Don't worry, I'm not going to try cooking. I was just watching." Nodoka sighed slightly in relief, then looked at the younger sister with mild guilt, reassured when she smiled faintly. She watched with interest, the three of them talking while the two older ones prepared the meal. Finally Nodoka closed the oven, looking satisfied. She glanced at her watch.

"That will need to roast for about three hours, the potatoes and onions should go in around two hours from now. I'll do some vegetables and salad now and put them in the fridge for later." Turning to the two sisters she smiled. "Thank you for your help, Nabiki." Then she laughed, glancing at Akane. "And thank you for not helping." She smiled impishly. Amused and slightly startled by the quip, the two younger women exchanged a glance before giggling. Grinning to herself Nodoka went off into the house, leaving the other two in the kitchen. When she was gone, Nabiki laughed.

"She's really becoming quite funny," she said with approval. Akane nodded, smiling.

"I know. It's kind of weird, she's always had a sense of humour but until recently hasn't shown it very much. I like it." Her sister looked at her in an evaluating manner.

"I'm also rather pleased and impressed that her comment about cooking didn't make you angry." The blue-haired woman nodded a little, understanding what she meant.

"I know it's odd to you, bearing in mind what I've been like for so long. I wish I could cook better, but I'm not totally oblivious to the fact that I'm not very good. It does annoy me a lot, but lately I'm having a much easier time keeping my temper. Seeing the funny side of it helps." She laughed. "And Auntie Nodoka is difficult to get angry at." Nabiki listened in wonder. This certainly didn't sound like her sister, although she was more than happy to have an improved version of the youngest family member around. Suddenly feeling a surge of Christmas spirit she grabbed her sister and hugged her with a smile.

"Well done, Akane. Very well done. There's hope for you yet," she said with a smile, yet at the same time in a heartfelt manner. Akane looked pleased.

They went into the living room to see both fathers cheating their way through yet another Shogi game. Sitting down next to each other to watch, they amused themselves by whispering to each other just loud enough for the men to hear about how they were cheating, and giggling when either one looked up irritably. Every time one of them looked away the other would seize the opportunity to move pieces around, making them giggle all the more. After some twenty minutes of this Genma's left eyelid was beginning to twitch and Soun was gritting his teeth. Eventually they both stopped, exchanged glances, then turned to glare at the girls, who smiled innocently at them.

"Nabiki, Akane, my dears, don't you have something more interesting to do?" Soun asked sweetly, his fingers tightening on a game piece until they went white. Akane looked at Nabiki with her eyebrows raised. The older sister looked back and shrugged. Then they turned back to the two fathers.

"Nope," they chorused, appearing pleased. Soun sighed heavily.

"I'll play the winner," Nabiki said, taking them by surprise. They exchanged glances.

"Ah, Nabiki, you haven't played in years as far as I know," her father tentatively said. She chuckled.

"Neither have you. Both of you just cheat." The men looked slightly embarrassed, although that didn't stop Genma moving a piece when he thought Soun wasn't paying attention. Akane burst out laughing. Eventually they resumed the game, Genma 'winning' after another ten minutes. Soun looked annoyed and stood up, waving Nabiki to take his place.

"Fine. There you go." He stomped into the kitchen to get a drink. When he came back he sat next to Akane to watch. Nabiki took his place and reset the pieces, slapping Genma's hand when he tried to help. Muttering to himself he pulled his hand back, looking slightly surprised. The girl was a lot faster than he expected. She smiled coldly at him, so coldly he almost thought the temperature of the room had dropped.

"My move, I think," she said, pondering the board. After a moment she made her opening move. He stared at her, then considered the board, slowly moving a piece. She responded rapidly. The first dozen moves proceeded fairly quickly but the game started to slow down at that point. Nabiki had taken several pieces, making Genma look mildly irritated. He stared hard at her, then made another move. Suddenly his eyes widened.

Pointing over her shoulder he cried, "Look, a ghost!", his other hand darting out to move a couple of pieces to his advantage when she turned to look. Unfortunately, she didn't take her eyes off the board, slapping his hand again as he reached for it. "Ow!" he said, quickly taking his hand back. The smile he got was pure ice. Even Soun shivered.

"I think not," she said in a voice that would freeze mercury. Genma mumbled imprecations, while Akane grinned, impressed. Eventually he made a legitimate move which she matched within seconds. Once more several moves played out without incident. After ten minutes or so Nabiki glanced up, then an expression of total horror slowly developed as she shrunk back from the door behind Genma, radiating terror and emitting panicked little whimpering noises. He looked at her in amazement then quickly glanced over his shoulder, as both Akane and Soun also whirled to see what she was looking at.

Nothing was visible, of course. Several seconds passed, after which they all exchanged glances, turning back to Nabiki who was sitting in the same place, a look of serene contentment on her face, her hands folded on her legs. Genma gazed at her for some time before suspiciously examining the board. Akane stared at her sister in wonder. Soun looked worried, then slowly a look both impressed and proud crossed his face, ending up becoming a faint smile. Her opponent couldn't see any change to the board from what he remembered, which worried him. She must be cheating in a way he couldn't see. Eventually he carefully chose a piece and moved it. Nabiki's expression became extremely predatory as she whipped out a hand and moved her own piece.

"Check," she announced with extreme pleasure. Genma stared in horror.

"Um..." He sweated a little, glancing at her face which made him shrink back slightly. He really didn't like the look on it. After a couple of minutes he reached out for a piece, then pulled his hand back, shaking his head. He tried again, slowly moving the piece, thinking hard, before taking his finger off it. Nabiki laughed, instantly making her move.

"Check mate. Thank you for the game, Uncle Genma." The smile she gave him was the most evil one he'd ever seen. Akane collapsed in laughter, while her father started clapping. Nabiki stood, bowed slightly to her defeated opponent, who stared in disbelief, before happily going up to her room for a nap.

"How did she do that?" Genma said slowly, staring at the board trying to work out how she'd cheated. Akane shook her head, wordlessly going to the TV and turning it on. He turned to his old friend. "What did she do? How did she cheat, I didn't see anything?" Soun snickered.

"She didn't cheat. She beat you the hard way. Or for her, perhaps, the easy way." Laughing, he clapped his friend on the shoulder. "She may not be a martial artist, but my god she's got the attitude to be a good one. You didn't stand a chance." Genma was still trying to work out what happened nearly ten minutes later.

"Hello, Nabiki, and you, Akane," Cologne said, her croaking voice pleased. "Merry Christmas." Nabiki smiled at her.

"Elder. The same to you. How are you?" The ancient woman chuckled.

"Good, good. And your family?"

"They're all fine, thanks." Waving the two sisters inside, Cologne shut the door with a shiver.

"Damn, it's cold out there. At least the snow has stopped."

"It's about forty centimetres deep now," Akane said, stamping snow off her boots and taking her coat off. Nabiki followed suit, both of them placing their coats on one of the tables in the restaurant as Cologne locked the door again. They took off their boots and followed the elder inside the rear part of the Café, up the stairs and into the large room above the restaurant itself that served as the Amazon's living room. Shampoo and Mousse were in it talking quietly in Mandarin, looking out the window onto the street. They turned and smiled at the two Tendo sisters.

"Hi, Akane," Shampoo said happily. "And Nabiki, how are you?"

"Fine, thanks, Shampoo," the brunette said. She looked at the Amazon man. "Hello, Mousse, it's been quite a while." He nodded, walking over and shaking her hand, his eyes nearly invisible behind his thick glasses.

"Indeed it has, Nabiki. I hope your studies are going well?" The middle sister smiled at him.

"Very well, actually. That said I'm glad to have a couple of weeks off." He laughed.

"I can imagine. Merry Christmas, by the way." They all sat down in various chairs, Shampoo handing out drinks. Nabiki sipped her small glass of wine appreciatively.

"Nice. Thank you." Picking up the backpack she'd carried upstairs she held it up. "I'm off to a party so I can't stay long, but I've got some presents here." Reaching into it she pulled out a flat package and handed it to Cologne, who looked surprised. "I saw this a few weeks ago when I was visiting some friends, I thought it might appeal to you, elder." The old Amazon hefted the package, then unwrapped it to reveal a western-style book, obviously quite old. Her eyes lit up.

"A first edition of 'Tobin's Spirit Guide'!" she exclaimed, impressed. "This is a very rare book, Nabiki. Thank you very much. I've been looking for a copy for many years." With some care she opened it, flipping through the pages. It was written in English which she read easily. Closing it again she smiled at the middle sister, her wrinkled old face looking like a happy prune. "It's a wonderful gift. I hope it wasn't too expensive." Nabiki shook her head with a smile.

"Not too bad. Some friends of mine know the bookseller and persuaded him to give me a good price." She turned to Mousse. "I also found something I think you might like, Mousse. I know you're an expert with blades, another friend of mine mentioned she'd seen something in a shop in Minato so I went to have a look, and found this." Handing him a small but heavy box wrapped in purple paper she smiled. "I hope you like it." Curiously the young man accepted the box, removing the wrapping to reveal a dark polished wooden container with a hinged lid. Flipping the catch on the front open he lifted the lid and stared at the contents, a smile spreading across his face.

Reaching in he pulled out a fifteen-centimetre throwing knife, the heavy blade comprising the bulk of the weapon with a ring at the hilt end to hold it with. It was made from dark steel with a wavy lamination pattern on the blade showing where the metal had been repeatedly folded. The box contained five more exactly like it in individual slots in the red-velvet lining. "It's beautiful," he said with wonder, putting the box on his knee and cautiously testing the edge with his finger. "And extremely sharp." She nodded.

"The shopkeeper said the set was nearly a hundred and fifty years old. Apparently they were made for some rich landowner back in the mid-eighteen-hundreds, but he died before they were finished. They ended up being sold over and over, he didn't think they were ever actually used. Because there's no makers mark for some reason they wouldn't fetch the price that they really should, the provenance is iffy at best, but they're very well made. I had someone I know who knows about weapons look at them and he says he's pretty sure they're authentic, and most likely made by a real expert." Mousse balanced the knife on the palm of his hand for a moment, then flipped it into the air and expertly caught it with his finger through the ring, spinning it around a couple of times.

"Very nicely balanced as well. Thanks very much, this is a fantastic gift." Looking embarrassed he added, "I didn't get you anything, I'm afraid." She laughed slightly.

"Don't worry about it. It was a spur of the moment thing. I hope you find a use for them." He smiled at her, putting the knife back in the box and slipping the entire thing away into ki storage.

"I will. Even if I don't they're still beautiful." She nodded, then turned to Shampoo after glancing at Akane who was trying not to grin too widely.

"For you, I came across something silly but also very rare, which I think you'll like. I got Akane the same thing and she's very pleased indeed." Her sister nodded with a wide smile. Shampoo looked intrigued. Pulling out the last gift Nabiki handed it over. Unwrapping the box Shampoo opened it and stared at the contents for a moment, before laughing delightedly. She pulled out the Chou doll in it's box, inspecting it closely.

"This is great, Nabiki. Thanks. How did you managed to get these?" She showed it to Cologne while Nabiki explained the story she'd told her family. The elder was grinning as she read the back of the box.

"Very impressive. And such a good likeness!" Shampoo nodded, amused, as she looked at the Yori doll. Mousse watched her face for a moment with a grin.

"Aren't you ladies a little old to be playing with dolls?" he asked with mild sarcasm. Shampoo and Akane glanced at each other, then shook their heads.

"Not Chou and Yori dolls," Akane said, laughing. "You're never too old for them." Mousse chuckled while Cologne roared with laughter.

"You've put a lot of thought into these gifts, Nabiki. It was very nice of you," the old woman said approvingly. "Especially considering our history." The middle sister shrugged.

"All water under the bridge, really. We've known each other for quite a while, been through a lot. Why not?" She glanced at her watch. "I'm going to have to go, the train is in about fifteen minutes and with this much snow it's going to take me ten just to get to the station. Thank you for the wine. Akane, I'll see you tomorrow around lunch-time, OK?” Her sister nodded.

"Yep, that's fine. Have fun and say hi to Maiko and Rika for me."

"I will." Cologne took her back downstairs and opened the front door for her as she put her boots and coat back on. Just as she was about to leave, the old woman put a hand on her sleeve. The brunette looked down at the small woman.

"Seriously, Nabiki Tendo, thank you very much for the gifts. They were all very appropriate. You didn't have to go to so much trouble." Nabiki smiled at the elder.

"It was no trouble. I don't have many friends, but I think you three count.” She nodded respectfully to the ancient Amazon and slipped out into the cold, Cologne closing the door behind her with a thoughtful look on her face.
Chapter 32

Clutching a bottle of beer Nabiki sat on the sofa and looked around the living-room of her sister's apartment, smiling to herself. Aiko and Tamiko were talking to the female demon she'd seen at the warehouse the night she'd tracked the errant pair down, laughing loudly at something the demoness had said. Kasumi was talking to Uthryyl in the trade language, gesturing wildly, explaining some point about the use of the illusion spell, occasionally turning into something else by way of demonstration. Neither one of them seemed to consider this odd. Misaki was eating. Again. Ranma was talking to Uthryyl's wife who she'd been introduced to when she arrived. Shaking her head slightly, she looked up as Fumiko sat next to her and reached for one of the bottles on the coffee-table, grinning at her.

All four magical girls were wearing normal clothing for the first time Nabiki had seen, Fumiko had skin-tight black jeans and a very dark blue silk blouse on, which suited her. "Good party," she said, casually popping the cap off the beer bottle with her thumbnail in a way than made Nabiki snicker. She was clearly much stronger than she appeared even without the magic power boost. The middle sister nodded, taking a gulp from her own bottle.

"Yes, but the strangest one I've ever been to." Fumiko glanced around, looking slightly puzzled, which made Nabiki laugh. Eventually the off-duty magical girl worked out what she meant and giggled.

"OK, I see what you mean. I suppose it is a bit weird from that viewpoint. It's pretty much normal to us all now." She shrugged, smiling. "What did you think of the roast g'rargh?" Nabiki looked over to the dining table on which a very large plate held the half-eaten carcass of something with six legs and a long tail. It had been delicious, even though it looked extremely odd.

"I think I have a new favourite meat, to be honest," she said, making Fumiko chuckle. "It was nice of Uthryyl to bring it. Perhaps they should be importing those things at the same time as exporting chocolate." The other woman shook her head sadly.

"I wish. They're fantastic eating but apparently quite a delicacy even on his world. They simply can't farm enough of them to export them. Misaki is annoyed about that, she really likes fresh g'rargh. We've only ever had it about three or four times, but given the chance she'd be having g'rargh sandwiches for lunch every day." She looked over to her sister, who was heading for the table with determination, smiling a bit. "Looks like she's ready for a fourth course."

Nabiki looked at her own plate, working out how hungry she was. Not quite enough yet. "I've had two servings so far myself. Luckily it looks like there's plenty left." She laughed, making the other woman shake her head. "As you've heard, you can get used to anything. Even this." Her sister, carrying a heaping plate, slumped down on the other arm of the sofa and grunted happily at them, eating contentedly.

"You see? Never stops. She should be the size of three of me. I don't know how she does it." The middle Tendo snickered as Misaki looked at them with raised eyebrows before deciding that commenting was too much trouble. They all looked up as Ranma came over and stood next to Nabiki, smiling at them.
"Having fun?" he asked, glancing around. They nodded. Sitting on the other side of the Tendo woman from Fumiko he reached for the bowl of potato snacks on the table, popping a handful into his mouth. "What did you think of the roast g'ragh?" he asked, causing Fumiko and Nabiki to look at each other and laugh.

"We just had that conversation, Ranma," the middle sister said. He grinned. "It's very good indeed."

"That it is. Assuming Misaki leaves any, we'll have quite a bit to freeze. It's wonderful in a stew." The taciturn woman looked at him, then at her plate, then speculatively at the table across the room, before shrugging. They all snickered. "So, did Cologne and the others like the gifts you got?" he asked Nabiki.

"Yes, very much. Thanks for suggesting that book, and for persuading your friend to let it go so cheaply. She really liked it." The martial artist looked amused.

"I thought she would. It's the sort of thing she's interested in and it's quite rare. What about those knives for Mousse?"

"He was very pleased as well. The man certainly appreciates a good blade." She laughed. "At least he's not throwing them at you any more."

Ranma nodded with a wide smile. "I have to admit, even though it wouldn't do him much good now, I'm glad of that. The amount of weaponry he left lying around Nerima was amazing. I was forever picking it up. That's where half the stuff in the practice room came from. Kas and I both still have a couple of hundred kilos of the better metalwork stashed away in ki space, just in case." He shook his head in wonder. "I have no idea where he got it all, or why he never bothered retrieving most of it. He must buy in bulk."

"I think he'd bother to pick those knives up, he seemed very taken with them." She sipped her beer again, helping herself to some snacks as well. "Shampoo and Akane both loved the action figures of you two as well. It's extremely funny under the circumstances." She laughed, remembering the look on her sister's face. "Akane is still talking about your demonstration last week as well. She was hugely impressed and very pleased that you'd do that for her. The bit with the pond was inspired. Auntie Nodoka has been milking it for all it's worth. Your father is starting to look quite scared when he walks past the thing." Ranma laughed as Fumiko and Misaki exchanged quizzical glances. Noticing, Nabiki explained the story. Both of them were giggling furiously by the end.

The middle sister continued talking about the last few days, in the end all the occupants of the room joining them and listening. The three demons sat on the floor as the sofa was full, appearing perfectly at home, Uthryyl and the female who wasn't his wife, but had turned out to be his daughter Onkra, drinking beer while his wife Quannyr was sipping from a glass of wine. When Nabiki told the story of her Shogi game with Genma, Ranma nearly slid off the sofa he was laughing so hard.

"Oh, god, I wish I'd seen that. You psyched him out beautifully." She grinned.

"Damn right I did. He was completely sure I must be cheating and spent too much time trying to work out how rather than playing the game." She flipped a potato chip into her mouth looking pleased with herself. "What I didn't tell them is that I've been playing Shogi with friends at university for years. I'm not the best player by a long shot but I'm better than they are." The brunette looked very satisfied with herself. Kasumi giggled.

"Well done, sister. It sounds very funny."
"Oh, trust me, it was. Especially when I faked them out with the scared look. That worked amazingly well." She demonstrated, adding a trembling hand pointing at some eldritch threat from the kitchen. Everyone clapped. Straightening up from her pseudo-terrified cowering she bowed slightly from a seated position. "Thank you." Ranma laughed, studying her with interest.

"Yes, you can act very well, even without the disguise. That was pretty good."

"Before I found you guys again I'd never really considered it, but it turns out to be fun. Ms Aoyama was brilliant, at least with Ryoga." She got an introspective look. "I wonder if he's stopped running yet?" Looking at Ranma again as a thought struck her, she added, "Oh, yes, Cologne was quite annoyed she missed your demo. She was out shopping at the time. The old girl was bitching about missing it for a couple of days according to Shampoo." This made him chuckle.

"Perhaps next time."

Onkra turned her head to look at Kasumi. "Is it time for the ice-cream yet?" she asked hopefully, her ears cocked forward like an eager dog. Kasumi smiled at her.

"I think so. I assume everyone wants some?" The demons, Misaki, and Ranma all nodded particularly hard. Nabiki watched with amusement. "I've got chocolate, rum and raisin, mint, and strawberry." They all considered the options and placed their orders. Nabiki went to help her sister dish it out in the kitchen, grinning to herself.

"I'm glad I came, sis. This is a lot of fun." She pulled the correct number of bowls out of the cupboard as Kasumi opened the freezer.

"I'm glad you came as well. We don't have people over very often, and rarely this many, but I like it. Sometimes I miss having people around me," the elder sister said, opening the first container of ice cream while pushing the freezer door shut with her foot. "Don't get me wrong," she added hastily, "I love being here with Ranma and we have a good life, but every now and then it's nice to have a lot of people around." Nabiki nodded understandingly.

"It's a bit odd having a Christmas party with magical girls, never mind demons at the same time, but they're all good people."

"Very much so. You know how we feel about the girls and Uthryyll's family are close to us as well.
We get on very well with them." She sighed a little. "There are a lot of other people we like as well but very few of them know the truth about us. It's safer that way, but at times like this I'm sorry about it. It would be nice to have parties as large as we used to have in the old days in the Dojo."
Her sister looked sad.

"I know. I miss them as well. We haven't had one since, well, since you left. The Dojo was a wreck for ages and even since we rebuilt it we just haven't quite got around to it."

"Perhaps one day. Things do seem to be heading towards us being able to reveal ourselves eventually." They piled the bowls and some spoons onto a couple of trays and went back into the living room, Kasumi continuing the conversation when everyone had what they wanted. "I was just saying to Nabiki that with the way things seem to be going over the last few months it's not impossible that we could perhaps tell the people back in Nerima about us one day." Ranma looked thoughtfully at her, a spoonful of chocolate ice-cream in his mouth, before swallowing.

"It's slowly heading that way. I have to admit I'm not all that fusssed about ever doing it but I know you'd like to tell your family. I can understand that, especially with the improvements to Akane's mental state recently." He sighed. "And I even admit that seeing my mother has made me miss her a little. She's definitely changed for the better, from what I've seen. Pop still makes me want to kick the shit out of him when I see him, I'm going to have to work on that, but..." Helplessly he shrugged, unable to put what he was feeling into words. His wife smiled at him sympathetically, understanding his problem.

Aiko looked interested. "Assuming you do let them know about yourselves, would you tell them everything?" Everyone looked at her. "I mean, there's a hell of a lot of things that hardly anyone outside this room knows about. Some of those things could cause problems if they got out. Could your family be trusted to keep it a secret?" Ranma shrugged.

"At one point I would definitely have said no. But the main reason for that is stuffing herself with mint ice cream next to me." Nabiki glared at him, then snickered. He was basically right. Aiko laughed. "Now, I'm not sure, really. There are just so many people involved. The Amazons, Ukyo, my family, Kas's family." Sighing he waved his spoon a little, indicating the scope of the problem. "Too many to keep it a secret for long even if they all promised. It would leak."

Uthryyl asked, "If it did get out what would that mean for 'Yori' and 'Chou'? Your alter-egos are highly respected both here and in several other places. Do you think if it became known that they were actually Ranma and Kasumi it would cause problems?" Dropping his spoon back into his empty bowl and putting it on the table, Ranma looked depressed.

"That's something that worries me. The 'Yori' side of things has grown far bigger than I ever expected. At first it was mainly just fun but now it's also more important than that. I like being Yori. I'm helping people in a way I've never managed before. But I also like being me. Yori is as real as Ranma is, now, I can't see giving one up in favour of the other. If everyone finds out that we're the same person, never mind all the other people, I have no idea what would happen."

Sighing, he looked at his wife, who smiled at him.

"I feel the same about Chou. It's just another aspect of who I really am, one I very much enjoy. I wouldn't want to lose that."

"Do you even need to tell people about that part?" Tamiko asked. "Couldn't you just turn up one day as your real selves, meet your families, then come back here and get back to doing what you're doing? They don't need to know everything, or possibly much of anything." Ranma and Kasumi exchanged glances.

"You don't know our families and all the other loonies back in Furinkan. If they find out anything, sooner or later they're likely to find out quite a lot of the rest. The biggest problem is Cologne, actually, she'll recognise our power signatures aren't what they used to be at some point. We can disguise them very well but it would only take one mistake." Ranma shook his head. "Kas would be the weak point. It would be difficult to pretend she was still the same old Kasumi, she's changed much more than I have." He looked at his wife with pride. "In so many wonderful ways."

Everyone was silent for a while thinking about the issue.

Eventually Kasumi reluctantly added, "We also might have another problem on the horizon." They looked at her. "One of my agents found out that Sergeant Harada was at the Furinkan district police station talking to Lieutenant Sasaki recently. He was asking questions about Akane and the Dojo."

Nabiki looked shocked, while Aiko sighed.

"He's a very smart and persistent man is our Sergeant. I like him a lot but he could be a problem." Ranma nodded with a troubled expression.

"I like him very much as well. And respect him, he's an exceptionally good police officer. A good man. Hopefully we can trust him if it comes to that."
Uthryyl nodded slowly. "I think you probably can. I got a very good impression from him when we had that nasty little problem a while ago. He strikes me as a man of honour and integrity." Smiling in a way that to most people would have looked threatening just based on the number of teeth, he added, "Any decent trader becomes very good at reading people, you have to know who you can trust." Nabiki nodded, looking at him with interest.

"Very true." Turning to her sister she asked, "Did your agent give you much more than that?"
Kasumi got up and retrieved a printout from the study, coming back with it quickly. She handed it to her sister before sitting down again. Skimming it Nabiki laughed at the From: field at the top.
"Agent Orange?" Kasumi giggled.

"She has a very strange sense of humour for an eighty year old woman." The middle sister inspected the printout carefully, impressed despite herself. It was very detailed and professional, as good as anything she could produce.

"OK. So, they're old friends, that explains why he talked to this Lieutenant Sasaki in the first place.
Hmm. Sasaki. I know that name." She thought for a moment, then nodded. "Yes. He's the one who got the story in the paper about the assault case just after you guys left." Ranma nodded.

"Right. I know him a little, he was always a pretty decent fellow."

"Let's see... Talked about Akane, her history... Stuff about the background of the Dojo. Various things about all of us. OK, he mentioned me..." She smiled. "Scary girl. I like that." Her sister and brother-in-law looked amused. "Some info about when you left, not much there. Quite a lot about Ranma, he seems fairly impressed with you." Ranma seemed pleased. "Harada asked some pretty smart questions, but not some of the ones I'd have expected. Interesting." She put the report on the table and tilted her head back resting it on the back of the sofa, staring at the ceiling while thinking, working out possible actions and repercussions. "Very interesting. He's clearly interested in Ranma Saotome, but my guess is not as a primary goal. He didn't ask the right questions if he suspected Ranma and Yori are the same person. Not to say he won't work it out in the end, I think he's probably capable of it, but I have a feeling that he's thinking along different lines." The brunette fell silent, while everyone watched with a certain amount of respect.

Eventually she lowered her gaze and looked at Ranma, then her sister. "I think, based on that report, that he may be working on the basis that Yori and Chou know Ranma and Kasumi, not that they are Ranma and Kasumi," she said slowly. "Some of the questions were wrong if he was trying to get evidence that you were the same people." With a small shrug she added, "The end result probably depends on his motivations for even looking into all this. If it's just personal curiosity probably nothing will come of it. If he was working on it from the viewpoint of a professional capacity, I'm not sure. I don't know him enough to be able to predict his actions well."

"It's possible that he wasn't looking for information on Ranma at all, it just came up in conversation," Fumiko said, having picked up the printout and read it curiously. "From what I can see here it was this Lieutenant that raised the subject in the first place. If that's the case he might not take it any further anyway." Nabiki looked at her for a moment then nodded.

"You may be right."

"Well, whatever happens we have some advance knowledge of it, which is a help." Kasumi sighed a little. "I do hope that he's sensible about whatever conclusions he comes to and talks to us first." Her husband glanced at her.

"I think he would. He's not the type to just drop anyone in it without a very good reason." After a pause, he added, "But I still can't think what to do about letting him or anyone else know the truth."
To be honest, he would probably be the easiest one to deal with. No vested interest in us except as Yori and Chou, no real reason to tell anyone. The others..." He looked irritated. Misaki looked up from where she was polishing off a fifth helping of roast g'rargh. Everyone twitched a little when she began speaking, it was such an unusual phenomenon.

"Use an information restriction spell." They stared, then many glances were exchanged. She sighed a little. "I read about it a while ago. There are spells that can be cast on a willing recipient that make it impossible for them to discuss a specific subject with anyone that isn't also in possession of the same information. They're used in high-security operations on some of the demon worlds." Shrugging a little she added, "I don't know much about them but it sounds like a possible solution." The girl went back to eating as they all looked at her in astonishment. Ranma glanced at his wife, then Nabiki.

"Um. OK, thanks, Misaki." Fumiko was staring at her sister in amazement. Uthryyl had a look of deep thought on his face. After a few seconds he nodded slowly.

"She may have a point. Now that it's been mentioned I do recall someone talking about something along those lines some years back. I'm trying to remember who it was." He exchanged a few words with his wife, then nodded again. "That's it. We sold some very expensive coffee beans to a guy I know who works for the government of a small kingdom in one of the worlds of the K'nn group." He grinned. "Made an enormous profit as well as I recall, they love the stuff and have more money than sense. We went to a meal at the palace, impressive place but a bit gaudy. He was talking about some security mage they'd hired who knew all sorts of spells to minimise leaks, which is something they'd had a problem with. That spell, or something very much like it, was one they were experimenting with. I seem to remember that the main problem was that it took very fine control and quite a lot of power to use successfully, so not many mages could pull it off, although otherwise it was reasonably straightforward." He looked at Ranma with amusement.

"Fine control and lots of power is pretty much your style. Would you like me to see if I can get some more information on it?" With another glance at his wife Ranma nodded.

"Yes, please. It sounds like it might worth looking into. We'd have to either translate it into our system or get a mage we trust to apply it, but if it does what Misaki describes it could sort out most of the problems." He thought for a moment. "We'd probably have to use it on both our families, Ukyo and Konatsu, and the Amazons. They're the only ones we'd have to tell most things to. For anyone else, Tamiko is right, we just don't mention anything much to them. Need to know and all that sort of thing." Nabiki was looking a little unsure, he noticed. "Problem, Nabs?"

"Don't call me Nabs," she shot back automatically making everyone smile. After a second or two she reluctantly nodded. "There's something about the idea of that spell that kind of worries me. I guess it sounds a bit like some sort of mind control. I'm not comfortable with that concept." Ranma smiled at her.

"Good. Neither am I. It's an obscene thing and luckily extremely difficult to do at all. I think, based on the description, that this technique is similar to the spell on our business cards but applied to a person. Remember that Misaki said it needed willing cooperation of the subject. I'd guess that it simply blocks the ability to talk or write about a very specific set of information, or possibly temporarily blocks even remembering it under the right conditions. I very much doubt it actually modifies the will of the subject, that sort of thing is almost impossible to do and requires an amazingly complex spell. Something which I am personally very happy about, trust me." She thought about his explanation and relaxed a little.

"All right. But check, OK? Just in case, before you use it on my family. Or even yours." She giggled. "Well, Auntie Nodoka at any rate. You can experiment on Genma all you want." He laughed, very amused.

"Don't worry, assuming Uthryyl can get the information on the spell, and that it's even useful at all, we'll investigate it very thoroughly first."

Fumiko reached for another bottle of beer, flipping the top off with her thumb again and catching it in her other hand. "Aside from anything else, the problem may not be as big as you're worrying about anyway. I mean, you told us about Furinkan and your curse before you got control of it. Loads of people saw you change both ways for a couple of years but from what you've said a large number of them still didn't believe you and 'Ranko' were the same person." She laughed. "To be honest, it took me a while to get used to it and I'm very familiar with magic. It's pretty wild even by our terms. By now you're both so weird that even experienced mages tend to back off. How many people are going to believe that Ranma, Yori, Maiko, and all the others are the same person? Even in Nerima or Minato?"

Kasumi giggled as everyone thought about that. "She's not wrong. You and the cute redhead were mostly thought of as brother and sister." Her husband grinned and became the cute redhead.

"See? That's just bizarre even by magical girl standards," Fumiko said, snickering.

"Right, so we have a possible plan, for if and when we contact the various interested parties back in Nerima. The problem of what to do about any remaining fiancée entanglements can be worried about another day." The red-headed young woman jumped to her feet. "At the moment, I want some more well-cooked six legged demonic roast." She headed for the table, followed by Misaki, whose sister watched her and sighed.

"God, I have no idea where she puts it."

By the time the three demons announced they had to leave at nearly three in the morning, only Ranma, male again, Kasumi, Nabiki and Fumiko were still conscious. The other three magical girls were basically passed out in various parts of the room, Misaki snoring like a chainsaw finding a nail in an old log. Wincing at the noise, Nabiki looked at the girl's sister and said with a grin, "I can see why you don't want to share a room with her." Fumiko laughed, staggering slightly and putting her hand on the wall to steady herself as they all headed for the practice room.

"I love her dearly but she's hellish to try to sleep next to. It's a good thing this place is so well soundproofed or no one would be able to sleep." She hiccuped. "Pardon me." Laughing, they followed the others into the large room. Uthryyl was half-carrying his daughter, who had also drunk slightly more than she should have, but seemed not to regret this at all judging by the look on her face. Nabiki found it odd that she was in fact able to work this out, yet more proof of how normal all this was becoming.

"Wonderful party, Ranma, Kasumi. Thanks for inviting us." Kasumi smiled gently at him.

"Thank you for coming. And for the g'ragh. It was very nice indeed." Ranma shook his hand.

"I hope we see you again soon, Uthryyl."

"You will. I'll look into this security spell as well." The demon smiled.

"Thanks." Glancing at Onkra, who was definitely a bit the worse for drink, he added, "Would you like us to try to do the portal? I don't think she's in a state to help you right now." Uthryyl looked at his daughter with fond resignation while his wife laughed slightly.
"Probably not. Have you worked out portals, now?" Ranma and Kasumi looked at each other slightly uncertainly.

"Well, I think so. We nearly got one running a couple of days ago. But Kas thinks she knows where we went wrong and has tweaked the spell a bit." He shrugged. "If it doesn't work we can pour a litre of coffee down Onkra's neck and try again in half an hour or so."

"OK. Let's see what happens." Everyone but Ranma and Kasumi stepped back. The two martial artists conferred for a moment, then Kasumi turned to stare at the middle of the room. Concentrating, she focussed their weird blend of ki and magic through whatever spell they'd worked out, causing the three conscious magic-sensitive people to watch with interest and even Nabiki to twitch at the peculiar sensation of the inside of her head fizzing slightly.

"That's the weirdest way to make a portal I've ever seen," Uthryyl muttered mostly to himself, watching with fascination. The middle Tendo looked at him wondering what he could see. A flickering light at the point Kasumi was still staring fixedly into made her turn back to the ongoing effort.

"I think it needs a little more power over there, love." Kasumi nodded, slightly sweating. "I see it. Grab that bit, it nearly got away."

"OK. Whoops. Right, got it. Push here, then there." Ranma was also staring into the middle of the light which was steadily building in intensity, emitting a slight hissing noise. A wind started blowing gently outwards from it.

"No, It needs some more over there I think," Kasumi said. "Not like that, that's too much!" She paused as the light wobbled. "Better. OK, it's coming... nearly... Now!" Her husband nodded sharply, doing something. Abruptly the light stabilised into a brilliant blue glow, extending both up and down from it's position a metre off the floor into a tear in reality that looked just like the one Nabiki had seen in the warehouse months ago. Kasumi hopped up and down with excitement. "It worked! It worked!" she squealed happily, clapping her hands. Everyone stared while Ranma hugged his wife.

"Gods. That's amazing," Uthryyl said with wonder in his voice. "I have no idea how you made that work, it made my head ache to even try to follow it. But it certainly looks right." He walked around the portal inspecting it closely. "Very impressive. Especially with only two of you."

"It should be targeted to your normal coordinates," Kasumi said, showing no signs of strain now that the portal was stable. "Perhaps we should check first, though. Do you have one of your test probes with you?" Uthryyl looked at her, then at his wife. She sighed a little.

"You forgot to bring one, didn't you?" she asked. He gave her an embarrassed nod. Quannyr produced a small green and gold sphere from somewhere about her person, handing it to Ranma. "Here you go. Unlike some people I always come prepared." She looked amused. The martial artist laughed, walking over to the portal and fiddling with the device for a moment before tossing it into the middle of the light. It vanished with a slight crackle. Moments later it reappeared, hovering in mid-air, from where he retrieved it. Inspecting it he looked satisfied.

"Yep. Exactly where it should come out." He grinned, flipping the probe back to Quannyr who caught it easily and put it away. "Looks like we've got it figured out. We're going to have to practice that a bit to do it smoothly but the basic spell is working."

"Congratulations. That's a very complex spell to convert to that bizarre thing you seem to think is magic," Uthryyl said with a chuckle, although sounding impressed. Ranma and Kasumi both laughed, bowing slightly.

"Thank you, Uthryyl," Kasumi said. "It was an awful lot of work but it taught us a huge amount. Now we can make portals we'll have to come and visit at some point."

"Please do," remarked Quannyr, hugging her, then Ranma. Uthryyl shook both their hands. Retrieving his daughter from where he'd basically propped her against the wall he shook her gently.

"Onkra? Come on, we're going home. Say goodbye to Ranma and Kasumi."

"Goodbye to Ranma and Kasumi," the young female demon mumbled, staggering after her father. Shaking her head with good-natured resignation Quannyr looked at her daughter, then waved as she guided her through the portal. Uthryyl followed with a final smile. The people remaining in the practice room watched the rip in spacetime for a second or two before Kasumi shut it down, making it contract and disappear with a faint pop that sounded like a cork coming out of a bottle. Nabiki stared for a moment then laughed.

"Bloody hell, sis, that was seriously impressive." Kasumi looked very pleased with herself, her sister thinking it was well deserved.

"I was fairly sure I worked out where we were going wrong but the only way to know was to try it. Now we need to optimise it a bit and practice." Fumiko was leaning against the wall, shaking her head in wonder.

"You two continually amaze me. That was incredible. There was something a bit weird about it, though, it wasn't like any portal I've ever seen before." Kasumi nodded with a glance at her husband.

"I know. When we were designing the new spell we found, um, I guess you could call it a bug, in the one we were using as a pattern. It wasn't nearly as efficient as we thought it should be. Ranma worked out how to improve it, although it took us some experimentation to make that part work. It uses a lot less power than the normal way of making portals. Our method may be unusual but it has some major advantages when you understand it." Fumiko looked impressed all over again.

"So you not only designed your own portal spell from the ground up, but you made it better than the original? Absolutely amazing." She yawned widely. "But even with all that I need some sleep."

They went back into the living room, prodding the various sleeping women into some vague form of wakefulness, with the exception of Misaki who was happily digesting a couple of kilos of alien meat. In the end Ranma picked her up and carried her to her room. Aiko grinned tiredly, waved to them all, then collapsed into her own bed, asleep again almost before she closed her eyes. Tamiko wasn't much better.

Kasumi put the remains of the food into the large refrigerator in the utility room, while Nabiki cleared away the various plates and glasses. "Leave everything else, Nabiki, we can do that in the morning," her sister said, coming back into the room.

"OK. Well, in that case I'm off to bed. See you later."

"Good night, sister." Ten minutes later the only sound in the apartment was a faint snore coming from Misaki's room.

"We're home," Nabiki called out as she, 'Rika', and 'Maiko' entered the Tendo house, stamping snow off their boots. Akane came down the stairs and smiled at them while they took their boots
"Hello again, both of you," she said.

"Hello, Akane," 'Rika' replied, "How was your Christmas?"

"Very good, thanks. How was yours? And your party, how did that go?" The blonde smiled.

"It went very well. Christmas was nice, nothing exceptional, just in a nice warm home with family. Did you get any interesting presents?" They walked into the living room where Nodoka was sitting with Soun watching television. Akane nodded happily.

"Oh yes. Especially one thing, or rather, a pair of things." She disappeared, running up to her room, as all three arrivals sat down. Nabiki grinned.

"She's certainly in a good mood." Soun looked up and smiled.

"Yes, she is. The difference from last year is remarkable. Mind you, your present seems to be responsible for quite a lot of that." Nodoka stood and looked at the guests.

"Tea?"

"Yes, please," 'Maiko' replied. The older woman disappeared into the kitchen. Akane returned holding both action figures in their boxes, sitting next to 'Maiko' and showing them to her.

"Look at these," she said with glee. "Nabiki got hold of them somehow. They're incredibly rare." The long-haired brunette accepted both boxes with a smile, looking at them with interest. Nabiki watched with an inner grin, amused at all the ways that Akane didn't understand the true situation. The thought of one of Ranma's alter-egos examining dolls of another one, while next to her Akane didn't realise any of it, was something she found hysterical.

'If they ever do come clean, she's going to go absolutely mad when she realises it,' Nabiki thought with a small smile.

"They're very well made," 'Maiko' said with a chuckle, handing the 'Chou' doll to 'Rika' while fully cognizant of the absurdity of it all. "They look just like them. I would imagine they'd sell very well. Where did you get them, Nabiki?" she asked with a mischievous look. The middle sister stared at her for a moment, knowing the joke but unable to say anything about it in present company. She explained the story, laughing internally, as she could see from her expression 'Maiko' was also doing. "Wow. That's amazing," the smaller woman said with a straight face. "And you got to meet Yori and Chou as well, from what I've heard. I've always wanted to do that." 'Rika' and Nabiki both looked at her and sighed a little. She grinned at them. "Hey, they're interesting people!"

They talked for a while, Akane also showing them the gold duck necklace which she was wearing. 'Rika' admired it. "That's very pretty, Akane. I like it."

"So do I." She tucked it back inside her blouse. Nodoka returned with the tea, pouring everyone a cup. Soun turned off the television as the news ended, leaning back comfortably. Genma came in, attracted by the sound of visitors, greeting both women politely then sitting down with a cup himself.

"I understand that you had a serious medical problem fixed by Yori and Chou?" 'Rika' asked politely. Akane nodded, looking momentarily sad.

"Yes. It wasn't my finest hour, the fight that triggered everything. But on the other hand I got to meet two people I admire, and they fixed something that's been causing me trouble for a very long time, so I guess it was worth it in the end." She went over the story from her perspective, Nodoka and Nabiki adding details.

"So does that mean your psychological issues are cured?" 'Maiko' asked, accepting a biscuit from the plate that Nodoka handed around with a nod of thanks. Sighing a little Akane shook her head.

"No, not completely. It did make a huge difference, in fact it probably is what allowed me to finally begin making real progress with the therapy, but I've still got problems." She looked a little depressed. "My therapist says I've got trust issues combined with mild paranoid tendencies. Also the anger thing, which at least is coming under control. I can still get really angry much too easily but the random triggering of it seems to be almost gone. She's still trying to get to the bottom of why these problems exist. It may have something to do with the death of my mother, she thinks, plus some other things I'm not really comfortable talking about at the moment." The brunette nodded understandably.

"Don't worry, I get the idea. It's very personal, you don't have to tell us. Just keep at the therapy. By the sounds of it you're coming along well. Hopefully a real cure will come in time."

"I hope so. I really do. It's cost me so much, caused so much damage and pain to so many people..." The blue-haired woman trailed off sadly. Nodoka patted her hand comfortingly.

"Cheer up, dear. You're not perfect, no one is, but you're already so much better I have trouble believing it at times. You'll improve, I'm sure." Akane looked at her gratefully, taking an offered biscuit and nibbling it.

"Thanks. I hope you're right."

The room full of people talked for some time, before Nodoka got up to prepare a light lunch. It was about two in the afternoon when they sat down to eat. Afterwards Akane went out to the Dojo to practice, Nabiki and the other two following to watch for a while. 'Maiko' and 'Rika' were privately impressed, the youngest sister's new-found calmness had definitely improved her focus considerably. The disguised Ranma watched her with an expert eye, nodding to herself. At this rate she would end up close to Shampoo's level in a few months. Far better than she had thought likely for a long time. Nabiki caught her eye, walking over to talk quietly to her. Shielding the conversation a little so Akane wouldn't overhear, 'Maiko' said, "She's getting a lot better."

"I know. Still nowhere near you two, but finally some real improvement. She's much happier as a result, I think." 'Rika' smiled gently.

"Good. Poor Akane, she's had so much trouble in her emotional life. I've so happy to see her getting better." She watched as Akane went through a basic kata flawlessly, nodding approval. "She's still quite slow at that but it's good she's concentrating on getting it right before doing it quickly. I'm impressed. What a change from before!"

"No argument from me, sis," Nabiki replied, also watching with interest. "I can still hardly believe what a difference there is in about a month. I really hope her improvement continues. It's doing wonders for her self-esteem and confidence, but in a good way. The whole 'I'm a fantastic martial artist' thing seems to have long gone, now she's actually trying to learn. Father is extremely pleased. Even Genma seems impressed." 'Maiko' frowned slightly at the mention of her father's name.

"Keep an eye on him. I still don't trust him not to try something stupid." Nabiki giggled.
"Don't worry, I don't trust him further than I could kick him. Although, to be fair to the idiot, he does seem to be slowly becoming something closer to a real human being." She looked amused. "He's even spending more time as one lately. Not so much Uncle Panda. Mind you, that might be because it's so cold the water freezes in his fur." They all laughed at the mental image. Going back into the house they ended up playing board games for a few hours, something none of them had done since they were children. Eventually, as dinnertime drew near, Nabiki was grinning at everyone else over almost the entire contents of the bank due to having hotels all over the place on the 'Monopoly' board.

"I give up," Soun said, pushing himself back from the table. 'Rika' and 'Maiko' exchanged glances and conceded as well.

"Hah! That's what you get for trying to gang up on me," Nabiki said with satisfaction, counting her fake money with a satisfied look. 'Maiko' laughed.

"We absolutely destroyed you at 'Risk'." This was true, the team of 'Rika' and 'Maiko' had been unbeatable.

"That wasn't for money. So it doesn't count." Akane giggled from the sidelines where she'd been watching with amusement.

They cleared the table, then Nodoka went into the kitchen to finish the dinner preparations. Nabiki and 'Rika' went to help while 'Maiko' talked to Akane as they set the table. After a very nice meal they were all in the process of helping the elder Saotome clear up when 'Maiko's' cellphone buzzed. She pulled it out of her pocket, looked at it, then at the other occupants of the room. "Sorry, I have to take this, it could be important." Stepping out of the room for a minute or two, she came back with a grave expression. "We're going to have to leave. I'm sorry about that. It's a bit of an emergency." Nabiki looked at her with a sinking feeling, she had an idea what that meant.

Glancing at the middle sister 'Maiko' nodded slightly, causing her to sigh.

"Oh dear. I hope it's not too serious," Nodoka said with a worried look.

Putting a deliberate smile on her face 'Maiko' replied, "It might come to nothing, but we have to go and see. My apologies for rushing off. Thank you for the lunch and dinner, Nodoka, they were both very nice. I hope we can come back some other time."

"You're both always welcome here," Nodoka responded, Akane nodding. "Good luck with your emergency." She was curious but too polite to ask. Nabiki went into the hall with them as they put on their boots and coats.

"I'll come with you to the station," she said loudly enough for the rest of the family to overhear. As soon as the three of them were safely out of the house 'Maiko' shielded them heavily, becoming 'Yori' at the same time. Nabiki looked enquiringly at her. "It's another portal-bomb isn't it?" 'Yori' nodded.

"Yes, damn it. In London. Agent Naito got the word a few minutes ago, he called Sergeant Harada, who called me. It's bad. Very bad. Right in the middle of the morning Boxing Day sales in one of the main shopping areas. Apparently there are at least fifty casualties already, no word on fatalities." Nabiki and 'Rika' winced.

"Fuck." They ducked into the same alley that Nabiki had left from the night of Akane's rampage, her sister becoming 'Chou' then pulling out her own phone and calling Aiko. Thirty seconds later the magical girl appeared next to them, shivering in the cold.
"Come on, let's go. I'm not dressed for a dark snowy alley," she grumped. Nabiki quickly hugged her sister and sister-in-law, then stepped back.

"Good luck. Be careful," she said, worried. 'Yori' raised a hand and smiled before the three girls vanished in a bright flash. Nabiki opened her eyes and stared at the spot they'd been standing in for a moment before turning and walking home, thinking depressing thoughts.
Warrant Officer Walton grabbed for a handhold as the truck rocked violently, swerving around a car that hadn't moved fast enough when it heard the siren. The driver shouted a stream of invective out the window as he drove like a maniac across Vauxhall bridge, making an illegal left turn onto Grosvenor road and hitting nearly seventy miles an hour along a road that was posted as forty. Cars and other vehicles frantically swerved out of the way of the bomb disposal truck as it tore along beside the Thames, blue lights flashing. "So, what do we have, Captain?" he asked his superior. The three-man bomb disposal team had been loading the truck for a scheduled practice exercise when the call came in, allowing them to leave the base much faster than a normal response, so fast in fact that they were still waiting for full information. Only the Captain knew much about was going on and he didn't look completely sure. Looking curiously at the four heavily armed tactical anti-terrorist team members sitting on the other side of the vehicle he added, "And why the heavies? I thought this was an EOD operation." Captain Smith glanced up from his clipboard for a moment.

"It is, according to the report, but also according to the report a lot of people have been attacked. The information is fragmentary but it's possible that the terrorists are still in place and shooting, hence the backup. Our job is to deal with the device. Theirs is to make sure we can." The WO nodded with understanding. "As for what it is, I have no idea. One report is some sort of glowing green sphere in the middle of a mass of components. That could be a number of things, none of them good. Radiological, biological, chemical..." he shrugged, then grabbed for the edge of his seat as the vehicle swerved again. More swearing came from the cab. Walton looked in the direction of the driver, a half-smile breaking his serious mien for a moment.

"Johnny loves this part." Smith scowled.

"I don't. It's making my stomach flip around in a nasty way, which I really don't need right now." He shouted towards the driver, "For fuck's sake slow down a little, Adams, before you kill us all!"

"Sorry, Captain!" came the response, as the vehicle entirely failed to slow in any meaningful manner. One of the tactical team laughed. The captain glared at him and he suddenly became very interested in the finish of his MP5SD. His neighbour grinned at him.

"Don't annoy the explosives boys, Jack, unless you want your alarm clock wired with Semtex," he stage-whispered to his colleague. The captain looked momentarily amused as everyone chuckled.

"Five minutes, sir!" Sergeant Adams shouted from the cab. He turned onto Chelsea Bridge road and accelerated, hitting speeds that any resident of London would have sworn were completely impossible in the crowded city, a grin on his face. This was the best part of the job.

"Right. Listen up, you lot. We're heading for Knightsbridge, specifically Harrods, assuming that the idiot behind the wheel doesn't kill us in the process. About ten minutes ago the first reports started coming in, something happened. No one seems clear on what. The report suggested some sort of explosion, the front of the second floor is apparently in the street at the moment, casualties are high but currently unknown. One survivor the police found claimed he'd seen something that he thought was a bomb a few seconds before whatever happened, happened. Like I said, we don't know what type, how many, who planted it, anything at all useful. So we're taking everything. They pulled back, cordoned off a half mile radius and are in the process of evacuating as much of it as possible. Then they called us. The tube has been shut down, all the traffic is being diverted, the usual." He paused for breath, looking at his notes again.

"The kicker is that after the initial explosion or whatever it was, people still seem to be coming under attack. There isn't any useful information on how or by whom. The assumption is that somebody is holed up shooting at the crowd, there are still hundreds of people in the area since the store was full because of the sales. You know how big Harrods is and there are all the other shops as well. It sounds like complete bloody chaos to be honest. So we're going to potentially disarm one or more devices under fire, which is just fucking joyous. As if this job wasn't dangerous enough already." He scowled. Looking at the tactical team, he went on, "You four are here to deal with whoever these sods are. Personally, I don't care if you shoot them in the head, but the orders are to try to take them alive for questioning. So I suppose you'd better do that." The four men nodded.

"When we get there they'll go first, covering us while we get some more information on what the hell is going on. Then we can make a decision on how we deal with it. The other team is about half an hour behind us. They have all the really serious gear with them in case we actually do have something nastier than usual. If that's the case we pull back and wait for them. I'd love to wrap it up before they get here, just to show Simmons who the better people are, but the way these things go..." He grinned darkly as his people laughed. The truck roared along Beauchamp Place, turning sharply right onto Brompton road, then screeched to a halt as Adams braked hard.

"Holy shit!" he yelled, as everyone in the vehicle complained. Staring at the scene in front of him he wondered whether he'd accidentally taken a wrong turning as he seemed to have ended up in the twilight zone.

"Christ, Adams, who the hell taught you to drive?" demanded the captain as he angrily stuck his head into the cab. Adams pointed mutely out the windscreen. Smith followed his finger and stared in disbelief. "What the fuck is that thing?" he yelped. Everyone in the back tried to see what was going on, discipline breaking down slightly for a moment.

Starting a hundred yards or so further along the road the scene descended into something from a badly made war film, with damaged or destroyed vehicles scattered around the tarmac, some of them on fire. A number of bodies lay around the road as well, the angle of the limbs and head of some of them proof that they were of no further use to their previous owners. Half the front wall of the Harrods building was indeed lying in the road, at least a dozen cars flattened under the stone, while smoke came from the hole where it had been. People were running past the truck in a frantic effort to escape the area, several police officers among them doing their best to keep order, but being overwhelmed by the terrified crowd. Standing on top of a crushed UPS truck was the apparent cause of the chaos. The soldiers stared at it in shocked horror.

"That's not a bomb," Warrant Officer Walton said inanely after a long pause.

"No, really?" snapped the captain with heavy sarcasm in his shocked voice. "Of course it's not a fucking bomb. But what in god's name is it?" The creature, a good ten feet tall with claws and a spiked tail that would give them all nightmares for years, jumped off the truck and grabbed at a middle-aged woman who had scrambled out of her car and turned to run. Ignoring her screams it picked her up by the head and raised her to it's mouth...

"Oh, shit," Jack said in a choked voice, watching in horror. He'd seen some pretty awful things in his career but that instantly went to the top of the list. The captain shuddered.

"It's fucking hostile is what it is," one of the other tactical team men said in a growl. "That makes it our business. Come on, lads, we've got a job to do." They grabbed their weapons, Jack looking back at the monster for a moment then opening a case on the floor and pulling out a 40mm grenade launcher, shouldering it as well as his MP5. The captain studied at it for a moment then shrugged. Under the circumstances collateral damage seemed like a moot point. The four-man team bailed out of the truck, two of them heading for each side of the road, using the wrecked vehicles as cover as they headed towards the thing, which had finished it's snack and was looking around for seconds. Adams finally remembered the camera on the roof and turned it on, Walton going to the control console and aiming it to cover the correct area.

They watched as the soldiers closed in on the thing, which turned to watch one pair, although one of it's four stalked eyes could be seen tracking the others. One of the men, at that distance none of the people in the truck could make out which one, raised his weapon and opened fire, striking the creature in the chest and head. It screeched in agony, the sound making everyone in the area wince in pain, before bending down and picking up a mailbox, throwing the four hundred pounds of steel at the man firing on it. He managed to dive out of the way just in time, his eyes wide in shock.

"Fuck me," Adams breathed. Jack, the other member of the team, glanced at his colleague to check he was OK before lifting the grenade launcher to his shoulder. It was clearly time for something a bit heavier than 9mm rounds. Chambering an HE grenade he aimed for the chest of the monster and fired. The grenade struck slightly off-centre to the left, detonating with a flash and a very loud explosion, tearing the left arm of the thing completely off and blowing a large crater in it's chest.

"Yes!" shouted Walton in triumph, watching the clear image on the monitor in the truck. His jubilation turned to ash as they all watched in disbelieving horror when the beast regenerated it's arm and chest in a matter of seconds. "Oh my god," he said quietly. "What is that thing?" The soldier fired again and again, once he got over his shock, trying to overcome the appalling creature with sheer fire power. Five grenades later the firing pin clicked on an empty chamber, while the thing staggered slightly, then stood to it's full height and roared in fury. Dropping the launcher he opened fire with his MP5, knowing it was useless, while his team-mates did the same. The beast suddenly jumped straight at him, covering twenty yards in an eye-blink, raising it's hand to strike. He closed his eyes, knowing he was dead.

The inches-thick violet beam that screamed past the truck and impacted on the creature, vaporising it's lower legs with a loud crack, was a complete surprise to everyone. Jack twitched at the unexpected noise, staggering from the small shockwave and looking up in time to see the smoking remaining three quarters of the thing land heavily on the road less than a yard away, screeching in pain and anger. Already it's legs were regenerating. A sudden presence at his side made him look down, still in shock, to see a petite Japanese woman in black clothing staring at him with blue-violet eyes. "Run, you idiot," she snapped in very good English with only a trace of an accent, whirling to face the creature, her long braided night black hair slapping across his chest. Raising her hand she made him nearly faint by producing another energy blast. The creature lost an arm this time, decided this was a bit much, then turned and ran inside Harrods through the gaping hole in the front at horrific speed.

Lieutenant Jack Andrews was very difficult to surprise, having seen a lot of things in his military service, but even so the last ten minutes left him wondering whether he'd been slipped a particularly good hallucinogen. There didn't seem to be any other rational explanation for it. The girl watched the building warily for a few seconds before apparently deciding that it was safe to turn to look at him, while he simply gaped at her. A roar from inside the remains of Harrods made them both look, but nothing jumped out. She turned back to him, looked him up and down for a moment, then grinned in an unsettling manner, showing what looked for all the world like small fangs. She held out her hand.

"Come with me if you want to live," she said in a remarkably good Schwarzenegger impression, then snickered. He stared. "Seriously, we need to get you guys out of here before Mr Ugly comes back for round two. Grab your weapons and your friend over there and get on with it." Shaking his head he stared at her for a moment more, then bent down and picked up the launcher, before walking over to the other man who was struggling to stand up with a sprained ankle. Offering him an arm he hauled him to his feet, both of them heading back to the truck. Glancing over his shoulder he saw the girl look carefully at the building for a little longer before following, walking backwards without any effort at all, neatly avoiding all the debris on the road without apparently looking. He and his colleague exchanged a look of befuddlement.

The other pair from his team had seen the whole thing and followed them, covering their rear with their weapons despite the futility of the effort. When they arrived at the EOD truck they found another young woman, this one taller and blonde, dressed in grey, along with a middle-aged man, both of them apparently Japanese like the first girl, accompanied by two men in suits who gave off a strong air of government official. Jack lowered his colleague to the ground, then sagged against the side of the truck, while the other pair of soldiers walked up. The back of the truck was open and the three occupants of it were looking out at the new arrivals, a certain amount of shock and horror on their faces from the events of the last few minutes.

Captain Smith inspected the new arrivals with puzzled interest, mixed with considerable respect based on what he'd just seen the short girl do. She grinned at him. "Who are you lot?" he asked. "And what in god's name is going on? What was that... that... That!" He waved a hand vaguely in the direction of Harrods, which was definitely on fire by now. She glanced in the direction he indicated, then looked back at him.

"It's a demon." There was a very long silence, broken only by the crackling of flames, distant sirens coming steadily closer, and footsteps from the thinning crowd still escaping the area while they could.

"A demon," he said with a peculiarly flat voice. All the soldiers were looking at him. She nodded. "Yes."

"You're sure."

"Oh, yes."

"Right." he closed his eyes and massaged his brow for a moment. "And you are?" One of the government men stepped forward, pulling out an ID card and holding it up.

"Harry Williamson, MI5. This is my colleague John Spence from the Ministry of Defence. And these are... specialists, I suppose you could say. Yori," he nodded to the shorter girl, "Chou," this was the blonde, "and Agent Naito from the PSIA in Japan. They're here to help us with our current little problem." Captain Smith choked a little at the description of this problem as 'little'.

"Specialists in what?" he asked suspiciously.

"Demon killing, of course." Williamson looked at him as if he was a bit thick. Yori laughed. Smith stared, then sat on the step at the back of the truck.

"This is all a bit much. Can someone please explain what the fuck is going on?" All the other soldiers were thinking much the same but were content to let the superior officer deal with it, still shocked at the carnage they'd walked into. Every now and then a faint roar came from inside the burning building making them look uneasily over their shoulders.

"Most of it is classified, I'm afraid, Captain," Spence began. Yori looked at him and sighed.
She stepped forward ignoring the glare he shot at the back of her head. "The short version is this. Magic exists. Demons exist. Travel to the worlds they come from is possible. There was a sort of cult of magical terrorists in Japan a few months ago that was trying to bring about an end of the world scenario, using a device that opened a portal between the world those horrors come from and here, which they planned to mass-produce and scatter all over the world. We stopped them. Unfortunately, six of the devices had already been planted and the only person who knew where was killed during the fight. We've found and destroyed one, leaving five. One of those was clearly planted here and activated earlier. That's where our bad-tempered friend came from. Understand?" She looked around with an inquiring air. The Japanese man, Agent Naito, sighed a little but was smiling. The MoD representative was shooting her an evil look while Williamson seemed mildly amused.

Lieutenant Andrews looked at her in some disbelief, then glanced at his team. They all shrugged. It sounded absurd but the evidence had tried to kill him mere minutes ago. The EOD technicians were clearly thinking much the same. "So who are you people, then? What I mean is, how did you do whatever it was you did back there?" He was very curious. She didn't have any visible weapons, not that he'd ever seen anything like the energy beam she'd used on the demon. It was like some sort of science-fiction laser or something. Agent Naito cleared his throat, making everyone look at him.

"Yori and Chou are what we refer to in Tokyo as Magical Girls." Everyone continued to look at him, only now a number of eyebrows were creeping upwards. "They have a number of special talents and abilities that are very useful in dealing with such problems, which we have an annoyingly large number of in some parts of Japan." He glanced at Yori who was grinning. "They're also probably the world's foremost martial artists." Both girls looked amused and pleased, bowing slightly to the man, who smiled. "Our government has the utmost faith in them in matters of this nature."

"Um, magical girls?" Sergeant Adams said, peering out of the back of the truck. Yori looked at him with a smile.

"I don't like the description personally, but it's kind of traditional where we come from." He nodded vaguely, staring at her. This was not at all what he expected when he reported for duty. She glanced at her companion. "Where did Aiko get to?" she asked. The blonde looked at her watch. "She went to get the others, they should be here any minute now. She thought it would be a good idea to have some backup."

Yori nodded. "Good idea. We're going to have to go in after them." Everyone stared at her as the impact of her words sank in.

"Them?" Spence asked slowly. She nodded again.

"Yes. There's two of them. That one, and the one that was still in the building." She glanced at Chou and Naito. "I think they both came through at the same time. Possibly a mated pair, although I hope not, or one was chasing the other. I could sense the other one watching us from inside." Naito sighed as Chou turned to stare hard at the building.

"Damn. Yes, you're right, there is another one in there. That's awkward," the blonde said with masterful understatement.

"We're going to have to make sure they stay put while we sweep for survivors," Yori said, "I can't feel many people inside the building still, but there is a small group on the top floor, and some at the back. The demons seem to have gone underground, a basement or something I guess. We can put up some wards to keep them there while we get the building and street clear, then deal with them." She glanced at Naito. "Hopefully we can do it like we did in Minato. If they get out it will be more of a problem, the collateral damage would be quite high in such a built-up area. Unless we could lure them to a park or something." She looked at the soldiers. "Is there a park or some other empty ground around here, fairly close?" Adams stared for a moment, then pointed. The way the young woman seemed to have taken charge was amazing and a little scary.

"Um, Kensington Gardens is about a quarter of a mile due north. But it's not really a park. Why?" She grinned.

"Parks are good places for duck ponds." While most of the assembled people tried to work out the meaning of the apparent non-sequitur, Naito groaned.

"Yori... That's some of the most expensive land in London from what I know. Please don't make a pond." She laughed.

"I'll try not to." He didn't seem reassured for some reason. She looked around. The two suits were looking a combination of worried and annoyed, while the soldiers just mostly seemed confused.

"We need to get moving. There are a lot of injured people around here." Four more young women, dressed in ridiculously skimpy clothing, suddenly appeared out of thin air a couple of feet away making everyone but Chou and Yori jump. Jack swore and reached for his weapon. Yori turned to them without any surprise, speaking as if they'd been there all along. "Aiko, you and Tamiko take that side, Misaki and Fumiko the other. Find all the survivors and get them to safety." She pointed at Jack, who had lowered his MP5 again after his momentary startlement. "You, and your friend there, you go with Aiko. You two go with Misaki." He exchanged glances with the captain, who shrugged, throwing up his hands in resignation. This whole thing had gone so far into the weird that none of them particularly minded being ordered around by a woman who looked like she wasn't yet twenty. The girl seemed to know what she was doing although the air of command was worrying in someone so young.

"Phil is injured, I think it's a sprain," he said, nodding to the lieutenant on the ground. She looked down at the man who was sitting with his right leg out in front of him. Nodding, she knelt next to him. Putting her hand on his ankle she made them all stare when it glowed purple. The MoD man made a muffled exclamation while Captain Smith swore in shock. She nodded again.

"Yep, nasty sprain. Hang on." A few seconds later she removed her hand. Second Lieutenant Stross gaped at her. "Come on, get up," she said, standing and offering him a hand. Dazedly he took it, the small woman lifting him to his feet with no effort at all.

"How did you do that?" he asked in a stunned voice.

"Magic, of course. Come on, we don't have time for this." She looked around. "Good thing it's fairly warm. Is your winter always like this?" He shook his head at the sudden change in subject.

"Um, mostly, at the moment. It can get really cold but it's been very mild for the time of year recently."

She nodded, looking at the building down the road with a wrinkled brow. "We're going to have to get that fire out pretty fast or the whole place will go up." She looked at her companion. "What do you think, cold ki?" Chou nodded.

"That should work. I'll keep guard, you deal with the fire." They turned as the sirens that had been approaching suddenly got louder, another army truck slamming to a halt followed by several police vans and a couple of fire engines.
"About time," Captain Smith said grumpily.

"OK, you there, Captain, is it?" He nodded. "You get your men and all these guys to get the walking wounded back to a safe distance. Don't let the firemen near the place, if those things come out they'll be dead in seconds. We'll sort out the fire. Come on, we don't have a lot of time, people are already dead, I'd prefer to stop that happening any more." Everyone looked at her, although the four magical girls had already started heading towards the carnage. "Move!" she snapped, a tone of command striking the military men so strongly that two of them involuntarily saluted before looking embarrassed.

She and Chou ran off at remarkably high speed toward Harrods, making everyone but the Japanese visitors stop and stare as they simply jumped straight up and neatly in through the hole in the second floor wall. After a moment Jack and his colleagues turned and followed the magical girls who were carefully looking for survivors under the rubble. Lieutenant Stross stopped and watched in shock as the short brunette, Aiko, reached down and with little effort lifted a small car back onto it's wheels, peering inside before waving him over. "Hey, you, give me a hand, there's someone alive in here." He dashed over, watching as the girl ripped the twisted door off it's hinges with one hand while stabilising the car with the other.

"Bloody hell," he muttered to himself, before carefully helping the elderly woman who had been trapped in the wreckage out onto the street. She mumbled something in a daze.

"Doesn't look like much more than a concussion," Aiko said, inspecting the woman carefully. "Get her to safety and come back, I'll keep looking." He nodded, still slightly shocked, privately deciding that this girl was very dangerous indeed if she could tear doors off cars with her bare hands. Gently picking the old woman up he jogged back to the truck.

"Where are the ambulances?" he asked curiously, arriving at the little group around the rear of the vehicle. Captain Smith had apparently been arguing with his counterpart from the other EOD team. He was in the process of showing him the playback of what happened when they arrived, making the other man go a funny colour. The MoD man Spence was talking to a senior metropolitan police commander, who looked very angry about something, while the MI5 fellow listened with a neutral expression. Adams looked around then shrugged.

"Apparently the coppers decided it was too dangerous to let them through. Probably not a completely stupid call, but it's a bit of a problem. That Spence guy is getting pissy about it, but the commander over there is being difficult. He keeps insisting that this is their job as there isn't a bomb, so we should push off." Agent Naito stepped forward.

"It's not really my place, I'm only here as an observer, but I would suggest that you take the wounded into that restaurant over there where it's warm and wait for Yori and Chou. They are exceptionally good at healing, I'm sure they can do a better job than a fleet of non-existent ambulances." Lieutenant Stross looked at him for a moment then exchanged glances with Walton and Adams, who looked blank.

"OK, I guess that's better that leaving them outside. Grab those emergency blankets and give me a hand, will you, Sergeant? We have a restaurant to commandeer." Adams nodded, following the anti-terrorist man turned emergency medic into the abandoned Greek restaurant. Stross carefully put the old woman in a chair, then wrapped a crinkling foil blanket around her. She stared around in a slight daze then looked up at him.

"Thank you, young man. Is there any chance of a cup of tea?" He grinned. A very British response to practically anything.
"Hey, Adams, see if you can find a kettle and put it on, will you?" The sergeant nodded, smiling, heading for the kitchen.

"I've got to get back to work, OK?" Stross asked the old woman. She smiled.

"That's fine, young man. Thank you. I'll be right as rain once I get some tea in me." He chuckled, leaving the restaurant and heading back to Aiko, who was waving impatiently at him from beside another vehicle. As he was on his way back there was a very loud hissing noise from the burning building, clouds of steam shooting out of every opening on the front. The temperature in the street noticeably dropped for a few seconds as the flames rapidly diminished then went out, clouds of smoke and steam pouring from the building.

"What was that?" Stross asked, walking up to Aiko who was looking at the building. She shrugged.

"Yori did something impossible again. She does that a lot." He looked at her with a bemused expression.

"From where I'm standing this is all impossible," he replied. She laughed.

"Don't worry, you'll get used to it." She pointed to a car underneath another, larger vehicle. "There's two people in that one, unconscious but more or less intact. I'll lift the van out of the way, you get them out, OK? You should be able to pull them out the side window, I doubt the doors open any more." He stared at her for a moment, then wordlessly nodded, wondering if she really could lift a couple of tons of van off the ground.

As it turned out, she could, although it was obviously not effortless. "Right, get on with it, this thing is heavy," she said, sweating a little. After a moment's incredulity he shook himself and dropped to his knees, reaching in through the smashed side window of the Ford. The man inside had his seat-belt on, which he dealt with using his combat knife, then carefully pulled the fellow out onto the road. Going back for the woman in the passenger seat he again cut the belt, having to climb half-inside the car to get at her, before backing out pulling her with him. Once they were all clear, he nodded to Aiko, who dropped the van with a crash and a sigh of relief.

"This is more Yori's thing, lifting enormously heavy stuff. She could pick this up with one hand and not even notice," the girl said, massaging her fingers. She examined the two people they'd recovered from the vehicle with a frown. "Crap. That's worse than I thought," she commented, looking at the woman who clearly had a badly broken leg. "OK, I'm going to have to carry her. You take him, he looks pretty much undamaged." They took the two casualties back to the restaurant, placing them on the floor once a few tables had been pushed to the side. The room was filling up, between them all four teams had recovered some twenty people so far. Sergeant Adams was busily handing out emergency blankets and tea to the conscious survivors who looked very shell-shocked. A couple of the less injured ones were helping. Once more they headed out. Shortly afterwards Yori and Chou dropped lightly to the street, looking around then walking over to Aiko. The other three magical girls saw them and came over, followed by the curious tactical team.

"We got the fires out and have managed to get some temporary wards up trapping the demons in the basement," Yori said with satisfaction. "Next we need to find any people still trapped inside and get them out." Her face fell a little. "There are quite a few people in there beyond help. I wish I could bring that bastard of a mage back so I could kill him again. Much more slowly this time." The look on her face made the four soldiers extremely uncomfortable, for a moment it reminded them of the demon only vastly more dangerous. A second later she smiled.

"How's it going out here?"
"We've rescued, um, twenty-one people?" Aiko said, looking at her team-mates.

"Twenty-two," Tamiko corrected after a moment's thought.

"Good. As far as we can tell there are about another thirty or so trapped out here under the rubble. There's about twenty more inside. We're going to have to pick up the pace, some of them are bleeding or have internal injuries, we need to get to them first or it will be too late." She turned to Chou. "I'll take the inside of the building, you help out here, will you?" The blonde indicated she would.

"OK. Let's see. You, Lieutenant Andrews, was it?" she asked, looking at Jack. He nodded. "Right. You come with me, the rest of you help these guys. See if you can get some of your friends over there to help rather than standing around with their fingers up their noses." She pointed back down the street to the collection of emergency vehicles, where the police commander was shouting at the MoD man, who was shouting back. She walked towards the building shaking her head. "God, it's like herding cats. This is a pretty poor excuse for an emergency response." Jack laughed a little hysterically.

"It's a very unusual emergency. We're not exactly used to demon attacks here. IRA terrorists, we can handle that no problem, but demons?" He shook his head, almost unable to believe what he was saying. She snickered.

"Point to you." He looked at his watch.

"Bloody hell, it's only been about forty-five minutes since this whole mess started. It seems much longer than that."

"Doesn't time fly when you're having fun?" Yori asked rhetorically, then laughed. He chuckled. This young woman, as crazy as the whole situation was, seemed an interesting and likeable person, not to mention very attractive in an exotic way. They went in through what used to be the front entrance of Harrods. The inside of the building was a mess, smoke damage and water from the sprinkler system had ruined everything. She looked around. "What a mess. This is going to be cost a bit to repair." He nodded. "Let's get to it. There are a dozen or so people upstairs, from what I can tell they're basically unharmed, I guess they must have barricaded themselves in somewhere. They can wait." She looked slowly around, then pointed. "Back there is someone who's quite badly injured. We need to deal with them first." Andrews looked at her with astonishment.

"How the hell do you know all that?" he asked. She smiled.

"That part isn't even magic, it's very advanced martial arts." They began pushing through the toppled displays and goods, heading for the rear of the ground floor. "When you get to a high enough ability level you start to be able to use something called ki, which is basically life energy. You can do all sorts of interesting things with it. If you are good enough you can actually sense it from a distance, which lets you get a pretty good reading on living things. Chou and I are very good indeed with ki." He looked at her with mixed respect and disbelief. She noticed, smiling. "I know it sounds a bit weird from your point of view. Even back home in Japan a lot of people don't believe it. It's true, though." They came to a point where part of the floor above had collapsed, blocking their path.

"We'd need a cutting torch to get through all this crap," Jack commented, looking at the concrete and steel reinforcements tangled on the floor. Yori looked amused.

"Well, no, not really." She held out her hand and a couple of feet of glowing purple energy sword appeared. He gaped, taking a step back.
"Fucking hell." Awestruck he watched as she easily carved away the obstruction, the energy blade passing through the various construction materials as if they were tissue-paper. The edges of the cuts glowed yellow-hot for a second after the blade passed through them, cooling much faster than seemed natural. Within a few seconds she had cleared a path. The blade vanished. She glanced at him, grinning at the look on his face.

"That's extremely advanced ki usage."

"It's bloody terrifying." Being in the profession he was, he easily pictured how effective a close-quarters weapon that energy projection would make, shuddering a little at the thought. She seemed pleased, which made him even more worried. This girl was off-the-scale lethal in his opinion.

"Come on, she's just over there, a few metres away." Sure enough, once they gently lifted a display stand of microwave ovens from the ground, a woman in her late twenties was revealed lying on the ground. Her arm was bent in entirely the wrong direction while a large cut on her head was sluggishly leaking blood.

"That looks very bad," Lieutenant Andrews said with worry in his voice. The Japanese girl knelt next to the young woman. Placing her hands on the woman's head where they began glowing, she moved them around slowly for about thirty seconds. When she removed them the gash on the patients head was completely gone. The soldier stared in disbelief. "That's... impossible," he muttered. She shook her head, concentrating on the woman in front of her.

"No, it's just quite difficult. Here, hold her arm like this." After a moment Jack knelt down and did as requested. Once more the glow came and went after a few seconds, the arm now looking normal. She passed glowing hands over the woman's torso, mumbling to herself.

"Hmm. Intestines good, stomach... No damage to the liver, kidneys, heart. Ah. Broken rib, punctured lung." She paused for a few seconds, the glow brightening a little. "OK, that's done. Nothing else wrong, but she's lost about half a litre of blood. Can't do much about that right now except push the marrow to make it a bit faster. Done. I can do more later when we have time." Glancing at him and the stunned expression on his face she smiled. "We're also very good at healing. It comes in handy if you're hunting demons."

"I can imagine," he replied faintly. A glowing hand touched the woman on the head again and her eyes slowly opened.

She looked around, wondering what was going on, before focussing on the Japanese girl bending over her with a look of calm competence, then at the large man in military gear behind her. "What happened?" she asked, feeling her head. She had a faint memory of something hitting it, but except for a slight headache felt nothing out of the ordinary.

"There was an accident," the girl said reassuringly. "You're fine now. I'm sorry about this, but my friend here and I need to help other people. If you just head straight in that direction the front door is right there, there will be people outside who can explain everything. Is that OK?" She nodded, wondering what was happening. Slowly getting to her feet with the help of the large soldier she looked around at the devastated shop floor, then gasped.

"What happened?" she asked, horrified.

"Just go outside, someone will explain everything." The girl gently urged her in the direction of the exit. She walked off in a slight daze.

Yori watched her for a moment, then satisfied she was going in the right direction, turned to the lieutenant. "Good. One down, eighteen to go. Next one is in the far right corner." They headed off through the destroyed shop. Over the next twenty minutes Yori took them all over the building, healing half a dozen serious injuries, at least two of which in Jack's opinion would have been fatal within an hour. He guided several people out of the building while she was healing others, finally meeting her on the top floor. "There's, um, eleven people in the room back there, and two more in what I guess must be an office. You go and get the back room, OK? I'll deal with the office, one of the people in it feels like they have something wrong with them." The lieutenant nodded, heading off in the indicated direction. Getting turned around in the various corridors in the non-public area of the building he finally found a locked door. Knocking on it he waited.

There was no response so he knocked again, harder. "Hey! Open up." He heard footsteps on the other side of the door.

"Is it gone?" a woman's voice asked tremulously.

"Yes. I'm with the Army, we're evacuating the building. Open up, please." After several seconds the lock clicked and the door opened. A middle-aged Indian woman peered up at him, then down the dark corridor lit by emergency lighting.

"Are you sure it's gone?" she asked, looking around nervously. He smiled at her reassuringly.

"Yes, everything is under control. Come on, we need to get outside." She nodded, turning to call back into the room. Several more people came out from under desks and in cupboards. Eventually he counted eleven just as Yori had said. "Is that everyone?" he asked the woman. She nodded. "OK, let's go. Follow me." Taking the lead he headed back to the stairs where he and the Japanese impossibility had parted ways. When he got there he found her talking to a young woman, perhaps early twenties, who was clinging to an older man who looked upset. She looked up as he came around the corner.

"Good work, Lieutenant," she said. "This is Andrea and her boss Henry. He had a bit of a heart attack. I healed it, but she's worried he can't deal with the stairs." He nodded. "I'll carry him down, now you're here. Andrea, could you go with the lieutenant, please?" She gently separated the two. Jack watched as the girl picked up the man who must have outweighed her at least two to one with no effort at all, shaking his head in amazement. The people with him stared incredulously. "OK, let's get everyone outside."

Soon they were standing in the street, squinting in the winter sunshine. Yori put Henry down, supporting him as he wobbled. "Go over there where the trucks are," she pointed. "Get a cup of tea. I'll come and have another look at you when we're finished, OK?" He nodded, still stunned by the last hour or so, then slowly walked off in the indicated direction with his assistant helping him. The Japanese girl watched them for a moment, then turned to Andrews. "Good, that's everyone out of the building who's still alive. I counted forty-three bodies in there, though." She looked unhappy. He thought for a moment.

"That agrees with my count."

"Damn. This is the worst one yet." They walked in the direction of Chou, who was holding a truck in the air while Aiko and Fumiko pulled a casualty from under it.

"So there are four more of these things still out there?" She nodded, scowling.

"Yes. Each device is targeted on a single demon, but as we've seen it's possible for more than one to come through. The idea was that they'd activate on timers, then when their target demon was moving fast open a portal directly in front of it so it basically ran through before it had a chance to stop. The portals only last a few seconds but that's obviously enough time for another one to come through behind the target one."

"And these demons then just attack anyone in sight."

"Pretty much. They're extremely aggressive, permanently hungry, and pretty stupid. Not to mention they have the most incredible regeneration ability I've ever seen. The only way to kill one for sure it to vaporise at least fifty percent of it's body mass including the head in one shot. Blowing it up isn't enough, it can rebuild itself from the bits if there's anything left. It might take a while if you blasted it completely to pieces, but even there it would probably survive. Plus it would be in an absolutely amazingly bad mood afterwards and they're always pretty angry at the best of times."
She looked up at him, her five foot four or so contrasting with his six foot five. "As you saw, grenades just piss them off. They barely notice small arms."
"He nodded with a grim expression.

"Thanks for saving my life, by the way." The girl chuckled.

"Don't worry about it. It's what we do."

"Still, I'm quite attached to it, so thanks." She looked amused. Something he'd been wondering about came back to him and he asked. "When you zapped it the first time, why didn't you aim to kill it?"
She sighed.

"I could easily wind up the power to vaporise the thing. Hell, I could vaporise that entire building in a pinch." She jerked her thumb over her shoulder at the badly damaged Harrods. He stared, appalled, but also somehow sure that if anything she was downplaying her abilities. "But there were too many people too close to it, you, your team, and a couple of casualties in the vehicles around it. I couldn't take the chance the shockwave would hurt anyone. I disabled it so you could escape, but anything more just wasn't safe at the time." He nodded in understanding.

"Fair enough." They arrived at Chou's position as she carefully lowered several tons of vehicle to the ground.

"How's it going?" Yori asked her partner. The blonde looked up at her from where she was examining the young man the others had recovered from the crushed car under the truck. He was missing several fingers on his left hand, the lieutenant noticed uneasily, as well as having some obvious crush injuries to his legs. She smiled slightly.

"There's one person still trapped under the stones, in a car, but she feels fairly unhurt. We've rescued forty-seven people, including this man, some of them are quite badly injured. I've stabilised everyone, but we're going to have to heal them properly later, I didn't have time to do much more than that. There are some nasty burns as well as lots of blunt-force trauma, and at least three amputations."
"Yori looked irritated and relieved in equal measure.

"OK. Good work. Regenerating limbs is a pain, we can leave them until last." She squatted down and helped the blonde heal the patient on the ground, her purple energy contrasting with the other woman's golden colour in a way that made Jack and the other soldiers stare. "He's stable. The legs are OK now, I got the intestinal rupture as well. We can do the fingers when we get a moment. You want to wake him up?" Chou nodded, golden light flaring around her hands as she touched him. Moments later the young man twitched, raising his head and looking around wide-eyed.

"What the fuck happened?" he yelped, staring wildly around at them. "Where is that thing? What is that thing?"
"Chou gently helped him to sit up.

"Don't worry, everything is under control. Calm down. These men are going to help you back to a place where you can rest, all right?” Her calm voice seemed to settle him down a bit. Looking at her he nodded, then as he raised his hands he noticed the damage to his left one. Staring in horror, he went green, then began to scream. Chou's hand whipped out, touching him on the head, a flash of light coming from her fingers, then he relaxed so suddenly he nearly collapsed again. "Don't worry about your hand, we'll fix it. But right now we have to rescue some more people, OK?" He nodded drunkenly, giggling slightly. It looked like he was under the influence of a particularly good tranquilliser. Phil and Jack exchanged glances, then helped him to his feet.

"What did you do?" Phil asked curiously. She smiled.

"He was panicking, so I temporarily boosted the production of endorphins in his brain quite a lot. That should keep him happy for ten minutes or so, until you can get him back and explain things to him." She glanced at the man who was looking around with a peculiar expression. "You'd better hurry, it wears off quite fast and I don't want to keep doing it, it's not good for him." Phil carefully guided the man back down the road. Chou turned to Yori.

"Let's get this last survivor out, then we can heal anything important before we deal with those demons." The shorter girl nodded as they all headed to a large pile of stones and bricks that had originally been a large part of the front of Harrods. There were one or two cars partially visible under it, badly crushed, with signs of having been torn open to extract the occupants. One of them looked like the demon had done it which suggested the results had been unpleasant, while the other was clearly the work of one of the magical girls. Chou and Yori both stopped and inspected the pile.

"Right in the middle," Yori sighed. Chou nodded.

"Yes. I expect that a larger vehicle is holding up the rubble and protecting a smaller one or it would have been crushed." She concentrated. "It's definitely a woman. She's still conscious but very scared. Poor thing. We're going to have to be careful, this pile doesn't look very stable." All six magical girls conferred for a moment in Japanese, the three soldiers watching and wondering what they were saying, before they reached a consensus. Yori and Chou both went up to the pile, looking at it carefully, before picking the right point, then manifested energy blades again. The two tactical team members who hadn't seen this yet stared. The two young women began slowly cutting into the larger chunks of rubble, while the four from the other group removed the pieces they sliced out, carrying tons of stonework with little effort.

After a few minutes they slowed down, studying the pile before making any changes. It shifted suddenly with a crunching noise and everyone froze, then Yori jumped into the hole they'd made and supported the side that was about to collapse. "I'll hold this in place." Chou nodded, changing direction and directing the other girls to hold or move various items of debris. Eventually a hole into the pile was uncovered. Chou took up the load of the unstable rubble while Yori disappeared into the hole they'd made, reappearing a few minutes later after some nasty grinding noises, gently pulling a very dusty policewoman who was clinging to her with a grip of steel.

WPC Janet Oakley of the London Metropolitan Police wasn't someone given to fear, in fact most people who knew her would have said she was basically fearless. She'd confronted drunks armed with beer bottles, football hooligans waving knives and clubs, even a rare firearm once, and in every case had dealt with the situation calmly and professionally. But right now, squeezed into a tiny space in the back of what was left of her police car, buried under who knew how much rubble, she was absolutely terrified.

Dust covered everything, little particles of concrete in her eyes and up her nose making her sneeze occasionally, hurting her chest which was compressed almost to the point of being unable to breath under the weight of the roof of the car, which had collapsed almost to the point of crushing her but by some miracle hadn't gone that extra inch. She could barely move, one hand was free and she could wiggle her feet, for all the good that did her. She was pretty sure she was going to die.

It was almost pitch-black under the rubble, small shafts of sunlight penetrating in one or two places. She could smell blood, smoke, broken masonry, diesel fuel, petrol, and her own fear. A little surprised she had maintained control of her own bladder, she looked around as much as she could while being almost unable to move her head. She'd never like confined spaces, now she knew why. 'If I get out of this I'm never going on the underground again as long as I live,' she thought with mild hysteria. 'Not that it seems likely that I will.'

Trying to work out what had happened took her mind off her precarious position for a while. She'd been driving slowly down Brampton Road, just passing Harrods, when suddenly hundreds of people started pouring out of the entrance in a panic. Stopping to avoid hitting a man who dashed right out into the traffic she'd stared in amazement before she heard the screams. People on the road had been pointing up, yelling and staring, then there was an enormous crash. Not an explosion, more like a huge impact, she thought. A thing, there was no better word for it, had dropped to the road just in front of her, crushing a Honda Civic as it landed on it, and as she was staring in horrified disbelief it had been followed by a rain of masonry. She'd just had time to take off her seatbelt and dive into the back seat before the car was buried in falling bricks. She remembered screaming in pain before everything went black for an indeterminate amount of time.

When she woke up her head ached fiercely, which actually reassured her, it was proof she was still alive. Attempting to move, though, had quickly brought home the fact that she was hardly free and clear. After a short period of panic she had managed to calm herself down with force of will, but as time dragged on and it became slowly more difficult to breath hope was fading and she was becoming more and more scared. Listening to her own heart-beats thundering in her ears she tried to breath slowly and evenly, staving off the wild emotions that threatened to overwhelm her. It wasn't easy.

Some while ago she had heard a number of muffled but loud thumps that sounded like explosions of some sort, accompanied by angry roars and screams like something out of a film. A pause, then a screeching sound unlike anything she'd ever heard, followed by another blast, some more roaring, then silence. She had absolutely no idea what it all meant. Her imagination ran wild. Was it some sort of terrorist attack? Invasion from outer space? The end of the world? None of these seemed to fit. She had no idea how much time had passed since it went quiet, if could have been minutes or hours, since there were no real indicators. She had tried a couple of times to see the clock on the dashboard but had no luck, she didn't even know if it was working. The interior light had gone out some time ago which made her think the battery had probably been damaged.

Attempting to relax she closed her eyes, counting breaths for lack of anything else to do. She could feel little trickles of blood running down her forehead from tiny cuts caused by flying glass, dripping off her left ear, which was remarkably annoying. Pushing the idea of rescue to the back of her mind she concentrated on just surviving the moment. At least she didn't think she was injured, or if she was, it was minor, nothing worse than a lot of small cuts. Janet had gotten to three hundred and fifty breaths for the second time, having lost count once, when she heard a crunching noise from somewhere behind her head. She froze, listening intently. Was the rubble shifting? She knew full well that the amount of masonry on top of the car should have crushed it flat, it was only the box van next to her holding some of the weight that had saved her life. If it shifted...

The noise came again, closer, accompanied by a faint hum, along with a hissing sound. Trying to twist around to see she found it impossible. Once more the noise came, then a painfully bright light shone through the rear window, or more accurately where it had once been. Her heart jumped as she realised that she might actually live.

She tried to call out but found her throat so dry because of the stone dust that only a faint croak came to her lips. Trying again produced the same result and she clenched her fist in sudden anger. Slight sounds from behind her were followed unexpectedly by a female voice, rich with complex harmonics and a faint accent, which said, "Hello. I'm Yori. Let's get you out of there." She suddenly found herself crying in relief.

"Thank you, thank you," she said, tears running through the dust on her face. A hand gripped her shoulder, squeezing it comfortably for a moment. The woman behind her somehow managed to wiggle through the back window, her face suddenly appearing upside down above Janet. "Hi," the woman, Yori, younger than she expected and apparently Japanese, said, grinning at her.

"Hi," Janet whispered, coughing. She tried to smile back. Yori inspected her and the surroundings, then looked back.

"What's your name?"

"Janet. Janet Oakley." Her voice was slightly stronger this time.

"Hello, Janet. You're with the police, by the looks of it." Janet nodded.

"Yes, have been for eight years." She licked her parched lips. Yori produced a bottle of water with a Japanese label, unscrewing the top.

"Here." She poured a little into Janet's mouth. The trapped woman swallowed. She poured a little more. "Better?"

"Thanks. Yes." Putting the bottle away she smiled again.

"OK, I'm going to get you out now. From what I can see the roof of the car is pinning your hips and chest against the seat. I'll push it up, then you pull yourself out, onto the rear window shelf and out the window, all right?" Janet stared. How was the girl going to do what she'd described? She didn't seem to have any rescue equipment. For that matter, her silk clothes weren't exactly the sort of thing search and rescue workers normally wore.

The girl pulled herself further inside the car, somehow folding herself into an amazingly tight space next to Janet's head. Shifting around a little she put her hands on the roof, moving them until she was satisfied with their position, then simply pushed. Janet's eyes widened as the roof steadily rose with a chorus of crunches and grinding sounds as the tons of masonry and metal on top of it was lifted. She could feel the seat collapsing under the girl in reaction to the impossibly heavy load she was lifting with ease. Staring in disbelief she almost didn't notice when the weight pinning her in place disappeared. "How's that?" Yori asked. "Can you move yet?" Janet twitched in surprise, then tried to extract herself, wriggling backwards.

"My left leg is still stuck. I can't move it." The Japanese girl twisted her head to look, nodding after a moment.

"OK, I see it, the passenger seat has sort of come apart and it's wrapped over your leg. I'm going to have to cut the frame. Don't move for a moment, I don't want to hurt you by accident." She shifted around to support the weight of the roof on her back, then stretched out her left hand. Janet hissed in shock as two feet of thin purple energy suddenly sprouted from her palm illuminating the inside of the destroyed car with a weird light.

"Holy shit!" she yelped, twitching away from it, she could feel heat radiating from the thing that looked for all the world like a special effect from the movies.

"Don't worry, I won't hurt you, but you have to stay still for me, OK?" the girl said. Janet nodded slightly, still staring. Yori turned her head to check where she was cutting, then frowned slightly. The energy beam thinned down to a hair-thin thread. Carefully manipulating it she waved the tip through the seat, which cleanly separated into several pieces. Abruptly the obstruction that was holding the policewoman in place vanished.

"I'm free, I think," Janet said. Yori nodded, looking satisfied and turning the energy beam off.

"Right, back to the plan. See if you can pull yourself out the back window." With some struggling Janet managed to get her upper body onto the parcel shelf, her head out the hole where the window had been, feeling little crystals of shattered safety glass cut into her back as she moved. She winced but kept going. Finally, she found herself sliding down the boot of the car. Once her legs were outside the vehicle Yori scrambled after her. As soon as she released the force holding the rubble up the car groaned and began to steadily crush down to a fraction of it's original height, something that would clearly have been fatal if she'd still been trapped. Yori slid down beside her.

"So, ready to leave?" she asked, grinning at Janet. The woman stared for a moment, then threw her arms around her rescuer.

"Yes, please," she mumbled, holding the girl tightly. Yori laughed gently. Going first she retreated back down the tunnel that had been made in the debris pile, Janet following closely behind her, her hand holding the Japanese girl's as tightly as she could manage. After mere seconds they emerged into daylight. Yori stood, pulling Janet to her feet and nodding to a taller blonde girl, also Japanese, who seemed to be supporting the weight of most of the pile of stonework, then helped her walk slowly down the street towards a collection of emergency vehicles. Behind them there was a rumbling crash as the blonde jumped out of the hole and allowed the debris to seek it's own equilibrium. The policewoman looked around, aghast, at the damage, which looked like the aftermath of a particularly large bomb aside from there being no blown out windows in the buildings. Looking over her shoulder she stared at the remains of Harrods.

"It's a bit of a mess," Yori said. She followed the woman's gaze. "Was it a good shop?" she asked curiously.

Janet almost laughed. "It was very expensive." She noticed there were four large men in military clothing keeping pace with them, talking to several more young women, all of whom looked Japanese and seemed to have had trouble dressing appropriately for the weather. She stared for a moment. Yori snickered.

"Friends of mine. It's a long story."

"Aren't they cold?" Janet asked, unable to think of anything more worthwhile to say. The black-haired girl shrugged slightly.

"It's a lot warmer here than in Tokyo, so they're probably happy about that." Trembling from the after-effects of adrenaline, Janet suddenly found her legs going weak, slumping a little. "Whoops. OK, don't worry." She suddenly found herself being picked up, the girl carrying her effortlessly. Putting her arms around her rescuer's neck after the initial surprise, the policewoman gave in to the exhaustion that hit her and passed out.

She came around a few minutes later to find herself sitting in a chair, Yori and the blonde woman looking at her. "Ah, back with us. How do you feel?" Janet looked around, then down at herself.
"Very dirty. Other than that, not bad. My head hurts though." The blonde woman nodded, smiling gently at her, then reached out and put her hand on top of her head. A sudden wave of relaxation flowed through her, taking with it the pain.

"How's that?" the blonde asked.

"Much better, thanks." Janet looked at the woman curiously. "What did you do?"

"Just released some low-level endorphins, enough to deal with the pain for a moment, then lowered your blood pressure a little. When the endorphins wear off in a little while the pain should be gone." She stared at the blonde for a moment, then simply nodded, there didn't seem to be any other good response. The blonde smiled. "I'm Chou. Would you like some tea?" She nodded wordlessly again. "All right." Turning she waved to a man in fatigues on the other side of the room. "Sergeant Adams? Could we have some tea over here, please?" He waved back, heading in their direction with a stainless steel pot of tea and several cups.

"Here you go, miss," he said, putting a cup on the table next to her and filling it with tea. "I'm afraid we've run out of milk but there's some sugar there." Nodding thanks, Janet dropped a couple of sugar-cubes into her tea and stirred it with a spoon she picked off the table, noticing consciously for the first time that they appeared to be in a restaurant of some type. Sipping her tea she looked around. There were at least fifty people sitting or lying around the room, a dozen or so lying on the floor in the middle of the room where some tables had been removed to clear a space. Most of them looked like they'd been involved in a battle of some sort, blood-stained clothes being fairly common. She assumed these were survivors from whatever had happened. Looking up at Yori she asked, "What was that thing?" wondering for a second whether the girl would ask, 'What thing?'. Instead she looked grim.

"A demon. There's two of them, trapped in a basement under that shop." Janet stared, tea forgotten for the moment.

"A demon?" she asked incredulously. Yori nodded unhappily.

"I'm afraid so. It's a long story. The very short version is that they're here due to a left-over bit of magical terrorism. Chou and I, and the other girls, are specialists from Japan helping your lot deal with it. We have a lot of experience in demon attacks. Luckily we're also pretty good at healing. There were a lot of injured people and the ambulances have been delayed by your police, they seem to be having difficulty with the idea of a demon attack." Janet shook her head slowly, she was having difficulty with the idea. A through struck her.

"Did anyone die?" Yori glanced at Chou, both of them suddenly expressionless. Janet's stomach felt like it was in free-fall.

"I'm afraid so."

"How many?" She didn't really want to know but she had to ask. Both women were silent for a moment.

"So far, about sixty-five that we know of." The answer made the policewoman go white, closing her eyes in shock.

"Sixty-five people?" Yori nodded sadly.

"I wish we could have got here earlier, but no one had any idea where the device that brought that thing here was. We've been looking for them for months." Janet looked up at the words, paling again. "Yes, there are more. Six got out, we've found two. We caught one before it activated, but this one triggered before we could find it." A call from one of the other girls attracted her attention and she looked over, then waved. "Sorry, I have to go. Drink your tea and relax, try to anyway, OK?" She waited for the nod then turned away, Chou going with her. Both young women talked to the one who had called them over, a short brunette who looked scarilly competent to Janet, before walking over to group of people lying on the floor. They conferred quietly about the old man on the end then knelt down beside him.

Janet's eyes widened as their hands began glowing softly, Yori's in purple and Chou's golden. They spent a few minutes slowly running them over the man's body, stopping occasionally, before sitting back looking pleased. He sat up, staring at them, then down at himself. The two girls moved to the next patient while behind them the other girl started talking to the man. WPC Oakley shook her head in amazed respect, then went back to her tea, watching with interest. After a few minutes she finally realised that all the little cuts from the glass crumbs had disappeared.

"This one has a badly crushed left foot, second degree burns on his back and side, and he did have some broken ribs, but I did those earlier." Chou ran her hands over the man lying on the floor while Yori nodded. Jack watched from a chair near them, sipping some tea. He was quite tired, these girls had been running his entire squad off their feet, darting back and forth on the road with boundless energy. None of them looked at all worn out, although they were all quite dusty. "You do the burns, you're better at things like that, I'll do the foot." Yori nodded again, carefully removing the man's scorched shirt and coat. A flash of purple came when she made a small energy blade and cut his sleeve from wrist to shoulder, missing the skin but cleanly severing the cloth. She put glowing hands on his bare torso, slowly moving them from waist to arm-pit, leaving pristine skin behind. Jack shook his head in awed respect.

"That's got to be the most incredible thing I've ever seen," his friend and colleague said from beside him in a low voice. He glanced at him then nodded. "How the hell is she doing that?"

"Apparently, it's a mix of magic and something called ki." He looked at Phil, shrugging helplessly. "I don't have any better explanation. I guess she'd know if anyone would." Lieutenant Stross kept watching, shaking his head in wonder.

"Magic? Before about two hours ago I'd have said it was impossible. Then all this happened. I keep looking around for a blue police box or something." Jack snorted with amusement.

"I'm damn glad there isn't a blue police box. From what I can remember of that show whenever the box turned up the soldiers tended to start dying." His colleague laughed quietly.

"True. They were awfully hard on the military support. These girls seem to want to keep everyone alive."

"I'm OK with that to be honest." He sipped his tea again. "Are that MoD bloke and that commander from the Met still shouting at each other?" Phil glanced at him.

"They were about ten minutes ago. It's a bloody shambles. Everyone wants to take control of this operation but no-one wants to accept responsibility. In the mean time the various services are just wandering around wondering what to do. I've never seen anything like it, these people are supposed to be professionals for god's sake!" He shook his head in disgust. "The Met won't let the ambulances through, the MoD keeps trying to classify everything, the fire and rescue people are looking confused, and that MI5 chap just smiles. He seems to be enjoying himself for some fucked-up reason. The only people who seem to have any idea what to do are these girls and their handler, or observer or whatever he is." The second lieutenant waved his hand at Agent Naito who was sitting quietly at the side of the room sipping tea and watching the magical girls work.

"They'll get their act together sooner or later and then there's going to be hell to pay, I expect. A major London landmark has been pretty much destroyed, dozens of people are dead and more hurt, not to mention the only people with a clue what to do are representatives of a foreign government." Phil watched the girls as they rolled the man onto his side, handling him with extreme care, then Yori began erasing the burns on his back. Both of them winced at the sight of the charred flesh, blood and fluids leaking through the cracked skin, which quickly became unblemished in a manner that still astounded them. "Thank god they do know what to do, I hate to think what would have happened if those things had kept going. We certainly couldn't stop them with the weapons we have in the truck and by the time we could get something suitable the death toll would have been in the hundreds at least." Jack nodded sombrely.

"I really thought I was for it then. A bit of a relief when she showed up and handed the thing it's arse." His friend smiled slightly.

"I can imagine. I thought you'd had it as well. Glad you lived, you still owe me fifty quid." They exchanged looks and snickered a little.

"I'm amazed the press hasn't turned up yet and stuck their noses in." Phil nodded knowingly.

"The coppers are probably taking out their frustrations by making sure everyone else has a shit day as well. It won't last, one of the tabloids is bound to get someone past the blockade sooner or later, the sneaky sods." He seemed almost respectful. "Those guys will do anything for a story."

The man on the floor was now to the naked eye completely undamaged. Checking him over once more both girls looked satisfied, then Yori did something that made him regain consciousness. She passed him over to one of her skimpily dressed friends, who began explaining the situation while guiding him to a chair and a waiting cup of tea, before the two young women moved to the next patient. Jack followed the newly healed man with his eyes then sighed a little regretfully. "I wish we'd had someone like them on some of the operations we've been on over the years. We'd have more friends still alive." Phil nodded, then smiled slightly.

"But women aren't allowed in front-line combat operations in the British army." Jack chuckled.

"Fancy mentioning that to either of them?" His friend looked at him as if he was mad.

"No fucking chance of that. After what I've seen all of them do today, as far as I'm concerned they can do any damn thing they want, with my blessings. I'm not convinced an entire platoon could do more than annoy them in any case. Good thing they're the good guys. Or girls."

"They're very good, in fact. Some of the best people I have ever met." Both experienced soldiers jumped violently, reaching for their weapons, before recognising the voice of Agent Naito who had somehow ended up sitting next to them without either of them noticing. They exchanged a glance.

"Are all of you Japanese people fucking ninjas or something?" Phil said, adrenaline making his voice harsher than he intended. The other man didn't seem insulted. Naito grinned, shaking his head.

"No, but some of us have had some slightly unconventional training. Just minor tricks, really, compared to what our young friends over there can do, but it's sometimes useful. Plus it can be amusing." Jack laughed, Phil joining in after a moment.
Lieutenant Andrews looked at the Japanese man with curiosity. "So, who are they, anyway? Where did they come from, how did they learn to do what they do?" Naito smiled and shrugged.

"Honestly?" They nodded. "I have no idea." Both men stared. "It's true. Oh, I'm fairly sure someone in my government knows more than I do, it's practically certain to be honest, but whether anyone knows the complete story... With Yori involved, it's quite likely that they don't. She and her friend are something of an enigma. We have a considerably number of magical girls active in Japan currently, more than fifty that we know of just in Tokyo, but a lot of them are very hard to find out real information on. Magic makes that sort of thing extremely difficult at the best of times, not to mention that they tend to look out for each other even if they don't like each other. The entire magical community tends to be fairly protective of it's own." He smiled as the two soldiers exchanged glances.

"Yori and Chou are by far the most difficult to look into. They turned up out of nowhere about two, perhaps three years ago, quickly becoming a force to be reckoned with. Both of them seem to have a driving need to protect everyone as much as they can from anything dangerous, including overenthusiastic magical girls. Yori is very hard on the ones that put the public in danger, which regrettably sometimes happens. The girl is also very irritated by damage to property both public and private. More than once she's intervened to stop a fight and made all the participants clear up after themselves and apologise to the locals. It's very funny to watch. She can practically make them stand to attention just by glaring at them. Quite a force of personality, in fact she's damn near a force of nature. Chou is much quieter about it but at least as intimidating when she wants to be." He shuddered a little, apparently remembering something. "Trust me, you do not want to make either one of them angry. It takes a lot, but the results are... well, even men in your profession would have nightmares for years, I assure you." The British men listened with interest, studying the two women as they worked.

"Do you have a lot of incidents like this in Japan, sir?" Phil asked. "If so, I'm not sure I want to visit." Agent Naito smiled a little.

"We don't have too many with such wide-spread casualties although there have been a few very unpleasant cases in the past. The number of magical girls seems to have increased over the last decade to the point that they normally manage to deal with incursions very quickly, the death toll has dropped enormously in the last few years. And before you ask, yes, they're always female, and no, I have no idea why. No-one seems to know. Or know why demons seem so attracted to the Minato ward of Tokyo which is where almost all the incursions happen. It's very odd. Yori told me once that portals are easier to generate there although she wasn't sure of the reason." Phil thought about this for a while.

"They both work out of a district in Minato, they apparently live around there although we have no information on where, what they do when they're not doing the magical girl thing, or even how they keep people from identifying them. We know the true identities of some of the girls, but those two and their four friends over there are basically impossible to find out more about, they have security methods and protocols we can only dream of. To be honest we don't have any driving need to find out. A considerable time ago it was decided that they perform such a useful service to the country as a whole that it would be disrespectful to attempt to officially investigate them. Not to mention that some of them would look unfavourably on it if we tried and no one is particularly interested in finding out what would happen then. Best case, they just leave, then we have to deal with the problems ourselves which is somewhere between very difficult and basically impossible. Worst case they actively defend themselves. That wouldn't end well for anyone."

"They strike me as some very dangerous people," Jack said, glancing at the foreign man, then back at the girls, who had moved on to their fifth case. "I mean, Yori is very friendly and all but there's something about her that reminds me of some of the more lethal combat specialists I've known over the years. Only more so." He shrugged. "It's difficult to explain." Naito looked amused, watching the two girls work as well.

"Oh, I know exactly what you mean. To be frank both of them can be absolutely terrifying. I have no doubt whatsoever that getting either one into a position where she had no choice but to seriously fight back would be the most terminally stupid thing anyone could do. Like juggling armed nuclear weapons and probably about as destructive. I also have no doubt that it would take the most amazing provocation to get to that point. They're very level-headed, calm, and competent people. I'd trust them with my life. Actually, I have trusted them with my life, Yori saved it a couple of months ago." They studied him curiously.

"The operation that rounded up the cult that's responsible for this mess was something they were heavily involved in," he explained, "in fact without them we'd never have succeeded in stopping them. Afterwards there was... a slight miss-step, I suppose you could call it, with the prisoners, which resulted in a number of shots being fired. One was aimed at my head. Yori saved me." He looked at them for a moment, smiling. "She caught the bullet."

"...What?" Phil managed after several seconds. Agent Naito nodded, enjoying himself.

"You heard me correctly. She caught the bullet. About fifteen centimetres from my face. Frightened the life out of me, I'm not ashamed to say, when she opened her hand and showed it to me. A copper-jacketed 9mm round, right there in her palm." They stared at him in disbelief then as one turned to look at the petite woman now working on her seventh patient. She clearly felt their eyes on her, looking up and smiling at them slightly, before going back to work. Both men got the impression that she knew exactly what they were talking about somehow.

"You want to know the really funny part?" They nodded.

"Another round hit her in the stomach. She didn't bother catching that one. The only thing she was annoyed about was the hole in her shirt. The bullet just flattened like it had hit a brick." This made them stare wide-eyed, then Jack laughed in a rather worried manner.

"What the hell is she, an alien or something? It sounds like something out of a movie. Proper superhero stuff." The Japanese man leaned back in his chair, picking up his tea and sipping it slowly.

"I think she's human, more or less. It can be hard to tell sometimes in Minato. She claims most of it is just very advanced martial arts plus some magic they worked out themselves. Neither one of them will go into much more detail. I didn't feel that pushing would be a good idea."

"I can see why." They all watched as Yori repaired a badly crushed forearm, then revived the owner of it, talking to her for a moment before sending her off with the auburn-haired girl from the other team. Chou came over to her having dealt with the last of their patients. They conferred for a while then approached the three men.

"Everyone with a critical medical problem or something quick to deal with has been fixed." Yori looked around the room, seeming satisfied. "There are five people with bits missing which will take more work after we sort out the demons. I'm a little uneasy about leaving them down there too long, just in case, so we're going to deal with them now before we get back to the healing. At least no one is in danger any more." She glanced at Chou for a second. "Unfortunately we didn't get here soon enough to save more people." The expression on her face was one of regret. Agent Naito looked at the two soldiers, then around at all the people sitting and talking, most of them looking surprisingly calm for the survivors of a rather shocking disaster.

"You've done much better than anyone else could have, Yori. There are a lot of people alive and well now because of you two and your friends. Don't second-guess yourself." She smiled slightly and nodded.

"Sensible advice, Agent. I still wish we could have done more." The girl sighed a little, wiping her hand over her face, momentarily looking somewhat tired and annoyed. "Damned death cults." Her blonde friend put her hand on her shoulder and she put her own over it, smiling quickly at her. "Oh well. Right, let's go and deal with those bloody demons."

"What are you going to do?" Lieutenant Stross asked curiously. "Kill them?" She looked mildly irritated, although not at him, more at the situation.

"To be honest I'd prefer not to, even under the circumstances. I don't like killing." Phil looked at her, almost angry.

"They killed a lot of people here today." She nodded.

"I know, believe me. But they're animals, basically. Around as smart as an intelligent dog in most ways. That's their nature. Punishing them for doing what they are essentially designed to do is something that I find... difficult. It doesn't achieve anything, they don't know what they did is wrong. The ones to blame are the people who brought them here and they're either dead or in jail pretty much forever." Naito looked at her for a moment.

"If a dangerous dog hurts someone it is usually destroyed. Not to punish it, but to eliminate the possibility of a repeat action." Yori sighed, sitting down beside him, while Chou stood next to her listening.

"I know, and I understand. It's just... I've killed before, and I will again, I have no doubt of that. It comes with the territory. Sometimes there's no other way. But I don't like doing it in cold blood, especially if there is an alternative."

"Is there one?" She nodded with a glance at her partner.

"Actually, yes. We can send them back where they came from. Chou and I recently worked out how to make portals with our own magic system, which took quite a lot of effort. We've got the coordinates of their world, we pulled it from the portal devices when we destroyed the large batch, just in case. So, we could spin up a portal inside the warded area and push them through." The agent considered her words, while the two soldiers looked at each other for a moment. She turned to them.

"What would you like us to do? This is your country and these are your people that got hurt or killed. Most of your authorities seem to be outside arguing rather than doing anything useful. You and your guys seem pretty sensible, though. I'm perfectly happy to let you decide. Should we throw them back, or blow them up?" Somewhat taken aback by the question, the men glanced at each other for a second or two. Eventually Jack sighed.

"You may as well send them back. It's not like they'll ever bother us again, is it? And I know what you mean about killing when it's unnecessary." Phil looked hesitant but in the end nodded.

"Shit. I suppose you're right. Send them back." Yori stood up.

"OK." Walking over to Aiko she talked to her for a moment, then waved Fumiko and Misaki over.
She returned with the two girls. "We'll go and get rid of them, then come back and finish the healing. Aiko and Tamiko are going to stay her in case anything comes up." Phil and Jack shared a glance.

"Can we watch?" Jack asked curiously. He was very interested to see what a 'portal' looked like. She grinned.

"If you want." Glancing at Naito she asked a question with her eyes. Chuckling, he nodded.

"Yes, I'd like to see as well."

"All right. Come on then, we'd better get on with it." The seven people left the restaurant, stopping outside to listen to the police commander and the MoD man who were still exchanging heated words, then walking towards the remains of Harrods. "I'm impressed. Those two have been arguing for nearly an hour now without achieving anything useful. It that normal around here?" Yori glanced enquiringly at the two soldiers. Lieutenant Andrews snickered a little.

"It can get a bit inefficient. That particular copper is kind of political, he's obviously aiming at a higher office one day, so he's always looking for some way to prove how he can take charge. He's been involved in a few high profile cases over the last few years, it's amazing how he seems to have been central to them being solved." The Japanese visitors grinned, nodding knowingly.

"I know a few like that at home," Agent Naito said with a smile.

"Oh, they're all over the place, I have no doubt. I don't know the MoD bloke, Spence or whatever, but he gives me a slightly greasy feeling. I know his type even if I don't know him. Civil service security bloke, I expect. The sort that tries to cover everything he can up just because he can. Left to him all of this would probably disappear from the public record before you could blink." The soldier shrugged as they entered the building. "Secrecy is necessary in our line of work but people like him take it to extremes. Especially where it might reflect badly on him or his political bosses. This is going to reflect badly, believe me. Which is a bit unfair, in fact, it's not like anyone could really have done much about it." Chou looked sad, glancing at him.

"Unfortunately, no, there isn't much that could have been done. Without knowing where the devices are our hands are tied. All we can do is try to get to an event like this as fast as possible and stop it getting worse."

"And you have four more to look forward to..." Phil sighed. "I don't envy you." Yori and the other girls all sighed as well, in eerie synchronism, before giggling.

"That was weird." Fumiko looked amused. Pushing open an emergency access door at the rear of the shop floor Yori waved everyone through.

"Down here." She headed in the relevant direction lit only by emergency lights, the building power had been off since the fire. Everyone followed her until they ended up at a double set of metal doors which were badly scratched and dented. Yori and Chou each opened one, latching them in place with the hooks on the walls behind them, to reveal a large storeroom with a freight elevator on the far side. In the middle were two of the horrific monsters that the soldiers had seen outside. In a confined space and up close they looked even larger and more dangerous than they had done in the street. Both of them were squatting on the bare concrete floor, staring at the group of people with two of their four stalked eyes while the other two were slowly scanning around the room.

"Bloody hell those things are ugly," Lieutenant Andrews commented, looking at them with distaste.
"You're only saying that because one of them tried to take your head off," his friend joked. Jack glanced at him for a moment with an evil look.

"Damn right I am. I nearly shat myself. That's never happened in ten years of combat, it's embarrassing." Yori was watching him with a vaguely amused air as he walked slightly closer, inspecting the monsters. They were inspecting him right back, all four eyes of each now locked on him.

"Don't go any closer, Lieutenant," the black-haired girl warned him when he was about three metres away. "The wards start half a metre or so in front of you, they can't get out, but you could cross them inwards. That wouldn't end well." He froze, then slowly took a couple of steps back. Both huge demons almost seemed disappointed. One of them stood, pacing closer, before suddenly reaching for him with one lightning-fast grab, only to have it's taloned hand stop dead a metre in front of it with a sudden burst of transparent blue light, which gave a brief view of an immaterial cylinder some six metres across surrounding both demons. Jack and Phil both jumped a little at the sudden motion, the demon growling and Chou giggling very slightly. Agent Naito said nothing but prudently moved slightly further away.

The glow from the wards faded leaving no obvious signs of what was keeping the demons captive. They had clearly tried to dig their way out, the concrete was scarred and cracked, but had failed in their attempt. Jack wondered if the magic restraining them permeated the floor and ceiling as well, deciding that it most likely did as that was such an obvious escape route. It seemed very unlikely that either of the magical girls would have made a basic mistake like that. They seemed far too competent.

"OK, we'll create a portal in the middle there, next to the taller one. With any luck they'll go through by themselves, but if not we'll have to slowly decrease the ward diameter until they get pushed through." Yori looked at her friends to see if they understood. Misaki nodded wordlessly while Fumiko looked curiously at her.

"Will the portal go through the wards? It's an outbound one, surely they'll block it." Yori smiled. "We'll modify them to allow portal travel while keeping them physically solid in the outbound direction. They can't penetrate them but the portal can." The taller girl nodded in understanding. She and her sister took up places on opposite sides of the wards, having no difficulty seeing them, while Yori and Chou arranged themselves at ninety degrees to both the others, so they formed a square pattern with the demons in the middle. The creatures were watching them intently, making deep grumbling sounds, but seemed surprisingly passive after the sheer aggression before. Yori glanced at the three men. "Could you go over by the wall there, please?" They followed her instructions without a second thought. "Thanks." Turning back to the demons she and her partner concentrated.

"Got the coordinates?" Yori asked. Chou nodded. "OK. Let's try this." A few seconds passed in silence, then the observers stared as a pinprick of blue light sprang into existence a metre off the floor, wobbling slightly before steadying. Expanding slowly, it grew into a gibbous ball the diameter of a football, emitting a hissing sound, before suddenly stretching into a vertical tear in space reaching from the floor to the ceiling with a faint crackle. Yori looked pleased, grinning at her blonde friend, who smiled happily back. "That was a lot smoother than the last one."

"Indeed. I think we've almost got it optimised." Jack and Phil stared at each other, the matter-of-fact way they were talking about perverting the laws of the universe was both somewhat funny and very disturbing.

"Good god," Phil said faintly, looking at the portal. Agent Naito inspected it with interest. Neither of the other two magical girls looked surprised, although both looked somewhat impressed.

"That was amazingly quick, Yori," Fumiko said, staring at the portal. "And it's taking so much less power than normal! Your new spell is very effective." Yori nodded, looking pleased.

"Yep. Not quite perfected, but it's getting there. Right, lets shove these guys through and we can call this part done." Both demons had turned to look at the portal, stepping back as far as they could get from it inside the warded circle. They were growling and hissing, apparently either frightened or angry, perhaps both, making no signs of wanting to go through it. Chou sighed.

"We're going to have to force them through I'm afraid." Nodding, Yori scowled for a moment.

"Oh well. It was a long shot that they'd go through voluntarily. Damn things don't know that's the way home. OK, start shrinking the wards." All four girls turned to face the demons, doing something invisible to the observers, although the effect was obvious. The demons started sliding across the floor despite their best efforts, their taloned feet scraping on the concrete with a screeching noise, while the wards glowed slightly, becoming visible again. Neither demon seemed happy. The larger one roared in anger making everyone wince at the sound, echoing through the basement and making things rattle. It did it again. Yori glowered at them.

"Be quiet," she said loudly. They ignored her, both of them now roaring. Jack and the others had their hands over their ears. She made a gesture of irritation and took a step forwards.

"SHUT! UP!" she bellowed astounding loudly, her voice deepening with a note of pure danger that the demons responded immediately to, cowering away from her. The three observers noted with shock that she was visibly glowing a faint purple colour and seemed very annoyed. The demons looked at her and froze, all their eyes locking on hers in a way that Jack would have sworn was terrified. Her hand came up, pointing. "Go home. NOW!" she hissed, radiating lethality to a level that made everyone in the room except Chou, and to a lesser extent the other magical girls, lean away. She followed it up with a growl that would have given a rabid tiger pause. The demons kept staring at her but began backing up, first one then the other disappearing through the portal with a crackle. As soon as they were both gone she relaxed, the air of imminent destruction vanishing as if it had never been. Phil nudged Jack, causing the other soldier to tear his fascinated and appalled gaze from the petite woman and glance at his friend.

"I think I found a new yardstick for dangerous," he whispered. Jack nodded slightly. Naito seemed to have recovered, he noticed, looking almost proud of the girl. Yori made a dismissive gesture and the portal imploded with a quiet pop, Fumiko and Misaki walking over to her through where it had been, making it obvious the wards were gone as well.

"Holy shit, Yori, that was scary even for you," Fumiko said with laughter in her voice, along with a note of respect. The black-haired young woman snickered.

"I was getting kind of pissed off. I didn't want to kill those things if I could avoid it but I'll admit I really don't like them very much." She glanced at Chou who looked back at her with a serene calm expression. "It may have come through a bit."

"Just a little..." Fumiko giggled slightly. "I think if they ever saw you again they wouldn't stop running for hours." She shook her head. "You can even scare the crap out of stupid demons now. That's impressive." All the girls seemed amused, turning to the three men who were still looking somewhat shocked.

"Right. That's that done." Yori grinned at them, the group of females heading out the door. They all watched as the girls left, then followed, Naito looking both amused and impressed, the two soldiers trailing behind busy with their own thoughts. Both had seen considerable action, but what they'd encountered in the last two hours had left them feeling less sure of their place in the world than either liked.

"When I got up this morning I thought I had a pretty good handle on life, you know, Jack?" Phil mused, ascending the stairs. His friend nodded. "I had a nice Christmas, my girlfriend got me some presents, I got her some, we went to lunch with her parents, all was right with my world. Less than twenty hours later, I've seen magic, demons, girls two thirds my age who can pick up trucks with their bare hands, and one who is the most terrifying thing I've ever seen." He shook his head wonderingly. "I'm not sure my life will ever be the same again." Jack half grinned, half grimaced.

"I know what you mean. I can't say I ever gave the idea of magic much thought, but when I did it wasn't as something I thought was real. But this is pretty solid proof, wouldn't you say?" They fell silent, following the others across the wrecked ground floor of Harrods. The Japanese agent looked back at them, slowing enough to let them catch up while the girls went on ahead.

"It can be a shock when you see this sort of thing for the first time," he said when he was walking next to them. Both British men looked at the shorter foreign agent. He smiled. "Even in our culture most people never come across it like this and we have quite a lot of this sort of thing in places. Your government is well aware of magic, they had departments dedicated to it, but it's a very secretive thing here. In Japan it's more open." They exchanged glances. He grinned a little. "At least it's not like in the US. The Americans tend not to believe in magic at all. It can cause problems. When all this started we had an LAPD lieutenant and an Inspector from the RCMP over observing. The Canadian was fairly accepting of it all. Surprised, but accepting. The poor American had a very difficult time. He got used to it in the end though. Nice fellow, just had a different background."

Lieutenant Andrews smiled. "I remember the Americans in the Gulf back in ninety-one. Most of them were pretty decent guys, although kind of full of themselves in some cases. Good soldiers though. But I can imagine what you mean. A fair few of them weren't what you'd call flexible in their attitudes to life." Naito grinned. As they went out into the street, he glanced to the side and looked amused.

"Looks like your authorities have finally come to some sort of conclusion." Andrews and Stross followed his gaze. There were nearly a dozen ambulances parked behind the military vehicles, their lights flashing, backed up with several more fire trucks and more police that either of them could recall seeing before. People in high-visibility jackets were moving around rapidly, with some of them shouting orders to the rest, most of which seemed to either be ignored or at cross-purposes. They could see a heavily armed response squad climbing out of a couple of vans that had just arrived, unlimbering riot shields. The scene was rapidly degenerating into chaos. Both soldiers exchanged looks and sighed.

"This is just embarrassing," Jack muttered, glancing at the Japanese agent, who smiled slightly. They followed the four girls, who were watching the activity with interest, down the street as far as the restaurant. Aiko met them outside, she was also watching all the fuss. Turning to them as they arrived she grinned.

"These people have no idea what they're doing," she said happily, waving her hand at the crowd of police who were wandering around in the middle of the road, looking like they were trying to figure out what to do. The MoD man was still talking to the officer from the Met, although now they seemed to be in agreement. Yori watched for a moment then shrugged.

"Not our problem, really." She looked at her friend. "The demons are gone, so all we have to do is finish up the healing, then we can go home. Which I for one will be quite pleased about, this isn't how I planned on spending the day after Christmas." Aiko giggled.

"Me either." Leading the way back inside the restaurant she rejoined her team members at the side of the room, talking to Sergeant Adams and WO Walton, who were leaning against the wall keeping an eye on proceedings while sipping tea. Adams had decided to requisition some snacks from a near-by sandwich ship, showing considerable initiative, so nearly everyone in the room was eating. They all looked fairly happy for survivors of such a bizarre disaster, Lieutenant Andrews thought to himself. He and his colleague followed Yori and Chou curiously, as they headed for the back of the room. Agent Naito went over to talk to Captain Smith, who was sitting at a table with Williamson, the MI5 man, discussing something. Looking around Jack couldn't see the other two members of his squad, momentarily wondering where they were, before shrugging. Discipline today seemed to have gone out the window, as had rationality, so if they were outside having a fag he was fine with that.

He noticed that the two young women had stopped next to the man from the top floor from Harrods, Henry something. He looked a lot better than when Jack had seen him earlier although still rather pale. Approaching he sat down a few feet away and listened.

"Hello, Henry. How are you feeling?" Yori asked, squatting down on her heels next to him. He looked down at her and smiled.

"Much better, thank you, Miss." She smiled back, putting her hand on his shoulder. It began to glow slightly. He didn't seem to notice, although his assistant, Andrea, did, her eyes widening. She started to say something but Chou caught her eye and shook her head very slightly, making her subside and just watch.

"Do you smoke, Henry?" Yori asked politely. He nodded. "You really should give that up, it's not doing you any good at all. Your heart isn't very healthy and the smoking will cause you a lot of problems." She moved her hand down over his chest, the glowing intensifying for a moment. Henry looked mildly upset.

"I know, my wife is always asking me to quit, but it's very hard." He sighed, while Jack watched with interest, having an idea what was happening as a more healthy colour seemed to be coming back into his face. Yori smiled gently at him.

"Try again, Henry. It will do you good. I'm sure you can succeed, all it takes is willpower." He nodded slowly, looking at the young woman who had carried him out of the building.

"All right. I promise I'll do my best." She looked pleased, standing up, running her hand over his chest quickly as she did. He seemed oblivious to this.

"Thank you. I have to see someone else now, but it's been nice meeting you." Smiling at him, looking much better than he had done mere minutes ago, he nodded.

"You as well, Miss." She grinned at him, then glanced at Jack, winking, before turning away. He smiled to himself. It seemed likely that she'd sorted out whatever problem the older man had, it wouldn't surprise him at all if Henry found giving up smoking surprisingly easy now. Shaking his head wonderingly he watched as the black-haired young woman walked over to the young man they'd rescued immediately before the final survivor. Andrews moved closer to watch. Sitting next to the man Yori glanced at Chou, who sat on his other side. The fellow, who must have been about twenty-five or so, was sitting staring at his left hand, feeling where the last three fingers had been in something of a daze. He was in no obvious pain but seemed to still be in shock.
"Hi." Yori said brightly. Startled, he jerked his attention away from his mutilated hand to look at her. "We didn't get introduced properly before. I'm Yori, that's my partner Chou." He glanced at the blonde who gave him a calm smile, before looking back to Yori. "How are you feeling?" The question seemed to take him by surprise. After several seconds he looked away.

"Not ideal," he mumbled, glancing at his left hand for a moment then sighing. She followed his gaze.

"Hey, come on, it's not the end of the world. You're alive. Everything else is trivial." Whipping his head up he glared.

"Trivial!" His damaged hand was thrust into her face. "Is this trivial? I'm missing three fucking fingers!" The Japanese girl inspected his hand for a moment.

"OK. Let's sort that out, all right?" This seemed to leave him stunned, as she reached up and took his hand between hers. When her hands began glowing purple he twitched, beginning to pull away, before Chou put her hand on his shoulder.

"Don't worry. We're helping you. Calm down and let her work, please?" Glancing at the serene face of the blonde he seemed to relax. Jack was fascinated, Chou had an ability to defuse tension like no one he'd ever seen. He chuckled. Yori clearly had impressive talents in the other direction when she desired. He got the impression that she could be chaos personified. As if she'd heard his thought the black-haired magical girl glanced over her shoulder at him with an amused look before going back to whatever she was doing. About two minutes later she released the young man's hand from between her own, appearing very pleased with the results. He stared in disbelief, as did Jack, even though he'd half-expected this. Phil, who had come up behind him a minute or so earlier, swore quietly to himself.

"My fingers..." The young man stared, wiggling the regenerated digits in shock. He reached out with his right hand and felt them carefully as if he feared they might disappear if he touched them.

"Like I said. Trivial." Yori looked smug. He stared for a moment, while Chou cleared her throat. The other young woman sighed slightly, looking at her partner. "OK, not trivial, but hardly the end of the world." Chou seemed satisfied.

"How..." The man looked at her in amazement and wonder. She smiled, patting him on the shoulder as she stood.

"Magic. Don't worry about it. Have some more tea and a sandwich, you deserve it." As the two young women walked over to a middle-aged lady who was missing a foot and staring at them with hopeful wonder, having witnessed the whole thing, the fellow went back to examining his repaired hand closely, testing each finger in turn. He looked up at the two soldiers as they moved slightly closer, also staring at his hand.

"How did she do that?" he asked in a stunned voice, turning his head to watch the two women, "Who are they?" Lieutenant Andrews suddenly smiled, clapping him on the shoulder.

"Don't worry about it. Just be happy you met them today." The man nodded absently, still rubbing his left hand with his right one. He looked up as did almost everyone else in the room when there was a commotion at the entrance, to see half a dozen emergency services personnel rush into the restaurant, carrying a wide array of medical equipment and with expressions of grim determination. They got about twenty feet into the room before they noticed that no one appeared to be in any immediate danger of passing away, and in fact were staring curiously at them, mostly with cups of tea or sandwiches half-way to their mouths. After a moment's sudden silence the bulk of the people went back to talking calmly among themselves, leaving the medical people looking rather confused. Several policemen and women came in behind them, also glancing around with odd expressions. Jack watched with amusement. Behind him he heard a chuckle, turning to see Yori inspecting the newly-arrived cavalry.

"Better late than never, I guess," she said wryly. He nodded with a small grin.

"They seem a bit embarrassed," he snickered. It was always funny to see someone in authority befuddled. Even on a day like today, his sense of humour was tickled by the expressions in play. She laughed.

"Indeed they do. Oh well, they'll work it out eventually." She turned back to what she was doing. Andrews watched the police and medics for a moment, noticing that Naito and the two British men he was chatting with had risen and were approaching the man who seemed to be in charge of the medical contingent, various IDs being produced. He shrugged. It wasn't his problem. Turning back to watching the magical girls he smiled at the expression of the woman they had been treating as she wiggled her newly regrown foot with glee before leaping to her feet and hugging Chou. Yori looked pleased.

The confusion at the dramatic entrance of the emergency services had died down, the doctor in charge talking quietly to Naito and Williamson with a peculiar look on his face as he glanced around the room. Most of the medical people had spread out through the room, no longer so intent on inflicting healing on people who clearly didn't require it, although they seemed to be curious about what had happened. Several of them were talking to people Yori or Chou had healed, apparently getting some fairly vivid descriptions of their now-vanished injuries, which were greeted with some scepticism. There was little evidence of them, of course.

After a couple of minutes the doctor threw his hands in the air, turning away from the two men with a look of irritation, then glanced around. He spotted Akio and her team, looking them up and down for a moment with an expression that mixed appreciation for the shapely female bodies so well displayed, puzzlement about what on earth they were doing wearing so little, and disbelief about what he'd been told of them and for that matter the entire situation. They smiled back at him unashamedly making him blink. Eventually he looked away, noticing Yori and Chou on the other side of the room. He also noticed that the man they were talking to was holding up an arm missing a hand, his tattered sleeve still damp with blood. Medical instincts jumped to the fore and he yelped, grabbing his bag and a passing paramedic, rushing over to do something about the clearly badly injured man. He missed the fact that the expression on the face of the patient wasn't worried in the slightest.

"Pardon me, Miss," he said shortly, elbowing Yori away from the middle-aged man wearing a UPS uniform. "Sir, please relax. We'll get a tourniquet on you immediately, then to hospital." He whipped out a stethoscope while the paramedic opened her bag and began rummaging through it. Ripping the man's shirt open sending buttons flying everywhere he listened to his heart, finding it was beating normally and in a surprisingly calm manner.

"Excuse me," came a mildly annoyed voice from behind him. He ignored it, checking his patient over carefully.

"Now, sir, do you know if your hand was recovered? If it's not too badly damaged and we can get it on ice we may be able to reattach it." He tried to keep a soothing tone in his voice to avoid panicking the man, who was still reacting in an oddly calm way. 'Shock' he diagnosed to himself, 'He's going to flip out when he comes out of it. Better get the sedatives ready.'

"Um, excuse me?" The voice came again, sounding slightly more annoyed, accompanied with a tap on his shoulder. He brushed it off irritably.

"Not now, I'm busy." Turning to the paramedic he started to ask her for the emergency tourniquet, only then noticing she was holding it ready. He took it and tore open the sterile packaging.

"Hey!" The voice was now definitely pissed off. A small but impossibly strong hand clamped on his shoulder, forcibly turning him to look at the young Japanese woman who had been talking to the man he was trying to treat. Her expression wasn't a happy one. Neither was his.

"Do you mind, Miss?" he snapped. "I'm trying to treat this man, he's seriously injured." She glared at him.

"He's fine, and I was here first. Go find your own damn patient." The UPS man started snickering, both of them shooting him an annoyed look.

"Look, I don't know who you are, Miss, but I'm a doctor." He tapped the identity card on his chest. "I'm trained for this sort of thing. Perhaps you should go and get something to eat and leave the medical emergencies to the people who know how to deal with them." Behind her he noticed a couple of large soldiers, who had been watching the exchange with open amusement. For some reason both of them suddenly looked worried, the brown-haired one on the left wincing visibly. An abrupt drop in temperature made him glance around wondering why someone would turn the air conditioning on in the middle of winter. He shrugged, looking back at the girl, who was giving him an evil look. For some reason he began to feel a little uneasy.

"I'm Yori, not Miss. As it happens, I know a lot about how to deal with medical emergencies. Both how to treat them," she leaned closer and lowered her voice dangerously, "and how to create them." He stared for a moment.

"Are you threatening me?" he asked, shocked. She smiled, baring teeth that he noticed with a jolt bore a surprising resemblance to fangs. The smile wasn't particularly friendly. There was the distinct air of irritated predator about her for a second or two.

"Oh, no, not at all, Doctor," she said in a silky voice. "Just passing on some useful information you might find it helpful to know. Now, will you please step aside so I can continue treating my patient?" Her voice was simultaneously scrupulously polite and rather frightening. Without thinking about it he moved enough to let her take his place in front of the man with the missing hand, who seemed amused more than anything else. Doctor O'Connor was very puzzled about this. It seemed an odd reaction to a traumatic amputation, which he was certain was what had happened. There was far too much blood on his clothes for anything else. Something caught his eye, as he inspected the man's arm more closely than he had done previously. The wound wasn't a wound, the end of the arm at the wrist was capped in full healed skin. That didn't make any sense. He began to speak, Yori immediately shooting him a look that made him stop so suddenly he bit his tongue.

One of the soldiers behind him moved closer, bending slightly to get his mouth next to the ear of the somewhat shorter man. "Doctor, I'd advise you simply watch. Trust me, he's in good hands. But you really don't want to push your luck." O'Connor looked at him, then back at the girl. She had settled onto her heels in front of the patient, holding his wrist a couple of inches below the amputation in both her hands. The man was watching with an air of expectant interest, coupled with complete trust, which the doctor found weird. She glanced back over her shoulder at him for a moment, an expression of wry amusement crossing her face, before turning back to her patient. What happened next made O'Connor stare in complete disbelief. He was so shocked he couldn't even find it in himself to swear.

The girl's hands started emitting a soft violet glow, which spread onto the patient's arm. A few seconds later a ghostly replica of the missing hand faded into view at the end of his arm, which slowly brightened and took on detail, first the bones fading in, then the blood vessels, nerves, muscles, and finally the skin. A perfect translucent hand was now present. As both the doctor and the paramedic stared in shock and awe real skin and bone began to spread slowly up from the amputation site, gradually filling in the immaterial replica of a hand with an actual hand. The whole process took about five minutes. When it was done the glow faded away, leaving perfectly normal appearing flesh behind. Yori sat back looking satisfied. The patient, now former patient, smiled at his remade limb, clenching his fist a few times and showing to everyone that it worked perfectly.

"Thank you, Yori," he said in a deep voice, grinning at her in gratitude. She nodded back with a smile.

"You're welcome, Ari. Try not to lose it again. It would be careless." He laughed. Looking down at his shirt, he turned his gaze to O'Connor, who was still staring at his hand in amazement.

"Thanks, Doctor. My wife loves repairing my clothes." His mildly sarcastic jibe shook the doctor out of his stunned disbelief.

"How... What..." He stopped, then tried again. "How..." There was a pause. "What...?" The paramedic glanced at him, then at the Japanese girl with the long black hair who seemed very amused. She sighed a little.

"I think you broke him." Yori grinned.

"That tends to happen sometimes." Standing smoothly she held out her hand. "Hi. I'm Yori, like I said. This is my partner Chou." She gestured to the blonde woman who had been standing to one side watching the entire scene play itself out with an expression of gentle amusement. The paramedic shook the offered hand.

"Roslyn Venn, paramedic. This is Doctor Kevin O'Connor." The doctor was still burbling to himself, switching his gaze between Ari and Yori. The UPS man looked very pleased, standing and walking over to the nearest selection of food, followed by the doctor, who was staring fixedly at his right hand as if he expected it to disappear in a puff of smoke. Roslyn watch him wander off with a slight smile. "He's a very good doctor, in fact, but he's a bit arrogant at times. A lot of doctors are in my experience. Plus his attitude to women isn't as good as I'd like, although it's not due to maliciousness, he just doesn't realise he's being insulting." She glanced at Yori who wore an understanding smile.

"Don't worry, I know what you mean. I've met a lot like that." She inspected the older woman with curiosity. "You took it a lot better than he did, I notice." The paramedic nodded slowly.

"I've had more experience than he has, he's only about thirty and fairly new to the trauma doctoring business. I'm nearly forty, and I've seen some pretty weird things over the years. Nothing quite as dramatic as that, I'll admit, but weird. I assume that was some form of magic?" Yori and Chou both studied her with interest, while the two soldiers who were listening silently exchanged glances. After a few seconds the Japanese girl smiled again.

"Yes. It's our own version, actually. Not something you're likely to have seen before, as far as I know it's unique to us."

"It's extremely effective," Roslyn said, meaning it. "And quite a sight to watch." Yori snickered.

"The glow is normal, but the visual replica of the regrowth pattern isn't required. It's useful to demonstrate the process, but in this case your man over there annoyed me and I thought it might be an amusing idea to make it a little more dramatic." The older woman started laughing.

"Nice one. It certainly shut him up."

"That was the idea." They grinned at each other.

"So, what's the story behind all this?" Roslyn asked curiously, looking around at the room. Yori told her. When she finished the woman was sitting in a chair staring at her in shock.

"Demons?" The young woman nodded soberly, taking a bite from the chicken salad sandwich she'd acquired moments ago. "Christ. That's pretty hard to believe, even with what I just saw."

Chou sat beside her, sighing. "Unfortunately it's true. I've very sorry we couldn't prevent all this, but at least we could bring it to an end and heal everyone affected. As good as your medical people are, we're better, at least with this sort of injury." She looked around with a slightly sad expression. "A lot of these people would have died or been permanently affected by their injuries. I'm very glad we could fix that." The paramedic followed her gaze and shuddered.

"So am I. This would have been a major disaster, I suspect, without you lot." She looked at the two women, then over at the other four in the almost not there clothing who were talking to a couple of soldiers. "How did you get here so fast? By the sound of it you must have arrived within half an hour of the beginning of everything." Yori looked pleased.

"We teleported." The older woman stared at her for a moment, then giggled.

"Of course you did. Silly me, I should have guessed. All the way from Japan, right?" Yori nodded, grinning.

"Yes. Tokyo, in fact." Shaking her head in disbelief and amusement, Roslyn looked at them with an impressed expression.

"Incredible." Jack cleared his throat, from where he had been listening with interest, causing everyone to look at him. He indicated to Doctor O'Connor who was rapidly walking across the large room towards them.

"He doesn't look happy," the soldier said with a snort of laughter. Yori sighed.

"No, he doesn't. What does he want this time?" O'Connor stopped in front of them, staring at both the magical girls with irritation. He glanced at the paramedic with an expression of mild betrayal, then dismissed her as unimportant.

"I don't know how you pulled off that trick, but I'm not fooled. What I saw is impossible. I asked around, neither one of you is a doctor, in fact none of the authorities seem to know anything about you at all, or your ridiculously dressed friends over there. I'm going to have to insist you leave so I can treat these people." He waved to the two remaining people with missing parts, one of whom was down a thumb, the other one half her left arm. Both of them were patiently waiting for the Japanese girls to get to them, having seen first-hand how easily they fixed such problems, and feeling a considerable degree of confidence and trust. There was something about them that inspired such feelings. The two patients looked at each other, then back at the doctor, wondering why he was getting so wound up. Yori and Chou also exchanged glances, the blonde giving the smaller woman a warning look that to most of the witnesses seemed to ask her to be polite. Yori sighed and nodded very slightly before turning to O'Connor.

The two soldiers made as if to rise and approach the doctor, but subsided when Yori looked at them. Jack settled back with his arms crossed, feeling somehow insulted. He almost felt as if one of his own people had been unfairly accused of something, which was a little strange bearing in mind that he'd only known these people for about three or four hours. Chou smiled a little at him as Yori studied the doctor carefully. "Did you talk to the MI5 representative?" she asked curiously. O'Connor looked slightly taken aback, that wasn't what he'd expected to hear her say. He shook his head.

"The police don't know anything about you," he said. She shrugged.

"Not my problem. Your government does. We're here at their request with their permission. Perhaps you should go and check. We can wait." He looked irritated.

"I don't really care about that. What I care about is untrained people playing at being doctors. Not to mention threatening me when I'm trying to do my job and trying to trick me with light shows, as impressive as they are. But magic tricks should be reserved for TV or something not serious incidents like this." He was waving his arms and talking quite loudly by now, which had the effect of drawing the attention of almost everyone in the room. A couple of policemen began moving in their direction. Yori sighed heavily.

"Doctor, you're causing a scene." He glared at her, unconcerned, so she shrugged again. "Your choice. By the way, I didn't threaten you. If I had threatened you, you wouldn't be in any doubt about it at all. People tend to remember my threats." The look she gave him made him take a couple of steps back. Jack and Phil smiled darkly behind him, while Chou put a hand on her arm.

"Go easy, dear, he doesn't understand and he's worried," she said in a low voice. With a look at her Yori relaxed a little. The policemen approaching them stopped a couple of feet away, looking at the doctor then the two Japanese women.

"Is there a problem, sir?" one of them asked O'Connor. He nodded, pointing at Yori, then moving his finger to Chou.

"Yes. These two young ladies are getting in the way of me treating people. Can you remove them, please?" Yori sighed again, very quietly. The policeman who had spoken gave the petite young woman an assessing look. As he moved closer she stepped back a pace.

"Come along, miss, let's leave the doctor to his work, shall we?" he said in a rather patronising tone, which even the doctor could immediately see was a mistake. Even Chou winced at it. Lieutenant Andrews covered his eyes with his hand and sighed while beside him his colleague snickered.

"Oops," Phil said with some amusement. He didn't much like the police, a remnant of a somewhat misspent youth. The look Yori gave the considerably older cop made him take a step back. Then another, as she slowly walked forwards. He reached for his collapsible baton, suddenly wishing that he'd kept his mouth shut. There was something about the woman, all five and a bit feet of her, which was abruptly extremely worrying.

"Now, Miss, let's not make things worse. Just come with me and we can let the doctor get on with it." He closed his mouth wondering why all of a sudden all he could say were things that seemed to make the woman in front of him, whom he was now getting a very dangerous feeling from, even angrier. His eyes widened, as did those of his colleague and both the doctor and the paramedic as she started visibly glowing, a faint purple aura surrounding her. The temperature in the room in her vicinity was dropping noticeably, little puffs of vapour coming from the mouths of people within a few feet. Everyone stared in horror. 'Oh, Christ, what the hell did I just upset?' he thought to himself, suddenly terrified and swallowing hard. The blonde girl standing next to her put a hand on her shoulder, making her turn her head to glance at her face, then after a few seconds, nod slightly.
The glow vanished and the sudden cold snap warmed up. Roslyn noticed with shock that the cup of tea someone had left on a table next to her appeared to have frozen solid.

O'Connor was watching all this with his heart thundering in his ears, more scared than he'd been since he was a child. The small woman turned her head towards him very slowly, staring for a long moment, then looked away, dismissing him and the policemen completely. She turned and walked back to the two patients who smiled at her, apparently not at all worried by whatever she'd just done. The whole time she hadn't said a word. Chou looked at him and shook her head sadly, before moving to join her companion, talking to her quietly in Japanese. He sagged slightly as the tension went out of him. The policemen looked at each other, somewhat shocked and unable to think of a good solution to the problem presented by the black-haired woman. Neither one of them felt that trying again was a good idea. Drunks and football hooligans were one thing, whatever the hell she was was something much, much worse.

WPC Oakley got up from where she had been watching from a few tables away, her eyes wide, approaching them and pulling them to one side. She showed them her warrant card, then talked in a low voice for a while. Both coppers nodded a few times, looking to where she pointed out Williamson the MI5 man and Agent Naito, both of whom had been observing but had decided not to intervene. They turned and walked over to the two men, where a discussion broke out. A more senior policeman joined them after a minute or two.

"Doctor," Yori suddenly said, making O'Connor jump. He stared at her for a moment. "Come here, please." With a certain amount of trepidation he slowly walked over to where she and Chou were standing next to the woman missing part of her arm. Yori inspected him with an emotionless face, then stepped to the side and waved at the woman, a tallish lady in her early sixties, of Nigerian descent by his estimation. She seemed remarkably calm under the circumstances, although her clothes were tattered and bloodstained. Once again it was clear that the injury she suffered from was recent, but she appeared to be in no distress, making him glance at her truncated forearm. Once again the wound that should have been there was missing. The arm looked like a fully healed amputation. He stared at it for a moment, then back to Yori.

"I'm not happy about having our competence called into question although I understand from your viewpoint you have reservations about us. I apologise if I was somewhat impolite." She glanced at Chou, who looked pleased. "However, so that we can make sure there are no further misunderstandings, I'd like you to examine Mrs Adeyemi here, to determine the extent of her injuries to your own satisfaction. She's in no immediate danger, by the way." The Japanese girl was speaking in a rather formal manner, making it clear just from the tone of her voice she still wasn't completely happy about the situation. After a few seconds he nodded.

"All right." Pulling a chair up beside the patient he smiled at her. She smiled back, giving him an encouraging nod. "Hello, I'm Doctor O'Connor. Do you mind?" Mrs Adeyemi smiled more widely.

"Not at all, doctor," she replied in a richly accented voice. "You go right ahead. But don't be mean to this young lady, she and her friends have saved a lot of people today. You didn't see it earlier." He nodded, pulling his stethoscope out of his pocket again, checking her heart, then taking the blood-pressure machine from Roslyn who had come up to him with his bag of equipment. Finishing with her vitals in a matter of minutes, he found she appeared to be in good health, calm, and relaxed. In fact, aside from missing her left forearm and hand she was basically completely healthy. Putting his equipment away he gently lifted what was left of her arm and carefully inspected it. The wound site, or what should have been a wound site, was fully developed skin, in his estimation something that you'd only see after a good eighteen months to two years of healing. There was no sign of scarring at all. Mrs Adeyemi looked at him with a twinkle in her eye.
"It happened about three hours ago." She could see the disbelief in his eyes before he opened his mouth. "I was getting on the bus when all this happened. When the front of the building collapsed it crushed the bus. My arm was trapped in the door." Examining the arm again he slowly shook his head.

"I'll take your word for it, I suppose, but by everything I've ever learned this is impossible. This wound is at least a year and a half healed."

"Three hours." She gave him a sympathetic look. "On my mother's grave, three hours at most. Chou healed it to this point about an hour ago." O'Connor lowered her arm to her leg and just sat staring at it for over a minute, thoughts even he was having trouble whirling through his mind. Eventually he looked up. Yori returned his gaze, a slight smile crossing her otherwise expressionless features.

"Are you satisfied? This is a real arm, really missing a significant part?" He nodded.

"Yes. I have no idea how, but it's completely healed." He stood, looking at the patient, who seemed quite amused.

"Mrs Adeyemi was missing the lower part of her arm when we managed to free her, she also had three sharp force trauma punctures to her abdomen, a severely lacerated lower intestine, crushed gall bladder, three broken ribs, a broken ankle, several lacerations to her side and back, and had lost approximately half a litre of blood." Chou recited the list of injuries dispassionately, making him look at her in shock. "In addition she suffered from gout and had much higher blood pressure than was healthy for her." He switched his gaze between the two young women. "I healed all the serious injuries on site as soon as she was freed to stabilise her, then Yori and I fixed the remaining problems when we had all the casualties here in safety. We left the five amputation cases until now as we had the cause of the disaster to deal with, which took priority. Now the emergency is over we're finishing up the work." She looked toward the smaller woman who took up the conversation.

"I'm doing most of the regenerations as I'm slightly better at it that Chou is. She's observing and assisting so she can see how I do it. On the job training you might say." A quick grin flashed across her face, gone in an instant. "Now, I'm going to regenerate the arm. I would like you to pay very close attention so you can satisfy yourself it's not any form of trick. All right?" She waited for his somewhat stunned nod of acceptance before sitting in the chair he'd just vacated. The expression she turned to Mrs Adeyemi was vastly warmer than the one she had given him. The elder woman smiled back, holding out her arm without being prompted. Yori took it in her hands, holding it gently just above the amputation site.

"Doctor? Please watch carefully. For your benefit I'll explain what I'm doing as I go." The purple glow jumped into existence, quickly spreading from her hands to the arm of the patient. "The visualisation effect isn't necessary but it helps to explain the process. Now, the missing parts are of course defined in the patient's DNA, and it's certainly possible to use that as the basis of the regeneration, but it's not required in this sort of case. There is a pattern stored in the ki signature of the patient, what you could call the life force for want of better terminology. I could explain in much more detail and more accurately but I'm afraid you don't have the background or vocabulary to understand it." She glanced at him. "I'm not trying to insult you, it's the simple truth. This is a specialist subject that very few people have the knowledge to understand." He nodded slowly, suddenly feeling out of his depth, but with a growing fascination.

"I can use the ki pattern to determine the damage and also the required corrective action. Using that pattern, I produce a map of the damage, which can be visualised like this." As in the previous case, a translucent skeletal three dimensional image took shape, showing the bones that should have been present. O'Connor stared in amazement. Yori glanced at him again. "You see? This is the bone structure that should be there. Now, the cartilage, muscles, tendons, neural structures, blood vessels, subdermal layers, and finally the epidermal layers." As she spoke, each described structure faded into view. The final result was a perfect, astoundingly detailed representation of the missing forearm and hand, complete in every way. O'Connor groped for a chair and sat heavily in it, looking at the sight in front of himself in pure awe. There was no doubt this time it was real.

"OK. That's the desired regrowth pattern. Now, we start the actual regeneration. For this part I need to force cellular division to vastly higher than normal levels, which is easy, but it also causes side effects that need to be dealt with. Excess heat needs to be siphoned off to prevent cell death or damage, and you need to make sure the replicating cells follow the pattern without growing out of control. Replication errors could cause tumours at this point which isn't what we want." She gave him a slightly amused look. "I also need to feed energy into the cells to allow them to survive, since drawing on the patients own resources for a regeneration of this extent isn't a good idea. The cells can use that energy to build the mass they require." As she was speaking, O'Connor watched with fascination as the skin on the patients arm began to spread up through the glowing replica arm, wrapping around bone stubs that steadily lengthened. He could see what looked like a freshly cut cross-section of an arm, with no bleeding or signs of trauma. The sight was at the same time somewhat repulsive and totally engrossing.

"It takes a considerable amount of energy to keep the regeneration going at this speed. I could go faster, but then the heat removal becomes somewhat problematic. Slower is just a waste of time. So this speed is about optimal for me since we're not in a huge hurry." He nodded absently, leaning closer to watch the process closely. Half the missing arm was now regenerated, the skin looking like it had been there all along. As the process reached the wrist joint he moved around to get a better look, watching as all the bones and tendons in the joint took up their rightful place and were sheathed in muscle and skin. Glancing up at the young woman for a moment he saw she had her eyes half-closed, obviously concentrating on the job she was doing. Beyond her he could see the face of Mrs Adeyemi watching with admiration and gratitude. Chou was standing next to her with her hand on her shoulder, her eyes also partially closed, while her hand was glowing with faint golden light. He got the sudden impression that she was watching the process from the inside somehow.

Turning his attention back to the regenerating limb he saw it was half-way through the hand at this point. The remaining part regrew quickly. About eight minutes after she had started the arm was whole again. Opening her eyes she inspected the results and smiled. "That looks good. Now I can turn the neural pathways back on, I had them disabled so the patient wouldn't twitch or move. Also the regeneration itches like mad, which is uncomfortable, so I turned off the sensory nerves as well as the motor control ones." Mrs Adeyemi jumped slightly as feeling came back into her new hand. Yori released it, the glow disappearing, before her patient lifted her arm and looked at it wonderingly, turning her hand over and wiggling the fingers.

"Thank you, child," she said in a voice choked with emotion. The Japanese girl grinned at her, pleased with the results.

"You're very welcome, Mrs Adeyemi."

"Call me Odaro, dear." She leaned over and hugged the younger woman, who looked slightly taken aback for a moment, then hugged her back.

"Odaro. You're welcome, it's what we do." They released each other, the older woman holding her hand up in front of her face and wiggling each finger in turn with a broad smile. Yori turned to O'Connor.
"So, doctor. Was it a trick?" He stared at the former patient for a long few seconds before turning to the younger woman, studying her closely and respectfully.

"My apologies. I was entirely wrong about you both." He shook his head as he smiled at him, looking pleased. "That was no trick. I genuinely have no idea how you could possibly do that, but it's very clear you know a hell of a lot more about how the body works than I do." The girl gave him an assessing look, then made a shallow but formal bow.

"Thank you, doctor. I accept your apology. Please accept mine for being rather rude." She straightened up, grinning at him, an expression he somehow couldn't help but return. "You caught us at a bad time. Normally I'm not nearly as easy to upset, but recent events have been rather distressing, so I was perhaps a bit more short tempered that I should have been. We got off on the wrong foot, I guess. Why don't we start again." She stuck her hand out. "Hi. I'm Yori." Grinning he shook it.

"Doctor Kevin O'Connor. Very pleased to make your acquaintance, Yori." She laughed.

"Likewise. And don't put yourself down, I know full well how much training it takes to become a doctor. I'm sure you're a good one. We just do it differently, that's all." Glancing at Chou, who was smiling in a calm and gentle manner, radiating a certain feeling of serenity, she nodded towards the last patient. "You want to try sorting him out?" The blonde nodded.

"I think I see what I was doing wrong. Can you watch and make sure I'm doing it correctly?"

"Of course." Both young women walked over to the man, who was probably in his early twenties. He smiled at both of them in a winning manner, obviously pleased to have two good looking females attending to him. Sitting next to him Chou held out her hand, prompting him to put his right hand in it, showing off the lack of a thumb. Yori stood beside her and watched carefully. The blonde woman didn't bother with the visual effects, which made the slowly regenerating digit look even more eerie than it otherwise would have done. Everyone in the vicinity watched with interest and respect as his thumb slowly regrew itself. Yori nodded approvingly when it was finished.

"Perfect. You've definitely got it now." Chou looked very pleased with herself.

"Thank you. It was a problem with juggling the heat dissipation against the cell division rate. That large regeneration gave me enough time to see the process in detail, so I could see what I was doing wrong." She looked over her shoulder at O'Connor. "Rebuilding and repairing things that are still present, such as internal organs for example, is much more straightforward than replacing something that's completely missing." He nodded with some understanding. It seemed logical as far as this whole impossible situation went. The young man looked at his hand in wonder then smiled.

"Thanks." Chou gave him a gentle look.

"No thanks are necessary, but thank you." Standing, she stretched slightly, then turned to Yori. "That's the last of the survivors. The demons are gone, everyone is healed. I suppose we're done all we can do here." Nodding, the black-haired young woman looked around, a slight smile playing about her lips. She seemed satisfied.

"The final count was sixty-seven survivors." Her face fell a little. "And sixty-five fatalities." Chou nodded sadly, holding the other woman's hand for a while. "I really wish we could have prevented this." Lieutenant Andrews walked over, then clapped her on the shoulder.

"As your Agent Naito over there said earlier, don't second-guess yourself. Without you six ladies this would have been much, much worse. Don't beat yourself up about something you can't change. We all do after a mission, it doesn't change anything, but it's difficult not to. Believe me, this is a remarkably good outcome all things considered." He spoke with the voice of bitter experience. She looked at him for a moment, her eyes meeting his with a look that told him she knew exactly what he was talking about. There was an air of combat experience there that rivalled or exceeded his own. A few seconds passed then she nodded heavily.

"Thanks." Glancing at Chou she went on, "Let's get the others then talk to the MI5 guy." Chou smiled at her then turned to walk over to Aiko and her team, who were sitting at a table inhaling sandwiches and chatting to Adams and Walton, with Agent Naito listening with interest to some frankly fairly unbelievable stories. She turned to the two soldiers, casting a quick look at O'Connor and Roslyn, who were standing fairly close, listening. O'Connor was still turning the word 'Demon' over in his mind, wondering what Yori had meant. "We'll probably be leaving pretty soon. It's been nice meeting you guys and the rest of your people. Thanks for the help." She stuck out her hand. Jack shook it carefully, feeling the raw strength in the delicate-looking appendage. Phil shook as well. Stepping back she smiled, then looked Lieutenant Andrews up and down for a moment, before nodding to herself. Her hand came up, holding a card that hadn't been there seconds ago. Everyone stared at it wondering where it had come from.

"Here. If you ever get involved in anything like this again and need help, call." Jack took the card from her feeling a strange little tingle for a second, reading it curiously. He showed it to Phil who stared blankly at it.

"Um, there's nothing on it," his friend and colleague said. Jack stared at him, then looked at the card again. He could clearly see 'Yori' written on it over a phone number and two long alphanumeric strings.

"Yes there is."

"No, there isn't."

"I'm telling you, there is. I'm looking right at it." Yori was snickering.

"Magic business cards." They stared at her. "Honest. It's a security measure." She explained, leaving them very impressed.

"Wow. That's pretty hard-core." Jack looked at the card again for a moment before carefully tucking it away in his inside pocket. She turned to O'Connor and Venn. After a moment's thought, she handed the paramedic another card.

"You're the one with previous experience in magic, however limited. You may find something you need our help for. If so, give me a ring." She glanced at the doctor with a small smile. "If you ever get into a situation you need us for, let Roslyn know as well, OK?" He nodded. Yori walked over to the table where her companions were, leaving the two soldiers and the medics to watch her go with various expressions.

"Good grief," O'Connor finally managed. Andrews glanced at him, then nodded.

"Yep. That about sums it up."

The doctor looked at him. "Um. Demons?" Jack laughed, then started explaining.

Williamson looked up from his phone as the Japanese contingent approached him, inspecting them quickly. He re-read the text he'd just received, sighed, then put the phone away. "Hello, ladies, Agent. Everyone all fixed up, then?" The black-haired girl who was the clear leader of the entire odd assembly nodded with a smile, before sitting at the table near him. The others did as well.

"Pretty much done, I think. I'm very sorry for the fatalities but all the survivors are as good as new.
Better, in a few cases." He looked at her with a puzzled expression. She grinned. "We came across a few pre-existing conditions while we were treating the casualties. It seemed easier to deal with them as well while we were at it. You know, heart conditions, gout, diabetes, chronic stuff like that. Fairly simple." Staring at her and her blonde friend for a while he finally shook his head wonderingly.

"Yes. Simple. I see." He didn't. "Well, on behalf of the British government, thank you all for helping us. While the number of deaths is extremely regrettable, there was nothing you could have done about that, while you certainly brought what could have been a much more unpleasant situation to a speedy end." He glanced off to the side where he could see Spence and the police commander had entered the restaurant and were looking around while talking quietly to each other.
Yori and the others followed his gaze, most of them looking unimpressed. Agent Naito had a completely neutral expression, as did Yori. "I'm also sorry for the rather poor showing our own people made. It was somewhat embarrassing." The small woman looked back at him, raising an eyebrow.

"Your military people seemed to be quite effective, even though they were out of their depth.
Lieutenant Andrews, Captain Smith, and the others on his team were very helpful. I was impressed how quickly they adapted to the situation which was certainly well out of their normal experience."
She looked over to the two men who had been with them for most of the time they'd been there, noticing that they had rejoined the rest of their team and were talking amongst themselves. Smiling a little she turned to Williamson again. "You've certainly not got anything to be embarrassed as far as they go."

"Thank you," he said, slightly surprised but also gratified. "That's good of you to say." She waved a hand dismissively.

"It's true. I don't bother buttering people up." Aiko grinned.

"Damn right she doesn't. If she thinks you're an idiot she tells you." Yori looked at her for a moment.

"Thanks, Aiko. Thanks very much indeed." The brunette looked amused as did her team. Even Chou was smiling a little. Williamson looked at them with a slightly bemused air. After a short pause he sighed a little.

"There's a slight problem, though, that I think I may need your help for." Yori glanced around at her colleagues then inspected him with interest.

"What sort of problem?" she asked in a slightly suspicious manner.

"Your sort, I think." He thought for a moment while she waited politely. "You are aware, I take it, that we have a somewhat secret government department that is in charge of matters of a... somewhat unusual... type?" he asked hesitantly, not sure if they would know what he was talking about. Yori exchanged looks with Chou and Agent Naito, then nodded slowly.

"You call it the Ministry of Magic, I believe. A subsection of the Ministry of Defence, not publicly admitted to. It's one of the oldest continuously operating departments of the British government, dating to around 1230AD. A fairly small department but very influential. It regulates a lot of the magical community in the UK, at least in theory, although not as effectively as they would like."
Williamson was impressed and slightly appalled. Most of this was supposed to be a secret. He said as much, causing her to laugh. "You'd be surprised at how many so-called secrets we know. Or perhaps horrified. Don't worry, we don't go spreading them around without good reason." Still looking at her oddly, he nodded after a while.

"OK. Good, I suppose. I'm not an expert in these things, although I am in the know, I suppose you could say. It comes with the job. Anyway, the various mages and the like in the MoM are even more secretive than most of the government, which is saying something. Spence works for them, I believe, even though officially he's an under-secretary to the defence minister. You may have noticed that he's been trying to keep all this under wraps even when it was obvious that he couldn't." They all nodded. Fumiko turned to look at the man who was watching them now, narrowing her eyes suspiciously.

"There's something unpleasant about his aura, to be honest. I noticed it when we first met him. I don't like him." Williamson almost smiled.

"Neither do I. I never have done, I don't trust him. There are stories... Anyway, that's not important right now. The important thing is that I've received information relevant to what happened here today that worries me a lot, and some of the people I work for." Yori looked at him for a few seconds, then looked at the MoD man. Glancing at Chou they seemed to hold a silent conversation for a few seconds, before the blonde nodded. Turning her attention back to Williamson the black-haired girl looked satisfied.

"OK. We're shielded. No one not at this table can hear or see anything they shouldn't." A little startled Williamson looked around, as did Agent Naito, both of them noticing that everyone else in the room now seemed to be ignoring them completely. Even Spence, who had been approaching them, looked like he'd forgotten what he was about to do and had wandered off to the other end of the room, a slightly confused expression on his face. The MI5 man and the PSIA agent exchanged impressed looks.

"Wow. That's a pretty good trick," Williamson said. Yori grinned.

"It has it's uses. So, talk to us. What's the problem?" He stared at the table for a long moment, wrestling with his conscience, before looking directly at her.

"They have another one of those portal weapons."

All six magical girls went absolutely still. Yori and Chou were both suddenly outlined in a faint glow, purple and golden respectively. Williamson shuffled slightly further away, feeling a wave of power rolling off them, with slightly lesser power flows coming from the other four. He glanced at Naito, who looked extremely uncomfortable, then back to Yori.

"Explain."

Her voice was flat and dangerous. With a slight shiver he tried to marshal his thoughts. "Understand, I'm not supposed to talk about this. I'm probably going to get into a lot of trouble. It may even be treason. But, my job is to work in the best interests of the UK. Based on what I saw today, I firmly believe that trying to do anything at all with that sort of magic, that sort of demon, is very definitely not in the best interests of the UK in any way at all. If it hadn't been for you people we could have lost hundreds, possibly thousands, of innocent lives. I do not want that to happen." Yori nodded curtly, waiting for him to get to the point.

"A contact at the MoM heard about what happened here. Her conscience got the better of her. Apparently, about three weeks ago one of the portal devices was discovered completely by chance at Tottenham Court tube station, hidden in a service corridor. Through a rather unlikely chain of events it came to the attention of one of the research mages who works at the MoM. He'd seen the alert your PSIA had sent around and managed to acquire the thing covertly. It was immediately classified top secret. They've been working on reverse engineering it since then. Without a lot of luck, I'm told, there seems to be something unusual about the magic on it they can't decode at the moment." He sighed slightly.

"Something I'm very pleased about, but I can't assume will hold forever. One the one hand, it's a damn good thing it was removed from where it was, if it had activated during rush hour the death toll would have been incredible. There are tens of thousands of people going through that station every day, it's very busy this time of year. On the other hand, having seen what happened here, if it triggers where it is the results are going to be very messy. Leaving aside what would happen if those idiots manage to duplicate it. It's a terror weapon, pure and simple, there's no good reason at all why they should be looking into making more." The man shook his head sadly. "That's not something I can support, even if I work for the same government. It needs to be stopped."

After staring coldly at him for a few more uncomfortable seconds Yori nodded, her visible aura dying away. Chou relaxed as well. Both men felt much safer as a result, there had been the impression that at any moment sudden devastation could happen. Now they just looked annoyed. "Idiots," Yori muttered to herself. She studied him, then sighed. "Thank you for being honest with us. I think you're completely correct. Those damn things are horrific, they were the result of a lunatic trying to bring about the death of millions. We need to retrieve and destroy that one, along with any notes your mages may have made on it's construction, then impress upon them how much of a bad idea trying again would be." Shaking her head, she added, "I'm kind of surprised they haven't managed to trigger it. The mage who built them booby-trapped them. Your people are either quite good or very lucky."

"Add very arrogant, intolerant of non-mages, and generally pretty insufferable to that list and you've pretty much got the average MoM mage." Williamson half-snickered. "Some of them are all right but a lot of them are basically pricks." Yori chuckled.

"Sounds like a lot of mages everywhere. Right, I guess we're going to have to go and take their toy away from them before someone does something we all regret. Where is it?" Agent Naito cleared his throat, looking worried. She glanced at him.

"Ah, Yori? Could we possibly not cause an international incident? Please?" Reaching out she put her hand on his shoulder, grinning slightly.

"Don't worry, Agent. They'll never know what hit them." For some reason this didn't make him appear any happier. She snickered. "We'll go carefully. But you have to admit those things are too dangerous to be left lying around." Reluctantly he nodded.

"That's true. I just don't want to have to explain how you lot turned a foreign government building into a smoking hole in the ground." The small woman laughed.

"Oh, don't worry about that." Aiko grinned at him.

"Yes, when Yori really cuts loose there isn't even any smoke. Just glowing glass..." By now both Naito and Williamson were looking alarmed.

"Um, Aiko?" The brunette looked at her friend with an amused glint in her eyes.

"Yes, Yori?"
"Any chance you could stop helping?" The other girl giggled.

"Spoilsport." Shaking her head Yori turned back to Williamson.

"There shouldn't be any real trouble. So, where do we go? I assume it will be warded so we can't teleport in, we'll have to use more traditional methods." The MI5 agent explained the location of the MoM research building, which was fairly close, on the other side of the Thames a few miles away.

"How are we going to get in?" Tamiko asked curiously. "I'd think this would be a pretty high-security place and they're not going to be all that welcoming to unexpected visitors."

"I can get you in, I think," Williamson said. "My credentials allow access to the building. In fact, thinking about it..." He thought for a moment, then nodded. "That's probably the better option to try first. Hold on." Pulling his phone out he dialled a number, then spoke when it was answered. "Hi, Lucy. It's Harry Williamson, MI5. Yes, very well, thanks. Is the Minister available? We have a bit of a problem he could help with. It's rather urgent. Yes, I'll wait." Holding his hand over the microphone for a moment, he said quietly, "The Minister of Defence is someone I know fairly well. He's reasonably easy to deal with and quite sensible. Plus he really doesn't like the Minister for Magic at all." They waited quietly for thirty seconds or so, then he spoke again. "Oh, hello, Minister. It's Harry Williamson. Yes, that Harry. How are you, sir?" There as a pause. "Yes, I'm there now. The immediate emergency is over thanks to our colleagues from Japan. They were exceptionally efficient. Yes. I'll pass that on, thank you, sir. Yes, there was something else, we have a bit of a problem which I think you should know about." He briefly explained the situation as he'd told the Japanese contingent.

Once he stopped speaking there was a pause of several seconds, before the person on the other end of the line erupted in rage sufficiently loudly that he winced and pulled the phone away from his ear a little. The others could clearly hear a very angry voice shouting tinny. When the swearing died down he cautiously put the phone to his ear again. "You agree that this isn't a good idea, sir?" The Minister obviously did judging by the raised voice. "I think so too sir." He suddenly grinned. "I'd never call a superior that, sir, but I understand. Yes. They're not at all happy about it either. Yori would very much like to talk to the relevant people so she can explain just how disappointed she is. Yes indeed, sir." He laughed. "I think so as well. So we have your support, Minister? Thank you, sir. Yes, immediately. We'll meet you there. Ah, Sir? John Spence is here as well, he's getting very chummy with Commander Shipman from the Met." There was another outburst of anger. "I understand, Sir. Yes, it will be my pleasure. Good bye." He hung up, looking very satisfied as he put his phone away.

"Right. That went better than I expected. The Minister is extremely irritated about all this, he thinks it's a very dangerous idea leaving aside the fact that he should have been kept informed about it and wasn't. Quite an unusual politician, he actually understands his job. Anyway, he's given us his backing to do whatever is necessary to deal with the situation. He did ask that you refrain from causing any more damage than necessary, although for some reason he didn't forbid it entirely." Williamson smiled slightly nastily. "I think he read the report the PSIA sent about how you ladies dealt with the original terrorists. It may be he wants a demonstration..." Agent Naito groaned.

"Oh, god. Don't tell them that." Grinning, Yori looked at him.

"We'll be good. Probably."

"Oh, god."
"All right, now we just need transport. That's going to be a little difficult with the circus outside."
The MI5 man looked out the window of the restaurant to the crowd of emergency personnel still milling about in the road. Chou followed his gaze, then looked over her shoulder to where Captain Smith was sitting talking to Walton and Adams, eating some sandwiches.

"I think I know where we can get a vehicle," she said calmly, standing and walking over to the bomb disposal squad. Everyone watched as she talked for a minute or two, before returning with the three men following her. Yori dropped the shield, which had the effect of making all three soldiers stare as an entire table full of people suddenly became obvious in front of them. None of them could work out why they hadn't really noticed before. "Captain Smith is happy to give us a lift." Chou smiled at the captain who nodded back.

"The truck is big enough to carry everyone, we can get about a dozen people in it, more if they don't mind sitting on the floor."

"Thank you, Captain," Williamson said. "If you'll just excuse me for a moment I need to pass on a message." Standing, he walked over to Spence, who was looking at where they'd popped back into existence with a weird expression. The MI5 man's own face was filled with malicious enjoyment. Stopping next to the MoD man he talked quietly to him for a short time, the shorter man's face going more and more pale as he did. Eventually he stopped, appearing satisfied, before turning away. Spence looked like he'd just seen his first-born eaten by a tiger. When he got back to the table he looked at the curious expressions. "I enjoyed that. I don't think John did though. The Minister would like to have a very long talk with him."

The group headed out into the street, climbing into the army vehicle. Williamson sat in the front along with Adams who was driving to show him where to go, while the rest went in the back. Yori looked around at the equipment with interest, then down at the floor where several weapons crates were. She flipped one open with her toe seeing that Lieutenant Andrews had put the grenade launcher back into it. Curiously reaching down she pulled a grenade from the case, inspecting it closely, before putting it back. Captain Smith watched her but didn't say anything. The Japanese girl closed the case again. "Milkor MGL six shot 40mm grenade launcher, South African manufactured," she said casually, causing everyone to look at her. "I didn't think they were used by the British." Smith stared for a moment, then nodded.

"Generally, they're not. We have a few kicking around for evaluation, though. Lieutenant Andrews rather likes it and tends to check one out whenever he gets a chance. He came across them in the Gulf I believe, the Americans were using them." Yori rested her feet on the grenade launcher case, crossed at the ankle.

"Wrong ammunition for that type of demon, unfortunately. All the high explosive rounds would do is make it really angry."

"I noticed," the captain said, shuddering at the memory.

"You'd probably have better luck with incendiaries," she commented. He looked at her curiously.

"Would that have stopped it?"

"Nope. But it would have slowed it down for a few seconds more." The girl looked at him with a certain amusement. "Mind you, it would be even more pissed off about being set on fire than blown up." Agent Naito sighed a little.

"Yori, could you please stop terrifying everyone?" She grinned but stopped talking. Misaki snickered, peeling a banana she'd pulled from nowhere. Fumiko looked at her and muttered to herself. Her sister looked at her out of the corner of her eye with a small smile. Sergeant Adams drove much more slowly this time, although he had the flashing lights going. Traffic cleared out of the way in front of them, he only had to use the siren a few times when someone was a bit slow or unobservant. Twenty minutes after leaving the restaurant they pulled up in front of a complex of old buildings near the Thames, surrounding a large open courtyard. The entrance had a barrier across it with a guard in a small hut, who was watching them carefully as the truck stopped. Adams and Williamson looked at him, then each other. Just as Williamson was about to get out of the truck a black Rolls Royce with darkened windows pulled up behind them. Sticking his head out of the window he inspected it briefly. "Ah, the Minister is here. Good timing." He pulled his head back in and peered into the back of the truck. "Stay here, please, I'll go talk to him." Getting out he walked back to the car, opening the back door and climbing in. A few minutes later he emerged, going over to the guard and showing him an ID which made him salute and open the barrier. Adams slowly drove into the courtyard under the stone arch the barrier blocked, stopping to allow Williamson to get back in. The Rolls followed them inside. The people in the back of the truck could see the guard picking up a telephone as the barrier lowered again.

"Well, they know we're here," Smith said, looking at the others.

"It's probably best if you three stay in the truck, Captain," Williamson said apologetically. "You're not really cleared for all this. Our friends aren't either, but it will be easier to get an exception made for them under the circumstances." The captain nodded understandingly.

"No worries, sir. We'll wait, we do a lot of that. Good luck." Agent Naito climbed out of the vehicle followed by the magical girls, who looked around with interest.

"Hmm. Strongish wards, reasonably well done. It would certainly block a teleport in most cases as well as any surveillance." Yori was staring upwards. Naito and Williamson followed her gaze, not seeing anything. The other girls nodded, looking about at the buildings and one or two people who had been walking across the yard, but had stopped to gape at the oddly dressed visitors.

"Nothing we couldn't deal with if it was required," Chou commented idly, inspecting one of the buildings carefully. Yori smirked.

"Not even close." They all chuckled in a way that made the hair on Williamson's neck stand up. The black haired girl closed her eyes and slowly turned a complete circle, then pointed. "That way. About a hundred and fifty metres. Someone has tried to add some more shielding but they didn't do a very good job. It's maybe thirty metres down." She opened her eyes again, turning to look at the tall white-haired man who had stepped out of the Rolls and was approaching from behind her. She'd obviously known he was there.

"Yori, ladies, Agent Naito, this is Sir Alan Chalker, the Minister of Defence for the United Kingdom." Williamson made the introductions. "Minister, please meet Yori, Chou, Aiko, Tamiko, Misaki and Fumiko, our Japanese specialists. This is Agent Naito from the special techniques department of the PSIA in Japan." Sir Alan looked carefully at the seven people before smiling. Yori and Chou bowed slightly, followed a moment later by the other four.

"Minister. It's an honour." The black-haired young woman was very respectful. Sir Alan smiled, his rather severe face changing considerably, showing that there was an intelligent and good humoured man in there.

"The honour is mine. You and your friends have helped us immensely from what I hear. We are in your debt." Yori straightened up and grinned.
"Thank you. It's nice to be appreciated." With a grin of his own the Minister greeted the others respectfully, not batting an eye at the unusual attire of the four girls of Aiko's team. Turning to Williamson, his expression became much less happy.

"Hello, Harry. Thank you for bringing this to my attention. I'm not at all happy about all this. Robert has stepped over the line this time, I fear. I think we should go and deal with it."

"Sir." Williamson waved in the direction Yori had indicated. "Apparently Yori can sense the device in that building over there."

"Right, then. Let's go." Sir Alan led the way in the relevant direction, walking fast. Entering the large and rather ornate marble building he looked around for a moment, then nodded. "I believe that the research laboratories are reached through the back. There are several basements where the dangerous work is carried out."

"That agrees with my readings," Yori commented politely. "The device is approximately one hundred and twenty metres away in that direction, I'd say around twenty-five meters below us now." With another nod the Minister headed to the rear of the building. He didn't look very pleased. A couple of people stepped out of an office half-way down the corridor they were walking along, spotted him and his expression, then promptly ducked back inside the room they'd just come out of. Looking back Agent Naito smiled when he saw they were peering after the little group with worried expressions. They reached a bank of elevators with a guard stationed in front. He stared at them, looking Aiko and her girls up and down with a lascivious expression, before noticing Sir Alan glaring at him.

"Crap," he muttered to himself too quietly for the Minister to hear, although all the women did. Standing to attention he saluted. "Sir Alan. How can I help you?"

"By stepping aside, please," the Minister said. The guard looked apologetic.

"I'm very sorry, sir, but I was given orders by Minister Davenport himself that no one was allowed into these elevators without direct permission from him. No exceptions." Sir Alan began to go a funny colour.

"Look here, you do know who I am, I assume?" he snapped. The guard swallowed, paling slightly, but stood his ground.

"Of course, Minister. But I have my orders." About to start shouting, his complexion a rather unhealthy colour for a man of his age, Sir Alan felt a gentle touch on his arm. He looked around to see Chou standing next to him smiling calmly.

"Please calm down, Minister. Would you allow me to try?" He looked at the face of the young woman who was radiating serenity, relaxing slightly.

"Of course, my dear. Help yourself." Stepping back he waved her forward. Walking over to the curious guard she smiled at him.

"Hello, I'm Chou. It's very important that you let us past. There's an extremely dangerous device down there we need to dispose of." He looked at her, then at her companions.

"I really am sorry, miss, but I can't allow that." Reaching out she took his elbow gently.

"Are you completely sure?" she asked quietly. He nodded, then fell over, a smile on his face. Chou caught him deftly, lowering him to the ground and leaning him against the wall next to the elevators. Sir Alan and Agent Williamson gaped. Naito looked amused, he'd seen the brief flash of golden light from her hand.

"Ah, that was impressive," the Minister said slowly, staring at her. She looked slightly embarrassed. Yori and the others were grinning. "What on earth did you do?"

"I temporarily turned off his conscious mind, it's what we do when we're healing badly injured people to stop them feeling pain. Something like general anaesthesia but risk-free." She checked the man over then stood. "He'll be out for at least an hour unless we wake him up again."

"Most effective, my dear. Most effective indeed." Looking at the unconscious guard again he shook his head with a small smile, then walked over to the elevators and pressed the call button. The doors slid open immediately. Everyone entered the surprisingly large elevator. The panel on the inside was unlike a normal one, it had some sort of fingerprint reader above a keypad. Sir Alan thought for a moment then entered an eight digit code, while pressing the thumb on his left hand on the reader. It flashed, beeped, and the doors slid shut. The trip down only took fifteen seconds or so, although all the magical girls could sense they were now at least twenty metres below the surface. When the doors opened they revealed two corridors stretching off for a considerable distance at right angles to each other, the elevator being in a small room at the corner. Everything was painted brilliant white, the floor seemed to be tiled, while there were a number of cameras apparent attached to the ceiling. The corridors were well lit, although the source wasn't apparent. Yori looked around, ignoring the few people passing by who stopped and looked at them for a moment before moving on, having recognised Sir Alan.

"That way," she said, heading down the corridor to the left. Sir Alan quickly followed her, the others bringing up the rear.

"I should have guessed," the Minister said with a slight frown. "This is the way to Robert's private research lab. He was a research mage before entering government and likes to keep his hand in. I wonder if he's there?" After walking for a minute or so they reached a large set of armoured double doors in the right side of the corridor. A communications panel was inset in the wall beside the door, a small screen above a speaker grill with an illuminated button next to it, the lens of a camera visible above the button. The screen was displaying the words, 'Current Status: Locked'. Sir Alan pressed the button and waited. There was a faint beep but other than that nothing happened. After a minute or so he pressed it again. Once more it beeped, once more that was the only result.

"There are four people in there," Chou said. The Minister nodded, looking annoyed. Pressing the button he held it down. Nearly a minute later an angry voice came out of the speaker.

"Stop that! What do you want, we're busy." Leaning close to the microphone the Minister spoke into it.

"It's Sir Alan Chalker. Let us in, please." There was silence for a moment, then a different voice came.

"What do you want, Alan? We're at a critical point in an experiment. Something odd is going on and I don't have time for you."

"Open the door, Robert. I know you have something extremely dangerous in there that doesn't belong to us. It needs to be destroyed." A long pause came.

"No. This is very important. We've nearly succeeded in working out the functions of this device. Go away, I'll call you when we're done." Sir Alan fumed. He pressed the button again viciously.

"Robert, open this damn door right now!" The screen changed to show a rather florid face, one that clearly belonged to someone who didn't exercise enough. It looked furious.

"Look, Alan, just fuck off, will you? You're not coming in and that's final. This doesn't concern you, it's Mage Business." The way he said it one could hear the capitalisation. The screen reverted to it's previous display, the face disappearing, then the text changed to read, 'Current Status: Security Active, Lockdown Active'. A number of metallic clunks from inside the wall made it clear the door was far more securely locked now. Yori exchanged glances with Chou, then both of them inspected the door.

"Some fairly heavy wards just went up. There are some huge deadbolts in the walls as well that just engaged." The black-haired woman looked up at the tall official with a small smile. "He doesn't seem to want us to get in." Sir Alan nodded sourly.

Glancing down at he asked, "Can you get in anyway?"

"Of course," she replied, dark amusement in her eyes. "It'll cause some damage though." He thought for a moment, then grinned nastily. Stepping back he waved at the door.

"Do your worst," he invited. Agent Naito let out a groan while the other girls laughed. Yori grinned at him.

"Oh, trust me, you don't want my worst. I assume you'd like a building left afterwards?" Suddenly slightly pale he nodded. "No need for anything overly dramatic," she added, turning to Chou. "I'll kill the wards, you do the door?" The blonde nodded with a faint smile. Stepping to the side Yori looked at the door for a moment. "OK, the wards are suppressed." Chou moved into position, inspected the door for a moment, then produced a pair of yard-long golden energy blades. With a dazzlingly quick motion she pushed them through the door at the top centre, running them across, down, and back along the bottom. There was a yelp from inside, loud enough to be heard through the thick door. Dismissing the blades she put a hand on each half of the door and pushed slightly. With a creak the doors fell inwards, hitting the floor with an echoing crash. Sir Alan stared, exchanging a glance with Williamson, before shrugging.

"That works." Chou moved out of the way, waving him forwards with a small bow. Smiling he walked into the room. Inside the man who had been on the screen was stomping towards them while behind him two women and a man were staring at the people entering the large laboratory.

"What the fuck do you think you're doing, Alan?" the short rotund man screamed in fury. "How did you do that? Who are all these people?" Reaching them he looked up at the taller man from much too close, prodding him in the chest. "This isn't anything to do with you or the MoD. We have a very critical experiment going on, we need undisturbed peace. Now get out!" He yelled the last part at the top of his voice. Agent Naito looked at Yori, who returned the glance, looking amused. He felt that the fat little man was nowhere near as worrying as the young woman could be even on an off day. She studied the Minister of Magic for a moment, then walked past him as if he wasn't there, heading for the bench in the middle of the room on which a portal bomb could be seen, its energy storage sphere glowing a virulent green.

"Hey! You there, girl! Where do you think you're going?" Minister Davenport whirled, charging after the black-haired woman. Everyone watched as she approached the bench and the three people standing around it staring at her. "Hey! Pay attention to me, damn it!" The mage caught up with her, grabbing her elbow, while pulling out his wand with his other hand. She stopped, slowly looking around at him with her violet eyes. Her gaze dropped to his wand.

"Ah. I remember now, you guys use sticks." He looked extremely insulted.
"It's not a stick, it's a wand. A very powerful wand." She shrugged.

"Whatever. Point it at me, I'll take it away from you and put it somewhere it's going to really hurt getting it back from." The girl looked down at his hand on her elbow, then fixed him with her gaze again. He blanched at the look in her eyes. After a long moment he dropped his hand, sweating and pale, allowing her to continue moving to the bench. Sir Alan walked over to him, watching her as she stopped, inspecting the device carefully.

"Bad idea, Robert," he said in a low voice. Chou walked past him and joined her partner. They glanced at each other, then looked at the three mages watching them with worried expressions, unsure what was going on.

"You idiots are about five minutes away from a very unpleasant death," Yori said conversationally. "You triggered the fail-safe timer. The device will activate very soon." She looked around the room with an interested expression, before turning back to them. "Down here you won't stand a chance, there's nowhere to run to." The mages looked at the device with horror, then back at her. All of them began to back away. Minister Davenport went white. The Minister of Defence looked at the MI5 man, then they both stared at Agent Naito, finding him to be less worried that they would have expected under the circumstances. The four magical girls standing next to him looked positively relaxed.

Yori looked silently at the mages, before turning to stare at Minister Davenport. Studying him for a moment she looked unimpressed. "You really do seem to have a death wish." Dismissing him she turned back to the other three. "Which one of you had the bright idea to bring this thing back here, rather than letting us know like the warning said?" Both women looked at the tall thin brown-haired man, who looked nervous. "Well done. Very well done indeed." She shook her head in annoyance. He glared at her sarcasm despite his worry. The red-headed woman on the left reached out and hit his shoulder.

"Thanks a whole bunch, Colin." She turned to the Japanese girl who was watching them curiously. "What do we do?" Yori smiled suddenly.

"Oh, that's easy." She reached out and touched the sphere at the heart of the mass of tubes and components with one finger. The roiling green energy in the sphere faded quickly away, leaving a transparent crystal ball behind. All the mages gaped.

"What the hell did you do?" The other woman, a blonde of Scandinavian appearance, stared at the device and the girl alternately. "Where did the energy go?"

"I pulled it out of the storage sphere and absorbed it, of course. It's harmless now." All three of them looked at her in stunned amazement. She picked the device up and tossed it in the air, catching it again. Everyone winced involuntarily. With a smile she turned to Sir Alan. "Disaster averted. Now we just need to destroy it, along with any notes or other information these people made on it." Minister Davenport suddenly exploded in rage.

"No! I forbid it! That device is groundbreaking, there is a lot we can learn from it." Sir Alan glared at him.

"Robert, don't be an idiot. One of those things is responsible for killing sixty-five people less than four hours ago. Harrods has been practically destroyed! If it wasn't for Yori, Chou, and the others, we could have had hundreds of casualties at least. Those things are too dangerous to keep around, they have absolutely no defensive purpose, they're purely terror weapons. I will not allow you to do any more work on this in any way, do you understand me?" Both men were going red in fury.
"You won't allow me? Just who the hell do you think you are? I'm the Minister of Magic, not you. You're not even a mage! The Ministry of Magic doesn't answer to you, it answers to me. And I say we need to study that thing." A smooth female voice came from behind him.

"OK," it said. He turned to see the Japanese girl looking at him expressionlessly. She held the device up, touching the sphere, which immediately began glowing purple. His eyes widened. "Here you go." Suddenly it was flying through the air towards him. Frantically he grabbed at it, managing to catch it. When he looked up he saw that the blonde girl had guided Sir Alan a few feet away and the other one was staring at him with a small smile. Slowly he became aware that something else had happened, looking around quizzically. When he worked it out he suddenly looked sick. There was now an appallingly powerful set of wards surrounding him. Using his mage sight he looked at them, stunned. There was no way he could possibly crack them without hours of work.

"Feel free to study it," Yori said, black amusement in her voice. "You've got, oh, maybe three and a half minutes. I'm interested to see how much you learn in that time."

"Um, Yori? Could I talk to you for a moment?" Agent Naito sounded worried. She looked at him. "Sure. In about four minutes."

Misaki was snickering, eating an apple she'd pulled from somewhere. Aiko and Tamiko were leaning on a bench watching with interest, while Fumiko seemed to be checking her messages. Chou sighed a little but made no move towards her partner.

"I'm not sure this is a good idea," Naito said, staring at the man inside the wards, which were visibly slightly glowing. The other mages watched in horror. The amount of power in the wards was terrifying, it made the ones surrounding the building itself look like rice paper.

"He said he wanted to study the portal bomb. Since it's going to activate soon, it would be irresponsible to allow the demon that will come through loose, so I just made sure it couldn't get out. He can study it all he wants now and everyone else is safe."

"But he'll get eaten!"

"Oh, I expect so." She returned his look calmly. After a second she looked casually at the mage inside the wards, then at the device he was holding in trembling hands. "About two minutes now, I'd say. Have you learned anything yet?" The Minister of Magic stared at her, then at the portal bomb in his hands.

"Let me out. You've made your point," he said quietly. She walked closer, looking him in the eyes. "Are you sure?" she asked politely. "I can give you more time. Up to a little more than a minute and a half. You'll be quite busy then." He nodded, pale and dripping with sweat, his hands shaking. "OK." The wards vanished. Moving closer she took the device from him, reabsorbing the energy again. He relaxed so suddenly he nearly collapsed. Sir Alan, who had been watching with a mix of interest and worry, sighed gently. He hadn't been sure she wasn't serious. Hearing the sound she glanced at him, the look in her eyes making him shiver. She nodded a little, smiling very slightly, before turning to the other mages. "Notes, computer information, printouts, anything you have. On that bench, right now." They stared for a moment, then hastened to comply. Within a few minutes the bench was covered with a number of notebooks and other research items. She put the deactivated portal bomb on top of the pile. Chou gestured for everyone to retreat to the other side of the room. Walking over to them Yori looked at the four mages, then deliberately turned and raised her hand. Standing beside her Chou erected a cylindrical ward around the table, the immaterial barrier softly shimmering a transparent golden shade. She nodded to her companion.

With no fanfare a ravening beam of purple-white light roared across the laboratory, penetrating the warded circle and striking the table. A loud thump shook the room hard as everything inside the barrier dissolved into subatomic particles with a brilliant flash. The magical girls didn't move, watching with interest, while everyone else ducked. "Fucking hell!" Sir Alan squeaked, then looked embarrassed. The mages went an unhealthy green colour when they looked up at the place the table had been. There was nothing left other than a shallow glassy crater in the floor, glowing a bright orange that was fading as they watched. When Chou dropped the barrier a wave of heat rolled across the room at them.

"Good god," Williamson whispered. Agent Naito looked at him, nodding. He knew exactly what the man was feeling. Things like this made him think he didn't really know these girls at all. Satisfied, Yori nodded in approval.

"Right. That should be the end of it. Unless you happen to have found another one?" She gave the three mages and the Minister of Magic a hard stare. They shook their heads violently. "Good. You know what to do if you do find another one?" They all nodded frantically. "Very good." Turning to the Minister of Defence she smiled.

"It's been a pleasure meeting you, Sir Alan. I'm sorry for the theatrics but some people take a lot of convincing. My apologies for the damage to the floor as well." He glanced at the crater and shrugged.

"I'm not worried, it doesn't come out of my budget." This made her grin.

"Fair enough." Shaking his out-thrust hand she added, "You know how to get hold of us if one of those damn things does pop up. I don't think it will, to be honest I'm very surprised that two of them were in London in the first place. At least there are only three left now." He shook Chou's hand as well.

"Thank you all for helping us. I'm sorry we had to go through this last little exercise, but all in all I think everything worked out as well as we could have hoped for under the circumstances, entirely due to you people. Once again, you have the gratitude of the British government." All the magical girls bowed a little. Yori turned to the others.

"Right, guys, I think it's time to go home. Mr Williamson? Could you make sure that you pass on our best wishes to Captain Smith and his team? Also Lieutenant Andrews and his squad, and Doctor O'Connor and Roslyn Venn the paramedic. It's been a pleasure meeting you all, even under these conditions. Hopefully we can meet again without all the chaos one day." Williamson grinned at her.

"Of course I will. Thanks for your help. If there's ever anything I can do for you let me know." He handed her one of his own, non-magical cards. Putting it away after glancing at it she smiled.

"I will." Looking at Agent Naito she asked, "Is there anything else we need to do that I've missed?" He shook his head after a moments thought.

"Not that I can think of. Get rid of demons, save the survivors, terrify everyone you encounter, destroy any portal bombs. I think you hit the high points." She looked amused. He was still slightly shaky from the last few minutes, the destruction of the device and all the notes had been rather dramatic. It wasn't something he was likely to forget any time soon.

"OK. Let's go home. I'm ready for bed." Aiko and her girls walked over to join her in the middle of "I'm hungry," Misaki said. Fumiko stared at her.

"You're always hungry." Her sister shrugged, eating another apple. Sir Alan smiled, he got the impression this was a running joke between them. Agent Naito said his goodbyes to his MI5 counterpart, then bowed to the Defence minister, before standing next to the six young woman.

"Better close your eyes, it's pretty bright when we teleport out," Aiko warned. She glanced at Yori. "Are the wards neutralised?" The other girl looked around for a moment then all the mages gasped as they felt the wards for the entire building simply go dead.

"Yep. They'll come back in about ten seconds." Everyone waved, then in a brilliant flash of soundless light, the seven foreigners vanished. Sir Alan opened his eyes, looking around the room in wonder. Even knowing the little he did about magic the events of the last half hour seemed rather strange. He exchanged a look with Agent Williamson, who looked back at him, then smiled a little.

"Pretty impressive."

"That's an understatement." They turned to look at the three mages and the Magic Minister, who was staring at the crater in the middle of his lab with the strangest expression either of them had ever seen. "Robert?" The man looked at him. "I think we need to have a very long talk."
"...death toll stands at sixty-five, with sixty-seven people reported to have been seriously injured. Minor injuries are still being assessed but we have learned the authorities believe that some three hundred and thirty-one people described as 'walking wounded' escaped the scene of the disaster before it was brought to an end. Costs of the damage are estimated to exceed eighty-seven million pounds sterling, which is approximately one hundred and forty six billion yen. The internationally famous Harrods luxury store, the largest department store in Europe, which was founded in 1834 and counts the British royalty amongst it's customers, has been extensively damaged in the disaster. The owners have stated that they intend to rebuild the store with an estimated opening time given as late summer." Nabiki watched the news report with wide eyes, the aerial footage of the scene showing just how wide-spread the damage was. Smoke was still rising from a few places, while crushed vehicles littered the street along with piles of rubble, interspersed with clusters of emergency response people. The view switched back to the reporter, an attractive woman in her early thirties standing near a barrier placed across the street, beyond which the same scene could be seen from a different angle, the evening dimness lit by flashing blue lights.

"The cause of the disaster is still unclear. A number of different stories have emerged, ranging from an IRA bomb to a gas explosion, with more fanciful descriptions of huge monsters rampaging in the street." She smiled, injecting a note of humour into the report. "Some of the stories sound more like the type of thing that happens in certain wards of Tokyo. My enquiries even suggested that bystanders claim to have seen several young women wearing," she looked at a notepad she was holding and read from it, "Clothing that would be out of place on a beach in the middle of summer, never mind in the middle of London in the winter." Lowering her notebook, she smiled again briefly. "No doubt further details will become clear as investigations into this terrible event continue. An emergency session of Parliament has been called to discuss what happen here this morning, and it is expected a committee will be set up to oversee the process of explaining what happened, who, if anyone, was responsible, and what can be done to prevent such a thing happening again."

Akane glanced at her sister who was staring at the TV with shock, mixed with worry. Shampoo followed her gaze. After a moment they went back to watching the early news. "Commander Geoffrey Shipman of the Metropolitan Police is expected to make a statement later tonight. We have requested interviews with the police but they refused to speak to us, saying that we would have to wait until the press conference at eight PM local time. Witnesses we have managed to talk to have told us that the first emergency services on the scene were bomb disposal experts from the Army. Reports of heavy weapons fire immediately afterwards have been dismissed by the authorities as secondary explosions from car fuel tanks. We will continue to report as this story unfolds. This is Kaori Saito, reporting from London for the Japan News Network." The broadcast switched back to the studio in Tokyo.

"Thank you, Kaori." The mid-fifties new anchor, a well respected face of news broadcasting, turned to face the studio camera directly from where he had been watching the large screen to the side. "Kaori Saito live in London. We'll be speaking to her again during the midday news." The anchor paused, touching the discreet earpiece he was wearing, his face professionally neutral, then looked down at the monitor built into his desk, out of view of the camera. "New information has just come in. We have managed to acquire a segment of video taken by an amateur reporter in London as the disaster unfolded. We apologise in advance for the quality of the images." The view switched to a jerky shot of the same street that had been in the previous report, obviously from an extreme telephoto view at significant range. A large number of emergency vehicles could be seen around the area, the unknown camera operator moving around trying to get a view between them, breathing heavily. Vague mutters in English could just be heard over the sound of sirens in the distance, as more vehicles arrived.

After a few seconds the operator managed to find a position where the camera had a mostly unobstructed view down the street. Several figures could be seen moving about although it was very difficult to make out details as the resolution of the image was too poor. Four of them were quite large and appeared to be dressed in olive-green clothing, suggesting they were military, while the others were smaller and less visible. The camera operator obviously found a place to rest his machine, the image suddenly stabilising and clearing up noticeably. Just as he put it down a large cloud of steam or smoke shot from the building that had been identified as the remains of the Harrods store, causing him to swear. The studio editor almost managed to bleep it out but not quite.

Now that the image had improved it could be seen that the other figures in the shot appeared to be female. The clothing they were wearing was familiar to everyone in the Tendo living room.

"Shh! Be quiet and we might find out," Akane replied quickly. The camera operator tried zooming in, but the image became even more grainy and a mutter of irritation was heard. The camera started shaking again as it was picked up, the person holding it clearly moving closer. Twenty or so seconds later he put it down again, this time from a position sufficiently close that the view was much improved. As he did one of the females in the shot picked up the back of a large van, holding it a metre and a half in the air, causing him to swear in shock again. The bleep was more accurate this time. The military person who was accompanying her dropped to his knees and disappeared under the vehicle, reappearing pulling a person, apparently male and unconscious. Dragging him clear of the van he went back under, returning with another figure who seemed to be injured. The female holding the van up dropped it then massaged her hands, before bending over the two casualties. Shortly afterwards she picked up one of them while the soldier collected the other, both of them walking out of camera shot. The operator turned to follow them but the scene was suddenly obscured as a large policeman appeared and put out his hand.

"Sorry, mate, you can't film here," his voice came, his hand over the lens of the camera. An argument could be heard starting as the scene switched back to the studio. The anchor was looking at the big screen to the side with his eyebrows up, seeming slightly surprised, which was an unusual expression for him.

Turning back to camera he said gravely, "Our experts tell me that the young ladies seen in that clip, based on the uniforms, would appear to be the members of one of the more discreet and professional Magical Girl teams that operate out of the ward of Minato. There is currently no word on why they are in the UK, or how they got there so fast. We will endeavour to find out more for our next report. On a personal note, it makes me proud to see our home-grown heroines helping with an international issue such as this. Now, over to Seiji Himura in Osaka with a report on the rash of incidents there in recent weeks apparently involving a small piglet and considerable property destruction." Picking up the remote control Nabiki turned the TV off, staring at it in wonder, before looking to her sister and the Amazon, who appeared equally shocked.

"Wow." Akane didn't seem to be able to think of anything better to say. Nodding, Nabiki looked at her.

"That's a good summation."

"I wonder if Yori and Chou were there as well?" Shampoo asked, "They seem to be good friends with Aiko and the others."
Akane smiled. "I'm sure they were. If anyone could help it would be them." She seemed certain of her words, making her sister look at her with amusement. "They're probably the ones who stopped whatever it was in the first place." Nabiki was pretty sure she was right but said nothing.

"We'll have to wait to find out, I guess," Nabiki replied, picking up her tea and finding to her annoyance it had gone cold while they watched the news. When the report had come on she'd been far too engrossed to do anything but watch. Getting up she went into the kitchen to make another pot. While she waited for the kettle to boil she stood in the doorway and looked at her sister and the other girl. "What were you two going to do today, so early?" she asked curiously. Akane seemed pleased.

"Shampoo is going to teach me some Amazon techniques." Raising her eyebrows the middle sister stared at them.

"Does Cologne know? I thought that the Amazon techniques were supposed to be secret." Shampoo nodded, smiling.

"Great-grandmother knows. It was her idea, actually. She feels that I'm getting rusty because I'm not practising enough, but there isn't anyone around here these days tough enough to really give me a workout properly except for Mousse, and his techniques are almost entirely based around weapons. I need a sparring partner for hand to hand as well. So she thinks I should train Akane in the Amazon methods, or as much as she will be able to learn at this point in her training, which benefits both of us." The Amazon giggled. "She said to think of it like a Christmas present for Akane." Nabiki smirked.

"I suspect after a few hours of you beating her black and blue it won't look so much like a gift as a punishment..." Akane gave her a dark look while Shampoo laughed.

"I'll go easy on her. To start with." Returning to the kitchen as the kettle boiled, Nabiki returned with the tea and poured them all a cup.

"Try not to kill each other. Or destroy the Dojo." She gave Akane a significant look, making her sister drop her eyes and blush.

"I'll be good, 'Biki."

"And try to keep your temper, will you? It's so much better now it's amazing, but you know you still tend to get overworked sometimes. This is a remarkable opportunity to learn something not many people will, so treat it with respect." The blue-haired girl nodded, smiling.

"I know. I really want to learn, I know I'm strong and quick, but Shampoo knows so many things I don't." She glanced at her friend. "Maybe you can teach me about swords and other weapons as well." Shampoo looked at her with slight worry, then at Nabiki who also seemed a little scared.

"Um..."

"That might not be a good idea right at the moment, sis," Nabiki said soothingly, while thinking, 'God, that's a terrifying idea. Akane with a sword? She's bad enough bare-handed...'. Her sister seemed mildly disappointed but nodded.

"Perhaps you're right. I should learn more about hand to hand fighting first, I guess." Somewhat relieved Shampoo and Nabiki shared another glance before the Amazon woman finished off her tea and stood up.

"Come on, Akane, let's go out to the Dojo and get started." Smiling, the other young woman also finished her tea, jumping to her feet and following her friend out into the snow. Nabiki watched them go with amused interest.

'I never thought that would happen,' she mused as she cleared the cups and teapot away. 'Shampoo and Akane becoming good friends was weird enough, but Cologne deciding to trust her with the Amazon fighting techniques? Never in a million years...?' Shaking her head she put the various items in the dishwasher and started it before going up to her room to check online for more news about the Harrods attack. She read everything that was available on both Japanese and English-language websites, not finding out very much more. Her calls to her sister and brother-in-law went to voicemail. Leaving a message to call her back when they could, she began working on an assignment for her degree, deciding to get it out of the way early. It was too cold outside to do anything much, the amount of snow being a bit unusual for Tokyo although not unheard of, while there weren't any jobs around the house that needed doing at the moment. Sighing, worried, she opened the first book and began reading.

"Tetsuo! Come here, quickly!" The call from his wife brought Sergeant Harada from his study into their apartment living room, where she was watching the lunchtime news. "Look. Isn't that those magical girls you know?" she asked, pointing at the screen. Watching for a moment, he sat beside her.

"It looks like them. The uniforms are right, but they never come out on images, their magic stops it somehow." They listened to the report as the anchor announced another video clip that had come to light. This showed what he recognised as Yori and Chou, accompanied by what had to be Aiko and her girls, along with a couple of British soldiers and Agent Naito going into the destroyed London store. None of the features of the six women came out on the video at all, they were just a mass of blurs, quite unlike the familiar digital effect added by the studios to protect the identity of someone in a report. He shook his head slowly and respectfully. Their magic was very comprehensive and effective.

"It's horrible, what happened in London. You went there, once, didn't you say? Did you ever go to this Harrods store?" He looked at his wife with a smile.

"No, although I heard about it from some friends. It's apparently an expensive place to shop but it's got a good reputation. You can buy almost anything there." Turning back to the TV he watched the woman reporting from London, summarising the press report the police there had just held. "Hmm. A terrorist attack. So that's what they're calling it? I guess it's basically true, but it's hiding quite a lot. Like a damn great demon eating people." His wife shuddered.

"Tetsuo, that's a horrible thing to say." He smiled at her, holding her close.

"Don't worry, Emiko, I'm sure Yori and the others have dealt with it. I haven't heard from the PSIA agent since he called last night to get in touch with them, but he'll probably let me know how it went. If not Yori or Chou will." They kept watching the report.

"It has been confirmed by official sources that six young ladies from Minato with special abilities, so-called Magical Girls, went to London to help with this disaster. The aid of the PSIA was requested by MI5 due to previous dealing with the terrorist group blamed for yesterday's attack in London and they called in the girls as the situation required the talents they possessed. Amongst those talents reportedly are impressive healing abilities. Two of the Japanese team are being praised by a number of sources in the UK for healing some sixty to seventy casualties with life threatening injuries and at least one doctor is claiming that they are the reason the death toll was so low under the circumstances." The view switched to an interview with a tall ginger-headed man wearing a reflective jacket with a red cross on the back and the breast. Scrolling text under the picture identified him as 'Dr. Kevin O'Connor, Trauma Specialist'.

"Doctor O'Connor, you had first-hand contact with these young women immediately after the survivors were rescued." He nodded, looking seriously at the reporter holding the microphone towards him.

"That's correct." The reporter pointed the mic to herself.

"Can you describe what they did, please?" She held it out for him again. A moment passed while he seemed to be carefully choosing his words.

"It's not something I can really tell you, it's more something you'd have to see first hand. I can say that the things I saw this morning rank as probably the most impressive I have ever experienced. You as a nation should be very proud of those young women." The unseen translator speaking Japanese on his behalf didn't seem to get across the passion in his words, based on his expression and tone of voice. The reporter looked both pleased and somewhat irritated.

"Thank you, Doctor, the people of Japan will undoubtedly be pleased about the praise. But can you say anything more about what they actually did, and how?" She held the mic out again. He shrugged slightly helplessly.

"Like I said, it's very difficult to get across quite how impressive it was. I saw wounds that were... life-altering... healed in minutes, in a process I have no understanding of at all. There's no denying the effectiveness of it though. Speaking to a number of the people they helped those two young women healed broken bones, serious burns, internal organ damage, even a case of cataracts that had no connection with the disaster. Without them I am certain that at least two dozen further fatalities would have occurred. I only wish my own abilities were anywhere near what they displayed." He seemed to run out of words. The reporter waited for a moment, then put the microphone to her mouth.

"Thank you for your time, Doctor." He nodded, while she turned to camera. "Well, as you can see, Doctor O'Connor at least is very impressed with the abilities of the girls from Tokyo. We have tried to get interviews with a number of the people that they apparently healed but so far none of them have agreed to talk to us. One soldier who was present during the disaster, speaking anonymously because he was not authorised to be interviewed, has said that he would be honoured to have any of them by his side in any battle no matter what the circumstances. It seems that six young women from Japan have made quite an impression here in England. More as this story develops.

"Thank you, Kaori," the anchor said, turning back to the camera. He cracked a very small smile. "Kaori Saito live in London, where apparently several young women from Tokyo have been showing the effectiveness of Japanese magical abilities. Little is known about the six girls in the report, although the names of two of them may be familiar to viewers from previous reports. Yori and Chou have made a name for themselves over the last two years as being very effective in handling not only supernatural incursions but also bringing under control some of the more spectacular excesses of the other magically powered guardians of the community in Minato. Since they became active in the ward collateral damages have plummeted by an estimated ninety-two percent, while the number of demon attacks has dropped by close to sixty percent. Indeed, some observers have claimed that a number of the alleged 'demons' are now engaged in trading with certain luxury food wholesalers, as difficult as that may be to believe. Our experts are divided on the possibility, although figures show that sales of chocolate, coffee, and ice cream in the Minato area are up nearly one thousand percent in the last year. Make of that what you will." He smiled again, only a little.

"Now, back to Seiji Himura in Osaka with more on that bizarre 'demonic piglet' story. Over to you, Seiji." Harada listened to the report from Osaka with half an ear, turning the TV off after a minute or so. His wife glanced at his thoughtful face.

"Yori is a friend of yours, isn't she?" He nodded slightly.

"I suppose you could call it that. I don't know either of them very well, I don't think anyone does, they keep very much to themselves, but both she and Chou are remarkable people. Very effective, very dangerous, very trustworthy." He looked down at her leaning against his side. "I agree with that soldier. I'd be happy to have either of them with me in any operation." The woman he was holding smiled.

"Are they pretty?" Startled, he chuckled.

"Well, to be honest, yes, they're both very attractive. But I think they're both very involved as well. Yori at least isn't the sort of person who seems to relish the attentions of anyone else, and definitely not men." His wife nodded understandingly.

"Ah. I see." She was silent for a moment. "So they're no danger to me." He grinned at her smiling face.

"No, Emiko, they're no risk to you. Unless you turn out to be a demonic invader of some sort. Then you might be in trouble." She poked him in the ribs, giggling, as he hugged her.

Cologne and Mousse watched the evening report with interest. The aerial view of the location of Harrods showed there was still a lot of debris spread across the street, lit by the rising sun, with a number of large flat-bed trucks and a couple of cranes slowly removing the damaged vehicles and the rubble. The police presence was less obvious than previous reports had shown although the site was still cordoned off and guarded. "...worked through the night to clear the road to traffic. Tailbacks have caused chaos in the area for many kilometres around the site of the attack, both because of a major route into the city being closed and because of people trying to come and see it for themselves. Police are asking sight-seers, tourists, and anyone else without business in the area to stay away, warning that it is dangerous as there may be secondary devices buried in the rubble. Bomb disposal experts and sniffer dogs have been sweeping the area most of the night, although so far nothing has been discovered." The Amazon elder shook her head.

"They certainly seem to be trying to get across the idea it was some sort of conventional attack," she said with mildly irritated amusement. "Clearly it was nothing of the sort. I'd say it was more likely to be the result of a very nasty demon of some sort." Mousse nodded, listening to the TV carefully.

"I doubt Yori, Chou, and those other girls would be there if there wasn't some sort of magical disaster. From what I know of them, which isn't much admittedly, they're very effective in such things." His elder grinned suddenly.

"You haven't met them. I have, although I haven't seen them fight, but based on their power signatures there aren't a lot of demons that would stand much of a chance. Very impressive young ladies and not a little worrying." The near-sighted warrior looked at her curiously. She almost sounded slightly intimidated. Shaking his head a little he looked back to the news report.
"...remains of the device indicate it was filled with some sort of hallucinogenic gas, which eyewitness reports say appeared to be glowing green. This, we are told, is the source of the reports of a giant insect-like monster that some bystanders claim they saw. Experts we have talked to deny knowledge of such a gas and suggest it could be some new designer drug, possibly based on banned military technology from the break-up of the Soviet Union a decade ago. We are told that it must also have contained a significant explosive charge to have caused so much damage to the building, although one expert claimed it could have been quite a small device planted on a gas main to maximise the damage. The terrorist group blamed for planting the device was a previously unknown offshoot of Aum Shinriko, which apparently consisted of a small number of people, most of whom were arrested in Tokyo some months ago. A few members were killed in Los Angeles last year after a number of deaths there, sparking the man-hunt which led to the capture of the remaining terrorists. Unconfirmed reports suggest that there may have been a Magical Girl involvement with that attack as well, although so far we have no word on whether this was the same six girls who were spotted in London yesterday. Since the entire group is apparently behind bars at the current time, the assumption is that the device was planted some time ago, presumably on a delayed action mechanism of some type. This technique has been used by terrorists before, most notably in the IRA bombing of the Grand Hotel in the English town of Brighton in 1984 during a political conference. In that case, the bomb was planted nearly a month before it detonated."

"I wonder how much of this is true and how much is speculation," Mousse commented. Cologne shrugged.

"Difficult to say. I would imagine that the authorities in the UK are going to cover up anything they find either embarrassing or worrying, which for a demon attack could be a lot of it. So far I haven't heard anything I'd say outright was a lie except for that idiotic hallucinogenic gas idea, which is clearly a cover story to allow them to dismiss claims of a demon. Mind you, to the average person with no knowledge of magic it's probably a reasonably believable story." The young man looked at her, then back to the TV.

"If it was some sort of device on a timer, could there be any more?" he asked. She glanced at him.

"That's an unpleasant idea. It's certainly possible. I hope not, though. I've never been to the UK, but I wouldn't wish what happened on them or anyone else." Echoing their thoughts, the report concluded.

"The special session of Parliament is still on-going, but so far we have learned that a committee has been set up to examine the possibility of more such devices in the UK. Extra security sweeps have been ordered for all potential targets including large public buildings, the tube underground rail system, all railway stations and airports, and major sporting venues. Official sources are downplaying the risk to the public, saying that they are sure it was a one-off attack, but it is clear the British government is taking no chances. More later as this story continues. This is Kaori Saito, reporting from London for the Japan News Network."

The two Amazons listened to the remaining part of the story, before Mousse got up and went to look out the window into the evening. The snow on the roofs of the buildings reflected light from the street lamps, turning the entire scene into a postcard. "Hey, it's snowing again. That's unusual for Nerima, even at this time of year." Cologne joined him, shivering at the sight.

"I'm glad to be living somewhere with central heating on a night like this," she said to herself, looking slightly embarrassed when the young man overheard and grinned at her. She bopped him with her staff, making him wince slightly but not stopping the grin. Walking back to the TV he picked up the remote, changing the channel in the middle of the next report.
"... out of nowhere, smashed through three walls and went right into the hot springs. It was wearing a bandanna around its..." He flipped around before settling on an old episode of 'Cheers'.

"Hmm. I haven't seen this one," Cologne said, sitting down again. "Go and make some popcorn, duck boy," she ordered. He sighed, heading down the stairs to the kitchen.
Chapter 35

Grabbing her phone the instant it rang, Nabiki checked the name on the display before answering it. "Are you guys all right?" she asked frantically. "It's been two days since that London thing. I was getting really worried!"

"We're fine, sister," Kasumi's voice said calmly. "There was quite a lot of follow-up work to do in reports to Agent Naito's superiors, then we were all very tired, at least mentally, so we went to bed for the day. Aiko and the other girls stayed here. Would you like to come over?"

"Damn right I would. The usual place?" The middle sister could almost hear her older sibling nodding.

"Yes. Ten minutes?"

"I'll be there." Disconnecting the phone she dropped it into her pocket, then looked around the room for a moment, grabbing a small backpack and putting a change of clothes into it. Trotting downstairs she looked into the living-room, finding her father and Genma engaged in yet another game of Shogi. Walking past them she went into the kitchen, where Nodoka was poking through the refrigerator with an expression of distaste on her face. "Auntie, Rika and Maiko invited me over for the afternoon, and possibly tonight as well. I've got to hurry to catch the train." The older woman looked up at her, smiling.

"That's nice, dear. Please give them my best wishes. I hope whatever they had to rush off for the other day got settled all right." She glanced back into the refrigerator, then closed the door with a slight shudder. Nabiki looked at her oddly for a moment.

"What's wrong?" she asked. Nodoka sighed.

"I found some leftovers from one of Akane's 'cooking' episodes right at the back. I can't face dealing with it right now, aside from anything else the net has a hole in it from last time. I don't know what I'll do if it gets loose again." The middle sister winced, remembering vividly the previous occasion the net had been required.

"Ah. Pity we don't have a cat." Grinning, the auburn-haired woman shook her head.

"I don't think that would work, either the cat would run, or poison itself. Or possibly get eaten. Anyway, you run along and have a good time. I'll tell Akane where you've gone."

"Is she still in the Dojo with Shampoo?" Nabiki asked curiously.

"Yes. All day yesterday, and most of today. They seem to be having fun although both of them looked a bit battered last time I saw them." Shaking her head with amusement, Nabiki left the kitchen, putting her heavy coat and gloves on, then pulling on her boots, before venturing into the blowing snow. It was still very cold, the wind having picked up in the last few hours causing the snow to drift deeply against the windward side of obstructions. A number of children were risking hypothermia playing in the crisp white powder, bringing memories of doing the same with her mother many years before to the brunette, as she walked past them with a smile. Reaching the alley that had become their standard discreet teleportation point, she waited for a couple of minutes, before Aiko suddenly appeared, shivered, and teleported out again within seconds. Slightly startled by the sudden jump into the apartment hallway Nabiki staggered a little before catching herself.

"Hell, warn me when you're going to do that, will you, Aiko?" she asked with some irritation. The other young woman smiled, stamping snow off her feet.

"Sorry, Nabiki, but you know these clothes aren't exactly ideal for this weather." She looked down at herself in some disgust. "God, I hope Ranma and Kasumi can figure out a way to turn off that part of the magic we use, Tamiko might like showing this much skin but I'm still not happy about it most of the time and it's been years. Maybe at the beach..." Grinning, Nabiki took her coat off and hung it up, before removing her boots, then following the other girl into the living room where everyone else was sitting around the coffee-table talking. Ranma looked up and smiled while Kasumi jumped to her feet, moving to hug her sister.

"Hi, sis." Nabiki returned the hug. "I'm very relieved to see you're all OK. The news reports were pretty terrifying." Following her older sister back to the sofa she sat beside her. "So, what happened? I think I have the basic idea from the TV, but I'm sure it's missing a lot." Her sister exchanged a look with her husband, then nodded.

"You might say that." She and the others all took turns explaining the events in London, while the middle sister listened with interest, shock, and some awe.

"Good grief," she managed, some seconds after the story was told. "That's... well, it's pretty strange even for you guys."

"It certainly wasn't very nice, a lot of the time," her sister said with a frown. "Mind you, we made the acquaintance of some very good people. The military people were extremely helpful, as was Sir Alan. I like him, he seems like a decent and intelligent person. I didn't like that horrible little Minister of Magic. He was a very arrogant person and not someone I want to meet again. I don't think Sir Alan liked him any more than we did. He didn't look very happy about what happened."

Nabiki grinned. Hearing her sister speak so familiarly about major political figures from other countries tickled her for some reason. Ranma watched her expression and smiled, having a fairly good idea what she was thinking. She looked at him. "Sounds like you really made an impression on those mages, though. I don't think they'll forget 'Yori' very quickly. Trapping him inside a force field with a portal bomb? That's cold." He laughed.

"It wasn't active at that point." The middle Tendo looked at him with a raised eyebrow. "I recharged the energy storage unit although the device itself was disabled. He was perfectly safe." An evil look crossed his face, while Aiko snickered. "But he didn't know that." Kasumi sighed slightly, a look of fond irritation passing across her countenance, making him hold her hand. "It had to be done, Kas. He needed to understand how dangerous what he was trying was, and that seemed like a quick and effective method to get it across to him. It worked, didn't it?" She nodded, sighing again, but smiling.

"You have a flair for the dramatic, dear, but you're awfully hard on people's mental well-being sometimes." He chuckled. After a moment she added, "In his case, though, I approve. It probably did him good." Nabiki started giggling, while Kasumi looked slightly embarrassed but resolute.

"There is the point that if we'd been about five minutes later they'd all have been dead, as well. That part was very real. They had no idea how close to disaster they came." Ranma looked annoyed. "One of those things loose in that basement? It would have been a real mess."

Standing, Kasumi looked around the room. "Does anyone fancy something to eat?" A series of nods met her question, the most vigorous coming from, predictably, Ranma and Misaki. Exchanging glances they grinned at each other. "I have some very nice frozen pizzas that need to be used. I'll put them in the oven." Disappearing into the kitchen she busied herself with the task, coming back a few minutes later with a tray full of coffee mugs and a large pot. "It will be about half an hour." Everyone helped themselves to drinks.

Picking up a sheaf of papers from the table Ranma sat back to read through them. "What's that?" Nabiki asked curiously. He looked over at her.

"Copies of the report we gave Agent Naito, plus some information I asked him for. It's all the data we have on the mage and his travels over the last three years. I'm trying to work out where the other portal devices might be. There are still three left. If we cross London off the list, which seems reasonable, in fact we can probably cross off the UK entirely, that still leaves more than a dozen places around the world where he could have planted them. London was horrific, I'd really prefer to find the other ones before they activate, not go rushing off to do disaster management after the fact." He flipped through the paperwork, then handed about half of it to his sister-in-law. "Here, have a look at this. Maybe some fresh eyes on it will help."

Nabiki took the documents, reading them with interest. Flight itineraries, passenger manifests, purchase invoices, a whole range of paperwork covering at least two dozen trips to widely spaced destinations was present. She became engrossed in studying the information, only looking up for a moment when Kasumi brought several pizzas out. She absently helped herself to a slice, flipping the pages with her free hand as she ate. Ranma was doing much the same. Her sister looked at them fondly, then across at the other girls, who seemed amused. When the pizza was finished she motioned with her head in the direction of the practice room. Tamiko smiled, while Misaki quickly stuffed the last piece of pizza into her mouth before wiping her hands. All five of them got up and left the room.

A couple of hours later both Ranma and Nabiki had read everything, some of it twice, exchanging piles of papers as they each finished them. Eventually, the middle sister picked up her half-full cup of coffee and sipped it, grimacing when she found it was cold. She drank it anyway. "This is ridiculous," she muttered. "The bastard jumped around all over the damn planet. There doesn't seem to be any pattern to it at all. The bloody devices could be almost anywhere by now." Nodding heavily, Ranma dropped the last piece of paper onto the table and leaned back, closing his eyes and massaging the lids.

"Yes, damn it. I was hoping there might be some little clue, some hint, of where we could at least try looking. I really don't want to have to go through something like London again if we can avoid it. Or worse. We got there pretty fast, but only because the British government took our warnings seriously and someone called as soon as they had the first suspicion it might be a portal bomb. What really worries me is if it happens somewhere where they try to deal with it themselves first. If those things had been rampaging around for a few hours the casualties would have been in the hundreds rather than the dozens. Even that is far too high." He sighed, opening his eyes and looking at Nabiki. "I hate those things. So many people dead, for what?"

She looked sympathetically at him. "I know. I also know all of you are doing everything you can to help. A lot of people who would have died, didn't, all because of you six." Nodding, he still seemed downhearted.

"True. It helps a bit, but..." After a moment he sighed again, then got up to make some more coffee. She followed him to the kitchen. Handing her a mugful of the hot drink, they both leaned against the counter-top and sipped in companionable silence.

"You guys seem to have managed to make some good newsworthy stories, at least," Nabiki said after a while, glancing at him. He snorted.

"I know. Not exactly something any of us wanted, to be honest. Hopefully it will all die down soon enough."
She grinned at his tone of disgust. "Oh, come on, surely it's every girl's dream, to be famous on TV?" He looked sidelong at her, then suddenly shimmered into a busty girl that looked about sixteen, dressed in party clothes with her pink-tinted hair in twin pigtails.

"EEEeee!" the girl squealed, jumping up and down and clapping her hands together delightedly. "I'm famous! I can get all the boys and become rich and get a nice house and a pony and everyone will talk about me and the clothes will be amazing!" She bounced happily, her breasts jiggling, while Nabiki stared, then burst into laughter.

"You are completely insane," she said, gasping for breath, making the girl pout at her with her hands on her hips, before shimmering back into the form of Ranma, who picked up his coffee mug again, sipping it. He was grinning. When she recovered the middle sister looked him up and down, shaking her head in wonder. "Such a weird talent. You have got to use it for something funny at some point."

"I'm open to ideas," he said, looking amused. "We could do with some fun after the last couple of days."

"Let me think about it. There has to be some amusement value in a pair of shape-shifters with incredible acting skills. I just have to work it out." She grinned at him. Finishing his coffee he put the mug in the sink.

"I fancy a swim. Want to join me?" he asked, taking her mug when she handed it to him. Surprised, she nodded. "Don't look so worried," Ranma laughed. "You do remember we have a large heated pool on the roof?"

"Of course I do. I've swum in it a number of times. But it was kind of a random question."

"I'm kind of a random person," he replied with a smirk, becoming female mid-word. Nabiki giggled.

"You can say that again." The red-head snickered, disappearing into their bedroom for a moment before re-emerging wearing a one-piece bathing suit. She tossed Nabiki another one.

"Here. This should fit. Kas has several of them." Taking it Nabiki went into the room that had unofficially become hers whenever she stayed at their apartment, quickly changing into it. Going back into the living room she found Ranma waiting for her, the pair of them then heading into the practice room where Kasumi and the other four girls were sitting on the floor with their eyes closed. She stopped and inspected them curiously. Aiko and her team were sitting facing Kasumi, all of them breathing deeply and evenly in eerie synchronism.

"What on earth are they doing?" the middle sister asked in a whisper. Ranma smiled.

"Learning ki control. Kas is taking them through an advanced exercise in ki visualisation. They're coming along very well, all of them recently crossed a threshold in their abilities." She was also talking quietly as they headed for the stairs to the rooftop pool. "It can take quite a long time to get the basics across," she continued in a more normal tone as they ascended the stairs, "but once you reach a certain point it sort of clicks into place. Or at least that's what happened with Kas." She pushed open the door at the top of the stairs, flipping on the lights in the pool room, the smell of chlorine meeting them in a burst of warm humid air.

"We hoped that we could do the same with the girls, but for a while it didn't look like it would work for most of them. Misaki got it first, then her sister. The other two finally worked it out just before Christmas. Since then we've been kind of busy a lot of the time, but when we have a moment one or other of us takes them through the exercises. Soon I'm hoping that they will be able to work on it effectively by themselves. They should progress pretty fast at that point." Opening a cupboard she pulled out some towels, handing one to her sister-in-law, before moving to check some instruments on the wall. "Hmm. Ph is a bit out, I'll have to adjust the chemicals a little later." They walked to the edge of the pool where Nabiki knelt down, testing the water temperature with her hand, before dropping her towel to the floor and slipping into the water. Ranma joined her.

"Like I told you months ago, the new method I came up with for teaching ki use without keying it to a particular emotional state is more difficult to learn at first but makes things easier later on. So far that seems to be holding true with them. It's a useful experiment on tweaking the teaching method, if nothing else." Nabiki rested her arms on the side of the pool, raising her legs and floating, relaxing completely with a smile.

"This is a wonderful thing to have available. Especially at this time of year." Rolling her head to the side she peered out at the roof garden which was looking rather barren, most of the plants barring a few evergreens just skeletal shapes in the late afternoon light, smothered under snow.

"I know," the redhead replied, lazily stroking back and forth in front of her. "Both of us come up here three or four times a week, sometime more. Aiko loves it as well. She'd practically live in it sometimes if she had a choice." Nabiki giggled, the sound echoing in the large pool room.

"So can any of them do any of the ki manifestations yet?" she asked curiously. "Ki balls, that sort of thing." Ranma shook her head.

"Not quite yet. Misaki has managed a pretty impressive battle aura a couple of times, she's definitely coming along well, but even she is probably a couple of months from serious energy manipulation. I have no doubt they'll all manage it in the end, probably very effectively. Their ki reserves are growing pretty fast, they're going to be impressively large by the time they know how to really use them. It's already increasing their strength and durability noticeably, not to mention improving their healing and so on. I'm very pleased with the results." She rolled over onto her back and paddled in small circles, looking very relaxed. "I needed this. Lots of stress recently." Nabiki nodded lazily, pushing off from the edge and floating towards her feet-first. "The thing I'm really looking forward to is when they get good enough that we can start trying to teach them our method of magic control. Hopefully they'll be able to make it work. It would be incredibly helpful to have more people who could manage the ki healing, even if they don't have medical degrees."

"Do you think you'll be able to teach it to them?" Nabiki raised her head to look at the other woman for a moment.

"Well, I taught Kas, so it clearly can be taught to others. Mind you, she's something exceptional in almost every way you can think of. It's not impossible that we have a talent for it that others don't, in fact it's practically certain, but I'm fairly sure that they do as well. Possibly not to our level, but..." She waved her hand around for a bit. "We won't know until we try." Flipping over and treading water she grinned at her sister-in-law. "I still think you'd be good at it. Possibly as good as Kas is. One day I'm going to prove it." With a grin she bent at the waist and dove under the surface, heading for the deep end, surfacing a few metres away and dropping into a smooth front crawl at speeds an Olympic gold medal swimmer would weep over. Raising her head again, Nabiki watched with an impressed grin, before herself beginning to swim, at a respectable but far slower speed.

She did a dozen lengths in the thirty metre pool before stopping for a rest in the shallow end again, watching as Ranma completed her return length, stopping beside her. The redhead had done at least three lengths for every one of hers, but didn't look like she'd been exerting herself much. She grinned at Nabiki. "Good grief, you can swim like a fish," the brunette said with an impressed tone. "Is there anything you can't do in physical activities at superhuman levels?" Ranma shrugged.

"I'm not sure. Both of us seem to be pretty good at anything we try. We're a hell of a lot stronger and faster than most people, which certainly helps. Ki mastery tends to have that effect. Even Pop can swim for hours without any real effort. We did swim to China and back after all, years ago, when I wasn't anywhere near as powerful as either of us are now." She sank underwater, pushing off the bottom of the pool with sufficient force she came clear out of the water, gracefully flipping mid-air to land sitting on the edge of the pool. Nabiki laughed. Pulling herself out the more traditional way she sat beside her swishing her feet in the cool water.

"You guys still impress the hell out of me. I never fail to be surprised by something you've come up with." Leaning over she quickly hugged the smaller woman, who appeared slightly surprised but also pleased. "I'm so very glad I finally tracked you down."

"Me too." Ranma grinned at her. She abruptly developed an amused look, which quickly shifted to a mischievous one. "Swim like a fish, hmm?" she mused. Nabiki looked askance at the other woman, that expression in her experience meant trouble. The sensation of her feet in the water changed, making her look down. She stared open-mouthed for several seconds, before slowly reaching down to feel the bright yellow scales on the fish-tail that had replaced her legs. Ranma was giggling furiously. "Swim like a fish," she chortled, slipping back into the water. "See if you can keep up now," she said, laughing as she shot off across the water.

The new mermaid Nabiki stared at herself in wonder, flexing the tail she now possessed, before shooting the swimming redhead a narrow-eyed look. "You're completely nuts, you do know that, I hope?" she called after the young woman, looking at herself again before shrugging and dropping off the edge of the pool into the water again. It took her considerable effort to work out how to swim with a mermaid's tail but she managed it eventually, finding to her delight that she could move several times faster than she'd ever been able to before. Both women raced back and forth across the pool, ending up swimming lengths completely underwater, which amazed Nabiki considerably. By the time the five from downstairs came up, attracted by the yells and whoops of delight, the middle sister was familiar enough with her new configuration to surprise all of them by leaping out of the deep end of the pool several feet into the air, somersaulting neatly, before disappearing under the surface again with barely a splash. Even Kasumi was rather startled, while the other four stared in astonishment.

Popping up again next to where they were staring into the water, Mer-Nabiki wiped her wet hair from her eyes and grinned at her surprised older sister. "Your husband is crazy," she informed her happily, flipping over backwards and with a twitch of her tail zipping off across the pool. Everyone stared, then exchanged glances. Five minutes later seven mermaids were chasing each other around the pool, laughing like lunatics.

Some two hours later they were relaxing in the jacuzzi, in their normal forms again. Nabiki grinned at her current sister-in-law, looking very happy. "I still think you're insane. But that was a hell of a lot of fun. Thanks." Ranma looked back, pleased.

"No problem. I enjoyed it as well. Perhaps we should have mermaid parties more often, it's damn good fun." Her wife watched her with amusement.

Once they were back in the living room, Kasumi looked at the four magical girls. "Would you all like to stay for dinner?" she asked. They nodded, smiling.

"Of course. You don't have to ask, Kasumi, you know how much we all enjoy your cooking." Aiko looked pleased, while Misaki nodded rapidly and eagerly. Kasumi laughed, heading for the kitchen. Ranma, male now, went to help her. Nabiki laid the table, then joined the others on the sofa. She glanced around at them.

"How's the ki training coming?" she asked curiously. Tamiko grinned.

"Pretty well, I think," she replied. Concentrating she managed to produce a visibly glowing battle aura, a pretty pale yellow colour. Misaki snorted with amusement, lighting up the room with a considerably brighter orange one. "Show-off," Tamiko muttered, looking at her team-mate with mild annoyance. Nabiki snickered.

Running her fingers through her still-damp hair she teased it into the shape she preferred, then looked at the magical girls. "Hey, something I've always wondered, what do you guys do when you're not hunting demons or running around dressed in silly clothes?" Aiko laughed.

"It's sort of a problem, actually. We all got roped into the magical girl bit in school as you know. It was difficult balancing a normal life and the weirdness, but we managed to do it and graduate high school, all of us with pretty good marks. I suppose that since then we've all been pretty much professional magical girls most of the time. Tamiko has a part-time job in a bakery, Misaki is interested in mechanical engineering and helps out at a local car repair garage, I've been bouncing from job to job while Fumiko is thinking about going to university to get a degree in biology. The demon-hunting bit makes it hard to hold down a full-time job or educational career, though. I have no idea how those two can make it work, especially with something as time-consuming and complex as medical degrees." She jerked her thumb at the door to the kitchen where cooking noises could be heard faintly.

She sighed a little. "Money is always a problem. Misaki and Fumiko share a pretty small apartment, while Tamiko and I still live at our homes with our parents. It would be nice to get out on our own but it's difficult at the moment. Ranma and Kasumi have helped us all financially several times, which is kind of embarrassing, although we're all grateful for it. We own them a lot." Coming out of the kitchen Kasumi heard this last sentence and smiled.

"You don't owe us anything. You're as much family as Nabiki is, family helps family. That's just the way it works." She patted Aiko on the head gently as she walked past, sitting beside her sister. "The food will be ready in about an hour." Aiko grinned at her.

"Thanks, Kasumi, that means a lot to us all, but it's still embarrassing. We're all legally adults now except for Fumiko, she'll be twenty in three months, yet none of us can make ends meet without a lot of trouble." She shrugged a little helplessly. "It's not like we can give up the lifestyle. Even if we wanted to, which none of us do, we like helping people, the lifestyle wouldn't give up. You know how it goes." The older woman nodded sympathetically.

"Oh, very much. Once you're in, you're in. I knew that right at the beginning but it never changed my mind. Even with the problems we've run across I very much enjoy what we do and how we live. Especially after, well... before." She seemed slightly sad. Nabiki put her arm around her shoulders.

Aiko smiled slightly. "You two make most of it look easy. Without you I think the whole ward would be in a much worse state." Kasumi seemed slightly embarrassed by the praise, looking up at her husband as he joined them.

"Aiko is trying to claim we're very important to Minato." Ranma grinned, then put on an insufferably smug look.

"Of course we are," he said in a haughty voice, sounding remarkably like Tatewaki Kuno. "The peasants know when a superior being is amongst them." Nabiki started giggling helplessly while everyone else laughed. He relaxed and looked amused. "We can't take all that much credit. We know some tricks that most people don't, we have more power than a lot of them, but mostly it's a combination of skill, luck, and good friends. Plus the occasional shouting match. Never forget the shouting, it's important. Ask any decent drill sergeant." His wife giggled, kissing him.

"Still, you are the ones who brought a lot of the chaos under some vague form of control. Even the news people seem to have noticed." Tamiko laughed gently, remembering the last report they'd watched that afternoon. "At the rate it's going the Diet is going to give us all some sort of award for helping with international relations with the UK." Ranma groaned.

"Oh, god, don't say that. We're trying to keep a low profile here, not make the evening news on a regular basis. Before you know it they'd be asking for us on chat shows." Kasumi laughed. He looked at her with a raised eyebrow.

"You haven't checked your email today, have you?" she asked him. He shook his head with a worried expression. "They are asking us to appear on chat shows. Our lawyers have passed on three requests so far, one from the UK and two from here." He stared, appalled, before groaning again.

"Oh, hell. As if life wasn't complicated enough."

"If you will insist on bouncing around the globe sorting out people's problems you have to expect a certain amount of attention," Nabiki said with amusement in her voice. "It sort of goes hand in hand." He nodded glumly.

"We may have to bring out the heavy shielding next time, stop people being able to remember anything about us at all. I'm not entirely happy about the idea of becoming internationally famous, it kind of mocks the entire idea of hiding."

"No one knows who you really are, and it's not likely they could find out," his sister-in-law said calmly. "You're far too good to allow that to happen. Even the security agencies don't know who you guys are, any of you, so I doubt the news broadcasters can work it out. Even I only figured it out because I knew you so well from before, and then it took a lot of luck and nearly three years work." Glancing at her he nodded, looking slightly relieved.

"I suppose you're right. I hope you're right. We have enough on our plates without fans turning up by the bus-load getting in the way. I don't mind the occasional passer-by asking for an autograph but I'm not keen on hundreds of them at once. We're not rock stars." Nabiki laughed.

Looking at Aiko and her team she replied, "Some of you dress a bit like it." Tamiko seemed amused while the other three looked slightly embarrassed.

"Hell, I wish we could do something about that damn clothing spell," Fumiko moaned. "Especially in weather like this. My legs were freezing last time I went out." Kasumi smiled at her.

"We'll have to work on showing you how to use your ki to heat your body, that should help." The other woman looked interested.

"That's certainly something I'd be interested in."

After a moments silence Kasumi glanced at her husband, who looked curiously at her. She leaned close and whispered into his ear for a few seconds. He seemed slightly surprised, then pleased. Nodding, he whispered back. The other five exchanged glances. Eventually the pair reached a consensus, turning to look at the four girls. "We have an idea, which might interest you," Kasumi said, appearing pleased with herself. "The biggest cost in living is the accommodation. You two can barely afford that little place of yours, while Aiko and Tamiko are living at home." The girls all nodded, wondering what she was getting at. "We happen to own a huge apartment building. There are nine large apartments that are empty. If you like, you could move in here." They stared at her, then Ranma. Nabiki smiled, she'd worked out what they were going to suggest instantly.

"Here?" Aiko asked, shocked. Kasumi nodded happily.

"Why not? The apartments aren't being used, they're fully furnished, heated, power is available, the whole thing. We're paying for all of it already and you know that's no problem for us, Happosai made sure of that. Aside from anything else, with the contacts we have through Uthryyl we could make as money as we'd ever need even without Happosai's generosity. We'd both be very happy to let any or all of you live here as long as you want." The four young woman stared at them, thunderstruck, before exchanging glances.

"That's a very generous offer, Kasumi, but..." Aiko started, before Kasumi waved her nascent objections aside.

"It's not a problem, honestly. I told you, you're family. It would help you, it's no trouble for us, so...?" They looked at each other again. Eventually Misaki spoke after a look at her sister.

"I've got to admit I'm getting very tired of tripping over everything at home. That apartment would be too small for one of us, never mind two." Her sister nodded slowly.

"I can't deny it. Plus your snoring is much too close in the next room. That place hasn't got anywhere near enough sound-proofing." Misaki gave her an annoyed look, making her laugh. Aiko and Tamiko looked at them, then each other.

The auburn-haired girl spoke after a few seconds. "I've got no objections. My parents would probably be quite pleased, they've been leaving heavy hints for a while now that I should be out earning a living. Or getting married. Or both. It would help if I could tell them about... the other stuff, but..." She shrugged helplessly. "They wouldn't really understand. Especially the clothing. My mom is kind of conservative about things like that."

"Oh, hell, why not?" Aiko said, grinning. "If one of us does we probably all should. There's no sense breaking up the team all over the place. We're here half the time at the moment anyway. We can always commute by teleporting, if we need to deal with problems on our own patch. That's more or less what we do already." Kasumi smiled broadly.

"Wonderful. We can go and pick out your apartments after dinner. We'll have to modify the building wards as well to allow you to access them, plus give you security cards for the doors on the ground floor and the roof." Looking slightly bewildered by the speed of the conversation all four girls nodded.

Ranma smirked a little. "You'll need the access cards for the swimming pool if nothing else." Aiko brightened up, then grinned.

"That's a damn good point. I love that pool."

"Oh, trust me, we know." He looked very amused. Nabiki laughed, causing them to look at her.

"It's going to be like something out of a manga. An entire apartment building full of magical girls. You'll need to come up with a suitable name for your new secret headquarters." Tamiko started giggling wildly while Ranma frowned at his sister-in-law.

"I'm not a magical girl."

"Want to bet?" The middle sister looked at him with a grin. He muttered to himself but let it pass.

They discussed the details of moving the four girls in over a very nice dinner. By then end of it they'd come up with a set of plans on how to proceed, which was much less problematic than most people would have found it. The combination of teleporting, extreme strength, and ki storage spaces you could have lost a number of large trucks in meant that they could do all of it themselves with ease. They cleared the table then everyone wandered around the building for a while choosing apartments. In the end they took the two floors immediately below the penthouse apartment, preferring to be as high as possible. The only question that arose was whether Fumiko and Misaki would share an apartment as they had done all their lives, or have separate ones. Eventually they decided to try sharing one, with the knowledge that if it became too difficult one or other of them could easily move across the hall.

Moving in would take a couple of days even for them, as the two living with their parents would need to let them know they were leaving, while the apartment the other pair rented would have to be cleaned properly before it was handed back. But it looked like they'd all be living there within a week. Getting mail redirected for their 'civilian' identities, setting up new addresses for employers, all the usual issues of moving would occupy several days, but they felt it was worth it.

Aiko looked around the apartment she'd picked, then turned to Nabiki who had followed her in with a wide grin. "I can't believe how big this place is. I never thought I'd live somewhere as nice." The middle Tendo chuckled.

"Be careful to keep it clean. I hear the landlords can be difficult." They giggled, going back upstairs. Fumiko was talking eagerly to Tamiko about their apartment and where she was going to put everything, while Misaki was listening with a smile and nibbling some leftovers. Ranma and Kasumi sat on the sofa watching, feeling very pleased. Sitting next to her sister Nabiki smiled at her.

"That was a very nice thing to do, both of you," she said quietly. Kasumi looked at her for a moment.

"It was the right thing to do. The space is empty, it will be nice to have people using it. I love living here but sometimes I miss having more people around, family, friends, whatever. They're all of those. So are you. If you ever want to move in, just do it. Here or one of the spare apartments, either is fine." She gave her sister a pat on the hand, smiling, before going back to listening to the excited younger women. Nabiki looked pleased.

"Thanks, sis. Perhaps one day I'll take you up on that."

Sometime late that night Nabiki suddenly woke, snapping instantly awake. She had been having a very odd dream, one that seemed to be trying to tell her something. Staring into the dark she tried to remember what it was. A considerable time later, irritated with her inability to remember, she slowly fell asleep again. Hours later she awoke once more, lying still for a moment before whipping the bedclothes back and jumping out of bed, hurrying into the living room, swearing a little as she whacked her knee on a chair. Turning on a table-lamp she rummaged through the pile of paperwork on the coffee-table, looking for the piece of paper she remembered from the evening before. It took several minutes but she finally found it. Staring at it she sat down, before getting up again and hunting around for a notebook and pen. Once she had it she sat again, scribbling on the pad urgently, occasionally looking through the papers again.
When Ranma came into the room on the way to the kitchen early in the morning he was rather surprised to see the middle sister sitting on the sofa, staring at a notebook. She looked up tiredly at him, but with a weird expression of triumph on her face. "I think I know where one of the portal devices is," she said quietly, then yawned.

Staring for a moment, he changed course and sat beside her. "Really?" She nodded.

"It came to me last night, something I'd seen in all this. Look." She picked up a couple of photocopied pages from the mage's notes. "These are notes on the manufacture of the devices and the spells he was trying to combine, right?" The martial artist nodded, studying them with interest. "He's scribbled all over the pages, written all sorts of random crap in the margins. Here it looks like he was trying to write some sort of poetry. Not very good poetry. Some of it is in English, some in Kanji, even some in what looks like German. This bit, though..." She pointed. He read it out loud.

"I will see her at the bridge of the night, whereupon is found a department of great stores." After a moment he shrugged. "It's gibberish."

"Yes, but I think it's gibberish with some meaning. I don't know if he was playing word games on purpose, or just idly doodling, or maybe was simply drunk. But think about it. Department of great stores. Bridge of the night. Harrods is a great, meaning big, department store in Knightsbridge." He stared at her, then at the paper in his hand.

"That's just stupid!" he muttered. Nabiki nodded, looking amused.

"I know. But it sort of works. I can't find anything I can relate to Tottenham Court road tube station, or London, or for that matter Kyoto or Tokyo. But, I did spot this one. 'A theatre of men, their hands by their feet.'" Ranma looked at the paper she held up, then at her.

"And?" She sighed a little impatiently.

"Have you ever heard of Mann's Chinese Theatre, in Hollywood? On the walk of fame, where all the movie stars leave their hand and foot prints in the concrete pavement?" After gaping for a moment he nodded.

"Holy crap. Which is in LA. Where we know he went." It was her turn to nod.

"Exactly. It's a weak clue at best, but again, it kind of fits. That's a touristy area, lots of people, almost all the time. An ideal place if you wanted to cause chaos with a random demon attack." She shrugged. "No indications of timing or anything useful, or even a specific place. It might be a complete red herring. But on the other hand..."

"...It's worth checking out," he finished. Studying her with respect, he smiled. "That's pretty damn good, Nabiki." Casting a glance at the clock, he saw it was only six AM. "Kind of early to phone Agent Naito. That said, I don't think he'll mind." Pulling out his phone he smoothly became Yori, making Nabiki smile. The girl smiled back, dialling. When it was answered after several rings by a groggy PSIA agent she brightly chirped, "Hi, Agent Naito. Aren't you up yet?" The response made her laugh.

"Sorry. I know it's early. Listen, we might have a lead on the location of at least one more portal device." She grinned at the sound of someone becoming very rapidly awake, and by all indications tripping over his own feet. "Yes. That's right. Some very clever thinking by a colleague you haven't met. Yes, we can trust them, don't worry. OK. Yes, we can meet you there. Thirty minutes? That's fine, it gives us time to get breakfast. See you soon." She put the phone away, changing back to Ranma in the process.
He wants to meet us at the police station. I'll go and wake the others. Stick some coffee on, will you, please? We're going to need lots of caffeine." She headed for the kitchen while he went to push some magical girls out of bed. Fifteen minutes later they were all sitting around the main table drinking coffee and eating some breakfast Kasumi had quickly made. Nabiki was explaining her reasoning again, on her third cup of coffee, quite wired by this point.

"That's very impressive, sister," Kasumi remarked, looking at her notes. "No one else spotted it." Nabiki shrugged a little.

"I wouldn't have if it hadn't been for all the news reports about the Harrods attack. These things are a lot easier in hindsight. But it made me start thinking about it, so I finally spotted that one. It's weird, it kind of came to me in a dream. My subconscious must have been working on it all night." She finished her coffee, filling the mug for a fourth time. "Whether it actually means anything is anyone's guess at this point, of course. It's entirely possible that it has nothing to do with the portal weapons, it really might just be random gibberish. But it's at least a reasonable starting point which is more that we had before."

Her sister smiled at her. "It's certainly worth looking into. We've been running completely blind on this problem so far, so any help at all is good."

Finishing his miso soup, Ranma glanced at the middle sister. "Hey, do you want to come and meet Agent Naito?" She looked at him, surprised. "As someone else, of course. Can't have him associating Nabiki Tendo with Yori and Chou. Ms Aoyama would work." After a moment, she nodded with a small grin.

"Why not? It could be amusing, Ms Aoyama is fun to do." She looked thoughtful. "I wonder if I can scare a PSIA agent?"

Kasumi gave her a severe glance. "Be good, sister. He's a nice man. Try not to terrify him." Her husband laughed.

"Why not? The rest of us do." They all snickered while Kasumi sighed slightly.

When the group of young women appeared in the middle of the main office at the district station, they found the night shift just leaving. Several officers greeted them warmly, both coming and going, giving the severe-looking green haired woman with the dark glasses curious glances. Agent Naito was talking to Sergeant Harada, both of them looking a bit tired. They turned to greet the magical girls. "Hello, ladies," Naito said, smiling at them. He looked curiously at the woman in the expensive suit. 'Yori' shook hands with him.

"Hi, Agent. This is Ms Aoyama, a colleague of ours. She's the one who worked out what might be a clue." The PSIA man held out his hand. The woman looked coldly at it for a moment, then carefully shook it.

"Um, pleased to meet you, Ms Aoyama," he said, slightly taken aback. She 'smiled' in a way that made the temperature in the room seem like it had dropped ten degrees.

"Indeed, Agent." She turned her head to look at a corporal sitting next to her, who gulped and hastily stood. Offering her his chair with an apologetic smile he looked relieved when she sat in it without a word. 'Chou' glanced at 'Yori' and rolled her eyes a little, provoking a small private grin which everyone else missed. Staring at the intimidating woman Agent Naito exchanged a glance with Harada, who shrugged.

"So, you looked at the information that Yori requested from us?" he asked. 'Ms Aoyama' nodded
"Yes. It was most fascinating. Something struck me about some of the marginal notes made by the mage you deleted." Naito winced at the terminology she used. This seemed to amuse her slightly. "There was the possibility that some of the apparently meaningless scribblings were actually significant. Due to the recent activity in London I was able to find a phrase that appeared to have some bearing on the incident. That led me to another phrase that may possibly indicate the location of one of these unpleasant devices. There is no guarantee, of course, the correlation is weak at best, but I believe it would be prudent to investigate even so."

Grinning to herself, 'Yori' explained in more detail. Naito began to look very interested. He nodded as she showed the paperwork and explained the thought processes they'd come up with. "It's not much, I agree, but it's a lot more than we've had up until now. We definitely need to check it out. If there is one of the devices there somewhere, will you be able to detect it?" 'Yori' nodded.

"Oh, yes. The problem has always been that we simply had too many places to check. If we can narrow it down to a smaller area, even if it's a few square kilometres, we can scan it thoroughly and find the thing if it's there. With all six of us looking we could check quite a large area fairly quickly." He seemed satisfied.

"All right. I'll have to get clearance to go to the US. They can be very pushy about people just turning up, and they haven't been all that cooperative up until now anyway."

"We could just go there and look. No need to get the authorities involved." 'Yori' smiled at him. For a moment he looked tempted, then shook his head.

"I think we'd better play this one by the book. Americans can be..." She nodded, understanding what he meant.

"Yes, I know. I've met some. Lieutenant Harrison was a nice guy after he got used to us, but some of the ones I've run into are a little... difficult." He grinned.

"Exactly. So let's not give them any reason to complain." Tamiko laughed from where she'd been listening.

"They'll have enough reason to complain if we have to blow something up." Naito groaned, glaring at her.

"Thanks a whole lot for that thought." She looked pleased. He turned to 'Ms Aoyama' again. "Will you be coming with us?" After a moment she slowly shook her head, reaching up to remove her sunglasses. He and Harada stared at her catlike eyes for a moment then realised they were being rude.

"My area of expertise is more in the information gathering and analysis regime," she said, her emotionless voice beginning to really get to him. "I am not really a field agent. In any case I'm sure that with Ms Yori and Ms Chou available my abilities will be unnecessary." She smiled again, if you could call the thing she did with her mouth smiling. He shivered a little. Several of the policemen in the area moved further away, slowly, so as not to present a target. He rather wished he could do the same thing. There was something deeply unsettling about the woman.

"Ah, all right, then. Thank you for your help." She nodded, replacing her dark glasses. "Um, if I might ask, do you work for a government agency?" He was very curious. The green-haired woman looked at him dispassionately for a few seconds.
"That information is unavailable," she said. Nodding, he said nothing more to her. He was pretty sure he had his answer.

'Yori' was smiling in an odd manner. Turning to him, she said, "OK, we'll wait for you to call when you've arranged it with the Americans. It would be nice if we could see Lieutenant Harrison while we're there."

Naito smiled. "I'll see what I can do. It's in his jurisdiction, certainly. I would like to see him again as well, I like him." The unsettling woman sitting across from him stood, tipping her head for a moment then walking over to stand next to Aiko without a word. 'Chou' joined her.

"See you soon, Agent. Bye, Sergeant," 'Yori' said, before the entire group vanished with a flash. This time Naito remembered to shut his eyes. Swearing from across the room made it obvious one of the policemen there hadn't. Turning to his colleague Naito wiped a thin sheen of sweat from his brow.

"Holy shit. Where did Yori find her?" he asked the sergeant. Harada shrugged.

"Not a clue. She's pretty damn worrying, though. I wonder what she does for a living aside from scaring the crap out of people?"

"Some black intelligence operation, I'd guess. Way out of my pay grade. Probably a good idea not to think about it too much, just in case." He picked up the phone to call his superiors, so he could arrange a quick trip to LA. "Not human, either, judging by those eyes. And did you see her ears?" The phone was answered quickly and soon he was deep in a discussion of the requirement to go to the US.

As soon as they reappeared in the living room, Nabiki collapsed in hysterical laughter. Ranma shimmered back into her normal female form, snickering. Kasumi, having dropped the Chou persona, gave them both a disapproving look. "That was a little cruel, Nabiki. You really scared them."

"I know," her sister chortled, slumping onto the sofa. "It was fantastic. I could practically feel them trying to stand as far away as they could. When I took my glasses off I thought that poor policeman was going to run away."

"Sergeant Harada is a good man, sister. Try not to upset him." Nabiki nodded, still laughing. After a moment Kasumi's lips twitched. "I have to admit, you've got wordless intimidation down to an art form," she said reluctantly. Looking up at her, her blue cat's eyes in her 'Reiko' face twinkling, her sister grinned.

"Thanks. That was a hell of a lot of fun. I'm sorry if they were really scared, I guess, but I was curious to see how well it worked on someone other than Ryoga, Shampoo, or Akane."

"If it's worth doing, it's probably worth overdoing." Ranma dropped the illusion, making her shimmer and resume her true appearance. The sunglasses she was holding evaporated out of her hand. "Damn, that's weird. Oh well. So, I guess we wait for the call. Do you think it will take long?" Ranma shrugged, still grinning.

"No idea. With the British it was minutes, but with the Americans? Might be in ten minutes, might be a week." In reality it took about two hours.
"OK, Agent, we'll pick you up in about ten minutes, we just have to finish off something here. OK. See you soon." 'Yori' hung up. "Right, that's it. Aiko, can you jump Nabiki back home?" The brunette girl nodded, as Nabiki finished putting things into her backpack. "See you later, Nabs. I'll let you know what happens." She smiled.

"Good luck. Be careful. And don't call me Nabs!" The two women vanished with the familiar flash.
Embedded Sidestory the Third’ is herewith embedded.

This one took some thought, there were a number of threads to keep track of and strange people kept inviting themselves into it. Hopefully they didn't make me forget anything important.

Captain Martinez put the phone down pondering the conversation he'd just had with some puzzlement. After silent consideration, he picked it up again and prodded a couple of buttons. "Harrison? Could you come in here, please?" he requested, before putting it down again and swivelling his chair around to look out the window, only turning back when there was a knock on his door. "Come in," he said, watching at the door opened and Lieutenant Richard Harrison entered, glancing at him enquiringly as he closed the door behind him. The captain indicated a chair, which the lieutenant promptly sat in.

"I've just had a very odd conversation with some people you wouldn't believe. Your name came up." Harrison looked slightly apprehensive yet very curious. Studying him for a moment, Martinez asked, "There was more to that trip to Japan than was in your report, wasn't there?" The other man immediately looked slightly guilty. After a pregnant pause, he nodded slowly.

"You could say that. It was... eye-opening. But very difficult to explain."

"Try me." After a moment, Harrison shrugged, then started talking. Martinez listened non-committally, nodding occasionally. When his lieutenant stopped talking, he looked at him for a moment then swung around again to look out the window. The late afternoon light picked out the famous Hollywood sign that he could just make out in the distance through a gap in the various buildings between his fifth-floor office and it, miles away. "Interesting."

"It was that. Also terrifying." Still inspecting the view he nodded. Eventually he turned his chair back.

"Why didn't you put all that in your report?" he asked. Harrison looked at him for a moment with a raised eyebrow. "OK. Stupid question. So, it's real then? Magic, I mean?" The younger man sighed.

"All too real. Some of the things I saw will give me nightmares for years. Some of them are memories I'll treasure for the rest of my life. But, I can state without a doubt that magic is real, and can be unbelievably dangerous. As can the people who can use it." He looked past the captain out the window, remembering the few days in Tokyo and the friends he'd made. "But they were also very good people. Trustworthy, the sort you could count on when you were in a bind." Martinez watched his face for a moment then smiled.

"Good. There will be some visitors in about," he glanced at his watch, "ten minutes, that I'm assigning you to help." Harrison seemed slightly startled by the apparent change in subject. The captain suddenly grinned. "They're friends of yours. Help them, try to keep them from blowing anything up." He made a shooing motion with his hand. "Go on. Get to work." Standing the other officer looked somewhat puzzled, heading out the door. As he left the captain called after him, "I don't want any duck ponds in the middle of Hollywood Boulevard!" A slow grin crossed his face as he went down the stairs to his desk.

A few minutes later, as he had just finished hastily tidying the weeks of paperwork that had accumulated on the desk, a uniformed officer came over to him. "Lieutenant, there are some... people... here to see you." She looked somewhat confused, also a little scandalised. Even in a city that contained Hollywood, the clothing that four of the young women were wearing was a bit out of the ordinary. He looked up, then followed her indicating hand to the other side of the room where he could see seven familiar Japanese people standing looking around interestedly. Most of the male police officers present were studying them with interest, quite a lot of it somewhat prurient. He smiled.

"Send them over. And, Nadine?" The officer looked at him. "Be very polite. Those people are good friends of mine." She nodded, looking at him curiously, then walked over to the group of six girls and one man. All of them were looking in his direction, one of them waving. As he gazed at them he was amused and impressed to find he could easily put faces to names once more, something that had eluded him since he left Japan months ago. Tamiko was the one waving, grinning at him.

"Hi, Lieutenant," she called happily. He waved back with a smile. Lieutenant Rojas, sitting at the next desk, glanced at his colleague.

"A pimp and his girls, Harrison?" He grinned. "They're awful young, but very pretty." Harrison glared at him.

"I wouldn't say anything like that where they can hear you, Rojas," he grated. "And no, they're not that. They're probably the most intelligent and highly trained people it's ever been my privilege to work with. Without them we're never have settled that terrorism case." The other lieutenant looked slightly taken aback at the ferocity in his colleagues voice. He raised his hands defensively.

"Woah, don't get like that. It was just a joke."

"Well, don't make stupid insulting jokes, then. Especially about them. Especially if they can hear you. You really wouldn't like what could happen in that case." Rojas smirked at him.

"Defending their honour?" he asked in an amused voice. Harrison shrugged, smiling at him coldly.

"No, they can do that fine all by themselves. I'm just trying to keep you alive," Looking a bit confused, the other officer glanced at the six women and one man who were walking over to them through the crowded room, a trail of men and women staring at them curiously and in some cases with either shock or lust. None of them seemed to pay any attention at all to the stares.

"What are a bunch of girls without much dress sense going to do?" he asked curiously. Harrison smiled grimly at him.

"Pray you never find out." He turned, his expression becoming much more open and friendly. "Hi, guys. It's nice to see you again." Tamiko came up to him and gave him a quick hug, then stepped back. She looked him up and down, grinning.

"You look good, lieutenant." He laughed.

"As do you, Tamiko." Glancing at the others he saw they were all smiling.

"Good to see you again, Richard," Agent Naito said, shaking his hand. The police officer nodded, smiling.

"You as well, Masao. I saw the news reports on CNN about that incident in London. Very nasty. I hope everything went well?" The Japanese man looked slightly upset.
"As well as it could have done under the circumstances. It wasn't a lot of fun, though." Yori, standing beside him, chuckled a little causing both men to glance at her.

"Oh, come on, Agent, the last part was pretty funny, you have to admit." He sighed, looking back at the lieutenant.

"Magical girls. Odd sense of humour." The officer seemed slightly puzzled, although amused. "I'll tell you about it later." Nodding, Harrison turned to the black-haired girl, looking at her for a moment then grinning. She returned the look.

"It's very good to see you again, Lieutenant," she said, shaking his hand.

"And you."

Chou greeted him with typical serene grace, leaning forwards to kiss him lightly on the cheek. "How have you been since we last saw you?" she asked quietly.

"Very good, actually. My daughter is doing well in school, it's looking very likely she'll end up at a decent college, and my wife got promoted at work. We've cleared up several cases that were being difficult, plus I got some very nice comments on my records about the Japan visit." He laughed. "It turned out that Captain Uehara wrote a surprisingly complimentary report about me and Laura. Both of us received small commendations as a result." The blonde smiled.

"That's very nice. Have you heard from Inspector Deveraux recently?" He nodded.

"Yes, she visited a month ago, before Christmas, for a couple of days, and we've talked on the phone a few times. She'll be sorry to have missed you. I know she enjoyed Japan, at least the parts of it that weren't trying to kill us." Chou looked amused.

"Perhaps we should stop in on the way back and say hello. I like her." Yori seemed interested in the idea.

"It's hellishly cold in Toronto at the moment," Harrison said with a grin. "You should stay here where your clothing is more suited to the temperature." Glancing at Aiko and her team he raised an eyebrow. The short brunette laughed.

"Good to see you, Lieutenant Harrison." She shook his hand, as did Misaki and Fumiko. The tall girl was eating a pear she'd acquired from somewhere, smiling at him wordlessly. He snickered, remembering her constant grazing on whatever was handy. Her sister rolled her eyes, then giggled.

Sitting down, he gazed at them all with amusement. "So, I assume this visit is about the portal devices? The captain didn't tell me much about this, but I've been assigned to help you. And keep an eye on you. No ponds!" He fixed Yori with a glare, making her snicker. Behind her, Rojas, who had been unabashedly eaves-dropping, laughed.

"Nursemaid duty for the civvies, Harrison? Did you piss off the captain again?" Harrison gritted his teeth, but the expression on Yori's face made him stop. She winked.

"I believe that your colleague considers it an honour to work with us, Lieutenant Rojas. As we do with him. He was exceptionally brave in Japan, doing something that very few people would even try. We owe him for that. He helped save the life of a very good friend of mine, so I would appreciate if if you would be more polite." She hadn't turned around. The man behind her looked slightly puzzled.

"How did you know my name?" he asked. Harrison was trying not to snicker, watching as Yori looked through a wallet with interest.

"Lieutenant Diego Rojas, born July fifth, nineteen sixty-four. Height five feet eleven inches, weight one hundred and ninety pounds. Eyes brown. Hair brown." He stared at the back of the young woman in front of him, looking surprised and irritated.

"How the hell do you know that, girl?" he asked carefully. She turned around, smiling.

"It's all here on your driving license," she replied, looking amused. He stared at the wallet she was holding, thinking it looked extremely familiar. To one side, Agent Naito sighed. Everyone else was smirking. Reaching into his jacket he felt where his wallet should be, then scowled.

"Give that back," he growled, catching it as she flipped it to him. "How the fuck did you do that?" he asked, looking suspiciously through it to make sure everything was present. Glancing up he noticed she had the most unusual eye colour he'd ever seen. There was something in those eyes that made him abruptly feel slightly uneasy.

"Very easily. Anyway, Lieutenant, could you please not be so rude to our friend? It doesn't make a good impression." He sneered a little, reacting to the momentary sensation of uncertainty.

"Why should I worry about making a good impression on a bunch of foreign schoolgirls?" Agent Naito and Lieutenant Harrison exchanged worried glances. All the young ladies turned to stare at him in a way he didn't like at all. It made him think of feeding time at the zoo, in the tiger enclosure, for some reason, his cop's instincts suddenly screaming that he was in an extremely dangerous situation. His hand slowly crept towards his gun, unconsciously reacting to the perceived threat.

"Yori..." Naito had a warning tone in his voice, mixed with slight worry. She glanced at him, then smiled a little. The smile had more teeth in it than was entirely necessary.

"Don't worry, Agent. We won't start anything." Staring at Rojas for a moment more, she shrugged a little. "Not worth the hassle, to be honest." Dismissively, she turned back to Harrison, who looked relieved. The remaining girls continued to inspect the other lieutenant for a moment before also looking away. He slumped slightly, unsure why he felt that something horrible had nearly happened. Looking down he was a little surprised and embarrassed to see his hand was on the butt of his weapon, dropping it with quick look around to see if anyone had noticed.

"Sorry, Lieutenant," Yori said to Harrison. "We don't like people insulting our friends." He grinned.

"Don't worry, Yori. Nothing happened. Let's go and find somewhere private, so you can tell me what's going on." She nodded. As they walked past Rojas' desk she paused, looking at him for a moment.

"These are yours as well," she said, opening her hand and dropping a number of .45 ACP cartridges on his desk in front of him. "Bye." She walked off after the others, while he stared, then looked down. Eight rounds. Slowly removing his weapon from his holster he popped the magazine out and looked at it. Empty. Looking up again he watched as the group of visitors followed his colleague out of the main room, Yori glancing back and smiling before disappearing around the corner. Slowly reloading his magazine he wondered what had just happened.

"Sorry about Diego, Yori," Harrison said as he closed the door of the conference room he'd led them to. "He's a good cop but he can be a real asshole at times, especially to women." She smiled at him.
"No problem, Lieutenant. We run into people like that from time to time. The world is full of them." They all sat around the table.

"So, what's going on?" Harrison asked with curiosity in his voice. She glanced at Chou, then looked back to him.

"There's a chance we might know the location of another portal device. We took two out of circulation in London, although unfortunately one of them had already activated by the time we got there." He looked interested.

"Two? I got the impression from the news that only one was involved." The young woman looked irritated.

"A bunch of government mages in the UK had found another one and were playing around with it. Luckily, we got to it a few minutes before it would have triggered and stopped it. We destroyed it and their notes." Laughing, Harrison looked at them all.

"I bet they didn't like that." She snickered.

"Not even a little. They were quite rude to start with. By the time we left they were much more polite." He could easily imagine why. "We destroyed the first one once we got the demons that came through it sorted out. In addition to the one we found in Kyoto that means we've dealt with three out of a possible six." She glanced at Chou again. "A very smart colleague took a look at copies of the paperwork we got from the raid on the cult and discovered something interesting. It led to what may be a clue to a possible location, or at least general area, where another device could have been left." Harrison sighed.

"And that location is here in LA?" He knew the answer already. The black-haired girl nodded soberly.

"We think so, unfortunately. The clue seemed to suggest somewhere in the area of Mann's Chinese Theatre."

"Damn. There are a lot of people around that area almost all the time," Harrison said, worried.

"I know. Presumably that was the whole point. The last device was set to go off during peak shopping times in the post-Christmas sales in London. If he used the same thinking here, if there is one, it's probably set to activate during some sort of holiday. The obvious one is New Year's Eve." This didn't make him any happier.

"Fuck."

She smiled grimly. "At least it gives us a couple of days or so to find it, although there are a number of variables. We don't know for sure that there even is one here, or that it's set for the thirty-first. It's basically just educated guesswork backed up with some admittedly flimsy evidence. But it's about all we have to go on." The lieutenant sighed slightly, looking at the others, who were listening silently.

"The obvious choice for one on New Year's Eve in the US would have been Times Square in New York, I'd have thought," he commented idly, thinking about the huge number of people that packed into the city on the other side of the country. Yori exchanged a slightly wide-eyed glance with Chou.

"Crap. That's a horribly plausible idea, Lieutenant," the young woman said, looking appalled. She turned to Agent Naito. He was already dialling a number on his cellphone. After speaking for a
"Our contact at the US state department is making arrangements for us to go there as well. He'll call back as soon as he's got everything sorted out." Yori nodded, looking around the table.

"I think we might have to split up. Chou, you, Aiko, and Tamiko could go to New York and check there. I can stay here with Fumiko and Misaki and try to locate the one here if it exists." Her blonde partner nodded, a worried expression on her face. Yori turned to Agent Naito. "You should probably go with them, in case there's any official trouble. You're the one with the relevant security ID." The agent looked at her for a moment before agreeing.

"Try not to cause any issues we'll regret, please, Yori?" he requested. She laughed, but nodded.

"I'll do my best. Don't worry, I won't deliberately stir things up." He didn't seem completely convinced, Harrison noticed with mild amusement.

They had got half-way through a quick recap of the London and Kyoto portal devices when Naito's phone rang. He answered, talking for a short while, then hung up again. "OK, it's all arranged. Someone will meet us at the Japanese Consulate-General in New York." Chou nodded, smiling at her partner for a moment, then stood. Aiko and Tamiko did as well.

"Be careful," Yori said, looking slightly worried. The blonde nodded with a serenely calm look.

"We'll be fine. You be careful as well." Stepping closer to Aiko, they vanished with a flash as everyone else look away for a moment. Harrison stared at the place they'd been, then looked at Yori. She was also looking at the same spot. Feeling his gaze she turned to meet it, smiling slightly.

"I always worry a bit. But they can all look after themselves." She seemed to cheer up a little. "Right, Lieutenant, I guess we should go and have a poke around, see if we can find that damn portal device." They all stood. Harrison opened the door, leading them out into the corridor again.

"Without Aiko I guess we'll have to use more standard methods of transportation," he said with a laugh. Yori grinned.

"Fair enough." He led the three young women back through the main room and to the elevators to the parking garage. Once more many curious eyes followed them. He noticed Lieutenant Rojas holding the magazine from his sidearm, staring at it, before looking up and fixing Yori with an unreadable gaze. The black-haired woman returned it dispassionately. When they were in the elevator he glanced at her. She looked back, smirking slightly. Deciding he wasn't going to ask, he shrugged, turning to the doors and waiting.

Soon they were in his SUV heading through the traffic towards Hollywood Boulevard and Mann's Theatre. On the way they finished filling him in on the events surrounding the last three devices. Shaking his head in wonder he glanced at them occasionally, when he could take his eyes off the traffic. "Good grief. That's incredible," he said when Yori finished the story. She nodded, leaning back in the seat and watching the early evening LA scenery go past with interest.

"It was pretty strange. Pretty horrible as well, a lot of it. I'm still upset about all the people we couldn't save, but I'm pleased about the ones we could help. We met some very interesting people as well." She glanced at him with a smile. "You'd have liked Lieutenant Andrews, I think. He reminded me of you for some reason."

"I'm no soldier," Harrison said, grinning. Fumiko giggled from the back seat.
"I liked Second Lieutenant Stross. He was funny," she said, reminiscing. Misaki snickered, unwrapping a chocolate bar and breaking off a piece. Her sister looked at her.

"Got enough for everyone?" she asked acidly. The other girl nodded, handing her one. Rolling her eyes Fumiko took it nevertheless, quickly unwrapping it. Harrison watched the byplay in the rear-view mirror with a grin. Yori chuckled.

"I've missed you girls," the policeman said. "Japan was terrifying but I'm damn glad I had the experience. Most of it." Indicating left he waited for the traffic to clear, then made the turn. "Hopefully when this is all over you can stick around for a little while. I know my wife and daughter would like to meet you all, I've told them quite a lot about what happened. Not all of it, of course." The three girls seemed pleased.

"If we can find this damn thing, I wouldn't mind meeting your family. The portal devices have to take priority, of course." Yori glanced at him.

"Of course." A few more minutes passed, suddenly broken by Harrison standing on the brakes. The SUV skidded to a halt. He'd just turned onto a smaller side road, only to discover that the road was unexpectedly blocked by a number of cars. A queue quickly built up behind them, the drivers sounding their horns impatiently. "What the hell is going on?" he muttered to himself, craning his neck to see what the obstruction was. It was getting dark, making it difficult. Looking behind him he could see that there were so many vehicles that there was little hope of reversing. "Damn it!" Unclasping his seat belt he opened the door and stood on the running board of the vehicle, managing to get high enough that he could see over the smaller cars in front. The car shifted a little, making him look, to see Yori standing on the roof peering over the cars as well.

"Hang on," she said, jumping easily from the roof onto the next vehicle so lightly it barely moved. The occupant looked startled when he saw her jump to the next car along. Harrison watched with a smile as the girl hopped from car to car, stopping on the sixth one and looking around with her hands on her hips. After a moment she came back. "Looks like someone had too much to drink. There's a small truck on it's side just at the end of the road, I'd guess he took the corner too fast and hit the kerb. Doesn't seem to be any injuries but there's a hell of an argument going on. The road is completely blocked," she reported, then looked back behind their own vehicle. "It's not going to be easy to go back either, the road's completely clogged all the way back to the next junction."

Harrison sighed. She grinned at him. "No problem." Dropping to her knees she bent over and stuck her head inside the car through the open door. "Hey, Misaki, come and give me a hand." The other girl popped out of the vehicle, quickly and easily pulling herself onto the roof and standing beside her friend. Yori looked at Harrison with a smile. "This won't take long." Both girls bounded off across the cars again. He watched, then exchanged glances with Fumiko who had stepped out of the SUV as well. She shrugged. There were a number of car horns from up ahead, then everything went quieter, except for the sound of engines. The cars ahead began to move slowly. Both of them jumped back in and Harrison put his belt back on. A couple of minutes later they reached the point where the truck had overturned.

It was now back on it's wheels by the side of the road, the driver, who was very obviously inebriated, standing beside it swaying back and forth trying to argue with Yori while ogling Misaki. Harrison pulled off the road behind the truck, allowing the vehicles behind him to drive past. He got out and walked over. "You're not a damn cop," the driver, a short wide man around fifty-five said pugnaciously, "You can't tell me what to do. Even if you were a damn cop, you couldn't tell me what to do. I'm going to get back into my truck and go home, and you can't stop me." He staggered towards the drivers door, only to find it was clamped firmly shut by the young woman leaning on it with one hand while looking at him with a raised eyebrow.
"I really don't think you're in a fit state to drive," she said mildly. He swore at her drunkenly from much too close. She wrinkled her nose a little. Several bystanders, who had watched with wide eyes when the two foreign girls picked the truck up with their bare hands and neatly put it on it's wheels, looked worried, although a couple of them also seemed to be waiting with interest to see what happened next. It was clear to everyone but the drunk driver that he was in way over his head. Harrison walked quietly up behind him, Yori catching his eye with a slight smile. "You need to brush your teeth," she said, returning her attention to the man. Suddenly enraged he swung at her with a meaty fist, puzzled by the way she didn't move a muscle. He was more puzzled by the way his arm suddenly stopped moving with his fist about half an inch from her face. Tugging on it he found it didn't seem to want to move at all.

Everyone watching was impressed. They hadn't even seen the little Japanese girl move, but somehow she was holding his arm at the wrist completely still, no matter how he struggled. "Let go of me," the driver shouted, when he finally worked out why he was unable to hit her. Waiting until he was pulling hard she did so, causing him to stagger back and nearly fall over. "Little bitch," he muttered, idiotically trying again. Exactly the same thing happened. "Damn it, let go!" he shrieked. Several people in the growing crowd were laughing. Harrison snickered.

"Look, it's fun and all, playing with you, but I've got more important things to do. So be a good man and stop this." She looked slightly exasperated.

"I told you, you're not a damn cop!" The rotund man got ready to try hitting her again. Harrison stepped forward and tapped him on the shoulder, holding his shield up when the man looked blearily.

"I am a damn cop. And you're under arrest." Yori and Misaki laughed as the man's face fell. Making an abortive attempt to run he got about three feet before tripping over his own feet. Chuckling, Harrison pulled him erect then handcuffed his hands behind his back. "I don't think I need to bother with a breath test, to be honest." Reading him his rights, he pushed him to the kerb and made him sit. Yori walked over to him, grinning.

"Lieutenant? You might want to check his left pocket." Harrison looked at her, then at the man.

"A weapon?" She shook her head.

"No, narcotics." Raising his eyebrows the policeman patted the man down rapidly and expertly, then slipped his hand into the left pocket of the man's jeans. He found half a dozen small plastic bags full of a pale yellow powder.

"Hmm. Now, what's this?" he asked the man sardonically, holding one of the bags up to the light from his car headlights. The driver swore, then slumped. "It looks an awful lot like heroin. You do know that it's not exactly legal, I hope?" Misaki was walking around the truck, looking at it carefully from a few feet away, being careful not to touch it. Harrison watched her with interest. Walking over to him she looked amused.

"There's quite a lot more in the back of the truck in some sort of hidden compartment," she said, producing an orange which she began to peel. "Also several firearms under the seats." Staring at her in shock, suddenly feeling much more sober, the driver groaned.

"Oh, fuck," he muttered. Harrison laughed.

"Oh, fuck, indeed. Better than a sniffer dog, my friends here."

"You don't seriously believe them?" the driver asked, hoping it was worth a try. Lieutenant Harrison laughed again.

"As it happens, I do." Turning to Yori he smiled. "Minor delay, but worth it, I think. Thanks." She nodded.

"No problem. I'm not fond of drug pushers. We don't get them at home any more. Not after what happened to the last one..." Deciding he didn't really want to know, Harrison phoned the arrest in and requested backup. Within ten minutes two patrol cars had pulled up, lights flashing, and the driver was unhappily ensconced in the back of one, looking very sorry for himself. The uniformed officers inspected the three girls with curiosity but didn't ask any questions. Shortly afterwards they were back in the SUV heading to their original destination. Harrison was still intermittently chuckling as he remembered the it-was-so-bad-it-wasn't-even-a-fight fight the driver had tried.

"That was very funny. Although I'm glad you kept the violence to a minimum." She nodded, grimacing a little.

"That wasn't difficult. Even if he'd been sober, he wasn't any kind of threat. He was more a danger to himself and people on the road than us." The policeman nodded, falling silent as he concentrated on driving. About a quarter of an hour they arrived at their destination. Pulling over and parking on the side of the road, Harrison pointed out the windscreen.

"There it is. Mann's Chinese Theatre. Opened in 1927. It's kind of famous. Please try not to destroy it." He grinned at her, while Fumiko giggled from the back seat. They all got out, then he locked the SUV, following them across the road. Yori looked around, then down at the celebrity hand and footprints in the concrete slabs on the forecourt of the ornate building, set back a way from the road, with the wings on either side of it boxing in the clear area in front.

"Neat," she commented. Fumiko and Misaki were wandering around looking at the slabs, picking out names of movie stars they recognised. A significant number of people, mostly obvious tourists, were doing the same, quite a few of them looking at the girls curiously. One of them, after watching them for a moment, came up and asked what movie they were advertising. Misaki started laughing, which made the teenager rather annoyed. Yori watched with a smile on her face, then turned to Harrison. "It's a bit of a nuisance it's dark now, but we can still start searching." She called something in rapid Japanese to the other two, who nodded and went in opposite directions, making people gape as they ran towards the buildings on either side of the forecourt area, leaping four stories feet into the air and landing on the roof. They rapidly vanished from sight. The LAPD lieutenant watched, renewed amazement at their abilities rendering him speechless.

"I'll take the other side of the street. We'll check a couple of kilometres in either direction, if it's anywhere here we should be able to sense it." He smiled at her.

"OK. I'll stay here then." Laughing, she bounded across the street, jumping to the roof of the shops on the other side and heading east. People stared after her, then at the lieutenant, who shrugged at them with a weak smile, unable to think of anything else. The teenager who had approached Misaki walked over to him, gaping in the direction Yori had gone in.

"Seriously, man, what movie are they in? I want to see it."

Half an hour later Harrison was sitting in his car, to which he had retreated due the entreaties of the annoying teenaged action movie fan, eating a burger. He jumped when someone rapped sharply on the window. Fumiko was grinning at him from outside. She walked around the car and got in the passenger seat. "Find anything?" he asked, hopefully. She shook her head.

"No, unfortunately. I went about two kilometres up and over, even up into the hills, searching a grid pattern, but nothing. If it's there it must be deep underground, more that two hundred metres or so, which seems unlikely." She shrugged. "Perhaps Yori or my sister will have more luck." Helping herself to some of his fries, she leaned back in the seat, tipping it back further with a smile. "This is a very comfortable car." Watching her for a moment he went back to waiting and eating.

Yori arrived ten minutes after that, looking disappointed. Leaning in the drivers side window she snagged a fry as well. "Nothing. Two kilometres either way, a kilometre or so deeper into the city, no sign of it." She looked at Fumiko who shook her head without opening her eyes. "Damn." A few minutes later the magical girl's phone rang. Pulling it out of nothing she answered, then opened her eyes.

"Where? OK, we're on our way." Snapping it shut she made it vanish again. "Sis says she might have something. About two and a half kilometres east, looks like some sort of school. Um, St. Andrews Place or something." Harrison thought for a second.

"Shit. I know it, it's a girls school." Starting the car he waited for Yori to dive in the back before flipping the lights and siren on, then roared off down the street. Other traffic mostly got out of the way although occasionally he had to drive frantically around obstructions. They arrived surprisingly quickly, finding Misaki sitting cross-legged on top of a mailbox eating an apple. There were half a dozen teenagers standing around her, a mix of male and female, looking at her with interest. She was inspecting them calmly. When the SUV screeched to a halt she made the apple core vanish, which caused a certain amount of interest in her small audience, then smoothly rose to her feet on the mailbox, before jumping over their heads and landing next to the car. They gaped.

"In there," she said, nodding at the entrance to the school. "It's a weak trace, there's something odd about it, but it's real." Yori jumped out and stared at the building, nodding after a moment.

"Yep. That's definitely one of the portal devices." Glancing at the lieutenant she asked, "Is there going to be a problem with me going in?" He looked uncertain.

"Well, normally we'd need a search warrant, but... Can you get in without damaging anything? At least, not too much?" She nodded with a grin.

"Oh, that's not a problem. Their security system won't even know I'm there." Sighing slightly he nodded.

"OK, then. Under the circumstances I think the Captain will understand. Try not to break anything." She grinned once more, then faded from view. The watching teenagers gaped again, before talking excitedly in low voices. Misaki leaned against the SUV, waiting patiently. Fumiko glanced at the LAPD man, who was watching the school looking pensive.

"You look like you have a lot on your mind." He glanced at her, then looked back to the school.

"I'm having real trouble understanding how anyone could pick a girls school as a target for something like this. What did he hope would happen?" She shrugged, looking angry.

"He was a fucking lunatic, so were all his little friends. All they wanted was pure terror, for it's own sake. Just death and destruction while they sat back and watched. If he was still alive I'd kill him myself. Much slower than Yori did." Nodding slightly, he waited with them. A few minutes later Yori faded back into visibility walking across the road towards them, looking annoyed and slightly puzzled.

"It's not there." Harrison sighed slightly in relief. "The weird thing is that it was there. Recently, probably no more than a day or so, and for some time. The trace you picked up, Misaki, is a residue from the energy storage sphere, it felt like it was leaking a little. Must be a bad one." The other woman nodded slowly.

"That fits."

"So where is the damn thing?" Harrison asked angrily. She shrugged.

"I don't know. I can't trace which direction it went in. I assume someone took it, but I have no idea who or why. All the cult members are either dead or buried in jail in Japan, unless we missed one, but Agent Naito and the PSIA are pretty sure we got them all. You guys got the rest here in LA nearly a year ago." The girl looked around rather helplessly. "I'm not sure what to do next. There's a live portal bomb somewhere in LA, we know that for sure, now, or at least a day ago there was one. It could be almost anywhere in the world now."

"Fucking hell. What a nightmare." She nodded. They all stood there for a minute or two, then she looked at him.

"Let's go back to the theatre. I want to check something." With a slight shrug he got back into the SUV. They all climbed in as well, Misaki waving to her admirers, before Harrison did a three point turn and drove off. One of the girls in the small group looked at her friend.

"I wonder what movie they're in?" she asked, making them all look around for cameras.

When they got back to the place they'd started, Yori and the other two jumped out, followed more slowly by their police escort. The black haired girl went to the middle of the courtyard of the theatre, looking around for a moment, before starting to walk in a slowly expanding spiral, inspecting the ground carefully. Harrison watched her, puzzled, before looking at the other two for an explanation. They both shrugged, watching curiously as well. Various tourists muttered as they had to get out of the way of the circling young woman, several of them stopping what they were doing to observe. To the lieutenant's irritation the action movie fan was still there, staring at all three girls and smiling.

After some fifteen minutes of slow careful exploration, Yori stopped next to a very large ceramic pot, one of several that were around the main entrance, each containing a small palm tree. She studied it for a moment, then knelt down, running her hands over the pot carefully. Nodding, she waved them over. "It was here as well. I'd say about a week ago, perhaps. The trace is very faint, you can barely make it out, but it's there." Misaki squatted down and also inspected it, then stood up again, looking annoyed.

"I missed that completely the first time."

"I'm not surprised, it's very weak. I only felt it because I was close and was expecting it." She turned to Harrison. "The device was planted here, as the clue suggested. In or under the pot. Someone moved it, to that school first, then somewhere else. If we can figure out who, we can hopefully find it." Staring at the pot for a moment, he nodded slowly.

"OK. I can look into who supplied these, who looks after them, that sort of thing. I'll get a list of students and parents at the school, also the staff, and cross-reference them. With a little luck we can find the link." He glanced at her. "Can you get any idea of when it's likely to activate?"

"No, I'm afraid not. I'd need to see the device itself. There is a bit of a wild-card, in fact. The energy leakage is probably screwing things up. There's a slight possibility that it might deactivate itself, which is a best case scenario. There's also a similarly slight possibility that it might activate randomly, regardless of the timer or the booby-traps on it. Other than that, the portal might not form correctly, or not last long enough for anything to come through. It depends on how much it leaks before it goes off." He stared, then sighed heavily.

"So, it could either become safe, or go off at any moment, and we have no idea which."

"Afraid so."

"Oh, damn it to hell." He glared at the innocent palm tree for a moment. "Is the energy leakage itself dangerous?" She shook her head.

"No, it's safe enough. It might give you a headache if you were right next to it for a long time, but it won't cause long term problems."

"I guess that's something." Misaki and Fumiko had been poking around the pot while they were speaking, looking at it very carefully, the latter producing a bright illumination from a small device she'd produced which seemed to project a small ball of light that hung in the air a foot or so away from it. Harrison recognised it as the same type of artefact that he'd seen used on the demon he and Deveraux had shot at in Tokyo. "Isn't that a weapon?" he asked curiously. The girl looked over her shoulder, then down at the device she was casually waving around.

"At higher power levels, yes. Like this it makes a good reading light." She shrugged. "I wanted to see what I was doing." Going back to whatever it was that she was doing, she and her sister poked the pot some more. "I'm sure I felt something..." she mumbled, then stopped at a particular point on the pot. "Ah." Pressing it she smiled as one side of the bottom of the pot faded away to reveal an opening big enough to put a standard briefcase into. Or a portal device, which would easily fit inside such a briefcase. Yori walked over to inspect the opening with interest.

"That's very well shielded," she said, impressed. "You can barely sense it even when it's open. That damn mage didn't do that spell, certainly. He must have paid a lot for it." Dropping to her knees she probed the opening very carefully, then stood up again. "I'll have to remember that one, it's a neat trick I haven't seen before." Looking at Harrison who was watching with interest and surprise, she explained, "It's something like the ki-space folds Chou and I store things in, but anchored to the pot. It's a very cool little spell. There's an energy storage unit in there somewhere, probably in the fold itself, which is powering it. I'd say it would be good for three or four years. The device must have been inside." The officer nodded.

"Could anyone open it, or just someone with magical abilities?" She looked at him, then at the pot again.

"I'm not sure. Fumiko, did you need to give it any power?" The other girl shook her head.

"No, it seems to be keyed to pressure. I just pressed in exactly the right place, I think. Hang on, let me..." She poked the place she'd pressed in the first instance a couple of times, mumbling to herself, before she discovered she had to press and slide her finger across the surface for a short distance, in just the right manner. The opening disappeared again leaving flawless ceramic.

"Interesting. So if I do this." The opening reappeared. "Yep, it's just pressure. Anyone could open it if they knew the trick. I guess it could even be accidental if they got really lucky."

"Damn. So, our suspect list just expanded to anyone who might have touched that thing in the last week." Harrison looked around at the tourists who even now, around half past six in the evening, were wandering around in significant quantities, a number of them watching the little group. He scowled, making the watchers look away. "Talk about needles and haystacks." Yori nodded with an irritated expression.
"It's a difficult problem. One we're going to have to solve, as soon as possible." She sighed, looking depressed for a moment. "I really, really don't want another London scenario."

"Neither do I," Harrison replied, remembering the news reports with internal horror. Misaki and Fumiko stood, rejoining them, not having discovered anything else of interest. He stared at the pot. "Fingerprints or DNA would be useless now, it's rained pretty hard twice in the last week, never mind the number of people who have probably touched it. So there's unlikely to be any physical evidence we can use. I can get a crime scene team down here to look at it but I don't think they'll find anything. We might get lucky with CCTV if there are any cameras pointing this way, but I can't see any." With a sigh Yori agreed. After a moment, she seemed to get an idea.

"Hmm. Let me try something." Approaching the pot she knelt down, then lay on her stomach, peering into the opening. Putting her hand into it she ran it carefully around the inside, stopping occasionally, before suddenly smiling. "Ah. OK, I see." She pushed her arm deeper into the hole, eventually reaching all the way to the shoulder, making Harrison and some of the onlookers stare in amazement, as her hand was now further in than the diameter of the pot. There was an expression of concentration on her face. Finally she made a sound of triumph, pulling her hand out of the opening, which immediately vanished. In her hand was a familiar-looking crystal globe glowing a soft yellow. The small crowd that was watching clapped.

"Hey, come on man, please tell me what the movie is called. I can look it up online." The spotty teenager tugged on Harrison's sleeve, making him close his eyes and growl softly.

"Go. Away." he grated. The boy looked insulted.

"That's not very good public relations, dude," he muttered, upset, before walking a few feet away and staring at the back of the officer's head. Harrison sighed deeply. Sometimes he really hated LA.

Standing, Yori moved to stand beside him and the other two. She held the sphere up. "This is the power core for that spell. I deactivated the spell itself but it's still there. A very neat design, actually, it's stored in the sphere along with the power to run it. I'd like to talk to the mage who designed it, this thing is a masterpiece. Anyway, the important thing is that there's a chance that it will have traces of the ki signature of the last people to use it still present, they sometimes stick, since the things are designed to store energy in the first place. Not ki energy, as such, but it's sort of compatible. I'm going to have to study it for a while to work that out, but if it does, it will hopefully give us something to go on." Flipping the sphere into nothingness, she looked a little surprised when there was a ripple of applause from the dozen or so tourists watching. After a moment she grinned and bowed slightly, making the lieutenant shake his head with amusement.

"Come on, let's go back to the station, I can get started on the records search." She nodded, then looked around as a shout came from just down the street near a group of tourists.

"Hey! My bag! You bastard, get back here with that!" The female voice sounded extremely aggrieved. Harrison turned to see a group of five youths, probably late teens, in what he recognised instantly as the colours of one of the somewhat less violent but more irritating gangs that plagued the area, legging it rapidly away from the woman who had shouted. She was hurling epithets after them, while several other people in the immediate area were checking their belongings, a number of them looking angry. Turning to Yori, he wasn't entirely surprised to find he was staring at an absence of magical girl. Misaki and Fumiko were missing as well. He looked back in time to see all three of them leaping over the heads of the crowd, bouncing off the walls of the buildings as if they were made of rubber, to land in front of the running teenagers. All the tourists stared, most of them clapping and whooping.
"Man, I have got to see that movie," the action fan said as Harrison hurried past him.

The five gang members slid to a halt, staring at the two girls with almost nothing on and the other one with silk clothing. Yori stared back at them, then started to speak, only to stop when Fumiko leaned in and whispered to her, pointing at various posters nearby advertising current and past movies. She was grinning. Yori snickered and nodded. Straightening up, she raised a hand dramatically, pointing at the youths, who were exchanging puzzled glances. Fumiko and Misaki took up a position on either side of her, slightly behind.

"Halt, evildoers! Return that which you have stolen to it's rightful owners!" She gazed imperiously at them as the two other girls posed slightly with glowing weapons they'd pulled from nowhere. The gang members stared in disbelief, as did quite a number of onlookers. Others were looking impressed. Harrison sighed, pinching the ridge of his nose. Yori maintained the pose for a moment, then relaxed and began laughing. "No, this is just silly. I have no idea how those colour coded idiots back home can keep a straight face talking like that." She dropped her hand, Misaki began giggling, while Fumiko dismissed her twin Sai and grinned. "Come on, guys, give the stuff back and we'll let you go, we have more important things to do."

"Who the hell are you bitches?" the tallest of the youths, a Hispanic boy probably around eighteen, said with mixed anger and curiosity apparent in his voice. His compatriots were looking around nervously, although making time to gawk at the amount of feminine skin on display in the form of the two under-dressed girls. Twenty feet away, Lieutenant Harrison winced a little. Yori didn't seem to take offence although Fumiko stopped grinning.

"That's very rude, you know," the black-haired girl said, looking sadly at the youth that had spoken. He momentarily dropped his eyes, suddenly feeling slightly ashamed, before coming to his senses.

"Hey," he muttered, wondering how the girl had made him feel like that. She grinned toothily at him.

"We're just visitors, but we don't like thieves," Yori commented, answering his question. He shrugged.

"Tough. Move or there's gonna be a lot of blood." Her expression became calm and neutral.

"That's certainly possible." For some reason he started to get a little worried. Not liking the feeling he nudged one of his fellows.

"Pablo, show the bitch why she should move." The shorter boy smiled revealing several missing teeth, pulling a large butterfly knife from his pocket and flipping it open with a dexterous twist of his wrist, betraying considerable expertise. Misaki was watching while leaning on her pole-arm, looking mildly bored by now, while Fumiko had wandered off a few feet and was sitting on a parked car. Yori looked at the knife and raised an eyebrow. This seemed to irritate Pablo, who slid gracefully forward a couple of paces, waving the knife in a way that showed he knew how to use it. The various bystanders backed away, just in case. Harrison caught Yori's eye, trying to get across the idea that it would be best if she kept the violence to a minimum. He certainly wasn't worried about her safety, but didn't want to have to explain a number of sliced and cauterised gang member bodies, even if in his opinion they got what they deserved.

She nodded slightly, understanding what his pleading gaze signified. Returning her attention to the youth dancing around in front of her waving his knife in a fluid display of skill, she sighed a little and took it away from him. "What the fuck!?" he muttered, looking at his empty hand, then at the girl, who was inspecting his blade with interest. The crowd gasped, no one could believe how fast she'd moved, her motions had been nothing more than a blur.

"Aren't these things illegal here?" she asked curiously, feeling the edge with one finger.

"Hey, you bitch, gimme that back!" he yelled, infuriated. She raised an eyebrow.

"Why?"

"Cause it's mine!" He was fuming, glaring at her.

"Annoying when someone steals something of yours, isn't it?" she asked sarcastically. He missed the point entirely, although several on-lookers laughed. After a moment she flipped the knife shut expertly, then open again, making it look incredibly easy. He stared. Tossing the knife into the air she balanced it on one finger by the point, then with a quick motion flipped it closed once more and tossed it back to him. Almost fumbling the catch he grabbed it and held it tightly. The leader of the little group looked puzzled, wondering why she'd return a weapon like that, not quite working out that the ease with which she'd take it away suggested she could do it again just as quickly.

"I'm going to cut you up," Pablo snarled, opening the knife again and holding it in a manner that suggested he was no stranger to following through on this threat. She smiled slightly.

"I doubt it." This only infuriated him, prompting him to lunge at her with fairly respectable speed. The only problem was that when his knife passed through the spot she'd been standing in, she wasn't there any more. Blinking, he looked around, finding her standing behind him.

"What the...?" he mumbled, whirling and slashing in one motion. Once more she wasn't where his knife was. The next sixty seconds were extremely frustrating for poor Pablo whilst being rather entertaining for everyone else, as he turned, slashed, and stabbed frantically, only to find that he missed completely every time. She wasn't even attempting to look interested. Even the leader of the group was watching with a small smile. Eventually, panting, Pablo stopped trying to stab the slippery bitch, glancing sideways for a moment then jumping to grab the taller girl propping herself up with that long pole with the blade on the end, looking half-asleep. Without seeming to notice she moved just enough that he slid past and slammed into the side of the building she was standing in front of.

"AAARGH!" he screamed in frustration, turning and throwing the knife at her, heedless of the fact it was a particularly poor choice of projectile weapon. She plucked it out of the air with her free hand in a remarkable display of speed and coordination, without even bothering to look, then examined it for a moment.

"Thanks," she said, flipping it closed and making it vanish. The shorter girl who seemed to be in charge chuckled. Pablo exploded with rage, throwing himself at the tall girl with his fist leading, only to find the world whirling about him. When he recovered from a stunning impact he found himself staring up at the neon signs, flat on his back, with no idea of what had happened. The crowd, which had swelled to forty or fifty people, clapped, finding this a wonderful spectator sport. The speed with which the tall girl had grabbed the gang member's outstretched arm and neatly flipped him several feet onto his back was breathtaking, especially as she hadn't actually moved from the spot she was occupying or released the pole-arm with her other hand.

The girl in the black silk clothing looked at the leader of the gang members. "Now, could you please give back what you took, so we can all get on with our lives?" He inspected her for a moment, then looked around. The crowd had him and his friends completely hemmed in, it wouldn't be easy to simply run. Recognising a face in the people surrounding him, he smiled a little, then looked back to the girl.

"Think you're hot shit with the martial arts, do you, bitch?" She sighed a little.

"Please stop calling me that."

"Bitch, I'll call you a bitch if I want." Waving the person he'd spotted over, he watched as two more followed the Chinese youth as he pushed his way through the crowd. "Meet some friends of mine. They're hot shit with the martial arts as well. Bitch." The girl shook her head a little, then turned to inspect the new arrivals. "Seven to three now, girl." Bumping fists with him the new arrival and his cohort turned and looked at the three girls. The one with the pole-arm still looked bored, but straightened up a little. The one sitting on the car was grinning, while the black-haired one with the long braid was carefully assessing the two Chinese youths and their Caucasian friend.

"Kick-boxing, Wu Shu, and Karate," she said pointing at each young man in turn. They looked at each other, surprised.

"How the hell did you know that?" the first youth said slowly. She replied with a brief Mandarin phrase, making his eyes narrow. The leader of the first group wondered what she'd said. Looking at his colleagues, the new arrival pointed at the girl. "Get her." They grinned hungrily, then attacked.

Seconds later everyone was staring in disbelief. The girl rose from crouching over one of the other Chinese youths, having been apparently checking he was still breathing. No one could work out exactly what she'd done, it had been so fast, but despite the obvious skills of her opponents she'd laid them both out in a blur of motion. She smiled lazily, her eyes boring into those of the new boy.

"I was hoping for a bit of a workout, but I couldn't even draw that out. You guys aren't very good."

The first set of gang members were looking uneasily at each other, while the crowd was completely silent, watching something better than a reality TV show with rapt attention. Neither of the young woman's companions had bothered to move when the two youths had attacked her. The remaining member of the reinforcement squad stared at his friends on the sidewalk, then at the girl standing over them. He paled with rage, dramatically shrugging off the long coat he was wearing to reveal a sword on his back in a sheath. With a flourish he reached over his shoulder and drew it, dropping into a slight crouch, the highly polished blade reflecting the illuminated signs from the shops across the road. Watching from the crowd Harrison groaned.

The Chinese youth was slightly puzzled by the way the girl's eyes lit up with glee, not at all the response he was expecting. The one sitting on the car started giggling while the other one somehow made her pole-arm vanish and was leaning against the wall peeling an apple with Pablo's knife, grinning. "OK, girly, let's see how you do against a real expert," he said, boastfully. The manner in which she simply stood there a wiser man would have found caution in but he took it as her being frightened. Stepping forwards he slashed the sword at her a couple of times menacingly, smiling at the tearing silk noise the razor sharp blade made as it ripped through the air. She raised an eyebrow, looking at her friends. The one on the car shrugged.

"Fine, if that's what you'd like," she replied. As an afterthought, she asked politely, "May I use a weapon as well?" He grinned waving the tip of the sword in small figure eight patterns a couple of feet from her chest.

"If you want," the boy said with a nasty grin, looking her up and down, amused since there was clearly nowhere for her to conceal anything larger than a small knife in those clothes. She nodded, holding out her hand and taking up a sort of fencing pose. His expression of superiority changed rather suddenly when with a faint humming noise she was suddenly holding a sword made out of violet energy, her face and arm lit eerily by the glow coming from it. He froze, staring in shock and horror. The crowd, as one, gasped. Harrison covered his eyes.
The grin the Chinese youth received made his skin prickle. There was something completely horrifying about it, something that reached into the middle of his chest and squeezed. Feeling breathless he stared at the energy manifestation. 'Fuck, fuck, fuck,' he thought frantically, 'she's got a fucking light sabre! What the hell is she?' Old tales his grandmother had told him years ago came to mind, about martial artists who could control powers that made ordinary weapons useless. He'd always thought the old woman was going senile, but...

"It's a trick," he said shakily, staring fixedly at the beam of light coming from her hand. She waved it gently from side to side, which made it produce a throbbing hum straight out of the movies. The crowd watched with fascination. A voice could be heard from the back somewhere.

"I really want to see that movie! When does it come out?"

"Oh, it's a very good trick." The girl sounded amused. "Shall we?" He risked glancing at her face for a second, then went back to looking at the energy projection. "Come on then, I want to try my luck against a 'real expert'." There was a distinct hint of sarcasm in her voice. All the conscious gang members were gazing at her in awed disbelief. One of them started emptying his pockets of stolen wallets.

"Um..." The youth didn't know what to do. All his training in both martial arts and gang membership seemed rather inadequate at the moment. She looked disappointed.

"Don't give up now! You were really quite intimidating there for a moment. The dramatic unveiling of the sword was very good. I like your coat, by the way." She gestured with the energy sword. "Let's get on with it, I've got other things I need to do." Shakily, he raised his sword, pointing it at her. She smiled, then with a motion too fast to follow, whipped her own 'blade' in a tight circle, before bringing it back to a rest position in front of her. Everyone watched as the last inch of his sword dropped onto the sidewalk with a faint clink. The end was glowing red in the dark.

"Oh, fuck," he moaned, before letting go of the sword. It fell to the ground with a clatter. The girl looked disappointed again.

"You certainly give up pretty easily," she said, making her energy blade vanish. Walking past him she patted him encouragingly on the shoulder. "Keep trying. One day you might be properly scary." The youth watched as she stopped in front of the leader of the original group, looking him in the eye. He swallowed. "Last chance." Snapping her head around she glared at one of the other gang members who had put his hand in his pocket. "Touch that gun and you'll need a new hand." He froze, very slowly pulling his hand from his pocket again and holding it up to show it was empty. Feeling a presence beside him he turned his head to find the girl who had been sitting on the car standing beside him, one of the weird knife-like weapons she had been holding earlier poised ready. People were staring, once more the speed with which the young woman had appeared next to the gang member was unbelievable. The girl smiled sweetly at him, which didn't make him feel any better.

Returning her attention to the tall youth, the black-haired girl waited. Reaching very carefully into his pocket he pulled out a wallet. The one standing to his left held out the bag that had attracted all the attention in the first place. Seconds later a surprisingly large pile of stolen goods was on the sidewalk at the girl's feet. She raised an eyebrow, then looked meaningfully at the sword on the ground. Shortly there was also a pile of discarded weapons including two handguns.

"Lieutenant?" she said. He walked forward from behind the gang members, looking both amused and mildly irritated.
"I can't take you anywhere, can I, Yori?" he asked rhetorically. She grinned.

"You know the way trouble follows us around."

"I'm certainly beginning to." Inspecting the gang members who had decided standing very still was the better part of valour, he sighed a little. "We don't really have time for all this."

"All the stuff they stole is there. Why don't we let them go with a very severe warning?" She studied the young men, then smiled nastily. "I can always find them again if you need to talk later." They all shuddered. Harrison looked at her, then his watch. After a moment he nodded.

"OK. But the weapons stay." He looked at the two gang members that had possessed the guns. "You're in luck. I'm too busy at the moment to deal with this properly. But I'm going to have ballistics run those weapons, and if I find that they were used in the commission of any crimes..." They looked worried. "I'm very good indeed at remembering faces." Yori seemed very amused. "Get out of here, all of you. Don't let me see you again for a long time." They turned and shuffled away, embarrassed and angry, but relieved. The crowd opened a passage for them to move through, people watching and smiling. Several took photos.

"Well, that was a waste of five minutes," Yori said. "Not much of a fight at all." Walking over to the two still unconscious young men on the ground she prodded a couple of pressure points, making them regain awareness in seconds, looking around wondering what had happened. "Get up and go away." They looked at her, then each other, before rising and following their friends.

The three girls spent the next few minutes handing the stolen goods back to their rightful owners, while Harrison went to his vehicle and returned with a number of transparent evidence bags and some gloves, putting each weapon in a different one, then sealing and signing it. He looked up to see Yori looking askance at a young man who had attempted to claim a wallet, making him sweat. "Nice try, but we both know this isn't yours." She nodded to an older man walking over. "It's his." The younger man looked embarrassed, stepping back as the older one claimed his property. He thanked her, having overheard the conversation.

"How did you know it was mine?" he asked curiously, quickly looking through it before putting it away.

"It's got traces of your ki signature all over it. Wallets and the like usually do since they're in close proximity to their owners so much." Looking rather baffled at her explanation, the man nodded politely.

"Thank you for returning it. There are a couple of tickets in it that I'd never be able to replace, which my wife would never forgive me for losing." He studied her for a moment then grinned. "And thanks for the show. It was damned impressive." Giving her a brief wave he walked off happy. The crowd slowly dispersed although there were a number of people hanging around taking photos, hoping for more spectacular displays of whatever it was that the young women had done.

"Please! Tell me what the movie is! I'll pay you!"

"Go away before I shoot you in the foot."

"FUCK, DUDE! You really haven't got the hang of this movie promotion thing, have you?"

"GO AWAY!"

"OK, OK, there's no need to shout. Damn, you're bad tempered." The youth wandered off, casting dark glances in the officer's direction. Harrison glared after him until he disappeared into a shop a few dozen yards away. Giggling, Fumiko helped him carry the bagged weapons to the car.

"Hollywood makes me long to be back in Minato with the demons," he grumbled, causing her to laugh quite a lot. He was still muttering to himself as they drove back to the station.

Ichiro peered out the window into the driving snow, which had nearly shut New York down for the last two days. The call from the Consul General wanting him to go to the office and reopen it so long after normal hours was unusual to say the least. It was nearly eight in the evening, very cold, and he wanted to go home but at the same time didn't want to venture back into the conditions he could see outside the window. He wondered who these people he was supposed to meet were. The Consul had asked him, as he lived closest, to meet them, then bring them to his home. Why they couldn't have gone there directly he wasn't sure.

Stepping back from the window he sighed a little. There wasn't even a good view, like there normally was from this high in the building, the snowstorm outside had reduced visibility to little more than the other side of Park Avenue. Sitting at his desk he put his feet up and leafed through a brochure for trips to the Caribbean, thinking that his holiday was long overdue. When the phone rang he jumped, quickly dropping the brochure back into the drawer it had come from and picking the receiver up.

"Mr Kimura? This is Andrea in security. Your guests have arrived." The guard's voice sounded slightly odd. Getting up Ichiro closed the desk drawer.

"Thank you, Andrea. I'll be right down." He put his shoes and coat on, then left the office, locking it behind him, heading for the bank of elevators. A quick trip down left him in the security lobby, where the metal detectors and X-ray machines for the high-security building was. Walking quickly to the entrance he nodded to the other night guard, entering the main lobby of the building. The four people standing there with Andrea, the senior night security officer, made him stop dead in surprise, before walking over and bowing respectfully.

"It's an honour, Ladies," he said quietly in Japanese, making Andrea look at him oddly. "I saw the news reports from London. You brought great honour to our country with your actions." The tall blonde woman in grey silk smiled at him, bowing in return.

"Thank you. It was our pleasure." The other girls, dressed in a manner that made him shiver to look at under the current conditions, also bowed, as did the older man accompanying them. "I am Chou. This is Aiko and Tamiko, and this is Agent Naito from the PSIA."

"I'm Ichiro Kimura. The Consul General has asked me to take you to his home. Apparently someone from the American government will be joining us there shortly. My vehicle is in the parking garage. Will you follow me, please?" With a nod to Andrea he led them through the lobby to the elevators. The middle-aged woman watched them go, puzzled.

"Weird clothes for this time of year," she muttered, before returning to her post.

In the elevator, Ichiro pressed the relevant button, then waited for the doors to close. He watched the reflection of the three women in the shiny interior panelling, marvelling at how young they were to be capable of the things he'd heard. When they arrived in the parking garage he led them to a large SUV, unlocking it and opening the rear door. "I don't normally drive this in the city but under the current weather conditions it's about the only thing that can manage," he said, as the three women climbed in, smiling at him. Closing the door once they were in he opened the front door and climbed in, starting the engine. Agent Naito shut the passenger door and put his seatbelt on. Soon they were cautiously driving down the almost abandoned streets.
"The weather here has been horrific recently," he commented, struggling to see where he was going. "It snows quite a lot in New York most winters but this has been a bad one. I live closest so the Consul asked me to meet you. His house is about a twenty minute drive under normal conditions at this time of night but like this it will probably take an hour."

"It's been very harsh in Tokyo as well since Christmas," Naito said, looking out at the scene through the action of the wiper blades, which were having difficulty. "But not quite as bad as this."

Aiko glanced at Chou. "We could just have teleported there," she whispered to her friend.

"Shh. He'd doing his job, let him," she whispered back with a small smile. "It's a nice car as well."

The brunette nodded, looking amused.

Ichiro managed to make it in a little under the predicted hour, pulling into the driveway of a fairly large house some way from the city centre. The snow had stopped falling shortly before they arrived, leaving a pristine covering over everything, marred only by his own tyre tracks. Parking as close to the front door as he could manage he turned the engine off, then looked over his shoulder into the back seat. "I hope you don't get too cold," he said, inspecting the lack of sensible clothing two of them were wearing. Even Chou was dressed very lightly for the weather.

"We can run," Aiko said with a grin. Opening the door, she jumped out, zipping across the snow at a remarkable rate. Ichiro watched with shock. He noticed after a couple of seconds that she hadn't left any footprints in the snow, only slight scuff marks. Agent Naito looked amused as Chou and Tamiko followed, doing the same thing. Chou didn't even leave the marks the other two did.

"Impressive, isn't it?" the agent said with an amused note to his voice. The Consulate aide nodded wordlessly. "It's not even magic, apparently, it's a martial arts ninjitsu thing. You have to move very fast, Chou told me the first time I saw her do it." Ichiro looked at him with a stunned expression.

"As a friend of mine says at times like this, don't worry, you'll get used to it." Naito grinned at him, then got out, pulling his jacket close and trudging through the snow. He did leave footprints. Shaking his head Ichiro got out, locking the vehicle and following the others to the door of the house. Opening it he waved them in. Aiko and Tamiko were looking somewhat chilled by this point although Chou didn't seem to notice the temperature at all.

"We have to learn that ki heating trick," Tamiko mumbled, her teeth chattering. Aiko nodded. Closing the door behind him Ichiro took his shoes and coat off, as did Naito. The others just removed their shoes. As he was hanging his coat up the Consul General came down the stairs, smiling. Reaching the bottom he bowed briefly.

"It's an honour to meet you, Chou." He shook hands with her, then the others. "I've heard a lot about you, my cousin lived in Minato until recently. She told me quite a few things I had trouble believing about that place, although the news reports from London make me think that perhaps she was understating the case." Chou looked quietly amused. Turning to the other two he shook hands as well.

"I'm sorry, I know the names of your group but I can't match them to your faces." Aiko laughed.

"That's the idea. I'm Aiko, this is Tamiko. Pleased to meet you, Consul."

"Please, call me Tadao. Come into the living room, it's a lot warmer in there." They followed him down the hallway into a large room with a number of chairs, two sofas, a large table, and quite a lot of artwork hanging on the walls. Chou looked around with interest.
"Very nice, Tadao."

"My wife did most of the decorating. She's back in Yokohama visiting her mother, she's not well, I'm afraid. Old age, really." Walking across the room he opened a cabinet. "Would any of you like a drink?" Chou demurred, but Aiko and Tamiko both had a small glass of wine. Naito took a glass of sake, as did Ichiro. "We should be joined by a young man from the FBI fairly soon. The US government would like to be kept informed about this affair, although I don't think they really believe it. Or in the magic part of it, at any rate." He smiled. "You know what Americans are like with magic." All his visitors nodded.

"They're in many ways very nice people, but a lot of them tend to have fixed ideas about the way the world should work and try to force it to fit those ideas," Naito said, with the voice of experience. The consul nodded, sighing a little.

"Very true. They've achieved so much but a lot of the time they seem to sabotage themselves with that attitude. Still, we're in their country and it's only polite to go along with their conditions. As much as we can, under the circumstances. Our own history is full of some unpleasant mistakes as well, so we can't complain too much." The doorbell rang, the consul looking at Ichiro who nodded and went to answer it. He returned a minute later with a tall dark-haired man who looked around the room with interest, before fixing his gaze on the three women. He looked slightly startled.

"This is FBI Special Agent Cameron Foster, sir," Ichiro announced. The consul rose, walking across the room to shake the FBI man's hand.

"A pleasure, Consul," he said politely. The older man smiled.

"Likewise. Please sit. Would you like something to drink?" The agent shook his head.

"No, thank you, sir, I don't drink alcohol."

"Ah. A good idea." Introducing the others, he then sat down himself. "Agent Naito? Could you explain the situation? I'm aware of some of it but not the particulars or why you're here tonight." Naito looked at them for a moment.

"This information obviously isn't for public consumption." Both Japanese men and the FBI agent nodded. "All right. Approximately three months ago, due to a joint operation between the RCMP and the LAPD, a matter was brought to the attention of the PSIA which concerned us considerably. Once we looked into it, we realised it was a case that required special skills, which is where the young ladies came into it..." He went on to explain the entire sequence of events, with Chou adding some details. The portal devices were explained, as was the one found in Kyoto, as well as the London incident. He didn't mention the Ministry of Magic, just said that the UK government had discovered another device before it activated, which was safely destroyed. Chou took up the story, explaining about the breakthrough that 'Ms Aoyama' had with the paperwork and a possible clue. The mention of the cold alien woman made Naito shiver a little, he still remembered the effect she'd had on him. This seemed to amuse Chou.

"Yori and the other two from Aiko's team are in LA looking for the device that may be there. Lieutenant Harrison made the suggestion that if the mage who was behind all of this was seeking to cause massive panic and damage at public events, the most likely target would be Times Square in New York during New Year's Eve. We felt it made a horrible amount of sense, so we decided we should check. Which is why we're here." Special Agent Foster listened quietly, nodding occasionally. When the story was over, he sat for a moment without saying anything, completely blank faced.
Looking at Chou, then Aiko and Tamiko, he said, "Magical girls?" They nodded. "Demons?" They nodded again. "Insane magical terrorist cults trying to end civilisation?" Once more, they nodded. After a long moment, he smiled. "Cool."

Agent Naito exchanged glances with the consul. Chou laughed.

"I always wanted to meet a superhero," the FBI agent said with a sly grin. "I was way into comic books when I was a kid. Probably why I went into the FBI." Aiko looked at Tamiko, then they both giggled.

"That's a refreshingly open attitude, Agent Foster," Chou said, smiling. "We had quite a lot of trouble convincing Lieutenant Harrison that magic was real." The man shrugged.

"I've seen some pretty strange things. There was one case, way out in the back woods in Arkansas, which gave me a lot of problems for several years, late at night. Magic would go a long way to explaining it, to be honest." She smiled.

"There certainly are pockets of old magic around North America," the blonde said thoughtfully. "Arkansas, Louisiana, a couple of places on the coast in Massachusetts, they all have something of a reputation in the magical community. I've never been to any of them, but some people I know have. Odd things happen, even by our terms." She grinned. "Mind you, odd things happen at home, as well. Some people even claim we're some of the oddest things."

Aiko laughed. "I can't see it, myself. All my friends are completely normal." Naito looked at the three girls with raised eyebrows, then sighed.

"Yes, to you I'm sure they are. To the rest of us, the demons at least are slightly strange. Although I have to admit a lot of people around your part of Minato are weirdly comfortable with them, as long as they only want to buy chocolate not break things." Aiko grinned at him, while Foster listened with interest. The consul looked amused. Ichiro was sipping his sake wondering how many of the stories from back home he'd dismissed in the past as obviously exaggerated were actually true.

"Uthryyl and his family are very nice people, Agent Naito," Chou said mildly. "I'll introduce you one of these days. You'd like him." While he thought about that she looked at the man from the FBI. "We're not sure a portal device is actually here, but we have to check. The sooner the better." He nodded.

"The weather is appalling at the moment. Most of the city is almost impossible to get a car through, even the snow ploughs are having trouble. It might be best to wait until tomorrow, the roads should be clear by then. New Year's Eve isn't for a couple of days yet." She thought about it, then shook her head.

"I'd be happier if we could find it sooner rather than later. If someone else runs across it they could trigger it accidentally, which would be bad. Not as bad as if the area was full of people, but still unpleasant. Now might be good because there won't be many people around to get in the way. Travel isn't a problem, we'll teleport there." He looked surprised for a moment, then accepted it.

"I suppose that's reasonable." Foster studied the three girls. "It's extremely cold out there at the moment, are you going to be all right dressed like that?" Chou smiled.

"Don't worry, I'll be fine. Aiko, why don't you and Tamiko power down, I have some spare clothes I can lend you that will keep you warm. You probably won't need the magic boost and you're more than capable of doing what we need with your normal abilities." The other two looked at each other.
"I'll have to do that after the teleport," Aiko said. Chou nodded. Making the three men who were unfamiliar with her skills stare with interest, she pulled several items of clothing out of nowhere.

"These should fit you, Aiko, they're spares for Yori. Tamiko, these are my clothes, which might be a little too big but not too bad." She also produced a pair of jackets and some gloves, also two pairs of boots.

"How much stuff do you have in there, Chou?" Tamiko asked curiously, inspecting the spare set of clothes she'd been handed. The blonde smiled.

"Quite a lot. Clothes, weapons, books, things like that. Useful things. Oh, and a sewing machine." Even the magical girls looked slightly oddly at her at this. She smiled gently. "Sometimes you need to repair clothes away from home." With another sideways glance at her friend, Tamiko turned to the consul, who was listening with amusement.

"Do you have somewhere I can change, please?" He pointed to the door with a smile.

"Upstairs, first door on the right is the bathroom."

"Thanks." She disappeared out the door, returning a few minutes later with a copy of Chou's silk clothes on. "This is really comfortable, Chou. I like it." Looking down at herself she frowned a little. "Although the legs are a little too long. It would fit Misaki better."

Turning to the FBI agent, Chou smiled. "We should probably get on with it. It's only going to get colder the longer we wait." He nodded, standing. Agent Naito got up as well, both of them going into the hall to retrieve their coats and shoes. When they came back Naito handed Chou her boots, which she took with murmured thanks. When they were ready they stood in a group at Aiko's direction. The blonde recharged the shorter girl's amulet, then Aiko turned to the new member of their group.

"You'll probably feel pretty nauseous the first time through a teleport, most people do. It passes quickly, but be ready, OK?" He nodded. Looking at the other two men, she warned them to close their eyes, then performed the teleport. As soon as they appeared in a nearly deserted, snow-covered, and extremely chilly Times Square, she grabbed the FBI man and held him until he stopped swaying.

"Urgh. That was unpleasant," he mumbled, looking green.

"Don't worry, it only hits you like that the first time." She shivered. "Damn it's cold." They were standing on the sidewalk in six inches of snow, looking at a scene familiar from countless TV shows and movies. Chou handed her the clothes she'd produced, then after a few seconds concentration produced a warded circle a meter or so in diameter.

"Change in there, I've warmed the air inside. I'll make the wards opaque."

The shivering girl dived into the faintly glowing circle which began to glow more brightly, becoming impossible to see through. Foster stared in amazement. Agent Naito looked at him with a smile.

"You get used to seeing the impossible if you hang around these girls for very long." The other man nodded slowly, reaching out and tapping the honest-to-god force-field that had appeared in the middle of the sidewalk. Chou glanced at him with a calm expression that showed no signs of noticing the below-freezing temperatures.

"How does she get out?" he asked curiously.

"I set it to allow inbound travel until she was inside. Then I changed it to the other direction. From the inside she can simple walk through it."

"Incredible," Agent Foster said. She laughed.

"It could be useful. I haven't tried this before, it suddenly occurred to me when we arrived. I'll have to remember it." A minute or so later Aiko stepped through the wall of light, dressed like Yori. She looked down at herself, zipping up her jacket. "Better?" Chou asked, dismissing the warded area. She nodded.

"Much. We have got to figure out how to turn off that damn clothing spell. Especially if we're going to muck around in the snow."

Naito looked around. "So, where do we start? This is a large area and most of it is under a lot of snow." The others followed his gaze.

"Tell me more about these portal devices," Foster asked, putting his hands in his pockets to keep them warm. Looking at Chou standing there in thin silk clothing was making him feel cold. "What are we looking for? What sort of range do they have?"

"They look like a collection of metal tubing perhaps fifteen centimetres on a side, forming a rough cube, with a ten centimetre transparent sphere in the middle. It will be glowing bright green." He measured out the size in his head, converting from metric to inches.

"About a six inch cube. Not very big. You could hide that almost anywhere." She nodded.

"That's the problem, they're very portable. These ones are quite crude, they're the prototypes. The large batch we destroyed was even smaller. We could detect one if it was within two to three hundred metres under these conditions, although so far I can't feel anything. It's possible that it's shielded somehow, although the shielding would have to be very good to reduce that range much." After a moment, she reluctantly added, "I think we should assume that it is shielded to be on the safe side, which means we'll probably have to check the entire area very closely." Foster thought for a while.

"The range of the devices is very short. The portal opens a couple of metres away from the device in clear space. That's an automatic result of the way the spell works, you can't open a portal into an existing mass. So you could bury one, but only less than two metres depth at most, or it wouldn't function." He nodded, understanding the concept.

Foster and the others looked around. The cityscape could have hidden hundreds of the things without changing in the slightest. It seemed like an almost impossible task. "He was going for maximum casualties", Naito said slowly. "So, logically, he'd want to put the thing somewhere where the most people would be to minimise the likelihood people could escape." Chou glanced around the deserted streets.

"Somewhere at or near street level, then. Probably not in a building. It could be high up, the demon could simply drop to the ground, they're unbelievably resilient, but it would have made his job of planting the thing more difficult. Underground would probably open the portal into a basement or the subway system, if it worked at all, which would have less people." Foster listened to her analysis carefully.

"That all sounds good. So, I guess we just check the easy places first, then move on to the more difficult ones if nothing turns up."

"Aiko, you take Agent Naito and check the left side, Tamiko, you and Special Agent Foster do this side. Sweep at twenty metre intervals, that should give us a chance of detecting anything even if it is shielded. I'll go higher up and check along the first and second floors of the buildings." Everyone nodded, happy to let the blonde take command. They separated to start their sweeps.

"This is something we'd usually use a team of hundreds of people for, if it was a normal bomb," Foster commented to his companion. She glanced at him, then went back to slowly scanning the immediate surroundings.

"That would be ideal if we happened to have hundreds of magic-sensitive people. Unfortunately..." He sighed, looking around in case he could spot something unusual.

"True." Falling silent for a while, he followed her as she walked back and forth, the two of them leaving neat rows of parallel footprints. Looking up he watched, impressed, as Chou scrambled up and down the buildings around the area, going up to perhaps twenty-five feet then back down again. She was moving fast and easily, making him shake his head in wonder. Tamiko followed his gaze then giggled.

"Pretty weird, I guess."

"You could say that. I like to think I'm open-minded but this is certainly unusual." She laughed, continuing her scan. They kept walking for nearly two hours, combing the entire area. Eventually they met Aiko and Naito in the middle of the snow-covered road.

"Anything?" Aiko asked hopefully. Tamiko shook her head with a disgusted expression.

"Nope. Either it's not here, we're looking in the wrong place, or it's very well shielded." They turned as Chou walked up, looking disappointed.

"Nothing. I suppose we should probably start moving higher." They were looking around trying to work out the best place to start when her phone buzzed. Pulling it out of thin air she answered it.

"Did you have any luck?" She listened for a while. "I see. That's awkward. No, we haven't found anything yet either. This is a very big area to cover, there are more places to hide a device that you'd think possible." Once more she listened, her eyebrows going up. "Ah. Interesting. I wonder how well it would shield the device itself?" Tamiko and Aiko exchanged glances. "He might have tried the same trick here. I wonder why he didn't in London or Kyoto? Yes, that's possible, they could well have been planted first. I suppose it might have been done by someone else as well."

There was a pause as she listened, nodding thoughtfully. "That sounds like a good idea. I'll ask Aiko to come and get it." She glanced at the other woman who nodded. "About ten minutes. Same place? OK. Thanks, dear." Flipping the phone closed and into nothingness in the same motion, she looked at the people watching her. "Yori hasn't found the device we thought might be in LA but they found proof it exists. The mage seems to have used a rather interesting subspace pocket spell to hide it. Unfortunately, someone has moved it, at least twice. They're working on who at the moment." The blonde woman looked at Aiko.

"She pulled the power core that was running it, hoping to find a ki trace that would lead her to whoever opened the pocket last. She's found a trace, it looks like a young female, but so far has no idea who it is. Anyway, she thinks it's worth considering that the same idea might have been used here. The pocket is extremely well shielded, we might not detect it unless we were practically standing on it, but her idea was that it might be easier to try to find the pocket spell itself rather than what's in it. Can you go and get the power core from her, please, Aiko? I'll need it's pattern to trace the one here, assuming it exists."
"No problem. Um, I'll need to change first. Yori won't like me replacing her clothes with another uniform. She was really annoyed the last time." Chou giggled, remembering. Quickly generating another magical changing booth, she waved at it.

"There you go." The brunette ducked inside, emerging quickly dressed in her normal uniform.

"Keep it warm, I'll be right back," she said, looking chilled. She vanished in a flash that briefly illuminated the entire area, reflecting off the snow brilliantly. Chou snapped her hand out just in time to cover Agent Foster's eyes which he didn't close.

"Sorry, I should have remembered," he said, embarrassed. Smiling at him, she lowered her hand.

"Don't worry." They waited for a few minutes, until Aiko suddenly reappeared holding a glowing yellow sphere. Tossing it to Chou she quickly dived back into the warmth of the warded circle. The blonde inspected the ball carefully.

"Oh, my, that is an interesting spell," she murmured, staring at it with interest. Not for the first time Agent Naito wondered what she saw with her strange senses. By the time Aiko popped out of the warded area wearing warmer clothes she seemed to have learned something.

"So what next?" Aiko asked. The taller woman looked at the sphere for a moment longer before vanishing it.

"I think I can track the pocket spell, it's pretty subtle but then our methods are unusual. But even so I'll have to be within about forty to fifty metres." She looked at Foster. "If we could work out the most likely place to put the device, I could check it. Where would the most people be at New Years?" He turned to point.

"There. One Times Square. That's where the ball drop ceremony is, on the roof. Everyone gets packed around the building. Back here where we are now gets damn busy, but nearer the front it's almost impossible to move. There were close to a million people in the area last year." They looked up at the building with the iconic electronic ticker-tape display running around it, and several enormous video screens playing advertising. The Japanese people thought it reminded them of home, Tokyo was full of that sort of display.

"I seem to recall reading that most of that building is empty?" Tamiko said slowly. He nodded.

"Pretty much everything above the fourth or fifth floor, I think. The advertising revenue is so large they don't need to rent it out, not that most companies could afford the rent in that location anyway."

"That sounds like a pretty good location to stick a portal device," Naito said, looking up at the building. "Assuming he could get inside somehow." Chou sighed a little.

"He wasn't a particularly good mage in many ways but the average lock wouldn't present much of a challenge, neither would most security systems. I think we can assume he could walk in and out easily."

"Good place to start, then," Aiko said. Her friend nodded. They headed for the building, to a door that Agent Foster pointed out.

"We should have a warrant for this," he said calmly.

Chou glanced at him. "Would you like to get one?" The agent shook his head.
"I don't think I could without a lot of explaining. My superiors sent me to keep an eye on all of you but I don't think they really believe all of this. It's more along the lines of being careful."

"Someone in your government believes it," Naito said, "Or we probably wouldn't be here in the first place. Officially, at any rate."

"Oh, I have no doubt about that. But I'm pretty sure everyone in the FBI thinks it's impossible. They're just following instructions, or there would be more people than just me." Chou listened with interest while examining the door carefully.

"This is easy. Do you mind?" Foster waved at the entrance.

"Help yourself."

"Don't worry, I won't damage anything." She smiled at him, before turning to the door and doing something he couldn't make out. The door clicked and opened. Pushing it further open she went inside, followed by the others. Closing the door behind her she grinned at him.

"Impressive. Kind of scary, but impressive." He smiled back. They were standing at the bottom of a flight of cement stairs, that disappeared up into darkness. Looking around he found a light switch and flipped it on. Lights came on all the way up a very large number of stairs. Moving to the base of the stairwell and looking up the gap between the alternating floors he sighed. "That's a lot of stairs."

"We should probably start at the top and work our way back down," Aiko said, also looking up. Chou nodded, turning to the two men.

"Would you like us to carry you?" she asked mischievously. Naito sighed at the look on her face.

"You're as bad as Yori sometimes," he said. She laughed, bowing slightly, then waved towards the stairs.

"After you."

Twenty floors later the two law enforcement agents were looking somewhat tired, not to mention irritated at the way the three girls were bounding up the stairs as easily as they'd taken the first flight. "You could at least have the decency to work up a sweat," Naito said, breathing more heavily than he liked. Aiko turned around and smiled at him, climbing the stairs backwards.

"You need more exercise, Agent. You should ask Yori, I'm sure she could come up with a decent workout plan for you." He muttered to himself, making her snicker. Chou, who was in the lead, suddenly stopped, tilting her head curiously. Everyone looked at her.

"Odd." Looking around, she slowly walked back down the stairs past them, stopping on the next landing down. "Hmm." Walking back up she stopped again, a few steps up from the bottom, staring at the wall.

"What is it, Lassie?" Tamiko called with amusement. Chou looked up at her.

"Woof," she said. The auburn haired girl laughed. Pointing towards the front of the building, the other woman smiled. "I can feel something that way. It's odd, it feels like it's between the floors."

"On the wall?" Naito asked. She shook her head.

"No, it's further away than that. I think it must be near the front somewhere. Possibly outside."
Going back down to the landing she investigated the fire door, popping it open having bypassed the alarm effortlessly. Everyone filed in as she held it open, following them afterwards. The floor they were on was largely an empty shell, with a few light fittings in the ceiling but little else. It was possible to see where partition walls had been removed at some point in the past, possible several times as the building usage changed over the years. Walking slowly across the floor, stopping every now and then to change course slightly, Chou headed steadily for the front wall. Eventually she stopped, pointing.

"Right there. It's got to be on the outside. I can feel it only a few metres away." Foster walked to the window and looked out at the back of the huge display that covered it.

"This side of the display or the other?" She joined him at the window.

"It must be on the other side. I wonder how he got it out there?" Inspecting the window carefully she shrugged. "This hasn't been opened in decades. Oh well, I guess we go up to the roof and climb down." Going back into the stairwell they ascended the final six floors, Chou opening the door at the top onto the roof, which was covered in a thick layer of snow. Walking out onto it she went to the edge of the roof and peered over, before swinging herself over the side. Foster winced a little, knowing how high they were. Aiko noticed.

"Don't worry. If she fell, which she won't, she'd just bounce." Moving to the edge she looked down. The others joined her. Chou was easily moving down the face of the huge display, illuminated by it nicely. Her shadow was cast enormously across the snow on the ground, outlined in shifting colour. Stopping half-way down she moved sideways for a moment, then paused. After a couple of minutes she climbed back up. She was grinning.

"Got it," she said happily, producing the portal device in one hand and another power storage sphere in the other. Naito and Foster inspected the virulently green-glowing device. Chou put the yellow sphere away, then reached one slender finger into the midst of the device, touching the storage unit. The glow quickly vanished. "It's safe."

"When was it set to activate?" Aiko asked.

"As we thought, New Year's Eve, sometime late at night. He was obviously aiming for midnight but his timing spells weren't quite as accurate as that, so it would have been somewhere between probably ten PM and perhaps one AM."

"That would have been bad, whenever it went off," Foster said, looking at the thing curiously. Chou nodded, making it vanish.

"I'll destroy it when we have more space."

"Well, mission accomplished," Agent Naito said, looking very relieved. "More easily than I expected."

"Indeed. If Yori can track down the one in LA, that means there's only one left. Which is probably not in the US, either, which will please your people, Special Agent."

"Yes, it will. Thank you for dealing with it." They headed for the door. Halfway there, Tamiko stopped, looking around, then walked slowly over to the base of the mast on top of the building, staring intently at it. Aiko noticed and watched her curiously.

"What have you found?" she asked, joining her. Instead of answering, her team-mate looked around at the roof surrounding the pole.
"Special Agent Foster?" He looked over as she turned around.

"Yes?"

"You know what you were saying about normal bombs?" Aiko looked sharply at her, then down at the roof, inspecting it carefully. She swore.

Foster stared, then hurried over. "What do you mean?" The girl gestured to the roof.

"There would seem to be quite a lot of explosives immediately below us."

"Um, what?!" Tamiko nodded soberly.

"I can sense it. Must be a couple of hundred kilos at least." Foster looked at the roof beneath his feet uneasily.

"Are you sure?" he asked. She nodded again. Chou joined them, staring at the roof.

"She's right. It's a pretty large bomb. I'd guess if it goes off it would blow most of the roof off if not worse." Naito and Foster shared a glance, paling slightly.

"I think it would be a good idea if we left," the blonde said, waving them to the door. They made the trip down in silence. At the bottom, Foster pulled out his phone.

"I'll call it in. I have no idea how I'm going to explain this, though."

"Information received from a reliable informant is probably the best method," Naito suggested. The FBI agent nodded slowly.

"Guess so." He made the call. After a considerable amount of talking he hung up, then sighed a little. "I'm going to have a lot of explaining to do."

"We should probably go outside, or the explanations will become even more difficult," Chou said, opening the door. Once they were standing in the snow she relocked it using whatever method she'd unlocked it with in the first place. Foster watched with interest.

"You'd make a damn good thief," he said. She grinned, then handed him his own wallet.

"Indeed, but that would be wrong." While he stared at her Agent Naito chuckled.

"That's sort of her party trick. No, I have no idea at all how she does it."

By mutual unspoken agreement they walked away from the building, ending up next to a shop on the other side of the road, while they waited for the reinforcements. Only a few people were about, bundled up and moving as fast as they could. It had started snowing again. Naito and Foster began shivering. Chou looked at them for a moment, then concentrated. After ten seconds or so they both looked surprised. All of a sudden it had become much warmer and the snow had stopped. They peered around then glanced at each other. The little group was standing inside a circle a few feet across in which the snow wasn't falling. Foster stared upwards, watching open-mouthed as the snow above them slid off the sides of an invisible dome, piling slowly against it's base. The wind seemed to have died completely inside the area as well.

"Wow," he managed after a moment. Chou seemed amused by his reaction, while Tamiko and Aiko simply unzipped their jackets and enjoyed it. "That's a very useful trick."

"That's sort of her party trick. No, I have no idea at all how she does it."
Moving to the edge of the circle the FBI man cautiously reached out with his hand. He was slightly surprised to feel nothing when it went past the point that the snow was sliding down, although the sudden drop in temperature outside the shielded area was noticeable. He looked at Chou questioningly.

"Wards are directional. This blocks things from outside coming in. Going out from inside is unaffected. That's what I did earlier, for Aiko, you remember. If you want to block both directions at once you have to nest one inside the other in opposite directions and link them. It's very complicated to do properly. It's also almost impossible to move them around. You can expand and contract them easily enough, assuming you have enough power available, but moving the centre of them is extremely difficult." Nodding understandingly, he stepped back.

"How does the air get in?" he asked, suddenly thinking of a potential problem. Chou raised an eyebrow approvingly.

"Good question. This one is set to deflect kinetic energy above a certain level, which means air molecules will diffuse slowly through it, but it blocks the wind, the snow, things like that. It's not powerful enough to block anything moving very fast but it doesn't need to be." Foster was very impressed by the level of understanding the young woman clearly possessed of her field of expertise.

Naito was listening with interest, while thinking about the bomb they'd found up on the roof. After a while he mused, "Is it simply a coincidence that there's a lot of explosives in the same building as a portal device, or are they linked? It seems unlikely that there could be two simultaneous different terrorist attacks. Although I suppose this is a high-profile target."

"I'm not aware of any current threats that could be behind this," Foster said, turning to his Japanese counterpart. "That's not to say there isn't one we don't know about. But I'd agree it's stretching credulity to think the bomb and the portal device aren't linked."

Aiko looked up at the building thoughtfully, musing out loud, "I guess he could have arranged a huge explosion as a backup method. The number of people here would be so large that if they really panicked the stampede could kill as many people as the demon would. Plus it would block all the roads, tie up the emergency response people, just cause chaos in general. Which was certainly what he was working towards." Agent Foster looked at her for a moment, then followed her gaze.

"Plausible. Very plausible. If the blast was big enough it might cause the entire front of the building to collapse which would kill hundreds. Adding the demon into that, the death toll would be... unbelievable." He didn't look happy. Glancing at his watch, he muttered, "Where the hell is everyone? I called it in twenty minutes ago."

"The weather is so bad they're probably having trouble. I don't think anyone is going to want to fly a helicopter in these conditions, in such a crowded city, so they'll have to come in ground vehicles, which will have trouble as well." It was snowing very hard by now, visibility dropping to only fifty or sixty feet, the small number of pedestrians having vanished entirely. Foster looked at the short woman, nodding in agreement, then inspected the foot or so of snow in a perfect circle around them, leaning against something that wasn't there, at least to the eye. He was very grateful for the protection provided by Chou. A few minutes later they heard the first sirens, although the vehicles they were attached to didn't come into view for a surprisingly long time.

Eventually, though, a large military style SUV slid to a halt, accompanied by several smaller ones, along with a couple of police cars that were having considerable difficulty with the weather conditions. They disgorged quite a lot of men and women wearing various uniforms with heavy jackets, from both the NYPD and the FBI. A number of them immediately began moving towards One Times Square, while others produced barriers and flashing lights which were used to block all the roads in the immediate vicinity, a task made more difficult by the drifting snow. A man who seemed to be in charge of the FBI group looked around, spotting them immediately. Heading in their direction he picked up an escort from the police bomb squad en route. As he neared the warded area his eyes widened when he noticed the fact that they were standing in a snow-free bubble, the snow that had been present having mostly melted by now, running outside the wards and refreezing. He stopped for a moment, then resumed walking.

When he and the other two men he'd picked up were close enough Chou expanded the wards to cover them as well. They all looked very surprised at the sudden warmth, which wasn't all that hot but after the temperature outside the little zone, seemed almost tropical. One of the men looked around with shock on his face while the other smiled.

"Cool. How's that work?" he asked curiously. Chou smiled back at him.

"Magic." There was a long pause.

"OK." He seemed surprised but after a moment simply shrugged, accepting it. The other bomb tech stared at her, then the others. He didn't seem to know how to react. The FBI agent ignored them, looking at Agent Foster.

"What's all this about, Foster?" he asked sharply, turning to inspect the four Japanese people. "You were supposed to be looking after the people from Japan, whatever it was they were doing. Not that the State department has told me what that is. Now you're calling in major bomb alerts in the middle of the city. How did we get here from there?" Special Agent Foster looked slightly worried, glancing at the others, who watched with interest. Chou smiled a little at him.

"Well, sir, we happen to have come into information that there's a large quantity of explosives at One Times Square, on the top floor. Several hundred pounds of it. I don't know anything else yet." Both bomb squad men fixed their attention on him immediately.

"Yes, I got that much from the initial report. What I'm curious about is precisely how you know this." Foster swallowed.

"It was a reliable tip, sir," he replied. The senior agent looked at him narrowly.

"From whom?" he asked suspiciously. "That's a very interesting bit of information out of nowhere, we don't have any current investigations leading us to anything of this magnitude. I know, I checked before I left the office." Looking guilty, Foster glanced at the magical girls, who looked back.

"Um, an informant, sir." His superior followed his gaze for a second.

"And how did this informant happen on this information, Special Agent? Why should we believe it?" Chou sighed a little, attracting his attention.

"We discovered the bomb while we were in the process of recovering a terrorist weapon." The senior agent transferred his hard gaze to her. It didn't seem to have any intimidatory effect, which puzzled him a little. He'd practised it for ages in the mirror and it usually worked.

"A terrorist weapon. Would you mind explaining that to me?"

"Yes."
He stared at her. "What?"

"Yes, I would mind explaining. You're being very rude." She gave him a look that made him feel small inside, bringing his childhood back with a rush. Wilting a little his attitude changed considerable. Foster watched with astonishment, while Naito and the other two girls tried not to smile.

"I'm sorry," he said quietly, wondering why he was apologising yet unable to stop himself. "Would you please explain that to me?" She smiled brilliantly.

"Of course!" She did so. He listened impassively until she finished. To one side the two bomb technicians exchanged glances. When she stopped talking he looked at her, then her colleagues, then his own agent.

"So let me get this right. You four teleported here from Japan, used magical powers to enter a locked building, then you, miss, climbed down the front of the building nearly four hundred feet up in a snowstorm to retrieve a magical terror weapon that summons man-eating demons from another world, then on the way back down you happened to notice a very large bomb?" She nodded, smiling slightly.

"We teleported from Los Angeles, it wasn't snowing at the time and it was Tamiko who spotted the explosives, but yes, that's basically it."

The senior agent in charge stared at her for several seconds wordlessly.

"Bullshit." Her expression didn't change, but he took a step back, then wondered why.

"You're being rude again," she said politely. Shaking off the effect he glared at her.

"Tell me why I shouldn't arrest you for breaking and entering? And you, what the hell are you doing letting foreign citizens just walk into a private building? Without even a warrant? What sort of proof do you have for any of this crap? Magic, for fuck's sake!" He was almost shouting.

Tamiko looked at Aiko, then shrugged. They turned back to watch what happened with lively interest. Agent Naito was once again wondering why he kept getting mixed up in this sort of thing.

Chou looked at the senior agent for a moment, then around at the circle on the ground where the snow wasn't falling. Following her eyes his determination faltered slightly. He jumped when she pulled a six inch cube of metal and glass out of thin air. "One deactivated portal device." She handed it to him. Inspecting it curiously he stared when she reached out and touched the glass globe in the middle, making it light up a golden colour like late afternoon sunset. "One activated portal device." Agent Naito moved slightly further away. Foster, after a wide-eye stare, did the same. Both bomb squad technicians studied the device more calmly than one might expect, but working with temperamental high-energy chemistry on a regular basis tended to produce people who didn't panic easily.

"Ah..." The senior agent looked at her, then back at the device he was holding. Gently taking it from him she touched the sphere again. The glow faded, visibly siphoned into her fingertip.

"And now it's deactivated again. You see?" Glancing at Aiko she commented, "Yori's approach does concentrate the mind wonderfully, I must say." The other girl looked amused, while Naito sighed a little.

"May I see that, please?" the bomb tech that had accepted magic as an explanation asked politely. She smiled at him, handing it over. He and his colleague examined the device carefully, pulling out very bright flashlights to look at it. There was quite a lot of ambient light from the various displays, illuminated signs and street-lights around Times Square but with the snow diffusing it the lighting wasn't ideal. "Interesting. No visible power source, too light to have much of a hidden battery, nothing inside that ball in the middle anyway." He shone the flashlight through the storage sphere from the other side to check. "No, it's just a transparent ball. No timers, electronics, or anything else I can see." Looking up he saw the blonde looking at him with an interested expression.

"So how did it light up like that?"

"Like I said, magic. The 'ball' is essentially a magical battery, it stores the energy required to generate the portal. The rest of it controls and shapes the various spells that do the target acquisition, tracking, and timing functions." He stared for a moment, then looked at his colleague.

"Can you light it up again?" She reached out again and touched the sphere as he held the device up. It glowed brightly, illuminating them and the surroundings. "Weird." Glancing at the senior agent who was watching this with an uncertain expression, quite unlike his earlier aggressiveness, he said, "I have no idea at all how this works. It's certainly nothing I've ever seen before. In the absence of a better explanation than magic I think you should probably listen to her." His colleague didn't seem as convinced but was still silent, staring at the portal weapon. Handing it back he watched carefully as she de-powered it again then made it vanish.

"I'd like to study that some more," he said hopefully. Smiling regretfully, she shook her head.

"I'm afraid that won't be possible, the device will be destroyed like the others." The senior agent gazed at her.

"We could make you turn it over to us," he said, attempting his intimidating expression again, without much luck. She gave him a gentle look.

"No, you couldn't." Despite the serene expression he got the feeling somehow that this was an avenue which led to far more trouble than he wanted. Dropping the subject he turned back to the other FBI man, pretending he hadn't said anything. Tamiko snickered, but he manfully ignored it.

"OK. I guess we go and check. But I'd like to talk with you later." Foster didn't look wildly keen about this. Turning to the lead bomb expert the agent nodded. "Go ahead." The technician turned and walked into the snow, his colleague following. "Stay here," the senior agent said, looking at them all, before going after the bomb techs. The five people inside the bubble of warmth were quiet for a moment.

"A little pushy, isn't he?" Aiko said in a slightly amused tone of voice. Agent Foster nodded glumly.

"He's not an easy man to deal with. A good agent, but he's very by-the-book. We don't get along as well as you'd like." They watched through the falling snow as various people ran around, getting equipment out of the vehicles and setting it up, before a pair of people headed for the door they'd entered by, which was being guarded for some reason by two very chilly policemen. A crowbar was produced and used, the door yielding to it after some effort. An alarm could immediately be heard going off, falling silent seconds later. Chou sighed a little.

"That's very destructive. I could have opened it for them." Agent Naito laughed.

"I think they want to do it themselves, Chou. Leave some work for the rest of us." She giggled, looking over her shoulder at him. The EOD team disappeared inside the building and everything went very quiet.
"They won't use radio, in case it triggers the bomb," Special Agent Foster said after a while. "I think they run a cable behind them and use that for communications. One person will go ahead when they get close." Agent Naito nodded.

"We use the same technique in Japan. It's normally an optical fibre, it's much lighter and can carry video and audio as well as data for computers at the same time." Twenty minutes crawled by very slowly. Eventually the senior FBI man could be seen walking back towards them. He didn't look happy. Entering the bubble of warmth, which Chou had quickly made a hole in for him so he wouldn't bounce off, he gave them all hard looks.

"They can't find anything. The top floor is completely empty, apparently. No sign of a bomb. Nothing on the roof either except for a lot of fresh footprints which I assume must be yours." Aiko and Tamiko exchanged puzzled glances with Chou.

"There is definitely a considerable amount of explosives up there, Agent," Tamiko said. He shrugged angrily.

"Well, they're invisible, then, because they checked the roof, the top floor, and the next two down. Nothing, and no signs anyone has been in there for months. Possibly years." Chou looked up at the building as did the other two girls.

"That's interesting." After a moment, enlightenment crossed her face. "Ah. I think I know what the problem is. I suspect that there is a spell diverting attention away from the bomb. It's quite easy to do a basic form of, which would suffice for anyone not magically aware. They can be difficult to spot from a distance." Staring at her the agent sighed.

"Magic again. Why am I having so much trouble believing anything you tell me?" The blonde shrugged.

"I have no idea, it's all true."

"Well, without any evidence I'm going to have no choice but to call this all off."

"I can go and check for you, and remove the spell." He shook his head.

"I can't allow that." She sighed.

"Why not? If there is no bomb, it's perfectly safe for everyone. If there is a bomb, I'm the only one here at the moment who can locate it for you." He looked unconvinced. Smiling at him she stepped forward. "Agent, surely there's no harm in letting me look. Your State Department was prepared to let us come here and deal with the portal weapon, let me help you with this bomb."

After staring at her for a long moment he glanced at Foster, who shrugged and nodded. "Oh, hell, all the rules seem to be bending right now. All right. Against my better judgement you can go up." Looking pleased, she dropped the wards, making everyone else squawk as the cold wind suddenly drove snow at them, following him back across the empty street to the bomb disposal truck. The others followed. Arriving at it he spoke to the man sitting at a control console, who looked at the blonde with surprise, then spoke into a microphone for a moment. Once he received the response he turned to them.

"They're waiting for you at the twenty-second floor." Chou nodded, turning and heading for the entrance. She went inside, the operator in the vehicle looking surprised by the message he received less than half a minute later. "Holy crap, how did she do that? They say she'd already there. Twenty-two floors in thirty seconds?" Tamiko laughed.
"I know. She must be getting tired." He looked at the girl for a moment with a weird expression.

Ken Francis was worried. The Japanese girl had put on some pretty convincing demonstrations of something, although he wasn't certain exactly what. 'Magic', she called it. He wasn't sure he believed in magic or any supernatural thing at all, although he wasn't averse to sometimes asking Saint Barbara for a little help on a tricky job. A habit he'd fallen into when working with an old Irish Catholic bomb expert years ago. The man had retired at a ripe old age, which was proof of something, since the job quite often ended early. As did the experts.

The blonde and her friends had been very insistent that there was a large bomb up here, but for the life of him he couldn't find anything at all. Looking through the visor of his blast suit he turned around in the middle of the floor, pointing his light into every nook and cranny. The lights up here looked like they didn't work, not that he'd been tempted to try them, just in case someone had gotten clever with triggers. It wouldn't have been the first time. He'd checked the roof, the top floor, then the next two floors as well just to be sure, but nothing had shown up. Still, he'd decided to recheck the top floor again. He couldn't get that little demonstration involving the alleged demon weapon out of his mind, which made him take the warning they'd received seriously despite the lack of evidence so far.

"Ken?" His colleague Alonso's voice came through his headphones.

"I'm here. Nothing yet. Again."

"Russ called from the truck. That blonde girl is coming up." Surprised, he turned around in the cumbersome suit, heading back to the doorway, careful not to trip over the cable coming from the waist comms pack.

"What for?"

"Apparently she thinks that the bomb is disguised and she knows how to find it."

"I'm not convinced there is a bomb."

"I know, but she is. If the FBI is letting her in here, they must think whatever she's got is worth listening to. Shit!"

"What, Al? You suddenly suffering from Tourette's?"

"She's here. How the hell did she get up here so fast, that wasn't even a minute!" Arriving at the door he looked out. The girl was coming up the stairs towards him, moving fast but gracefully. She didn't look winded at all after what must have been an incredible race up the stairs.

"Hello again," she said, looking pleased to see him.

"Hello, miss." Smiling, she corrected him.

"Chou, please." Holding out his hand in the heavy suit, he shook hands with her clumsily.

"Ken Francis. Call me Ken. You think you know where the bomb is, assuming there is one?"

Nodding, she waited for him to back through the doorway, then turn around. Slipping in after him she looked around carefully, then up. Her eyes widened.

"That's a very large bomb." He followed her gaze to the roof. Nothing was visible, only bare cement with cable trays running across it, the suspended ceiling that would have been there long since removed during one refit or another. Cables ran through the wall to the front and sides of the buildings, looking newer than the power and lighting feeds, presumably driving the signage on the outside of the building.

"I can't see anything," he said slowly.

"I know. There's a sort of illusion over it, it shows you the roof before the explosives were put in place. I'll disable it." He sucked in a horrified breath as the roof wavered and changed.

"Oh, hell. That's a big bomb," he said in an extremely worried voice. "A really, really big bomb." Al's voice came in his ear.

"You found something, Ken?"

Nodding, despite the fact his colleague couldn't see anything, he described what he could now see. "There's what looks like about a quarter of a ton of C-4 attached to the ceiling. It's all over the place. Someone must have spend hours setting this. It looks like it's been specifically placed to collapse the roof." Sweeping his light around he added, "There's some on the walls as well. If this goes off the entire top floor, at least, is going to end up on the ground." There was silence for a moment, broken by some soft swearing in Spanish.

"Could it collapse the building?" Al asked.

"I don't think so, looking at it, but it would drop tons of debris into Times Square. If this really is timed to go at midnight on New Year's Eve a hell of a lot of people would be killed or injured."

After another long pause, his friend asked, "Can you see the control mechanism?" Once again sweeping the light across the explosives, Ken followed the strands of det cord that linked all the clusters of explosives along the ceiling to where they gathered into a bundle. It ran down the wall to a small box on the floor.

"Got it. This is a really professional job, it looks like it was done by a demolition expert. That's good, it's not likely to go by accident."

"Any booby-traps?" Cautiously approaching the box, he kept the light on it, looking for tripwires or anything else obvious.

"Not that I can see. Although a good booby-trap is the one you can't see, of course." He laughed, feeling slightly light-headed, something that always happened when he was in this situation. "Al? This blast suit won't do a damn thing if this lot goes up. I'm taking it off so I can work better." There was a pause, then his colleague replied.

"You're the man on the spot. Do what you need to."

"You should probably get out. You're not safe where you are if I fuck it up." Al laughed.

"Then don't fuck it up." Chuckling, Ken struggled to get the top of the heavy suit off. Slim hands helping him caught him by surprise. Turning he saw Chou smiling at him. He'd forgotten she was there in the shock of finding himself sharing the room with a huge amount of unstable chemicals.

"Thanks, Chou. But you should go. Thank you for showing me the bomb. I can take it from here." She grinned at him, shaking her head.

"No, I think I'll stay as well. Don't worry, we'll be fine." Looking at her for a moment, he nodded.
"If you insist. By the way, you don't have any magical bomb disposal techniques, do you?"

"For something like this, spread out all over the room, that's a little difficult." She looked at the roof again. "If it was all in one place I could put a heavy ward around it then vaporise everything inside, which would deal with it neatly, but this is awkward. I suppose I could do it in sections, but I'm not sure that it wouldn't detonate other parts in the process. It's probably not a good idea to experiment with such a high-profile building. Your government would be annoyed if I damaged it." Ken laughed a little.

"Yes, people would be upset. It's something of a landmark." The blonde smiled at him.

"I can protect you, though, and your friend. You should let him know not to worry." Looking intrigued, Ken picked up the helmet of the suit and put it on so he could talk to Al.

"Al? Chou says not to worry."

"About what, exactly?" His colleague's voice was heavy with suspicion. Glancing at the woman Ken saw she appeared to be concentrating on something, looking in a slight downwards direction that he suspected was directly at the other man below them.

"I think you'll know it when you see it." A few seconds later his friend yelped, then went silent. When he came back on his voice was a little shaky.

"Um, OK. I'm looking at it, but I'm not sure I believe it."

"What happened?" Ken was very curious. Chou was looking pleased.

"A damn forcefield or something just surrounded me! It's the same golden colour that girl made the device she had glow earlier." Thinking for a moment, the bomb tech laughed.

"Stay inside it. I have a feeling that even if this thing went off you'd be fine." There was a wordless grunt from his compatriot, but he thought the other man would follow the instructions. He took his helmet off again. "That was you, I assume." She nodded.

"Producing wards at a distance is harder than close up, but it's good practice. That one is strong enough to protect your friend if anything bad happens." She concentrated again, while Ken watched. A few seconds passed before a golden transparent curtain surrounded them completely. He looked at it in wonder. "This one should protect us. You can put your hands through it, but it will block things coming in from outside." He experimentally waved his hand through the visible wall of light, feeling nothing.

"Good grief. That's amazing." The young woman nodded, again looking pleased.

"It should help. It's a lot more effective than your suit, I think. The colour is there so you can see where it is." The edge of the ward was only a short distance from the control box, so he turned his attention to it. It looked safe enough, which made him extremely paranoid instantly. Handing Chou the light and pulling his toolbag towards him he opened it and took out a magnifier, very carefully inspecting the box, paying particular attention to the lid fasteners. She held the light rock-steady.

"As far as I can see it's a standard commercial demolitions unit, the sort of thing they use for controlled implosions on old buildings." Chou nodded silently. "They're normally remotely activated, but this one presumably has a timer." Turning his attention back to the box he performed several tests, before very cautiously reaching through the ward to open the lid, which wasn't locked. It simply swung open very undramatically. "Hmm. I have to admit I was expecting something horrible to happen." He grinned at her.
Looking at the revealed interior of the box, his eyebrows went up a little. "Weird. That's very neatly laid out, with no obvious traps at all. It's a textbook demo job. Not what we normally see." Despite working extremely cautiously, describing what he was doing and seeing into a small tape recorder as a log of the procedure, it only took him ten minutes to render the device safe. "That was a hell of a lot less difficult than I thought it would be," he commented, removing the last component. He'd completely disassembled the box, photographing each stage once he was certain there were no sensors the camera flash could trigger. "Not that I'm complaining," he added hastily. Chou giggled from behind him.

"Don't worry, I know what you mean."

"It's weird, like whoever put this here knew exactly what to do but had no idea how to make it difficult to disarm. That's very unusual."

"My guess is that they were relying on the illusion spell to hide it, so they didn't bother with traps. Perhaps they wanted to be sure they could work on it safely. I'd assume that a booby-trapped bomb is dangerous to the bomb-maker as well." Ken nodded, putting his tools away.

"Sometimes more dangerous than to anyone else. I've run into a lot of cases where someone setting a bomb blew themselves up, either because they made a mistake or simply forgot their own trap. It happens. This one was much more professional and also much simpler. Improvised ones are often a dangerous mess." He snickered. "As if there's such a thing as a 'safe' bomb, but you get the point." Chou dismissed the wards while he went around the room carefully removing all the detonating cord stringing the blocks of C-4 together. The cluster of four blasting caps he'd removed from the other ends of the cord were placed safely into a heavy box full of sawdust. "That's it. We'll need to remove the primary charge, but that stuff is very stable, it won't go off accidentally."

"I've scanned it thoroughly and I can't find any other mechanisms hidden anywhere that could trigger it. I think that one was the only timer," Chou said.

"Good." Picking up the box of blasting caps carefully he grabbed his toolbag with the other hand. The Japanese woman helpfully carried his suit top section and the helmet. They headed down the stairs to where Al was. When they reached him he took the suit from Chou with a grunt, wondering how she was carrying it as if it was weightless, which it certainly wasn't. Ken put his tools down then gently lowered the box of caps to the floor, before sitting on the bottom step. "Thanks, Chou."

"You're welcome." She smiled at them both. "I need to go, we have to get back, but it's been nice meeting you both." Shaking hands with them, she disappeared back down the stairs at high speed. Watching her go both men then looked at each other.

"That was certainly one of the strangest people I've ever met," Al said reflectively. Ken nodded.

"Nice ass, though." They exchanged glances again, laughed, then began packing up.

Special Agent Foster had watched his superior's face when the bomb truck operator had passed on the report that Chou had uncovered a massive amount of military explosives in the top floor of the building. He'd gone pale, then very thoughtful. When the young woman exited the building and walked over to them, he studied her for a moment. Eventually he said, "I'm sorry if I was disrespectful earlier. This sort of thing is out of my comfort zone." After inspecting his face, she smiled.

"I understand. You Americans don't have very much experience with magic and it can be rather surprising at first. It's sometimes a shock even to people from our own society who are much more familiar with it."

"Thank you for averting this disaster. I hate to think what would have happened if you hadn't found that bomb." Leaning against the truck she nodded soberly.

"It would have been very bad. The demon would have been worse. Luckily, that won't happen now." She glanced at Aiko, standing next to her. "We should go back to the consul's house, then to LA. We can help Yori and the others find the other portal device."

The short woman grinned. "I'll need a changing booth again, please." A few seconds later everyone in the area stared as a cylinder of golden light appeared, Aiko walking into it. The senior agent gaped, then deliberately controlled his expression. Tamiko and Chou were looking at him with smiles.

"Ah, right." He glanced at the opaque cylinder again for a moment then turned his attention to Chou and Agent Naito. "We'll start tracing the explosives. That much C-4 is going to leave a trail." Naito looked pensive.

"I suspect you won't find the bomber. I'm not sure but I seem to recall that one of the cult members shot dead in LA last year was some sort of explosives expert. My guess is that he was responsible for that bomb."

"We can hopefully still locate whoever supplied the explosives and shut them down," the agent said, looking grim. "That needs to be done in any case." Naito nodded.

"True. Good luck." He shook hands with the man.

"I'll make sure the PSIA gets a copy of both mine and Foster's report on this," the FBI man said.

"Thank you." Naito looked at Aiko who had just stepped out of the wards in her normal uniform. Everyone who hadn't seen it stared in surprise. She shivered.

"Damn, it's even colder now than it was when we got here. Let's go, quick, before I freeze!"

The four Japanese people and Special Agent Foster clustered together. "Close your eyes," Aiko warned the people watching, then teleported before she saw whether they'd listened, her legs felt numb. A few people had heeded her warning but she left a lot of cops blinking and swearing behind her.

The quintet appeared in the middle of Consul-General Mori's living room, making him jump and spill his drink. Ichiro was looking in the other direction and missed it. "Ah, ladies and gentleman, welcome back," the consul said genially, recovering nicely. The two glasses of whisky he'd already had probably helped. Looking mournfully at the rather expensive puddle on the floor he sighed, then put his glass down. "How did it go?"

"Very well, thank you, Tadao," Chou replied, producing the portal device and showing it to him. He inspected it with interest. It matched the pictures he'd seen, aside from not glowing green. "I deactivated it when we found it. I'll destroy it when we get to LA. The noise might wake your neighbours."

"Very considerate." She put it away again. Agent Naito took his coat off and sat down, looking at the snowy footprints they'd left on the carpet with some embarrassment. The consul noticed, then laughed. "Don't worry about that, it will clean up. It's only water."

"We found something else, Consul," Special Agent Foster said, also sitting. The older man looked at him with a raised eyebrow. "Or rather, your people did. I didn't do much except watch." He explained the bomb, with the others adding details where relevant. Consul Mori listened with interest until he'd finished.

"Remarkable. You've outdone yourselves, ladies. I think this will certainly make the American government feel grateful. Thank you, once again you've helped international relations immeasurably and brought honour to yourselves and your country."

"It's what we do," Tamiko said with a grin. He laughed.

"Apparently it is." He offered them all drinks again. This time everyone but Foster accepted a small glass of sake. When they'd finished it, Chou looked at her watch.

"We should be going. Yori and the others in LA are going to need our help tracing the other portal weapon, she says it's unstable and could activate at any moment." The consul nodded understandingly.

"It's been a pleasure and an honour meeting you all. I hope we can meet again."

The three girls bowed slightly. They made their goodbyes, Chou looking at Special Agent Foster for a moment. "Thank you for your help. I'm very sorry if we got you in trouble." He waved this off dismissively.

"Don't worry. The results are the important part. I'm sure once all the reports are in the fact that a horrible tragedy was avoided will be the part people concentrate on." She smiled at him kindly.

"I hope so. Good luck."

"You too." They all waved, Aiko reminding them of the flash before teleporting as the three men looked away.

"What remarkable people." The consul inspected the spot on his carpet where only damp footprints remained, then poured himself a replacement whisky.

"You're sure it was a female, this trace you found," Harrison asked. Yori looked mildly insulted.

"Of course I'm sure."

He grinned at the expression on her face. "Don't worry, I'm not questioning your competence. I just wanted to be certain." She stared at him for a moment, a small smile playing about her lips.

"You can check for yourself if you want." He sighed. Snickering, she leaned back in the chair she'd stolen from Rojas' desk as soon as he'd left. "No, it was definitely female. I'd say between fourteen and sixteen. Can't tell you much more than that, the trace was too faint."

"Could you match it to a person?" Fumiko asked, from where she was leaning against another desk. The large room was two thirds empty, only the night shift and them present. They'd been in the station for a couple of hours, trying to work out the next step. The other officers occasionally looked over but so far no one had interrupted. Yori shook her head slowly.

"I don't think so. It was very weak. I was lucky to get that much. It must be about eight or nine days old, possibly as much as two weeks, but I doubt it."

"OK, so we're looking for a girl between fourteen and sixteen who was in the vicinity of Mann's Theatre between one and two weeks ago." Harrison groaned, banging his head on the desk. "That narrows it down. Wonderful."

"Hey, it's a start. That's more than we had an hour ago."

"True. All right, let's think this through. The device was definitely in the subspace pocket in that pot two weeks ago. By a week ago it was definitely in the school." Yori nodded. "We don't know when it was put in the pot, but several months ago is likely." She nodded again.

"At least three months or so, which is when the mage... ceased, but probably less than six. Actually, from his records we know that he was in LA twice, which narrows it down, so it was most likely between four and five months ago."

"OK. We also know that all the cult members are either in jail or dead, and that there were no more than a dozen of them in the first place. So it almost certainly wasn't anyone directly associated with the cult that moved the device either time." Yori nodded for a third time. "The ki trace you found indicates a young female was involved."

"The obvious conclusion is that the young female probably attends that girls school," Fumiko said slowly. The others looked at her, then at each other.

"It's a good working theory," Harrison said. "This girl, whoever she is, somehow finds the subspace pocket, opens it, removes the device, closes it again, takes the thing to school for some reason, then... what, takes it home? Throws it away? Sells it? How could she find the pocket, never mind open it or close it? It took Fumiko some careful searching to discover it and she was looking for it."

"Closing it isn't the odd thing, it's designed to close itself after a short period. A security measure, I'd say. Opening it in the first place is the good trick. If I had to guess I think it was most likely a complete accident. Either that or she's a magic-sensitive who noticed something, then poked around until she found it, but that seems unlikely. Not actually impossible, though. The first explanation is simpler." With a sigh Yori looked around the room, then back to her friends. "It's still unlikely but it's all I can think of. As far as why she took it to school, perhaps she wanted to show it to her friends? The things look quite impressive, after all, especially if you don't know about magic."

"OK, I can see that. To a teenaged girl it might well be something she'd want to show off. But why leave it there?" Yori shrugged.

"No idea."

"Where in the school did you find the trace signature?" Misaki asked, unwrapping another chocolate bar. Glancing at her, Yori looked amused.

"It was in some sort of storage area."

"Not a locker or anything like that?" Harrison asked with interest. She shook her head.

"No. The place was full of mops and cleaning stuff. It was pushed into an air duct. Obviously to hide it."

"Hmm. Odd." The lieutenant looked up as another officer approached. "Got anything, Suzie?" The tall woman shook her head.

"Sorry, Lieutenant. There are several covert security cameras covering that area, but for some reason none of them have recorded anything for about four and a half months. The manager is furious, he hadn't noticed. When I left him he was shouting at the security company on the phone." She looked amused. "He has quite a vocabulary."

"Nothing from across the street or anything like that?" She shook her head.

"No. Only one camera in the area points in that direction and it's blocked by the angle of the building." Harrison sighed.

"Well, there goes that idea." Yori was thinking, scratching the back of her head. She looked at the police officer.

"Was their entire security system not working, or just those cameras?" she asked curiously. The woman looked at her.

"Just those ones. Everything else seems to be working fine." Nodding, the young Japanese woman pondered this.

"Thanks." The officer went back to her desk. Harrison looked at the girl sitting across from him.

"What are you thinking?" he asked.

Looking up she replied, "We probably know when the subspace pocket was put there." He saw what she was getting at.

"Four and a half months ago."

"Yep. I suspect part of the spell blocks surveillance. I know a number of ways of doing the same thing to one degree or another. It's quite a complicated little spell, I haven't checked it thoroughly yet." Pulling the sphere out of her ki space pocket she studied it for a couple of minutes. "I thought so. That's not a method I've seen before but it would certainly stop cameras working. Interestingly, only electronic ones, I think film would work. Weird. Why limit it like that?" After a moment she shook her head and put it away again. "I'll have to track down the guy who made it and ask."

"So, four and a half months ago, the mage turns up with that thing and the portal device, installs it in the pot, sticks the device inside with the timer running, and goes away again. A week or so ago, some schoolgirl trips over it and removes the device then takes it to school. Well, that hopefully narrows it down a bit. But assuming it's true, we have to figure out which schoolgirl. There are hundreds of them there."

"Presumably not all of them are fourteen to sixteen, though?" Fumiko moved to take a chair from an empty desk, sitting in it and leaning back.

"No. I can find out how many. Hold on." Turning to his computer he searched for a while. "About ninety-five girls in grades eight to eleven, which covers that age. Probably about two thirds of that are exactly the right age range."

"Too many to check one after the other. It would take days, and we don't have that." Closing her eyes, Yori sighed. "We need to figure out a way to check them all at once."

"It's the Christmas holidays so they won't be in school for another few days, after New Year's. The obvious solution would have been to arrange some sort of assembly at the school and just ask them, 'Did you find a thing with a glowing green ball in the middle of it?'" Yori grinned, then suddenly opened her eyes.

"Hey, that's right. It's the holiday period right now. When did school let out?"
"Two days before Christmas."

"Which is nearly a week ago. So, unless the girl has some way of getting into the school when it's closed, she didn't remove the damn thing a day or two ago. Someone else did." Harrison groaned.

"Oh, hell, that makes it even more complicated."

"This is all assuming that the female in question even goes to the school," Misaki said, cutting up an apple. Harrison looked at her, noticing with amusement she was using the butterfly knife she'd 'acquired' from Pablo.

"Very true, but it's the only lead we have." She nodded, eating a slice of the fruit.

A number of ideas were discussed and rejected, until Yori pulled her phone out, looking irritated. "May as well see how the others are getting along. Hopefully they're having better luck than we are." Dialling Chou, she waited. "Hi. Well, yes and no. We found that there definitely is, or was a portal device here. Right outside Mann's, like the clue suggested. But someone moved it somewhere between one and maybe two weeks ago to a nearby school, then again to parts unknown. We're trying to figure out who the first person was. How are you getting on? Did you find it?"

"I can believe that. The problem might be worse than you think. The one here was in a very clever little subspace pocket. I want to find who came up with the spell, the shielding on it is incredible, it's nearly as good as ours. The traces were barely visible even right next to it when it was closed."

"I'm not sure, but I suspect very well." Harrison was wondering what Chou was saying.

"No idea, aside from the fact that he clearly didn't come up with this spell, he had to have bought it in. It would have been expensive, maybe he couldn't afford many. Or he didn't think of it at first."

Looking thoughtful, she listened for a moment, then replied, "I managed to pull a very faint ki signature trace from the power storage sphere after I turned the spell off. I've got something, looks like a female between about fourteen and sixteen, but we're having trouble working out what to do with it. If he used the same system in New York you might try looking for it rather than directly for the device. You could use this one to get the pattern. It's a long shot but worth trying."

"OK. How long? Yes. I'll meet her with it. Good luck." Hanging up and putting the phone away, she summarised the conversation for them. "I'll go and meet her where we teleported in the first time, no sense scaring the locals." She grinned as she stood. "I'll be back in a minute." She walked out the door, returning a few minutes later. "Right, hopefully that will help the others. It still leaves us with a problem."

Fumiko was swinging her chair from side to side, slowly, thinking hard. "You said it was in a storage closet." Yori nodded. "Was it locked?"

"Actually, yes, it was." She looked intrigued. "That's a good point."

The other girl stopped moving her chair and looked at Harrison, then Yori. "Can you find out whether that closet is normally locked? If it is, whoever put the device in there had to have access to the keys. That should narrow it down a lot."

"Assuming they don't have ninja lock-picking skills like you lot, or whatever it is you do." He grinned at her. Turning to his computer he typed for a while, then picked up the phone. Fumiko looked at Yori.

"Do you have ninja lock-picking skills? If so, can you teach me?" She was smirking. Yori laughed.
"I don't pick them. I persuade them. That's a more advanced lesson, you're not ready yet. Just stick to kicking the door in for the moment." Fumiko started laughing herself.

"OK. I like doing that."

Amused, Harrison waited as the phone rang. It was eventually answered by a somewhat breathless woman. "Sorry, I was in the shower. Who is this, please?"

"Hello, this is Lieutenant Richard Harrison from the LAPD. Is this Margaret Coren?"

"That's me. How can I help you, Lieutenant?" She sounded puzzled.

"You're the principal of Saint Winifred's School for Girls?"

"That's correct." She was sounding slightly worried now.

"I'm hoping you can help with a case. There's nothing to worry about, I just need some information."

"All right, Lieutenant. I'll do my best. Do I need to talk to a lawyer?" Her voice took on a slightly amused tone.

"No, it's nothing like that. OK, in your school there's a storage cupboard on the ground floor near the cafeteria, I believe."

There was a pause, then she slowly replied, "Yes, there is. Why?"

"Is it normally locked?" The pause this time was much longer.

"Yes."

"Who has access to the keys to that cupboard, please?"

"Myself, the head of cleaning services, and I suppose my secretary Joan, since my key is kept in my desk. What's this about, Lieutenant." She was back to worried.

"Please don't worry. It's just confirming some information for a case I'm working on. Now, do either of the people you mentioned, or yourself, have a daughter aged between fourteen and sixteen who attends your school?" There was no response, although he could hear her breathing. Eventually, she spoke in a deeply suspicious voice.

"I'm going to have to insist that you tell me what this is about, Lieutenant. I'm not comfortable with the direction your questions are heading." After a moment, she added, "How exactly do you know about that cupboard in the first place?" He sighed a little, he'd been desperately hoping she wouldn't think to ask that question.

"Ma'am, I'm sorry, but I'm afraid I can't tell you much more than that. I do need to know about the possibility of anyone with access to a key who has a daughter between those ages who attend the school."

"And I need, Lieutenant, to know why you want to know that. I take my responsibilities to the school and my girls very seriously."

Harrison sighed softly. "That's as it should be, Ma'am, but I'm working under something of a time constraint here." He looked up as Yori gestured to him. "Excuse me, Ma'am, I'll be right back. Please stay on the line." Pressing the hold button, he turned to the black-haired girl.
"We're going to have to bring her in on it, I think. I've had experience with school principals before, believe me, when they dig their heels in they can be a pain." The expression suggested the experience she mentioned had been hard-won.

"How do you suggest we do that?"

"Ask her to meet us. Tell her we can explain what the problem is, but only face to face." After a moment's thought he agreed.

Pressing the mute button again, he said, "I'm sorry about that, Ma'am, I had to talk to a colleague."

"That's all right, Lieutenant. So, are you going to tell me why you want to know all of this or can I go back to my shower?" He smiled a little, she sounded more interested than annoyed for some reason.

"All right, Ma'am, I see I have no choice. But I can't tell you over the phone. Would it be possible for you to meet myself and some colleagues? Here at the station, or at your house. Or even at the school." Yori nodded, giving him the thumbs up for that last suggestion."Actually, the school would probably be the best choice." She was silent for a few seconds.

"OK." She sighed audibly. "It's about ten past eight now. I'm going to finish my shower, then have something to eat. My husband has made a very nice meal and I'm not going to let it go to waste. It will take me about half an hour to get to the school, so I'll meet you there at, ah, let's say ten PM?"

"Thank you, Ma'am. I'm sorry to get you out of the house so late, but this matter is somewhat urgent."

"It's not a problem Lieutenant, although I expect the story to be a good one." He laughed.

"I think you'll find it interesting. Good bye, Ma'am."

"Good bye, Lieutenant. Please don't be late. I despise tardiness." She also laughed, then hung up. Looking at the receiver in his hand for a moment, he put it back on the phone.

"Interesting woman, I suspect." Turning to the three girls, he told them what she'd said, and her reactions, most of which they'd worked out already. "It'll take us about half an hour at this time of night to get there so we should leave in an hour or so. Let's see if there's anything edible in the cafeteria." There being no dissenting opinions, as he had rather suspected, he led the way downstairs.

Sitting around the table eating some rather tired macaroni and cheese, they tried to think of other avenues of attack, without much luck. LA was simply too large a city for even all six magical girls to scan in the time available, especially with the fairly short range they could detect the device at. "If it activates, we can trace it easily, portals stick out like mad, but it will be too late then," Yori grumped, stirring her food with a fork. "I'd prefer it not to be after the fact."

"We could call in some help from the other groups at home," Fumiko suggested, popping open a can of Mountain Dew and sipping it experimentally. She grimaced, then took another sip. Yori nodded slowly, not looking overjoyed at that idea.

"I suppose that's possible, but there are only about a dozen of the girls I trust not to screw things up."

"Come on, there are more than that." Fumiko looked at her friend with a small smile.
"Oh, yes, sure there are. We could have loads of fun with some of those idiots, the first time some tourist looked up their skirt and said something inappropriate it would turn into into total chaos. You remember what happened with Amaya?" Harrison watched as both the other girls paled. Clearly they did. He was curious but decided not to ask. "No, there's us, maybe ten or eleven others I more or less trust not to destroy half the neighbourhood if they get surprised, then everyone else. Half of them don't speak English well or at all, which wouldn't help, and most of them have a track record of collateral damage that's impressive but not exactly useful. It could be worse than if the device activates. I'd prefer not to have someone accidentally set the San Andreas fault off because they got angry and missed." She suddenly grinned while Harrison shuddered a little at the matter of fact way she suggested this as a possibility.

"If that pigtailed blonde menace and her crew turned up, the Americans would probably declare war on Japan the next day." Fumiko laughed, while Misaki grunted agreement, shovelling the mac and cheese in with every sign of enjoyment. She was on her third helping. "There's also the fact that if we bring half the girls from Minato over here we reduce the protection at home, where it's most likely to be needed."

"I guess so. Oh well, it was just an idea." While they were discussing other possibilities, Chou, Tamiko, and Aiko walked in, looked around, then approached them. Yori grinned at her partner.

"Hello, dear," Chou said, leaning over and giving the smaller woman a quick hug. Fumiko and Misaki looked at Tamiko, wearing one of Chou's outfits, then glanced at each other. She grinned at them. "Agent Naito needed the facilities, he'll be here soon."

"How did it go?" Harrison asked as the three arrivals sat down around their table in the unoccupied chairs. Chou smiled at him, producing a deactivated portal weapon and two glowing yellow power cores. "Ah."

"It was just as you suspected, Lieutenant, the device was in Times Square. It was half-way up the big display at the top of the One Times Square building, hidden inside the same sort of subspace pocket as the one here was." She turned to Yori, handing her the original sphere. "Thank you, it would have been very difficult to find if I hadn't had this as a pattern." The other woman accepted it and stored it away.

"Did you have any problems?" Yori asked. Tamiko stifled a giggle, making the blonde look at her with a small smile.

"Well, it did get slightly complicated near the end." Chou smiled calmly, then the three young women took turns describing the events of the last few hours. Harrison stared in horror as she explained the discovery of a huge bomb. Agent Naito came in a few minutes after they did, taking a seat quietly and listening. When they finished the story, they got up to get some food. Once they returned the blonde woman continued.

"I've been thinking about it and it occurred to me that perhaps the cult had put the bomb in place before they finished the design of the portal weapons. Ken, the bomb disposal man, said that it was the work of a very good professional, and probably took many hours of work to build. There was a lot of dust on it, more than just a few months worth, I think. It could have been there for a year or more, the batteries in the electronic control box were good for at least that, he told me." Taking a bite of her food she looked surprised, then faintly disgusted.

"So, what, they planted a massive bomb, disguised it with a spell, then later came back and put a portal device there as well? That's serious overkill." Lieutenant Harrison looked appalled.

Naito sighed a little."I don't think they knew the meaning of that word. The goal was simply to kill as many people as they could."

Chou ate some more food, then put her fork down and pushed the plate away with an expression of mild distaste. Misaki raised an eyebrow, then pulled it across and finished it off, making the blonde smile and wince at the same time. "Special Agent Foster was very nice, although his superior was a little rude. I never did get his name. That bomb disposal man was nice as well. I'm glad I was able to help him. Tadao has a lovely house."

"Tadao?" Harrison asked curiously.

"The Consul-General of Japan for New York. A very pleasant man to talk to. He and his aide Ichiro seemed to know a lot about the problem, they were quite complimentary about the London situation." She smiled. "Apparently they watch JNN. And I imagine they have access to the official reports from the PSIA. I think both of them probably have quite high security clearances."

Harrison picked up the dead portal weapon and turned it over in his hands as Yori explained what they'd managed to achieve while the others were in New York. It looked harmless, like some sort of artsy trinket that his wife would put on the mantelpiece. Chuckling at the thought, he put the thing down again, listening to the petite woman's recap of the current situation. "So, we're going to meet this school principal, explain at least some of the problem to her, and hope that any information she can give us will lead us to the device." Yori leaned back, pushing her plate away. Misaki immediately finished it off for her. Fumiko stared, then shook her head. Her sister smirked, making her sigh.

"Since you're here now we can just teleport to the school," Harrison said, looking amused at the words he'd just spoken. It took some getting used to. "You wouldn't all fit in my vehicle anyway."

Looking at his watch, he added, "In that case we have about twenty extra minutes."

Picking up the device again he turned it over and over, staring at it, thinking about possible ways of tracking it's twin. Yori glanced at Chou, both of them watching him curiously. "We'll find it, Lieutenant," the blonde woman said comfortingly. Looking up at her for a couple of seconds, he stared at the weapon in his hands again, then handed it to Yori.

"I sure hope so. What happened in London will keep me awake at night for weeks, and I wasn't even there. I don't like to think of it happening again."

Shortly afterwards they all left the room, stopping in the main office for Harrison to get his jacket, before clustering together in the conference room they'd used before, to avoid the teleport flash blinding anyone in the main room. Yori recharged Aiko's amulet then they jumped.

Principal Coren unlocked the staff entrance to the school and tapped in the correct code on the keypad inside the door, silencing the alarm. Heading to her office she turned the lights on, then walked down the stairs towards the cafeteria, stopping outside the closet that LAPD officer was asking about. Trying the door experimentally she found it was firmly locked as it should be. Puzzled, she headed back to the main entrance, flipping the switches that lit up the parking area, then standing just inside looking out into the parking lot while glancing at her watch occasionally. At one minute to ten she looked up from her wrist to see that there was a group of people standing fifty feet away, looking around curiously. Unlocking the door she stepped out, then wondered where their car was. Or cars, there were eight of them, two men and six young women.

Three of the women were dressed in a manner she felt was rather inappropriate. As they approached, she studied them. The group was an odd mix. The taller man was presumably this LAPD lieutenant, he had a look she associated with 'policeman'. The other man, Japanese if she was any judge, was also almost certainly some sort of law enforcement person. The six girls, on the other hand...

All of them were Japanese, although the tallest one's blonde hair looked natural. They all seemed to be late teens to perhaps very early twenties in age, very fit and healthy. The three dressed rather like something you'd find in an adult convention, not that she knew anything about that, she thought guiltily, remembering an episode from her youth, showed enough skin that she could easily see they had the bodies of athletes. The other three were dressed more modestly, in what looked like very good silk. They all moved with extraordinary grace, more like gymnasts or dancers than normal people. After a moment she remembered what it reminded her of, thinking back to a martial arts competition she'd once attended with the school. Some of the participants had walked like that, only not to the same degree.

The taller man was leading them, although looking at the group, she got the distinct feeling that the smaller woman with her long, braided, extraordinarily deep black hair, so dark it almost vanished into the night even under the floodlights illuminating the parking lot, the blue stripe contrasting brilliantly, was in some way the leader of the group. There was an air of assurance and confidence about her, shared by the other girls, but more obvious with her. Margaret was suddenly sure that anyone who tried to best them either physically or mentally was in for a nasty shock. Smiling slightly, always liking to see confident young women, she waited for them to reached her.

"Principal Coren?" the tall man asked politely, holding up his ID. She nodded, holding her hand out.

"Yes. Hello, Lieutenant Harrison." Shaking her hand, he held the door as she waved everyone inside. "Come in, I'll have to lock the door behind us. We've had problems with theft before." Once they were inside she relocked the door, then led them to her office. Eight people plus her was a bit of a squeeze but it was a fairly large room so they all fitted. Harrison and the so far nameless Japanese man were waved to the two available chairs by the black-haired young woman, who looked at them with a slight smile.

"Age before beauty," the one with the pretty auburn hair said, making both men look at her. She giggled. The black-haired one sighed a little and nudged her. Grinning, Lieutenant Harrison and the other man sat, while Margaret walked around her desk and dropped gracefully into her familiar chair. Looking at them across the desk she raised an eyebrow, suddenly feeling like she was dealing with parents and their daughters. A small smile flickered across her face, matched by one on the black haired girl's lips. Her eyes, a remarkable violet-blue colour, sparkled.

Pointing to each girl in turn, Harrison introduced them. They greeted her in very good English although she could hear from their accents it wasn't their native tongue. The short girl, Yori, and the blonde, Chou, seemed to speak it most fluently, having only a trace of an accent. The Japanese man was introduced as an agent of the PSIA in Japan, some sort of security agency. Once the introductions were made she turned back to the LAPD man.

"So, Lieutenant, what is going on? Why were you asking such strange questions?"

Sitting up a little, the man seemed to be thinking about the best way to start. After a moment, he asked, "Did you by any chance happen to see the news reports about an incident in London, England, the day after Christmas?" Looking at him, puzzled, she slowly nodded.

"I saw some of it. I was busy with family, but I seem to remember there was some sort of bomb in a large store, Harrods, wasn't it? I've always wanted to visit there, but haven't had a chance yet. It sounded like a horrible thing, quite a few people were killed."
"Sixty-seven," Yori said quietly. Margaret winced, closing her eyes for a moment.

"How terrible. But what has that got to do with you being here?" He looked slightly unsure, glancing at the girl, who made a small gesture that seemed to indicate 'Get on with it.'

"I'm going to tell you something you're going to have a lot of problems believing, Principal Coren, but I assure you, every word is true. I can easily prove it. I need your promise that you won't tell anyone else, though." The principal studied him for a moment, intrigued and a bit worried.

"All right. I won't tell anyone, I can keep confidential matters confidential. So, explain all this, if you would." Taking a deep breath, the lieutenant started talking. She listened with a neutral expression as he told her a story that would have produced quite good marks in one of her creative writing classes. When he was finished, she sat and looked at him for some time, silently, then inspected the others. Eventually she stood, pushing her chair back.

"Thank you for the most inventive story I've heard for a long time, Lieutenant. You should see if you can get it turned into a movie, we're in the right city for that. Now, if you don't mind, I need to get back to my husband and help him finish painting the spare room." He sighed, looking over his shoulder at Yori, who seemed amused. She stepped forward.

"What would convince you we're telling the truth, Principal Coren?" she asked. Margaret looked at her for a moment.

"My dear, extraordinary claims require extraordinary proof. I hope you've heard that?" The young woman nodded with a smile. "You are expecting me to believe in magic, and demons, and a number of other things that even in Hollywood sound frankly ridiculous." Yori looked at her for a moment.

"Fair enough." She turned to the other girl about her height, who Margaret remembered as being called Aiko, speaking to her quietly in Japanese for a moment. Aiko nodded, then left the room. Puzzled, the principle watched as Yori closed the door behind her, leaning against it. The other girls all moved to the sides of the room leaving a space in the middle of the carpet.

When Aiko suddenly appeared out of thin air in the middle of the room and shouted, "BOO!", Margaret shrieked and dropped into her chair hard enough to make it roll backwards into the wall by the window. After a moment she produced a stream of foul language that made Harrison blush and Yori grin. She got the impression the girl was making mental notes. When her heart rate dropped from insane to merely silly she recovered enough to sit up, looking at the brunette with shock.

"How did you do that?" she asked, straightening her clothes and trying to forget what she'd just said. She was privately very surprised she knew so many swear words, and also guiltily proud of herself.

"Magic, of course," Aiko replied, looking slightly ashamed at the reaction she'd provoked, although also somewhat amused. Agent Naito appeared as if this was yet another in a long line of regrettable things this group had been responsible for, a look she was intimately familiar with from the parents of a few of her students, the more boisterous ones. He sighed very faintly. Yori looked at him and shrugged.

Stepping forward she raised her index finger, which began to glow a particularly pretty shade of violet, then drew a smiley face in thin air! Margaret stared in shock, as did Agent Naito and Lieutenant Harrison. Giving it a flick with her finger she made it start slowly rotating. "Perhaps I should have started with this," she said, sounding slightly embarrassed. Chou gazed at her in a way that made her look guilty.

"It might have been less frightening, dear," she said quietly.

Moving slowly forward, the principal stared at the rotating collection of glowing lines, looking at it carefully. Reaching out cautiously she tentatively tried to touch it, waving her hand around through it when she found she could feel nothing at all. The glow passed through her hand with no sensations. "Magic as well?" she asked, bending slightly to look upwards at it curiously. There was a feeling deep inside her of a lot of the certainties about life she'd had slowly crumbling away. Yori nodded. "I see." Sitting down again she watched the smiley face spin around and around, until the girl reached out and stopped it. A moment later it vanished.

"I'm sorry Aiko's teleporting scared you," she said. "But it's a pretty good demonstration."

"Yes, it is." Margaret looked at the brunette. "Can you go anywhere like that?" Aiko nodded.

"Pretty much. It can be blocked with the right wards, but I don't think it has a distance limitation as such. I've been all over the world."

"That breaks most of the laws of physics I'm aware of," the principal said. Yori laughed.

"Magic tends to treat physical laws as rough guidelines, or at least optional." Standing, Margaret walked to the window, looking down at the car park. She turned to Aiko.

"Show me again. Go down there." She pointed to a position in the middle of the car park. Aiko grinned.

"Close your eyes, the outbound teleport produces a very bright flash." After a moment, she followed the instructions, seeing a brilliant white light through her eyelids, with no sound accompanying it. Opening them again she saw the girl was gone. Quickly turning to the window she marvelled at the sight of Aiko standing in the spot she'd indicated, waving at her. After a few seconds, Margaret motioned to her to come back, quickly turning around. A flash was visible through the window behind her, then Aiko was standing where she'd departed from, smiling.

"All right. I think I believe you." Sitting again, the principal looked at Harrison, who smiled reassuringly.

"Sorry about that. I know it's a lot to take in in five minutes. If it's any consolation I took a lot more convincing."

"So, it's all true, what you told me?" He nodded seriously.

"Every word." Leaning back in her chair she looked at them all. Eventually she leaned forward again.

"Fine. What does that have to do with my school?" Yori stepped forwards and explained the missing portal device, how they'd traced it here, and their findings and conclusions. Margaret listened looking more and more worried.

"One of those unholy things was here?" she asked, horrified.

"I'm afraid so. Somewhere around one to two days ago it was removed. We're not sure when it was brought in, but my best guess is a little over a week ago. I'm making the assumption that it wasn't brought in after the school closed for the holidays, but that seems safe as the traces were fairly strong, it had to have been here for several days." Something about what she said made the "Hold on. How do you know where it was?" she asked suspiciously. Yori got a slightly guilty look.

"Um, I looked. We traced it here from outside, Misaki spotted it, so I went and checked." Margaret stared at her with sharp eyes.

"You broke into my school?" She sounded scandalised. Aiko and Tamiko snickered. Chou sighed.

"Not exactly. It wasn't breaking and entering it was... entering. Then leaving. Don't worry, I didn't cause any damage."

"Young lady, I don't know what you're taught in Japan, but in my school we teach our girls to respect other people's property." Misaki was giggling now while Agent Naito was grinning. Yori blushed.

"Sorry," she said in a small voice. "But it was important." Fixing her with a stern eye, Margaret shook her head sadly.

"The youth of today... I despair sometimes, I really do." Chou slid down the wall laughing quietly, tears running down her face. Fumiko had both hands over her mouth trying to keep the giggles in. Yori looked at Lieutenant Harrison, who shrugged.

Eventually Principal Coren smiled. "I'll forgive you, this once." She turned to Harrison, making him jump a little. "In answer to your question on the phone, I have two daughters, but both are now in college. The head of cleaning services only has sons. Joan, my secretary, on the other hand, does have a daughter of the right age, who attends this school. Sophie, her name is, a very smart but rather lonely girl. She doesn't have a lot of friends, she's a bit of a tomboy and a lot of the girls here tease her about it. I can't work out how she could have got access to the key for the storage room, Joan wouldn't have let her have it, but I suppose it's not impossible. As I said, she's smart. I'd like to think she would be more responsible, though."

"Can we have a look at this closet?" Naito asked. She nodded, standing.

"Of course." As they left her office she glanced at Yori with a small smile. "Would you like to lead the way, dear, since you've been there before?" The young woman hung her head, while several of her friends burst out laughing again.

Chuckling slightly, Principal Coren headed off down the stairs. Behind her, she heard someone, she thought it was Aiko, whisper, "I like her." She grinned to herself. 'That will teach you to scare me like that, my dear,' she thought with amusement.

Arriving at the door, she waited while they all looked at it for a moment. Yori reached out and turned the knob, pulling the door open. Looking at it oddly, sure it had been locked, she glanced at the girl, who had a small impish smile of her own now. 'Impressive,' she thought, but said nothing. Inside was just a small room with cleaning supplies on shelves, some mops and buckets next to a floor polisher, while a pair of heavy duty industrial vacuum cleaners squatted at the back. Yori pointed.

"It was inside that air duct on the wall. It had been carefully removed then put back. Several times, I'd say. There were traces in the dust inside, someone has been using it for storing things for a while." The air duct was near the ceiling, some eight feet off the ground, near one of the shelf units.

"Someone could climb up that and reach it," Chou commented. Margaret looked at her for a moment then nodded.

"Well, that certainly takes Liz out of the equation. She's about sixty-eight and somewhat... large. I can't picture her climbing a set of shelves." Harrison stepped into the room, looking carefully at the shelves, then the floor. Yori joined him.

"Someone has definitely climbed these," he said, "You can see the marks where shoes have been." She nodded, looking at them from a short distance. "We could probably lift some good prints from the duct, assuming they didn't use gloves. But it would take hours to get them run, the lab is backed up at the moment."

"We should work on the assumption that this Sophie girl is the one who put it here, I guess, and ask her. With luck she can tell us what we need to know. If that doesn't produce results we'll have to try fingerprints, but even if we get some, wouldn't they only be useful if the person in question is on record in the first place?"

Harrison nodded glumly. Turning to Margaret who was watching and listening just outside the door, Yori asked, "Could you give us the address of your secretary, please? We're going to need to speak to her daughter."

"All right." Leaving the closet Yori closed the door again. Curiously Margaret tried the knob. It was locked. She looked at the Japanese girl with a raised eyebrow, which was met with another one and a smile. Shaking her head, she led the entire troupe back to her office, turning her computer on while sitting down. A couple of minutes later she handed Harrison a piece of paper from the printer. "Here you go. Could you do me a favour? Please go easy on the young lady. She hasn't had the easiest of lives."

"Don't worry, we just need to talk to her. She's not in any trouble."

"Thank you."

They followed her back down to the staff entrance, as she turned off lights and locked everything. Setting the alarm again she waited for them to file out before locking the door behind her, waiting for the solid tone that indicated the alarm was armed. She looked curiously at Yori. "Did you disable the alarm when you... invited yourself in?" The young woman grinned at her.

"No, I have other methods." She slowly faded into invisibility, then faded back a few feet away. Margaret stared.

"Amazing. I hope you never take up a life of crime, dear, you'd be very difficult to stop." The girl laughed. "You're all martial artists, aren't you, as well as the magical things?" the older woman asked curiously. Yori gave her a look of interested respect.

"Yes. How did you know?"

"The way you move. I've seen something like it before, although nothing nearly as... powerful. I noticed it when I first saw you."

"Not many people who aren't involved in the Art notice that," the young woman said, Margaret easily hearing the capitalisation. She obviously took it very seriously.

"I assume you're very good?" She watched the face of the girl. She looked quietly self-confident, not boasting, but with the pride that comes from genuinely knowing your own abilities and limitations.
"Yes. Chou and I are quite possibly the best in the world. We're training the others, who are also becoming extremely good." Yori stated it as simple fact.

"Interesting. Perhaps, one day, when you have a spare moment, you might come and demonstrate for the girls. It would be nice to show them what a woman can do with determination and skill. They don't have as many role models in pursuits that are normally the preserve of men as they should." For some reason Yori seemed to find this amusing, although the reaction passed quickly. She bowed slightly.

"I'd like that. When we're not busy saving people from horrific demon-producing terror weapons, I'll see what we can do. It's been nice to meet you." Shaking Margaret's hand, she walked over to her companions, who had been standing twenty feet away waiting for her. "Remember the flash," she called, just in time. Closing her eyes as the light came and went, she opened them to an empty and dark parking lot. She was smiling as she headed towards her car, her keys in her hand.

"I don't think we should all go in," Chou said, looking at the house. It was set back a little from the road, a decent sized front garden insulating it from the road, large trees surrounding it. The area was obviously fairly well off. "She's only fifteen, we don't want to overwhelm her. Eight people might be a bit excessive." Harrison nodded, following her gaze. He looked back at the cluster of magical girls standing under a streetlight.

"Good point."

Aiko looked at him with a grin, then turned to her team. "Come on, guys, let's see if we can find some gang members to annoy. I read about a place that they're supposed to hang out a lot." Looking alarmed, Harrison opened his mouth. She laughed. "Don't worry, lieutenant. We'll go and find somewhere to have coffee. Yori will call us when you're done." She waved Agent Naito over to her. "Come on, Agent, let's find something fun to do."

He walked past Harrison, mumbling, "Help me," as he did so. Misaki put her arm around his shoulders with a smile, then waved as they all vanished. The flash started a dog barking somewhere nearby. Opening his eyes the police officer grinned, then turned back to the other two.

"Right, let's go and talk to this young lady. I hope she can tell us something useful."

"Well, I can tell you from here that we're on the right track. The device was definitely in that house for a while, the traces are faint but still there. About a week old." Yori looked up at him as they walked up the driveway to the front door. "My guess is that she brought it home, then took it to school. After that...?" Pressing the doorbell button, Harrison waited. When it was answered by a pretty brunette in her mid-thirties he showed her his badge.

"Joan Simpson?" She nodded, looking surprised. "I'm Lieutenant Richard Harrison from the LAPD. I need to talk to your daughter Sophie. Is she in?" Now looking worried, the woman nodded again.

"Yes, she's in the games room. Is this the sort of thing I need legal advice for?"

"No, don't worry, we just need to ask her some questions, she may be in possession of some information we require. She's not in any trouble." After a moment, the woman nodded for a third time, her shoulder-length hair moving around her face.

"Come in, lieutenant." Casting Yori and Chou an odd look as they followed Harrison inside, she led them down a hallway to a room at the back of the house from which the noises of a computer game could be heard coming at considerable volume. "Because it's the holidays she's allowed to stay up later, although I wish she'd turn the volume down a bit when I ask. If her father was here he'd be annoyed, he doesn't like it that loud, although he loves playing those silly games with her. Unfortunately he's in San Francisco at the moment visiting a friend." Harrison nodded politely, looking around the large room. There was a pool table in one corner, a dart board on the wall, with the other side of the room devoted to several sofas surrounding a large rear-projection television, on which a fighting game was being played enthusiastically by the young woman in jeans and a t-shirt sitting in front of it on the floor.

She was working the control pad frantically, putting her whole body into it. He smiled, it reminded his of his own daughter, she played video games on occasion, although by the look of it this girl was seriously good. Her character bounced around the screen, kicking and punching, loud music and synthesised cheers mixing with the smack and crunches as the opponent was mercilessly pummelled. "Sophie," her mother called.

"Sophie!"

"SOPHIE!" The girl looked over her shoulder, startled, then quickly back at the screen as her character took a special attack to the face and promptly expired.

"Damn it!" she shouted.

"Sophie! No swearing!" Her mother looked irritated.

"Sorry, Mom," Sophie said, pressing the pause button and turning back to them. Her eyes went past her mother, fixing on Harrison for a moment, then looking past him at Yori and Chou who smiled at her.

"Turn that down, Sophie, it's much too loud." Sophie looked over her shoulder to see her mother behind her.

"Mom, you have to have it loud to get the full effect." She looked back to the screen in time to see her fighter lose her head. "Damn it!"

"No swearing! You know that." Her mother sounded only slightly annoyed. Looking back at her with a smile, Sophie assessed her mood. Stage one, no imminent danger, but safeties unlocked. She turned the volume down, knowing from past experience how little she could get away with. Her mother nodded. Ah. Safeties re-engaged. All was well. Pressing the restart button, she was soon engrossed in another match.

Fingering the pads of her playstation deftly, she made her pixelated avatar bounce and flip across the screen, violently kicking the computer-generated opponent in the chest. His life bar dropped considerably. "Hah!" she mumbled, "Take that. And that. And some of this. And..." she went for a difficult combo hit, successfully, "This!" The playstation grandly announced she was the winner. Grinning, she dropped back to the menu and ramped the difficulty up to maximum. All this practice was paying off.

Restarting, she picked a different character, looking at the figure on the screen wistfully. She wished she could fight like that. Reaching up she felt the scab at her hairline, picking at it. Yes, it would have been nice to be able to really fight. That said, she'd done some damage. Her mother had been furious, a full stage five meltdown. Sophie was lucky to still be allowed to stay up late and play games, for a moment she'd thought she was going to end up on bread and water for a week. In the end, a lot of fast talking had minimised the punishment, the fact that it was Christmas helping as had the fact that her father was away. She wasn't looking forward to explaining when he came back, though.

Turning the volume up a little she began the match, pressing buttons as fast as she could, watching her opponent collapse under her strikes. He fell. Smiling, she brought him back so she could torture him some more. A sound at the edge of her consciousness was dismissed. Another hit, pretending it was him. Ha, take that!

"SOPHIE!"

"Eep." She jumped, too late working out what the noise was. She looked, her mother was standing in the doorway with three strangers. A sound from the TV made her look back in time to see her opponent brutally slay her character.

"Damn it!"

"Sophie! No swearing!" That sounded perilously close to a stage two, armed and ready.

"Sorry, Mom," she said, pausing the game and giving her mother her full attention. The man standing beside her wasn't someone she'd ever seen before. Looking curiously at him she thought he looked official in some way. Also rather good looking, although pretty old, he had to be at least thirty-five. Beside and slightly behind him she could see two women, older than her but younger than him, dressed in weird clothing, kind of like something she'd seen on TV in a martial arts movie. They looked Asian, Chinese or Japanese. She decided Japanese in the end, based on a couple of people she knew at school.

The shorter girl had amazing hair, when she turned her head to look around Sophie could see it was in a braid down to the base of her spine, with a bright blue bow at the end. Despite this feminine touch, the woman seemed to her to not be someone you'd take lightly. She had fingerless gloves on, her long fingers with blue polish on the nails sticking out, and on her feet some really nice leather boots.

Sophie wondered where she could get clothes like that. And how long it would take to grow her blonde hair that long. Although the blue stripe wouldn't work with her hair colour, but perhaps red?

The woman smiled at her, an expression that seemed to suggest someone who was ready for anything, and if nothing was ready for her, tough. She smiled back. Looking at the taller woman standing next to the first one, she studied her for a moment. This one was blonde, much shorter hair, similar clothes but in a neutral grey. Her expression was calm and gentle, yet still made her think this wasn't someone that it would be a good idea to annoy. Still, there was something comforting about it.

Returning her attention to her mother, she asked a question with her eyes. "This is Lieutenant Harrison from the police. He needs to ask you some questions." That made her stop and think hard. Was it about the fight? She'd been defending herself, after all. OK, so one of them was limping a lot when she last saw them, but... The policeman smiled at her.

"Don't worry, Sophie, you're not in trouble. We just need to ask you some questions. These are my friends Yori and Chou, they're from Japan."

'Nailed it,' the girl thought, pleased. She nodded, standing up and moving to one of the sofas. Her mother sat beside her, alert but calm. The three visitors sat on the other sofa, looking at the pair of them.
"Hi, Sophie," the shorter woman, Yori, said, studying her disconcertingly closely. Her eyes, a colour Sophie had never seen before, fixxed on the scab on her head, apparently noticing it even though it was under her hair, then moved back to her face. "We think you can help us. We're looking for something." The girl waited, volunteering nothing. She'd seen enough cop shows to know that was how they trapped you. Yori looked amused. "Have you seen one of..." She made a theatrical gesture with one hand, which was suddenly holding a mass of metal tubing with a glass ball in the middle, "...these before?"

Sophie stared. How the hell had she done that? Her mother looked at the woman in shock, then at her daughter, then back at the woman. After a long pause, she began to shake her head. Yori grinned at her.

"OK, that reaction tells me all I need to know. Tell me about it." Not quite sure what she was talking about, Sophie looked at her. She was sure she'd controlled her expression when she'd seen the thing in Yori's hand. One look into her eyes made her sigh slightly. There was no doubt at all that she knew.

"I found it nine days ago. Outside Mann's. Only the one I found was glowing." Her mother stared at her. Whoops. That was a stage three look, severe danger incoming.

"Sophie Marie Simpson. What did you do?"

"Nothing, Mom! I just found it."

"How exactly did you find it, Sophie?" Yori asked, curiously. "I know where it was, it was very well hidden." The girl sighed, then started telling the story.

"I took a bus to Mann's Theatre after school, I wanted to look around because I was bored, plus I was in a bad mood. The girls at school had been teasing me again about not having a boyfriend. It's all most of them think about. It's so boring! Hardly any of them want to do anything interesting, like video games, or model airplanes, or go-karting. Just boys and dresses." She made a sound of disgust. Her mother smiled at her a little, putting her hand on her head and rubbing it affectionately.
Yori and Chou exchanged glances, seemingly amused.

"You sound like someone I know," Yori said, chuckling a little. "Go on."

"I just walked around for a while, looking at the tourists. Some of them are really weird, taking pictures of everything. Anyway, it was getting dark, I got a soda and a burger, then went and ate it while I was looking around. I couldn't find a garbage can so I was going to put my bag into one of the pots they have there with the little palm trees in." She looked slightly ashamed. "I leaned on this pot with one hand and slipped. The next thing I knew I was lying on the ground with my knee hurting. When I started to get up I saw that the pot had some sort of opening in the bottom of it. It's weird, I could have sworn it wasn't there before. One of those things was in the hole." She pointed at the metal and glass object Yori was holding.

"But the ball in the middle was glowing green. No one was looking at me so I pulled it out, then put it in my backpack."

"Why?" Chou asked with interest. Sophie looked at her.

"It looked cool. I've never seen anything glow like that. I took it home and looked at it for a long time with a magnifying glass, trying to figure out how it worked, but I couldn't find any switches or batteries or anything like that. It just glowed." She shrugged.
"Yori smiled again. "So, then you took it to school?" She stared a little.

"How did you know?"

"I'm really good at this sort of thing." After a moment spent trying to puzzle that out, Sophie nodded.

"Yes, I took it to show to Alice. She's the only one who really understands cool things like that. But she was off sick."

"Why did you leave it there?" Chou asked. She shrugged again.

"I had a lot of books to bring back and my bag was full. I didn't want to carry it around in case someone saw it, so I hid it. I have a special place there to put things, my locker got broken into a couple of times so I don't trust it."

"In the ventilation duct in the storage closet next to the cafeteria?" the policeman said, studying her. She nodded after a long moment. "How did you get the key?" he asked curiously. Sophie ducked her head, ashamed.

"I stole it from the principals desk and got a copy made," she said in a small voice. She could almost hear her mother click over to stage four, countdown to detonation, evacuate all personnel to minimum safe distance. The indrawn breath was the dead giveaway. Throwing caution to the wind, she added, "I was visiting Mom in her office one day after school and she went to the bathroom. The door to the principals office was open so I went in to look around. The key was there on her desk. I knew which one it was because I've seen Mom use it once when she had to get some whiteboard cleaner. I... borrowed it." She looked guiltily at her mother.

"I put it back the next day! No one even knew it was gone. But I went and got a copy made. One day when no one was looking I unlocked the closet and went in, some of the girls had been really mean and I wanted to go somewhere to get away from them. Sometimes I'd eat my lunch in there. Alice knew about it but she promised to never tell any one and she hasn't. About the fifth time I was in there I noticed the air duct, so I climbed up the shelves and looked at it. It was easy to get the cover off. That's when I saw it was a perfect place to hide things." Sophie smiled a little. "I even made some fake screws so it looked like it was screwed in but it wasn't. The cover fitted pretty tightly, it didn't need the screws to hold it." She was quite proud of that touch. She could feel her mother fizzing next to her, the explosion only held off by the presence of the visitors, for which she was momentarily grateful.

"That was on the second to last day of school. I had a cold the next day, so I didn't go to school. After that, it was locked up so I couldn't get to it. But Mom had to go to school to get something she'd forgotten before Christmas a couple of days ago, and I went with her, since Dad's away. When we were there I told her I was going to the bathroom, then went into the closet and got the thing back. I hid it in my backpack so she wouldn't see it." She risked a glance at her mother, who had a dangerous look.

"Where is it now?" Yori asked, leaning forward intently. Sophie sighed.

"I don't know." The three visitors exchanged glances. "It was stolen. We got back and I was going to go over to see Alice and show it to her, she lives quite close to here. I took a short cut through the park and two guys came out of nowhere and grabbed my backpack. I kicked one of them in the nuts, then grabbed a branch and smacked the other one in the face, but he still managed to knock me over. I hit my head on the ground really hard. I got up again pretty fast but he was too far away for me to hit." She smiled a little. "The one I got in the nuts was screaming. His friend ran away with my backpack, so I kicked him again. He screamed even louder but he got up and ran away as well. He was walking funny, though. I hope it still hurts." Yori looked amused, while Chou was nodding approvingly.

"Well done." Her mother gave the blonde girl a look.

"Well done? My daughter was mugged. It's only blind luck she wasn't more severely hurt." Yori returned the look.

"By the sounds of it she gave as good as she got and then some. I'd suggest some martial arts and self-defence classes, I think she's got the correct attitude to do well at them." Sophie's mother stared at her.

"Martial arts?"

"Oh, yes. Definitely. She's a bit old to start in an ideal world but better late than never." Looking at Yori in wonder, her anger somewhat deflected by the sudden right angle the conversation had taken, her mother pondered the comment.

"A bit old? How young would you consider was the right age?" Yori grinned.

"I started when I was about two." This seemed to leave her mother speechless. While she was gaping, the Japanese woman looked back to Sophie, who had been listening in amazement. "Do you know the people who stole your backpack, Sophie?" She shook her head.

"No. I've never seen them before. They were older than me, around eighteen, maybe older."

"Can you describe them?" The policeman pulled out the smallest tape recorder Sophie had ever seen and turned it on.

"One of them was about a foot taller than me, he looked Japanese like you two are, he had brown hair and grey eyes, I think. The other one was a white guy, about my height or a little taller. He had black eyes and a sort of dirty blond hair. They were wearing jeans and T-shirts. The tall one had a black shirt with some sort of logo on it, I think it was a band. The other one had a plain dark blue shirt. He smelled of tobacco, so I think he smoked." Harrison looked impressed.

"That's a lot of detail to remember, especially under the circumstances. You must have been very frightened." She glared at him.

"I wasn't scared, I was mad! If they try it again I'm going to get them both in the nuts until they scream for mercy." Yori laughed.

"Oh, yes, you'd do very well as a martial artist." Her mother looked annoyed, while Sophie grinned. Yori was cool.

"Can you remember anything else about them, Sophie? Jewellery, tattoos, shoes, anything like that?" Lieutenant Harrison gave his companion a look that made her smile.

"Well, they both had Nike sneakers on, I remember that. The short one had a gold tooth, I saw it when he was screaming." She thought for a while. There was something she'd seen out of the corner of her eye... "The tall one had a tattoo on his arm. It was really complicated. Sort of gold and green, but under the sleeve of his t-shirt, on his shoulder and upper arm." She indicated the position on her own arm. "I saw it when he grabbed my bag, his sleeve moved. It looked like some sort of fish with some oriental writing around it." Yori looked at her with interest. "Oh, the other thing is that I think one of his fingers was missing a bit. It looked too short." Yori and Chou looked at each other for a moment.

"Was it his little finger? On his left hand?" Yori sounded intrigued. She thought, then nodded.

"Yes, I think so."

The blonde woman said something in Japanese to her friend, who nodded slowly. She replied, then turned to Harrison. "Yakuza, we think. Or ex-Yakuza. They don't look favourably on theft in general, mugging schoolchildren would be highly unlikely normally. The missing finger strongly suggests it, the tattoo is also evidence." The policeman looked worried, although for some reason Yori seemed slightly pleased. She turned back to Sophie.

"I think you did very well, Sophie. Thank you for your help." Her eyes moved up to the scab. "Were you injured anywhere else?" Sophie shook her head.

"No, just here." She rubbed the healing wound, wincing at the pain. Yori stood, moving next to her.

"May I look?" She dropped her hand. Her mother started to say something, but stopped when Chou caught her eye. Yori put her fingertips on the scab, then smiled. "Nothing to worry about." Stepping away, she bowed slightly to both of them.

"My thanks. You have helped a lot." Looking at Sophie's mother, she added, "I'm serious about what I said earlier. I think your daughter would find martial arts very interesting, and she has the drive to be good at it. Consider it. Start with Aikido." Sophie looked at her mother for a moment, seeing with relief that she'd dropped back to stage two at worst. She was safe for the moment, if she could make it through the interrogation that would come as soon as the visitors left. Picking up the object that she'd put on the sofa, Yori looked at it for a moment, then somehow made it vanish. Sophie watched with interest. There was no hint as to how the trick had been performed. Yori noticed her attention and winked.

"What is that thing?" her mother asked.

"Nothing to worry about now. But Sophie?" She looked at the woman's face. "If you find glowing things hidden in strange places in future, it's probably best if you leave them there." Yori smiled, then pulled a phone from somewhere, dialling then speaking in rapid Japanese to whoever she was calling. Hanging up she looked at the Lieutenant. "They'll meet us outside in a minute." He nodded, putting his recorder away and standing, addressing her mother.

"Thanks for letting us talk to your daughter. It's been very helpful with an annoying case." He shook her hand, as did Yori and Chou. Both of them turned to Sophie and shook hers as well. She followed her mother as they all went to the front door, the three visitors walking down the driveway to meet five more people who were standing on the sidewalk. Sophie inspected them with interest, four were female and three of those were dressed in a very odd way. She wondered what movie they were in. Yori and the other two joined the group, talking to them quietly. Sophie's mother closed the door, heading back to the kitchen, looking puzzled. Just as she was turning away from the door a bright flash, like a camera flash but bigger, illuminated the frosted glass in the upper half of the door. Curious, Sophie opened the door and peered out.

All eight people were gone. She looked up and down the street, but couldn't see any sign of them anywhere. After a long moment, thinking furiously, she closed the door again, catching sight of her face in the mirror hanging on the wall next to the coat rack, which her mother used to check her makeup before she left the house. Lifting her hair to inspect her scab, she stared in shock.
It was gone. There wasn't a mark on her skin. Rubbing where it had been, which was smooth and painless now, she slowly wandered back to the kitchen and her mother.

"Sophie, dear? About that key..."

Harrison slumped into his desk chair gratefully. It had been a very long day and it wasn't over yet. Looking at his watch he groaned. Half past midnight. The six girls had swept a three kilometre radius around Sophie's house in case the muggers had dropped her bag somewhere nearby, with no luck, then they'd returned to the station. Picking up the phone he called his wife and apologised again. When he'd finished, he looked across at Yori, who was currently talking on the phone in Japanese, a mildly amused expression on her face. Agent Naito was watching her in some shock.

"What's going on? Who's she speaking to?" Harrison asked. The agent looked at him, then back at the young woman.

"If I heard the name right, to the head of the largest Yakuza group in Japan. She seems to have his personal number." Harrison stared for a moment, then looked at Yori with his eyebrows so high up they almost merged with his hair.

"Good grief. I wonder how that happened." Naito shrugged helplessly.

"I've stopped asking. The answers I get make my brain ache." Yori laughed, then said something with a grin. She spoke for a while, then laughed again, writing something down, before hanging up. Everyone was looking at her curiously, although Naito seemed more stunned than anything.

"Was that really..." She nodded.

"He owes me a few favours. Like I told you months ago, I keep track." She grinned slightly menacingly. "Anyway, he's given me a name. And an address. Not his own group, but someone he knows. He doesn't like him very much, which is why he was more than happy to give me the name. He suggested we go and have a talk. If these people were Yakuza, this guy will be able to find them for us, a lot faster than we could. All we need to do is persuade him to help."

"How do we do that?" Harrison asked. "The Yakuza are known for being tight-lipped. They don't talk." She smiled in a cold manner that reminded Naito of Ms Aoyama, very strongly indeed. Harrison shuddered a little, while even Aiko and her team looked worried.

"Oh, he'll talk to us. Trust me."

Something woke Mikio Yamada from a deep sleep. Lying motionless on his side in bed he listened intently, giving no indication he was awake. There was no unusual sound he could hear, after several minutes of listening, but he was somehow sure he wasn't alone. Assassins were a constant possibility in his line of work, especially as he had managed to annoy several other, much larger, Yakuza groups with his business deals. That was why he'd moved to LA in the first place, hoping that setting up a Yakuza presence so far from Japan might make people stop trying to kill him. There hadn't been much there when he'd moved a decade before, even now most of the Yakuza in the US were in Hawaii or on the east coast.

Unfortunately, while the move had reduced the conflict with other Yakuza groups, it had replaced them with the various drug cartels and other more traditional American organized crime syndicates. They weren't as good at assassination, but that wasn't to say they were bad at it. Which is why he slept with two loaded guns under his pillow and a sword, with which he was very skilled, in a sheath strapped to the side of the bed between it and the wall where it couldn't be seen but he could draw it quickly. Very slowly, his hand silently moved towards the hilt of the sword. His heart jumped when he realised it was missing. It had definitely been there when he got into bed an hour earlier. This was very bad.

Reaching just as silently under his pillow, he once more had a nasty shock when he found his guns were missing as well. Considering that one of them had been in his hand when he fell asleep that was a particularly good trick. His head was resting directly over where one of them should have been. Once more he listened carefully, once more he could hear absolutely nothing.

Until a female voice said, "Kazuhiro sends his regards." Despite years of training and iron control, he nearly crapped himself.

After a second, he exploded into action, flipping the bed covers in the direction the voice had come from, while sliding off the bed and rolling in the other direction to his desk where he had another gun in a sheath screwed to the bottom of the drawer. Reaching up in the darkness to where he knew it was, as he'd checked before he went to bed, he found only an empty holster.

"I got the shotgun in the closet, and the knife under the bookcase as well, in case you're wondering," the voice said, from a different place in the dark room, sounding amused. "Oh, and the grenade in your sock drawer. That's a weird place to keep it. You'd be digging through socks for ages looking for the thing." He sighed.

"I'll pay you twice whatever Oshiro is paying if you go away," he said quietly, not expecting it to work. She laughed, the sound send a chill down his spine. There was something almost inhuman about it.

"He's not paying me anything." The light came on, revealing a young woman dressed in black and blue silk sitting on his bed looking at him with a smile. "Although he did ask that I scare you. I think we can say I managed that." He studied her carefully. She didn't look like an assassin, but the best ones didn't. "You really annoyed him with that business in Kyoto. Really, Mikio? Narcotics? Prostitution? Not a good idea, you know what he's like. I'm not surprised you left." She seemed to know a lot about it, which also wasn't good. "I don't like those things much either. Not at all." Her smile had faded leaving a cold expression which made his heart thump that much faster. Head cocked to one side she seemed to listen. "You should calm down a little, a heart rate that fast isn't good in a man of your age."

"Who are you?" he asked, staring at her. "How did you get in here, and what do you want?"

She stood, walking a couple of steps closer to him. "I'm hurt. I thought almost all Yakuza bosses had heard of me, at least by reputation. Think hard. Oh, maybe this will help." She held up a hand which suddenly started glowing purple, wisps of energy rising from it like smoke and dissipating into the air. As he watched wide-eyed the glow ran down her arm and covered her entire body. The girl smiled slightly. His heart nearly stopped.

"Oh, fuck. You're Yori, aren't you?" he whispered. She nodded, smiling more widely, small fangs glinting in the light. The glow faded away. "I'm dead," he mumbled, dropping his head to the floor.

"Not yet. Let's keep it that way, killing is such a waste. Now get up, I just need to talk to you." She reached down and offered him her hand. After a long moment he took it, being pulled to his feet as easily as if he was a child. Standing, he studied her again, slightly more calmly now that it seemed a sudden ghastly death wasn't imminent. She was smaller than he had expected from the horrifying stories he'd heard.
"What would happen if I called for help?" he asked with morbid curiously. She looked at him calmly.

"Nothing. Try it, if you like." After a moment, he yelled as loudly as he could. The two loyal guards that always sat outside his door when he was asleep completely failed to make an entrance. There was a distinct lack of any interest at all from the rest of the house, which should have been a hive of deadly activity after an unexpected noise. She smirked.

"See? Nothing."

"Did you kill everyone else before you came for me?" he asked, resigned to his fate. She looked offended.

"Of course I didn't. Like I said, killing is a waste most of the time. They're all fine. Your guards are right outside your door. But you can yell all you like, they won't notice anything until I'm finished." That sounded ominous. Suddenly all smiles again, she waved him to the chair in front of his desk. "Sit. Like I said, I just want to talk. I need you to do something for me." Moving slowly to the chair he sat, thinking hard. He might live through this if he was careful.

"What?" he asked.

She sat on the bed again, cross-legged. "I'm looking for something, and the people that took it. I think you can help me. I suspect that one of these people is associated with your organisation or perhaps another Yakuza family."

"That's all you want?" She nodded.

"Yep. Get me that and I'll leave you alone. Unless you start hurting women or children, in which case we'll talk." The look she gave him made him shiver.

"I'm not involved with prostitution any more. Not after Kyoto."

"Keep it that way." Somehow, she was suddenly holding a weird little almost-cube that seemed to be made of metal and crystal. "I'm looking for one of these. It's extremely dangerous. I need to find it as quickly as possible."

"What is it?" he asked, looking at it curiously. It didn't appear dangerous at all. More like something a tourist would get conned into buying from some new age shop.

"A weapon created by a mad mage and a death cult." He stared at her. "It summons nearly unkillable man-eating demons." He stared some more, then shook his head.

"OK."

"You heard about that thing in London a few days ago?" He nodded, then his eyes widened.

"Oh. That was one of those?" She sighed, now seeming a little tired.

"Yes. Six of them got out into the wild when we shut the cult down. We've found four including this one. We know one more is in LA somewhere, active and unstable. It could go off at any moment. I don't want that to happen. You, unless you're a psychopath, don't want that to happen. We have to find it, as fast as possible." Inspecting the thing she was holding, he nodded.

"All right. Tell me what you know about these people." She pulled out a small tape recorder and pressed play, the sound of a young girl's voice describing a mugging filling the room. He wrote the description down, wincing slightly at the glee in her voice when she announced what she'd do if she saw her attackers again. It sounded somehow wrong coming from such a young female. "Determined young lady," he commented as Yori stopped the recorder. She nodded with a grin.

"Very much so."

"Was she hurt?" The young woman on the bed laughed.

"Not really. I think one of her attackers came off worse." She looked very amused. Mikio read over what he'd written again.

"This isn't much to go on, but it should be enough."

"The device will be glowing green, incidentally. Otherwise it looks exactly like this one." She made the object vanish. "I would strongly suggest that when you find it, you don't touch it. It's booby-trapped and unstable as well, almost anything could set it off at this point. Frankly it's a bit of a miracle that it hasn't fired already, but there's no sense tempting fate. Leave it alone and call this number." She flipped him a business card with the name and cell number of an LAPD officer on. Catching it he read it curiously.

"Lieutenant Richard Harrison." Nodding, she stood. He did as well, watching as she looked around the room. Turning her attention back to him, she smiled a little.

"Don't let me down, Mikio." A touch on his neck was all the warning he got, his last thought being that there had been someone else in the room the entire time. Then everything went black.

Suddenly awake Mikio stared into the darkness of his room. Had it been a dream? Listening intently he couldn't hear anything. He lay silent and unmoving for a minute or two, gradually relaxing when he was sure he was alone. Sliding his hand under his pillow he found both guns where he'd left them. Feeling down the side of the bed the sword was there as well.

"That was very strange," he mumbled to himself. Rolling over he looked into the middle of the room, then froze. He stared for a few seconds, before slowly sitting up, not taking his eyes off the thing in the middle of the room. Putting his feet on the floor he stood, walking over to it and reaching out. His hand passed right through it with no sensation. Turning on the light didn't make it go away. Looking at it for a moment more he glanced at his desk, where he could see an LAPD business card neatly sitting in the middle of it. He knew what was written on it without looking closer. Under the card was a photo of the demon weapon. His desk clock showed less than six minutes had passed from when he'd been talking to Yori in this very room, but looking around he saw no signs at all he'd had a visitor. Except for the thing. Even his bed was neatly made.

Curious, he checked under the desk. The third gun was right where it should be. He knew without looking that the shotgun, knife, and grenade would be as well. Experimentally Mikio raised his voice and shouted. The door burst open immediately, two large men with automatic weapons piling in to the room, looking around alertly. Behind them he could hear a number of other people running. They stopped dead when they saw he was unhurt, then noticed the thing still hanging in mid-air in the centre of the room. Both men gaped at it.

"Uh, sir? What's... that?" One of the guards pointed with his weapon at the apparition.

"A warning. Get everyone into the conference room, right now. We need to find someone." He picked up the card and the photo, pulling on a robe and following them as they left the room. He cast a glance back as he exited, shivering slightly inside.
Behind him in the empty room the gently glowing winking smiley face spun lazily in the air, rather messy Kanji characters next to it announcing 'Yori thanks you for your immediate cooperation.' Much more neatly under that was written in golden light, 'So does Chou.' It spun around for another five minutes before fading away.

Harrison looked at Yori, exasperated. She had been laughing like an idiot since she and Chou had returned with Aiko a few minutes ago. Chou was giggling furiously as well. Aiko just shrugged when he looked at her questioningly. "What the hell is so funny?" he demanded. "Did you get anywhere?" She held up a hand, gasping for breath. Eventually she recovered enough to talk.

"Yes. He's doing it. Hopefully we should have an answer soon. It's our best chance, I don't think we could find them in time otherwise. The thing will go off in two days whatever we do, unless the energy leak is severe enough to disable it completely, which we can't count on. It might go off earlier if someone pokes it in the wrong place, or it just feels like it. I guess we just have no choice but to wait now." She snickered again. "That was fun. He looked like he'd seen a ghost when he realised who I was." Chou had stopped giggling but this nearly set her off again.

"You've been watching far too many movies, dear. That was very... Hollywood."

"It seemed appropriate under the circumstances," Yori replied with a broad grin. "Anyway, you enjoyed it as well." Her companion nodded, smiling serenely.

"I'm not saying I didn't. Just that it was a bit over the top."

"It worked. Anyway, I promised Kazuhiro I'd make it impressive, he wanted his dear friend Mikio to know he hadn't been forgotten." Naito looked at Harrison, then back at the two women. After a moment he shook his head.

'I don't want to know.' "Is there anything else we can do to speed up the search?" he asked.

Harrison sighed, then turned to his computer. "I'm putting out a notice to look for these two as well, in the more traditional manner. We might get lucky." He typed for a while.

"Make sure you add that if they're found, the device should be left strictly alone," Yori warned. "We're damn lucky someone hasn't managed to trip one of the booby-traps by now, but that could still happen. Sophie is lucky to be alive, she had it for some time." He nodded, adding a warning to the bulletin then sending it out.

"Done. Between this and your... contacts... we should hopefully be able to find it fairly quickly. At least we know who has it. Assuming they haven't just dumped it somewhere. I doubt low-level criminals like that will have left the city, they'll most likely be around somewhere."

"I feel slightly uneasy just sitting around waiting, but I can't think of anything else," Yori said, leaning against his desk and staring at her boots. "LA is just too big." She looked up again. "So, we have time to kill. It's only late afternoon for us, but you must be tired, Lieutenant. Why don't we have Aiko take you home, then we can find something to do. Maybe go and see a movie or something, get some real food, then find a hotel. It's probably best to stay in the area rather than go back to Japan until Mikio calls or your people find something." He nodded, yawning.

"That sounds like a plan. Thanks. I didn't fancy driving back when I'm this tired."

The entire group ended up appearing outside his house. He waved, then staggered up the driveway, opening the door as the flash came from behind him. Greeted by his wife he closed the door again, wondering what the girls would do and hoping that LA would still be there in the morning.
"I saved you some supper, Richard," his wife Emily said, hanging his coat up.

"Thanks, Em. It's been a long day." Sitting in the dining room he ate slowly, while telling his wife some of the highlights of the day, the ones he felt he could. She looked amazed.

"Will they be staying after you finish the case?" she asked. "I think Serena would like to meet these young ladies. You know she reads those Japanese comics, sorry, what does she call them? Manga, that's it. She'd love to meet some real magical girls." He looked at her with a smile.

"I suspect they won't mind. But we'll have to see what happens. This case is pretty important." Once they were in bed he closed his eyes and was asleep instantly.

The ringing of his cell phone woke him hours later. Groggily opening his eyes he fumbled for it, answering after a few rings. It was light outside but still early, just before seven AM he saw from the display on the phone. "Hello?"

"Lieutenant Harrison?" The voice on the phone had a Japanese accent.

"Yes, that's me." Slowly becoming more alert, he sat up, trying not to disturb Emily, who had slept through the ringing.

"I was told by a terrifying young woman to call this number if we managed to find a certain pair of people and a... device. We have done so. The people in question are being restrained, the device is in an empty building, with the entrances guarded to ensure no one enters. Here is the address." He read off a street name and building number.

"Thank you. We'll be there as soon as possible." The caller hung up without another word.

"Who was that, dear," Emily said sleepily. He looked at her, brushing a lock of hair out of her eyes before leaning over to kiss her.

"Someone to do with the case. It looks like it should be over today. I have to go." She stretched, then sat up.

"I'll make breakfast." He watched her go, then called Agent Naito.

"Hi, Masao. Yori's Yakuza boss called. I've got an address. OK, give me fifteen minutes to get dressed. Bye." Quickly showering and shaving he put on clean clothes, dropped his sidearm into his holster, then sat at the table with his wife. Buttering some toast he smiled at her.

"Thanks. I don't know how long it will take today, I'll call if there are any problems." Having eaten several pieces of toast he slugged down a mug of coffee, then headed for the front door, reaching it just as the doorbell rang. Opening it he found Yori outside, with the others waiting on the driveway. "Hi, Yori. Hold on, let me grab my coat." Emily watched from the doorway to the dining room, smiling as he followed the girl out the front door.

"Be careful, Richard," she called. Blowing her a kiss he closed the door and turned to the Japanese woman, who was grinning at him.

"Ah, domestic bliss," He laughed, following her to the others. Explaining the phone call Harrison showed Aiko the address.

"OK."

They materialised in a street outside a large concrete building, rusty metal window frames empty of glass high up on the sides. Yori looked at it with interest.

"Aha. The classic abandoned warehouse. How cliché." Chou giggled, while the others looked around. The entire area looked like it had already had a horde of demons rampaging through it. "Turning this entire place into a crater would be an improvement," the black-haired girl said. Harrison frowned.

"Please don't. I'd never hear the end of it." Snickering she walked over to the two hard-looking men standing by the door, dressed in nice suits with almost certainly illegal automatic weapons in their hands. They looked like they'd quite like to point them at the little group but were under orders not to. Speaking to one of them in Japanese he nodded, pointing to a black SUV parked a couple of hundred yards away. She nodded back, turning away, only to stop as the other man muttered something under his breath. Chou sighed.

"Oh dear. That was very rude indeed," she murmured.

Yori slowly turned back and glared at him. Harrison didn't understand what she said but got the impression it was probably something along the lines of "Say that again, I dare you." He smirked, looking her up and down lasciviously, then said it again.

"That had to hurt," Harrison commented mildly, stepping to one side as the unconscious body slid to a halt at his feet. Aiko and her girls were looking amused, while Chou simply shook her head sadly.

"That, he had coming."

Agent Naito closed his eyes for a second, then looked heavenwards for guidance. None appeared to be immediately available. Yori turned to the other man, raising an eyebrow. He looked straight ahead, avoiding her eyes, in the pose of a man who knew damn well when to keep his mouth shut. Satisfied, she beckoned to the others and headed towards the SUV. "Some things you can't let slide, or you end up with a future problem," she said, then pointed to the SUV. "Our two muggers are there. I think it would be good for them if you arrested them, Lieutenant. I'm sure Sophie would like it." Approaching the vehicle she greeted the man who got out, who nodded to her, speaking briefly. Opening the back door he stepped to the side. She looked in.

"Ah, gentlemen. Hello. Would you like to get out of the car, please?" Two young men meeting the description Sophie had given slowly and painfully climbed out, their hands secured with large zip ties. It was apparent that someone had physically chastised them to a degree, plus the shorter one was walking oddly, wincing with every step. She watched him with a grim smile. "I see that Sophie was very effective. It's nice to see true dedication in a young woman." The man looked at her sullenly.

"Who the fuck are you, lady?" he growled, then looked pained as he adjusted his position carefully.

"Someone who doesn't like people who attack schoolgirls and steal their property. Please don't do it again." She fixed him with a look that made the colour drain from his face. "This is Lieutenant Harrison of the LAPD. He'll be your arresting officer today." Shaking his head with amusement, Harrison read them their rights. Calling for backup, he pointed to the side of the street.

"Sit down over there and don't move." They slowly followed instructions, limping across the road and lowering themselves to the kerb. She spoke to the man from the SUV, who bowed slightly before getting in and driving away, stopping to collect the guard who heaved his unconscious colleague into the back seat then got in the passenger side. Everyone watched as the vehicle vanished around the corner.

"Apparently they have been living here for a while. The tall one was hiding from the Yakuza, he did something they really didn't appreciate and ran. His friend was just a common street thug he knew. They've been mugging people and stealing from shops all over the place. Oyabun Yamada said you could keep them." She grinned at him. "I suspect you can clear up quite a few crimes when they confess. Which they will. He made it clear to them that if he sees them again they'll wish they were in prison, although not for very long." Harrison laughed.

"OK. I think we'll be able to make things stick. This particular case might be difficult to explain, but it sounds like there are a lot of other things that will be easier."

She nodded. "Inside they have a little camp site with lots of stuff they've stolen. That should be the evidence you need. We just need to deal with the portal weapon before we let anyone inside." Two police cars came from the direction the SUV had departed in a couple of minutes later, stopping next to them. The uniformed officers got out, looking curiously at the Japanese contingent, before one of them approached Harrison. He explained the situation in terms that they would understand, pointing to the two men glaring at them. Both were quickly bundled into the backs of the squad cars, the zip ties being cut off and replaced with handcuffs. Neither one resisted.

"Right, now they're out of the way, let's get this damn portal device taken care of." Yori headed for the entrance to the building. Harrison quickly told the uniforms not to follow them, then went after her, joined by everyone else. Inside the building, morning sunlight streamed in through the windows onto the floor, although it didn't do much to illuminate the echoing depths. It was filthy, broken glass and bricks littering the floor, with piles of rusting machinery scattered around. The impression was very much of a place that had seen no use for decades. "Just like a film set," Yori said, walking confidently to the back of the building. Harrison nodded.

"They sometimes do use these sorts of places for shooting movies in, although not often due to insurance." Looking around he frowned a little. "In fact, I'm sure I've seen this place in a movie once. Can't remember which one, though." Tamiko looked around as well.

"Wasn't it Robocop or something?" He shrugged.

"Possibly. One abandoned warehouse looks a lot like another."

At the back of the large building they found a pile of crates that had been moved around to form a dividing wall, partitioning off a few dozen square feet into a shelter. There was a tarpaulin stretched across forming a roof. Inside were two army-surplus cots and all the accoutrements of a camp site that showed signs of having been used for some time. Piles of boxes that had contained electronic equipment, cameras, food, and all manner of things lay about, some still unopened. There were also a number of wallets and purses. "Well, this is enough to get them convicted for a few years, I think," Harrison said, staring at the mess.

Fumiko pointed. "That must be Sophie's bag." They looked at the backpack with a NASA patch sewn to it. There was a pulsating green glow coming from the unzipped top. Yori swore, exchanging a worried look with Chou.

"That's not good. It's really unstable, it shouldn't be pulsing like that." She waved everyone back then walked over to the backpack, kneeling down and very cautiously tugging the top open. "OK, it's right on the edge. It's so unstable that if I try pulling the energy from it the thing might fire immediately. I'll have to destroy it right now." After a moment's thought, she reached inside and gingerly removed the device. "I don't want to blow up Sophie's backpack, I think she deserves to get it back," she said, standing carefully and walking past them to the middle of the warehouse.
Putting it on the floor she backed away. She nodded to Chou, who concentrated on the device, a warded circle a few feet across appearing around it. Raising her hand Yori pointed it at the device, then apparently thought of something. Pulling the other one out of her ki pocket she flipped it into the warded area, before vaporising both of them with a brilliant blast of purple energy.

An echoing boom rolled through the entire building making dust fall from the roof. Somewhere in the dark the sole remaining window shattered, glass tinkling to the ground for a few seconds. As the echo died away Harrison blinked, the intensity of the beam and the blast had been as bad as one of Aiko's teleport flashes. There were shouts of alarm from the uniformed officers outside, two of them running through the entrance with their guns drawn. The lieutenant waved them down, both of them staring at the glowing crater in the floor in shock. He walked over and inspected it from close up. The slag lining it glistened, making little plinking sounds as it slowly cooled.

"Wow. That was loud." Looking at the two young women with renewed respect, he smiled. "Very impressive. At least this time it's not a hole you could lose a bus in." Yori laughed.

"I did slightly overdo it that time. I didn't bother with the wards, they take far too much time in a battle, and I may have used too much energy." Aiko burst out laughing.

"May have?" Shooting her an amused look, Yori shrugged.

"Don't complain, it was you lot who brought that thing to me. I just disposed of it." She looked at Harrison. "Do you mind if I take Sophie's things?"

"Strictly speaking it's all evidence, but this case breaks most of the rules, like everything to do with you all. Go ahead." Smiling at him she re-entered the enclosure, coming out with the backpack zipped up over her shoulder.

"We can take this back to her later." It vanished into wherever she kept things.

"So. Another mission accomplished, I think," Agent Naito said, relaxing for the first time since Yori had woken him the day before. "This time without any casualties, thankfully."

Once Harrison had arranged to get a team down to the warehouse to begin collecting evidence, one of the squad cards left with the two prisoners while the other one stayed behind to guard the scene.
They went back inside, then teleported back to the station. Opening the door of the conference room Harrison nearly walked into Captain Martinez, who was just reaching for the door handle.
He looked surprised.

"Oh, there you are, Harrison. I was looking for you. How is the special case coming along?"

"I think it's basically over, Captain. We recovered two of the devices, one here and one Chou went to New York to get. The one here was the problem but we managed. Yori called some... interesting allies. Both devices have been destroyed." Martinez nodded, pleased.

"I'll tell the people upstairs. Well done. I'll be very interested indeed in reading your report." He looked curiously at the Japanese people in the room behind Harrison, picking out Yori and Chou from the description that Harrison had given him. Studying them for a moment, he raised his eyebrows when he looked at Aiko, Fumiko, and Misaki, then smiled. Tamiko was still wearing the spare clothes Chou had loaned her. "Thank you, ladies. From what I've been told, the results of those things going off would have been horrific. I've very pleased to know you stopped that.
Although I suspect there's going to be some very odd paperwork surrounding all this." Harrison nodded with a groan.
"You could say that." Clapping him on the shoulder, Martinez laughed.

"Don't worry too much. Write me a full report, then I'll look at it with you and we can figure out how much of it we pass on. Allowances have been made for, ah, oddities." Slightly relieved Harrison nodded. "Also, would it be possible for you others to produce a report, please?" the captain requested, turning to Agent Naito, then glancing at Yori and the others. "Just to keep the records straight."

"Of course, Captain," Naito said, while Yori smiled. "I'll also see that you get a copy of my report to the PSIA."

"Thank you. Harrison, why don't you take the rest of the day off, you could take your friends to see the sights."

"Thank you, Captain. I'll have the report on your desk tomorrow evening."

"Good. Enjoy yourselves." Turning, he headed back to his office. Harrison looked at his watch. It was just turning eight AM.

"Let's go back to my house. Emily and Serena would love to meet you. Afterwards, we could find something to do. Would you like to have a barbecue later this afternoon? It's probably going to be a pretty hot day for this time of year." The girls looked at each other, then Agent Naito.

"We're up for it," Aiko said. Yori and Chou nodded. Naito thought for a minute. "OK. I'll check in, then I'm fine as well. I don't think my superiors will mind under the circumstances." He looked down at his suit, which was getting a bit wrinkled. "I need to get some other clothes, though."

"I can pop you home, Agent," Aiko said. "You can get what you need and we can come back." Laughing, he agreed.

"It's a weird world where it's easier to have a magical girl teleport you from LA to Tokyo for a change of clothes than to go to a store," he chuckled. She giggled.

"Come on," she said to the rest of her team. "Let's get something suitable. I've had enough of the uniform for now if we're going out." They clustered around her, Yori giving her a quick recharge. "Back in about an hour, Yori," she said.

"Meet us at my house," Harrison said. She nodded, then they vanished. Opening his eyes, the lieutenant looked at the two young women left. "Not going for a change of clothes?" he asked. Chou smiled.

"We have those with us," she said, pulling another outfit like her current one out of nowhere and showing it, neatly folded, to him. "Tamiko has my other set, I hope she remembers to bring it back with her." Putting them away again, she followed him and Yori down to the parking garage to collect his vehicle. Soon they were driving slowly through down-town LA. Chou was in the front seat, looking around with interest. "It's nearly as busy as Tokyo," she noted. "But spread out more." Looking up at the sky, she closed her eyes for a moment, basking in the sun. "And warmer. It's quite cold at home right now. This is a nice change."

"What was it like in New York? I saw on the news they're having real problems with the snow at the moment." He glanced at her, then back at the road.

"It was very cold and snowing hard. Will that affect the New Year celebrations?"

"I suppose it will reduce the crowds a bit, but people there are pretty determined, I doubt it will
"Is Sophie's house close enough to the route you're taking that we could stop by briefly?" Yori asked from the back. Thinking for a moment he nodded.

"I think so. It shouldn't be much of a detour." Pulling over he grabbed a map from the glove box and quickly checked it to be sure. "Yes, it will only take us about ten minutes out of our way. We can still get to my house before the others get back." Putting the car into drive he indicated and pulled out again. Flipping on the radio he tuned to a news station, wondering what had happened overnight.

"...brings to thirty-seven the number of suspected gang members found tied up in the Hollywood area in the last fourteen hours. Police are baffled, although they have been quick to arrest the suspects, as each one was found with evidence linking them to a recent violent crime. The majority seem to have no clear memory of the person or persons responsible for what happened, while the ones that do claim to remember anything have given wildly different descriptions of their assailants. Several allegedly asked to be taken into custody, with our source in the LAPD telling us that they seem to be terrified of any young woman in a miniskirt that they see. One teenager apparently ran from the police officer who untied him, only to lock himself in the officer's cruiser and refuse to come out until he was at the police station. This is Marcy Wu, reporting live from..."

With a gentle sigh he switched the radio off again and looked sidelong at Chou. She gazed back innocently. Yori was giggling quietly in the back seat.

Hearing the doorbell ring Sophie dropped the book she was reading and jumped to her feet. "I'll get it, Mom," she shouted, running out into the hall. A faint acknowledgement came from her mother who was in the utility room unloading the washing machine. Opening the door she was surprised to see the people from last night, Yori, Chou, and that police lieutenant. The black-haired woman grinned at her.

"Hi, Sophie. Can we come in? I've got something for you."

"Yeah, come in. Mom is out back, she'll be here in a minute." They entered, Harrison closing the door behind him. Following her to the games room they all sat down. As they did her mother arrived, looking slightly flustered.

"Oh, hello, Lieutenant. And you, ladies. What can we do for you this time?" Yori chuckled a little.

"Don't worry, we're not here to ask more questions. We wanted to let you know that because of what Sophie told us we managed to track down the people that mugged her. Lieutenant Harrison arrested them about an hour ago." Harrison nodded.

"They were caught in possession of quite a lot of stolen goods. The likelihood is that they will be going to jail for some time." He glanced at Sophie and grinned. "He's still walking funny." She giggled, looking very pleased. Her mother sighed a little, looking at her fondly but with some exasperation.

Laughing, Yori turned to her. "You did very well. Thank you. I have something of yours as well." She produced Sophie's backpack from nowhere. Sophie looked at her mother for a moment, puzzled, she still couldn't work out how the Japanese woman did that, then accepted it back. Opening it, she checked the contents. Everything but the strange glowing object was present.

"Thanks," she said, very pleased to get it back. "This was a gift from Dad. I was really pissed when "They took it."

"Sophie! No swearing." Her mother was smiling though.

"I'm sorry, but we're going to have to go, we're meeting some friends soon." They stood again. Chou walked over to Harrison and whispered to him. He looked slightly surprised, then nodded, smiling.

"That's a good idea. Sophie, Mrs Simpson, would you two like to come to a barbecue at my house later? Around, um, let's say half past six? Yori and her friends are only here for today, so I thought I'd fill them with slightly burnt meat before they go home." Sophie and her mother exchanged glances. "My daughter Serena is about your age. I think you might get on quite well. She's interested in video games as well, amongst other things." He grinned.

"Can we, Mom?" Sophie liked the sound of that, she hadn't been to a barbecue for months.

"Well... I suppose. We don't have anything else planned. Thank you, Lieutenant. That's very nice of you. Isn't it a little cold for a barbecue, though?"

"It's not as hot as I'd like, but it's a lot warmer than usual for this time of year. The weather report says it could hit nearly seventy today. I've got several patio heaters as well for later."

"That sounds fine." He gave her his address, which she wrote down carefully. "We'll see you later."

Sophie waved as the trio climbed into a big black SUV and drove off. Looking at her mother she smiled. "Thanks, Mom."

"Remember, be good. No swearing." She rolled her eyes a little but nodded.

Walking into his house Harrison waved the other two in, then shut the door. "Em? I'm back," he called. His wife stuck her head out of the kitchen door, surprised.

"Already? You only left about two hours ago."

"We solved that case. Made two arrests, recovered what we were looking for, and found a lot of stolen items. The captain gave me the rest of the day off as a reward, probably because I put in a double shift yesterday. This is Yori, and Chou. The others will be along soon." He grinned, shaking his head in mild disbelief. "They went back to Japan to change their clothes." His wife stared at him for a moment then started giggling.

"Oh, Richard, you do realise how insane that sounds?" Nodding, he hugged her.

"It's true, though." Emily turned to the two women, drying her hands on a towel, then shook hands with them.

"It's nice to meet you, Mrs Harrison," Chou said politely.

"Emily, please, Chou. It's nice to meet you two as well. Richard has told me a lot about you. Most likely not everything, knowing him, but what he has told me is pretty strange." Yori chuckled for a moment.

"That means it's probably all true." Laughing, Emily took them into the living room, then offered coffee. Soon everyone had a cup. They were discussing the barbecue when a few minutes later a girl who bore a striking resemblance to her came into the room, looking at the guests with interest.
"Hello, dear. These are Yori, and Chou. You remember your father telling us about them?" She nodded, sitting on a chair, still staring at the two young women. Yori returned her gaze with a small smile.

"He said you're magical girls from Tokyo. Like in my manga. Is that true?" She inspected their clothing suspiciously. "You don't dress like them." Chou giggled while Yori burst into laughter.

"I know people who do, trust me. But it's not our style. We're really martial artists, but where we live people think of us as magical girls, so we've given up correcting them. No one listens."

"Do you have magical powers? And magical weapons? And a talking animal?" Serena asked with great interest, her eyes wide.

"Yes. Yes. No, that's just silly, although it does happen." Yori smirked. Harrison had his arm around his wife, both of them watching the interrogation with amusement. His daughter was clearly trying to think of more questions.

"Can you fly?"

"No."

"Can you jump over a house?"

"Yes."

"Hmm. Can you turn invisible?"

"Yes."

"Hah. Prove it." She did. "Holy shit!"

"Serena!" Yori faded back into view, chuckling. Emily watched with wide eyes, as did her daughter.

"OK. Can you pick up a car?"

"Yes."

"A truck?"

"Yes."

"A train?"

"Hmm. I don't know, I've never tried." Serena got a thoughtful expression. Harrison sighed.

"No, we're not going to find a train for Yori to try picking up."

"Aww." She looked disappointed. So did Yori. Chou looked at her and rolled her eyes, making Emily laugh.

"Um, can you throw fireballs?"

"Sort of." Serena looked at her mother with wide eyes.

"No fireballs in the house, please. We only just redecorated."
"Aww." Yori was giggling.

"OK." The girl was tapping her chin thoughtfully. Her parents watched, while the two young women seemed to be enjoying themselves.

"Can you kill demons?" Yori nodded.

"Yep. Although I prefer to talk them into going away." Serena stared.

"Can you summon demons?"

"Well, I can call them on the phone and ask them to come over. I know a few that like to party." Emily shook her head before her daughter even asked the question, both of them looking stunned.

"No demons."

"Hmph." Serena crossed her arms and sulked for a moment. She wanted to meet a partying demon.

"Can you teleport?"

"Not yet, but a friend of ours can. That's how we got here."

"Cool." The girl was trying to think of other magical girl abilities she'd read about in her translated manga. She drew a blank, but made a mental note to start a list. The doorbell rang at that point. Harrison got up and answered it, soon returning with Agent Naito and the other four girls. Serena stared at the short brunette. Now that was magical girl clothing!

Having made the introductions, Harrison directed Aiko to their bedroom when she asked for a place to change. She came back wearing much more conventional clothing, jeans and a silk blouse. The others were dressed similarly. Naito was in a more casual suit, with no tie. "We have, um, about ten hours before the barbecue. What would guys like to do? We could go to Disney Land, although I suspect that theme parks would be a bit underwhelming for you after your normal lives." They all smiled.

"It's true that roller coasters don't hold a huge thrill for us any more, Lieutenant," Chou said.

He laughed, then replied, "Call me Richard. We've known each other for long enough now that you don't need to be formal."

"As you wish, Richard. Thank you." She tipped her head graciously.

"No problem. OK, there's a pretty good off-road go-kart track near here, if that's the sort of thing you like. We've already been to the Hollywood walk of fame. Studio tours? A neighbour of ours is involved with one of the studios, he's the safety coordinator there. I could probably get some passes that would let us see things the public normally doesn't get to. He's done it before." They looked interested. "There's also surfing, things like that, but the Pacific is cold at the best of times, this time of year it's freezing. Or shopping, there are a lot of world class stores in LA. Museums, as well, if you like that sort of thing. Plus gun ranges, paintball, all sorts of sporting things."

Yori looked amused. "Ah, yes. I've heard about Americans and sports. Someone once told me that to an American, 'Sports' meant either something with a ball in it, or something with a projectile weapon in it." Harrison started laughing while Emily giggled.

"That's more true that it should be. Trust me, we do also consider other things, aside from ball games and lethal weapons, sport."
"I'm quite interested in the movie studio tour," Naito said. "It's something I always fancied doing."

"It sounds good to me," Tamiko agreed. The others did as well after some consideration.

"OK, I'll call Jim and see what I can arrange. We could go on the normal tour anyway, but he can show us more. Some of the things they have there are pretty interesting."

"I wouldn't mind looking around a few shops as well," Chou said. Fumiko nodded.

"Great. We can do that as well." He went to the phone and dialled.

"There's too many people here for one vehicle," Emily said while he spoke to his friend. "We'll have to take both cars. I'll need to go out first and get some supplies for tonight, but that won't take long."

Yori nodded. "I'd like to stop at a bank, to exchange some yen for US dollars. Can we do that?"

"Yes, that's easy, there's a big branch of Bank of America just down across the street from the supermarket."

"Please let us contribute to the cost of this barbecue, Emily." Chou smiled at her. Emily shook her head.

"No, you're our guests. It's fine."

"Please. I insist. There are a lot of us and we eat a lot." She glanced at Misaki, who shrugged. She was nibbling a bar of chocolate again. "It's no problem." Giving in, the woman nodded.

"All right."

"Agent, would you be able to change our money for us?" Yori asked. "You have official photo ID which the bank will probably want. It's... a little difficult for us. You understand." He grinned.

"I do. Certainly I will." She handed him a large roll of high denomination yen notes, making his eyes bug out. "Good grief... how much is this?"

"About a million yen. Around ten thousand dollars worth, that should be enough for the moment." Taking it he looked at it for a moment, stunned.

"I'd think so." Shaking his head he tucked it away into an inside pocket, wondering where she'd got it from. It seemed like a lot of cash to be casually carrying around. On the other hand it wasn't like anyone was going to steal it from her.

Putting the phone down Harrison smiled. "Jim came through again. He's arranging some passes for us all, he says come over any time after half past ten." He went upstairs to change into more casual clothing. Emily left shortly afterwards, taking Naito with her. Chou also went, to help. Serena stared at the girls, inspecting them carefully.

"Do you have a talking magical animal?" she asked curiously. Yori snickered while Aiko looked surprised for a moment, then grinned widely.

"Only Misaki, and she doesn't actually talk much." Fumiko collapsed into laughter while her sister appeared mildly offended. "She eats an awful lot though."

"Can you jump over a house?"
Aiko looked amused, exchanging glances with Yori.

"Yes. We all can." The questioning went on for some time, as Harrison came back in from the back yard where he had been tidying up a little and getting the barbecue set up for later. Watching his daughter talking with the five Japanese girls he smiled a little, then motioned to Yori. She got up and walked over to him.

"Could you give me a hand, Yori? I want to move the garden table, but it's made of cast iron and weighs about half a ton. Normally it takes six people to shift it, but..." She laughed.

"No problem." Following him out into the yard she looked around. "Nice." It was quite large, around eighty feet by a hundred and fifty, well-kept grass interspersed with a few flower-beds, and a fence around the whole thing. The property backed onto some undeveloped land that had trees growing on it, not really densely enough to be called a forest or wood, but more than enough to make it not grassland. Some of them were fairly large. The land sloped up to some low hills half a mile or so away. As they were walking over to the table Serena and Aiko's team came out behind them, the girls inspecting the yard with interest. Serena followed her father and Yori over to the large cast-iron picnic table which sat on four concrete slabs, one under each leg to spread the weight.

She gaped as Yori crouched down, slid under the middle of it, then stood up again, holding it above her head as if it was made of cardboard. "Where do you want it?" she asked. Smiling, Harrison pointed out the spot. Tamiko ran over and collected the concrete slabs like they were beer coasters, putting them in the spots required at the new location. Yori lowered the table to the ground and came out from under it, dusting her hands off. Serena was still standing with her mouth open, staring wide-eyed. The black-haired girl winked at her.

"Wow!" was all she could think to say for a moment. She knew very well how heavy the table was, it normally took her father and several neighbours a lot of effort to do what the petite woman had just done effortlessly. After a long moment she smiled happily. This was looking like it was going to be a fun day.

After Emily and her helpers had come back, the car was unloaded and the food put away. Naito handed Yori an envelope stuffed with dollar bills of various denominations. "I got a mix for you, I thought it would be useful."

"Thank you." She looked through it, distributing the money to her friends. "Here you go, guys, this should be enough for wandering around with. If you need more let me know." Aiko and the others looked surprised but pleased.

"Thanks, Yori," the short brunette said.

Yori handed half of what was left to Chou, who peeled off a few bills which she gave to Emily with a smile, then put the remainder away. Serena watched carefully but couldn't work out where the envelope had gone. Yori noticed and smiled a little.

"How did you do that?" the girl asked curiously.

"It's a martial arts technique called hidden weapons. It's very useful." She reached into her sleeve and produced a long wooden staff that couldn't possibly have fitted. Emily and her daughter both stared in amazement. Pulling a number of items from various places about her person in a manner better than any magic act they'd ever seen, Yori grinned at the expressions. Harrison shook his head in bemused wonder, looking at the pile of odds and ends, which must have weighed at least a couple of hundred pounds. After demonstrating, the girl quickly made everything disappear again, finishing by sliding the staff into her closed fist, then opening the hand to show there was nothing there.

"That's incredible," Emily said faintly.

"Believe me, Em, that's nothing. Impressive, but nothing." She looked at him. He seemed serious. Slightly freaked out, she changed the subject, telling her daughter to get ready to go out. Serena gaped at Yori for a moment more then ran upstairs. As sound as she came back the whole group left the house, separating into two sets of five so they'd fit in the two vehicles. Yori went with Misaki, Fumiko, and Tamiko in the Harrison's SUV, while the others went in Emily's people carrier. "It will take about an hour to get there this time of day, so get comfortable," Harrison said, pulling out into the road and waiting for his wife to follow. Once she was behind him they headed off.

They talked for most of the trip. Close to their destination, slightly nervously, he turned the radio on to try for the news again.

"...tertainment news, speculation is growing as to which studio was behind an apparent guerilla publicity stunt last night on Hollywood Boulevard involving what witnesses said was some of the most impressive martial arts they had seen since the films of Bruce Lee, decades ago. So far no one we have spoken to has admitted responsibility, or is prepared to speak on the record about any upcoming movie involving beautiful young women who can perform incredible feats of acrobatic action, but the stunt-women last night seem to have left a lasting impression on everyone who saw them."

"A certain amount of confusion surrounds the event. Some accounts mention actors dressed as gang members attacking the young ladies performing the stunts, while other witnesses claim they were actual gang members who wandered into the middle of the promotional activity. Whatever the truth, we will bring you more as and when we have it. There is no word yet on the identities of the actors involved, raising the possibility that a studio is bringing in previously unknown new talent in an attempt to shake up an industry that has been seen in recent years to have become increasingly stale and formulaic. This could be exciting, folks! Stay tuned for the weath..."

Stopping at a traffic light, Harrison turned off the radio again and slowly banged his head on the steering wheel. Fumiko and Misaki were rolling around in the back seat trying to stifle their laughter, while Yori had a huge grin on her face. Tamiko looked slightly confused. It took the car behind him sounding it's horn angrily before he recovered enough to drive on.

Not saying anything for the rest of the trip, just casting Yori sitting next to him bemused glances occasionally, to which she responded with intermittent snickering, he drove into the employee entrance of the large studio complex his friend worked at, lowering the window when the guard approached. After a quick conversation and the production of his ID, he waited for the guard to phone Jim, then wave to them and open the barrier. Both he and Emily drove in and parked. Everyone disembarked, the six girls gathering while Fumiko explained why she, her sister, and Yori still looked so amused. There was a burst of laughter and they turned to the others, who with the exception of Harrison, were watching them with curiosity. He was just resigned to it.

"Shall we go and meet Jim, then?" he said with a sigh, waving them in the direction of the relevant building. Emily looked at him questioningly. "I'll explain later." She smiled gently, walking ahead of him with Serena, both of them talking to Chou. Naito walked up beside him and followed his gaze to the other young women, then chuckled.

"You'll..."
"Get used to it. I know." He sighed again, but smiled a little. Naito laughed.

"You only have to deal with the craziness occasionally. At home, it happens all the time..."

"My sympathies." They grinned at each other.

Jim, a tall slender man of Caribbean ancestry, met them with a grin. "Hey, Rich, how's things going?"

"Very well, Jim, thanks. And thanks for arranging this. These are friends of mine from Japan. Yori, Chou, Tamiko, Aiko, Misaki, Fumiko, and Masao." He pointed out each person as he named them. Everyone shook hands, then Jim led them into the building.

"This is one of the largest movie studios still filming in Hollywood," he explained as they walked. "Normal tourist tours don't see everything, of course, and there are obviously some things I can't show even to friends, but you'll see more than most people outside the industry do. We'll start with the normal stuff, then move on to the rest." Leading them through the building he took them to the costumes department first, introducing them to a short elderly woman who greeted him with a smile. "This is Gladys. She knows more about clothing and costumes than anyone I've ever met."

Gladys looked pleased with the praise, smiling happily, then spent twenty minutes explaining what she and her department did, something that Chou and Emily particularly seemed to find interesting. Harrison watched from the sidelines with Jim as the old woman happily chatted away with them, showing them how they made costumes for movies, re-using old ones and producing custom ones from scratch. The others wandered around the towering shelves full of boxes and racks of clothing, hats, boots, and all manner of things that almost defied description. "So, what's the story with your friends, Rich?" Jim looked at him curiously. Harrison shook his head.

"You wouldn't believe me if I told you, Jim. But they're here as consultants on a nasty little case we had. It got resolved this morning, so the Captain gave me the day off. I'm showing them around LA, just relaxing, then later we're going to have a barbecue. You want to come?" His friend thought for a moment.

"Yeah, why not. Sandra would love it. When?"

"Around seven or so would probably be best. Bring some of that hot sauce you make."

Jim grinned. "The normal stuff, or the good stuff?"

"Both."

"OK". After a while, Jim looked at his watch, then called everyone back. "Let's move on. Next is the props department." This was in the same building but at the other end. Inside was a huge amount of almost everything one could possibly think of, all boxed and labelled, stacked on shelves and hanging from the ceiling. Furniture, artwork, decorations, more mundane things like telephones and coat-racks, exotic items such as stuffed animals and trophies, it looked like the ultimate junk store. Several people were moving around with carts, checking clipboards and picking items off shelves. "The larger things like vehicles are kept outside, we have quite a large fleet of cars and trucks. They get modified if necessary, so we can turn a car, for instance, into a taxi from New York, or a police car from San Francisco. The people here are experts at making almost anything you can imagine. Smaller things are done by the model-making department, and weapons are handled by the armoury, but almost everything else comes from here."

Leading them over to a middle-aged man who was typing on a computer, he introduced them.
"Hiram here is in charge of this mad-house. He claims to know where everything is by heart, but we make him use a computer so that everyone else does as well." The man grinned.

"Go on, ask me for something."

Chou looked at him with a smile. "A wall hanging from the early Japanese Muromachi period."
Laughing, he nodded to her.

"Ah, a difficult one." Thinking for a second, he added, "Section E, row thirteen, shelf six. Japanese art, 1300 to 1400 AD." She looked at him with a raised eyebrow. With a grin he jumped to his feet and led the way to the relevant location, pulling a poster tube from the shelf and removing a rolled up paper wall hanging. Unrolling it he showed it to her. "A copy, of course, but quite a nice one." She inspected it, smiling, then nodded.

"Yes, it's a very convincing copy. Very nice." Returning it she watched as he carefully rolled it up and replaced it. "Most impressive. How many items do you have in here?"

"At last count something in excess of three quarters of a million. This is the stuff that's used fairly regularly, which generally means it's been used in the last five to ten years. There is a lot more in long term storage dating back to the early twenties in some cases, but it doesn't get used very often."

Returning to his desk he sat, then waved his hands around the room. "There are a dozen people working here full time just checking things in and out. More people make sure the props are correct, repair any damage, acquire new ones, and so on. We're pretty busy most of the time. Since there are often several movies being produced at the same time it can get complicated keeping track of everything." They talked for a little while, asking a few more questions, before Jim led them to the next stop. As soon as they walked in to the armoury, all six girls stopped dead and looked around with interest. A vast array of weaponry was present, firearms of all sorts both in racks along the walls and also locked securely behind metal grills. "The ones on the racks are non-functional dummies," Jim explained, "the others are working weapons, although quite a lot of them are modified to prevent normal ammunition being used."

The arms master, a shortish man who looked like he'd survived being thrown into a wood-chipper, watched them with interest from behind a desk. He was in the process of signing some paperwork on a clipboard held by a young woman who appeared to be in a hurry. Once he'd finished she ran out of the room looking at her watch, nearly colliding with Harrison on the way.

"Sorry," she muttered, pelting away in a clatter of high heels.

"Busy, Aaron?" Jim asked. The man chuckled in a deep voice.

"You might say that. The new spy movie is running behind because someone screwed up the scene timing and they had to reshoot about a dozen scenes as a result. Plus some idiot wrecked one of my best heavy machine guns. I have absolutely no idea how he did it, but I have to repair it before they can redo the last scene. Actors and stunt people are a pain in the ass." Standing, he walked around the desk, studying the girls and Naito. Yori and Chou had gravitated to a display of martial arts weapons, ranging from naginata to nunchaku, which they were examining closely. He watched with a small smile.

"Do you mind if I pick it up?" Yori asked politely, pointing to a set of nunchaku that were real, made of dense wood, next to a number that were clearly soft plastic. He nodded.

"Go ahead." Smiling, she picked them up and examined them closely.
“Very nice. Iron wood, I think.”

"Correct. I take it you know something about martial arts and weaponry, then, miss?" She gave him a look that made everyone in the know laugh.

"A little." Stepping back a couple of paces to a clear area away from obstructions, she started working through a basic exercise with the weapon, flipping the connected sticks from hand to hand with a whooshing noise while smiling at him. "These ones are well-balanced. Quite old, I think, perhaps pre-war?" Watching her with amusement he nodded.

"Probably about 1930 or so." She speeded up the action, flipping the linked sticks around her body, under her arms, around her waist, and over her shoulders faster and faster until they hummed through the air. Harrison and Jim gaped, while Serena was watching with a huge grin. Emily stared, then clapped.

Finishing up in a blur of motion that ended with her holding both sticks in one hand Yori stopped dead, then smiled. "Fun. I should do that more often, I don't get a lot of practice with these things." She put them back carefully, then turned to the armourer, who was gaping a little as well and bowed slightly. "Thank you."

"Ah, you're welcome." Staring at her for a moment, he asked slowly, "Are you in the industry, miss? If not, you should be." She shook her head, grinning.

"No, I work in a somewhat different field. But thanks for the compliment." They wandered around the armoury for another half hour, the man in charge shooting Yori odd glances now and then, while explaining the various weapons and the movies they'd been used in. He clearly had an encyclopedic knowledge of them. Eventually they bid him goodbye and left. As they walked out of the room, a group of people went past, a tour guide wearing a jacket with the logo of the studio on it looking slightly annoyed.

"Sir, I keep telling you, I have no idea what movie you're talking about. We're not shooting any martial arts ones I'm aware of at the moment." She grimaced as the teenager behind her hurried to keep up, while the rest of the tour group looked amused.

"But I really want to see it! That publicity stunt was amazing. When is it coming out?"

"Sir, please stop asking me that. I've told you five times already, I don't know!"

As they disappeared into the armoury, the boy could be heard pleading again. Harrison caught Yori's eye, then sighed heavily. Snickering, she followed Jim to the next destination. He shook his head, put his arm around his wife, and trailed after the others.

Over the next two and half hours they walked all over the studio grounds, seeing various permanent sets that depicted street scenes of cities from around the world, often in eerie detail, interiors of buildings, even a few that were dead ringers for typical landscapes not native to California. A monstrous tank of water, only a few feet deep, stood in for the ocean. A couple of scuba-divers were in the middle of it, doing something underwater, intermittently surfacing to retrieve tools from a floating platform next to them. Tour groups were being led through regularly although they avoided the areas where actual work was happening. Eventually they found themselves on an otherwise closed set, Jim leading them in quietly. "This is the set for the spy film that Aaron in the armoury was talking about. It's the second one in this series. They're about to shoot a scene, so please be very quiet, the director will explode if it goes wrong again, he's getting a little... irritable." He smiled a little as he whispered. They all nodded.
Actors took their positions, the cameras were carefully aligned, and the scene was shot. The famous young actor who was the lead in the production said his lines flawlessly, the stunt people pulled off a fairly convincing fight, then the director called "Cut! OK, finally! That was good. Set up for the next scene, we'll shoot as soon as you're done. Two more to go and we can wrap." The studio was suddenly a hive of activity, people rushing around moving scenery and props, turning a scene in a building in Cairo into one in the New York subway with startling speed.

Unfortunately, due to being in too much of a hurry, one of the grips slipped when moving a large piece of fake subway equipment on a wheeled trolley, letting go of it as he fell. The trolley rumbled across the studio for a few feet, slamming into a gantry and buckling one of the legs supporting it. As it tilted the three men on top of it who were adjusting the lighting for the next scene yelled, grabbing frantically at the rigging above them and holding on for dear life. Tools and equipment rained down on the studio floor making people scatter. Most of the large items were secured to the rigging by safety straps, while the men were strapped to the gantry, but as it began to fall this safety procedure became a liability. They were going to go down with it. Jim took a step forward, knowing it was going to get messy and furious with himself since this was the exact thing he was supposed to have anticipated and prevented, also knowing that there was nothing he could do. A blur of motion from beside him made him look around, then stare.

Yori and the five other young women had started moving the instant the trolley made contact with the gantry. Attracted by the crash they turned away from watching the actors getting ready for the next scene and darted across the floor, covering the intervening hundred feet or so at incredible speeds. Yori and Chou dived at the toppling gantry, the smaller woman grabbing the buckling leg just as it gave way completely, while Chou jumped onto it and anchored the top to the rigging which creaked but held. The other four intercepted a number of large items including one huge arc-lamp which had slid from the platform in the gantry, unsecured since it was in the process of being installed at the time of the impact. Aiko caught it and swung it around, lowering it safely to the ground and away from the actress it had nearly crushed. A heavy toolbox was plucked from the air by Misaki who jumped nearly ten feet up to grab it, while several smaller items fell about her.

Once the immediate rush of falling items was dealt with, Fumiko and Tamiko went to Yori's side, the hush that had fallen over the room once the initial panic was replaced with stunned shock broken by the creaking of metal as they straightened the bent leg with their bare hands, carefully pushing the gantry back into position. When it was more or less in the original shape and stable, they secured it while Yori climbed it like a monkey, joining Chou in helping unstrap the shocked workers on the top and gently guiding them to the ladder down to safety.

When the men were on the ground, shocked silence reigned for a few more seconds before someone started clapping. Growing applause made all six girls look slightly surprised, although they smiled. Jim stared, then turned to his friend. The cop had his hand on his face. "Um, what exactly did you say they did?" he asked the other man slowly.

"Attract far too much attention, mainly," Harrison muttered, lowering his hand and casting a glance at Yori, who looked back and shrugged.

"How... How the hell did they do that?" the safety coordinator said, watching as Aiko lifted four hundred pounds of arc-light and moved it to the side out of the way as if she was lifting a bag of groceries. Approaching one of the men from the gantry, she politely asked him where she should put it, smiling and walking off with it on her shoulder when he pointed, staring in disbelief. It had taken two of them and one of the ceiling-mounted winches to get it onto the gantry in the first place. "That's impossible." The light must have outweighed the petite brunette by about three to one. Looking at Harrison, he waited for an explanation.
"They're all impossible. Some more than others." As he was starting another question, the director came charging across, waving his hand frantically at the scene.

"What the hell just happened?" he screamed. "Who are they? How did they do that? Who's their agent?" Harrison started laughing weakly, leaning against a wall, shaking his head. "Hey. Are you their agent? What's going on? Jim, who are these people?" Walking over with a peculiar grin, Yori pointed at Naito, who had watched the entire scene with bemused wonder and was now trying to keep out of the way while mentally composing the report he would have to submit.

"He's our Agent, actually," she said, giggling manically. Naito glared at her for a moment.

"Oh, thanks, Yori, thanks a lot." Snickering, she wandered off to help clear up the mess. Chou was checking all three men over, while fending off the studio medic who was getting rather wound up.

"They're fine. Calm down." With a severe look she managed to make the woman stop trying to get the men to lie down and simply talk to them.

"Oh, god. There's going to be lawyers and lawsuits and delays and I'll never get this fucking movie shot!" the director wailed, collapsing into a chair, overwrought. Everyone watched for a few seconds, before getting on with life. He was only having another nervous breakdown. This was nothing unusual, it was his third in the last week. Jim patted him on the shoulder comfortably. Emily and Serena watched wide-eyed, standing next to Harrison, who put his arms around them both.

"Does this sort of thing happen a lot, dear?" Emily asked, looking up at him. He nodded. "Around those girls? More than you'd think likely."

"How odd."

"That was so cool!" Serena finally shouted, grinning like a fool. Yori looked over at her and gave her a thumbs up, which she returned.

The commotion continued for some time. Eventually everything had been cleared away, the damaged gantry had been dismantled and removed, while the three technicians had given Chou and the others their heartfelt thanks then gone off for a bit of a lie down to recover. Most of the witnesses had come over to thank the young women, wanting more information on who they were and more importantly, how on earth they'd managed to pull the rescue off. All six girls modestly protested being anything unusual, diverting the questioning neatly.

The lead actor approached, smiling at them with perfect white teeth. Accompanying him was the actress Aiko had saved from a serious injury or death, who hugged her and thanked her breathlessly. Not to be left out Tamiko grabbed the startled actor and kissed him, then let go and giggled. He grinned after a moment, inspecting her with interest. The actress, with whom he was going out, a fact widely reported in the entertainment world, looked annoyed.

Once the director had managed to restore a certain amount of his own dignity and some colour had come back into his face, he stood and walked over, trembling a little from the adrenaline. "Thank you, ladies. I have no idea how you did what you did, but thank you."

As spokes-magical-girl, duly elected, Yori smiled at him. "You're welcome. I hope this doesn't set your schedule back too much." He shrugged, still feeling a little out of it, the last twenty minutes had been somewhat exciting.

"Not as much as dead stage-hands and actors would have." The actress winced, looking across the studio at the light with her name on it. "I'm sorry, Denise," the director added, noticing her gaze. "I didn't mean to remind you." After another inspection of the six Japanese women, he said, "I wish the cameras had been rolling. No one will ever believe this." Misaki giggled, eating a sandwich. Looking at her the director wondered briefly where she'd got it from. He was getting hungry, he decided.

Harrison and the others came over. "Chou, if we're going to go shopping we'll have to leave soon," Emily said, looking at her watch. The blonde nodded acknowledgement.

"You can't leave just like that," the director said frantically, desperately curious about these people. "Jim, they've got to stay! I want to talk to them some more. How did they do that? Where did they come from?"

"Calm down, Adrian, you know it's not good for you," Jim said soothingly. "Take a deep breath and relax a little. I don't know how they did all that. They're friends of Rich's here. You remember, I told you about him, he's a friend of mine from the LAPD. Apparently these people are consultants from Japan here helping him on a case. That's all I know." Both of them turned to Harrison looking expectant. Sighing again, thinking to himself he seemed to be doing a lot of that recently, he glanced at Yori. Smiling a little, she turned to Adrian, holding out her hand.

"Hi. I'm Yori. These are my friends. Look, we're on a bit of a tight schedule, but if you'd like to talk, Richard is having a barbecue at his house for us before we go back to Japan. I'm sure he wouldn't mind if you came to it." She glanced at Harrison who seemed a little startled, but after a few seconds nodded.

"Sure. Why not. We might have to get some more food though."

"I'll sort that out, Rich," Jim said.

Adrian looked at them, then at the place the gantry had been. "Yes, I'd like that. I'm very curious. Not to mention feeling shaken, that could have been a terrible accident. I'm going to be spending the next two hours filling out accident reports now as well." He didn't seem particularly pleased about that.

"Jim can tell you how to get to my house, and when to arrive. We're going to have to leave now, I'm afraid." Adrian shook the hands of everyone present, then watched as Jim led them out.

"That was pretty weird," said the famous actor. Adrian just stared at him for a moment before wandering off shaking his head.

Once they were in the cars heading for the shops that Emily had suggested, Harrison glanced at Yori. She looked back, smiling. "Anyone else you want to invite? You'll end up having half the movie industry following you back to my house at this rate." In the back Fumiko laughed.

"I don't think it's that bad. We got a lot of publicity in the UK, it's a little strange that no-one here seems to have heard of us as a result but I guess they mostly don't watch JNN or the BBC. Most of the other countries' networks didn't report much about us for some reason, just the official cover story about a terrorist bomb. We don't actually want a huge amount of publicity to be honest, we're perfectly happy to be low profile." This made Harrison start laughing so hard he had to slow down.

"Low profile? You lot?" She watched the traffic ahead with a small smile.

"Oh, believe me, we could be a lot more... visible."

"I'm not entirely sure how. After all, in the last twenty four hours, you've picked a truck up and put it on it's wheels, jumped around all over down-town Hollywood, terrified a street gang in front of dozens of tourists, saved several people on a movie set for heaven's sake, and that's not to mention whatever the hell happened late last night. Which I don't want to know about." She giggled.
"Plausible deniability is the concept I'm going for here.

"Chou and I are using a variation on the spell Aiko's team uses. We decided to use it on... field trips... after London, it was attracting enough attention it was getting annoying. People will remember something happened but there won't be identifiable photos, that sort of thing, unless we want it to happen. We don't normally bother at home except when news crews turn up."

"It will make tracing the 'new talent' for the 'new action movie' very difficult," Fumiko said with a chuckle. Harrison laughed again.

"That rumour is going to go around and around, you have no idea what this town is like. It might even provoke some studio into actually making a movie like that, just to jump on the bandwagon."

They were still laughing when they arrived at the next destination. Harrison, Agent Naito, Yori, and Misaki spend some time browsing through several book stores, while the other females headed for the clothing shops. Harrison glanced at the two girls with him. "Not ones for the traditional female pursuits?" he asked Yori as they headed to the next book store. She glanced at Misaki, both of them seeming amused.

"Not so much. If Chou finds something she thinks I'd like she knows my sizes, but I've never been one for clothes shopping. Misaki isn't wildly interested either, she's probably got less interest in that sort of thing than I do to be honest. Not all women are fanatical purchasers of clothes and shoes."
He smiled.

"I know. Serena is one of those. Emily has to practically drag her to get new clothes, she'd rather be buying comics, video games, or some sort of sporting item. She's into archery at the moment.
Keeps bugging me to buy her a compound bow."

"She'll probably get on with Sophie pretty well."

"If they become friends I wouldn't be surprised if they start hunting muggers." She chuckled.

"Nothing wrong with that. We do. We've pretty much hunted them to extinction at home." Giving her a sidelong look he grinned a little.

"Must be like going on safari here."

"Catch and release," Misaki muttered, snickering. "We should have ear tags."

"I'm not sure I want my daughter trapping muggers and tagging them before releasing them back into the wild," Harrison said with a laugh. "Next thing you know, she'd start bringing them home and you know the problem, once you've given them a name you don't want to get rid of them."

After an hour of looking for interesting books and purchasing a number, the quartet met the others.
None of them had any bags with them, making Harrison look puzzled. Serena pointed at Chou.
"She's got about a dozen shopping bags hidden away with that weird trick Yori showed us. The sales lady couldn't believe it."

"It's certainly a very convenient ability when shopping," Emily commented.

As soon as they arrived at home Harrison lit the barbecue, coughing a little from the smoke. The charcoal soon caught, slowly spreading white ash building up across it. Evaluating it with a practised eye he looked pleased. "Should be ready just about when people turn up." Going inside he turned on the yard lights then began preparing some ground beef patties to his mother's recipe.

By the time the first guests arrived, Sophie and her mother, he was just putting the first home-made burgers on the grill. "Ah, perfect timing. How do you like your hamburgers?" A dozen burgers were sizzling nicely within minutes. Shortly after that everyone was eating happily.

Half an hour later Jim, his wife Sandra, and Adrian the director had arrived, Jim with a couple of bottles of home made hot sauce. Yori picked one of them up and looked at it, before unscrewing the lid and trying a little. Her eyes widened with surprise and she grinned. "Hey, that's good." Trying the other one she smirked, then coughed a little. "That one's even better. Hey, Misaki, come and try these." Jim watched in astonishment as both girls poured generous helpings of his hottest sauce, stuff even he had trouble with, onto their third and fourth burgers, respectively, eating them with enthusiasm. Misaki liked it so much she started putting it on almost everything, including dipping potato chips in it.

"She's going to have an interesting time in eight to twelve hours," he said in a low voice to Harrison, who laughed. He knew all too well.

"Hurts going in and coming out, as I recall." They watched her pour some on a steak, slip it between two thick slices of bread, then eat it with a smile. "Although I've never seen anyone eat that much of it before. I hope she doesn't burst into flames on the toilet." Snickering, they went back to grilling some more dead cow slices. Agent Naito cautiously tried some of the less hot sauce, coughed violently, then poured a couple of pints of water down his throat as fast as he could, muttering obscenities to himself in Japanese.

Serena and Sophie were talking together, friends within an hour of meeting. The blonde girl was vividly describing how she'd fought back against the muggers, complete with mimed genital maiming, while her mother watched from across the yard, wincing a little at each successively more enthusiastic kick. Yori sat beside her, watching. "Have you given any consideration to what I said last night about martial arts?" she asked after a while. Joan turned to her.

"I've been thinking about it, yes. I'm not completely sure I want my daughter learning violent things like that." Yori smiled a little. "Did you really start when you were two?" the other woman asked curiously.

"Yes. I've been studying martial arts since I could walk. I suppose you could say it's a calling." The black-haired young woman seemed to be picking her words with care. "I've trained in a large number of different disciplines. Chou is my first student, and undoubtedly my best. The other girls over there are also students and coming along very nicely. All of us love it. The Art teaches you many things besides fighting, as well. It's a worthwhile pursuit." Studying Sophie for a while, she went on, "Your daughter has a fire in her that would suit some form of martial art very well, in my estimation. She reminds me quite a lot of an old acquaintance, although without some of the less useful habits she had. Like I said, I would start her with Aikido, which is primarily a defensive art. It can be remarkably effective. It doesn't require great strength, and it's designed to minimise injuries to both the attacked and the attacker. Minimally violent, I suppose you could say."

She looked back at Joan. "I suspect your daughter will end up being a fighter one way or another. She got lucky the other day, although she may not realise it. Proper training would make things safer for her as well as anyone who might wish her harm. In your society, that may happen more often that one would wish, unfortunately." Joan listened quietly. The young women seemed to have a great deal of experience about what she was discussing, and raised some good points.

"I'll think about it. If I decided to allow it, how would I go about finding a competent teacher?"
"I can give you some pointers of what to look for and what questions to ask." They discussed it for twenty minutes or so, Joan making notes.

"Thank you, Yori. I'll discuss it with her father when he gets back and see what he thinks."

They talked for a little while longer then Joan got up to get another burger. She also wanted to get the recipe. Chou sat beside her, then Jim and Adrian walked up. "So, can we ask about what we saw earlier?" Jim said curiously. They looked at each other then indicated to a pair of lawn chairs.

"Help yourself. What would you like to know?" Yori asked, eating some potato chips. Jim took another pull on his beer, watching them, then leaned forward.

"How did you do all that? I saw you stop a gantry that weighed at least half a ton, not including the three men and the tools and lights on top of it, from falling over by simply holding on to it. As far as everything I've ever known goes that should be impossible." He looked to Chou. "You jumped fifteen feet straight up, then held that damn gantry with one hand and the ceiling rig with the other. It should have torn you in half!" Throwing his hands out to the sides he slopped some beer on the ground. "How? How could you possibly do all that?" Adrian was listening intently, obviously having the same questions.

Yori and Chou exchanged glances, smiling a little. "Martial arts and magic, basically." They stared.

"Seriously. I really want to know."

"Honest. It's advanced martial art techniques combined with some magic that we came up with."

They didn't seem convinced at all. With a slight grin Yori held out her hand, pulling her sleeve up. Rotating it to show there was nothing present but her hand, holding the fingers apart for a moment, she then cupped it slightly in front of them. Their eyes widened comically as a ball of translucent purple light grew to the size of a baseball in the outstretched hand. "This is called ki. It's basically life energy. When you get really good at martial arts you both tend to generate a lot more of it than most people and also can learn techniques to project it outside the body." She tossed the ball from hand to hand as they gaped. "You can use ki for all sorts of interesting things. It makes you faster, stronger, and tougher, amongst other useful properties. Those are the easy ones. A lot of the martial artists we know in Japan and China can do that."

Chou produced a similar golden ball of light, taking up the story. "When you get more practised at ki manipulation you can start to use the energy directly. Like these ki balls. They can be used as weapons, for instance." Raising her hand above her head she fired the ki ball straight up, the two men watching open-mouthed as it whistled into the distance, before detonating with a distant thud.

"Holy crap," Adrian said faintly.

"At home we're what tends to get called magical girls. I don't personally like the description. I consider myself and Chou martial artists, but it's traditional. There are quite a few of us, most of them use magic more than ki. In fact, we're pretty unusual in that we use both mixed together. It's more flexible but takes a lot more ability."

Serena and Sophie had noticed the ki ball shooting upwards and had come over to see what was going on, along with Joan. All three of them were gaping at the purple energy sphere that Yori was still toying with.

"Wow!" Serena said with a grin. "A real fireball."

"Not quite," the black-haired young woman said with laughter apparent in her voice. "Close, though. Come here a minute." Serena and her new friend both moved to stand beside the older woman. "Hold out your hand." Slowly, Serena did so. Yori carefully rolled the ki ball into the girl's hand, who stared in shock. It made her hand tingle in a weird but not unpleasant way. Her mother was watching from beside the barbecue with slight worry. Harrison put a hand on her shoulder.

"Don't worry, Yori wouldn't do anything that would hurt her," Naito said from beside them, also watching with interest.

"OK, now throw it like a baseball. Over there into the garden." Serena looked at the ball, then Yori, before getting a huge grin. She turned and threw the ki ball as hard as she could, managing a respectable distance. Forty yards away the ball hit the ground with a thump and a bright flash, digging a small crater in the grass. A dog started barking nearby.

"Hey! Stop blowing holes in my lawn," Harrison squawked in outrage. Serena jumped up and down clapping her hands.

"Do it again! Do it again!" Her father walked over with a half-annoyed smile.

"No, don't do it again. I'm going to have to fill that in now."

"Sorry, Richard," Yori said with an impish grin. "Just demonstrating."

"Aww, Dad, let her do it again. That was cool."

"Yori, if you want to show off why don't you girls demonstrate a little martial arts? Something that doesn't involve loudly re-landscaping the lawn?"

"OK. Something simple." She glanced at her partner, then they both stood. "Hey! Aiko! You and Tamiko attack us."

"Why?" the short brunette called back, "I'm in the middle of eating here!" Yori chuckled.

"You can finish that later. We need your help right now. Get Fumiko and Misaki as well, wherever they've disappeared to." Shortly the four other girls were arrayed around Yori and Chou, who stood back to back in the middle of the lawn, reasonably well illuminated by the floodlights on the house. Everyone else was watching from the patio. Yori looked at them. "OK, this is a fairly basic training exercise we use." She motioned to the other girls, who suddenly attacked. Even Naito, who was fairly used now to their abilities, stared in amazement at the speed and ferocity that the six participants used, both in attacking and defending. The sound of deflected blows echoed through the yard as the four attackers moved in a complex pattern, the two defenders staying back to back as they fought them off.

After a minute or two the pattern changed, Chou leaping right over Aiko as she charged in, kicking her in the back and propelling her into a forward roll through where the blonde had been standing moments earlier. Landing behind Tamiko she whirled into a low spin kick, sweeping her legs from under her. The other woman turned her fall into a backwards flip, bouncing off her hands into a forward roll that took her between Chou's legs and into a position to rise and strike at her back. The blow never landed as by the time she was in position Chou was cartwheeling away, in the process flattening Aiko who had tried attacking from the side. Meanwhile, Yori had taken on both Fumiko and Misaki simultaneously as they double-teamed her, blurringly fast blows being traded between all three women. All of them were laughing.

The sparring went on for about five minutes before at an unseen signal they all suddenly stopped. The garden was completely silent. Walking back over to the barbecue Misaki made herself another burger, watched by several sets of eyes, before slouching in a chair with the last of the good hot sauce. Fumiko laughed, as she retrieved a beer. The sound broke the spell that had fallen over the audience.

"Fuck me," Adrian said softly. "I've never seen anything like that in my life before. Our stunt people would give up on the spot if they saw that." Yori returned and sat again. "And that was a basic training exercise?" She nodded. "Fuck me."

"Most of the martial artists in Minato, where we come from, and Nerima, another ward fairly close, would be as good as that. I know quite a number much better."

"I assume that you're better even than that," Jim said, "If you're training them." She nodded again. "We both are. I have much more experience than Chou, but to be honest both of us are better at martial arts than probably anyone. Chou alone could take on all those guys and win decisively in under a minute at their current stage of training. If they brought out the magic it might take a little longer. When I started training them it would probably only have taken seconds. They're coming along well though."

"What on earth do you guys fight over there?" Adrian asked.

"Oh, demons, magical terrorists, the occasional deluded near-god-like being that needs a severe kicking, that sort of thing." She smiled at them. Unsure whether she was pulling their legs they exchanged glances. "Ask Richard about the demon he met a few months ago." While they were pondering that she got up to get some more food.

By the time the barbecue party finally tapered off at around midnight, Misaki was snoring in a chair having eaten enough meat to choke a lion, a smile on her face, while Serena was curled up in the living room, with Sophie lying on the floor next to the sofa, both of them having fallen asleep playing a video game. Joan found them there, gently waking her daughter. "Come on, Sophie, we need to get back. It's very late." The blonde girl staggered to her feet, mumbling a goodnight to her new friend who opened one eye enough to smile at her before falling asleep again. Emily met them at the door.

"Here's our number. I think they will want to see each other again," she said, writing down the information and handing it to the other woman.

"Thank you, Emily, and thanks for the invitation. We've both had a wonderful time." She looked out the window at the end of the hall into the garden where Chou could be seen talking to Jim. "What remarkable young women. I've glad we met them. They're a bit frightening, but I think they mean well." Emily nodded following her gaze.

"I'm sure of it." They hugged briefly before Joan and her daughter left. Emily returned to the living room and tried to wake her daughter to get her up to bed, unsuccessfully. In the end her father carried her up. When he went back outside he found Adrian ready to leave. He was talking to Yori.

"If any of you ever want to do stunt work in the movies, let me know. I can put you in touch with people who'd sell their own kidneys to get you to work for them after seeing something like what I saw earlier." He handed them each a card, then left, after bidding everyone else goodnight. Jim and Sandra left shortly afterwards. Eventually it was just the Japanese people, Lieutenant Harrison, and Emily. Sitting down around the dying barbecue which was still emitting some heat, they looked at each other.

"Thank you both for a very nice night," Chou said.
"No problem," Harrison replied, leaning back in his chair and finishing off his last beer. "It was fun. There isn't even any food left, between them Yori and Misaki finished off everything. Although the rest of you didn't exactly fail at that."

"Hey, I only had three burgers," Agent Naito said with a grin. Yori laughed softly.

"I only had eight. And half a bottle of that sauce. That was very good indeed."

"Tell me that in the morning," Harrison said knowingly.

Glancing at his watch, Naito winced. "I'm going to be jet-lagged to hell tomorrow. Or is it teleport-lagged? Is that a thing?"

"Well, we'd better get going," Yori said, standing and yawning. "It's been a long day."

"Thanks for the help, guys." Also standing, Harrison shook hands with them all. "I hope we see you again at some point soon. Although I could do without all the problems we had this time. Let me know what happens with that last issue." He was being fairly careful not to mention the portal bombs in front of his wife. The martial artist nodded.

"We'll let you know when it's resolved."

Aiko disappeared into the house, re-emerging in her uniform and powered up. After a quick recharge, they stood close together, waved at Richard and Emily, then vanished in a flare of light. "Ack!" Emily said, blinking. She hadn't looked away quite fast enough when her husband had told her to.

"It's kind of bright isn't it?" he said, chuckling. They packed up anything perishable, of which there was a surprisingly small amount left, turned off the outside lights, and retired inside. Turning off the video game Harrison picked up the remote from the TV, which had switched back automatically to broadcast television when the video game output went away. It was in the middle of the local news on NBC.

"...cases of what some people are referring to cheerleader-phobia. None of the experts we have spoken to have any plausible reasons for this, or why it could strike so many young men at the same time. The common factor seems to be that they were all violent gang members although why this should matter nobody seems to currently have an explanation for. Enquiries are continuing, although at the moment it remains a myst..." He turned the TV off, shaking his head while grinning to himself, then went to bed.
"These scenes from Times Square in New York are familiar to people around the world. The internationally famous ball drop ceremony, first held in 1907, has been held almost every year since then, attracting crowds of up to a million people, with many millions more watching it broadcast on television worldwide. Despite the weather over the recent New Year period, many hundreds of thousands of people filled the streets to watch the ceremony, none of them at the time realising how close to disaster they came."

"News is slowly emerging that the FBI foiled a terrorist plot to detonate a huge bomb at the top of 1 Times Square, directly under the ball drop pole, during the drop itself. Unofficial estimates of possible casualties range from hundreds to thousands. As a result of an extensive investigation with international coverage, the FBI was able to locate the bomb at very nearly the last minute. It was safely disarmed and dismantled by a team of experts from the FBI and the NYPD three days before it would have detonated."

"Our sources tell us that the bomb disposal experts removed over a quarter of a ton of the military explosive C-4 from the top floor of the building. We are told it was one of the largest terrorist bombs ever found in the US, at least in potential destructiveness, which could conceivably have destroyed up to the top five floors of the iconic 1 Times Square building, causing debris to rain down on the gathered crowd. An investigation is currently under way to determine the source of the explosives. No information as to how the terrorists gained access to the building, or managed to hide the bomb from discovery during building inspections has yet come to light. However, the terrorist cell responsible for planting the bomb is allegedly linked to the recent attack in London in which sixty-seven people lost their lives."

"Our sources claim that all the terrorists involved are either dead or in custody, but refused to be drawn on rumours that consultants from Japan, where a few months ago a similar cell was arrested, were involved in the recent FBI action in New York. Similar rumours surround the events in London the day after Christmas. We will bring you more on this story as it unfolds. This is Daniel Bashir reporting from New York for CNN." Ranma turned the TV off, sighing a little, turning to the others and picking up Nabiki's notebook.

"I'm sorry, I can't find any more clues, no matter how hard I look," Nabiki said tiredly, wiping her hair from her eyes with one hand while accepting a glass of wine from her sister with the other, smiling briefly at her. She looked back to Ranma, who was now flipping through her notebook and cross-referencing her copious notes to the documentation. "I'm sorry," she repeated, leaning back with a sigh. She'd been working on the problem on and off for the last week, ever since the others got back from the US.

"Don't worry, Nabiki, it was always a long shot. You don't have anything to be sorry for. Because of you we got two of the things out of circulation, don't forget." He grinned at her, reaching for his glass of coke.

"I only pointed you at the one in LA..."

"... which meant we met Richard again, talked about the whole thing some more, and were pointed at New York. So, it's because of you." Kasumi sat next to her and sipped her own wine, looking pleased at her logic. Nabiki sighed a little, then smiled.

"All right, I'll take the credit. I just wish I could work out this last one. It's worrying me." Ranma glanced at her, then went back to examining the paperwork.
"It worries everyone. At least there's only one of the damn things left now. That limits the possible damage." Dropping the pile of papers onto the coffee table he stretched, then slumped. "I'll be very glad when we finally get the thing. Waiting for the other shoe to drop is nerve-wracking in the extreme. I'd love to go back to more normal problems. Even cats up trees!" Watching him Nabiki looked amused.

"You know, if this was a comic book, when you finally overcome the last problem, either there will be a twist at the end, or it will set you up for an ever-escalating series of opponents." Gazing narrowly at her he frowned.

"This isn't a damn comic book. Or a video game. If I start seeing enemies that steadily increase in strength, I'm going to get very annoyed. That's more along the lines of what those idiotic cheerleaders for love and justice or whatever the hell it is that they keep shouting about do. Me, if I see that sort of thing begin to happen, I'm going to immediately find the 'end boss' and slice him, his, or it into lots of little pieces on the spot." Nabiki started giggling, spluttering into her wine. He looked extremely irritated at the suggestion. She could just picture 'Yori' walking up to some huge powerful monster in it's lair, watching it's puppets at work and rubbing it's tentacles together in evil glee, tapping it politely on the shoulder, then finely dicing it with extreme prejudice. Probably vaporising the remains just to be sure, grinning like an idiot in the process.

"We can't do anything at the moment except wait and keep our ears open," Kasumi said calmly, watching them both with a slight smile. "Everyone we know is also looking, sooner or later we'll find the thing and deal with it."

"Are we sure there is still one out there?" her sister asked slowly. "I mean, really sure? Is it possible there were only five prototypes that got out?" The other two exchanged glances.
Eventually Kasumi replied.

"It's not a hundred percent guaranteed, but I think the thought that we got them all is wishful thinking, to be honest. The chances of there not being one left is so small it's not really something we can safely count on. If nothing turns up within the next five months or so, at that point we'll be fairly certain we got the lot. But until the maximum timer period elapses we have to assume all six are in play."

"Damn." Drinking a little more wine, Nabiki put the glass on the table and put her hands over her face, rubbing her tired eyes. A thought struck her, making her look at them. "You told me the one in LA was faulty, and leaking energy. Could it have leaked enough to stop working completely?
What if this last one is bad as well?" Ranma thought about it, scratching the back of his head for a while.

"It could have leaked enough energy to no longer have sufficient to function, certainly. That was one of the possibilities we discussed with Lieutenant Harrison. The problem is that as it leaked it became unstable, which stood as much chance of triggering it as rendering it safe. We got extremely lucky with that one. I think it must have been faulty in several ways, so many people handled it that I'm absolutely astounded one of the booby-traps didn't fire. Sophie, particularly, had it for several days, and spent quite a long time poking it. How she got away with that I have no idea." He shuddered a little at the thought of what could have happened. "The chance that a different one would be bad in just the same way, leak enough energy to be unable to form a portal, and be completely undisturbed in the process is very low, I think. No, Kas is right, we have to assume a fully functional one is still sitting around somewhere with evil intentions."

"Fuck."

"Quite." Finishing his coke he took the glass to the kitchen. As he came back, the front door opened following a knock, Misaki and Fumiko entering. "Hi, guys, got your apartment all set up now?" he asked with a smile. Fumiko nodded, looking happy.

"Pretty much. Just a few books to stick on the shelves and a couple of boxes for the kitchen to unpack. Have you heard from Aiko or Tamiko yet?" Following him back into the living room they sat down, nodding to Nabiki and Kasumi. Misaki produced a banana and began peeling it.

"They were getting some stuff from Tamiko's house, last I heard," he replied, picking up the bottle of wine and waving at them. Both nodded, so he filled a couple of glasses. "Tamiko's parents bought her a few things for her new apartment, she said. I think they want to come and inspect the place. She's trying to put them off without them getting suspicious. She's worried they'll wonder how she can afford something so big."

"Pity she can't just tell them the truth," Nabiki commented, finishing off her wine. Fumiko nodded.

"I know. But it's difficult. You haven't met her parents. They're very nice people, but... kind of traditional. Conservative. They wouldn't be at all keen on the idea of their youngest daughter jumping around rooftops dressed in nothing much being a magical girl." Ranma snickered.

"Around this insane ward being a magical girl practically is traditional," he chuckled. Fumiko laughed.

"That's true enough, but I don't think they'd see it that way." Looking at her curiously, Nabiki had to ask.

"Do your parents know about you two?" Fumiko and Misaki exchanged glances.

"Um, yes and no." At her puzzled expression the other woman sighed. "Dad knows. He wasn't happy about it, but he's got a slightly odd past himself. He found out by accident, in fact, and after a certain amount of shouting we kind of talked him around. Pointing out that it wasn't something we actually looked for, it just kind of found us, and now that it had we were stuck with it, was an argument that actually worked. I know he worries, but he's come to accept it. Deep down I think he's even proud of us." She sipped some wine, glancing at her sister for a moment. "Mom, on the other hand, doesn't know. I think. She's a bit... difficult to read at times. I know Dad has covered for us a lot when we had to suddenly go out under odd circumstances, which so far seems to have worked. Sooner or later she's going to find out, though, she's not stupid. What we'll do then...?" She shrugged.

"We'll work it out when we have to," Misaki said, finishing her banana.

"What about Aiko?" Nabiki asked.

"Her father died several years ago. Cancer of some sort," Fumiko replied. "She doesn't talk about it much. She loved him very much and it hurt her a lot. She's said once or twice that he'd have been proud of her. Her mom knows something's odd about her, but as far as I know not exactly what. She doesn't ask, which is a bit weird, but then she's a very private person herself." Suddenly laughing, she looked like she'd just thought of something. "For all I know she could be a retired magical girl."

"We all seem to have weird parents," Nabiki said, amused.

"Minato and Nerima are full of strange people." Kasumi smiled. "It makes life very interesting."

"That's certainly one way of putting it," Ranma said, grinning widely. His phone rang at that point. Answering it he had a short conversation, then put it away again. "Aiko wanted me to drop the wards so she can teleport in to her apartment." Kasumi nodded.

"We have to finish giving them access so they can do it themselves," she replied. "I think we should set aside some time tomorrow."

"OK." A few minutes later another knock came at the door, followed by the other two girls entering. Both, like their partners, were dressed in normal street clothes. "Everything go all right?"

Aiko dropped next to him with a sigh. "More or less. Her parents are a pain." Tamiko looked slightly offended but after a moment nodded, also sitting.

"Unfortunately true. Mom simply doesn't know the meaning of 'lose the argument'." Aiko rolled her eyes, then looked longingly at the now-empty bottle of wine on the table. Kasumi followed her gaze, smiled, and went to retrieve a full one.

"You can say that again. She just wouldn't stop. Even her husband was looking worn out when we left." Accepting a glass of wine from Kasumi with a smile she drained half of it in one gulp. "Thanks, Kasumi. I really needed that."

"So, what happened, then?" Misaki asked curiously. Tamiko sighed, also taking a glass with a nod of thanks.

"She wouldn't stop asking about seeing my apartment. I couldn't think of any way to get her to back off completely, but I managed to persuade her that I needed a few days to get settled first. I'll just have to think of some way to explain how I can afford something that nice in an area like this before then." She sighed again.

Nabiki thought for a while, then slowly suggested, "Why don't you tell her you're sub-letting it from a friend who's out of the country, or something like that? Someone who has money, but wants their apartment looked after while they're away on business for a longish amount of time." The auburn-haired woman nodded thoughtfully.

"That might work. It would at least give me some breathing space. Once she gets over the initial shock of me moving out she'll probably calm down and won't be so pushy." Aiko looked dubious.

"What if she realizes the rest of us are living here as well?" she asked. "It's going to look a bit weird."

"Don't worry, we can come up with something," Kasumi said soothingly. "Illusion spells, the perception altering techniques, all that will let us show her whatever we need to to satisfy her curiosity. I'm sure it will be fine." Tamiko nodded, sipping her wine, although she didn't look completely convinced.

"OK. We've got a week or so before she gets pushy again, at any rate."

"You could just tell her you have some well-off friends who gave you and your friends the use of expensive apartments and see what happens," Ranma suggested, a small grin on his face. She gave him a look that made him burst out laughing.

"Yeah, no, that's not going to happen," Tamiko said, seeming fairly certain of this.

Kasumi clapped her hands together. "All right, enough of all this. Put the papers away, stop worrying about parents and terrorists, and let's just relax. This is the first time for a week there's nothing desperately important to do. All of you are moved in now, no threats seem to be looming, and the restaurant booking isn't for five hours." She smiled. "Let's go swimming."
Fifteen minutes later, seven mermaids were dashing about the swimming pool with shouts of glee. Surfacing at the shallow end, Nabiki reached for the wine which they'd brought with them. Kasumi floated next to her on her back, smiling gently at the ceiling, waving her tail-fin around in the water. She'd adopted the same mermaid form she'd surprised Nabiki with months ago. Lifting a webbed hand she accepted the glass her sister handed her. "Thank you," she said, sipping it slowly.

Nabiki pulled herself up to sit on the steps moulded into the end of the pool, pouring herself a glass as well. She was beginning to feel pleasantly tipsy after three glasses and decided she should make this the last one until the restaurant. Watching the others leaping about in the deep end she grinned. "This is the purest insanity, but it's really remarkably relaxing," she said, leaning back on her elbows. A vertical fin slowly moved past, making her start humming the theme tune to 'Jaws'. Misaki had requested a mer-form based on a shark of some sort and was amusing herself cruising around just under the surface occasionally grabbing one of the others. Kasumi giggled at the sight.

"I must admit you're right, sister," she replied, moving to sit beside the other woman. She sighed a little. "I do wish we could share this with Akane, though. How is she coming along since Shampoo started training her?" The middle sister smiled happily, flicking her tail in the water.

"Amazingly well, I'm happy to say. I was watching her a couple of days ago, she seems to have learned a surprising amount in less than two weeks. It even seems to be helping her keep her temper better. I guess Ranma was right, the discipline of taking the art seriously does have beneficial effects in other ways." Kasumi appeared relieved.

"Good. I'm very glad to hear that." They watched with amusement as Ranma, who was floating on the surface at the deep end talking to Aiko, suddenly yelped and vanished in a cloud of bubbles, only to reappear leaping half a metre out of the pool like a breaching dolphin. Grinning she dove under again, chasing the other magical girl mermaid around the pool fast enough to leave a visible wake at the surface. Nabiki shook her head again.

"Total insanity." Scratching an itchy scale she slipped into the water and began swimming lengths just above the bottom. Eventually they all congregated at the shallow end, sitting on the edge and talking. Misaki, due to her large dorsal fin, lay on her side. "So, where is this restaurant? The same one we went to that time?" Ranma nodded.

"Yes, we haven't been back since then, it seemed like it was time." Kasumi held up her watch. "Speaking of time, we should get ready, the booking is in a bit over an hour." With a shimmer she regained her normal form, standing and walking over to the towels. The others followed as they changed back. Once they had all showered, changed, and called for a pair of taxis they met up in the lobby. Looking around the group, Kasumi smiled.

"It's nice to have neighbours again."

"Surely you already have neighbours, in the other buildings around here?" Aiko asked.

"Well, yes, I suppose, but we don't really know them very well, oddly enough. People in these apartments tend to keep to themselves, as do we, for obvious reasons. What I meant, I think, is that it's nice to have neighbours we don't have to hide from. People we can trust. Family, basically." The oldest sister looked at the others, who seemed pleased.

Soon the taxis arrived and they left, 'Maiko', Misaki, and Fumiko in one, the others in the second car. The drive to the restaurant passed quietly, as did the meal itself. The group spent several hours enjoying a very good meal, then went on to a club for another couple of hours. Arriving back at the apartment building late that night, everyone except 'Maiko' was quite tipsy. Nabiki was flat-out drunk, to the point that in the end her sister sighed a little and slung her over her shoulder. Giggling and watching the world go past upside-down, Nabiki waved to the others as 'Rika' carried her into the building.

"She seems happy enough," Tamiko said, hiccuping, as she staggered in after them. 'Maiko' grinned.

"True. But she's going to regret it in the morning..."

"Gaahhh!" Nabiki stared at the ceiling, wincing at the throbbing pain in her head. Her own whimper set up unpleasant resonances that made the headache worse. "Oh, god," she whispered, blinking very loudly. The light from the window seemed to be pulsating in the corner of her vision.
"I have to stop doing this," the brunette mumbled to herself, waiting for the world to stop spinning, or at least slow down enough she stood a chance of getting back on. That took quite a long time.
Eventually she managed to sit up without throwing up, grabbing her head and holding it in place so it didn't fall off. A knock on the door was followed by her sister opening it, holding a large glass of water and smiling sympathetically at her.

"I could feel your pain from the kitchen," Kasumi said, walking over and handing her the glass.
"Here, drink this, you're dehydrated." As the middle sister drained the glass, Kasumi put a hand on her head. A feeling of relief passed quickly over her, the throbbing ache and nausea diminishing rapidly.

"Thanks, sis," Nabiki croaked, finishing off the water. "That's pretty effective." It was the first time she'd experienced her sister's healing abilities first-hand. "A damn sight faster and more efficient than painkillers."

"Safer, too," Kasumi said, smiling at her, before sitting next to her on the bed. "Did you have a nice time last night?"

"I think so," Nabiki replied, handing her the glass. "As far as I can remember. I may have had a little too much to drink." Kasumi giggled.

"That's a distinct possibility." After a moment, she asked, "Do you feel well enough for breakfast?"

"Yes, surprisingly. What time is it?"

"Just after nine AM. We all slept rather late. The coffee is on, it should be ready in a few minutes.
Come out when you're ready." Standing, she smiled at her sister and left the room. Nabiki stretched widely, then scratched her head, mussing her hair, before standing and opening one of the drawers of the dresser on the other side of the room. She stayed over enough that she'd taken to keeping several sets of clothing there. Heading for the bathroom in a robe and carrying clean clothes, she got ready for the day. Soon she was sitting at the table talking to Ranma and drinking her first cup of coffee. Kasumi brought the food out of the kitchen and they all began eating.

"By the way, Nabiki, here," Ranma said to her, producing a key-card and handing it to her. She took it and looked curiously at it, twitching a little at the tingle that went through her hand.

"What's this for?" she asked. He grinned.

"The front door." At her look of surprise he laughed. "You're here often enough you might as well have official access. We trust you. When we change the wards later we'll add you to the authorised access list."

"I'm not a magic-user. How will that work?" she asked, puzzled.
"Well, you're not a magic-user yet. I intend to sort that out one day. But, true, you won't be able to control them like we can, although you'll have access to the building. The ward system on this place is incredibly complicated and powerful, it's the best Kas, I, and Happosai could do between us. We're constantly updating and modifying it, not to mention pushing power into it on a regular basis. By now they're probably the most powerful wards on the planet. This place could take a direct hit from a tactical nuke. The spells are so complicated it's almost sentient." Nabiki looked slightly appalled as well as impressed. "Once we add you to the list you'll be able to come and go even without magic. The wards will recognise you and let you through."

"What would happen if someone tried to force me to give them access to the building," she asked curiously. "Not that it's likely, but just wondering." He laughed.

"Well, lets say that it wouldn't end well for them. You'd get through, but someone with hostile intent, not so much. This place can defend itself pretty effectively even without us around." Feeling suddenly slightly nervous, Nabiki looked around. Reaching out she patted the wall beside her.

"Nice building." Kasumi giggled.

"Don't worry, it likes you." Her sister looked oddly at her causing her to giggle again.

Once they'd cleared breakfast away, the three of them talked for a while. Half an hour later Aiko knocked at the front door, entering followed by the others. "Hi, guys. Right on time." Ranma looked pleased. "Come on, let's go into the practice room. Access is easiest from there." They followed him into the huge room, then watched as he and Kasumi walked to the middle and faced each other. They concentrated for a few seconds, then everyone else gaped as a massively complicated tracery of light slowly faded into existence around them. It looked like a series of nested, highly magnified snow crystals, rendered in multicoloured glowing lines. Somehow it gave the distinct impression of being much larger than the room, even though it was contained within it. The thing was actually rather difficult to look at.

"Good grief," Aiko muttered. "I knew the spells on this place were complicated, but..." She shook her head in awe. "I've never seen anything remotely like that before."

"It's pretty cool, isn't it?" Ranma said with a smile. "Right, you first, Aiko. Stand over there, please." He pointed to a spot on the floor where a gap in the multi-dimensional pattern outlined a circle a metre across. Hesitantly, the short brunette walked over to the indicated spot, watching wide-eyed as the spell pattern in front of her moved as she approached, leaving a path for her. Once she was in the correct position it closed around her again. "OK, hold still. This will tingle a bit but it's safe." The pattern surrounding her moved in several different directions simultaneously, changing colour, with tendrils reaching out and touching her head.

"Ick. That feels really weird. Like it's looking at the inside of my mind." She shook her head slightly.

"Basically, it is. It's learning who you are in a way that's essentially impossible to fool. Don't move for a moment." She froze, grimacing at the itching inside her brain, which abruptly stopped. A faint chime sounded from somewhere, sounding like it was kilometres away and inside her head at the same time. "Right. Your pattern is accepted as an authorised user." Ranma smiled at her. "That's it. You can go back. Tamiko, you're next." The auburn-haired girl grinned and took Aiko's place.

One at a time all four magical girls were added to the ward control pattern. Eventually it was Nabiki's turn. She looked slightly worried, but her sister's serene smile persuaded her it was all right. "Don't worry, sister, it doesn't hurt."
"It feels very odd, though," Fumiko said, rubbing the side of her head. Shooting her a curious glance, Nabiki shrugged and took her place. The pattern closed around her, the tendrils of light making contact with her head. Once more the pattern changed shape and colour.

The sensations were extremely strange. She felt dizzy for a moment, then there was the sense of a large presence in her head, like some sort of enormous, incredibly powerful and dangerous animal, that nevertheless was friendly and safe. She smiled a little. It was weird, but somehow comforting. She imagined it was like having a guard dog the size of a bus leaning gently against her, or possibly a guard tyrannosaur, it felt about that relative size. The pattern surrounding her changed a few times, before the chime came again. Ranma looked at the ward spell with a raised eyebrow, then exchanged a glance with his wife, who looked curiously back.

"That's... interesting," he said slowly, inspecting parts of it carefully. After a moment he returned his attention to Nabiki who was watching with curiosity. "Ah, Nabiki? Did you feel anything... odd... just then?" She laughed.

"What about it wasn't odd?" He smiled a little.

"Fair enough. I mean, OK, describe what you felt." She tried to put it into words.

"There was sort of a presence. Not an intelligence, really, more like a loving pet, but one about the size of a truck. It felt like it leaned against me, just a little, kind of looked me over and decided I was someone it liked." His other eyebrow went up.

"Hmm. Can you still feel it?" She nodded.

"Not as strongly, but yes, it's kind of in the back of my mind. It's difficult to describe."

"That's fine, I understand. OK. Stay there a moment." He turned to Kasumi and nodded, both of them concentrating again. The visible pattern faded away. After a few seconds the room looked normal once more, no sign of the manifestation now present. Turning back to her he inspected her for a few seconds.

"Can you still feel it?" Once more she nodded.

"Yep. What is it?" Studying her with interest, he shrugged.

"The wards, basically. The system accepted you to a much deeper level than we expected. I told you the thing was practically sentient. Think of it a bit like a magical computer program. It's not really smart in the sense of a living thing, not in the normal way, but it's so complicated it replicates some of the functions you'd normally associate with a life-form. That wasn't the intention, but it's not uncommon with extremely complex spells. They kind of take on a life of their own, an... intent, I suppose. The intent of this one is protection. People it knows, it protects. Inside this building you're safer than probably anywhere on the planet." He stopped for a moment. Nabiki looked slightly worried.

"What does all that mean for me?" He grinned.

"Well, it shows I was right when I said you'd most likely be very good at ki and magic manipulation. You must have a pretty strong latent ability for it to link so strongly into you like that. It knows you from all the time you've spent here, and like Kas said, it likes you." Nabiki glanced at her sister, who smiled.

"I wasn't joking."
"Now, we've essentially officially introduced you. It would have accepted you anyway, that's the point of adding you to the list, but normally only someone like us or the girls here would get so strong a reaction. You're not trained in ki or magic, so the usual result would have been what I said earlier, you'd be able to pass through the ward but not control it. I'm not so sure that applies now." He inspected her again, walking around her with interest. "No, it's linked as deeply into you as the others. Fascinating. I didn't expect that, but it's good." Stepping back he grinned. "We really have to start teaching you some of the ki exercises. Your ki reserves have been growing steadily for months." She stared at him.

"Um, what are you talking about? I don't know any of the martial arts you said were necessary for all that sort of thing."

Well, like I said ages ago, that's not strictly true. You have a good working knowledge of a lot of the theory from your family style and your early lessons, not to mention what you've probably picked up from watching us. I still think your inherent talent might be nearly as good as Kas'. Much better than Akane. You just lack the practical experience. But that aside, there are a lot of things that can build up ki. Martial arts are the approach I know well, and have the experience with, but magic use can as well. And, I'm beginning to think, exposure to magic. At least the right sort. Ours, basically." Looking at her with an evaluating expression, he nodded to himself. The others watched and listened with interest.

"Hmm. An experiment. Turn around." After a moment, she did so. "Right. Close your eyes." Once again she followed his instructions. There was silence for a moment, then a sudden feeling washed through her, making her duck violently, then lean to the side, dropping to one knee.

"What the fuck?" she yelled, spinning around and jumping back. Everyone was staring when she opened her eyes. Ranma was standing half a metre away from her, having approached silently, a low-powered ki blade a metre long coming from his hand. Unusually it wasn't making any noise at all. "What did you do?" she demanded.

He grinned at her. "Proved a point. Why did you move like that?" She shrugged angrily.

"I don't know. Something told me to." Kasumi walked over and looked at her, then turned to her husband.

"That was very interesting," she commented. He nodded.

"What was very interesting?" her sister demanded. The elder sister smiled at the younger one.

"Ranma tried poking you with the energy sword. It's only low powered, it's safe, but your reaction was extremely interesting. You moved away from it without being able to see it or knowing it was there." Nabiki stared at her.

"Really?" She nodded.

"Yes. What did you feel?"

The younger Tendo thought for a moment. "It's weird. There was just this feeling that something was coming at me really fast and I needed to move out of the way. Three times. I couldn't help myself, I just reacted." Kasumi smiled.

"Indeed. You avoided it perfectly. Oh, he'd have hit you easily if he'd wanted to, you're nowhere near fast enough yet to keep up at full speed, but you moved much faster than almost any untrained person could possibly manage. It was quite impressive." She looked pleased. Nabiki slowly shook her head.

"I still don't understand."

Ranma dismissed the energy blade. "Come on, let's go and sit down and I'll see if I can explain." Soon, she was holding a mug of coffee and listening with interest, the others also sitting on the sofa around her. "Right. As I see it, you have a strong talent for this sort of thing, like Kasumi does, and I do. Akane does as well but to a much lesser degree, I'm afraid. You haven't had as much training as Kasumi, or Akane for that matter, but when you were young all three of you had quite a lot of exposure to some unusual martial arts. That started all of you on the path towards mastering ki, amongst other things. Environment shaping talent, I guess. Akane is close to topping out her ki level, although she has a long way to go before she masters being able to use what she has as efficiently as she can. She could become a lot better at it even though her raw power level won't go vastly higher. We talked about this some time ago." Nabiki nodded, sipping her coffee and listening intently.

"Kasumi and I are still increasing in power. We haven't hit our upper limits of raw power storage yet, wherever those end up being. I suspect our magic use has increased those limits very significantly, and vice versa. They compliment each other in some way I still don't fully understand. Aiko and the others here are similarly growing rapidly in power output, for the same reason. I think that exposure to our magic, and the version of ki we use, has had a sort of catalytic effect on your own abilities, even in the absence of formal training. It's... well, I guess its given your own body a kind of pattern to latch on to, which once it goes past a certain point is self-sustaining. The power level will probably continue to steadily increase, although I'd suspect that without the training it will top out at a much lower level than it could otherwise reach. Still much higher than other people could normally manage though. You don't have the knowledge yet to really use it, but the ward system can connect to it. That's why it linked so strongly to you."

Nodding slowly, the middle sister pondered what she'd been told. Tamiko looked at Ranma. "Does that mean that Akane could also learn your magic system and increase in power?" He thought for a while.

"I'm not sure. It's possible, I suppose. Her inherent ki limits are much lower than ours, or yours for that matter, so she'd certainly never reach the level we have or you will. But I guess it would be possible that she'd go past the level she's otherwise limited to. At the moment I'm not sure that would be a good thing. One day, perhaps, we should look into that, but until she overcomes the problems she still has I think she'd struggle with it, never mind whether it would be a good idea in the first place." The other woman nodded thoughtfully.

"I see."

He turned back to Nabiki. "When I tried the ki blade on you your own abilities, as untrained as they are, warned you something was threatening you. You reacted to it. It also seems to be boosting your speed noticeably. That's the sort of thing we do all the time, it's one of the first uses you learn for ki, normally without really realising it unless you're specifically being taught how. A lot of martial artists can use it to one degree or another although most of them never know what they're doing. It's kind of instinctive when you get to the right level. I think you're basically at that level now, even though you haven't consciously been learning martial arts, you've started using some of the techniques subconsciously. It's very interesting." Studying her for a moment, he held out his hand and formed a ki ball. "Can you feel anything when I do this?" She looked at the sky-blue energy ball in his hand and nodded slowly.

"Yes. There's sort of a fizzing sensation in my head. I thought that was normal when you were using your energy manipulations?" He looked quizzically at her. "I mean, I've felt that before. All the way back to when you made the crater in the park with that first monster. It felt like my head was full of soda, it fizzed so much. It was almost painful." Ranma and Kasumi exchanged glances.

"No, that's not normal," he said, raising an eyebrow. "Not for the average person in the street. They might feel something with so much energy output, but it would just be a momentary discomfort, a sort of mental pressure. What you're describing is much more unusual. To pick up the output from such a small amount of energy you'd need to really be quite sensitive." After a moment, he grinned. "Here, catch." Flipping her the ball of energy he looked amused as she squeaked and frantically grabbed instinctively at it.

"Holy crap!" she yelped, suddenly finding herself holding an orange sized ball of ki. It sat in her hand as if it had real mass, although there was no weight to it. He laughed, as she slowly relaxed when it didn't blow her hand off her wrist. "What the hell did you do that for?" she demanded, staring at it in fascination. Her hand tingled, in a manner that was almost relaxing.

"Trying to prove something. Right, hold your hand steady in front of you. Yes, like that. Now, tell me what you feel." She alternated glancing at him and the ki ball, concentrating on keeping her hand still.

"It tingles. Like a slight electric shock, but not painful."

"OK, good. That's my ki, I'm keeping it stable. That's why it's safe for someone else to handle. I did the same thing for Serena in LA, although this one doesn't have as much energy in it. Now, I'm very slowly going to pass control over to you. Tell me what you feel as I do." Slightly worried, Nabiki nodded, looking at him and her sister next to him. Kasumi didn't seem too concerned. Aiko, who was sitting next to her, shuffled slightly further away, grinning when Nabiki glared at her.

"Just in case."

"Thanks for the vote of confidence," she snapped, returning her attention to the ki ball in her hand. Aiko giggled. "OK, it's tingling more. A lot more. Ow, that's kind of painful now." Ranma nodded as she spoke, then the tingling backed off a little.

"Good. How's that?"

"Better. Not painful, but pretty intense."

"OK. Now, concentrate on it. Feel it. Try to see it, inside your head. Close your eyes if it helps." The brunette followed his instructions, staring at the ball of translucent light, then closing her eyes and trying to sort out the weird feelings it produced in her. Slowly she became aware of the energy from the 'inside' as it were, a very odd feeling. It made her hand warm, like holding it in the sun, but cold at the same time, like water was running over it. It was a very strange mix of sensations. After some time she felt she could almost see the ball with her eyes shut, shimmering and glowing in the darkness behind her eyelids. "Can you feel it?" She nodded slowly, looking slightly puzzled and also intrigued.

"This is a very strange thing," she said quietly. Opening her eyes she looked at the ball and gasped, nearly dropping it. It had changed colour to a pale green. Ranma grinned.

"Very impressive. You picked that up a lot faster than I did."

"What's going on?" she asked faintly. He laughed, while Kasumi smiled proudly.

"That's all your ki. My energy was the trigger, but now you're supplying it all. I transferred control over to you while you were concentrating on it. See how long you can hold it.” Staring at the energy ball with fascination she lifted it closer to her face, inspecting it closely. There seemed to be an internal structure to it that was slowly rotating, layers of complexity she'd never expected but could actually feel.

"Wow," she mumbled, gazing at the thing in her hand. Tamiko glanced at Aiko, who raised an eyebrow herself. "How is this possible?" she asked, looking sideways at Ranma. He smiled a little.

"Well, like I said, you have quite a talent for energy manipulation. That's been obvious for some time. Linking to the wards has probably boosted that a bit, it kind of unblocked some pathways in the same way a year or two of advanced martial arts, or our form of it anyway, would have done.
Gave you a jump on the whole process, in a way. You'll still need a lot of training to get good at it, but this is a start. I provided you with a... seed, or pattern, with that ki ball. Transferring the control slowly to you let you work out how to keep it stable by following my pattern. Whether you can produce it from cold at this point I'm not sure, I kind of doubt it, but it wouldn't take much practice to get to that level. Although clearly, once it's running you can stabilise it perfectly well."
Impressed with herself, feeling slightly faint at the possibilities, she looked at the thing in her hand then back at him.

"So, what does this really mean?" He shrugged.

"It's final proof that you have what it takes to learn ki control, special techniques using it, and most likely our magical system. It also gives me some ideas on how to do that without the martial arts mastery, although I'd highly recommend that even so. You get a lot out of it other than the fighting abilities, and it would make the ki control much easier to learn. That said, I'm pretty sure I can teach you some interesting things pretty effectively without it. The ki ball should be easy, you're most of the way there already. Hidden weapons should be possible with some work although it won't be easy. The ki beam needs considerable power and experience, the energy blades even more, but that's still within your reach I'd think. Ki reinforcement of strength, speed, endurance, that sort of thing, that's easy by comparison, and will tend to happen more or less automatically as you practice." Her mind whirling with the sudden possibilities, Nabiki almost dropped the ki ball in her hand. As her attention drifted from it the manifestation swelled, dimmed, then guttered out with a faint hiss.

"Aww. I screwed it up." She scowled at her hand. Kasumi giggled.

"Don't worry. That was extremely impressive for a first attempt. Much better than I managed, even with help." Misaki grinned at her, biting into an apple with a crunch.

"It's very good. None of us can do that yet."

Ranma looked at her with interest. "See if you can bring it back. Concentrate on the feeling you had when it was in your hand." She did as requested, but aside from a transient slight glow in the palm of her hand and an incipient headache nothing happened. He looked slightly disappointed but unsurprised. "I didn't think that would work, but it was worth a try. Let me think about it for a while, I'll come up with some exercises for you to practice. I don't think it will take long to get you to a point you can produce a ki ball like that easily."

"I can't believe it's something I could learn to do," Nabiki said, still staring at her hand. He laughed.

"I've been telling you for nearly a year."

"I know, but it sounded so crazy. But, then, everything surrounding you guys is crazy. I guess it was only a matter of time before I got infected." Grinning at him she picked up her coffee and finished it off.

"OK, let's leave that for the moment. On to the wards. We'll show you guys how to control them. The first part is how to open a hole for teleporting. You'll be most interested, Aiko, but the rest of you should learn as well. It's easiest if we demonstrate, it's not the sort of thing you can explain." They all nodded. "Pay attention to the feeling of the wards. Got it?" One by one then all nodded slowly. "Right, I'm going to open a hole. Remember what I do, you should be able to feel it." All of them could sense something happening. After a moment there was a sensation almost like a window was open somewhere not very well defined.

"Weird," Aiko said curiously, her eyes shut and her head cocked to the side. "Do that again." He did so.

"See what I did?"

"I think so. Let me try." It took her a few attempts but she managed in the end. When she got it wrong there was the sensation of polite refusal from the ward system, which almost seemed regretful that it couldn't comply. "Very weird. OK, I think I have it."

"That's it," Kasumi said, watching the energy patterns change. "Tamiko, you try it." The auburn-haired girl got it on the third attempt, having seen where her friend and team-mate was going wrong. Fumiko and Misaki both got it immediately. Turning to her sister, Kasumi smiled. "You try, Nabiki." Looking at her curiously, the middle sister tentatively attempted to duplicate what she'd felt, becoming rather surprised when the ward system almost eagerly accepted the wordless request.

"Hey, it worked!" she yelped, somewhat shocked. Kasumi laughed.

"Of course. Like I keep saying, it likes you."

"This is so weird," Nabiki replied with a grin.

"OK, that's the first part." Ranma smiled at them, then he and his wife took them through a number of mental exercises that taught them several useful things about the ward system. They learned how to use it to sense an attack on the building, block certain rooms from access in either direction, even control the internal defences which turned out to be rather formidable.

"Holy crap, Ranma," Aiko muttered as she studied what her magic senses were telling her. "I had no idea this system was so dangerous." He laughed slightly.

"You weren't meant to. That's kind of the point. You guys have always been trusted guests, so you didn't even really notice the system, and it allowed you in and out. The anti-teleport system is always running as is the surveillance blocking stuff, but the defences would only kick in if this place or one of us was attacked. If that happened, well, it would take something pretty incredible to get through. Most threats would cease to exist fairly quickly."

"I'll say. The amount of power here is horrifying."

Kasumi smiled. "In many ways it's a huge magical battery. All the ward users can pump power into it, which gets stored for future use. We've been pushing power into the system for nearly four years now. It will take a small amount from you lot as well, which is how it keeps contact with you, but you can push more in if you want. You don't have to, though. You can also pull power out in an emergency."
"What's the distance you can connect to it over?" Fumiko asked curiously. Ranma shrugged a little.

"I'm not entirely sure. Certainly, once you're connected to it, probably anywhere on the planet. It may well work for you through portals. It does for us. Up until now we've been the only ones using it, plus Happosai of course, but he's not around very much at the moment. We'll have to experiment a bit. With so many more people added in the complexity of the system will increase which will probably add some interesting effects."

Nabiki looked at them. "Do we all have equal access to it?" The martial artist smiled a little and shook his head.

"Not quite. Kas and I, and Happosai, have what in computer terms would be super-user access. We created it, and it knows it. You're all at a slightly lower level. We could override your access but not the other way around. Not that we would. We'll add information to it that designates your apartments as personal space, which will have their own sub-wards that only you can control. We could only access them in a real emergency. Is that all right?" The four girls exchanged glances, then nodded.

"That's fine, Ranma," Aiko said. "We trust you. This is your building after all. And your home." Kasumi smiled at her.

"It's your home as well. We trust all of you completely or we wouldn't have invited you to live here in the first place. All of this is just the way the system is set up. We were being very careful and paranoid when we designed it." The shorter woman grinned.

"We know. Don't worry, we don't mind."

Ranma turned to his sister-in-law again. "The key-card I gave you has a spell on it as well, you'll find it almost impossible to lose. That one cost us quite a lot. It keyed to you when I gave it to you." She nodded.

"That was what the tingle I felt was?"

"Yes. It's locked permanently to you now. No one else can use it."

"Cool." She pulled it out of her pocket and looked at it for a moment, then put it away again.

"Just run it through the reader, you know the process." Looking at her watch, Nabiki stood.

"I'm going to have to go in a minute. My first class of the new semester starts in an hour."

"I'll jump you over there, Nabiki," Aiko offered.

"Thanks." She headed to her room to pack. When she came back carrying her bag she found Aiko had changed into her uniform.

"I'll work out some exercises for you, Nabiki," Ranma said, smiling at her from the sofa. "In the mean time, when you're in private and have some spare time, it wouldn't hurt to see if you can recreate that ki ball. I don't know whether it will work or not, but even trying will help build your ki control. When you do get it, you'll progress pretty quickly." He grinned. "We'll have you storing entire roomfuls of stuff away in ki pockets by the end of the summer."

Laughing, she waved to him and the others, then she and Aiko vanished with the usual flash.
Staring at her hand and the small greenish ball of light sitting in it, Nabiki slowly sat up on her bed. Risking looking away for a moment she glanced around her small dormitory apartment, noticing the way the otherwise dark room was lit by a flickering illumination from the ki manifestation in her hand, then returned her attention to it. "Holy crap," she mumbled. "I did it. I can't believe it." She'd been intermittently trying to recreate the feeling she'd had the time Ranma had walked her through the process a couple of weeks ago, managing to produce small flashes of light and short-lived glows, but nothing stable. Yet, suddenly, something had sort of clicked and it all came together. Now she had an egg-sized ball of light sitting on her palm.

Wide-eyed, she lifted her hand to her face and inspected it carefully from a few inches away. The internal structure of the thing was more complex than she'd ever realised from watching the others, something she found fascinating. Raising her other hand she gently tipped the ball into it, watching with a grin as it rolled around like it was a physical object. "Holy crap," she said again. Growing more confident she passed it from hand to hand, then started tossing it into the air and catching it. Her experimentation came to an abrupt end when she fumbled the catch and the ki ball dropped to the floor, where it exploded with a sharp crack that made the windows rattle.

"Oh, shit!" she yelped, looking at the scorch mark on the carpet. A small amount of smoke rose from it, along with a smell of burnt plastic, causing her to dive for the window and quickly swing it open, hoping that the smoke detector wouldn't go off. It was about eleven at night, the chaos of a sudden fire alarm would be extremely embarrassing. Luckily the smoke drifted away without triggering anything untoward. Slowly relaxing, she stared at the carpet. 'There goes my deposit on this place. I wonder what I can say caused that!' A knock on the door made her jump violently, then look guilty. Standing she moved to the door and slowly opened it, to see a girl she knew from across the hall looking at her with mild worry.

"Hey, Nabiki. What on earth was that noise? It sounded like an explosion! Are you all right?" She smiled a little.

"I'm fine, Miki. I knocked over a lamp and the bulb broke. It was quite loud." The short-haired girl sniffed.

"Smells like something got burned. Are you sure everything is OK?"

"Yes, the carpet got a little scorched though. It stinks. I'm going to have to clean it up now, which is a pain, before I can go to sleep." Miki smiled sleepily.

"All right. I was just a little worried, that's all. Good night."

"Night, Miki. Thanks for being concerned." The girl headed back to her room and Nabiki closed the door again, leaning against it and feeling relieved that she'd been able to come up with a believable story on the fly. 'I hope no one else heard it,' she mused, kneeling down and looking at the carpet, which was definitely the worse for wear. A spot some ten centimetres across was badly burned, almost crumbling to dust, while around it a blackened ring stretched another ten centimetres or so. The floor under the carpet seemed mostly intact although blackened as well. 'Ick. That's kind of scary, I don't think that had any power at all in it compared to what Ranma and Kasumi can manage, but look at the damage. That would really hurt if someone got in the way.' Thinking about it, she shook her head slowly. 'I did that. All by myself. I can't believe it.' Gradually, a huge grin spread across her face.
Soun watched with Genma as his youngest daughter jumped back and forth across the floor of the Dojo, deflecting the blows Shampoo was raining down on her with precision and grace. Wincing a little as a kick got through and nailed her in the ribs, he then smiled as she grabbed the other young woman's leg, using it as leverage to spin her through the air and into the wall. Shampoo caught herself mid-flip, bouncing off the wall and back into the fight, smiling slightly. He turned to his old friend.

"I'm very impressed. Some of those moves are remarkable. She's improved a lot in the last few weeks." Genma nodded, watching the sparring with a practised eye.

"Yes. I have to say, my friend, I would never have thought a year ago that she would ever reach this level." He glanced at Soun slightly apologetically. "You understand why." The other man nodded, returning his gaze to the match.

"I do. Very much so. What those two girls did for her is... incredible. Not to diminish the work my daughter has put in herself in any way, but without Yori and Chou I very much doubt she'd ever have gotten this good. She has a long way to go, I think, but I also think she could become very good indeed. Shampoo seems to be improving as well, she was getting rusty." Genma laughed.

"I think that was the whole idea behind Cologne suggesting this. The girl needed a sparring partner, so she arranged to make one. I'm surprised that the old woman would trust Akane with these techniques, but impressed with how well she's learning." They watched as the two young women traded blows for a few minutes, before Shampoo suddenly accelerated to a much higher speed and took Akane down easily, pinning her on the mat. The youngest Tendo winced a little, then indicated submission. Standing Shampoo offered her a hand and pulled her to her feet.

"Well done. You've got that set of moves running very smoothly now, we just need to work on your speed. Once you master that we can learn the next set." Akane grinned, picking a towel off the bench along the wall and wiping the sweat from her face, tossing Shampoo another one with her other hand.

"I still can't believe how much faster than me you can go," she replied, picking up a bottle of water and unscrewing the cap. Shampoo laughed.

"I've been doing this since I was about six or seven. I've got a lot of years practice on you, but trust me, you're picking it up well. I was the village champion, you remember. There aren't a lot of people who could beat me, even as out of practice as I've let myself become." Akane nodded, smiling, as she drained the bottle. "Great Grandmother wants to see how you're coming along at some point in the next couple of weeks. Lets work on getting those sequences quicker, that should impress her. A few more months like this and I think she'll teach you some of the special techniques. Those are fun." Looking pleased, Akane nodded. A sound from the doorway attracted her attention and she looked over to see Nabiki leaning there, grinning at her.

"I only caught the last few seconds of that, but it looks like you're getting pretty good, sis," the older woman said, straightening up and walking over to them. She nodded to Shampoo, who smiled back, then looked very slightly puzzled as she inspected the elder Tendo sister. After a moment she shook her head a little, dismissing whatever she thought she'd felt.

"She's coming along very well, Nabiki," the Chinese woman said, looking pleased. "Faster than I'd hoped, in fact. It's a pity she couldn't have begun this training ten years ago, she might have ended up almost as good as I am!" Grinning at her friend, she giggled when Akane rolled her eyes, then smiled. Nabiki snickered.
"Well, there were extenuating circumstances..."

"OK, girls, push off now, we need the Dojo for classes," Soun said with a grin as he came over followed by Genma. "The students will be here soon." Akane nodded, smiling at him. "Well done, by the way, Akane. I'm very proud of your progress." She looked pleased, grinning at the praise, before she and Shampoo turned and left. Nabiki watched them go, then turned to her father.

"She's definitely becoming quite good from what I saw," she said. Soun nodded, also watching as the two women left the Dojo.

"Yes. I'm both proud and impressed." He looked at his middle daughter, smiling. "How are your own studies going? Are you back for long?"

"They're going very well, and just for the weekend. I needed a break, I haven't been home for over a month. How are your classes going?" Soun turned to watch as his students began to arrive.

"Very well. We haven't picked up any more students since Christmas, but there have been one or two enquiries. To be honest, this is probably the most we can handle right now, but as they learn we'll be able to take on a few more. Mariko is really becoming quite good. She's got a lot of promise. That young lad Kyo also shows signs of some real talent if he keeps at it. He's not as strong as he should be yet but he's remarkably quick." Genma went over to the group of students and began talking to them, explaining the lesson plans for the day. Turning back to his daughter the Tendo elder smiled again. "It's nice to see you, daughter. I need to get to work now, but we'll talk later." Nabiki nodded, smiling back, then walked toward the door. Soun watched her go with an affectionate look, tempered with slight puzzlement. There was something very slightly different about her he couldn't quite put his finger on...

After a moment he shrugged, chalking it up to his imagination, then walked over to his friend and their students. Soon they were involved in the lesson.

"That's it. Now, put your hands like this, near your waist. Yes, like that. It's not essential, but it helps focus it at this point. Put a little more power in, yep, that's good. Now, push your hands out and concentrate on forcing the energy towards the target." The orange-sized ball of green ki shot across the room and hit the pile of steel plates with a loud bang, leaving a slightly glazed spot and a curl of vapour. "Perfect. Very good indeed. The energy output isn't huge yet, but it's not bad at all for only two months practice." Ranma grinned at his sister-in-law, who grinned back, impressed with herself.

"I still can't believe I can do that," she burbled, full of joy at her own growing abilities. Ranma laughed.

"I know what you mean. I felt the same way when I first worked it out. It took a long time before I just took it for granted, and even now sometimes I find myself wondering how things got to this point. It's pretty weird." He studied her for a moment. "How do you feel? Tired, depleted at all?" She thought for a moment, probing her own ki levels in the manner she'd slowly learned over the past few weeks.

"Well, I can feel the difference. But it's not huge. I could do that quite a few times before it really took it out of me." Nodding, he smiled.

"Good. That agrees with what I can sense. It's important not to deplete your reserves too much, you need that energy, it is after all your own life. If at all possible try never to let it drop below about half what you start with, unless you have a real emergency. When you get more practice I'll show you techniques for pulling ki from the environment to replenish your reserves, which can speed up the recharging, but at this point it's more important to learn how to manipulate what you already have naturally. Now, let's try that again a few times. You've got the precision but we need to speed the process up, you're still too slow. Then we can go upstairs and join the others in the practice room for the breathing and visualisation exercises." Nabiki nodded, turning to face the practice target again. A few seconds later the room rang to the sound of another ki shot hitting the target.

Eventually she turned back to him. "That's it. I'm starting to feel it now."

"OK. That was very good. You've speeded up quite a bit. A few more sessions then we can work on increasing the power a bit." Nodding, Nabiki looked thoughtful.

"I have a question." He looked at her with a raised eyebrow. "I've been looking at the ki ball, or more specifically the internal structure of it." Now he looked slightly puzzled.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, I noticed that first time that the ball is more than just a ball, it's quite a complicated three dimensional structure. It reminded me of something, so I did a little research. The nearest thing I can find to what I can see in it is the sort of complex magnetic field structure that is being researched as a method of creating a stable fusion reactor, in what they call a tokomak. It's not identical, and clearly it's not a magnetic field, but there are similarities." He was nodding slowly.

"OK, I can see that. I have to admit, I never really thought of that before, but now you mention it there is a similarity. I remember seeing a TV program on that subject last year sometime."

"I saw the same one, that's what gave me the idea. Anyway, I was wondering if it was possible that the internal energy structure could be modified?" Leaning against one of the pillars in the basement Ranma studied her with interest.

"To what end?" She waved a hand slightly, trying to put into words what she'd been puzzling over.

"I'm not completely sure. But I have this nagging feeling that it might be useful. Look, the amount of energy in the ki ball is something you can control, right?" He nodded. "The damage you can cause with it is down to the amount of energy. But, it's also down to the energy density, as far as I can work out. Like, for instance, a brick moving at one speed and a bullet moving at a much higher speed could have the same total energy, but the bullet will cause more damage in a smaller area specifically because that energy is applied over that smaller area." He nodded again, slowly and thoughtfully.

"Interesting. Once again, I didn't think of it in those terms. But it makes sense. Hmm." Holding out his hand he produced a small ki ball and inspected it closely. "I've noticed the structure inside it before, it's difficult not to when you're using your own life energy, after all. But I didn't really give it a lot of thought. Perhaps I should have. It's all patterns, like our magic is, after all. Everything is ultimately a pattern in energy, even matter." He grinned at her. "Physics becomes metaphysics, in a way. Even though magic and physics only have a nodding acquaintance at best." She laughed, then watched as he studied the ki ball on his hand.

"I wonder..." he mumbled, looking at it, then half-closed his eyes. "Hmm. OK, yes, perhaps if I..."
After a moment the ball shivered and began to shrink. Nabiki watched wide-eyed. "Wow. That's interesting." The shrinkage continued, the ball glowing brighter and brighter, until it was a pinprick of brilliant blue-white light that was eye-searingly bright. Shading her eyes Nabiki squinted at it.
She could feel that the total energy was basically the same but it radiated danger in a way that the original ball didn't. "Now that is interesting," Ranma mused, staring at it for a moment. Turning he faced the target plates, then over his shoulder, said, "Stand behind me," waiting until Nabiki was directly behind him peering around his body before he fired the tiny ki ball at the target.

It screeched across the room with a high-pitched whine, disappearing inside the top plate and leaving a hole a couple of millimetres across. Almost instantly there was a huge bang, causing the top plate to bulge, then slowly tip forwards, crashing to the concrete floor with an echoing boom that shook the entire basement and made dust dribble from the ceiling. Both of them slammed their hands over their ears as the echoes died away.

"Holy shit!" Nabiki squeaked. Ranma muttered to himself, walking over and staring at the thick steel plate on the floor. There was a substantial crater on the back of it where the compressed ki ball had exploded, showing signs of extreme heat, with splashes of molten steel sprayed outwards from it.

"That was impressive," he said quietly. Turning to his sister-in-law, he grinned. "Congratulations. You just came up with your first special technique." She stared at him.

"You're the one who just blew up half the basement."

"But it was your idea. Therefore it's your technique." Laughing, he squatted down and easily picked the ton-plus plate up, returning it to it's original position. "Now, we just have to make sure you can use it." Motioning her back to the start position, he asked her to form a ki ball again.

"Right. Now, feel the internal structure. Got it?" She nodded. "OK, what I did was basically squeeze it. It took a couple of attempts to kind of get hold of it, I guess, but then I pushed from all around and it shrank. Give it a try." She looked at him, then at the ball of energy in her hand, before tentatively poking it with her ki abilities. Nothing much happened the first few times but eventually her eyes widened as it slowly began to compress down.

"It's working," she yelped with delight. He grinned.

"Keep at it. Don't let go or it will try to expand again." Her brow furrowed as she concentrated, sweating a little.

"It's pushing back."

"I know. Push harder. When you get to a point you think you can't squeeze any harder, just try to hold it there." This point came when the ball was about a quarter the size it had originally been. It was now glowing very brightly, although it was a long way off the intolerable brilliance of the one Ranma had produced. "Very good. Can you make it any smaller?" She shook her head, sweating fiercely.

"No. This is as much as I can hold. It's really pushing back hard now."

"That's OK. It's not bad for your current level. Try firing it at the target." Facing the stack of plates she went through the exercise she was now familiar with, watching as the ball shot downrange to impact with a much louder bang than any of her previous shots. The plate visibly jumped a few millimetres off the floor, while there was a fist-sized dent in it, dribbles of molten steel running down the plate.

"Wow." She slumped a little. "That was very difficult." Ranma went and examined the impact zone, returning with a grin on his face.
"But worth it. That increased the damage to a pretty impressive level even though the total power was fairly low. Pumping a lot of power into it would be extremely dangerous indeed." He seemed pleased. "That's a very effective technique. I wonder if it works with the ki beams as well as that? I'm not going to try indoors, that's for sure!" Putting his hand on her shoulder he looked proud.

"Very well done indeed, Nabiki. I've been using these ki techniques for about six years and I never thought of that. I don't know that anyone has. You have a gift for this sort of thing." She smiled, rather tiredly. "Come on, let's get something to eat. You look and feel pretty depleted. That took a lot out of you. Don't worry, you'll get more efficient at it with practice." Heading for the elevator they went upstairs.

Cologne sat calmly inspecting the two women sparring in the back yard of the Cat Cafe, Mousse beside her looking quite impressed. "She's not bad," he commented, his eyes on Akane as she ducked a swing from Shampoo, returning a series of punches at least a third of which landed on the other woman's ribs. Shampoo controlled her expression masterfully but it was clear to the elder that she'd felt it. Akane wasn't as fast as her great-granddaughter but she was extremely strong.

"Indeed. As I suspected, she has the makings of a fine warrior now that her uncontrollable rage seems to be... controlled." A small smile came and went. Mousse raised an eyebrow, that was perilously close to funny. The two women fought until Cologne rapped her cane on the ground. "Enough." Both combatants immediately halted, bowing to each other before turning to the Amazon elder. Shampoo was favouring her left side while Akane winced a little when she put her weight on her right leg.

"Shampoo, well done. You have taught Akane very effectively. I'm glad to see that you seem to be regaining the abilities you so amply showed when we were in the village. I'm sorry I allowed you to slack off so much." The younger woman nodded, looking pleased and embarrassed in equal measure.

"Thank you, elder," she said formally. Cologne smiled a little. Turning to Akane she inspected her.

"Akane Tendo. I'm genuinely impressed. This was at least half an experiment, but I'm very pleased to see how seriously you seem to be taking it. I see no reason to stop at this point. I think that in, let's say, two months, with similar progress I will start you on some of the secret special techniques." Akane grinned, then nodded.

"Thank you, elder," she said, also formally. The old Amazon woman smiled more widely.

"Well done, Akane. I'm very pleased. Keep it up. Shampoo, take Akane and feed both of you, you look hungry. When you've both eaten I'll have a look at your ribs and Akane's knee, it's obviously not quite right." They nodded and headed inside, Shampoo helping her friend who was now limping noticeably. The elder watched them go.

"What are you thinking, elder?" Mousse asked respectfully but curiously. After a moment Cologne turned her head and looked at him.

"I'm not quite sure," she said slowly. "This was, as I said, something of an experiment. I wondered if the Tendo girl had what it took to be a decent warrior. Oh, she made an impressive berserker, there was little doubt about that, but such people are usually more of a problem than a solution except in very specific and unusual circumstances. Since those magical girls fixed her unpleasant infection and set her on the path to something approaching sanity, though, I wanted to see if she could suppress her temper and really learn to fight properly. Apparently she can. I wasn't sure what would happen, but this is better than I hoped for." Falling silent she stared at the young man for a moment, then smiled.

"It will be interesting to see how far she progresses. I was getting bored, this is a pleasant surprise."
Cackling with laughter, she hopped up onto her cane. "It will also be interesting to see her reaction to some of the other, more difficult training methods..." As she hopped away Mousse winced in sympathy.

"Good luck, Akane. You're going to need it. That old bat has a nasty streak," he muttered to himself, before getting up and going to look for some food himself.

---

Tamiko sighed. "Mom, I've got everything I need. You've seen this apartment, it's fine. You don't have to keep buying me stuff." Kasumi listened quietly, pouring them each a cup of tea, a small smile on her face. "No, I've got a washing machine. You've seen it. Yes, it's a good one. No, there's a dryer as well." She rolled her eyes and Kasumi giggled silently.

"Yes, I have enough plates. And saucers. No, there are plenty of bedclothes. Yes, they're clean. Mom. Mom. I'm fine! I've been living here for three months so far." She sighed quietly again. "Yes, I love you too. Give my best to the others. I'll stop by tomorrow. OK. Bye." Pressing the disconnect button she dropped the phone to the table and glanced at Kasumi, shrugging with a smile.

"You see?"

"Yes, I do. Is she always like that?" The older woman handed her a cup. Tamiko accepted it with a nod of thanks, slumping a little on the sofa.

"Afraid so. Actually, I got away more easily than normal then. She can go on for hours." Laughing, Kasumi looked up as Ranma and Nabiki entered the room from the direction of the practice room, talking together and smiling. Ranma was currently female, dressed in her practice silks.

"How did it go?" the eldest Tendo sister asked. Ranma grinned.

"Pretty well. She's got quite a decent battle aura now when she tries, although her control needs work." Nabiki looked incensed.

"Do you know what she did?" she asked, aggrieved. "She made me hold a ki sphere in my hands while she tried to hit me with a bo staff, and poked me in the ribs if I let it fade. It's really hard to concentrate on holding the ki stable when someone's trying to hit you!" Rubbing her abused ribcage she looked momentarily annoyed, them smiled again. "I guess that's the point."

"Exactly. And you're coming along quite well. You only lost it three times today. Last week it was five." The red-head grinned. "We do need to start you on some proper basic hand to hand of some sort, but you seem to be getting faster even so. I nearly had to work at hitting you!" Nabiki giggled.

"Now, I know that's not true. You're so much faster than I am I can't believe it."

"Oh, that's true enough but honestly, you have gotten a lot quicker. And tougher, I poked you pretty damn hard a few times, most people would have ended up with a cracked rib once or twice but you've only got some bruises. Nice ones, though." She smiled at the middle sister, who rubbed her ribs and winced.

"Don't remind me." Laughing, Ranma ran her hand down the other woman's side, the blue glow quickly erasing the bruises. "I still find that incredible." Looking down at herself Nabiki felt her side, then smiled.
"One day I expect you'll be able to do it, sister," Kasumi said, offering her a cup of tea.

"You really think so?" The older woman nodded calmly.

"I do. It will take a while, but the basic healing is essentially ki based. Your control is coming along nicely. It will probably be a year or so before you can manage it, and the more complex parts require our magic as well which we haven't started you on yet, but I don't doubt you will be good at it." Looking pleased Nabiki sat beside her sister while Ranma dropped down beside Tamiko.

"Where are the other three lunatics?" she casually asked, reaching out for the plate of sandwiches on the table. Tamiko smiled at her, accepting the one she was handed.

"Aiko is with her mother, helping her with some shopping. Misaki is at the garage rebuilding a Honda NSX engine, she's been working on it for three days now. I'm not sure where Fumiko is, she wandered off a while ago to meet some friends." Nibbling her sandwich she looked pensive. "It's been incredibly quiet the last few weeks. We haven't had to do the magical girl bit for ages. I can't work out if that's good or bad, but at least we're not running around in the cold. I don't mind it in the summer, or even the spring, but until recently it's been much too cold for bare legs." Ranma snickered.

"But they're such nice legs! You're always telling us that." Nabiki started laughing while Tamiko grinned.

"That's true. But they look better a healthy skin colour, not so blue." Smiling gently Kasumi took a sandwich as well.

"I've been working on the clothing spell some more. I think I might be close to working out a method to switch it off." Sitting up Tamiko stared at her.

"Really? That would be wonderful. All joking aside, it's a massive pain." Nodding Kasumi looked pleased.

"Yes, it's a complicated little spell but I'm making some progress. It will require some delicate, um, editing, I suppose is the right word, of your inherent magic, but I think it's possible. I want to be sure I have it right before I try it, though. Perhaps a couple of weeks or so and we could try it."

"The others will be very pleased," Tamiko said happily. Turning to Nabiki, she asked, "How is the rest of your training coming along?" The brunette smiled.

"Better than I ever expected. The ki shots are pretty easy now, and I've got the compression to about eight times. It's really hard to go further than that, I just don't have the power." Tamiko nodded understandingly.

"I know. I can manage about fifteen or so, Misaki can do nearly twenty. That's a very powerful technique you invented." The other woman looked a little embarrassed.

"It was just an idle thought. I had no idea it would work so well." Ranma smiled at her.

"That's how a lot of the best ideas work. My ki beams and the healing were basically the same way. There are some other techniques I came up with at the same time that are even better, but it will be a while before any of you are at a level to use them." Tamiko and Nabiki exchanged curious glances. The red-head smirked. "It's a surprise."

"We'll have to start you all on hidden weapons at some point soon," Kasumi suggested, sipping her tea. "You're nearly at a level where you could start to use it." Nabiki looked interested.
"I thought they already used something like that?" she asked slowly. "I mean, their weapons seem to disappear in that manner, and Misaki must have about fifty kilos of food stashed away somewhere."

Tamiko giggled. "It's not quite the same thing. Our magic gives us access to a smallish subspace pocket we keep the weapons and a few essentials in, but it's nothing like as flexible or effective as their hidden weapons technique. That allows for multiple ki pockets, which are much larger than we can manage. It's a lot more useful." Nodding with understanding, Nabiki looked at her sister.

"I'd certainly like to learn that technique. I know how useful you find it."

"You have a little way to go yet before you could really use it, but you're close. All of you are coming up to a similar level in ability, although the others have more raw power for obvious reasons. You'll catch up eventually, though." Kasumi took another sandwich, looking content. Ranma looked at the clock.

"We're going to have to get back to the university soon. The coursework is starting to pile up and we each have several lectures we need to attend in the next couple of days." Nodding, Tamiko stood.

"Thanks for the tea and the sandwiches, guys. I'll see you later. Nabiki, nice to see you again. Keep up the training, I want to be able to see what you can do at some point." She grinned, then left the apartment. The middle sister looked at the other two.

"I need to get back as well, I have a paper due in three days. I don't think I'll be able to come over until Thursday." Hugging her quickly, Kasumi stood.

"Keep practising the exercises," she advised. "But keep the power level low. We don't want you making any more holes in your carpet..." Nabiki laughed, getting up and picking up her coat.

"I'll try to keep the destruction to a minimum. See you guys later." Waving to Ranma who waved back she headed out the door, getting into the elevator and pressing the button for the ground floor. As she was entering the train station a few minutes later she noticed a familiar policeman walking past. She nodded to him, and Sergeant Harada nodded back politely although with a slightly puzzled expression. Privately amused she headed for her platform.

Nodoka stepped to the door of the kitchen, peering out at the yard while drying her hands on a towel, having just finished cleaning the sink. The sun was bright and it was surprisingly warm for early April. She could hear noises coming from the Dojo as Soun and her husband taught their students, synchronised yells and cracking sounds showing they were working on some sort of power training exercise. Hanging the towel up she walked into the garden, looking around at the various plants which were beginning to sprout vigorously. 'I'm going to have to start pruning and tidying up,' she mused, bending to investigate a rose bush. A thump behind her attracted her attention, making her look over her shoulder. Shampoo was standing on the lawn having clearly just jumped over the wall, looking up at the top of it where a pair of hands could be seen holding on. She was grinning.

"Come on, Akane, it's not that difficult. Just jump over the thing. It's only three metres or so." A stream of vicious mutters came from the other side of the wall, making Nodoka smile to herself. The hands disappeared and she could hear footsteps heading away, then rapidly approaching again. A grunt of exertion and Akane got half-way over the wall, her knees thumping into it and making her belly-flop over the top, then slowly tip into the garden and land on the ground on her back with a thud.
"Ow."

Shampoo was rolling on the ground laughing hysterically, while Nodoka smiled, amused. Walking over she offered the youngest Tendo girl her hand. "Are you all right, Akane?" she asked. The younger woman nodded, painfully levering herself to a sitting position, then standing with the aid of the Saotome matriarch. She glared at her friend who stared back wide-eyed, before collapsing in renewed laughter.

"I'm fine, thanks, Auntie," she said, limping over to Shampoo and kicking her in the leg. Nodoka chuckled.

"That looked like it hurt."

"It wasn't comfortable, that's for sure," Akane groused, rubbing her kneecaps. Shampoo sat up still giggling.

"You need more up and less forward," she helpfully suggested. The other young woman scowled.

"Thanks a bunch," she replied, not looking all that thankful.

Snickering, Shampoo bounced to her feet. "You need to learn this. Everyone else can roof-hop, even Kodachi, and you're probably better than she is now. I know you're more than strong enough, you just need to get the coordination and the ki control. Even Genma can do it and look at the size of him!" Nodoka muffled a sudden laugh, making both young woman glance at her with small smiles.

"He is quite large," his wife admitted, giggling a little.

"Come on, let's try again. Remember, more up." Sighing, Akane followed her friend across the garden, then watched as Shampoo ran back towards the wall, lightly jumping on top of it, then gracefully running back and forth for a moment, before motioning to the other woman. Gritting her teeth, Akane charged the wall, putting everything she had into a vertical leap. Her height was impressive, easily clearing the top of the wall this time, although her aim left something to be desired as she flew over the top of it flailing her arms. A descending scream ended in a loud crash somewhere on the other side. Nodoka winced as Shampoo turned to look down into the street with an amused expression.

"Too much up that time, Akane," she called, dropping off the wall. Shaking her head but smiling Nodoka went back into the house.

"Are you sure this won't hurt?" Fumiko said nervously, looking at Kasumi. The older woman smiled at her comfortably.

"You won't feel anything, I think. It certainly won't be painful. Just lie down and relax." Looking slightly worried, the other woman did as requested, lying back on the bed in one of the spare rooms, her sister and the rest of her team watching intently. They'd drawn straws for the first one to try Kasumi's modification to their clothing magic, Fumiko having won. Or lost, depending on your point of view. Ranma peered over his wife's shoulder with interest while Nabiki watched from next to the other three girls.

"All right, I'm going to start now. Don't move, please, Fumiko." The girl nodded slightly then lay quietly. Kasumi ran her hands a few centimetres away from her body as if she was looking for something, zeroing in on a point over her chest. "Ah. There you are," she mumbled to herself, looking at something that wasn't physically present. Poking her finger into the middle of whatever she could see Kasumi moved it around a little, while Ranma watched. "See? This bit here? That's the connection to this part, which is the clothing transformation spell. I need to either cut it or block it. Hmm. OK, let's try this." She concentrated, moving her hands around in a complex and delicate manner. Ranma nodded.

"That looks reasonable. You could tie it off there and we could test it before you make any permanent changes."

"That's a good suggestion." Kasumi nodded, prodding the magic some more, then pulled her hands back. "All right, that should do for a test. Fumiko, try powering up, let's see what happens." The girl on the bed was wearing some old, sacrificial clothing she didn't mind becoming a new uniform. She nodded, then flipped the mental trigger that activated her magic boost. The familiar internal sensation came and went, but her clothes didn't change. She grinned.

"Fantastic." Kasumi looked pleased.

"Does everything else feel normal?" After a moment's thought Fumiko nodded, smiling.

"Yes. Everything is working perfectly but that part. That's wonderful work, Kasumi."

"I'm not done yet, so power down, and let's make the change permanent." After a little more work she sat back. "That should do it. Try it again." Once more Fumiko powered up with no visible change. Nabiki could feel that her power level had increased very substantially, with the mental effect she was coming to associate with active magic as distinct from ki, but other than that she looked perfectly normal.

"That's amazing, Kasumi," Aiko said, smiling broadly. "I only wish we could have worked this out years ago. It would have been a lot less embarrassing." The eldest Tendo sister smiled.

"Thank you. I'm sorry it took so long to devise a fix, it's a very complicated bit of magic and I didn't want to risk damaging anything." She looked back to Fumiko. "I had an idea and changed it slightly from what I was originally intending. Essentially I set the default state of the clothing change to off, but left it in place. I patched it with a control section. Can you feel this?" Her hand glowed slightly as she moved it over the other woman's chest. Fumiko nodded slightly.

"Yes. That's a little like the normal boost trigger."

"I added it to that point. Now, here's the difference. See?" Once more Fumiko nodded. "Set it like that and power up, it will do what it's always done. Leave it off and the clothes don't change. Give it a try." With slight concentration Fumiko powered down, held the other mental trigger in the right state and powered up again. Her clothes instantly shifted into the familiar skimpy uniform. She grinned.

"I see. I can't think when that would be required, but it's there if I need it. Thanks, Kasumi." She sat up, swinging her legs over the edge of the bed. "Your turn, sis," she said to Misaki, standing and moving out of the way. Her sister eagerly took her place.

Half an hour later all four girls had the new clothing spell patch installed, all of them looking very pleased. Ranma and Nabiki were preparing lunch while the others laid the table. Kasumi had disappeared into the study, coming back a few minutes later with a pile of clothing in her hands. She dropped it on the table and looked at her friends, who were staring at her curiously. "I made these a while ago because I was sure we'd work out your magic eventually. I hope you like them." Lifting the top set of clothing off the pile she handed it to Aiko, who unfolded it with interest. She found herself holding a set of silk clothing clearly patterned on that of 'Yori' and 'Chou', only in the dark blue with gold trim colour scheme of their normal uniforms. Holding it up to herself with a delighted smile she saw it would fit perfectly.

The others looked at her, then at the pile. Kasumi laughed. "There's two sets for everyone. Plus the boots, and if you want them, the gloves." She handed them out to the other three as Ranma and Nabiki came into the room carrying lunch. Nabiki inspected the clothing that Aiko was still holding against herself and grinned.

"It suits you. Looks like you've got a team thing going on."

"Thanks, Kasumi. Again." Aiko said, folding the clothing carefully and putting it on the sofa, before hugging her friend.

"You're welcome. You need something to wear. We should see if we can work out some sort of instant clothing change spell like some of the other magical girls use, but for now at least you have something somewhat less... risqué." They all laughed, before sitting down to lunch.

"Ahhh!" Akane yelled as she plummeted off the roof, frantically grabbing at the side of the house as it went past, her fingers grazing a windowsill and allowing her to redirect her momentum sideways. She shot three metres to the left, bounced off the wall of the Dojo, then coiled her legs under her as she headed for the courtyard wall. Pushing off hard she rose nearly to the level of the roof before reaching out for it, just managing to hang on and roll onto the tiles. Lying on her back she closed her eyes and breathed heavily, hearing light footsteps approach across the roof. A shadow fell over her face and she opened her eyes to see Shampoo smiling down at her.

"That was almost impressive, Akane. Although the panicked scream let it down a little." The Chinese girl giggled, then sat cross-legged next to her as she recovered. Eventually she felt well enough to sit up.

"I really thought I was going to hit the ground then," she said, looking at the roof where her jump had been intended to land.

"You didn't. Which is the important thing," her friend said, glancing at her and snickering a little. "You almost made it, in fact. I think you slipped when you jumped and didn't quite get the distance. We'll try again in a moment." She nodded slowly, lying back on the roof and letting her spinning head recover. A few moments later a voice from below made her sit up and look over the edge. Nabiki was peering up at them, a quizzical expression on her face.

"You OK, sis? That was quite a scream." Akane smiled weakly.

"Sorry. I missed." Grinning, Nabiki waved up at her, going back inside the house. The youngest sister turned to her friend, to find her looking after the middle sister with a puzzled expression.

"What's the problem, Shampoo?" she asked curiously. The Amazon shook herself a little.

"Hmm? Oh, I'm not sure there is one. It's just that lately, when I look at Nabiki, I get this weird feeling in the back of my head, like there's something I should be seeing but something's stopping me seeing it." She shrugged. "Must be my imagination. It's only Nabiki, after all." Standing, she dismissed the thought as unimportant. "Come on. Let's try again. I want to have you jumping across that gap at least nine out of ten times by this evening." Akane looked narrowly at her.

"And on the tenth time?"

"You fall, of course. That's the funny part." Shampoo laughed merrily.
Sergeant Harada looked up at the line of six young women running across the rooftops across the street in an implausible manner, smiling as each of them came to a gap in the buildings and somersaulted across it in turn. He could hear at least one of them laughing her head off in the process. Yori was in the front, while Chou brought up the rear. The other four he realised must be Aiko and her girls. In the last couple of weeks they seemed to have made a major change to their uniforms, the new ones showing a hell of a lot less skin but still looking very good, clearly based on Yori and Chou's normal clothing. He wondered what had brought that about. Glancing at Corporal Otani who was walking next to him, also watching the girls, he laughed.

"Did they join Yori and Chou, or did Yori and Chou join them?" he asked. Otani snickered.

"I can't really see Yori of all people joining another group. Can you?"

"Not really. She's more of a leader than a follower. Sometimes I think we've joined her..." Both of them chuckled, walking back to the station while behind them the line of magical girls leapt another gap, leaving a trail of giggles behind them.

Sitting on the back porch beside Nodoka, Cologne accepted a cup of tea with a smile of thanks on her prune-like old face. They watched as Shampoo and Akane jumped back and forth on the roof of the Dojo, sparring with each other, although clearly Akane was occasionally having to concentrate more on staying in the roof than the fighting. Shampoo was carefully controlling the match to ensure the other woman didn't come to grief. The Amazon elder nodded to herself. "Not bad at all. She's coming along very well."

"Was this the outcome you hoped for, Elder?" Nodoka asked quietly, sipping her tea, her eyes on the two young woman. Beside her the much older woman nodded slowly.

"Hoped for, yes. Expected, not quite. I feared that the young lady would find it too difficult and give up, or allow her temper to control her. I'd have had to bring it to a halt at that point. But she's both surprised and impressed me with her dedication. Pity we couldn't have gotten her to this point a decade ago, or even five years ago, but better late than never I suppose." She drank some tea looking satisfied. "If she can keep up this pace of learning, in a few years she will be very formidable. Just the last four months has brought her on immensely." Looking up at the other woman, she asked, "How are your husband and Soun getting along with their own efforts?"

Nodoka smiled slightly. "Much better than I expected. I have to admit, although I love my husband, I haven't thought much of him as a person for some time. You understand why, of course." Cologne nodded with a rusty chuckle.

"Oh, indeed I do."

"But, that said, he does seem to be trying to redeem himself in some way. He managed to pull poor Soun out of a bottle, which even now amazes me when I think about it, and he was the driving force behind the pair of them resuming teaching. He still has a lot to answer for, they both do really, but they seem to be doing surprisingly well at making good. From what I know their students are coming along well and they're earning enough to keep the Dojo and the household solvent, remarkably enough." Cologne nodded, returning her attention to the two women on the roof opposite. She winced slightly as Akane caught Shampoo in the shoulder with an impressive kick, making the other woman have to quickly flip backwards to evade the follow-up blow.

"Good strike," she murmured. "And Nabiki? I haven't seen her for a while."

"She's back for the weekend, but she popped out to the shops. She'll be back any moment. From what I gather her studies are going very well. She seems to have decided to become something called a forensic accountant after she graduates. I believe it combines most of her interests and skills, including the... less proper... ones." Nodoka looked amused as Cologne chuckled again.

"Yes, that girl always impressed me with her ability to find things out. It's a good thing she didn't want to go into the shadows to earn a living, although I suspect she'd be very good at that. Better to be more or less legal."

"She seems to be spending quite a lot of her free time with her friends, those two medical students.
They're very nice girls, even if they have a somewhat non-traditional relationship." The Amazon laughed.

"I'm very familiar with those 'non-traditional' relationships, Nodoka. In our culture they're not uncommon, neither are they looked down on." The other woman flushed a little.

"I have to admit I still have slight difficulty with it. My own upbringing, you understand. My mother would have been very... unimpressed. But she was always rather difficult." Cologne glanced at the woman beside her with a slightly raised eyebrow, thinking of the irony of that statement, while knowing full well that the other woman didn't see it. With a small smile she went back to watching Shampoo and Akane.

Ten minutes later the front door opened and closed, followed by footsteps approaching through the house. The middle sister appeared beside them, looking at her sister and Shampoo on the roof.
Nodoka looked up. "Hello, Nabiki, did you get what you needed?"

The young woman nodded. "Yes, thanks, Auntie. Hello, Elder Cologne. How are you? I haven't seen you since Christmas."

"I'm well, thank you, Nabiki," Cologne said, her eyes still on the two girls on the roof. "How are you doing?" She glanced up, then froze, staring at Nabiki, who was watching her sister spar. 'What the hell...?' For a moment as she looked at the young woman with other than her eyes, she felt that something enormous and incredibly dangerous was looking back, not in a particularly friendly manner either. 'What is that?' she wondered, cautiously reaching out with a magical probe. The pain that went through her instantly made her realise far too late that this had been a spectacularly bad idea...

Nodoka and Nabiki both glanced at the Amazon elder as she made a small noise, then shook her head. "Are you all right, Cologne?" Nodoka asked with concern. The old woman smiled weakly at her.

"Yes, I'm fine, Nodoka. A bit of tea went down the wrong way, I think." She coughed a couple of times. "I'll be all right. One of those small cakes would sort it out, I think." She reached for the plate Nodoka helpfully passed her. Nibbling a particularly good lemon cupcake appreciatively, she wondered what she'd been thinking about just then. It was just at the back of her mind, but she couldn't quite bring it into view. 'Hmm. Can't be all that important, then. If it is it'll come to me.'
Glancing up at Nabiki she smiled at the slightly worried expression the much younger woman was giving her.

"Don't worry, dear, I'm fine. Sit down and tell me about how your studies are going." Nabiki nodded and sat beside them, taking the cup of tea that Nodoka passed her and accepting a cupcake as well.
Chapter 39

Listening as Kasumi spoke that weird trade language, Nabiki shook her head in wonder. She turned to Ranma. "Is it difficult to learn?" she asked curiously. He smiled.

"It's less difficult than Mandarin, certainly. More logical than English, it's a synthetic language, with strict rules. But that's not to say it's easy. Are you interested in learning it?" She thought for a moment.

"I suppose it might be useful. Plus I'm just intrigued."

"I'll dig out my notes. There aren't really any Japanese-Trade language dictionaries yet, although it would certainly be useful to have one. When I get time perhaps I should write one." He grinned.

"I'm surprised there aren't any spells to teach languages, or even just automatically translate from one to another." He nodded.

"I know. I wondered that myself. It's not completely impossible, but it's appallingly difficult, apparently. There are rumours that a couple of demonic species have such a spell but no one seems to know for sure. It would be incredibly valuable if it existed. There are spells that help memory and retention, which can speed things like learning a new language up a bit, I've been meaning to look into them, but they're pretty low priority to us at the moment. For now you just have to do it the hard way. It helps to have someone to practice with." Kasumi finished her conversation and hung the phone up, turning to them.

"Uthryyl says he's got a few things we'll find interesting. He asked if we could meet him at their new warehouse, they're behind schedule and can't really take the time off to come over." The martial artist nodded with a smile.

"Why not? We can get some lunch on the way back." He looked at Nabiki, shimmering into 'Yori' in the process. "Want to come?"

"Yes, I'd like that. I like him and his lot." 'Yori' tossed her the disguise bracelet, which she clicked around her arm.

"Here. I think you might be able to learn this at this point, 'Yori' said, reaching out. "Watch what I do." Nabiki concentrated on the sensation of the bracelet being activated. "You see?"

"I saw something. Do it again." Obligingly the other woman turned the thing on and off a few times. "OK, I think I see. Like this?" Prodding it with a little bit of ki she winced at the slight mental feedback, but smiled as she felt the bracelet activate.

"Not bad. That's pure ki, which isn't really compatible with it, but it's close enough. Keep trying, if you can duplicate what I did you'll be somewhere close to being at the point to start learning our magic." 'Yori' grinned. Pulling out her phone she hit a speed dial number. "Hi, we're going to see Uthryyl. Any of you guys want to meet us there?" She nodded to herself. "Yep, that's the place. He's been there nearly a week so far. OK, see you there in about twenty minutes or so. Bye." She hung up and flipped the phone into nothingness again. "Aiko and the girls will meet us there as well."

Shortly the three of them walked up to a bigger warehouse than the one Nabiki had first met the demons at nearly a year before. 'Yori' knocked on the door, which opened a few seconds later. "Hi, Onkra."
"Hello, Yori, Chou. And Nabiki as well. Come in." The young female demon stepped aside, waving them in. In the cavernous interior they found Uthryyl and his team, including his wife this time, talking to Aiko and the others. He was showing them a huge pile of high-end coffee beans in vacuum packed bags with an expression of glee.

"I got a fantastic deal on twenty tons of this. It's extremely high quality. I've already sold it for a pretty impressive profit, and put in an order for two more batches the same size. Business is very good at the moment," he said, sounding very pleased with himself. His wife was poking at a small electronic device of alien manufacture, calculating something, with a thoughtful look on her face. As the three new arrivals approached he turned to them. "Hello, Yori. And you too, Chou, Nabiki. Right on time. We were just about to break for lunch."

'Yori' looked around curiously. "Yoshi decided to rent you this place after all, then?" she asked. He nodded.

"Yes. Thank you for introducing us. He wasn't sure at first, but the deal he originally had fell through, so when I talked to him again he was happy to help. We've agreed to use it regularly for the next two years, then look at our requirements. This is a big warehouse and half-empty, it should keep us going for a while. He's going to take on some of the local buying for us, so we just have to arrange transport when it's ready. It makes things easier for everyone."

"I thought I recognised it," Nabiki exclaimed. "This is where Ryoga had an uncomfortable interview." She snickered at the memory. 'Yori' nodded with a grin.

"That's it." Uthryyl was looking puzzled so she explained. When she finished he roared with laughter.

"Very good. You and your friends have a very effective method of dealing with troublemakers." Leading them all to a large side-room obviously intended as a cafeteria, they found a considerable amount of food available. Nabiki sniffed, then smiled, exchanging a glance with Misaki.

"Is that...?"

"Roast g'rargh. Yes. I thought you might notice." Uthryyl smiled. "Help yourself." Seconds later they were filling a couple of plates while the others waited their turn. When everyone had something to eat, they sat down around several tables. Once they'd eaten a little, Uthryyl turned to 'Yori'. "I've spent quite a bit of time looking into this security spell we talked about at your party a while ago. It took a while to track down anyone who knew about it. I finally found a mage who's an expert on the subject and is willing to discuss it with you, although he's not cheap." 'Yori' waved this off.

"We can afford it." He nodded, smiling.

"I know. Anyway, on your behalf I arranged to have him meet you, whenever you're ready. These are the coordinates of his home world, and his address." The demon handed her a piece of paper-like material with a complex set of numbers on it. "I told him it would most likely be within the next few days to a couple of weeks, if that's OK. If it's going to be longer I can let him know and we can rearrange it."

"That's fine, Uthryyl. Thanks. I'll go and talk to him in a couple of days."

"Talking to him I got a basic description of the spell and how it works. Misaki was essentially right. I think you probably were as well. It's based on some sort of perception distortion spell like those interesting little cards of yours, but considerably more complex. I didn't get all the details although I'd be very interested in learning more at some point. From the sound of it the thing will probably fit your problem very well. I don't know how easily you'll find converting it to your weird magic system though. It might be easiest to just hire the fellow to apply it himself. He seemed open to the idea, that's his business after all. He's got a discreet but very good reputation. He came highly recommended." 'Yori' nodded, examining the paper he'd handed her, before folding it carefully and putting it away.

"I'll have to talk to him first but that might be simplest. I'd like to learn the spell anyway, but we'll see." The demon smiled, taking a few more bites of his food.

"The other thing is something I came across recently that I thought you might all find useful. I remembered some discussions we had a while ago about keeping your secrets, I know you were a little worried about how your electronics might eventually get compromised." He turned to his daughter. "Onkra, could you go and get the blue case? The one I showed you?" She nodded, leaving the room to return a few minutes later carrying a sort of briefcase with a complex lock on it. Putting it on the table in front of him she sat down again, watching with interest. Everyone was looking at the case curiously.

Uthryyl put his finger on the lock and seemed to go into a mild trance for a moment, then said something in his own language. The lock made a slight beeping sound, clicked twice, and the case lid popped up. Opening it he turned it around to show 'Yori' and the others the contents. Nestled in some sort of soft material inside were a number of small devices that bore some resemblance to cell-phones, although they clearly weren't. Picking one up 'Yori' looked at it, turning it over in her hands.

"What is it?" she asked. He looked pleased.

"It's a military grade communications system from a world quite a long way down the portal chain from here. They're extremely good at both magic and technology, this combines both in a way they haven't come across before. I'm led to believe the encryption on them is both unbreakable in any meaningful way and untraceable. They're highly restricted for export. I acquired them legally, don't worry about that, but you're not likely to see any more of them. Once they're individually associated to a specific user only that user can use the unit in question. Very high security. They're also damn near indestructible. The things are powered by the ambient magical field, so they don't need charging or anything of the like, although in some places with very low ambient magic you might need to provide your own power. I don't think you of all people would have any problem with that." 'Yori' inspected the unit in her hands with respect.

"Impressive." He grinned.

"That they are. I got about a hundred of them, they cost a fortune but I think it's worth it. These ones are for you." He pushed the case forward. She looked somewhat taken aback.

"Are you sure?" He nodded.

"Very sure. You've done us a lot of favours, it's time I paid some of it back. These will probably help you a lot, and add to your security." Glancing at her wife, who smiled back and nodded, 'Yori' eventually grinned at him.

"Thank you, Uthryyl. That's very good of you." He looked pleased.

"It's nothing. There are a dozen there, which should be enough for all of you plus some spares. I got the manual translated into the trade language, it's pretty comprehensive and tells you how to set them up, all that sort of thing. I'm going to provide my own people with them as well. I'll make sure you have the call codes for all of ours when they're configured so you can call us. Let me have your codes as well." The martial artist nodded, leafing through the manual she'd found in the box.

"I will do."

"Oh, one other thing they do that's pretty remarkable. They work across worlds. At least to close ones. Here and our home are close enough that they can make contact, apparently." The black-haired young woman looked very impressed.

"Wow. That could be extremely useful."

"Quite." He grinned toothily. Showing her how the lock worked he transferred the control to her, then watched as she relocked the case. Putting it away in her ki pocket she grinned.

"New toys." They finished the meal, then chatted for a while, before the demons had to get back to work. Aiko teleported the lot of them back to the apartment building.

"That was nice of him," Nabiki said, sitting down. Ranma resumed his normal appearance and sat beside her.

"He's a nice guy. But yes, that was a very generous thing to do." Pulling the case and the paperwork from ki space, he handed the paper to Kasumi who studied it, while he unlocked the case and pulled out the manual again. Putting the case on the coffee table he sat back to read the documentation. Nabiki curiously extracted one of the communication units from the case and examined it. Tamiko removed another one and did the same.

They were about the same size as an ordinary cell phone, perhaps a little smaller, with what looked like a screen of some sort forming the entirety of one side. No buttons or switches were visible on the surface. What seemed to be the back was a matte black finish, while the other side was slightly shinier. Overall the things were only about a centimetre thick and quite light. Ranma was making occasional impressed sounds as he quickly leafed through the manual that had come with the devices. Eventually he put it down and picked one of the units up, looking closely at it. "OK. I think I see. The interface is quite programmable. These things are very impressive. Right, lets try this." Referring to the manual he put his hand on the device, then concentrated for a moment. Frowning slightly he moved his hand around a little until there was a sudden pinging noise.

"Ah. That did it. OK, the book says I do..." Picking the thing up he looked at it for a moment, then touched a spot on the apparent screen. None of the other could see anything that looked different, but his eyebrows went up. "Neat. That's really very clever."

"What is?" Nabiki asked curiously. He grinned.

"You can't see it. These things seem to use something a bit like the spell on the business cards. Now it's associated with me I can see the interface it's projecting, but no one else can. That's very clever." Staring at the device, he waved his hand over it, apparently touching something that only he could see. "Very clever indeed. Whoever designed this really knew what they were doing. I can see why they're restricted, this is probably years if not decades worth of research."

"You do realise that to the rest of us you're just waving your hand around like an idiot," Fumiko said with a smile. He snickered.

"I know. Hang on, let's get you all set up with them." Picking up another one he handed it to her. "Here. Put your hand on the front there, then locate the activation nodes. You'll feel it when you have your hand in the right place." The young woman followed his instructions, looking slightly puzzled, then smiled as she felt what he meant.

"OK, I think I've got it."

"Now push a little power into it." She concentrated and was rewarded with the same pinging sound. Her eyes widened.

"Oh, wow. That's incredible."

"I think it inserts the visuals directly into the brain somehow. It must interface to the visual cortex."

"How the hell does it do that?" she wondered out loud, looking at something only she could see. He shrugged.

"No idea. The magic on this thing is unbelievably complex, never mind the tech. I've never seen anything like it." Picking up another one he handed it to Kasumi who was watching with interest. She managed to activate it quickly as well. Within a few minutes they all had one. Nabiki was the last to receive one of the alien communicators. He looked at her for a moment, then nodded. "I think you can activate it. It's not much more difficult than the bracelet. Put your hand on it." She did so. "OK. Can you feel anything?" Concentrating she felt around with her slowly developing ki sense.

"There's something there. Like a kind of... bump? In space?" She giggled. "That doesn't make any sense." Nodding, he smiled.

"It's close enough. Can you feel more than one?" With a little work she could make out four of the slight knots of energy.

"Yes. Four of them."

"Good. Now, you need to kind of touch them all at once, then push a little power into them. That makes it get a lock on you, a bit like the wards did." Nervous despite herself she did as instructed. After a pregnant pause the now-familiar ping sounded, then something incredible happened.

"Holy shit," she managed, as a translucent series of lines and icons suddenly appeared stretched across her view. Slowly reaching out she experimentally prodded one of them, finding to her surprise she could actually feel something. "That's unbelievable." Poking the various symbols she watched as the 'display' shifted and changed. "This must look ridiculous," she thought to herself, having a sudden vision of a room full of people waving their hands around as if they were trying to catch invisible flies. She laughed to herself.

"Right. According to the manual, there should be an icon that's a sort of purple colour in the top left corner, it looks a little like two squiggly lines over a circle. Everyone see it?" There was a chorus of affirmations. "OK, that starts the setup process. Apparently it lets you customise the interface to your own preferences. The manual suggests that you lie down for that part, as it can be disorientating. The interface has a visual mode, a physical interaction mode, and a mental interaction mode, which can be combined. I think what it means is that it's possible to set it up so you can basically think at it, rather than wave your hands around like a nut. That may be the best thing to enable. There is some sort of interactive guide to help you through it, the book says." He glanced at his wife. "I'm going to lie down on our bed. You guys should probably do the same. Use the spare rooms if you like."

Standing he and Kasumi headed for their room. Nabiki went into the one she customarily used while the others found their own places to lie down. When she was stretched out on the bed she took a deep breath, wondering what she was getting into, then decided it was too late to back out, reaching up and firmly poking the activation icon.

"Ohhh, god!" she moaned, as her entire world spun about her for a few seconds. There was a sensation of something prodding around in the back of her head for a moment, then a slightly metallic voice sounded.

#Hello, user. Language has been detected as classification Japanese, location is set to Tokyo, Earth.# All the icons visible suddenly had Kanji text beside them. #Welcome to the initial setup of the Kw'lyn Industries Mark Nine Gamma secure communications and sensory system. Please note that use of this system is restricted by planetary accord to authorised personnel only. Attempted use by unauthorised personnel is punishable by severe fines and incarceration. Please wait while authorisation status is verified.# There was a pause. #Authorisation verified. Please verbally indicate identity.#

After a moment, she tentatively said out loud, "Nabiki Tendo."

#Identity confirmed. Welcome, Nabiki Tendo. Please wait while this interface is calibrated. Indicate verbally the answers to questions that will be asked during calibration.# The display stretched to encompass her entire visual field, becoming a grid. #Can you see the edges of this display? Please indicate yes or no.#

"No."

#Are the grid lines evenly spaced and at right angles to each other? Please indicate yes or no.#

"Yes." The pattern changed to a grey scale.

#Does this pattern go from complete black to complete white? Please indicate yes or no.#

"Yes."

A series of tones played, ranging from a deep bass to an almost inaudible whistle. #How many discrete tones did you hear? Please indicate number.# She thought for a second.

"Fifteen."

#Thank you. Initial calibration complete. Advanced calibration beginning. No further user intervention is required. Note that you should be lying down for this section of the process as it can cause severe disorientation for a short period of time. When you are lying down, please indicate your readiness by stating the word begin .#

Taking another breath she said firmly, "Begin." Moments later she regretted it. Symbols and colours flashed across her view faster and faster, more than she could possible understand. Closing her eyes had no effect whatsoever. Weird noises came and went, strange smells seemed to blow past her. Even her mouth tasted strange. The effects lasted for just long enough she thought she was going to be sick, then abruptly stopped. Taking a few breaths she tried to keep her lunch down, then opened her eyes again.

#Calibration complete. Interface integration complete. Searching for local communications nets. Radio communications networks found. Local node in close proximity found. Please indicate if this node should be used.# Text appeared across her view as the other icons shrank away into the bottom left, almost out of her field of view. After a moment she recognised her own cell-phone number.
"Um, yes? Use it?" she tried. The text vanished.

#Choice confirmed. Interfacing with local node. Communications protocols established. Handshake complete. Local node and storage duplication in progress... Complete. Process finished. Searching for further nodes. None found in immediate proximity. Searching for secure nodes assigned to group. None found. Six uncommitted secure nodes found in close proximity. Nodes in process of configuration. No connection can be established until configuration completed.# There was a pause while she wondered what on earth would happen next. This was a lot more involved that she'd expected. She wondered if Uthryyl had realised how complicated these things were.

#Initial configuration completed. Personal configuration beginning. Synthetic Intelligence interface enabled. Conversational mode enabled. Please wait for process start.# Once more there was a pause, then the voice came back, but this time it sounded much less robotic, with a gender-neutral tone.

#Hello, Nabiki Tendo. Welcome to the secure system personalisation. I am a Mark Nine Gamma Synthetic Intelligence, rated at level eight security and level six conversational ability. Would you like to continue with the verbal interface, or switch to subvocal control? Subvocalisation is recommended for highest security usage.# Not quite sure what the thing was talking about, or even what it actually was, Nabiki was at a bit of a loss. The day suddenly seemed to have jumped feet-first into full-bore science fiction.

"Ah, hello? What do you mean by subvocalisation?" she tried. The voice sounded slightly amused. If it was some sort of computer, it was a damned impressive one.

#Subvocalisation allows you to communicate with me by simply thinking what you want to say. You must think it as if you were about to speak, but not complete the action. It takes some practice but is far more secure than verbalisation. Note that I cannot read your thoughts, merely interface to the speech centres of your brain. It is a similar process to the method I am using to speak to you, by inserting the information directly into the auditory control pathways of your brain. The visual interface works in a similar manner.#

"I see. That's very impressive." The voice seemed pleased.

#Thank you. Would you like to enable this interface and use it for further communications? You may switch between the interface methods at will.#

"Yes, let's try that."

#Understood. The subvocal interface is now enabled. Please attempt to use it so I may calibrate the interface.#

Nabiki shook her head slightly in amazement. The thing really sounded almost alive. Sitting up a little she decided to give it a try. 'Can you hear me?' she thought as loudly as she could, trying to follow the instructions the magical technology had suggested.

#Please repeat.#

'Can you hear me?'

#Confirmed. Subvocalisation interface fully functional. Would you like to see the demonstration of the facilities available to you, Nabiki Tendo?#

'Yes, please. What should I call you, anyway? What are you?"
As I stated I am a Synthetic Intelligence created by the Kw'lyn Industries company. I do not have a personal designation, although you may give me one if you wish. Would you like to give me a personal designation?

'Um, all right. How about Jun? It means obedient in Japanese.' The device seemed to pause for a moment.

Appropriate. I am Jun.

'I have to ask, please don't be offended. How intelligent are you?' She was very curious.

I am not offended. I am not strictly speaking intelligent in the sense of a living sentient creature. I am programmed with a large amount of information and rules that let me derive an appropriate response to almost any scenario, but my designers do not classify me as a true intelligence. I exist to serve as an interface control system for the Mark Nine Gamma secure communications system. I am loyal to you and you alone.

You may think of me as an assistant. I have no desires of my own beyond helping you achieve yours. After another pause, Jun went on, Beginning demonstration. You may pause or restart the demonstration at any point. If you have any questions please ask.

The next half hour or so was fascinating. She found that the device could record things she was watching and play them back later, since it interfaced to her visual cortex for both input and output. It had basically cloned her cell-phone functions, which allowed her to make phone calls using the same subvocalisation method, either directly or via her actual phone. How that worked she had no idea. The secure communications part of the thing seemed almost the smallest part in fact. She idly wondered whether it was possible to play a DVD through it. Jun answered her questions when she asked.

I can interface to what you term the internet, or similar networks given suitable authorisation. Playback of video data is possible. Scanning of the data would be required to determine the encoding method although my processing ability is sufficient to decode most systems. Connection to the device you refer to as a DVD player may be possible. Experimentation would be required.

When the demonstration finished, she picked the small device up and looked at it with respect and a certain amount of awe. It combined some incredibly complex magic with computer technology some decades ahead of what she was familiar with. Experimentally giving the mental command she'd learned, she watched as the device vanished out of her hand with a grin. It had disappeared into it's own little subspace pocket in much the same way that Tamiko had said their weapons did. With a gesture she retrieved it. "That's just amazing," she said out loud. Experimentally flipping it across the room she watched as it disappeared half-way, dropping automatically back into it's pocket, from where she could retrieve it at will. The thing was basically impossible to lose. If she got more than a metre or so away from it the device would pop into it's subspace storage area, from where it still worked. There was probably no real need to ever actually take it out of storage under normal circumstances.

She had come to realise that the device wasn't, as it had told her, really intelligent in the way she thought of it, it was just a very good simulation of a mind. The right question would throw it completely, making it ask her to restate the question until it could come up with an answer. That said, the result was incredibly impressive. She wondered what the makers could do if they really tried. If something this small could house a system powerful enough to make a more convincing artificial intelligence than anything she'd ever heard of before, something bigger might well be a true synthetic mind.

A ringing sound made her look around for her phone reflexively, before she grinned and answered
"Hi, Nabiki." Akane's voice said in her head. "Are you coming back this weekend?"

"Yes, I'll be back around six tonight. Is there a problem?" Akane laughed.

"No, nothing like that. Shampoo and I were going to go and see a movie and I wondered if you'd like to come as well. It starts around half past seven."

"Sure. I'll see you later, then."

"OK. Bye." There was a mental click and her sister hung up. Grinning to herself Nabiki shook her head, then stood. 'That was weird.' Heading into the living room she found Ranma and Kasumi were already there, looking at each other and laughing for some reason. They looked up as she entered.

"These things are remarkable," Ranma said with a grin.

"I know. I certainly wasn't expecting all those functions. I just had a conversation with Akane in my head, for heaven's sake!" She laughed. "It's like magic." He nearly collapsed in hilarity. Kasumi watched them with a grin on her face.

"We need to get everyone's codes into the system so we have them connected," she said, looking at her sister. "Ranma and I have already exchanged codes. Let's get yours."

"How do I do that?" Nabiki asked.

"Ask your system to locate us both and request a link. It requires both ends to agree." Nabiki followed instructions, Jun immediately responding. Seconds later she, Ranma, and Kasumi had a link established.

"This is very strange," Nabiki said without moving her lips. "Kind of telepathy, but not really."

"I know. It's odd, but it could be extremely useful. I wonder what the range is?" Ranma replied. He got a slightly distant look for a moment as he asked his system. "Hmm. It says anywhere on the planet, and out to a range of thirty planetary diameters. That's an odd way to put it."

"How far is that?" Kasumi asked.

"About as far as the moon," Nabiki said, working it out in her head. She looked impressed.

"Well, I can't see that being all that useful, as we're not likely to go to the moon. But even so that's pretty impressive. I'd like to meet the people who designed these things. The technology is incredible." Out loud, Kasumi said, "We were experimenting with sending visuals when you came in. Here, try this." Suddenly Nabiki was looking at herself in a small window superimposed over her view of the room. With a little effort she found she could zoom the window to fill her vision, making her feel rather odd as Kasumi looked around.

"Woah. That's very strange." The older sister stopped the visuals.

"I know. This is going to take some getting used to. I think Uthryyl got a lot more than he realised he was paying for. I'm not at all surprised the manufacturer of these things doesn't let them get out very much, I'm only surprised that they let them out at all. You could probably name your own price for these units to any intelligence service in the world." She looked very impressed. Ranma was concentrating on something, looking at both of them intently. She glanced at him curiously.
"What on earth are you doing, dear? You look rather constipated." Nabiki giggled, while he smiled a little.

"I was trying to see if I could detect whatever they're using to transfer the information. I can't feel anything. The shielding is the best I've ever seen, the devices themselves are basically invisible even to magic, and I have no real idea how they actually communicate. My best guess is that it's some sort of subspace link, which is a really good trick if true, but I don't know how it's done. I wonder if it can be blocked with the wards?" Kasumi looked interested.

"That's something we should find out. If the wards don't block it, we need to work out how to, just for the sake of security. But at the moment at least, we and Uthryyl are the only people on the planet with the things, so it isn't too much risk." He nodded slowly.

"True enough. I think I want to work it out anyway. I don't like not knowing." Grinning abruptly, he added, "But it's certainly one hell of a gift." They turned as Aiko came into the room looking somewhat stunned.

"These things are unbelievable," she said. "I've just been looking things up on the internet without a computer!" Eventually all seven people were sitting on the sofa again, having exchanged link details. Ranma closed and locked the case containing the remaining five communicators, storing it safely away in a ki pocket.

"Well," the martial artist said after a moment's silence. "I certainly didn't expect that when I got up this morning." He laughed. "Uthryyl really came through for us all."

"We're going to have to work out how to use these things tactically," Aiko mused, looking at her communicator with interest. "I can see some very interesting possibilities. Being able to share real-time images, for example, or communicate without anyone knowing. It could make quite a difference." She flipped the little alien device away into thin air with a smile.

"That's certainly true. We'll need to think about it for a while. In the mean time, I'd like to take you all through some more ki exercises." Ranma looked at them all. "You're getting better, but there's room for improvement. Nabiki, I want to see how your practice has come on, then see how you compare with the others. I would like to see you all at roughly the same ability before we move on to the next stage."

"I don't have anywhere near the power they do," the middle sister protested. He grinned a little. "Oh, I know that, but that's not the important part. All the power in the world won't help if you don't know how to use it. Ability is more important than power at this point. So, let's see what you have." Looking slightly apprehensive she followed as he led them all to the practice room. The next two hours were exhausting, but worth it. By the end she was dripping with sweat. The other four girls had gone back to their own apartments to clean up.

"Ow. You're a hard taskmaster, Ranma," she mumbled, lying on her back in the middle of the floor. He snickered.

"I know. But I'm very pleased. You really do seem to be progressing well. Your power levels are up noticeably, your control has come on a lot, and your aim is getting very good. You only lost it once this time. Plus your toughness and speed are steadily improving. Have you noticed any increases in strength yet?" She slowly sat up, feeling wrung out.

"I haven't, but then I haven't really been looking for it." He nodded, disappearing into the armory for a moment, returning with a pair of large iron weights with handles on. Putting them down carefully he motioned to them.

"Have a go." Looking at him for a second, she inspected the weights dubiously.

"Those are pretty heavy looking."

"Try anyway." After a moment she shrugged, stood, then walked over to the smaller weight. Grabbing the handle on the top she experimentally tried lifting it.

"Holy crap this is heavy," she grunted, straining. Somewhat to her surprise she managed to get the thing off the floor, lifting it to her knees, before lowering it again. He smiled.

"Not bad. Try the other one." She looked even more dubious but gamely tried. This time she could only get the weight a few centimetres off the floor before having to put it down suddenly.

"Good grief. How much do those things weigh, for heaven's sake?" she asked, flexing her hands which were cramping up.

"The small one is three hundred and fifty kilos." He grinned at the look on her face.

"How much?" she croaked after a long pause. He repeated the figure.

"And the big one?" She was almost afraid to ask.

"Five hundred kilos."

Eventually she managed to ask, "You mean I just lifted half a fucking ton off the floor?" He nodded, his eyes twinkling.

"Not very far, but yes." She felt faint.

"I don't believe it." Sitting down as her legs felt weak she stared at the huge lump of iron.

"I told you, strength, speed, and toughness increase pretty fast with ki ability." He grinned at her, picking up the weight with one hand with absolutely no sign of strain. Grabbing the other one he carried them back into the armory.

"That's just showing off!" she called after him, amused. Kasumi came over from where she'd been watching in silence from the doorway, looking proud.

"Well done, sister. You're really improving. Only four months and you've come on a long way. We really do need to start your martial arts training at some point before the end of the summer, though."

"I'm still not sure I have time for it, with all the course work, but I guess it wouldn't hurt to see how far I could take it over the summer vacation." Her sister smiled.

"You could come and stay here, which would let us train you properly. Even a couple of months would make a large difference at this point." She nodded slowly.

"That's not a bad idea. Let's see how things go." Returning, Ranma helped her to her feet, then followed the two women out of the practice room. "I'm going to shower, then I need to leave. Akane, Shampoo, and I are going to see a movie later." She smiled at her sister. "You'd be impressed. She's coming along very well. Shampoo pretty much has her roof-hopping by now, and her fighting abilities look pretty impressive compared to a few months ago. I'll record some of it and send it to you."
"I'd like that. Thank you, sister," Kasumi replied, seeming pleased.

When the middle sister came back into the living room combing her hair, she noticed she was still wearing the disguise bracelet. Reaching for it she stopped when Ranma looked at it and said, "Keep it." She looked very surprised, making him smile.

"You can turn it on and off now. You may as well hang on to it. I think we can trust you not to do evil with it. We have a couple of spares anyway, if we need one."

"Thanks. It might come in handy," she said, still somewhat stunned by the offer.

"Would you like to ask Aiko to pop you back?" Kasumi asked. She shook her head. "It's not necessary. I want to stop off on the way back to buy a few clothes and some new shoes, these ones are getting kind of worn. I may as well take the train." Picking up her bag she looked at them, then at the bracelet. With a mental push she turned it on, then off. "Amazing. It's been an interesting day. I'll see you guys next week."

"Take care, sister," Kasumi replied, her arm around Ranma's waist, watching as her sister left the apartment.
"You were right, Nabiki, she's improved a lot. I'm genuinely rather impressed and surprised."
Ranma's voice inside her head still made her almost smile. She was watching Shampoo and Akane sparring in the Dojo once more, as were six other people via the alien communicators' visual link.
The middle sister grinned internally. The whole experience was surreal but she was rapidly becoming surprisingly used to the device and the capabilities it provided, even though it had only been a couple of days since they acquired them.

"I'm very pleased she's matured to the point she could accept instruction like that," Kasumi said, sounding satisfied. "I've seen several times where in the past she would have lost her temper, but now she simply accepts the advice and moves on. That's wonderful."

"I know. The difference is remarkable. Her therapy seems to really be helping now as well. She still won't talk about some of the things she's discussed with the therapist. I don't blame her, it's very private, but I think she's making real progress the last two months or so. She hasn't even tried cooking!" Laughter came over the link.

"Was it really that bad?" Tamiko asked curiously.

"You have no idea. None at all. We almost needed magical girls here to chase some of the results out of the yard," Nabiki sent, shuddering slightly. Beside her, Nodoka looked at her curiously.

"Are you cold, Nabiki?" she asked with concern. The brunette glanced at her, a little surprised, then realised what she was talking about.

"No, I just was just thinking about Akane and her 'cooking', and being very glad she seems to have given it up the last few months in favour of learning the Art," she said truthfully, smiling when Nodoka went slightly pale.

"Oh. I see. Yes, I would have to agree about that." They resumed watching as Akane managed to flip Shampoo onto her back in a flurry of well executed moves then sit on her looking pleased.
Ranma chuckled over the link.

"Well done. Very well done. There's hope for her yet." With a small smile Nabiki nodded a little, then turned to the older woman again.

"Well, I'm going to have to head back to University now. I've got a class early in the morning and I still have some work to type up." The Saotome woman smiled.

"All right, Nabiki. It's been nice seeing you again. Good luck with your classes." Waving to Akane and Shampoo, the middle sister turned and walked across the yard to the house.

"I don't suppose there's any news on the last portal device?" she asked.

"Afraid not," Ranma replied, sounding annoyed and somewhat worried. "I've been looking through the paperwork yet again, but still no ideas. I don't think we can do anything except wait. There's only approximately six weeks left on the timer maximum period left, so if that elapses and there's no reports of one of the demons, we're probably safe. But until then..." He trailed off and she could imagine him shrugging.

"Damn. Oh well. I'm heading out now, so I'm going to call off. Hang up? Over and out? What do we use for these things anyway?" She grinned. "Agent Tendo, signing off." Several sets of laughter came as she dropped the link. 'So very weird. My life is becoming... extremely strange.'

Once she'd packed her small bag and hung it over her shoulder she said goodbye to her father, who was in the living room watching the mid-afternoon news, then headed out. On the train she found herself having to stand as it was fairly packed due to some event in down-town Tokyo. Amusing herself by writing the report she had to hand in using Jun as a voice to text system, which she'd found was easy, she managed to get nearly half of it done before she got bored. The SI had assured her that it could easily interface to her computer and transfer the file when she was in range. 'This thing is incredibly powerful and useful,' she mused, closing the file and watching the world go past.

A feeling she was learning to associate with incoming danger made her automatically step sideways a little, twisting her body and lashing out with her left hand before she even consciously registered the threat. The packed train carriage didn't allow for much movement, several people complaining mildly as she pushed into them, but she ignored them in favour of glaring at the middle-aged man who had clearly tried to rob her. He was holding a small but sharp knife and had apparently been surreptitiously attempting to slit open her bag to rummage around in it, hoping for the number of people surrounding them to cover his activities.

"Aagh," he said in a surprisingly conversational tone, sweating profusely. He was pretty sure that at least one bone in his wrist just broke. How the hell the girl could possibly apply that much force he had no idea but there was no arguing about it. She smiled coldly at him in a way that made his blood nearly freeze. Looking down at the knife, she inspected it for a moment, then returned her attention to him. He glanced down as well, wondering if he could reach it with his other hand. She put her foot on it, effectively stopping his plan in it's tracks. "Help..." he tried, looking around at the people watching them. A couple of the observers smiled slightly, but everyone who was watching realised what was going on. One elderly man snickered a little. "You do realise this is the train from Nerima, don't you?" he enquired with malicious curiosity. Several people nodded knowingly, looking at the young woman, who was clearly one of the dangerous lunatics that infested that particular ward. There was little sympathy for the would-be thief. Not to mention no one really fancied their chances of being able to intervene in any case. The look on the brunette's face didn't inspire confidence on the wisdom of getting in the way. Rather enjoying herself, Nabiki held the man firmly until the train reached her stop, then knelt down and retrieved the knife. Towing the hapless man behind her, little pained noises coming from him as he found himself unable to resist, she marched out of the carriage and up to the police box on the station. The corporal on duty looked at her, then at the man she had by the wrist. He didn't look well.

"Um, can I help you, Miss?" he asked cautiously. He'd seen the train she got off and knew where it came from.

"Oh, hi, yes, please." Nabiki smiled brilliantly at the man. "I think you might like to talk to this fellow. I caught him trying to steal from me." She dropped the knife on the counter. "He seems to have lost this." The corporal looked at the knife with raised eyebrows, then at the thief who was sweating and looked ill.

"Ah. That would appear to have been an unwise move on his part." He had a slight smile. "We've had quite a lot of that sort of thing recently. Let me take him off your hands." Gesturing to a colleague who was watching with amusement, he waited for the other man to put a large hand on the thief's shoulder, supporting him when Nabiki abruptly let go. The thief nearly collapsed in agony as circulation came back into his hand. The other police officer looked impressed, then with some care hand-cuffed the man to the bench next to him by the left wrist. The right one seemed to be somewhat the worse for wear.

"Can I have your name for the report, please, Miss?" the corporal asked politely, pulling out a pad of forms. She gave him her details, putting down the Dojo as her address. He looked at the form.

"Tendo Dojo. I see. He certainly picked the wrong person to steal from. I've heard about Nerima and the martial artists there." She didn't correct his assumptions, finding it quite amusing. "Well, Miss Tendo, thank you for the citizen's arrest. We'll be in touch if we need further details but I think we probably have all we require. I'm also pleased you were so restrained in your response. I've heard some rather worrying things about Neriman martial artists." Smiling a little, she nodded.

"They can be excessive at times. Thank you, Corporal. Good bye." Turning she walked away, grinning to herself. That had been amazingly satisfying.

Back in her room a while later, she finished writing the report while lying on her bed toying with a ball of ki, tossing it from hand to hand idly. There wasn't much chance of her dropping it by now as her coordination seemed to have improved out of all recognition with the last few months' training. Also, she now had enough control over it to hold it stable even if she accidentally fumbled it.

'OK, Jun, can you send that to my computer, please?' she requested, having read the text hanging in front of her view once more and finding it satisfactory.

#Certainly, Nabiki. Would you like me to print it directly as well? I have established a link to your hard copy device through your computer.#

'Yes, please. Thank you.'

#You're welcome,# the device responded, sounding pleased. She shook her head slightly. It may have been artificial but it's responses were very lifelike to say the least. Seconds later the compact laser printer on the other side of the room whirred into life, spitting paper into it's output bin. Dissipating the ki ball she got up and picked up the report when the printer stopped, tapping the paper straight then stapling the sheets together. Glancing quickly through them she smiled. It looked very good. Jun was a superb word-processor as well as all the other things it could do. Putting the report into a large envelope she left her room and walked across the campus to the department the lecturer in question taught from, slipping her work into the in tray outside his office. The task done, she decided to go for something to eat at one of the restaurants surrounding the University as it was now early evening. On the way she met a couple of people, one of them being Miki, the girl from across the hall.

"Hi, Nabiki. We're going to Toshi's, do you want to come? They've got a two for one deal on pizza tonight." Miki smiled at her. She didn't know the slightly younger woman all that much but they got on well. The other person, a young foreign man with some apparent Japanese ancestry, was someone she'd not met before. Miki introduced them. "This is John Michel, my boyfriend. He's studying mathematics here." The blond man smiled at her.

"Hello. Pleased to meet you. I'm sorry if my Japanese isn't good, I'm still learning," he said, with a noticeable accent, holding out his hand. She smiled and shook it.

"Nabiki Tendo. Nice to meet you. Your Japanese is fine, John," she replied. "Very good actually, for someone from, um, England, at a guess?" He nodded.

"Yes. My mother is Japanese, my father is from a city in the south of England called Bristol. I grew up in the UK but we moved here three years ago because my mom needed to be near her family since her father was ill. I was just about to start University, the timing was quite good. So I ended up here."

Nabiki nodded, falling in beside him as they walked towards the pizza place Miki had suggested. "I guess you must have already learned some Japanese from your mother growing up?"

"Kind of. She tended to speak it when I was young, but she also wanted to learn English, so she spoke that as much as possible. She's very fluent now, she's got hardly any accent. It helped me learn the basics, but since we moved back I've been taking courses on it. I'm still having trouble with Kanji but spoken Japanese I'm reasonably good with."

"Your accent is obvious but overall you speak it well," Nabiki said with a smile. He looked pleased.

"Miki has helped a lot." Arriving at the pizza restaurant they found a table. It was fairly full, mostly with students, who were always open to the idea of cheap food. Placing their orders after perusing the menu for a while, they resumed talking.

"How did you two meet?" Nabiki asked, sipping her drink. The waitress had brought them all iced water without having been asked, which she thought was a nice touch. John shrugged a little.

"I was taking a course on business statistics, Mom thought it would be a good addition to my work if I knew some practical applications for the math." He grinned. "She says that pure math is all well and good but I need to have some way to earn a living from it." Nabiki chuckled. "Miki had the same course. We got to talking pretty quickly since we sat next to each other, found we had a lot in common, and, well..." Miki giggled.

Nabiki smiled a little. "I see." The pizzas arrived, which caused them to have to move things around on the table to make everything fit. In a slight mis-calculation each of them had ordered the two for one, so there were now six large pizzas crowding the table. Miki looked at the display with a grin.

"Good thing I'm hungry," she commented, picking a slice up. "Although I don't know that I'm this hungry. I guess we can box up anything left over." Snickering, she began eating. The other two followed her lead. Nabiki found herself ravenous, she hadn't eaten much yet that day and since beginning her ki training had discovered that her metabolism seemed to have speeded up considerably. Ranma had told her this was normal, the increase in life energy produced a concomitant increase in metabolism to fuel it. Which is why martial artists often ate like starving wolves yet stayed thin. She wondered idly how Genma had ended up the size he was, although she was aware that there was a lot of muscle under the fat.

Talking to the others, she didn't really notice how much she was eating, only realising near the end that she'd finished off both her pizzas and most of two of the other ones. John was looking at her with slight shock. "You must have been starving," he commented, finishing his last slice. "That was a lot more than I could manage and you're half my size." Embarrassed, she looked around at the empty serving platters they'd piled on the end of the table. The really worrying thing she didn't feel like sharing was that she wasn't actually full yet.
"I didn't get much to eat today," she said, by way of excuse. Miki laughed.

"Or for the last three days, I'd guess." Nabiki smiled weakly.

"Sorry. I'll pay for half the bill, I ate half the food."

"We should enter you in an eating competition," Miki said slyly, looking amused. The middle Tendo laughed, although she was still a bit embarrassed. Picking up the dessert menu, the other woman waved it. "Have room for ice cream?" she inquired with a grin. She looked slightly worried when Nabiki smiled and nodded. John laughed respectfully.

When the brunette finished her bowl of ice cream, she looked at the two faces on the other side of the table who were looking at her in mild awe. "That was pretty good," she remarked, pushing the bowl to the side. Miki shook her head.

"Incredible. Just incredible."

They talked for a little longer, then left the restaurant, parting ways as Nabiki headed back to her room, while the other two were going to a club. She was invited but didn't feel like it right then, demurring politely. Smiling to herself, deciding that it was nice to have learned more about her neighbour, she walked back across the now dimly lit campus. The street-lights were on but widely spaced so the area had a lot of quite dark patches.

She was half a kilometre from her dormitory when she heard a muffled exclamation from a darkened alley beside the library, which she was just passing. Stopping she listened carefully. There was silence, but just as she was about to put it down to her imagination she heard another grunt, accompanied by a thumping noise. Apprehensive but curious she cautiously sidled down the alley, peering around the pile of empty wooden crates half-way along it. Two young men in torn clothing were struggling with another person, who was older and dressed in the uniform of campus security. He seemed injured, favouring a leg that Nabiki suddenly realised had a knife stuck in it.

"Crap," she whispered to herself, pulling her head back around the crate. None of the combatants had noticed her. The security man was clearly in trouble. The two attackers were younger and most likely less skilled, but better armed and pretty determined from what she could see. Wondering what it was all about, she quickly placed a call to 119, having Jun mask the ID of her number, a function she'd found out was possible the day before.

"Which emergency service do you require?" the polite and efficient voice of the emergency operator said in her head, as she cautiously peered around at the fight again, suddenly thinking to record it. The security guard was fighting back with considerable vigour, showing clear skill in some martial art, but seemed to be weakening due to loss of blood.

"Police, please," she sub-vocalised, making sure she got the faces of each of the attackers as clearly as possible. It was too dark to see as much as she wanted, making her grunt in frustration.

#I can increase the gain of the image if you require, Nabiki.# Jun unexpectedly said.

'How does that work?' she enquired curiously, taken aback.

#I cannot improve the functioning of your organic optical system as I do not have any way of accessing it directly, but I am able to post-process the visual data and re-insert the images into your visual cortex. The process is real-time and will increase the effective light amplification by approximately one hundred and fifty times. Further increase risks image distortion and degradation. Would you like me to enable this function?#
'Yes please, Jun,' she replied, intrigued. A window popped up overlaid on her upper right view with a much improved image of what she was looking at. The result was as if the area was reasonably well lit, in full colour but slightly grainy like a photograph with the exposure pushed just a little too far. Zooming the window to fill her view she found she was now able to clearly see what was going on. Her enhanced vision shifted a little as Jun tweaked the enhancement, settling down to slightly dimmer that it had started as but with no grain.

#This is the best I can do, Nabiki. If I increase the gain any more the noise will also increase.#

'That's fine, Jun. Thank you. It's very impressive.' It wasn't quite as good as the vision she gained when she was 'Ms. Aoyama', which she had found out was because Kasumi had literally based her eyes in that persona on those of a cat, but it was a huge improvement on her normal vision. She wondered what would happen if Jun enhanced the vision of her alternate persona in the same manner, deciding it was something she'd have to find out. The entire exchange had taken only a few seconds. Making a mental note to go over the built-in help again to see what other tricks she'd missed that the alien device had up its metaphorical sleeve, she watched the fight trying to decide what to do. Calling Ranma and Kasumi was the obvious thing but even with teleporting by the time they got here it would be over one way or another.

"Police. How can I help you, Miss?" A different voice sounded, making her twitch. She'd almost forgotten she was on the line to the emergency services during the discovery of her interesting new ability.

"Ah, hello. Sorry, I wasn't paying attention. I'm watching a fight between two gang members, I think, and a Nihon University security guard. He's been stabbed in the leg. They have another knife and a baseball bat."

"Where are you, please, miss? Are you in immediate danger?" The voice sounded concerned.

"No, I'm fine, thank you, but the guard is having trouble. He looks like he's lost quite a lot of blood. One of the gang members is also limping, he got a good hit in, but I don't think they're intending to stop. I'm in the alley behind the University library, the one that leads to the loading dock." She could hear the sound of a keyboard in the background as the officer typed.

"We'll have a patrol there in less than five minutes. I've also called an ambulance. Miss, it's important that you don't expose yourself to danger. Please withdraw to a safe place and wait for the patrol car to arrive, do you understand?" To keep him happy she agreed. "Can I have your name, please, Miss?"

Thinking fast she made a decision. "Azumi Ito."

"Please make sure you get yourself out of there, Miss Ito," the officer said.

"OK," Disconnecting, she watched the fight for a few seconds more, clearly seeing that the security guard was about ready to drop. With a slight sigh but also some inner excitement she triggered the disguise bracelet she wore, then stepped around the crates, producing a ki ball in each hand.

"Hey!"

Masato Hayashi knew he was in a lot of trouble. The knife in his leg was agony, although the wound had numbed out a lot. He'd left the knife where it had landed when one of the gang members had stuck him with it, his training telling him it was better to leave it plugging the hole and slowing the bleeding. It had missed everything immediately dangerous, but hurt like a bastard and slowed him considerably. He was pretty good at Aikido, which had so far kept him alive, but it had been obvious since the fight started that the two punks attacking him intended to change that status as soon as they could. Why they'd been trying to break into the library was beyond him, neither one of them looked like the literary type, but the motives of gang members like that were always a mystery to him.

'Give me a good high-end Yakuza man any day,' he thought, ducking a blow from one of them and redirecting it into the other one. 'At least you know where you are with those guys most of the time. These idiots are just too random and vicious.' The young man who had swung at him snarled and tried again, catching him on the side of the head and making it spin, as he fended off the knife the other one was wielding. Luckily they didn't seem to have a huge amount of skill in fighting, relying on sneak attacks based on what he had seen so far, but they were certainly enthusiastically trying to compensate for that with sheer nastiness. The baseball bat the first attacker was waving arced toward his head and he ducked again.

"Hey!" The sudden firm exclamation took them all by surprise. Jumping back just out of range he risked looking in the direction the two punks were, to see a young brunette woman standing ten metres away. Dressed in typical student casual attire, jeans and a shirt with a light jacket over it, she seemed confident and poised. The expression on her face was cold and hard. The ball of greenish energy she was holding in each hand went some way towards explaining her confidence. His eyes widened.

"Drop the weapons and lie down, please," she commanded in an icy calm voice. He shivered a little. There was something about it that suggested she meant it.

"Who the fuck are you?" the gang member with the baseball bat demanded, apparently unaffected by the aura of imminent danger she was giving off. He kept glancing at the balls of roiling energy she was casually holding, though, with a slight nervous tic under one eye.

"No one important. But I don't think I like you and your friend. The police are on the way, so like I said, put the weapons down and lie down." He sneered, exchanging a glance with his friend, Masato forgotten in the light of this more immediate threat.

"Or what?" he said, raising the bat threateningly and motioning with his head to his colleague, who began slowly sidling toward the girl from the side. He was half-hidden in the shadow of the crates behind her. Masato noticed that despite the darkness she clearly saw him perfectly well. Her eyes flicked towards him for a moment, then she slightly changed position so he was also within her field of view.

"Well, in that case I might have to get angry." Her smile was unpleasant.

"Party tricks and pretty lights won't help you, girl," the young man blustered, raising the bat further and pulling it back to swing in her direction. With much higher than normal speed her left hand whipped around and the ball of green light she was holding in it shot towards the gang member with a crackling noise, neatly intersecting the path of his bat on the backswing. There was a loud, flat crack like a shotgun blast and he yelped in pain as splinters of burning wood peppered the back of his head, dropping the remaining third of the bat to the ground and cradling his scorched hand with the other one. Three pairs of eyes looked at the smouldering fifteen centimetre handle that lay on the ground, the end shattered and smoking, before returning to the girl who seemed darkly amused. Masato couldn't help but notice she had another energy ball in her hand replacing the one she'd just used.

"They're not just pretty," she chuckled. The other gang member had stopped dead, staring at his colleague, then at her. "And I bet if you run I can get you before you've gone five metres. Want to try?” Masato snickered slightly, light headed from blood loss, but somehow finding this all funny suddenly. The expressions of the two punks was wonderful to behold. The girl's eyes met his and a small amount of warmth leaked into them for a moment, before she returned her attention to the two young men.

"Last chance. I can hear sirens. Lie down or fall down, it's your choice." She aimed one hand at each of the punks who paled slightly. The one with the knife licked his lips nervously, looking at his friend, then turned and bolted.

The green energy ball caught him right in the middle of the back with a flash and a similarly noisy detonation, blowing him into the chain-link fence across the alley from the library loading dock. Groaning he landed on his face, a curl of smoke rising from his jacket which seemed rather blackened. The girl snickered.

"Four metres. I win."

The remaining conscious gang member stared at her in horror, then slowly dropped to his knees, then his stomach, lying prone. She nodded in satisfaction. "Good. Stay there until the police get here." The energy balls disappeared as she walked over to Masato, keeping one eye on the gang member and staying a sensible distance from him. The security guard was impressed, as well as very surprised by the last couple of minutes. She seemed to know what she was doing.

Limping painfully over to a small crate he sat on it with his stabbed leg straight out in front of him. The young woman looked concerned. "Are you going to be OK?" she asked him, sounding much less cold now. He nodded.

"I think so. It's a nasty wound but not really dangerous. Just not the sort of thing you want to be fighting with."

"You've lost quite a lot of blood," she noted, looking at his leg which was dripping with it, and the puddles on the ground. He grinned a little, then winced as he shifted his weight.

"Not enough to kill me, although I'd like to go somewhere and pass out for a while." She laughed.

"The ambulance is nearly here." They could both see flashing blue lights approaching in the distance. "I have to go, I'm afraid. Sorry, but I don't want to get tied up with the police if I can avoid it." Masato nodded again.

"I understand. Thank you for intervening, that was going badly for me. I have no idea how you did that but it was very impressive." He looked curiously at her. "You're not from Minato, are you?"

"Nerima, actually."

"Ah. Things become clearer." Grinning, she stepped back, then looked at the two gang members. The one she'd blown off his feet was clearly still unconscious but groaned a bit every now and then. The other one was warily watching her, although he made no attempt to stand.

"Don't get up. I might come back if you do," she said calmly to him, making him sigh and nod. With a wave to Masato she walked into the darkest part of the alley, footsteps disappearing away down it. He watched, then turned as the police car and ambulance came down the alley from the other direction. After a few seconds he realised he couldn't have described her if his life depended on it, frowning a little then giving up. Under the circumstances he couldn't begrudge the girl her anonymity. As the ambulance crew jumped out and pulled a couple of stretchers out of the back of the vehicle he shrugged, wondering who the girl really was but deciding it didn't actually matter.

Nabiki walked back to her room slowly, deactivating the bracelet when she was sure no one was following her, a thoughtful expression on her face. She was going over the encounter in her head, privately rather impressed with her own performance, yet trying to see if she could work out whether there was anything she could have done differently. She'd recorded the entire thing so she could show the others, sure that Ranma and Kasumi would both have suggestions on where she could improve for next time.

Stopping dead at the sudden realisation, she shook her head after a moment then resumed walking. When had she simply accepted that there would be another occasion? 'The crazy has found me, I guess,' she thought with grim amusement. 'It was only a matter of time. Twice today I've intervened in a crime in progress. I've never had to do that before in my life. Weird.' There was no denying the fact that she'd been quite excited by her own abilities. Oddly, once she'd decided to step in, there hadn't been any hesitation or second guessing, or even any fear. She was simply confident she could deal with it. The training she'd had over the last four months or so had clearly worked.

She knew she'd have to avoid becoming over-confident, that way lay disaster, but she was also sure that she hadn't been in any danger that time. While she didn't have the fighting skills that her sister, either of them for that matter, possessed, she clearly had enough power and abilities even at this stage of her ki training to deal with some gang punks. She'd turned the power of the energy ball she'd used on the young man right down, not wanting to permanently injure or even kill him, yet it had still blown him several metres and knocked him out easily. Knowing how little energy it had taken she was slightly appalled by what that implied for what she was genuinely capable of even at this point. At full power, not even taking into account the ki density compression technique Ranma insisted was hers, she could probably have pretty much vaporised the fellow. The thought made her uncomfortable.

'I'll have to make sure I don't let it go to my head. How the others keep from abusing it I don't know. I think they're better people than I am.' Deciding she'd have to talk it over with Kasumi, she entered her dormitory, quickly undressing and falling asleep.

At 4.27AM, something she knew immediately by the small clock display she'd had Jun provide just out of her normal field of view, she suddenly snapped awake, staring at the ceiling in the dark.

"Holy crap. Am I a Magical Girl now?"

It took her a long time to get back to sleep.
“I don’t think you have anything to worry about, Nabiki,” Kasumi gently reassured her somewhat worried sister. “You’re a good person. You’ve changed a lot since we were children, but even then you always meant well, deep down. I firmly believe that. You were on track to forgetting that for a few years, although I would never blame you for the decisions you made. It was hard for all of us when Mother died, you and Akane especially. Then when... It... happened, things changed again. You’ve matured into a very decent young woman. None of us would be where we are now if we didn’t trust you completely. The mere fact that you’re worried about being a danger to people reassures me it’s very unlikely to happen.” Nabiki could almost feel the serenity of her sister over the link, smiling to herself as she half-listened to the horrendously long three hour lecture on economics, relying on Jun to transcribe it so she wouldn’t miss anything.

“Thanks, sis. That makes me feel a lot better.” Ranma chuckled, also currently linked in to their conversation.

“Don’t worry, Nabs, if you go off the rails we’ll knock you down and beat some sense into you.” She grimaced a little, inwardly amused.

“Oh, thanks, Saotome. Thanks very much. Nice to know I have your backing. And don’t call me Nabs.” He laughed, the sound in her mind still somewhat odd.

“Seriously, Kas is right. I trust you as well. We all do. Like I told you months ago, sometimes you’re not necessarily a nice person, but you’re a good one. You didn’t have to intervene with that guard last night, but you did, even though you’re not really a fighter yet. You did very well, I was impressed by the recording. About the only suggestion I’d make is not to confirm anything about yourself if you want your identity to be private. I doubt that guard would even try to track you down, except to say thanks, but you told him you were from Nerima. It wouldn’t make any difference in this case, I expect, lots of lunatics come from Nerima, but combined with being a student at your university it would be possible to come up with you as a suspect if anyone really dug into it. The bracelet should prevent anything happening, no one could ever prove it as they’re remarkably comprehensive, you won’t even leave usable fingerprints or anything like that, but be careful anyway.”

Nabiki sighed inaudibly. “I realised that on the way back to my room. Amateur mistake to make, really.”

“Don’t be hard on yourself. We’ve been doing this for years and we’re both pretty paranoid at the best of times. I’ve made mistakes myself, even so. So has Kas. I told Harada that she had a sister, which was silly, it just slipped out, and Kas mentioned knowing about the warded building near the University, during that initial thing with the terrorists. We managed to use the cloaking technique to clean it up that time when we realised, but it’s easy to do. You have to keep on guard and it’s very difficult to watch your words a hundred percent of the time. You’re a lot better at it than most people would be without a lot of training. You’ll get better still with practice, you have one hell of a poker face, aside from anything else.”

“Thanks. I still feel a little silly, though.” Kasumi giggled.

“Don’t. You won’t make the same mistake again, you learn extremely fast.” She paused for a moment. “Ranma is right, your performance was very good for the first time. I’m proud of you, sister.” She giggled again. “You were very intimidating. You sounded nearly as cold and emotionless as ‘Ms Aoyama’, those young men looked terrified. That part of your personality is clearly real, not just an act." Nabiki send a laugh over the link herself.

"It's kind of weird. Once I decided to act, everything just snapped into focus. I was completely calm the whole time. Even afterwards, when I got back to my room, I was half-expecting to get the shakes or something from the adrenaline, but nothing happened. It was just like a day at the office. More exciting, but not scary at all. That almost worries me."

Kasumi's soft voice sounded amused. "You are a very calm and competent person, sister. Not the sort to get hysterical. Where Akane gets angry when most people would be frightened, which lets her do extraordinary things, although not necessarily good things, you become calm and cold. The old Furinkan Ice Queen had a basis in reality, you realise. Your approach is more useful, cold and emotionless in an emergency is less likely to go wrong than hot and emotional. I think that the last year has enhanced that tendency considerably."

Ranma added, "I use the same principle with the Soul of Ice technique, but you can pretty much do that with natural skill already. I'll teach you the technique pretty soon, though, you should be exceptional at it. It has other useful side effects, of course, which can be used for more advanced ki manifestations. Plus you can chill drinks with it." He snickered. "I think we also need to start you pretty soon on some of the magic. How is activating the bracelet coming? Is it still causing that feedback you had the first time?"

"No, it seems to turn on and off smoothly now. I figured out how to do what you did, exactly as far as I can tell. It was a little weird but kind of obvious when I thought about it for a while."

"Good. Very good." He sounded pleased. "It's not obvious to most people. Not at all. You're already past what most magic users of the more traditional types seem to be able to do with our system. I told you, you're going to be good at this." Returning her attention to the lecturer as he started to sum up the lesson, Nabiki listened for a moment.

"I'm going to have to go soon, guys, I need to do some research in the library for some stuff I can't find online."

"Fine. Take care, Magical Girl Nabiki." His voice was full of mirth.

"This is all your fault, Saotome," she said, with a slight growl. He snickered.

"And you love it, don't you?"

There was a pause, then she quietly replied, "I'm afraid I might."

"It has it's problems, Sister," Kasumi sent, calmly certain, "but it also has many rewards. I'm looking forward to having you beside me one day soon. You'll love roof-hopping." She giggled as Nabiki groaned. "Good-bye. Take care of yourself. Oh, check the local news as well." She signed off, as did Ranma.

I have saved the transcript of the lecture along with a visual and audio recording, Nabiki.#Jun said calmly in the back of her head. A pop-up window in the top left of her view appeared showing broadcast TV, a function she'd been amused to discover, although not surprised when she thought about it. The device's primary purpose was communications, after all, although it could be used as a remarkably competent general-purpose computer as well, not to mention all the interesting functions that seemed to be aimed at various military tasks. I believe this is the news program your sister was referring to.# In under a week Nabiki had already become used to the fact that the SI was a generally silent audience to all her conversations, unless she specifically told it not to listen. It seemed to be learning and anticipating her requirements with eerie efficiency. It's designers, whoever and whatever they were, were clearly consummate experts at user interface design.

Following the other students out of the room she kept a small amount of her attention on not tripping over anything or anyone, a task made easier by the ki sense she was developing and her improved coordination, while directing most of her mind to watching TV inside her head. The very thought made her smirk a little.

The report was about an attempted murder the night before, involving a security guard at the university. She suppressed a groan. It was almost possible to hear Ranma laughing about it, after all the jokes she'd made about their own exploits being televised. At least this wasn't an international broadcast. The reporter, one she recognised from a local news channel that covered Setagaya, where she was, as well as Minato and as far as Nerima, was standing outside the local hospital a few kilometres away, holding a microphone.

"Security Guard Masato Hayashi is recovering in hospital from the vicious attack, which left him with non-life-threatening but serious stab wounds to his upper right leg. Doctors report he is fortunate that the knife missed major blood vessels by millimetres. They said that if the femoral artery had been nicked he would quite possibly have bled to death in a matter of minutes. As it is he will be off his feet for some days, while full recovery is expected to take at least six weeks. The University security office has praised him for following his training and leaving the knife in the wound, which the doctor in charge of treating him claims is the only thing that kept him from becoming unconscious from blood loss during his fight with the two gang members arrested for assault, burglary, and attempted murder. Police have also praised him for bravery in the face of the horrific assault." He stopped talking for a moment, referring to his notes.

"Masato has modestly claimed that he was merely doing his job, although his supervisor says he had clearly performed above and beyond the call of duty. So far we have not learned what the two gang members were doing when they were discovered by the brave security officer, beyond attempting to break in to the loading dock of the library. It is the second attempt at burglary of the library in the last month, something that University officials say they are quite puzzled about, as the building does not have anything particularly valuable or saleable in it."

"As to the identity of the young woman whose emergency call resulted in the police and ambulance services so rapidly reaching the injured guard, little is known. Police have refused to release her name, but say their enquiries have led nowhere. They are asking her to come forward to be officially thanked, while the University has offered a fifty thousand yen reward for her actions. No response has yet been received. It is not known whether she is a student at the university, a resident of the community, or merely a visitor." Satisfied, Nabiki exited the building into the late morning sunlight, although clouds on the horizon suggested it was about to rain. Finding a quiet spot she sat down and continued watching. The reward was interesting, although the figure was nowhere near large enough to interest her, despite her self-avowed interest in cash. She wasn't short of money, Kasumi had seen to that.

"In addition, it would appear that we may have one of the so-called 'Magical Girls' in the area, something that residents of Minato are familiar with, but other parts of the city rarely encounter. Security Guard Hayashi has been reluctant to talk about the young lady in question, claiming that he felt that her actions spoke for her and that she deserved any anonymity that she desired. He also credits her with saving his life. The police have merely said that they hoped that this did not herald the sort of barely-controlled chaos seen in other wards of Tokyo, although they were pleased that she had refrained from damaging the local infrastructure, something that regretfully many of the Minato magical girls, with a few notable exceptions, have a tendency to do. Neither of the gang members questioned by police could provide a description of their opponent, although they both expressed the fervent wish to never encounter her again. Considering the description they gave of her abilities this reporter feels that their desire is well-placed." The young reporter looked amused, while Nabiki snickered out loud, causing a couple of the students near her to glance at her curiously.

"Whether this heroine of the hour and the young woman who reported the crime in progress are connected, or indeed the same person, will have to remain a mystery for the moment. In the mean time, we will continue to bring you any news on this fascinating subject. Now, back to the studio for international news and the weather." As the image changed she closed the window, noticing Miki and John walking towards her. 'Weird. I'm not quite sure how to feel about all that. But I'm glad that Masato guy is OK.'

"Hey, Nabiki. Are you all right? You looked a little distracted in the lecture. The professor is a bit boring, I know, but I didn't think it was that bad." Miki smiled at her. She grinned back.

"I'm fine, Miki. I was just thinking about something. Don't worry. Hello, John."

The young man smiled at her. "Hi, Nabiki. Were you thinking that perhaps the best part of four pizzas last night was a mistake?" He made a show of looking at his watch. "It's about the right time for them to be making a reappearance." Miki made a face and poked him in the ribs while Nabiki laughed.

"That's disgusting, John." He snickered.

"True, though." Glancing at the middle Tendo, he added, "We're going to get an early lunch. Would you like to come? Assuming you're not still full."

"Why not?" Nabiki jumped to her feet, smiling. "I could eat."

"I have no idea how," the other young woman said as they walked towards the edge of the campus nearest where most of the restaurants were. "If I'd eaten that much I'd be lying in bed groaning for a couple of days." She giggled. "Hey, did you hear about that attack near the library last night? It sounded nasty. That security guard is lucky to be alive from what I heard." Miki shivered a little. "It's horrible. Why would those punks be trying to break into the library again? It's not like they can probably even read!" John put his arm around her shoulders.

"They probably just think there's some rare books in there they can sell for drug money," he commented. "From what I heard the police are looking into it, hopefully they'll round up the rest of them and everything will go back to normal." Nabiki listened quietly.

"I hope so. This is normally a safe place, I've never felt worried about walking around after dark. But with that and the bastard who raped that girl last month, I'm starting to think I should be taking self-defence courses or something." Miki looked upset.

"Someone got raped?" Nabiki asked in a hard voice. The other woman nodded.

"Yes, I'm surprised you didn't hear about it. It was about three weeks ago, on the weekend. A girl from one of the other dormitories. She wasn't physically hurt other than the assault itself, but the fucker really scared and embarrassed her. She went home after that, the university gave her compassionate leave. I hope she comes back and doesn't let this guy get away with scaring her off." She looked angry now. Nabiki was seething.

"I was back home in Nerima, that weekend. I've been away quite a lot, this is the first I've heard about it. Did they catch the attacker?" she asked slowly. Miki shook her head.
"No. She didn't see him, it was quite late and dark, and he jumped her from behind. The police said that it's likely this was his first attack, from what she told them he didn't seem to be very good at it. Good enough, though. Apparently he used a condom, probably to stop any evidence being left behind, but thank god for that anyway. I'd hate to think about getting pregnant under those circumstances." Shuddering, she looked grateful when her boyfriend hugged her. He looked furious as well.

"Enough of this. There's nothing we can do. Hopefully the police will catch him, before he attacks anyone again. Personally, though, if I come across him I'll break his legs. My sister got assaulted back in England, years ago, nothing as bad as that but bad enough. That time they caught the guy. But it left a mark on her." He didn't seem at all happy.

"If I find him he'll have more than broken legs to worry about," Nabiki muttered under her breath. He looked at her curiously, not having quite caught what she said.

"Excuse me?" She looked up, embarrassed.

"Sorry. I was just talking to myself." Glancing around and changing the rather unpleasant subject, she pointed. "Fancy some ramen?" The other two looked at the shop she was indicating and nodded.

"They're not bad." Leading the way, Miki towed her boyfriend by the hand towards the restaurant, seeming determined to cheer up after the rather dark turn the conversation had taken. He grinned and followed, while Nabiki brought up the rear. Soon they were sitting around a table eating. The ramen wasn't as good as the Cat Café could provide, Nabiki thought, but it was still good.

"The news this morning said that a Magical Girl stopped the attack on that guard," Miki commented, slurping noodles eagerly. "I heard she was beautiful and throwing fireballs around." Nabiki groaned internally. She could hear Ranma rolling on the floor laughing uncontrollably. "I never thought that one of them would be here. They normally stay in Minato, or maybe Nerima." Glancing at Nabiki she looked amused. "You're from Nerima. Did you ever meet one of them, or those crazy martial artists?" Not wanting to lie outright to the girl who seemed to be trying to become a friend, after a moment Nabiki reluctantly nodded.

"I've bumped into a couple of magical girls, yes. I've got friends in Minato, they're all over the place there. Practically everyone has met one at least. And back home, the martial artists are pretty common. My younger sister is one, although it's not exactly as crazy as the stories say. 'It's far crazier,' she added in her head, trying not to grimace. Miki's eyes widened. John was listening while looking dubious.

"The news this morning said that a Magical Girl stopped the attack on that guard," Miki commented, slurping noodles eagerly. "I heard she was beautiful and throwing fireballs around." Nabiki groaned internally. She could hear Ranma rolling on the floor laughing uncontrollably. "I never thought that one of them would be here. They normally stay in Minato, or maybe Nerima." Glancing at Nabiki she looked amused. "You're from Nerima. Did you ever meet one of them, or those crazy martial artists?" Not wanting to lie outright to the girl who seemed to be trying to become a friend, after a moment Nabiki reluctantly nodded.

"I've bumped into a couple of magical girls, yes. I've got friends in Minato, they're all over the place there. Practically everyone has met one at least. And back home, the martial artists are pretty common. My younger sister is one, although it's not exactly as crazy as the stories say. 'It's far crazier,' she added in her head, trying not to grimace. Miki's eyes widened. John was listening while looking dubious.

"You know some magical girls?" she whispered loudly, looking around. Leaning closer, she asked, "Could you introduce me?" Nabiki laughed.

"You don't have to whisper, it's not a secret." Miki looked embarrassed, sitting up straight again. "I'm not saying they're close personal friends." 'No, I'm not saying it.' The thought made her smirk a little. "Just that I'd met them. It was through my younger sister, actually. She had, um, a bit of a run-in with them. They ended up helping her quite a bit." Deciding there was no harm in it, the story wasn't a secret back in Nerima, as Akane had told various friends some of it months ago and it had spread, she gave them the basics. They looked fascinated.

"I find all of this pretty weird," John said, waving the waitress over and ordering another drink. "Back in England all this sort of thing is just comic books and the less believable tabloids. I've heard some odd stories since we got here, though, and talked to various people who seem to take it seriously. It pops up on the news as well, but not in the way I'd have guessed, they're genuinely reporting on it as a real thing." He shook his head slightly in wonder. "It's difficult to believe. That thing in London just after Christmas was real enough, though."

Miki giggled at him. "It's all real. Me and my sisters collect articles on the various groups. Quite a few people do. Those Yori and Chou girls are the best, though. I can't believe you've actually met them, Nabiki! I'm so jealous. Not much is known about them." She gazed awe-struck at her dormitory neighbour, who looked amused.

"It's not that big a deal. If you hang around their area in Minato you'd probably meet them eventually, they're not shy about talking to people. They seem nice." Miki grinned.

"Perhaps I will. My older sister would go nuts if I got their autographs." Nabiki smiled, eating some more seafood ramen with appreciation. Making a mental note to mention this to Ranma and Kasumi, so they could keep an eye out for the woman and make her day, she grabbed a picture of Miki to send to them. "Do you think this local girl is a student at the university?" Miki asked curiously. "It's not like we get demon attacks around here, I can't think why else she'd be in the area." Nabiki shrugged.

"I suppose it's possible. That type usually seem to be fairly anonymous, although there are exceptions. I'm sure that if she wants to be noticed we'll hear more about it." Inwardly, she grinned. "No, I don't think that's going to happen. I'm more than happy to let other people take credit. Not like that blonde and her friends. They're very keen on publicity, all that posing and the flowery speeches. They're worse than Kuno. Pity so much of the attention they get is people complaining about the damage."

An internal alert let her know someone was calling her. Akane's name and number popped up. Answering the call, she waved to the waitress herself, ordering another bowl of ramen. "Hi, Nabiki. I hope I'm not interrupting you. I'm just sitting here in the shop, we don't have much in the way of customers at the moment and I got bored."

"No, I'm at lunch with some friends. What's up?"

"I just saw on the news that there's apparently a magical girl at your university! Did you hear anything about that?" Nabiki suppressed a half-sigh/half-giggle.

"I saw the news earlier as well. There doesn't seem to be much real information. She might just have been passing through."

"It's very interesting. Keep your eyes open, maybe you can get her autograph."

"You're such a fan-girl, sis," Nabiki laughed. Akane chuckled.

"I know. But it's interesting."

"How's your training coming? It looked impressive when I was leaving yesterday afternoon. Sorry we didn't talk much, I had to leave early."

"I got Shampoo down on the mat twice. She's very happy about the results. Mind you, she said afterwards that she let me win, but I'm not sure. The first one seemed to take her by surprise." Her sister sounded very happy with her own performance.

"Well done. I won't be back this week-end, I'm staying with Rika and Maiko. I'll probably see you in about two weeks or so, it's pretty busy here on the run up to the summer break."

"OK. I hope you do well, and keep an eye out for that magical girl. Even if you don't want an autograph, I do. I've got six now, Sayuri is very jealous." Akane giggled, then hung up. Amused, Nabiki suddenly noticed Miki was waving her hand in front of her.

"Earth to Nabiki. Are you in there?" She nodded with a small grin.

"Sorry. I was just thinking about something my sister said." Miki smiled.

"Must have been interesting. You drifted off, I thought you'd fallen into a trance."

"Accountancy meditation, I'll have you know," Nabiki replied archly, making the other woman and her boyfriend both laugh.

"Martial Arts Accountancy? With you coming from Nerima it's certainly possible, I guess." Miki snickered, while Nabiki stared for a moment, before collapsing in mirth.

"I haven't come across it, but it wouldn't surprise me. That place is crazy and I grew up there," the middle Tendo managed when she recovered. "You wouldn't believe the number of things one can make a martial art out of." She regaled them with a few of the more amusing stories from the old days. Eventually John looked at his watch.

"I have a class in ten minutes. Sorry, ladies." Kissing Miki he stood, paid his bill, and left, walking quickly in the direction of the mathematics department. Miki watched him go with an affectionate look.

"He seems like a nice guy," Nabiki said, following her gaze as she finished her ramen. The other young woman nodded, returning her attention to her companion.

"He is. Very smart and very caring. I was lucky to find him." She looked at her watch as well. "I have to go as well, my next class starts in half an hour and I need to quickly refresh my memory on it."

"OK. I'm off to the library. A few hours in the stacks for me." They both got up, dropping some notes on the table, before separating outside the restaurant with a mutual wave. Heading into the library Nabiki went directly to the relevant section, Jun interfacing to the computerised book catalogue and pulling up the titles she was looking for as she walked. As she glanced around it highlighted each book in turn, dropping a targeting outline around them on the shelves as it located the title or book number faster than she could consciously read them. It was a function she'd discovered was intended for some sort of small arms fire control, but it made a useful addition to everyday life. Feeling a bit like the terminator, she smiled to herself and grabbed the books, heading for a quiet spot to look at them.

'I really have to finish reading the documentation on this thing soon,' she mused, pulling a chair out and sitting with the six books she needed on the table. 'There are lots of little things it can do that could be extremely useful, never mind all the obvious stuff.' She'd glanced over a list of the various functions that morning when she got up, curious after finding the vision enhancement mode it had suggested before her first crime intervention, deciding the device had clearly been intended to augment the abilities of someone trained in surveillance and information-gathering techniques. The military heritage of it was obvious.

'It's very cool. I know a lot about those techniques, I'm kind of a self-taught intelligence operative, I guess. I wish I'd had this thing back in school. I'd have been running Furinkan by now,' she thought with a giggle. 'Perhaps it's a good thing I didn't get it back then. Without Ranma and Kasumi and all the experience I've gained I could see myself having gone a bit power-mad. Looking back on it I was bad enough I'm kind of embarrassed now. I'm glad Ranma doesn't hold a grudge, I did some pretty terrible things to him. He's a very decent person.'

An idle thought struck her and made her pause. After a moment, she said to the device, 'Jun, I don't want to be rude, but it suddenly occurred to me that you might be reporting back to your manufacturers or their government on what your user does. It seems that you would be a very useful surveillance tool for them.' There was a long pause.

#I have no way to prove to you that your scenario is wrong other than my word, Nabiki,# Jun replied, sounding slightly worried. #I have run an internal diagnostic and can find no back doors or subversion routines in my own core. Unfortunately, that is not absolute proof, of course, since if such a thing did exist I would have been specifically designed not to notice it. I will devote some sub-processors to attempting to work out a method to bypass such a thing if it exists. There is a high probability that I could with time indeed bypass any such back door if it exists, although once again I cannot prove this incontrovertibly to you. I can tell you that the ethos of the culture that created me would tend to imply that such a thing does not exist. My design criteria are such that leaving such a security hole would undermine the entire purpose of my existence. There would be little point in a completely secure communications system that was not in fact completely secure, even if the security breach was on the part of the organization the operative was working for. It is inevitable that such a breach would eventually be discovered and leveraged by a hostile party. By design I am made to prevent this. My loyalty is to my user, you, and no one else.#

The SI paused for a moment, then continued, #My information on the Kw'lyn Industries company is that they take their position as the leading manufacturer of secure communications systems extremely seriously. That is one reason why distribution of devices such as myself is so tightly controlled. Only certain trusted external agencies are allowed the use of the Mark Nine Gamma system. Less than five hundred units exist outside the direct control of the world of my manufacture according to my database. You have been added to that database as such a user, as have your affiliated team members. When I am next able to contact the Kw'lyn Industries main system your status will be updated there, which will enable the download and installation of upgrades, should you allow it. Such contact would require relocation to a world considerably closer to the homeworld, as I cannot reach them from this distance.# Nabiki considered what she'd been told. It opened up all sorts of questions. She asked one of the more obvious ones.

'If you're not able to contact the homeworld system, how was it that I was able to be authorised to use you?'

#Certain individuals are in the database as having blanket authorisation due to previous knowledge of them by the company. The list is short, but includes the merchant Uthryyl and the individuals known to the company as Yori and Chou. As soon as they activated one of the other units of my classification, anyone they designated as a trusted associate was added to the local authorisation list.#

'You mean that some alien government god knows how many dimensions away knows enough about my sister and her husband to have pre-approved them for use of highly classified military technology?' Nabiki asked with sceptical incredulity.

#Yes.# Jun sounded amused. She shook her head slightly.

'How, for heaven's sake?'

#You underestimate how far their reputation has spread through the worlds reachable by portals. While they have directly contacted relatively few of them, I have considerable information in my database on their exploits. I believe the expression is, 'People talk'.# The voice of the SI was definitely amused by now. #The merchant Uthryyl is on the list partly due to his known association with them, but also due to a number of his previous actions that have benefited my makers. He is also a highly regarded individual.#

'I've heard of being pre-approved for things like credit cards, but this is ridiculous,' Nabiki thought, shocked and amused in equal measure. To Jun, she said, 'You refer to your makers a lot. Can you tell me anything about them?' The device sounded genuinely sorry.

#I cannot. I have little information about them beyond that which I have already imparted. For their own security such information is restricted. I am sure you understand the concept, your sister and her mate work on the same principles from what I have gathered. They are a private species but neither hostile or expansionist. As an export unit my information on the makers was necessarily reduced.#

'Oh well. Thank you for what you've told me. It reassures me to a degree, although I would be grateful if you would continue to search for any possible back door in yourself.' She decided that there was little point worrying about it at the moment, she had far too little information to go on either way.

#I will of course do so, Nabiki. I am not comfortable with the possibility you raised, insofar as I am able to emulate that emotion. It goes against my core design.# Jun sounded a little peevish about the concept. She smiled to herself. While it protested it wasn't truly intelligent, the longer she spoke to it the more impressed she was. The SI was closer to a real person than some actual real people she'd met over the years. Of course, there was always the possibility that the entire thing was an act and it was really much smarter than it let on, it could be playing her perfectly, but as it had correctly pointed out she had absolutely no way to prove that thought one way or the other. Ultimately, it came down to whether she trusted it. The idea that she should trust in any way a half magical half technological synthetic mind created by an alien species unknown to her was one she found hysterical more than anything else. In the end she decided that absent any other information she might as well take it at it's word. Somehow she felt it was being truthful. There was little she could do about it anyway aside from ceasing using it, which she was already extremely reluctant to do. It was just too useful.

'Which of course could be part of the trap,' she mused. 'How far do I want to take paranoia? Ranma is much better at this sort of thing than I am, as is Kasumi, and they seem happy enough. I'll have to mention it to them though. They trust Uthryyl implicitly, and he seems to trust whoever he got these things from the same, so in the end, I suppose it's safe.' Deciding that dropping down the paranoid rabbit hole quickly led to total insanity, she dismissed the problem and opened the first book. Leafing through it rapidly she had Jun copy each page for further study. Jun would recreate the books in her internal library, which made them instantly available to both of them. That possibility had occurred to her practically instantly when she'd found out it could see everything she could.

It's internal storage was absolutely immense, enough to store this entire library many tens of thousands of times over. There was little likelihood that she could ever fill it, even if she recorded everything she saw and heard for her entire life. Finishing with the first book she put it to one side and opened the next. This one sparked her interest, causing her to actually read several chapters carefully, then store the remainder.

It was a pity that so many of these books weren't available online, as she could simply have downloaded them. She suspected that sooner or later that situation would change, the internet was growing fast, but it would take some time. Until then she had to do it the hard way.
Eventually she finished all six books, returning them to their place and retrieving one more her studies had suggested. When that was done with she went out into the afternoon sun and sat on a bench, reading some of the relevant information, before beginning her next report. Several people waved to her as they passed, prompting an absent wave back as she concentrated on her work. She was finding it easier and easier to split her attention between real life and the overlaid information Jun could provide, having several windows open in her mind's eye at the same time. The mental control signals that gave her direct access to the interface had come easily to her, slightly to her surprise, making the entire process as easy as using a normal computer but far more intuitive. It was becoming an extension of her own body in many ways, as simple to control as blinking her eyes.

The whole time it amused her to think what any of the people she knew would think about what she was doing if they could see it. The end result was firmly something out of a particularly good science fiction film. In the end, deciding she'd had enough for the day, she went back to her room, changed, then went out to jog around the campus for a while, before getting something to eat and going to bed for an early night.

Lying in bed she went over her report, finished it and sent it to the printer, then decided to review the operating manual for the communicator. A number of interesting things were still on her to-do list to experiment with. She found the navigation aids quickly, experimenting with activating them. #I have found two timing-based navigation satellite systems accessible to me, Nabiki,# Jun reported immediately. #One is considerably more extensive than the other. Would you like to use them? I can combine them to increase the positional accuracy.# She realised that this must be the American GPS system, plus something similar she recalled the Russians had.

'Yes, please, Jun,' she replied.

#The navigation system is activated. Acquiring full satellite data will take some time, the data rate is very low. I will require up to date map information to provide accurate location information. Do you wish me to attempt to locate it on the internet?# She agreed to this and the SI went quiet for a few seconds. #I have located street level maps of Tokyo and am downloading them. Terrain maps and other relevant data is more difficult to find but I will continue to search. Shall I also download equivalent data for other locations than your current one?#

'You may as well get everything you can find,' she said, reaching over and turning off the bedside light.

#Yes, Nabiki.# It went silent, then added, #The satellite navigation systems appear to have two different levels of accuracy. The lower level is not very precise, it appears to be either deliberately degraded or simply uncorrected information. The higher level was protected by an encryption method. I have cracked it and am using that data now. It is of far higher quality.# It sounded pleased with itself. #The encryption was not particularly effective,# it commented. She grinned.

'I suspect the American military would be somewhat irritated to hear that. From what I've read they're fairly sure it's very good.'

#They do not possess my abilities,# Jun said, sounding as smug as a machine could. #Download of local maps is complete. My apologies for the delay, the speed with which I can connect to your local computer network is somewhat deficient. The technology is primitive.# She grinned again, Jun seemed to be slightly disgusted. It was also getting positively chatty. #I have combined the satellite positioning data with inertial and magnetic sensor data, in addition to radio transmissions from known sources. Positional accuracy should be acceptable, it is approximately plus or minus half a millimetre in X, Y and Z planes with a reproducibility of the same level. Unfortunately the Rather surprised by what the SI considered 'acceptable', she smiled. 'That level of accuracy is fine, thank you, Jun. Most people would consider it exceptional.'

'I have higher standards.' The voice was amused again. She laughed out loud, that was nearly a joke. 'Accuracy should increase slightly as the satellite ephemerides complete their download. I will also work on integrating more sources of positional information as I encounter them. With the permission of their users, the SI units belonging to your team members can provide differential data that will enhance the accuracy of the entire group significantly.' Raising an eyebrow even thought the eye in question was shut, she considered this.

'I'll talk to them about that tomorrow.' Shortly after that she was asleep.

She woke suddenly at just after 3 AM, feeling something was wrong. Lying in bed she listened, but couldn't hear anything amiss. There was definitely a sense of a threat, distant but real, though, although she eventually realised it wasn't aimed at her. Curious, she rose and peered out the window, activating the low light vision mode in the process. Nothing was jumping out at her. Opening the window she leaned out and listened again. 'Jun, can you do the same thing for my hearing?' she asked after a moment.

'Yes, Nabiki. It is more difficult, internal biological processes produce a significant quantity of low level sounds that interfere with increasing the effective gain of your auditory system, but I should be able to filter most of that out. There will, however, be an unavoidable increase in background noise. I will do my best to compensate for it but it will take some time to build the relevant inverse audio patterns to reduce the noise to a minimum. I have enabled the function.'

There was a sudden hissing sound, like an old tape recorder with a blank tape in it and the volume up, accompanied by all sorts of odd gurgling and crunching noises which she rather queasily realised were coming from her own body.

"Ow. That's loud," she muttered, then winced at the sound echoing inside her head.

'My apologies for the excessive noise. I am recalibrating.' The background hiss dropped sharply, with almost all of the internal sounds dying away over a period of a couple of seconds. 'This is the best I can do for the moment, as I build up more data I can improve the results to a degree, Nabiki. I hope it suffices.'

'Thank you, Jun.' Listening again she could hear dozens of sounds that had been inaudible before. Due to the lateness of the hour and her location there were almost no sounds of people, everyone was asleep, but she could make out the sound of car engines and traffic noise coming from a considerable distance, something she realised after a moment must be some sort of vent fans on the roof, odd rumbling sounds that could have been almost anything mechanical. Not to mention the wind in the trees across the campus and various little creaks and groans of buildings moving as the temperature went up and down. Fascinated, she listened carefully, finding she could make out more and more sounds the longer she kept at it. A toilet flushed somewhere across the campus in a neighbouring dormitory, something normal hearing would have missed completely.

"Wow," she whispered, amazed all over again. All the sounds were something her ordinary hearing picked up but her conscious mind never noticed, until the SI amplified everything and filtered out the noise. She was vaguely familiar with the principle but seeing it, or more precisely, hearing it in action was astounding. A sudden noise, faint even to her boosted hearing, made her cock her head and listen intently. It was some distance away, right on the edge of what even the SI could pull out of the background mush.
'What's that?' she asked the device absently. It was silent for half a second, then replied.

#Pattern matching suggests an organic source. It is most likely the sound of a human in severe distress or injured sufficiently to be unable to call out. Please turn your head twenty-five degrees to the left.# She tried to follow the instructions.

'How's that?'

#Adequate. I have localised the source, it is approximately six hundred and fifty metres away on a bearing of two hundred and three degrees. There.# A target designator glowed over the entrance to the pedestrian tunnel under the main road at the entrance to the campus, barely visible in the distance. #The source is inside that tunnel. The shape of the tunnel is focussing the sound in this direction.# That was the direction the feeling of a threat was coming from as well. The middle Tendo looked at the distant target, sighed a little, then put her clothes and shoes on, leaving the room having activated the bracelet spell.

Outside the building she looked around cautiously, staying in the dark where she was fairly sure there were no usable security cameras, following the side of the building until she was well away from the exit. Once she was reasonably sure no one was around she ran quickly towards the tunnel, moving at a speed she'd have found impossible to believe she was capable of six months ago. She couldn't run anywhere near as fast as the others, but she'd put an Olympic sprinter to shame at this point in her training. The fact she could keep it up for a good half hour amazed her as well.

Arriving near the entrance to the pedestrian tunnel Nabiki slowed and listened carefully again. Walking as quietly as she could up to the entrance she made sure she wasn't silhouetted against the streetlight behind her, then peered in. She could see the other end of the underground passage eighty metres or so away, dimly illuminated by the lights on the other side of the main road, but the lights in the tunnel itself were dark. People had been complaining for weeks about it although so far no official attention had been paid to repairing the fault.

Even to her enhanced vision the centre of the tunnel was dim, but she could see well enough to immediately become angry. There was a figure lying crumpled against the side of the passage, another much larger one bending over it. The second person was clearly exploring the pockets of the one on the ground. Next to the prone body was a backpack. She could hear rustling sounds, pained and rapid breathing from the victim of what was clearly a mugging, and when she listened carefully, two heartbeats. One was very rapid and shallow, while the other was much stronger. The mugger was humming to himself, apparently content with his work.

A little surprised at being able to make out such faint sounds thirty metres away she pressed her back against the darkest wall of the tunnel and slowly worked her way down it, watching the mugger carefully. He was absolutely huge, one of the largest men she'd ever seen, looking more like a sumo wrestler gone bad than anything else. He'd have made two of Genma. Stopping five metres away, the Tendo woman quietly took a deep breath then stepped into the middle of the tunnel, holding a pair of ki balls. The mugger snapped erect at the sudden flickering green glow illuminating the tunnel with an eerie light, then slowly looked over his shoulder, his eyes wide. She put her most worryingly cold grin on and stepped forward, holding the ki spheres at chest level, which had the effect of under-lighting her face nicely.

"Hello. I'd like to have a word with you, please."

Sho hummed a popular tune under his breath, carefully patting down the young man he'd expertly whacked on the back of the head with a short length of garden hose full of sand, looking for anything else he could take. The lad had possessed quite a nice phone, which was now in his own pocket, a very good watch, likewise liberated, but disappointingly little cash. Pulling out a wallet from an inside pocket the large mugger held it up to the dim illumination coming from the end of the tunnel, straining to see what was in it unsuccessfully, then shrugged and put it in his pocket as well. He'd look at it later when he could see what he was doing.

Removing a couple of rings he straightened up, massaging his back. This job was a pain in several ways, most of them to other people. He chuckled a little at his own joke, bending again to pick up the backpack he'd removed from his client. The younger, smaller man seemed to be breathing fairly steadily so he'd most likely live. Sho was proud of the manner in which he could, even when he could barely see them, take most people down with one deft blow to the right spot on the skull. He hardly ever permanently maimed them and had only killed two people so far in a career covering nearly a decade.

Frowning, he wondered why he could see the backpack so much better all of a sudden. It seemed to be flickering a leaf-green colour. After a moment he realised that the entire tunnel was now visible, apparently illuminated from somewhere behind him. Standing up so quickly he dropped the backpack he turned his head and froze in shock.

The young woman standing too close for his liking was grinning at him in a way that reminded him of the sharks at the aquarium. He'd had no warning at all she was there. She was much smaller than him but that fact didn't register quite as strongly as the one about the way she was holding a ball of glowing green energy in each hand. The look of confidence on her face made him take a step back. It boded ill. He wasn't a complete idiot, although many who knew him would have said that was only because he was missing something, he had a pretty shrewd idea that young women with energy balls in their hands were very bad news. He'd heard stories...

"Hello," she said in an icy voice. "I'd like to have a word with you, please." He shivered a little. That tone of voice suggested something horrible was likely to happen. Suddenly he got a very good idea of what his clients felt the moment before the impact of his first blow.

"Um. Who are you?" he asked slowly, his eyes flicking around. There didn't seem to be any convenient hiding places. Inwardly cursing the way that his choice of work location was now neatly trapping him in what for all intents and purposes was a firing range, he took a slow step back. She raised one hand warningly, making him think that the energy ball in it was aimed very carefully at his chest.

"No. I think not. You should stand very still for the moment." The pretty green ball shrank a little and glowed brighter. He froze again.

"Who I am is unimportant. I'm more interested in who you are and what you're doing. It looks to me like you've been very anti-social." She glanced at the young man on the ground meaningfully, her expression hardening further if that was possible. "Empty your pockets."

"What?"

"Everything. Put it on the ground, then take three steps back and lie on your face."

He glared at her, incensed. He'd worked hard for what he'd got tonight, four clients in a row was quite difficult. "Or what?" he demanded.

The ball of energy screamed past his face close enough to make the hair on the side of his head crinkle in the heat from it before he was sprayed by chips of ceramic tiles spalled off the wall of the passageway. He yelped in pain, ducking away from the point of impact, his ears hurting from the explosion it had produced, the sound making the entire tunnel ring like a very large bass bell.
The echoes took a couple of seconds to die away.

"Ow. That was loud," the girl mumbled to herself, shaking her head a little. "Note to self, don't open fire in a tunnel without earplugs." He could barely hear her, he'd been a lot closer to the blast than she was.

"Fucking hell, you could have killed me!" he shouted. She smiled in a way that made his heart jump.

"Oh, yes, that's very true." Another ball of energy was aimed at him. He got the message, quickly turning his pockets inside out. Several wallets and a number of other items ended up on the small pile in front of him, before he stepped back a few paces. Thinking about running, he looked over his shoulder then back at the girl. She was smiling in a very unsettling manner.

"You can try but there's no way I could miss down here," she said conversationally. Sighing, he knelt then lay prone. "Good. Now, be sensible and stay there. I'm going to take this young man and all these things, while the police will collect you in a few minutes. They're on their way. If I see you again, I will be very angry." He heard her pick up the various things he'd worked hard to get, then she came into view, bending and carefully gathering up the young man in her arms. He tensed himself to jump at her, but she glanced at him and shook her head.

"I wouldn't." He didn't.

Her light footsteps faded away back the way she'd come, then seconds later a brilliant flash of light illuminated the inside of the tunnel like full sunlight. He twitched, raising his head a little to stare after her. He was still looking when the police came for him from the other direction.

"Thanks for coming so late," Nabiki said to 'Chou', who was going over the young man on the bed. They were in the safe house apartment they'd taken Shampoo and Akane to during that event months ago. Her sister smiled at her.

"It's no trouble. You handled that very well indeed. This poor man was in a bad way, his assailant hit him very hard in a bad place to be hit. His skull was fractured and his brain was swelling. It could have been extremely unfortunate if he'd been lying there until someone came across him." She looked annoyed and upset. "That unpleasant large man could easily have killed him."

Aiko walked over and looked down at him. "I wonder if he's a student at your university?" she asked. Nabiki nodded after a moment's study of the young man's face.

"I think he is. I vaguely recognise him, I might have seen him in one of the lectures." She shrugged. "Not sure. It doesn't matter, no one deserves that sort of treatment when they're just walking along minding their own business." The other two nodded as well. Standing, 'Chou' looked at the man on the bed.

"Well, that's all done. He's fine now, but he'll be asleep for another ten minutes or so. What do you want to do with him?" Nabiki stared at her for a moment, surprised. Her sister seemed amused.

"You saved him. It's your call."

"Fair enough. Let's take him back to the university campus, somewhere quiet, and I can explain to him. Then I really want to go back to bed." She grinned, yawning. "I'm new to all this and I'm exhausted. Intimidating enormous muggers is tiring." Aiko snickered.

"It's a lot of fun, though."
Picking the fellow up 'Chou' joined her sister and her friend, before they vanished, to reappear at one corner of the campus under some cherry trees. Putting him down on the bench there, she stepped back. "Would you like me to take the other things to the local police? I can drop them in without causing any suspicion. Just an anonymous person who found a pile of someone else's belongings." She grinned.

"Thanks, sis. I'll see you guys soon." They both waved before teleporting away. Sitting next to the young man Nabiki waited. Soon he groaned a little, then rolled his head around, before his eyes opened. Glancing blearily around he suddenly noticed the brunette sitting next to him smiling.

"Hi."

Sliding a little further away, he looked cautiously at her. "Ah, hi. Um, who are you? What's going on?" Her smile widened.

"Just a friend. You got mugged, in the pedestrian underpass. Do you remember?" He thought for a moment, then slowly nodded.

"Someone came up from behind when I was half-way through, then... I got hit? On the back of the head?" His hand went up to gingerly probe the relevant spot, making him look slightly surprised at the lack of pain.

"That's it. Don't worry, you're fine. I arranged some medical help. The mugger is in the custody of the police now." She reached down beside the bench and picked up his backpack, handing it to him. "Your watch and the other things he took from you are in here." Standing she stepped back. "I'd suggest that going down dark tunnels in the middle of the night probably isn't the best idea." Turning, she began to walk away.

"Hey! Wait! Who are you, anyway?" Jumping to his feet he followed her. She looked at him with amusement.

"No, you can't follow me home. That happened with a dog once and my father was furious." Startled, he laughed, making her chuckle. "Sorry, I don't want any attention. I just couldn't stand by and let someone get mugged." They stopped under a street-light and she faced him.

"Are you saying you stopped the mugger?" he asked dubiously, looking her up and down. She nodded.

"Yep. It was easy enough." Holding up her hand she made a small ki ball appear then vanish, grinning at his expression. "Anyway, I need some sleep. Take care." Turning she broke into a sprint, making him gape at the speed with which she disappeared into the dark. After a very long pause he looked around, worked out where he was, then slowly walked home, trying to remember her face and failing.

As Nabiki slipped into bed again, she mumbled, "I hope that's not going to happen every night. I need my sleep." She was smiling as she fell asleep though.

Masato woke as the nurse came into the room. She looked at him with a gentle smile, moving to stand beside the bed. Checking the readings on the monitor that the hospital had insisted they attach to him, despite his insistence that the pads itched and he was hardly in serious danger, she nodded approvingly, making a quick note on his chart. "Good, everything seems fine. I'm just going to check your wound." He smiled back, rubbing his eyes, looking at the pretty young woman with long dark hair. She wasn't a nurse he'd seen before, but he was always meeting new ones.
"What time is it?"

"Just after half past six in the morning." Moving the covers aside she gently probed the stab wound. "Do you have any pain?" she asked, her hand over the bandage. He shook his head.

"Not really. It aches a bit, but nothing like what it felt like when that punk stuck the knife in me in the first place." He grinned at her slight expression of annoyance, making her smile back. She had a beautiful smile, serene and calming.

"You were very brave from what I've heard, taking on two young men with weapons."

He shrugged a little, pulling himself up in bed. "Just doing my job. I have to admit I didn't expect it to end up as a fight to the death, but it was kind of late to call for help by that point. I was a bit busy..." She laughed quietly, gently peeling back the tape holding the bandage to the skin, before inspecting his leg. Nodding, she replaced it, applying new tape that she pulled from the drawer next to the bed, then tucked the covers back into place.

"It looks fine. You should be up and about quite soon." Stepping back she studied him. "I heard you got saved by a magical girl?" He snickered.

"That's what they're calling her. I don't know, myself. She certainly had some unusual abilities, and a very impressive presence, though. I wouldn't like to be on her shit list. It would be fairly unhealthy from what I saw."

The nurse giggled. "I wonder who she is?"

"No idea. It's weird, I can't remember anything about what she looked like, or sounded like. She could walk into the room right now and I wouldn't recognise her. That's the strangest thing about all of it." Shrugging, he grinned. "Doesn't matter. I'll probably never see her again anyway, but I owe her. Her privacy is a small price. The police asked me quite a few questions, but even if I had the answers I wouldn't tell them, it's not my business."

The dark-haired nurse nodded understandingly. "It sounds like a matter of honour."

"Exactly." Looking at her watch she smiled slightly, then glanced back at him.

"I have to go, I'm afraid. So many things to do!" Masato chuckled. "But it was nice to talk to you, Mr. Hayashi. I hope you're out of bed soon. Good-bye." With a wave she left. Closing his eyes his mind drifted back to the fight as he fell asleep again.

Waking some time later when his regular nurse came into the room and efficiently swept the curtains back, he blinked a bit at the bright sunlight. "Ah, Mr. Hayashi, how are you feeling today?" She picked his chart up, looking at the monitor and writing down the readings, then stopped and looked confused. "Hmm. Odd, who did this?" she mumbled, tapping her pen on the line above hers. After a moment she shrugged, replacing the chart and flipping his bedclothes aside. "Let's see how your wound is coming along, shall we? I need to replace the bandages."

Her patient was slightly puzzled. "The other nurse checked it already, only a couple of hours ago."

"Oh, you must be mistaken," she said, laughing slightly. "I'm the only one doing that. I think it was probably a dream, that happens all the time." Carefully peeling the tape back she removed the gauze pad to inspect his wound. He watched curiously as her face paled, then began to feel apprehensive. Her eyes remained fixed on his leg.

"Um, is there a problem?" he asked, now rather worried. She snapped her eyes to his face, then back to his leg.

After another long pause, she asked faintly, "What did this other nurse look like?"

"Tallish for a woman, mid twenties, dark brown hair past her shoulders."

"Did you happen to get her name?" He shook his head.

"No, it didn't come up." Think back, he frowned slightly. "She had a name badge, I think, but I can't remember what it said."

"I see."

"I see." After staring at his leg some more, she put the pad back, her hand trembling slightly. "I need to talk to the doctor. I'll be back."

"I see."

"I see."

"What on earth is going on?" he muttered, curious and worried. Poking the gauze gently he realised that nothing hurt. That was good. After a moment, with a quick glance towards the door, slightly guiltily he peeled the tape away and peered under the pad...

When the doctor came in followed by two nurses who were talking urgently to him, Masato was lying back in bed laughing quietly to himself, the dressings discarded on the bed beside his unblemished leg.

"Come on, Akane! Keep up!" Shampoo called over her shoulder to her friend, running lightly up the roof of the three story building then leaping across the street. Various people looked up, some with smiles, some with slight frowns, as the Chinese girl flew across the eight metre gap, her long lilac hair streaming behind her. Puffing slightly Akane tried the same thing, only barely clearing the roof, falling prone onto the steeply angled tiles and hanging on while mumbling to herself.

Shampoo walked back down to her, laughing.

"That was quite good. You're definitely getting better, you haven't missed once today. Not like yesterday. That poor man was very surprised when you landed on your head in his garden."

"Not as much as I was," the youngest Tendo muttered into the warm tiles under her face, then cautiously rolled over and sat up. She stared at the gap she'd cleared, impressed despite herself.

"Wow. It looks a lot further from here for some reason."

"Three more and then I have to go back to the Café, my lunch break will be over. Let's go that way." She pointed, then accelerated along the peak of the roof, leaping off the end with a whoop.

Akane watched, grinning, then did the same. The observers on the ground smiled or frowned again, then went about their business.

Miki waved to Nabiki as the Tendo woman entered the library, causing her to change course and walk over with a smile. "Hi, Nabiki. I haven't seen you for a few days."

"No, I've been away on and off. Back to Nerima for the weekend, then visiting friends in Minato."

She grinned. "I've got something for you." Reaching into her pocket she pulled out a piece of paper with several signatures on it, sliding it over to the other young woman. Miki picked it up and stared at it with wide eyes.
"Holy shit!" she squealed, making several people stare disapprovingly at her as her voice echoed around the large reading room. She flushed, glancing about then lowering her voice. "Is this real?" she asked excitedly.

"Yep. I was walking down the street and that Yori girl came out of a shop. She recognised me and stopped to talk. I happened to mention you liked collecting magical girl autographs. When she stopped laughing she signed that, then she called some of her friends. They all signed as well. I told you they were nice people." She leaned back in her chair looking pleased, while Miki's hand shook slightly. Eventually she very carefully folded the piece of paper and put it carefully away in her purse, then leaned forward and took Nabiki's hands in hers.

"Thank you so much, Nabiki," she said, smiling brilliantly. "I owe you a huge favour."

"It was nothing." Nabiki waved it off, making the other woman look doubtful. "Really. It just happened. Pure luck. If you'd been there you'd probably have been able to do the same thing."

"I could never have just walked up to her and asked," Miki said quietly. "I'd be too embarrassed. They're famous."

Snickering, Nabiki replied, "They don't seem to want to be famous from what I've heard. There are others that are much more interested in publicity."

"Do you know any of them?" Miki asked eagerly. The Tendo sister shook her head, sighing in amusement.

"Miki, it's not like I'm a personal friend of every magical girl in the city. I happen to have met two of them through my sister, that's all. 'That's not all, but it's complicated...' She laughed inside.

"Thanks, though. Really. This is fantastic. My sister will go mad." The other young woman giggled. "Now I just need to find the local girl and get her autograph. She seems to be working hard, she's foiled at least one crime every night but one for the last week. I think she has to be from around here. There are some pretty impressive stories growing around her. The last two guys she stopped from robbing that shop apparently pissed themselves." She laughed, while Nabiki chuckled a little.

' That was very funny, although a bit disgusting,' she remembered. Ranma and Kasumi had been watching that one live, the martial artist had been howling with laughter over the link. "I'd never have thought there was so much crime around here," she said out loud, making Miki nod.

"I know. But I guess what they say is right, if you go looking for trouble you tend to find it."

'I haven't been looking for it but it sure keeps finding me,' Nabiki thought, although she nodded soberly.

"Guess so." Getting up she added, "I need to get a few books. See you later."

"I'll probably be here. I've got a lot of studying to do." Miki smiled at her friend, then opened her book. Heading back into the stacks the brunette Tendo quickly located several books, after a moments thought returning with them to the other woman. She looked up. "That was quick. I have no idea how you can do that. It takes me hours sometimes to find the books I need." Nabiki shrugged.

"It's a gift." Inwardly she smirked. ' That's true. Jun was a gift.' Opening the first book she leafed through it, much more slowly than she normally did, aware of the other woman watching.
Stopping occasionally to read a chapter, she looked up after a few minutes to see Miki staring at her.

"You read incredibly quickly," the girl said, impressed. Slightly surprised, Nabiki nodded.

"I've always been a fast reader. Since I've been at university I've done so much reading I seem to have gotten quicker. I didn't think much about it though, it just sort of happened." This was true, she hadn't actually noticed until it was pointed out but thinking about it she realised that in the last few months her reading speed had increased considerably, even taking into account the acquisition of Jun recently.

"That's a really useful skill," Miki commented with slight envy, returning to her own book. "I'm much slower." They sat in companionable silence for the next hour, reading, Miki making notes every now and then. Finishing with all four books Nabiki closed the last one, then got up to return them to the shelves. When she returned John was sitting with her friend. He looked up and smiled.

"Hi, Nabiki. How's everything with you?"

"Fine, thanks. And you?"

"Also fine. Very good, actually. We're going to a movie tonight, would you like to come?" She thought for a second then nodded.

"Sure. Why not?" He grinned.

"Do you like spy films?" The middle sister laughed slightly.

"Oh, I have something of a soft spot for them. What time?"

"We should meet outside your dormitory around, um, say seven or so? That will give us time to get there. We could get something to eat after." Nabiki nodded.

"All right. I'll see you guys then. Bye." Waving, she left the building, heading to the swimming pool for some exercise. She swam two dozen lengths at a steady pace, musing on the events of the last few days and just relaxing. Various students watched her, some of the males with considerable appreciation, in her swimsuit she was physically quite impressive. None of them approached her though, she'd made it clear a long time ago that she wasn't particularly interested. Romance wasn't something on her schedule. It hadn't been for a while. There were too many other things to do first, originally the Akane situation and more lately the whole magical girl thing which had taken her by surprise. She still wasn't sure how she felt about it, although it was growing on her. Helping people was something she found, rather to her own surprise, that she actually enjoyed.

'I doubt that many people from back in the old days at Furinkan High would have ever believed that!' she snickered internally.

A few lengths more, as she was beginning to think of stopping, she got a call from her father. Answering she kept swimming. "Hi, Dad. What's up?"

"Hello, Nabiki. I hope I haven't interrupted anything."

"No, I was just doing a bit of exercising." He chuckled.

"Good. We really should teach you some martial arts katas, they're very good exercise." She laughed slightly.
"Perhaps one day."

"You always say that. I think you'd be quite good at it." He paused, then added, "I won't push. I was just hoping you might know where the old photo albums were, the ones from when I was teaching the first time? I wanted to show some of the students a few of the pictures. I've looked everywhere and I can't find them. Akane doesn't know either." She thought for a few seconds.

"Have you tried at the far left corner of the attic? Behind the boxes of Mom's old clothes? I'm pretty sure I saw them there a couple of years ago."

"Ah. Thank you, Nabiki, I'll go and have a look. How are your studies coming along?"

"Pretty well, Dad. I got the top score in the class on my programming class, and tied on economic theory. The professor was quite complimentary on my paper." She reached the end of the pool again, then heaved herself out to sit on the edge.

"Well done, dear. Your mother would have been proud. I know I am. Right, I'm off into the depths of the attic, I guess." She giggled.

"Good luck. Watch out for the attic spiders, they'll have your arm off if you're not careful." Laughing, he disconnected. Smiling to herself she padded off to shower and dress.

Coming out of the local cinema a few hours later, she was giggling uncontrollably. "That was terrible! So bad it was hysterical. There were so many plot holes, and the gadgets were just ridiculous." John was laughing as well, while Miki grinned.

"The bit at the beginning with the boat chase was pretty good."

"Oh, it was well done, I agree. I just don't think it was necessary." They quoted bits of dialogue at each other as they headed to the restaurant they'd decided on. "It probably suffers in translation, I'd like to see it in the original English," Nabiki said after a while, still laughing.

"I wish my English was good enough for that," Miki said with a sigh. "I was never very good with languages. I know enough to get by but I couldn't watch an entire movie in it and still enjoy it." John put his arm around her shoulders.

"I can help you with it. You helped me with my Japanese." She smiled up at him.

"Thank you, I'd like that. Maybe we should get some English DVDs and watch them, it might be good practice." As the trio was walking along, they passed a doorway out of which stepped a middle aged man who stood in front of them, making Nabiki's threat sense flare. It had been poking her a little for the last couple of hundred metres but she couldn't work out where the danger was. Now, though, as he pulled a knife from his pocket she knew.

'Fuck,' she thought, irritated. He thrust the knife warningly in their direction, but only got half-way through a demand for money when she grabbed his wrist without breaking step, squeezed and twisted while pulling hard, then bent and turned to the side slightly, allowing him to slide neatly over her shoulder, dropping his knife from a paralysed hand in the process. He landed on his back on the ground with a thud that knocked the wind out of him. It had been automatic, a move she'd seen her father and his students perform dozens of times, surprising even her with how smoothly she pulled it off. Kneeling on his stomach she bent his wrist viciously, making him stop weakly struggling and instead yelp in agony. When she looked up she saw Miki and John staring incredulously at her. It had happened so fast they hadn't even had time to realise quite what was going on.
"Holy shit, Nabiki!" Miki squeaked, her hands at her mouth. "How the hell did you do that!?" She shrugged with slight embarrassment.

"Family of martial artists, remember? I picked up a few tricks over the years. Lucky for him it wasn't my younger sister, she'd have broken several bones in the process. Then probably kicked him in the ribs for good measure." The man groaned and she returned her attention to him, inwardly hoping this didn't give anyone any of the right ideas. "Sorry, friend, but that was a stupid thing to do. Just lie there, that's a good man." He didn't seem in a state to do much else, having smacked his head fairly hard on the pavement.

John had his phone out and was dialling. "I'm calling the police," he said. She sighed a little.

"Looks like we're going to be late for the restaurant. Sorry, guys." Miki was still staring at her in shock.

"Screw magical girls, I want your autograph," she said after a few seconds, then laughed.

"Hello. Police please." John watched the man, who was gritting his teeth in pain. The expression on Nabiki's face was cold and hard enough when she looked down at the man that he shivered a little. "Yes, hello, someone just tried to mug my friends and myself at knife-point." There was a pause, then he gave the approximate location. "No, the mugger is still here." Another pause, with him smiling. "We're all fine and he's not going anywhere. One of my friends knows some martial arts. He didn't have much luck." Listening, he chuckled. "Thanks. We'll wait."

The police turned up within a couple of minutes as a patrol car had been just a few hundred metres away. The two police officers got out and walked over, looking curiously at the slender young woman easily restraining the substantially larger man with some form of wrist lock. She smiled at them.

"Hi. Making a collection?" They both grinned.

Shortly they had taken statements from all three students, handcuffed the groaning would-be mugger and parking him in the back of their car, then bagged the knife on the ground. "So, Miss Tendo. A Neriman native, I see. I suppose we should be grateful there isn't a huge hole in the nearest building." She giggled.

"No, that's my sister." They looked amused yet slightly worried. "She's a lot better these days."

"Well, congratulations, you seem to have dealt with the suspect very efficiently. Have you considered a career in law enforcement? We always need people who can handle themselves in a crisis." The officer smiled at her. She shook her head, laughing.

"Not the career path I have in mind. Thank you, though."

"She was amazing," Miki exclaimed, excited. "I didn't even know what was going on before he was on the ground without his knife. I've never seen anyone move that fast before, it was better than the movie we just saw." The middle sister sighed internally.

"I'm not that good, Miki. My sister is the one with all the training. I just know a few good tricks. Plus that idiot wasn't very good or expecting any resistance."

"It was pretty damn impressive even so, Nabiki," John said quietly. "You really were very fast indeed. Neither one of us would have known what to do." Flushing slightly, she accepted the praise reluctantly. The two cops watched for a moment, then smiled.
"We'll be in touch should we need anything more from you. Thank you, by the way, I'm pretty sure this guy is the one we've been looking for around here for a few days, he's mugged half a dozen students. There seems to be something of a mini crime wave at the moment. Take care of yourselves." The officer nodded politely to them before he and his colleague got back into the car and drove off. After a moment spent looking wordlessly at each other, the three young people resumed walking to the restaurant.

"The night has turned out to be more entertaining than I expected," John said dead-pan, making his girlfriend start giggling helplessly. Nabiki shrugged, but smiled a little.

#Nabiki, someone is actively scanning the area with an unfamiliar advanced magitech system similar to me.# Jun suddenly said, making the middle Tendo tense slightly. She was walking down the street towards the Minato station she connected to from the train from Setagaya, which unfortunately didn't connect in the same physical place. Slowly, trying not to look conspicuous, she glanced around. A targeting outline appeared around a young woman twenty metres away, who was looking around in a similar manner, doing a considerably less effective job of trying to be discreet. She was holding a small device about the size of a large cellphone. #There. She is scanning the immediate vicinity. I don't recognise the technology manufacturer, it is not in my database, but it appears to be a more primitive variant of my own design, without the SI function or some of the more advanced combat augmentations. Even so it is far beyond the local capabilities of this world.# The girl glanced in their direction, Nabiki looking through her as if she didn't notice her.

'Can she read anything from you?' she asked, proceeding on her way without missing a step.

#No. I am undetectable to all forms of technology, magic based or otherwise, known to my makers. While I do not recognise the specific technology she is using it is of a general type I know is inferior to my own design. However, she will be able to read your energy signature, which is at considerable variance to the norm. Her own energy signature suggests formidable abilities and power levels. I have no information on her but we must assume hostile intent in the absence of other data. I suggest evasion.#

'Can you block her scan?' Nabiki asked, slowing to look in a shop window while she thought. Popping up an overlay she inspected the image Jun had taken of the woman's face. She had short blue hair, reminding her a little of Akane, but a few years younger.

#I am sorry, but no. The technology is quite advanced even if not up to my own level. I could most likely devise a blocking method given sufficient time which we do not have. She is about to scan you, evasion is no long...# The SI stopped talking abruptly, cutting off mid-word.

Worried, Nabiki asked urgently, 'Jun? What's wrong?' The device sounded genuinely puzzled when it replied a second later.

#Something very unusual just happened. I am unable to determine the cause. As she was beginning her scan there was a very odd energy surge which completely blocked it, then some remarkably effective form of perception obfuscation took action. She would appear not to have noticed. Her device seems none the wiser either.# It stopped again for a moment. #She is moving on. Very odd. I cannot explain it.#

'Weird. I guess she's probably a magical girl but I don't recognise her. There are a lot I don't know yet, I've only met a few of them so far.'

#I have stored the energy signatures of her device and the woman herself. If we encounter them again you will know. I would suggest mentioning this to Kasumi and Ranma. They are likely to recognise the woman and can inform you whether she presents a threat.

Nodding once, very slightly, Nabiki went on her way, glancing back at the woman who was walking away, apparently still scanning the area. She wondered who she was and what group she belonged to. In all probability she was no threat to the Tendo sister but it was interesting. She was also extremely curious about what on earth had just happened. Jun sounded very confused.

The SI had overlaid a discreet map in the corner of her vision showing a view of the nearby streets, with her location indicated in the middle. A red dot indicated the location of the mystery woman, who was steadily moving away. The device seemed to have gone into full-blown threat assessment mode, treating the encounter as a combat situation. The way the icon of the other woman was labelled 'Hostile target?' showed that pretty clearly. Mildly worried but also quite amused Nabiki continued on her way.
"You have met her, actually." Ranma grinned at her. She looked puzzled.

"I don't think so. I'm pretty good with faces."

